THE PICTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND is now brought down to the accession of George III., after having been in course of publication for four years all but two months, during which time there has appeared every month a portion of the Work containing nearly as much letterpress and pictorial illustration together as would fill an ordinary octavo volume of three hundred and fifty pages. The whole, if printed, for example, in the manner of the Oxford edition of Burnet's History of his Own Time, would make thirty-five such octavo volumes as those of that work, containing about four hundred and fifty pages each.

Notwithstanding a previously announced intention of carrying on the narrative, without a break, to a date a few years later, it has, on a consideration of all circumstances, been determined to bring the Original Work to a close now, as the course which will best fulfil the spirit of the engagements that have been made with the subscribers. It could not have been extended, as was at one time designed, to the commencement of the French Revolution, without the addition of a fifth volume, which, besides, would probably not have corresponded in bulk with the others; while, after all, the point of time at which the narrative was broken off would scarcely have been so much of an epoch, in English history, as that at which it actually terminates.

But, to make the Work as complete as possible, a Continuation of it has been commenced under the title of THE PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF GEORGE III., in which the progress of Legislation;

Institutions, Arts, Literature, and the Condition of Society in all its departments, as well as the progress of events, will be pursued as far as possible after the same plan as in the History now before the reader. This will, in fact, be the History of the American and French Revolutions, and of the long and eventful war, produced by the latter, in which, although it involved all Europe, our own country on the one side bore the principal part, as France did on the other, blended with the history of a contest of parties and principles at home also the most fiercely waged, and the most ennobled by brilliant displays, of any recorded in the annals of the constitution, and accompanied, moreover, by the history of an activity and advancement in commerce, manufactures, and every other field of peaceful industry and enterprise, making the social aspect of the subject vie in interest with the military and the political. Altogether, it will be the history of the greatest movement in human affairs that has happened since the Reformation—in some respects the greatest that has taken place since the establishment of the existing commonwealth of Europe; it will be the history of that movement complete in its beginning, its middle, and its end,—in so far as any such movement can be said to have an end:—it will be the history of it, at least, to its first general subsidence and pause.

This New Work, which will be abundantly illustrated with Wood Engravings will be published in Monthly Parts of the same number of pages with those of the present; and will be completed, it is expected, in about twenty such Parts. But it will be divided into three, instead of two, volumes; and new Title-pages are now issued for the present Work, in order that it also may be bound in less bulky volumes than those in which it originally appeared.

Upon the new Title-pages it has been thought proper to place the names of myself and Mr. Mac Farlane, by whom five-sixths of the book has been written. But if it had not been that the editing of the Work had been all along in my hands, the authorship might with more propriety have been assumed by Mr. Mac Farlane alone, who has written by far the greater portion of it,—the whole of the Narrative of Civil and Military Transactions, constituting the First Chapter of each Book, and extending in all to nearly two thousand two hundred pages, having been furnished by him, with the exception of little more than a hundred pages. The other portions of the Work have been contributed by the following gentlemen :—The History of Religion for the first three Books (with the exception of the sketch of Druidism in the First Book) by Mr. Thomas Thomson; the Third Chapter of each Book (with the exception of the account of the British Nations in Book First, the accounts of the Revenue, and various insertions, especially in Books Second, Third, and Eighth) by Mr. A. Bisset, barrister-at-law; the History of the Useful Arts, at the end of the Fourth Chapter of each Book by Mr. J. C. Platt (except that in Book First, which is by Mr. Planché) the account of Saxon Literature in the Fifth Chapter of Book Second, and the arranged specimens of language and style in the same chapter of Book Third, Fifth, and Sixth, by Sir Henry Ellis; the History of Architecture in the Fifth Chapter of the Second and following Books, by Mr. Poynter; the History of Music in the same Chapter of Books Fourth, Fifth, Seventh Eighth, and Ninth, by Mr. Ayrton; the accounts of Costume and Furnitur in the Sixth Chapter of each Book by Mr. Planché; and the History of Manners and Customs, forming the remainder of that Chapter, by Mr. Thomson

CHAPTER I.

NARRATIVE OF CIVIL AND MILITARY TRANSACTIONS.

A. D. 1688.—INTERREGNUM.

THE work of the Revolution was not completed by the flight of James; the crown was in a state of abeyance for nearly two months, or from the 23rd of December, 1688, to the 13th of February, 1689, during which time the Whigs were brought to the enunciation of admission principles which were equally new to the people, bold, and wise. Up to a certain point all parties seemed to agree (the papists were too inconsiderable to merit the name of a party); but the Tories and high churchmen soon hung back, and left the danger and the honour of settling the problem to the Whigs, who proceeded, not by the stated rules of the English government and laws, but by the general rights of mankind, looking not so much to Magna Charta as to the original compact between the governors and the governed conceived to be involved in the idea of a political society;* the notion of which had hitherto been considered as a republican chimera, though it had been entertained by the wisest and best of the Commonwealth men. The Prince of Orange, who had taken up his residence, not at Whitehall, but at St. James's,† seemed to leave the nation to settle the business in their own way, most scrupulously avoiding any assumption of right and any symptom of eagerness. On the 25th of December the lords spiritual and temporal to the number of about ninety, who had taken their places in the House of Lords, requested William to take upon him the administration of affairs and the disposal of the public revenue, and to issue writs for a "Convention" to meet on the 22nd of January; and on the following day an assembly of such persons as had sat in parliament in the reign of Charles II., to the number of about a hundred and fifty, together with the aldermen of London and fifty of the common council, having met at St. James's pursuant to the expressed desire of the prince, immediately proceeded to the Commons' House, and there, after some debate, agreed upon an address similar to that of the Lords. The prince dispatched circular letters, accordingly, to the several counties, universities, cities, and boroughs; and in the mean time the country, the fleet, and all that remained of James's army, submitted quietly to his authority. In Ireland it was very different; but in Scotland men were as prompt in their obedience as in England. Under the dextrous management of the Duke of Hamilton, Sir Patrick Hume, Sir John Dalrymple, and other Whig leaders, about thirty Scottish peers, and eighty commoners, intrusted William to take upon him the administration of Scotland until the convention of the estates to be summoned by him should be assembled. But the Earl of Arrian, the eldest son of the Duke of Hamilton, expressed himself very boldly for the recall of the fugitive king; the Duke of Gordon, a Catholic, held the castle of Edinburgh for James; and apprehensions were entertained of the furious loyalty of Graham of Claverhouse, who had lately been created by King James II. Viscount Dundee.

A. D. 1689.—On the appointed day—the 22nd of January—the English convention, or parliament, as it was afterwards declared to be, assembled in the Houses of Parliament, and proceeded vigorously to their important business. The Marquess of Halifax was elected to the presidency in the Lords, and Mr. Poole, one of the patriots of Charles II.'s parliaments who had taken bribes from France, was chosen Speaker in the Commons. A letter from William was read in both Houses. His highness told them that he had endeavoured to the utmost of his power to perform what had been desired of him, in order to the maintenance of the public peace and safety; that it now rested with themselves to lay the foundations of a firm security for their religion, their laws, and their liberties; that he did not doubt

* Subsequently, however, two Scottish regiments in England revolted because William ordered them to serve in Holland and took the command of them from Lord Dumbarton, who was their old commander, but a determined Jacobite. General Ginckel overtook these Scots as they were marching from the coast of Suffolk towards the borders with drums beating and colours flying, and very easily put down the mutiny. William pardoned all the mutineers, officers as well as men.

• • Hallam, Const. Hist.

† "All the world," says Evelyn, "go to see the prince at St. James's. There there is a great court. There I saw him, and several of my acquaintance who came over with him. He is very stately, serious, and reserved."—Diary.

That, by such a full and free representation of the nation as was now met, all the ends of the declaration which he had put forth on landing might be peaceably attained; "and since it had pleased God hitherto to bless his good intentions with so great success, he trusted in him, that he would complete his own work, by sending a spirit of peace and union to influence their counsels, so that no interruption might be given to a happy and lasting settlement." William next alluded to the dangerous condition of the Protestants in Ireland, and then passed on to the affairs of Holland and the Continent, which he had still more at heart. He told them that the present state of things abroad obliged him to warn them that, next to the danger of unseasonable divisions among themselves, nothing could be so fatal as too great delays in their consultations; that the States of Holland, by whom he had been enabled to rescue this nation, might suddenly want the troops which he had brought over, as the old and powerful enemy of both countries (Louis XIV.) had declared war against the States. And he further intimated, that as England was already bound by treaty to help the Dutch in such exigencies, so he felt confident that the cheerful concurrence of the Dutch in preserving this kingdom, with so much hazard to themselves, would meet with all the returns of friendship from Protestants and Englishmen whenever their own condition should require assistance.*

In the Commons, Poole, the Speaker, embraced all the prince's views with a most ardent zeal, and carried some of them much farther than William had done, artfully striking a key-note to which he knew the old national feeling, and pride, and prejudice would respond. He reminded his hearers of the dangerous state England was still in, and of the fatal consequences that must follow any disagreement; he spoke vehemently of the papists in Ireland, and of the loss England might sustain by the disseverment of that kingdom; and lastly, he dwelt upon the growth of the exorbitant power of the king of France, and the vast designs of that turbulent and aspiring monarch, the persecutor of the Protestant religion everywhere, and the sworn enemy of England,† exciting the House to put the nation in such a warlike attitude as might not only secure it from any affront, but also enable it to subdue France a second time, or at least to recover the provinces of Normandy and Aquitain, which were the indisputable inheritance of the kings of England. This speech threw the House into a sort of transport; the old walls rang with warlike shouts, and everything was agreed to that William or his party desired. Nor was the Upper House either cold or critical. In a very full meeting, from which scarcely any were absent even among the bishops, except Sancroft, the primate, they appointed a day of public thanksgiving to Almighty God for having made his highness the glorious instrument of the great deliverance of the kingdom from popery and arbitrary power; and they joined the Commons in an address of thanks to the prince, to whom, "next under God," this happy deliverance was owing. The Lords and Commons in a united body presented the address, which, besides thanks and enthusiastic expressions of gratitude, contained the following important clause, designed to give a constitutional and fully legal sanction to the authority the prince had been exercising ever since the flight of his uncle and father-in-law, the miserable James:—"And we do most humbly desire your highness to take upon you the administration of public affairs, and the disposal of the public revenue, for the preservation of our religion, rights, laws, liberties, and properties, and of the peace of the nation; and that your highness will take into your particular care the present state of Ireland, and endeavour, by the most speedy and effectual means, to prevent the dangers threatening that kingdom." The phlegmatic William delayed giving any answer till the next day, and then he coldly and laconically said, "My lords and gentlemen, I am glad that what I have done hath pleased you; and since you desire me to continue the administration of affairs, I am willing to accept it." He added, however, and with more warmth, "I must recommend to you the consideration of affairs abroad, which makes it fit for you to expedite your business, not only for making a settlement at home on a good foundation, but for the safety of Europe." The two Houses then adjourned to the 28th, on which day the Commons, having re-assembled, resolved themselves into a committee of the whole House to take into consideration the state of the nation. Mr. Hampden was in the chair. Dolben, son of the late Archbishop of York, "was the bold man who first broke the ice, and made a long speech tending to prove that the king's deserting his kingdom without appointing any person to administer the government, amounted, in reason and judgment of law, to a demise." This opinion was taken up and defended by several other members; and Sir Robert Howard went a step farther, and not only asserted that the throne was vacant, but also undertook to prove, that the whole reign of his late majesty was one continued breach of the original contract between the king and people. "I have heard," said Howard, "that the king has his crown by divine right; but we, the people, have a divine right too." The Tories, including Sir Edward Seymour, who had been one of the first to join the Prince of Orange, made a vain effort to procure an adjournment; and the committee, after a stormy debate of many hours, voted the resolution—"That King James II., having endeavoured to subvert the constitution by breaking the original contract between king and people, and, by the advice of Jesuits and other wicked persons,

* Ralph.—Roger Coke.—Narcissus Luttrell, Diary.

† Louis had already avowed his intention of reinstating James by force of arms, and his fleet and privateers, had already begun to make prizes of all the English shipping that fell in their way.

having violated the fundamental laws, and with drawn himself out of the kingdom, has abdicated the government, and that the throne is thereby become vacant." Mr. Hampden was ordered to carry up this resolution to the Lords, and to request their concurrence. On the morrow the Commons, still in committee, voted, "That it hath been found, by experience, to be inconsistent with the safety and welfare of this Protestant kingdom to be governed by a popish prince"—a principle which was certainly held by the vast majority of the people of England and Scotland. The Whigs, in their anxiety to settle the Protestant William upon the throne, were too much disposed to overlook the restrictions proper to be put upon his power; and the Tories, in their eagerness to keep the question open, stood forward in the new light of champions for the liberties of the people. The lawyers engaged seemed to desire nothing, to care for nothing but the instant filling of the vacant throne. When Mr. Hampden carried the resolution to the Upper House, their lordships, also going into committee, subjected it to a long and critical examination, being evidently averse to any acknowledgment of the divine right of the people to judge and choose their chief magistrate. Lord Clarendon, uncle to the Princess of Orange, led the opposition, and proposed that the fugitive king should be nominally left on the throne, and a Protestant regent appointed during his life.* It was argued on the other side by Halifax, Danby, and other lords, that, having begun the work of revolution, it was necessary to complete it; that while the appointing a regent and expelling the king was almost as extreme a measure as choosing a new king, a regency would be insufficient and dangerous; that, by this proposition of a regent, there would be two kings at the same time—one with the title, and another with the power—one, a Protestant at home, another, a Papist abroad; that the law of England had settled the point of the subject's security in obeying a king in possession or de facto by the statute of Henry VII., so every man knew he would be safe under a king, and would act with zeal and courage, but all such as should act under a prince-regent, created by a convention, would find themselves without the necessary forms of law to support them; that all that would be done would be thought null and void in law; that if the oaths to King James were held to be still binding, the subjects were bound by them to maintain, not merely his title to the crown or to the name of king, but also all his prerogative and power; that it would be absurd to continue a government in his name, and to take oaths to him, when all power was taken out of his hands; that a mixed, confused, and unnatural sort of government must result from the establishment of any such regency; that if it should be carried on in King James's name, but in other hands, the body of the nation would still consider James as the person that was truly their sovereign, and if any should plot or act for him, they could not be proceeded against for high treason, as conspiring against the king's person or government, since it would be visible that they were only designing to preserve his person, and to restore him to his government. These and other weighty reasons prevailed, and the project of a regency was rejected, but only by a majority of two—fifty-one to forty-nine. On the 30th of January the Lords resolved, by a majority of fifty-five to forty-six, that there was an original contract between the king and people, by which theoretical position they got rid of the doctrine of divine right; and after this they voted that the original contract had been broken by James. On the next day, however, they voted an amendment in the clause of the resolution in which the Commons averred that James had abdicated, substituting the word deserted; and they next struck out the important clause, that the throne was thereby vacant, by a majority of fifty-five to forty-one. This, it is said, was owing to the party and the exertions of Danby, who maintained that the crown had devolved upon William's wife, who would have been heiress to it but for her infant half-brother. A motion was made for an inquiry into the birth of the pretended Prince of Wales. It was rejected; but it seems to have been tacitly understood by both sides that that child was to be presumed spurious;† and, without that deep-rooted belief in the minds of the people, this revolution would certainly not have been so easy of accomplishment. While these debates were in progress a London populace were shouting for King William or Queen Mary, and expressing a most eager and alarming anxiety for an immediate settlement of the great question. On the 1st of February the Lords sent down their amendments to the Commons, taking care, however, on the same day to concur unanimously with the Commons' vote, which declared popery to be inconsistent with the English constitution and excluded for ever all Roman Catholics from the throne. They also ordered that the anniversary of James's accession should no longer be observed. As far as James was concerned this seemed decisive; but still the suspicion was not removed that a large portion of the Tory peers were intent upon bringing back that unfit king. The Commons rejected the amendments of the Lords; and this led to a conference between committees of the two Houses. After long arguments about the propriety of substituting the word deserted for abdicated, and upholding the hereditary character of the succession, which would allow of no vacancy, the Lords withdrew to debate among themselves,

* "Some," says Burnet, "intended to bring King James back; and went into this as the most probable way for laying the nation asleep, and for overcoming the present aversion that all people had to him. That being once done, they reckoned it would be no hard thing, with the help of some time, to compass the other."

† "This, at least," says Mr. Hallam, "was a necessary supposition for the Tories, who sought in the idle rumours of the time an excuse for abandoning his right. As to the Whigs, though they were active in discrediting the unfortunate boy's legitimacy, their own broad principle of changing the line of succession rendered it, in point of argument, a superfluous inquiry."—Const. Hist.

and the Commons adjourned to the next day. The capital was in a ferment; and a declaration which William had made to Halifax, Danby, Shrewsbury, and some others, was industriously made public in all directions. The prince had told those noblemen that he had been hitherto silent, because he would not say or do anything that might seem to interfere with the freedom of deliberating and voting in matters of such importance; that he was resolved neither to court nor threaten any one. Some, he said, were for putting the government into the hands of a regent;—he would say nothing against that, if they thought it the best manner of settling their affairs; only he thought it necessary to tell them that he would not be the regent, and that if they continued in that design they must look out for some other person, as he saw what would be the consequences, and would never accept of that office. Others, he said, were for putting the princess, his wife, singly on the throne, and to have him to reign by her courtesy. “No man,” he added, “can esteem a woman more than I do the princess; but I am so made, that I cannot think of holding anything by apron-strings; nor can I think it reasonable to have any share in the government unless it be put in my own person, and that for the term of my life. If you think it fit to settle it otherwise, I will not oppose you, but will go back to Holland, and meddle no more in your affairs.” He assured them that, whatever others might think of a crown, it was no such great thing in his eyes, but that he could live very well, and be well pleased without it. In the end, he repeated that he could not accept a dignity that was only to be held during the life of another (his wife); admitting, however, that he thought the issue of the Princess Anne, James’s second daughter, should be preferred in the succession to any children that he might have by any other wife than the Princess Mary.

William was neither a very faithful nor a very tender husband, but Mary was a very submissive wife: she was ready to do his will in all things; and at the present crisis this facility of disposition contributed not only to her own comfort, but also to the happiness of her native country. Danby, who had judged incorrectly of her disposition from reflecting upon the general character of princes and princesses, and who had privately warned her that, if she chose, he would place her alone upon the throne, had received from her a very sharp answer—in which she stated that she was the prince’s wife, and would never be anything except with him and under him; that she would take it most unkindly if any persons, under a pretence of their care of her, should set up a divided interest between her and her husband; and, not content with this declaration, she sent over both Danby’s tempting letter and her answer to it to William.* Yielding to the force of circumstances, and the steadiness of the Commons, the Lords gave up their amendments, and adopted in full and without change the resolution as it had been sent up to them; and then, by a majority of sixty-two to forty-seven, they resolved that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared King and Queen of England and all the dominions thereunto belonging. This vote, passed on the 6th of February, was sent down to the Commons on the 7th: but, some days before this, a declaration of the reasons why King James had vacated the throne, and asserting the ancient rights and liberties of the nation, had been agreed to by that House; and they now delayed concurring in the resolution of the Lords till the latter consented to adopt that declaration, which, after some debate, they did; and it was accordingly incorporated, in the form of a preamble, with the final resolution to which both Houses, after several conferences, came, on the 12th of February,—“That William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange, be, and be declared, King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the crown and dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to them, the said Prince and Princess, during their lives, and the life of the survivor of them; and that the sole and full exercise of the regal power be only in and executed by the said Prince of Orange, in the names of the said Prince and Princess, during their joint lives; and, after their decease, the said crown and royal dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to be to the heirs of the body of the said Princess; for default of such issue, to the Princess Anne of Denmark and the heirs of her body; and for default of such issue, to the heirs of the body of the said Prince of Orange.”

WILLIAM AND MARY.

On the same busy day, Mary, the new queen, arrived from Holland at Whitehall; and, on the morrow, the prince and she being seated on two armed chairs under a canopy in the Banqueting House, both Houses of the Convention waited upon them in a body, when the clerk of the crown read the declaration and resolution of the two Houses, and the Marquess of Halifax, in their name, made a solemn tender of the crown to their highnesses. On the same day, being Ash Wednesday, William and Mary were proclaimed King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, at the usual places in the cities of London and Westminster, “with great acclamation and general good reception, with bonfires, bells, great guns, &c." "It was believed," says Evelyn, "that both, especially the princess, would have showed some seeming reluctance of assuming her father's crown, and made some apology, testifying by her regret th

¶ "She seems," says Evelyn, "to be of a good nature, and that she takes nothing to heart; whilst her husband has a thoughtful countenance, is wonderful serious and silent, and seems to treat all persons alike gravely, and to be very intent on affairs: Holland, Ireland, and France calling for his care."

he should by his mismanagement necessitate the nation to so extraordinary a proceeding; which would have shown very handsomely to the world, and according to the character given of her piety—consonant also to her husband's first declaration, that there was no intention of deposing the king, but of succouring the nation: but nothing of all this appeared. She sat in Whitehall, laughing and jolly, as if she was to see us to seem quite transported. She rose early the next morning, and, in her undress, as it was reported, before her women were up, went about from room to room to see the convenience of Whitehall; lay in the same bed and apartment where the late queen lay; and, within a night or two, sat down to play at basset, as the queen her predecessor used to do. She smiled upon and talked to everybody, so that no change seemed to have taken place at court since her last going away, save that infinite crowds of people thronged to see her, and that she went to our prayers. This carriage was censured by many.⁴

The Scottish Convention of Estates met on the 14th of March; and, through the ingenious management of Sir James Dalrymple (afterwards Lord Stair), hardly any were returned to it except Whigs and Presbyterians. The Duke of Hamilton was appointed president: the waverers were fixed by the success of the revolution in England, and everything proceeded with rapidity and spirit. A letter was presented from King James. A similar letter had been rejected by the English Convention without reading; but the Scots, after passing a resolution that nothing contained in the letter should dissolve their assembly, or stop their proceeding to the settlement of the crown, gave the royal epistle a respectful reading. It was written in the terms "of a conqueror and a priest; threatening the Convention with punishment in this world and damnation in the next;" and it was countersigned by James's Secretary of State, Lord Melfort, a furious Papist, who was abhorred by the Presbyterians.† The Convention returned no answer, but hastened to reply with gratitude to a letter from King William which was presented at the same time. They issued a proclamation, calling upon all men from sixteen to sixty to be ready to take up arms for their country and their faith: they arrayed the militia of the south, levied troops, and sent arms and ammunition to their brethren settled in the north of Ireland, who were apprehending a massacre at the hands of the Irish Papists.‡ The sheriffs were ordered to seize all persons found in arms without the authority of the Convention; and the Duke of Hamilton was invested with a dictatorial power of securing all suspected persons. The fiery Dundee did what he could to dissolve the Convention by cannon-balls. He urged the Duke of Gordon, who held out in Edinburgh Castle, and who had been proclaimed a traitor under the walls of that fortress, to fire upon the city. Gordon refused, or hesitated, and then Dundee attempted to get up a counter-convention at Stirling; but he was ill seconded by his friends, the Marquess of Athol and the Lords Balcarras and Marr. Dundee was eager to be in the field; but James had instructed him to remain quiet until assistance should be sent over from Ireland, where that wretched outcast had landed on the 12th of March, two days before the opening of the Scottish Convention. Urged on, however, by his natural impetuosity, or fearing for his life, which he said was threatened by some of the Covenanters, upon whom he had practised infamous severities "a-foretime," he mounted his horse, and galloped through Edinburgh with a troop of cavalry, consisting of some fifty men, who had deserted to him from his regiment in England. It is said that a friend asked him whither he was going, and that Dundee, waving his hat, replied—"Wherever the spirit of Montrose shall direct me." He had made that daring partisan his model, and his proudest boast was that the blood of Montrose ran in his veins.* In passing under the outer walls of the castle, on the road that leads to Dalkeith, he dismounted, scrambled up the precipice at a place where it is almost perpendicular, and held a conference with the Duke of Gordon, whom he vainly pressed to retire with him into the Highlands, raise his brave vassals there, and leave his command of Edinburgh Castle to his loyal and faithful lieutenant.† While the conference lasted, a crowd collected at the foot of the precipice. A rumour reached the Convention, which was then sitting, that Dundee was at the gates with an army, and that Gordon was going to bombard the town. The Duke of Hamilton, who was better informed, turned the panic to the advantage of his party. He ordered the doors of the house to be shut, and the keys to be laid on the table—exclaiming, that there was danger within as well as without doors—that traitors must be held in confinement until the danger was over—but that the friends of liberty had nothing to fear, as thousands were ready to start up in their defence at the stamp of his foot. At his order, drums beat and trumpets sounded, and swarms of west-country Covenanters, who had been brought into Edinburgh by Hamilton and Sir John Dalrymple, started from their hiding-places in garrets and cellars and showed themselves in the streets with arms in their hands. When the doors of the Convention were thrown open for the members to retire, the few Tories present were assailed with threats and curses; which had such an effect that some of the adher-

* Diary—The Duchess of Marlborough more than confirms what Evelyn says: "And here I cannot forbear saying, that whatever good qualities Queen Mary had to make her popular, it is too evident by many instances that she wanted beauty. Of this she seemed to me to give an unquestionable proof the first day she came to Whitehall. I was one of those who had the honour to wait on her in her own apartment. She ran about it, looking into every closet and convenience, and turning up the quilts upon the bed, as people do when they come into an inn, and with no other sort of concern in her appearance but such as they express a behaviour which, though at that time I was extremely surprised by her, I thought very strange and unbecoming. For, whatever necessity there was of deposing King James, he was still her father, who had been so lately driven from that chamber and from that bed; and, if she felt no tenderness, I thought she should at least have looked grave, or even pensively sad, at so melancholy a reverse of his fortune."—An Account of the Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough From her first coming to Court, &c.

‡ These reasonable supplies were of first importance to the men of Londonderry and Inniskillen. The first weight of the war in Ireland fell.

* The relationship, however, was very distant—Dundee being the eighth and the great Marquess the ninth in descent from the same common ancestor, Sir William Graham, who died early in the fifteenth century.

ents of James fled at once into the country, and still more adapted themselves to circumstances and changed sides. With the field left to themselves, the Whigs were relieved from the necessity of those fine lines of policy, and those compromises between Whigism and Toryism, which had embarrassed the English Convention, and given to its proceedings an appearance of a want of decision and straightforwardness, but which, at the same time, had produced more moderation and a greater attention to the feelings or the rights of opposite parties. But there was a project which had long been entertained by some eminent Scottish statesmen, and which had been recommended by William in his letter to the Convention—a project which roused the national and religious feelings of the people, and which might have ruined everything if it had not been given up in time. This was the scheme of the union of the two kingdoms; and Lord Stair, and his son—Sir J. Dalrymple—who at a better period renewed it with success, and Lord Tarbet, recommended that the settlement of the crown and the union should go hand in hand. But the keen Presbyterians, who formed the majority of the Convention, refused to listen to the project of an incorporation with the prelatical English; and for this and other weighty reasons the plan was abandoned at once.*

On the 4th of April the Convention came to the resolution that King James had, by his evil deeds,

* Burnet—Dalrymple—Ralph.

“forfeaulted” (forfeited) his right to the crown—a term which, in the law language of Scotland, implied the exclusion of all James’s posterity. But as this would have comprehended William’s wife and the Princess Anne, as well as the disputed male child, and as it was intended that Mary should be admitted to the throne, they agreed upon the following explanation of the legal term:—“That the word forfeault, in the resolution, should imply no other alteration in the succession to the crown than the seclusion of King James, the pretended Prince of Wales, and the children that shall be procreated of either of their bodies.” Only five voices spoke against the sentence of forfeiture—which, per se was more logical and correct than the abdication or the desertion put forward by the Convention of England. Upon this sentence of forfeiture they grounded the offer of the crown to William and Mary; and they accompanied the offer by a declaration of rights, which went farther than the English one, exposing all the inroads upon liberty made not only by the late king, but by his brother and predecessor, Charles II., and defining with more nicety the power of the prerogative and the rights of the nation. The Duke of Hamilton himself read the Act of the Convention at the Market Cross; and the Earl of Argyle, the son of the unfortunate nobleman who had been executed under James, Sir John Dalrymple, and Sir James Montgomery, were appointed to repair to London with the offer of the crown. Such visitors were pretty sure of a kind reception: they were admitted to the presence of William and Mary, and Argyle read aloud the Scottish coronation oath, the king repeating each clause, and holding up his right hand whilst he swore. Persecution had not yet taught the Covenanters and Presbyterians the blessed creed of toleration; and the Convention had not revised a clause which bound the king by oath "to root out all heretics and enemies to the true worship of God"—by which was meant, the old Presbyterian form of worship, to the exclusion of all others. When Argyle came to these words, William, who did know the advantages of toleration, stopped him, and declared that he would not oblige himself to become a persecutor. The commissioners assured him that it was not so meant. "Then," said William, "I take the oath in that sense only."*

The revolution was now accomplished, and the Prince of Orange was King of England and Scotland, to the consternation and disgust of those theorists who had favoured his invasion and progress in the credulous and almost insane hope that he would content himself by being the head of a British republic; and equally to the mortification of many of the Tories and high-churchmen, who, with equal credulity, had believed (or so they pretended) that William, after correcting the abuses of the government and putting down Popery, would restore his father-in-law to the throne and return quietly to Holland.

William's first measure was to announce that all Protestants found in office on the 1st of December last should continue in their places until further notice. On the 17th of February he published a list of the privy councillors, at the head of whom was Est il possible, who was considerable in nothing except in being the husband of the Princess Anne.† The number of disinterested patriots was exceedingly small: every man of any consequence that had assisted in making the revolution put in his claim for reward; and there was a general scramble for pensions and places and court distinctions. If England had been El Dorado, and William the most giving and liberal of princes, there would have been no satisfying all those claimants; and, of the dissatisfied, too many were prone to extend their dissatisfaction to the whole revolution, with the principles it established, and were soon ready to undo what they had done. Under almost any other sovereign the effect would soon have been seen in the worst of all revolutions—a restoration; but William, whose vices no less than his virtues—whose strange, imperturbable, cold manners, no less than his extraordinary abilities, fitted him for the crisis—conjured the worst part of the storm, and turned some of its conflicting elements to the advantage of himself and of the nation, which, perhaps, never more than at this moment depended upon the character and talent of a single individual. On the 18th of February he made his first speech from the throne to the two Houses. It was short and cogent. He told them that he was come to assure them that he should never do anything to lessen their good opinion of him; that the condition of affairs abroad, particularly in Holland, was such that, unless some speedy care was taken of them, they would run a greater hazard than the English would have them exposed to; that they themselves must be sensible that the posture of affairs at home would require their serious consideration, and that a good settlement was necessary for peace and for the support of the Protestant interest both here and abroad; and, particularly, that the state of Ireland was such as could not be remedied by any slow or weak measures. The Commons returned a solemn vote of thanks, which passed nomine contradicente; but on the next day the Lords brought in a bill to remove and prevent all questions and disputes concerning the legality of the assembling and sitting of this present parliament. This bill was read twice on the same day, and a third time on the day following, when it was sent down to the Commons. Both Whigs and Tories—the members of the cabinet as well as the members of parliament—had been struck by the very obvious necessity of legalising the Convention in some way or other; and, before the Lords' bill came down, the Commons were debating in committee upon a question put by their chairman, Mr. Hampden—"Whether a king, elected and declared by the Lords, spiritual and temporal, and Commons, assembled at Westminster, January 22, 1688-9, coming to and consulting with the said Lords and Commons, did not make as complete a parliament and legislative power and authority, to all intents and purposes, as if the said king should cause new summons to be given and new elections to be made by writ?" The Tories and Jacobites, who were anxious for a new election, answered this proposition in the negative, and insisted that the king's writs should be issued for the calling of a new parliament, which might confirm, or—as they hoped—revoke or modify what had been done by the Convention actually sitting. But, in the end, a bill was passed declaring the Convention to be, to all intents and purposes, a legal parliament. On the 1st of March the new oath of allegiance was tendered. It was conceived in the simplest form: the words "rightful and lawful sovereigns" being, upon mature deliberation, omitted. But, notwithstanding this modification, several lords and several members of the House of Commons withdrew without permission; and the Earls of Clarendon, Lichfield, and Exeter, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and seven of the bishops refused the oath. Among these spiritual lords were five of the seven who had been sent to the Tower for refusing obedience to the mandates of James. Above four hundred of the clergy, including some of the highest distinction, followed the example set by the primate and these seven bishops; and thus began the schism of the Non-jurors—a term which now becomes as prominent as that of Nonconformists had been under the two last Stuarts.*

The first parliament of Charles II. in the heat of their loyalty had settled upon him a revenue for life of 1,200,000*l.*, and this precedent was followed on the accession of James. William, it appears, expected to have the same kind of grant for life; but the Commons had learned a good lesson, and both Whigs and Tories opposed the vote. "We may date our misery," said Sir Edward Seymour, "from our bounty here. If King Charles II. had not had that bounty from you, he had never attempted what he did." During the debate, William informed the House by message that the late king had sailed from Brest with a French armament for Ireland. The Commons then agreed to a temporary vote for 420,000*l.* per month, and engaged, together with the Upper House, to support his majesty with their lives and fortunes. The government and even the life of William were already threatened by conspirators; caution was necessary, and a certain stretch of the law, perhaps, justifiable; but the Commons suspended at once the Habeas Corpus Act—thus establishing a dangerous precedent; and the Lords, going still farther, "humbly advised and desired his majesty to take extraordinary care of the government in this conjuncture, by securing all disaffected persons whatsoever"—thus laying the personal liberty of the subject open to every attack of suspicion, fear, and animosity. And, in subsequent periods, timid or arbitrary ministers have not failed to follow the example in seasons of excitement. At this first suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, however, very few persons were arrested, for William was neither timid nor arbitrary. The hearth-tax, by which the sum of two shillings a-year was levied on every house in the kingdom, had always been particularly odious to the people, and it was now abolished at the recommendation of William, who received thereupon the thanks of both Houses. Proceeding with the great question of supply, the Commons bore in mind that, though a standing army had just been declared illegal, there could be no such security against it as the want of money in the crown to maintain one; and that the civil list ought to be clearly fixed and separated from the funds provided for the public defence and contingent expenditure. Upon a careful examination of accounts, they had discovered that the real value of the late king's revenue was far above its nominal amount: that James had been in the receipt, altogether, of 2,000,000*l.* per annum, and that in the expenditure nearly 90,000*l.* per annum was set down under the suspicious head of secret-service money.* They now voted 1,200,000*l.* for the current year, only one-half to be appropriated to the civil list, the other half to the public defence, &c.; but they soon improved upon their original scheme of a definite revenue, by taking a close and constant superintendance of the navy, army, and ordnance, having estimates regularly laid before them, and seeing, as far as was possible, that the supply granted was appropriated to the services to which it was voted. This great and fundamental principle became henceforward an invariable usage, and by means of it the House of Commons acquired that controlling position which it now maintains; and this alone will make Englishmen grateful for the Revolution of 1688.† For the current year the Commons fixed the allowance for the navy at 700,000*l.* instead of at 1,100,000*l.*, as proposed by ministers; and they made only provision for six months for the army which was to defend or rather recover Ireland. They voted 600,000*l.* as compensation to the Dutch for the services rendered in ships and men at the Revolution. William had only demanded 700,000*l.*, but the reduction displeased him much, and generally he complained of parsimony and a want of confidence. He had told Parliament that the Dutch had neglected their own safety to relieve England in her extremity; that by this service they had drawn the French upon them; and that now the ruin of Holland would be but a step to the ruin of England.

William had been bred a Calvinist, a circumstance which did not endear him to the Church of England; but in Holland he had witnessed the agreeable prospect of all sects and religions living peaceably together, and he was both by heart and head disposed to toleration. He proposed a repeal of the Test Act, trusting that the great dread of the Papists would be removed with the removal of a Roman Catholic king, and that the professions of good-will which had passed between the established church and the dissenters, when threatened by James, would lead to some amicable and lasting agreement. But the Lords rejected the repeal by a great majority, and took no notice of a petition from the City of London, praying that the king might be at liberty to use indiscriminately the services of all his Protestant subjects, without any imposition of the sacramental oath, which offended the consciences of so many.‡ At the same time, the church party in the House of Lords eagerly grasped at a clause—also recommended by the tolerant king—which went to dispense with the oaths of the bishops and established clergy to the new government. But the dissenters in the

‡ During the discussion William told the Lords,—"As I doubt not you will sufficiently provide against the Papists, so I hope you will leave room for the admission of all Protestants that are willing and able to serve. of Commons resolved to show as little regard to the consciences of churchmen as the churchmen had shown to theirs; and they moved for an amendment to oblige the established clergy to take the oaths of allegiance before the 1st of August, without any excuse, and under pain of suspension, to be followed, in six months, by deprivation. The Lords, in their turn, rejected the amendment. Conferences ensued; but all that the Commons would allow was, that the king should have power to grant, during his pleasure, a third of their benefices to any twelve clergymen who should incur deprivation by refusing to take the oath. William was never easily turned from any serious project. Though surprised at the religious animosities of his new subjects, he attempted to carry a bill of comprehension, by which he flattered himself that the established church, the kirk, and the conventicle might by degrees be amalgamated. The Commons united with the Lords in oversetting the project; but, in the end, they agreed upon a free toleration to all Christian sects except the Roman Catholic.* William, who had no notion of being merely the king of one party, recommended an act of indemnity which should include the Tories who had made such an abuse of power in the two preceding reigns. The Whigs, who certainly aimed at monopolizing all favour, all power and trust, represented that all kings were fond of prerogative, and that William wanted a pardon for the ministers of the late reigns only with a view to employ servants who would be as obsequious to him as they had been to James and Charles. In both Houses numerous exceptions were proposed, which would have changed the indemnity into something very like a sweeping proclamation of treason and misdemeanor against the Tory chiefs; and that liberal project also fell to the ground. The Declaration of Rights was embodied in a bill, which, however, was not passed until the following year, when it became an invaluable portion of the law of the land. After a pretty full examination of witnesses and of written evidence, parliament reversed the attainders of Lord Russell and Algernon Sidney, declaring their sentence to be iniquitous--their execution, murder.†

* By this toleration bill the penal laws were suspended in favour of all dissenting Protestants, provided they took the oaths to the present government, and did not meet in any place for religious worship with licensed and ticketed doors. "This bill," says Bishop Burnet, "gave the king great content. He, in his own opinion, always thought that conscience was God's province, and that it ought not to be imposed on; and his experience in Holland made him look on toleration as one of the wisest measures of government. He was much troubled to see so much ill humour spreading among the clergy, and, by their means, over a great part of the nation. He was so true to his principles herein, that he restrained the heat of some who were for proposing severe acts against the Papists. He made them apprehend the advantage which that would give the French, to alienate all the Papists of Europe from us; who, from thence, might hope to set on foot a new Catholic league, and make the war a quarrel of religion, which might have very bad effects. Nor could he pretend to protect the Protestants in many places of Germany and Hungary unless he could cover the Papists in England from all severity, on account of their religion. This was so carefully infused into many, and so well understood by them, that the Papists enjoyed the real effects of the toleration, though they were not comprehended within the statute."

Louis XIV., by the act of sending troops into Ireland, had made a war with France unavoidable; and, besides, if it had not been for his darling project, the one great thought of his whole life,—to check French aggrandizement,—it may be doubted whether William would have taken upon himself the weight of the crown of England, or have put himself in a position to be tempted by the offer of it. If he had been somewhat oversanguine as to the virtues of tolerance, moderation, and magnanimity among parties, he had certainly not miscalculated the inveterate feeling of the nation against the French. Both Houses pledged themselves, and gave their "solemn and hearty promise and engagement, to support his majesty in a war against the French king." "This," said William, with unusual emotion, "is the first day of my reign."

The fugitive James had met with a very kind, and what was called a very honourable, reception at the court of Versailles; for Louis, who was menaced by a vast coalition, was sensible of the great use that might be made of him; and the "grand monarque," though exceedingly little in many essentials, had a kingly bearing, and a disposition which sometimes looked like magnanimity. It was universally known that Ireland was our vulnerable part: Tyrconnel informed his proscribed master that all the Roman Catholics there would take up arms for him; and it was forthwith resolved that James should be landed in Ireland with a French army. Louis drove on the preparations for the expedition with uncommon earnestness, and appointed d'Avaux to accompany "his Britannic majesty," with the title of ambassador-extraordinary. Tyrconnel had played his part with rare vigour and success. He amused the friends of the English revolution with half-promises and delusive assurances, and seems to have made even the cautious and incredulous William believe that he would submit quietly to his government. On the 12th of January James despatched Captain Ruth, from St. Germain, to assure him that he was coming speedily with a French fleet and army. Tyrconnel then pretended to the chiefs of the Protestant party that Ireland ought to recognise and submit to the new government, but that he, as a soldier, was bound in honour to ask the sanction of his old master. He then summoned to Dublin Lord Mountjoy, who was the man most trusted by his party, and whose power and influence over the Protestants of the North were boundless; and charged that noblemán and the lord chief justice Rice with a mission to St. Germain. Mountjoy was told that he was to assure King James that the defence of Ireland was an impossibility, and that the loyalty of the lord-deputy yielded only to an absolute necessity; and James was told to make the dangerous Mountjoy fast; and as soon as his credulous lordship got to Paris he was safely lodged in the Bastille.* Having thus adroitly deprived the Irish Protestants of their great chief, Tyrconnel soon proceeded to disarm them, and to recruit his Catholic army, which was already considerable, and which was raised in the course of two months to forty or fifty thousand men, all Papists, all eager to establish their religion and to recover their ancient possessions. Everything seemed to promise success; but the presence of James was in itself sufficient to defeat all their hopes. That fatal blunderer left St. Germain on the 1st of February. At parting Louis gave him his own cuirasse,—a thing which was as likely to be kept out of the reach of bullet and pike on the person of James as it had been when worn by the donor,—saying, as he embraced him, “The best wish I can give you is, that I may never see you again.” He arrived at Brest on the 5th of February. There he found a crowd of English and Irish exiles, about 2500 soldiers under the command of the French general De Rosenc, and a fleet of fifteen sail manned and commanded by some of the best sailors and marine officers of France. He was detained by contrary winds in the Brest Roads, or upon other parts of the French coast, during which time he ought to have been intercepted by the English fleet; but at last, on the 12th of March, he landed at Kinsale, where he was received with enthusiasm by the native Irish. From Kinsale he proceeded to Cork, where all was jubilee, and from Cork he went to Dublin, where his public entry was magnificent, in the midst of Catholic bishops, priests, and monks, who hailed him as their deliverer and the champion of the only true church. Except in the most Protestant province of Ulster his authority seemed to be recognised everywhere; and even on the frontier of Ulster the Protestants had been defeated,† and were in an attitude of strength and defiance only at Londonderry and Inniskillen. The English fleet, under Admiral Herbert, having missed the enemy on the French coast, found them greatly reinforced in Bantry Bay: for, while they had been beating about, Château Renaud had got over from Brest with a second squadron; and that admiral, relying on his superiority of force, and on the improvement which the French mariners had made, while the English were losing their qualities under the inglorious reigns of Charles and James, now came boldly out of Bantry Bay, with twenty-eight ships of the line, and gave Herbert battle. The engagement lasted the whole day; but in the evening the English sheered off for the Scilly Islands, while the French returned with a great show of triumph to the anchorage they had left in the morning. James, though a bad sailor, had been fond of the sea, and had taken a pride in the English navy, which he had helped to deteriorate.‡ It is said that, when

* Lord Mountjoy had been warned by many of his Protestant friends that Tyrconnel intended a trick of this kind; but he had yielded to the solemn asseverations of Tyrconnel, who swore that he was sincere,—that he earnestly wished for submission and peace, but knew that the court of France, which “would not care if Ireland were sunk to the pit of hell, so it gave the Prince of Orange three months’ diversion,” would oppose his purpose to the utmost; and that, if he saw that James would ruin Ireland merely to serve France, he should consider himself released from all his engagements to him.

d'Avaux, the ambassador-extraordinary, exultingly told him how the French sailors had beaten the English, James said, sadly, "It is the first time!" This story may be true, though it rests upon indifferent authority;* but there is good evidence to show that the English exiles in France, who had not forgotten their nationality in their loyalty, grieved at the success of the French navy though fighting for their master.† James formed a council of government, consisting of his natural son the Duke of Berwick, the Duke of Powis, the earls of Abercorn, Melfort, Dover, Carlingford, and Clauricard, Lord Thomas Howard, the lords Kilmallack, Merrion, Kenure, the Lord Chief Justice Herbert, the Bishop of Chester, Colonel Dorrington, the French ambassador d'Avaux, the Marquis d'Albeville, Count Sarsfield, and one or two other foreigners. When the Protestant bishop of Meath, at the head of his clergy, implored the royal protection and permission to lay before him an account of the injuries they had received, James replied, "I will protect all men in their religion and properties; and as for the wrongs that have lately been suffered by several, it is impossible, in these times of commotion, but such will happen: but I shall, as far as I can, prevent and redress them. However, if I am invaded in this kingdom as I have been in England, I must secure myself as well as I can." When the Popish bishops and priests, who had welcomed him into Dublin, and who had sung Te Deum on his arrival, waited upon him, they were received in a very different manner; and these demonstrations, however much they might please the Irish Catholics, could not but serve to ruin all hopes of his return to England. In a series of proclamations that were issued he commanded all Irish subjects who had lately abandoned that kingdom to return home, under assurance of protection, and on pain of outlawry and confiscation (there had been a general flight of Protestants, and of English and Scottish settlers, who apprehended nothing less than a massacre); he required all persons, of what degree or persuasion whatsoever, to join with him against the Prince of Orange; he expressed his gratitude to the Roman Catholics of Ireland for having with such readiness and cheerfulness put themselves in arms; but he required such as were not in actual pay and under regular commanders, not to surrender their arms, but to lay them up in their own houses, because, as was acknowledged, even this meritorious arming had given rise to many robberies: he called upon the country people to supply his army in the north with provisions, and he forbade the soldiery to take anything without payment: he altered the currency by declaring that twenty shillings should pass for a guinea; and, lastly, he summoned an Irish parliament to meet at Dublin on the 7th of May.

Of the Irish Protestants who had not fled the far greater part were in arms against him. Only six Protestants were returned to the House of Commons, and only five lords and four bishops of that faith attended in the Upper House. In his opening speech to this Catholic parliament he thanked them for the exemplary loyalty which they had shown at a time when others of his subjects had "so undutifully misbehaved themselves, or so basely betrayed him;" he expressed his gratitude for their seconding his deputy, Tyrconnel, in his bold and resolute conduct; he assured them that he had come among them to venture his life with them in defence of their liberties and his own rights, and he praised their courage as being equal to their zeal. He continued—"I have always been for liberty of conscience, and against invading any man's right or liberty; having still in mind that saying of holy writ, 'Do as you would be done to, for this is the law and the prophets.' It was this liberty of conscience I gave, which my enemies, both at home and abroad, dreaded to have established by law in all my dominions, and made them set themselves up against me, though for different reasons; seeing that, if I had once settled it, my people, in the opinion of the one, would have been too happy, and, in the opinion of the other, too great." But the Irish were not sufficiently advanced in civilization to allow of a toleration or to modify the doctrines of the Romish church, which as yet, with a few exceptions in obscure corners, was everywhere intolerant, everywhere a persecuting power: their only notion about the law and the prophets was to do as they had been done by,—to avenge upon their Protestant conquerors the wrongs and oppressions they had suffered from them, and to recover possession of the lands and privileges they had lost. This latter design, this natural hungering after broad and fertile acres, which, however disguised by religious or party feeling, has been at the bottom of every Irish insurrection, was inevitable in the circumstances; and it compelled James to sanction the repeal by his parliament of the Act of Settlement, by which the majority of the Protestants and English and Scottish colonists held their estates in Ireland. There was no reconciling the rival interests and antagonist feelings;—what gratified the Irish was worse than a declaration of war to the knife to the English. "The bill," says a Protestant writer, "was received with a loud huzza, which more resembled the behaviour of a crew of rapparees over a rich booty than that of a senate assembled to rectify abuses and restore the rights of their fellow-subjects." In the House of Lords two or three of the Protestant minority of nine had the courage to oppose

* The story is copied by Dalrymple from "Short View," &c.—to the composition of one Higginis, a devoted Jacobite.

† This appears from a letter written by Lord Melfort (who had no such feeling) to James:—"I am extremely sorry," says his lordship, "to see, from several letters, that some of your majesty's servants of our country at St. Germain have been so indiscreet as to show their dislike that the French should beat the English at sea. Indeed, I have pain to believe them so little concerned in your majesty's happiness; but it is written to the Cardinal de Fournin and to the Duke de Chaulnes. If it have made no noise, then it is well. If there be anything in it, such are most unworthy, he they who they will, of the honour of serving your majesty; but they name nobody, nor can I guess who the persons are."—See II. Ellis's Collection.

the bill as injurious to the public good and destructive of the public faith; but the best argument was used by Dr. Dopping, the Protestant bishop of Meath, who told them that it was fit to get possession of the whole of the promised land before proceeding to divide it. The practical part of the repeal was intrusted to troops of horse and dragoons, or was taken up by the armed Catholics, who seized the property of the Protestants without any nice regard either to justice or mercy. This act was soon followed by another, attainting all who abetted or assisted the Prince of Orange, forfeiting the manors, lands, goods, and interests of all absentees, and vesting all this property in the crown, and by another destroying the spirit of Poynning's law, which had been imposed by the conquerors to make the Irish subordinate to the English parliament.* They voted 20,000*l.* a-year as a proper reward for the patriotism of Tyrconnel, to be taken out of the estates forfeited by the Protestants; and they voted 20,000*l.* per month for the king. They passed an act for liberty of conscience to all Christians; but, as the Catholics formed the immense majority, such of the Protestant clergy as had not fled were left without the means of support, the Papists being authorised to pay their tithes to their own priests, and the stipends of Protestant ministers in cities and corporate towns being stopped by law even where the followers of the reformed church were in the majority. All schools and colleges, from which the Protestants had excluded everything in the shape or likeness of a priest or monk, were now seized by the Roman clergy and monastic orders. The Protestant churches fell of course into the hands of the triumphant majority; and—which was not quite so inevitable, but which showed in a clear light the popular interpretation of religious liberty—the Protestants were forbidden to assemble in churches or elsewhere under pain of death. At the same time the Protestants were plundered about equally by the rapparees and by the officers of James's army, who sold them protections at extravagant rates, and made them renew their protections whenever they wanted more money. And, as a low price had been fixed by proclamation for all the supplies required by the army, and as this low price was paid in base money, the Papists, wherever they could, gave the preference to the Protestants as sellers. James had brought only some 400,000 crowns from France; and Louis, though often pressed, was unable to send him more money, having himself to wring from a half-starving people the means of carrying on a war against more than half of Europe. The desperate resource, in such circumstances, was sure to suggest itself to a mind like that of James. He debased the currency, and, by proclamation, ordered his brass coinage to pass for a hundred times more than it was worth. He was as impatient of all opposition to his royal will, as incapable of controlling his arbitrary temper, as ever. When this Irish House of Commons opposed him in a particular measure, he fell into a violent passion, and exclaimed, "I find all Commons are the same;" and when they preferred a complaint against his secretary of state, the rash and insolent Melfort, he said that they were using him unkindly and basely; and declared that, if he had thought they would not let him choose his own servants, he would never have come among them. At the same time his poverty-stricken court was the scene of incessant turmoil and intrigue: Melfort hated d'Avaux, and d'Avaux detested Melfort; the French affected to despise the Irish, and the Irish were jealous of the French, who, whatever had been the arrangements between King James and King Louis, certainly acted as if with a design to transfer the dependency of Ireland from England to France, or at least to render the quarrel between England and Ireland irreconcilable. When Melfort quarrelled with Tyrconnel, James was obliged to get the former out of Ireland, and his lordship was sent on a begging mission to the pope, who had no more money to spare than the French king, and less inclination to risk it in a desperate enterprise.* But the departure of that hot-headed Scot did not put an end to the jealousies and jars which raged from the arrival at Dublin down to the flight back to France. Nor could James

* On the 5th of September, 1690, when James had been driven out of Ireland, Melfort, who was still begging, wrote thus, from Rome, to his royal master at St. Germain:—"He (the pope) said that it was perfectly well, for, that your majesty being safe, your re-establishment was certain; and that he approved extremely of you having come away, and would write so much to your majesty himself. I told his holiness, that now your majesty was come to France to demand succours from that king, the next thing I had commanded me was to beg of his holiness what assistance it was possible for his holiness to give. That the enterprise was great, and that, though France should do all they could, yet that all would not be near what was sufficient, and that therefore his holiness of necessity must see this must just cease perish, to the reproach of all the Catholics, who did not assist or help to support it. That there never was a time in which the holy see had so much honour to gain or lose, and that the eyes of all Europe was upon his holiness to see if he would tamely suffer a Catholic kingdom to fall into the hands of heretics, unopposed to see so many hundreds of thousands of Catholics under the grievous persecution, and greatest temptation to lose their religion. That, by a timely and suitable assistance, his holiness might have had the glory in his pontificate to have advanced the Catholic religion in England and Scotland, where it was not; and, as that would have been much to his honour, I was assured he would never give occasion to the contrary, by suffering a Catholic kingdom to be dismembered from the church in his time, without giving all the assistance he could to such as were endeavouring its defence. That a timely supply might do much, and I was sure but 12,000 or 15,000 stand of arms might have prevented these mischiefs if sent in time, since your majesty wanted not men but arms to have outnumbered your enemies. That that was neglected, but that for the future I hoped his holiness would turn his thoughts more intently on a thing in which he and the church of God were so much concerned. His holiness repeated all his former compliments of what he would do and suffer for your majesty, but that he could not act against all the world, and he had not wherewithal to do as he would. That all the world was in war. That war was come into Italy. That there was scarcity at Rome. That the rents of the ecclesiastical state were not paid. That he was in thousands of straits and difficulties. That the little he had given was borrowed: he had in it given his entrails, so difficult is it now to find money."—Ellis's Letters.

* They declared that the parliament of England had no power or authority over Ireland, and that no writ of error and appeal should be made from Dublin to Westminster. In a national sense this was their wisest and best enactment—it was doing what required fame to the Grattans and Floods in the memorable Irish parliament of 1782. It appears, however, to be a mistake to assert that Poynning's law was formally repealed. A bill to that effect was brought in by the Commons, but James sent an order to stop it, and it fell to the ground, though the Irish had it much at heart, correctly considering the old act as the greatest sign and means of their subjection to England. By Poynning's law the initiative power was reserved to the English council, and no act could be passed by the Irish parliament without being recommended or perused by the king and council of England.

make up his mind to any fixed plan of operation. At one time he thought of repairing with his Irish army to England, where his friends flattered him with assurances that it would be no difficult matter to overturn the new and unsettled government; at another moment he entertained the project of Lord Dundee, who informed him that there were no regular troops, except four regiments, in Scotland, and that, upon his landing, all the warlike clans of the Highlands would join him and cut his way to London with their broad swords. In the end, James resolved to subdue the Protestants in Ulster, and to complete the conquest of Ireland; and Dundee was soon lost to that cause of which he was the bravest and ablest champion. Before he fell he equalled the romantic adventures of his model hero, Montrose. After his singular interview with the Duke of Gordon he withdrew into the west; and as soon as he received news of James's arrival in Ireland he hastened to Inverness, where the clans of Lochaber were quarrelling with the townspeople about some money claims. He paid the debt in dispute out of his own pocket, and prevailed upon most of the clans to enlist under the banners of King James. From Inverness he made a most rapid Montrose-like march through different parts of the Highlands, calling the fierce clans to arms, promising magnificent rewards to the chiefs, and dispersing the small bodies of militia commanded by officers appointed by the new government. His force gathered like a snowball—he was soon at the head of five or six thousand active and daring Highlanders. The charm of his name was so great, that in some instances clans deserted their hereditary chiefs to follow him; having, however, as of yore, the tempting prospect of plundering all the Lowlands. The Lord Murray, son of the Earl of Atholl, had got under arms about a thousand men upon his father's estate and the estate of Lord Lovat, who was married to his sister, under an assurance that they were to serve King James, though in reality Murray intended to make them serviceable to King William. While Murray was reviewing these men they quitted their ranks, ran down to a brook, filled their bonnets with water (other drink being scarce), drank a health to King James, and then, with pipes playing, marched off to Lord Dundee.* The prompter or chief manager of this dramatic scene was Simon Fraser, afterwards Lord Lovat, who at the distance of fifty-eight years made his exit on Tower Hill, in a manner equally dramatic. Several of the great lords in the north either openly assisted or secretly connived with Dundee, who had friends in the Scottish privy council and even among the officers of the regiments that were sent against him. This force of the new government was commanded by General Mackay, a good officer, but who was evidently deceived and hampered on many occasions by his subalterns and other Jacobites in disguise. He, however, cooped Dundee up in the mountains, and prevented any very extensive incursions of the Highlanders. Dundee received orders from James not to risk a battle until he should be joined by reinforcements from Ireland, which were promised in abundance, but which, when they arrived, amounted only to five hundred men, miserably armed and equipped. The partisan leader was obliged continually to shift his quarters by prodigious marches, in order to avoid or harass the enemy, or to obtain provisions. Mackay's regular troops were no match in these evolutions for the light-footed, half-naked Highlanders; nor could the Lowlanders bear the privations of hunger and thirst and cold like the hardy Celts, whose ordinary life was comparatively one of privation. In these marches Dundee generally walked on foot with the men and fared as they did. He possessed a key to their hearts in a knowledge of clan history or tradition, and of the genealogies of which they were so proud. He talked with them, sang Celtic songs with them, and joked with them; it being one of his maxims that no general should fight with an irregular army unless he were personally acquainted with every man he commanded. Yet the severity of his discipline, in certain points, was dreadful, and the only punishment he inflicted was death; it being another of his maxims that any other punishment disgraced a gentleman, and all who followed him were gentlemen! Towards the enemy he was merciless whenever he obtained the advantage; even as he had been against the Covenanters and Cameronians when simply Graham of Claverhouse. And on this point his maxim was, that, if terror ended or prevented war, bloodshed was mercy. Towards the end of June he received the Irish reinforcement, and at the same time intelligence that Mackay was marching through Atholl to attack the castle of Blair, the loss of which place would tend to cut off the communication between the two divisions of the Highlands. He instantly made one of his flying marches to Blair, got there long before the heels of Mackay's columns were seen, and advanced to the pass of Killikrankie, near Dunkeld. On the morning of the 16th of July Mackay moved from Dunkeld, and, after halting two hours at the mouth of the deep and gloomy mountain-pass to ascertain by means of scouts whether there was an enemy within the gorge, he began to enter it about mid-day, his soldiers looking anxiously about them and to the woods and rocks which overhung the pass. But Dundee had no intention to dispute that passage, his plan being to engage in the open plain beyond it, while some Atholl clans should press on Mackay's rear, occupy the mouth of the defile on the side of Dunkeld, and make retreat impossible or dangerous in the extreme. Thus Mackay and his regulars got through the pass without seeing any living creatures except the eagles and other birds of prey that wheeled and screamed over their heads; but, a little beyond Killikrankie, they discovered Dundee and his army resting upon the side of a hill. At a favourable moment, when Mackay's line was thin and far extended, either from the nature of the ground or from an intention to outflank, Dundee led down his Highlanders in compact columns. They received the fire of the regulars, and then, giving one discharge, threw their guns and pistols behind them, fell on with their broadswords, and cut their way through and through Mackay's line. The English horse, who were very few, galloped off without firing a shot; the artillery was seized; some of the infantry threw down their arms, and the whole line was broken or confused. Mackay himself was driven up to some hills to the west of the pass of Killikranksie. When he halted to rally that portion of his little army which had kept near him, and looked back from the heights upon the field of battle, he saw that there was no pursuit, and said to his officers that he was sure the enemy had lost their general.* Nor was he mistaken—Dundee had fallen in the moment of victory. According to a Highland tradition, he had a charmed life, and could expose himself without chance of injury to showers of musket-balls made of lead or iron; but one of Mackay's soldiers, knowing this fact, and perceiving that their shot took no effect upon him, tore off a silver button, put it into his piece, and so gave him his death-wound. Some of the regulars that fled back through the pass were roughly handled by the Highlanders, who had met at its southern mouth; but the whole amount of slaughter appears to have been greatly exaggerated: † Mackay soon collected the fugitives; and the Highlanders, completely dispirited by the loss of their leader, retired to their homes, leaving, according to their custom, a great heap of stones to mark the spot where he had fallen. A letter was found in Dundee's pocket from Lord Melfort, importing that, notwithstanding the promises of indemnity, indulgence, and toleration, contained in a declaration lately issued, he had so worded them, that King James, who did not think himself obliged to stand to them, might break through them when he pleased! Buchan and Cannons, who had come over with the Irish troops, made one or two attempts to renew the war, but they failed entirely, and by degrees the clans accepted King William's proclamation of pardon, and laid down their arms. Some time before the battle of Killikranksie the Duke of Gordon had surrendered the castle of Edinburgh; and by the end of the year the whole of Scotland was tranquil and submissive to the new government, with the exception of the insignificant garrison of the Bass Rock, which had the doubtful honour of being the last to strike the banner of the Stuarts.‡

* General Mackay's own manuscript, as cited by Dalrymple.

† According to some Scottish Jacobite accounts, Mackay lost two thousand in killed and five hundred in prisoners. William's London Gazette, however, was certainly as far from the truth. It stated that a party of Highlanders had carried off certain stores of meat which had been provided for the use of his majesty's forces; that Mackay pursued them to their main body, who were nearly all killed or taken prisoners, &c.

‡ In the Life of James the most is made of this very trifling yet

A few days after losing Dundee, James lost all hope of winning the city of Londonderry, upon which the fate of the north of Ireland depended. The Protestant inhabitants of that city, consisting chiefly of Scottish Presbyterian colonists and their descendants, had acted with admirable spirit. While matters were yet in doubt—before James was absolutely driven out of England, and some time before Tyrconnel had thrown off the mask—they had refused to receive a Popish garrison of 1200 men, who had been despatched by the Lord Deputy to make sure of that important place. When this force halted within sight of the town, nine Protestant youths rushed forth from the alarmed city, hauled up the drawbridge, and shut the gates in their faces. Animated by this action, others flew to the guard-room, broke open the magazine of arms and distributed the materials; and presently the walls were manned and the few miserable cannon pointed against the Irish troops. Inniskillen, where the Protestant feeling was equally strong, followed the example of Londonderry; and, by degrees, nearly the whole of the province of Ulster rose up in arms and joined in a league for the defence of their property and religion. A general council met at Hillsborough, opened a correspondence with the Prince of Orange, and raised several Protestant regiments. James had proceeded in this direction a few weeks after his arrival in Ireland; and his interests were served by Colonel Landie, who had been appointed by William to be governor of Londonderry. A few days before James sat down before the town, two regiments arrived from England; but they did not throw themselves into the place, owing to the treacherous assurances of Landie that it was untenable, and that there were not ten days' provisions in it. There is reason to suspect that at least one of the colonels of these two regiments was a Jacobite. But the townspeople, aware of Landie's treachery, deposed him, and chose two better defenders in Mr. Walker, a Presbyterian minister, and Major Baker, who were appointed joint curious affair. "By this means the Bass (a small fort upon a rock in Leith Road) was the only foot of land, if it may be so called, that the king remained in possession of; where a few loyal and resolute persons set all the kingdom at defiance; but, being in great necessity for want of provisions, his majesty found means by some French privateers of supplying their wants: it was a pleasant sort of independent state, consisting of about fifteen or twenty souls, and their way of subsisting a subject of great curiosity to all sort of people: they had a boat which was of great use to them for making descents, in order to bring off provisions or to get intelligence from their friends: this boat they frequently changed as they found occasion, till at last they got one which was very large, and more useful on that account, but too heavy to be hoisted up by their crane, as they were used to do the others, so, being forced to leave it floating at the foot of the rock, it was taken from them in the night by surprise: this made the government think they would be more inclined to surrender, so sent a sergeant and some soldiers to offer them an indemnity if they would submit; but, instead of that, they had the dexterity to repair their loss by it, for, desiring them to come nearer under pretence of not hearing well what they said, brought them at last within reach of their fire-arms; by the terror of which they forced them in, and, disarming the soldiers, seized the boat, and made the prisoners help them up with it as far as to put it out of danger of being retaken as the other had been; and soon after a Danish ship passing within reach of their cannon, they forced her in also, and, having taken a small tribute of provisions and what else they wanted as due to their little independent state, they put their prisoners on board, that they might not help to consume what now began to be too little for themselves; and in this manner they held out till the beginning of the year 1694, when they were forced by famine to surrender at last."

governors of Londonderry. When James summoned the place in person they fired upon him. The fortifications were rudely but effectually repaired: a few brave Scotsmen, well acquainted with the art of war, threw themselves into the beleaguered city. After eleven days of unsuccessful attacks, James drew off, and went to Dublin to open the Irish parliament, whose session has been already described. General Rosen, who was left to conduct the siege, was a savage that had improved his natural brutality in the exterminating war which Louis XIV. had waged in the Protestant and defenceless Palatinate. He ordered that all the inhabitants within ten miles round Londonderry should be driven under the walls of that place, and all the country wasted and burnt: he proclaimed that, if the town did not surrender in ten days, he would put every one within it to the sword. And, in fact, a vast crowd of men, women, and children were collected, and driven, naked and famishing, under the walls of the furnishing town, wherein the defenders were reduced to eat their horses, their dogs, and their garbage. The besieged, on the other hand, erected a tall gibbet on one of the bastions to hang whatever prisoners fell into their hands, and intimidated the enemy that they had better send priests to confess these victims of a fair retaliation. James certainly neither commanded nor approved of these atrocities;* but he was away in Dublin; and many hundreds of the country people, including mothers with infants at their breasts, were left to perish outside the walls of Londonderry, while those who, at the end of two days and two nights, were permitted to go back through Rosen's lines, found their homes in ashes, and their cattle and all other property whatsoever destroyed or carried off. William's choice of officers was, at the least, singular. Kirk, who had committed such cruelties in the west of England for James, but who had contrived to recommend himself as a good soldier to the new king, was sent over to the relief of Londonderry; and, after forcing a boom which obstructed his passage, and silencing some batteries which the Irish had thrown up on the water's edge, he, on the 30th of July, succoured the heroic garrison, who had scarcely strength left to thank their deliverers. Including the townspeople, eight or nine thousand had perished by famine, disease, or the shot of the enemy. On the very next day Rosen raised the siege, which, altogether, had lasted nearly four months.* On the same day the brave Inniskilleners, who had kept their town, and caused great loss to the Papists by sallies and surprises, defeated General Mackarty and 6000 Irish at Newton-Butler,

* The real hero of the siege of Limerick was Walker, the Presbyterian minister. He was honoured and rewarded by William; but he lost his life soon after at the passage of the Boyne. When the king was told of his fate, he said, "What business had the minister there?" For this William has been censured; yet it appears to us that he was in the right, or that he meant merely to say that Walker had done enough at Limerick, and after that siege might have put on his Geneva gown and left the war to regular soldiers.

killing, it is said, about 2000, and causing about 500 to drown themselves. Ulster was now safe; and, on the 13th of August, old Marshal Schomberg landed at Carrickfergus with 16,000 men—English, Scotch, Dutch, Danes, and French Huguenots;—the latter, for the most part, men who had nothing left to them but their swords, and who hoped to avenge upon the Papists and the French in Ireland some of the wrongs which they had endured in their own country on account of their religion. Of all the bands that adhered to the standard of King William, and followed him in all his extending wars on the Continent, there was none more brave, more enthusiastic, than these proscribed French Protestants. At the same time the English fleet, after some disgraceful signs of sloth or cowardice or treachery in the commanders, was assuming a respectable attitude: Brest was watched or blockaded; and the Confederates, passing the Rhine, laid siege to Bonn and Mayence, in the view of forcing a passage into France and fighting Louis on his own territory.

The life and soul of this confederacy was William, who was burning to join its armies and take the command of them; but, besides the recovery and settlement of Ireland, he had many other things to do, and also much to suffer from the factious and intriguing spirit of his new subjects, or at least that part of them who figured as public men and made politics their trade. Proof has been accumulated upon proof to show that he was continually betrayed by some of those who held office under him, but who, considering that they had not been sufficiently rewarded—that they had not gained enough by the Revolution—were willing to bring about a counter-revolution in order to have one throw more out of the dice. The wretched old king had not been gone three months from England ere Danby was heard to say, "If King James would only quit his priests, he might still retrieve his affairs;" and Halifax was of opinion that wise men ought not to venture too far. Others spake out louder, and (in convenient places) joined the cry of those who maintained that William had overturned the constitution he was invited over to preserve—had broken faith with the nation—acted most unaturally to his uncle and father-in-law—and trampled upon the laws of God and man. Others, again, who were merely timid and selfish waverers, lauded King William at one side of the mouth and blessed King James with the other, so that, come what might, they might pass for loyal and faithful servants. To gratify as large a number as possible of the rapacious claimants for office, the Treasury, the Admiralty, the Great Seal were all put into commission.* But this told two ways; for Danby, who expected to be reappointed lord treasurer, and Admiral Herbert, who expected to be made lord high admiral, with the sole control of the Admiralty, were disgusted in the extreme. Lord Churchill, moreover, who had done as much for the Revolution as any man, and who, more than most, had been obliged to the late king, was sorely disappointed at seeing Schomberg named Master of the Ordnance instead of himself. Churchill received an appointment in the royal household, and so did the Lords Devonshire, Mordaunt, Dorset, Lovelace, Oxford, and others; but then every one of these (with the exception, perhaps, of Devonshire) wanted something better, and was irritated at seeing William keep three of his Dutch followers—Bentinck, Auverquerque, and Zuystein—about the English court. Halifax had looked for something more than the privy seal, which was restored to him; and Shrewsbury, appointed one of the secretaries of state, was astonished and distressed (as were all the Whig party) to see that sturdy Tory, Nottingham, who had done all he could to prevent the settlement, appointed to be the other secretary. Nominally, the public ministers of the crown were Nottingham, Shrewsbury, Halifax, and Danby, who thwarted one another, and only agreed in complaining that the king did not repose sufficient confidence in them, but preferred the advice of Sidney, now created Lord Sidney, and that of his countryman, Bentinck, now Earl of Portland, who both were true to his interests. The majority of the ministers, members of the privy council, and placemen, together with all those who haunt courts for the honour of the thing, were disgusted by William's cold, stiff, retiring manners and by his hereditary taciturnity;* but if William had unbent himself with these men, they would have broken him; if he had given them his confidence, they would have made use of it to betray him. Even as it was, nearly every secret of the cabinet of St. James's was communicated to Versailles, to St. Germain, to the court of King James at Dublin.

On the 19th of October William opened the second session of his first parliament. The Bill of Rights[†] was passed with the additional clauses about royal marriages. This bill and the Land-tax Bill received the royal assent on the 16th of November. The Princess Anne, who was completely in the hands of Churchill, now Earl of Marlborough, and his bold and able wife, after agreeing to the Act of Settlement, had come to an open quarrel with the new court, and was disposed to do whatever the spirit of party might suggest in opposition to it. Anne wanted 70,000*l.* a-year to be settled upon her by parliament, and for life, wholly independent of her brother-in-law and sister. William, who had notions of economy, wondered very much how she could spend 30,000*l.* a-year; and, as most of his own revenue was voted not for life, but year by year, he wished to have her income depend upon himself, without any parliamentary debate or vote. He even sent Shrewsbury to offer her highness 50,000*l.* a-year if she would desist from soliciting the settlement by parliament. Instigated by my Lady Marlborough, she replied—"That she could not think herself in the wrong to desire a security for what was to support her; and that the business was now gone so far, that she thought it reasonable to see what her friends could do for her."[‡] Anne's present friends were the Tories, and they stood out in the House of Commons for the 70,000*l.* a-year; but in the end they compounded the matter for 50,000*l.* The consequence of the struggle was a complete breach between the two royal sisters, which was never made up. Even on her death-bed, Queen Mary refused to see the Princess Anne—who, however, had given offence in many other ways. Lady Marlborough says that the success of the affair was chiefly imputed to the steadiness and diligence of my Lord Marlborough and herself; and she labours to show that William's enmity to her husband arose from this circumstance, choosing to overlook some very obvious and very serious facts, which we shall give in their proper place. When the king's revenue fell under consideration, it was settled, as before, for one year. The House of Commons had gone into committee to consider the dangerous state of the nation, the condition of the public revenue, &c.; and they had agreed in an humble address to his majesty, laying before him the ill conduct and success of affairs with respect to Ireland, the armies, and fleet; and desiring his majesty to take into consideration, and in his wisdom to find out the authors of, the late failures, and to appoint persons unsuspected to the management of affairs, for his own safety and better satisfaction of his subjects. This was done by the Whig majority, who wanted to drive out every residue of Toryism from court, cabinet, camp, fleet, and law courts: but it is impossible to deny that the miscarriages of which they complained were disgraceful and dangerous, and were chiefly brought about by persons that were very properly suspected by the country. On the 21st of December, Mr. Hampden, who was accused of having got up the agitation out of disappointment and out of pique to the Earl of Nottingham, who had "crossed his ambition by stepping between him and the secretary's office," reported the address to the House, but found that the humour was changed, and that the Tories, in support of their friends in office, and the Whigs in place, had come to an agreement that the address should be recommitted; and it was recommitted accordingly. On the 23d of December there was a call of the House for that day fortnight. It was found that even in the Commons the Tories already pretty nearly equalled the strength of the Whigs—in the Lords they surpassed it. Parties were so nearly balanced that the king could make either of them the stronger; and the Tories, who promised more liberality in voting supplies and less jealousy of the prerogative, won a share of his favour without acquiring much of his confidence. The Whigs made a bold attempt in a new Corporation Bill, which, by restoring the boroughs to the state in which they were in 1675, and by disqualifying every mayor, recorder, sheriff, common-councilman, town-clerk, magistrate, or officer, that had consented to, joined in, or in any way contributed to the surrender of the charters in the two last reigns, would, as they calculated, give them the complete ascendancy in a new election. By a curious coalition of parties, or party men, this bill was hampered and delayed.

A. D. 1690.—On the 27th of January, William put an end to this convention parliament. Halifax had retired from office; Mordaunt, Delamere, Godolphin, Admiral Herbert, were dismissed, and the business of government was committed to Danby, who had been created Marquess of Cacermartheir, to Nottingham, and Sir John Lowther, a dependant of Danby; and it was found that this Tory ministry had a Tory majority in the new parliament, which met on the 20th of March. Sir John Trevor, a bold and dexterous Tory, who had been Speaker and Master of the Rolls under James, and who is said to have been the first to begin "the practice of buying off men," was elected Speaker of the Commons.* Still, however, this ministerial majority was unsteady: the voting of Whigs and Tories (and it is not always easy to distinguish the one from the other) was wavering and uncertain; and, as happens wherever parties have not been thoroughly organised and drilled in parliamentary business, it was difficult to divine from one vote or motion what they would do next. And, besides, a certain degree of honour and good faith, though it be but as "the honour among thieves," is essential to party men; and of this two-thirds of the public men of that time seem to have been utterly incapable. In some respects the Tories answered to their engagements, seeming, as usual, more free in voting money than the Whigs. In his opening speech, William told them that his presence in Ireland would be absolutely necessary, and that he continued in his resolution of going thither as soon as possible. "And," continued he, "I have called you together for your assistance to enable me to prosecute the war with speed and vigour: in which I assure myself of your cheerful concurrence, being a work so necessary for your own safeties. In order to this, I desire you will forthwith make a settlement of the revenue; and I cannot doubt but you will herein have as much regard for the honour and dignity of the monarchy in my hands, as has been lately shown to others. And I have so great a confidence in you, that, if no quicker or more convenient way can be found for the raising of ready money (without which the service cannot be performed), I shall be very well content, for the present, to have it made such a fund of credit, as may be useful to yourselves as well as to me in this conjuncture; not having the least apprehensions but that you will provide for the taking off all such anticipations as it shall happen to fall under." He spoke of his earnest endeavours to extinguish or compose all differences among his subjects, and of his frequently recommending an Act of Indemnity to the last parliament; and told them that, since part of it, which related to the preventing of private suits, was already enacted, and because there was now little time to spare for debate, he intended to send them an Act of Grace,

* Trevor, according to Burnet, "knew the most effectual ways of recommending himself to every government: he had been in great favour in King James's time, and was made Master of the Rolls by him; and, if Lord Jeffries had stuck at any thing, he was looked on as the man likeliest to have had the great seal: he now got himself to be chosen Speaker, and was made first commissioner of the great seal. Being a Tory in principle, he undertook to manage that party, provided he was furnished with such sums of money as might purchase some votes. . . . I took the liberty once to complain to the king of this method: he said, he hated it as much as any man could do; but he saw it was not possible, considering the corruption of the age, to avoid it, unless he would endanger the whole."—For more of Trevor, see vol. iii. p. 647.

with exceptions of some few persons only. (The Tories had alleged that the delay of the Whigs in passing the indemnity kept the axe suspended over their heads, and tended to alarm and alienate one-half of the nation.) "A further reason," said William, "which induceth me to send you this act at this time, is, because I am desirous to leave no colour of excuse to any of my subjects for the raising of disturbances in the government, and especially in the time of my absence; and I say this, both to inform you, and to let some ill-affected men see, that I am not unacquainted how busy they are in their present endeavours to alter it. Among other encouragements which I find they give themselves, one of the ways by which they hope to compass their designs is by creating differences and disagreements in your counsels, which, I hope, you will be very careful to prevent; for be assured that our greatest enemies can have no better instruments for their purposes than those who shall any way endeavour to disturb or delay your speedy and unanimous proceeding upon these necessary matters."* He, told them that he had thought it most convenient to leave the administration of the government in the hands of the queen in his absence; and, if it should be judged necessary to have an act of parliament to confirm her power, he desired they would prepare one and present it to him. The Commons unanimously passed a vote of thanks, and pledged themselves to support the government of their present majesties, King William and Queen Mary, "both by their counsel and with their assistance to the utmost of their power." On the 27th of March (the seventh day of the session) they resolved, nemine contradicente, that a supply be given to enable his majesty to prosecute the war against France and reduce Ireland with speed and vigour; and on the 28th they came to the following resolutions:—"1. That the hereditary revenues which the late King James was entitled to in December, 1688, became and are vested in their present majesties, in right of the crown of England, except the late revenue arising from fire-hearths and stoves. 2. That a bill be brought in to declare that the said revenues are so vested, and to make provision that they shall not be alienated from the crown, or charged with any gift or grant to be made for the future. 3. That a bill be brought in for settling for life that moiety of the excise which was granted to the late Kings Charles and James for their lives, with a clause to make the said revenue a security for raising money. 4. That a bill be brought in to grant to their majesties, for the term of four years from Christmas next, the customs which were granted

* In the next paragraph of his speech, William, who really believed that the great measure might easily be carried, and at once, spoke of the Union. "I must recommend, also, to your consideration an union with Scotland: I do not mean it should be now entered upon; but they having proposed this to me some time since, and the parliament there having nominated commissioners for that purpose, I should be glad that commissioners might also be nominated here to treat with them, and to see if such terms could be agreed on, as might be for the benefit of both nations, so as to be ready to be presented to you in some future session."

to the late Kings Charles and James for their lives, with a clause to make the said revenue a security for raising money," &c. But though these votes were carried without a division, they did not pass without a sharp debate. Some thought the Commons were giving too much—others thought they were giving too little, and that the customs ought to be voted for life as well as the excise. Burnet says—"It was much pressed to have it all settled for life; but it was taken up as a general maxim, that a revenue for a certain and short term was the best security that the nation could have for frequent parliaments." Sir Charles Sedley, the professional wit, who had become a great patriot,* maintained that the great men in office ought to be made sensible of the burdens they were imposing upon the impoverished people by bearing their share in them. "Truly, Mr. Speaker," said he, "it is a sad reflection that some men should wallow in wealth and places, while others put away in taxes the fourth part of their revenue, for the support of the same government. We are not upon equal terms for his majesty's service: the courtiers and great officers charge, as it were, in armour; they feel not the taxes by reason of their places, while the country gentlemen are shot through and through by them. The king is pleased to lay his wants before us, and, I am confident, expects our advice upon it: we ought, therefore, to tell him what pensions are too great—what places may be extinguished, during the time of the war and public calamity. His Majesty sees nothing but coaches and six, and great tables, and therefore cannot imagine the want and misery of the rest of his subjects: he is a brave and generous prince, but he is a young king, encompassed and hemmed in by a company of crafty old courtiers. To say no more, some have places of 3000*l.*, some of 6000*l.*, and others of 8000*l.* per annum; and, I am told, the commissioners of the treasury have 1600*l.* per annum apiece. Certainly, public pensions, whatever they have been formerly, are much too great for the present want and calamity that reigns everywhere else; and it is a scandal that a government so sick at heart as ours is should look so well in the face. We must save the king's money wherever we can, for I am afraid the war is too great for our purses, if things be not managed with all imaginable thrift. When the people of England see all things are saved that can be saved—that there are no exorbitant pensions nor unnecessary salaries, and all this applied to the use to which they are given—we shall give, and they shall pay, whatever his majesty can want, to secure the Protestant religion, and to keep out the King of France and King James too; whom, by the way, I have not heard named this session—whether out of fear, discretion, or respect, I cannot tell. I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let us save the king what we can, and then let us proceed to give him what we are able." On the 1st of April, the amount of the supply for the public occasions, between that time and Michaelmas, was fixed at 1,200,000*l.*: on the 2nd, the sum to be raised on the credit of the bill or bills for settling the revenue as part of that supply was fixed at 1,000,000*l.*; on the 3rd, it was agreed that the remaining 200,000*l.* should be provided by another tax.

The measure which gave rise to the greatest debate in the Lords was a bill brought in by the Whigs for recognising and acknowledging that their Majesties King William and Queen Mary "were, are, and of right ought to be, by the laws of this realm, our sovereign liege lord and lady, King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland," &c.; and also declaring all the acts made in the late convention parliament to be, to all intents and purposes, laws and statutes of the kingdom. The first part of the bill, according to Burnet, passed with little contradiction, though some objected to the expressions attributing a rightful and lawful title to their majesties as not at all necessary.* But as to the second point, although the Tories offered to enact that the acts of the convention should be all good laws for the time to come, they opposed the declaring of them to have been such from the date of their passing. The Whigs, however, with the assistance or connivance of some of the Tories in office, carried the bill through the second reading and the committee; but they lost their point by six votes on the report; and then they recovered it, although not exactly in the same words as before, principally, it is said, through the impression made by a strong protest, signed by the Whig Lords Bolton, Macclesfield, Stamford, Newport, Monmouth, Bedford, Herbert, Suffolk, Delamere, and Oxford. This bill of recognition was easily passed through the Commons, who, however, made a loud and firm resistance to another bill which was also introduced, in the Lords, by the Whigs. This was "The Abjuration Bill," which provided that all persons in any employment or trust, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, should take an oath abjuring the late King James and his title to the crown. According to Lord Dartmouth, William was present during the whole of the debate in the Upper House. Of late there had been a vast deal of swearing and forswearing—those useless ceremonies which attend all revolutionary changes. Lord Wharton said that he was a very old man, and had taken a multitude of oaths in his time, and hoped God would forgive him if he had not kept them all, for truly they were more than he could pretend to remember;† and he for one should be very unwilling to charge himself with more oaths at the end of his days. Lord Maccles-

* Sedley had been very active among the drivers of the Revolution and the convention parliament, saying that, as King James had made his daughter a countess, he would help to make James's daughter (Mary) a queen.

• Burnet says, "Some excepted to the words rightful and lawful," on which Ralph captiously remarks, "Unluckily the words rightful and lawful are not in the act." He omits to state that expressions perfectly synonymous are in it.

field, who had come over with William from Holland, said that he was much in the same case as my Lord Wharton, though they had not always taken the same oaths; that he never knew oaths of any use but to make people declare against government that would have submitted quietly to it, if they had been let alone; that he himself had made very free with his oath of allegiance to King James, but should be loth to be under the temptation of breaking any more. "The Earl of Marlborough said he was surprised to hear that lord say what he did, for he was sure there was no man in England that had more merit in bringing the late happy revolution to effect than his lordship. The Earl of Macclesfield said he had spoken his mind with more freedom, because he was sure he should not be misrepresented; but his lordship did him too much honour in thinking he had so great a share in the Revolution: there were others that had gone much greater lengths than he either could or would have done; for he had been only a rebel,* and should always be ready to venture his head, whenever he thought the laws and liberties of his country required it. This cast so strong a damp upon the debate, that the House adjourned presently after, and the king seemed as little pleased as the Earl of Marlborough. The Bishop of London made a long speech against the multiplying of oaths, but the conclusion set them all a laughing; for he desired not to be misunderstood: he did not speak for himself; there was not, nor could not be made, an oath to the present government that he would not take."† Among the Lords nearly every Tory opposed this abjuration bill, which was lost in the Commons by a majority of 192 to 178. Hereupon the Earl of Shrewsbury, one of the staunchest of the revolutionists, resigned his places, seeing that the king was driven more and more to the Tories, and that Danby, now Marquess of Caermarthen, had gained more credit in the cabinet than he could tolerate.‡ The party war of bills and counter-bills was continued with no lack of violence and vehemence. The Tories brought in a bill for restoring to the city of London all its ancient rights and privileges, which they had been instrumental in ruining and destroying when absolutism was in the ascendancy. The bill of their own framing was of course highly favourable to their own party; but the Whigs, though not without difficulty, kept the bill in suspense till the close of the session. Another bill from the same party called for payment of the fines of 500*l.* which had been incurred by those persons who had acted as magistrates or officers without duly qualifying themselves to

* His lordship meant to hint that Marlborough had been a traitor and a false friend.

† Lord Dartmouth, note in Burnet.

‡ According to Burnet, this resignation troubled William very much. "He loved the Earl of Shrewsbury, and apprehended that his leaving his service at this time might alienate most entirely from him. . . . The king sent Tillotson and all those who had most credit with the earl, to divert him from his resolution. But all was to no purpose. The agitation of mind that this gave him threw him into a fever, which almost cost him his life. The king pressed him to keep the seals till his return from Ireland, though he should not act as secretary; but he could not be prevailed on."

serve by oaths, &c., as the law directed. "The main drift of this," says Ralph, "was to make the dissenters smart for their ductility in the late reign; and it was the business of their allies, the Whigs, to show these dissenters all possible countenance and protection: but then they were out of heart—the stream of the session had set against them; numbers were tired of a vain opposition, and had made their retreat to the country." It should be added, that many had been enlisted and bribed into the Tory ranks. The bill was carried by a majority of 176 to 93, together with a clause added in committee, that all the money arising from the said fines should be paid into the exchequer, and that a distinct account should be kept thereof.* The Whigs attempted a diversion by reporting that they knew there were confederacies and designs on foot to raise a rebellion, and that they would prove it before the bar of the House of Commons.† They succeeded in obtaining a vote that a bill should be brought in for the more effectual security of their majesties' government against all such persons and practices. On the 20th of May, after William had given the royal assent to the act for the exercise of the government by her majesty during the king's absence, and to the act for reversing the quo warranto judgment against the city of London, &c., the Lords, who had unanimously agreed in the great measure of policy and mercy so strongly recommended from the throne, sent down the following message to the Commons, by Mr. Justice Eyre and Mr. Baron Turton:—"Mr. Speaker, his majesty has been pleased to send this bill, intitled, An Act for the King and Queen's most gracious, general, and free pardon, which the Lords have passed and accepted, nemine contradicente, and now send it down to this House." To the honour of the Commons, the roar of opposition was hushed; not a voice was raised against the healing measure, and the bill was immediately carried through all the forms of the House. Out of this act of grace or amnesty were excepted by name thirty-one individuals, of whom the most noted were the Marquess of Powis, the Lords Huntingdon, Sunderland, Dover, Melfort, and Castlemaine; the Bishops of Durham and St. David's; the Judges Herbert, Withens, Jenner, and Holloway; Sir Roger l'Estrange, Colonel Lundie, the false governor of Londonderry, Father Petre, the Jesuit, and George Lord Jeffreys, deceased. [That firbrand had gone out like a snuff, in the Tower, where he died of disease on the 19th of April, 1689.] After they had returned the bills to the lords, the Commons took exception to the words nemine contradicente in their lordships' message as something that might be construed into an attempt to

* This important amendment was added because it was apprehended that if the fines should be left to the king, few would be demanded by him, and still fewer paid.

† "Many discoveries," says Burnet, "were made of practices from St. Germain and Ireland; but few were taken up, and those were too inconsiderable to know more than that many were provided with arms and ammunition, and that a method was projected for bringing men together upon a call."

overawe them, it having never been usual for either House, in their intercourse with the other, to intimate by what number any bill had passed. A committee of the Commons was appointed to search precedents, and draw up reasons to be offered at a conference, by way of protest; but, on the very next day, William went down to the Lords, and, having witnessed the passing of the act of grace in the usual form,* put an end to the session.

Twelve days after the prorogation William left London for Ireland; and on the 14th of June he landed at Belfast with a force not very considerable in point of number, but perfect in discipline, appointment, spirit, and devotion to his cause. It included English, Scots, Dutch, Danes, and French; and, when it was joined to Schomberg's forces and the Protestant volunteers that flocked in from various parts of Ireland, it made up an army of 30,000 men. In the ten months that Schomberg had held the chief command little had been done towards the reduction of that unhappy island. On his first landing he took Belfast, Carrickfergus, Newry, and Dundalk; but at the latter place he was brought to a stand by De Rosen, and about the middle of September James came up in person with the remainder of his army, and obliged the old marshal to intrench himself at and round about Dundalk. The Jacobites endeavoured to force him to a battle, but they failed in their attempts. On the 27th of September Schomberg wrote to William, that the best thing he could do was, to lie there on the defensive; and on the 12th of October he says in the same spirit—"If your majesty was well informed of the state of our army and that of our enemy, the nature of the country, and the situation of the two camps, I do not believe you would incline to risk an attack. If we do not succeed, your majesty's army would be lost without resource. I make use of that term; for I do not believe, if it was once put into disorder, that it could be re-established."† On the other side, De Rosen would not venture an attack upon Schomberg's positions and entrenchments, and, as the bad weather set in, King James retired to Ardee and fortified himself there. Schomberg's forces lay for the most part out upon cold wet ground, and suffered severely.‡ There were two or three insignificant affairs of outposts, and Sligo was taken by the Catholics. On the 8th of November James returned to Dublin, after which Schomberg quitted his entrenchments and retired to better winter quarters. In the beginning of February James's natural son, the Duke of Berwick, who had some of the qualities of a good soldier, made an attack upon the advanced position of Schomberg at Belurbet, but he was worsted and nearly killed in the action, having his horse shot under him. In the month of May, Charlemont, a place of great strength, which had been bravely defended by Sir Teague O'Regan, was forced by famine to surrender to the Protestants. And by this time the English fleet, which had been so long skulking or retreating before the French, began to do something; they scoured St. George's Channel, carried provisions to Schomberg's half-famished troops, and took the only man-of-war James had out of the very road of Dublin, where it lay at anchor. "But," in the words of the Jacobite memoir of that king's life, "these misfortunes at home were nothing in comparison to the disappointment he met with from the court of France, whence all hope of succour was to come: there was no endeavour nor industry wanting in the queen to represent the necessity of transporting the Irish army into England, and making that the seat of war, where it was hoped the conjunction of the king's friends would soon so augment his force, as to make the English weary of resisting God and their duty, when they found the miseries of war brought to their own doors; besides the incapacity Ireland was in of maintaining such an army, as would be necessary to oppose the mighty force England was preparing to send over. This seemed strange to some people, considering how plentiful a country Ireland is; but the enemy was muster of all Ulster,

* An act of grace or pardon is signed by the king before it is submitted to the parliament: and, having thus received the royal assent in its first stage, is passed by the clerk of the parliament saying, not from the king to the parliament, but from the parliament to the king. "Les prelates, seigneurs, et communs, en ce present parliament assemblez, au nom de tous vos autres subjects, remettent tres humblement votre majesté, et prient à Dieu vons donner en sante bone vie et longue." (The prelates, Lords, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, in the name of all your other subjects, most humbly thank your majesty, and pray to God to grant you in health and wealth long to live.) The act is not in the form of a common statute: the present, for instance, begins—"The king and queen's most excellent majesties, taking into their serious consideration, &c., are well pleased and contented that it be enacted by authority of this present parliament, and be it enacted by authority of the same," &c. It is peculiarly fit to such a bill that it is only read once in each House, and that, although it may be rejected, it cannot be amended. The present act of grace was far too good and mild to be the act of faction or party. Many, both Whigs and Tories, of those who had opposed it in parliament, criticised it afterwards without mercy. The ultra Whig, Lord Delamere (now Earl of Warrington), who had been engaged with Shaftesbury, with Russell, with Algernon Sydney, with Monmouth—who had been implicated in every movement and confederacy—complained bitterly of this "free pardon without regard to exemplary justice, for those treasons and murders, and other high crimes committed before the Revolution." He said that his majesty had been duped by the Tories, who "not only deceived the king of the great forfeitures and fines that ought to have been borne part of the charge of his expedition hitherto; but had set all the party at least upon even ground with the most innocent sufferers for their country, to be preferred to all sorts of magistracies and authorities, and saved from making reparation to multitudes, whom they had oppressed, under colour of authority, in the two last reigns." His lordship, who, in settling this revolution, would have seen the seeds of several others, by driving one-half of the country to desperation, says that he had heard many of the Tories laugh at the weakness and credulity of the king, and at the formal exception of the thirty-one persons that were not the greatest criminals: that time showed that all those persons who did not embark in after rebellions were in fact admitted into the indemnity. "No process," says his lordship, with a horror which we cannot share with him, "has issued against any of them, not a penny of their estates, nor one hair of their heads hath been touched; and several of them have even since sat in the House of Lords as our legislators."—Impartial Inquiry.

† On the other hand, the Jacobites complained that, while King James had been punished in the extreme, the men by whose advice and ministry he had acted were allowed to pass scot-free. "These punishments, I say, at least some of them, were not only suffered to escape punishment, but were highly preferred and rewarded, even by your poor King William: than which I challenge any one to give an instance either of greater inquiry or deeper hypocrisy."—Dialogue of the Times, as quoted by Ralph.

* Dalrymple; Appendix.

† "His army was grievously afflicted with the country's disease, and so overrun with lice, that vast numbers of them died; especially the English, not only common men, but officers, as Mr. Wharton, son to the lord of that name, Sir Edward Peering, Sir Henry Ingholby, Gore Barrington, Sir George Erwin, and others; Sir George Hewitt, Lord Drogheda, Lord Rosemount, and others, were very ill."—Life of James.

and the Catholics, who quitted it upon Schomberg's landing, brought such prodigious flocks of cattle with them as ate up the greatest part of the grass and meadows of the other provinces, and destroyed even a great share of the corn too: the county of Louth, the best corn country in Ireland, together with that of Meath, Leitrim, and Sligo, were ruined with incursions; the great stocks of cattle, sheep, &c., being in the hands of Protestants, and many of them flying into England, they had been embezzled, and those that stayed were ruined in great measure by the Rapparees; this brought such scarcity, that there was neither corn nor meal to feed the army any considerable time, no cloth to clothe them, nor leather for shoes or saddles, and the brass money put an absolute stop to importation; so that the army must either be transported out of Ireland, or all necessaries for its subsistence imported from France, as also an additional number of troops proportionable to the vast preparations England was making: but the court of France seemed deaf to all these representations; the French officers and ambassadors in Ireland had sent such desponding relations from thence, that, though they could not but see the great advantage of such a diversion, yet the improbability of success made them averse from venturing more succours than what was absolutely necessary to keep the war alive."

This absolute dependency upon France showed the hopelessness of James's cause, and prevented many from joining it that were otherwise well disposed towards him. The complaints, moreover, and the throwing of the whole blame upon France, are characteristic of the fallen king and his faction. Louis was, as we have seen, in the greatest difficulties himself, and to him the war in Ireland was, and could be, nothing but a temporary diversion. Yet he now sent over 6000 men, some money, and some clothes for James's army. De Roseu having retired in despair or disgust, these French troops were entrusted to the Count de Lauzun, who, on his arrival in Ireland, assumed the chief command of the whole army. Lauzun had assisted and accompanied James's queen in her flight from Whitehall, and had so recommended himself to her good graces, that Mary d'Este, "not knowing but he might be as great a general as he affected to appear," and "perhaps with a view of doing an agreeable thing to Madame de Maintenon, in whose good esteem he was at that time," got him appointed to this command.* But Lauzun was incompetent and arrogant; he was constantly quarrelling with the Irish, and he found the French officers weary of the hard service in Ireland and completely disheartened. According to the memoir, d'Avaux and these officers "generally, instead of assisting the king in that extremity, pulled each a different way: nor were they much afflicted in the bottom, to see things go so ill, because it verified their accounts, and recommended their judgment: in fine, such were the wants, disunion, and dejection, that the king's affairs looked like the primitive chaos."† Even in this situation were James's affairs when he was apprized that William had landed, and would soon be upon him. After various consultations and conflicting opinions, he resolved to advance as far as Dundalk to eat up the forage thereabout and preserve his own country behind him; and in pursuance of this plan he left Dublin on the 16th of June. Upon that day King William was at Belfast, attended by Prince George of Denmark, the Duke of Ormond, the Earls of Oxford, Scarborough, and Manchester, Mr. Boyle, and many other persons of note, civilians as well as military, Irish as well as English. The preceding day being Sunday, Dr. Rouse had preached before him, on the text, "Through faith they have subdued kingdoms;" upon which occasion William had said, "My chaplain has begun the campaign bravely." Two or three days after, he told his officers that he did not come there to let grass grow under his feet; and, moving forward to Loughbrittan, he reviewed his whole army, and found it to consist of 36,000 men, all in good order. From that point he marched towards Newry, and was so well pleased with the prospect of the country, that he said to those about him, "It is worth fighting for."‡ In the mean while James had encamped behind the small river which runs into the sea at Dundalk, where he lay till the 23rd of June, when he fell back upon Ardee. William, making a compass, crossed the hills between Newry and Dundalk; and on his approach on the 27th, James retired from Ardee to Dunlane, and on the 28th to the left bank of the river Boyne. On the 29th James crossed the Boyne and took up an excellent position on the right bank. On the 30th William reached the Boyne, and found his enemies encamped along the river in two strong lines. He, however, resolved to force the passage on the morrow, and rode along the left bank to reconnoitre. While engaged in this service the enemy brought two field-pieces to bear upon him, and at the first shot they killed a man and two horses that were very near him. This ball was presently followed by another, that had like to put a period to William's own life; for this second ball, having first grazed on the bank of the river, rising en ricochet, slanted on the king's right shoulder, took out a piece of his coat and tore the skin and flesh, and afterwards broke the head of a gentleman's pistol. Lord Coningsby rode up to his majesty and clapped his handkerchief on the wound; but William said coolly that it needed not—that the ball should have come nearer to do him harm. But the enemy on the opposite side of the river, seeing that he stooped in his saddle, and that there was some disorder among those who attended him, joyfully concluded that he was killed, and this false report was conveyed with wonderful rapidity to Dublin, from Dublin to Paris, and from Paris to every capital in Europe.* The rapturous joy felt by his enemies, and the grief and despair of his friends, were alike tributes to the merits of William, or proofs of how much was considered to depend upon his person. In the mean time, having got his flesh-wound dressed, he continued on horseback nearly the whole of that day. About nine at night he called his officers together, and declared that he would pass the river on the morrow. He gave orders that every soldier should be provided with a good stock of ammunition, that all should be ready to march at break of day, and that every man should wear a green bough or sprig in his hat, to distinguish him from the enemy, who wore pieces of white paper as cock-

* Life of James.—According to the same authority, though this pleased Louis's mistress, it displeased his great minister Louvois, who was jealous of Lauzun, and who purposely thwarted him in Ireland.

† It is added,—"The queen, on the other hand, finding her solicitations so fruitless, would have pawned the remainder of her jewels to buy necessaries, she having sent a great sum of money into Ireland already, which had been raised that way, but the king writ to her that the matter was now drawn too near a head to wait for supplies from such methods."

ades. The watchword of that night was "Westminster;" and at about twelve o'clock William rode with torches quite through his army. He then retired to his tent in calm expectation of the morrow. That day of slaughter soon dawned—it was the 1st of July, and the weather was beautifully clear. The générale was beat in the camp before day, and as soon as the sun was up Schomberg and General Douglas moved with the right wing towards Slane. The Irish, by a corresponding movement, brought their left wing to Slane, but the English dashed into the river and forded it there. The wretched James had already sent off his baggage and all his cannon but six towards Dublin; and his left wing, after a smart fight, retreated before the horse, foot, and artillery of Douglas, who, with little loss, got a firm footing on the right bank of the Boyne. Nearly at the same time William made an attack on the pass at Old Bridge, and the Dutch blue guards, beating a march till they got to the water's edge, went in eight or ten abreast, and waded across with the water above their girdles. When they got into the middle of the stream they were saluted with a terrible peal by the Irish, who had lined the houses, hedges, and breastworks on the other side; but the Dutchmen went on, got a footing on the bank, formed in two lines, and soon drove the Irish from their intrenchments. The blue guards then, advancing into the open fields, were set upon furiously by the Irish horse; but they stood close and firm, and, as other regiments came up to their assistance, the Irish retired. At another point the Irish horse, who behaved very gallantly, drove a body of Danes and of French Protestants back into the river. Old Schomberg, perceiving this disorder, and that the French Protestants were left much exposed and without a commander, passed the river himself, in order to lead them. Pointing to the French Papists in James's ranks, he exclaimed to his Huguenots, "Allons, Messieurs, voilà vos persécuteurs;" but

* In Paris, where the news of William's death arrived in the middle of the night, there was wonderful readiness in rejoicing: the church bells were instantly set ringing, and bonfires lit in the streets. The aggressions of Louis XIV. had, however, so cooled the religious zeal of the ultra-Catholic courts of Madrid and Vienna, that in those capitals they mourned for the death of the heretic. At Rome the intelligence of William being killed and that of James being defeated seem to have arrived together, and Melfort was greatly embarrassed. On the 12th of August he writes from Rome to James's queen:—"All that concern, anxiety, joy, or fear can bring being on me almost at once, at least by near succeeding its, your majesty cannot blame me if I long to be freed of them by a full confirmation of the success in Ireland and the death of the Prince of Orange, that the king is safe, and your majesty once again happy in seeing and having so near a prospect of Whitehall. . . . As soon as the confirmation of this new Hero, the Prince of Orange, his death shall come, all that is to be expected from this will be immediately done, and my longer stay here will be needless. . . . It is impossible to imagine the falsehoods spread abroad by the allies' ministers here, who go through the town offering great wagers that the French had greater losses at Flcury than the allies, and that their fleet is totally defeated. But to us, who are sure of the contrary, it is some joy to see the moon shifts they are put to. Would to God we were as sure of the usurper's death and of the victory in Ireland, of which with the utmost impatience we expect the confirmation from Ireland—for from Versailles it seems to come directly enough hither. I have only the letters of the 17th July, so that I want those of the 10th of that month, and those of the 24th, and that, notwithstanding others have got letters of that date, which brought the news of the total defeat in Ireland of the king's forces, and his flight, which had broken my heart if that of the death of Orange had not come before."—Sir Henry Ellis's Collection.

he had scarcely said the words when he was slain, being shot through the neck by a flying party of James's horse-guards, or, "through a fatal mistake," by some of his own men.* When James was already edging off to the Dublin road William crossed the river, and, drawing his sword, not without pain, his arm being stiff from the wound he had received the day before, he marched at the head of the Inniskilliners and Dutch guards towards the enemy's centre, which, though somewhat confused, was as yet unbroken. Once, if not twice, William was driven back and put in imminent danger by the Irish horse and the French troops of Lauzun; but the Inniskilliners performed most manfully, Schomberg's horse came up, General Ginckel made some brilliant charges; and, in the end, James's army was beaten, right, left, and centre, and pushed off the field. James himself had got through the defile of Duleck with the van of his left wing, and was marching for Dublin without any care for his rear; but Tyconnel and Lauzun, with some horse and the French infantry, faced about and defended that pass till five of the six pieces of artillery and the broken regiments were got through. If the conquerors had been a little more active they might have made James a prisoner in the pass. From Duleck the Jacobites retreated in pretty good order to the Neel, another defile, the enemy following without pressing upon them at all, and at nightfall giving over the pursuit. But that panic fear which had seized the new troops pursued them still; and as soon as it began to grow dark the greater part of the fresh foot dispersed, many of them having thrown down their arms and deserted before: but the French still kept in a body and retreated in good order. The flying James got to Dublin that night, but he no longer considered himself safe there, and, travelling all night, he got to Duncannon about sunrise, and there embarked for France with a very slender retinue. Attempts have been made to give a different colouring to his conduct; but a cool examination of facts enforces the impression that he really ended as a coward the enterprise which he had begun and conducted like a blockhead.†

* Another account is, that Schomberg was "said to be killed by Sir Charles O'Toole, an exempt of the guards, as he was passing the ford."—Life of James.

† On the 19th of August we find Melfort writing to Mary of Este: "Never was anybody so tossed with contrary passions as I have been since the time I heard of his majesty's arrival into France; for then we had the fear that all was lost in Ireland, immediately after we had an excess of joy, to hear that Orange and Schomberg were killed, and their troops beaten again. The rage to be triumphed over by the Spaniards, who affirm the Prince of Orange alive, Ireland his," &c. It appears, from these interesting letters, that the joy of King William's allies was extreme, and that a Te Deum was sung in the cathedral of Vienna for his victory on the Boyne. Melfort told the pope, "The difference of the spirit which actuates us, and that of the House of Austria! We were glad that Christianity gained, though from those that fought against our enemies: whilst they sung the Te Deum for the church's having lost a kingdom, and a heretic's victory. But I hoped that God, in his good time, would put a stop to these impieties. His holiness asked me if it was possible that any cathedral had sung the Te Deum for Orange's victory: I told him that I had their own printed news for it, at which his holiness seemed horribly scandalised." Thus ended this audience, by which your majesty will see how far the warmth which appeared at the news of the usurper's death exceeded now they think he is alive."—Sir H. Ellis's Collection. But the plain truth is, that William

The poor Irish, smarting under defeat, and forgetting other considerations, said, with some humour, that if the English would only change kings with them they would be glad to fight the battle of the Boyne over again. They and their French allies had lost about 1500 men in the battle and retreat, and among them some persons of note, as Lord Dungan, the Earl of Carlingford, Fitzgerald, Sir Neal O'Neal, the Marquis d'Hoquincour, Colonel Casanova, &c. Driven from the Boyne, they resolved to make a stand on the Shannon, where the standard of James still floated over the strong walls of Athlone and Limerick. Drogheda, at the mouth of the Boyne, surrendered the day after his victory, and on the 3rd of July the Duke of Ormond, with nine troops of horse, secured Dublin for King William, who on the 4th marched that way with his whole army, and on the 8th rode in a triumphant manner into that capital, where the Protestants, and for the same sort of reasons, were as joyful as the Papists had been the year before at the arrival of King James. He went directly to the cathedral church of St. Patrick, now again restored to the Protestant faith, and returned thanks for his victory. On the 9th he marched away with part of his army southward, detaching General Douglas with another body to besiege Athlone. William reduced Waterford, Dungarvon, and other places in that neighbourhood without difficulty; but Douglas was obliged to raise the siege of Athlone by the movements of the bold and skilful Sarsfield. Nor was William himself more successful when he came to Limerick, where the Jacobites had concentrated the mass of their forces, and were commanded or instructed by French officers and engineers well skilled in the art of defending places. William invested Limerick on the 9th of August, lost part of his battering train which was coming up on the 11th, got some great guns from Waterford on the 17th, and opened a breach; was repulsed from the breach on the 18th, with a narrow escape from a cannon-ball; made fresh batteries and advanced his trenches, breached the walls in other places, and carried the covered way or counterscarp on the 26th; but, after effecting a lodgement, his men were again driven back with great loss, and on the 30th he raised the siege to hasten back to England, where his presence had been several times much wanted. While he was fighting on the Boyne and Shannon, the French fleet had agreed to sail up the Thames, to give countenance and assistance to the Jacobites, who had engaged all along had a strong party among the cardinals and princes of the church, who regarded him as the best ally of their allies, the emperor and the king of Spain, who had been so seriously injured and humiliated by Louis XIV. Nay, that arrogant sovereign, a few years before, had insulted the pope's predecessor, Alexander VII., in the midst of the holy city, in the very shadow of the once mighty Vatican, in consequence of some insult which had been offered by the populace of Rome to the Duke of Crequy, a French ambassador. And, besides, the great principle of the papal court was to check in Italy the progress of the French, who more than once flattered themselves with the hope of becoming masters of the entire Peninsula. There are reasons for believing that, when the Prince of Orange came over to expel his most Catholic father-in-law, he brought some of the pope's money with him to help him in that undertaking.

to rise in London, seize Queen Mary, and re-proclaim the legitimate sovereign, who, on his part, had promised to leave the war in Ireland to be managed by his generals, and to hasten to London with a part of his forces. A squadron of French galleys was to have landed some troops at Torbay, and then the whole French fleet united was to have prevented William's return from Ireland. But though the scheme was well laid,—though some of William's naval commanders were ready to betray him,—and though the Jacobites in London plotted might and main,* the grand project fell to the ground because (among other reasons) the French fleet could not obtain or maintain the mastery of the narrow seas, and because James would not trust himself among his English subjects. But, had it not been for the Dutch fleet, the French might have ridden in triumph in the Thames and Medway, even as the Dutch themselves had done in the year 1667. On the 30th of June, the day before the battle of the Boyne, eighty-two men of war, bearing the flag of Louis, encountered an united fleet of English and Dutch off Beachy Head. The Dutch, who were in the van, fought bravely, and were as bravely seconded by some of the English; but the rest of the English shirked the action as much as they possibly could. The Dutch lost two admirals and a considerable number of men, and were obliged to sink several of their vessels, to prevent their capture. The English that engaged did not fare much better, but several ships under our flag had neither given nor received a single shot. The French, however, had suffered so much in the battle, which lasted from morning till evening, that they were glad to seek the shelter of their own coast. It was suspected that the English officer in command, Admiral Herbert,—now, through the gratitude of William for services rendered at the Revolution, Earl of Torrington,—had gone back to the interests of King James. He was afterwards brought to trial and acquitted, being even praised by some for his caution and prudence in avoiding fighting at Beachy Head, and so sparing the fleet.[†] But, whatever was the trim of his politics at this moment, it is proved beyond a doubt that subsequently he maintained a close correspondence with the courts of St. Germain and Versailles.

* At this moment, according to Burnet, the militia was raised, suspected persons were secured, and the cry of the people was so much in favour of the new government, that the Jacobites, all England over, were glad to keep out of the way, lest they should be torn to pieces. On the 14th of July, a fortnight after the fight at Beachy Head, Queen Mary issued proclamations for apprehending the earls of Lisburne, Aylesbury, and Castlemain; the lords Montgomery, Preston, and Bellasis; Sir Edward Hales, Sir Robert Hamilton, and ten or twelve others, mostly officers. Our friend Peps, the amusing diarist, had been sent prisoner to the Gate House on the 25th of June, upon an accusation, which we can believe was very well founded, of having sent information to the French about the state of the English navy.

† William, however, dismissed him from his service, promoted his rival Russell, and would never again admit Herbert into his presence. Lord Nottingham, then the only secretary of state, ascribed the miscarriage at Beachy Head expressly to the treachery of Herbert, who was accused either of treachery or cowardice by the whole Dutch fleet. On the 22nd of July a French squadron of 24 ships, Torbay, where they landed about a thousand men, who burnt a village and some fishing-boats, and then returned to the rest, with the conviction that the people in the West of England were not at all disposed to rise for King James.

Upon the departure of William from Ireland the conduct of the war there fell to General Ginckel, who retired from before the well-defended walls of Limerick to Clonmell. The Earl of Marlborough, though allied with the Princess Anne and a disaffected party that met at Sion House, and though regarded with suspicion and dislike by William and his queen, was eager to have a share in the glory or the profits of the Irish war; and, by means which are not very clearly explained, he actually got appointed to a command, and landed at Cork on the 21st of September, with about 5000 English troops, who were presently joined by about 4000 Danes, already in the country, under the command of the Duke of Wirtemberg. Marlborough's mission was to take Cork and Kinsale, through which principally the Irish kept up their communications with France; and this duty he performed completely and with alacrity, returning to England with triumph in little more than a month. The Duke of Grafton, one of Charles's illegitimates, who had accompanied him to Cork, was killed at the siege of that place. William, it is said, declared that he knew no man who had seen so little of war so fit to be a general as Marlborough; but the English people were much more enthusiastic in the praise of the native hero, boasting that he had achieved more in one month than the king's phlegmatic Dutch favourites had done in two campaigns.*

After the departure of the luckless James the Irish and French quarrelled worse than before; and, to make the confusion still more hopeless, the Irish themselves were split into two or three factions. Louis XIV. recalled his troops, and the Duke of Berwick went over to France in disgust and despair. On the approach of winter a great part of the wasted country was like a hell: famine and disease, violence, murder, and all the darkest crimes held a horrible jubilee. The expedition of James had produced an amount of human misery which has been rarely equalled in any other country in modern times.* The brave and active Sarsfield remained to carry on the war for James.

On the 2nd of October William again met his parliament, having previously received congratulations on the success of his arms from the city of London and from various other quarters. In his opening speech he said—"That he had used his best endeavours to reduce Ireland into such a condition that it might be no longer a charge to England; and God had blessed his endeavours with such success, that he doubted not but he should have been fully possessed of that kingdom by this time, had he been enabled to have gone into the

* It will be well to remark at this point the line of conduct recommended by his advisers, and which would doubtless have been followed if James had proved victorious. When Melfort was under the happy impression that his master had succeeded in Ireland, and was about transferring the war to England, he advised some of the most absolute and odious measures that had ever been suggested by a British minister. After saying that the first steps on English ground would be most dangerous, and that all the rocks they had before split upon must be minded, he added:—"These rocks are obvious. Besides the oaths and penal laws against dissenters from the Church of England, there is the standing army of foreigners, the power of money, the exorbitant usurpations of parliament, the trial of high treason and other crimes against the crown by juries, the Habeas Corpus Act, and such like, which, if not regulated more advantageously for the crown or quite abolished, I can see no comfort the king can have of his crown, or safety the subjects can have from their own follies. There is a great consideration of forming the party the king will choose to govern by; for by a party a factious state must still be maintained; endeavouring to use all equally in it being a certain way to lose all. . . . This party ought to be men of tried loyalty; for with our countrymen there is no trusting to new men nor to probabilities, so corrupt our blood is grown by hereditary rebellion against God and the king." The court was to be composed exclusively of those "that be of the best blood, and prudentest, honestest, and loyalist principles." "But, above all things," says Melfort, "care must be had that such as have been active in the king's service in his absence be well rewarded, and all advantages taken to punish such as have been the authors or promoters of this rebellion; and if the king be forced to pardon, let it be as few of the rogues as he can, and with a watchful eye over them, remembering that King David pardoned Shimei at his return to Jerusalem, but took care that he should sooner or later feel the smart of his wickedness the first failing he made. Such as are excepted, no pardon should ever be allowed; and amongst these should be as many of those families where father and son both are engaged, or such as have been hereditarily disloyal: for from such there is no more loyalty to be expected than religion from the devils. It is not in their nature, and rebellion is like the sin of witchcraft, neither can repent." Such were some of the precious remedies proposed, such the blessings intended for England if the counter-revolution had succeeded. And we shall soon find that neither time nor an increase of devotion made the exiled sovereign more scrupulous about promise-breaking: that, to help him in winning his way back, James issued proclamations and manifestoes, which, upon his own avowal, he never meant to respect, intending, on the contrary, to take full vengeance upon the nation which had cast him off.

field as soon as he should have done, and as was more especially necessary in Ireland, where the rains are so great and begin so early." He then extolled the bravery of the army; and, having said he had asked no revenue for himself, but what he had readily subjected to be charged to the uses of the war, he added that he would "command all the public accounts to be laid before the House of Commons; by which they would see that the real want of what was necessary beyond the funds given, and the not getting in due time that for which funds were assigned, had been the principal causes why the army was in so much arrear of their pay, and the stores both for the navy and the ordnance not supplied as they ought to be." He told them that it was too plain from what the French had done, and were doing, that if the present war were not prosecuted with vigour, England would be in the greatest danger; that he would lay before the Commons a statement of what would be necessary for the proper support of the fleet and the army; and that he must recommend to their care the clearing of his revenue, so as to enable him to subsist and maintain the charges laid on the civil list. He assured them that the support and success of the confederacy abroad, which was equally meant to defend the liberties of England and the integrity of the continental states from the encroachments of the French, would absolutely depend upon the speed and vigour of the English parliament. Then, after noticing the general fidelity and affection of the people, he complained of the recent ill conduct of the fleet, which had committed the honour of the country. Knowing that some party or parties would do their utmost to limit the supplies and carry the attention of the Houses to other matters, he said, in conclusion—"Whosoever goes about to obstruct or divert your applications to these matters, preferably to all others, can neither be my friend nor the kingdom's."

should be given to their majesties for the entire reduction of Ireland, for securing the peace of this kingdom, and carrying on a vigorous war against France. They proposed that 1,000,000*l.* of this money should be raised upon the credit or by the sale of the estates forfeited in Ireland by those who had taken up arms for King James. This, in effect, would have included the estates of all the Papists; and prudential and merciful objections were offered. The Commons, however, brought in a bill for attainting the persons that were or had been in rebellion either in England or Ireland, and for confiscating their estates and applying them to the use of the war; with a clause for reserving a portion of the forfeitures for his majesty's disposal. The Lords let this bill sleep; and, in spite of messages from the Commons, it was finally allowed to drop. On the 25th of November, after giving the royal assent to a bill for doubling the excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors, William, in a speech to both Houses, declared his grateful sense of the readiness of the Commons in voting such large supplies, assuring them that he would see the money properly applied to the uses for which it was intended. He told them that the posture of affairs abroad required his presence at the Hague before the end of the year, and that, consequently, he must desire them to expedite their further supplies, for no funds were left available for the support of the civil government, as the excise and all other branches of the revenue had been applied to other uses. The Commons made such dispatch that, by the 20th of December, there was a bill ready for the royal assent for granting certain duties upon East India goods, wrought silks, and other merchandise; and another bill for increasing the duties upon wine, vinegar, and tobacco. Altogether the money voted for the support of the ordnance, of the army, which was to consist of 69,000 men, and of the fleet, with 28,000 seamen, amounted to 4,000,000*l.*—the greatest sum that had, as yet, been voted by an English parliament. People began immediately to complain of the increase of taxation; but the inestimable benefit they were purchasing was worth the money. In passing these bills, William told them that he could not long defer his voyage; and represented to the Commons, "that if some annual provision could be made for augmenting the navy, and building some new men of war, it would be a very necessary care at that time, both for the honour and safety of the nation." The Commons presently voted 500,000*l.* more for the building of new ships of war.*

A.D. 1691.—On the 5th of January William took his leave of the parliament. In the course of his speech he said—"I think it proper to assure you that I shall not make any grants of the forfeited lands in England or Ireland till there be another opportunity of settling that matter in parliament, in such manner as shall be thought most expedient." His departure from this promise—which, however, he never broke to the extent represented by his enemies—was one of the worst steps taken by William, and one that caused him most trouble in the sequel. After the king had spoken, the Lord Chief Baron Atkins declared that it was his majesty's pleasure that both Houses should adjourn till the 31st of March. Parliament adjourned accordingly; and on the very next day, on the 6th of January, while the Londoners were enjoying the festivities of Christmas, William set off on his journey. But the weather became most inclement: a severe frost set in, with strong and contrary gales of wind, and when he had got as far as Canterbury he was obliged to return. He remained at Kensington till the 16th, when he again set out in the midst of frost and snow. On the same day he embarked at Gravesend; and on the 18th, about noon, his convoy, consisting of twelve men-of-war and seven yachts, and having on board many persons of distinction, made the Dutch coast, after a troublesome and dangerous voyage. That coast was ice-bound, and it was extremely dangerous to attempt getting into port with the large ships. But William, who always suffered exceedingly from sea-sickness, and whose affairs were most urgent, would not be delayed. He ordered a chaloupe to be got ready, stepped into it with the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Devonshire, now Lord steward of the household, the Lord Chamberlain Dorset, the Earl of Monmouth, his countryman and bosom friend, Bentinck, now Earl of Portland, and his other attached followers,

Messrs. Ouverquerque and Zuleystein. The sailors hesitated to put off—his men of quality advised him to stay—but William gave the word, and away they went in the open boat. They had been told by a fisherman that they were within a league and a half of Goree; but either the fisherman misinformed them, or they mistook their way in a thick fog which presently surrounded them. The fog was soon made darker by the setting of the sun; and all that cold night they pulled and beat among floating ice; and it was eight o'clock the next morning before they reached Goree, half perished with cold. On the next day, William got to the neighbourhood of the Hague, where he was waited upon by the states-general, the states of Holland, the council, the public bodies, the foreign ministers, and an immense body of princes and confederates, who looked to him as their defender and champion against the victorious and insulting French. Among these princes and potentates were the Electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg; the Dukes of Zell and Wolfenbuttel; Prince Christian Louis of Brandenburg; the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; Prince Waldeck; the Prince of Nassau, stadtholder of Friesland; the Princes of Nassau-Sarbruck, Nassau-Dillenburg, and Nassau-Idstein; the Duke-Administrator of Wirtemberg; the two Princes of Anspach; the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, and his brother, the Duke of Saxe-Eysenach; Prince Philip Palatine; the Duke of Zulsbach; the Prince of Wirtemberg; the Duke of Courland; the Prince of Anhalt-Zerborst; the Landgrave of Homberg; three princes of Holstein-Beck; the Duke of Holstein; the Prince of Commerci; the Prince Palatine of Birkenfelt; the Princess of Nassau-Friesland; the Princess of Radzevill; the Countess of Soissons; the Princess of Saxe-Eysenach; and others, attended by counts and barons far too numerous to name. William was no stage hero—no parading, dramatic prince: his manners were cold and retiring—his dress and personal bearing as simple as those of a plain Dutch or English gentleman; yet, though he was indifferent or averse to such pageantries, he consented to make a triumphal entrance into the Hague; and, on the 26th, the stadtholder-king rode under arches and through streets studded with inscriptions and hung with tapestry. The burghers in arms lined the way; the windows and balconies were crowded with the fairest faces the Seven Provinces could show, and the very housetops were covered with spectators, who hailed him as "William the Conqueror."[†] Before the cannon had done roaring, or the bonfires had burned themselves out, William proceeded to business; and, in a day or two, the assembled princes, and the other members of the confederacy represented by their ambassadors, sat as a congress to provide for their own security and the general independence of Europe. While William had been defeating the Jacobites and the French in Ireland, the Dutch

* In the course of this year the Earl of Marlborough wrote a letter to King William, while on the continent, which proves that he was already suspected of peculation, and of that eagerness for money which was afterwards a most notorious and striking part of his character. "You will pardon me, sir," he writes to the king, "that I take the liberty in saying that I have been extremely frosted at a thing that has been told me since you went, which is, that Sir John Guise should tell you that he knew by merchants, when I came out of Holland, that I left 30,000*l.* there, and that your majesty should answer him, that when you came back you would inquire into it. I do assure you that there is not anything true of what Sir John Guise has told you; and if your majesty find that I had one shilling there before the 6th of September that I sent over by my Lord Portland, and afterwards 4700*l.* to Schulenburg, I then beg you to believe me the least of men." (See the letter, dated June 17, 1690, in Dalrymple's Appendix.)

and their allies, under the command of Prince Waldeck, had been wasting their time or misdirecting their efforts on the Continent, and the French had gained a great victory over them at Fleurus, in Flanders, nearly at the same moment that William had won the battle of the Boyne. The real head of the league, and life and soul of the confederacy, now told this congress that the imminent danger wherein they were thrown sufficiently showed the errors they had committed; that juster and better measures must be instantly adopted without losing time in debate; that, in the circumstances they were in, they must act, not talk; that the French were masters of all the chief fortresses which had served as barriers, and would quickly possess themselves of the rest, if the spirit of division, slowness, and particular interests continued any longer among them. In continuation, he spoke broadly of the errors and vices which are inherent in every coalition of the sort; and which, in spite of all his efforts, and the accumulated proofs of the fatal consequences, continued to vex him till his dying day. He told them that all parties in the confederacy ought to be persuaded that their respective interests were comprised in the general one; that the French were united, and were formidable in that union; that it was in vain to clamour and complain, or to trust to protests against their injustice; that it was not the resolutions upon paper of a diet or congress, nor the hopes of some men of fortune arising from frivolous foundations, but soldiers, strong armies, and a prompt and sincere union among all the forces of all the allies that must do the work, put a stop to the conquests of Louis, and snatch the liberty of Europe from his grasp. He pledged himself to spare neither his credit and forces nor his own person, and promised to return in the spring at the head of an English army. His speech gave courage to the desponding, and a momentary union to the conflicting elements of the coalition; and the congress resolved that 222,000 men in all should take the field, and that no peace should be made with Louis until he had restored his conquests, made reparation, granted liberty of conscience to his Protestant subjects, and re-established the states of the kingdom in their ancient liberties, and the parliaments in their ancient and rightful authority.* But the French, who had the power of being so, were as active as William would have been. On the 5th of March, accompanied by the Duke of Zell and a great train of princes and nobles, he left the Hague for Loo; and on his way he learned that the French had invested the city of Mons. He immediately ordered all the Dutch troops that were in readiness to march into Flanders, and he soon after followed in person. His great rival, Louis, accompanied by the dauphin, the Duke of Orleans, and the Duke of Chartres, arrived before Mons five days after the siege began, and the mass of the French army was rapidly and skilfully concentrated upon that point. The Duke of Savoy, who had joined the confederacy, and sent an ambassador into England to congratulate King William at the close of the preceding year, had undertaken to make a diversion in the south of France; but his movements had been anticipated: the French had besieged and taken his city of Nice; and some of the troops now collected in Flanders had been brought by rapid marches from the maritime Alps. An immense quantity of artillery was brought to bear upon the walls of Mons; breaches were opened; a redoubt was carried sword in hand; the inhabitants threatened to rise against the garrison; and the governor capitulated on the 20th of April, before William could collect the Spanish troops in Flanders and his other dilatory allies. Indeed, the Spaniards had been so careless and slow that nothing was prepared for the expedition; and, while the French had all the matériel of war in the utmost abundance and perfection, William could not find baggage-waggons or horses to draw his artillery. After the fall of Mons he hastened back to England, where more than one conspiracy against his government had been detected during his absence.* Upon his arrival in London he regulated the mode in which the war in Ireland was to be prosecuted, got the English fleet to sea under the command of Admiral Russell, and filled up, at last, the sees which were held to be vacated by the bishops that would not take the oaths to his government. Dr. Tillotson became Archbishop of Canterbury; and, generally speaking, the vacated bishoprics were filled with men superior in learning, morality, and decency to those who had displaced themselves by refusing the oaths. But this fact did not, of course, moderate the complaints of the Nonjurors, who contrived to disturb and vex the queen, though they could never irritate William into a persecution. The celebrated Henry Dodwell distinguished himself among these Nonjurors by his "pervicacious humour." "That Dodwell," said William, "wants me to put him in prison, but I will disappoint him." By the 1st of May the king was again on his way to Holland, having further prorogued the parliament; and, on the 2nd, he embarked at Harwich, under the convoy of a strong squadron commanded by Admiral Rooke. Some English levies had already been sent over—others went with him; and he was attended by Lord Sidney, secretary of state, and the Earls of Marlborough and Portland. Ever since the beginning of the year Marlborough had been corresponding with King James, and the refugees at St. Germain, through Colonel Sackville and Mr. Bulkeley, two of the numerous Jacobite agents, expressing in unqualified terms his contrition for his past conduct, and his anxiety to make amends to his dethroned sovereign and benefactor. Together with his friend Godolphin he had made, and was actually making, communications of the state of public affairs and domestic transactions in England: yet Marlborough was treated with every show of esteem and confidence by King William; and, as soon as he was on the Continent, he attracted universal admiration by his talent for military affairs, although, through inevitable circumstances, his operations were confined to hastening the preparations and assembling and exercising the troops of the confederation for the ensuing campaign.* It was pretty apparent that, notwith-

* Coxe's Memoirs of John Duke of Marlborough, with his Original Correspondence, collected from the family records at Blenheim.—King James had even been assured by his secret agents that Marlborough would desert to him or to the French with all the English troops that were in Flanders. In James's Memoirs it is said:—"Nevertheless the king found no effects from these mighty promises, for his majesty, insidiously upon his offer of bringing over the English troops in Flanders as the greatest service he could do him, he excused himself, under pretence that there were some mistake in the message; that it would ruin all to make the troops come over by parcels; that his business was to gain an absolute power over them, then to do all the business at once."

Archdeacon Coxe thinks that the Jacobite agents exaggerated their services and deceived James by telling him more than Marlborough had told them, and that all that Marlborough wanted was to secure an indemnity for himself and friends in case of a counter-revolution. But this was all that many other would-be-wanted. The archdeacon is probably right in his conjecture, though usually obtuse in his moral feeling in passing over the selfishness and double treachery of his hero so very lightly as to leave it almost doubtful whether he seriously disapproves of his conduct. In the Memoirs of James, where a letter is cited written by that unhappy sovereign on the 20th of April to his former favourite, it is said—"However, as if he (Churchill, i. e. Marlborough) had merited great matters, he grows upon the king (James) in his demands, for his first request was only two lines under his hand, though not signed, to testify that he would extend his pardon to him, or any other, through the greatest offenders, who by their future behaviour should give him proofs of their deserving it, [which he said would influence the . . . self, my Lady (the Princess Anne is here evidently meant), Churchill, and others: this the king readily complied with; but his lordship stopped not there: when he found the king so good natured, his next request was, that he would please to write to my Lord Godolphin and assure him of forgiveness too; in which letter the queen must insert a few words likewise to testify her being reconciled to him, and yet at the same time to order him to keep his employments, to be more servicable, as was pretended (it seems he had soon forgot his friend's scrupulosity, and that he made a conscience of betraying his trust); so that, in fine, they were to be pardoned and in security in case the king returned, and yet to suffer nothing in the interim, nor to give any other proofs of their sincerity, in case the king returned, than bare words and empty promises, when under pretence of being suspected, or of doing greater service afterwards, there never was found a suitable time to put the least of them in execution. However, the king thought fit to bear with this sort of double dealing, and, seeing him begin to decline in the Prince of Orange's favour, still hoped he might do service in the end; so accepted his excuses, and continued his correspondence from time to time as long as he lived, though with scarce any other effect than to bring an additional expense upon him, by appointing persons in England to act under his directions; and an additional trouble, from the continual complaints of the king's other friends, who, being of different religions, and having different views, instead of uniting their force for the king's service, studied all they could to thwart each other's methods."

* The most important of these conspiracies was headed by the Scottish Lord Preston, whom James, since his abdication, had created an English viscount and secretary of state. In the preceding month of December, Danby, now Earl of Caermarthen, received intelligence that a suspicious vessel, with several gentlemen passengers on board, was about to sail from the river to France. This vessel was boarded off Gravesend, and in her hold were found my Lord Preston, Mr. Ashton, who had been in the household of the late queen, and one Elliot. Ashton attempted to throw a bundle of papers overboard, but they were secured and found to contain very treasonable matters. The most remarkable of the papers was styled, "The Result of a Conference between some lords and gentlemen, both Tories and Whigs, respecting the Restoration of King James;" which, however, was to be brought about (or so said the paper) "without endangering the Protestant religion," &c. Elliot made his peace with the government by betraying his confederates; or, according to another account, he was not tried because no good evidence could be procured against him. Lord Preston and Ashton were brought to trial at the Old Bailey, were found guilty of a design to bring in King James by means of French arms, &c., and were both condemned to die. Ashton was hanged on the 18th of January (1691), but Preston, who is supposed to have communicated many secrets to the government, was reprieved and finally enlarged. By the discovery of this plot many persons of note were committed. The Earl of Clarendon, uncle to the queen, was sent with some others to a very short imprisonment in the Tower. The Bishop of Ely, Mr. Graham, and some others, absconded.

standing their being on unfriendly terms with nearly every country in Europe, and in open war with the Empire, Spain, Holland, Savoy, England, and even the pope, the French would still be very formidable enemies. William, at the head of about 70,000 men, of various nations and various dispositions, advanced to the capital of Spanish Flanders, sovered Brussels, which was threatened by the main body of the French army under Marshal Luxembourg (Louis had returned to Versailles), forced that able general to retire, sent a detachment to the relief of Liège, which was threatened by Marshal Boufflers, and then advanced to the Sambre, and crossed that river, with the view of engaging Luxembourg in a pitched battle. But in those days general engagements were rare things; and, except in sieges, soldiers consumed more shoe-leather than gunpowder. Luxembourg, who was outnumbered, but whose army was one consonant whole, while the army of William was made up of many parts, and those so heterogeneous that they could scarcely be kept together, retreated and manœuvred, marched and countermarched, and baffled every attempt to bring him to action. William gave up the command to the Prince of Waldeck, and retired to his hunting-seat at Loo in September, whence, after a fortnight's diversion, he repaired to England. In other quarters the success of the war was various. On the Rhine, where the Elector of Saxony commanded for the allies, little or nothing was done; in Catalonia, the French made devastating incursions, but obtained no footing; but on the side of Italy, and in Savoy, Marshal Catinat gained many advantages—taking several towns—approaching within three leagues of Turin, the Duke of Savoy's capital, and laying siege to Coni, one of the strongest of his fortresses. But here he was checked by Prince Eugene of Savoy, who now began to display those qualities which afterwards made him the companion and rival of Marlborough. William had just sent the duke a seasonable supply of money, and a few troops under the command of Schomberg, son of the Marshal who had perished at the battle of the Boyne. Eugene, being, as it is said, advised thereto by Schomberg, made a sudden march across the mountains, forced the French to raise the siege, in which they had lost many men, and then, descending into the plain, retook Carnagnola, and drove back Catinat with loss and shame. The Emperor Leopold, who was the nominal, as William was the real, head of the league, was made easy on one of his frontiers by a sanguinary defeat given, at Salankeman, on the Danube, to the Turks, who had been excited to a new war chiefly through French diplomacy.*

But in Ireland the campaign had been decisive. Early in June the Dutch general Ginckel, reinforced by some excellent troops from Scotland, and well supplied, through the vigilance of William, with all the necessaries of war, took the field, and on the 18th sat down before Athlone, a very strong town divided into two parts by the river Shannon, but connected by a bridge, which was protected by a fort. The part on the eastern bank, called the English town, was carried with some slaughter, and Ginckel rushed onward to the bridge; but the besieged had broken some of the arches, the French officers had constructed a tête du pont, and there was no way across except by fording the Shannon. After some fruitless attempts upon the bridge, a council of war determined, on the 30th, to try one of the fords, which are few, narrow, and dangerous. General Sarsfield, commanding the garrison, perceived the intention, and informed Monsieur St. Ruth, who was now commander-in-chief of the combined forces of French and Irish, that the enemy were going to ford the river. St. Ruth, who had been reinforced with several good regiments from France, and who lay in the neighbourhood, treated this intelligence with contempt, saying, "They dare not do it, and I so near." Sarsfield said, in a sadder tone, "He does not know the English." On the following morning the English grenadiers dashed into the Shannon, and, locking their arms together, they waded twenty abreast across a ford, and in spite of a terrible fire of well-managed artillery and musketry, and in the teeth of all other obstacles, they gained the opposite bank, established themselves firmly there, and drove the Irish from the head of the bridge. Planks were soon laid over the broken arches, and the rest of the army crossed by the bridge or in rude pontoons. In less than an hour they were masters of the Irish town, Sarsfield running out at one side as Ginckel entered at the other. St. Ruth, who had behaved like a confident blockhead, attempted to re-take the town, but, after losing men, he decamped by night without beat of drum, to take up a strong position at Aghrim, in the midst of hills and bogs. There he was attacked by Ginckel on Sunday, the 12th of July. The approaches, through morasses, were exceedingly difficult, and the Dutch horse and the English dragoons were repulsed at the pass of Urachree; but, after a hard struggle, Eppinger's dragoons and my Lord Portland's horse gained ground on the enemy's left, and General Mackay attacked their right. As they advanced they found the ditches strongly lined by Irish musketeers and the French and Irish horse advantageously posted on the spurs of the hills behind the musketeers. The Irish troops, both horse and foot, fought bravely, and in unusually good order; but St. Ruth was obliged to strengthen his wings, which the English threatened to turn, and then Ginckel moved forward to attack his weakened centre. Ginckel's men advanced over a red bog half a mile broad, sinking to the waist in mud and water; and beyond this uncomfortable morass they had to ascend a hill, where the French and Irish took advantage of every hedge, of two old Danish forts, and of the old castle of Aghrim, which kept up a hot fire. The English centre, after suffering severely, were forced back to the edge of the red bog. St. Ruth exclaimed, "Now will I drive these English back to the gates of Dublin." But the Frenchman again miscalculated: the English rallied almost instantly, and, being reinforced with some fresh men, charged the pursuing Irish, and drove them up the hills. At the same time the advancing right wing of the English drove still farther back the Irish left, and victory was scarcely doubtful, when St. Ruth was killed by a cannon ball. As soon as the French guards saw their general fall they moved off; they were soon followed by the Irish horse; and then the rest of the host fled to the top of Kilmomodon Hill. But the English pursued them, drove them from the heights, and committed a pitiless slaughter on the infantry. Four thousand Irish fell on the field of battle, and nearly an equal number in the pursuit. The English counted about 1400 killed and wounded. In consequence of this victory Galway surrendered; but Limerick, which had foiled King William in the preceding year, stood another memorable siege, the garrison being vastly strengthened by Sarsfield, who conducted thither that part of King James's army which survived and kept together after the fatal battle of Aghrim. Tyrconnel, who had returned from France, died in Limerick a few days after that battle; and Sarsfield, the bravest and ablest of James's adherents, commanded within those walls which now enclosed all the means and the hopes of the party. Limerick was invested by Ginckel on the 26th of August, but it was not until the 22nd of September, and after some terrible encounters, that the English were able to open their trenches on both sides of the Shannon. Then, however, the garrison began to despair, and Sarsfield proposed a surrender upon conditions: on the 1st of October the articles were submitted to Ginckel and the lords justices, who signed them on the 3rd, and thus put an end to the Irish war. These articles of Limerick, which were so reprobated by the bigots of Protestantism and the men hungering and thirsting after forfeitures and confiscations, were highly honourable to King William, and were also, in a measure, an acknowledgment of the valour of the Irish people. A nation of poltroons would not have obtained such favourable terms. By the first of these articles it was agreed "That the Roman Catholics of this kingdom shall enjoy such privileges in the exercise of their religion as are consistent with the laws of Ireland, or as they did enjoy in the reign of King Charles II.; and their majesties, as soon as their affairs will permit them to summon a parliament in this kingdom, will endeavour to procure the said Roman Catholics such further security in that particular as may preserve them from any disturbance upon the account of their said religion." The second article secured to all the inhabitants or residents of Limerick, or other places and garrisons then in possession of the Irish, and to all officers and soldiers then in arms under commission of King James in the several counties of Limerick, Clare, Kerry, Cork, and Mayo, or in any of them, and all the commissioned officers that belonged to the Irish regiments then in being that were not prisoners of war, or had not taken out protections, the enjoyment of all their estates, freeholds, inheritances, rights, titles, interests, privileges, and immunities which they held in the reign of Charles II., free from all forfeitures or outlawries incurred by them, provided only they returned to their obedience to King William and Queen Mary, and took the oath of allegiance; and all persons comprehended in this article were to have and enjoy all their goods and chattels, real and personal; their trades, professions, and callings, with free liberty to exercise their professions, trades, &c., as in the reign of King Charles II., provided that nothing in this article should extend to restoring any forfeited person then out of the kingdom, in France or elsewhere, except only such as were comprised in another article. The sixth article wisely fixed limits for that war of litigation which must always follow such revolutions, such sudden transfers of property, and personal injuries and animosities. It declared that—"Whereas the present wars have drawn great violences on both parties, and that if leave was given for bringing all sorts of private actions, the animosities would probably continue that have been so long on foot, and the public disturbance made to last; for the quieting and settling, therefore, of the kingdom, and avoiding those inconveniences which would be the necessary consequence of the contrary, no person or persons whatsoever, comprised in the foregoing articles, shall be sued, molested, or impleaded at the suit of any party or parties whatsoever, for any trespass by them committed, or for any arms, horses, money, goods, chattels, merchandizes, or provisions whatsoever by them seized or taken during the time of the war." The garrison of Limerick were allowed to march out with all the honours of war, with their arms and baggage, and either to embark for France or enter the service of King William at their option. Of 14,000 or 15,000 Irish soldiers, about 10,000 chose to embark for France, where they entered the service of Louis XIV., and became that gallant corps so constantly mentioned in the wars abroad as "The Irish brigade." Ginckel was solemnly thanked by the English parliament for his services; and the titles of Baron Aghrim and Earl of Athlone were conferred upon him. But though the army of England had been so triumphant in Ireland, her fleet had scarcely done more under Russell than they had done the preceding year under Herbert,—and precisely for the same reason, or because the commander was lukewarm in the cause, and actually corresponding with the court of St. Germain. Russell, during his long cruise, scarcely fired a shot;† and the maritime trade of England was almost ruined by French privateers.

William, who had reached London a few days before, met his parliament on the 22nd of October. In his speech, after alluding to the success which had attended his arms in Ireland, he represented the propriety of taking care to pay the arrears of the army, and the necessity of still increasing the number both of his troops and ships. Votes of thanks were passed, and loyal addresses sent up; but those who had been shut out of the "court pasture" got up a strong opposition to all the money bills, making it their business to explore every method of rendering the possession of power uneasy to those who held it, under popular pretences, but with an eye to their own private advantage. Admiral Russell was called to account for his misdoings, or, rather, his non-doings; but he threw the blame upon the Board of Admiralty and the commanders of the Dutch fleet that sailed with him; and such an artful cloud was raised that both the offender and the offence were lost sight of. The Commons complained loudly of the abuses and peculations of officers in the army, of commissaries, of men in office, and of the servants of the government generally; they challenged the right of inspecting all public accounts whatsoever; and the party out of place had the enthusiastic generosity to propose that all the profits arising from any place in the gift of the crown, either by salary, fee, or perquisite, above and beyond 500*l.* per annum, should be applied to the charge of the war, with an exception in favour of the Speaker of the House of Commons, the commissioners of the great seal, the judges, ambassadors and ministers residing at foreign courts, and the officers of the fleet and army. It is scarcely necessary to pause to explain how soon the wheels of this mighty move came to a deadlock, or how it was demonstrated that the three kingdoms could not furnish persons disinterested enough to serve the public for 500*l.* a-year. On the 6th of November it was unanimously resolved that a supply should be granted to their majesties for the carrying on a vigorous war against France; and in passing the estimates of the navy they voted 1,575,898*l.* for that service, including ordnance and the building one dry dock and two wet docks at Portsmouth, for such conveniences were much wanted. On the 16th of the same month they resolved to carry the army to 64,924 men, exclusive of officers; but, before fixing the sum, they debated long, and critically examined the estimates of the paymaster, as also the proportion that should be furnished out of the revenue of Ireland; and it was not until the 4th of January that they voted, for the land forces, or the service of that year, 1,935,787*l.* to be paid by England, and 165,000*l.* to be taken out of the revenue of Ireland. While the army estimates were under consideration they, however, dispatched two other money bills, one imposing an additional excise upon beer, ale, &c.; the other imposing a land-tax of two shillings in the pound. On giving the royal assent to these two bills, which he did on the last day of December, William thanked them in form, but said, "I must take notice to you at the same time, with some trouble, that the new year is already come; while our preparations for it are not only more backward, but those of our enemies, as we have reason to think, in greater forwardness than they were last year." And he told the Commons that, the season being so far advanced, the session could not admit of a much longer continuance, and that, therefore, he must recommend dispatch in all their other bills.

A.D. 1692.—A variety of bills were rapidly passed by the Commons, but for the most part rejected by the Lords, who expressed great dread of innovation. A bill for vesting the forfeited estates in England and Ireland in his majesty, to be applied for the use of the war,—an army bill, for strictly proportioning the pay to the real complement of men,—a bill for reducing the rate of interest upon borrowed money,—and another for continuing the commissioners of public accounts, were all lost in the Upper House. This led to several stormy conferences between the two Houses. But the Commons carried their point about the commission of accounts, by tacking it to a poll-tax bill, by which all persons except children, servants, and paupers were to pay a shilling every quarter; every gentleman of 300*l.* a-year, twenty shillings a quarter; every person worth 300*l.*, ten shillings; every beneficed clergyman or teacher worth 80*l.* a-year, twenty shillings; every lord of parliament, 10*l.*; and Nonjurors double. Two things are here made apparent—the great expensiveness of a continental war, and the unskilfulness of the legislature in the art of taxation. The very name of poll-tax had always been odious to the English people; but perhaps the unpopularity excited by it was the reason why many men in parliament voted for the bill.

On the 29th of February the parliament was prorogued. In the interval between the prorogation and William's departure for Holland several important changes were made in court and cabinet; and these changes were almost entirely in favour of the Tory party, or of the trimmers, who privateers and worse designs. [The same writer says that the Earl of Torrington (Admiral Herbert) was a man of pleasure, and did not make the haste that was necessary. It is calculated that from the beginning of the war up to the month of November, 1692, fifteen hundred English trading vessels, of the aggregate value of three millions sterling, were taken by the enemy. In some instances it was proved that the privateers, under French colours, were equipped and partly manned by English and Irish Jacobites; and, from the certainty with which these corsairs pointed upon their prey, it became an article of belief in the commercial world that the Jacobites at home gave notice of the sailing of the shipping from English ports, of their destination, &c. "The conclusion of all," says Burnet, "was, Russell complained of the ministry, particularly of the Earl of Nottingham, and they complained no less of him, and the merchants complained of the Admiralty; but they, in their own defence, said that we had not ships nor seamen, both to furnish out a great fleet and at the same time to send out convoys for securing the trade." But Burnet knew not what we now know—that Russell was corresponding with James, and that the delinquent king's adherents boasted that Admiral Delaval, Admiral Killigrew, and others depended entirely upon the king (James), because they owed their fortunes to him, and expected more from him than from the Prince of Orange.—See a Memorial from James's adherents to the French ministry in the Papers published by Macpherson.

could be Whigs and Tories by turns. The Earl of Rochester, maternal uncle to Queen Mary and the head of the high-church party, Lord Ranelagh, Lord Cornwallis, and Sir Edward Seymour, who had opposed the king in everything, were brought into the privy council, and the Earl of Pembroke was made lord privy seal. Pelham, a Whig, was turned out to make room for Mr. Montague, the ablest head of the Tory party. A damp fell upon the whole Whig party, and not a few were suddenly converted into flaming Jacobites. But before these appointments the Earl of Marlborough, who called himself a Tory till the Whigs in the following reign afforded him the means of acquiring renown, and, what was dearer to him, enormous wealth, was suddenly disgraced and dismissed from all his employments, and prohibited from appearing at court.* As the Princess Anne espoused the cause of the husband of her friend, and joined Lady Marlborough in styling William "a monster," "a Dutch abortion," &c., the bitter quarrel between her and her sister, the queen, which had begun with the new reign, became irreconcilable. An order was sent through the lord chamberlain, enjoining Lady Marlborough to remove from the palace of Whitehall; and thereupon Anne, disdaining to continue in the palace, removed to Sion Hill, a mansion lent to her by the Duke of Somerset, whence in a short time she repaired to Berkeley House, which became her permanent residence, and the resort of all who were friendly to the Marlboroughs and inimical to the court. This coterie did not confine themselves to calling names; they laboured with tongue and pen to augment the popular discontents and the difficulties of the government, and some of the chief of them intrigued with the exiled family and their agents.

On the 5th of March William embarked for the continent, and was soon with the grand army of the confederacy, which was assembled near Louvain. On the 20th of May Louis XIV. joined the French army, which was still commanded by

Luxembourg, who had with him the celebrated Vauban, the greatest military engineer of the time. On the 29th of May the French opened the trenches before Namur, which strong place surrendered on the 30th of June, William being unable to relieve it, through various causes.* Upon this disappointment William made an attempt to surprise Mons; but his design was betrayed to the enemy, and Luxembourg, by a rapid movement, prevented its execution. After various manœuvres, the French rested upon a strong position between Enghein and Steinkirk, covered by a wood and thick hedges, which were traversed by narrow and intricate defiles. Louis, upon the surrender of Namur, had gone back in triumph to Paris; but William now hoped to convert his Te Deum into a dirge. He perceived that the French were off their guard, relying upon the strength of their position, and he resolved to attack them by passing rapidly through the defiles. On Sunday, the 24th of July, the Prince of Wirtemberg and General Mackay led the English van through a deep defile which terminated in a small plain on the enemy's right wing. The advance was made with admirable spirit and quickness; an advanced guard were made prisoners; a terrible onset threw half the French army into confusion, and their lines were broken. But Count Solmes, whose duty it was to support the first column of attack, remained inactive, and behaved altogether in such a manner as to give credibility to the dishonouring reports which were afterwards circulated about this Dutch officer.† Luxembourg was thus allowed time to rally his broken battalions, and then, advancing,

* Evelyn, who hated the man, says, without mixing the matter, "Lord Marlborough, lieutenant-general of the king's army in England, gentleman of the bedchamber, &c., dismissed from all his charges, military and other, for his excessive taking of bribes, covetousness and extortion on all occasions from his inferior officers. Note, this was the lord who was entirely advanced by King James, and was the first who betrayed and forsook his master. He was son of Sir Winston (the uncle of the Greencloth)." Lord Basil Hombilton, in a letter to the Duke of Hamilton, says,—"Everybody make their guesses what are his crimes. Some say that he was endeavouring to breed division in the army, and to make himself the more necessary, besides his endeavouring to make an ill correspondence betwixt the princess and the court, but everybody here their different thoughts; but this being late yesterday, all the matter is not well known, but I believe a few days will bring all to light." (Dalrymple, Appendix.) It is amusing to observe in what a very different manner Marlborough's wife, nearly forty years after, accounts for the disgrace of her lord. "The king," she says, "was pleased, without publicly assigning any particular reason, to remove my Lord Marlborough from all his employments. His majesty sent Lord Nottingham to tell him that he had no more occasion for his service. This event might perhaps be well enough accounted for, by saying that Lord Portland (Bentinck) had ever a great prejudice to my Lord Marlborough, and that my Lady Orkney, then Mrs. Villiers (William's favourite lady or mistress), though I had never done her any injury, except not making court to her, was my implacable enemy. But I think it is not to be doubted, that the principal cause of the king's message was the court's dislike that anybody should have so much interest with the princess as I had, who would not implicitly obey every command of the king and queen. The disgrace of my Lord Marlborough, therefore, was designed as a step towards removing me from about her."—An Account of the Conduct, &c.

* At first he was prevented by a rising of the waters, which swept away all the bridges on the river Meuse; and, by the time the waters subsided, the French had so fortified all the passes to their camp before Namur, as to render an attack too desperate. As soon as he had left England the Jacobites began to circulate a long and well-joined declaration from King James, who offered a free pardon to all except the Duke of Ormond, the Marquess of Winchester, the Earls of Sunderland, Danby, and Nottingham, the Lords Delamere, Wiltshire, Colchester, Coribury, and Dunblane, the Bishop of St. Asaph, Dr. Tillson, Dr. Burnet (the historian), about twelve other gentlemen who were named, the fishermen and all others who had offered personal indignities to his majesty at Feversham, the judges and jury who had condemned his plotting partisan, Ashton, &c. In this list of persons to be excluded from the amnesty appear the names of John Lord Churchill (Marlborough) and of several others who were corresponding with James and plotting against William; but this was, no doubt, intended as a blind. To omit the name of Marlborough, who had done so much against him, would have been to proclaim to the world that he had made his peace with his old master. In the month of April copies of a much more remarkable document were circulated. "This was a letter from King James, written and directed in his own hand, to several members of the privy council, whom he summoned to be present at the announcement of his wife. "Whereas," said the letter, "our royal predecessors used to call such of their privy council as could conveniently be had, to be present at the labour of their queens, and be witnesses to the birth of their children, and whereas we followed their example at the birth of our dearest son, the Prince of Wales, though even that precaution was not enough to hinder us from the malicious aspersions of those who were resolved to deprive us of our royal right, that we may not be wanting to ourselves now it hath pleased Almighty God, the supporter of truth, to give us the hope of further issue, our dearest consort the queen being big, and drawing near her time, we have thought fit to require such of our privy council as can possibly come to attend us here at St. Germain, to be witness at our dearest consort the queen her labour." A free pass to go and return was promised by his dearest brother, the most Christian king; but we need scarcely say that none availed themselves of it or undertook the journey. Letters to the same effect were directed to the Duchess of Somerset, the Duchess of Beaufort, the Lady Derby, the Lady Mayores of London, and many others who had belonged to the old court or cabinet.

† It was said that he purposely sacrificed the English, whom he hated,—that he kept back his own men, saying to those about him, "Let us see what sport these English bull-dogs will make us."

he attacked the English on some broken ground, and in the midst of hedge-rows and ditches in which they had got engaged. William brought up in person a strong body of infantry, and an unequal and most desperate fight was continued for nearly three hours, the English and French occasionally fighting with their muskets muzzle to muzzle. In the end, William was obliged to retreat before Luxembourg, who had been strengthened by some fresh troops brought up at a critical moment by Boufflers. The retreat was effected with excellent order, the English grenadiers covering the rear, and the French infantry scarcely venturing near enough to fire a shot. The carnage on both sides was tremendous, amounting, it is said, to 5000 killed on the side of the allies, and nearly as many on that of the French. The brave and devout Mackay, Sir Robert Douglas, and General Sir John Lanier, fell in the thickest of the battle. There was still an observable want of strict discipline and proper military training among them; but the headlong intrepidity which the British infantry displayed on this memorable day raised them and their country in the estimation of their foreign king. Though Luxembourg claimed a victory, he could not deny that he had sustained a perilous surprise, and he was in no condition to follow up his advantages. Little or nothing was done in this campaign after the battle of Steinkirk; but in the month of August a detestable conspiracy against the life of William was discovered through the skill of one Leefdale, a Dutchman. M. de Grandval, a captain of dragoons in the French service was arrested at Eyndhoven, and brought to trial before a military court, where he and one Dumont, his accomplice, confessed that King James, at St. Germain, in the presence of the queen, had engaged him to shoot King William. De Grandval was shot in the allied camp, and William proclaimed to the world the guilt of James and the connivance of Louis, by publishing the confession of the hired assassin. Neither the court of St. Germain nor that of Versailles replied to the foul accusation, though great pains were afterwards taken to exculpate James, who himself explicitly denied participation in any of the schemes which were repeatedly proposed to him for *killi*ng William. But the weight of this royal denial and the arguments of the Jacobites fall to the ground before the documentary evidence which has been produced in our own days from the friendly obscurity of the archives of Versailles; and M. Mazure, by proving that James subsequently employed conspirators against the person of William, has made it more than probable that he had employed this Grandval, or at least sanctioned his foul attempt.*

If France had been victorious in the Low Countries this year, she had felt the shame and the mischief of foreign invasion on her own frontiers in the south. The Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene, accompanied by Schomberg and his small body of English, rushed into Dauphiné, crossed the Durance, took several towns, levied large contributions, burnt eighty châteaux and villages, threatened Grenoble, and even Lyons, the second city in the kingdom. On the approach of winter the Duke of Savoy was obliged to evacuate his conquests, and retire to his own country; but he had demonstrated that France could be invaded, and that Italians, Savoyards, and Englishmen could retaliate upon the French the excesses they had committed, particularly in the Palatinate, when they were the invading party. But the great blow of the year was struck by British sailors.

Shortly after the departure of William for the Continent, the French began to collect a large fleet of men-of-war and transports to carry over King James and a formidable army to the invasion of England, where the Jacobites were full of insolent hope, and, encouraged by William's absence, were plotting and combining with wonderful activity. In some of the northern counties where the papists were numerous, considerable numbers of men were enlisted for the service of the de-throned king, who by the month of April reached the port of La Hogue, where he lay surrounded by a considerable army of French, Irish, and English refugees, all ready to embark. At this dangerous crisis several avowed Jacobites, including Lord Middleton, the Lords Griffin and Dummure, Sir John Fenwick, and Colonels Slingsby and Sackville were taken into custody; and on the 5th of May the Earl of Marlborough was suddenly arrested and conveyed to the Tower, on a charge of high treason. Warrants were also issued against the Earls of Huntingdon and Searsdale, and Dr. Sprat, bishop of Rochester. The Princess Anne herself expected to be put in du-rance; and she had some grounds for this apprehension, seeing that she had been making overtures to her de-throned father.*

On the same day that Marlborough was sent to the Tower, Admiral Russell set sail from the Downs in search of the French fleet at La Hogue. Off Beachy Head Russell was joined by the squadrons of Carter and Delaval, who had been watching the French ports, and by a portion of the Dutch fleet; so that altogether he was at the head

* Anne, it appears, never wrote to her father till there was an appearance that he must succeed in his new enterprise and recover his lost kingdoms. Then she deemed it necessary to avert the wrath of the parent she had abandoned, and expressed her concern for his misfortunes, the sense of her own unhappiness, and her long-nourished wishes of redeeming her fault by undoing all that had been done.—See her Letter in the Memoirs of James. Dalrymple says, boldly, "At length all things were settled: and the French king got assurance that the army would be directed by Marlborough, the fleet by Russell, and a great part of the church by the Princess Anne." And upon the evidence of the papers collected by Dalrymple and Mazure, and of other documents which have been successively brought to light, we may almost venture to say that there was something very like an arrangement of this kind. It should be remarked, however, that in some respects Admiral Russell was rather a bad politician than a bad or selfish man. In his correspondence with the exiled king he had insisted on terms and concessions all favourable to the liberties of his country, and which, in deed, if James had been restored, and had observed them (which he never would have done), would have converted the government of England into a republic.

of ninety-nine men-of-war, the greatest force that had been seen in the Channel since the Spanish Armada. On the 19th of May he discovered the French fleet off Cape Barfleur, bearing down upon him full sail. The French admiral, the Count de Tourville, who, it appears, did not know that Russell had effected his junction with the Dutch, and who had positive orders to engage the English (it being calculated that many of the English officers were in the interest of James), kept his course and actually engaged, though at long shots, with only sixty-three ships. The loose combat lasted from ten in the morning till five in the evening, when the French towed away with all their boats, and the English after them. At six there was a fresh engagement, but a fog fell, and under its cover the French made for the westward, favoured by a fresh gale. It appears either that De Tourville counted upon the superior sailing qualities of his ships, or that he still was ignorant of the amount of the force at sea against him, and from various causes, including treachery, perhaps, many ships of the allied fleet had neither come into battle nor hove in sight.* During the night there was a calm with heavy fogs, which lasted nearly till noon of the following day, when the greater part of the French fleet was seen about two leagues in advance of the English and Dutch, who pursued without any regard to order of battle, every ship in their van making the best of its way. But soon it grew calm again, and all came to anchor on the coast, the pursued being still considerably in advance of the pursuers. But on the morning of the 21st there was a brisk breeze, if not a rough gale, and as the English and Dutch advanced they discovered part of the French fleet making into the "Race of Alderney," a narrow strait between the island of Alderney and that part of the French coast which forms the peninsula of Cotantin. That channel, though safe in calm weather, and deep enough for the passage of the largest ships, is very dangerous in stormy weather, owing to irregular and conflicting currents. The Dutch and the blue squadron of the English,

* Queen Mary, who was governing during her husband's absence, suspected the fidelity of many men in the fleet, but she behaved with admirable prudence. According to James's biography, "It is more than probable that many officers of the English fleet, when they saw his most Christian majesty (King Louis) was in earnest, began to waver, at least the Princess of Orange was sensible of it; and, seeming by an affected generosity not to credit what she could not remedy, had sent them word she reposed an entire confidence in their fidelity and zeal, and that she looked upon the contrary reports as industriously raised by her enemies. This drew an address from the fleet, wherein they declared they would defend with the utmost peril of their lives their majesties' undoubted right, together with the religion and liberties of their country, against all foreign and popish invaders whatsoever. That, though perhaps no more cordially meant by many that signed it than addresses usually were in those days, might, however, create so much diffidence in those who intended well, as to prevent their venturing at what they might reasonably doubt would be generally opposed by others: nevertheless, the king had good hopes of many of the officers, particularly Carter, rear-admiral of the blue, but endeavoured to have matters so ordered as not to depend upon so dubious a foundation, especially the faint assurances of Admiral Russell himself, for he knew that fear alone would make those mercenary souls his friends, and that nothing but the preparations where he was could produce that effect." According to Brixtan de Molleville, "The government was acquainted with all these particulars, partly by some agents of King James, who betrayed his cause, partly by Admiral Carter himself, who informed the queen that he had been tampered with."—ibid. This Admiral Carter was killed at an early part of the engagement by a chance shot.

who pursued to the mouth of the Channel, hesitated about engaging in it, and finally stood off and let all the French ships that entered it escape.* For this Sir John Ashley, the admiral of the blue, was called to account in parliament, but was honourably acquitted. Sir Ralph Delaval, vice-admiral of the red, who was foremost of the rest of the allied fleet that had kept their course without turning to the Race of Alderney, was more successful; for, off Cape de Wick, near Cherbourg, he found dimasted or stranded De Tourville's ship, the Soleil Royal, of 110 guns, the Admirable, of 102 guns, the Conquérant of 80 guns, and three smaller rates, and Delaval burned and destroyed them all. Eighteen French ships of the line which had hauled for the Hogue, got safe in, between the forts de Lisset and de la Hogue, and before Admiral Russell came up they had been allowed time to provide for their defence. The ships were drawn up as far upon the shallows as tides and cables could bring them, and so left aground with their broadsides to the enemy; platforms and batteries, à fleur de l'eau, were raised on shore and planted with all the artillery of the army intended for the invasion of England; chaloupes filled with infantry were stationed among the shoals and along the beach; and upon the heights behind stood the whole army, with King James, the Duke of Berwick, the Marshal de Bellefonde, and other great officers. When Russell discovered these dispositions he lay-to, and sent Vice-Admiral Rooke on the 22nd to attempt the destruction of the ships. This was the really brilliant part of the battle of La Hogue; and most brilliantly was it performed. Rooke advanced with some light frigates and nearly all the open boats of the fleet, the ships of the line being unable to approach on account of the shallow water. He stationed his frigates as near as he could, and then trusted to the men in the boats, who had only a general order to board and burn, and do the best they could. The brave sailors pulled away and handled nothing but their oars, while they were assailed by a terrible fire of ship guns, caunons, and musketry both from shore and ships. But when they got alongside they threw away oars and muskets, and, with a tremendous huzza, with their cutlasses in their hands, they boarded, carried the ships, and pointed their guns against the French chaloupes and their forts on shore. They burned six ships of the line that night; and, renewing their attack on the following morning, they totally destroyed all the rest, together with a number of transports and merchant-vessels. James witnessed all this destruction; and it is said that, in the heat of the fight, his nationality, or the force of habit, so far overcame all other considerations, that he exclaimed, involuntarily, "See my brave English sailors!" While some of the ships were burning to the water's edge, some of their loaded guns, which had not been discharged, went off and killed some of those who attended upon him. James then said,—“Heaven fights against me!” and he retired, in utter hopelessness, to his tent, whence he soon repaired to St. Germain to his wife, Mary of Este, who, on the 28th of June, was delivered of a daughter.* He wrote to the abbot of the monks of La Trappe—“We have not yet suffered enough for our sins—I mean myself and my subjects. . . You have left the world to work your salvation—happier those who can do it—those are the only people I envy.”† But, in spite of these pious declarations, James still longed after his earthly crown, and he continued to renew his efforts in every possible way, for several years, though, after the battle of La Hogue, he never could have entertained a rational hope of success. To use the words of the writer of his life—“This hindered not a due attention to any occasion which Providence might offer to the regaining his right. He knew how to reconcile the suffering with patience the ill success of his endeavours with a due perseverance in them; for this reason the late disappointment hindered not a continuance of that correspondence with his friends in England, who (especially before the business of La Hogue) were, or pretended to be, very numerous—not only persons of the greatest rank, but even many who were in actual employment in the government.”‡ Twenty-four days after the victory, the Earl of Marlborough was liberated from the Tower. The ground of his arrest was this:—One Robert Young, then a prisoner in Newgate for the non-payment of a fine, knowing something of the suspicions entertained by the government of King William, and of the parties who were Jacobites, lodged an information that there were treasonable papers secreted in the house of Bishop Sprat, at Bromley, in Kent. A search-warrant was issued, and, besides several letters bearing the signature of Marlborough, there was found an act of association, which bore the signatures of Marlborough, Scarsdale, the bishop, Lord Cornbury, and Sir Basil Firebrace, who, according to the deed, undertook to restore King James. As soon as he was in the Tower, Marlborough declared to the Earl of Devonshire that the papers were forged, and made use of only to keep him in prison. Young, the accuser, bore a bad character; and, when he was confronted with Bishop Sprat, it was made to appear that, having an extraordinary talent in imitating handwritings, he had forged all the letters, signatures, &c.* Upon this, the bishop and the others implicated were dismissed, with the exception of Marlborough; and, after the defeat of the French fleet had dissipated the alarm of invasion, Queen Mary and the government set free a number of noted Jacobites, who had been arrested as a measure of precaution, without any explicit charge true or false. Though they did not declare the fact, the government no doubt knew, upon other testimony than that of the papers found at Bromley, that Marlborough was to be distrusted and feared. Yet his detention, after the release of the others, was very short; for, on the 15th of June, he was admitted to bail on the sureties of the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Marquess of Halifax, the Earl of Carberry, and Mr. Boyle. On the 23rd of June, however, his own name, and the names of two of his bail, Shrewsbury and Halifax, were struck out of the list of privy-councillors. At the beginning of Michaelmas term, Marlborough and his sureties applied for a discharge from their recognizances; but the Court of King's Bench refused, and they were obliged to wait for the meeting of parliament.†

King William returned from the Continent on the 19th of October, and was received by the people with acclamations. The atrocious design of assassination had raised him wonderfully in the popular affection. On the 4th of November he opened the parliament in person, in a gracious speech, in which there was more warmth of feeling than he usually displayed. At a very early period of the session, attention was drawn to the case of those who had been prisoners in the Tower. Marlborough, Scarsdale, and Huntingdon complained, in their places in the House of Lords, of the treatment they had received, and of the conduct of the judges who had refused to discharge them from their bail, or bring them to trial, conformably to the Habeas Corpus Act. The Earl of Shrewsbury, one of Marlborough's sureties, supported the appeal, and represented Marlborough as ungratefully

* “A week after the king returned from La Hogue the queen was delivered of a princess, which gave him at least some domestic comfort. She was christened Louise Mary, the most Christian king being her godfather, which ceremony was performed with great magnificence and solemnity; and though no one came out of England, according to the king's invitation, however, besides the princesses and chief ladies of the court of France, the chancellor, the first president of the parliament of Paris, the archbishop, &c., the wife of the Danish ambassador, Madame Meerzoon, as a person on whose testimony the people of England might reasonably rely, was present at the queen's labour and delivery, and notwithstanding her aversness to the king's interest, could not refuse owning the ridiculousness of that false and malicious insinuation which had brought him so much mischief, she being an eyewitness of the contrary herself.”—Memoirs.

† Ibidem.

‡ What immediately follows is amusing from that quarter, but it points clearly enough to the clue to the intrigues of men like Marlborough.—“Perhaps it was not purely a zeal for the king's restoration that stuck so much with many of them, as the prospect they had of an endless war and an unacted government, till things run in their natural channel again: they saw the most Christian king espoused his majesty's interest heartily, and the late success (barring that disaster at sea) against the united power of almost all Europe showed what he was able to do, even while he had such enemies to struggle with, and, by consequence, how much more, if that confederacy should break asunder, which, being a chain of so many different links, could not be hoped would hold long together. Since, therefore, there was some appearance of their being forced to return voluntarily, many of them thought it more eligible to return voluntarily, and by offering certain conditions to the king.”

* “The Duchess of Marlborough says: ‘‘ Soon after the princess (Anne) going to Sim, a dreadful plot broke out, which was said to have been hid somewhere, I don't know where, in a flower-pot; and my Lord Marlborough was sent to the Tower. To commit a peer to prison it was necessary there should be an affidavit from somebody of the treason. My Lord Romney, therefore (that is, Sydney), secretary of state, had sent to one Young, who was then in goal for perjury and forgery, and paid his fine, in order to make him what they call a legal evidence. For, as the court lawyers said, Young, not having lost his ears, was an irreproachable witness! I shall not dwell on the story of this fellow's villany, the Bishop of Rochester having given a full account of it in print.’—An Account of the Conduct, &c. There is no doubt of the indifferent character of Young; but we are not inclined to believe, except upon better evidence, that so honourable and kind-hearted a man as Sydney should have led him on in the manner described by the unscrupulous duchess.

and unjustly used. The debate was vehement and prolonged. The House of Lords came to a resolution—"That no peer shall be remanded to prison by the King's Bench upon his appearing before them by virtue of the Habeas Corpus Act, after having entered his prayer to be tried as the said act directs, or kept under bail, unless there appear against him two witnesses upon oath, or in a capacity to be sworn." They appointed a day to consider in what manner they should discharge the lords from their recognizances, but the king terminated the business by discharging them himself, and the ministers were exonerated by a bill of indemnity. Marlborough renewed his intrigues with the agents of James, begging all the while employment from William, who, however, thought it not for the good of the service to intrust the command of any of his troops to him, and who would never employ him until he was convinced that it was his interest to be faithful. Under a less magnanimous prince, and any government less controlled by the law, Marlborough would not have lived to be the hero of Blenheim, but would have perished on a scaffold. The other business of this session of parliament was exceedingly interesting. The war of parties was carried on with great acrimony. The Tories attempted to ruin the Whig admiral, Russell, who, as was supposed by many that were of neither faction, had not done all that he ought in the battle of La Hogue; and the Whigs attempted to unseat the Tory secretary of state, Lord Nottingham. The Whigs had the advantage in the House of Commons, which declared that Admiral Russell had behaved with fidelity, courage, and conduct: but the Tories prevailed in the Lords; and the king, who had been offended by several things in the debate, and who very possibly knew something of Russell's intercourse with the court of St. Germain, dismissed the Whig admiral and retained the Tory secretary.*

The Whig majority in the Commons, on the 13th of December, ordered a bill to be brought in which made the people wonder, for nine days or a little more, at the disinterestedness of the out-of-place patriots. It proposed nothing less than the banishing all the servants of the crown from the House of Commons. It was entitled, "A Bill touching free and impartial proceedings in Parliament," and its substance was, that all members of the House should be held incapable of places of trust or profit under the crown; and that any member that accepted a place should, by the fact, lose his seat, and be barred from any re-election. And, strange as it may appear, this bill actually passed, with little or no difficulty,

* We have said that Admiral Russell was not altogether a selfish man. But this must be taken comparatively. There are papers that tell strongly against his disinterestedness. In a letter addressed to the king, and dated the 10th of May, 1691, Russell complained of ill usage, and reproached his sovereign for not having added to his appointments, which at that moment he confessed were not under 3000*l.* a-year. He also complains grievously of his sisters being left without one pension, and of his brother, a lieutenant-colonel of horse, being "forced to quit the service, and seek a subsistence by marrying an old widow." "These things," adds Russell, "have given me great mortification, that you are pleased to show the world my family is less deserving of your favours than others."—Dutrymple's Appendix.

in a house that was unusually full of military officers and placements.* It was carried up to the Lords on the 22nd of December, while the supplies were yet depending, and, notwithstanding all the efforts of the court party, it was there committed by a majority of nine. In the committee it was still triumphant; and even on the report forty-two peers voted for it and only forty against it; but the scale was turned by the proxies, of which the court had seven and the opposition only three; so that the bill, for the present, was rejected by a majority of two. The ministers considered this an escape rather than a victory; and their opponents, including the Princess Anne's husband, Marlborough (who was absolutely pining for place), the Duke of Cumberland, and the Earls of Warrington, Thanet, Weymouth, Danby, Rivers, Sandwich, Mulgrave, and others, entered a strong protest; and Mulgrave, as a parting blow, printed his able and eloquent speech, "which was everywhere received as if it had been a new revelation."[†]

Before the ministry had recovered from the panic occasioned by the Place Bill, Marlborough's friend, the Earl of Shrewsbury, brought in the celebrated Bill for Triennial Parliaments, which provided for annual sessions and a fresh election every three years. After the example exhibited in Charles II.'s time of a seventeen years' House of Commons, it seemed necessary to fix the duration of the representative body, and three years were judged a proper medium term, appearing sufficient to establish a control of the electors over their representatives, without having recourse to the scheme of annual parliaments, which men who aimed at a still more popular form of government were then, as at later periods, most anxious to recommend. But the more immediate object of the movers of the bill was to procure the dissolution of the present parliament, which had already sat three years, wanting a few weeks. The opponents of the bill represented that, during so critical a war, it was not advisable to venture on a new general election, since we had so many among us who were so ill affected to the present government. But, in spite of these representations, and all the efforts of the court party, the Triennial Bill passed the Lords. When sent down to the Commons, it encountered considerable opposition. It was represented that such a bill did not come properly from the Upper House, who were not to be affected by it; for, though the Commons might be altered by it, the Lords, by their hereditary right, would remain the same. The motion for a second reading was however carried, and the bill was then committed. Several alterations were suggested in committee. The term of dissolution for the sitting parliament was extended from the 1st of January to the 24th of March, which secured another session. The question being put for the third reading, it was carried by 200 against 161, after which the bill was passed and sent back to the Lords; and they having concurred in the amendments, nothing was wanting save the royal assent to make it law. But this assent William refused; thus venturing on an exercise of prerogative, which no ordinary circumstances could reconcile either with prudence or with a constitutional administration of the government.* The circumstances of the times, however, were not ordinary, but most extraordinary, and in them must be found a justification, or at least an excuse, for his conduct in this and in several other particulars.

* Burnet says that, "whereas King Charles's Long Parliament was called the Pension Parliament, so they called this the Officers' Parliament: because many that had commands in the army were of it; and the word they gave out among the people was, that we were to be governed by a standing army and a standing parliament."

[†] Ralph. The Lords that protested argued that "the House of Commons would not have begun and passed a bill of this nature, wherein the members of that House are so particularly concerned, without having been fully satisfied in the reasons for it, and plainly convinced of that great need the people of England are in, at this time, of so just and wise a provision."

A. D. 1693.—After passing various bills—some good, some indifferent, and some decidedly bad—and after receiving very liberal supplies, which could only be provided for by still-augmenting taxation—William prorogued parliament on the 14th of March, alleging that the state of affairs on the Continent required his presence abroad. By this time it was evident to William that he could not govern with a Tory majority in the cabinet, and that the game which he had proposed, from the first, of balancing the two parties, would be both difficult and uncertain. He therefore withdrew his countenance from the obnoxious Earl of Nottingham, who had figured, in a manner, as prime minister; appointed that ultra-Whig, Trenchard, who had been engaged in Monmouth's rebellion, secretary in lieu of Sidney; and, still further to conciliate the Whigs, he on the same day made Sir John Somers, then attorney-general, and one of the purest names the party can boast, lord-keeper of the great seal—an appointment which was both popular and judicious. The Admiralty, the commissioners of which had discontented, if they had not betrayed, the nation, was remodelled, and Sir Cloudesley Shovell, an excellent officer and an honest man (at least for the time), was placed at the head of the board.†

Early in April William was again with the allied army, which was again concentrated near Louvain. Louis XIV. was with the French army; but as soon as William had disconcerted his manœuvres to fall upon Liege or Brussels, he returned to Paris, and left the care of the war to Luxembourg and Boufflers. Luxembourg brought up his forces to Meldert, within half a league of William's position; but neither would venture an attack, and the two armies lay looking at each other. After a skirmish, in which the allies had the advantage, the French made a sudden move towards Liege; but they were again disappointed, for William had thrown ten battalions of fresh troops into that place. Giving up the idea of an assault or a siege, Luxembourg, after some able manœuvres, put William in such a position that he must either fight, with an inferior force, or abandon the towns of Brabant to the French. Although he was expecting every day to be joined by some of his dilatory allies, William resolved to risk the battle, notwithstanding the great superiority of the French in point of number; and on the 29th of July he fought and lost the famous battle of Lauden. But he lost ground without losing honour: he displayed the greatest activity and bravery during the battle; and he conducted the retreat with a skill which forced an involuntary homage of admiration from his enemies. The loss was nearly equal, being estimated at about 9000 on either side in killed and wounded. Among the slain on the side of the allies was Count Solms, who had misbehaved at Steinkirk; and, on the side of the French, the gallant Sarsfield, who had fought so bravely for King James in Ireland. In a few days, when William was joined by the Duke of Wirtemberg, whom he had been expecting, and by the troops which he had detached to Liege, he again offered battle: but now he had the superiority in number, and Luxembourg had the ability, not only to avoid being forced into action, but to take Charleroi almost under the eyes of the allied army; and thus ended this year's campaign in the Low Countries. At Paris, Te Deums were sung, and nothing was spoken of but victories; but it was evident to thinking men that the tide of fortune was changing—that William was not disconcerted or discouraged—and that Louis, after bloody battles and a most ruinous expenditure, was not able to entamer the United Provinces.‡

In another direction the French gained some advantages, but at the same time covered themselves with infamy. The Marshal Delorges crossed the Rhine, and invested Heidelberg, the unfortunate capital of the luckless Palatinate, which was taken by storm and delivered up to a savage fury, to lust, and rapine. Nothing was respected: the churches were pillaged, blood was shed at the foot of the altar, the sanctuary of the tomb was invaded, and the bones of the old electors palatine, of their wives and families, were torn from the sepulchre and scattered all about. As the French did not hope to be able to retain possession, they set fire to the town in fifty places at once, and with barbarous wantonness they destroyed or defaced innumerable works of German art, industry, and genius. Louis, prince of Baden, who commanded the Imperial forces, said that he was come from a war against the Turks, to find that Frenchmen, calling themselves Christians, could be greater barbarians than the infidels. But Louis, the most Christian king, did not fail to order the Archbishop of Paris to sing the Te Deum for the capture of Heidelberg, nor did that prelate hesitate to obey the order.* Louis boasted that this conquest would give a freer entrance to his troops into the heart of the empire; but Delorges could not force the passage of the Necker, and, after sustaining several repulses, he was obliged to retreat into France. Beyond the Alps the allies, consisting of Savoyards, Piedmontese, Spaniards, and a few English under Schomberg, and commanded by the Duke of Savoy, Prince Eugene, the Count de Caprara, the Count de Las Torres, and the Marquis de Leganez, were defeated on the 4th of October, at Marsaglia, in the plains of Piedmont, by the French, under Catinat. But that marshal was so weakened in that hard-fought battle as to be unable to do anything else, and the French found themselves effectually shut out from Turin and from other places which they had expected to take by coups de main.†

† Killigrew and Delaval were joined with Shovell in the command of the fleet; and both were suspected upon very good grounds. "The two first," says Burney, "were thought so incredible to King James's interests, that it made some insinuate that the king was in the hands of those who intended to betray him to his enemies: for, though no exception lay against Shovell, yet it was said he was only put with the other two to give some reputation to the commission, and that he was one against two; so that he could neither hinder nor do anything."

King James, or the writer of his Memoirs, treating that affair slightly, says, that, after the battle of La Hogue, his most Christian majesty, "to show that he was neither dejected nor disabled by that loss, notwithstanding the expense of the war, gave orders for rebuilding as many ships as had been burnt, which, in a year's time, was done accordingly of the same bulk and burden, to the great admiration of the riches, power, and economy of his state." This statement is not far from the truth; but, if William had been served as he ought to have been, the case would have been different; at least there is reason to believe that if Russell, Delaval, and the rest, had done their duty, most of the old French ships would have been destroyed, and the new ones either burned on the stocks or prevented from getting to sea. Good plans were formed by William for this end, but they were all either betrayed to the enemy or frustrated in execution by rogues and cowards. A short time before the battle of La Hogue and the French preparations to invade England, William had intended to make an attack upon Brest, the chief port which Louis had on the ocean, and, if he did no more, to destroy all the shipping there. The project was entirely his own: he communicated it to none save some of his ministers; but they betrayed the secret to the French court.‡ After the battle of La Hogue, the project of an attack upon Brest and a descent on the French coast was revived, and William proposed that it should be made on a much grander scale than had been previously contemplated; and that the fleet should carry a land army of 10,000 men, horse and foot. It was calculated that, with this force, all the arsenals and dockyards of France might be destroyed; and the popular mind was excited beyond measure. The troops were embarked in transports, and were left, unprotected, to seek Admiral Russell, who was at sea; they, however, fell in with the fleet off St. Malo's: but then, instead of proceeding to action, they lost time in debates and councils of war, which are almost ever the signals and the causes of failure. As it had happened before, and as it has repeatedly happened since, more particularly in our expeditions to the French coast, the sea officers and the land officers disagreed, and Russell pretended everything to be difficult and dangerous; and after the troops had been on board for some four or five days, he brought them back without doing anything. During the autumn and winter the English fleet lay inactive, not even giving convoy to the merchant-vessels, some of which had been detained in port with their cargoes on board for many months. But the French, in the meanwhile, had made immense exertions; new ships of war were launched, old ones repaired, and, by the month of May, they had effected what was always a difficult and critical point—the junction of their fleet from Toulon, in the Mediterranean, with that of Brest, on the ocean. In the beginning of the present year (1693) the English government promised a convoy to the fleet of merchantmen destined for the Mediterranean and the Levant, and which was then called the "Smyrna fleet." But when the appointed moment came, ministers represented, that, on account of the immense value of the property embarked, those trading vessels must wait for a stronger convoy than that which had been prepared; and in the month of February new excuses were made, and they did not sail until the French had got into the best possible position for capturing or destroying them. Burnet says, decidedly, that the Jacobite spies were busy on this occasion.* The convoy, consisting of twenty-three men-of-war, was put under the command of Rooke, who sailed at the end of May with nearly 400 merchantmen.† On the 17th of June he discovered the united French fleet in Lagos Bay, on the coast of Portugal. Rooke

* One of the standing instructions of King James to the non-jurors and such ministers of the established church as adhered to him and plotted or intrigued for him, was—"That exact notices be sent of the fleet, how the preparations go on, &c. . . . That his majesty know who commands, what ships are out, and their stations."—Macpherson, State Papers. Dalrymple remarks:—"As the clergy were spread everywhere over the country, it was impossible for him to employ better intelligences."

† The Admirals Shovel, Killigrew, and Delaval, with sixty ships of the line, accompanied Rooke some fifty leagues south of Ushant, and on the 6th of June returned northward, believing, or pretending to believe, that Rooke and his convoy were safe, and that the French fleet were at Brest, intending to make a descent on the English coast. "It was more difficult," says Dalrymple, "for the English to get intelligence from France, because they could get it only in the common way of paying spies, than for the French to get intelligence from England, where the greatest and meanest equally, from the idea of serving the late king, pressed forward to give intelligence for nothing." Information about De Tourville's sailing had, however, been received in England by means of a letter which could be trusted, and which inclosed a list of the French ships. This communication was shown publicly at the council-board; but, through negligence or treachery, the warning was thrown away.

* The Palatinate had been cruelly devastated and Heidelberg bombarded by Turenne, at the express order of Louis XIV., in the year 1689, when another Te Deum had been sung at Paris, and a medal struck with the blasphemous inscription, Res dixi et factus est. By the two bombardments Heidelberg Castle, one of the most interesting edifices in Europe, studded all over inside and out with sculpture and the choicest carving, was defaced and more than half ruined.

† Schomberg received a mortal wound in the battle, and died for William, as his father had done at the battle of the Boyne.

‡ Dalrymple, Memoirs, with documents in Appendix. Lord Rochester, second son of Chancellor Clarendon, and one of Queen Mary's maternal uncles, was among those who corresponded with King James. "When I was last at Paris, I saw in the Scotch college there, a letter from Lord Rochester to King James, written on silk, which, from the form of the piece, had been the inside of a woman's stomach; and I was told there were others of his letters in the house."—Dalrymple.

tacked about, "while the merchants fled, as their fears drove them; a great many of them sticking still close to him." In a running fight one English man-of-war and one Dutch were burnt; two Dutch were taken; and of the merchantmen about forty of the richest were captured, and a like number destroyed—the residue getting into Faro, St. Luca, Cadiz, and Gibraltar. The enemy did not pursue Rooke very far, but let him get into Madeira, whence he arrived in Ireland without further accident. De Tourville, who commanded the French fleet, was foiled in an attempt upon Cadiz Bay, but he insulted the whole of the Spanish coast, from Cape St. Vincent to Cape de Finis, braved some English and Dutch vessels at Malaga, Alicante, and other places, and then returned in triumph to Toulon. By this most evident mismanagement and treachery, the whole English nation was thrown into a state of gloom and dejection, and the commercial interest received a terrible blow.*

In the course of these events the unusual tranquillity of Scotland was disturbed by plots and conspiracies for restoring a dynasty which had been a curse to the country. There are instances of a romantic and chivalrous loyalty, but, generally speaking, the Jacobites of Scotland were as foolish as were the heads of that party in England.

We have mentioned the apparently quiet settlement in 1689. A parliament was held at Edinburgh in the spring of 1690, and King William's ignorance of Scottish affairs, and idle advice given to him purposely or for factious ends, contributed to make the session an unpleasant one. But the greatest apple of discord grew out of the king's promoting Lord Melville, at the expense of his competitor, Sir James Montgomery, a hot-headed, daring man. In the Scottish remonstrance of grievances, drawn up at the Revolution, the first article was directed against the Lords of Articles, a body which had used to be nominated by the crown, and which had notoriously made the estates or parliament a mere mockery as far as the rights of the people were concerned. The said article stated that—"The estates of Scotland do represent that the committee of parliament called The Articles is a great grievance to the nation, and there ought to be no committee of parliament, but such as are freely chosen by the estates to prepare motions and overtures that are first made in the House." William had authorised the Duke of Hamilton, his lord high commissioner for Scotland, to reform and regulate The Lords of the Articles; but he had been told that to consent to their abolition would be fatal to his prerogative, and he refused to do more than modify. When, however, he was informed of the great heats excited by this refusal, he instructed Hamilton to concede to the three estates of parliament, nobles, knights, and burgesses, conjointly the choice of a committee of eleven, each to be chosen monthly, or oftener if they thought fit; and to enable the parliament to take the initiative in bills and to take any matters into consideration which had been rejected by this new committee of articles. But the Scottish patriots, with spirit and with wisdom, refused to accept of a mere modification, and called aloud for the utter destruction of so unconstitutional a body, demanding the assimilation of their parliament to that of England, which had never known the weight of that foul incubus. But the reluctance of William continued, and this now threw the parliament into a very bad humour. Like angry men, the patriots proceeded to violent and unwise measures. A bill was brought in of a retro-active kind, by which the spirit of revenge and retaliation would have been administered to in excess. It proposed to incapacitate for any public trust or employment whatsoever all those persons who "in the former evil government had been grievous to the nation, together with all those who had shown disaffection to the late happy change." The Lord High Commissioner Hamilton very properly refused the royal assent to this bill. The Scottish parliament then set up a right to appoint the judges of the kingdom, and ordered a bill for that purpose. By the positive orders of William, this bill was rejected also. Another bill was introduced for repealing the Act of Supremacy, which was first passed in 1669, and which gave the crown a most absolute authority over the church and the religious worship of the people. Here again William refused the royal assent, not because he wished to maintain the law as it stood, but because the repeal plainly contemplated the renewal of the old Presbyterian absolutism and intolerance. But early in this session he consented to the abolition of episcopacy, which the mass of the Scottish people regarded as the greatest boon conferred by the Revolution. But the parliament, not satisfied with being rid of the bishops, still insisted on appointing the judges; and they passed a resolution that it was illegal for the judges named by the sovereign to continue on their seats. On the other hand, the judges in commission were commanded to act by the authority of the privy council, and in the midst of a great ferment Hamilton adjourned the parliament. A violent remonstrance was published by the leaders, and then many men of opposite principles, Whigs and Tories, Episcopalians and Presbyterians united in dark cabals and intrigues for the restoration of James, who was represented on all hands as being so abject and weak as to be ready to consent to anything. Sir James Montgomery was at the head of the discontented Whigs, and he connected himself with the discontented heads of the Whig party in England, corresponding at the same time with the courts of Versailles and St. Germain. But by this time there were scarcely any public men in Scotland upon whom William could rely: even Hamilton, his counmissioner, was disaffected, because he thought his merits had not been sufficiently rewarded; and Lord Melville, who was put in his place, was weak and credulous. The Dukes of Atholl and Queensberry, the Lords Amundale, Breadalbane, Balcarras, and Middleton, were thorough-going Jacobites, and the last-named of these noblemen, the Earl of Middleton, went over to France this year. "And," says Burnet, "it was believed he was sent by a great body among us, with a proposition, which, had he had the assurance to have made, and they the wisdom to have accepted, might have much increased our factions and jealousies. It was, that King James should offer to resign his title in favour of his son, and likewise to send him to be bred in England, under the direction of parliament, till he should be of age; but I could never hear that he ventured on this advice."*

The person who was truest to his trust and to the principles of the Revolution, which he had helped to make, was Sir John Dalrymple, now, by the elevation of his father, Master of Stair. Dalrymple, who was secretary of state for Scotland, and commonly designated as "Secretary Stair," or "the Secretary," was at least as able as he was true: he was, in fact, the coolest and most sagacious politician in the kingdom; but an unfortunate event had covered him with odium. This was the incident commonly known in history by the name of the "Massacre of Glencoe." Although they had ceased any very active operations since the death of Dundee at Killikrankie, the Highlanders had not laid down their arms. The Lord Breadalbane, who had proposed a scheme of the same sort before, sent a plan for settling the Highlands to Secretary Stair, who was attending King William in Flanders. Breadalbane proposed that a general pardon, and 12,000*l., should be given to the Highlanders, and that pensions should be offered to their chiefs, upon condition of their holding 4000 of their clansmen in readiness to resist any invasion from France. This plan was readily

* Burnet adds: "In another he succeeded better. When King James thought the invasion from Normandy, the former year, was so well laid, that he seemed not to apprehend it could miscarry, he had prepared a declaration, of which some copies came over. He promised nothing in it, and pardoned nobody by it; but he spoke in the style of a conqueror, who thought he was master, and therefore would limit himself by no promises, but such as were conceived in general words, which might be afterwards expounded at pleasure. This was much blamed, even by his own party, who thought that they themselves were not enough secured by so loose a declaration: so the Earl of Middleton, upon his going over, procured one of another strain, which, as far as words could go, gave all content; for he promised everything, and pardoned all persons. His party got this into their hands. I saw a copy of it, and they waited for a fit occasion to publish it to the nation."

* On the 25th of June, 1691, Secretary Stair wrote to Breadalbane from the camp in Flanders:—"Do not trouble yourself with any discouragements you may see designed against you. By the king's letter to the council you will see he hath stopt all hostilities against the Highlanders, till he may hear from you, and that your time be elapsed without coming to some issue, which I do not apprehend; for there will come nothing to them. . . . But if they will be mad, before Lammas they will repent it; for the army will be allowed to go into the Highlands, which some think so high for, and the frigates will attack them: but I have so much confidence of your conduct and capacity, to let them see the ground they stand on, that I think these suppositions are vain. I have sent you your instructions."—Appendix to Dalrymple's Memoirs.

adopted by William, and Breadalbane brought the treaty almost to a conclusion. A proclamation was issued in the autumn of 1691, declaring that all the rebels or insurgents who took the oaths to the new government before the 1st of January, 1692, should be pardoned by his majesty. But the Duke of Hamilton, either from envy or from some other motive, thwarted Breadalbane and Dalrymple, sending schemes of his own into the Highlands; and the chiefs* played a double game, writing to King James for his permission to make the treaty, which they promised to break as soon as it should suit his interests, and to King William to awaken jealousies and misgivings as to the fidelity of his ministers in Scotland, not excepting Lord Breadalbane, who was managing the treaty for him,† nor Secretary Stair, who seems never to have departed a line's breadth from his hatred to the House of Stuart. Breadalbane then proposed a new scheme, and it appears to be proved beyond question that both Dalrymple and King William assented to it. This was to treat the Highlanders who still held out in their glens and mountains like wild beasts, and to practise upon them that sort of execution which was quaintly called in Scotland "letters of fire and sword"—an inhuman weapon, but sanctioned by the old laws of that country against attainted rebels. The order was sent down to the privy council at Edinburgh, which appointed a committee to carry it into execution, and allotted money and other necessaries for the purpose. Breadalbane, Tarbet, and the Marquess of Argyll agreed to co-operate with the king's troops, flattering themselves, it is suspected, with the prospect of part of the rebel chiefs' estates. But those Jacobites yielded on the approach of the danger, and they all hurried in to take the oaths to King William, with the single exception of Macdonald of Glenco, an hereditary enemy of my Lord Breadalbane. Burnet says that "these Macdonalds of Glenco were believed guilty of much robbery, and many murders; and so had gained too much by their pilfering war to be easily brought to give it over;" and a more recent historian affirms that Secretary Dalrymple thought "that mercy would be thrown away upon them, because they had been in the irreclaimable habit of making incursions into the low countries for plunder, and because he had himself obtained a pardon for them from King William, when, one of the clan having discovered his accomplices in a crime, the rest had tied him to a tree, and every man of the tribe had stabbed him with a dirk, Glenco, the chieftain, giving the first blow."* But all this was Highland law and Highland usage; and if the misdoings of the Macdonalds had been tenfold greater, the government would still be inexcusable for the detestable transactions which followed. Upon the last day of December—the last day to which the proclamation of pardon extended—the old chief went to Fort William and offered to take the oaths. But the officer in command refused to administer them, alleging that he was not a civil magistrate. Macdonald then repaired to Inverary, but the journey was rough and the weather stormy, and he did not reach that town till two or three days after the prescribed 1st of January. The sheriff of the county, however, after some scruples, administered the oaths of allegiance to King William, and then the chief returned to his native valley of Glenco, which runs between lofty mountains. It was resolved to take advantage of the letter of the proclamation; and a warrant, as we believe upon a misrepresentation of circumstances, was procured from King William, signed both above and below with his own hand, for proceeding to execution, which meant the extermination of the little clan. Even before the expiration of the term allowed, Secretary Stair contemplated extreme measures. Writing from London to Lord Breadalbane, on the 2nd of December, he says—"I am convinced it is neither your fault, nor can any prejudice arise to their majesties' service by the change of measures, but only ruin to the Highlanders. . . . I do not fail to take notice of the

* Burnet mentions, as a fact, the extremely probable circumstance that the Highlanders believed that the noblemen intended to keep the best part of the money to themselves. "There is a tradition, that when Lord Nottingham afterwards wrote to Lord Breadalbane to account for the 12,000*l.* which had been given him to be divided among the Highlanders, he answered,—My lord, the Highlands are quiet; the money is spent; and this is the best way of accounting between friends." Dalrymple.

† In a letter, dated in September (1691), the Secretary, still in the Low Countries, tells Breadalbane that he has been accused of tampering with the Highlanders for King James. "Nobody," says Stair, "believes your lordship capable of doing a thing so base, or that you could believe there could be any secrets in your treaties, where there were so many ill eyes upon your proceedings; but the truth will always hold fast. The king is not soon shaken. . . . I have heard there are endeavours going to make the Highlanders either own these base terms as promised by your lordship, or else to declare their peacefulness did not proceed on your account, or for your negotiation, but because of the endeavours of others. I am not ready to believe these projects will have great effect. Let not anything discourage you, but believe all these devices will tend to magnify your service when you finish your undertaking." In a letter written a few days after this, the Secretary tells his lordship,— "There wants no endeavours to render you suspicious to the king; but he asked what proof there was for the information? and bid me tell you to go on in your business; the best evidence of sincerity was the finding that matter quickly to a conclusion. We now would fain fancy the time is too long, and that it will be abused in the interim by those who intend not to take the allegiance, but to come down to debauch the Low Countries, and insult the government." And again, in a letter dated the 3rd of December, the secretary excites still more strongly Breadalbane's desire of revenge, and even pledges himself that that passion shall be gratified. After speaking of some military preparations against the clans, he says, "I am not changed as to the expediency of doing things by the easiest means, and at leisure; but the madness of these people, and their ungratefulness to you, makes me plainly see there is no reckoning on them, but delecta est Carthago. . . . Mearns, Glenrury, and all of them, have written letters, and taken oaths to make it believed that all you did was for the interest of King James. Therefore, look on, and you shall be satisfied of your revenge." But Breadalbane, who was indubitably the most guilty party, is supposed to have had a double object—to gratify his own revenge for old feuds and recent attacks, and to render King William odious to the Highlanders, by one and the same blow. And other evil passions and other men's interests played into his hands. Argyll, for example, who engaged to co-operate with him, was quarrelling at the time with several of the clans about territory and feudal rights, and had with difficulty been brought into the scheme of a pacification by money and amicable means; while some of the clans had betrayed his father and sent him to the block.

* Dalrymple, Memoirs. It is also said that the men of Glenco had distinguished themselves in the two preceding reigns by their cruelties to the Covenanters and Cameronians, who were accustomed to justify their revenge by texts of scripture. In all directions we find strong passions at work, except in King William, who had none, and who was certainly not blood-thirsty on any other occasion. Still, however, it is probable that, without himself settling the matter to be pursued, he may have been led to believe that a sudden and rigorous measure might have a beneficial effect upon the rest of the Highland clans.

frankness of your offer. I think the clan Macdonald must be rooted out. . . . But for this, Leven and Argyll's regiment, with two more, would have been gone to Flanders. Now all stops. . . . God knows whether the 12,000*l.* sterling had been better employed to settle the Highlands or to ravage them; but since we will make them desperate, I think we should root them out before they can get that help they depend upon. Their doing, after they got King James's allowance (permission), is worse than their obstinacy; for these who lay down arms at his command will take them up by his warrant." Dalrymple instructed the military how to proceed and take them by surprise. He informed Colonel Levingstone, commander of the forces in Scotland, that such as had not taken the oaths by the time limited should be excluded from the benefit of indemnity and destroyed by fire and sword. But there was an article in mitigation to this effect:—"In order that the rebels may not think themselves desperate, we allow you to give terms and quarters: but in this manner only, that chieftains and heritors, or leaders, be prisoners of war, their lives only safe, and all other things in mercy: the community, taking the oaths of allegiance, &c., to have quarter and indemnity for their lives and fortunes, and to be protected from the soldiers." But a few days after, the Secretary, writing again to Levingstone, says—"Just now, my Lord Argyll tells me that Glenco hath not taken the oath, at which I rejoice. It is a great work of charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable sect, the worst of the Highlanders. The winter is the only season in which we are sure the Highlanders cannot escape us." And, on the very same day (the 11th of January), Secretary Stair got the king's signature and counter-signature to a new order, in which, after directions about the treatment of the clans who had submitted, occur these fatal words:—"If the tribe of Glenco can well be separated from the rest, it will be a proper vindication of public justice to extirpate that sect of thieves" Nor did the Secretary stop here: on the 16th of January, in forwarding some new and merciful instructions, he says—"But for a just example of vengeance, I entreat the thieving tribe of Glenco be rooted out to purpose." On the 30th he writes to Colonel Hill, the commander of Fort William—"Pray, when the thing concerning Glenco is resolved, let it be secret and sudden: better not meddle with them than not to purpose." And again, in another dispatch to Levingstone (the Secretary's mind must have been inflamed by some Presbyterian fanaticism), he says—"I hope the soldiers will not trouble the government with prisoners." In the month of February, when old Macdonald believed himself safe on his oaths, two companies of soldiers, commanded by Captain Campbell of Glenlyon, uncle to the wife of one of the old chief's sons, marched up the valley, and took quarters among the clan, not as enemies but as friends. The soldiers were Highlanders like themselves. They remained in the valley nearly a fortnight, and then rose in the night-time to butcher their unsuspecting hosts. Thirty-eight men of the clan were murdered in their sleep, and the rest would have shared the same fate, but for the alarm given by one of the chief's sons, who overheard one of the soldiers saying to another, that he liked not the work—that he had not courage to kill them so. "This massacre," says Burnet, "raised a mighty outcry, and was published by the French in their gazettes, and by the Jacobites in their libels,* to cast a reproach on the king's government, as cruel and barbarous;—though, in all other instances, it had appeared that his own inclinations were gentle and mild, rather to an excess. The king sent orders to inquire into the matter; but when the letters writ upon this business were all examined, which I myself read, it appeared that so many were involved in the matter, that the king's gentleness prevailed on him to a fault, and he contented himself with dismissing only the Master of Stair from his service." Stair was soon re-employed; and the Highlanders, who could not or would not sift the evidence, continued to associate him and William as the real authors of the bloody deed.†

William returned from the Continent in the month of November, at a moment when plots and conspiracies, some new, some old, were on foot in England, Scotland, and Ireland. He soon made an almost entire change in the offices of government, going back to the Whigs, although he was not ignorant of their intrigues with the court of St. Germain. His principle of action seems to have been to make it worth their while to be faithful, and to remove those fears of a counter-revolution, which had been the source of the infidelity of many of them. He knew that kind of human nature, and was fully aware that if they found it more profitable and more safe to serve him than King James, he might count upon their services. But the misfortune was, he could never fully establish this conviction of security in the minds of some of them: there was a despicable dread of the power of the Grand Monarque, though it was now waning, and a consequent apprehension that, after all, the exiled king or his son would be

* We may judge of the Jacobites' accounts by that given in the Life of James.—"The king's friends soon after were forced to submit, who, upon laying down their arms and promising to live peaceably, were assured at least of indemnity and protection; yet, contrary to that, by an order, which Nero himself would have had a horror of, the Prince of Orange commanded one Colonel Hill and Lieut.-Col. Hamilton to put Glenco to death, and all the males of his line, not exceeding seventy; accordingly the old gentleman was inhumanly murdered in his bed, and most of the number most barbarously butchered in cold blood by the soldiers, who were peaceably quartered in those parts, at a time they least expected such a treatment, having all of them either taken the benefit of the immunity, or had protection in their pockets, which put them under the care and safeguard of their government. It was hard to imagine the Prince of Orange could apprehend danger from such a handful of people; but whether he thought this severity necessary to terrify others, or that he had some particular pique against that clan, was uncertain; but either of those reasons (the probable) was a sufficient motive, according to his morality, to do so inhuman a thing."

† It appears most certain that the most criminal party was Lord Breadalbane, who was well known to have had a long feud with Macdonald. Burnet says that he was anxious both to gratify his own revenge, and to render William odious to all the Highlanders; that he went up to London on purpose, and got the king to sign and intersign the barbarous order in a hurry.

restored. William changed many of the lords lieutenancies and magistracies in the counties, in favour of the Whigs, and put Whigs into most of the offices of government. Charles Montague (subsequently Viscount and Earl of Halifax), an ardent Whig, was soon afterwards made chancellor of the exchequer; Admiral Russell was restored to his place, in lieu of the three unlucky commanders; and Lord Shrewsbury was re-appointed secretary of state, Nottingham being now dismissed from that office. Still further to win over the Whig party, he, a few months after, made some very unusual promotions in the peerage, creating one marquess and five dukes. The marquess was Normanby, the dukes were Leeds, Bedford, Newcastle, Devonshire, and Shrewsbury. The Duke of Shrewsbury immediately attempted to bring his friend Marlborough into employment with him; but the king, without assigning any specific reason, told the duke that Marlborough was not a man to be trusted. Godolphin, however, the bosom friend of the general, who had gone as far as he had done in his intrigues with the exiled family, was admitted into the ministry.* But one of the most remarkable circumstances of the time was William's admitting into a considerable degree of favour and confidence the Earl of Sunderland, the obnoxious minister of James II., who, at the Revolution, had fled to the Continent.† It is said that Marlborough, when in office, prevailed upon the king to pardon and recall the ex-minister to England; and now that Sunderland was frequently consulted by William, he made use of his influence—but for some time in vain—in favour of Marlborough. It would require many pages to describe the intrigues and backslidings of the present cabinet; but, for our purpose, it will be enough to say that nearly every member of it was in the habit of communicating with the agents of the exiled family, particularly with one Lloyd, who went and came between St. Germain and St. James's with curious facility. It is believed, however, if not proved, that some of them were secretly authorised by William to continue this intercourse, in order to bewilder his enemies and to sound the bottom of the Jacobite plots.

Upon the pledges of support tendered by the restored Whigs, William ventured to reject proposals for peace which were offered by Louis XIV. in the course of this winter. The truth was, that France was falling rapidly into a miserable condition: her finances were exhausted—her population ground to the earth by taxation and sudden imposts; and, in consequence of a succession of bad harvests, famine threatened to depopulate the land. Through the respectable mediation of the neutral court of Denmark, Louis offered to restore the conquests he had made during the present war, to renounce his pretensions to the Low Countries, to agree that the Duke of Bavaria should have the Spanish Netherlands in case of the death of the King of Spain, and that the commercial arrangements of Europe should be put on their old footing. But no recognition was offered of the title of William to the English throne; the claimant, James, with his family, was still kept at our doors and treated as King of England; doubts were entertained of the sincerity of the French monarch—doubts justified by experience of his past conduct; the weakness and dependency of France was known; and William, with the almost unanimous assent of his allies, rejected the overtures and resolved to continue the war, hoping to obtain still better conditions, and to humble the pride of that monarchy which had insulted nearly every nation in Europe. The conduct of William in this great matter has been made the subject of boundless censure; but, in spite of occasional grumbings at taxes, the English people shared largely in the spirit which dictated it, and the English parliament did not raise a single complaint at the time.

To this parliament, which met on the 7th of November, the king was unusually frank. He did not attempt to conceal the losses he had sustained by land and sea, but spoke them out fairly, inferring "the necessity of increasing the forces the next year, as essential to the honour and security of the kingdom." The Commons unanimously voted "that they would support their majesties and the government, and grant a sufficient supply for the vigorous prosecution of the war;" and, without much delay, it was carried that the land forces should be raised to 83,000, exclusive of officers, and that the navy should be 40,000. Both Houses, however, made inquiries into the causes of the late miscarriages by sea; and the Commons voted "that there had been a notorious and treacherous mismanagement." In the course of the inquiry, Lord Falkland, who had been for some time at the head of the Admiralty, was censured and dismissed; and, after a short interval, the dubious Admiral Russell was put at the head of that board, with a considerable extension of powers.

The articles of Limerick were far too generous, humane, and enlightened to be acted upon in that age: though approved of by the king, they had given mortal offence to Protestant intolerance and cupidity; and the men to whom William had entrusted the government of Ireland had, partly through choice and partly through necessity—being driven on by the Irish Protestants and English and Scottish settlers—departed widely from the spirit of those articles; and, in other matters to

* Godolphin, who had been brought up at court, and had been one of the chief counsellors of Charles II., and one of the lords of the treasury in the reign of James, had been appointed to a seat at the treasury board when William first came over: "for," says Tindal, "as he understood the treasury business well, so his calm and cold way suited the king's temper."

† Under date of this year (1693), Burnet says: "But the person that had the king's confidence to the highest degree, was the Earl of Sunderland; who, by his long experience and his knowledge of men and things, had gained an ascendancy over him, and had more credit with him than any Englishman ever had." Yet, to use a familiar expression, William never trusted Sunderland farther than he could see him; nor did King James, who was actually in treaty with his fatal ex-minister, give him any more of his real confidence. The great recommendation of this extraordinary man was, that he convinced William that the Whigs, if taken into office, would carry on the continental war with vigour, whereas the Tories would inevitably force him into a dishonourable peace with France.

which that treaty did not extend, had rapaciously and tyrannically begun, or rather renewed, that pasha-like system of government which continued down to a very recent date. Lord Bellmont, a member of the privy council, proposed in the House of Commons an inquiry into the late mismanagement in Ireland, and exhibited articles of impeachment against Lord Coningsby and Sir Charles Porter, the lords justices there, who were charged with traitorously abusing their power and authority. At first the House seemed indignant at the offences charged and proved against them; but in the end a resolution passed, "That, considering the state of Ireland at the time, they did not think it fit to ground an impeachment upon them." And this guilty vote was followed by the dismissal of Lord Bellmont and the pardon of Coningsby and Porter.

A. D. 1694.—The year opened with fresh disasters and failures at sea, the sort of reverses which the English people bear with the least temper. Admiral Wheeler, who had gone to the Mediterranean to look after the returning Smyrna fleet, was surprised, in the month of February, when near the Straits, by one of the most terrible of tempests: he was sunk in the Sussex with all his men, and two other line-of-battle ships, three men-of-war of inferior rate, and many trading vessels went to the bottom. This was the work of the elements: what follows was the result of treachery. William had once more resolved to destroy the arsenals, docks, and shipping at Brest, by making a lodgment on the narrow neck of land which separates Brest roads from the roadstead of Cameret, and commands the bay and the harbour; but his intention was betrayed to King James, early in the spring, by Marlborough's bosom friend, the Lord Godolphin, now first lord of the treasury, and subsequently by Marlborough himself, in a letter dated the 2nd of May. "This," said Marlborough, "would be a great advantage to England; but no advantage can prevent, or ever shall prevent, me from informing you of all that I believe to be for your service. Therefore you may make your own use of this intelligence." This letter was enclosed in another from Colonel Sackville to my Lord Melfort, James's precious secretary; and Sackville said, "I send by an express, judging it to be of the utmost consequence for the service of the king my master, and consequently for the service of his most Christian Majesty."⁶ It is argued by some that, though held of such importance, Marlborough's letter was of little use to James or the French, as the preparations making in our ports sufficiently betrayed the intention of some such attack;* but if this reason be correct, it will hardly excuse the conduct of the low-minded hero of Blenheim; and there is, besides, evidence of ministerial treachery in the slowness with which our preparations were made, and in the insufficiency of the force embarked.† It was the first week in June before everything was ready, and then, apparently by a private arrangement between William and Russell, the command of the fleet, which consisted of about thirty ships of the line, was transferred to Lord Berkeley, who was accompanied by General Tollenmache with about 6000 land troops. These commanders appeared off Brest on the 7th of June; but the genius and activity of the great engineer, Vauban, had, in the course of a few weeks, put that place and its environs into a most formidable attitude of defence; and he had written to his master, Louis, that there was no ground for apprehension—that he had made all the passages under the castle bomb-proof—disposed 90 mortars and 300 cannon in proper places—drawn up all the ships out of the enemy's reach—and collected 300 bombardiers, 300 gentlemen volunteers, and 4000 regular troops, besides a regiment of dragoons just arrived. When the English fleet drew near, they found the shore lined with entrenchments and batteries, with cavalry drawn up in regular order behind them, and, when they advanced still nearer, three masked batteries, which till then had been effectually concealed, opened upon them with a tremendous fire. Tollenmache, who was making ready to land, was confounded, but he exclaimed, "The die is cast—we cannot in honour retreat!" About 900 English soldiers were thrown upon the beach in Cameret Bay, flanked right and left with batteries and entrenchments; and the Marquess of Caermarthen, Danby's son, fighting bravely for the country which his father was betraying,‡ covered the landing of these men with a part of the fleet, his ships all the while being exposed to a heavy cross-fire. The men that were landed were assailed on all sides, but they formed, and, perceiving that the French were slackening their fire, they gave a loud huzza and rushed towards the batteries; but at that moment French dragoons were seen issuing through passages purposely left between the entrenchments. The unprotected English foot halted, wavered, and were soon thrown into complete disorder by the charge of the French horse. Meanwhile the tide had ebbed, and half of the English boats had been left dry on the beach. Unable to get off, the greater part of the troops that had landed were miserably slaughtered, or forced to beg for quarter; and General Tolle-mache, after displaying more valour than conduct, received a mortal wound. With this loss, and with the additional loss of about 400 seamen and one ship, the English armament, with a drooping flag, retired from Brest. It is said that Tollemache, who survived a few days, complained in his dying moments that he had been betrayed by his own countrymen. And yet this general himself had been engaged deeply with the friends of King James; and, speaking generally, it is most difficult to discover who were faithful and who not, for the man who was loyal one week would be a traitor the next, and the traitor of to-day would probably be a patriot on the morrow.

Soon after the melancholy failure at Brest, the fleet under Berkeley bombarded and nearly destroyed Dieppe and Havre de Grace, destroyed all the unprotected French shipping and fishing-boats, augmented the want and misery already felt by the poor French people, and threw the whole coast into an agony of consternation. This was called a proper retaliation for the barbarous excesses committed by the French the preceding year at Heidelberg and in other parts of the Palatinate. But in the course of the summer another part of the English navy performed more honourable service. Admiral Russell, now apparently steady and trusty, sailed into the Mediterranean with a noble fleet, consisting of about sixty-five ships of the line, English and Dutch, and not only cleared that sea of de Tourville and the French, but relieved Barcelona, blockaded Toulon, imposed respect upon the states of Venice and Tuscany, which were now, for the first time, brought to acknowledge William's title, reanimated the Duke of Savoy, who had been wavering and thinking of a separate peace with France, and made the English flag respected from one end of the inland sea to the other. And when Russell had performed these signal services, instead of coming home, he wintered with his fleet at Cadiz, in order to be at hand to prevent the annual junction of the Toulon and Brest fleets. From this moment the maritime trade of England, which had been declining ever since the Revolution, began to revive, and a new and unthought of spirit was infused into it in the course of a very few years.

The land campaign was far from being so brilliant. William, who had left London at the end of April, again concentrated the allied forces at Louvain, and found himself at the head of nearly a hundred thousand men, well trained and provided. Luxembourg, who was inferior in number, made use of his old art of avoiding battle. After sundry marches and counter-marches, when Luxembourg seemed moving upon Maestricht, which was known to be strong enough to defy him, William detached the Elector of Bavaria to invade French Flanders. The movement was ably planned; but the slow German was no match for the rapid Luxembourg, who wheeled about, and, by an astonishing forced march, covered the threatened territory. The confederates were then fain to satisfy themselves with the capture of the town and castle of Huy; and so the campaign in those parts ended, and the troops separating, going to the annual indulgence of winter quarters about the middle of October. Upon the Rhine the French were much more severely chastised; for, when Marshal Delorges, the brutal destroyer of Heidelberg, crossed that river, he was again driven back with loss and shame by the Prince of Baden, who followed him across the French frontier, established himself for the summer in Alsace, and laid the whole of that province under contribution. On the side of Savoy and Piedmont little or nothing had been done for a reason already mentioned—that is, the indecision and tampering of the Duke of Savoy; but Lord Galway, a brave officer, had been sent thither to succeed Schomberg in the command of the British contingent. In Spain, where the French had reduced Castel Follet with other strong fortresses, and had promised themselves the entire possession of Catalonia, Marshal Noailles, utterly disconcerted by the appearance of Admiral Russell and the relief of Barcelona, retreated, and did nothing. The Turks, who had performed the part of valuable allies to the French, by invading the hereditary dominions of the emperor, had been very unsuccessful the whole of this year, and, at the end of the campaign, of all their fortresses on the north of the Danube, none remained to them except Temeswar.

It was the 9th of November before William landed at Margate, where he was met by Queen Mary, whose life had been one continued anxiety during his absence—a wearing state of mind which shortened her days. On their road to the capital, and on their entrance there they were received with acclamations. Three days after, William met his parliament. His speech was short, modest, and simple in the extreme. "I am glad," said he, "to meet you here when I can say our affairs are in a better posture, both by sea and land, than when we parted last. The enemy has not been in a condition to oppose our fleet in these seas; and our sending so great a force into the Mediterranean has disappointed their designs, and leaves us a prospect of further success. With respect to the war by land, I think I may say that this year a stop has been put to the progress of the French arms." Loyal addresses were returned, and supplies to the amount of five millions were readily voted, but with the supply bills the triennial parliament bill kept pace. On the 22nd of November that bill was brought in by Mr. Harley, who was now rising into eminence as a parliamentary debater: it passed the House by a great majority, was sent up to the Lords, who concurred without any amendment; and on the 22nd of December it was presented to William, who now gave the royal assent. He probably felt the constitutional impropriety of longer resisting the two Houses and the popular desire, but his consent was attributed by many to the dangerous illness of the queen, whose death it was imagined might weaken his right, and lead to fresh and more dangerous conspiracies.* This act, by which a new parliament was to be called every third year, and the present parliament to be dissolved before the 25th of March, 1696, was received by the nation with very great joy. Six days after it became law Queen Mary breathed her last. Her constitution, which had never been a good one, was weakened by much mental suffering,† and in this state she was attacked by small-pox of the most malignant sort. As soon as she was aware of her danger she shut herself up in a closet for many hours, burning a great heap of papers, and sorting others to be preserved. The new Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Temison, who had succeeded Tillotson only a few days before, had much private discourse with her, and she was calm and resigned, seeming to desire death rather than life. "She had formerly," says Burnet, who was constantly about the court, and who waited upon her in her sickness, "written her mind, in many particulars, for the king: and she gave order to look carefully for a small escutroire that she made use of, and to deliver it to the king, and, having dispatched that, she avoided the giving herself or him the tenderness which a final parting might have raised in them both. She was almost perpetually in prayer. The day before she died she received the sacrament, all the bishops, who were attending, being admitted to receive it with her. We were, God knows, a sorrowful company; for we were losing her who was our chief hope and glory on earth." After lying silent for some hours, or only uttering a few disjointed words, she expired on the 28th of December, about one o'clock in the morning, in the thirty-third year of her age.‡ Whatever was Mary's character and conduct as a daughter and a sister—even in her dying moments she refused to be reconciled with Anne*—she was certainly the most devoted and exemplary of royal wives. She had, indeed, the good sense and the good fortune to submit to and reverse the commanding intellect of her husband; and she tenderly loved his person, though she was childless by him, and though, in accordance with the universal practice of sovereigns, he kept a mistress in the court. And William responded to all this tenderness with a feeling which had been deemed alien to his cold manners. During her illness he called Burnet into his closet, and gave a free vent to a most tender passion. "He burst out into tears, and cried out that there was no hope, and that, from being the happiest, he was now going to be the miserablest creature upon earth. He said, during the whole course of their marriage he had never known one single fault in her; there was a worth in her which nobody knew besides himself. . . . The king's affliction for her death was as great as it was just; it was greater than those who knew him best thought his temper capable of: he went beyond all bounds in it: during her sickness he was in an agony that amazed us all, fainting often, for both Houses, to sit in form while the archbishop preached the funeral sermon. This could never happen before, since the sovereign's death had always dissolved our parliaments."—Burnet, Own Time.

* This is the account most generally received, but it is said by some that Mary, from her death-bed, sent a forgiving message to Anne—a circumstance, however, which is not mentioned by Burnet. The Duchess of Marlborough, whose word is not to be taken implicitly, says, "that at the time the princess fancied herself envenomed, and was lying constantly upon a couch; yet that as soon as she heard the news of the queen's dangerous condition she sent a lady of her low chamber to present her humble duty to her, and to desire that her majesty would believe she was extremely concerned for her illness: adding that, if her majesty would allow her the happiness of waiting on her, she would, notwithstanding the condition she was in run any hazard for that satisfaction."

† Burnet, whose partiality was for Mary rather than for William, says, "He came, on the second day of her illness, and passed the night in frequent exclamations, which if he had not done that day, it is very probable he would never have passed it."

‡ The letters published by Dalrymple in his Appendix, from Queen Mary to the king, during his frequent absences and dangers in Ireland and on the Continent, sufficiently prove her consuming anxieties and her fond and passionate devotedness to her husband. They also show, in a most striking light, the treachery and difficulties with which she was surrounded when the administration of government during those long absences was left in her hands, and how entirely she depended upon the better judgment of her husband. In one of these letters, which were found carefully treasured in King William's cabinet at Kensington, she says, "I pray God send you back quickly, for I see all breaking out into flames." And she regrets that, busy as she is, and with prying eyes constantly fixed upon her, she has not time to weep, which would a little ease her heart. "But," she says, "do but continue to love me, and I can bear all things else." On one occasion she tells her husband that Lord Lincoln has assured her "that the lord president and all in general who are in trust are rogues;" on another, she says that Lord Monmouth, formerly Lord Mordaunt, that eccentric nobleman, best known by his last title of Lord Peterborough, the friend of Pope, in a conversation with her, had told her that whatever was said in her cabinet council one day was written to France the next. And nobody could speak with more certainty to this fact than my Lord Monmouth, who was himself the writer of many of the lemon-juice letters to the courts of Versailles and St. Germain. When William was about to cross the Shannon, Mary writes—"This passage of the river runs much in my mind, and gives me no quiet night or day I have a million of fears. . . . I pray God give me patience and submission; I want the first exceedingly, but I, hope all is well, especially your dear self, who I love much better than life." Some of these letters are scarcely to be read without tears.

§ The queen was buried with the ordinary ceremony, and with one piece of magnificence that could never happen before; for both Houses of Parliament went in procession before the chariot that carried her body to Westminster Abbey; where places were prepared as it was thought necessary to see, as possible, it was hoped she would defer her visit. "This civil answer," continues the duchess, "and my Lady Derby's postscript, made me conclude, more than if the college of physicians had told it me, that the disease was mortal. And as I knew that several people, and even one of the princess's own family, were allowed to see the queen, I was also fully persuaded that the deferring the princess's coming was only to leave room for the continuing the quarrel in case the queen should chance to recover, or for reconciliation with the king (if that should be thought convenient), in case of the queen's death. During all the time of the queen's illness to her decease, the princess sent every day to inquire how she did; and once, I am sure, her majesty heard of it; because my Lord Fishland, who was charged with the message, and who had more desire than ordinary to see the queen, broke in, whether they would or would not, and delivered it to her, endeavouring long to express in how much concern the princess was; to which the queen returned no answer but a cold thanks. Nor, though she received the sacrament in her illness, did she ever send the least message to the princess, except that in my Lady Derby's letter, which perhaps her majesty knew nothing of. How this conduct to a sister could suit with the character of a devout queen, I am at a loss to know."—An Account of the Conduct, &c.

The half Jacobite Evelyn, who gave so unfavourable an account of Mary on her arrival at Whitehall, thus speaks of her at her death:—"I supped at the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry's, who related to me the pious behaviour of the queen in all her sickness, which was admirable. She never inquired of what opinion persons were who were objects of charity; that, on opening a cabinet, a paper was found, wherein she had desired that her body might not be opened, or any extraordinary expense at her funeral, whenever she should die. This paper was not found in time to be observed. There were other excellent things under her own hand, to the very least of her debts, which were very small, and everything in that exact method as seldom is found in any private person. In sum, she was such an admirable woman, abating for taking the crown without a more due apology, as does, if possible, outdo the renowned Queen Elizabeth."

and breaking out into most violent lamentations : when she died, his spirits sunk so low, that there was great reason to apprehend that he was following her ; for some weeks after he was so little master of himself, that he was not capable of minding business, or of seeing company."

Although the Jacobites had always held that there was no right anywhere except in King James and the infant Prince of Wales, and that neither the nation, the parliament, nor any power whatever, could bestow a right, or change, under any circumstances, the order of succession to the crown ; they now pretended that Mary had had a right by her birth, and that William's share in that right was made void by her death : and many who were not decided Jacobites, but who hated the king, and longed for the chances of another change, took up the same opinion, representing that, by the act of settlement, the Princess Anne had a preferable claim to the throne. The Earl of Rochester, maternal uncle to both princesses, tried to raise a doubt as to the legality of the continuance of the present parliament, arguing that, since it was surmised in the joint names of William and Mary, so, upon her death, the writ that ran in her name must die with her. This would have been attended at that season with fatal consequences ; but the act which put the administration entirely in the king, and only gave the queen a share in the sovereign titles and dignity, made this cavil appear to be ill-grounded, and nobody was ready in the Houses to second so dangerous a suggestion. Rochester, who drank as much as ever, and who was as much as ever a head of the high church party, studied all he could to embroil affairs ; but his former colleague, Sunderland, took a different view of his own interests, and, having, by wonderful art and address, acquired an equal influence over the Princess Anne and King William, who had both hated him, and represented him as the most treacherous of men, effected a reconciliation by inducing the princess to write a letter of condolence and regard to the king. " It is my earnest desire," said Anne, " that your majesty would give me leave to wait upon you, as soon as it can be without inconvenience to you, and without danger of increasing your affliction."* The letter suggested by Sunderland, and no doubt dictated by him and the Marlboroughs, was delivered, and then the Lord Keeper Somers, acting from higher and purer motives, stepped in to complete the family reconciliation. Somers found the king sitting at the end of his closet in Kensington Palace, in an agony of grief, and so absorbed in it, or in mournful reflection, that he took no notice of the intrusion till the lord-keeper broke silence by proposing to put an end to those unhappy differences which he had so long deplored, and which might now produce, by factious means, the most lamentable consequences. The king replied instantly, " My lord, do what you will ; I can think of no business!" By the agency of Somers an interview was arranged, in which William received the princess with cordiality, appropriated the palace of St. James's for her future residence, and gave her the whole or part of her deceased sister's jewels.* The Marlboroughs, in forwarding the reconciliation, had expected to be partakers of its good fruits ; but the rational repugnance of William continued, and the general renewed his intercourse with the exiled family, and regularly attended in the House of Peers, where he voted with Rochester and the other zealous Tories, and put his name to their addresses and violent protests.

A. D. 1695.—Towards the end of the session, complaints made of some military men who did not pay their quarters at Royston, alleging that their own pay was in arrear, led to a searching inquiry into corrupt practices, which seem to have been universal through all the departments of government. It was proved, for example, that the Secretary of the Treasury had taken two hundred guineas for procuring or expediting the payment of arrears due to a regiment ; and that Sir John Trevor, the Speaker of the House of Commons, had accepted of one thousand guineas for passing through the House the Orphans' Bill. The Secretary of the Treasury was turned out of his place and sent to the Tower.† The punishment of Trevor was more dramatic : he was obliged, as Speaker, to put the question, " That Sir John Trevor, Speaker of this House, in receiving a gratuity of one thousand guineas from the city of London, after passing the Orphans' Bill, is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor."‡ The question was carried : he was expelled by the unanimous voice of the House ; and Mr. Paul Foley, who had got great credit by his integrity or by his constantly complaining of the administration, was chosen in his stead. Mr. Hungerford, chairman of the committee on the Orphans' Bill, was also convicted of corruption and turned out of the House. But the inquiry, once begun, could not be made to stop here. One discovery made way for another : it was found, from the books of the East India Company, that there were entries of

* Letter from Mrs. Burnet to the Duchess of Marlborough, as cited by Coxe in his Life of the duke. Neither Mrs. Burnet nor the duchess, however, mentions the jewels. Her grace says, " But this and some other favours, granted her at Lord Sunderland's request, were only to save appearances, and for political views." After Anne's conduct towards the king and queen, and with his knowledge that she still continued her correspondence with the court at St. Germain, it was scarcely possible that William should have any great affection for her.

† According to Burnet, many were the more sharpened against Guy, the Secretary of the Treasury. " because it was believed that he, as well as Trevor, the Speaker, was deeply concerned in corrupting the members of the House of Commons : he had held his place both in King Charles and King James's time, and the share he had in the secret distribution of money had made him a necessary man for those methods."

‡ See the account of this affair by Roger North, as quoted in the last book, vol. III. p. 847. The Orphans' Bill, for forwarding which Trevor had accepted the bribe from the city of London, was a bill to provide means for the payment of interest upon a debt, amounting to between seven and eight hundred thousand pounds, due by the city to the Orphans' Fund—or, in other words, to the estates of the children, being minors, of deceased freemen, which, by a custom of the city, were managed by the chamberlain. Many attempts had been made to effect this arrangement ; but it is said to have been found impossible to carry the bill through the House of Commons till the support of the Speaker and of other influential members was purchased by the city.

great sums of money given by the Company for secret services done them in the House of Commons. In the year 1688 only 1284*l.* were entered to this account; in the two following years there appeared the sums of 2096*l.* and 3056*l.*; but in the last year, pending a life-and-death struggle between the old company and the promoters of a new one, the secret service money rose to the enormous amount of 167,000*l.* Sir Thomas Cook, a member of the House of Commons and governor of the Company, was called upon to explain how this money had been expended. Cook refused to answer, and was committed to the Tower. The Commons then brought in a Bill of Pains and Penalties, to force a full revelation. When this bill was carried up to the Lords it was vehemently opposed by the Duke of Leeds (Danby), then lord president of the council, who spoke like an incorruptible patriot, but who had himself touched no inconsiderable part of the money. His very heat made him the more suspected; and the bill ultimately passed the Lords, with a clause indemnifying Cook from the consequences of any offence committed by him in distributing the bribes; and thereupon Cook delivered in writing a statement of the various sums which he had paid to various members of the House of Commons and others. To Sir Basil Firebrace was set down the sum of 40,000*l.* Firebrace, being called to account by the House, fell into great confusion and loss of memory—said that he had done the Company service by solicitations, but knew not of any money or stock given to any person whatsoever for procuring a new charter—complained of illness, and begged that the examination might be postponed. Great efforts were made by the guilty and powerful parties to quash the evidence: Cook seemed disposed to evade some of the questions, but a threat of repealing his indemnity act made him more communicative; and Firebrace could no longer hang fire. When re-examined, this oblivious gentleman recollected that he had had a treaty with Mr. Bates, a great friend of my lord president, the Duke of Leeds—that he had given Mr. Bates two notes for 5500 guineas—that Bates had waited upon several great lords, particularly the lord president, who, after the notes were given, was found well disposed to the renewal of the charter—and, finally, that about a week ago, when the storm was brewing, Bates desired to return 5000 guineas (keeping the remaining 500 to himself), because the affair might make a noise.* Bates was then summoned, and, being terrified by the House, he deposed, with little hesitation, that Sir Basil Firebrace had applied to him for his interest; that he did accordingly wait upon the lord president, who promised to do what he could for the Company, agreeably to the opinion which he had expressed in public, that the charter ought to be renewed; that he told the lord president of the notes in question, and wanted to press them on him; that his grace refused them, but took counter-notes, making the payment dependent on the renewal of the charter; that when the charter was passed the money was lodged in the hands of M. Robart, a foreign domestic of the lord president, where it remained till he (Bates) had returned the bribe to Sir Basil, from fear of the noise that might be made about it. Not knowing how to avert the storm, my lord president, his Grace of Leeds, in his place in the House of Lords, avowed that he had received the money, but that he had returned it, as stated by Bates. He was still speaking, when he was warned that the Commons, in a fury, were proceeding to a vote of impeachment against him. He abruptly broke off, ran down to the Lower House, and desired to be heard in his own defence. The Commons granted the favour, and allowed him to be seated, with his hat on, within the bar. He relied on his cloquence; but his cause was so bad as to admit of no mending by rhetoric, and of no excuse or commiseration, except from men as mercenary as himself—but they were numerous in both Houses. Rising, with his hat off, he thanked the Commons for the favour they had granted him; but he soon left this modest tone, and boasted of all that he had done for the glorious Revolution of 1688. It was a bold word, he said, but a truth, that that House would not have been sitting at this time but for him: he had been formerly pursued for being in the French interest, but he hoped that all the actions of his life would justify him from such charges. It was true that Firebrace had been introduced to him, but he had not touched one penny of the money. He insinuated that there was a design against him, framed by his enemies who had got up the committee of the House; and he told them that, as to this business about the East India Company's charter, he knew more than they did, and could spin a thread finer still. He hoped that the House would proceed speedily to a fair trial, and prayed that he might not suffer upon a rack, or under a blast, till a parliament should sit again. The duke then withdrew; and the Commons, without losing time, resolved, that the committee should draw up articles of impeachment in due and regular form, and that Mr. Comptroller Wharton should immediately carry up the impeachment to the bar of the Lords. In a few days the articles were engrossed and presented to the Lords. But, in the mean time, M. Robart, the duke's domestic, had absconded, and the duke, knowing the evidence to be thus incomplete, pressed for a speedy trial, and moved, in the Peers, that, if the House of Commons should not reply to an answer which he had put in to the impeachment, proceedings might be discharged—complaining that the rights of all subjects were injured in his person, for that no man was safe if an imputation could be fixed upon his character

* Sir Basil Firebrace further stated that at first he had tried to do the Company's business for two or three thousand pounds; that Bates had replied that more than this had been offered by the opposite party; that at last he (Sir Basil) agreed to give 5000*l.*; and that, upon the representation of Bates that there would be nothing for his own reward, he added 500*l.* as a douceur to that go-between.

by hanging a lingering impeachment over his head, at a time when it was impossible for his enemies to prove his guilt, and equally impossible for him to disprove their charges, however conscientious of innocence. The Commons, confounded by the evasion of Robart, the essential witness, knew not what to do; but they gave in that evasion as the sole cause of their delay, not scrupling, of course, to intimate that the Duke of Leeds could produce his servant if he thought fit. His grace, who had played many parts in his time, now assumed the language of an honest man smarting under unwarrantable injuries, and accused the Commons of precipitation and malice. He told their lordships that, from a letter which M. Robart had left behind him, addressed to his lordship's chaplain, and from a particular knowledge he had both of the man and the thing, he would not be seen here again in a hurry. "And so," continued his grace, "if this man be insisted upon as a material evidence, and my trial is to be delayed till he is forthcoming, when am I likely to be tried?" And he again urged that the impeachment should drop, if not immediately followed up by the Commons. Matters were in this state, when William, on the 3rd of May, prorogued the parliament. "It was intended," says Burnet, "to hang up the matter to another session, but an Act of Grace came in at the end of this, with an exception, indeed, as to corruption; yet this whole discovery was let fall, and it was believed that too many of all sides were concerned in it; for, by a common consent, it was never revived." Enough had appeared to prove the Duke of Leeds guilty in the opinion of the whole world; yet William, for considerations of expediency, allowed him to remain at the head of the council, though, when he made his annual journey to the Continent, he did not appoint him one of the lords-justices of the kingdom, who constituted a sort of regency during his majesty's absence.

Six days after the prorogation of the English parliament the Scottish parliament assembled, it being impracticable to defer a session there any longer, as the funds voted by the Scots towards the maintenance of the army were exhausted, and the death of the queen called for caution and for some new arrangement.

The loud outcry raised on account of the massacre of Glenco still continued, and would have provoked a parliamentary inquiry had not William ordered a commission to be passed under the great seal for a pre-cognition, which is a practice in the law of Scotland of examining into crimes before the persons concerned are put upon their trial;—and this was regarded as an artifice to cover that dark transaction by a private inquiry, and was interpreted into a proof that William had authorised or even expressly ordered the massacre. When some members of the assembled parliament reproached the government for its slackness in examining into the affair, the Marquess of Tweeddale, who was now William's commissioner, assured them that, by the king's order, it was then under examination, and that a report upon it would be made to them. In the course of the examination made in the privy council and by means of agents, some of the Highlanders deposed that the Earl of Breadalbane, the originator of the schemes of pacification, while treating with them for their submitting to King William, had assured them that he still adhered to the interests of King James, and that all that he wanted by the specification was only to preserve the clans for his service till a more favourable opportunity. Upon these revelations the double-dealing Breadalbane was committed to Edinburgh Castle; but he maintained that he had secret orders from King William to say anything that would procure him credit with the Highlanders; and William seemed to own the fact by ordering a new pardon to be passed for the earl.* It is unquestionable that, in his almost unprecedented difficulties, William repeatedly had recourse to these arts, the practice of which makes it not unfrequently doubtful who were real traitors to him, and who were only pretended traitors, to do him service and frustrate the plans and plots of the Jacobites. It was found necessary to deliver in the report of the examination of the massacre in full parliament. By this report it appeared that a black design had been on foot at one time to cut off a great many more clans in the same fashion—that there were many letters written with great earnestness to this effect by ministers and others—and that, though the king's orders implied nothing of the sort, nor contained anything that was blameable, the secretary of state's letters went much farther. In the end, the Scottish parliament justified the king's instructions, but voted that the execution in Glenco was "a barbarous massacre," and that it was "pushed on by the secretary of state's letters beyond the king's orders." It was also carried by a great majority that an address should be presented to the king, praying that the secretary of state, and others concerned in that matter, might be proceeded against according to law, in order that the vindication might be national, as the reproach had been; but principally that they, from whom it was most proper, might testify to the world how clear his majesty's justice had been in the whole matter. As the secretary of state (Dalrymple, Master of Stair) had been allowed to go unscathed, it was judged that no proceedings could be taken against him; and, as the principal was thus protected, the inferior instruments were not much troubled by any course of law.* Hence, all who were enemies to William, proclaimed everywhere that he must have been willing that the massacre should be perpetrated; but his friends found an excuse in the vast obligations he owed to the family and interest of the Dalrymples, and in the great ability of those men, who were the most politic and best heads in Scotland, and most able to do him service there whenever the storm should be blown over. And, at the same time, no inconsiderable part of the Scottish Lowlanders who had been most exposed to the incursions and depredations of the wild Highlanders thought that no crime had been committed by extirpating "that sect of thieves;" and that the best security for their cattle, their goods, and their persons would be a repetition of the blood-letting at Glencoe upon the other clans whose lawless practices excluded them from the benefits of civilized law.

* But we are not to wonder at his escape; for it is said he was as subtle as a serpent, and as slippery as an eel; that he had no attachment of any kind but to his own interest; that he was not only Jacobite and Williamite by turns, but both at once; and that he played this double part with so much success in the Highland treaty, that he received the thanks of King James for having preserved his people, whom he could not succour, and was rewarded by King William for having reconciled to his government those desperadoes whom he found it so difficult to subdue." MS. character of Breadalbane quoted by Dalrymple.—But this character, caeteris paribus, may be applied with equal justice to many of the leading men both in England and Scot-land. There were several suits for "apprise and restitution of damages" instituted against Breadalbane, but it does not appear that the Highlanders had much success in the courts.—Lander of Fountainhall, Decisions.

It was during this session of the Scottish parliament that the scheme was presented of a Scottish company and colony on the Isthmus of Darien, which ended in a great amount of human suffering and in an increase of unpopularity to the king. The Scottish parliament in the year 1693 had passed an act for the encouragement of commerce, by which it was provided that letters patent should be granted to all such as should offer to set up new manufactures, establish new settlements, or drive any new trade; and, taking advantage of this act, some of the English interlopers in the East India trade, after being defeated by the Company, had entered into treaty with some merchants in Scotland, who now undertook to procure a special act for a new colony from their parliament. There was one Paterson, a man of no education, but of great notions, which, as was generally said, he had learned from the Buccaneers, who knew the New World and the islands of the Pacific better than any other class of men, and with whom it was believed he had associated for some time. Paterson made the Scotch merchants believe that he was in possession of a great secret—that he knew of a country where gold mines were rich and many, and where the Spaniards were not;—a country admirably situated for trade with other parts of the world. For some time he did not describe this happy land, but only desired that the West Indies might be named in any new act they proposed. Meanwhile an act was passed and received the royal assent, giving the undertakers most extensive privileges, with a limitation, however, that they should not interfere with the trade of England. Paterson then named his promised land. It was the Isthmus of Darien, which connects the two continents of America, and which the English buccaneers had made the scene of most extraordinary adventures during the reign of Charles II., when, among other exploits, Morgan had traversed it from ocean to ocean, and plundered and burnt the Spanish city of Panama. Paterson, who was perfectly right in his geography, considered that isthmus as a place where a good settlement might be made, or rather two settlements, for he proposed establishing a town and blockhouse on the side of the Atlantic, and another over against it in Panama Bay on the shores of the Pacific, from which conjointly a trade might be opened both with the West Indies and with the East, and means taken to keep the Spaniards in the neighbourhood of the isthmus in quiet if not in subjection. When the passing of this ill-considered act was known in London many more rich merchants entered into the scheme, and thus provoked more than ever the hostility of the East India Company. When all was ready, Paterson and his people, amounting in all to twelve hundred souls, set sail in fifty Scottish ships to famine and destruction, but with the confident hope of establishing a great colony and realizing enormous wealth. This, however, did not happen till four years after the passing the bill; but the Scots availed themselves of the large letter of the act in other directions, trenching, as it was said, both upon the Dutch and the English, and invading the commercial rights vested in older companies.

In Ireland the first session of a new parliament was held in the course of this year (1695), and the Protestant ascendancy was completely and tyrannically established under the administration of Lord Capel, now lord deputy, "who," says Burnet, "studied to render himself popular, and espoused the interests of the English against the Irish without any nice regard to justice or equity." But Capel was neither better nor worse than many who succeeded him, and who acted upon the one principle, that the only way to keep Ireland quiet was to coerce the natives, and degrade and persecute their religion. By a series of acts passed during this and the next reign by the English parliament, the great body of the Irish people were put into the chains of a new and complicated bondage. No Papist was allowed to keep a school or to teach any in private houses except the children of the family occupying that house; and, while this enactment prevented Papists from receiving education at home, another went to deprive them of that benefit abroad, for severe penalties were denounced against such as should go themselves or send others for education beyond sea in the Romish religion; and, on probable information given to a magistrate, such persons could be arrested and tried, not by a jury, but by justices at quarter-sessions, where the burden of disproving the charge was thrown upon the accused. As a matter of course, under the ascendancy system, magistrates, jury, justices, were all Protestants. Inter-marriages between Protestants and Papists, pos-

* The secretary, Dalrymple, Master of Stair, was, however, effectually driven from office. He became Viscount Stair, by the death of his father, in November this same year; was advanced to the rank of Earl of Stair in 1703; and died suddenly, in January, 1707, during the discussions on the Union, in which he had taken a warm part. It is his father, the first Viscount Stair, who is the author of the celebrated 'Institutions of the Law of Scotland'; of the 'Philosophia Nova Experimentalis'; and of the 'Vindication of the Divine Perfections'; which last appeared immediately before his death.

sessing any estate in Ireland, were forbidden; and the Protestant husband, or the Protestant wife, might at any time take the children from the Catholic parent to be educated in the Protestant faith. No Papist could be guardian to any child; but the Court of Chancery might appoint some relation or other person to bring up the ward in the reformed faith. If the eldest son was, or became, a Protestant, he might convert his father's estate in fee simple into a tenancy for life, and thus secure his own inheritance. If the children were all Papists, the father's lands were not to descend to the eldest son, but to be divided equally among them, by gavel-kind law,—an admirable instrument for reducing an aristocracy or a body of great landholders to the condition of potato-farmers. Papists could not purchase land except for terms not exceeding thirty-one years. They were bound to conform, within six months after any title should accrue by descent, devise, or settlement, on pain of forfeiture to the next Protestant heir; a provision, says Mr. Hallam, which seems intended to exclude them from real property altogether. No Papist was permitted to keep arms, and search might be made at any time by two justices. The celebration of mass and other Catholic rites was not subjected to any new penalties; but all regular Popish priests, bishops, and others claiming spiritual jurisdiction, and all who should come to the kingdom of Ireland from foreign parts, were ordered to be banished, and were to be held guilty of high treason if they returned from their banishment. To prevent the evasion of these barbarous and maddening regulations, all priests were bound to be registered, and were forbidden to leave their own parishes, in which they were to be fixed like paupers by the old poor-laws; and informers, always ready and numerous enough upon the mere motives of religious intolerance and personal enmities, were further tempted into the field by large rewards, to be levied on the Papists, and to be given to those who should detect the violation of these statutes. Let the Irish Protestant party, who disgraced a great name by calling themselves Orangists, equivocate and colour the matter as they will, there is as much truth as generous warmth of feeling in the words with which an eminent living historian concludes his account of these detestable enactments:—"To have exterminated the Catholics by the sword, or expelled them, like the Moriscoes of Spain, would have been little more repugnant to justice and humanity, but incomparably more politic."*

On the 12th of May William embarked to put himself again at the head of the allied army. One great event which contributed to hasten the decline of the power of Louis XIV. was the death of the Marshal Duke of Luxembourg, one of the greatest generals of that age, who died at the beginning of this year. The other great generals of France, and Seignelai, the son of Colbert, who had called the French navy into existence, and Louvois, the greatest of her statesmen, were all dead already; there were none that promised to supply their places; Barbessieux, the new minister, a creature of courts and saloons, promoted by court intrigues and the influence of mistresses, was wholly incapable of contending with the difficulties in which even his great predecessor had left the country; and if to this we add that the oppressed people in many parts of France were absolutely perishing with hunger, the reader will understand that the French army in Flanders, badly supplied with provisions and recruits, and commanded by a third-rate general, Boufflers, or Villeroy, was in no condition to repair the check it had received in the last campaign. William, who saw the difference in every move he made, and in every movement of his enemies, detached Ginckel, now Earl of Athlone, with a great force to invest the important city of Namur, which had been taken by the French in the year 1692. Old Ginckel did his best, but, from the nature of the ground and the vast extent of his lines, he could not prevent Boufflers from throwing himself into the place with a strong reinforcement. The garrison then amounted to 14,000 or 15,000 men, and, as Vauban had been employed upon the works, the French deemed Namur impregnable. But William, having put his army in a good position, left it under the command of the Prince of Vaudemont; and at the head of a division joined the Elector of Bavaria, and then, uniting with Ginckel, took the command of all the forces before Namur. Vaudemont committed a great blunder in moving from his position, with the view of preventing Villeroy from marching to the relief of Namur; but Villeroy had not ability enough to profit by the advantage, and Vaudemont retrieved his error by making an admirable retreat to the walls of Ghent. In the mean while the siege of Namur was prosecuted with vigour under the eye of William and the direction of the great engineer Coehorn. The king, though a valetudinarian, shared in the fatigues as well as in the dangers of the common soldiery. On the 27th of July, at the storming of the first countercarp, Mr. Godfrey, deputy governor of the Bank of England, who had come over to speak with the king upon some financial business, but who ventured where he was not wanted, was killed with several other persons close by William's side.* For a time the English troops under Major-General Ramsay and Brigadier Hamilton were left alone in the midst of mines and booths on the glacis, and they were three several times repulsed, yet still returned to the charge, and at last made themselves masters of the countercarp. During the stern contest William laid his hand on the elector's shoulder, and exclaimed, "See my brave English! see my brave English!" The Dutch, advancing along the Maese, came up in time to secure the advantage which the English had gained; and on the same day the Elector of Bavaria threw a bridge over the Sambre, while other corps of the allies drove the French from the suburb of Jamb, and effectually prevented any more sallies. On the 29th, when the town-moat was drained by undermining and blowing up the dam which kept it full, a council of war was held in the allied camp, and it was there resolved to make a simultaneous attack on every side, notwithstanding a doubt of its success expressed by the cautious Coehorn. And, as soon as it was dark, all the corps ordered on this desperate service advanced as near to the enemy's intrenchments as they could without being discovered, and there rested on their arms till peep of day. Then they put themselves in motion and began the attack at three several points at the same instant, and, after a terrible slaughter on both sides, made themselves masters of all the outworks on the castle side from the Sambre to the Maese. At the same moment a mine was sprung on the town side, and the breach kept clear by a well-directed fire. On the morrow, the 1st of August, the breach was enlarged, and, on the 2nd, two hundred English grenadiers, supported by a battalion of Dutch, forced the breach, stormed and carried the half-moon, the covered way, and the demi-bastion at St. Nicholas gate. By this time the besieged lay open on all sides to the fire of the besiegers, who pointed their own guns against them, and kept up an incessant play with cannons, mortars, small arms, and grenades. On the following morning, as the allies were preparing for a general assault on the town, M. de Guiscard, the governor of the town, hung out a white flag, and soon capitulated for the surrender of the town, but no more with the Elector of Bavaria, who at first refused to treat for anything less than the whole. De Guiscard, with the remnant of his forces and with his sick and wounded, retired into the castle, which still held out with six or seven thousand men in it, under Boufflers. The loss of the French had been terrific, but the confederates, as assailants, had suffered far more severely. On the 7th, towards evening, the batteries were opened against the castle. In the mean while Villeroy had passed the Lys and the Scheldt, and advanced to Ninove; and the Prince of Vaudemont had decamped from Ghent and taken post at Dighen, in order to watch the French, who still gave out that they were going to the relief of Namur. But it was discovered that Villeroy's real intention was to bombard the city of Brussels. To prevent this calamity Vaudemont proposed occupying the plain of Gigot and St. Pec, and asked for considerable reinforcements from the main body of the army. But William, on the first news of Villeroy's movement, had de-

* According to a note in Ralph, "tradition also adds that a short parley had just before passed between them, to the following effect:—

"King.—As you are no adventurer in the trade of war, Mr. Godfrey, I think you should not expose yourself to the hazards of it.

"Mr. Godfrey.—Not being more exposed than your majesty, should I be excusable if I showed more concern?

"King.—Yes; I am in my duty, and therefore have a more reasonable claim to preservation."

tached the Earl of Athlone and the Count of Nassau, with thirty battalions and forty squadrons of horse, to post themselves between Waterloo and Gemappe, in order to oppose the enemy's passage at Braine le Chateau; and he soon followed in person with twenty squadrons more: so that nothing remained for Vaudemont to do but to encamp his infantry on the heights near Brussels between Montzey and the counterscarp of Ixel, where the communication was opened between his forces and those of Athlone and Nassau, who now covered part of that ground which in our own days has been the scene of a far more memorable warfare. By these manœuvres the allies were also enabled to throw several battalions into Brussels and its outworks; but they could not prevent Villeroy from taking ground proper to the purpose of the revengeful commission with which he was charged by his sovereign, who had felt most acutely the insults offered to his own coasts by the English fleet, who were this year repeating their bombardments of the French sea-ports. The marshal took up his quarters at Auderleck, and dispatched a letter to the governor of Brussels, signifying "that the Prince of Orange having sent his fleet upon the coast of France to bombard and ruin the sea-ports, without any prospect of advantage to himself, the king his master thought he could no otherwise put a stop to such disorders than by making reprisals. That for this reason he had sent his commands to bombard Brussels; and at the same time to declare that it was with reluctance his majesty was constrained to make use of this expedient: as also, that as soon as he should be assured his sea-ports would be no more bombarded, he would bombard the towns of his enemies no more, with the exception of such places as should be regularly besieged. That his majesty's concern was so much the greater because the Electress of Bavaria was residing in Brussels; but that, if the governor would make known in what quarter her electoral highness resided, care should be taken that the French mortars should not be directed that way." By this time the Elector of Bavaria himself had come up to the threatened city, and he replied to Villeroy's letter, that the reason assigned for his orders to bombard Brussels solely regarded the king of England; that his electoral highness would acquaint him with it, and procure an answer in twenty-four hours; and that as to the consideration which his most Christian majesty had shown to the electress, he begged to say that her residence was at the royal palace. But Villeroy, whose real purpose was to create a misunderstanding between William and his allies, or to induce those whose towns were liable to similar visitations to oblige the king of England to spare the French ports, instantly began to arrange his batteries; and as soon as they were ready he opened his fire upon that fine old city with twenty-five mortar pieces and eighteen pieces of heavy artillery. This scene of destruction commenced between six and seven o'clock on the evening of the 13th of August, and lasted without intermission till the afternoon of the 15th, during which time fifteen hundred houses, six churches, and many other public buildings were laid in ruins: There was a strong wind, which spread the flames on some buildings that took fire; and, but for the knocking down of many of the houses to cut off the communication, nearly the whole of the city must have been destroyed. King William had returned to the siege of the castle of Namur on the 12th; but the Prince of Vaudemont, from his fortified eminence, witnessed this vindictive act without daring to attempt to interrupt it, nor could Athlone and the troops at Waterloo do more than the prince. As soon as Villeroy had executed his commission, he decamped and made by forced marches for Enghien, where he remained till the 20th, and then, evacuating various towns which the French had taken in this or the preceding campaign, he advanced to Soignies, almost in sight of the grand army under William. But he was watched by the Prince of Vaudemont, who, having joined Athlone at Waterloo, advanced to Gemappe, and then to Mazey, a strong camp within two short leagues of the main army, where he was joined by the Hessians and Launburghers. On the night of the 12th, when William had returned to the siege of the castle of Namur, trenches were opened, approaches were made, and for three successive days a terrible fire was kept up. Boufflers, who had been told that no French marshal had ever surrendered, conceived a desperate design to break through the confederate camp with his cavalry, and so escape to Villeroy; but his movements were anticipated by William, who took precautions which rendered the plan utterly hopeless. On the 21st, one hundred and sixty-six cannon and sixty mortars assailed the castle, "and, as if the besiegers had designed to level the walls like those of Jericho, with one blast, the dreadful business of the day was opened with one general discharge from all these batteries at the same instant, with such an effect, that not only the whole circumference of the castle, but the very hill it stood on, seemed to reel with the shock, and to be lost in the cloud of smoke and dust that followed it. Scarce could the besiegers themselves sustain the horror of their own experiment; and, as to the besieged, their consternation and confusion were inexpressible: those that escaped could scarce believe they had escaped: every object round about them wore a face of ruin; for, bursting bombs, fractured battlements, dying men, and horses staking themselves on the palisades, or plunging headlong into the ditches, in a fit of ungovernable frenzy, were the only objects they were surrounded with.*" At this desperate juncture, Villeroy having sent off his baggage to Mons, advanced with his army to Soignies, announcing his approach in the night by a discharge of ninety cannon, which was answered by the besieged with a great light thrown up from the battlements. When day dawned he was discovered near the allied army, with his right wing resting upon Fleurus, and his left upon Sombref. He had been reinforced from various quarters, and on the next day (the 27th) he was joined by troops from the Rhine and other forces under the Marquis d'Arcourt. William, who had received ten fresh battalions and twenty-two squadrons, left the Elector of Bavaria to look after the castle, and placed his troops in position, expecting a general engagement. On the morrow Villeroy removed to Gemblours, and on the 29th drew up his forces and advanced in order of battle; but he was deterred by the sight which a close approach afforded him, and, instead of fighting, stood gazing on the allied army till nightfall, when, with as little noise as possible, he edged off, and, coasting the river Maligne, he extended his right to Perwys, and his left to Boneffe. The king of England was on horseback from four in the morning till eight at night, neither refusing nor seeking battle. The reduction of Namur was his great object, and Villeroy had now with him an equal if not a superior force. On the next day Villeroy drew off altogether, and left the castle of Namur to its fate. On the very same day, after another terrific cannonading and a vain offer of conditions by the Earl of Portland to prevent further effusion of blood, a general assault was made by English, Spaniards, Bavarians, Dutch, and Brandenburgers—the foremost being the English under the brave Lord Cutts. These English went too fast, or the Spaniards and Bavarians, who were to follow them on other points, went too slow: the consequence was a dreadful slaughter of the English, who, however, rallied, forced the palisades sword in hand, and made a lodgment on the covered way. Then the Bavarians, the Spaniards, the Dutch, and the rest of the attacking parties made good their assault on the prodigious outworks of the castle, and kept their lodgment, which altogether was nearly an English mile in extent. But this advantage cost the besiegers two thousand lives, including several officers and a proportionate number of wounded, among whom were Lord Cutts, the Prince of Hesse Homburg, Count Horn, and many other persons of rank. The next day the French demanded a truce for this truce was on the point of expiring the Count de Guiscard appeared on the breach, and, desiring a parley with the Elector of Bavaria, offered to surrender Fort Cohorne. But the elector would hear of no capitulation except for the whole: preparations were made for a fresh assault upon the main body of the castle; and then Marshal Boufflers accepted terms of capitulation, which were signed on the following morning. Then all the outworks and forts were put into the hands of the allies, who signified their success by a triple discharge of all their artillery, and a running fire of musketry, three times repeated along their lines. Villeroy was near enough to hear the ominous sounds; but he presently passed the Sambre near Charleroi, and retreated with some precipitation. On the 5th of September 5538 Frenchmen—all that remained of 14,000—evacuated the castle, and marched off with the honours of war towards the French lines at Mons.

After the reduction of Namur the allies retired to winter-quarters, and William repaired to Loo, where he was complimented by all the ministers of the confederate princes and potentates. In other directions the campaign had been inactive and inglorious to the French. On the Rhine the Marshal Delorges had been again foiled by the Prince of Baden; in Italy the Duke of Savoy had recovered possession of the important fortress of Casale; in Spain they had been obliged to evacuate all their conquests in Catalonia beyond Gironne. But the Turks, the allies of his most Christian majesty, had again dashed across the Danube, and inflicted some severe blows upon the imperialists in Hungary. The English navy had continued masters of the sea; and Lord Berkeley, in conjunction with the Dutch squadron, had bombarded Dunkirque, Calais, and St. Malo, had totally destroyed the town of Grandeval, and had inflicted fresh miseries upon the suffering, half-starving population of the French coasts.

William returned to England on the 20th of October, and was received with enthusiastic acclamations. On his passage through London to Kensington the city was in an uproar, and he was hailed as a conqueror. But he came not to enjoy pomps and pageantries, or even quiet, which was far more desirable after the incessant fatigues which he had undergone, with a constitution that was always rather sickly than robust. On the very night of his arrival he held a council to debate the great question of dissolving the present parliament, which, by the Triennial Act so recently passed, might sit till Lady-day. "The happy state the nation was in," says Burnet, "put all men, except the merchants, in a good temper: none could be sure we should be in so good a state next year; so that now, probably, elections would fall on men who were well affected to the government. A parliament that saw itself in its last session might affect to be froward; the members, by such a behaviour, hoping to recommend themselves at the next election. Besides, if the same parliament had been continued, probably the inquiries into corruption would have been carried on, which might divert them from more pressing affairs and kindle greater heats; all which might be more decently dropped by a new parliament, than suffered to lie asleep by the old one." According to another authority, the chief reason, or one of the chief reasons, which induced William to dissolve the sitting parliament was the prosecution of the Duke of Leeds, "which in the whole course of it had made his majesty very uneasy. . . . Now, as, on the one hand, his majesty could never have sacrificed a minister, to whom he not only owed his match with the late queen, but who had likewise been the chief wheel on which the Revolution turned; so, on the other hand, there was no safer way to put a stop to an impeachment, which was still depending, than the calling a new parliament.* A proclamation was forthwith published dissolving the present parliament, and calling another, to be held at Westminster on the 22nd day of November.

During the preparations for the election, all parties had recourse to the pen and to the press, which, though not yet liberated by statute from its shackles, had been exceedingly free and active ever since the Revolution. According to an unseemly comparison made by a contemporary, "the press was as fruitful as the mud of Nilus was famed to be." The most remarkable of its products was a clever tract, written by Halifax, and entitled, "Some Cautions offered to the Consideration of Those who are to choose Members." It was written with all the power and wit and grace of that man, who, all things considered, was a better author than statesman, and more witty than frank or honest. These cautions to electors were in number twenty; but those which seemed most applicable to the circumstances of the times were the last six. The 14th was—"Not to choose practising lawyers, who had two duties to attend to which were often inconsistent and sometimes irreconcilable with each other; because they were used to argue on both sides the question indifferently for the same consideration, and had an eye to preferment as well as gain in all their doings." The 15th was directed against violent party men as being no longer free agents—as having liberty only for their motto, but being in reality greater slaves than anybody desired to make them, as having the public always in their mouths and self always at heart, &c. The 16th was as cutting as it was just: it warned the electors against the pretenders to exorbitant merit in the late Revolution, as men having no other merit to recommend them—as bringing in longer bills than ought to be allowed, and making larger claims than the nation could pay. The 17th hit the officers of the army, whom William had at first naturally and excusably introduced into the House of Commons: it described the military as being out of their element in the House—as being disqualified by their very habits and accoutrements (which were such as might authorise the peaceable part of the assembly to swear they went in fear of their lives) from appearing there; as being no longer their own men, and consequently unfit to protect the liberty of others; and as serving two masters, whose commands might be opposite and irreconcilable, if not ruinous to each other. The 18th and 19th put those who voted on their guard against pensioners and placemen; as being dependants on the crown, not free representatives of the people; as being more liable to vote according to their own interests than according to the interests of their country; as not having the aspect of freemen, if they had the virtue to be so; and as standing, according to equity, proscribed by the Self-denying Bill, which had passed the House of Commons, though it had not the good fortune to pass into a law. And the 20th caution was levelled against such as, for reasons best known to themselves, had thought fit to oppose the Triennial Bill. All these cautions were followed by a few striking words in which truth was more salient than the sarcasm:—"In the mean time, having told my opinion who ought not to be chosen, if I should be asked who ought to be, my answer must be, choose Englishmen. And when I have said that, to deal honestly, I will not undertake that they are easy to be found." This pamphlet was the last effort of the accomplished Halifax, who died before the meeting of the new parliament.

Burnet seems to attribute a journey which the king made at this moment to a desire of influencing the elections by courting that popularity of which he had hitherto been exceedingly careless. "The king," he says, "made a progress to the north, and stayed some days at the Earl of Sunderland's, which was the first public mark of the high favour he was in. The king studied to constrain himself to a little more openness and affability than was natural to him: but his cold and dry way had too deep a root, not to return too oft upon him." And we learn from other quarters that the English gentry were again offended at this dry, cold manner, and that he was offended by one university and gave offence to the other;* and it was represented, no doubt with some exaggeration, that the only place where he was affable and courteous was at Althorp, the seat of the exceedingly unpopular Sunderland.† Notwithstanding these circumstances, the friends of James gained no ground in the elections. "The Jacobites," says Burnet, "were so decried that few of them were elected; but many of the sourer sort of Whigs, who were much alienated from the king, were chosen: generally they were men of estates; but many were young, hot, and without experience."

On the day appointed—the 22nd of November—the new parliament assembled: the Commons again chose Foley for their speaker, and the king made a long speech from the throne. The demand for supplies was still very high; but William said that, as he had engaged in the present war by the advice of his first parliament, who thought it necessary for the defence of our religion and the preservation of the liberties of Europe; and as the last parliament, with great cheerfulness, had assisted him to carry on that war; so he could not doubt but that the present would be unanimously zealous in the prosecution of it, particularly since the advantages gained this year afforded a reasonable hope of future success. "Upon this occasion," said he, "I cannot but take notice of the courage and bravery of the English troops, which I may say have answered their highest character in any age; and it will not be denied that, without the concurrence of the valour and power of England, it were impossible to put a stop to the ambition and greatness of France." He further told the Commons that the funds which had been voted had proved very deficient; that the condition of the civil list made it impossible for him to subsist upon it; and (this clause was repeated year after year, and not without reason) that compassion obliged him to mention the miserable circumstances of the French Protestants, who were suffering for their religion. He alluded to the ill state of the coin, and to the propriety of devising some good bill for the encouragement and increase of seamen and the advancement of trade—having a particular regard to that of the East Indies, lest it should be lost to the nation.

* For the vice-chancellor and heads of Cambridge, having paid him a short compliment, at Newmarket, on his happy success abroad and his safe return, gave him no invitation to visit them; and when he crossed the country to visit Oxford, where a magnificent entertainment was provided for him, he refused either to eat or drink, because the Duke of Ormond had received an anonymous letter, which had been dropped in the streets the day before, intimating a purpose to poison him." This is the account of the differences of the universities as given by Bulph, who pursues William with hatred and spleen. Although Oxford had relapsed into many of her Jacobite errors, we believe that we may exonerate her and all her sons from the foul charge. If the poisoning letter were really delivered (we find no mention of it in other quarters) it was doubtless a hoax—though, perhaps, a malicious device of the Jacobites.

† Evelyn says, "He stayed seven or eight days at Lord Sunderland's, at Althorp, where he was mightily entertained." And on the 1st of the following December, he adds, "I dined at Lord Sunderland's, now the great favourite and underhand politician, but not adventuring on any character, being obnoxious to the people for having twice changed his religion." This minute diarist says not a syllable about the Oxford poisoning.

The decay of trade, though it was now reviving, and the encroachments made by William's countrymen, the Dutch, by the Scotch, and others, on the East India Company, were prominent topics in the numerous invectives against the government which had recently issued from the press. False lists and calculations were made of our losses at sea: the ships lost by our merchants alone were carried up to the grand cipher of 4000, and their cargoes were estimated at more money than the whole country was then worth. The double relation in which the king stood to this country and to Holland was always the source of infinite clamour and jealousy; and it is wonderful that national prejudices and clashing interests did not produce more serious mischief to his government. It was said, for example, by party writers that the great losses of the English had been connived at purposely, that the Dutch might run away with our trade; that the Navigation Act, and all the other statutes intended for the increase of our shipping and the extension of our home manufactures, had become a dead letter; that the importation of Dutch commodities, though prohibited by the laws, had been encouraged; that the States-General, in order to cover and protect their own merchant-vessels, had not furnished their proper quota to the combined fleet, nor suffered their men-of-war to act for the common service; that their wants and deficiencies were supplied out of English stores and English provisions; and that, instead of acting in conformity to the signals and instructions of the commander-in-chief of the combined fleet, they too often detached their ships of war to act as guard-ships and convoys to their own trade. Nor had the English East India Company spared their pamphlets and their broad sheets, in which they complained grievously of the encroachments made by the Scots since the passing of the late Colonial Act for that country. Hence the allusions in the king's speech.

The Commons voted an address of thanks and congratulation upon the success of his majesty's arms abroad, the preservation of his sacred person from the many hazards to which he had exposed himself, &c., and they pledged themselves to assist him effectually in the prosecution of the war. William's answer was short: "I heartily thank you," said he, "for the marks you give me of your affection. Our interests are inseparable; and there is nothing I wish so much as the happiness of this country, where God has placed me." The Lords made the like offering at the footstool of the throne; and, that the proceedings of parliament might wear such a face of seriousness and solemnity as became them, his majesty, at the instance of the House of Commons, not of the bench of bishops, was pleased to appoint a day of fasting and humiliation, for imploring the blessing of Almighty God upon its consultations.* The business to which they proceeded was of the most important kind. Early in the session they passed the memorable act for regulating trials in cases of treason and misprison of treason; and thus secured equally to peers and commons, and to all Englishmen, a palladium against the suspicions and malice of despotically inclined sovereigns. They rectified the vile state of the coinage, giving up the absurd principle of raising money above its intrinsic value, and recommending the re-coining of all the specie in England in milled money. A bill was also passed for preventing charge and expense in elections; meaning to level a blow against the profligate corruption which was practised then, and so long after, to the disgrace of the nation and the demoralisation of the poorer classes. The preamble stated that grievous complaints were made, and manifestly appeared to be true, that in the election of members to parliament, contrary to the laws, and in violation of right and decency, excessive and enormous expenses had been incurred; and by the enacting clauses it was provided that the giving or promising, directly or indirectly, any present, reward, drink, or entertainment, as a consideration for any man's vote, should incapacitate the party offending, and make his return void.†

Above all men, William most trusted and cherished Bentinck Earl of Portland, who had followed him through all his dangers and difficulties. To reward his important services, and to testify the warmth of his affection, he had bestowed upon my Lord Portland four very extensive manors in † "A severe bill was brought in for voiding all the elections of parliament men, where the elected had been at any expense in meat, drink, or money to procure votes: it was very strictly penned, but time must show whether any evasions can be found out to avoid it: certainly, if it has the desired effect, it would prove one of the best laws that ever was made in England, for abuses in elections were grown to most intolerable excesses, which threatened even the ruin of the nation."—Burset.

Denbighshire, never having money to spend in this way. The donation excited a terrible clamour: it was pretended that the king intended to make this Dutchman Prince of Wales—to give him all that the crown could give in the principality; and the gentlemen of Denbighshire, with true Welsh heat, petitioned the House of Commons against these grants. The petition was presented by Mr. Price, with a speech which was afterwards printed, and which was “equally bold and bitter.” After stating that the Welsh petitioners were not actuated by their own interests, but by a regard to the honour of the crown and the welfare of the nation, which would be alike injured by granting away the lands and revenues of the crown, Price represented that the whole grant comprehended not only the three lordships of Denbigh, Bomfield, and Yale, but also a farther extent of land worth 3000*l.* a-year; that the amount of the whole was at least 100,000*l.*; that the people of Wales were bound to pay a certain duty and service to the prince, which could not be severed from the crown and transferred to any other individual, and least of all to a foreigner. “It cannot be expected,” continued Price, “that he should know our laws, who is a stranger to us and we to him, any more than we know his counsels, which I wish we did. . . . These ministers are guilty of the highest violation of the laws and liberties of England, and strike at the very foundation of the succession, and tear up the Bill of Rights by the root. It was their province and duty to have acquainted the king of his power and interest, that the ancient revenue of the crown is sacred and unalienable, in time of war and the people’s necessities. By the old law, it is part of the coronation oath of the kings of England not to alien the ancient patrimony of the crown without consent of parliament. But as to those oaths of office, most kings have court casuists enough about them to inform them that they have a prerogative to dispense with those oaths, especially when their interest (as it generally does) goes along with their counsel.” Price then mentioned the numerous cases in which parliament had resumed the grants made by over-liberal sovereigns, recommending the same proceeding in the present case. He then made his speech hissing hot with the materials that were lodged in the popular jealousies and antipathies. The Dutch were denounced without mercy as enemies to the trade and prosperity of England. “They have plauted themselves among us,” said Price, “some being of the king’s council, some in the army, some naturalized, some made denizens; and their common traders have possessed themselves of the outskirts of this our great city. . . . We see our good coin all gone, and our confederates openly coining base money of Dutch alloy for us: we see most places of power and profit given to foreigners: we see our confederates in conjunction with the Scotch to ruin our English trade. . . . How can we hope for happy days in England when this great lord and other foreigners are in the English as also in the Dutch councils? . . . I shall make no severe remarks on this great man, for his greatness makes us little; and will make the crown both poor and precarious. . . . I foresee, that when we are reduced to extreme poverty (as now we are very near it), we are to be supplanted by our neighbours, and become a colony to the Dutch. And when God shall please to send us a Prince of Wales, he may have such a present of a crown made him, as a pope made to King John, who was surnamed Sans-Terre.” And then of course ensued a diatribe against popery, which had nothing to do with the business, or that with the title of Lackland, bestowed upon the execrable John. To the fiery petition William coolly replied—“I have a kindness for my Lord Portland, which he has deserved of me by long and faithful services; but I should not have given him these lands if I had imagined the House of Commons could have been concerned: I will, therefore, recall the grant, and find some other way of showing my favour to him.” And he forthwith made a fresh grant to the Earl of Portland of the manors of Grantham, Dracklow, Pevensey, East Greenwich, &c., in the several counties of Lincoln, Cheshire, Sussex, and Kent, together with the honour of Penrith, in the county of Cumberland, and other manors in Norfolk, York, and the Duchy of Lancaster. As these ancient crown lands were far apart, it could not be pretended that the king was creating a principality for his favourite; but the English murmured at the largeness of the grants; and probably the more because Bentinck was not only a foreigner, but a man of cold, retiring habits like his master.

The House of Lords took up the popular outcry against the trading charters granted to the Scots, and represented that the whole trade of the larger and richer kingdom of England must be destroyed by them. They invited the Commons to a conference, and both Houses agreed in a joint address to the throne, in which they represented that an act of parliament which had lately received his majesty’s assent in his kingdom of Scotland, for erecting a company trading to Africa and the Indies, was like to bring many great prejudices and mischiefs to all his English subjects that were concerned in the wealth or trade of this nation: that the said act exempted the Scots from restraints, customs, taxes, &c., to which the said trade was liable in England: that by reason of these great advantages, and the duties and difficulties that lay upon their trade in England, a great part of the stock and shipping of this nation would be carried to Scotland, and so Scotland would be made a free port for all the East India commodities; that, moreover, the said commodities would be brought by the Scotch into England by stealth, both by land and sea, to the vast prejudice of English trade and navigation, and to the great detriment of his majesty in his customs. The address, which ought to have been called a remonstrance, represented still further, “That when that nation should have settled themselves in plantations in America, the English commerce in tobacco, sugar, cotton, wool, skin, masts, &c., would be utterly lost; because the privileges of that nation, granted to them by this act, were such, that that kingdom must be the magazine for all commodities, and the English plantations and the traffic there lost to this nation, and the exportation of their own manufactures yearly decreased: that, besides these and many other obstacles that this act would unavoidably bring to the general trade of this nation, another clause in the said act, whereby his majesty promised to interpose his authority to have restitution, reparation, and satisfaction made, for any damage that might be done to any one of the ships, goods, merchandize, persons, or other effects whatsoever belonging to the said company, and that upon the public charge, did seem to engage his majesty to employ the shipping and strength at sea of this nation to support this new company, to the great detriment even of this kingdom." To this address the king replied, "That he had been ill served in Scotland; but that he hoped some remedies might be found to prevent the inconveniencies which might arise from the Scottish act."⁶

A. D. 1696.—But the Commons did not give over the clamour. Being quickened by a petition from the English East India Company, they, on the 26th of January, came to the resolution that the directors of the Company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies, &c., and, under colour of a Scotch act of parliament, styling themselves a Company, and acting as such, and raising monies in this kingdom, for carrying on the said Company, were guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor; and that the said directors, whose names were inserted, should be impeached of the said high crimes and misdemeanors. The spirit of jealousy and monopoly was bitter and boundless; but at the same time the framers of the Scottish act, in tenderness to their own countrymen, had inserted clauses and conditions which, though thought necessary for the infant foreign trade of a poor country, gave the Scots invidious advantages over the established companies in England, and had thus exceeded the intentions of William, who had given the royal assent in a hurry in his camp in Flanders, and in the midst of the cares and turmoils of war. (Yet we believe that, had there been no investment of English capital in these speculations, the East India Company, the real champion in this conflict, would have paid much less attention to the Scottish charter.) William dismissed the Marquess of Tweeddale, his lord high commissioner, and the two secretaries of state for Scotland, and made great changes in the ministry of that kingdom. All this, with the assurances of his English ministers, that he had been duped, and that the Scots should not be allowed to benefit by the deception, quieted the powerful East India Company, and gave general satisfaction to the English, who had not yet forgotten their old national animosity. "But," says Burnet, "when it was understood in Scotland that the king had disowned that act, from which it was expected that great riches should flow into that kingdom, it is not easy to conceive how great and how general an indignation was spread over the whole kingdom. The Jacobites saw what a game it was like to prove in their hands: they played it with great skill, and to the advantage of their cause, in a course of many years."

All this led to a motion to create, by act of parliament, a board or council of trade. The Commons resolved themselves into a general committee to consider the commercial state of the nation, and it was therein resolved—1. That a council of trade should be established by act of parliament, with powers for the more effectual preservation of the trade of this kingdom. 2. That the commissioners constituting the said council should be nominated by parliament. 3. That none of the said commissioners should be members of the House. 4. That the said commissioners should take an oath acknowledging King William to be rightful and lawful king of this realm; that the late King, James had no right or title, &c. William took umbrage at the bill, which he considered as an attempt to change the constitution by depriving him of an important part of the executive government. "Many," says Burnet, "apprehended that, if the parliament named the persons, how low soever their powers might be at first, they would be enlarged every session; and, from being a council to look into matters of trade, they would be next empowered to appoint convoys and cruisers: this in time might draw in the whole Admiralty, and that part of the revenue or supply that was appropriated to the navy; so that a king would soon grow to be a duke of Venice." To the mortification of William, the Earl of Sunderland declared for the bill, and did all that he could to promote it. According to Burnet, Sunderland did this out of fear of the extreme Whigs, whom the bishop now styles the "republican party." He says that the king himself told him that, "If he went on driving it as he did, he must break with him."⁶

At this moment, however, William was in greater danger from the Jacobites in England, who, encouraged by the presence of another French army of invasion, collected on the opposite coasts, were getting ready to rise, while a desperate band among them, sanctioned by the devout and penitent outcast King James, were planning how they could best assassinate William. Notwithstanding his pilgrimages, his visitation to the monks of La

Trappe, and his flagellations and fastings, James had never ceased to struggle for his earthly crowns; and his petty court at St. Germain had been the scene of constant plots and intrigues, including some of the darkest dye. Perceiving that his former declarations did not go far enough to satisfy the malcontent Whigs, or remove all the jealousies of popery entertained by the ultra-loyal high-church party, James resolved to promise everything, with the mental reservation of a fixed intention to break all such of these promises as were too much for the tenderness of his conscience. According to his Memoirs, he was sensible he should be blamed by several of his friends for making such promises and submitting to such "hard terms;" but, "reasonably speaking," there was nothing else for him to do, and no other hope of regaining his kingdoms than by gratifying his English partisans—"that, as to France, the whole kingdom is weary of the war as well as the ministers, the country being almost ruined by the great taxes, together with the scarcity of wine and corn. . . . And should he have refused these proposals, how hard soever they appeared, the clamour of the whole country would have been so great, that his most Christian majesty could not have been able to have resisted it, and probably he (James) would have been sent out of the kingdom as an opiniatre (obstinate) bigot, who preferred some points of his prerogative, which his people perhaps might have afterwards restored, before the peace and quiet of all Christendom." This new declaration was dated in April, 1693; and, according to his Memoirs, included certain heads suggested by Marlborough, Admiral Russell, and other public men in England. When it had gone forth, and not before, he submitted this case of conscience to four of his own priests; whether he as a Catholic might declare and promise to protect and maintain the church of England as by law established; to fill up the bishoprics and all other dignities or benefices with the most worthy of the Protestant communion, to secure to the members of the English church all universities, colleges, schools, &c., and promise to agree to any laws that might hereafter be desired by the English parliament for the further security of their religion, &c. The four English or Irish priests thus consulted were, Father Sanders, the king's confessor; Dr. Betham, his son's preceptor; Mr. Innis, the queen's almoner; and Dr. Fenwick; who all answered in the negative—not frankly or decidedly, however, but stating "that the matter was improperly worded; that what reasonably could be expected might be granted in other words."* But, not satis-

* For, first, they said, the king could not promise to protect and defend a religion he believed erroneous, which was the substance of the first and second query, nor could he make the promise required in the third, because they may think the educating the Prince of Wales in the Protestant religion necessary for its preservation, or to exclude any Catholic from succeeding, which had once been thought necessary even in respect of himself. But they agreed that the king might promise to secure and protect his subjects of the church of England as by law established, in the free and full exercise of their religion, and in the quiet and peaceable possession and enjoyment of their bishoprics, ecclesiastical dignities, and other benefices; and that upon all vacancies care should be taken to fill them up with fit members of their own persuasion, it being a quite different case fied with this answer, James submitted his case to five French divines, and to the Bishop of Meaux, the celebrated Bossuet, who gave their sanction and approbation to the declaration which had been issued. According to the Memoirs, they did this "too hastily," as "not having a right notion of the case, nor understanding the laws of the kingdom;" and because James had only submitted to them a part of the queries. But it is stated, upon authority at least as good as that of the Stuart MSS., that the learned and elegant Bishop of Meaux answered in the affirmative, because he was expressly ordered so to do by Louis XIV.; and Bossuet, notwithstanding his great merits, had not the heroism to resist the will of an absolute monarch, but had before now condescended to many compliances against his conscience. It is added, in the Memoirs, that soon after these French divines recalled their judgment, "when they were more fully apprised of the case, and saw the declaration itself, together with the Test Act, and thought fit to write a long paper of reasons for their retraction." But, soon after, the declaration, and all the plans and armaments with which it was attended, were frustrated and shown to be, like the whole cause of James, utterly hopeless; so that then the divines might be honest without injury to the interests which they would have served with their duplicity or the straining of their consciences. Yet, according to the Memoirs, Bossuet compared the declaration to that which the most Christian king had given to the Huguenots in the edict of Nantes, and wrote his reasons in favour of it to Cardinal Janson at Rome, who made no reply either pro or con; "but though he (Bossuet) persisted something longer in his opinion than the rest, he owned his mistake at last, but did not think it necessary to do it by a writing or public instrument, the matter being then at an end, and all expectancies on that account determined." All this is base enough; but the archives of France have in our days been made to give up a document that completes the story. This is a letter written by James's secretary and chief adviser, my Lord Melfort, to Cardinal Janson, and sent to Rome with the letter written to the same French prince of the church by Bossuet. Melfort says to the cardinal that the declaration, of which he incloses a translation, has been made at the prayers of a very considerable part of his Protestant subjects in England; "but," he adds, "as the most lawful things are subject to misinterpretation, the king, my master, foreseeing that some scrupulous or ill-intentioned Catholics might blame certain concessions his majesty is obliged to make to his Protestant subjects, he has begged the Bishop of Meaux to put his opinion in writing and transmit it to his eminence, in order that he may render an account of the affair to the Holy See, not doubting its full approbation," &c. In continuation, Melfort begs the cardinal to represent the matter to the pope secretly, not as if from King James, who would communicate with his holiness directly at a future time, but only as from Bossuet, who, having given his opinion by order of King Louis, had thought it his duty, by the means of his eminence, to explain the reasons to his holiness, and submit the whole to his decision. He urges that everything depended on representing matters at first in such a manner as to make a good impression; and he further tells the cardinal that James relies on his zeal for obtaining the approbation of the pope, and for shutting the mouths of some false zealots that might complain of his majesty's conduct with regard to the declaration. Above all things, Janson is to have the first word with his holiness. But Melfort reserved the most important part of this communication for a postscript, which he wrote with his own hand, having been prevented by illness and pain from writing the body of the letter. In this postscript his lordship, with honest roguery, tells the cardinal that the declaration, which had been made the subject of such delicate debates, was only meant to help James to get back to England. "What is to be done," said Melfort, "is not to avoid the censures of Rome, nor to bring about an examination of the affair, which must be avoided, and particularly the assembling of congregations upon it: what his majesty wants being to satisfy his holiness privately of the necessities under which he is with regard to his re-establishment, and his having the liberty of bringing up the Prince of Wales in the Catholic religion, which will be a greater benefit to the said religion than anything else that can happen. It is also to be considered that his majesty has assurances from the chief of those English with whom he has treated, that he shall obtain liberty of conscience for the Catholics of England, provided only that his majesty do not press the matter by his own authority, but leave it to the parliament. In fine, this I understand, the declaration is only to get us back, and we may much better dispute the affairs of the Catholics at Whitehall than at St. Germain."⁸

to promise to maintain the religion itself, and to maintain the professors of it in their possessions, benefices, &c., which being all the security the Protestants desired, might reasonably have satisfied the ministers."—Life from the Stuart MSS., &c. It is said to have been in the sense here laid down by his four priests that James had made his declaration about religion to the English council on his accession.

And this was written only thirty-eight days after the signing of the declaration, in which the pious James had said—"We only come to vindicate our own right and to establish the liberties of our people, and may God give us success in the prosecution of the one as we sincerely intend a confirmation of the other." But the strange story is not yet told: the French king, who had little sympathy with James's half scruples, but who wished to avoid any discouragement from Rome that might possibly have followed the too open false dealing of Secretary Melfort, was besides not desirous of committing his own name and

kingly faith with the court of Rome, particularly as he knew that James was at that very moment authorising the Jacobites to make a personal attack upon William. Accordingly Louis intercepted the whole packet, and neither the letter of Bossuet nor the letter of my Lord Melfort was ever sent to Rome or seen by Cardinal Janson.* Wondering why no answer came from the cardinal, yet soon perceiving that, though the intention of it were not fully revealed, his declaration produced nothing but "blame from his friends, contempt from his enemies, and repentance in himself,"† the exiled king importuned Louis to take advantage of the consternation occasioned by William's defeat at Landen, and the disasters of the Smyrna fleet, and invade England. He represented as confidently as ever that a large part of the nation would join the invading force and conduct him back in triumph to Whitehall. But Louis was not in a condition to attempt anything of the sort, and James was still obliged to trust to his intrigues with the furious Jacobites and the discontented Whigs, who could scarcely have co-operated for a week if the course of events had brought them into the field. In the course of the following year (1694) two emissaries from the court of St. Germain—Crosby and Parker—were committed to prison on suspicion; but Crosby was soon liberated upon bail, and Parker contrived to escape out of the Tower. The evidence produced against Crosby was of a very defective kind; but as the designs attributed to him were of the worst kind, he was for some time closely watched. To counteract the Jacobite agents and spies, the court employed others; and, apparently, some of these scoundrels took pay from both sides. In the course of the present winter (1695-6) Louis, for his own interest, had gone again into James's plan of invasion, and had collected a considerable fleet and army on the coast; and James had sent over Sir George Barclay and his natural son, the Duke of Berwick, to promote an insurrection, without which, or the assurance of one to favour them on their landing, the French were loth to embark. Barclay and Berwick both got secretly into London, where the former, the more daring and less scrupulous conspirator of the two, remained some time lodging in Hatton Garden. This Barclay, according to his own account, as given in the Life of James, found that there was no great hope of an insurrection in England; but that there was "a design on foot to form a party to fall upon the Prince of Orange." This design he says was first communicated to him by Mr. Charnock, who at their first meeting "complained to him that he and some others had a design on foot, which would have undoubtedly facilitated the king's return, but that his majesty would never permit them to put it in execution." A few days after Charnock made him acquainted with Sir William Perkin's, who was concerned with him in all their projects, and who then opened the design more fully, assuring Barclay that they wanted nothing for perfecting it but his majesty's leave. "I did much approve of it," says Barclay, "if it could be carried on with that secrecy and conduct as a thing of that consequence ought to be; upon which I immediately asked them if it was possible to find so many good men as would be requisite, and would undertake a brave action without asking of questions." They assured him that they knew several of their own mind. "Therefore," adds Barclay, "presuming upon the commission I held from his majesty to make war upon the Prince of Orange and all his adherents, I thought myself sufficiently authorised to engage with them to attack that prince when his guards were about him; upon which I showed them my commission, which they were much pleased with, but told me it was absolutely necessary I should see Mr. Porter, who lodged in the same house with them, and was privy to all their designs." Barclay says that for some time he would not condescend to visit this Porter; not that he mistrusted his loyalty, but because he heard "he was much given to drink, and open-minded." But the other conspirators told him that their lives were as dear to them as he could esteem his own; that if Porter had been a drunkard and a blab they would not have trusted him; and at last Barclay went with Major Holmes to Porter's lodgings, where they found him confined to his bed. "By this time," says Barclay, "Captain Knightly had heard of me, and was very desirous to speak with me, so I made an appointment with him and Captain Hungate. At our meeting Captain Knightly told me he and some others had a design of making a party to fall upon the Prince of Orange, and that he and Durance, a good partisan, had viewed the ground several times, and found it for their purpose, and desired me to see Durance, which I did, to try what I could learn from him, and then went to see the ground, when I was conducted to a hunting-house kept by one Mr. Latten, and where the prince used to go often a-hunting. There it was they proposed to me to lay an ambuscade, but I could not agree to their design: not but that the place was to my mind, but my objection was, that the men must have been placed there over-night, and if the Prince of Orange did not come, they could not remove till the night following; and, in so little a spot of ground, they might have been discovered by the rangers, and if the design had failed twenty men would have been let into the secret." This deliberate assassin, Barclay, goes on to say that, being several times told "from good hands" that one Captain Fisher, that lived in King-street, Westminster, had made several great proposals, he went to him in disguise, when the captain proposed to attack the Prince of Orange between the two gates as he passed from Hyde Park to St. James,—he (Fisher) undertaking to kill one of the coach-horses with his own hand. Barclay set the captain down for a fool, engaging him, however, to give him notice when William went a-hunting. Captain Fisher sent him word accordingly, and also informed him that a person lurking about Kensington Palace, whom Barclay supposed to be Durance, had been taken notice of by the servants;—"for," says Barclay, "I had him and another placed to give me notice of what they could learn at that court; as, immediately after my arrival in London, I made it my business to know that prince's days of council and recreation, and how many guards he had when he went abroad; but after we were in readiness, I could never learn he was anywhere abroad at night or a-hunting." He assures us that, having once engaged in this affair, he was resolved to try every way to go through with it; that he was disappointed of any opportunity of meeting William in a fit place; that he went to Kensington itself with Major Holmes, and everywhere else about London where that prince used to go, both to know the ground and what plan would be best. At last he fixed upon Turnham Green as best suited for the purpose, and therefore that place was agreed upon by the rest of the conspirators. Then Sir William Perkins undertook to provide five men, well mounted and armed, but not to be there himself; and Mr. Porter and Mr. Charnock engaged each for the like number of men and to be there themselves. Barclay was to add five men to these fifteen, and he gave money to Major Holmes and Mr. Charnock to buy him twenty horses and furniture, which they did in a few days. To prevent suspicion, these horses were kept in different stables; and rendezvous were appointed for the day of action at different inns about Turnham Green and Brentford.*

After one or two balks, at which the heart of Charnock misgave him, and he talked of going into the country, Barclay received certain word on Saturday, the 15th of February, that William was getting into his coach, and that it was believed he was going to that hunting-house where Mr. Latten was keeper, which was over against Brentford on the other side the river Thames. The plan of the assassins, who were now increased to thirty-five men, was to surprise William on his return at a hollow part of the road between Brentford and Turnham Green, one division of them being placed behind some bushes and brushwood at the western end of the green. Eight were to have "taken care of the prince, and the rest to have dealt with the guard,"—who, however, according to their calculation, would scarcely have got across the river when William fell into the ambuscade. When the murderers, or as Barclay calls them, "the gentlemen," were all ready to go to the posts assigned to them, word was brought that William had changed his mind and would not hunt that day. There was a fear that their design was suspected; but, after lying close and still in the interval, Barclay, Porter, and Goodman, concluding that their design was not discovered, had another meeting on the 19th, and then, learning that William was going to hunt at the place calculated upon, which was in Richmond Park, on the next Saturday, the 22nd of February, they resolved to do the business on that day. When Saturday came William was watched to his coach, and again "the gentlemen" were in readiness, but "presently word was brought that the prince was come back to Kensington in great haste, his horses being in a top sweat." There was also a muttering among the people about the detection of a horrible plot; and then Barclay made the best of his way back to France, leaving his brother conspirators to shift for themselves.* The Duke of Berwick had returned thither some time before with ample assurance of there being no hope of any popular rising for his father; but James had been very careful to conceal this information from the French monarch, who was still unwilling to risk the expedition without the sure prospect of its being joined by the English people. The miserable exile was then on his road to Calais, where he expected to embark with the French troops. In the mild showing of his biographer, "he durst not disabuse his most Christian majesty, for fear his ministers, who were ever averse from these expeditions, should quash all, without so much as a trial." Therefore he wrote a delusive letter to Louis, and continued his journey to Calais—"still hoping something might happen on which he could raise a request to let the troops embark first." But he had no sooner reached the French port than he learned the discovery of Barclay's plot; and then, overwhelmed with confusion and disgrace, he skulked back to St. Germain.†

The day after the flight of Barclay was a Sunday; but on Monday, the 24th of February, William declared in parliament that a plot had been discovered to assassinate him, and that a design of invasion from France was on foot. He told them that he had given the necessary orders for the fleet, and had dispatched other orders for bringing over from Flanders a sufficient number of our troops; that some of the conspirators against his person were already in custody, and that measures were taken for apprehending as many of the rest as was possible. It appeared that Captain Fisher, an accomplice—he who lived in King-street, Westminster, and who had proposed to murder William between the park gates—had, on the 10th or 11th of February, disclosed the plot to Lord Portland, but without naming any of the conspirators. The king, it is said, disbelieved or disregarded this confession. But, on the evening of the 14th, one Pendergrast accosted Lord Portland at Whitehall, telling him, that if the king went to hunt on the morrow he would assuredly be murdered. Pendergrast added, that, though an Irishman and a papist, he abhorred such a business, and had from the first resolved to defeat it; that he was totally ignorant of this barbarous design till he was sent for to London. Having said this, he subjoined a relation of the whole plot, as it had been communicated to him by the confederate assassins; which he said he would have discovered to the king himself, but that he durst not go to Kensington for fear of two orderly men, who were kept there as spies, to give notice to the conspirators of what occurred in the court. Pendergrast also refused to name the conspirators. In the meantime a third accomplice, named De la Rue, waited upon Secretary Trumbull, and gave some information about the plot, revealing the names of several of the conspirators, as Sir George Barclay, Sir William Perkins, Charnock, Parker, and Porter. Upon hearing of this new evidence, Fisher and Pendergrast made up their minds to fuller revelations. William was persuaded by Lord Portland to examine personally, but separately, Pendergrast and De la Rue; and then these witnesses gave up the names of all those who had conspired against the king's life. The secret was kept, and both Pendergrast and De la Rue attended the meeting of the conspirators on the morning of the 22nd, when William took coach for Richmond, and they thought their blow was sure. But, after the news of the king's sudden return to Kensington, the company talked of treachery, drank confusion to the Prince of Orange, separated in consternation, and Pendergrast and De la Rue returned to court to relate what had passed at that meeting. But the infatuated cut-throats still fancied that they were unknown; and they were nearly all arrested that night in their beds.

On the 24th a proclamation was issued for the apprehension of the rest, offering 1000*l.* reward to any one that should discover and seize them, and 1000*l.*, with a free pardon, to any accomplice that should deliver himself up and reveal what he knew. The names inserted in this proclamation were,—the Duke of Berwick, Sir George Barclay, Major Lowick, Captain Porter, Captain Stowe, Captain Wallbank, Captain Courtney, Lieutenant Sherburne, Price Blair, Denant, Chambers, Boise, George Higgins, and his two brothers, Davis, Cardell, Goodman, Cranburn, Keys, Pendergrast, Burley, Trevor, Sir George Maxwell, Durance, Knightley, Holmes, Sir William Perkins, and Rookwood—this last a name which occurs in almost every English conspiracy from the time of the gunpowder-plot downward. As soon as this proclamation was out, Mr. George Harris, who had been sent from France to obey the orders of Barclay, delivered himself up to Sir William Trumbull, the secretary of state, and divulged all that he knew; and, led by the same hopes of saving their lives and getting high rewards, several more conspirators followed his example. Among these king's evidences was

* Life of James:—Sir G. Barclay's own relation.

† According to the Life, this discovery "put the kingdom into such a ferment, that there was no thinking of the Jacobites venturing to rise; much less of the king's landing, though the French had been willing; but, besides their aversion to hazard their troops, it was said afterwards, that the whole design on the French side was only a feint to amuse the English while they made a junction of their fleets."

Porter, who had been suspected by Barclay as being "much given to drink and open-minded," but who is described by others as having been one of the most brutal and most forward of the whole gang. Porter, who had been lying at Epsom, came in on the 2nd of March, and deposed that he knew Barclay well, and had heard him say he came over to put in execution a design upon the king's person; that Charnock had told him that the said Barclay had 800*l.* given him by a servant of King James, for providing men and horses for the design; that he had heard Barclay complain of the smallness of this sum; that Barclay had bought horses, &c.; that Charnock told him Barclay held a commission from King James; that Sir William Perkins had read the commission, which was all in King James's hand-writing, and which ran, "for raising and levying war upon the person of the king;" that he had heard Barclay say that twenty or twenty-two persons were come from France, who had been officers, and were to be concerned in the design; that several consultations had been held as to the manner of assassinating King William; that these consultations were held at his (Porter's) lodgings in Norfolk-street; others at the Globe Tavern, in Hatton Garden; at the Sun Tavern, in the Strand; and at the Nag's Head, in James's Street, Covent Garden; that two ways had been proposed for assassinating the king—the one by an ambuscade of foot to be laid not far from the lodge near Richmond; that some days before Saturday, the 15th, he, the deponent, with two others, had surveyed the ground at Turnham Green, Brentford, Richmond, and the ferry by which the king had to cross the river (i. e. Kew Ferry, near the place where Kew Bridge now stands); that a day or two after he and Durance, or Durant, had taken a list of the stables and inns near those places; that two of the party were constantly placed at Kensington to watch the king's movements; that the persons employed in the design were to be divided into three parties, two of which were to attack the guards with their swords only, and the third the king's coach; that Rookwood was to command one of the two first parties, the deponent the other, and Barclay the third, which was to cut off his majesty and all that were with him in the coach; that he, Porter, had told Pendergrast that he should have his musketoon, which carried six bullets; that it was an expression current among them that the assaulting the king in this manner was fair war, and no more than attacking him at his winter-quarters, or killing him as he was passing from one town to another in Flanders.*

* According to the contemporary writer, Roger Coke, who follows the reports of the trials and confessions without materially differing from Barclay's narrative, "at last they fixed upon a place between Brentford and Turnham Green, in a bottom where the ground is moorish, where there is a bridge at which divers roads meet and cross one another: on the north side there is a road that goes round Brentford, and on the south a lane that leads to the river, so that you may come thither by four several ways. After you have passed the bridge, the road grows narrow, having on the one side a footpath, and on the other a tall thick hedge; and this was the place pitched

After other particulars which agree very closely with the account given by Sir George Barclay, himself, Porter continued to depose that the day before he went to survey the ground he dined with Barclay, Perkins, Friend, Holmes, and Ferguson [the last the same Presbyterian preacher who had written the manifestoes of Monmouth, and had been a principal driver in that wretched attempt at a revolution, but who had since become a Jacobite, and had taken an oath to be concerned in every conspiracy that should be got up in his time]; that after dinner other persons came in, when they discoursed privately one another of the assassination, and more publicly of the preparations for invasion then making along the sea-coast of France; that the persons who talked of the private design were Barclay, Perkins, and himself; and that Sir John Friend (a rich London brewer and a flaming Jacobite, but who was not prepared to be an assassin), observing their frequent whispers, said, that he deserved to be fairly dealt with,—that he was as ready to serve King James as any man, but that he found there was something behind the curtain which was concealed from him; that it was then and there that Sir George Barclay first informed the deponent (Porter) in a whisper that the king's son, the Duke of Berwick, had been here, adding that he could not have told him of this if the duke had not been gone again. And Porter further deposed that Perkins had assured him that Mr. Lewis, gentleman of the horse to Lord Feversham, would furnish three horses if wanted; that Perkins had a commission from King James for a regiment of horse; and that the said Perkins and Charnock had told him that Sir John Friend had a like commission, and that Friend had owned this himself, and declared he would be in readiness; that Charnock had told him that 300*l.* had been paid for Colonel Parker's escape out of the Tower on the former occasion when he was in trouble with Crosby, and that Friend had advanced 100*l.* of that money; that Mr. Tempest, of Durham, had a commission from King James to raise a regiment of horse, and had everything in readiness; that he (the deponent) was to have the first troop in King James's own regiment, of which upon for the execution of their barbarous villainy; and, indeed, one more likely to do their business could not well have been found out for his majesty, very often returning late from hunting, usually crossed the water at Queen's Ferry without coming out of his coach; and as he landed on this side the water, the coach drove on, without expecting the rest of the guards, who could not cross the Thames till the boat returned to Surrey side again, to bring them over, and so the king must unavoidably have fallen into the hands of his murderers before the rest of his guards could have come up to his assistance. Neither was the time and place more cunningly and devilishly contrived than their men were disposed of; for, having secured several places at Brentford, Turnham Green, and in scattered houses thereabouts, to set up their horses till the king's return from hunting, one of the conspirators was ordered to wait at Queen's Ferry till the guards appeared in sight on Surrey side of the water, and then to give speedy notice to the rest, to be ready at their respective posts, while the king was crossing the Thames. For this evil end they were divided into three parties, who were to make their approaches by three several ways: one of them from Turnham Green, another from the lane that leads to the Thames, and a third from a road that goes round Brentford; one of these parties was to attack his majesty's guards in front, and another in the rear, whilst ten or twelve men of the bloodiest sort were to assassinate his majesty in his coach."—Detection.

Parker was to be colonel; that Goodman had also a commission, and was provided with arms and saddles; and that the said Goodman had had discourses with him two years ago about a design "to seize and carry off the king," which design was proposed to King James by means of Barclay.

According to Porter, the only arrangement they had made for their escape after "doing the thing" was this—that when the assassination should be over at Turnham Green they should keep together till they came to Hammersmith, when they were to disperse and get into town by different ways in small companies, and there lie concealed till the invasion from France, which they calculated would take place immediately.* Bertram, Blair, Harris, Hunt, and one or two other mere mercenaries who had been tempted by the hope of gain and plunder, made similar revelations. Bertram said that he had been engaged for a particular service by getting a guinea in hand; that he knew it was on account of the little man—one of the nick-names given to William—and that he understood he was to be killed. Blair avowed that he had been retained in the secret service of King James by Father Harrison, one of the managers in England ever since the La Hogue affair, and had been asked by Father Harrison, about the beginning of February last, whether he knew any soldiers or men of courage who would do something that might be an introduction to King James's happy restoration; but that Sir John Friend, when he heard of the assassination plan, was sorry for it, because he was afraid it would ruin King James's affairs and all his friends. Harris, who had served James in Ireland as an ensign of foot, and since in France as one of his guards, inculpated that unhappy sovereign far more directly than any of the rest; for he deposed that, about the 14th of the preceding January King James sent for him, and one Harc, his comrade, into the queen's bed-chamber, and told him "he had now an opportunity of doing something for him;"—that he should send him to England, where he was to follow Barclay's orders, and trust to his majesty for being taken care of afterwards; that his majesty then ordered money for their journey, and told them they would find Colonel Barclay every Monday and Thursday evening between six and seven o'clock in the open square of Covent Garden, he being to be known by a white handkerchief hanging out of his coat pocket; that Colonel Parker, who was present all this while, went with him by King James's orders to the secretary,* who gave them ten louis d'ors a-piece, saying, that money would be enough to carry them over, and that, if they were wind-bound, the president, Josse, would provide for their subsistence at Calais.† And Harris further deposed that the said president did provide them with everything while they remained at Calais, and on their departure procured them a passage on board a chaloupe, commanded by one Gill, who had been in the habit of going backward and forward for intelligence. Hunt, who had a convenient house on the solitary flats of Romney Marsh, confessed that many persons going and coming between London and St. Germain, had been entertained and concealed by him, and that the Duke of Berwick had been at his house very recently. Goodman inculpated Sir John Fenwick, Lord Montgomery, Lord Aylesbury, Colonel Fountain, and other persons of rank, but he did not accuse them of intending more than to seize William, and to carry him off to France—an attempt, however, which, if made, must have ended on the spot in murder.

The first of the conspirators put on their trial at the Old Bailey, on the 11th of March, before the learned and upright Lord Chief Justice Holt, were, Charnock, who had been a fellow of Magdalen College, and afterwards a captain in King James's Irish army; King, who had been a captain in the same service; and Keys, a trumpeter, who had been the servant of Captain Porter. They were all found guilty of high treason, and were executed at Tyburn on the 18th. Charnock left a paper to justify the lawfulness of their design against the usurper; and they all died avowing the plot, but exculpating King James of all knowledge of the intended murder. They were all three Roman Catholics, and, having refused the assistance of any Protestant divine, and not being allowed by the laws a priest of their own persuasion, Charnock performed the spiritual offices for himself and his fellow sufferers. He most solemnly declared in his last paper that the body of English Catholics "had no manner of knowledge of this design;" which, he said, had been carried on merely by a small number, without the advice, consent, or privy of any parties whatsoever. King, who also left a paper, declared that he was brought to that place of punishment by his crimes, and particularly by that one for which he was about to suffer: but he declared that he had never seen any order or commission from King James, "promoting the

* The secretary here named was not Lord Melfort, who, however, would certainly not have hesitated at any such service, but a gentleman called Cary.

† It appears that it was usual for the French government, at the request of James, to billet his secret emissaries going into England upon the French authorities of Calais and of Boulogne. In the margin of one of the papers discovered by M. Mazure, there are these words, apparently written by one of Louis's ministers or secretaries:—"Prendre l'ordre du Roi pour écrire au Gouverneur de Boulogne, en faveur du Sieur C." The person here designated by the initial C. was indisputably Crosby, who at this time (1693) was engaged in the plot to seize and carry off the person of William. In another letter, written at the same time, from Monseigneur to M. l'Abbé Renaudot are these significant words:—"His majesty does not approve of my giving Crosby a memorial signed by me; but if he imparts to you his instructions and the English memorial which you seem to approve of, I will give his majesty an account of them. In the mean while I send the letter you ask for the commandant at Calais, in order that he may raise no obstacle to his passage."

* In a subsequent examination, Porter accused the Earl of Aylesbury, Lord Montgomery, eldest son of the Marquess of Powis, and Sir John Fenwick. He declared that they, with other individuals who met at a tavern in the city, agreed to send over Charnock to King James, to desire him to borrow 8000 foot and 2000 horse from the French king, who would not refuse such an army, particularly when it was made known that few forces were left in England, that many people were dissatisfied, and that everything promised success. Still further inculpating Sir John Fenwick, he swore that Charnock had assured him that he had been in France with the message about the troops, and had brought several messages back from King James to Fenwick, Lord Aylesbury, and other persons of quality whom he did not name.

assassination." And he further declared that the design was not undertaken with any general knowledge or approbation of any body of men, either Catholic or Protestant, and that he had not engaged in the plot "on presumption of any king-killing principle that could justify such an undertaking (here he seems to acknowledge that murder was really understood), but was drawn into it by his own rashness and passion." As to the third sufferer, Keys, the poor trumpeter and serving-man of Porter, he said nothing but his prayers, and a general confession that his sins had brought this just judgment upon him. Sir John Friend, the great brewer, Sir William Perkins, Brigadier Rookwood, Major Lowick, and Captain Cranburn were tried, condemned, and executed a few days after. Friend died with the declaration that he believed the cause he was going to suffer for was the cause of God and true religion; that it was altogether new and unintelligible to him that the king's subjects could depose or dethrone him on any account whatsoever; that he knew of no sudden invasion of these dominions, and supposed it was not expected that he should clear himself of the assassination plot since none of the witnesses had charged him with it.* "I am," said Friend, "an unworthy and unprofitable member of the church of England,—of that non-juring church which at present suffers so much for a strict adherence to loyalty, the laws, and Christian principles. For this I suffer, and for this I die." Sir William Perkins, who suffered with him, said that he had been falsely sworn against by Porter,† as having owned to him that he had read a commission from King James to levy war upon the person of the Prince of Orange; whereas the tenor of the king's commission, which he had seen, was general, and directed to all loving subjects to raise and levy war against the Prince of Orange and his adherents, to seize all castles, forts, &c., which he supposed to be a customary form of giving authority to make war: "but," said he, "as for any commission particularly levelled against the person of the Prince of Orange, I neither saw nor heard of any such. It is true I was privy to the design upon the prince, but was not to act in it, and am fully satisfied that very few or none knew of it except those who undertook to do it." They were attended on the scaffold by three non-juring clergymen,—Shadrach Cook, William Snatt, and the celebrated Jeremy Collier,—who publicly gave them absolution, in the name of Christ, and by imposition of hands, for all their sins. For this performance Cook and Snatt were thrown into Newgate; but Collier, who was accustomed to a hide-and-seek life, got out of the way, and, as was usual with him, published a book upon the subject, justifying what he had done.*

All the victims at Tyburn denied more or less explicitly that James was privy to the assassination part of the plot; but the nation and the greater part of Europe refused belief to their dying assertions. James himself, though he had been silent as to the accusations put forth on the detection of Grandval's plot, took great pains to prove his innocence on the present occasion. He told Erizzo, the Venetian ambassador at Paris, that the winds had disconcerted his measures to land in England, and betrayed his best hopes; but that he had yielded and did from his heart acquiesce in the divine will. "As to any attempt upon the person of the Prince of Orange," said he, "I am wholly ignorant; and, though to face an enemy at the head of his troops, in my opinion, can never be reputed an assassination, I do swear I know nothing of it."† Taking these words to be fairly reported, they go rather against his case, for he seems to hold to the notion entertained by some of the assassins themselves,—that, because William might have a few guards with him, the falling upon him would be warfare, and not murder. He and his partisans, however, maintain that Barclay had used the commission in an unauthorised manner, and that the conspirators generally had given it a sense which was not in it. The real commission was carried back to France by Barclay, so that we are obliged to take whatever

* State Trials.—Coke.—Ralph.—Burnet.—There are three elaborate accounts of the plot, with narratives of the whole proceedings. One is called 'An Impartial Account, &c.:' which is described by Ralph as containing little more than the articles of intelligence which were communicated to the public as the events happened or were ascertained. The second, entitled 'The History of the late Conspiracy against the King and the Nation, &c.:' professed to be extracted out of the original depositions of the witnesses and other authentic papers. The third, and the best known, was the production of Sir Richard Blackmore, M.D. whose name, rendered immortal by his own bad verse and by the wit of Dryden, stands in the title-page. It is called 'A True and Impartial History of the Conspiracy against the Person and Government of King William III., of glorious memory, in the year 1699.' The he-knighted doctor and physician-poet declares, in his preface, that he was engaged to write the work by the Lord Keeper Somers; that, in order to be made master of the subject, he was admitted to several conferences with Lord Somers, the Duke of Shrewsbury, and the Earl of Portland; that he was furnished with authentic copies of the depositions and other papers from the secretary's office, &c. The work, however, was not published till more than a quarter of a century after the fact, and when it was produced as a lesson to the factious and discontented in the reign of George I. Somers, Shrewsbury, Portland, and the secretary were all dead, and could neither confirm nor contradict what Blackmore advanced as to his sources of information, and the care taken to keep him correct to the letter. Between his account, however, and that given in the State Trials, a fair notion may be formed of the whole business, which, in its most mitigated form, was traitorous and anti-national. As a short narrative of the events, Roger Coke's account is very clear and good. Evelyn, half Jacobite as he was, speaks with horror of the whole plot. "There was now a conspiracy of about thirty knights, gentlemen, captains, many of them Irish and English Papists and Nonjurors, or Jacobites (so called), to murder King William on the first opportunity of his going either to Kensington, or to hunting, or to the chapel; and upon signal of fire to be given from Dover Cliff to Calais, an invasion was designed. In order to it there was a great army in readiness, men-of-war, and transports, to join a general insurrection here, the Duke of Berwick having secretly come to London to head them, King James attending at Calais with the French army. It was discovered by some of their own party. . . . This was so timed by the enemy, that, whilst we were already much disoriented on the greatness of the taxes, and corruption of the money, &c., we had like to have had very few men-of-war near our coasts. . . . This deliverance is due solely to God. French were to have invaded at once England, Scotland, and Ireland. . . . The quarters of Sir William Perkins and Sir John Friend, lately executed on the plot, with Perkins's head were set up at Temple Bar; a dismal sight, which many pitied. I think there never was such at Temple Bar till now, except one in the time of King Charles II., viz. of Sir Thomas Armstrong.—History. † Roger Coke.

* Indeed, more than one of the witnesses had declared that he turned with fear and horror from the thought of murder; but, on the other hand, he was sworn to as having been one of the most powerful or influential of those of the conspirators that were plotting for the bringing over of the French army of invasion.

† Upon his trial Friend had objected that the witnesses, being Papists, were not legal witnesses against Protestants; that a consultation to levy war was not treason; and that the being at a treasonable consult was but a misprision of treason.

version of it the court of St. Germain chose to give. Even in their version the document was calculated to mislead men who were no diplomatists, and to excite partisans who had proved over and over again that they were wildly enthusiastic and fanatic. The commission, according to the Jacobite Memoir, was conceived in these words:—

“JAMES R.

“Our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby fully authorise, strictly require, and expressly command our loving subjects to rise in arms and make war upon the Prince of Orange, the usurper of our throne, and all his adherents, and so seize for our use all such forts, towns, strongholds within our dominion of England, as may serve to further our interest, and to do from time to time such other acts of hostility against the Prince of Orange, and his adherents, as may conduce most to our service, we judging this the properest, justest, and most effectual means of procuring our restoration and their deliverance; and we do hereby indemnify them for what they shall act in pursuance of this our royal command.

“Given at our court of St. Germain en Liege, the 27th of December, 1695.”*

But we have no authority except that of the party inculpated for the authenticity of this document, and, even as it stands, a word or two omitted or a word or two inserted—a mere stroke of the pen—might give it a different character. It has been generally, and perhaps wisely, agreed not to lend implicit credit to the testimony of the persons who became king's evidence. Men like Harris and Porter, when placed in such critical circumstances, are almost sure to swear to more than they know. But there are other incidents and circumstances which tend to fix the guilt upon the exiled king and upon those nearest to him. His own son, the Duke of Berwick, confesses “that he was, during his residence in London, informed by Sir George Barclay of a conspiracy which was carrying on against the person of the Prince of Orange;” and he says that he hastened his return to France that he might not be confounded with the conspirators, whose designs appeared to him—not dishonourable, not dastardly, not atrocious, such moral thoughts seem never to have entered his head—but difficult to execute. Nay, further, this illegitimate scion of royalty, or the writer of the Memoirs which bear his name, says that he did not disapprove of the conspiracy, and thought himself bound in honour not to dissuade Sir George Barclay from it; that, on communicating the project to Louis XIV. at Marli, that monarch gave orders that all things should be in readiness, and that the army of invasion should sail the instant the success of the conspiracy was known. But the Duke of Berwick saw James at Clermont at least two days before he saw Louis at Marli, and he must most assuredly have related the particulars of Barclay's enterprise to his father, who did not, thereupon, waver, or return, or dispatch messengers into England. On the contrary, he went on, and lay at Calais till news reached him (carried probably by Barclay himself) that the conspiracy had been detected, and most of the assassins seized. But there is another kind of excuse set up for James. It is said that now, as on former occasions, what was meant by falling upon the Prince of Orange was merely to seize his person, and bring him over a prisoner to France. The Duke of Berwick modifies his account of the plot in this manner, saying that he thought even Barclay (whose plots and determinations he must have known to the bottom, as he was concealed with him for some time in and about London) designed only to secure the person of William. Now, it required not the head of a soldier like Berwick to perceive that, if really projected, this design could not be executed without bloodshed. Forty assassins lying in ambuscade, and surprising the royal carriage when separated from the guard, might easily have assassinated the king, but not four hundred, nor four thousand, could have carried him off from the neighbourhood of his capital into France. We therefore cannot but agree with Burnet, who observes that assassination “is an odious word, and perhaps no person was ever so wicked as to order such a thing in so crude a manner; but the sending a commission to attack the king's person, was the same thing upon the matter.” M. Mazure has brought to light a draft, or the minute of a warrant, dated 1693, which is in these words:—“As the Prince of Orange, against all the laws of God, the laws of nations, and against all the duties and engagements of natural affection, without any preceding provocation, without any pretence or colour of right to cover his ambition and evil designs, has unjustly invaded our kingdoms; and, by usurping a tyrannical and arbitrary power over the lives and property of our subjects, has exposed them to greater miseries than can be expressed; and as, unless we take care to prevent the consequences, the ruin of our kingdoms is inevitable; we authorise you, by this present, we require, and you are by this present authorised and required, to seize and secure the person of the Prince of Orange, and to bring him before us, taking to assist you such others of our faithful subjects in whom you can have most confidence; and we command you, and order all our lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, mayors, sheriffs, and other officers, civil and military, to assist you in the due execution of what is herein contained; and this present will be your authority for so doing.”* “Is it possible,” to adopt the words of Mr. Hallam, “to consider this language as anything else than an euphemism for assassination?” It has been objected that this paper is only a minute; that it does not appear to whom it was addressed; and that it might have been written by a minister of King Louis, and not of King James. The last objection is futile; and, as to the other two, we would observe,—1. That such minutes are not made and preserved in archives unless the subject-matter has been seriously entertained at some time. 2. That it matters not to whom the warrant was addressed, whether to Crosby or to any other spy, conspirator, or Jacobite. In James's Life, which denies or palliates everything, which is from beginning to end a course of special pleading, and in which we seldom know who speaks,—James or his priests,—it is said:—"It was a more than usual trouble to the king to see his project broke, his hopes blasted, and his friends ruined, by their pursuing methods contrary to his judgment, and without his consent; for he had (as we said) been long solicited to agree to something of that nature, but had still rejected it. About the end of the year 1693 a proposal had been made to the king, by one newly come out of England, of seizing and bringing away the Prince of Orange, and of making a rising in and about London; but his majesty would not hear of it, looking upon the project as impracticable, and exposing his friends when he had no prospect of seconding them; the same thing, some time after, was proposed again, and again rejected; notwithstanding which, in the beginning of the year 1695, it was a third time moved by one Crosby or Clench (as was mentioned before), who came from people that wished the king well (as he pretended), though another sort of men than those the king had hitherto corresponded with: these persons, he said, made no doubt of seizing the Prince of Orange, and bringing him off, but desired a warrant signed by his majesty to empower them to do it; this the king again rejected, and charged him not to meddle in any such matter, nor so much as to mention it any more when he returned for England, which he was then obliged to very soon, being only out upon bail; but notwithstanding this injunction, at his arrival in London, he drove it on what he could, and was so indiscreet and insolent as to encourage not only those people of his club to prepare, assuring them an order would soon be sent accordingly, but, having by some means or other found out several of the other club, as Mr. George Porter, Goodman, Sir William Perkins, and Charnock, engaged them to join with him; and, to gain the greater credit and reputation with them, assured them an order would speedily be sent to him for the executing of it. Some of them, indeed, gave no credit to what he said; but others, more credulous and zealous, sent about to hire a vessel for the purpose; but Mr. Charnock, doubting of the truth of what Crosby pretended, writ over to know, and was assured the contrary; upon which the project was laid quite aside by that club; but upon Sir George Barclay's being at London privately, to whom and others a power had been given to levy war and to head the rising (as was mentioned before), they proposed their old project to him, which it seems he accepted of, and prepared to attack the Prince of Orange with forty horse on the road as he went to, or came from, hunting at Richmond; whereas his commission imported no such thing." Yet, taking the words of King James himself,—where they are more easily distinguishable,*—it will appear that James does not deny in express terms that he had consented to the attempt to seize William's person in 1696. And we repeat once more, that he and his instruments must have known that such an attempt would end in murder. By the parliament of England, and by the vast majority of the people, the miserable old man was never allowed the benefit of a doubt; and the conspiracy did more good to William than anything which had yet happened. Both Houses immediately voted addresses of congratulation, with assurances that they would adhere to him against all his enemies, and in particular against the late King James; and declaring that they detested and would revenge so barbarous and villanous a design upon his enemies and their adherents if his majesty should ever come to any violent death. They suspended the Habeas Corpus Act, and voted the banishment of all papists from London and Westminster. In imitation of the Protestant Association, formed when the life of Queen Elizabeth was supposed to be in danger from Catholic conspirators, the Commons proposed an association for the defence of King William. In the words of the bond, in consequence of "a horrid and detestable conspiracy, formed and carried on by papists and other wicked and traitorous persons for assassinating his majesty's royal person, in order to encourage an invasion from France, &c., we whose names are hereunto subscribed do heartily, sincerely, and solemnly profess, testify, and declare, that his present majesty King William is rightful and lawful king of these realms." About four hundred members instantly signed this bond; but in the House of Lords the Tories still clung to their nice but confounding distinction between a king de facto and a king de jure; and they resisted the proposition of the Commons that the signing the bond of association should be indispensable for all who would pass for good and loyal subjects. The Lords, however, took up an expedient, and the Commons were obliged to content themselves with this compromise—"That his present majesty King William hath a right by law to the crown of this realm; and that neither King James, nor the pretended Prince of Wales, nor any other person, hath any right whatsoever to the same."† And in this shape the bond of association was generally signed, and that not merely in parliament,‡ but throughout the country. Ac-

* Extracts in Macpherson's State Papers.

† Burnet says that the Earl of Rochester offered the amendment, which was thought to answer the ends of the association, and at the same time not to revolt those Tories "who said they could not come up to the words 'rightful and lawful.'" He adds that fifteen of the peers refused to sign the bond even with this compromise, and that in the Commons there were fourscore that refused their signatures. Ralph says that it was refused by ninety-two of the Commons.

‡ "The association," says Burnet, "was carried from the Houses of Parliament over all England, and was signed by all sorts of people, a very few only excepted." Under date of the 15th of May, Evelyn enters in his Diary, "The association, with an oath, required of all lawyers and officers, on pain of preemunure, whereby men were obliged to renounce King James as no rightful king, and to revenge King William's death, if happening by assassination. This is to be taken up by all the council

ording to Burnet, the bishops also drew up a form for the clergy after the model of that signed by the lords with some small variation, which he says was so universally signed, that not above a hundred clergymen all over England refused it. Shortly after, on the 3rd of April, the bond of association was presented to his majesty at Kensington by the House of Commons in a body, who solemnly prayed that he would order it, together with all other associations of the like nature, to be lodged among the records of the Tower, there to remain as a perpetual memorial of loyalty and affection. As yet, however, the signing of the bond was not enforced by any law. But on the following day they resolved in the House that whosoever should, by word or writing, affirm the association to be illegal, should be deemed a promoter of the designs of King James, and an enemy to the laws and liberties of his country. Nearly at the same time the Commons unanimously resolved that a Bill should be brought in for the better security of King William, having these heads:—1. That such as should refuse the oaths to his majesty should be subject to the forfeitures and penalties of popish recusants convict. 2. That penalties should be inflicted on such as should call in question William's being lawful and rightful sovereign or question the Act of Settlement. 3. That the association should be ratified and confirmed by all good subjects whatsoever. 4. That no person refusing to sign the association should be capable of any office of profit or trust, civil or military. 5. That the same penalties should be inflicted upon such as came out of France into England as upon those that went thither. Several clauses were afterwards added to the bill, which was eventually passed under the title of An Act for the Better Security of His Majesty's Royal Person and Government: it was enacted, for example, that no one that refused the bond could be returned to parliament, and that no persons should be admitted into the service of the Princess Anne or her husband that did not sign it. Anne, according to the Gazette, had already signed the bond.* An order of council was issued for reviewing all the commissions of the peace, and for turning out all such magistrates as had not signed when the act was voluntary; and it appears that some justices were displaced accordingly. The session of parliament was closed on the 27th of April, after five millions had been voted as a supply.

At the critical moment when Barclay was with his cut-throats in London, and James, with the French army of invasion at Calais, it had so happened—or probably it had been so arranged by intriguers and traitors—that all the shipping in the

Downs consisted of one first-rate, two third-rates, eight fourth and fifth-rates, one fire-ship, and a brig; while all the rest of the ships of war that were in pay lay far asunder in different ports, poorly manned and provided.* But the French force did not move, and by the beginning of March Admiral Russell, who was again fully trusted, had collected eighty sail, small and great. Hoisting his flag on board the Victory, he sailed from the Downs and stood over to Calais, where he discovered some three or four hundred transports drawn close upon the shore, while about eighteen French men-of-war were at Dunkirk, close at hand. He bombarded Calais, left ships to blockade the coast, but did not venture upon the experiment which had been so successfully tried at La Hogue. The French people, exposed to fresh miseries and insults, cursed James as the cause of them, and declared that no enterprise would ever succeed under the influence of his evil star. The outcast sought consolation among the monks of La Trappe, in fasting and in self-inflicted flagellation. "But," says his biography, "whilst the king was thus turning his whole attention to the gaining a heavenly crown, to his great surprise an earthly one was offered him, not that which was his due, and which, for that reason alone, he desired, but one which gave the world a just idea of his merit, and how well he deserved to wear that which had been so unjustly torn from his head. Towards the end of this summer his most Christian majesty sent M. Pomponne to the king, to acquaint him he had received an account from Abbé Polignac, who was then ambassador in Poland, that the people of that country had some thoughts of him in the election they were about to make of a new king, and that some particular diets had already named him: this, at the first sight, seemed not to be despised, and many of his majesty's friends of the court of France persuaded him to give into it, but he made no other reply at that time than that he should ever retain a grateful remembrance of the esteem and kindness those persons had shown him; but as soon as he saw his most Christian majesty (he) told him he could not possibly accept it, were it offered, much less use any endeavours to obtain it; that it would amount to an abdication, indeed, of what was really his due, and therefore he was resolved to remain as he was, though he had less hopes of being restored than ever, rather than do

* Burchet, Life of William.—Evelyn, writing on the 26th of February, just after the detection of the plot, says, "But as it pleased God that Admiral Rooke wanting a wind to pursue his voyage to the Straits, that squadron, with others at Portsmouth and other places, were still in the Channel, and were soon brought up to join with the rest of the ships which could be got together, so that there is hope this plot may be broken. I look on it as a very great deliverance and prevention by the providence of God. Though many did formerly pity King James's condition, this design of assassination and bringing over a French army alienated many of his friends, and was like to produce a more perfect establishment of King William." And on the 1st of March he says, "The wind continuing N. and E. all this week brought so many of our men-of-war together, that though most of the French, finding their design detected and prevented, made a shift to get into Calais and Dunkirk Roads, we

by a day limited, so that the Courts of Chancery and King's Bench hardly heard any cause in Easter Term, so many crowded to take the oath. This was censured as a very extrajudicial contrivance of the parliament, in expectation that many in high office would lay down, and others surrender."

the least act which might prejudice his family or be hurtful to religion. There could not be a greater instance that it was the public good and his obligation to the prince his son and family, and not a thirst after rule and dominion, that made the king never lay aside the endeavours of regaining his right; which, as it will render his memory glorious, so it will bring an eternal blemish upon the people of England, for having rejected their lawful hereditary monarch, though he was so well qualified to govern them, that an elective kingdom was disposed to make choice of him preferable to all the world besides.* But in truth there was no more chance of James's being elective king of the Poles, than there was of his becoming hereditary sultan and caliph of the Turks. The meaning of the message sent through M. Pomponne was this:—Louis was already negotiating with King William that peace which was concluded a few months after, and he wished to turn James's thoughts away from England, and also, perhaps, to throw one sweet drop into the cup of his affliction.

William had arrived on the Continent early in May, but his campaign this year was far from being brilliant. A short time before his arrival in the allied camp the Earl of Athlone (Ginckel) and Cohorn had attacked and destroyed a vast magazine of ammunition and military stores which the French had collected at Givet. But this was the solitary exploit of the year: Marshal Villeroy and the king of England marched and counter-marched, and never came to a battle. Upon the Rhine operations were equally bloodless and indecisive. But in Catalonia there had been some hard fighting, and M. de Vendome, who had succeeded Noailles, fought a pitched battle, and gained a dearly-purchased victory over the Spaniards. On the Danube, where the emperor, the nominal head of the confederacy, was obliged to keep up a great army, which prevented his reinforcing the allies in Flanders, the Imperialists fought one battle in the month of August, and then rested from their fatigues. It was at this moment that Russia or Muscovy, under the young Czar Peter I. first began to enter the lists as a European power. The surrender of Asoph to Russian arms seemed an important event, and an indication of coming changes which were then as welcome to the greater part of Europe as they have since been unwelcome and alarming. The Emperor Leopold was most eager for the alliance of the Czar against their common enemy the Sultan, and the whole family of European princes and states perceived that a hitherto half-barbarous and half-forgotten country must have its weight and influence in all future great political arrangements. Yet the event which was more immediately interesting to William and the English was the defection of the Duke of Savoy, who wavered again, and, it is said upon assurances secretly transmitted to Turin by the court of Versailles at the beginning of the year, that King James must inevitably be restored to his throne in consequence of extraordinary measures then concerted, went to Torretto as if upon a pilgrimage, and there, in great secrecy, signed a separate treaty with France.* This clandestine proceeding was soon suspected; and in the course of the summer the Duke of Savoy pulled off his mask, and declared his intention of establishing a neutrality in all Italy, which was a leading clause of his secret treaty. His late allies, the emperor, and the kings of Spain and England, complained loudly of his desertion, and refused to accede to the neutrality, which had, in fact, been recommended by the pope, in order to save the Peninsula from the ravages of a war which only went to determine whether French or Austrians and Spaniards should have the dominion of that beautiful land. Then the Duke of Savoy put himself at the head of the French army in Italy and of his own troops, invaded the duchy of Milan, then in the possession of Spain, and invested the fortress of Valencia. The court of Spain having no troops to spare, and being at the same time threatened by invasions and insurrections at Naples, her possession at the other end of the Peninsula was thus forced to accede to the neutrality; and thereupon the Duke of Savoy retired across his own frontier, and Louis XIV. ordered Te Deums to be sung at Paris for the happy termination of the war in Italy—for the grand monarch, who had figured so long as a conqueror, now took to himself the merit of peace-maker. William, at the same moment, was compelled to listen to the wishes of the Dutch, who had received overtures of peace from Louis. These overtures, made under the mediation of Sweden, were accepted by the States General; and on the 3rd of September their high mightinesses came to a solemn resolution that the concessions of France afforded a good ground for a treaty. The terms were communicated to the other members of the confederacy. Some of the minor powers would have accepted them, but the emperor and even the king of Spain, weak as he was, rejected them altogether, insisting that the declarations of France were not sufficiently explicit,—that the treaty of Westphalia ought to be renewed

* The Duke of Savoy was considered, not without reason, as holding in his hands the keys of Italy; but his power and resources were too limited to make head in all the passes of the Alps against France and Austria, and at the same time to control the wavering and always jealous states that lay beyond his dominions in Italy. The witty Prince de Ligne was accustomed to say of him that his geographical position prevented his being honest. He had been tampering with the French ever since 1693, when he lost the battle of Marsaglia—the first battle, it is said, in which the attack was made (by the French) with the bayonet and sword alone. Prince Eugene, whose heart was with the confederates, tried to keep him to his treaty; but the prince was not much surprised when he heard that the duke had met at the shrine of Loreto with the private agents of France and Venice, who were disguised as monks. By his treaty with France he stipulated for the marriage of his eldest daughter with the Duke of Burgundy, son to the dauphin, and for the restitution of all his dominions, including even Fignorol, which the French had held for more than half a century. These conditions prove the importance to Louis of the neutrality or alliance of Savoy.

Life from the Stuart Papers, &c. Just about this time our old acquaintance Titus Oates, who was alive and flourishing upon a pension, "dedicated" Mrs. Evelyn, "a most villainous reviling look against King James, which he presumed to present to King William, who could not but abhor it, speaking so infamously and untruly of his late beloved queen's own father"—Diary.

in all its parts as the only proper basis of a lasting peace,—and that the King of Sweden, as guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia, should join his forces with those of the allies, in case France should refuse to accede to that treaty.

William returned to England; and on the 20th of October, the day appointed for the meeting of parliament, he informed the two Houses that overtures for peace had been made by the enemy. "But," said he, "I am sure we shall agree in opinion that the only way of treating with France is with our swords in our hands." Both Houses returned a cordial reply; but the Commons were warmest. After stating that this was the eighth year that they had assisted his majesty with large supplies for carrying on a just and a necessary war,—that this war had cost the nation much blood as well as treasure,—they added that the benefits procured to religion and liberty were not dearly purchased even at this price; and they pledged themselves to provide not only the necessary supplies for continuing the war with vigour, but also for the payment of the public debt, which had been gradually accumulating in consequence of the deficiencies of the revenue. That able Whig, Montague, chancellor of the exchequer, stepped forward with a very bold scheme. It appeared that six millions would be required for the current expenses of the year; and that the floating debt, which they undertook to discharge, exceeded five millions. If the chancellor of the exchequer had pursued the old routine, he could scarcely have got voted a greater supply than six millions; but he boldly proposed to provide the expenses of the year 1697 within the year, by means of a land-tax of three shillings in the pound, and a heavy capitation or poll tax; that the deficiency of funds, the low state of public credit, and the want of circulating medium, should be remedied by some new imposts, and by continuing some old ones about to expire to the year 1706, and by borrowing money upon state counters or exchequer tallies, bearing interest and being secured upon supplies voted in succeeding sessions:—and both Commons and Lords concurred in all these measures, and adopted the last and startling innovation, which continued to be acted upon in subsequent times till the national debt of England became one of the wonders of the world. Lord Bolingbroke, who fancied that this creation of funds by forestalling and borrowing would prove fatal to the liberties of the country, by annually increasing taxes and the power of the crown, says, "I am not, however, so uncharitable as to believe that the authors of these measures intended to bring upon their country all the mischiefs that we, who come after them, experience and apprehend. No: they saw the measures they took singly and unrelatively, or relatively alone to some immediate object. The notion of attaching men to the new government by tempting them to embark their fortunes on the same bottom, was a reason of state to some; the notion of creating a new, that is, a monied interest, in opposition to the landed interest, or as a balance to it, was a reason of party to others: and the opportunity of amassing immense estates by the management of funds, by trafficking in paper, and by all the arts of jobbing, was a reason of private interest to those who supported and improved this scheme, if not to those who devised it."^{*} At the same time the privileges of the infant Bank of England were considerably extended, and an increase in its capital took place.

Sir John Fenwick, who had been deeply engaged in the late invasion plot, as in several others, and whose name had appeared in the proclamation, was seized at New Romney† in the course of the summer. He was preparing to sail for France, at that moment an offence all but capital in itself; and he was forthwith committed to the Tower. A letter was intercepted which he had written to his wife, and in which he had said that nothing could save his life except the family interest of the Howards, with whom he was allied through her, or the securing of a jury.‡ This was held, without sufficient attention to the strict laws of evidence, as a proof and confession of his guilt. When brought before the Lords of the Regency he stoutly denied the charges against him, but, at the production of the letter to his wife, he changed colour, faltered, and seemed inclined to admit his guilt, with some modifications. On the 10th of August, when he had been nearly two months in prison, Sir John gave a long confession, written in his own hand, to the Duke of Devonshire, making that nobleman pass his word that it should be communicated to King William only.§ "And I believe," says Devonshire, in enclosing the document, "your majesty, when you read it, will not wonder that he exacted that promise from me. I may truly say I should have been very glad not to have been trusted with this secret, being very unwilling to believe what is there suggested of persons for whom I have a great respect, and which, as your majesty may please to observe, is for the most part hearsay. All that I can say is, that, whether your majesty gives no credit at all to that part of this paper, or if you do, and, in consideration of the difference of times, would have no notice taken of it, some of them being in places of the highest trust, and in all

† "He was taken at a house by the side of the road from Great Bookham to Stoke Dabernon, in Surrey, near Styfield Mill, as I was told by the great grandson of Mr. Evelyn.—W. B."—Notes to Evelyn's Diary.—One Webber, an attorney, who was also lying in wait for an opportunity to escape into France, was taken with him.

‡ According to Burnet, Fenwick's notion of making sure of a jury was, "that some of the jury should be hired to starve out the rest."

§ "It appears," says Burnet, by his discoveries, "that the Jacobites in England were much divided; some were called compounders, and others non-compounders. The first sort desired securities from King James for the preservation of the liberties and religion of England; whereas the second sort were for trusting him upon discretion, without asking him any terms,—putting all in his power, and relying entirely on his honour and generosity: these seemed, indeed, to act more suitably to the great principle upon which they all insisted,—that kings have their power from God, and are accountable only to him for the exercise of it. Dr. Lloyd, the deprived Bishop of Norwich, was the only eminent clergyman that went into this: and, therefore, all that party had, upon Sanctori's death, recommended him to King James to have his nomination for Canterbury." But this is rather a general description of the two classes of plotters than a précis of what is in the confession or confessions of Fenwick.

appearance very firm to your interest now, I humbly beg leave to assure your majesty that, whatever part of this paper you would have kept secret shall remain so inviolably for me.* Fenwick, in fact, confessed that ever since King James's departure from Ireland there was a select number of his friends entrusted by him to manage his affairs here, who held a constant correspondence with him and his secretary of state, and who used all methods possible to advance his interests by engaging men in place, in the government, fleet, and army, and by remitting accounts to France that might encourage Louis to attempt his restoration; that, up to the winter preceding the business of La Hogue, no member of William's government, except Lord Godolphin, was known by him as holding a constant correspondence with St. Germain; that Lord Middleton had been going and coming, and treating in London with Shrewsbury and Godolphin and other men in office; that, when James and the French were at La Hogue, Captain Lloyd, a groom of the bed-chamber to King James, was sent over to his majesty from Lord Marlborough and Admiral Russell, with an assurance of their interest in the army and fleet if he would only grant them his pardon for what was past; that the Duke of Shrewsbury, in returning to office under King William, had assured James that it was only to be more capable of doing him service, &c. But of all these double dealers none was so strongly denounced as Marlborough, whom Fenwick described as being entirely depended upon by the exiled monarch. There was, however, scarcely a word in this confession that could be new to William, who weighed well the advice of the Duke of Devonshire, and determined neither to proceed against Shrewsbury, Marlborough, Russell, and their satellites, nor to interfere to save the life of Fenwick. In fact, with the exception of Marlborough, most of the denounced traitors enjoyed at the time that portion of his confidence and favour which the king was wont to bestow on such personages; and, by making such a confession in those circumstances, Fenwick whetted the axe for his own neck. The prisoner, persevering in this fatal course, delivered a second confession, which, however, seemed chiefly meant to make it appear that neither King James nor any of the gentlemen that adhered to him had ever sanctioned Crosby's plan for seizing William, it being always understood that thereby nothing could be intended but assassination. On the 8th of September the inculpated Shrewsbury writes to King William to rebut the charges;—by which it is pretty evident that the Duke of Devonshire had not kept his promise of secrecy to the prisoner. Shrewsbury cannot find words to express his surprise at the impudent and unaccountable accusations of Sir John Fenwick: he, however, allows that he had seen Lord Middleton several times; but this he excuses on account of the nearness of their alliance. He goes on to say—"One night at supper, when he (Middleton) was pretty well in drink, he told me he intended to go beyond seas, and asked me if I would command him no service: I then told him, by the course he was taking, it would never be in his power to do himself or his friends service; and if the time should come that he expected, I looked upon myself as an offender not to be forgiven." In this letter Shrewsbury makes sure of William's forgiveness, but wishes it were as easy "to answer for the reasonableness of the generality of the world." "When such an invention," says he, "shall be made public, they may perhaps make me incapable of serving you; but if till now I had had neither interest nor inclination, the noble and frank manner with which your majesty has used me upon this occasion shall ever be owned with all the gratitude in my power." On the 18th of the following month of October, only two days before the meeting of parliament, Shrewsbury wrote again to the king, humbly and earnestly begging his majesty to allow him to return the seals, "it being not fit that a person labouring under such suspicions should serve in so nice an employment as that of his majesty's secretary." Shrewsbury was entreated or commanded to remain in the ministry; and the destruction of Fenwick was made so much the surer.* Burnet says that Fenwick offered no evidence except his own word,† which he had stipulated should not be made use of; that he took especial care to charge none of his own party (that is, the non-compounders or thorough-going Jacobites, who desired no security and made no bargains except merely personal ones with James); that he offered not the least shadow or circumstance to support his accusations; that, afterwards, when examined by the lords of the regency upon oath, he took care to name none of his own side but those who were committed by other evidence, or who were safe and beyond sea; that the most his discovery could signify was to awaken old jealousies; and, finally, that his main design in making it was to gain time in order to practise upon the witnesses. And it is quite certain that these practices were not only resorted to, but employed with great success. By means of his wife, Sir John began with Captain Porter, who was ready to swear that the prisoner had been engaged in Barclay's plots. Porter was offered a good sum in hand and an annuity for life if he would go beyond sea, and so invalidate the testimony—for there was only one other witness, and in cases of treason the law absolutely required two. But Porter, who had at the time, or shortly after, a pension from the government of 260*l.* a-year, pretended to entertain the proposition, and drew Lady Fenwick and the friends who were acting with her to bring the money that he

† "It is now well known that Fenwick's discoveries were not a step beyond the truth. Their effect, however, was beneficial to the state, as, by displaying a strange want of secrecy in the court of St. Germain's, Fenwick never having had any direct communication with those he accused, it caused Godolphin and Marlborough to break off their dangerous course of perfidy."—*Italian, Const. was to receive to a certain apartment, where he had provided witnesses to overhear all that passed. At a given signal the secreted witnesses rushed in and seized Lady Fenwick and the rest with their money-bags. This practice was fully proved, and the persons concerned in it were censured or punished. But this did not prevent Lady Fenwick from practising with Goodman, the other witness, who was prevailed upon to go out of England.

A. D. 1697.—Sir John Fenwick now thought his life safe; but the confessions he had sent to the king had arrayed against him an implacable and a most formidable band, who resolved to strike him by attainder in parliament. Admiral Russell, one of those upon whom his accusations lay the heaviest, rose in the Commons, and, as he said, by the king's permission, laid the two written confessions of the prisoner upon the table. After a reading which excited a tempest, in which the guiltiest were the loudest, Fenwick was brought before the House; and, as he refused to give any further account of the matters contained in them, unless upon condition of a full pardon, the papers were voted false, scandalous, and made only to create jealousies; and a bill of attainder was brought in presently. This bill, however, encountered at every stage great opposition in both Houses. "The debates," says Burnet, "were the hottest and held the longest of any that ever I knew." The Tories, the semi or entire Jacobites, fought for the unhappy prisoner, and insisted upon a delicate regard to the laws of evidence and the laws of treason, which they had over and over disregarded when they were in power; and the Whigs strained these laws and made up evidence somewhat in the fashion of which they had formerly complained so loudly, and of which some of their party had been the victims upon the scaffold. Goodman, before he had fled or been bought over, had signed a pretty ample confession made in the course of an examination before Secretary Vernon, and he had, besides, on the trial of some of the Barclay conspirators who had suffered death, sworn point blank to Sir John Fenwick's being engaged in that conspiracy; and it was resolved by a majority of the Commons that all this should be received as legal evidence; as also the depositions of two grand-jurymen, as to the confessions he (Goodman) had made upon oath before them previously to their finding the bill of indictment against Fenwick. It was easy to prove—and the crown counsel and the supporters of the bill in the Commons did prove—that Lady Fenwick had tampered unsuccessfully with Porter, and successfully with Goodman, to get them out of the way.

At the final division of the Commons upon the guilt of Fenwick (which was clear enough, though it could not be proved except by resorting to a blameable and dangerous straining of the rules of law), and upon the consequent passing of the bill of attainder, the Whig majority was only 189 to 156.

In the Lords, after a most vehement debate, it was carried only by 68 to 61.* The Duke of Devonshire, who had received Fenwick's confession in the Tower, voted against the bill, and Shrewsbury had the delicacy to absent himself from the debate—though it is possible that this absence might be occasioned by a severe fit of sickness which he was then suffering. The Lords Godolphin and Bath, two others of those whom Fenwick had accused, voted against the bill, and appeared earnest for the preservation of their accuser; but Marlborough had none of this generosity or decency; he supported the bill, and induced the Princess Anne's husband to do the same; and this is said to have been the very first instance in which Marlborough voted with the Whigs against the Tories. Archbishop Tension and Bishop Burnet, who would have done well to remember the ancient canon of the church which prohibited church-men from sitting on a case of blood, both voted with the majority.† The royal assent was soon given to the bill, for which, however, William had not been anxious. Fenwick then made all possible application to the king for a reprieve; but the majority who voted his attainder were eager for his death: the royal ear was filled by these men, and Fenwick was beheaded upon Tower-hill on the 28th of January. "He died," says Burnet, "very composed, in a much better temper than was to be expected; for his life had been very irregular. At the place of his execution, he delivered a paper in writing, wherein he did not deny the facts that had been sworn against him, but complained of the injustice of the procedure, and left his thanks to those who had voted against the bill. He owned his loyalty to king James, and to the Prince of Wales after him; but mentioned the design of assassinating King William, in terms full of horror." The eccentric and unscrupulous Earl of Monmouth (Peterborough) was implicated in this business, and was sent for a short time to the Tower, for having, as it was said, encouraged Fenwick to persist in his accusation of his own personal enemy Shrewsbury.

On the 16th of April William closed the session, and took leave of his parliament, with an assurance that the administration of affairs would be

* "The Lords took a very extraordinary method to force all their absent members to come up: they sent messengers for them to bring them up, which seemed to be a great breach on their dignity; for the privilege of making a proxy was an undoubted right belonging to their peerage; but those who intended to throw out the bill resolved to have a full House."—Burnet, Own Time.

† Burnet says that he had a much larger share in this "unaccountable affair" than might seem to become a man of his profession; but that the House of Lords, by severe votes, obliged all the peers to be present, and to give their votes in the matter. But this compulsion ought to have had no more power over Burnet and Tension than it had over the bishops who kept away. Burnet acknowledges that he delivered an elaborate speech against Fenwick: he says, "Since I was, therefore, convinced that he was guilty of the crime laid to his charge, and that such a method of proceeding was not only lawful, but in some cases necessary; and since, by the search I made into attainders and parliamentary proceedings, when I wrote the History of the Reformation, I had seen further into those matters than otherwise I should ever have done; I thought it was incumbent on me, when my opinion determined me to the severer side, to offer what reasons occurred to me in justification of my vote. But this did not exempt me from falling under a great load of censure upon this occasion." Forty-one peers protested against the attainder; and in this number were eight bishops.

left during his absence on the continent in the hands of such persons as he could depend on. It was strange to see Lord Sunderland put forward as one of these trustworthy men: that adroit and treble-sided politician was now made Lord Chamberlain and one of the council of regency. Admiral Russell had been gratified with the blood of Fenwick, and he now received the further gratification of being raised to the peerage with the title of Earl of Orford: and at the same time the lord-keeper was made Lord Chancellor and a peer, with the title of Lord Somers, Baron of Evesham. The summer passed over very quietly in England, for the Jacobites were now humble and silent; and the Marlboroughs, the Russells, and the rest had had a happy escape from the charges of Fenwick, whose accusations were perfectly true, though he was unable and unwilling to substantiate them. Besides, the hopeless reprobated condition into which King James had fallen, and the evident symptoms of an earnest desire for peace on the part of France, did at last pretty well dissipate their doubts and fears of a restoration. And when there was nothing to gain by dishonesty and double dealing, and nothing to lose by the opposite conduct, these model politicians made up their minds to be honest—though their honesty after all was comparative, and still modified, in most cases, by that spirit which was denominated by the Commonwealth men “self-seeking.”

The campaign in Flanders was opened by the French with unexpected vigour; or rather, the allies, trusting too much to diplomacy, had neglected arms. M. Catinat, who had been allowed by the cessation of hostilities in Italy to come into Flanders, invested the town of Aeth before William reached the continent; and when his majesty took the field, he found the French besieging army covered by another under Villeroy and Boufflers. Aeth was taken, but the French were prevented from advancing towards Brussels, which they intended either to take or to bombard. The allied forces, and the French under Catinat, Villeroy, and Boufflers, then chose advantageous camps and lay inactive all the rest of the summer. We shall presently see, however, that the pen was not so inactive as the sword. In Catalonia the French, reinforced under the command of the Duke of Vendome, took the important city of Barcelona, an event which forced the court of Spain to think of peace, and to lower the loftiness of its tone. On the Rhine even less was done in the way of fighting than in the Low Countries; but on the Danube the army of the emperor, now commanded by Prince Eugene of Savoy, thoroughly defeated the Turks, led by the sultan in person, at the great battle of Zenta. His imperial majesty instantly dispatched a courier to the States General, hoping that the news of this signal victory might induce them to break off those negotiations with France to which he was as averse as ever. Poland had become the scene of French intrigues, and plans had been formed there which might have tended greatly to strengthen Louis XIV. John Sobieski, the brave reliever of Vienna, had died the preceding year. The candidates for that elective and most troublesome crown were, as usual, very numerous; and at one moment the Abbé Polignac, the French ambassador, had, it was thought, by lavishing vast sums of money among the mercenary nobles, secured the election of the Prince of Conti. Nay, the primate of Poland proclaimed that French prince, and sang Te Deum; and Conti even set out from Paris to take possession of that crown and kingdom. But, on the other hand, the Bishop of Cujavia proclaimed Augustus Elector of Saxony, King of Poland, and sang Te Deum in another place; and when Conti arrived, he found Augustus master of the capital and kingdom. Of the venal and factious nobles that generally made a market and a fight of a new election, each faction accused the other of corruption and treachery: the Polish people, who were mere serfs, looked on with stupid indifference, or only felt the curse of the system which eventually ruined what ought to have been one of the finest nations of Europe, when they were pillaged and plundered by the contending parties, and made to bear all the worst evils of that frightful anarchy. The Prince of Conti, after a short struggle, returned to Paris, and the Elector of Saxony, the accommodating Augustus, who changed his religion to qualify himself to be king of the Catholic Poles, remained on the throne till driven from it by that heroic madman Charles XII. of Sweden. During the election there was a talk of a James;—but it was James Sobieski, son of the deceased king, and not James Stuart. At this moment Poland hung together only because her neighbours were either not strong enough to attack her, or were engaged in other extensive wars; but Sobieski, in the course of his hard struggle with the Turks, had been obliged to purchase the alliance and assistance of Russia with the fatal treaty of Moscow, signed in the year 1686, by which he ceded in perpetuity to the Russians the greater part of the Ukraine and of the rich country watered by the Borysthènes (or Dnieper); and now the young Czar Peter looked forward with a confident hope to much vaster aggrandisements, and to the occupancy of the post of the first power of the North.*

* It was during this present year (1697) that that wonderful Muscovite, in search of the means of civilising himself and his people, came into Holland, where he occupied himself for some time in learning practically the art of ship-building. Peter and William met at Utrecht: and after a conference of two hours, they separated with expressions of mutual friendship and esteem. The Czar having expressed an earnest desire to pass into England, the king ordered three men-of-war and a yacht under the command of an admiral to conduct him to the Thames. Under the date of the 30th of January, 1698, Evelyn enters in his diary,—“The Czar of Muscovy being come to England, and having a mind to see the building of ships, hired my house at Say’s Court, and made it his court and palace, new furnished for him by the king.” Evelyn had made Say’s Court, which was close by the dock-yards at Deptford, a beautiful place, and had bestowed great pains on the gardens and grounds. The hard-drinking, half-barbarous Muscovites made a sad havoc, not respecting even a magnificent hedge-row of hollies, which was very respecting even to the old owner’s heart. Whilst the Czar Peter was in his house, one of Evelyn’s servants writes to him,—“There is a house full of people, and right nasty. The Czar lies next your library, and

While the armies of the French and the confederates enjoyed their ease in Flanders, the Earl of Portland and Marshal Boufflers were busily engaged, at first in a small cottage in the plains of Halle, and subsequently at Brussels, in adjusting the terms of a treaty. Preliminaries were soon signed, and the King of England, after signifying to all the plenipotentiaries assembled at Brussels that he had settled his *separate concerns with France, retired to his country house at Loo. Then the treaty was carried on slowly and cautiously to a conclusion, at Ryswick, a house belonging to William, between the Hague and Delft. The diplomatists of Spain were humble; but not so those of the emperor, who prolonged discussion on many essential points. The chief of the English diplomatists was the Earl of Pembroke, a man of eminent virtue and of some learning, particularly in the mathematics. "This," says Burnet, "made him a little too speculative and abstracted in his notions: he had great application, but he lived a little too much out of the world, though in a public station." The King of Sweden, Charles XI., had been accepted as mediator, but he died before any great progress was made in the treaty. His son, Charles XII., a youth of fifteen, was admitted to succeed him in the mediation, and the first act of the reign of that most warlike of sovereigns was of a most peaceful character. He intimated, through his ambassador and plenipotentiary at Ryswick, that his father had persevered till death in his purpose of fulfilling his engagements as mediator and guarantee, and had recommended from his death-bed the same line of conduct to his successor, who inherited the same inclinations for a pacific settlement of this long war.

The helpless court of St. Germain was soon made aware of the inevitable result of the negotiations, which could be no less than the acknowledgment and recognition of William. James appealed to the emperor by means of an agent "dispatched privately away to Vienna with the approbation of the court of France;" and, if we are to believe that very doubtful authority, the Jacobite Life of James, Louis XIV. authorised this secret agent "to propose to the emperor the setting up of a separate treaty with his most Christian majesty, who promised better terms than could be expected by a general one,"*—that is, by the treaty going on at Ryswick, where Louis's negotiator, Harlay, was professing at the time a most edifying sincerity and singleness of purpose to all the allies. James's agent, who was probably a priest or a monk, addressed himself to one Father Eclera, a Jesuit of his acquaintance, who had great credit at the court of Vienna. The emperor, however, refused to admit the envoy to a private audience;† but he appears to have read a memorial, wherein James described his pitiful case. "So," continues the Jacobite Memoir, "he appointed his confessor, Father Millingatti, to acquaint him that he had done nothing but what was both conscientious and allowed of by common practice of Christian princes; that he entered into that league against France for self-preservation against an unjust aggressor; that he did not attack King James, or go about to invade his right, but made use of the force of a man in power to preserve his own state from oppression and ruin; that, in acknowledging the Prince of Orange for king, he followed the consent of the whole nation and the example of other princes, who had done the like to Queen Elizabeth and Cromwell; that he entered not into any league with the Prince of Orange till that prince was settled in England; that it was not the first time Catholic princes had made such leagues," &c. Applications to the pope were equally unsuccessful; for, besides other considerations, what Innocent most wanted was a lasting peace; and the pacification of Italy was a matter of far greater importance to him and his country than the restoration of James, which, if to be procured at all, could be brought about only by a renewed and a long war. After the failure of these efforts James pressed hard to have his plenipotentiary received at Ryswick; but that conference unanimously refused to admit him in any way as a party to the negotiations. Then the court of St. Germain put forth a manifesto professing to give a faithful account of the Revolution of 1688, and of the crying injustices James had suffered all along. "His majesty hoped that the confederate princes would have some regard to their own security, in discountenancing such wicked attempts on the right of sovereignty; and that they would, for the sake of truth and justice, which had been panies in the parlour next your study. He dines at ten o'clock and six at night; is very seldom at home a whole day; very often in the king's yard, or by water, dressed in several dresses. The king is expected three times a day: the best parlour is pretty clean for him to be entertained in. The king pays for all he has." And after the departure of Peter, Evelyn himself deploras the miserable condition in which the Czar had left his house, after making it his court for three months.

* According to Burnet, the subject of the "separate concern" and of the private conferences between Portland and Boufflers was the exiled family. The bishop says, "They met four times and were long alone: that lord (Portland) told me himself, that the subject of those conferences was concerning King James. The king desired to know how the King of France intended to dispose of him, and how he could own him and yet support the other. The King of France would not renounce the protecting him by any article of the treaty; but it was agreed between them that the King of France should give him no assistance, nor give the king any disturbance on his account; and that he should retire from the court of France, either to Avignon or to Italy. On the other hand, his queen should have 50,000*l.* a-year, which was her jointure, settled after his death, and that it should now be paid her, he being reckoned as dead to the nation; and in this the king very readily acquiesced. These meetings made the treaty go on with more dispatch, this tender point being once settled." M. de Torcy, who had his information from Boufflers himself, confirms Burnet in saying, "For the future security of his master, the Earl of Portland demanded that this unfortunate prince (James) should be obliged to remain out of France, to follow his unlucky star to Rome, or to whatever part of the world he might prefer." But he adds that Boufflers insisted that a general act of grace should be granted by William to all the English who had followed the fortunes of James, and that they should all be restored to their estates, &c.

* According to the same authority, "the restitution of Lorraine by Louis seemed to be what the emperor most insisted upon; yet there was so much diffidence on both sides, and the person sent by the king not sufficiently trusted or entrusted by the court of France, that it (the private treaty) vanished likewise."

† Under pretence, "says the Memoir, of a letter lately written to that court, full of deep resentment, from the Prince of Orange, for their having admitted a person from St. Germain's, with the privacy of the court of France, to treat of affairs very prejudicial to his interest."

so visibly abused, their own honour, the public peace, and good of religion, endeavour his restoration." The Prince of Orange was accused of destroying and persecuting the Catholics; and, in proof of James's attachment to the faith, it was asserted that, if he, the king, had been willing to have given the young prince, his son, to be educated as a Protestant, the Prince of Orange would have been disappointed. James further declared that, as to the expedient which had been proposed, of permitting the Prince of Orange to possess the throne for his life, and appointing his son, the Prince of Wales, to succeed him, nothing could be more contradictory to reason, and the duty his majesty owed himself, his posterity, and his people. And here the old doctrine of divine right blazed forth as hotly as it had done when he was the master of a crown, and of fleets and armies: his misfortunes and humiliations had suggested no notion of the divine right of the people to be well governed. "To admit of such a compromise," said the manifesto, "were to suffer the fundamental laws of the kingdom to be altered by a tumultuous assembly of revolted subjects,—to suffer himself to be deposed, and his son to owe that to their gift which is his own by right of inheritance, and the uncontested laws of a successive monarchy: and therefore his majesty was incapable of so low and degenerate an action."* The Jacobites pretended great astonishment that so plain a representation should not have altered the decisions at Ryswick and the politics of all Europe, and complained bitterly that James was totally neglected and given up by Louis XIV. himself, who was so bent upon a peace as to forget his former resolution of restoring James by force of arms, and to recognise, like the rest of the contracting parties in the treaty, the title and right of the usurper William. Pride, however, forbade their admitting that, though kindly and delicately treated by the French court, their exiled king had been but as a mere card in the hands of Louis, who used him according to the turns of the game. Recourse was had to a new protest, that most useless of all diplomatic papers: and "James, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland," &c., informed all princes, potentates, &c., that he disclaimed and denied all proceedings adopted, and all articles inserted, in the treaty of Ryswick, which had been concluded without his participation. The princes of Christendom were once more reminded how dangerous the precedent of the English Revolution might prove to themselves, and that his cause was the common cause of all sovereigns; they were called upon to assist him in the recovery of his kingdom, and were told to reflect "how glorious such a revolution would be, and how suitable to the true interest of those who are born to govern." For himself and his lawful heirs James solemnly protested against the usurper,—against all treaties of alliance, confederacy, or commerce made with England since the usurpation,—against all acts whatsoever of the pretended parliaments of England. What did him better service (and it might have done him more good than it did if he had consented to remove from France, or if Louis had enforced the conditions in regard to which William was so liberal) was the arrangement already mentioned, entered into through the tender care of Louis, that he should be allowed, or that his queen should be allowed, a pension of 50,000*l.* a-year.

By the treaty of Ryswick, which was signed on the 20th of September, England obtained better conditions than had been offered in the winter of 1695; so that William had not persevered so much longer in the war for nothing. The great principle of the treaty was restitution or a return towards the status quo ante bellum. Spain and Austria had long insisted that the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen should be renewed to the letter;* and though that was found impracticable, those treaties were, in a manner, the basis of the present. Louis XIV. restored to the empire, to Spain, to Holland, to the Duke of Lorraine, and to minor potentates, nearly everything that he had taken from them; but Strasburg, described by Louis himself as one of the principal ramparts of the empire and of heresy, was yielded up absolutely by the emperor and by the empire to France, which was also allowed to retain several important fortresses along the Flanders frontier. The French diplomatists tried hard to keep Luxembourg, but it was restored to Spain. The French people,

* According to the writer of this portion of James's Memoirs, and also according to the Memoirs of the Duke of Berwick, the project of appointing the young Prince of Wales successor to William was seriously entertained by Le... and was not rejected by William: but Ja... indignant at it, and his wife declared that she would rather see her son lie dead before her than become the usurper of his father's throne. "His most Christian majesty," says the Life, "had undertaken prevailed with the Prince of Orange to consent. . . . That necessary prince, it seems, had no great regard to the pretended souls of his- ming, nor to the acts of parliament which excluded the Prince of Wales and all of that persuasion from the succession." We scarcely need hint at the very unsatisfactory nature of this evidence. Such an arrangement, instead of securing William on his throne for his life—the selfish motive which is attributed to him—would have precipitated him from it at once, and the English parliament and people would never have received back a Catholic child bred up in abhorrence of their religion. It is true that William had no great affection for the Princess Anne, his successor by the act of settlement: but Anne, as a Protestant, would not only be acceptable to the nation, but also bound, bon gré mal gré, to persevere in his darling system of politics, and to stand on the eminent as a head of the confederacy hostile to France. We have less difficulty, though not much less, in believing another story, told in the Memoir, to this effect.—In the preceding year James had "some glimmering views towards a restoration, on account of the Prince of Orange's ill health, whom he conceived to be the only obstacle; and at that moment the Princess Anne, who had all along kept up a fair correspondence with the king, full of assurances of duty and repentance. . . wrote to the king to know whether he would please to permit her to accept it (the crown), should the Prince of Orange die, and it to offer to her. . . . She accompanied this request with a seeming sense of her duty, and a readiness to make restitution when opportunities should serve; and that, should she refuse it, considering the present disposition the kingdom was in, it would only remove his majesty the further from the hopes of recovering his right, by putting the government into worse hands, out of which he could not so easily retrieve it." But, according to his biography, "this suited no ways with the king's temper: . . besides, he knew that, of all restitutions, none is harder to make than that of a crown." If Anne really made this offer, nothing can more clearly prove the imbecility and fatuity of the Jacobites who suggested it, or afterwards entertained it as a means of promoting the restoration of James. If Anne had ever attempted any such restitution, she must inevitably have gone to join the exiles at St. Germain.

* Spain had even pretended to treat in a loftier manner, and to renew the articles of the peace of the Pyrenees; but finding that such exorbitant pretensions could not be listened to, she restricted her claim to the restitution of all that had been conquered from her.

though long weary of the war and sadly exhausted by it, complained bitterly of the moderation of their negotiators, not failing to accuse them of treachery and corruption. They said that Louis could not have made a worse peace if he had been vanquished; and, looking only to the bright part of his career, they, with their usual vivacity, asserted that he had been uniformly victorious. But the plain truth was, that the grand monarque was absolutely in need of a truce—he, at least, never intended that the peace of Ryswick should be more—and behind the Pyrenees he was watching events and making preparations which he doubted not would give Spain to one member of his family, though his ambitious hope of gaining the empire for another prince of his blood had been frustrated. The treaty of Ryswick left as they were the pretensions of the House of Bourbon to the Spanish succession, arising out of the marriage of Louis XIV. to the Infanta Maria Theresa, the daughter of Philip IV. Diplomacy had not touched those pretensions, nor provided for the proper and national filling of the Spanish throne; and at this moment Louis well knew that the child of the old age of Philip IV., by a union with his niece,—the sickly, imbecile, and childish Charles II.,—a constant prey to indigestion, sickness, melancholy, and a consuming and harrowing superstition, was hastening to the splendid tomb which his forefathers had prepared for royalty under the palace of the Escorial. During eighteen years, or ever since the marriage of Charles with the beautiful Louisa of Orleans, the niece of Louis, the intrigues of the French had been incessant, and now the web seemed complete. Louis knew that the treaty of Ryswick would dissolve the league,—that the forces of the confederates would be dispersed and in good part disbanded: he knew that the constitutional jealousies of the English parliament would prevent William from keeping up a standing army, while he himself, unchecked and absolute, might keep the mass of his own forces together, or increase and improve them. To collect again the armies of the confederacy would be a work of time; but the French, united within their own frontiers and quartered on the road to the Pyrenees, would be ready to march and to act at once. The result proved that these calculations were correct, and that Louis had been moderate at Ryswick only to grasp at the whole Spanish succession. But we shall find that William was presently aware of these intentions, and that, unable to oppose them by arms, he attempted to gain, by a bold diplomacy, a partition of the Spanish dominions, so that France should only have a portion, while the rest of that vast inheritance should be divided, with a view to the balance of power.

The treaty of Ryswick was, in consequence of the brilliant victory obtained by Prince Eugene of Savoy, soon followed by a treaty which restored peace between the Turks and the Austrians, with terms honourable and advantageous to the latter:

and thus the seventeenth century, after long wars and infinite bloodshed, was left to terminate in tranquillity.

William returned to England in the month of November. His entrance into London on the 16th was triumphant and joyous: the people blessed him as the restorer of a happy peace. "Some progress was made in preparing triumphal arches, but he put a stop to it; he seemed, by a natural modesty, to have contracted an antipathy to all vain shows; which was much increased in him by what he had heard of the gross excesses of flattery, to which the French have run, beyond the examples of former ages, in honour of their king." * Addresses of congratulation were presented from every part of the kingdom upon the conclusion of a peace in which honourable and reasonable terms had been acquired by the wisdom, fortitude, and perseverance of his majesty. The parliament met on the 3rd of December; and William, doubly justified by the state of affairs abroad and by the state of affairs at home, where he saw himself still surrounded by plotting and factious men, frankly declared to the two Houses, "that, for the present, England would not be safe without a land force." "And I hope," said he, "that we shall not give those who mean us ill the opportunity of effecting that, under the notion of a peace, which they could not bring to pass by a war." Had there been nothing else to justify this declaration, the slowness of the French in evacuating the fortresses and territories which they were bound to cede, might have seemed enough. But this consideration and all others were lost sight of in the national detestation of a standing army; and the feeling of the nation gave weight and consideration to those men in parliament, who, some from patriotism, some from timidity, but many more from merely factious motives, denounced the king and the government as harbouring intentions to destroy that liberty and constitution which he had preserved from absolute wreck, by keeping on foot a host of mercenaries with whom his will was law. By almost unanimous consent the Earl of Sunderland was accused as the principal promoter of this plan; for though he was nominally only lord chamberlain, he was believed to have almost the influence of a prime minister over the king. The Commons, in their address, congratulated his majesty on his having, by the late honourable and advantageous peace, completed the glorious work of the nation's deliverance; but as to the necessity declared by his majesty of keeping up a land force for the present, they said not a syllable. William was hurt and disconcerted—for every day brought alarming news from the continent, with sure indications that Louis XIV., who still kept the exiled Stuarts at Versailles, had in no sense given up the cause of that family; but he said not a word more about the business than the Commons had done; he sent none of those "quickenings messages" which the princes of the House of Stuart had so frequently resorted to, and with such fatal effect. He calmly waited the deliberations of parliament. The important question came on in the Commons in the course of a few days, and loud was the debate. It was affirmed, without any nice distinction as to number or officering, that a standing army—that any standing army—was utterly inconsistent with a free government, and absolutely destructive of the English constitution; that a standing army once established was established for ever; that the records of every country had shown that the establishment of a military force, apart from the people, had been ever fatal to liberty; that a people are no longer free when the sword is taken out of their own hands and put into the hands of mercenaries; and, finally, that, if a standing army were once established in England, all that Englishmen would have gained by the Revolution was a precedent in favour of resistance to arbitrary power—which they would never again be permitted to quote or to use. Scoundrels who would have thrown the country prostrate at the feet of the shallowest and most vindictive of despots, who would have brought in James by means of a French invasion, were enthusiastically eloquent upon these points. When the question came to a division in the Commons, it was carried by a majority of 185 to 148 against the court, and the resolution was adopted—that all the forces raised since the year 1680 should be forthwith disbanded. This determination, however, fell far short of the original intention of many, who had proposed that the public defence should be intrusted solely to the militia; for it allowed of 8000 regular troops, the number on foot in 1680. The king confined his complaints to his friends Lord Portland and the Dutch Grand Pensionary Heinsius.* Sunderland, who was about equally odious to both factions, though both allowed his ability for business, had argued, with many others, during these debates in favour of the necessity of keeping up a greater force; and now, pressed hard by the Tories, and apprehending that the Whigs would defend him very faintly, he resolved to prevent a public affront by retiring voluntarily from the court and from business. William earnestly requested him to continue still about him; but Sunderland had made up his mind, and he went to his pleasant retirement at Althorp. He probably thereby escaped an impeachment. Before the passing of the bill, or immediately after signing the treaty of peace, William had ordered the disbanding of a large part of the army; a reduction which was carried on in conformity with the demands of the two Houses, and in spite of the increasing alarms on the continent, until the land forces actually on foot did not exceed 15,000 or 16,000 men. But there William appears to have stopped. Parliament, however, in this session settled a revenue upon the king for life, and carried the amount to 700,000*l.* instead of 600,000*l., as originally intended.

During this session the English parliament, still far from adopting any wide or general doctrine either in commerce or religion where Ireland was concerned, fell with a heavy hand upon that luckless country. William Molyneux, a gentleman of Dublin, had published a book entitled "The Case of Ireland's being Bound by Acts of Parliament in England," attempting to refute sundry old notions, and to get up a determined spirit of resistance to Poyning's Law, which kept the Irish parliament in shackles. But Molyneux's arguments were in some respects excessively faulty; for, while he denied the dependence of Ireland upon the parliament of England, he represented Ireland to be a conquered country, subject to the will and pleasure of the crown. There is this, however, to be said in exculpation—Molyneux must have known that far more was to be expected from the tolerance of William than from the intolerance of the English parliament; the king had, at least, the merit of intending well and kindly; but parliament had never voted or acted except to add oppression to oppression, and even the wise and generous had appeared to lose their wisdom and their generosity whenever the affairs of that kingdom were in question. Now, inflamed by Molyneux's book, which at first appeared anonymously, the English Commons appointed a committee to inquire what proceedings in Ireland had given occasion to the writing, and voted an address to the king, praying that his majesty would be pleased to give directions for the discovery and punishment of the author. Their committee also unanimously resolved "that the said book was of dangerous consequence to the crown and people of England, by denying the authority of the king and parliament of England to bind the people and kingdom of Ireland, and the subordination and dependence that Ireland has, and ought to have, upon England, as being united and annexed to the imperial crown of this realm." And they went on to complain that the Irish House of Commons had unwarrantedly and impudently made alterations in an act "for the better security of his majesty's person and government" already passed by the English parliament, and had moreover enacted divers things to which they were not competent, and in

* Burnet, however, tells us the king complained to him of the ill usage and jealousies of the parliament: "This gave the king the greatest distaste of anything that had befallen him in his whole reign; he thought it would degenerate much from him, and render his attitude so inconsiderable, that he doubted whether he could carry on the government, after it should be reduced to so weak and so contemptible a state. He said that, if he could have imagined that, after all the service he should have done the nation, he should have met with such returns, he would never have meddled in our affairs: and that he was weary of governing a nation that was so jealous as to lay itself open to an enemy rather than trust him, who had acted so faithfully during his whole life, that he had never once deceived those who trusted him." He said this, with a great deal more to the same purpose, to myself; but he saw the necessity of submitting to that which could not be helped."

* "It had been promised," says Burnet, "at the treaty of Rye-wick, that King James, being now as dead to England, his queen should enjoy her jointure, that was, 50,000*l.* a year; and it was intended to settle a court, about the Duke of Gloucester, who was then nine years old; so, to enable the king to bear that expense, this large provision was made for the civil list: but, by some great error in the management, though the court never had so much, and never spent so little, yet payments were ill made, and, by some strange consumption, all was wasted."

so doing had given occasion and encouragement to the forming and publishing the dangerous positions contained in the said book. Four days after this, the English Commons, in a body, presented an address to his majesty, asserting that very dangerous attempts had been made of late by some of his Irish subjects to shake off their subjection to, and dependence on, this kingdom, &c. To this William mildly replied that he would take care that what was complained of might be prevented and redressed as the Commons desired.* But the parliament of England fancied it had other grievances to complain of besides the assertion of an abstract principle, which was not likely to have much weight until the Irish, from the weaker, should become the stronger party, or until a healing amalgamation should take place and destroy the jealous distinctions between Englishmen and Irishmen, Protestants and Papists—an event still rather in the region of prayer than in that of hope. It was rumoured in England that the Irish were making coats for their own backs—nay, that they had even had the audacity to set up extensive woollen manufactures, “to the manifest detriment of those which constituted the staple trade of England.” At first the House of Commons ordered a bill to be prepared for quieting these national apprehensions; but, giving up this course, they voted another address to the king. The tone of this address, which will disgust every liberal mind, was like a political anathema and excommunication. According to this document the Irish owed the universal gifts of light and air, life and a soil to tread upon, more to the English parliament than to God Almighty. It stated “that, being very sensible that the wealth and power of this kingdom do, in a great measure, depend on the preserving the woollen manufactures as much as possible entire to this realm, they thought it became them, like their ancestors, to be jealous of the establishment and the increase thereof elsewhere, and to use their utmost endeavours to prevent it. That they could not without trouble observe, that Ireland, which is dependent on, and protected by, England in the enjoyment of all they have, and which is so proper for the linen manufacture, the establishment and growth of which there would be so enriching to themselves, and as profitable to England, should of late apply itself to the woollen manufacture, to the great prejudice of the trade of this kingdom, and so unwillingly promote the linen trade, which would benefit both nations; that the consequence thereof would necessitate his majesty’s parliament of England to interpose to prevent this mischief, unless his majesty, by his authority and great wisdom, should find means to secure the trade of England by making the subjects of Ireland pursue the joint interests of both kingdoms: wherefore they implored his majesty’s protection and favour in this matter; and that he would make it his royal care, and enjoin all those he employs in Ireland to use their utmost diligence, to hinder the exportation of wool from Ireland, (except to be imported hither,) and for the discouraging the woollen manufactures and encouraging the linen manufactures in Ireland; to which the Commons of England should always be ready to give their utmost assistance.” To this address his majesty made answer, “that he should do all that in him lay to promote the trade of England, and to discourage the woollen and encourage the linen manufacture in Ireland.”

In another matter this session of the English parliament was indirectly the cause of considerable expense and suffering to Ireland. “The flame both within doors and without, about a standing army,” was kept up by constant additions of fuel, not always drawn from those depths where truth is said to reside; and the patriots proclaimed that the reduction had not been carried far enough—that there was still in England a force sufficient to put in jeopardy the liberties of the people. The course to be taken was apparent; a considerable number of horse, foot, and dragoons, were drafted off to Ireland. It was assumed, however, by some in the House of Commons, that this was in reality giving an unwarrantable benefit to the Irish, who would receive the money spent by the soldiery!

Towards the close of the session the Commons addressed his majesty, demanding that a list should be laid before that House of the troops disbanded, and intended to be disbanded, together with a list of all the officers who were put or to be put upon half-pay. So jealous were the people of any approach to that object of their unvarying hatred, a standing army, that they complained loudly of the half-pay system, which they represented as insuring and keeping together the nucleus of an army—for where the officers, the most essential part, were kept together, it would be easy to raise the private soldiers again in a few weeks or to make new ones in a few months. Trenchard, ex-secretary of state to William, who wrote “The History of Standing Armies,” and who exerted himself on the patriotic side, was an honest and conscientious man, but the majority of those who acted with him in this matter were actuated exclusively by factious motives. Some boasted that they would break the cold stern heart of the king by depriving him of all his forces except a troop of horse, and by rendering him utterly unable to take any further part in continental affairs.

On the 5th of July William prorogued the parliament without betraying any symptom either of grief or ill humour; but on the 7th he dissolved it by proclamation, and summoned a new one to meet on the 24th of August. We may make use of this interval to pass into Scotland, which, in the course of the present year, came in for a share of heavy grievances as well as Ireland. The king had never been and never became popular with the Scots, who were far too zealous for one particular faith to love the only consistent friend of toleration in his kingdom. They—we mean the vast majority of the Presbyterians—would scarcely have allowed bread and water to the ministers of the episcopal church, whom they had dispossessed and driven from their livings with violence and contumely. When these priests of Baal were in the ascendancy, what had they received from them but idolatrous ceremonies, false interpretations of the blessed word, stripes, imprisonment, torture, banishment? and had not the blood of their brethren been made to run like water in the war about lawn sleeves, altars, and liturgies? Thus reasoned the enthusiasts, who had every part of scripture in their mouths except those texts which teach the forgiveness of past injuries.* But the Scots had other grounds of complaint, and upon some of these they were indisputably entitled to sympathy and respect. Proud and high spirited, and justified in their national pride by their long preservation of their independence against a far greater and richer country, they now saw that in all matters of government Scotland was made subordinate to England. This, under the circumstances, was inevitable, and nothing was left that could make the odds even except an entire incorporation and union with England. But the word union still sounded like anathema maranatha in their ears, and their hearts still clung to the name and separate insignia of old Scotland. On all subjects where the interests of the two nations clashed, the English parliament treated the parliament of Scotland with nearly as much disrespect as it showed to that of Ireland; the Scottish council of state appointed by the king not unfrequently drove matters without a very delicate attention to the rights and usages of the country; and the Court of Session was corrupt and partial, the judges setting an example of subservience to the higher powers which has been too frequently followed by Scottish judges down nearly to our own times. It was thought by some that the king might have removed at least a part of the unpopularity which attached to him personally if he had gone occasionally into Scotland, and opened their parliament in person, &c.; but William was not fitted to court favour in this way; his manners were not captivating; and it may be that the remembrances of the dynasty of the Stuarts, which he had displaced, blew like a cold blast from their old home, Scotland, making the country uninviting. However this may be, to Scotland he never went. As often as the parliament had assembled there he had made his excuses for not meeting them in person, by pleading his constant occupation in his military capacity; but now the war was at an end a session was to be held at Edinburgh, and he had a favourite point of his own to carry; and yet, instead of going down, he appointed the Earl of Marchmont, then lord chancellor of the kingdom, to open it by commission.† On the 19th of July, the day before William left England for Holland, this Scottish session began. In his letter read by Marchmont the king told them “that their enemies abroad, and those who were disaffected to the government at home, were still ready to lay hold on all opportunities for carrying on their bad designs; and that, therefore, his majesty judged it absolutely necessary for their preservation that the forces upon the present establishment should be continued; and he did not doubt but they would provide suitable supplies for maintaining them.” He then recommended the raising of supplies for making up deficiencies in former funds for paying arrears due to the troops, and repairing the forts and garrisons. Less jealous of a standing army than were the English, this parliament readily voted that the present standing forces were necessary to be continued, and then passed to a vote of ways and means. But Paterson, the projecting financier, and his schemes had thrown the whole Scottish nation into a new ferment. The merchant-adventurers and others who had acted upon the large charter of trade and colonization granted by William in the year 1694 laid a representation of grievances before the Scottish parliament, stating that, “whereas the wisdom of the king and parliament had thought fit, by two several solemn acts and letters patent under the great seal of the kingdom, to establish their company with such power, privileges, and immunities as were needful to encouraging any such new undertaking in that nation; and particularly to raise a joint-stock in such manner as they should think fit; and for that end to enfranchise such foreigners as would become partners with them; and to enter into treaties of commerce with any in amity with his majesty for that effect: that those of their number who were then intrusted with the management of that affair did think it most natural to make the first offer of sharing their said privilege with their countrymen and other neighbours in England, as living under the same monarchy; and that they not only readily embraced the offer, but in nine days subscribed 300,000*l.* sterling, as the one-half of the capital stock then proposed, and actually paid in the first fourth part thereof, part in specie, part in bank-notes payable upon demand: that both Houses of Parliament of England, taking umbrage at those proceedings, had not only jointly addressed his majesty for frustrating the ends of the said acts, but the House of Commons had also appointed a committee to examine what methods were taken for obtaining the said acts of parliament for establishing their company, who were the subscribers thereunto, and who were the promoters and advisers thereof—with power to send for persons, papers, and records: and that, pursuant thereto, the said committee had given orders to summon not only the English subscribers, but even some persons residing then in Scotland; as by the said address, votes of the House of Commons, and copy of the said summons, did appear. By all which, together with some other measures then taken, their friends in England were, to their great loss, disappointment, and retardment, forced to relinquish their enterprise." The representation or remonstrance then went on to show that, notwithstanding the discouragement interposed by the English House of Commons, most of the nobility, gentry, merchants, and the whole body of the royal burghs of Scotland, had, upon the inducement and public faith of the said acts of the Scottish parliament and the said letters patent of his majesty, contributed as adventurers in raising a far more considerable joint-stock than any that had ever been raised in that kingdom for any public undertaking or project of trade whatsoever, which made it now the universal concern of their nation: that they had also hopes of foreign aid and contribution, especially at Hamburg, where the merchants had contracted to join at least 200,000*l.* sterling with them; when, of a sudden, and to their great surprise and loss, the English minister there resident had, under pretence of a special warrant from his majesty, put a stop to the whole business, by presenting a memorial to the Hamburg senate, which not only disowned the authority of the said Scottish act of parliament and letters patent, but also threatened both the senate and the merchants with the king of England's utmost displeasure if they should persevere in the project: that, after this memorial of the English ministry was presented, the Scottish deputies had been advised and prevailed upon by the Hamburg merchants to open books in the said Merchants' Hall, where for some days the Hamburgers signed considerable sums pursuant to their previous contract, though under condition to be void if they (the Scots) should not procure some declaration from King William that might render them secure from the threatenings and insinuations contained in his minister's memorial: that, as the reasonable and unquestionable prospect of a powerful assistance from Hamburg and several other places had induced them (the Scots) to make a far greater and more expensive preparation for colonies and trade than they otherwise would have done, so the rendering these measures abortive had weakened their stock, lessened their credit, retarded their expedition, disheartened the shareholders and contributors, and thrown a damp upon all branches of foreign and domestic trade and improvement in Scotland. The old nationality was appealed to in an effective manner:—"We humbly conceive," continued the remonstrants, "that the honour and independency of the nation, as well as the credit and authority of our parliament, is struck at through our sides." Still preserving the secret as to their destination, they suggested "that, the ships being then at sea on their intended voyage," the estates of parliament should not neglect to provide for their security against the old enemies of their company, who either directly or indirectly might ruin all their designs; and they called upon the estates to vindicate the honour of the Scottish nation and provide for its good by insisting on their former acts and his majesty's letters patent. The Scottish parliament hereupon drew up an address to his majesty; but it was short and general, and so cold as to look almost like indifference. It purported that, having considered a representation made by the council-general of the Scottish company trading to Africa and the Indies, which mentioned several obstructions, and particularly a memorial presented to the senate at Hamburg, tending to lessen the credit of the rights and privileges granted to the said company, they earnestly entreated and expected that his majesty would take such measures as might effectually vindicate the undoubted rights and privileges of the said company: and that, as they were bound to return thanks for the assurances his majesty had given them of all due encouragement for promoting the trade of Scotland, so they were thereby encouraged to recommend to the more especial marks of his royal favour the concerns of the company trading to Africa and the Indies, &c., in which they and the nation which they represented had a more peculiar interest. But long before this address was ready William was in Holland, busied in revolving one of the boldest or least scrupulous of his continental schemes. His Scottish ministers endeavoured to qualify the heats which this commercial fever had caused, but their efforts were not very successful, and in the beginning of September they adjourned the parliament to the 25th of November. In that interval the Scottish speculators ascertained from Stevenson, their agent at Hamburg, that their affairs there lay under the same difficulties and discouragements as before. They presented a letter or memorial to Lord Seafield, secretary of state. But Seafield could do nothing for them, and when the Estates re-assembled it was found that they could not do much more. Meanwhile the company's ships at sea went on their course.*

During William's last stay in England the palace of Whitehall, which for a long course of years had been the residence of our kings, was all burnt to the ground except the Banqueting House;† and

* Dalrymple, Memoirs.

† Part of Whitehall had been consumed by fire eight years before this. Evelyn, under date of the 10th of April, 1691, says, "This night a sudden and terrible fire burnt down all the buildings over the stone gallery at Whitehall to the water-side, beginning at the apartment of the late Duchess of Portsmouth (which had been pulled down and rebuilt no less than three times to please her), and consuming other lodgings of such lewd creatures, who debauched both King Charles II. and others, and were his destruction. The king returned out of Holland just as this accident happened. Proclamation against Papists, &c."—Diary. The second fire, mentioned in the text, gave rise to a malicious witticism. A statue of the dethroned King James had been left in Privy Gardens, where it still remains. During the conflagration this figure was surrounded with flames; upon which it was said that this was the first time James had ever stood fire. Ralph says that, in consequence of this fire, all the royal apartments were destroyed; "and our sovereigns have since chosen to keep their court in that irregular unsightly heap which at this day, by the courtesy of England, is called the royal palace of St. James's."—Hist. William's favourite residence, however, was Kensington, which Evelyn describes as "yet a patched building, with a garden: however, it is a very sweet villa, having to it the park, and a straight new way through this park." William, who had bought the place of Lord Nottingham, made very considerable alterations and additions, and stocked the house with a choice collection of pictures, &c. In 1696, when it had been seven or eight years in his majesty's possession, Evelyn thus describes it:—"I went to see the king's house at Kensington. It is very noble, though not great. The gallery furnished with the best pictures, from all the houses, of Titian, Raphael, Correggio, Holbein, Julio Romano, Bassan, Vandyke, Tintoret, and others; a great collection of porcelain; and a pretty private library.

BANQUETING HOUSE, WHITEHALL.

my Lord Marlborough, who had been so long in the shade, and active only in protesting against ministers, was restored to his places both in the privy council and in the army. The Princess Anne, whose strange attachment to Lady Marlborough was more vehement than ever, had exerted every interest in her power at court, with ministers and others, to procure the re-appointment of that fair lady's disgraced lord.

In the preceding year (1697) Anne's only surviving child, the Duke of Gloucester, had attained the age of eight years, a period at which it was thought imperative to confide to some nobleman the charge of his person, and to some bishop or learned doctor the care of his education. William offered the first office—or the post of governor—to the Duke of Shrewsbury, who, on account of the accusations of Sir John Fenwick and of ill health, was soliciting permission to resign the fatiguing office of secretary of state. Shrewsbury, however, declined the appointment. Anne then put forward the husband of her favourite; but William's well-grounded objections to Marlborough were not overcome until Anne and Marlborough had secured Lord Sunderland and Lord Albemarle, a new favourite of the king, and the warm recommendation of the Tories, who were again making their influence felt, and looking confidently to the not distant formation of a pure Tory cabinet. But even at last William only consented because he saw that, if he rejected Marlborough, he must consign the young prince to his maternal uncle, Lord Roches-

The gardens about it very delicious."—Diary. But Kensington Palace was visited by fire as well as Whitehall. In November, 1691, part of it was burnt; and another fire broke out some years afterwards, which had well nigh consumed the king himself in his bed. One popular way of accounting for these frequent conflagrations was, to talk of the carelessness, drunkenness, and stinginess of William's Dutch attendants; but there were not wanting some who saw the finger of the pope in them all, and who called for new measures against the Roman Catholics at every conflagration.

ter, the blazing head of the high-church party, the staunchest or loudest of all Tories, and a man whom William hated more than he did the plotting and venal, but accommodating Marlborough. Having once made up his mind, he conferred the office in the most gracious manner upon the fortunate and aspiring soldier, who had many more accomplishments than virtues. "Teach him," said William, "to be like yourself, and he will not want accomplishments." As if to balance the Toryism of this governor—for Marlborough was still a professing Tory—the king gave the preceptorship to the celebrated Dr. Burnet, the historian, then bishop of Salisbury, and a Whig of the first water.*

The very evening after his appointment Marlborough was restored to his military rank and to his place in the council; and, striking up a sudden friendship for the Whig bishop, he continued to divide with Burnet the care of the Duke of Gloucester, who, like all princes that die young, is represented as being of a most promising disposition—as another Marcellus. "All my endeavours," says Burnet himself, "to decline this were without effect; the king would trust that care only to me, and the princess gave me such encouragement that I resolved not only to submit to this, which seemed to come from a direction of Providence, but to give myself wholly up to it. I took to my own province the reading and explaining the scriptures to him; the instructing him in the principles of religion and the rules of virtue; and the giving him a view of history, geography, politics, and government." The Tories, not much satisfied with Marlborough, were absolutely furious at the bishop; and a motion was made in parliament for an address to remove Burnet in consequence of the censure passed by the House of Commons, some years before, on a Pastoral Letter of his, which had been ordered to be burnt by the common hangman.† But here Marlborough stepped in to the support of his colleague; and, chiefly, it appears, through his great interest, the motion was rejected by a considerable majority, and Burnet left in his anomalous position.‡

* Cox, Life of Marlborough.—Burnet.

† Provoked by the Jacobites and Tories, who, in spite of the Act of Settlement, sought all occasions of calling the right of William in question, several friends to the Revolution were urged into imprudent measures, and even declared that, let the matter be questioned as it might, the throne of England belonged to William by right of conquest. Dr. Lloyd, bishop of Worcester, in a sermon preached before their majesties on the 31st of November, 1690, pronounced this doctrine. Burnet adopted it, and carried it out in a pastoral letter; and one Mr. Blunt, under the sanction of Bolan, the licenser of the press, published a bold pamphlet, entitled "King William and Queen Mary Conquerors." On the 20th of January, 1692, the House of Commons fell upon these offenders, and resolved that the assertions of conquest were of most dangerous consequence, &c.; that Blunt's pamphlet should be burnt by the hands of the common hangman; and that Bishop Burnet's pastoral letter should undergo the same fate. It was debated whether Bishop Lloyd's sermon, which had also been printed, with large additions incensuring the divine right of conquest, should not be burnt also; but either out of respect to their majesties, or thinking they had already set a sufficient brand on the doctrine, they let that motion drop.

‡ The bishop, as a matter of course, professed, as we have seen, an unwillingness to accept of this additional charge and court office. He says—"I used all possible endeavours to excuse myself; I had hitherto no share in the princess's favour or confidence; I was also become uneasy at some things in the king's conduct; I considered him as a glorious instrument, raised up by God, who had done great things by him; I had also such obligations to him, that I had resolved, on public as well as on private accounts, never to engage in any opposition to him; and yet I could not help thinking he might have carried matters further than he did, and that he was giving his enemies handles to weaken his government. . . . These considerations disposed me rather to retire from the court and town than to engage deeper in such a constant attendance for so many years as this employment might run out to. The king made it, indeed, easy in one respect; for, as the young prince was to be all the summer at Windsor, which was in my diocese, so he allowed me ten weeks in the year for the other parts of my diocese."

Early in the year William had dispatched Lord Portland on an embassy to Paris, with instructions that were known to none except the king and his friend and adviser, the pensionary Heinsius. To make an impression on the French court and people, who had contracted a great liking for such things during the stately and gorgeous reign of Louis XIV., William departed from his usual plainness and simplicity, and fitted out this embassy and retinue in a most splendid manner, and at a vast expense. Those who grumbled at everything he did complained loudly at this; and those perhaps the loudest who had most blamed him for parsimony and meanness, and a disregard to the dignity of the nation. Portland was attended by the celebrated wit and poet, Mathew Prior, as his secretary. The embassy made its public entrance into Paris on the 27th of February, making the Parisians stare and wonder. It is said that they criticised the dresses, equipages, &c.; but this is rather an old habit than any proof of their want of better taste. Portland represented his master with good effect, being stately, cool, and dignified, and resolute not to yield any of those points of etiquette which were so important in the court and diplomacy of France at that time. He wrote to William,—“Not understanding ceremonies, I make up for it in obstinacy, which is rather necessary here.” The stage dignity of Louis, and all his imposing manners, were thrown away upon this firm and cool-headed Dutchman; and the grand monarque, for the first time these many years, saw a diplomatist that would hold the master he served his equal in all things. Nor was Secretary Prior wanting in his part. One of his sayings was proper to make an impression on a witty, epigrammatic nation. As he was passing through the splendid gallery at Versailles, covered with paintings by Le Brun, representing the victories of Louis XIV., he was asked by one of the courtiers whether his master, King William, had any such paintings as those at Whitehall. "No, sir," said the wit, "my master's actions are to be seen everywhere but in his own house." Portland, with little circumlocution, complained of the countenance still shown by the court of Versailles to the Duke of Berwick and "other assassins," who had the bad taste to be there at his presentation and after-visits. The French court replied that the Duke of Berwick had only been engaged in the matter of invasion; and that, as for the rest, if they were proved to be assassins (that is, to have been accomplices with Barclay, Perkins, and the other Turnham-green men), his most Christian majesty would withdraw his protection from them.

Portland named Sir George Barclay himself, who, since his flight from England, had been treated with as much consideration as ever by the court of St. Germain. The French minister merely told him that Barclay had been deprived of his military command. Lord Portland then demanded the removal of King James to Rome or Avignon, insisting that this removal had been verbally agreed to by Marshal Boufflers when negotiating the treaty at Ryswick. Boufflers rather equivocated than denied the fact; but Louis, who wanted to keep England in a state of uneasiness, declared that nearness of kindred to the dethroned sovereign, compassion, and the point of honour, forbade him sending James out of his dominions. After such a declaration, and with the notoriety of the fact that the court of St. Germain continued to be stocked by men who had proposed or actually engaged in plans of assassination, it was hardly to be expected that William should send James's queen the pension of 50,000*l.* a-year. If the English parliament had been less jealous upon the subject of the army,—if Louis had not at this moment proposed a grand scheme, which for a time misled him, it is pretty certain that William would not have stopped at the mere suspension of a payment to the exiled family, but would have demanded, as a sine quâ non, the removal, from the neighbourhood of the English shores, of that focus of conspiracy and intrigue. The scheme in question was the memorable "First Partition Treaty," of which so much has been said and written. It is declared, or artfully implied, by some writers, that this plan originated with William. But, on the 3rd of January, when Portland was preparing to go to France, William, in writing to his intimate adviser, the Pensionary Heinsius, with whom he had no state secrets, alludes to a scheme suggested in France, and seems to wonder what it can be. "What the French ambassadors have said to you," says William, "that something must be done by the Republic, France, and me, towards maintaining the peace, surprises me much; but I am of opinion with you, that it relates to the guarantee between the emperor, the empire, and us. The Earl of Portland will readily be able to get to the bottom of this affair in France; and this is a further reason for hastening his departure as much as possible." On the 15th of March, or about a fortnight after his arrival at Paris, Portland writes to his master,—“Yesterday, Messieurs de Pomponne and De Torcy came to see me, and told me that it was by order of the most Christian king to tell me that he was willing to make use of me in a thing of the greatest importance, and which demanded the greatest secrecy; and that his majesty had an entire confidence in me. After I had answered as I ought, M. de Pomponne said that, as the sentiments of the king, this master, were sincere for the maintenance of the peace, and as they were fully persuaded that your majesty's sentiments were the same, it was necessary to take care of those things which might cause the interruption of that peace, and to come to an understanding how to prevent it: that the death of the King of Spain, which might happen suddenly, and which would bring on the same trouble from which we had just freed ourselves, was of that nature that the most Christian king desired to enter with your majesty into engagements which might prevent so great an evil; that, Spain falling into the hands of the emperor, he might make himself master of all Italy, and so absolute in the empire as to become an object to be feared; that, for this end, his most Christian majesty wished to enter into an understanding and agreement with your majesty touching the said succession, desiring to know if your majesty were inclinable thereto, and what conditions and securities you would require. I replied that I was surprised at this proposition, though I could not but consider the death of the King of Spain as a thing that would indubitably throw us back into a war; that, however, we considered the circumstance as an inevitable evil, only hoping that it might not happen quite so soon; that I saw that the interest of England and that of Holland was opposed to an accommodation, both as regarded the maritime force and the trade of all the world; that I did not see how it was possible for your majesty to give any other answer than a general one to such a proposition, unless I was informed of the sentiments of the most Christian king with regard to the particulars which he had to propose. He (M. Pomponne) replied that he could not enter into particulars until your sentiments in general were understood, and that, even then, they must know from you what you would judge suitable for the interest and security of the two nations of England and Holland. I told him I was sure that, if I wrote to your majesty in the general terms he spoke about, I could expect, at the most, no other answer than that your majesty would be willing to listen to what should be proposed to you. And as I saw, at length, that I could get nothing more out of him, I told him, as if for talk, my own private sentiments as to what I believed would be considered as contrary to our interests. To which he said, that, as for what concerned the Low Countries, it would be easy to agree in a manner to give satisfaction to both parties; that, for Spain itself, they would give sufficient securities that that kingdom should never be under the domination of the same king with France; but for the Indies, and about the security of our trade in the Mediterranean, on which two things I touched a great deal, he would answer me nothing, demanding only that I should render an account to your majesty of all that he had proposed to me, declare the sentiments of the king his master, and beg to be informed of yours, sir.”* In continuation, the wary diplomatist informed William that he had not dropped a word which might lead them to judge of his majesty's intentions, and that he would endeavour to engage Pomponne in some other discourse, from which he might learn, beforehand, the real intentions of Louis. And in the same letter he announces the departure (on that very day) of the Comte de Tallard, who was bound to St. James's, ostensibly only to congratulate William, but in reality to lead him into the grand and secret plan of Louis. Tallard, an experienced negotiator, arrived at London on the 19th of March, and soon after a negotiation of the Partition Treaty was entered upon with vigour, but still with the utmost secrecy—at least as far as England was concerned; for there are reasons for believing that Louis, for objects which will be soon made apparent, let some of the grantees of Spain into the mystery. Louis himself and King William, Lord Portland, Count Tallard, and the Pensionary of Holland did all the business without the knowledge of any English minister or any English subject whatever. Sunderland, that man of all counsels, was passed over in this; and even the steady, close, and true Chancellor Somers, though not kept totally in the dark, was admitted only to a demi-jour sort of light. But Somers, be it said,—perhaps we may add Montague,—was the only one of the cabinet that William could have trusted;—Admiral Russell, now Lord Orford, Shrewsbury, and the rest, would have sold or betrayed the secret if they had been trusted with it. But such close proceedings suit ill with a constitutional form of government. “The exclusion of all those,” says Mr. Hallam, “whom, whether called privy or cabinet counsellors, the nation holds responsible for its safety, from this great negotiation, tended to throw back the whole executive government into the single will of the sovereign, and ought to have exasperated the House of Commons far more than the actual treaties of partition, which may probably have been the safest choice in a most perilous condition of Europe.”* But that perilous condition of Europe was really such that no statesman could look at it without dread; and so unable was William to take a warlike attitude that he almost ran the risk of a civil war by leaving sealed orders with his council to keep up a paltry land force of 16,000 men. Unable to fight, he treated; and his conduct must always be regarded with reference to, and in connexion with, the whole circumstances and condition of himself, of England, and of Europe. He well knew that Louis had had his eye upon the whole Spanish succession for more than thirty years; and that the laws of the French monarchy, and the inclination of a powerful faction in Spain, would justify and facilitate an immediate seizure, whenever Charles II.'s dim lamp of life should go out. In a letter, dated in the month of March,† William says—“Should this death take place soon, there is nothing to be expected from this negotiation. The invincible difficulties that appear in the thing itself, the unprepared state the allies are in to begin a war, and the bad situation of Spain, make me shudder when I consider the affair; for certainly France is in a condition to take possession of that monarchy before we shall be able to concert measures to oppose it. The constitution here is such that I shall be able to contribute little towards the land forces, but I will do something towards the marine; for the people here will, I believe, be inclinable to it, though we shall have great want of money.” Continuing in the same anxious tone, William tells his confidant Heinsius that all possible precautions ought to be taken by the allies, and that he did not know but it would be proper to assemble a kind of congress at the Hague again, or at Vienna, though at the latter place he saw great difficulties, on account of the distance. In conclusion, he says, “Expert ministers must be sent thither, as also to Madrid. It will also be necessary to give encouragement on all sides to remain armed. I wish I could do so too.”* On the first of April, writing from Windsor, William assures Heinsius that he approves of his correspondence with the Earl of Portland, and thinks that he has fully explained “this important matter to him.” He doubts, however, whether the French will proceed to particulars, and doubts still more whether it will be possible to bring this important negotiation to a good conclusion, seeing the different interests of the parties negotiating. “Besides,” adds William, “the greatest hardship that appears to me in this business is, the little reliance to be made on engagements with France; and her power will be thereby so much the more considerable, that she will be at liberty to pay just as much regard to the treaties as may suit her convenience, of which we have had but too much experience. On the other hand, I do not see a possibility of preventing France from putting herself in immediate possession of the monarchy of Spain, in case the king should happen to die soon. However, nothing else can be done than to take all those measures you mention; and principally we must labour to bring the emperor and Elector of Bavaria† to an agreement with respect to the succession, otherwise it will be impossible for us to take measures right." In the same letter he speaks anxiously about the naval equipments of France. Up to this point, and indeed long after, William looked rather to war than to negotiation; but the discordant views, the poverty, and indecision of the members of the late confederacy, and the temper of his own English parliament, utterly precluded all hope of any successful recourse to arms; and, to diminish the evil, he drove on his secret diplomacy. The Count de Tallard followed him into Holland; and in the quiet, rural retreat of Loo the fate of Europe was debated, and the partition of the vast and in good part unamalgamated dominions of Spain was decided upon—not so much (as far as William was concerned) for any self-aggrandisement as for preventing the whole from falling to Louis. The first glimpse of these negotiations was communicated by Lord Portland, who had joined the king at Loo, and who, about the middle of August, wrote to Secretary Vernon, enclosing a letter from the king to Chancellor Somers. Portland's letter let out only one-half the secret. "While I was in England," says this negotiator to the English Secretary of State, "I often heard that Count Tallard should say that an accommodation might be found out, in relation to the succession of Spain, in case of that king's death. . . . 'Tis true I heard the same thing talked of while I was in France. . . . The king, to avoid a war by previous accommodation, has sounded France upon what terms an agreement might be made, to which they do not seem averse; and, as his majesty would not enter too deeply into this matter without knowing something of their opinion in England, he has commanded me to impart it to you; and you may speak to my Lord Chancellor about it." Portland then divulged the conditions of this First Partition Treaty, which were in substance, that the Electoral Prince of Bavaria should have the kingdom of Spain, the Indies, the Spanish part of the Low Countries, and all the dependencies of the Spanish crown, except Naples and Sicily, Sardinia, the province of Guipuscoa on this side the Pyrenees, Fontarabia and St. Sebastian, Final, and the places on the coast of Tuscany, called Presidii, of which Spain stood then possessed; and all which were to go to the dauphin, in consideration of which France was absolutely to renounce the right it pretended to the succession, and Milan was to be given to the Archduke Charles, the emperor's second son.* The king's letter to Chancellor Somers was in these words: "I imparted to you before I left England that in France there was expressed to my Lord Portland some inclinations to come to an agreement with us concerning the succession of the king of Spain;* since which, Count Tallard has mentioned it to me, and has made such propositions, the particulars of which my lord Portland will write to Vernon, to whom I have given orders not to communicate them to any other besides yourself, and to leave to your judgment to whom else you would think proper to impart them; to the end that I might know your opinion upon so important an affair, and which requires the greatest secrecy. If it be fit this negotiation be carried on, there is no time to be lost, and you will send me the full powers under the great seal, with the names in blank, to treat with Count Tallard: I believe this may be done (so) secretly, that none but you and Vernon, and those to whom you shall have communicated it, may have knowledge of it; so that the clerks who are to write the warrant and the full powers may not know what it is. According to all intelligence, the king of Spain cannot outlive the month of October; and the least accident may carry him off every day. I received yesterday your letter of the 9th. Since my lord Wharton cannot at this time leave England, I must think of some other to send ambassador to Spain; if you can think of any one proper, let me know it, and be always assured of my friendship." At this moment, when all the particulars of the treaty had been settled at Loo, without any concurrence or advice of the English cabinet, Chancellor Somers was at Tonbridge Wells taking the waters for the benefit of his health. Three days after the date of the king's letter the chancellor replied to it, stating that he had thought the best way of executing his majesty's commands would be to communicate to my Lord Orford, and Mr. Montague, and the Duke of Shrewsbury, the subject of my Lord Portland's letter, letting them know at the same time how strictly his majesty required an absolute secrecy; that Mr. Montague and Mr. Secretary Vernon had come down to him at Tonbridge Wells, and had there humbly suggested three things for his majesty's guidance:—1. That the entertaining a proposal of this nature seemed to be attended with very many ill consequences, if the French should not act a sincere part;—"but," adds Somers, "we were soon at ease as to any apprehension of this sort, being fully assured your majesty would not act but with the utmost nicety in an affair wherein the glory and safety of Europe are so highly concerned." 2. That prospects were very bad indeed if the death of the King of Spain, which seemed probably to be very near, should happen before any provision or arrangement, the King of France having so great a force in readiness that he was in a condition to take possession of all Spain before any other prince would be able to make a stand; and that in as far as related to England there was "a deadness and want of spirit in the nation universally," for none were disposed to the thought of entering into a new war,

* Hardwicke State Papers.

† Both the emperor and the Elector of Bavaria pretended to the Spanish succession, their claims, like those of Louis XIV. for his son, the Dauphin, depending on intermarriages and descent from different Infantas of Spain. It is sufficient in this place to state that the claim of the Dauphin of France was derived through his deceased mother, the Infanta Maria Theresa, who was the eldest sister of the reigning King of Spain, Charles II., but who had expressly renounced for herself and her posterity all right of succession to the Spanish crown on her marriage with Louis XIV.; that the claim of the Electoral Prince of Bavaria was also derived through his deceased mother, the Electress Maria Antonietta, who was the daughter of Charles's second sister, Margaret, likewise deceased, married to the Emperor Leopold I.; that this claim was opposed by the electoral prince's grandfather, Leopold, on the ground that Maria Antonietta had renounced her right of succession, as well as her aunt Maria Theresa, on her marriage,—the fact being that the emperor had, indeed, compelled his daughter-in-law to make such a renunciation, but that the act had never been confirmed either by the king or the Cortes of Spain, on which account it was generally considered invalid; and, finally, that the Emperor Leopold I., assuming that his grandson's pretensions were thus set aside, claimed the inheritance of the Spanish crown for himself, both through his mother, Maria, who was a daughter of Philip III., and as the true heir male of Ferdinand and Isabella, the founders of the monarchy; but at the same time he offered to renounce this right, both for himself and his eldest son, in favour of his second son, the Archduke Charles.

* Somers had therefore not been left quite in the dark.

† In one of the letters written to Heinsius from England in the month of April, William says—"I gave him (Tallard) to understand that I foresaw no accommodation, unless at least all the Spanish possessions in Italy should be ceded to the emperor, and the Spanish Netherlands to the Elector of Bavaria, not in the condition they now are, but with a stronger and greater barrier, which might be discussed hereafter; and for us (the English) some ports in the Mediterranean and in the West Indies, for the security of our commerce."—Harwichke State Papers.—But William evidently could not get these terms con-

but all seemed to be tired out with taxes "to a degree beyond what was discerned, till it appeared upon the occasion of the late elections."* "This," adds Somers, "is the real truth of the fact, upon which your majesty will determine what resolutions are proper to be taken." 3. It would remain to consider what would be the condition of Europe if the scheme proposed in the Partition Treaty took effect. "Of this," says the chancellor, "we thought ourselves little capable of judging. But it seemed that, if Sicily was in the French hands, they will be entirely masters of the Levant trade; that, if they were possessed of Final, and those other sea-ports on that side, whereby Milan would be entirely shut out from relief by sea or any other commerce, that duchy would be of little signification in the hands of any prince; and that, if the king of France had possession of that part of Guipuscoa which is mentioned in the proposal, besides the ports he would have in the ocean, it does seem he would have as easy a way of invading Spain on that side as he now has on the side of Catalonia. But it is not to be hoped that France will quit its pretences to so great a succession without considerable advantages; and we are all assured your majesty will reduce the terms as low as can be done, and make them, as far as is possible in the present circumstances of things, such as may be some foundation for the future quiet of Christendom; which all your subjects cannot but be convinced is your true aim. If it could be brought to pass that England might be some way a gainer by this transaction, whether it was by the Elector of Bavaria (who is the gainer by your majesty's interposition in this treaty) his coming to an agreement to let us into some trade to the Spanish plantations, or in any other manner, it would wonderfully endear your majesty to your English subjects." Somers also gave it as the suggestion of Montague, and Secretary Vernon, and himself, that it did not sufficiently appear, in case the negotiation proceeded, what was to be done on William's part in order to ensure its due execution; or whether any more was required than that the English and Dutch should sit still and leave France to see it executed. "If that he so," adds the chancellor, "what security ought we to expect from the French that, while we are neuter, they will confine themselves to the terms of the treaty, and not attempt to take farther advantages?" And

* While the king was negotiating at Loo the elections were in progress for a new parliament, and every candidate was unpopular that did not pledge himself to peace, economy, and a reduction of taxes. With this state of England on the one hand, and the wavering and weakness and selfish policy of his allies on the other, what could William do but endeavour to lessen the mischief by treaty, and treat in such a way as might effect a tolerable compromise and satisfy the allies? Even before he left England, and before the elections came on, he told Heinsius that the English, in case of a war, would contribute little or nothing except in a fleet, and leave the struggle by land to the Dutch and the other allies, who would never be able "to carry through" without more assistance from England. He doubted even whether he could secure that old battle-field the Spanish Netherlands against the French. "I see," said he, "no likelihood of bringing the parliament to give money sufficient to keep so considerable a body of troops in the Spanish Netherlands as I had last war; and without that I see no possibility of defending them."—Hardwicke State Papers.

then Somers concluded his letter in these words: "I humbly beg your majesty's pardon, that these thoughts are so ill put together: these waters are known to discompose and disturb the head, so as almost totally to disable one from writing. I should be extremely troubled if my absence from London has delayed the dispatch of the commission one day. You will be pleased to observe that two persons (as the commission is drawn) must be named in it, but the powers may be executed by either of them: I suppose your majesty will not think it proper to name commissioners that are not English, or naturalised, in an affair of this nature." And then came a most important postscript, announcing that the commission, with full powers and the names in blank, had been passed under the great seal of England. "The commission," says Somers, "is wrote by the secretary, and I have had it sealed in such a manner that no creature has the least knowledge of the thing besides the persons named." But Somers, suspicious of after-consequences, had not only made Secretary Vernon write the commission, but had also asked him to give a warrant for affixing the seal to it. The secretary, however, declined giving this warrant, and Somers used the great seal without it, taking care to keep the king's letter as a justification or an excuse for this clearly unconstitutional act. As soon as the sealed powers arrived at the Hague William appointed Lord Portland and Sir Joseph Williamson his two commissioners; and on the 11th of October, or about six weeks after the dispatch of the carte blanche from England, the memorable First Partition Treaty was signed by Portland, Williamson, the Count de Tallard, and the Pensionary Heinsius. By the first article the parties contracting (that is, England, France, and Holland) renewed and confirmed the treaty of Ryswick; and the next avowed and declared that the desire of preserving the public tranquillity, and preventing the umbrage which might be taken from the overgrown power of any one prince, were the sole motives of the partition of the dominions of Spain. They bound themselves by the 8th article to communicate the treaty to the emperor and the Elector of Bavaria immediately after the exchange of ratifications; and, upon the death of the King of Spain, the emperor and the elector were to be invited to approve thereof. And by subsequent articles it was provided that, in case either the emperor or the elector should reject the present treaty, and, should, nevertheless, make any attempt to take possession of the share (*partage) therein allotted

* The several partages or shares were finally thus arranged in the treaty: "That the dauphin, in lieu of his claim to the whole succession, shall have for his share (son partage), in full propriety, possession, &c., to have and to hold to him and his heirs for ever, free from all molestation upon any pretence or any claim on the said succession whatsoever, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily; the places on the coast of Turkey, or the Islands adjacent, then belonging to Spain, namely, St. Stefano, Porto Ercole, Orbetello, Jeronimo, Porto Longone, and Piombino, in the same manner as they were then had and held by the Spaniards, together with the town and marquise of Final, the province of Guipuscoa, particularly the towns of Fontarabla and St. Sebastian, situated in that province, and to him, or of any other part of the inheritance of Spain, by force, the present contracting parties should oppose such attempt with all their force; and in the mean time any share allotted to the brother or son of the prince so rejecting this present treaty should remain, as in sequestration, in the hands of such as should then be viceroys or governors of the said territories; that the present treaty should be made good by force of arms against all opposers whatsoever; that all kings, princes, and states might become parties to the treaty if they thought fit, or even guarantees of the same; and that the ratifications should be exchanged within three weeks from the day of signing, or sooner if possible. But there were certain separate and secret articles, namely, 1. That the Elector of Bavaria should be tutor and administrator to his young son, and should have the administration of all his territories during his minority. 2. That if the said prince, his son, should die without issue, then the elector should succeed to all the said kingdoms, &c. 3. That in case the duchy of Milan should come to be sequestered, the administration thereof should be vested in the Prince de Vaudemout, its present governor, and upon his decease in Prince Charles de Vaudemout, his son. These secret articles were signed by Tallard, Portland, and Williamson only, Heinsius being omitted; but six other ministers besides Heinsius signed the body of the treaty on behalf of the Estates General. The ratifications were exchanged within the time prescribed; and as William, at an earlier part of the present year, had entered into a new triple alliance with Sweden and Holland on a defensive plan, which provided not only that in case either of the contracting parties was attacked the others should immediately assist, but also declared and imported that the scope of this triple league was to preserve the peace of Europe against any aggression whatsoever, he for a moment flattered himself with the hope that he might pass the short remainder of a declining life—his constitution was breaking fast— repose and tranquillity, appearing, indeed, to have believed that the great object of his existence was accomplished, and that some limits were set to the ambition of Louis XIV., which, at the beginning of his career, when called upon to defend his native dykes, had seemed as irresistible as it was boundless. But there was little sincerity in one of the parties to this new triple league; and Sweden, two months after signing it, being probably advised in secret by France, and made jealous of the Partition Treaty then negotiating, concluded another treaty, rendering the triple one nugatory, with Louis. And in reposing upon the arrangements made at Loo William rested upon a mere reed, though it is just possible that, but for an event which he could not foresee,—namely, the death of the young Bavarian prince,—those arrangements might have been somewhat more effectual. The manner in which the Partition Treaty had been carried on and concluded was, in England, clearly unconstitutional; and much or most of the treaty itself is indefensible. Yet we cannot but think that it has been condemned with too much rancour, and that sufficient allowance has hardly ever been made for the perplexing and insurmountable difficulties of William's position. Political enormities of a more recent date—the several partitions and dismembersments of Poland—have rendered the very word partition harsh and odious to all liberal ears, and have served to convert every treaty in which it occurs into a bye-word and reproach. Yet the proposed division of the inheritance of the Spanish king differed most essentially from the partition of Poland. It was not proposed to cut up and parcel out one nation and people:—Spain, at least, was to be left as a whole, untouched by the diplomatic knife, except on the Trans-Pyrenean territories of Navarre, &c., which had long been as much French as Spanish, and which were occupied by a people of a different race or races, speaking different languages, having different laws, customs, and interests. It did not go to discover the essentially Spanish colonies in South America and the West Indies from the mother-country: it merely lopped off that which Spain should never have had, and which she had acquired by no very honourable means—the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, the Milanese, Sardinia, and a few ports, with scarcely any territory adjoining them, on the Tuscan coast. The diplomatic critics in those days merely complained of these decisions and transfers being made without their knowledge and consent of the King of Spain, or of this or that other prince; but the party most interested (as were the Poles at a later date) seem scarcely to have been considered at all. And it is indisputable that the dominion of Spain had been especially the part of Passages comprised in it; with this exception, that if any places belonging to the said province lay on the other side of the Pyrenees, and the other mountains of Navarre, Alava, or Biscay, they should belong to Spain; and, contrariwise, all such places belonging to Spain as lay on this side the said mountains should belong to France; the passes of the said mountains to be equally divided between the two kingdoms: the whole of the said premises, together with the fortifications, ammunition, powder, ball, cannon, galleys, &c., which should be found belonging to the king of Spain at the time of his death, without issue, to be annexed to the kingdoms, places, islands, and provinces, which are to compose the share of the dauphin: in consideration of which said share so composed, the most Christian king, for himself, the dauphin, his children male and female, his heirs already born or to be born, as also the dauphin, for himself, his children, heirs, &c., did promise to renounce, and on these conditions did then renounce, all his rights and pretensions to the said crown of Spain, and all other the realms, isles, estates, countries thereto belonging, &c. That the crown of Spain, together with the other kingdoms, islands, states, countries, and places belonging thereto (except those before excepted), should be given and assigned to the Electoral Prince of Bavaria, in full propriety and possession, to have and to hold to him and his heirs for ever, as his share of the said inheritance, against all rights, claims, and pretensions, &c. &c., either on the part of the most Christian king, the dauphin, &c., on one part, or the emperor, the King of the Romans, the archduke, &c., on the other; in consideration of which, the said Elector of Bavaria, as well in the quality of father, as of lawful tutor and administrator to the said electoral prince, his heirs, &c., should hold himself satisfied with the said share, and renounce all rights, claims, and pretensions whatsoever on the shares assigned to the dauphin and the archduke; as the said electoral prince was also to do, when out of his minority. The duchy of Milan was assigned to the said archduke, as his share of the said inheritance; and in extinction of the claims of all his family: for as he, the said archduke, by the said article, was to renounce, when he became of age, all the kingdoms, provinces, &c., already disposed of, so, by the next article, the emperor, for himself and his heirs, and the King of the Romans, were severally to declare and execute the like renunciations, on the death of the Catholic king; in consideration of the allotment of the said duchy to the archduke."

a curse to the Italian people, and that Naples and Sicily and Milan had miserably decayed and retrograded under the government of Spanish viceroys, who had been for the most part the most stupid and worst despots of the seventeenth century. The French, during their brilliant but brief successes in that fair peninsula, had not acted in a manner to leave a good name behind them; but, to the suffering Italians, any change, any chance, seemed preferable to that dead-weight of the Spaniards, which paralysed their blood and heart; and, if the people had been consulted, they would at that moment have preferred a French king—like the dauphin or his son—to those blundering and plundering Spanish viceroys who had misruled them ever since the time of Ferdinand the Catholic.* That heavy reproach—the malediction of an injured, denationalised people—which falls upon the partitioners of Poland, cannot therefore be made to apply to William, who must be held exempt from the worst of the charges implied by the word partition.

After concluding the long negotiation at Loo, the king amused himself for a short time in reviewing the Dutch troops and interchanging compliments with the princes of Germany; not neglecting, however, the important treaty going on at Carlowitz for a permanent peace between the sultan and the emperor, the King of Poland and the Venetians. [He sent Lord Paget to Carlowitz, where the negotiations were not finally concluded till the end of the year.] It was the 4th of December before William reached London, and on the 6th he opened his new parliament, which he soon found to be composed of very turbulent materials. Both parties professed to feel that the choice of a speaker would not only show their relative strength, but in a degree determine the character of the session and the issue of their debates; and the press, as usual, had been at work before the meeting of the two Houses. A paper entitled ‘Considerations upon the Choice of a Speaker’ had made a considerable impression, and the doctrines of its author were taken up and repeated on all sides; as, for example—that, whenever slavery should be fixed upon England, as it was upon our neighbours, it must be by the twofold influence of a corrupt parliament and a standing parliamentary army, according to the dictum of the great Lord Burleigh, “that England could never be undone except by a parliament;” that a corrupt Speaker was the fittest person to corrupt and otherwise influence the proceedings of the House; that men holding offices in the government were most unfit to be Speakers of the Commons; that this disqualification also lay against all bargainers and tricksters like “that old prostitute of the exploded pensioned parliament in Charles II.’s reign, who had, from that time till now, been tricking the House in so shameful a manner that three several periods of his life might be marked out by the bargains he had made with the court, when the court came up to his price.” This description was intended to designate Sir Edward Seymour, one of the Whigs spoken of for Speaker; and the remark about men holding places under government was directed against Sir Thomas Littleton, the other Whig favourite. Yet, when the house met, it was found that the Tory idol, Mr. Harley, had withdrawn, as having no chance in a contest; and then the choice fell upon Littleton,—“which looked like a good omen on the side of the court, promising a smooth and happy session.”* The king, in his speech, told them that two things principally seemed to require their consideration—the first, what strength ought to be maintained at sea, and what force kept up at land, for the quieting of people’s minds at home, and for preserving to England the weight and influence she had acquired in the counsels and affairs of the continent.—[“It will be requisite,” said he, “that Europe should see you will not be wanting to yourselves.”]—The second was the making of some further progress towards a discharge of the debts which the nation had contracted by reason of the long and expensive war.—[“I think,” said he, “that an English parliament can never make such a mistake as not to hold sacred all parliamentary engagements.”]—The Commons instantly took fire at these allusions to continental politics, land forces, &c.; and, leaping over the usual parliamentary courtesies of an address to the sovereign in reply to his speech, they fell upon the old ground of standing armies, which no public man, patriot or traitor, honest or a scoundrel, had ever yet taken up without rallying the masses of the English people round him. The ministers of the crown were too weak to make any resistance, and a resolution was soon adopted—“That all the land-forces of England, in English pay, exceeding 7000 men (and those to consist of his majesty’s natural-born subjects), should be forthwith paid and disbanded; and that all the forces in Ireland, excepting 12,000 men (and those natural-born subjects, to be kept and maintained by the kingdom of Ireland itself), should be likewise forthwith disbanded.” This went to deprive William even of the services of his Dutch guard, which had followed him through good and bad fortune, which was dearer to him than almost any other object, and which was far too insignificant in number to excite any reasonable jealousy. Yet, without the slightest regard to his feelings, the representatives of the people whom he had rescued from a tyranny and a despondency in which they had seemed unable to help themselves framed a bill upon the obnoxious resolution, carried it through all its stages, and sent it up to the Lords. Perhaps it is necessary to be a soldier to feel in its full force the bitterness of such a draught as this. By writers of all parties William’s feeling is described as having been intense. In his first agitation he even threatened again to quit the kingdom for ever, leaving the government to be vested in such persons as parliament might please to appoint. In a letter to the Pensionary Heinsius he says, "I am so chagrined at what passes in the House of Commons with regard to the troops, that I can scarce turn my thoughts to any other matter. I foresee that I shall be obliged to come to resolutions of extremity, and that I shall see you in Holland sooner than I thought."* Nay, he even went so far as to write out, with his own hand, a speech to announce his purpose. It still exists, as penned by himself, among the manuscripts in the British Museum. Like all William's productions, it is plain and simple, without the least attempt at eloquence or rhetorical flourish. Its import in English is as follows:—"My lords and gentlemen, I came into this kingdom, at the desire of the nation, to save it from ruin, and to preserve your religion, laws, and liberties; and for this object I have been obliged to sustain a long and very burdensome war for this kingdom, which, by the grace of God and the bravery of this nation, is at present terminated by a good peace; in which you may live happily and in repose, if you would contribute to your own security as I recommended at the opening of this session; but, seeing, on the contrary, that you have so little regard to my advice, and take so very little care of your own safety, and that you expose yourselves to evident ruin in depriving yourselves of the only means which may serve as necessary means for your defence, it would neither be just nor reasonable for me to be a witness of your ruin, not being able on my part to avoid it, being in no condition to defend and protect you, which was the only view I had in coming to this country; and thus I must require you to choose and name to me such persons as you may judge capable, to whom I may leave the administration of the government in my absence, assuring you that, though I am at present forced to retire out of this kingdom, I shall always preserve the same inclination for your advantage and prosperity; and that, when I may judge that my presence here is necessary for your defence, and that I can conceive I have the proper power to undertake it with success, and that you will contribute by putting me in my proper place, then I shall be induced to return and hazard my life for your security, as I have done in time past. I pray God to bless your deliberations, and to inspire you with what is necessary for the well-being and safety of this kingdom."† The speech was not delivered, and doubts were entertained whether he ever seriously intended to withdraw. "It was considered," says Burnet, "only as a threatening, so that little regard was had to it." But Chancellor Somers, who knew more of what was passing in the king's mind than any one, wrote to inform the Duke of Shrewsbury that he thought William was in good earnest.* We know not how the popular mind might have been affected: probably, however,—as the English people almost invariably take the more generous side, and are susceptible of all the generous passions,—they would have felt both pain and regret if he who had preserved them from a degrading despotism, who had led them in the field, who had retrieved the long-tarnished honour of their flag, and raised their military reputation to its ancient lustre, had been obliged to retire when the work was done, without his reward, and with the embittering conviction that he had served an ungrateful race. But, as for the majority of the truckling statesmen, they betrayed no generosity of sentiment on the occasion, but spoke of the facility of making a new king at their will and pleasure. A generation or two after, an anecdote was current that the Earl of Sunderland, upon being told that William threatened to throw up the crown, exclaimed, "Does he so? Well, there is Tom Pembroke, who is as good a block of wood as a king can be cut out of! We will send for him and make him our king.†

A. D. 1699.—According to Lord Hardwicke, William was moved from his resolution by his chancellor.‡ When the Lords had passed, without amendment, the bill sent up by the Commons, William went down to the parliament (on the 1st of February, 1699), and there, with a good grace, gave it the royal assent. "I am come," said he, "to pass the bill for disbanding the army as soon as I understood it was ready for me. Though in our present circumstances there appears great hazard in breaking such a number of the troops, and though I might think myself unkindly used, that those guards who came over to me, to your assistance, and have constantly attended me in all the actions wherein I have engaged, should be removed from me; yet it is my fixed opinion that nothing can be so fatal to us as that any distrust or jealousy should arise between me and my people, which I must own would have † Dalrymple's Memoirs. By Tom Pembroke was meant the Earl of Pembroke. A similar story is, however, told of the Duke of Devonshire at a somewhat later period. The editor of the Oxford edition of Burnet says, "It appears, from Carte's papers in the Bodleian Library, that the Duke of Devonshire, in consequence of his dislike to settling the crown on the House of Hanover, said, it would be better to place it on Long Tom's head, as they commonly called the Earl of Pembroke." But Devonshire, who was not remarkable for wit or originality, might have repeated an old jest.

‡ In a letter to the Duke of Shrewsbury, written about this time, Somers says, "At present the king is without anything which has the appearance of a ministry. The plain consequence is, that everybody (seeing the little credit those have who serve him) is in a manner invited to endeavour to ruin or expose them." Lord Hardwicke thus describes the chancellor's behaviour at this crisis:—"Lord Somers told the king upon it, that before his majesty made that declaration [to parliament he should humbly desire to resign the great seal; he had received it from him as his sovereign, and begged to return it to him while he continued so. This manly speech checked the king's hasty project, which would have been construed as a sort of abdication."—Note to a letter of the king's in Hardwicke State Papers.

† Sir Henry Ellis's Collection. The editor informs us that "the Countess of Suffolk, lady of the bedchamber to Queen Caroline, told the late Dr. Morton that she communicated this original draft to the queen, who chose to keep it, returning her only a copy. After the queen's death it came into the possession of the Princess Amelia, who gave it to Lord Berkeley of Stratton, for the Museum." The original, in the Museum, is in French, and in French of a very indifferent quality, both as to grammar and orthography; but Sir Henry Ellis's copyist or the printers have certainly added sundry errors of punctuation, &c. Dalrymple gave an English version of the letter in his Memoirs; but the authenticity of the document appears to have been doubted till Sir Henry Ellis found the original in William's handwriting.

been very unexpected, after what I have undertaken, ventured, and acted, for the restoring and securing of their liberties. I have thus plainly told you the only reason which has induced me to pass this bill; and now I think myself obliged, in discharge of the trust reposed in me, and for my own justification, that no ill consequences may lie at my door, to tell you as plainly my judgment, that the nation is left too much exposed. It is, therefore, incumbent upon you to take this matter into your serious consideration, and effectually to provide such a strength as is necessary for the safety of the kingdom and the preservation of the peace which God hath given us." The Commons hereupon voted an address of thanks, in which they expressed a sense of their great obligations and their gratitude to him who had rescued their religion and liberties, and given peace to Christendom; and the Lords also voted an address in the same tone, both Houses engaging to defend his sacred person and support his government. But when William, encouraged by these honeyed words, sent down to request that his Dutch guards might be allowed to remain, the Commons rejected his prayer with something like contempt: they resolved to adhere to the letter of the act; and it was decided, by a majority of 175 to 156, that the foreign troops, who were actually embarking at the moment, should be sent on their voyage to the continent. "It is," said the majority, in a new address, "an unspeakable grief to your loyal Commons, that your majesty should be advised to propose anything to which they cannot consent, with due regard to that constitution which your majesty came over to restore, and did, in your gracious declaration, promise that all those foreign forces which came over with you should be sent back: in duty, therefore, to your majesty, and to discharge the trust reposed in us, we crave leave to lay before you, that nothing conduceth more to the happiness and welfare of this kingdom than an entire confidence between your majesty and your people, which can no way be so firmly established as by intrusting your sacred person with your own subjects." But, whatever confidence William might repose in the generous and kindly feelings of the mass of the English people, he had had melancholy proof that there were many of his subjects—subjects eminent in name and rank,—men in the highest commands in army and navy—that had plotted his destruction; and he could not but know that, when that double traitor Marlborough, in the year 1692, strove in parliament to get his foreign guards removed, it was in order to rob him of his crown and to restore the fatal line of Stuart. And, putting apart the weighty consideration of foreign wars and intrigues at every instant ready to break out afresh,* was it not natural, was it not excusable, that he, whose life had been repeatedly threatened by assassination in the streets and in the immediate neighbourhood of his capital, should be desirous of keeping about his person those countrymen of his own who had served him so faithfully and so long? The jealousy against standing armies has, no doubt, been a blessing to England, but still every generous mind must agree that this sending away of the Dutch guard was, what it has been described by one of the best of our living writers—"an act of unkindness and ingratitude."* If we look into the base and party motives of the majority that carried the act, we shall feel inclined to speak still more harshly of the whole transaction. Dalrymple states, on the authority of what he calls "a well-vouched tradition," that, when the account of the refusal of the Commons to leave him his Dutch guards was brought to him, William walked some time silently up and down the room, with his eyes fixed on the floor, then stopped, and, glancing wildly around, exclaimed, "If I had a son, by God these guards should not quit me!" But, though we have the authority of Burnet to prove that William, in spite of his habitual coolness and great command over his passions, would sometimes betray violent feelings in violent and indecorous language, we are not disposed to give implicit credit to this tradition. He, however, made no further effort to retain the foreign troops; and Dutch, French Huguenots, and all, proceeded to Holland. The condition of the latter—the exiles for conscience and religion—ought to have made the deeper impression, as about this time the persecuted Vaudois or Waldensers were again driven out of Savoy to seek for refuge and a home among the Protestant princes of Germany.

The tottering Whig ministry was now assailed on all sides. "And it is certain," says Burnet, "that this act (an act lately carried by Montague and the Whig majority for establishing a new East India Company), together with the inclinations which those of the Whigs who were in good posts had expressed for keeping up a greater land force, did contribute to the blasting the reputation they had hitherto maintained of being good patriots, and was made use of, over England, by the Tories, to disgrace both the king and them. To this another charge of a high nature was added—that they robbed the public, and applied much of the money that was given for the service of the nation both to the supporting a

* Hallam, Const. Hist.—In a letter to Lord Galway (Rouvière), dated January 27, 1699, when the subject was under debate, the king says, "There is an spirit of ignorance and malice prevails here beyond conception." In the same communication he speaks of a secret design to get three French regiments, and perhaps Miermont's dragoons, sent over to Ireland to be kept there; but subsequently he gave up this design. And he also says to Lord Galway in another letter—"It is not possible to be more sensibly touched than I am at my not being able to do more for the poor refugee officers (the French Huguenots) who have served me with so much zeal and fidelity. I am afraid the good God will punish the ingratitude of this nation. As usually, on all sides, my patience is put to the trial. I am going to breathe a little beyond sea, in order to come back as soon as possible."—Fundal, Hist.

* Bolingbroke, though connected with the Tory party, who had voted for the measure, candidly admits that the hurried reduction of the army was a capital political blunder. "France," he says, "continued armed by sea and land after the peace. She increased her forces, whilst other nations reduced theirs; and was ready to defend or to invade her neighbours, whilst, their confederacy being vast expense and to the raising great estates to themselves: this was sensible to the people, who were uneasy under heavy taxes." The reader will not have forgotten the conduct of Admiral Russell, now Earl of Orford, and both first lord of the admiralty and treasurer of the navy. It was upon this personage that the Commons made their first attack, charging him with keeping large sums of money on hand for his own private use, and to the great prejudice of the seamen and the public service. The accounts were produced, and the charges seemed primâ facie well made out. It appeared that there remained a balance in the earl's hands of 460,000*l.; but, according to his own showing, about the whole of this sum was then in course of payment. The Commons forthwith voted an address to his majesty, complaining of delays in granting convoys, of allowances improperly made to officers, &c., of a misapplication of the public money, of many new and unnecessary charges introduced into the navy; and representing that it was inconsistent with the service for the same person to be one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral and treasurer of the navy at the same time; that passing of accounts without regular vouchers, &c., was of dangerous consequence; and that they must desire his majesty to be graciously pleased to take effectual care that these mismanagements might be prevented for the future. William sent a short and proper answer; but Orford resigned, quitting both fleet and admiralty—"as if from a foresight of the storm which was gathering against him in the House of Commons." The Tories were desirous of getting Sir George Rooke put in his place, but the Earl of Bridgewater, a nobleman but little acquainted with sea affairs, was appointed, and Priestman, one of the junior lords, who was removed at the same time, was succeeded by Lord Haversham, another "land admiral," as the sailors began to call the admiralty commissioners. It was decided by the votes of the House that the naval forces should be strictly limited to 15,000 seamen; and, for fear the king might augment his land-forces in the form or under the name of marines, it was specified that the said 15,000 men should consist of seamen only. For the several demands for navy and army, disbanding, &c., they provided by one single bill, granting 1,484,015*l.* 1*s.* 1½*d.* to be raised by a land-tax of three shillings in the pound. But in the same act, "very much against the grain of the court," a clause was attached for empowering commissioners "to take an account of the estates forfeited in Ireland by the last rebellion, in order to their being applied in ease of the subjects of England." William, since the last time these Irish forfeitures were the subject of parliamentary debate, had given many of the Irish estates to his favourites, contrary to his promise to the Houses, being encouraged thereto by the long silence, and by the proposal made in the Commons that a part of the property should be left to the disposal of the crown. Proceeding on their principle that the Lords could not alter a money bill, the Commons further named in the bill the commissioners for carrying their purpose into effect. The Lords, who found themselves precluded from entering into the merits of the bill, reluctantly passed it, nine of their number—being a mixture of Whigs and Tories—protesting strongly against the procedure:—"First, because the clause in question comprised a matter foreign to the bill; and, secondly, because the practice of tacking clauses of this nature to money bills was contrary to the ancient method of proceeding in parliament, subversive of the freedom of debate, and derogatory to the privileges of the House." William, though hurt and offended, gave the bill the royal assent, and prorogued parliament on the 4th of May. The ministry was now completely broken up. The Duke of Leeds, who had sunk into contempt ever since the discovery of his dealings with the old East India Company, was now dismissed from the Presidency of the Council, which was conferred on the Earl of Pembroke, or "Long Tom," as he was called, who pretended to be neither Whig nor Tory, and who was respected by both parties. The Duke of Shrewsbury resigned, and Lord Jersey was put in his place. Sir John Lowther, now Lord Lonsdale, who had pushed his way to honours and riches through the patronage of Danby and the Tories, got the privy seal.

A few days after the prorogation William passed over to Holland, and fixed himself at his quiet retreat at Loo. But the tranquillity of that place could scarcely extend to his own mind; events were rolling on with astounding rapidity. The treaty of Ryswick and the Partition Treaty were both beginning to appear of no effect; the whole Spanish inheritance seemed again inevitably falling to France; and, while he was precluded from keeping together the nucleus of an English army, Louis was increasing his forces, with the resolution of defending with his sword what he was gaining by intrigue and diplomacy. But before proceeding to the great continental question we will briefly narrate events and circumstances nearer home which immeasurably increased William's old unpopularity in Scotland.

The ships mentioned as being already at sea in the last session of parliament there were five stout ships carrying 1200 men, under the guidance of Paterson, who had sailed from Leith Roads on the 26th day of July (1698). That extraordinary projector had transported the ordinarily cool and calculating Scots almost out of their senses. From high to low all his countrymen were visited by day-dreams of sudden and enormous wealth, by visions of gold, and of nothing but gold. The new company, which included some of the noblest and most intellectual of the Scottish nation, had caused the stout ships to be built in Holland, and many of the aristocracy had embarked their younger sons, confident that they were putting them on the sure road to wealth and distinction. Several lords denuded their estates to send out their vassals or tenantry; and many officers who had been disbanded by the late peace had ventured their persons and their little property. The whole city of Edinburgh poured down upon Leith to witness the departure of the colony, and hundreds of soldiers and sailors, who had not been engaged, and for whom no provision was made, were with difficulty prevented from forcing themselves into the ships. Ten days after their departure the Scottish parliament unanimously addressed the king, begging his support for the company, which still would not doubt of the validity of the charter, and of the letters patent which his majesty had granted it. The Lord President, Sir Hugh Dalrymple, brother to Lord Stair, and the Lord Advocate, Sir James Stuart, jointly drew up memorials to the king, in which they defended the rights of the company upon the principles of constitutional and international law. Paterson, who had not only visited the shores of that country, but had also been acquainted there with Dampier, the buccaneering captain, and Lionel Wafer, the surgeon to the Buccaneers (who had lived many months among the native Indians), and who knew more of the isthmus than any European, led his little squadron straight for Darien. In the month of October they arrived at Golden Island, a place famed in the annals of the Buccaneers. It has been said, and with some reason, seeing what had been done on shore by a handful of English marauders, that these twelve hundred brave and hardy men, who for the most part had been trained to arms and inured to the fatigues and dangers of the late war, might, if they had been so disposed, have marched from one end of South America to the other, without finding any Spanish force capable of opposing them. But Paterson, who paid more respect to treaties of peace and the laws of nations than had been shown by the Morgans, Sharpes, and Dampiers, quietly landed at Acta, in a convenient harbour, one of the sides of which was formed by a long narrow neck of land. This neck of land they cut through, and, having thus formed a sort of island, they erected upon it their little fort, which they christened "New St. Andrew's," or, according to other accounts, "New Edinburgh." Some forty or fifty guns were landed from the ships and planted round the fort. On the opposite side of the commodious harbour there was a mountain commanding a very extensive view both seaward and landward, and here they erected a signal-house, and placed in it a corps of quick-sighted Highlanders to give notice of the approach of any hostile force. The first public act of the infant colony was a declaration of freedom of trade and of religion to all nations. This great and ennobling idea, which as yet had not been acted upon by any of the English colonies in the New World, with the curious exception of that of Maryland, planted by the Catholic lord Baltimore,* seems to have originated with Paterson, who, whatever were his birth and education,† possessed an enlightenment and liberality really extraordinary, and notions about commerce and conscience which had hitherto been confined to a few speculative and inoperative philosophers.‡ Acta, or New St. Andrew's, was admirably situated on the northern coast of the Isthmus of Darien, or Panama, about midway between Portobello and Carthage, being about fifty leagues distant from either town. The magnificent natural harbour was capable of receiving the greatest fleets, and was defended from storms by numerous islands and islets. On the other side of the isthmus the little frequented and unoccupied shores of the Pacific were indented with bays and harbours equally commodious: but the land communication from sea to sea lay over rough and lofty mountains, and through wild forests: the river of Santa Maria, which ran across a great part of the isthmus into the South Sea, was scarcely navigable by canoes except at certain seasons of the year, and for short distances: there was almost every variety

* See vol. ii. p. 540. Lord Baltimore, of course, would not exclude persons of his own religion from his colony, and would not have been permitted to exclude Protestants; so that he had no resource but to tolerate both religions.

† Dalrymple says that Paterson's birth was unknown; that he was bred to the Scottish Church, but, having a violent propensity to see foreign countries, he made his profession the instrument of indulging it, by going to the western world under pretence of converting the Indians; that there he became acquainted with Dampier and Wafer, and other Buccaneers; that at first his intention was to offer his plan for a settlement on the isthmus of Darien to the English government, but, being discouraged, he turned his attention to the scheme for erecting the Bank of England, the model of which he assisted to make; that he afterwards proposed his colony to the Dutch, the Hamburgers, and the Elector of Brandenburg; and that, on forming an intimate acquaintance with that wise and patriotic Scot, Fletcher of Saltoun, he trusted the fate of his project to his own countrymen.

‡ This appears from Paterson's own papers, which exist in the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh, and from which Dalrymple has published some very striking extracts. We quote the following passages as being far in advance of the age in which he lived:—"The time and expense of navigation to China, Japan, the Spice Islands, and the far greatest part of the East Indies, will be lessened more than half, and the consumption of European commodities and manufactures will soon be more than doubled. Trade will increase trade, and money will beget money, and the trading world shall need no more to want work for their hands, but will rather want hands for their work. Thus this door of the seas, and the key of the universe, with anything of a reasonable management, will, of course, enable its proprietors to give laws to both oceans, and to become arbitrators of the commercial world, without being liable to the fatigues, expenses, and dangers, or contracting the guilt and blood, of Alexander and Caesar. In all our empires that have been anything universal, the conquerors have been obliged to seek out and court their conquests from afar; but the universal force and influence of this attractive magnet is such as can much more effectually bring empire home to its proprietors' doors. But from what hath been said you may easily perceive that the nature of these discoveries is such as not to be engrossed by any one nation or people, with exclusion to others; nor can it be thus attempted without evident hazard and ruin, as we see in the case of Spain and Portugal, who, by their prohibiting any other people to trade, or so much as go to, or dwell in, the Indies, have not only lost that trade they were not able to maintain, but have depopulated and ruined their countries therewith; so that the Indies have rather conquered Spain and Portugal than they have conquered the Indies; for, by their permitting all to go out, and none to come in, they have not only lost the people which are gone to these remote and luxuriant regions, but such as remain are become wholly unprofitable and good for nothing. Thus, not unlike the case of the dog in the fable, they have lost their own countries, and yet not gotten the Indies. People and their industry are the true riches of a prince or nation; and, in respect to them, all other things are but imaginary. This was well understood by the people of Rome, who, contrary to the maxims of Spain and Portugal, by general assistance, liberty of conscience, and immunity of government, far more effectually and advantageously conquered and kept the world than ever they did, or possibly could have done, by the sword."

of natural difficulty to overcome; the whole line was fitted for ambuscades and hostile surprises; and, if the Spaniards at any time chose to move from the towns of Santa Maria or Panama, there were passes and places where five hundred men might have arrested the march of five thousand. In the year 1680, when Dampier and his brother buccaneers landed at Darien, and crossed from sea to sea, in order to launch for the first time on the great Pacific, and to plunder the town of Santa Maria, they experienced tremendous difficulties. Though carrying nothing but four cakes of bread called dough-boys, a light gun, a pistol, and a hanger each man, they were four days before they gained a point whence the river of Santa Maria was navigable. There some of them embarked in canoes furnished by the friendly Indians, hoping to glide easily down the stream: but this mode of travelling, owing to the scarcity of water and other impediments, was as wearisome as marching across the mountains and woods; and, after enduring tremendous fatigue, it was not till the eighth day that they reached a point of land where the river, being joined by another stream, became broad and deep, permitting them to glide, in deep water and with an easy current, down to the Pacific.* And here was one of Paterson's capital mistakes; for he had concluded that cargoes of goods landed at Acta, or New St. Andrew's, could easily be transported by land and river carriage from sea to sea, and then re-shipped in the gulf of Panama for all the great countries of the East. A great European nation, at the expense of a war with Spain, and with the allies to that crown, who would assuredly have been called into the field by jealousy of the vast advantage, might have overcome all these difficulties in time, and with the outlay of enormous sums of money; but such an achievement was altogether beyond the force of such a company as Paterson had been able to create.

Although the Spaniards had for ages pretended an exclusive right to all those parts of the globe, they had, properly speaking, no possession of the isthmus, which was scantily occupied by the Mosquito Indians, who were constantly waging war against them; but the Spaniards held the country on both sides, and their towns of Panama and Santa Maria stood upon one of the edges of the isthmus. Dampier and his friends seem to have considered that they were justified, as allies of the Mosquitoes, in attacking and plundering the Spanish towns; and now Paterson and his companions assumed that these Indians had a right to sell or otherwise dispose of parts of their own unconquered territory; and contracts of this kind were made with the chiefs of the savages, one of whom Dampier had decorated with the well-sounding title of King Lacentia, sovereign lord of the isthmus. But, even in the state of decrepitude and imbecility into which the court of Spain had fallen, it was scarcely possible to expect that she would recognise transactions and principles of this kind, or submit to have such a neighbour as the Scottish colony in the midst of her American empire. A writer who has taken some pains about this subject, and who had access to all the papers of the Scottish Company,* seems to think that a free passage across the isthmus might have been obtained by a treaty, and the payment of such tolls or transit duties as the King of Spain might demand: but it is quite certain that the Spanish court would on no account have entered into any such treaty; and that nothing but force of arms could have opened to Scotland or England, or to any other country whatsoever, "that door of the seas and key of the universe." From all that is before us we are disposed to believe that it was this insuperable obstacle on the part of Spain, and the necessity he was under of respecting the general feeling of the nations of Europe, that determined William to check, discourage, and uproot Paterson's settlement. But several writers confidently affirm that the prayers of his English subjects trading with the East, and the Dutch East India Company, had more to do with this decision than any considerations about Spain or the jus publicum of Europe. These influences, however, may have been considerable as secondary agents. Whatever were his motives—and all political motives are complicated—William, as soon as he knew the real intentions of Paterson and the Company, directed the Earl of Seafield, secretary of state for Scotland, to inform the colonists that, "the particular design not being communicated to his majesty," he must delay giving them any assistance till he should receive surer information. Upon this the Company in Scotland notified to Seafield that their ships had reached their destination on the coast of Darien, and had fairly obtained, by treaty with the natives, a tract of country which had never been in the possession of any European power. But the king, who knew better how the Spaniards interpreted that matter, sent out orders to Sir William Beeston, governor of Jamaica, who, early in the month of April, 1699, or about seven months after the settlement of New St. Andrew's, issued a proclamation importing that his majesty was not informed of the designs of the Scots in relation to Darien; that, those designs being contrary to treaties subsisting between his majesty and his allies, all his majesty's subjects in those parts were forbidden to hold any correspondence with those colonists upon any pretence whatsoever. Similar proclamations were issued by the gover-

* Narrative by Basil Ringrose.—Burney's Discoveries in the South Sea, vol. iv.—Dampier himself has given us no account of this expedition; but his Voyages contain a narrative of his return over-land from the Pacific to the Atlantic the following year. "Thus," he concludes, "we finished our journey from the South Sea to the North in twenty-three days; in which time, by my account, we have travelled 110 miles, crossing some very high mountains; but our common march was in the valleys, among deep and dangerous rivers. . . . Our first landing-place on the south coast was very disadvantageous, for we travelled at least fifty miles more than we need to have done, could we have gone up Cheapo river or Santa Maria river; for at either of these places a man may pass from sea to sea in three days' time with ease. The Indians can do it in a day and a half."—New Voyage Round the World, I, 23.

nors of the other islands possessed by the English ; and it was to these West India islands that the unfortunate colonists looked for supplies of provisions, assistance, and co-operation. The slowness of all Spanish proceedings had, long before this, passed into a proverb ; yet it seems scarcely credible that that court should not have taken notice of this affair before the month of May, when the Marquess de Canales, minister residentiary, is said to have first presented a memorial to the court of London, remonstrating in the strongest terms against the Darien settlement, which was described as not merely a violation of friendship, but as an actual rupture of the alliance subsisting between the two crowns. The English court replied by producing the strict orders sent out to the governor of Jamaica a month before the presentation of the ambassador's memorial.* Nor were those orders meant for a mere blind to Spain ; on the contrary, they were strictly executed in the West Indies : and, in consequence of them, Paterson and his followers were soon reduced to extreme misery, having consumed the provisions they had brought with them, and having no other supplies at hand than the very scanty ones afforded by the hunting and fishing of the poor Mosquito Indians. Bad food soon produced disease ; the climate assisted in these ravages ; the hardy mountaineers of Scotland perished by dozens a day ; and at last, when the sad residue, despairing of succour from their native country, took to their ships, there were scarcely a hundred men with health and strength enough to work them. It is said that the last man to embark was Paterson. The Scottish Company, after the presentation of the Spanish ambassador's memorial and the production of William's rigid instructions to his governors, but before any news reached them of Paterson's having left that fatal isthmus, sent out another colony of 1300 men to support an establishment which no longer existed. But this time their vessels, prepared in a hurry, were not stout ships : one of them was lost at sea, and another was injured by fire, and wrecked on the Spanish Main. And those of the passengers that reached their destination, instead of welcoming countrymen and friends, found nobody but a few wild Indians,—a desert and a waste where they had expected to see a thriving little town. As if to overset at once Paterson's beautiful scheme of universal toleration, and as if to throw burning torches into the abounding materials of inflammable matter, the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland had sent out four fiery Presbyterian ministers, with orders "to take charge of the souls of the colony, and to erect a presbytery, with a moderator, clerk, and record of proceedings ; to appoint ruling elders, deacons, overseers of the manners of the people, and assistants in the exercise of church discipline and government, and to hold regular kirk sessions." Such an authority as this was not only inconsistent with Paterson's plan, but also extremely odious to many of the gentlemen colonists, who neither were Presbyterians, nor wished to become so. Shunned by this superior class, the four preachers fastened upon the adventurers of inferior rank, and soon sowed both spiritual and political divisions in New St. Andrew's. At the same time they almost put a stop to the indispensable labours of the colonists, by requiring their almost constant attendance at kirk and prayers.*

When this second colony had been about three months on the isthmus it was joined by Captain Campbell of Finab, with a company of his own tenantry, chiefly men whom he had commanded in the wars in Flanders, and who were glad to follow their old officer and landlord in a ship of his own. On his arrival at New St. Andrew's, Captain Campbell learned that a Spanish force of 1600 men, brought from the opposite coast of the South Sea, lay encamped at Tubucatee, not far from the colony, expecting the arrival of a Spanish squadron of eleven sail, in order to a joint attack by land and sea. Campbell, who obtained the chief command on account of his reputation as an officer, and of his high birth, resolved to anticipate the Spaniards, and to fall upon the troops before the ships should come up ; and, accordingly, on the second day after his arrival he marched briskly upon Tubucatee with 200 men, stormed the camp at the dead of night, and scattered the Spanish force with considerable slaughter. In a military point of view this was the best thing he could have done ; but, at the same time, it was making the Scots the aggressors, and beginning a war, not

* Dalrymple, who hotly embraces the hypothesis that the English and the Dutch were more fatal to his countrymen than were the Spaniards, says, "that during the space of two years, while the establishment of this colony had been in agitation, Spain had made no complaint to England or Scotland against it (but Spain could not complain before she knew where this colony was to be planted) ; that the Darien council, or the council of the Company, even avowed in their papers (which are in the Advocates' Library) that the right of the Company was debated before the king, in presence of the Spanish ambassador, before the colony left Scotland." But Dalrymple does not produce his evidence from the Advocates' Library ; and the statement is so incredible as to require far more support than the avowment of a hot-headed, dreaming, enthusiastic body corporate like the Company. Continuing the same line of argument, Dalrymple says, "But now, on the 3rd of May, 1699, the ambassador presented a memorial to the king. . . . It was believed that this memorial proceeded more from the suggestion of the English and Dutch ministers than from his own court, because it was observed that the orders to the English governors were dated before the memorial of the Spanish ambassador."—Memoirs.

* "They exhausted the spirits of the people by requiring their attendance at sermon four or five hours at a stretch, relieving each other by preaching alternately, but allowing no relief to their hearers. The employment of one of the days set aside for religious exercise, which was a Wednesday, they divided into three parts—thanksgiving, humiliation, and supplication, in which three ministers followed each other. And, as the service of the church of Scotland consists of a lecture, with a comment, a sermon, two prayers, three psalms, and a blessing, the work of that day, upon an average of the length of the service of that age, could not take up less than twelve hours ; during which space of time the colony was collected and kept close together in the guard-room, which was used as a church, in a tropical climate, and in a sticky season. They presented a paper to the council, and made it public, requiring them to set aside a day for a solemn fasting and humiliation, and containing their reasons for the requisition, in which, under pretence of enumerating the sins of the people, they poured abuse on their rulers. They damped the courage of the people, by continually presenting hell to them as the termination of life to most men, because most men are sinners. Carrying the Presbyterian doctrine to its destination to extremity, they stopped all exertions, by showing that the consequence of them depended not on those by whom they were made. They converted the numberless accidents to which soldiers and seamen are exposed into immediate judgments of God against their sins."—Dalrymple, Memoirs.

only without a commission from, but against the positive orders of, his sovereign. Campbell returned safely and triumphantly to New St. Andrew's; but during his short absence the Spanish squadron had come up, their ships of war and transports were lying at the mouth of the harbour, troops were landed, and positions were taken up which cut off the communication of the Scots, and soon hemmed them in within their frail, hastily constructed fortifications. Yet, in this desperate situation, without hope of help or provisions, Campbell defended the place for nearly six weeks, and then the garrison capitulated upon honourable terms. Campbell got to his ship, sailed away to New York, and thence made his way back to Scotland, where he was received as a hero; but nearly all the rest of the officers were dead before the capitulation. The survivors, whom Campbell had left behind, were embarked by the Spaniards in one of their ships called the "Rising Sun," but they were so weak as not to be able to weigh their anchor without assistance. The Spaniards behaved humanely, but the governors of the English possessions where they were obliged to touch treated them like felons and outcasts; and, in the end, between war, shipwreck, and disease, only thirty of these unfortunate adventurers ever saw Scotland again. Of the four Presbyterian preachers, however, three survived and returned to explain their wrath of God to their countrymen. These ministers had quitted the settlement before the Spaniards marched to attack it, and, to excuse their deserting the post of difficulty and danger, they wrote letters to the general assembly of the kirk, throwing the blame on the colonists, whom they described as an accursed crew, worse than the people of Sodom, running their way to hell and eternal judgment, till they should be ripe for the sickle of the wrath of God. One of these indecent railers and most unchristian zealots subsequently published in Scotland a sort of history of the colony, in which he exulted over the sufferings of his countrymen, whose greatest crime in his eyes probably was a dislike to the intolerance and gloomier tenets of Calvin, and a fondness for liberty of conscience. He calls the four ministers, including of course himself, "God's jewels," and he assures his readers that, when the last of the four was got out of that damnable place by a kind of miracle, like a brand out of the fire, then perdition fell upon it;—"as when once Lot was got out of Sodom into Zoar, then, without any longer delay, the Lord rained destruction from heaven upon those cities of iniquity." Poor Paterson, who had gone homeward on the ruin of the first colony, "looking more like a skeleton than a man," went mad on his passage; but he recovered both in mind and body, and, still ardent and confident of success, he presented a new plan, according to which England was to share with Scotland the dominion of the isthmus, and a new joint-stock of two millions sterling was to be raised, one fifth part to belong to Scotland, and the other four fifths to England. He survived many years in neglect and poverty—haunted, if he were a man of feeling, by the recollection of the hundreds of his countrymen whom he had unwittingly led to destruction.*

In the month of September, while the company in Scotland only apprehended, but did not know, the conclusion of the tragical drama in Darien, they transmitted an address or petition to William, complaining of the injuries they had already received, and the mischiefs they had to apprehend, from the Spaniards; and beseeching his majesty's favour and protection. To this an evasive answer was returned; and thereupon the Scottish company remonstrated in strong terms, averring "that they were not within the pale of the royal protection;" complaining of the proclamations which had been issued to the governors of the West India plantations, and which had produced the most fatal consequences to the company; and entreating that his majesty would be pleased to take off the force and effect of those proclamations, and allow his parliament of Scotland to meet at as early a period as possible, in order that he might have the advice and assistance of the great council of the nation in such a weighty and general concern. Lord Seafield, the secretary, replied for William, that his majesty much regretted the loss which that kingdom and company had lately sustained; that his majesty would upon all occasions protect and encourage the trade of Scotland; and that they should enjoy the same freedom of commerce with the English plantations as formerly: but, as for the parliament, it was adjourned till the month of March; yet he would cause it to meet when he judged that the good of the nation required it. This answer was of course very unsatisfactory; the national ferment grew and spread on all sides; and, when news arrived of the attack and surrender of New St. Andrew's, of the harsh treatment received by the Scottish fugitives at the hands of the English authorities in the West Indies, of a number of Scottish subjects being detained prisoners at Carthagena, and of the heart-breaking fate of nearly every individual that had been concerned in the Darien colony, the whole of Scotland was excited almost to a state of madness, and nothing less was talked of than a war with England and a declaration that the throne of Scotland was forfeited by William's conduct in this business. And, indeed, that conduct seems scarcely to admit of any excuse or palliation. It is represented that some of the Scottish ministers knowingly deceived him; that the extravagantly sanguine and enthusiastic promoters of the plan—and among these were men of the highest rank most trusted by William—inserted in the parliamentary acts more than they were authorised to do; that the royal assent to these acts and the letters patent were got from the king in a hurry; and that the most important of the signatures was actually affixed in the trenches before Namur, when William's attention was absorbed by the operation of the most important siege he had ever undertaken. But after all this, there was time to come forward frankly and openly, and stop the fatal expedition; and when the orders were sent out to the English governors in the West Indies—orders which went to famish and destroy hundreds of brave men, who doubtless, for the most part, believed that they were acting under the sanction of their king and parliament,—and still more when his majesty disclaimed to the Spanish ambassador any participation in the scheme—assuredly the least that ought to have been done, in justice or humanity, was to have dispatched a convoy to bring the unhappy colonists and the wreck of their property safely home. It may be more than probable that the English parliament, in their jealousy of the Scots and in their desire to thwart the king in all things, would have opposed any such merciful expedition, but William might have taken so much upon himself by right of his prerogative; but this he did not do, nor does it appear that he ever suggested any such measure either to the parliament or to his ministers.

* Dalrymple, Memoirs. This writer adds—"After the union of the two kingdoms Paterson claimed reparation of his losses from the equivalent money given by England to the Darien Company, but got nothing; because a grant to him from a public fund would have been only an act of humanity, not a political job."

Part of this Scottish storm did not burst over his head till after William's return from the continent; but his summer retreat at Loo was disturbed and made stormy by other elements. The Partition Treaty,—apparently by France, the first projector of it,—was made known to the court of Madrid, where it excited feelings favourable to Louis and a most intense hatred against William. In the preceding year (1698), in spite of the intrigues of the French party, Charles II., who considered himself authorised to dispose by will, and without any consent of the Cortes, of nations and of many millions of people of different races and interests, whom he had never been able to govern, executed a testament in which he called the young Electoral Prince of Bavaria (one of the parties provided for in the Partition Treaty) to the universal succession of the Spanish monarchy, appointing his father, the Elector of Bavaria, sole regent during the boy's minority. The wretched Charles, who had scarcely known a day's health from his infancy upwards, and who now, in the thirty-seventh year of his age, looked like a man of seventy, ascended his dishonoured throne, and announced this nomination of the young Bavarian to the counsellors of state and presidents of the supreme tribunals of Spain, informing them that his choice of a successor had been guided solely by motives of conscience and justice, and by the advice of the most learned and upright men in his kingdom. The French ambassador complained and protested; but the Count of Oropeza reminded him that Louis XIV., on his marriage, had consented to the renunciation of the Spanish crowns made by his queen, the Infanta Maria Theresa, and that hence the right had passed to Maria Theresa's younger sister, the Infanta Margarita, grandmother to the young Prince of Bavaria, who had never been bound to make any such renunciation of the Spanish succession.* But the young Bavarian had been scarcely named in the will and declaration when he suddenly fell sick and died, in the eighth year of his age. The bereaved father, the elector, who had been indulging in the most brilliant prospects for himself and family, suspected that his son had been carried off by poison, Dunlop, Memoirs of Spain during the reigns of Philip IV. and Charles II. As already mentioned, her daughter, the mother of the electoral prince, had been forced by her own father, the Emperor Leopold, to renounce her claim to the Spanish succession upon her marriage with the Elector of Bavaria; but the act had not been recognised, and was not considered valid in Spain.

and in his agony he charged the French king with the diabolical act.* But, as the young prince had been equally an obstacle to the pretensions of his grandfather, the Emperor Leopold, or to his scheme of devolving his own claims to the succession upon his second son, the Archduke Charles, it was reported and believed in France that the young Bavarian had perished in consequence of means employed by the Austrian cabinet.† This unexpected death not only rendered nugatory the First Partition Treaty, which had cost William so much pains and so much obloquy, but also, and in various ways, favoured the plans of Louis. From this moment, indeed, it was a struggle of intrigue, deception, bribery, and corruption between France and Austria—a sort of struggle in which the French have generally defeated all antagonists. Neither party had any conscience, any bowels, any the slightest visitations of compassion for the dying Charles, whose last days they rendered terrible as the life of the damned, and whose death they hastened, not so rapidly (there would have been mercy in that!), but as surely, as if they had hired assassins to drive a dagger through his heart. William must have been miserably served by his diplomatic agents at Madrid, else he must have known what was going on there, and that knowledge would have prevented him from engaging with the insidious Louis in a new Partition Treaty, for which the French, pretty sure of their game by other cards, pretended a great earnestness as soon as the death of the Bavarian Prince was known. And this time the emperor, apparently fearing the result of the struggle going on at Madrid, was fain to lower his pretensions and to correspond with the negotiators who met round William, Portland, and de Tallard, at Loo. But these negotiations, like the preceding ones, were soon made known to the Spanish court. The dying king had still spirit enough left to remonstrate in strong terms against these scandalous negotiations in a memorial presented to the English ambassador at Madrid, and to order the Spanish ambassador at London to present a still more stirring document to the council of regency, or lords justices, who managed affairs during William's absence. In this second memorial the Spaniard, after appealing to the justice and honour of the English nation, added, insolently enough, "If these proceedings, these machinations and projects, are not speedily put a stop to, we shall, without doubt, see a dire and universal war over all Europe, difficult to stop when wished, and most sensible and prejudicial to the English nation, which has newly tried and felt what innovations and the last war had cost them;" and he further declared that the ambassador extraordinary of Spain would manifest to the parliament, when it should assemble, the just resentment which he now expressed. When this memorial was transmitted to Loo, the Spanish ambassador was informed by Secretary Vernon that his master found its contents so insolent and seditious, that he must order him to quit his dominions within eighteen days. At the same time orders were dispatched to Madrid, commanding Mr. Stanhope to cease all diplomatic intercourse with that court, and return home. All this was sure gain to France, and it encouraged the shallow-headed Austrians, who neither knew how to gain or how to resign their point, to complain of the insolence of England and Holland in presuming to divide and parcel out the monarchy of Spain. When M. Hop, or Hope, the Dutch minister at Vienna, complained of the memorial presented by the Spanish ambassador at London, as gross and insolent, particularly in its appeal from the sovereign to his subjects in parliament, the Spanish minister there, who was present, said, gravely, that it was scarcely possible to regard in the same light with the subjects of other kings the English people, who had dethroned one king, and elected another,—who had even put a third king to death, and who had openly acted in defiance of the will of the present sovereign, alluding here to the affair of Darien. There was, indeed, this great difference between the subjects of England and those of Spain: the former cut off one king's head, and had driven out another; the latter had stood by and seen their kings, inquisitors, and despotic ministers put to a sort of lingering death a noble kingdom, and drive out the virtues and energies, the industry and genius, of a most capable and naturally high-spirited people.

William himself returned home on the 18th of October, to find a dispirited and breaking ministry. Montague, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, resigned, and Lord Tankerville, better known under his former title of Lord Grey of Werk, was placed at the head of the Treasury, one Smith, another of the commissioners, being made Chancellor of the Exchequer. Of the real Whigs, not one remained at his post except Lord Somers, the chancellor, and the Duke of Shrewsbury, who was induced to accept the office of Lord Chamberlain, previously held by Sunderland—a household appointment, but one which had never been filled in this reign except by an individual in possession of great influence and authority in council. On the 16th of November William opened the session of parliament with a speech in which every expression was carefully avoided that might give any cause of offence. But he used the words—"Since our aims are wholly for the general good, let us act with confidence with one another; which will not fail, by God's blessing, to make me a happy king, and you a great and flourishing people." And the Commons caught angrily at these words, as if by recommending this mutual confidence he meant to imply that they had been deficient towards him in this respect; and in their address they stated this captious feeling with very little periphrasis. "We do esteem it," said they, "our greatest misfortune, that, after having so amply provided for the security of your majesty and your government, both by sea and land, any jealousy or distrust hath been raised of our duty and affections to your sacred majesty: and we beg leave humbly to represent, that it will greatly conduce to the continuing and establishing an entire confidence between your majesty and your parliament, that you will be pleased to show marks of your high displeasure towards all such persons as have or shall presume to misrepresent our proceedings to your majesty." William, who must have seen that they were in a humour to quarrel about straws, coolly replied, that no person had ever dared to misrepresent to him the proceedings of either House, and that, if any such calumnies should be attempted, they would not only fail of success with him, but the authors of them would be treated as his worst enemies.

The Tories were resolved, at all hazards, to drive Lord Somers from his almost solitary post, and, "after much casting about," they accused the Lord High Chancellor of being a pirate on the high seas! If it had been a few ages earlier, they would probably have accused him of witchcraft and dealing with the devil. Some short time before, upon representations made to the king by Lord Bellamont, governor of New York, that the American coasts and islands were sorely infested by corsairs, William had countenanced a scheme for fitting out a ship of war by private subscription, to be sent to look after those marauders. There was nothing illegal or even irregular in this letter of marque; Somers the chancellor, the Earl of Orford, the head of the admiralty, the Duke of Shrewsbury, Lord Romney, and others contributed to the fund;* and at the recommendation of Lord Bellamont, Captain Kydd, said to be a native of Greenock, in Scotland, but long a resident of New York, in America, and a very able sailor, was appointed to the command of the "Adventure Galley," which was well manned, and armed with thirty guns. In addition to the usual letter of marque given to privateers, the captain was furnished with a warrant under the great seal, authorising him to make war upon and destroy the pirates,† &c.; but the choice of the commander was singularly unfortunate in a very material respect, for Kydd, who had probably been a buccaneer before, turned downright pirate as soon as he got into the American seas. This was reversing the case of Captain Morgan, in the days of Charles II., who was proclaimed to be hanged as a pirate first, and knighted and made governor of Jamaica afterwards. Lord Bellamont, however, had at last succeeded in taking his protégé and several of his crew prisoners, and was ready to send him over to England for trial.‡

Nevertheless, the Commons, on the 6th of December, agreed to a motion, "That the letters patent granted to the Earl of Bellamont and others were dishonourable to the king, against the law of nations, contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm, invasive of property, and destructive of trade and commerce." A long and shrewd debate followed, the Tories striving to make it appear that Somers had wittingly affixed the great seal to Kydd's commission, in order to enrich himself, his friends, and his sovereign, by the fruits of piracy; but, "having aggravated their charge to the end that it might ring the louder, they were so much less able to verify any part of it. . . . The chancellor's character for wisdom and integrity had as yet such weight with the house, that no imputation would stick; and upon the issue the motion was rejected; though the clamour was not let fall."§

But the point upon which the Tories laid still greater stress was the inquiry, ordered the preceding session, into William's grants of the Irish forfeitures. Seven commissioners had been appointed, who were all presumed to be anti-courtiers. Three of them, however, the Lord Drogheda, Sir Francis Brewster, and Sir Richard Leving, were for the court; while the other four, Trenchard, Annesley, Hamilton, and Langford, were violently against it, and disposed to stretch and torture the evidence and everything relating to the case, in order to inflame the report. All the seven commissioners, though they had frequent disagreements, had signed the several books which contained the particulars of their inquiry: but when the secretary drew up the report or abridgment of the whole, which was to be laid before parliament, the minority of three dissented from eight several articles, entered a sort of protest against them, and moreover joined in an appeal to each House of parliament, representing that the report had been drawn up without their full concurrence, and in a manner not warranted by the act of parliament, nor justified by the proofs which had been produced. They also complained of the overbearing conduct of the majority of four, who had laboured to influence them by transmitting private letters, instructions, and directions, which they affirmed they had received from several members of the House of Commons, &c. But this case was one

Lords of Trade, desiring that the prisoners might be sent for home, in order to their trials; there being no law in New England for punishing piracy with death, and the whole colony rather inclining to favour them, as being, in those days, little better than accomplices; if receivers of stolen goods deserve that name." The Lords of the Regency immediately dispatched the Rochester man-of-war to bring home the prisoners; but unfortunately she was unlit for such a voyage, and, after sustaining a storm, she was obliged to put back to Plymouth—as circumstance which was made use of to the discredit of the court; men saying that, as the whole adventure of Kydd was a practical job, so the return of the Rochester was a mere collusion.

* Ralph. This writer, who turns the facts as much as he possibly can against the court, says, that the clamour chiefly originated with, and was kept up by, the old East India Company, furious at the loss of their vast monopoly. But the whole Tory faction had joined in the cry, insinuating that all concerned in the affair ought to be turned out of their employments. "Such black constructions," says Burnet, "are men who are engaged in parties apt to make of the actions of those whom they intend to disgrace, even against their own consciences; so that undertaking that was not only innocent but meritorious was traduced as a design for robbery and piracy."

* A tenth of the profits made upon prizes, &c., was reserved for the crown; as usual when privateers were commissioned.

† The commission or letter of marque from the admiralty, dated January 29th, 1695, authorised Kydd to act against the French, with whom we were then at open war; the commission under the great seal authorised him to make war on certain notorious pirates therein named, and all other pirates infesting the coast of America and other seas.

‡ "On the 8th of July," (1699) says Ralph, "his lordship sent an account of the whole proceeding to the Secretary of State and the

of William's gigantic errors, and no friendly commission could have covered the worst parts of it, though a little more decency and respect might have been observed. The report, which was presented by the four who had penned it in their own way, stated in strong terms that they, the commissioners, had met with great difficulties and hindrances in the inquiry they had been prosecuting in Ireland, which were occasioned chiefly by the backwardness of the people of Ireland to give information, out of fear of the grantees, whose displeasure in that kingdom was not easily borne;* and by reports industriously spread, that their inquiry would come to nothing. There was no doubt much truth in this statement; under the absolute Protestant ascendancy matters could not have been otherwise in Ireland; but, abstractedly, the fact was proper to cast an odium upon William and his government; and, though every member of the English House of Commons had been in some measure a bully to the Irish people, this did not prevent them from declaiming upon the monstrous evils of violence and intimidation. In continuation the report stated, "that nevertheless, it appeared to them, that the persons outlawed in England, since the 13th of February, 1689, on account of the late rebellion, amounted in number to 57, and in Ireland to 3,921. That all the lauds in the several counties in Ireland, belonging to the forfeited persons, as far as they could reckon, made 1,060,792 acres, worth, per annum, 211,623*l.*, which, by computation of six years' purchase for a life, and thirteen years for the inheritance, came to the full value of 2,685,138*l.* That some of those lands had been restored to the old proprietors, by virtue of the articles of Limerick and Galway, and by his majesty's favour, and by reversal of outlawries, and royal pardons, obtained chiefly by gratifications to such persons as had abused his majesty's royal bounty and compassion: and that besides these restitutions, which they thought to be corruptly procured, there were seventy-six grants and custodiams, under the great seal of Ireland, of which they made a recital: as,—to the Lord Romney† three grants now in being, containing 49,517 acres; to the Earl of Albemarle,* in two grants, 106,633 acres in possession and reversion; to William Bentinck, Esq., Lord Woodstock,† 135,820 acres of land; to the Earl of Athlone‡ two grants containing 26,480 acres; to the Earl of Galway§ one grant of 36,148 acres, &c. That, indeed, the estates so mentioned did not yield so much to the grantees as they were valued at; because, as most of them had abused his majesty in the real value of their estates, so their agents had imposed on them, and had either sold or let the greatest part of those lands at an under value: but that, after all deductions and allowances, there yet remained 1,699,343*l.* 14*s.*, which they laid before the Commons as the gross value of the estates forfeited since the 13th day of February, 1689, and not restored. It further appeared from the report presented, that William had conferred the forfeited Irish estates of the late King James, estimated at 95,649 acres, worth 25,995*l.* a year, upon Mrs. Elizabeth Villiers, Countess of Orkney, his mistress or favourite lady. Upon this point the commissioners had quarrelled most violently; and it is evident that the majority had exaggerated the extent of the grant, and had purposely lost sight of various leases and annuities with which it was charged.

A. D. 1700. To work up a counter storm, Montagu, who had so lately resigned his Chancellorship of the Exchequer, but who still clung to his party and to the king, on the 15th* of January rose in the House and bitterly complained that Mr. Arthur Moore, a member of that House, had written a letter to the Commissioners, urging them to make a separate and strong article of my Lady Orkney's grants, "because that might reflect upon somebody." This somebody was, of course, the king; and Montagu insisted that this deserved the censure of parliament. The ex-minister, in the vehemence with which he took up this matter, was perhaps looking at the constitution and the rights of parliament rather in a Tory than in a Whig spirit; but, with at least equal inconsistency, the Tories on the other hand, in spite of their high notions about the sanctity of kings, treated the charge slightly, and called upon Montagu to produce his witnesses to the letter. He pleaded the obligations which lay upon him as a man of honour not to discover parties who had trusted him with the information in private conversation; but the House insisted, and, no excuse being allowed, Montagu named Methuen, Chancellor of Ireland, as his informer. But this Methuen denied having ever mentioned any such thing; and then, in the midst of the perplexity and confusion of the

* But the three commissioners in the minority expressly declared that the books relating to the forfeitures in Ireland were so ill and confusedly kept, as much to delay them in their proceedings; that they did not attribute this delay so much to the commissioners of the revenue there, as to the shifting this inquiry from one commission to another, which had been done five times since the battle of the Boyne; so that no commissioners, however well disposed to it, could ever have made any steady estimate of the forfeitures. They agreed with the majority as to the backwardness of the Irish people; but they insisted that this did not proceed from any dislike to the business or disobedience to the authorities: and then they affirmed, still more strongly than the four had done, that the fear of the grantees and of the persons in power in Ireland, together with reports "industriously spread abroad and generally believed," was the cause of this backwardness, and hindered many persons from making considerable discoveries. They also affirmed that John Burke, commonly called Lord Boplin, had agreed to pay 700*l.* for the use of my Lord Albemarle, in consideration of his lordship's procuring his majesty's letters patent to restore him to his estate and blood; and that he enumerated wholesale quantities of horses, cattle, sheep, &c., taken from the Irish Catholics, but never accounted for to the crown by the Protestant captors.

† This Lord Romney was the Henry Sydney and Secretary of State of former times, and he who had done so much to bring William into England.

* This Earl of Albemarle was William's present favourite, and a graceful and accomplished courtier. He was the son of Pelling, Lord Koppel of Gelderland, who was raised from being a page to the highest offices; and was made Earl of Albemarle and knight of the Garter in 1696. According to Burnet, "he was a cheerful young man, that had the art to please, but was so much given up to his own pleasures, that he could scarce submit to the attendance and drudgery that was necessary to maintain his post. . . . He was not cold nor dry, as the Earl of Portland was thought to be; who seemed to have the art of creating many enemies to himself, and not one friend."

court party, their adversaries put and instantly carried a vote, that the said report about Mr. Arthur Moore's letter was false and scandalous; and that the four commissioners had acquitted themselves with understanding and integrity. But the three commissioners in the minority insisted upon being heard; their side maintained that it was prostituting the honour and justice of the House to pass such a vote till both parties were examined; and thereupon the debate was adjourned till the following day, when the three were ordered to attend. Of this minority, Sir Richard Leving was called in first. He represented the great differences of opinion which had existed among the commissioners as to many points of the report, which was not and could not be considered as a cool and rational document. But the matter upon which he principally dwelt, was that of the "private estates" or the lands in Ireland which had belonged to James and been given to the Countess of Orkney. He said that he had given it as his opinion that this article ought not to be reported at all, because it was not within the power of their commission by the act, which limited their enquiries to forfeitures incurred since the 13th of February, 1689; but that the contrary had been maintained by another of the commissioners, who urged that King James had not forfeited his estates before he had done so by coming into Ireland on March 15th, and committing treason against King William and Queen Mary. On the other hand, he, Leving, had represented that, this private estate in Ireland being part and parcel of the possessions of the crown of England, and the crown being vested in King William and Queen Mary by act of parliament, all the said possessions were necessarily invested in them together with the crown—and that, as a consequence, the king might dispose of the lands. Sir Richard Leving then went on to accuse severally the majority of four of disrespectful and violent language. He affirmed, for example, that Langford, one of the four, had said, with reference to the exact time of James's forfeiture, that "the 30th of January was a good day and a good deed;" (it was the anniversary of the decapitation of Charles I.) that when Lord Drogheda, one of the minority, said that the report of Lady Orkney's grant would be flying in the king's face, Hamilton, who was on the other side, replied, "If you will not fly in his face, you cannot execute this commission;" that Trenchard and Annesley said they had letters of advice from Mr. Arthur Moore and Mr. Harcourt, urging them to reflect upon somebody, even as Mr. Montague had mentioned. Sir Francis Brewster, another of the minority of three, confirmed these statements, adding, moreover, that Trenchard had called the grant to Lady Orkney "a villanous grant," and had given him, Sir Francis Brewster, "ill language." "But my language," continued Brewster, "was not so bad, but he was forced to beg my pardon at the board; and I did not his. There he stands; let him deny it if he can." But Trenchard not only denied the words, but brought Langford and Annesley to do the same.* The letters of Arthur Moore and Mr. Harcourt were, however, produced and read, but no record of these documents has been preserved. Upon the whole matter the triumphant majority came to the following resolution:—"That there have been divers groundless and scandalous aspersions cast upon Francis Annesley, John Trenchard, James Hamilton, and Henry Langford, Esquires, four of the commissioners for the Irish forfeitures, the said four commissioners having acquitted themselves with understanding, courage, and integrity; that Sir Richard Leving, another of the said commissioners, has been the author of the said groundless and scandalous reports, &c., and that the said Sir Richard Leving shall be committed to the Tower of London for the said offence." And Sir Richard was committed accordingly.

After this manifest victory the Tories brought in their famous Bill of Resumption, by which the Irish forfeitures were to be applied to the use of the public, without any regard paid to the reservation of a third part to the king, which had been part of the bill they had sent up eight years before to the Lords. Ministers proposed the insertion of a clause for reserving at least some portion of the said forfeitures to be at the free disposal of his majesty; but they would not hear this proposition out, and proceeded to give another blow, by resolving that the advising, procuring, and passing the grants in Ireland had been the occasion of contracting great debts and laying heavy taxes upon the people; that the said grants highly reflected upon the king's honour; and that the officers and instruments concerned in procuring and passing them had highly failed in the performance of their trust and duty. Not satisfied with all this, the Commons, on the 6th of February, moved in more explicit terms that the procuring of grants belonging to the crown, by any public minister, for his own use or benefit, was highly injurious to his majesty, prejudicial to the state, and a violation of

* Trenchard, who was a practiced debater, a thorough man of business, and yet something of a wit, said, "Sir, it is true, I did ask his pardon; and the occasion was this: as Mr. Annesley has acquainted you, I was provoked by his opprobrious language to reply, I feared him in no capacity, but as an evidence, which he took very honestly; he repeated the word 'evidence;' he said, it was below a gentleman, below a man of honour; that such a one ought to be shunned by all civil conversation; that I had better have stuck a dagger in his heart than have called him an evidence; which now I think, Mr. Speaker, he won't resent so highly. This put the board in great disorder; and one of the commissioners whispered to me, (I think it was the absent member; but I am sure all agreed in it.) You know he is a very simple old fellow; and though he gave the affront, you are in the wrong, that you are capable of being angry with him. Truly, Sir, I was conscious to myself, that I was much to blame to suffer myself to be provoked by him, and therefore, that the debate might be interrupted no longer, I asked his pardon. As to the other part I am charged with, that I called the grant of the private estate a villanous grant, I directly deny it! 'Twas possible I might say, it was an extravagant grant, an unreasonable grant, an unexcusable grant: that the king was imposed upon and deceived in this grant, to give that for 5,000*l.* per annum, which is worth between 25,000*l.* and 26,000*l.* These are words that amount to it, and might fall from me; but that I used the word villanous, 'I positively deny.' 'Tis a word I don't use in my ordinary conversation; a word that never comes out of the mouth of a gentleman, and is false."—Ralph. The debates and proceedings of the Houses are badly reported, at this interesting juncture, in the printed accounts; but Ralph says, that the present debate upon the resumption bill were carefully taken down in short-hand.

the trust reposed in him. But here the Tories had committed themselves upon unsafe ground; and the Whigs, adopting the motion, retaliated upon their adversaries by attaching to it a very significant amendment,—a kind of resumption of their own, based upon the same principles as the original Tory bill, and which that party had not the effrontery to resist. The proposition was simply this: “To resume the grants of all lands and revenues of the crown, and all pensions granted by the crown since the 6th of February, 1684, and for applying the same to the use of the public.” The 6th of February was the inauspicious day of James II.’s accession; and from that day, down to the night of his flight from England, the Tories had monopolised the favours, grants, and pensions of the crown, and they were now bound to disgorge them all. It was known that, in the Upper House, “the king was a little more civilly used,” and it was feared that there the Resumption Bill would be thrown out altogether. To prevent this the Commons had again recourse to the device of making it part of a money bill; and they appended the resumption to the grant of a land-tax, the produce of which was indispensable for the payment of the fleet and army. The Lords were indignant at this proceeding, which in a manner tied their hands and tongues; but, encouraged by the court, they ventured to oppose the bill, and to offer some amendments, which were just and reasonable in themselves, and suited to check an immense amount of wrong to private individuals who had bought property in Ireland from the grantees, &c.* “The court,” says Burnet, “upon some previous votes, found they had a majority among the Lords: so, for some days, it seemed to be a design to lose the bill, and to venture on a prorogation or a dissolution rather than pass it. Upon the apprehensions of this the Commons were beginning to fly out into high votes both against the ministers and the favourites; the Lord Somers was attacked a second time, but was brought off by a greater majority than had appeared for him at the beginning of the session. During the debates about the bill he was ill, and the worst construction possible was put upon that; it was said he advised all the opposition that was made to the measure in the House of Lords, but that, to keep himself out of it, he feigned that he was ill; though his great attendance in the Court of Chancery, the House of Lords, and at the council table, had so impaired his health, that, every year about that time, he used to be brought very low, and disabled from business. The king seemed resolved to venture on all the ill consequences that might follow the losing this bill, though those would probably have been fatal. As far as we can judge, either another session of that parliament, or a new one, would have banished the favourites, and begun the bill anew, with the addition of obliging the grantees to refund all the mean profits: many in the House of Lords, that in all other things were very firm to the king, were for passing this bill, notwithstanding the king’s earnestness against it, since they apprehended the ill consequences that were like to follow if it was lost. When the Lords sent down their amendments to the Commons they rejected them, and gave their reasons in a paper which was delivered at a conference of the two Houses. The Lords then prepared answers to these reasons, and in a second conference presented them in writing; but the managers for the Commons declined pursuing this course of literary argument, and left the bill in the hands of their lordships, who were warned on many sides that they must pass it, or bring on a perilous crisis. The king became sullen upon all this: on the 5th of April he told Lord Portland that, if the bill was not stopped in the Upper House, he should count all as lost; and on the same day he declared that he was resolved not to pass the bill, and that the only question was, whether he should prorogue the parliament on the morrow or Monday next. Yet, when he coolly reflected upon all the bearings of the case and the danger of further resistance, he solicited the Lords by a private message to pass the bill; and the Lords having consented, not without some pangs, in which their own purses were concerned, he went down to the House, and gave the royal assent without a murmur on the 11th of April.† But, immediately after passing the other bills that were in readiness, he commanded the Earl of Bridgewater, in the absence of Chancellor Somers, who was still sick, to prorogue the parliament, which was accordingly done without a speech.‡

* “The case of the Earl of Athlone’s grant was very singular: the House of Commons had been so sensible of his good service in reducing Ireland, that they had made an address to the king to give him a recompense suitable to his services; and the parliament of Ireland was so sensible of their obligations to him, that they, as was formerly told, confirmed his grant of between 2000*l.* and 3000*l.* a-year. He had sold it to those who thought they purchased under an unquestionable title; yet all that was set aside, no regard being had to it; so that this estate was thrown into the heap. Some exceptions were made in the bill in favour of some grants, and provision was made for rewarding others, whom the king, as they thought, had not enough considered. Great opposition was made to this by some, who thought that all favours and grants ought to be given by the king, and not originally by a house of parliament; and this was managed with great heat, even by some of those who concurred in carrying on the bill.”—Burnet.

* The bishop adds, that he was one of those that were for passing this bill, and that the king was much displeas’d with him for it. “I confess,” says he, “I did not at that time apprehend what injurious lay under many of the clauses in the bill, which appeared afterwards so evidently, that the very same persons who drove the bill were convinced of them, and redress’d some of them in acts that pass’d in subsequent sessions. If I had understood that matter right, and in time, I had never given my vote for so unjust a bill. I only considered it as a hardship put on the king, many of his grants being thus made void; some of which had not been made on good and reasonable considerations, so that they could hardly be excus’d, much less justify’d. I thought the thing was a sort of force to which it seem’d reasonable to give way at that time, since we were not furnish’d with an equal strength to withstand it; but when I saw, afterwards, what the consequences of this act prov’d to be, I did firmly resolve never to consent again to any such a money bill as long as I liv’d.”

† William wrote to Lord Galway (Rouviqny, the French Huguenot), “You may judge what vexation all their extraordinary proceedings give me: and, I assure you, your being deprived of what I gave you with so much pleasure is not the least of my griefs. There have been so many intrigues in this last session, that, without having been on the spot and well inform’d of everything, it cannot be conceived. I never had more occasion than at present for persons of your capacity and abilities.”

‡ At the very moment the Commons were preparing a resolution,

On the 12th of February the celebrated Matthew Prior had written to the Earl of Manchester,—“To-morrow is the great day when we expect that my Lord Chancellor will be fallen upon, though God knows what crime he is guilty of but that of being a very great man and a wise and upright judge. Lord Bellamont, you will read in the Votes, was fallen upon to-day: thus, every day a minister, till at last we reach the king.” And on the 10th of April, the day before the prorogation, the same wit wrote,—“My Lord Chancellor is very sick.”*

Towards the close of the session another attempt had been made to couple Somers with Captain Kydd; but a motion for his removal had been negatived; and the House satisfied themselves with examining copies of the several commissions given to Kydd, of his majesty’s warrant for a grant of the prizes taken from pirates to the Earl of Bellamont and others, of an indenture between his majesty and Bellamont; of a letter from the Lords of the Treasury to that governor about sending over the property seized in Kydd’s ship; and with bringing in a bill for the more effectual suppression of piracy; followed by an address, upon information of Kydd being on his way home, that he might not be tried, discharged, or pardoned until the next session of parliament; and that Lord Bellamont might transmit all instructions and papers relating to the said pirate. But, before they could hang the pirate, Chancellor Somers was dismissed, or reluctantly resigned, the great seal,—thus leaving the cabinet entirely in Tory hands. The seals were soon after given, with the title of Lord Keeper, to Sir Nathan Wright, an obscure Tory serjeant-at-law,—“in whom there was nothing equal to the post, much less to him who had lately filled it.” William tempted the Whig Shrewsbury with an offer of the government of Ireland; but the duke, instead of accepting it, resigned even his office of lord chamberlain, and went away into Italy, at a moment when the king he had helped to make seemed in danger of being unmade. It is said that even Sunderland was invited once more—but in vain—to take office. William’s household was even deserted by my Lord Portland, who had grown enormously rich, and who was anxious to keep what he had got. Lord Jersey was appointed chamberlain, and Lord Romney groom of the stole.†

This year the king did not leave Kensington for Loo till the month of July. In Scotland the parliament met on the 21st of May, when the excitement about the business of Darien was at its greatest height. In the preceding month of December the council of the Darien Company informed the Scottish secretary, Lord Seafield, who was at court, that they had prevailed on Lord Basil Hamilton to go up to London with an address to his majesty in behalf of those Scots who were confined at Carthage; and that they must request the secretary to introduce Lord Basil to the king. Seafield replied that his majesty did not refuse to receive the petition, but could not allow Lord Basil Hamilton to be the presenter of it, as that nobleman had not yet owned his majesty’s government. This reply to the council of the company was followed up by an official note to the privy council of Scotland, stating, that though access had been refused to Lord Basil Hamilton, his majesty was resolved to demand from the Spanish court the release of the prisoners at Carthage; and that it was his majesty’s intention to advance the trade of Scotland, and to allow the subjects of that kingdom the same liberty of commerce that others enjoyed with the English plantations. The directors of the company, in a second letter to Lord Seafield, expressed their deep regret at access to the throne being refused to my Lord Basil, who was perfectly versed in the state of their affairs, and provided with ample documents concerning them, and who, as far as they had heard, had never done anything inconsistent with the duty of a loyal and peaceful subject. William, however, persevered in his objection; and when Lord Basil went up to London without permission, and attempted to put a memorial into his hands as he passed from his apartment to the council chamber, and to address him on the important subject, he put him back sternly and refused to hear him. In the month of March the Marquess of Tweeddale presented an address which ran in the name of the whole Scottish nation, and which was signed by an immense number of persons of all ranks, petitioning for or demanding a speedy session of parliament, in order that the Indian and African Company of Scotland might be enabled to prosecute their undertaking with greater assurance and better success than they had hitherto been able to do. It was in consequence of this address that the present session was opened sooner than ministers had intended; and it was scarcely opened ere a remonstrance was presented from the Darien Company, which was followed by petitions and addresses from all parts of the kingdom: and forthwith a resolution was moved that the colony in Darien was a legal and rightful settlement in the terms of the act of 1695; and that the parliament would maintain and support the same. The Duke of Queensberry, the king’s commissioner, hereupon adjourned the parliament for three days, but he could do nothing during that short interval to moderate that exceeding heat, and at the end of the three days the Estates met, if possible in a worse temper than before. Queensberry then ventured*to adjourn them for twenty days more; excusing this extraordinary exercise of the prerogative by affirming that several things had occurred which obliged him to consult his majesty. That very night the majority of the parliament met in a private house and drew up an address to the king, demanding that a stop should be put to this system of adjourning, and that their parliament should meet on the day to which it was then adjourned, to sit as long as might be necessary for redressing the great grievances of the nation. William replied to the bearers of this address that they should know his intention in Scotland. But in the interval the parliament had been again adjourned by proclamation—a measure which gave rise to riots and tumults in the city of Edinburgh; where many of the members proposed that they should sit and deliberate in spite of the proclamation, and make good the doors of their House by force of arms if necessary. In the month of July Queensberry produced a remarkable and a soothing letter from the king, which was published by authority. William declared that if it had been possible for him to have agreed to the resolution offered him by the parliament of Scotland, to assert the right of the African and Indian Company, he would gladly have done it; that he was truly sorry for the nation's loss, and most willing to concur in everything that could be reasonably expected of him, for aiding and supporting their interests, and demonstrating his hearty inclination to advance the wealth and prosperity of that ancient kingdom: but he warned them "to be careful both of their own preservation and of the honour and interest of the government, and not suffer themselves to be misled, nor to give advantage to enemies and ill-designing persons too ready to catch hold of any opportunity."* This declaration, which, as we are inclined to believe, was accompanied by still more persuasive documents, addressed to some of the Scottish leaders, produced a very sensible effect; and when parliament re-assembled matters went on with very surprising smoothness and moderation. Another angry remonstrance was presented by the Darien Company, and another national address was voted; but these died down the wind like the last echoes of a departing thunder-storm; the company saw that their loss was irretrievable; and the nation, little as it liked William, began to feel the extreme difficulty of his situation as king of England, and king of Scotland, and stadtholder to the Dutch, and to perceive that errors had been committed by themselves, and that, in the faults they complained of on the part of England, the king had been the least guilty or malevolent of all. At the opening of the session he had promised to give the royal assent to all such bills as they might offer him for the better security and advancing of the religion, liberty, and commerce of the country, and that nothing should be wanting on his part to contribute to the happiness of the people; and if the Scottish patriots had been so disposed, by giving up their hostility a little earlier, they might have procured the blessing of an Habeas Corpus Act like that of England. Having continued sitting till the 29th of October, the session was, by several acts, from time to time adjourned to the 28th of January of the following year, 1701. When, at the end of January, the question of supplies came under discussion, they voted, "That, in consideration of their great deliverance by his majesty, and that, next under God, their safety and happiness depended wholly on the preservation of his majesty's person and the security of his government, they would stand by and support both his majesty and his government to the utmost of their power, and maintain such forces as should be requisite for these ends." And, though it was hardly to be expected, after so universal a discontentment, the Scots gratified his majesty in the extreme, by keeping on foot, without reduction and without clamour, the whole of the land forces that existed in the kingdom when the session began. This was a striking contrast to the conduct of the parliament of England; but the opponents of the court easily accounted for the subservience of public men in Scotland, by assuming that they had been bribed and bought by the king. At the end of the session the Duke of Queensberry received the Order of the Garter—an honour rarely bestowed upon Scotchmen; and the Marquess of Argyll was raised to a dukedom.

* "Some," says Burnet, "were not ill pleased to see the king's affairs run into an embroilment. . . . The managers in the English House of Commons, who opposed the court, resolved to do nothing that should provoke Scotland, or that should take any part of the blame and general discontent that sowed that nation off from the King. It was further given out, to raise the national disgust yet higher, that the opposition the king gave to the Scotch colony flowed neither from a regard to the interests of England, nor to the treaty with Spain, but from a care of the Dutch, who, from Curaçoa, drove a coasting trade among the Spanish plantations with great advantage; which, they said, the Scotch colony, if once settled, would draw only from them. These things were set about that nation with great industry; the management was chiefly in the hands of Jacobites; neither the king nor his ministers were treated with the decency that are sometimes observed, even after subjects have run to arms: the keenest of their rage was, plainly pointed at the king himself."

The English parliament, while they allowed the land forces to remain as they were the year before—that is, at 8000 men,—reduced the navy to 7000; and that, too, in spite of a new war in the north of Europe and a treaty entered into by William to support the party attacked—that youthful hero, Charles XII. of Sweden. Burnet says that this reduction of the navy was moved for by the Tories, and that the Whigs readily gave way to it "because the fleet was now in another management." (That is, the command of the fleet and the admiralty had been taken from Lord Orford and the Whig dependents of that unworthy Russell.) The King of Denmark, Frederick IV., the unjust aggressor who hoped to wrench the crown of Sweden from the grasp of young Charles, had the indiscretion to say publicly, that as the king of England was at variance with his parliament, he would be able to do but little in Europe. William retorted—"I will make Denmark know I am still able to do something." And, being zealously assisted by the States General,* he pre-

* "Upon the Swede's demand of the auxiliary fleets that were stipulated both by the king and the States, orders were given for equipping them here, and likewise in Holland. The king was not willing to communicate this design to the two Houses, and try if the House of Commons would take upon themselves the expense of the fleet: they were in so bad a humour, that the king apprehended that some of them might endeavour to put an affront upon him, and

pared a fleet both in England and Holland, and spoke in the high tone of an arbiter to Denmark and the states in confederacy with her, or Russia, Poland, and Brandenburg, who had made an iniquitous contract on purpose to join in a general attack upon Sweden. And when these remonstrances failed, he, in the month of July, dispatched the united squadrons of England and Holland to the Sound, under the command of Sir George Rooke. The English admiral soon formed a junction with the fleet of Sweden; and then, with fifty-two ships of the line in all, he scoured the Baltic, drove the Danish fleet into Copenhagen, and bombarded that capital, "but with little damage to the place and none to the fleet." Yet this relief was most seasonable to the Swedes, who recovered their spirits, drove the Danes and the Poles from their frontiers and the towns they were besieging, and threatened Denmark with conquest. Frederick IV. now testified his willingness to accept the mediation of the maritime powers—England and Holland—and implored the English admiral to desist from further hostilities. But Rooke replied, that, though ready to accede to a lasting treaty, he had no power to agree to a mere truce. In the beginning of August young Charles of Sweden landed in person on the Isle of Zeland, and, conjointly with the combined fleets, prepared for a regular siege of Copenhagen. This struck a terror through all Denmark, and so quickened the pens of her diplomatists, that by the middle of August a treaty of peace was signed at Travendahl, a house of the Duke of Holstein, without the concurrence of France, and under the guarantee of the maritime powers. Peace being thus concluded, Charles and his army retired from before the Danish capital, and when Rooke had seen him and his army safe to Sweden, he sailed home. William's conduct in the whole matter was highly applauded:—he had effectually protected the young Swede, and yet obliged him to accept of reasonable terms of peace.

But before this peace was concluded in the North, the particulars of the Second Partition Treaty relating to Spain and the South were pretty generally known.* France, England, and Holland had agreed that the Archduke Charles, second son of the Emperor Leopold, should be substituted for the deceased Prince of Bavaria, to have and hold Spain, Spanish Flanders, and her dependencies in India, America, &c., or all that had been allotted by the First Partition Treaty to the Bavarian; while the other shares of the Spanish inheritance were to be divided as before, the dauphin, however, to have in addition the duchies of Lorraine and Bar, and the dispossessed Duke of Lorraine to have in lieu the duchy of Milan. But the em-oppose the sending a fleet into the Sound: though others advised the venturing on this—for no nation can subsist without alliances secretly observed, and this was an ancient one, lately renewed by the king; so that an opposition in such a point must have turned to the prejudice of those who should move it."—Burnet.

* It was signed in London on the 21st of February (O. S.), or 3rd of March (N. S.), 1700, by the Earls of Portland and Jersey and M. de Tallard; and on the 25th of March (N. S.) by M. de Briord and the plenipotentiaries for the States at the Hague.

peror, who still wanted the whole of the succession, would not be a party to the treaty. Perhaps he was also deterred by a fear of the ill consequences which might ensue in Spain, and which did ensue as soon as the treaty was known there. According to one account, the unhappy Charles was first informed of this new treaty by Don Bernardo de Quiros, his ambassador in Holland, who, having observed the long and private conferences going on at Loo between William and Count de Tallard, suspected their object, and then obtained surer information from some deputies of the States General, who were parties to the negotiation; according to another account the first hint was given at Madrid by the Marquis d'Har-court, the very adroit agent of King Louis, who assuredly was never sincere in the treaty; while yet another account declares that it was the Emperor of Germany that first disclosed this second project of partition, with a view to his own interest, and to making himself popular at the Spanish court. But let the first discloser be who he will, he must have known that the revelation would incense and rouse the Spanish nation, and more especially the Spanish aristocracy, who held vast estates in Sicily, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the other territories to be alienated to France; and who, moreover, had always looked to the vice-royalties and commands of those fair regions as the best means of making or mending their fortunes. It appears that at first the emperor derived most benefit from the disclosure, and that he became a favourite at the Spanish court when it was known that he pre-emptorily refused (which he did at the eleventh hour) to accede to the treaty. He was also favoured by the Queen of Spain, Charles's second wife, Maria Ann of Neuburg, daughter of the Elector Palatine, and sister of the late empress (Leopold's third wife). To check this latter influence, the queen, who could scarcely be said to have had a husband in the sickly Charles, received intimation from France that, if she abandoned the Austrian interests, she might hope, after the demise of her present husband, to be united to the dauphin, and so still share the Spanish throne. The wretched Charles a second time assembled a council of state to deliberate on the succession. He still inclined to Austria, but the grantees had taken a new turn, and, of twelve, ten were of opinion that a Bourbon prince should be named. The Count of St. Estevan declared that Spain had fallen into such a state of weakness as to be unable to defend or protect herself, and that nothing but interesting France in her favour could save her from that dismemberment to which she had been condemned by the maritime powers. The dominions of the emperor, he said, were too remote, his treasuries too much exhausted, to allow him to render any timely assistance; and then the House of Austria had no fleets, no ports, no naval power whatsoever to cover the coasts and the colonies of Spain from the assaults of England and Holland. France had both fleets and money—or so it was assumed for the sake of the argument—and the grand monarque, who had so recently made all Europe tremble, might preserve the integrity of the Spanish monarchy if the crown were only allowed to descend upon the head of his issue. Only two of these degenerate nobles had the spirit and good sense to propose that the great question which interested every man in the nation should be left to the decision of the national Cortes, to be assembled forthwith, and allowed to determine it according to the known laws and constitutions of the realm or realms. Such a small minority had no influence; the suggestion was scouted as disloyal and dangerous; and, instead of assembling the Cortes, Charles consulted the faculties of law and theology among the professors, of which the Marquis d'Harcourt had bought many golden opinions. These faculties decided in favour of the Bourbon, provided only that due means were adopted for preventing the crown of Spain and the crown of France being worn by one and the same individual, which, as the divines and jurists argued, was the real and sole spirit and meaning of the renunciation exacted from the Infanta Maria Theresa when she married Louis XIV. But the Austrian blood which flowed in a slow current in the veins of King Charles still sympathised with its cognate streams, and made him still desire that his possessions should fall to a prince of the House of Austria. To subdue this feeling the partisans of the French and the monks and priests alarmed his timid conscience, and threatened him with eternal damnation if he violated the rights of the legitimate heir. "I am partial to my own family," said Charles, "but my salvation is dearer to me than the ties of blood." And in these difficulties he sent the Duke d'Uzeda, one of his household, to consult the pope, and present to his holiness copies of the opinions of the juris-consults and divines of Spain. Innocent XII., after deliberating for forty days with cardinals devoted for the most part to France, replied that he entertained no doubt that, after his majesty's demise, the whole Spanish monarchy devolved by right of blood on the dauphin; but that his second son, Philip Duke of Anjou, ought to be called to the succession, in order to prevent the union of the two crowns of France and Spain. "I am myself" said the pontiff, "in a situation similar to that of your majesty, being on the point of appearing at the tribunal of Christ to render an account to my Sovereign Pastor of the flock which has been intrusted to my care; and it is, therefore, my duty to give such advice as will not be a matter of reproach to my conscience at the day of doom."* And, in effect, the old pope died shortly after, a few weeks before Charles, and just as the great powers of Europe were preparing to solve the problem by the sword. Still, however, in spite of the solemn adjurations addressed to him, the most miserable of kings leaned towards the princes of his own blood; and the queen, and the new confessor whom she had placed about him, in lieu of a monk in the French interest who had recently driven him to the verge of madness,* did all they could to encourage and strengthen this natural bias. By these machinations, military preparations were secretly made in Spain; Austrian troops were invited into the kingdom; the Duke of Medina Celi was dispatched to Naples with orders to admit the imperial troops into that kingdom, and negotiations were set on foot with the Duke of Mantua for the reception of an Austrian garrison into his capital, in order to overawe the duchy of Milan. But every part of this scheme was disconcerted; the emperor had but few troops to spare, and the Duke of Medina Celi and the Duke of Mantua were both in the French interest. At the same time the Marquis d'Harcourt rode away from Madrid to the frontiers of France, where Louis had already collected a strong army. Never did imagination conceive or the darkest romance attempt to picture such intrigues and horrors as assailed the miserable Charles, who was torn to pieces while yet alive by those who wanted his inheritance. "Clamorous disputes were heard even in the ante-chamber of the dying monarch.

* The Cardinal Portocarrero succeeded in removing the king's confessor, who belonged to the Austrian faction, and through whom the queen held the key to the king's conscience, and in substituting Freyhan Diaz, a Dominican friar from Alcala. Then the cardinal, the inquisitor-general, and the new confessor, persuaded the superstitious, imbecile Charles that all his indispositions arose from sorcery, and that it was necessary he should be exorcised. A Capuchin monk, "very intelligent and well-practised in matters of enchantments and in casting out devils," performed the conjuration; and the king, appalled, became more sick and melancholy than ever. But, as he still inclined to Austria, the French faction, the cardinal, the inquisitor, and the Dominican friar, got up a correspondence with another Dominican called Arguelles, who resided in the Asturias, and who was famed for having a strong command over demons. In reply to questions put to him in writing by the inquisitor and Freyhan Diaz, Arguelles stated that the devil had told him that the king had been bewitched in 1675, when only fourteen years of age, by means of a decoction of dead men's brains, administered to him in a cup of chocolate, by his own mother, Mary Anne of Austria. And subsequently Arguelles affirmed that his majesty had been bewitched again on the 24th of September, 1694, by means of a dead body and the agency of a woman called Maria, residing in the Calle Mayor. But, before this scheme could be completed, Rocaperti, the inquisitor-general, died, and was succeeded by the Bishop of Segovia, who rather inclined to the German faction, and who soon satisfied the king that an atrocious trick had been played upon him. When Diaz was attacked by the inquisition for having put his trust in devils, he threw the blame on the late inquisitor, and fled to Rome; but the Spanish ambassador there got possession of his person and sent him back to Spain, where he was confined in the prisons of the Holy Office till 1704, when he was released at the instance or command of Louis XIV., whose interests he had been serving in getting up devils, &c.—Proceso Criminal contra Fr. Diaz, as quoted by Mr. Dunlop, Memoirs of Spain. After the failure of this attempt the French faction persuaded the starving populace of Madrid that the famine was brought about by the ministers and partisans of Austria. The mob attempted to murder the ministers, destroyed all the bakers' shops, and presenting themselves in front of the palace, demanded to see the king. "His majesty is asleep," said one of the courtiers. "He has slept too long already, and must now awake," shouted the populace; and then Charles, pale and trembling, was brought to a balcony in the arms of his attendants, being unable, through fear and sickness, to stand upon his own feet. More horrors still remained to swell this most dismal of royal histories. The king was persuaded that the sight and contact of the mangled remains of his assassins would be beneficial to his own health, or at least quicken the prayers of the departed in his behalf. And, thus impelled, Charles descended to the subterranean vaults under the Escorial, and witnessed the opening of the coffins of marble and jasper. The first that was unclosed was that of his mother, whom he had never greatly loved; but he long and earnestly contemplated the remains of his first fair queen, Louisa of Orleans, which bore few traces of dissolution, and exhibited a countenance scarcely less blooming than when alive. At last he rushed in horror from the spot, exclaiming, "I shall soon be with her in heaven."—Opus,—Dunlop,—Ortis.

* Cox, Memoirs of the Kings of Spain of the House of Bourbon.

Pressed on one side by the French, and impertuned on the other by the queen and Austrian partisans, the debilitated frame of Charles sunk under the struggle of contending passions, and a crisis in his disorder announced approaching dissolution. With a view still farther to stimulate his tender conscience, Portocarrero exposed to him his awful situation, on the verge of eternity, and persuaded him to receive the spiritual counsel of the most pious divines to assist his devotions and prepare him to die with resignation. In the midst of those lugubrious ceremonies with which the Catholic church appeals the minds of the dying, these divines represented the danger of his soul, should he not dispose of his crown by will, and entail on his country, by this neglect, the horrors of civil war. They held forth the vengeance of an offended Deity, if he suffered himself to be swayed by mortal love or hatred,—if he consulted the affections of that body which must shortly moulder into dust. The Austrians, they urged, were not the relations, nor the Bourbons the enemies, of his soul; and it was his duty to conform himself to the opinion of the majority of his council, the disinterested advocates of justice, and the organs of the national voice.* This Portocarrero was a man of high birth and station, and of consummate address; and he was, moreover, a prince of the Roman church—a cardinal, an archbishop (of Toledo), not without hopes of wearing the tiara. He had been entirely gained over by the Marquis d’Harcourt, and had scrupled at no measures, however atrocious, that promised to work upon the weak mind of the king, being aided and assisted in his diabolical proceedings by the inquisitor-general Rocaperti: and now, when his victim was at the last gasp, with the horrors of hell kept before his eyes, this cardinal produced the eulorated last will and testament, appointing Philip, Duke of Anjou, universal successor to the Spanish monarchy. The Austrian faction, who had equally pretended that a royal will would be paramount to all laws or rights whatsoever, had no just ground to complain when the French faction assumed the same principle; but it completed the monstrosity of the business that an imbecile king, terrified out of the little wit he had ever had, should be allowed to dispose of so many millions of rational beings. The secretary, Don Antonio de Ubilla, acted as notary; and the cardinal and Don Manuel Arias stood by as the sole witnesses. Terrified, baited, coerced, as he was, Charles could hardly be brought to put his hand to the paper; and, as soon as he had signed it, he burst into tears, and exclaimed, “I now am nothing.”† He then fell

* Coxe, Memoirs.

† “This will was made the 3rd of October, and yet Schoenberg, the Jewish resident for England and Holland at Madrid, was so ill-informed of what passed at court, that he informed his masters it was done on the 3rd. He also informed them that the king soon after, thinking himself something better, expressed so much indignation against the junco who induced him to take that step, that he recalled the powers he had given them to act discretionally in the urgent affairs of the kingdom, that he afterwards signed another will, &c. But no article of this kind had the least foundation; on the contrary, he left the administration in the hands of that very junco, with Cardinal Portocarrero at their head, with all the powers neces-into a long faint, and was thought to be dead; but he once more opened his eyes to a world which had been to him a world of sorrow and woe, and he lingered between life and death for four weeks. The contents of the will were carefully concealed from the queen, the Austrian party, and the whole of Europe except the French court. Louis finished his preparations, and his effective ally Cardinal Portocarrero possessed himself of the great seals of the kingdom and of the entire administration of Spain—if at such a moment there was anything in that distracted country that merited the name of a government. At last, on the 1st of November, death mercifully removed Charles II., who had been a phantom king from the third year of his age, and who was now only thirty-nine years old. Count Harrach, the emperor’s ambassador, who had been so poor a match for d’Harcourt, was watching at the door of the cabinet when the council was assembled upon the king’s death; and so obtuse was he, and so thoroughly in the dark as to the will, that, when the Duke of Abrantes came forth with an extended hand and with smiling looks, he thought that all had been decided in favour of his master or of his master’s son. The Spaniard soon undeceived him by saying—“I come to take my leave of the house of Austria.”

As, however disorganised and ill-prepared were the allies, a war inevitably hung in suspense in case Louis XIV. accepted the will, instead of satisfying himself with the portions of the Spanish inheritance allotted to his house by the Second Partition Treaty, that ambitious sovereign at the moment of crisis entertained some doubts and misgivings; but these were merely momentary, and he dispatched his grandson Philip into Spain, exclaiming as he sent him—“Now there are no longer Pyrenees.” William, who had returned to England a few days before the death of Charles, appears to have been astonished as much as he was irritated by the news of the will and the decision of Louis. Writing to the Pensionary Heinsius, he says, “I doubt not but this unheard-of proceeding of France will surprise you as much as it did me. I never relied much on engagements with France, but I must confess I did not think they would on this occasion have broken in the face of the whole world a solemn treaty, before it was well accomplished. . . . We must confess we are dupes, but, if one’s word and faith are not to be kept, it is easy to cheat any man. The worst is, it brings us into the greatest embarrassment, particularly when I consider the constitution of affairs here; for the blindness of the people here is incredible. For though this affair is not public, yet, it was no sooner said that the King of Spain’s will was in favour of the Duke of Anjou, than it was the general opinion that it was better for any for preserving the peace and carrying on the operations of government. All the favour shown to the queen was, that her dowry was enlarged from 300,000 to 400,000 ducats a-year; besides which, she was to have her choice of the four general governments—Flanders, Naples, Sicily, or the Milanese; and in case she chose to make her residence in Spain, she had liberty to reside in which of the principal cities she pleased.”—Ralph.

England that France should accept the will than fulfil the treaty of partition. I think I ought not to conceal this from you, in order that you may be informed of the sentiments here, which are contrary to mine: for I am perfectly persuaded, that, if this will be executed, England and the republic (of Holland) are in the utmost danger of being totally lost or ruined. I will hope that the republic understands it thus, and will exert her whole force to oppose so great an evil. It is the utmost mortification to me in this important affair, that I cannot act with the vigour which is requisite, and set a good example; but the republic must do it; and I will engage people here, by a prudent conduct, and by degrees, and without their perceiving it. I have provisionally sent orders to my ambassador to declare, that I hold to the treaty, and that the two months the emperor had to declare himself are not expired. Before I could take any further determination, it occurred to me first, in order to gain time, which we have so much need of. I am not determined, whether it should be best that the emperor should accede to the treaty, or declare his right to the whole succession. Possibly acceding to the treaty would be best for Holland, but, as that is not approved here, the other may perhaps be best. . . . In case the emperor will take up the matter with vigour, he can, in my opinion, do nothing else than make himself master of the Milanese immediately, and endeavour to get Naples and Sicily to declare for him, and thus try to make himself master of Italy; in which the Italian princes may perhaps concur. What embarrasses me most is the Spanish Netherlands; for it will be very difficult for the Elector of Bavaria to prevent their declaring in favour of, and acknowledging, the Duke of Anjou, in case he receives orders from Spain for that purpose, or is pressed by France. The troops of the republic in garrison there ought to be well upon their guard, and the elector can dispose of them and his own troops, so that he will have the superiority. The only thing I can devise, which the elector can make use of for a pretext not to declare himself yet, or obey (the orders from Spain), is, the term of two months which the emperor has to choose in; or, that he cannot quit the government till his debt is paid. . . . I confess I think vigour is necessary on this occasion, and hope it is to be found in the republic, in case the emperor will maintain his right. If I followed my own inclination and opinion, I should have sent to all courts to incite them to vigour; but it is not becoming, as I cannot set a good example, and I fear doing more harm than good, not being able to play any other game with these people, than engaging them imperceptibly.* Three days after writing this letter, or on the 19th of November, William again addressed the same personage in a still more anxious tone. "It grieves me to the soul," says he, "to find that, now the affair grows public here, almost every one rejoices that France has preferred the will to the treaty; insisting, that it is more advantageous for England and all Europe; merely upon the supposition, that the Duke of Anjou, being a child, and to be brought up in Spain, will imbibe Spanish maxims, and be governed by the Spanish council, without any relation to France. These are suppositions, which, in my opinion, cannot take place; and I fear we shall feel the contrary too soon. It is certain, if the emperor submits to the will, we can do nothing against it; so that we must know what the emperor does, before we take a positive resolution. I think now, I can send nobody extraordinary thither till I know how the affair will be taken up; particularly when I consider the present sentiments of people here, which may probably change; for there is nothing certain here, nor of long duration. I fear the usual tardiness of the court of Vienna will not let them come to a speedy resolution, which is so necessary in this conjuncture. My chief anxiety is to prevent the Spanish Netherlands from falling into the hands of France. You will easily conceive how this business goes to my heart; for I shall be blamed for having relied on engagements with France, having had so much experience that they are never bound by any treaty. I wish I may be quit for the blame; but I have too much reason to fear I shall too soon feel the bad effects of it. The anxiety about the Spanish Netherlands was not unfounded; the Elector of Bavaria, after accusing the French court of poisoning his son, was now making up matters with Louis, and accepting the propositions made by Cardinal Portocarrero and the rest of that powerful faction in Spain; and on the 20th of November, the very day after the date of William's last letter, he gave the necessary orders for proclaiming the Duke of Anjou at Brussels, which was done with all possible ceremony.† Nor was William deceived as to the bad effects: faction laid her hand on the whole of the circumstances, and no regard was paid to the perplexing difficulties of all and every part of the case, no mercy was shown to the king's double error. It is curious to observe that William was blamed for his anxiety about his native country, Holland, and the erection of a proper barrier to that state; and that the Partition Treaty was condemned as being more prejudicial to England than the will, because it would have given the French new and most commanding situations in the Mediterranean, although the will, in effect, gave precisely the same advantages to France on that sea, while, in addition to Sicily, Naples, &c., the Duke of Anjou was to hold all the Spanish dominions everywhere else. † In another letter, dated Hampton Court, November 26, (v. s.) William says, "I learn by the French letters, that the Duke of Anjou is declared King of Spain, and is to set out thither the first of next month; so that the ice is broke; and the Elector of Bavaria writes, that he has been obliged to do the same thing in the Spanish Netherlands, and to cause Te Deum to be sung. These steps make the affair so difficult, that I shudder when I think on it. It will probably be a fortnight yet before one knows what resolution the imperial court will have taken; according to which, it now seems, everything ought to be regulated. I must confess, this business causes me no small chagrin." Hardwicke State Papers.

evils men generally prefer the less, but this was condemning the less and preferring the greater evil. If it were so natural—as the English politicians pretended—that England should dread a French king in Naples and Sicily, was it not still more natural to dread a French king in possession of the undivided inheritance of the last of the Austrian dynasty of Spain?

M. de Torcy told William's ambassador, Lord Manchester, that England must resign herself to the will, which was so necessary for the good and quiet of Europe, and that, if his master attempted to annul the will, he would find that he had two kingdoms to conquer;—that of Spain, which would not submit to the partition, and that of France, which would not abandon its rights. William coolly replied, that he should take time to consult with his allies, stating, however, that he did not think any variation could be made from the treaty till the emperor's mind was known. Louis dispatched de Tallard, one of the framers of the Partition Treaties, to London, to wheedle William into some fresh negotiations, which would have been observed with just as much faith as the late treaties. On the other hand, the Emperor Leopold, determining not to surrender his pretensions to the Spanish crown, sent over Count Wrattislaus as ambassador extraordinary, to renew and extend the old confederacy, and to keep his majesty of England firm to his purpose of opposing the will. Soon giving up his hope of deluding William again, Louis took the initiative in hostile measures, by dislodging, by an unexpected treacherous movement, the Dutch troops in the barrier fortresses. In the mean time Heemskirk, the Dutch minister at Paris, had dispatched a memorial representing to his most Christian majesty, "that their High Mightinesses did not expect his majesty would have taken a resolution so contrary to the late treaty, which they believed was to be observed in all things by the contracting parties, and to be departed from by none except by common consent: that the time in which the emperor might still accede in virtue of the secret article not being yet expired, their High Mightinesses, in conformity thereto, had again invited his imperial majesty in the most pressing manner to accede: and that for these reasons they hoped his most Christian majesty, in considering this affair anew, would have the goodness to make new reflections upon it, they having sent orders to their ambassador to entreat his majesty to persist in observing the said Partition Treaty, and every article it contained." Louis amused the Dutch, brought in a Swedish diplomatist to his aid to advocate a friendly mediation, and declared that it was quite certain, that, as to England, the greatest part of the nation dreaded a war, and hence would prefer the will to the Partition Treaty; and that the king of England would find great opposition in his parliament, in case he should be disposed to carry things to a rupture.*

* Dépêches, &c., de Louis XIV.

A. D. 1701. The time was now come for William to abide the test of a new parliament. On the retreat of the Whigs he had once more placed Lord Godolphin at the head of the treasury; and, to conciliate still further the Tory party, he made Lord Tankerville privy seal, Sir Charles Hedges secretary of state, and Lord Rochester lord-lieutenant of Ireland;* and, at the instance of this new cabinet, a new parliament, which turned out of a very Tory complexion, was called together for the 6th of February. Littleton, the late Whig Speaker, was persuaded to gratify his majesty at the expense of his party, and withdrew from the contest. But though the party lost their man they did not give up their object; and it is said that it was owing to the ferment on both sides, that the meeting of the two Houses was prorogued from the 6th to the 10th of February. But then the Whig nominee, Sir Richard Onslow, was defeated, and the adroit Robert Harley, still rising in reputation, and scheming and plodding on to the highest places, was elected Speaker by a majority of 249 to 125. In the first paragraph of his opening speech, the king said, "Our great misfortune in the loss of the Duke of Gloucester hath made it absolutely necessary that there should be a farther provision for the succession to the crown in the Protestant line after me and the Princess Anne. The happiness of the nation, and the security of our religion, which is our chiefest concern, seem so much to depend upon this, that I cannot doubt but it will meet with a general concurrence: and I earnestly recommend it to your earnest and effectual consideration." The son of the Princess Anne and of Prince George of Denmark had in fact expired on the 30th of July, the preceding year, in the 11th year of his age, and, according to Bishop Burnet, his tutor, his death "gave a great alarm to the whole nation, the Jacobites growing insolent upon it, and saying, that now the chief difficulty was removed out of the way of the Prince of Wales's succession." Next to his mother Anne, the personage preferred on account of her Protestantism for the succession, was the Electress Sophia of Hanover, grand-daughter of James I. This lady, as soon as she heard of the unhappy or happy event—the death of the young duke—proceeded with her daughter, the Electress of Brandenburg, to pay a visit to William, who was then at Lou. Before starting on this journey the Princess Sophia wrote a very curious letter to Mr. Stepney, at London, a poet of small dimensions, but who meddled with politics. After thanking the poet for a work and a letter, the old lady says—"If I were thirty years younger I should have sufficient good opinion of my blood and my religion, to believe that people might think of me in England. But, as there is little likelihood that

* "But his majesty soon found that, in dismissing the Whigs, because they could no longer do his business in parliament, he had done enough to disoblige them, but not enough to gain the Tories; and so met with such treatment from both, as once gave him occasion to say in a pet to Lord Halifax, that all the difference between the two parties was, that the Tories would cut his throat in the morning, and the Whigs in the afternoon."—Relap.

I should survive two persons (King William and the Princess Anne) both very much younger, though more sickly, than I am, it is to be feared that my sons will be regarded as strangers; and the eldest of them is much more accustomed to give himself the airs of a sovereign than the poor Prince of Wales, who is too young to profit by the example of the king of France, and who would be apparently so glad to recover what the king his father has so inconsiderately lost, that one might make of it whatever one would. But prejudice does everything in England: and, to confine myself to what you say, without undertaking to reason by letter, I will tell you that my daughter has dragged me hither (to Pyrmont), where she has taken the waters these three weeks, and that we shall set out next Monday to go by Brussels into Holland, where we shall have the honour of seeing your king. I am neither so philosophic nor so light-headed, as you may believe, as not to love this talk about a crown, and to make my reflections upon the solid judgment you offer me upon that subject. But it seems to me that in England there are so many factions, that one can be secure in nothing. This does not prevent me from being greatly obliged to those who testify affection for me and for my descendants.* It appears that the old lady's doubts were removed by her conference with William, which, however, did not last long; for, as they were later in arriving than had been expected, he only made them one ceremonious visit, and, according to the disposition he had previously made, he set sail for England the very next day.† The two electresses had other business besides the English succession;—they wanted William's concurrence and assistance in raising the Elector of Brandenburg to the rank of King of Prussia; and subsequently, when framing a new grand alliance against France, William gave this assistance. At the same time the English Jacobites sent over a brother of Lord Preston to St. Germain, to represent the succession of the young Prince of Wales as certain and inevitable; but James and his queen both refused one of the conditions proposed, which was, that the prince should be sent over to be educated in England, and thus threw a damp upon all those ardent hopes. It is also asserted that the Princess Anne proposed “very clandestinely” something of the same sort.‡

* Hardwicke State Papers.

† On the 26th of October, Mr. Stanhope, who was with the king, writes to Lord Manchester:—“Our two Electresses will be here to-morrow; and they say, that she of Hanover designs for England. If so, nobody doubts but it is to solicit for her son, to recommend him to the parliament's good graces: but, in order to that very end, it may be she would do him more service by staying at home.”—Cole MSS. as quoted by Ralph.

‡ In two letters written by Lord Manchester from Paris to Mr. Vernon, in November and December, 1700, are these passages:—“Three days ago Mr. F. Graham, brother to the late Lord Preston, came over to St. Germain's, and went away post this morning to Flanders, in order to embark for England in some of those posts. It is believed that he is sent over by Sir Charles Musgrave, and other parliament men, with proposals, in order to get the succession settled upon the pretended Prince of Wales on certain conditions.” “I cannot tell from whence they have at St. Germain's an apprehension that the pretended Prince of Wales will be carried away into England with his own consent; and upon this they have increased his guard: whereas he had formerly but six, he has now fourteen. They think their game so very sure, that there is no occasion he should make

In continuing his opening speech to parliament, William alluded in brief terms to the great event in Spain. “The death of the late king of Spain,” said he, “with the declaration of his successor to that monarchy, has made so great an alteration in the affairs abroad, that I must desire you very maturely to consider their present state; and I make no doubt but your resolutions thereupon will be such, as shall be most conducing to the interests and safety of England, the preservation of the Protestant religion, and the peace of Europe. These things are of such weight, that I have thought them most proper for the consideration of a new parliament, in order to have the more immediate sense of the kingdom in so great a conjuncture.” He reminded them of the deficiencies and public debts occasioned by the late war, and yet unprovided for, and he recommended them to inspect the condition of the fleet, and see what repairs and augmentations might be requisite for “the great bulwark of the English nation.”

In ending his account of the preceding year, the Whig Burnet says—“And now I am come to the end of this century, in which there was a black appearance of a new and dismal scene. France was now in possession of a great empire, for a small part of which they had been in wars (broke off, indeed, in some intervals) for above two hundred years, while we in England, who were to protect and defend the rest, were, by wretched factions and violent animosities, running into a feeble and disjointed state: the king's cold and reserved manner, upon so high a provocation, made some conclude that he was in secret engagements with France, that he was resolved to own the new king of Spain, and to engage in no new war: this seemed so different from his own inclinations, and from all the former parts of his life, that it made many conclude that he found himself in an ill state of health, the swelling of his legs being much increased, and that this might have such effects on his mind as to make him less warm and active,—less disposed to involve himself in new troubles, and that he might think it too inconsiderate a thing to enter on a new war that was not like to end soon, when he felt himself in a declining state of health.” But the bishop assures us that the true secret of this unaccountable behaviour in the king was soon discovered in his being obliged to bring the Tories into office: and soon after he proceeds to describe the complexion of this Tory cabinet and its Tory parliament. “As soon as our parliament was opened it appeared that the French had a great party in it: it is certain great sums came over this winter from France: the packet-boat came seldom without ten thousand louis d'ors; it brought often more: the nation was filled with them; and in six months' time a million of guineas were coined out of them. The merchants, indeed, said the balance of trade was then so much

turned to our side, that, whereas we were wont to carry over a million of our money in specie, we then sent no money to France; and had, at least, half that sum sent over to balance the trade. Yet this did not account for that vast flood of French gold that was visible amongst us; and, upon the French ambassador's going away, a very sensible alteration was found in the bills of exchange: so it was concluded that great remittances were made to him, and that these were distributed among those who resolved to merit a share in that wealth which came over now so copiously, beyond the example of former times." But here Burnet is accused, and apparently convicted, of disingenuousness and party malice. The French gold, which was mixed with Spanish gold, had been brought over to England because gold was at a premium here, and the louis d'ors fetched sixpence more than their current worth. King William, on this occasion, consulted that illustrious philosopher, Sir Isaac Newton, who knew more of the planetary system than of the monetary system; and by the philosopher's advice his majesty, just five days before the meeting of parliament, issued a proclamation to forbid the circulation of "certain pieces of gold of French and Spanish coin called louis d'ors or pistoles"—or rather that the said French and Spanish coins should not pass as they had done, "at near sixpence more than their real value."* This proclamation had the effect of checking the influx of foreign gold by destroying the freedom of trade in it, which ought to be as free as the trade in any other kind of commodity—a doctrine in political economy not, however, then recognised anywhere. The bishop ought to have mentioned these circumstances; yet, though the argument he builds upon them, or at least upon the overflow of French gold, falls to the ground, it may be still doubted whether some of the mercenary intriguers did not get bribes and promises from France, and even whether a part of the gold did not come into England in that shape. It is urged, as an unanswerable argument, that former precedents go against this supposition; but if Louis sent his gratuities to the patriots in Charles II.'s and James II.'s parliaments in bills of exchange and not in gold, that is scarcely a reason why he should not afterwards send gold and not bills of exchange, particularly when the price of gold was so much higher in England than in France. Burnet, still reflecting on the party now in power, goes on to say:—"A design was laid in the House of Commons to open the session with an address to the king, that he would own the King of Spain: the matter was so concerted, that they had agreed on the words of the vote, and seemed not to doubt of the concurrence of the House; but Mr. Monkton opposed it with great heat, and, among other things, said, if that vote was carried, he should expect that the next vote to be put would be for owning the pretended Prince of Wales." Upon this, Ralph remarks—"As to any design formed to open the session with such an address, facts and dates demonstrate, to say nothing of the contents of Burnet's own legend, that the session was not opened with any such debate; nor, indeed, is any trace of any such motion, in relation to the King of Spain, to be found in the Journals:" and he quotes a letter from Secretary Vernon to Lord Manchester, dated the 20th of February, in which the secretary declares that he never had seen "so great a spirit in the House of Commons, and such a resolution to preserve Holland as well as England." The bishop, however, though his language, as usual, is deficient in precision, seems to speak rather of consultations held by the Tory party among themselves than of any motion actually made in the House. On the 14th of February the Commons unanimously resolved, nemine contradicente, that the House would stand by and support his majesty and his government, and take such effectual measures as might best conduce to the interest and safety of England, the preservation of the Protestant religion, and the peace of Europe. But they differed very materially as to the proper interpretation to be put upon the words "peace of Europe," and as to the fittest means of securing that great end. Still, however, there was a party not disinclined to war—a Whig party, that had lost the king, and were yet resolved to recover him; who also, perhaps, carried their views beyond the limits of his life, which seemed hastening to a close. And, of course, this party knew in what high and absolute favour Lady Marlborough stood with the Princess Anne, what use was to be made of her, and how much her lord's heart was set on being a captain-general. Of those who looked at the question of peace or war in a sober and a disinterested spirit, the number appears to have been exceedingly small: yet some few there were at all times, who, from pure motives, preferred the chances and changes of a new continental war to a submission to the will of the King of France. On the 17th of February, three days after the address, William told those who presented it that he thanked them for their ready concurrence, which he took to be extremely important to the honour and safety of England; that he should never propose anything but what was for their common advantage; and that, having this opportunity, he must acquaint them that he had just received a memorial from the States-General, a translation of which he would leave with them. "As to the first part of the memorial," said he, "I think it necessary to ask your advice; as to the latter part, I desire your assistance."

This memorial, left in the hands of parliament, was none other than an intimation from the States-General that they had, on the very day that the parliament of England met, given up the Partition Treaty, to which they were a principal party, submitted to the will of the late King of Spain, and declared for a negotiation. Their high mightinesses, who had been hard pressed by Louis XIV., declared that, having considered their delay in acknowledging the Duke of Anjou for King of Spain was subject to malicious interpretations, as if their aim had been only to gain time to put themselves into a warlike posture, they now thought themselves obliged to acknowledge him without any condition, reserving to themselves to stipulate, in the negotiations about to begin, the conditions necessary to secure the peace of Europe. They assured William that in these negotiations they were resolved to do nothing without his majesty's consent and the consent of the other powers interested; they therefore prayed him to send to his minister at the Hague the necessary instructions to act conjointly in the negotiations. "But," said the document in conclusion, "as it may happen not to be possible to agree with France and Spain on reasonable conditions, and that, the negotiations being interrupted, they (the Dutch) may be suddenly attacked by the numerous troops which France has ordered to move towards their frontiers, their envoy is to represent to his majesty the urgent necessity they should have, in so great a danger, of the assistance of England, and to desire him to get the succours stipulated by the treaty in readiness, that they may rely on them, if occasion required."

The Commons took a day to deliberate; but, on the second day after receiving the memorial from the king, they voted an address, praying that he would be pleased to enter into such negotiations, in concert with the States-General and other potentates, as might most effectually conduce to the mutual safety of these kingdoms and the States-General, giving him at the same time assurances of support and assistance in the performance of the treaty made with the States in the year 1677. This address was presented by the whole House; to whom William replied with hearty thanks for their unanimous resolution, &c., and by telling them that he would immediately instruct his ministers abroad to enter into negotiations for attaining the great ends which they desired. These proceedings of the Commons are represented as having fully answered all his majesty's desires. "I hope," adds Vernon, in the letter communicating the vote to the Earl of Manchester, "it will have that good effect on your side as to produce a fair disposition to treat upon reasonable terms, that a war may be prevented; which I see we shall not decline, if we are forced into it by necessity.*" This was, indeed, more than William had expected; and though he well knew that nothing but a war could prevent the undivided transfer of the Spanish succession to Louis's grandson, he calmly waited events, and left his parliament to take its own course. On the same day that he communicated the Dutch memorial to the Commons he also communicated to both Houses a letter from that desperate Jacobite, Lord Melfort, to his brother, the Earl of Perth, urging that the present conjuncture ought to be improved for the benefit of the exiled family, and every advantage taken of the animosity then existing at the court of France against William. This old and hackneyed maker of revolutions and insurrections, which had all either come to nothing or ended in the ruin of those who engaged in them, was just as confident and unscrupulous as ever. He had heard fine things at Versailles, and had been admitted to a favourable audience by Madame de Maintenon, the very devout mistress of the grand monarch. He announced to his brother that Louis intended to put out this summer a very great fleet, the orders being given, the money ready, the stores full, and every one concerned active in his station. By means of this fleet the miserable old James, who was now much more like a monk of La Trappe than a king, was to pass over into England and recover all his crowns. "There is no doubt," says Melfort, "but this fleet will be master of the sea for some time, if not for all the summer; because the Dutch dare not stir till the English be ready; and they have long debates yet, before they can be in a condition to act, even if they have the will; and it is a question whether they will have it at all. The king never had so favourable a conjuncture, if he can only persuade this king that his affairs are really in the circumstances they are in: but there is the difficulty." [Indeed, Louis XIV. had been too often deceived already by the insane hopes of the Jacobites, ever to rely upon them again in the mode proposed.] Melfort was quite certain that James and his queen had more influence with Louis and with Madame de Maintenon, the mistress, than any other persons in the world; but their majesties wanted somebody to make plans and memorials for them, the better to convince Louis and Madame "of the easiness of restoring his majesty, the glory it would bring to France, and the wonderful advantages to the Catholic religion." The Jacobite secretary then proceeded to tell his brother that this kind of work could never be well done by a Protestant minister—meaning thereby Lord Middleton, whom he describes as "lazy in his temper, an enemy to France by inclination, tainted with Commonwealth principles, and against the king's returning by any other power than that of the people of England, and upon capitulation and terms; one suspected of giving aid to the compromisers, if not worse." Mr. Caryl, he thought, was better qualified, but he must be left to act alone; for, if Middleton was within distance of penetrating the affair, the true church of England party, the Catholics, and the Earl of Arran, with whom lay "the best game the king had to play," would never trust him.*

* The whole of this letter bears a pretty close resemblance in manner and spirit to the other original letters of Melfort, published by Sir Henry Ellis. Some of the paragraphs of the present episode are sufficiently striking. For example, "The king cannot but be sensible that the true church of England party, and their principal

Upon reading this letter, the House of Commons, more excited than they ought to have been by anything that came from such a quarter, thought it incumbent to put the kingdom in a state of defence; authorised the exchequer the very next day to borrow 550,000*l.*, at six per cent., for the service of the fleet, the guards, and garrisons; and soon after ordered that the seamen of the royal navy, who had been reduced during the last parliament to 7000, should be raised to 30,000 for the present summer. The Lords, on their part, pledged themselves to defend the Protestant succession; but they humbly desired that all the treaties that had been made with any prince or state since the late war should be laid before them, in order that they might be enabled to give the advice which his majesty had asked from them in a mature form, and upon full information. They humbly desired his sacred majesty to enter into alliances with all those princes and states that were willing to unite for the preservation of the balance of Europe; assuring him that they would most readily concur in all such methods as might effectually conduce to the honour and safety of England, and the peace of Europe. With reference to Melfort's letter, the Lords went farther than the Commons; they proposed the old and barbarous expedients, of putting the laws in execution for removing all Papists from London, seizing the arms and horses of the Papists and other disaffected persons, and issuing search warrants for those arms and provisions of war which were described in the intercepted letter as being in readiness. And, in the end, they urged the speedy fitting out of a fleet, for the defence of his majesty and the kingdom. When the Count de Tallard was taxed with Melfort's letter, and with the design forming in France to invade England, he treated, or affected to treat, the notion as chimerical, and Melfort as a madman and a fool. He assured Mr. Vernon that Melfort was banished from the court of king James, and had nothing to do in the court of France; that his waiting upon Madame de Maintenon was only to get two of his daughters put into the nunnery of St. Cyr; that he had no access to French ministers, but was "spinning cobwebs" of his own: and then this ambassador complained loudly of the letter being submitted to parliament, and of the jealousies and misunderstandings to which it had given rise. Vernon replied, that, though a part of Melfort's letter might appear "notional, and like a project of his own," yet other parts of it laid down positive facts, such as the fitting out a great fleet in France, a fact then known through other channels. And here Vernon, adverting to the production in the Houses of the intercepted letter, took occasion to explain some of the differences between constitutional and absolute governments, telling the ambassador "that we could make no provision for our safety but in parliament; and, therefore, it was fit that parliament should be acquainted with our danger, and that the proofs of it should be laid before them: that in France, they could dispatch every thing privately dans le cabinet: we had not so ready a way in England; but what we did, must be publicly and dans le marché; and whoever had suppressed such a letter here might justly have expected an accusation of treason." Then de Tallard owned that they were indeed fitting out ships in France; but this, he said, they did upon the preparations making in Holland, where they were at work night and day, Sundays and all, to get out their fleet. At Paris the same line of argument was adopted with the Earl of Manchester. M. de Torcy told that ambassador that Lord Melfort had indeed been about Versailles, but only for his private affairs; that he did own he had written a letter to his brother, which had been lost, but which did not contain what was alleged in the English parliament. De Torcy added, that the producing of that letter showed a desire of breaking with France,—that it was contrived only to frame a design to incense the English nation; and he complained of a printed paper about a new plot, or conspiracy, of France against England, which was cried about the streets of London. Manchester replied, that he could not in the least doubt but that the thoughts in the letter were Lord Melfort's thoughts, and written by him; at the same time, he expressed himself satisfied that the French court was far from taking such measures. As to the alleged libel crying about the streets of London, he assured the French minister that he did not believe it was done by order—"that they printed what they pleased in England, though, if the authors were discovered, they were liable to be punished." As M. de Torcy more than hinted that the letter produced in parliament was a forgery, got up by William and his advisers, Manchester took fire, and told him that this reflected on the honour of his master—that, if he supposed the letter was an invention, he did not doubt but that he might produce the original. "In short," says Manchester, "I am told they take it for granted that we shall enter into a war; and, as I happened to come a little later to Versailles yesterday than usual, the whole court had it, that we had declared war." In the end, Melfort was obliged to own his letter, and was disgraced for having written it: the court head, now the bishop of Norwich, has been silent for a long time; and their majesties may remember what weight the court of France laid upon their joining the king (I mean, the non-swearing clergy-men) in case of a landing: therefore all arts should be used, without delay, to get them to enter into a correspondence again; and every impediment ought to be removed, I say, without exception. And though, sometimes, it is of hard digestion for sovereigns, who ought to be obeyed without reserve, to yield to the humours of subjects, yet prudence shall teach them, when they cannot, without injuring their affairs, do what they would, to do what they can, and remember the fable of the dog who lost the substance by catching at the shadow. Assurances from the non-jurors—the soundest and most venerable part of the English church—would be of great use at this time to persuade France to undertake this great affair; for, besides their own example as a landing, and their preaching and writing to the people that their religion was in no danger, it is most certain they know better than any other can do what the church of England, in general, would do for the king's service; and they, being to run all the hazard, would be better believed at the French court than any other, as I found by experience."—Hutch.

at St. Germain, no doubt by the order of Louis, refused him admission, and the court of Versailles sent him to the castle of Angers, by a lettre de cachet—one of those compendiums of absolutism, which the bigot and fool would fain have imposed on his own country.

Meanwhile, negotiations were going on at the Hague, between England, Holland, and France, Mr. Stanhope acting as William's plenipotentiary. The instructions given to Stanhope were to obtain the following conditions:—1. That Louis should order all his troops out of the Spanish towns in the Netherlands within such time as should be agreed upon in the treaty, and engage not to send any forces into any of those towns or countries. 2. That no troops, but such as consisted of natural-born subjects of Spain and Germany, should continue in the Spanish Netherlands, except certain troops for the cautionary towns to be mentioned in the next article. 3. That for the better security of king William and the States-General, Newport and Ostend should be delivered up to his majesty, as cautionary towns, and the towns of Luxembourg, Namur, and Mons, to the States-General, to be kept by their garrisons respectively, with a proviso, that all this should be without prejudice to the rights and revenues of the crown of Spain. 4. That no towns belonging to the Spanish Netherlands, nor any ports whatsoever belonging to Spain, should be exchanged with France, or in anywise delivered up to the French. 5. That the subjects of England, &c., should enjoy the same liberties and privileges in all parts of the Spanish dominions, whether by sea or land, as they did at the demise of the late king of Spain, and in as ample a manner as the French, or any other nation. 6. That the emperor should be invited to join, and that any other princes or states, who thought fit to unite for the preservation of the peace of Europe, might be admitted into the treaty. 7. That the States-General should be desired to begin the negotiations, if the French ambassador would not. And Mr. Stanhope was further commanded by his instructions to hold a free communication on all matters with the Grand Pensionary Heinsius, and to desire a reciprocal freedom of communication from him, as a matter for king William's service.

On the 16th of March Mr. Secretary Hedges delivered a written message, signed by the king, to the Commons, informing them, that, according to the address of their house, Mr. Stanhope had been sent to negotiate at the Hague, and that it was his majesty's intention to acquaint them from time to time with the state and progress of these negotiations. Before this, the Commons had unanimously resolved, that twelve battalions, part of the standing forces now in Ireland, should be made up to 10,000 men, and sent to the assistance of the States-General:—providing, however, (a serious drawback,) that no new levies should be made in Ireland, or elsewhere, to supply the place of the troops thus drawn out of that kingdom.

The Lords, who had called for all the treaties that had been made since the late war, appointed a committee to deliberate upon them, or rather to pass sentence of condemnation upon the two partition treaties. That old Tory, Nottingham, was in the chair, but there were a few Whig lords in the committee. The report, when presented by Nottingham, enumerated seven circumstances as deserving of particular reprobation, in the First Treaty of Partition. 1. That Naples, Sicily, &c., were to have been given to the Dauphin. 2. That the emperor was not a party to this treaty. 3. That no minister of the States-General met with the plenipotentiaries of England and France, as required by the powers, at the making of the treaty in London. 4. That there were no instructions in writing given to our English plenipotentiaries, and that, if verbal orders were given, they were given without being considered in the council. 5. That the said treaty was ratified without being considered in council. 6. That the warrant for ratification was countersigned by one of the plenipotentiaries themselves. 7. That the treaty had been transacted, signed, and the great seal affixed to it in secrecy, and during the sitting of parliament. The facts were obvious enough, but the court party got up a debate upon every one of them. The first article was admitted; but the second about the emperor was absolutely negatived by a majority of votes. Sixteen of the lords protested against the rejection. The third article was also thrown out, and again the minority protested. The fourth article gave occasion to many severe remarks. "My Lord Portland, (almost the sole manager of these partition treaties after William,) finding himself close pressed in this debate, thought it would be a justification to him to name some lords of the cabinet council, that were present a little before the treaty was signed, when a draft of the treaty was read at his own lodging: but, those lords remembering likewise their objections made to it at the same time, that defence might as well have been spared."* Burnet says more circumstantially, that Portland, apprehending danger to himself, obtained the king's leave to communicate the whole matter. "So he told them, that he had not concluded the treaty alone, but had, by the king's order, acquainted six of his chief ministers with it, who were the Earls of Pembroke and Marlborough, the Viscount Lonsdale, the Lords Somers and Halifax, and Secretary Vernon: upon which, these lords, being likewise freed by the king from the oath of secrecy, told the house, that, the Earl of Jersey having in the king's name called them together, the treaty was read to them, and that they excepted to several things in it, but they were told that the king had carried the matter as far as was possible; and that he could obtain no better terms: so, when they were told that no alteration could be made, but that everything was settled, they gave over insisting on particulars:

they only advised, that the king might not engage himself in anything that would bring on a new war, since the nation had been so uneasy under the last. This was carried to the king; and, a few days after that, he told some of them that he was made acquainted with their exceptions, but, how reasonable soever they were, he had driven the matter as far as he could. The Earl of Pembroke said to the House of Lords, he had offered the king those advices that he thought were most for his service, and for the good of the nation; but that he did not think himself bound to give an account of that to any other persons. He was not the man struck at; so there was nothing said, either against him, or the Earls of Marlborough or Jersey. Upon this, the debate went on. Some said, this was a mockery to ask advice when there was no room for it; it was answered, the king had asked the advice of his privy council, and they had given it; but that, such was the royal prerogative, that it was still free to him to follow it or not, as he saw cause.* The Lords, however, agreed in a minute, that, whatever verbal orders or instructions might have been given, yet it appeared not that the draft of the treaty when perfected had been considered at any council when the king was present, or that it had been advised or approved of by any council, or committee of council.*

The 6th article, about the ratification, or the warrant for it, being countersigned by one of the plenipotentiaries, was purposely overlooked by the majority, who considered it as being personally directed against Lord Jersey. Subsequently the committee reported that it appeared there were powers, dated the 1st of July, to treat with the emperor, the Dutch, and French, for securing peace and friendship upon terms most suited to the circumstances of the time; that they were informed that some progress had been made in that open negotiation; but afterwards there were new powers granted on the 1st of January, to treat with the French and Dutch only; and the treaty for the partition was concluded without the emperor. A proposal to make this one of the heads of the address to his majesty was rejected; and then Lord Wharton proposed, "that it appears that the French king's acceptance of the will of the king of Spain is a manifest violation of the treaty; and that we do humbly advise the king that, in all future treaties with the French king, his majesty proceed with such caution as may carry along with it a real security." And it was resolved by the majority that this proposition should be one of the heads for the address. Here eight of the lords protested:—1. Because it might be construed to be an approbation of the treaty, which, as they conceived, was not intended by the House. 2. Because it was impossible to know the full meaning and extent of the words real security. When the address, however, came to be drawn up, it turned out to be a severe criticism of the whole of the secret negotiations. In it the lords spiritual and temporal represented that, having read and considered the treaty made by the French king, together with the separate and secret articles which his majesty had been pleased to communicate to them, they, to their great sorrow, found the matter thereof to have been of very ill consequence to the peace and safety of Europe: "for, besides the occasion it may have given to the late king of Spain to have made his will in favour of the Duke of Anjou, if this treaty had taken effect, the prejudice to your majesty and your subjects, and indeed to all Europe, by the addition of Sicily, Naples, several ports in the Mediterranean, the province of Guipuscoa, and the duchy of Lorraine, would have been not only very great, but contrary to the pretence of the treaty itself, which was to prevent any umbrage that might be taken by uniting too many states and dominions under one head." But these critics did not sufficiently reflect on the important facts, that, without the treaty, it was apprehended that all those territories, and territories of ten times their importance and a hundred times their extent, would be united under one head; that Louis and the emperor claimed each of them the whole of the Spanish succession; and that it was almost equally imperative upon statesmen who looked to the balance of power,—a system then sacrosanct in Europe,—to prevent either Louis or Leopold from getting possession of that vast dominion. The Lords, in their address, further represented, that, from all that they had been able to learn of the progress of this "fatal treaty," they could not find that the verbal orders and instructions were ever considered in the council; and then, aiming more especially at the Dutch lord, Portland, they besought his majesty for the future to require and admit in all matters of importance the advice of his natural-born subjects, whose known probity and fortunes might give both his majesty and the people a just assurance of their fidelity: and, in order thereunto, to constitute a council of such persons to whom he might be pleased to impart all affairs, both at home and abroad, which might in any way concern himself and his dominions; "for," continued their lordships, "as interest and natural affection to their country will incline them to wish the welfare and prosperity of it much more than others who have not such ties upon them, and as their experience and knowledge of their country will also render them more capable than strangers of advising your majesty in the true interest of it; so we are very confident that, after such large and repeated demonstrations of your subjects' duty and affections, your majesty cannot doubt of their zeal in your service, nor want the knowledge of persons fit to be employed in all your most secret and arduous affairs." Yet these lords must have known that, when Bentinck was first brought into the council, William had reasons for suspecting nearly every public man, Whig or Tory, and he did want the knowledge of persons fit to be employed in offices of trust. The opportunity was excellent for making an aphorism of the responsibility of ministers; and, whether ordered by the king or not, Chancellor Somers and the two others, in the parts they had acted in the matter of the treaty and ratification, had sinned against the constitution; but the Lords let the occasion pass, and in their address said not a word to enforce the grand principle of constitutional monarchy, which, though then beginning to be well understood, was far from being so universally acknowledged and revered as it now is. Some of the Lords pressed to have the address communicated to the Commons, that they might concur in it, or produce a fresh turmoil by criticising and refusing it: this motion, however, was overruled; and thereupon twenty-six lords entered a new protest. When the new Lord Keeper carried up the address he was alone, and he found only two or three of the lords in waiting at court, "to make the show of a House." Softened as it had been, this address was still a pretty severe reproof; but William merely said, in answer, that it contained matter of very great moment, and that he would always take care that all treaties he made should be for the honour and safety of England. Fierce and obstinate debates ensued in the Lower House, where the great privilege of freedom of speech was more freely exercised than had ever been known before. Mr. Howe called the Partition Treaty a "felonious treaty;" and others maintained that it was not more iniquitous than impolitic. But it was carried that an address of thanks should be presented to his majesty for his gracious message about the negotiations now in progress at the Hague, and for his royal intention to acquaint the House from time to time with the progress of those negotiations. Yet, in this address, the Commons strongly censured his past conduct, by telling him that matters would have gone much better if he had been equally communicative before concluding the Partition Treaty.

On the last day of March, Secretary Hedges communicated a message from the king to both Houses, telling them that the negotiations seemed to be at an end, by the positive answer the French ambassador had given to the States-General.* The Commons, who were called upon for their advice, adjourned till the 2nd of April, when, instead of an essentially warlike vote, which seems to have been half expected from them, they resolved unanimously, "That the humble advice of this House be given to his majesty, to desire that his majesty will be pleased to carry on the negotiations in concert with the States-General, and take such measures as may most conduce to security; and that his majesty will pursue the treaty made with the States-General the 3rd of March, 1677;" and they pledged themselves to enable him to support the said treaty. By this time the slow court of Austria was beginning to be in motion, and early in April the emperor declared that he had indispensable reasons for pursuing his right to the whole monarchy of Spain; and he invited the different states and potentates of the empire to join him in a league for the general interest of the empire, and especially the preservation of the Netherlands, &c. His imperial majesty was at peace with the Turks; and the army cantoned along the Danube and the Drave might be brought to the Rhine and the Sambre, where, as he represented, the English and the Dutch would make their last effort to assist him, to be avenged upon France, and to maintain their religion, liberty, and commerce. But at that moment, as at other crises, the empire was "so divided in itself" that no uniform and consistent league could be established, and the door seemed barred to the emperor from Vienna to Dusseldorf. The Elector Palatine was zealous for the Emperor, but several of the other princes were listening to a project of neutrality artfully put forward by France; the Elector of Cologne was receiving money from France, and raising 5000 men; and the Elector of Bavaria was receiving greater sums from the same quarter, and raising 10,000 men.*

About the middle of April a letter from the Duke of Anjou, dated Buen Retiro, and written in the style of King of Spain, the Indies, &c. &c., was received, and read in William's cabinet council. The Bourbon prince, or those who wrote for him, told his majesty of England, that, since he had taken possession of all the kingdoms and dominions belonging to him, he could no longer delay giving notice of the same; and, in courtly guise, he offered a sort of excuse for not having notified his accession before, and assured his majesty that he desired nothing more than his friendship. According to Burnet, "the Earl of Rochester and the rest of the new ministry pressed the king to own the king of Spain, and to answer his letter; urging that, since the Dutch had done it, it seemed reasonable that the king should likewise do it; and they prevailed at last, but with much difficulty." Whatever was the degree of William's reluctance or readiness, he answered the letter of "the most serene and most potent prince, brother, and cousin;" congratulating him on his happy arrival in his kingdom of Spain, being assured that the ancient friendship and correspondence betwixt the two crowns should remain inviolable, and the advantage and prosperity of all

* The French ambassador at the Hague had declared to the Pensionary that the king, his master, had no other answer to return to the demands made by the States-General of the United Provinces than that he was ready to renew and confirm the Treaty of Ryswick, it being all the security the States were to expect."

* We have seen how this Elector of Bavaria charged the French king with taking off his young son. On entering into alliance with Louis, he, in a manifesto, shifted the foul charge to the Emperor Leopold. "That star," he said, "which proves fatal to all who form an obstacle to the greatness of the House of Austria, carried off this young prince by a slight indisposition, by which he had been often attacked, without danger, before he was destined to wear the Spanish crown."—Histoire de l'Événement de la Mort du Dauphin, Par Targem.—The Emperor Leopold, it will be remembered, was the grandfather of the young prince whom he was thus accused of having destroyed.

be promoted, &c. There could be no possible use in questioning Philip's title, unless swords and bullets could be used as arguments; and up to this moment it was more than doubtful whether the emperor, if he made war, would not be left to carry it on without any assistance from the empire; and whether the English parliament would prefer a vast continental war to the alternative of seeing the grandson of Louis firmly established on the Spanish throne. At this very moment the parliament was pouring out the vials of its wrath upon the late Whig ministers. Not satisfied with their ample exposure of both Partition Treaties, and of the mode in which the second had been executed, they fell upon that Second Partition Treaty with fresh fury. All the members of the Commons were summoned to attend the service of the House upon pain of incurring its severe displeasure; and, the House having resolved itself into a committee to consider the state of the nation and that Partition Treaty, the following resolution was adopted forthwith:—"That William, Earl of Portland, by negotiating and concluding the Treaty of Partition, which was destructive to the trade of this kingdom and dangerous to the peace of Europe, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor." Sir John Leveson Gower was ordered to impeach him at the bar of the Lords, and a committee was appointed to prepare the articles against him. Their next step was to call upon the Lords for the particulars of what had passed before them between Lord Portland and Mr. Vernon, as also for whatever other information they had obtained by letters or otherwise. The Lords demurred for six days, when the House resolved, without a division, to apply to his majesty, by address, for copies of the grand alliance, of the two secret articles, and of the First Partition Treaty, together with the powers and instructions granted for negotiating the same. On the morrow Mr. Vernon, in his master's name, replied that his majesty had given orders for the treaties and powers to be laid before the House; but that there were no instructions for either of those treaties in writing. The next day the Commons had a conference with the Lords, and Sheffield, Marquess of Normandy, better known by his after-title of Duke of Buckingham, and who put himself foremost in the attack upon Portland, delivered to the managers for the Commons two papers in Latin, the one dated at Loo, July the 1st, 1699, containing the full powers granted to the Earls of Portland and Jersey to treat with the ministers of the Emperor, France, and the States, for the preservation of peace, but without any mention of the Spanish succession; and the other dated at Kensington, January the 2nd, 1699-1700, containing the like full powers to the same lords for signing the Second Partition Treaty. Sheffield also delivered the following paper, which had been laid before their lordships by Lord Portland, but not signed by him, when they had been questioning him as to his conduct:—"At the beginning of the summer in the year '99, when I was in Holland at my country-house, and when the king would have me be concerned in the negotiating of this treaty with the emperor, the French king, and the States, being very unwilling to meddle with business again, from which I was retired, before I would engage myself I advised with my friends in Holland, and writ into England to the Secretary Vernon, as my particular friend, whether it was advisable for me to engage in any business again? To which Mr. Vernon answered, in substance, that this would not engage me but for a little while: that, I being upon the place, and generally acquainted with the foreign ministers, it would be easier for the king, and proper for me, to be employed in it than anybody else that must be otherwise sent for on purpose." And Sheffield also presented a memorandum of the question which had been put to Portland in the Upper House, and his answer to it. It stated that, "the Earl of Portland being desired by the Lord Somers, with the leave of the House, to declare, if he pleased, whether my Lord Somers' name was mentioned in the letter he received from Mr. Secretary Vernon; the Earl of Portland declared that, if he had remembered any such thing in the letter, and had not inserted it in the paper which he had delivered to the House, he should have thought he had deceived the House." Portland was manifestly most anxious, even at the increased risk of peril to himself, to screen the ex-chancellor; but his evident equivocation only tended to drive on the impeachment, which was presently made to include not only Somers, but also the lords Orford and Halifax. The Commons gave all the papers they had received at the hands of the Marquess of Normandy to be translated and referred to a committee. Mr. Vernon and Sir Joseph Williamson, who had been almost as deeply concerned as Portland himself,—and Williamson much more so than Somers, for he had actually signed the Second Partition Treaty,—were overlooked, and the whole fury of the House was directed against the four lords. And, as if they had not materials enough in the passing an unwarranted commission under the great seal, they again attempted to couple the ex-chancellor with Captain Kydd. If we are to believe Burnet, the most nefarious endeavours were made to induce the pirate to inculpate Somers, the Earl of Orford, and Halifax. "Their enemies," he says, "tried again what use could be made of Kydd's business,—for he was taken in our northern plantations in America, and brought over: he was examined by the House; but either he could not lay a probable story together, or remnants of honesty, raised in him by the near prospect of death, restrained him: he accused no person of having advised or encouraged his turning pirate; he had never talked alone with any of the lords, and never at all with Lord Somers: he said he had no orders from them but to pursue his voyage against the pirates in Madagascar. All endeavours were used to persuade him to accuse the lords: he was assured that, if he did it, he should be preserved; and, if he did not, he should certainly die for his piracy: yet this could not prevail on him to charge them; so he, with some of his crew, were hanged, there appearing not so much as a colour to fasten any imputation on those lords: yet their enemies tried what use could be made of the grant of all that Kydd might recover from the pirates, which some bold and ignorant lawyers affirmed to be against law. So this matter was for the fourth time debated in the House of Commons; and the behaviour of those peers in it appeared to be so innocent, so legal, and, in truth, so meritorious, that it was again let fall. The insisting so much on it served to convince all people that the enemies of these lords wanted not inclination, but only matter, to charge them, since they made so much use of this; but so partial was a great part of the House that the dropping this was carried only by a small majority. When one design failed another was set up.* But the other design was justifiable and commendable in the eyes of the constitution, which can never wink or cease from vigilance without danger; and, while we detect the narrow personal spirit in which too many prosecuted that design, we must pause ere we censure the principle involved. Lord Somers had more reason to rely upon his eloquence and influence over the House than had the Duke of Leeds when he had resorted to the same measure:—as soon as he heard that the Commons were preparing to impeach him, he desired to be heard at their bar. An order was made for his admission; and, candles having been first brought in, his lordship entered with the ceremonies usual on such occasions. He then stood up uncovered, and began his defence or apology. According to the Whig-historian, his speech was triumphant; and, if the question had been then put, he would have carried the majority with him: according to Lord Dartmouth, who detested the king and hated all the Whigs, it was a complete failure.* The truth, as usual, lies between these two extremes of party. There is one little circumstance omitted by Burnet, but which, as a writer less friendly to the accused lords allows, showed “that Lord Somers, on that great occasion did not dishonour the rest of his life.”† When his lordship had done speaking, he was asked from the chair who it was informed him that there was a debate in the House relating to his lordship. Somers replied, “that he was strangely surprised at a question that he never knew was put to any man that came to desire the favour of being heard; and that, if the question was asked to bring the least prejudice to any man in England, he would not only be content to lie under the censure of the House, but suffer the worst thing that might befall him upon earth, rather than do a dishonourable thing.” His lordship then withdrew, but came back and desired to leave with the House a letter he had received from his majesty, and a copy of his answer to the same, saying that he had his majesty’s leave for this: and thereupon he retired for good.* There is no record of the debate which followed, and not even a list of those who took part in it. Upon the question being put, “That John Lord Somers, by advising his majesty in the year 1699 to the treaty for dividing the Spanish monarchy, whereby large territories of the King of Spain’s dominions were to be delivered up to France, is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor,” it was resolved in the affirmative by 198 against 188. The same question was afterwards carried with relation to the Earl of Orford by 193 against 148; and, with reference to Lord Halifax, by 186 against 163. It was then resolved that the said lords should be severally impeached at the bar of the Upper House. And, anticipating the trial, the Commons further resolved, by a majority of 162 to 107, that a humble address be presented to his majesty to remove John Lord Somers from his council and presence for ever: which was followed by the like motions against Orford, Halifax, and Portland, these being carried without a division. But instantly a counter-address was set on foot in the House of Lords, and carried through by a majority of twenty. It humbly and earnestly besought his majesty to be pleased not to pass any censure upon the four lords, until they were tried upon their impeachments, and judgment given according to the usage of parliament and the laws of the land. The king received the address, but returned no answer. He was surrounded by difficulties which scarcely any human prudence could wholly remove. If he pleased the Lords he must offend the Commons, and if he gratified the Commons he must incense the Lords. He had recourse to an adjournment. When the Houses re-assembled, other important business forced itself upon their notice. Secretary Hedges now informed them that the States-General were resolved not to take any step in the negotiation with France without his majesty’s full concurrence, and that they returned his majesty their hearty thanks for the provision he was making for their assistance in case of an attack from France. The Commons voted an additional aid of 3s. in the pound, to be made good by a tax laid upon land. They also resolved, in a committee of ways and means, that the savings which arose from the non-payment of 50,000*l.* a-year allotted as a dowry to King James’s queen, of 30,000*l.* a-year fallen in by the death of Catherine, the widow of Charles II., and of 20,000*l.* a-year more by the death of the Duke of Gloucester, — making in all 100,000*l.* per annum, — might be applied to the public service, without any diminution of the provision originally intended for his majesty. The proposition was very distasteful to the court, and all those in office seemed to consider the said savings as veils of royalty. Many of the temporising Whigs, who were seeking various methods of recommending themselves to the king and regaining the places they had lost, sided with ministers in the debate. The point was carried in committee, but not without considerable difficulty. When Mr. Conyers reported to the House that he was directed by the committee to move for leave to apply the savings of 100,000*l.* per annum towards the payment of the public debts, the motion was carried by a majority of 214 to 169. This contest was scarcely over when a message from the Lords reminded the House, “that as yet no particular articles had been exhibited against the lords impeached; which, after impeachments had been so long pending, were due in justice to the persons concerned, and agreeable to the methods of parliament in such cases.”* The Commons replied that the articles against the impeached lords were preparing, and in a short time would be sent to their lordships’ House. For some time people had been complaining out of doors of these continual discussions between the two Houses, of the violence of party animosities, and of the great neglect of the real business of the nation. Many of the men most identified with the Revolution retained a great influence in the country; and it is believed that some of these favoured and promoted the famous “Kentish Petition,” which was presented at this critical moment. This petition was drawn up at a meeting of magistrates, grand-jurors, and freeholders at Maidstone, and put into the hands of Sir Thomas Hales, one of the members for the county, to be by him laid before the House of Commons. But Hales, finding it was likely to give great offence to the House, excused himself; and then Mr. Meredith, the other member for the county, undertook to deliver it. But Meredith was cautious, and had his misgivings, and, before bringing up the petition to the table, he told the House that several of the gentlemen of good quality who had signed it were at the door, and quite ready to own their signatures. Upon this, an order was given that these country gentlemen should be admitted. Having severally owned the petition and their signatures, they were ordered to withdraw; and then the paper was read. After expressing their deep concern at the dangerous state of this kingdom and of all Europe, the Kentish gentlemen said, that they thought themselves bound in duty to lay before the House the consequences, in this conjuncture, of their (the Commons’) speedy resolution and sincere endeavour to answer to the great trust reposed in them by their country. “And,” they continued, “in regard that, from the experience of all ages, it is manifest no nation can be great or happy without union, we hope that no pretence whatsoever shall be able to create a misunderstanding among ourselves, or the least distrust of his most sacred majesty, whose great actions for this nation are writ in the hearts of his subjects, and can never, without the blackest ingratitude, be forgot. We most humbly implore this honourable House to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and safety may be effectually provided for, that your addresses may be turned into bills of supply, and that his most sacred majesty, whose propitious and unblemished reign over us we pray God long to continue, may be enabled powerfully to assist his allies before it is too late.” The “hot-heads” of the House were transported with fury. Some, more moderate, endeavoured to make up matters by going out to the petitioners during the debate, and attempting to persuade them to merit clemency from the House by certain submissions. But the Kentish gentlemen would offer no concession, declaring that they were of opinion that it was their right to petition the House according to the statute of the 13th of Charles II., and that, as to the matter of the petition, they intended nothing offensive. The Commons then, by a loud majority, resolved that the petition was “scandalous, insolent, and seditious,” tending to destroy the constitution, &c., and that the presenters of it should be taken into the custody of the serjeant-at-arms. A rude scuffle ensued, and then the House, on complaint of the serjeant-at-arms, by a majority of 169 to 93, sent all the Kentish gentlemen to the Gate House. According to Burnet; similar petitions were preparing in the city of London and in all parts of the kingdom. The gentlemen who were sent to prison, where they lay till the prorogation, were, he says, “much visited, and treated as confessors.” “It was much questioned,” he adds, “whether they (the Commons) had really an authority to imprison any except their own members, or such as had violated the privilege of their House.” The king was at last advised to interfere to prevent the address from the City; and persons were sent in his majesty’s name to divert the leading men from that design: “yet, with all this,” says Burnet, “it came so near for such an address in a common council, that the lord mayor’s vote turned it for the negative.”

* I was in the House of Commons during the whole debate: what the bishop says of Lord Somers making an impression in his favour is so far from true, that I never saw that House in so great a flame as they were upon his withdrawing. He justified his putting the great seal to a blank so poorly, and insisted that the king’s letter (which he produced) was a good warrant, which everybody knew to be none; nor did the contents sufficiently justify him, if it had been any; and his endeavouring to throw everything upon the king provoked them to such a degree, that he left them in a much worse disposition to himself than he found them: and I heard many of his best friends say they heartily wished he had never come thither.”—Note to Burnet.

Another royal message was soon delivered to the Commons about the state of affairs abroad; and in it the difficulties of the Dutch and their hopes of immediate assistance from his majesty were declared in a manner that betrayed an anxiety for an immediate declaration of war. And Secretary Hedges, together with this message, delivered a letter from the States-General to the king, in which their high mightinesses drew a forcible picture of French aggression and insolence. They showed how Louis, through his ambassador extraordinary, the Count d’Avaux, had endeavoured to lead them into a separate treaty; and how they had represented to his Catholic majesty that the security of Holland could not by any means be separated from that of England,—that the two nations had a common interest; and that they could and would do nothing without the concurrence of his Britannic majesty. “Upon the report,” they continued, “which has been made to us we have judged that their intent was to separate the interests of England from those of the republic. We look upon them as inseparable; and, as it is a plain case that they are so, we could draw no other conclusion from this proceeding, but that, on the side of France, there was a design to end the conferences, and to consent to none of the securities demanded, which are so necessary to the preservation of the kingdom, of your majesty, and of our republic. We are obliged to give your majesty notice of all this: we protest that, our interests being the same with those of your majesty in the negotiation, and inseparable one from the other, we shall not suffer them to be divided in any manner.” Their situation, they said, was rendered most critical by thus rejecting the insidious proposals of France. “We cannot but represent to your majesty the pressing occasion we have to be assisted. . . . It is that which makes us desire, with so much earnestness, the execution of the treaty which received the approbation of the parliament, in the year 1678, betwixt King Charles II. of glorious memory and this state. We repeat, now, our most earnest instances to have quickly the stipulated succours, and the entire execution of the said treaty. . . . We will tell you, Sir, in what condition France puts itself; and your majesty will judge, by that, if our fear, which reanimates our demands, be ill founded. France, not content with having taken possession of all the places in the Netherlands that remain to Spain, has thrown into them, and causes, actually, every day, formidable forces to march thither: they draw a line from the Scheldt, near Antwerp, to the Maese. They are going to begin to draw such a line, according to our advices, from Antwerp to Ostend. They send a numerous artillery into the places that are nearest to our frontiers: they make, with great diligence, many magazines in Flanders, in Brabant, in Guelderland, and at Namur, which they fill up with all sorts of ammunition for war and subsistence, besides the great stores for forage, which they gather from all parts: they build forts under the cannon of our places: besides, they have worked, and work still continually, to draw the princes that are our friends from our interests, to make them enter into their alliance, or to engage them to a neutrality at least. In short, by intrigues and divisions in the empire, they make our friends useless, and increase those of France. Thus, we are almost surrounded on all sides, except on the side of the sea.” Towards the close this remarkable letter was still more energetic. “Our condition,” said they, “is worse than it was during the late war, and worse than if we were actually at war; whilst the French make forts under the cannon of our strong places, and lines along our frontiers, without our being able to hinder it, as we might do if we were at war. These reasons oblige us to put ourselves in a state of defence, more than if we were actually attacked, by overflowing our country, and even cutting our dykes, to secure our frontiers. We are forced to employ these means, and all those we could bear in an open war; so that our subjects suffer already more than they did during the last war. Hitherto the winter has served us as a sort of security: but that season is over, and we are at the brink of being invaded and overturned every moment, if we do not get prompt succour.” And, at the same time, that nothing might be wanting to make this appeal to the English parliament overpowering, Secretary Hedges laid before them another letter which had been received from Mr. Stanhope, at the Hague. That negotiator exposed the double dealing of d’Avaux, who, moreover, had told him, that he (Stanhope) could not be admitted to the conferences, except upon certain inadmissible terms. Stanhope also confirmed the grounds of alarm mentioned by the States-General in their letter to the king. “I find them,” says the ambassador, “in great apprehension of some sudden invasion from the French, on account of fresh advices from Flanders, of extraordinary motions of their troops there, . . . of more forces coming into the country, and transports of prodigious quantities of cannon, mortars, bombs, and ammunition from several parts towards their frontiers.” The Commons postponed the consideration of these important matters till the next day, and went on that afternoon to examine the articles of impeachment prepared in committee against the Earl of Orford. And on the following morning, before taking up the subject of Holland, they sent up that impeachment to the Lords, with a demand that the Earl of Orford should be made to give sufficient security to abide judgment. Then they took his majesty’s message and the papers delivered by the secretary into consideration; and, after a very full debate, they resolved unanimously that they would effectually assist his majesty to support his allies in maintaining the liberties of Europe, and would immediately provide succours for the States-General, according to the treaty of 1677. On the very day after this welcome vote, Count Wratislaus, the imperial envoy, presented a memorial to William, setting forth the danger to be apprehended from the excessive power of France by its late union with Spain, the injury done to the emperor by that union, and the resolution of his imperial majesty to vindicate his rights to the Spanish succession. And, after this preamble, he intimated that his master, the emperor, knew the difficulty and danger of the undertaking; that he trusted, however, in the justice of his cause, and the assistance of the kings and princes who had been parties to the late confederacy against France, and among whom his Britannic majesty had the principal place; and then he hinted that the old confederacy or grand alliance, which had been virtually dissolved by the peace of Ryswick and the two Partition Treaties, was to be held still in force, and competent to bind the members of that old alliance to furnish fresh succour, &c. On the 14th of May, the Lords voted an address, in which they went still farther than the Commons. They assured his majesty that they were sensible of the great and imminent danger of the States General, and perfectly agreed with them in believing that the safety of Holland and that of England were so inseparably united, that whatsoever was ruin to the one must be fatal to the other: they desired his majesty not only to make good all the articles of any former treaty with the States General, but also to enter into a strict league, offensive and defensive, and to invite into it all princes and states that were concerned in the present visible danger, arising from the union of France and Spain. Nor did they stop here. They further desired that his majesty would enter into such alliance with the emperor as he might think fit, pursuant to the ends of the treaty of 1699, assuring him of their hearty and sincere assistance, and of their confident hope that Almighty God would protect him in so righteous a cause, and that the unanimity, wealth, and courage of his subjects, would carry him with honour and success through all the difficulties of a just war. Yet, to all this, they added an unpalatable paragraph, stating, with sufficient absurdity, that the dangers to which William and his allies were now exposed were chiefly owing to fatal counsels—that is, to those Whigs who had helped him through the Partition Treaties. William, as we have seen, had, in reply to the complimentary letter from Louis's grandson, in a manner acknowledged the young Philip as King of Spain, and that too, without the concurrence of parliament; but that act, being apparently considered as a mere matter of form, was neither condemned nor noticed by the Lords. In reply to their address, the king said, very briefly, that he would take into consideration their desires and proposals, which would be the most effectual means to raise the honour of the English nation to the reputation it had obtained in any former time.

In spite of the reproof of the Lords, that men ought to be tried before the stamp of reprobation were put upon them, the Tory majority in the Commons carried an address to the throne for the instant removal of Somers, Orford, Halifax, and Portland, from his majesty's counsels, &c., for ever. The very next day after this motion, and while the Lords were on their way to Kensington with their last and warlike address, the Commons were cut to the bone by a singular flagellum. A packet was put into the hands of the Speaker Harley by a poor woman, and this packet was found to contain a memorial (afterwards entitled the "Legion Memorial"), and a startling letter to the Tory Speaker. The letter was in these words:—

are charged with, in the behalf of many thousands of the good people of England. There is neither Popish, Jacobite, seditious, court, or party interest concerned in it; but honesty and truth. You are commanded by 200,000 Englishmen to deliver it to the House of Commons, and to inform them, that it is no banter, but serious truth; and a serious regard to it is expected. Nothing but justice and their duty is required; and it is required by them who have both a right to require and power to compel, viz., the people of England. We could have come to the House strong enough to oblige them to hear us, but we have avoided any tumults, not desiring to embroil, but to serve, our native country. If you refuse to communicate it to them, you will find cause in a short time to repent it."

The memorial, which was signed, "Our name is Legion, and we are many," is generally believed to have been the production of that wonderful penman, Daniel Defoe.* Though, in truth, nothing but a satire and a mystification, it had that writer's characteristic thorough reality and earnestness; and, like other papers by the same hand, it transported the parties addressed into a perfect fury and panic. The serjeant-at-arms was ordered to go his rounds with the mace to summon all members to instant attendance; a loud murmur was raised of endeavours to excite tumults and sedition; and a committee was appointed to draw up an address to beseech his majesty to check these most perilous attempts, and to provide for the public peace and security. Mr. Howe, who had been a very loud talker in the sense contrary to that of the writer of the Legion Memorial and his party, declared in the house that he was in danger of his life, and several other Tory members were frightened away into the country, believing, as it should appear, that the "Legion," which only existed in the imagination of Defoe, was really on the point of assaulting the parliament. A committee was appointed to meet in the Speaker's chamber; empowered to send for persons, papers, and records, and directed to sit de die in diem. But at last the mystification became evident, the Tories became ashamed of their panic, and no report was called for; and the whole affair, which must have convulsed the immortal author of Robinson Crusoe with laughter, was silently let fall. While the Commons were yet shaking with the panic, the Lords reminded them that, though they had sent up their articles against Orford, they had as yet exhibited none against Portland, Somers, and Halifax. Thus quickened, they drew up the impeachment of Somers in a most iniquitous spirit; and it was carried up to the Lords on the 19th of May. The high crime most insisted upon was his share in the Partition Treaty; but, in addition, Somers was charged with having passed many great, unreasonable, and exorbitant grants, under the great seal; with having promoted and procured unreasonable and exorbitant grants to be made of the late forfeited estates in Ireland, in contempt of the advice of the House of Commons; with not being content with all the fees, profits, and perquisites, legally belonging to the great seal, together with an additional pension of 4000*l.* per annum, but having, contrary to his oath, begged and procured for his own benefit many great and unreasonable grants of manors, lands, tencments, rents, hereditaments, and revenues, belonging to the crown of England, &c.; with having alienated many quit-rents and other rents annexed to Windsor Castle, &c.; and with having used many extraordinary methods, delays, and unwarrantable proceedings in the Court of Chancery, &c. Nor was Captain Kydd, though now hanged, forgotten in this impeachment, Somers, like Orford, being charged with the irregularities of that unlucky adventurer's proceedings. On the 24th of May, the ex-lord chancellor of England sent his answer to their lordships. He clearly made it appear that the obnoxious treaty was the king's own measure—though that, in constitutional strictness, did not exonerate him as a minister for what he had done in it—and that he had given his opinion freely upon the whole business. With regard to enrolling the treaty in the Court of Chancery, he urged that it was not incumbent on him as chancellor to see it enrolled, a duty which properly belonged to the Prothonotary. As to the grants which he had passed, and which he said he believed were not so considerable as those which, in the same number of years, had been passed in the times of most of his predecessors, they had been regularly passed through the proper offices, and brought such warrants with them as he had thought himself obliged to obey. He insisted that he of himself had neither advised nor procured any grants of any forfeited estates in Ireland for any person whatsoever; that the pension of 4000*l.* per annum which he had received was neither more nor less than what had been allowed to several of his predecessors; that he had never begged or used any means to procure any grant whatsoever for his own benefit; that whatever his majesty had given him had proceeded from his own bounty, and as an evidence of his gracious sense of his zealous endeavours for his majesty's service, without any previous solicitation either by himself or any other; that, in the year 1697, his majesty did indeed grant him the manors of Reigate and Howley, which, however, were far short of the value suggested in the impeachment; that he knew of no alienations at Windsor; that the commission granted to Captain Kydd, for taking and bringing pirates to a legal trial, was apprehended to be necessary for the preservation of trade and navigation; that the persons concerned in the undertaking fitted out Kydd's ship at their own expense; that the grant made of all the ships, goods, &c., belonging to the pirates, to the said undertakers for their suppression, was not without account,—being meant as a recompense to the said undertakers, and not being either prejudicial to the subject or dishonourable to the king; and, finally, that, if Kydd had faithfully discharged his trust, it might have been of great benefit to the public, whereas, the contrary having proved the case, the owners had lost all their expenses. As for the charges of abuse of power in the Chancery Court, unfair delays, and irregular proceedings, he gave to one and all a round denial, solemn, but short, as if he scorned the imputations. The Lords insisted that the trial should proceed forthwith, and the impeachments be made good or dropped; the Commons demanded more time, and proposed that a committee of both Houses might be nominated to consider of the most proper ways and methods for proceeding against the lords accused. They complained, that, being under accusation of high crimes, these lords had still been admitted to vote in the House, and in their own cases; and, to adjust this matter and some others, they insisted on a committee of both Houses, their departure from which, they said, "would be giving up the rights of the Commons of England, established by unquestionable precedents and the usage of parliament, and making all impeachment (the greatest bulwark of the laws and liberties of England) impracticable for the future." But the Lords rejected this proposal of a joint committee, and gave in their reasons for so doing at a conference.* This

* From internal evidence we feel perfectly convinced that Defoe was the writer. Oldmixon says, that Defoe had, in his hearing, taken to himself the honour of being the author of the paper. It appears that the Commons believed it had been got up by the Keutish commissioners, and that one of those gentlemen, who had escaped from the serjeant-at-arms, was coming, with the whole county of Keut at his heels, to make his threats good. The writer artfully made it susceptible of this latter interpretation, by complaining in the beginning of the haughty behaviour of the Commons, and their committing to illegal custody the writers and presenters of petitions, &c. Several of the clauses of the memorial were as severe and cutting as human pen could make them: others were very cogent. Take for example the following charges against the Tory majority, which now ruled the House:—"7. Voting the Treaty of Partition fatal to Europe, because it gave so much of the Spanish dominion to the French, and not concerning yourselves to prevent their taking possession of it all. 8. Deserving the Dutch when the French are at their doors, till it be almost too late to help them, is unjust to our treaties, and making to our confederates, dishonourable to the English nation, and shows you very negligent of the safety of England and of our Protestant neighbours. 9. Addressing the king to displace his friends, upon base surmises, before the legal trial, or any article proven, is illegal, and inverting the law, and making execution go before judgment, contrary to the true sense of the law, which exempts every man a good man till something appears to the contrary. 10. Delaying proceedings upon capital impeachments, to blast the reputation of the persons, without proving the fact, is illegal and oppressive, destructive to the liberty of Englishmen, a delay of justice, and a reproach to parliaments. 11. Suffering any, indecent reproaches upon his majesty's person to be publicly made in your house, particularly that impudent scandal of parliaments, John Howe, without showing such resentment as you ought to do: the said John Howe saying openly, that his majesty made a felonious treaty to rob his neighbours; insinuating that the Partition Treaty (which was every way as just as blowing up one man's house to save another's) was a combination of the king to rob the crown of Spain of its due: this is making a Billingsgate of the House, and setting up to bully your sovereign, contrary to the intent and meaning of the freedom of speech, which you claim as a right, is scandalous to parliaments, undutiful and unmannerly, and a reproach to the whole nation. 12. Your Speaker exacting the exorbitant rate of 10*l.* per diem for the votes, and giving the printer encouragement to raise it on the people, by selling them at 4*d.* per sheet, is an illegal and arbitrary exaction, dishonourable to the House, and burdensome to the people."

* These reasons were—1. Because they do not find that ever such a committee was appointed on occasion of impeachments for misdemeanors; and their lordships think themselves obliged to be extremely cautious in admitting anything new in matters relating to judicature. 2. That, although a committee of this nature was agreed to upon the impeachments of the Earl of Danby, and the five Popish lords for high treason, yet it was upon occasion of several considerable questions and difficulties which did then arise; and their lordships do not find, that the success in that instance was such as should encourage the pursuing the same methods again, though in the

led to other angry messages; but the Lords persisted in their resolution of not consenting to a joint committee. And at this moment the dispute was interrupted by the king's going to the House of Lords, to give the royal assent to the new Succession Bill, which had been carried through both Houses, and which was by far the most important act of the session.

According to Roger Coke, a Whig member designed to bring in the bill for fixing the succession to the crown in the Protestant house of Brunswick, "which being smoked by the Speaker, Sir John Bowles, a Tory, and little better than a madman, was employed to present it to the House, who had so little stomach to it, that it hung there above three months before they passed it." Bishop Burnet, who voted on the occasion, says—"Sir John Bowles, who was then disordered in his senses, and soon after quite lost them, was set on by the party (the Tories) to be the first that should name the Electress Dowager of Brunswick, (Sophia, grand-daughter of James I.) which seemed done to make it less serious, when moved by such a person. It was, by the forms of the House, put in the chair of the committee to whom the bill was committed. The thing was still put off for many weeks, but, every time that it was called for, the motion was entertained with coldness, which served to heighten the jealousy. The committee once or twice sat upon it, but all the members ran out of the House with so much indecency that the contrivers seemed ashamed of this management. There were seldom fifty or sixty at the committee, yet, in conclusion, it passed, and was sent up to the Lords, where we expected great opposition would be made to it. . . . Many of the lords absented themselves on design: some little opposition was made by the Marquess of Normanby; and four lords—the Earls of Huntingdon and Plymouth and the Lords Guildford and Jeffreys—protested against it. Those who wished well to the act were glad to have it passed any way, and so would not examine the limitations that were in it."* But the bearing of these limitations to the power of the crown was favourable to the liberties of the nation; and, whatever were their motives for urging them, the Tories, by some of them at least, unquestionably rendered a service to the constitution. The Whig historian will not of course allow any merit to his political enemies: on the contrary, he asserts—and the temper and views of many of the Tory party will almost bear him out—that the whole proceeding was marked with insincerity, and intended, by indirect means, to throw the government back into the hands of the exiled family. "Harley," he says, "moved that some things previous might be considered. He observed that the haste the nation was in when the present government was settled had made us go too fast, and overlook many securities which might have prevented much mischief, and therefore he hoped they would not now fall into the same error. Nothing pressed them at present; so he moved they would settle some conditions of government, as preliminaries, before they should proceed to the nomination of the person, that so we might fix everything that was wanting to make our security complete. . . . Suspicious people thought this was done on design to blast the motion, and to offer such extravagant limitations as should quite change the form of our government, and render the crown titular and precarious. The king was alarmed at it, for almost every particular that was proposed implied a reflection upon him and his administration, chiefly that of not employing strangers, and not going too often out of the kingdom. It was proposed that everything should be done with the advice of the privy council, and every privy councillor was to sign his advice. All men who had places or pensions were to be made incapable of sitting in the House of Commons. All this was unacceptable to the king: so, many who had an ill opinion of the design of those who were now at the helm began to conclude that the delays were affected, and that these limitations were designed to raise disputes between the two Houses, by which the bill might be lost." As eventually passed, the Succession Bill enacted that all things relating to the well governing of the kingdom which are properly cognizable in the privy council should be transacted there, and all resolutions taken thereupon signed by such of the privy council as should advise and consent to the same; that no person whatsoever, not a native of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging, or not born of English parents beyond seas (although such person were naturalized or made denizen), should be capable to be of the privy council, or a member of either House of parliament, or to enjoy any place of trust, either civil or military, or be capable of any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments from the crown; that, in case the crown should hereafter come to a foreign prince, the nation should not be obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories not belonging to the crown of England; that no person who should hereafter come to the possession of the crown should go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without consent of parliament; that whosoever should hold the crown should join in communion with the church of England, as by law established; like case; the lords observing, that, after much time spent at that committee, the disputes were so far from being there adjusted, that they occasioned an abrupt conclusion of a session of parliament."

* According to Roger Coke, Burnet himself attempted some amendments, which of course would have been in favour of the prerogative in Protestant hands. "The bill," says Coke, "was sent up so loose to the Lords, that the late Bishop of Salisbury (Burnet), out of the height of his zeal for the Protestant succession, was standing up to move for amendments, when a great many of the young lords, by a very signal providence, crying out, No amendments! no amendments! it passed without any; and, Dr. Newton, one of the masters in chancery, being sent with it down to the Commons, where there were not many members then sitting, after his admission he was asked, what he had brought them; to which he answered, The Succession Bill; then being further interrogated concerning what amendments the Lords had made to it, and he replying, None at all, several of the members said aloud, The devil take you and your Bill! This the late Lord Somers told several gentlemen, and particularly to a certain friend of his and mine, from whom I had it; and, if I had not known him to be a person of great integrity, I should not have ventured to insert it."—Detection.

that no person having an office under the king, or receiving a pension from the crown, should be capable of serving as a member of the House of Commons; that the judges' commissions should be made quandiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established, but that upon the address of either House of parliament, it might be lawful to remove them; that no pardon under the great seal should be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in parliament; and, finally, that the Princess Sophia, Duchess Dowager of Hanover, should be declared the next in succession to the crown of England, in the Protestant line, after his majesty and the Princess Anne, and the heirs of their bodies respectively; and that the further limitation of the crown should be to the said Princess Sophia and the heirs of her body, being Protestants. The sweeping disqualifications affecting all foreigners whatsoever and all servants of the government were not only unpalatable to William, but over-jealous, and in some respects unwise. But there were politicians of the day who would have gone much farther in their limitations, and, while they paid less respect to the rights of blood, which after all were compromised, would have declared as a broad principle the right of the nation to choose its own sovereign. Toland, a party writer of some eminence, published a pamphlet entitled "Limitation for the next Foreign Successor, or New Saxon Race;" in which he urged, that, if we had made terms with the prince and princess (William and Mary), who had both an antecedent title to the crown, we might very well demand further securities from those who had no other claim but what arose from our own good will; that, having to elect a successor, the English nation might be allowed the same liberty which the Spaniards had recently taken in bestowing their crown, and might choose out of the House of Hanover, or that of Brandenburg, which of the sons they pleased. And, correctly foreseeing the circumstances which happened under the two first Georges, he recommended the English parliament to consider whether we ought to make any of those princes of the House of Hanover or Brandenburg kings of England, without previously obliging them to renounce their foreign dominions. "For," said he, "if our crown should fall upon either of those families, they will fall under mighty temptations to enlarge their dominions beyond sea, in order to make the communication betwixt their old and new dominions more speedy and easy. This the family of Hanover may attempt, by falling down upon the Elbe and the Weiser, and swallowing up Hamburg, Bremen, Verden, &c.; and the House of Brandenburg might do the like, falling down the same rivers and the Rhine. All these things, how remote and chimerical soever they may seem at present, ought to be considered." These considerations were, however, overlooked, greatly to the satisfaction of the House of Hanover.* Ungrateful and displeasing as it was in many particulars, William gave the royal assent to this Succession Bill without a murmur. The Duchess of Savoy, grand-daughter of Charles I., presented a very useless protest against the bill, which, together with the Order of the Garter for her husband, was carried over to the Electress of Hanover by the Earl of Macclesfield. •

The dispute between the two Houses touching the impeachment of Somers, which had been interrupted a little while by the king's going to the Lords to give his consent to the Succession Bill, was renewed a few days after. Each House seemed resolute—the Commons in insisting on a joint committee, the Lords in refusing it. In a conference, Lord Haversham gave great offence to the Commons, by saying that they themselves thought the lords impeached innocently. "And I think," said he, "the proposition is undeniable, for there were several lords in the same crimes, in the same fact; there is no distinction, and the Commons leave some of these men at the head of affairs, near the king's person, to do any mischief they are inclined to, and impeach others, when they are all alike guilty, and concerned in the same facts." The managers for the Commons took this to be so great an aspersion on the honour of their House, that they thought themselves obliged in duty immediately to withdraw from the conference. And, after the return of their managers, the Commons resolved that John Lord Haversham had uttered most scandalous reproaches and false expressions highly reflecting upon the honour and justice of the House of Commons, and tending to the making a breach in the good correspondence between the Lords and Commons, and to the interrupting the public justice of the nation by delaying the proceedings on the impeachments: and they sent up Sir Christopher Musgrave to demand justice upon the offending lord, who, on his part, would not allow that his words had been "precisely taken." Then followed other messages and remonstrances. The Lords intimated their purpose of bringing on the trial of Lord Somers on the day they had fixed: the Commons refused to attend, and made an order that no member of their House should presume to appear at the place erected for the pretended trial of the Lord Somers, under pain of their utmost displeasure. On the day appointed the Lords adjourned to Westminster Hall, where proclamation was made, and the impeachment of Lord Somers read, as was also his reply. Then the proclamation says, "The great restrictions tugged to the limitation of the crown in the House of Hanover diminishes the value of it. However, I am glad the nation has done itself right in the first place, and likewise justice in this great family. . . . If your excellency thinks fit to write to her Electoral Highness on this occasion, I will take care to present it, &c." This hope of the English crown at once made the House of Hanover very zealous against the French. In the same letter Croiset says, "The said courts do all the service they can, being perfectly well intentioned. Five thousand men are already marched from hence towards Holland; and some other regiments are ordered to be in readiness. . . . But these poor princes cannot make brich without straw." Shortly after he lets us know that great court began to be paid to old Sophia, and that "the good old princess" was worn out by answering the letters of forward people almost unknown to her.—Letters quoted by Ralph. And indeed from this moment there was a sort of English court in Hanover, as well as at St. Germain.

* Mr. Croiset, in a letter to Lord Manchester, dated Zell, April 8, was read a second time, and the lord-keeper declared that the House was ready to hear evidence. No evidence was offered,—not a member of the Lower House appeared. The Lords, “after these formalities,” went back to their House, and declared that John Lord Somers was acquitted of the articles of impeachment against him exhibited by the House of Commons, and of all things therein contained, and that the said impeachment was dismissed. The next day the Commons ordered that the impeaching committee should inspect the Lords’ journals; that no member should presume to go out of town; and that all members should attend the service of the House on the Friday following (the 20th June). When that day came, they were informed by the Upper House that their lordships had appointed the 23d for the trial of the Earl of Orford. More angry messages followed, and the Commons voted that the Lords had refused justice to the Commons, upon the impeachment of Lord Somers, by denying them a committee of both Houses, which was desired by the Commons as the only method of settling the necessary preliminaries for proceeding to the trial with effect; and afterwards by proceeding to a pretended trial, which could tend only to protect the accused from justice by colour of an illegal acquittal, against which they solemnly protested, as repugnant to the rules of justice, and therefore null and void. And they further declared that the Lords, by the pretended trial, had endeavoured to overturn the right of impeachment lodged in the Commons by the ancient constitution, &c., and that all the ill consequences which might at this time attend the delay of the supplies necessary for preserving the public peace, and maintaining the balance of Europe, by supporting our allies against the power of France, were imputable to those who, to procure an indemnity for their enormous crimes, had used their utmost endeavours to make a breach between the two Houses. The Upper House replied, that the non-appearance of the Commons entitled Lord Somers to his full acquittal; that their Lordships could infer nothing from their still persisting in their demand for a committee of both Houses, which could never be granted, except that they never designed to bring any of their impeachments to trial; and that they should proceed with the case of the Earl of Orford on the day appointed. The Commons passed the same order as they had done with regard to Somers’s trial: no one appeared in Westminster Hall, and Lord Orford was acquitted. On the next day the Lords dismissed the charges against Portland and Halifax, and so put an end to this long and angry business. Then, recollecting the impeachment which had been brought by the Whigs against the Duke of Leeds in 1695, and which had neither been prosecuted nor discharged, they took the opportunity of dismissing it also.

On the 24th of June the Commons presented a liberal money bill, their Speaker telling his majesty how gladly they had complied with all his desires, having passed the Bill of Succession, with the bill for taking away those privileges which might have proved oppressive to his subjects; and having given his majesty such supplies as were more than ever were given in a time of peace, to enable his majesty when abroad to support his allies, procure a lasting peace, or preserve the liberties of Europe by a necessary war. William gave the royal assent to the several bills, and put an end to the session in a gracious speech. A week after the prorogation he left Hampton Court, and, attended by the Earls of Carlisle, Romney, Albemarle, M. Overquerque, and others, set sail for Holland, where he arrived on the 3rd of July. The battalions from Ireland and some new levies from England arrived in the Low Countries about the same time: some Scotch troops had been there many weeks; and, as he was accompanied by a battalion of his English guards, William had the appearance of being again at the head of an army. But his health, which had been severely tried by his recent vexations and crosses, was visibly giving way; and, when on the day after his arrival he took his seat in the assembly of the States General, his haggard appearance seemed to belie the sanguine hopes which he held out to his threatened countrymen. He told them that he always came with joy into his native country, but with more joy now than ever, because he foresaw that his presence would be necessary for its security. He had been in hopes to have passed the rest of his days in repose and peace, but such great alterations had taken place in the affairs of Europe, that men knew not how they might end. But, whether affairs should be accommodated, or whether they must take up arms again, he would still have the same zeal, the same devotedness to their interests, to the maintenance of their liberties and religion, and to the common cause of Europe. He assured them not only of his affection, but of that of the whole English nation,—who were ready to assist and strongly contribute towards their defence. In their reply the States did not forget to acknowledge their obligations to the English people, and they expressed their conviction that they might rely on their courage and valour, which had attained so high a character in the world. After his business in the States-General, William, as much as his health would permit, passed his time in reviewing the frontier garrisons of Holland; and, having visited Bergem-op-Zoom, Sluys, and other places, he returned to the Hague, there to learn that the empty form of negotiation was at an end, and that Louis had recalled his ambassador, d’Avaux.*

On the 7th of September a new treaty of alli-

* It appears that the States-General were deluded by d’Avaux’s professions of moderation, and that, for some time, William and Marlborough were the only persons there that saw clearly in what a vacuum the negotiations at the Hague would end. Even as late as the month of August William’s old friend and prime adviser, the Pensionary Heinsius, was persuaded that an arrangement might yet be effected, and expressed his hopes that Louis would give satisfaction to the emperor, &c., rather than incur the risk of a war.—Letter from Marlborough to Godolphin, as cited by Coxe, Life of Marlborough.

ance, styled "The Second Grand Alliance," was signed at the Hague. This treaty provided— 1. That there should be a perpetual and inviolable friendship between the emperor, the king of England, and the States-General of Holland. 2. That the allies could think nothing more effectual for establishing a general peace than the procuring satisfaction to the emperor for the Spanish succession, and sufficient securities for the dominions and trade of the allies. 3. That two months should be employed in endeavouring to obtain this satisfaction and security by amicable means. 4. That, failing these means, the allies would assist one another with all their force. 5. That the confederates would endeavour to recover the Spanish Netherlands, to be a barrier between Holland and France; as likewise the duchy of Milan, &c., for the emperor's security, and also the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, &c. 6. That the king of England and the States-General might seize what lands and cities they could belonging to the Spaniards in the Indies, and keep them. And in secondary articles it was provided that no party should treat of peace or truce separately, or without taking fitting security to prevent the union of France and Spain, and particularly the French possessing the Spanish Indies; that, at the making of a peace, care should be taken of the trade of the English and Dutch; and that after such peace there should remain a defensive alliance between the several contracting parties. All kings, princes, and states that pleased might enter into their alliance; and, as tempting money-bargains were made and other advantages offered by England and Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Holstein, and the Palatinate soon joined the confederacy. The emperor was so poor that he was forced to negotiate with Holland for 500,000 crowns, on the security of his quicksilver mines. His imperial majesty, however, engaged to furnish 66,000 foot, and 24,000 horse. William, on his part, agreed for 33,000 foot and 7000 horse; and the States-General for 32,000 foot and 20,000 horse.

But long before these forces were assembled, and even several weeks before the treaty was signed at the Hague, the war had begun on the side of Italy. As the active and able Prince Eugene, who continued in the emperor's service, had advanced to the passes of the Alps in the beginning of the summer, an attack was expected and prepared for by Marshal Catinat and the Duke of Savoy, who, with an army of French, Milanese, and Savoyards, posted themselves along the Adige, within the Mantuan territory. But Eugene, with 30,000 men, drove them from that position, forced their entrenchments at Carpi, and obliged them to retire behind the Mincio with considerable loss. Catinat and his Frenchmen had excited the vengeance of the Italian peasantry, who flew to such arms as they could procure, massacred their stragglers, and cut off their supplies. Prince Eugene, on the other hand, was favoured by the people, and had a free communication with Austria through the valley of the Adige and the Tyrol: and, after some brilliant manoeuvres, he drove Catinat and the duke to the line of the Oglio. Marshal Villeroy joined Catinat with fighting orders, and attacked Eugene and the imperialists in their lines; but he was repulsed with loss. No other battle took place, and at the approach of the rainy season the French retired to winter quarters between the Oglio and the Adda. Prince Eugene had, however, done great service to the emperor and to the cause of the allies: the French reputation was lowered in Italy, the Swiss cantons were prevented from closing with the tempting offers made by Louis, and the German princes, who had feared the superiority of France, began to view the matter from a different point. The associated circles, which had been induced to declare for a neutrality, recovered spirit enough to interpret their own act in their own way, and they allowed of the march of troops to the Rhine, in spite of the remonstrances and threats of French envoys. Nor did the petty German states stop here; soon intimating that they were ready for the most part to accept of subsidies from England and Holland.

While these mixed events were passing, the dethroned King James was getting fast out of the reach of their effects, and the rumours of them. The penances and mortifications to which he subjected himself hastened his end, and he had been dying all this summer.* On Friday, the 2nd of September, a few days before the conclusion of the grand alliance, he was seized with a fainting fit in the chapel of the palace of St. Germain. He was pretty well the next day, but on Sunday he fell into another fit, and lay for some time without life or motion, till his mouth being forced open, he vomited a great quantity of blood. He had confessed himself just before he fell into this fit, but as soon as he recovered sense enough he sent for his confessor again, called for the eucharist, and

* According to Father Innes, or whatever other priest it was that wrote this part of the memoir of his life, James, like the royal prophet David, having his sins continually before his eyes, thought of nothing but how to appease God's justice, and to gain a crown secure from usurpation. "This, indeed, had been (I may say) his sole employment since his return from Ireland—for though the correspondence he kept up, and attempts he made, showed he did not neglect the business of his restoration, yet they proving so many disappointments and additional mortifications, as they threw him still back more and more in reference to this world, they advanced him in that happy career which led him to the felicity of the next; and, finding so much benefit in order to this by his first journey to La Trappe, he returned thither ever every year till that day before he died. The effect those visits had upon him cannot be better expressed than by his own relation:—"At first it was partly curiosity and a desire to see whether the discourses I had heard and the relations I had read whilst I was in England, of that holy place, came up to my expectation, and whether the abbot who began that reform deserved all the commendations that were given him. An old friend of mine, the Marshal de Belford, carried me thither, for which, as long as he lived, I gave him many thanks, and by degrees found myself (as I thought) improved: for, till I had been there some time, and had made a kind of retreat for three or four days at a time (which I have continued to do at least once a year since my coming from Ireland), I found not that change which was necessary in myself: it gave me a true sense of the vanity of all worldly greatness, and that nothing was to be coveted but the love of God, and to endeavour to live up to his law, and to mortify one's self by all lawful means, and to be sensible (at least such a miserable creature as I, that have lived so many years almost in a continual course of sin, till God, out of his infinite mercy, called me by his chastisement to him) how necessary it is to continue visiting such a holy place to gain strength, who have so much need of it."

requested that care should be taken that he wanted none of the rites of the Catholic church. Then, sending for the young Prince of Wales, he conjured him to adhere firmly to the Catholic faith, let the consequence be what it might, to be faithful to his God, respectful and obedient to his mother, and ever grateful to the King of France, to whom they owed so many obligations. He blessed the boy, dismissed him, and called for the little princess. "He was not content with having spoke to his children: he made a sort of short exhortation to almost every one about him, with the greatest fervour and piety imaginable, but particularly to my Lord Middleton and his other Protestant servants, whom he persuaded to embrace the Catholic faith." As soon as the sacrament was brought, he cried out, "The happy day is come at last." The curate, who was to administer the viaticum, asked him if he believed the real and substantial presence of our Saviour's body in the sacrament; and he said "Yes, I believe it—I believe it with my whole heart." When all the offices for the dying were performed, he declared to the confessor that he forgave all his enemies, calling upon him to take particular notice that he forgave with all his heart the emperor, the Prince of Orange, and the Princess Anne, his daughter. On the morrow Louis went to visit his dying guest. James seemed to rally on the Wednesday; and on the next Sunday the French king paid him a second visit. But on the Monday he fell into a dizziness, and all hopes of recovery vanished away. He again called for the sacrament, and again forgave his enemies by name. On Tuesday, the 13th of September, Louis went for a third time to his bedside; and then, it is said, that the apartment being full of people, his most Christian majesty declared that he would take his family into his protection, and would treat his son, the Prince of Wales, in the same manner as he had treated him, and acknowledge him as king of England.* It is added that Louis shed tears as he departed from this mournful scene, and that, calling the officer of the guard that waited upon James, he gave him directions to follow and attend the Prince of Wales, as soon as the king was dead, and to show him the same respect and honours he had done to the king his father. James lingered till the following Friday, the 16th of September, and then expired, in the 67th year of his age.† His body lay exposed four-and-twenty hours in the midst of priests and monks, who sang the office for the dead all the night through, and in the morning celebrated masses at two altars erected in the room. Ac-

ording to the memoir of his life, he had ordered that his body should be buried in the church of the parish where he should chance to die; that his funeral should be unexpensive like that of a private gentleman, and that his only monument should be a bare stone with the words, "Here lies King James:" but his most Christian majesty said that this was the only thing he could not grant; and so he was embalmed, as royal personages are; and, part of his bowels being carried to the parish church of St. Germain, the rest were sent to the English college at St. Omer, and the brains and fleshy part of the head to the Scotch College at Paris, where, at the charge of the Duke of Perth, "was erected a fair monument, as a due acknowledgment of their sense of being honoured with those precious relics." They left his heart in the convent of Chaliot, the ruins of which place were his most favourite associates after the monks of La Trappe. The body was deposited in the church of the English Benedictine monks in Paris, there to remain "till it should please God to dispose the people of England to repair, in some measure, the injuries they did him in his life, by the honours they should think fit to show him after his death." With a little varnish this bad king made a tolerably good saint. At the time of his last sickness and death William was at Lou, sickly and feeble himself, and actually apprehending another attempt on his life by one Boselli, an Italian, "infamous for many ruffian-like exploits," who, after being long confined in the Bastille, was liberated at this critical moment, or permitted to escape. Great pains were taken to circulate a report, said to be grounded on a consultation of physicians, that William could not survive more than a month. In the eyes of Louis his single life was of more importance than armies and confederacies; and it was an axiom of the French court that, this troublesome prince once out of the way, the grand monarque might have his will in Europe. It should appear that his Tory ministry had had a pernicious effect upon William's health and spirits. The blatant, drinking, and red-hot Earl of Rochester, who had in a manner deflected and bullied the whole cabinet, was particularly offensive to him, and he was afterwards heard to declare that the most uneasy part of his life was the year in which that nobleman had been in the ascendancy. He still consulted Sunderland, who was wise enough to remain in his quiet retreat at Althorp, watching the course of events, and feeling anxious only about those things which might benefit or injure himself personally. His wife, Lady Sunderland, had contracted a romantic kind of friendship with the imperious but fascinating Lady Marlborough; and in the preceding month of January his eldest son, Lord Spencer, had married Lady Anne Churchill, Marlborough's second daughter, upon whose progeny the ducal title eventually devolved. Although William had reinstated that fortunate soldier, he still distrusted him; but Marlborough had of late rendered good services in the House of Lords, and

* Lord Manchester, in a letter to Vernon, thus describes what happened upon James's death:—"The Prince of Wales was immediately proclaimed king of England, by the title of James III. I do not hear there was any other ceremony than that, after he had taken the title of king, those of St. Germain kissed his hand, and treated him with majesty: after that, the French complimented him, and did the like. What was done in the town was in a tumultuous manner, by crying 'Long live James III.!' &c.—Cole MSS.

† The memoir adds, that it was about three in the afternoon when he "rendered his pious soul into the hands of his Redeemer; the day of the week and hour wherein our Saviour died, and on which he always practised a particular devotion to obtain a happy death."

through these and the good offices of Sunderland and others, the king overcame his repugnance, and not only entrusted him with the command of the English forces now in the Netherlands, but also employed him as his chief negotiator with foreign powers.* Marlborough had accompanied him abroad, and, though he still professed himself a Tory, lost no opportunity of abusing his party for not going more energetically into the war. In the month of September William wrote from Loo to Lord Sunderland, earnestly desiring to know from him in what condition things were in England, what people said, and what advice his lordship would give. He told him also that he feared that, if he should quit the Tories he then employed, and the Whigs should not be able to serve him, he should have no resource left. Writing in the third person, William says—and these passages with many others prove his high notion of Sunderland's sagacity and thorough knowledge of parties—"This inclines him to try again what the present ministers and their party will do, with a resolution to change upon the first occasion they shall give. He is undetermined whether he shall call a new parliament; the Tories giving him great hopes and making him great promises. He is advised to offer an act of grace at the meeting of the parliament, as a means of reconciling matters. Upon the whole, he earnestly desires you will give your opinion, and as soon as possible."† Sunderland's answer was remarkable: there was a point and a cutting sarcasm in nearly every word of it. "Everything here," said he, "is much as when you left England; only the ministry grows more hated every day, and more exposed.‡ . . . It is said the king is persuaded still to try the same party and the same ministers; because, if he changes and fails, there will be no resource; which is as much as to say, continue in the hands of your enemies, for, if they do not save you, you may return to your friends, who will; which is a sort of reason which ought not to be answered, but hissed." He then proceeded to give his notion of the disinterestedness of the Tories in general. "If the king employs the Whigs, and they cannot or will not help him, he may always be welcome to the others, whenever he will alter the lieutenancy of London, break the ecclesiastical commission,* and that party in the House of Lords who last session declared themselves against France; and, in short, give up the whole power to them." Continuing to turn the edge of his blade upon the party in power, he says, with a boldness and freedom which should seem hardly to belong to his character, and which would not have been tolerated by any other king:—"Another dangerous opinion the king is led into by flims and lies, that, if those he now depends on do not act as they promise, he can try new measures in the middle of a session, which is impossible; and that he must know, if he pleases to reflect. He will be wheedled, and complimented, and cheated; and at the latter end ruined. Can he forget how the Tories agreed to the ten thousand men, and the address to enter into alliances with the emperor? Was it not because it would have been done without them, and that they were frightened out of their wits, and to oblige him to thank them at last, that they might go into the country with safety? Are not their promises on the same account, and because they dread a new parliament? Can he forget the pains that were taken, after the King of Spain's death, to persuade the world that all was well, and nothing would be so fatal as a war? What a fine speech was made for him at the opening of the parliament, four months after the King of Spain died, and a fortnight after the French were actually possessed of Flanders? Or that, during the session, the ministers told him, every day, they nor their party never would come into a war, of which mind they are so much now, that yet they continue to say it will undo us? And if they are any ways forced into it, it will be with a design of raising money, which shall both be insufficient and laid so as to be the most uneasy to the people that is possible. But to what purpose is it so much as to think of anything of this kind, when, after a thirteen years' experience, the king will not judge right of things he knows, but will be undone infallibly by believing himself more cunning than a whole party, by whom he is beset, and who wheedle him every day, and of which, in his whole reign, he never yet could gain any one man? The king ought to consider that, most luckily for him, the whole moderate church party, who are not Jacobites, are joined with the Whigs; but he will be deceived if he reckons they will help to establish this ministry, which they think would ruin England, and hang them."‡ He next proceeds to treat about the offer of an act of grace, and to show the implacable animosities of the two great factions. As to the act of indemnity to be offered at the first meeting of the parliament, he

* According to Marlborough's biographer, "William's motives for this choice were laudably disinterested and patriotic. Sensible of his own approaching dissolution, foreseeing the inevitable necessity of a continental war, and anxious for the maintenance of that system which it had been the labour and boast of his life to uphold, he was desirous that the political and military powers should be transferred to one who, with abilities equal to the emergency, might possess the confidence of the country and the good will of his successor. In no one were these requisites united except in Marlborough. Accordingly William selected him to command the forces in the Netherlands, and to negotiate the treaties which were to be formed with foreign powers, for the renewal of the grand alliance. This choice, as judicious in itself as it was honourable to his feelings, was almost his last act before he quitted England, to organize the most formidable confederacy which had yet been marshalled against France."—Case, Life of Marlborough.

‡ "But," says the old fox, "since you desire to know the thoughts of people here, you shall; though what is said or writ of this kind is seldom kept secret, which is so unpleasant, that if any word of this paper should be trusted to any person whatsoever, except and here is for ever and end of this and all the like commences." No doubt we might fill up ends of these blanks with the name of Marlborough.

* This was a commission first granted after the death of the queen, and renewed in 1706, appointing the two archbishops and four other bishops to recommend persons to vacant bishoprics and all other church benefices in the gift of the crown, and authorising them, during the king's absence beyond sea, actually to fill up all such benefices that were under the value of 140*l.* per annum. This mode of administering the patronage of the church was loudly exclaimed against by the high church party and the Tories.

says that it might do well, though neither party will like it: "for the Tories will not be satisfied without ruining my Lord Somers, nor the Whigs without undoing the Tory ministers; in which the latter (the Whigs) think they have the whole nation on their side." He then replies distinctly to the query, What can the king do? "For example; let him come into England as soon as he can, and immediately send for my Lord Somers. He is the life, the soul, and spirit of his party, and can answer for it; not like the present ministers, who have no credit with theirs, any further than they can persuade the king to be undone. When his majesty speaks to my Lord Somers, he ought to do it openly and freely; and ask him plainly what he and his friends can do and will do, and what they expect, and the methods they would propose. By this the king will come to make a judgment of his affairs; and he may be sure that my Lord Somers will desire nothing for himself or any of the impeached lords, but will take as much care not to perplex the king's business as can be desired; and if he can do nothing his majesty shall like, he will remain still zealous and affectionate to his person and government. This is thought to be the best way the king can take, and perhaps the only means of being able to resolve with reason. It should be considered that, by the present ministry, the Tories have infinitely lost their credit, and the others have in proportion gained. It is a melancholy thing that the king, who has more understanding than anybody who comes near him, is imposed on by mountebanks, or by such as he himself knows hate both his person and his government." This letter was written on the 11th of September. On the 15th Sunderland enclosed it, or a copy of it, to Lord Somers, to whom he says,—“Among all the pamphlets which have come out (the press was wonderfully active, and Defoe was feeding it with his industry and genius) there ought to have been one to have particularly explained the proceedings of the present ministry; the breaking the last parliament; the late meeting of this; the care which was taken by them and their friends, upon the death of the King of Spain, to persuade the world that all was well, and that a war would undo us; as also how, by this management, the French possessed themselves of Flanders before the meeting of the parliament, which was thought of so little importance to England as not to be worth mentioning in the king's speech; all which disheartened so much our allies abroad, that the King of Portugal, despairing, made a treaty with France;* and many princes besides thought it best to be neuter. The late meeting of the parliament made it impracticable for England to be of any use abroad this year either by sea or land.”† Somers, who must have had the same high opinion of Sunderland's abilities as the king entertained, was politician enough to help himself and his party by striking up a sudden friendship with that dark riddle of a man. He approved of Sunderland's reply to the king, thinking it “to be written with all the good sense and good meaning possible;” and liking “every word in it but what related to himself.” “What is said of him and Somerset,” he observes, also speaking in the third person, “does not belong to him, nor can he perform that which seems to be expected from him. The king and the sender of the packet both know he never could nor would be a leader; and, having declared under whom he has listed himself (that is, under Sunderland), he hopes the part assigned him will be such as may be practicable by one of his natural temper, and in his present circumstances.”‡ The Whig ex-chancellor proceeds to urge still more strongly, that not he, but Sunderland, is the only man to make a proper ministry; or that, “under the king's present resolution, there is but one man living can determine him to take vigorous measures, and, considering who arc about him, the same person only can keep him steady.” “This is as certain,” adds Somers, “as anything in nature; so that, whatsoever is attempted, unless that person (Sunderland) does actually take a part, will infallibly prove insignificant. This he does not say to decline anything of which he is capable; but upon the deliberate weighing of the whole matter, and not without some regard to the particular interest of the person himself, for which he will always be sincerely concerned. If the present parliament be to continue, he thinks that person would be in the wrong to appear; but he is of a quite different sentiment if it should be resolved to have another. He knows there is a very general good disposition in the Whigs to unite in that person, which, he says, would have appeared in a very evident manner before this time, if he himself (Somers) had not been tied up so very strictly as he was from letting the good designs of that person be more understood.”† The ex-chancellor then seizes hold of two great events. “By the letter and answer he thinks the news was come to neither of the parties (William and Sunderland) of the two great incidents; that of the edict about

* Somers adds, speaking still of himself.—“He knows the king's humour well enough to be sensible to little anything said to him will signify, if it be but possible for him to think the person who speaks may have somewhat of his own interest in view; and he appears whether, in the condition he is now taken to stand, anything material can be said upon which such a construction may not be put? He does not say this to decline waiting on his majesty if it be thought necessary; and, in that case, will certainly speak his opinion clearly. But if that be the measure to be taken, he then depends upon receiving another letter, wherein the particulars of what is to be said be somewhat explained; he not only desiring, but insisting upon it, that he may be certain he says nothing at such a conference without the full concurrence of the person (i. e. Sunderland) by whose measures he has resolved to act.”

† Here he subjoins.—“He leaves it to that person to judge whether this conduct be perfectly right; because, at the same time the thing is made a mystery to friends who ought not to be ignorant, the enemies do positively take it for granted, and intend as maliciously to him as is possible. It is fit the person should be informed of this matter of fact, which may be depended upon to be certainly true. This being the case, if another parliament come to be resolved upon, why should not that person come to town as others do, since the same construction will certainly be made in the one case as in the other? This matter is entirely submitted to the person's own judgment; but he asks leave to say that, without this, in the present juncture, nothing can be brought to pass effectually for the good of England.”

the trade of England,* and that of the death of King James and the acknowledging the Prince of Wales. He thinks these things cannot but have considerable effect both with the king and others here. The association is in a manner at an end (meaning the association entered into by parliament and the nation on the discovery of Barclay's murderous plot); the renewing that, or the carrying it yet further, may perhaps be practicable." In his reply, dated the 1st of October, Sunderland pledges himself to quit his retirement and come up to town, if there should be a new parliament. "The king," he says, "was certainly engaged thoroughly in the true interests of England. . . . The great care ought to be, not to insist on things that are not absolutely necessary, but to make him find as much ease as may be." He very ardently embraces Somers's project about the association, and suggests that "perhaps it might best be begun in the House of Lords." On the 3rd of October Somers writes to the fox at Althorp:—"The great point is, a new parliament or not. One sort of men say that it is determined in the negative. If so, there is little room for deliberation." Sunderland had hinted that he knew the king would talk freely with his Whig ex-chancellor. To this Somers replied, "Upon supposition that the king will talk freely with a certain person, he very earnestly renews his request that he may be instructed what arguments will be most proper, and likely to be most effectual, and what is to be offered as a practical foundation." (Such was the deference, at this crisis, paid by this great Whig to that great non-descript.) On the 10th of October William sent a note from Loo to tell Lord Somers that he had charged Lord Galway (the Huguenot Rouvigny) to speak to him on his part "avec beaucoup de franchise." On the 21st Sunderland informed Somers that the king was resolved, "to discourse fully and plainly, with all the good inclinations possible, and knows that the two friends (himself and Somers) are of a mind in every particular." And then the ex-chancellor set down his "heads of arguments to induce the king to call a new parliament." Many of these heads were full of meaning.† For example, the parliament actually sitting was described as unmanageable and unworthy of trust, as appeared from the facts following, and others:—"1. Their inclination against the war has appeared to demonstration; and, though they say now it is unavoidable, their opinion is against it. 2. Great numbers are engaged for the Prince of Wales. 3. They had delayed so long in completing the supplics that it was no less than a miracle that all was not lost. . . . 6. Their inclination being manifestly against the king, if they comply it is but the effect of fear. . . . 9. The Whigs would look upon themselves as utterly abandoned, if neither the king's visible interests nor the manifest sense of the nation could induce him to give them quarter by hurrying to a dissolution. 10. Friends abroad would despair. . . . 12. The Whigs would leave him entirely to his own scheme on the plan of a new parliament, &c. 13. But to set himself and his people at ease, he must trust those whom the body of the people did not distrust." And, after all this, Somers urged that to trust the present Tory cabinet was to put the fate of Europe in their hands; but neither their will nor their power could be depended on—certainly not their will if he considered how their party was composed, for without the professed Jacobites they were nothing. "And will the king," he continued, "trust to a majority made up of Jacobites to make effectual provisions against France and the Prince of Wales?—Will he believe the Tories will quit them, and show themselves to be no considerable party; or will he depend upon the affections of the Whigs to assist them (the Tories in power) to establish a ministry which has no mercy or justice?—Will the king go upon an uncertainty when he need not?"

But William had made up his mind to go upon no such uncertainty; and when he landed from Holland on the 4th of November, he was confirmed in his resolution by the state of the public feeling, and by the ferment which he saw men's minds were in at Louis's prohibitory edict, and recognition of the pretender. On the 11th, he dissolved the old parliament, and called a new one to meet on the 31st of December. While the elections for the new parliament were going on, and while the two factions were exerting themselves to the utmost, Sunderland sent another letter of advice to Somers. "The king and the Whigs," says he, "will have the majority, if the king will. It is probable that the elections will be good, and that the Whigs will be considerably the stronger; yet nothing is to be neglected to arrive at it. The king being engaged, it is necessary that he follow the advice of the Whigs, and fortify them with all his power, as far as common justice and the law will allow. There is nothing more dangerous than to let either party think the king is wavering; but it is better the Whigs should fear, than that the Tories should hope; because it makes them bolder and more diligent to hurt. This has been the cause of the greatest part of the difficulties he has found during his reign. The encouragement he gives them, even in his closet, is prejudicial, and becomes presently public. By the same reason the king ought never to endeavour to gain any Tory. He is a judge, if he has ever succeeded in thirteen years. He would do well to propose nothing of

* Lord Manchester, in a dispatch from Paris dated the 16th of September, or four days before Somers wrote this letter, says,— "There is now in the press an edict to prohibit all trade with England; but, that this may not look like a declaration of war, they do permit the bringing in of beer, cider, glass bottles, and wool. Notice is already sent to all the sea-ports; and, after the 1st of November next, no person is to wear any of the manufacture of England under severe penalties." And the edict was published on the very next day.

† The first of all the heads are the following:—"The present ferment and disposition of the nation. 1st. Art of governing in England, in watching and using such opportunities. 2nd. These opportunities do not last. 3rd. Neglect of making use of them always must turn to disadvantage: 1st, by disobliging the zealous; 2nd, encouraging the ill-meaning; 3rd, creating jealousies of the king and his measures. 4th. The like opportunities not to be had again, there being no like occasion in view."

this to my Lord Ranelagh, Coningby, or Godolphin; at the same time he ought not to shut the door against the Tories, but to recommend those he will serve well, after the service done.* There is nothing more necessary than to observe a good method during the holding of a parliament, and to foresee events, so as not to be surprised, and to be in a condition to remedy them. The king and Lord Somers know the order which was observed in 1696, which had good success; the same method is to be pursued, and will succeed; many depend immediately on the king; a hint ought to be given him, that he may speak to them, and let them know his intentions, and receive no excuse. The Tories are better speakers than the Whigs in the House of Commons; therefore, in the beginning, the Whigs ought to have some remarkable advantage, which may give them that superiority which may help them to conduct the affairs during the rest of the session. The nomination of a speaker, though it be very important, will not be sufficient." He then alludes to the quarrel between the two Houses on the subject of the impeached lords, and he recommends an act of grace which will put an end to this in an instant. He says that, if the quarrel is allowed to go on, although the Whigs may have the majority at starting, the Tories will recover it in a fortnight.† This act of grace being passed, an abjuration ought to be proposed of the Prince of Wales: and this latter motion, he thinks, ought to commence in the House of Commons. One or two of the things he recommends have since passed into unvarying usage. "As soon," he says, "as the speaker is named, endeavours should be made to thank the king for his speech." And he adds, "It would be well for the king to give order to two of the cabinet to prepare the speech, as the Duke of Devonshire and Secretary Vernon, and bid them consult in private Lord Somers, rather than to bring to the cabinet a speech already made."‡ In the end, he points out the persons

* Here Sunderland adds—"The king will also do well to make use of those who are very capable of employment, provided they be not those who have distinguished themselves in parliament against him. He would also do well to tell the Tories openly, that he has called a new parliament, by reason of the ill-treatment he had from them during the last session. He may mention particulars which are too long to be inserted here."

† There being an appearance of such a division between the two Houses in such a juncture, it not only becomes the king, but it is in some measure his duty to stop the consequences; nothing being more indecent than to let his subjects come to extremities, when he can hinder it. It is certain he ought to prevent these divisions and animosities. If another way be found more sure, more ready, and more expedient than an act of grace, it ought to be followed. If this be thought proper, this act ought to be sent to the House of Lords, after the speaker is chosen in the House of Commons. It ought to be full, and extended as far as possible, excepting those who have misemployed the king's money, and those who have served, and been with King James since the abdication; taking care, if they who may be accused to serve King James in England be not excluded, that it ought to be understood that the act of grace is not to shelter them, but to put an end to the differences between the two Houses.

‡ "This speech," he says, "ought to give an account of the reasons of dissolving the last parliament, which are two; the addresses, as they are mentioned in the proclamation; but, above all, on account of the division of the two Houses at the end of the last session, and to exhort them not to continue in such divisions; and the king will consider of ways to stop them. It would also be proper to speak, in passing, of the dangerous consequences to have a parliament meet last year, four months after the death of the King of Spain, which, added to the inevitable delays occasioned by the differences between the two Houses, rendered the last session useless to the public good:

whom he thinks proper to form a good Whig ministry; and he suggests that none be of the cabinet council except those "who have, in some sort, a right to enter there by their employment"—such as the Archbishop of Canterbury, the lord keeper, the lord president, the lord privy seal, the lord steward, the lord chamberlain, the first commissioner of the treasury, the two secretaries of state, and the lord-lieutenant of Ireland when in England. "If the king would have more, it ought to be the first commissioner of the admiralty, and the master of the ordnance. If these two are excluded, no one can take it ill if he be not admitted. They may be summoned, when anything relating to their charge is debated." And at the end of all he adds these significant words, which tend to prove William's frequent neglect and distrust of his cabinet:—"It would be much for the king's service, if he brought his affairs to be debated at that council."

It should appear that Sunderland was still pressed and importuned to take office. In a letter, written in cipher, to Lord Galway, he earnestly desires his lordship, Somers, and all his friends not to think of him, but to act as if he were not in the world. "If he were worth having," says he, speaking of himself as number 33, "I would say there is no way but to forget him, which was desired so often, as you know, at the beginning. After all the clatter that has been made, if he should just now engage in business, it would be pretending to miracles, which he is very unfit for. Every letter that 33 receives, to persuade him that he is necessary, contributes to the fixing him here; for he is no way capable of answering those expectations of furthering what is fit, and hindering what is not. If there had been less hustle made about him, as was earnestly desired, he would have been ready to have complied by this time, but while he is to be stared upon, he cannot engage."* And in another letter, which is dated the 27th of December, only three days before the meeting of parliament, and addressed to Somers, he continues in the same coy humour, and says, with his usual point—"Your friend is convinced that what was designed cannot be done in the House of Lords, and therefore it may be no more thought of. He is very sorry to be pressed to what he cannot do; for he is very incapable of answering people's expectations, and does earnestly desire, that you and your friends may not think of him. For nothing, but being let alone for some time, can make it possible for him to be persuaded to stir."

therefore the king recommends to this parliament to dispatch the public affairs, and to think of nothing else till they have entirely concluded. He ought also to recommend the payment of the debts, to the end to ascertain and re-establish credit. To consider also what is proper to be said for maintaining the Protestant religion, as well at home as abroad."

* He adds, "12 (that is, the king) has a plain way to follow, and cannot fail if he pleases; and yet he will not do those things which his own judgment leads him to. . . . When 12 has put his affairs into some order, 33 may be perhaps of some use, and as soon as that is he will desire to be sent for as much as he now desires to be forgot." — Burdwick's State Papers.

On the very day on which this letter was written, Charles Howard, Earl of Carlisle, was substituted for Lord Godolphin, as first lord of the treasury. A few days after (on the 4th of January), Charles Montague, Earl of Manchester, late ambassador at Paris, was made secretary of state, in the room of Sir Charles Hedges; and on the 18th of the same month, the Earl of Pembroke, "long Tom," having been transferred from the presidency of the council, and made lord-high-admiral, Charles Seymour, Duke of Somerset, was appointed to succeed him in the presidency. Some time before these important changes, the honourable Henry Boyle, afterwards Earl of Carleton, had been made chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of Mr. Smith; and the privy seal, on the death of the Earl of Tankerville, had been put in commission. These members of the new cabinet, were all or principally the personal friends of the king.* The new parliament assembled, as appointed, on the 30th day of December. The returns proved that, if Sunderland and Somers were not quite borne out in their anticipations of a Whig majority, yet a great change in public feeling had taken place. Although many Tories were sent up from the smaller boroughs, the Whigs had carried most of the counties and great towns. Yet the Tories were strong enough to re-elect Harley to the speakership, by a majority of fourteen over Littleton. Henry St. John, better known as Lord Bolingbroke, who had recently begun his political career as member for Wootton Bassett, seconded the nomination of Harley. The speaker having been presented to the throne, his majesty opened the session with a speech unusually long, and unusually eloquent, which was drawn up by Lord Somers. "I promise myself," said William "that you are met together full of that just sense of the common danger of Europe, and that resentment of the late proceeding of the French king, which has been so fully and universally expressed in the loyal and reasonable addresses of my people. The owning and setting up the pretended Prince of Wales for king of England is not only the highest indignity offered to me and the whole nation, but does so nearly concern every man who has a regard for the Protestant religion, or the present and future quiet and happiness of his country, that I need not press you to lay it seriously to heart, and to consider what further effectual means may be used for securing the succession of the crown in the Protestant line, and extinguishing the hopes of all pretenders, and their open or secret abettors. By the French king's placing his grandson on the throne of Spain, he is in a condition to oppress the rest of Europe, unless speedy and effectual measures be taken: under this pretence, he is become the real master of the whole Spanish monarchy; he has made it to be entirely depending on France, and disposes of it as of his own dominions; and by that means he has surrounded his neighbours in such a manner, that, though the name of peace may be said to continue, yet they are put to the expense and inconveniences of war. This must affect England in the nearest and most sensible manner, in respect to our trade, which will soon become precarious in all the variable branches of it; in respect to our peace and safety at home, which we cannot hope should long continue; and in respect to that part which England ought to take in the preservation of the liberty of Europe." He then told them that, to obviate this general calamity, he had concluded several alliances according to the encouragement given him by both Houses of parliament; and that there were some other treaties still depending. And he then put the importance of their assembly in the strongest light. "It is fit I should tell you," said he, "the eyes of all Europe are upon this parliament; all matters are at a stand, till your resolutions are known: therefore, no time ought to be lost; you have yet an opportunity, by God's blessing, to secure to you and your posterity the quiet enjoyment of your religion and liberties, if you are not wanting to yourselves, but will exert the ancient vigour of the English nation; but I tell you plainly, my opinion is, if you do not lay hold on this occasion, you have no reason to hope for another. . . . Gentlemen of the House of Commons, I do recommend these matters to you with that concern and earnestness which their importance requires. At the same time, I cannot but press you to take care of the public credit, which cannot be preserved but by keeping sacred that maxim that they shall never be losers who trust to a parliamentary security. It is always with regret when I do ask aids of my people; but you will observe that I desire nothing which relates to any personal expense of mine: I am only pressing you to do all you can for your own safety and honour, at so critical and dangerous a time; and am willing that what is given, shall be wholly appropriated to the purposes for which it is intended.* . . . My Lords and Gentlemen, I hope you are come together determined to avoid all manner of disputes and differences, and resolved to act with a general and a hearty concurrence for promoting the common cause, which alone can make this a happy session. I should think it as great a blessing as could befall England, if I could observe you as much inclined to lay aside those unhappy fatal

* These appointments were not entirely those which had been recommended by Sunderland; but it is to be observed, that in his original letter the names he proposes are marked in initials, and that Lord Hardwicke filled them up according to his best conjectures. According to his lordship's editorial filling up, Sunderland proposed that the king should make the Duke of Somerset chamberlain; Lord Carlisle first commissioner of the Treasury; Lord Wharton secretary, in lieu of Hedges, who, at all events, was to be removed; Lord Jersey first commissioner of the Admiralty; and Mr. Smith commissioner of the Treasury, in the place of Mr. Hill, "who might have a pretence or a denary."

* And here he added—"And, since I am speaking on this head, I think it proper to put you in mind that, during the late war, I ordered the accounts to be laid yearly before the parliament, and also gave my assent to several bills for taking the public accounts, that my subjects might have satisfaction how the money given for the war was applied; and I am willing that matters may be put in any further way of examination; that it may appear, whether there were any misapplications and mismanagements; or whether the debt that remains upon us has really arisen from the shortness of the supplies, or the delinquency of the funds."

animosities which divide and weaken you, as I am disposed to make all my subjects safe and easy as to any even the highest offences committed against me. Let me conjure you to disappoint the only hopes of our enemies, by your unanimity: I have shown, and will always show, how desirous I am to be the common father of all my people; do you, in like manner, lay aside parties and divisions; let there be no other distinction heard of among us for the future, but of those who are for the Protestant religion and the present establishment, and of those who mean a Popish prince and a French government. I will only add this; if you do, in good earnest, desire to see England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the Protestant interest, it will appear by your right improving the present opportunity."

A.D. 1702. The effect produced by this speech, which was soon translated and spread through every country in Europe, was prodigious; the voice of dissent was silenced, every Tory apprehending that he might be made to pass for a thorough non-compounding Jacobite, a Papist, and a partisan of France. The Lords, with unusual haste, waited upon his majesty the very next day, the first of January, with a most loyal and earnest address, in which they echoed his just resentment, as to the late proceedings of the French king in owning and setting up the pretended Prince of Wales for king of England; "and," said their Lordships, "that no enemies to our religion and country may ever hope to prosper in their attempts against us, when, to our great unhappiness, it shall please God to deprive us of your majesty's protection, we do further declare our resolution, to assist and defend to the utmost of our power, against the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other pretenders whatsoever, every person and persons who have a right to succeed to the crown of these realms, by virtue of the acts of Parliament settling the succession." The Commons did not present their address till the 5th, but on that day it was presented by the whole House, and was as earnest as that of the Lords, and still more explicit; for they assured his majesty that they would, to the utmost of their power, enable him to make good all such alliances as he had made, or might hereafter make, pursuant to the addresses and advice of the Commons of the last parliament, &c. But, reminded by the court party, and by the king himself, of their omissions, the Lords carried up a second address, wherein, adopting the great sentiment of the new confederacy against Louis, they declared that England and her allies could never be safe and secure, till the House of Austria should be restored to its rights, and the invader of the Spanish monarchy brought to reason. And in conclusion, referring also to their addresses in the last session, they approved of all the alliances which had been contracted, and pledged themselves that no time should be lost, nor anything wanting on their parts, to give weight and effect to the said treaties, "not doubting but to support the reputation of the English name, when engaged, under so great a prince, in the glorious cause of maintaining the liberty of Europe."

On the 6th of January Secretary Vernon laid before both Houses copies of—1. The treaty with the King of Denmark and the States-General. 2. The secret articles of that new treaty. 3. The treaty with the emperor and the States-General. 4. The convention between his majesty King William, the King of Sweden, and the States-General. 5. The last treaty of all between his majesty and the States-General, signed in the preceding month of November. These documents contained all the diplomacy of the grand alliance, with a pretty clear intimation of the probable cost to England, and of the mercenary motives of some of the contracting powers. But the Commons raised not a single objection to any of the treaties; and on the 10th they resolved unanimously, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to take care that it be an article in the several treaties of alliance, that no peace should be made with France until his majesty and the nation have reparation for the great indignity offered by the French king, in owning and declaring the pretended Prince of Wales king of England." The vote of supply was also unanimous; and the first step taken upon it was, to authorise the exchequer to borrow 600,000*l.*, at six per cent., for the services of the navy; and 50,000*l.* for guards and garrisons. They readily agreed to the quota or contingent which the king was bound to furnish for the war, and which had been fixed at 33,000 foot and 7000 horse; they recognised the contracts made with the foreign mercenaries, subsidised troops, allowed that 10,000 more should be added to the 11,600 already engaged, and that 8300 of his majesty's natural-born subjects should be sent to join the 10,000 already gathered or gathering in Holland. They also granted 350,000*l.* for the maintenance of guards and garrisons, including 5000 men to serve on board the fleet. And they voted that the navy should be raised to 40,000 seamen, and that his majesty's allies should be invited to embark a certain proportion of troops in the English ships of war. As ways and means for the heavy outlays to be hereby incurred, they passed a land and income tax of 4*s.* in the pound, to be levied upon all lands, annuities, pensions, and stipends; as also on the profits arising professionally to lawyers, doctors, surgeons, teachers of separate congregations, brokers, factors, &c.; then a tax of 2½ per cent. on all stock in trade and money out at interest; and 5*s.* in the pound on all salaries, fees, and perquisites; next a capitation tax of 4*s.* in the year to be paid by all persons not receiving alms, or exempted because of their poverty from parish dues, or being under age, or menial servants, or day-labourers; next one per cent. upon all shares in the capital stock of any corporation or company, which should be bought, sold, or bargained for; and, lastly, a malt-tax of

6d. the bushel. On the 2nd of January that bill of attainder against the Prince of Wales which had been recommended by Sunderland was brought in; and on the 15th it was passed, nemine contradicente, and sent up to the Lords. On the 23rd their Lordships returned the said bill "with a draft of their own amendment upon it." This amendment was, that Mary of Este, whom James had named regent, should be attainted as well as her son. The Commons demurred, and asked time to search for precedents concerning bills of attainder. On the 29th the committee to whom this search was referred made their report; and on the 2nd of February, when this report was taken into consideration, the additional clause inserted by the Lords was rejected without a division; the Commons believing it might be of dangerous consequence to attain persons by an amendment only, in which case such due consideration could not be had as the nature of an attainder requires. But the Lords seemed anxious for the attainder of Maria d'Este. On the 10th they demanded a conference, in which they insisted on their amendment; urging that the method was fit and proper, citing a precedent from the reign of the most brutal of all our kings,* whereby it appeared the Commons themselves had attained several persons in simple amendments to bills. The Commons, however, adhered to their point, and left the bill unaltered with their Lordships; who at length retracted, and agreed to the bill without the amendment. But still there was a party in the Upper House that drove hard at the nominal queen-regent, against whom they brought in a separate bill of attainder. The fate of the bill was decided by a thin House—only twenty-eight voting for it, and no more than eighteen against it. Fifteen of the minority protested, "because there was no proof of the allegations in the bill so much as offered;" and, after all, the bill was dropped by the Commons. And, still in conformity with the advice offered by Sunderland, another bill for abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales, which had been strongly recommended in the address of the Commons, was introduced and carried, being coupled with a new acknowledgment of William as rightful and lawful king. There was a dispute in the Commons whether the oath should be voluntary or compulsory, but it was carried, by a majority of only one, that it should be compulsory, the numbers being 187 to 186. The bill was also passed by the Upper House, where, however, Lord Nottingham and nineteen other peers protested against this forced oath, as being no bond of union among those who took it, nor any true mark of distinction between the friends and enemies of government, and therefore repugnant to the very nature of a test.† It should be remembered hereafter, when we treat of the political delinquencies of that eccentric and dangerous man, that St. John (Bolingbroke) seconded this bill for abjuring the Pretender. The forced oaths, of course, did more harm than good to the cause of the Revolution: they were imposed upon all ecclesiastical persons, all members of the universities being of the foundation, all schoolmasters, all teachers of separate congregations, &c. It had been proposed to exempt the Quakers, but this was rejected without a division. One party had tried hard to attach a rider to the bill, to the effect, "that persons who took upon them offices should not depart from the communion of the church of England;" but this also was lost.

But while men were devising or taking oaths of fidelity and devotion to William, that prince was drawing near his end. He had suffered much during the winter, and in his more familiar conversations with Lord Albemarle he had intimated his apprehensions; but his unshaken mind maintained a most manly struggle with the weakness of his body; he continued to toil in his cabinet, and at his moments of relaxation to take that hard exercise to which he had accustomed himself. As spring approached hopes were entertained of his recovery. On Saturday, the 21st of February, though his legs were swollen, he set out from Kensington on horseback, as he was accustomed to do every week, to hunt at Hampton Court. As he was galloping along the road the horse stumbled and fell violently, and the king fractured his right collar-bone. His majesty was carried to Hampton Court, where the bone was set, and where the surgeon, finding his pulse feverish, hinted the expediency of bleeding. William said his pulse had been feverish at intervals for a fortnight past, declined the blood-letting,* and, contrary to advice, returned that evening to Kensington. An altercation arose in his presence between his surgeon, Ronjat, a Frenchman, and his physician, Bidloo, a Dutchman; the latter insisting that there was no necessity for bleeding, and that the bone had been ill set. On examination, it appeared that the setting had been deranged by the motion of the carriage; but the fracture was soon reduced again, and the king slept well the whole night. For several days no bad symptoms appeared, or, if they appeared, they were kept secret. On the 28th of February, a week after the accident, he sent the following message to the House of Commons:—"His majesty, being at present hindered, by an unhappy accident, from coming in person to his parliament, is pleased to signify to the House of Commons by message what he designed to have subjects; and those who have broken them will make no scruple of taking or breaking any others that shall be required of them: and consequently this new oath may be of dangerous and pernicious consequence to the government, by admitting such ill men as do not fear an oath into the greatest trusts, and who, under the specious pretence and protection of this new oath, which is to free them from suspicion, will have greater opportunities of betraying their king and their country."

* Burnet, however, says that the king's strength was then so much impaired, that it was not thought advisable to let him bleed, no symptom appearing that required it.

* The precedent quoted was from the 3rd year of Henry VIII.

† Other reasons were alleged by the twenty protesting peers. The following, we think, is unanswerable:—"If any such further evidence of the subjects' fidelity were, at this time, necessary to be required, we conceive a new oath is no such evidence, nor any additional security to the government; because those who have kept the oaths which they have already taken ought, in justice, to be esteemed good spoken to both Houses from the throne. His majesty, in the first year of his reign, did acquaint the parliament that commissioners were authorised in Scotland to treat with such commissioners as should be appointed in England of proper terms for uniting the two kingdoms, and at the same time expressed his great desire of such an union: his majesty is fully satisfied that nothing can more contribute to the present and future security and happiness of England and Scotland, than a firm and entire union between them; and he cannot but hope, that, upon a due consideration of our present circumstances, there will be found a general disposition to this union. His majesty would esteem it a peculiar felicity if, during his reign, some happy expedient for making both kingdoms one might take place; and is, therefore, extremely desirous that a treaty for that purpose might be set on foot; and does, in the most earnest manner, recommend this affair to the consideration of the House." A similar message was at the same time sent to the Upper House. This was William's last public act, and no scheme or intention could well be wiser or greater; though even here a certain class of writers, who pursue the greatest man of his age to the very grave with animosity and rancour, can find something to cavil at. On the next day his majesty was visited with some alarming symptoms, and a commission was issued to certain peers to give the royal assent to such bills as were ready; among which was the bill of attainder against the Prince of Wales. On the 3rd of March he was seized with fever and ague; and on the 7th, as if a demise of the crown would endanger every measure depending in parliament, the Lords were pressed to dispatch the Abjuration Bill and the Malt-tax Bill, which were still before them. Another commission was issued to give the royal assent to these bills; and William being no longer able to use his hand, the sign manual was affixed to the commission by means of a stamp. On the same day his favourite Keppel, Lord Albemarle, arrived from Holland with very good news; but the king said, "Je tire vers ma fin."* "By this time," says Ralph, "the court was become such a scene, as in the most lively manner showed the vanity of those possessions which men with the utmost anxiety aspire to: the anti-chamber swarmed with physicians, courtiers, and statesmen, all in such masks as suited best with the several parts they were to act: the council was also extraordinarily assembled, to receive the reports of the king's physicians from time to time, and to back their opinions, as necessity seemed to require. The king was apparently at extremity: Archbishop Tension and Bishop Burnet continued in their duty about him from Saturday morning to his last gasp." None hoped to gain more from the king's death than the Marlboroughs, who had, no doubt, intelligencers of their own in the anti-chamber;

* "The Earl of Portland told me, that, when he was once encouraging him, from the good state his affairs were in, both at home and abroad, to take more heart, the king answered him, that he knew death was that which he had looked at on all occasions without any terror: sometimes he would have been glad to have been delivered out of all his troubles, but he confessed now he saw another scene, and could wish to live a little longer."—Burnet.

yet the duchess afterwards said—"When the king came to die, I felt nothing of that satisfaction which I once thought I should have had upon this occasion: and my Lord and Lady Jersey's writing and sending perpetually to give an account (to the Princess Anne) as his breath grew shorter and shorter, filled me with horror." And if the Jerseys, who had partaken so largely in the king's bounty and friendship,—who owed all they possessed to the dying monarch, really acted in the manner described, their conduct, though far from being unprecedented, is proper to excite both horror and disgust; but it should be remembered that the wife of Marlborough, who says that she would lose the best employment in any court sooner than act so odious a part, was the inveterate enemy of the Jersey family, and was never very scrupulous in her observance of the homilies about lying and slandering. Burnet, one of the two prelates present, has left his own account of "the last scene of all." The bishop says—"The king's strength and pulse was still sinking as the difficulty of breathing increased, so that no hope was left. The Archbishop of Canterbury and I went to him on Saturday morning, and did not stir from him till he died. The archbishop prayed on Saturday some time with him, but he was then so weak, that he could scarce speak, but gave him his hand, as a sign that he firmly believed the truth of the Christian religion, and said he intended to receive the sacrament. His reason and all his senses were entire to the last minute. About five in the morning he desired the sacrament, and went through the office with great appearance of seriousness, but could not express himself: when this was done, he called for the Earl of Albemarle, and gave him a charge to take care of his papers. He thanked M. Auverquerque (or Overkirk) for his long and faithful services. He took leave of the Duke of Ormond, and called for the Earl of Portland; but before he came his voice quite failed; so, he took him by the hand, and carried it to his heart with great tenderness. He was often looking up to heaven, in many short ejaculations. Between seven and eight o'clock the rattle began; the commendatory prayer was said for him, and, as it ended, he died, (on Sunday, the 8th of March)* in the fifty-second year of his age, having reigned thirteen years and a few days. . . . He died with a clear and full presence of mind, and in a wonderful tranquillity: those who knew it was his rule all his life long to hide the impressions that religion made on him as much as possible, did not wonder at his silence in his last minutes; but they lamented it much: they knew what a handle it would give to censure and obloquy."†

* Evelyn says briefly—"8 March. The king had a fall from his horse and broke his collar-bone, and, having been much indisposed before, and aguish, with a long cough and other weakness, died this Sunday morning about four o'clock."—Dingy.

† The real cause of his death appeared to have been disease in the lungs. "When his body was opened it appeared that, notwithstanding the swelling of his legs, he had no dropsy: his head and heart

Perfection is not to be expected in a sovereign until the realization of the dreams of the Fifth-monarchy men: both as a sovereign and as a man William had faults and weaknesses and unamiable qualities; although these have all been grossly exaggerated by zealots of various and most opposite parties, the high churchmen detesting him on account of his indifference to the forms of church government, and both high and low on account of his toleration; the Jacobites heaping obloquy upon his name, because he practically upset the theory of the divine right of kings; the Tories because he naturally preferred the Whigs, who had most contributed to his promotion; and the republicans, then and in all subsequent times, because he did not try again the experiment which had been tried, and which had signally failed—because he was not his own opposite, a De Witt, and a republican,—a sort of character which, rightly or wrongly, was then reprobated by the vast mass of the nation, and which could no more have achieved the Revolution of 1688, than it could have changed and reformed the dynasty of the Celestial Empire. But William III. was the first of our rulers that really solved the problem of constitutional monarchy; and since his solution of that problem the duties of our princes have been easy and natural. Before his time all was riddle and uncertainty, and the constitution not understood, because it had never properly been put into practice. If now and then he stumbled, it should be remembered that what to after sovereigns has been a plain, broad, and beaten path was then an unexplored and dark passage, where nearly every step was an experiment. Our admiration for the ability, and the real genius in state affairs, of this illustrious prince must rise to the highest pitch if we look closely into the complicated nature and surpassing difficulties of his situation. A stult-holder in Holland with republican forms,—a king in England and Scotland, with constitutions which had never properly been defined—the ruler, in fact, of the Dutch, the English, the Scotch, and the Irish, who had all separate interests, jealousies, and animosities;—compelled by the very constitution which he called into life or efficacy, to trust ministers whom there was no trusting with safety,—engaged at the same time in an almost uninterrupted war with the greatest power in Europe, or undetermined by the intrigues of that power, which was even more formidable in diplomacy than in arms,—and all this with a frail state of body; we confess, all these circumstances considered, we are lost in wonder as to the result, and disposed to give William III. by far the foremost place of all the sovereigns that have ever worn the English crown.

were sound: there was scarce any blood in his body: his lungs stuck to his side, and, by the fall from his horse, a part of them was torn from it, which occasioned an inflammation, that was believed to be the immediate cause of his death, which probably might have been prevented for some time if he had been then let blood. . . . He was always asthmatic, and, the drops of the small-pox falling on his lungs, he had a constant deep cough."—Barnet.

GREAT SEAL OF ANNE (BEFORE THE UNION WITH SCOTLAND).

ANNE.—A. D. 1702.

THE king died, and the Princess of Denmark took his place. Anne was in the thirty-eighth year of her age, but as much under the tutelage of Lord and Lady Marlborough, as if she had been a girl of fifteen, or of still tenderer years. Her proclamation took place amidst acclamations, though some credulous people grieved to see her step into a revolutionary and usurped throne; having fondly expected, against all reason, or knowledge of the hearts of princes, that she would demur, and resign her seat to her half brother, the helpless pensioner of France. As the parliament continued sitting, notwithstanding the demise, and by virtue of an act properly passed in William's reign, Anne, three days after her accession, went down to the House of Lords, and there declared her resolution to prosecute the measures concerted by the late king, "the great support, not only of these kingdoms, but of all Europe." Even so much might have been expected from the Marlborough ascendancy. The Tories, together with what was called the landed interest, had agreed to leave the conduct of the war to the Earl of Marlborough, who, by means of his lady, was like to have the supreme direction of all things, and who as captain-general, would be almost as much interested in the continuance of the war, as if he had also been stadtholder of the United Provinces.* Anne further declared in her first speech that too much could not be done for the encouragement of our allies to reduce the exorbitant power of France; that her heart was entirely English, and that her word was to be depended upon. Both these last expressions, about the English heart and the honourable observance of promises, had been in her unhappy father James's first speech. The city of London, and all the counties, cities, and second-rate towns, sent up addresses. "In these," says Burnet, "a very great diversity of style was observed: some mentioned the late king in terms full of respect and gratitude; others named him very coldly: some took no notice of him, nor of his death, and simply congratulated her coming to the crown; and some insinuated reflections on his memory, as if the queen had been ill used by him. The queen received all civilly—to most she said nothing, to others she expressed herself in general words, and some things were given out in her name which she disowned. When the Commons presented their address, she assured them that they could not more agreeably confirm it to her, than by giving dispatch to all preparations for the public service and for the support of her allies.

The two secretaries of state for Scotland, with such of the privy counsellors of that nation as were in London, waited upon her with professions of loyalty and devotion; and, after reading to her the "claim of rights" agreed upon by the Convention of the Estates at the accession of King William and Queen Mary, they tendered to her majesty the coronation oath. Commotions had been expected north of the Tweed, but the Jacobites did nothing beyond talking; and the country continued to obey the privy council, and the authorities established by William, who were all, for the present, left in their places. A commission was sent to the Earl of Marchmont, then chancellor of Scotland, to represent the queen in the General Assembly of the kirk, which was then about to meet. In Ireland the papists were too much impoverished and reduced to excite any apprehen sions. The eyes of the government and of all England were directed to the continent, where, as it was still thought, the fate of the national liberties and of the Protestant religion was to be decided. The Earl of Marlborough had now attained the great object of his ambition. Three days after Anne's accession he was decorated with the Order of the Garter; on the morrow he was named captain-general of the English forces at home and abroad; and soon afterwards he was appointed master of the ordnance. The queen's husband, Prince George of Denmark, who was still considered as a subject, and who continued to occupy his seat in the House of Peers as Duke of Cumberland, was named generalissimo and lord-high admiral; but, as he had neither the ability nor the wish to take a very active part in affairs, and as he had always been as absolutely under the control of the favourites as his wife, Marlborough had, in effect, the entire command of the army. His countess, to whom his own elevation was owing, was made groom of the stole and mistress of the robes, and entrusted with the management of the privy purse: his two daughters, Lady Harriett Godolphin and Lady Spencer, were nominated ladies of the bed-chamber; and the Earl of Sunderland, at the particular intercession of Lady Marlborough, obtained the renewal of a pension of two thousand pounds, which had been granted him by the late king.*

Marlborough was ready to be either Whig or Tory. Anne had a great aversion to the Whigs and a proportionate love of the Tories: or, in the words of Lady Marlborough,—“The queen had from her infancy imbibed the most unconquerable prejudices against the Whigs. She had been taught to look upon them all, not only as republicans, who hated the very shadow of regal authority, but as implacable enemies to the Church of England. This aversion to the whole party had been confirmed by the ill usage she had met with from her sister and King William, which, though perhaps more owing to Lord Rochester than to any man then living, was now to be charged to the account of the Whigs. And Prince George, her husband, who had also been ill treated in that reign threw into the scale his resentment. On the other hand, the Tories had the advantage, not only of the queen's early prepossessions in their

* Lord Spencer, the husband of Marlborough's second daughter, was, as the reader will remember, the son and heir of Sunderland. On the 11th of March the old politician wrote from Althorp to the Marlboroughs, expressing his confidence in Anne's government. “I have,” says he, “no more ambition than a stock or a stone. I never was very covetous, and I have no spleen against any creature living, but those that I think would hurt the government; and I have now the same zealous and warm concern for the queen, that you have seen in me for the poor king that is gone.”—Cæcæ.

favour, but of their having assisted her in the late reign in the affair of her settlement. It was, indeed, evident that they had done this more in opposition to King William than from any real respect for the Princess of Denmark. But still they had served her. And, the winter before she came to the crown, they had, in the same spirit of opposition to the king, and in prospect of his death, paid her more than usual civilities and attendance. It is no great wonder, therefore, all these things considered, that, as soon as she was seated on the throne, the Tories (whom she usually called by the agreeable name of the church party) became the distinguished objects of the royal favour." Godolphin, who was the same sort of Tory as his friend and family ally, Marlborough, was intrusted with the sole management of the finances, with the title of lord-high treasurer, and he became in reality prime minister and arbiter of all things in the council, as Marlborough was of those in the field. "And I am firmly persuaded," continues the duchess, "that, notwithstanding her majesty's extraordinary affection for me, and the entire devotion which my Lord Marlborough and my Lord Godolphin had for many years showed to her service, they would not have had so great a share of her favour and confidence, if they had not been reckoned in the number of the Tories."* Lord Nottingham, one of the Tory chiefs, was appointed secretary of state, and he was allowed to restore his dependent, Sir Charles Hedges, to office, in the place of Secretary Vernon; Lord Rochester, the queen's hot-headed uncle, was continued lord-lieutenant of Ireland, with express permission to be absent as often as might be thought fit for attending in the English council, where, with his old temper unimproved, he aimed at absolute authority, and brow-beat all opposition from his brother-counsellors and ministers. The Duke of Somerset was dismissed from the office of lord president, to make room for the Earl of Pembroke, who had the merit of not being a Whig, though he had no pretension to that of being a Tory. The Earl of Bradford, a friend or dependent of Rochester, was made treasurer of the household; the comptroller's staff was transferred from Lord Wharton, a zealous Whig, to Sir Edward Seymour; the Marquess of Northampton got the privy seal; but the Earl of Jersey retained his post as chamberlain. Mr. Howe, who had personally and grossly insulted the deceased king, both in the House of Commons and out of doors, was named one of the joint paymasters of guards and garrisons; Sir John Leveson Gower was made chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; Sir Nathan Wright remained in the situation of lord-keeper; Mr. Harcourt was made solicitor, and Mr. Northey, another Tory, attorney-general. Most of the subordinate posts were also filled up by Tories. The only Whigs left in the occupation of commanding posts were, the Duke of Devonshire, lord-high steward, and Mr. Boyle, chancellor of the exchequer. The names of the great Whig leaders, Somers, Halifax, and Orford, were erased from the list of the persons directed to be summoned to attend the meetings of the privy council. The Earl of Marlborough, mindful of his former obligations to the Whig Shrewsbury, prevailed upon the queen to offer him the post of master of the horse; but the duke, who was absent in Italy, declined the appointment, which was conferred upon the Duke of Somerset, who was nominally a Whig, but in reality an insignificant nonentity. The queen's husband, Prince George, appointed a council to act with him, or for him, into which he admitted none but Tories;* Sir George Rooke, distinguished by his aversion to every thing that bore the name of Whig, became vice-admiral of England, and president of the commission for managing the fleet, &c.; and another member of the lord-high admiral's council was Marlborough's brother, George Churchill, who was not merely a Tory, but a downright Jacobite. Rochester, who was disappointed at not being placed at the head of the Treasury, and who could tolerate no difference of opinion, soon began to quarrel with Godolphin; and numerous materials contributed to envenom the dispute. The head of the high church party would have got up a new persecution of dissenters, and would have driven every man that was not a declared Tory out of the commission of the peace: Godolphin, on the other hand, was bent upon pursuing a mild and conciliatory course, and he, or his friends, represented Rochester as a firebrand. Rochester, moreover, was against the war, or at the most would have embarked England in it as an auxiliary; while the views of Godolphin were identical with those of Marlborough, who confidently promised himself wealth and renown from the contest. The two Whig dukes of Devonshire and Somerset voted with Godolphin, and the majority of the council decided upon a declaration of war against France.

Anne had dispatched a letter to the States-General, announcing her intention to maintain the

* An Account of the Conduct, &c.—Her grace adds: "The truth is, though both these lords had always the real interest of the nation at heart, and had given proofs of this by their conduct in their several employments in the late reign, they had been educated in the persuasion that the high church party were the best friends to the constitution, both of church and state; nor were they perfectly unacquainted but by experience. For my own part, I had not the same prepossessions. The word church had never a charm for me, in the mouths of those who made the most noise with it; for I could not perceive that they gave any other distinguishing proof of their regard for the thing, than a frequent use of the word, like a spell to enchant weak minds; and a persecuting zeal against dissenters, and against those real friends of the church who would not admit that persecution was agreeable to its doctrine. And, as to state affairs, many of these churchmen seemed to me to have no fixed principles at all, having endeavoured, during the last reign, to undermine that very government which they had contributed to establish. I was heartily sorry, therefore, that, for the sake of such churchmen, others should be removed from their employments, who had been firm to the principles of the Revolution, and whom I thought much more likely to support the queen, and promote the welfare of our country, than the wrong-headed politicians that succeeded them."

* Tindal remarks, that "the legality of such a council was much questioned, as it was a new court, which could not be authorised to act but by an act of parliament; yet, out of respect to the queen, no public question was made of it, and the objection to it never went beyond a secret murmur."

alliances concluded by the late king William; and now she deputed Marlborough to Holland, as ambassador extraordinary. The lord-general reached the Hague on the 28th of March, and was received with transports of joy. His reputation stood high, though he had scarcely been tried as a general; his favour with, and absolute control over her Britannic majesty by means of his wife, were generally known; and he had the happiness and head to persuade the Dutch and their allies that he could well supply in the field the place of the deceased William. It was presently arranged with the heads of the republic, and the envoy of the emperor, that war should be declared on the same day at London, the Hague, and Vienna, and that Marlborough should have the chief command of the allied armies—a post coveted by the new King of Prussia, by the Elector of Hanover, by the Duke of Zell, and by the Archduke Charles of Austria. On his speedy return to London, it was made apparent that either Rochester must withdraw, or the cabinet be distracted by incessant jars. “The gibberish of that party,” says her grace of Marlborough, “about non-resistance, and passive obedience, and hereditary right, I could not think to forbode any good to my mistress, whose title rested upon a different foundation.” The head of the high church party retired to the country in disgust, being the first of the Tory leaders “that discovered a deep discontent with the queen and her administration.” Towards the end of the year, her majesty was “so unreasonable as to press him to go” to Ireland, “to attend the affairs of that kingdom, which greatly needed his presence.” Rochester told her with great insolence, that he would not go into Ireland, though she should give the country to him and his son. His resignation of the lord lieutenancy followed, and he was so angry, that he would neither go to court nor to council; the queen, after some time, ordered that he should no more be summoned. “Perhaps,” adds the caustic narrator of these events, “his lordship’s unwillingness to leave England might proceed from his zeal for the church, and from his fears lest it should be betrayed in his absence; but it was generally thought, and I believe with good reason, that the true source of his dissatisfaction was the queen’s not making him her sole governor and director.” As soon, however, as Rochester was excluded from the government, all the high church party took up the cry that he was a martyr to their cause, and that the church was in danger. This party was so strong in parliament, that the Commons in their first address, inserted the following clause—“Your majesty has been always a most illustrious ornament to this church, and has been exposed to great hazards for it, and therefore we promise ourselves, that, in your majesty’s reign, we shall see it perfectly restored to its due rights, and privileges, and secured in the same to posterity, which is only to be done by divesting those men of the power, who have shown they want not the will, to destroy it. "The queen had declared her resolution to defend and maintain the church: as by law established; but this was not enough for the zealots, who wanted the power of persecuting and the exclusive occupancy of all places, civil and military, as well as ecclesiastic.* All this brewed a storm, which soon afterwards burst forth." In the mean time, however, the Commons voted her majesty for life 700,000*l.* a year, of which she chose to assign 100,000*l.* to the public service; the war had been proclaimed on the 4th of May, and the requisite measures adopted for prosecuting it with vigour; the oath of abjuring the Prince of Wales had been taken by the members of both Houses, and the name of the Princess Sophia, Electress of Hanover, introduced in the public prayers, as next in succession to the throne; and Marlborough, on the 12th of May, had departed for Holland, on the frontiers of which country military operations had already commenced. After a short stay at the Hague, the rising general repaired to Nimeguen to assume the command, to which was attached the enticing salary of 10,000*l.* a year. The negotiations, which had been going on in Germany among the minor states, had induced the House of Brunswick to send 10,000 men to join Marlborough, had won over the Elector of Brandenburg, now King of Prussia, had compelled the Princes of Saxe-Gotha and Wolfenbuttel to renounce their connexion with the King of France, had engaged the Elector Palatine in the grand alliance, and had compelled the Duke of Bavaria, the Elector of Cologne, and other little potentates who had been devoted to France, to remain neutral in the great struggle. The principal army of the allies, under the temporary command of the Earl of Athlone (Ginckel), was assembled in the vicinity of Cleves, to cover that part of the frontier which lies between the Rhine and the Meuse; Cohorne, the great engineer, stood with 10,000 men by the mouth of the Scheldt, to secure that quarter; Louis, Margrave of Baden, was on the Upper Rhine, the Prince of Saarbruck with 25,000 men, Prussians, Palatines, and Dutch, was besieging Kayserwerth, a place which the French had taken in the last war; and other forces were moving on different lines to co-operate. On the other hand, the main body of the French army was assembled on the Meuse; and in the strong fortresses existing in the bishopric of Liege, under the command of the Duke of Burgundy, and Marshal Boufflers; Marshal Tallard was marching with 13,000 men to the relief of Kayserwerth; and the Count Delamotte and the Spanish Marquess of Bedmar, who commanded in the name of Philip King of Spain, covered the western frontier of the Spanish Netherlands. The first blow was struck, while Marlborough was employed in settling a plan of the campaign with the Dutch, and the ministers of the allies, by his royal highness the Duke of Burgundy, who, being joined by Marshal Tallard, made a sudden move upon Nimeguen, which was without a garrison, and almost without artillery: but the burghers were active and brave, and Athlone, by a brilliant march, got to their assistance, and saved the place. The Dutch, however, were much disconcerted by the narrow risk they had thus run on their own frontiers. Different plans of operation were proposed by the various members of the grand alliance; and Marlborough began to experience the extreme difficulty of giving a unity of plan and purpose to a heterogeneous coalition. And perhaps at that moment, he repented of his old criticisms upon the military performances of the late king, feeling as he did, the same difficulties which had so often impeded the career of William. It was near the end of June before he matured his arrangements, and then he found that the Prince of Saarbruck, Athlone, and the other leading generals were in no disposition to submit to his authority, and act cordially with him. At the same time he found himself checked by the field deputies—obstinate functionaries whom the States-General were accustomed to send out with their armies, and who, on their part, were bound to do nothing, and permit nothing, without advising with their high mightinesses at the Hague. However, Kayserwerth having surrendered, Marlborough collected the forces which had been engaged in that siege, brought up the English from Breda, and, being joined by other bodies of the allies, found himself at the head of 60,000 men. But even then he was distracted and hampered by three or four plans of operations, each of which had its advocates in the allied camp. Moreover, when he had overcome the timidity of the Dutch government, and was about to do something, the general of the Hanoverians announced that his men could not march without the orders of Bothmar the Elector's minister at the Hague. He summoned Bothmar to the camp, and, after losing some valuable time, removed these obstacles. But the Prussians had their scruples and difficulties as well as the Hanoverians, and the removal of these cost more time. At last, on the 7th of July, he crossed the Waal, and established his head-quarters at Duckenbourg, a country seat belonging to the Count Schulenberg, a little to the south-west of Nimeguen. On the 16th his army was posted at Over-hasselt, with the Meuse in the rear, and the French in front, at the distance of two short leagues. On the 20th he writes Godolphin, "I have this night proposed the leaving 20 squadrons of horse, and 18 battalions of foot, to entrench themselves before Nimeguen, and to pass the Meuse with the rest of the army, or to march with the whole towards Cleves, in order to get between Venloo and the French, so as to be able to attack them. The fear the States have of Nimcguen and the passage of the Rhine hinders the advantage of having the superiority." At length he removed these fears, and obtained from the States-General full powers to execute his own plan, which was offensive. He moved forward en masse on the 27th, and by the 30th had his advanced posts near Hamont. The French, meanwhile, had suddenly decamped by night, and were now making forced marches in the direction of Peer and Bray. He expected a battle; but the French would not risk an attack, though one or two small fortresses were assaulted and carried under their eyes. On the 31st, Marlborough was twelve hours on horseback, reconnoitring the ground and ascertaining the French line of march. Although Tallard had come up with fresh forces, the French continued to edge off towards the Demer. Marlborough's object was to throw himself between them and that little river, and to give them battle on some exposed heaths; but, either through the slowness of his troops, or the indecision of the Dutch field-deputies, he failed in this attempt; and, though during two days he was marching on a parallel line with the French, and at times near enough to them to open a cannonade, he could neither intercept their retreat nor do them any considerable mischief. The Duke of Burgundy, however, quitted the army to avoid the dishonour of witnessing the reduction of the fortresses on the Meuse; Venloo was invested on the 5th of September, and was forced to surrender on the 23rd; on the 29th

Ruremond and Stevenswaert were invested, and both places were taken by the 7th of October. While these operations were in progress the army of the empire, under the command of Joseph, the young king of the Romans, had reduced Landau, and threatened the whole of Alsace. In consequence of this loss the French were obliged to weaken their main body, and to leave exposed the important city of Liege. Marlborough instantly moved upon that place; opened his batteries on the 20th of October, and compelled the French garrison to surrender on the 29th. By this important capture the Dutch frontier was secured, and the navigation of the Meuse was wholly free.

With these operations the campaign ended: the French retired within their lines, and Marlborough, after distributing his troops in winter-quarters, began his journey homeward. As he was descending the Meuse in a barge with the Dutch deputies, Colborne being before him in a larger and swifter boat, he was surprised by a French partisan from Guelder, who, with thirty-five men, seized the tow-ropes, hauled in the boat, and made all in it prisoners. The object of the party, however, seems to have been mere plunder, for, after pillaging the boat and the passengers, they let them go, on the production of false or forged French passports, which it is not likely that any of the marauders could read or cared for. On reaching the Hague, Marlborough was received with transports of joy, for the news of his capture had preceded his arrival. "Till they saw me," he writes to his wife, "they thought me a prisoner in France; so that I was not ashore one minute before I had great crowds of the common people, some endeavouring to take me by the hand, and all crying out 'Welcome!'" In London he was received with almost equal applause, notwithstanding some severe criticisms which had been circulated on his campaign. His exploits, however, were set off by the failures of other officers in other quarters. The plan for the reduction of Cadiz had been formed by the late King William, and since promoted by Marlborough and Godolphin. The expedition, after being long delayed, was at last got to sea; and on the 12th of August, Sir George Rooke and the Duke of Ormond, with a fleet of 50 sail and a land force of 13,000 men, came to anchor in Cadiz Bay. The Spanish governor was summoned to surrender to the allies of the rightful sovereign of Spain; but he refused, and then Rooke and Ormond, like all sea and land officers in a similar situation, quarrelled as to what was to be done next. The general wanted to make an attack upon the Isla de Leon, but the admiral thought this too dangerous. The usual and mischievous recourse was had to a council of war: the majority sided with Rooke; and while they were debating the Spaniards all along the coast removed their property into the interior, and prepared to defend the landing-places. Ormond threw some troops on shore at Port St. Mary's; but they were too weak to do anything beyond plundering the wine stores; they grew drunk and lost all discipline, and when they were hastily re-embarked they were followed by the contempt of the Spanish soldiery and the hatred of the plundered peasantry. After this miserable failure, Rooke and Ormond, still quarrelling with one another, made for Vigo, where a rich convoy of plate ships from the New World had sought a refuge. The prize was enticing; and English sailors were always ready to do desperate deeds when Spanish galleons were in sight. But, during the time which had been worse than thrown away in Cadiz Bay, the Spaniards at Vigo had time to fortify that harbour. The Duke of Ormond, however, landed about 2000 men, who carried by assault a tremendous battery which had been erected at the mouth of the harbour; and Admiral Hopson forced a great bomb, and led up the port. Hopson was followed by nearly all the fleet, who had to sustain a terrible fire from the Spanish ships and from other batteries that had not been carried by the land troops. After a stout resistance the Spaniards removed part of the rich cargoes, and then set fire to their ships. It was calculated that eight ships of war and six galleons, and fourteen millions of pieces of eight, or property to that value in merchandise and plate, were burnt or sunk; but the English and Dutch succeeded in bringing off ten men of war, several galleons, and seven millions of pieces of eight. With these prizes Sir George Rooke returned home in a sort of triumph, boasting that Cadiz might have been taken and other incalculable advantages obtained, if Ormond had but done his duty. On the other hand Ormond threw all the blame upon Rooke, and seemed inclined to provoke a parliamentary inquiry.*

A new parliament had assembled on the 20th of October, and now the Tories were found to have a majority powerful enough to carry everything before it. Such was the effect of the known Tory predilection of the new sovereign, the discouragement of the Whigs at the death of William, and the exertions of the favoured party throughout the country. "The queen," says Burnet, "did not openly interpose in the elections, but her inclination to the Tories appeared plainly, and all people took it for granted that she wished they might be the majority: this wrought on the inconstancy and servility that is natural to multitudes; and the conceit which had been infused and propagated with much industry, that the Whigs had charged the nation with great taxes, of which a large share had been devoured by themselves, had so far turned the tide that the Tories in the House of Commons were at least double the number of the Whigs. They met full of fury against the memory of the late king, and against those who had been employed by him." Harley was again chosen Speaker. Anne, in her opening speech, spoke in the highest high-church and Tory tone. In their address the Commons praised her as the champion of the Church of England, and congratulated her on having, by her majesty's arms and the Duke of Marlborough, "signally retrieved the ancient honour and glory of the English nation." "The word retrieved," says Burnet, "implying that the honour of the kingdom was formerly lost, all that had a just regard to the king's memory opposed it: he had carried the honour of the nation farther than had been done in any reign before his; to him they owed their preservation, their safety, and even the queen's being on the throne; he had designed and formed that great confederacy, at the head of which she was now set. [And the bishop might have added, that he had trained and formed the troops who are now about to give glory to the reign of the successor, who hated and maligning his memory.]† In opposition to this, it was now said that during his reign things had been conducted by strangers, and trusted to them, and that a vast treasure had been spent in unprofitable campaigns in Flanders. The Partition Treaty, and everything else with which the former reign could be loaded, was brought into the account." After a debate in which Marlborough was "praised at William's cost," the Whig amendment for substituting the word "maintained" for "retrieved" was rejected by a great majority: all that had favour at court, or that hoped for any, joining in the cry against the deceased king. "Controverted elections," adds the Whig historian, "were all judged in favour of the Tories, with such a barefaced partiality, that it showed the party was resolved on everything that might serve their ends." In all this the Tories were doing little more than had been done by their opponents, when they had the ascendancy; but presently they proceeded to undo the best deed that the Whigs had ever performed for the nation and humanity—to take a long step backwards towards the theory and practice of intolerance and persecution. They brought in the famous "Occasional Conformity Bill," the professed object of which was to prevent hypocrisy in religion and danger to the church; but the real object of which was to destroy the Toleration Act. By this bill, all those who took the sacrament and test as qualifications for office, and did after that go to the meetings of dissenters, or any meeting for religious worship, not according to the Liturgy or practice of the Church of England, were to be disabled from holding their employments, punished with heavy and increasing fines, &c.; and, whereas the Test Act only included the magistrates and corporations, this new act was to embrace all the inferior officers or freemen having a right to vote for members of parliament, &c. "The preamble of this bill," says Burnet, "asserted toleration, and condemned all persecution for conscience sake in a high strain. Some thought the bill was of no consequence, and that, if it should pass into a law, it would be of no effect; or that the occasional conformists would become constant ones: others thought that it was such a breaking in upon toleration as would undermine it, and that it would have a great effect on corporations; as, indeed, the intent of it was believed to be the modelling elections, and by consequence the House of Commons. On behalf of the bill, it was said, the design of the Test Act was, that all in office should continue in the communion of the church; that coming only once to the sacrament for an office, and going afterwards to the meetings of dissenters, was both an eluding the intent of the law, and a profanation of the sacrament. . . . Those who were against the bill said, the nation had been quiet ever since the toleration; the dissenters had lost more ground and strength by it than the church: the nation was now engaged in a great war; it seemed, therefore, unreasonable to raise animosities at home in matters of religion, and to encourage a tribe of informers, who were the worst sort of men: the fines were excessive, higher than any laid on papists by law; and, since no limitation of time nor concurrence of witnesses was provided for in the bill, men would be for ever exposed to the malice of a bold swearer or wicked servant." Neither Burnet nor wiser men than he saw the impropriety of the Test Act itself, and the monstrous mixture of folly and impiety that lay in forcing the great religious mystery upon those who doubted or disbelieved the virtue of the symbol. He continues—"It was moved, that since the greatest danger of all was from Atheists and Papists, that all such as received the sacrament for an office should be obliged to receive it three times a-year, which all were by law required to do; and to keep their parish church at least one Sunday a month; but this was not admitted. All who pleaded for the bill did in words declare for the continuance of the toleration, yet the sharpness with which they treated the dissenters in all their speeches showed as if they designed their extirpation." The bill was carried in the Commons by a great majority; but in the Upper House strong objections were taken to the high penalties imposed in it; some of the lords remembered the evil practices of informers in the reign of Charles II., "and would not consent to the reviving such infamous methods;" and all of them believed that the chief design of the bill was to throw all the corporations of the kingdom into the hands of the Tory and high-church party. The queen had the matter at heart,—made her husband vote for the bill, although this royal Dane was himself one of the occasional conformists, having received the sacrament of the Anglican church to qualify him for the office of lord high admiral, and yet keeping a Lutheran chapel and Lutheran chaplains. The whole strength of the court was exerted; but still the majority of the Lords remained steady to their purpose of throwing out or greatly modifying the bill. Most of the bishops agreed with the secular peers upon this point, though upon different views. The Upper House, however, was ready to consent, that such persons as went to meetings and conventicles after they had received the sacrament should be disabled from holding any employments, and be fined 20*l*. "Many," says Burnet, "went into this, though they were against every part of the bill, because they thought this the most plausible way of losing it; since the House of Commons had of late set it up for a maxim that the Lords could not alter the fines that they should fix in a bill, this being meddling with money, which they thought was so peculiar to them, that they would not let the Lords, on any pretence, break in upon it." When the Lower House started this objection, the Lords made a search into all the rolls of the clerk of the parliament's office from the middle of King Henry VII.'s reign; and they found by numerous precedents, that in some bills the Lords had set the fines, and in other bills had altered them, and changed the uses to which they were applied. The Lords ordered this report to be entered upon their books: the Commons, without entering upon the discussion, resolved to maintain their point—that is, their original bill in all its rigour. The Lords proceeded to make other alterations, introducing clauses that proof should be made by two witnesses, that the accusation and information about attending conventicles, &c., should be given in within ten days, and that the prosecution should commence within three months after the fact. The Commons, it appears, agreed to these modifications; but still they stuck to their high penalties and their exclusive right of fining the subject. "The thing," says Burnet, "depended long between the two Houses; both sides took pains to bring up the lords that would vote with them; so that there were above a hundred and thirty lords in the House: the greatest number that had ever been together. . . . After some conferences, wherein each House had yielded some smaller differences to the other, it came to a free conference in the Painted Chamber, which was the most crowded upon that occasion that had ever been known, so much weight was laid on this matter on both sides. When the Lords retired, and it came to the final vote of adhering, the Lords were so equally divided, that, in three questions put on different heads, the adhering was carried but by one voice in every one of them; and it was a different person that gave it in all the three divisions. The Commons likewise adhered—so the bill was lost. This bill seemed to favour the interests of the church, so hot men were for it: and the greater number of the bishops being against it, they were censured as cold and slack in the concerns of the church; a reproach that all moderate men must expect, when they oppose violent motions. A great part of this fell on myself; for I bore a large share in the debates, both in the House of Lords, and at the free conference. Angry men took occasion from hence to charge the bishops as enemies to the church, and betrayers of its interests; because we would not run blindfold into the passions and designs of ill-tempered men."

† Lord Hollingham says, "What I remember to have heard the Duke of Marlborough say, before he went to take on him the command of the army in the Low Countries, in 1702, proved true. The French mis-reckoned very much if they made the same comparison between their troops and those of their enemies as they had made in precedent wars. Those that had been opposed to them in the last were raw for the most part when it began, the British particularly; but they had been disciplined, if I may say so, by their defeats. They were grown to be veterans at the peace of Ryswick; and though many had been disbanded, yet they had been disbanded lately; so that even these were easily formed anew, and the spirit that had been raised continued in all."—Sketch of the State of Europe, in Letters on the Study and Use of History.

It is important to observe that this bill against dissenters was first introduced to the House of Commons by Bromley and by the famed St. John, who had himself been brought up a dissenter, but who, having no religion at all, was willing to adopt even a scheme of religious intolerance and persecution if it favoured the views of the Tory party with which he had engaged. Marlborough threw all his weight into the scale of intolerance, speaking, and voting, and doing all that in him lay, to revive the severity of the penal statutes against non-conformists.* By pursuing this course he gratified the Tories, who then formed the majority in the Commons, and he pleased the queen, who always entertained the highest of high-church notions. If the case had been reversed,—if her majesty had been the warm friend of toleration, and the majority a consistent Whig one, the rising captain doubtless would have stood forward as the champion of religious liberty. We shall never go far wrong in attributing base and selfish motives to this renowned hero, whose whole life was one continued comment on the text—Help yourself. Upon his return he had received the votes of thanks of both Houses of Parliament. Both Marlborough and his countess affected to raise some delicate scruples touching such an elevation; but the queen insisted upon the lord general's being made a duke, and a duke he was made accordingly on the 14th of December; and as his property was considered insufficient to maintain that dignity, Anne sent a message to the House of Commons, intimating the creation, and stating that, with the title, she had conferred upon Marlborough 5000*l.* per annum for her own life; and, in conclusion, she requested the House to devise a proper mode for settling the said grant on himself and his successors. This seemed paying high for the capture of a few towns, which, with the exception of Liege, were only third or fourth-rate places; and this was all that Marlborough had done as yet. Both the court and the general, however, were apparently surprised as much as they were vexed by an instant appearance of opposition in the House. Insinuations were thrown out there that Marlborough and his wife were making a monopoly of the royal favour and bounty. Sir Christopher Musgrave said he had no wish to detract from the duke's services, but that he must insist they had already been well rewarded with profitable employments conferred on himself and family. The outcry was so loud that Anne, with the advice of Marlborough and his countess, withdrew her application. This, however, did not prevent the Commons from presenting a strong remonstrance, in which, while criticising the proposed grant, they reflected harshly upon the memory of King William, and his profusion to favourites. It was, of course, the Tories that did all this; and by so doing they began to lose Marlborough, whom we shall soon find converted into their bitterest enemy. His proud wife would of course never allow the existence of such base and personal motives; and she takes care to inform us that she had always entertained a strong partiality to the more liberal party, and that she began very early to incline the queen to the Whigs. "Nor," says she, still boasting of her high disinterestedness, "had I any motive of private interest to bias me to the Whigs. Every body must see, that, had I consulted that oracle about the choice of a party, it would certainly have directed me to go with the stream of my mistress's inclination and prejudices. This would have been the surest way to secure my favour with her. Nor had I any particular obligations to the Whigs that should bend me to their side rather than to the other. On the contrary, they had treated me very hardly, and I had reason to look upon them as my personal enemies, at the same time that I saw the Tories ready to compliment me, and to pay me court. Even the pride of my Lord Rochester condescended to write me a very fine piece.”* Facts which will be presently produced will better enable the reader to judge of the sincerity and disinterestedness of the Marlborough conversion to Whiggism. The queen styled the conduct of the Commons “malicious;” and, on the very day their remonstrance was presented to her, she desired Marlborough to accept of 2000*l.* a-year out of the privy purse. “This,” said the queen, “can draw no envy, for nobody need know it.” The Marlboroughs, however, with at least as much worldly wisdom as high-mindedness, declined this offer of what inevitably must have made a noise at court.

Anne, it is said, earnestly desired that her husband should be associated with her on the throne, but this being deemed unconstitutional, her next thought was to secure a permanent revenue for him. A royal message intimated this wish for the settlement of a further provision on the Prince of Denmark, in case of his surviving her majesty.† Mr. Howe, the fiery Tory, who had been so vehement against the grants of the late king, moved for an annual allowance of a hundred thousand pounds. “This,” says Burnet, “was seconded by those who knew how acceptable the motion would be to the queen; though it was the double of what any Queen in England ever had in jointure.” But while the Tories in the House of Commons were carrying through the bill, objections were taken to a clause annexed to it, intended to continue his highness in the offices already conferred on him, by exempting him from the effect of that part of the last Act of Settlement, by which foreigners were prohibited to hold offices of state on the accession of the House of Hanover. The bill, however, with this clause in it, was carried, and sent up to the Lords. But there it encountered a sterner opposition, not arising so much from any considerations about the prince or his places, as from a resolution previously adopted by their lordships never to pass any money bill, to which any clause was tacked that was foreign to the body of the bill. A secondary objection was, however, made to the wording of the clause, which seemed to imply that all other foreigners already naturalised would be incapacitated in the next reign. Marlborough fought hard for the royal Dane, who had in fact been little better than a puppet in his hands; but Marlborough’s son-in-law, Lord Spencer, recently raised to the House of Peers by the death of his father, the Earl of Sunderland, as strongly opposed the grant, and by so doing drew down upon himself the wrath of his imperious mother-in-law the duchess. “Great opposition,” says Burnet, “was made; but the queen pressed it with the greatest earnestness she had yet shown in anything whatsoever; she thought it became her, as a good wife, to have the act passed. . . . The court managed the matter so dexterously that the bill passed, and the queen was highly displeased with those who opposed it; among whom I had my share.” The question was decided, however, only by a majority of one; and twenty-eight peers entered a strong protest against the whole bill, while seven others protested against the tacked clause. This opposition, which so irritated the queen, was mainly, if not entirely, the work of the Whigs; and Burnet, who was one of the protesters, affirms that the clause was introduced by some of the Tories in the House of Commons, only because they believed it would be opposed by those against whom they intended to irritate the queen. Anne, in one of her extravagant letters to the Duchess of Marlborough, attributes the passing of the bill solely to the pains taken by her grace and her husband.* Another bill, which occupied and agitated this session, was one in favour of those who had not taken the oath abjuring the Prince of Wales by the day named, and granting another year for reflection. It was urged on one side that the whole Jacobite party had now come entirely into the queen’s interest; but on the other hand, it was maintained that the Jacobites were still corresponding with the court of St. Germain;‡ that French agents were constantly coming and going, and recommending all persons to take the abjuration oath, that they might be capable of employments and seats in the Houses, and, in the end, be a majority in parliament powerful enough to repeal the oath imposed by force, and, with it, the whole of the Act of Succession or Settlement, that destined the crown to the Hanover line. The Tories in the Commons carried their point, and sent up this bill of indulgence for political offenders to the Lords. Their lordships added several clauses, one declaring it high treason to endeavour to change the succession to the crown as fixed by law, or to set aside the Princess Sophia, the next lawful successor; and another for sending the abjuration oath to Ireland, and obliging all there to take it in the same manner as it had been taken in England. To the surprise of most people, the Tories in the Commons consented to these two clauses; and, in the end, the whole of the bill, as amended by the Lords, was agreed to, but only by a majority of one. Burnet, who continued to overvalue such fragile securities as imposed oaths, says,—“All people were surprised to see a bill that was begun in favour of the Jacobites turned so terribly upon them; since, by it, we had a new security given, both in England and Ireland, for a Protestant successor.”

A. D. 1703.—The clamour against the former reign and its Whig ministers was still kept up. A committee of the House of Commons prepared a long address to the queen, laying the whole of the increase of the national debt at the door of the Whigs. This step followed a report made by a commission appointed to examine the state of the public accounts, and which incupulated Lord Rane-

lugh, paymaster of the army, and Lord Halifax, auditor of the exchequer. The first of these lords, whose reputation was none of the best, was expelled the House of Commons, of which he was a member, and compelled to resign his place; yet, according to Burnet, he appeared, upon all this inquiry, to be much more innocent than even his friends had believed him, there being only "a few inconsiderable articles, of some hundreds of pounds, proved, or half proved, against him." The Tories had charged him with millions! His profitable post was presently divided into two parts, and the best was given to Mr. Howe. Halifax was a member of the Upper House, and the majority of the Lords espoused his cause, and vindicated his character in a very decided resolution. Hereupon the Commons denied the competency of their lordships to interfere in any such matter, or to pass any vote of acquittal where the matter charged consisted of money, &c. This produced another violent quarrel, and drove both Houses to the press to explain their several motives and conduct. More serious consequences might have ensued if the queen had not suddenly prorogued parliament on the 27th of February. During this session the Lords had gained a great reputation throughout the country by their opposition to the Tory House of Commons. To strengthen their party in the Upper House, and to have a clear majority there, the Tories induced the queen, soon after the prorogation, to create four of the most violent members of the Commons peers. The four selected Tories were Finch, Levesson Gower, Granville, and Seymour. Harvey, though a Whig, was at the same time made a baron by private favour. "Great reflections," says Burnet, "were made upon these promotions. When some severe things had been thrown out in the House of Commons upon the opposition that they met with from the Lords, it was insinuated there that it would be easy to find men of merit and estate to make a clear majority in that House. This was an open declaration of a design to put everything in the hands and power of that party; it was also an encroachment on one of the tenderest points of the prerogative to make motions of creating peers in the House of Commons."

During the sitting of parliament a convocation of the clergy had continued its labours. Like the national parliament, the churchmen thus assembled were divided into an Upper and a Lower House; and, like the parliament in this present session, these two Houses disagreed and quarrelled with one another. The churchmen in the Lower House wished to cast some reflections on the preceding reign; but, as most of the bishops owed their promotion to William, and were personally pointed at in these reflections, they absolutely refused to concur. After this, the Lower House of Convocation sent an address to the bishops to suggest the expediency of putting an end to those disputes about privileges, &c., which had put a stop to the proceedings of former meetings. The prelates, while making some concessions, expressed their determination of supporting their own authority. Then the Lower House wished to refer the points in question to the decision of the queen, and of those her majesty might appoint. The bishops, after making the due loyal professions, said that the rights which the constitution of the church had vested in them were trusts which they were to convey to their successors as they had received them from their predecessors; so that they could not refer them to any one. Upon this the inferior clergy courted the favour and sought the assistance of the House of Commons; but the Tories there would not engage further than to vote that they would stand by them in all their just rights. They then made a separate application to the queen, desiring her protection, as if they were warring with Papists or Turks, and begging her majesty to determine the dispute. Neither the queen, however nor any of her ministers for her, gave any answer to this application for the royal interference. By this noisy opposition to their bishops the members of the Lower House of Convocation had incurred the suspicion of being Presbyterians, and enemies of subordination and of the whole hierarchy. To remove these, they suddenly voted that episcopacy was of divine and apostolical right; and, having signed a declaration to this effect, they carried it up to the bishops, desiring their concurrence. By a statute of Henry VIII.'s time, no canon or constitution was legal without the royal licence previously obtained, and a præmunire was incurred by any attempt to make such canon or constitution. The bishops resolved not to entertain the proposition. Thereupon the clergy in the Lower House, who knew and could practise all the arts and tricks of a merely lay assembly, prayed that the bishops would enter in their books that they had not concurred in that definition of the divine and apostolical character of episcopacy, &c. This manœuvre was looked upon as a masterpiece; if the bishops agreed with the request, the members of the Lower House gained their point—if their lordships refused, they could throw upon them the suspicions under which they had themselves laboured, and tax them with being secret friends of presbytery! But the prelates saw through the device, and replied that they acquiesced in that declaration about the rights and character of episcopacy which was already in the preface to the book of ordinations; and that they did not think it safe to go further in that matter without a royal licence. The convocation ended with the prorogation of parliament; the Lower and the Upper House, like the Commons and Lords, being apparently fixed in opposition and animosity to one another.* Hot disputes continued to prevail among

* Burnet. The Whig bishop continues,—"From those disputes in convocation divisions ran through the whole body of the clergy, and to fix these new names were found out: they were distinguished by the names of high church and low church. All that treated the dissenters with temper and moderation, and were for residing constantly at their cures, and for labouring diligently in them; that expressed a zeal against the Prince of Wales, and for the Revolution; that wished well to the present war, and to the alliance against France;

the teachers of peace and good-will to all men. Precisely the same disposition had existed in the preceding reign; but, for various reasons, the chief among which was William's firm determination to take part with neither, the two church factions had not been able to make so much noise. But now Anne warmly favoured the high-church party, and gave importance to every dispute by entering into the merits of it. As an important part of her prerogative and right divine, Anne assumed the power of performing miracles—that is, she had revived the revolting practice of touching for the scrofula or king's evil, and her clergy had inserted in the liturgy and prayer-book an office to be used during that performance.* The war continued to rage at many points at once, and both by sea and land.

The Duke of Savoy, upon seeing the successes in Italy of Prince Eugene, began to waver in his alliance with Louis XIV., and the King of Portugal absolutely detached himself from the French, and entered into the grand alliance this spring. These defections were of the utmost importance to the French monarch; who, moreover, was distracted and distressed by the insurrection, within his own territories, of the oppressed Protestants of the Cevennes, a mountainous country bordering on the frontier of Catalonia. The Duke of Marlborough saw the advantages that might be derived from this formidable insurrection; and he proposed to the English ministry that assistance should be sent to the insurgents, and all means adopted for fomenting the troubles in the Cevennes. This was the "good old plan," so dear to Burchell and Queen Elizabeth, and so often acted upon by France as well as by England and other nations. Louis had repeatedly encouraged insurrection in the dominions of the emperor;—he was at this very moment in a close correspondence with the oppressed Protestants in Hungary and Bohemia; and under his especial patronage the Hungarians were now organising a most important insurrection against the emperor. Yet Lord Nottingham and the other partisans of passive obedience strongly opposed

Marlborough's proposition, simply upon the grounds of the injustice and the impolicy of assisting rebel subjects against their legitimate sovereign. To the higher view of the case, which exposes the iniquities of such an interference, these men were never capable of ascending. Their opposition was, however, overruled in the cabinet; supplies of arms and ammunition were forwarded to the Cevennes, direct communications were established, and a considerable body of Louis's troops, instead of being marched to the great seat of the war in Flanders and on the Rhine, were kept at home to prevent the spread of this dangerous insurrection. At the same time brilliant offers were made to the Duke of Savoy, who might have wavered again; as, at the close of the preceding year, fortune had seemed to turn against Prince Eugene, who was cooped up by the Duke of Vendome, the general to whom Louis had recently entrusted the war in that direction, between the Secchia and the Po, on a narrow strip of country exhausted by the preceding operations. And on the Rhine events had occurred, after Marlborough's campaign of the preceding year, that greatly tended to revive the spirit of the French. The Elector of Bavaria, who at last declared openly for France, had surprised Ulm, and had opened a communication with the French on the Upper Rhine; and on the 14th of October, when Marlborough was on his way to winter-quarters, Marshal Villars had defeated the Margrave of Baden, and cleared the passages leading to the Black Forest, while Marshal Tallard, on the other hand, extended his force along the Upper Rhine and Moselle, and reduced Treves and Traerbach. The Germans were thus prevented from profiting by the reduction of Landau, and were hemmed in at Stolhoffen, in as bad a plight as Prince Eugene. Louis had determined to open the campaign of the present year with the utmost vigour, and a mighty plan had been conceived for the utter destruction of the house of Austria. While Marshal Villeroy was again to threaten the Dutch frontier, and occupy Marlborough in that corner, the troops on the Upper Rhine were to march through the defiles of the Black Forest, and join the Bavarians; from beyond the Alps the Duke of Vendome was to open his way through the Tyrol; and these two armies, moving in different directions, and favoured in the very heart of the empire by the Elector of Cologne, as well as by the Bavarians, were to form a junction between the Inn and the Danube, were to call upon the insurgents in Hungary, and then, like a torrent swollen, were to roll on to Vienna. In accordance with this grand plan, Marshal Villars broke up from his cantonments before the winter was finished, surprised several bodies of Germans in their quarters, and on the 9th of March, eight days before Marlborough arrived at the Hague, he reduced the important town of Kehl. And soon after this, leaving Tallard to keep the Margrave of Baden in check at Stolhoffen, Villars struck through the Black Forest, and de-

were represented as secret favourers of presbytery, and as ill-affected to the church, and were called low churchmen. It was said that they were in the church only while the law and preformations were on its side; but that they were ready to give it up as soon as they saw a proper time for declaring themselves. With these false and invidious characters did the high party endeavour to load all those who could not be brought into their measures and designs.

* It appears by the newspapers of the time that on the 30th of March, 1714, two hundred persons were touched by Queen Anne. Amongst these was Samuel Johnson, afterwards the justly celebrated moral writer. He was sent by the advice of Sir John Floyer, then a physician at Lehigh; and many years afterwards, being asked if he remembered Queen Anne, said he had a confused, but somehow a kind of solemn recollection, of a lady in diamonds, and a long black hood. The Honourable Daines Barrington has preserved an anecdote, which he heard from an old man who was witness in a cause with respect to this supposed miraculous power of healing. "He had, by his evidence, fixed the time of a fact, by Queen Anne's having been at Oxford, and touched him, whilst a child, for the evil. When he had finished his evidence, I had an opportunity of asking him whether he was really cured? Upon which he answered, with a significant smile, that he believed himself to have never had any complaint that deserved to be considered as the evil; but that his parents were poor, and had no objection to the bit of gold." The learned and honourable writer very properly observes on this occasion, "that this piece of gold which was given to those who were touched, accounts for the great resort upon this occasion, and the supposed afterwards miraculous cures." Peggs, Curialia.

scended into Bavaria, where he was joined by the Elector, who had already defeated the Austrians, driven them beyond the Inn and the Danube (thus leaving clear the proposed point of junction), and taken Neuburg and Ratisbon, in which imperial city a diet was assembled to pronounce his forfeiture, and put him to the ban of the empire. Count Styrum moved with 20,000 of the emperor's troops to free the Margrave of Baden; but, by the advice of Villars, the Elector of Bavaria threw himself between these two imperial forces, attacked the Count near Donawert, and completely routed him. Continuing this career of success, the French and Bavarians took Augsburg, and lay across what seemed an open road to the old walls of Vienna. But they were not cheered by any sight of the heads of columns which the Duke of Vendome was to lead from Italy through the Tyrol; the Elector and the French general disagreed, and Villars, who was wanted to look after the insurgents in the Cevennes, was recalled. And from this moment the grand scheme tottered.

It was the 17th of March ere Marlborough arrived in the Low Countries. Death had relieved him from the jealousies of the Prince of Saarbruch, and of the Earl of Athlone; and he found himself comparatively without a rival. By his advice, the Prussians had been acting during a part of the winter, as well as the French, and they had reduced in the month of February the fortress of Rheinberg, whence they had proceeded to blockade Guelder, the only place still held by the enemy in Spanish Guelderland. Marlborough found Holland still threatened on her frontier by Villeroi and Boufflers, who had commenced operations for recovering the strong places on the Meuse, from which he had driven them the year before. It appears to have been the design of the English general to act upon the offensive, and to invade French Flanders and Brabant; but the States-General preferred beginning with the siege of Bonn, flattering themselves that the Elector would capitulate rather than risk the ruin of his town. "I wish" says Marlborough, in a letter to Lord Godolphin, "it may prove so; for otherwise it will cost us a great many men, and a good deal of time, which we might expend more usefully in Brabant, now that a great many of their troops are gone towards Germany."⁹ He repaired to Nimeguen to concert with Cohorne the plan for the siege of Bonn. He then inspected the fortifications and garrisons of Venloo, Ruremond, and Maestricht, and the other places he had taken on the Meuse. This done, he crossed the country to Cologne, where he felt "a good deal of spleen," for nothing was ready for the siege, and Cohorne coolly proposed to let it alone till the end of the year. Marlborough, however, gave orders for investing the place, and proceeded to Bonn, with forty battalions, sixty squadrons, and a hundred pieces of artillery. The trenches were opened on the 3rd of May, and the Marquis d'Allegre capitulated on the 15th. During the siege the news from Germany continued to be "very ill;" and Villeroi and Boufflers, who had manoeuvred in vain to save Bonn, seemed to be increasing their strength upon the Meuse. Marlborough, however, returned to his former plan of transferring the war into the heart of Brabant and French Flanders; the Dutch generals Cohorne, Spaar, and Opdam were detached to Bergen-op-Zoom to forward the necessary preparations; and, as a part of this plan, an English fleet with a strong land force on board was to alarm the French coast from Calais to Dieppe, and, in conjunction with the Dutch troops, to make a descent near the latter place. With 59 battalions, and 129 squadrons, Marlborough crossed the river Year, close under the walls of Maestricht; and, near the heights of Hautain, between that river and the Meuse, he surprised a considerable part of the French army, and nearly cut them off. The French, who had so long been accustomed to slow movements on the part of the allies, had no expectation of such rapid ones; they retreated in confusion, destroyed the works of Tongres, and fled, without halting, three leagues beyond Thys. Marlborough fixed his camp at Thys, and there he was greatly disconcerted and vexed; for he learned that Cohorne had obtained the consent of the States-General to employ his troops in making an irruption into the country of Waes, where he hoped to levy large contributions—"which," says Marlborough, who had no objection to such prey himself, "these people like but too well."¹⁰ This entirely deranged the plan of the English general, who had intended in the first place to reduce Antwerp and Ostend, two places of the utmost importance; but he was obliged to remain inactive, keeping as near to the French army as possible, till Cohorne's expedition was over. "At this time," he says to Godolphin, "the strength of the French army is 118 squadrons, and 61 battalions; ours consists of 125 squadrons, and 59 battalions, but our battalions are stronger than theirs, so that I think we have a good deal the superiority, which is very plainly the opinion of the French, since they always decamp when we come near them." And Marlborough had other troubles; the confederates on the Upper Rhine were clamouring for reinforcements, and there were some both in England and Holland who would have greatly weakened the army in the Netherlands to send them succour. "This," said Marlborough, "would only answer the purpose of bringing things here into the same condition as they are there;" and he so far prevailed, that only twenty battalions and eight squadrons were detached to that quarter. His heart was set upon the taking of Ostend and Antwerp, but it was not till the 10th of June that he could move anywhere. Then he marched upon Hanef. In this march he expected an engagement, but the French

retreated to a position on the Mehaigne. From his camp at Hanef, Marlborough wrote to urge Cohorne to prepare for the siege of Antwerp, and at the same time expressed to his friends in England a confident hope of bringing the French to a general battle, which he thought would be "a far greater advantage to the common cause than the taking of twenty towns." At this moment the French occupied lines which extended from the Mehaigne to Antwerp, as also a series of fortifications stretching from Antwerp towards Ostend; and to maintain these defences they had two flying camps—one under Bedmar near Antwerp, the other under Delamotte near Bruges. When Cohorne was ready to act, he took up a position near Stabroek, east of the Scheldt, and about four miles north of Antwerp: Opdam was posted at Bergen-op-Zoom, with a good body of fresh troops, who were suddenly to advance upon Antwerp: General Spaar was detached to occupy the attention of Delamotte, and to maintain a communication with Cohorne, while Marlborough himself was to harass and detain the main army of the French, and at a given moment to enter the lines between Lierre and Antwerp. This was a combined movement, or series of movements, from different points, always difficult to execute—a good plan, but liable to be disconcerted by a hundred accidents, and by the slightest imprudence or want of regularity in any one of the co-operating columns. The French main carefully avoided an action; they were thrown into consternation by Marlborough's sudden march to Opheer; but after passing a whole night under arms, they felt themselves safe upon some strong ground near Landen. "Since we had no action yesterday," says Marlborough, writing to his wife on the 17th of June, "I believe we shall have none this campaign; for the French are now in a very strong country, and go behind their lines when they please." Cohorne and his Dutchmen, who had generally been accused of being too slow, were now too fast. Cohorne himself on the 15th of June, had crossed the Scheldt to Liefenshoek, and formed a junction with Spaar, who had been looking after Delamotte; and on the following morning these two Dutch generals made a combined attack on the French lines near Antwerp. Spaar penetrated as far as Steenbroek, suffering considerable loss; Cohorne forced the works at the point of Callo, and reduced fort St. Anthony. But Marlborough was not, and could not possibly be at hand, and it was the evening of the 18th before Opdam got up from Bergen-op-Zoom to the village of Ekeren, a little to the north of Antwerp, where he established himself in an isolated position, being left without support by Cohorne's crossing the Scheldt. The French, though no longer led by the genius of a Turenne, a Condé, or a Luxembourg, saw the gross mistake committed, and profited by it. Boufflers, with 20,000 men, principally cavalry, marched in all haste for Antwerp. Marlborough endeavoured, but in vain, to keep up with him. Boufflers reached Antwerp, united his forces with those of Bedmar, and completely routed Opdam's division. Opdam himself fled like a blockhead, but his second in command availed himself of the dykes, rallied the troops, repulsed some charges, and effected a retreat to Lillo with comparatively little loss. But by this movement Boufflers had wholly disconcerted Marlborough's grand object of gaining Antwerp; and all that the allies could do during the rest of this campaign was, to take the towns of Huy, Limburg, and Gelders.

In his letters, Marlborough throws the entire blame upon the Dutch generals and the Dutch field-deputies; but those functionaries, on their side, inculpated him; and in some respects his conduct was, perhaps, open to military criticism. It may be that his attention was distracted by the political intrigues and feuds carrying on in England, where his former friends, the Tories, were devising his disgrace, and where his busy wife was maintaining a most cordial intercourse with the Whigs, in the view of bringing about a coalition between Marlborough and that party. The general insisted that affairs could never be well managed so long as Lord Nottingham remained in the ministry and joined with Seymour and other Tories in obstructing business. Godolphin took the same view of the case, but he was forced to undergo the bitter reproaches of the queen whenever he ventured to speak of the necessity of removing Nottingham and employing Whigs. At one moment Godolphin, himself the main stay of Marlborough in the cabinet, was well nigh resigning and withdrawing from public affairs altogether. That minister's situation in the cabinet and at court was, indeed, so irksome, that his friend was obliged to confess that he would rather be where he was, notwithstanding the Dutch, who "made his life a burden," and all the hardships incident to war. "I hear so much of the unreasonable animosities of parties," says Marlborough in a letter to Godolphin, "that I pity you with all my heart. I have very little rest here, but I should have less quiet of mind if I were obliged to be in your station." At the same time the Whigs, who were not yet sure of their man, assailed Marlborough with importunities, while others, less sanguine, criticised his operations in the field, and made him the subject of satires and lampoons.

On the other side, the far grander plan of the French, of concentrating their forces upon the Danube and capturing Vienna, had gone absolutely to wreck. Vendome, who was to advance through the passes of the Alps from Italy, was obstructed by the brave Tyrolese, who fought gallantly for their old family sovereign, the emperor, and for their own independence; and he was still further impeded by the now avowed defection of the Duke of Savoy, who had made a very profitable bargain with the emperor, England, and Holland, the maritime powers agreeing, among other things, to pay him a monthly subsidy of 80,000 crowns. In the mean time, to obviate the objection against uniting the crown of Spain with those of Austria and the empire, Leopold and his eldest son Joseph renounced their claims to the Spanish succession in favour of the Archduke Charles, the second son of that house. This young prince was accordingly proclaimed king of Spain at Vienna, and, that ceremony being over, the emperor, his father, made preparations to send him to Portugal (which country was further confirmed to the grand alliance)* by way of Holland and England. About the middle of September the Archduke or King Charles of Spain, the Indies, &c., set out from Vienna on his journey: passing through the territories of the Elector of Hanover, he was met by that prince, and complimented on his accession; at Dusseldorf he was received, on the 16th of October, by the Elector Palatine and by the Duke of Marlborough, who was charged by her majesty of England with congratulations to the young sovereign. Marlborough, who was at least as good a courtier as he was a general, said, "I have just had the honour of putting your majesty in possession of Limburg." According to a current story, which may be true or not, the Catholic king took his sword from his side, and gave it to the duke, saying, "I am as yet but a poor prince; I have nothing but my cloak and my sword; the latter may be of use to your grace, and I hope you will not esteem it the worse from my wearing it one day." Marlborough, it is added, kissed the diamonded hilt, and pledged himself to hazard his life and all that was dear to him in rendering Charles the greatest prince of Christendom. The king without a kingdom, and the fortunate general who was in the course of acquiring almost wealth enough to buy one, travelled on together to the Hague, where the States-General received them both with nearly equal honour. Marlborough hastened over to England on the last day of October, but presently was dispatched from court to Portsmouth, to compliment his majesty of Spain on his happy arrival in the dominions of England, and to conduct him to Windsor Castle.† Charles well knew that the Duchess of Marlborough was as important a personage as the duke: he made some splendid presents to both of them, and treated the proud beauty—beautiful still, though a grandmother—with respect and gallantry. When the duchess, doing her court duty to a royal personage, offered him the basin and ewer, he took them from her hand and held them

But there were other scenes to go through far less complimentary and courtly. The parliament assembled on the 9th of November. The speech of the queen was warlike and confident. She announced the advantages secured to herself and her allies by the treaty with the King of Portugal and the declaration of the Duke of Savoy, which, she said, were, in great measure, to be imputed to the cheerfulness with which her parliament had supported her in this war, which there was now a fair prospect of bringing to a glorious and speedy conclusion. William, in his treaties, and in his formation of the grand alliance, had stopped far short of the point which Anne now took up, and which tended to lengthen the war beyond the period when war was needful or politic, and, in the end, to deprive England of the advantages which she might and ought to have secured by the costly and blood-wasting struggle. She announced, in short, that it was the intention of the allies "to recover the monarchy of Spain from the House of Bourbon, and restore it to the House of Austria." The treaty which she had lately made with the King of Portugal to this end, she added, would occasion great expense; and the subsidies which would be immediately required by the Duke of Savoy would occasion a further necessary charge. She further observed to them that, though the funds for the civil government had been diminished by the war, she had been obliged to contribute out of her own revenue towards some public services, as particularly the support of the circle of Suabia, whose steadiness and firm adherence to the interest of the allies, under the greatest pressures, had well deserved such seasonable assistance. She expressed a wish for the adoption of some more easy and less chargeable method for the speedy and effectual manning of the fleet; and that some regulations might be devised for preventing the excessive price of coals. In conclusion, she expressed her earnest hope that they would carefully avoid, in this session, any heats or divisions that might give encouragement to the common enemies of the church and state. On the 11th of November the Commons presented a very complaisant address, thanking her majesty for all that had been done, and assuring her that they would support her in all her alliances, new and old, &c. On the 12th the Lords presented an address quite as warm, expressing their satisfaction at the zeal with which her majesty espoused the public interest, even beyond the obligations of her treaties. Neither Lords nor Commons remonstrated against the dangerous intention of carrying on the war till Charles of Austria was seated on the Spanish throne. The Commons resolved that the army should be raised to 55,000 men, the navy to 40,000 sailors and marines; and they voted the necessary supplies with great readi-

* In the month of July the combined fleet of England and Holland, consisting of forty-nine ships, under the command of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, came to anchor before Lisbon, where they remained a whole week to encourage his majesty of Portugal to continue firm, and to promise protection to his coasts against the French. Admiral Shovel afterwards sailed through the Straits, made some descents on the coast of Valencia, and detached two ships to the gulf of Narbonne, with the arms and ammunition destined for the insurgents in the Cevennes.

† The King of Spain, landing at Portsmouth, came to Windsor, where he was magnificently entertained by the queen, and behaved himself so nobly, that everybody was taken with his graceful deportment. After two days, having presented the great ladies and others with very valuable jewels, he went back to Portsmouth and immediately embarked for Spain.—Evelyn's Diary.

ness. But a new storm was raised by the re-introduction of the Occasional Conformity Bill, shorn of some of its penalties, but still severe and irritating to all classes of men that differed from the established church. It was again carried triumphantly through the House of Commons, upon the old pretence that the church was in danger; but in the House of Lords it encountered a much stronger opposition than in the preceding session, and the second reading was negatived by a majority of 71 to 59. "It is not for me," says Roger Coke, "to pretend to give a reason why there was so great a majority this year in comparison of last year, where there was not above one or two odds: one should think the new-made lords might have added such a weight to the balance on the other side, as to have carried it cleverly; but the event has proved the contrary, and so we believe it dormant.*" But unluckily the spirit which dictated the Bill was not dormant.

On the 17th of December, her majesty, after giving her assent to the Land-tax Bill, took occasion to inform the House of Commons that she had received unquestionable information of ill practices and designs carrying on in Scotland by emissaries from France, which might have proved extremely dangerous to the peace of these kingdoms, as they would see by the particulars which should be laid before them as soon as they could be made public without prejudice. The Lords, having appointed a committee to examine some persons implicated in this Scottish plot, afterwards committed some of them to the custody of the black rod, who took them from the queen's messengers. Their lordships, however, soon sent back their prisoners and left them to the disposal of the secretaries of state. But the Tory majority in the Commons, who were irritated by their second defeat on the Occasional Conformity Bill, "made a handle of the matter," and voted an address to the queen, expressive of their great and just concern at this violation of the royal prerogative. "Your faithful Commons," said they, "believe the administration of the government best secured when it is left to your majesty, with whom the law has entrusted it; and have so firm a dependence upon your majesty's affection to your people, and your great wisdom, that they can never apprehend so little danger from any conspiracy, as when the examination thereof is under your majesty's direction. We are, therefore, surprised to find that, when several persons suspected of treasonable practices against your majesty were taken into custody by your messengers, in order to be examined, the Lords, in violation of the known laws of the land, have wrested them out of your majesty's hands, and without your majesty's leave or knowledge, in a most extraordinary manner, taken the examination of them solely to themselves; whereby a due examination into evil practices and designs against your majesty's person and government may in a manner be obstructed. Your loyal Commons do therefore most earnestly desire your majesty to suffer no diminution of that prerogative, which, during your majesty's reign, they are confident will always be exerted for the good of your people." And then, after repeating their assurances about timely and effectual supplies of money for the wars abroad, they assured her majesty that they would, to the utmost of their power, support her in the exercise of her just prerogatives at home, and against all invasions whatsoever. Prerogative was a word which Anne loved most to hear after that of church; but she was anxious to avoid rather than promote any collision between the two Houses, and she told the Commons that the matter which had occasioned their address was now at an end. The Lords, however, could not pass over that address without notice; and to vindicate their honour and assert their privileges they resolved and declared— "That, by the known laws and customs of parliament, they have an undoubted right, whenever they conceive it to be for the safety of her majesty and the kingdom, to take examinations of persons charged with criminal matters, whether they be in custody or not; and to order that persons to be so examined be taken into custody of her majesty's sworn officer attending their House" (the black rod); and "That the address of the Commons was unparliamentary, groundless, without precedent, and highly injurious to the House of Peers, tending to interrupt the good correspondence between the two Houses, and create an ill opinion in her majesty of their House, and of dangerous consequences to the liberties of the people, the constitution of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament." And then they appointed a committee to draw up a representation, which, when ready, they presented to the queen. Anne replied that she was very sorry for these misunderstandings, which were so inconvenient for the public service, and so uneasy to her that she could not but take notice with satisfaction of their assurance that they were anxious to avoid all such quarrels; and then she thanked them as she had done the Commons, for their great concern for the rights of the crown and for her prerogative.

The affair which gave rise to this prolonged quarrel was what is commonly called "Fraser's plot," the hero of which was Simon Fraser of Lovat, who, in the preceding reign, had led his family clan, with pybroch playing, to join the banner of Dundee; and who, from his early youth to his final exit in his old age upon a scaffold on Tower Hill, was engaged in plots and conspiracies and the most lawless enterprises. This Fraser of Lovat had a genius for iniquity—a cultivated intellect with the heart of a savage. He had brutally violated the sister of Lord Atholl, and, upon his consequent outlawry, had settled in France, the language of which country he spoke like a native. The nature of his offence, and the immorality and violence of his whole life and character, were no obstacle to his being received into the favour and confidence of the devout court of St. Germain. He undertook to excite a fresh insurrection in the mountains of Scotland, and to assemble 12,000 Highlanders for the Prince of Wales, if the court of France would only contribute a few regular troops, some officers, arms, ammunition, and money. Louis XIV. entered into the project; but, as so many schemes of the same kind had signally failed, and as he had no great confidence in Fraser's sincerity, he insisted that the outlaw should first return to Scotland, with two persons upon whom his majesty might rely, and who were instructed to examine the Highlands and sound the clans themselves. But Fraser no sooner reached Scotland with these two individuals, than he privately discovered the whole plot to the Duke of Queensberry, undertaking to make him acquainted with the whole correspondence between the Scottish Jacobites and the courts of St. Germain and Versailles. Queensberry, who had reasons for suspecting many persons of name and influence, concluded a bargain with the double dealer, gave Fraser a pass to secure him from arrest or molestation, and sent him into the Highlands, where he was to learn and report to the minister who were determined Jacobites, ready for insurrection and civil war, and who were not. Before setting out upon this treacherous, trepanning circuit, Fraser delivered to the duke a letter from the Queen-dowager Maria d'Este, directed to the Marquess of Atholl, whose sister the civilised ruffian had dishonoured, and whose prosecution of him for that offence he sought to avenge through a sentence for treason and death on the scaffold. After his journey in the Highlands, Fraser proposed returning to France, where, as he affirmed, he could obtain still more ample evidence, learn all the schemes and plots going on at the court of St. Germain, and disconcert them all by leading the plotters into false tracks. The Duke of Queensberry procured him a passport, but under a feigned name, from the Earl of Nottingham, and Fraser went off for France by way of Holland. Queensberry communicated his discovery secretly to the queen, and Anne's own spies at Paris confirmed the particulars of the plot for a rising in the Highlands. At the same time Sir John Maclean, the head of a clan, was arrested with his wife at Folkestone, in Kent, where he had landed from the French coast, and was carried up to London in the custody of the queen's messengers. Maclean, on first being examined in the Secretary of State's (Nottingham's) office, pretended that his intention was merely to go through England into Scotland, in order to submit to the present government, and to take the benefit of the queen's pardon; but, subsequently, he confessed that there had been some consultation at St. Germain about sending over a body of troops to join the malcontents in Scotland. Maclean further gave the clue for discovering and apprehending one Keith, whose uncle was one of the two that had accompanied Fraser from France at the desire of King Louis or his minister. This Keith, the nephew, confessed in his prison that there was a design on foot for securing the crowns of England and Scotland for the young Pretender, after her present majesty's death.* At nearly the same moment, Mr. David Lindsay, who had been under-secretary to King James and the Prince of Wales, was arrested; † and Mr. James Boucher, who had been aide-de-camp to James's natural son, the Duke of Berwick, was taken on the coast of Sussex, coming clandestinely from France. According to their own account, they all came proposing to live peaceably at home under her majesty's happy government; and at this moment the far-famed presbyterian preacher, Ferguson, whose hand was in every plot, came in voluntarily, and declared his readiness to disclose all that he knew of the matter. This knowledge was such as might have been expected from the character of the man and the nature of the whole transaction: he affirmed that Fraser was indeed employed by the Duke of Queensberry, her majesty's high commissioner in Scotland, to draw some persons into a plot; but there was, in reality, no Jacobite plot at this time; for they were very glad to see one of the race of the Stuarts upon the throne; though they hoped that matters would be so compromised that the queen might enjoy the crown for life, and that her brother might succeed her. Where men like this Ferguson and Fraser of Lovat were concerned, and where Queensberry, for the old state reasons, had promoted double-dealing and machination, it was not probable that the truth should be easily arrived at. It may be, as affirmed by Ferguson, that Queensberry, whose fears were excited, and whose power was on the decline, lent a too ready ear to the greatest of the villains, and even encouraged Fraser to disclose more than he knew, or more than was strictly true; yet at the same time we are disposed to believe that plots were actually on foot in Scotland. The nearly simultaneous arrival of the several Jacobites is a suspicious circumstance, and, as there is ample evidence to show that there was a most extensive conspiracy in Scotland, with a design for support-

* "When I heard this," says Burnet. "I could not but remember what the Marquess of Atholl had said to myself, soon after the queen's coming to the crown. I said I hoped none in Scotland thought of the Prince of Wales. He answered, he knew none that thought of him as long as the queen lived. I replied, that, if any thought of him after that, I was sure the queen would live no longer than till they thought their designs for him were well laid: but he seemed to have no apprehensions of that. I presently told the queen this, without naming the person; and she answered me very quick, there was no manner of doubt of that."

† Burnet says that this Lindsay had served first under James's Catholic secretary, the Earl of Melfort, and then under his Protestant secretary, the Earl of Middleton; that he had, years before, brought over from France, the letters and orders that gave rise to Dundee's insurrection; that he had always been much trusted at St. Germain, and so it was not doubted that that he came hither to manage the correspondence and intrigues. "He pretended he knew of no designs against the queen and her government; and that the court of St. Germain's, and the Earl of Middleton in particular, had no design against the queen; but when he was showed Fraser's commission to be a colonel, signed by the pretended king, and countersigned by Middleton, he seemed amazed at it; he did not pretend it was a forgery, but he said that things of that kind were never communicated to him."

ing it in France, in the years 1706 and 1707,* in which the Frasers, Atholl, and others were engaged, it is not unreasonable to believe that there might have been something of the same sort in the years 1703 and 1704. Upon the arrest of Boucher, who was well known, and who was suspected of being "sent on great designs," the House of Lords, apprehending a remissness in the ministry in searching and examining those who came from France, requested that the said Boucher might be well looked to, and that Sir John Maclean might be brought before them. After some delay the Earl of Nottingham told the House that the prisoners were brought up, and that they might do with them as they pleased. And it was then that their lordships had committed them for a short time to the custody of the black rod, and had named a committee of seven to examine all the prisoners,—the circumstance which had excited such a storm in the Commons. Boucher persisted in denying his participation in, or knowledge of, any plot: he said he was weary of living so long out of his native country, and that, being unable to obtain a pass, he had preferred throwing himself upon the queen's mercy to wasting the rest of his life in exile. This story obtained no credit, and the Lords prayed, in an address to her majesty, that the man might have no hopes of pardon "till he was more sincere in his discoveries." He was then prosecuted on the statute of treason; confessed his crime (for it was impossible to deny that he had been in arms against the government established by the Revolution), and received sentence of death. But he continued still to deny that he knew anything of this particular conspiracy, or Fraser's plot. "Few," says Burnet, "could believe this; yet, there being no special matter laid against him, his case was to be pitied: he proved that he had saved the lives of many prisoners, during the war of Ireland, and that, during the war in Flanders, he had been very careful of all English prisoners: and when all this was laid before the Lords, they did not think fit to carry the matter farther; so he was relieved, and that matter slept." But it slept merely for Boucher, who died soon after in Newgate.

A. D. 1704.—On the 29th of January the Earl of Nottingham informed the House that the queen had commanded him to lay before them the papers containing all the particulars hitherto discovered of the conspiracy in Scotland; but that there was one circumstance which could not be communicated without running the risk of preventing a discovery of still greater importance. Nottingham had been all along suspected of a desire to cover the conspirators, or at least to make the conspiracy appear as a very insignificant affair. The papers produced went merely to show that many messages had been exchanged between the courts of St. Germain and Versailles with relation to the affairs of Scotland; that the French king was willing to send an army to Scotland, but desired to be well-assured beforehand of the assistance that might be expected there, and that Fraser of Lovat and two others had come over to ascertain that point. The Lords, dissatisfied, ordered their committee to pursue their examination, which they insisted would lead to the discovery of much more important facts than Nottingham had chosen to reveal. The Tory majority in the Commons struck in again, went with a new address to the queen, insisting on their former complaints against their lordships for wresting the matter out of the queen's hands and taking it wholly into their own, and praying her majesty to resume her just prerogative. And, still further to support the head of their party, they had presented a resolution that the Earl of Nottingham, for his great ability and diligence in the execution of his office, for his unquestionable fidelity to the queen, and for his steady adherence to the church of England, highly merited the trust her majesty reposed in him. But all this could neither save Nottingham, nor stop the scrutiny. The committee of the Lords went on with their examinations, and after some days presented a very full and alarming report—for, if the Commons were inclined to treat the matter too lightly, their lordships, on the other hand, had determined to make the most of it. After the report was read, the Upper House came to the following unanimous resolution:—"That it did appear to them that there had been a dangerous conspiracy carried on for the raising a rebellion in Scotland, and invading that kingdom with a French power, in order to the subverting of her majesty's government, both in England and Scotland, and the bringing in the pretended Prince of Wales: and that they were of opinion that nothing had given so much encouragement to this conspiracy as the Scots not coming yet into the Hanover succession, as fixed in England." And in an address they besought the queen to use her endeavours to have the succession of the crown of Scotland declared to be settled on the Princess Sophia and the heirs of her body, assuring her majesty that, when her endeavours for settling the succession should have taken effect, they would do all in their power to promote the Union of the two kingdoms. This last assurance was far too important to be overlooked, and Anne, in a short but courteous reply, told their lordships that, she had some time since testified to her subjects in Scotland her earnest desire for their adoption of the Protestant succession, "as the most effectual means for securing their quiet and her own, and the readiest way to an entire Union betwixt both kingdoms; in the perfecting of which it was desirable no time should be lost." After this their lordships drew up and presented an answer to the second address of the Commons, accusing their house of trenching on the royal prerogative. They charged the Lower House with a want of zeal for the queen's safety and the preservation of the country, with having betrayed uneasiness during the whole of their inquiry into the plot, and, with having done all they could to delay and obstruct that inquiry: they quoted a vast number of precedents to justify every step they had taken, and to prove that their conduct in the matter had been strictly regular and parliamentary: and, quitting the defensive and the exculpatory, they taxed the House of Commons with gross partiality and injustice in matters of election.* "The address," says Burnet, "was penned with great care and much force. All these addresses were drawn up by the Lord Somers, and were read over, and considered, and corrected very critically by a few lords, among whom I had the honour to be called for one. This, with the other papers that were published by the Lords, made a great impression on the body of the nation."

But the Occasional Conformity Bill was not the only difference, nor was the Fraser plot the only ground of open quarrel between the two houses during this turbulent session. One Matthew Ashby, a freeman of Aylesbury, brought an action against William White and others, the constables of Aylesbury, for having debarred him from voting at the late election.† The cause was tried at the assizes, and White and his brother constables were cast with damages, the jury finding that Ashby had been admitted to vote in former elections, and that the constables had denied him a right of which he was undoubtedly in possession. But it was moved in the Queen's Bench to annul this sentence and to quash all the proceedings, since no action at common law had ever been brought upon any such account. Three of the judges, Powell, Gould, and Powis, were of opinion that no hurt was done to Ashby; that the judging of elections belonged to the House of Commons; that, as this action was the first of its kind, so, if it was allowed, it would not be the last, but would bring on an infinity of suits, and reduce all the officers concerned in such matters to the greatest difficulties. Lord Chief Justice Holt, though alone, differed from the rest, representing that this was in fact a matter of the greatest importance, both to the nation in general and to every man in it in his own particular; that there was a vast difference between an election of a member and a right to vote in such election: of the former the House of Commons were properly the only judges, and competent to decide whether such election was rightly managed, without bribery, fraud, or violence, or otherwise; but the latter, or the right of voting, was an original right founded either on a freehold of forty shillings a-year in a county, or upon burgage land, or upon a prescription, or upon a charter in a borough; and these were all legal claims and titles recognisable by a court of law. But Holt was one against three; and so the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench went in favour of the constables. By this time the cause occupied the attention of the whole Whig party, and it was brought by a writ of error before the House of Lords. Their lordships heard the case very fully argued at their bar, and called upon the judges to deliver their opinions upon the whole question. And after hearing the judges, and going through another long debate, the Lords, by a great majority, set aside the judgment of the Queen's Bench, and confirmed the judgment given in favour of Ashby at the assizes. This threw the House of Commons into a blaze: they passed five resolutions—against the man of Aylesbury (Ashby) as guilty of a breach of their privileges; against all others who, following his example, should bring any such suit into a court of law; against all counsel, attorneys, and others who should assist in any such suit, &c. They affirmed that the whole matter relating to elections, and the right of examining and determining the qualifications of electors, belonged wholly and solely to them, the Commons of England. And these their resolutions, signed by the clerk of their house, were fixed upon the gates of Westminster Hall. The Upper House lost no time in retorting: they appointed a committee to draw up a state of the case, and upon their report resolved—That every person being wilfully hindered from exercising his right of voting might seek for justice and redress in common courts of law against the officer by whom his vote had been refused; that any assertion to the contrary was destructive of the property of the subject, against the freedom of election, and manifestly tending to the encouragement of partiality and corruption; and, finally, that the declaring Matthew Ashby guilty of a breach of privilege of the House of Commons was an unprecedented attempt upon the judicature of Parliament in the House of Lords, and an attempt to subject the law of England to the will and votes of the House of Commons. And they ordered the lord keeper to send copies of the case and of their votes to all the sheriffs of England, to be by them communicated to all the boroughs in their respective counties. "The House of Commons," says Burnet, "was much provoked with this, but they could not hinder it: the thing

* "They made severe observations on some of the proceedings in the House of Commons, particularly on their not ordering writs to be issued out for some boroughs to proceed to new elections, when they, upon pretence of corruption, had voted an election void; which had been practised of late when it was visible that the election would not fall on the person they favoured. They charged this as a denial of justice, and of the right that such boroughs had to be represented in parliament, and as an arbitrary and illegal way of proceeding."—Burnet.

† In Aylesbury, the return was made by four constables, and it was believed that they made a bargain with some of the candidates, and then managed the matter so as to be sure that the majority should be for the person to whom they had engaged themselves; they canvassed about the town to know how the voters were set, and they resolved to find some pretence for disabling those who were engaged to vote for other persons than their friends, that they might be sure to have the majority in their own hands. And when this matter came to be examined by the House of Commons they gave the election always for him who was reckoned of the party of the majority, in a manner so barefaced, that they were scarce out of countenance when they were charged for injustices in judging elections. It was not easy to find a remedy to such a crying abuse, of which all sides in their turns, as they happened to be the majority, seemed to have forgot all that they had formerly cried out on. Some few excused this on the topick of retaliation; they said they dealt with others as they dealt with them or their friends. At last an action was brought against the constables of Aylesbury, &c."—Burnet.

was popular, and the lords got great credit by the judgment they gave. . . . This may prove a restraint on the returning officers, now that they see they are liable to be sued, and that a vote of the House of Commons cannot cover them."

Towards the close of the session the queen gave what was considered a very unequivocal proof of her attachment to the established church. On the 7th of February Secretary Hedges informed the House of Commons that her majesty, having taken into her serious consideration the mean and insufficient maintenance belonging to the clergy in divers parts of this kingdom, in order to give them some ease, had been pleased to remit the arrears of the tenths to the poor clergy, and that, for an augmentation of their livings, she had declared that she would make a grant of her whole revenue arising out of the first fruits and tenths, as far as it was or should hereafter become free from encumbrances; and that, if the House of Commons could find any proper method by which this good intention might be made more effectual, it would be a great advantage to the public, and very acceptable to her majesty. These tenths amounted to about 11,000*l.* a year, and the first fruits, one year with another, to about 5000*l.*: the money, Burnet tells us, was not brought into the treasury like the other branches of the revenue; but the bishops, who had been the pope's collectors, were now, and had been ever since the Reformation, collectors for the crown, and so persons in favour obtained assignments upon them for life, or for a term of years. "This," adds the bishop, "had never been applied to any good use, but was still obtained by favourites for themselves and their friends: and, in King Charles's time, it went chiefly among his women and his natural children. It seemed strange, that while the clergy had much credit at court they had never represented this as sacrilege unless it was applied to some religious purpose, and that during Archbishop Laud's favour with King Charles I., or at the Restoration of King Charles II., no endeavours had been used to appropriate this to better uses: sacrilege was charged on other things, on very slight grounds; but this, which was more visible, was always forgot." He goes on to lament that no means had formerly been thought of for providing a better subsistence for the poor clergy; "we having then amongst us some hundreds of cures that had not, of certain provision, 20*l.* a year, and some thousands that had not 50*l.* Where the encouragement is so small, what can it be expected clergymen should be? It is a crying scandal that, at the Restoration of King Charles II., the bishops and other dignitaries, who raised much above a million in fines, yet did so little in this way."* The Commons in an address expressed their sense of her majesty's pious concern for the church; and a bill was brought in to enable her majesty to alienate this branch of the revenue, and to create a corporation, by charter, to apply the money, according to the queen's intention, in increasing the miserable stipends of the poorer clergy. Sir John Holland, Sir Joseph Jekyll, and other Whigs, moved that the clergy might be entirely freed from that tax of first fruits and tenths, seeing that they bore their share in other taxes; and that another fund might be raised of equal value for the augmentation of the small benefices; but this was opposed by Musgrave and other Tories, who said that the clergy ought still to be kept in a dependence on the crown. To the act was appended a repeal of the statute of Mortmain, so far, at least, that it might be free to all men to give, by deed or by their last wills, whatever they chose towards the augmenting of benefices. "It was suggested," says Burnet, "but how truly I cannot tell, that this addition was made in hope that it would be rejected by the Lords, and that the scandal of losing the bill might lie on them." The Lords, in fact, objected to the repeal of a law which had been made and kept up even during the times of popery, and urged that it was unreasonable "to open a door to practise upon dying men." According to Burnet, who ought, however, to have known that it is quite possible to work upon the minds and the purses of dying men without purgatory and the doctrine of the efficacy of the prayers of the living for the dead, it was answered "that we had not the arts of affrightening men by the terrors of purgatory, or by fables of apparitions: where these were practised, it was very reasonable to restrain priests from those artifices by which they had so enriched their church, that, without some such effectual checks, they would have swallowed up the whole wealth of the world; as they had indeed in England, during popery, made themselves masters of a full third part of the nation." The bishops, however, were unanimous for the whole bill, and it was carried and passed into a law. Addresses of thanks and acknowledgments from all the clergy of England were presented to Anne, who rejoiced more especially in the title of "Nursing Mother to the Church." But this tender care, this easy generosity did not of course extend to other sects of the Protestant communion. The Presbyterians, chiefly Scots, or of Scottish descent, settled in the north of Ireland, had done as much for the Revolution and the prevention of popery and tyranny as any class of men; and to the Presbyterian preacher, Walker, was mainly owing the heroic defence of Londonderry, upon which the fate of the war

* "I had possessed the late queen with this, so that she was fully resolved, if ever she had lived to see peace and settlement, to have cleared this branch of the revenue of all the assignments that were upon it, and to have applied it to the augmentation of small benefices. This is plainly insinuated in the essay that I wrote on her memory some time after her death. I laid the matter before the late king, when there was a prospect of peace, as a proper expression both of his thankfulness to Almighty God, and of his care of the church; I hoped that this might have joined the hearts of the clergy: it might at least have put a stop to a groundless clamour raised against him, that he was an enemy to the clergy, which began then to have a very ill effect on all his affairs. He entertained this so well that he ordered me to speak to his ministers about it: they all approved it; the Lord Somers and the Lord Halifax did it in a most particular manner; but the Earl of Sunderland obtained an assignation upon two dioceses for 8000*l.* a year for two lives; so nothing was to be hoped for after that."—Burnet.

hung. Yet she had just allowed the parliament of Ireland to stop the trifling sum of 1200*l.* per annum, which had been paid to the poor Presbyterian ministers in Ulster in the reign of King William.

While parliament was still sitting; the fate of the Earl of Nottingham was sealed. "Pushing at such hot measures, like an axe struck upon a hard stone, the blow rebounded, and the weapon flew out of the hand of the unskilful workman."* His projects had all failed, his party had overcast themselves, and never recovered. After a vain attempt to induce the queen to dismiss the Dukes of Somerset and Devonshire from the council, he resigned, and retired in disgust, though, like Rochester, he was consoled by the applause of the high Tory party. Harley, still rising and now favoured by Godolphin and the all-prevalent Duke and Duchess of Marlborough, succeeded him as chief secretary of state, and was allowed to continue Speaker of the House of Commons notwithstanding this appointment. Mr. St. John at the same time became secretary-at-war. Soon after Sir Edward Seymour was dismissed, the lord keeper, Sir Nathan Wright,† "deposed," and other props of the "high-flying party" were left out of the council and removed from their places in the government. An inquiry into the condition and management of the navy—which had been grossly mismanaged‡—gave rise to another collision between the two houses. And still another quarrel arose out of an act for recruiting the army. The impressing of soldiers by the crown had been looked upon as one of the greatest of grievances

* Defoe, History of the Union between England and Scotland.

† "Wright," says Burnet, "was a scold to the party, and was become very exceptionable in all respects. Money, as was said, did everything with him; only in his court, I never heard him charged for anything but great slowness, by which the Chancery was become one of the heaviest grievances of the nation."

‡ Attempts were made to seize the Plate ships, and to stop the trade between Spain and her colonies; but these all failed, and continued to fail, in a very strange manner, during the whole of the war. Lord Bellingbrooke attributes the most important consequences to this circumstance; and is of opinion that we might have hindered France from importing annually, from the year 1702, such immense treasures as she did import by the ships she sent, with the permission of Spain, to the South Seas, to Mexico, and Peru. This year Admiral Munden was detached with a good squadron to intercept some ships in the West Indies; but coming in sight of the French admiral Du Casse, he declined attacking him. Munden was tried by a court-martial, and acquitted; but the queen, nevertheless, thought fit to cashier him. Soon after (on the 19th of August) the brave old Benbowe fell in with the same Du Casse, and instantly attacked him, though he had only seven ships to ten. Four of his captains fell astern in the action, and scarcely fired a shot; but Benbowe kept off the enemy, and continued a running fight from the 19th to the 24th, when he crippled one of the enemy's chief ships. But Du Casse held his wind when he saw that three or four of the English ships were so far astern that they could give no assistance to their admiral; and the French and Spaniards renewed the action with great fury. Old Benbowe had his leg shattered, and was otherwise badly wounded; but he ordered his hammock to be brought upon deck, and lying upon it, still continued the fight. But he was wretchedly seconded by his retainers, and the enemy were suffered to escape, and carry off their disabled ships. Old Benbowe returning to his station at Jamaica, brought the captives to a court-martial for cowardice and breach of orders: Captain Kirby of the Defiance and Captain Wade of the Greenwich were sentenced to be shot; Captain Constable of the Windsor was sentenced to be cashiered (and imprisoned during her majesty's pleasure); Captain Hudson of the Fenestrelle died some days before his trial. The other two captains were sentenced to be suspended. Benbowe died of his wounds at Jamaica; but the queen did him that justice to order Captains Kirby and Wade to be shot on ship-board on their arrival at Plymouth, without suffering them to set foot on shore. Commodore Loake destroyed the French settlements in Newfoundland, and took a few fishing-vessels, —and these were all our naval successes this year.

before the Revolution; yet in this session the Whigs agreed with the Tories in promoting an act empowering justices of the peace to impress for the land service such men, not being entitled to vote for members of parliament, as they saw fit: that is, the justices of peace, or any three of them, might take up such idle persons as had no callings or means of subsistence, and deliver them to the officers of the army, upon paying them the levy money usually allowed for recruits. Burnet, whose zeal in favour of the war was not at all repressed by his religious feelings and his office, thought this an excellent plan. "If well managed," he says, "it will prove of great advantage to the nation; since by this means it will be delivered from many vicious and idle persons, who are become a burthen to their country." He did not see the dangerous impropriety of leaving three country gentlemen—a class, generally speaking, distinguished neither by quickness of sight nor freedom from prejudice—to be judges of who were idle and vicious, and who not. Nor did the House of Lords extend their opposition to the principle of the measure: on the contrary, they looked at it by a party light, and seem merely to have objected to the great power lodged in country justices of the peace, because the existing magistrates had been put into commission by their political adversaries. They urged, in short, that the justices of peace had been put in and put out in a very strange manner, ever since Sir Nathan Wright had held the great seal; that they could not deserve to have so great a power lodged with them; that many gentlemen of good estates and ancient families had been of late put out of the commission, for no other visible reason but because they had gone heartily into the Revolution, and had continued zealous for the late king; and that, on the other hand, men of no worth, of no estate, men known to be ill-affected to the queen's title and to the Protestant succession, had been put in, to the great encouragement of evil-intentioned individuals, and to a dangerous bias in county elections, &c. The bill for recruits was, however, passed for a single year, and it was afterwards re-voted year by year. But the Lords presented a strong address to the queen, begging that no person who had refused the oaths to the late King William might be in the commission of the peace; that she would put in none but men of quality and good estates, of known affection to her majesty, to the Protestant succession, and the established church; and that she would order such to be restored as had been turned out without just cause. Passing over the oaths of allegiance to William—for, with a strange casuistry, Anne held that those oaths and William's right were illegal, while the oaths to herself and her own right, which were equally opposed to the theory of divine right and unalterable succession, and equally dependent on acts of parliament and the will of the nation, were strictly and incontrovertibly legal and sacred—she assured their lordships that she thought it reasonable that the commissions of the peace should be filled with gentlemen of the best quality and estates, and as fit that they should be of known loyalty and affection to the government, the Protestant succession, and the church; and that she would give directions accordingly.

During this session Anne was pleased to revive the Order of the Thistle in Scotland; and, on the 4th of February, she conferred the green ribbon on his grace the Duke of Argyll. The vista was opened towards a union, but in either nation there was so much passion and prejudice as to make it doubtful to many statesmen whether that great measure could be carried in their lifetime. On the 3rd of April the queen prorogued parliament with a gracious speech, in which, however, she took occasion to lament, very gently, that her desires of seeing a perfect unity among themselves were not yet realised.

The day after the parliament rose, David Lindsay was brought to trial for high treason, which was taken to be proved by his returning from France without pass or licence. He showed that he was a Scotchman, and pleaded a Scotch pardon; but he was told that this could not avail him in England, and he was condemned as a traitor in dangerous correspondence with France, &c. He denied all knowledge of Fraser's plot. To frighten him into a confession he was drawn to Tyburn; but he was proof even to the sight of the fatal tree; ministers did not mean to hang him: he was conveyed back to Newgate, where he remained some years; and the end of the man was, that he died in want and misery in Holland. Simon Fraser of Lovat, in the meanwhile, had found his way back to Paris, but had there been shut up in the Bastille. He had delivered a long memorial to Maria d'Este, the so called queen-regent, in which he gave a pompous account of the success of his mission, not merely in the Highlands, but also in the Lowlands—with the ministers of the crown as well as the chiefs of the clans.

But the Earl of Middleton perceived his falsehood and double treachery, and, by means of a letter to M. de Torcy, laid him fast for the present.* One effect of his manœuvres was the temporary disgrace of the Duke of Queensberry, whose interest in Scotland had been long on the decline. Anne, who at this moment was accused "of a secret bias of sisterly affection for the court of St. Germain," appointed the Marquess of Tweeddale her commissioner. The Scottish parliament assembled on the 6th of July, ministers having previously exerted themselves among parties to engage them to vote ample supplies for the continental war, which they had refused the preceding session, and to settle the great question of the succession. The queen, in a letter, delivered instead of an opening speech, deplored that the divisions among her Scottish subjects should have risen to such a height, as to encourage the enemies of the nation to employ their secret emissaries among them: she promised to grant, in a parliamentary manner, whatever might be demanded for quieting the minds of the people; assured them that she had empowered her commissioner to give unquestionable proofs of her affection and of her determination to maintain the government in church and state, and had authorised him to give the royal assent to whatever could be reasonably demanded, and was in her power to grant, for securing the sovereignty and liberties of her ancient kingdom. But the clause of the letter which was the most important of all, was that where her majesty exhorted them to settle the succession in the Protestant line. This clause was expected, and ample preparations had been made to meet it. The Duke of Hamilton forthwith presented a resolution declaring that the parliament would not name a successor to the crown until a good treaty in relation to commerce and other concerns had been concluded with England.—Fletcher of Saltoun exposed, in a striking manner, the many hardships which the Scots had sustained since the union of the two crowns in one sovereign, and the impossibility of their bettering their condition, unless by forethought and care to anticipate any design that tended to perpetuate the same hardships and insults. Remembering the recent tragedy at Darien, many of the assembly would have asked broadly for a full share in the plantation trade of England, and for the shipping of Scotland to be included and comprehended in the English Navigation Act. This, as Burnet observes, could not be granted without the concurrence of the parliament of England; but the Scots were perfectly right in demanding it as they did. Another resolution was produced by the Earl of Rothes, importing that the Scottish parliament should first take into consideration the questions of privileges and nationality, make such limitation on the power of the crown as might be proper for rectifying the constitution, and for vindicating and securing the independence of the nation; and, all that being done, they might take into consideration the resolution offered by the Duke of Hamilton for a previous treaty of commerce, &c. A violent debate ensued; but, at last, Sir James Falconer suggested a double resolution, that the parliament would not proceed to the nomination of a successor until the previous treaty with England should be discussed; and that it would not nominate the successor until after the necessary conditions and limitations on the crown had been made. This was carried by a considerable majority. Then the Duke of Atholl, who led all these violent motions, moved that her majesty should be desired to send down the witnesses and papers relating to the late conspiracy, in order that those who had been unjustly accused in England might be vindicated, and the real guilty brought to punishment. The Marquess of Tweeddale declared that he had already written to her majesty upon this important matter, and would write again. It was the design of Atholl, and of all those who were most friendly to the Pretender, to convict the Duke of Queensberry of malice and calumny—to prove, in short, that he was the fabricator of the Fraser plot, and, as such, merited death. Beyond the walls of parliament there was a loud and universal outcry among the people, that sundry of their innocent countrymen had been maliciously charged with a conspiracy, had been seized, examined, tried, and condemned in England with an obvious disregard to the rights of a nation which was as free and independent as

England herself, &c. Anne had certainly no affection for Queensberry,—she would probably have cared very little if he had been thrown, bound and helpless, in the midst of the furious Jacobites; but she, or her ministers for her, both in Scotland and England, saw that, if the examination was allowed, the business would not end with Queensberry,—that it would, on the contrary, raise and prolong such a ferment as might prove of the most dangerous consequence, while it would inevitably divert attention from the subject of the Protestant succession, and delay or stop altogether the vote of supply. She, therefore, returned no answer to the repeated applications for the witnesses and the papers; and the friends of peace and of the Protestant succession so managed matters that the inquiry was let fall. The Duke of Hamilton, who was by this time more than suspected of sharing the political sentiments of his grace of Atholl, now moved that the parliament should proceed to the limitations, and to the treaty about trade, and name commissioners to treat with England, before entering upon any other business, except the passing of a land-tax for two months only, to provide for the immediate subsistence of the forces actually on foot in Scotland, to whom arrears were due—the latter a circumstance tending greatly to shake their loyalty to Queen Anne. The Earl of Marchmont rose and proposed an instant act to exclude for ever from the throne of Scotland all popish successors. Hamilton and his party, with great heat, opposed the motion as unseasonable. The Lord Justice Clerk brought up a bill of supply, but this bill “had a tack to it.” They fastened, in fact, to this money bill a great part of a bill which had passed in the preceding session, but to which the queen had refused her assent—a bill providing, “that, if the queen should die without issue, a Scottish parliament should presently meet, and they were to declare the successor to the crown, who should not be the same person that was possessed of the crown of England, unless, before that time, there should be a settlement made in parliament of the rights and liberties of the nation, independent of English councils.”* This “tack” to the supply bill put the Scottish ministry into extreme difficulties: if they rejected it the army could no longer be kept up, for the arrears were considerable, and there was no money in the treasury to pay them. Some suggested asking the English ministry to advance the sub-

* “By another clause in the act, it was made lawful to arm the subjects, and to train them and put them in a posture of defence. This was chiefly pressed, in behalf of the best affected in the kingdom, who were not armed: for the Highlanders, who were the worst affected, were well armed; so, to balance that, it was moved, that leave should be given to arm the rest. All was carried with great heat and much vehemence; for a national humour of being independent on England fermented so strongly among all sorts of people without doors, that those who went not into every hot motion that was made, were looked on as the betrayers of their country; and they were so exposed to a popular fury, that some of those who studied to stop this tide were thought to be in danger of their lives. The Presbyterians were so overwrought with this, that, though they wished well to the settling the succession, they durst not openly declare it. The Dukes of Hamilton and Atholl led all those violent motions, and the whole nation was strangely inflamed.”—Burnet.

sistence money till better measures could be taken, but none of the Scottish ministers would venture upon this; for, as an army is reckoned to belong to those who pay it, so an army paid by England would be called by the Scots an English army. "Men's minds," adds Burnet, "were then so full of the conceit of independence (this Anglo-prelatised Scot ought to have spoken with more respect of the high and proud national feeling of his countrymen), that, if a suspicion had arisen of any such practice, probably it would have occasioned tumults; and even the army was so enkindled with this, that it was believed that neither officers nor soldiers would have taken their pay, if they had believed it came from England. It came then to this, that either the army must be disbanded, or the bill must pass. It is true the army was a very small one—not above three thousand; but it was so ordered, that it was doubly or trebly officered; so that it could have been easily increased to a much greater number, if there had been occasion for it. The officers had served long, and were men of a good character: so, since they were alarmed with an invasion—which both sides looked for, and the intelligence which the court had from France assured them it was intended—they thought the inconveniences arising from the tack might be remedied afterwards: but the breaking up of the army was such a pernicious thing, and might end so fatally, that it was not to be ventured on."

While the streets of Edinburgh were crowded with people of all ranks exclaiming against English influence, and threatening to sacrifice all that should prove traitors to their country and enemies to the ancient independence of Scotland, the appalled ministers, one and all, signed a letter to the queen, advising her to pass the bill, encumbered as it was with the greater part of that act of security which she had formerly refused. This measure involved Godolphin, who was now considered as the confidential adviser of the queen in all things, and who had already been marked out by the high-flying Tories for destruction. If he accepted the bill with the tack, he would be accused of promoting the disseverance of the two kingdoms; if, on the contrary, he refused the bill, he would be held liable for the ill consequences of breaking the Scottish army, and laying that kingdom open to an invasion. But Godolphin had courage enough to act with decision in this difficult dilemma; and, as the safest thing for the queen, and the least evil for the two nations, he induced Anne to pass the bill, and so be in a condition to defend Scotland against the incursions of the Jacobite Highland clans and against invasions threatened from abroad.*

But for the brilliant successes of Marlborough, who relied upon Godolphin as his main stay in the cabinet, Godolphin would have been annihilated

* "This," says Burnet, "was under consultation in the month of July, when our matters abroad were yet in a great uncertainty; for, though the victory at Schelleberg was a good step, yet the great decision was not then come."

in consequence of this measure. For the present, the Scottish ministers got the supplies, and the forces in Scotland were kept up and somewhat increased. The parliament of that country, however, was not yet satisfied; they debated anew upon the Fraser plot, denounced the proceedings of the House of Lords in England upon that business as an officious intermeddling in their concerns—an encroachment upon the independence of their nation; and they drew up an address to the queen, desiring that, next session at least, all the papers and evidence relating to that conspiracy might be laid before them. To still the storm the lord commissioner hastened to a prorogation. The English Tories got possession of the whole of the Scottish Security Bill, printed it, and circulated it through the country, in order to show that the two kingdoms were now separated so as never to be united again. At the same time dark reports were spread of vast quantities of arms and ammunition coming from France into Scotland, and of designs entertained by the Scots to cross the borders and make war upon England!

In the meanwhile Marlborough was gaining the greatest of his victories—was becoming "the hero of Blenheim." That fortunate soldier and politician, accepting a pressing invitation from the Pensionary Heinsius, and imitating the famed winter journey of the late king, had left London for the Hague on the 15th of January, while the English parliament was sitting, and when the season was intensely cold and stormy. He arrived safely at the Hague on the 19th; and, encouraged by the prospect of having 50,000 British troops under his immediate command, he proposed to the Dutch to open the campaign on the Moselle with his own troops and part of the foreign auxiliaries, while General Auverquerque remained to act on the defensive in the Netherlands with the Dutch and the rest of the auxiliaries. This, in fact, was only part of a bold plan he had formed for carrying the war beyond the Rhine, where the cause of the emperor seemed still falling to ruin; but this part was all he thought fit to confide for the present to the States-General, whose timidity and irresolution would, he feared, have opposed his daring scheme if they had known the whole of it at once. And there was also another reason, and a weighty one, for this reticence: somehow it had generally happened, that, when a scheme of operations was laid, and produced in the Dutch cabinet, in the allied camp, or in conferences with the ministers of the confederated powers, it was forthwith communicated partially or entire to the court of Versailles, or to the French generals commanding in the field! At first the States-General would hardly enter into Marlborough's modified or half-revealed proposal, considering it too hazardous and as likely to leave Holland too much exposed; but the pensionary, who had always so ably assisted King William, seconded the proposal, and engaged to employ all his influence and that of his friends in procuring the concurrence of his government. At the same time, Heinsius and Marlborough induced the States to grant a subsidy to the Margrave of Baden and a supply to the circle of Suabia; to take into pay 4000 Wirtembergers in lieu of 4000 or 5000 English and Dutch, who had been detached to Portugal, and also to make a promise of money to the Duke of Savoy, with the assurance of so vigorous a campaign on the part of the allies as should effectually prevent the French from sending more troops across the Alps. Under the same influences fresh encouragements were given to the Elector Palatine, and to the new King of Prussia, the most selfish and wrong-headed of all the allied princes. This over, Marlborough hurried back to London, where he arrived on the 24th of February, and instantly persuaded the queen to remit a hundred thousand crowns to the circle of Suabia; and to send out of her privy purse some of the money he had promised the Margrave of Baden. Having remodelled his politics so as to square with those of a partly Whig cabinet, Marlborough left London early in April to put himself at the head of the army. In spite of all the endeavours of the pensionary and his friends, he encountered considerable opposition even to that part of the plan which he had revealed (the real plan in its full extent was still a mystery even in England): the states of Zealand and Friesland in particular objected strongly to any movement of troops to such a distance from the Low Countries. But at length Marlborough, who had procured a general instruction from the English cabinet empowering him to take such measures as should be deemed proper for relieving the emperor and reducing the Elector of Bavaria, told the States that he was fully resolved upon going to the Moselle with upwards of 40,000 men. In a letter to Godolphin, he says, "I do no way doubt but her majesty will approve this: I am very sensible that I take a great deal upon me; but, should I act otherwise, the empire will be undone, and consequently the confederacy." The States-General were silenced by his determined declaration, and consented, with a good grace, to what they could not prevent. At the same time, however, they intrusted him with powers which they might and would have withheld if they had known the whole of his hazardous project. The only one of the generals of the allied powers that was intrusted with the secret was Prince Eugene of Savoy, who had been appointed to the command of the emperor's army on the Upper Danube.* Leaving Auverquerque with the Dutch troops and part of the auxiliaries to guard the frontiers, Marlborough proceeded to Utrecht, near which place he passed some days with the Earl of Albemarle, the favourite of the late king, and the depositary of William's secrets and plans. He then went by Ruremond to Maestricht, and thence to Bedburg, in the duchy of Juliers, which had been fixed upon as the place of rendezvous for the forces concentrating from different quarters. Here he found his brother, General Churchill, with fifty-one battalions and ninety-two squadrons of horse.* With these troops, which were to be joined on their line of march by Prussians, Hessians, Lunenburgers, and others, quartered on the Rhine, and by eleven Dutch battalions stationed at Rothweil, Marlborough, on the 19th of May (n. s.), began his celebrated expedition. He had got no farther than Kerpen (on the 20th), when he received an express from Auverquerque, imploring him to halt, because Villeroy had crossed the Meuse at Namur, and was threatening Huy.† At the same moment letters arrived from the Margrave of Baden urging him to hasten his march towards the lines of Stolhoffen, because Tallard had made a movement towards the Rhine. But Marlborough adhered to his grand project; and, only halting a day to quiet the alarms of Auverquerque and the Margrave of Baden, he pushed forward might and main to Kalsecken. At that point he deemed it expedient to disclose more of his plan: he wrote to the States-General to assure them that no danger was to be apprehended on the side of the Netherlands, while his own sudden operations engaged the entire attention of the French; he even ventured to ask for further reinforcements, insisting that Auverquerque would still be strong enough to cover their lines. Then he pushed forward to Sinzig, where he acted as if he intended to make the banks of the Moselle the scene of his campaign. He had not only kept his own design secret, but had established the means of a most rapid communication in all directions—if not a correspondence with some of the allies of the French, who betrayed the movements of Louis's generals. Upon intelligence that Tallard had passed the Rhine, thrown forward a reinforcement of 10,000 men to the Elector of Bavaria, and then resumed his former position near Strasburg, he accelerated his march, advancing with the cavalry

* "On which day the Prince of Saxe Zeist, Bishop of Raab, and several canons of Cologne, attended his grace with the compliments of that Chapter. The same day M. Brianzoni, envoy extraordinary from the Duke of Savoy to her majesty, came to wait upon his grace from Cologne, whither they returned together in the evening. The Bishop of Raab carried a letter with him from the Duke to the Elector of Treves, informing his highness of the approach of the army towards Coblenz, and earnestly desiring him that, as there was a great number of broad-waggons, timberlills, pontoons, and other wheel-carriages, which shortened and embarrassed their marches, his highness would be pleased to order a bridge to be laid forthwith over the Rhine; and that not only to facilitate the passage of these troops, but to spare his highness's territories, which would suffer the more if the army continued longer upon them."—Dr. Hare's MS. Journal. This reverend doctor attended Marlborough as his chaplain, and was a good and minute observer of the whole campaign. Archdeacon Coxe made from the MSS. at Blenheim an copy of the Journal, which now exists in the Library of the British Museum; but the laborious Archdeacon can hardly be said to have made use of the best parts of the chaplain's journal, or of the letters which Hare afterwards wrote when the Marlboroughs were in disgrace, and when the government were mean enough to stop and examine their letters at the Post Office.

† "The movement of the enemy gave some jealousy to M. d'Auverquerque himself; but his grace soon satisfied him that there was more advantage than danger in it."—Larc's MS. Journal.

* It appears, indeed, from the letters written by Eugene to Marlborough (preserved among the Blenheim Papers, and in Archdeacon Coxe's copies in the Brit. Mus.), and from the Vie du Prince Eugene (the latter an equivocal authority, however,) that Marlborough had arranged the whole plan of the campaign with that prince, who must, therefore, come in for some of the honours of it. Prince Eugene had induced the emperor to write a letter to Anne, representing his extreme danger, and praying for assistance.

upon Coblenz, and leaving his brother to follow with the infantry and artillery. His progress was favoured by the German people;* and on the 26th of May, while visiting the Elector of Treves, who was sojourning in that lofty and romantic citadel, he witnessed from the heights of Ehrenbreitstein the passage of his army across the Moselle and the Rhine. Again calling urgently upon the States-General for reinforcements he advanced along the bank of the Rhine to Broubach. The march, though rapid, was admirably conducted, so as to save the troops from the heat of the mid-day sun and from all unnecessary fatigue. From Broubach he wrote to the King of Prussia, who was wittily and correctly described by his son, the great Frederick, as being a great man in little matters, and a little man in great matters, praising the valour of the Prussian troops, and requesting to have more of them. He arrived at Mentz on the 29th, and rested there a day to refresh the troops and to partake of the hospitality of the elector. The army was fresh, and in such admirable order and tenuë, that the elector exclaimed, "These gentlemen seem to be all dressed for a ball."†

While at Mentz, Marlborough received advices that the States had consented to send after him twenty squadrons and eight battalions of Danish auxiliaries; but at the same moment he received the less welcome intelligence that the Margrave of Baden, to whom he had made his mistress send money out of the privy purse, had not only suffered the 10,000 men that Tallard had thrown forward to reinforce the Elector of Bavaria, but had also neglected a most favourable opportunity of bringing that elector to battle. In fact, 30,000 German troops, of different circles, had permitted the Elector of Bavaria to move from his camp at Ulin, towards the head of the Danube, to meet the French forwarded by Tallard; had allowed the elector to pass unmolested through narrow defiles, to march, in a manner, right through the main body of the Imperialists, to effect his junction with the French, and then to return through the narrow and dangerous pass of Stochach with a long line of carriages—whereas, by his seizing that pass, he might have cut off the Elector's retreat, and reduced him to surrender at discretion, his army being without bread, so that any delay or stoppage must have been fatal to it. Marlborough, however, did not lose heart: he persuaded the Landgrave of Hesse to put his artillery at his disposal, summoned several of the auxiliary or partisan leaders to receive his instructions as to the proper points where they were to join him, took up money to pay the English, "who, notwithstanding the continual marching, were extremely pleased with this expedition;" and moved towards the Neckar, where he had previously ordered bridges to be constructed. He had already saved the emperor from all fears of the Elector of Bavaria and his French allies; but, hoping to achieve much more than this, he was now directing his steps to the banks of the Danube, leaving the French in his rear lost in astonishment, and too weak and too indifferently commanded to be able to do anything but look on. They, indeed, were still uncertain as to his real intentions: at first they had expected an attack by the Moselle, then upon Alsace; his throwing a bridge over the Rhine at Philipsberg, and the advance of the Landgrave of Hesse's artillery to Manheim seemed to indicate the siege of Landau, which place had been retaken by the French and much improved in its fortifications.—The French generals were at last completely bewildered. If the Condé's and the Turennes had been alive, affairs might have gone differently; but Marlborough's genius was opposed by the mediocrity of Villeroy and Tallard: the first of these generals, who had followed him at a respectful distance from the Meuse, brought up reinforcements from French Flanders: * Tallard, on the other hand, descended to the Lauter, with the view of joining Villeroy, so as to protect Alsace. They were thus at fault, when Marlborough crossed the Neckar, and proceeded to Erpingen, with a force continually increasing by means of small bodies of Prussians, Hessians, Palatines, and others who flowed in to his line of march, right and left, like tributary streams to a main river. On the 7th of June he encamped at Erpingen, to wait for his brother, who was several marches behind him, with the cannon and part of the infantry. On that day he wrote to Godolphin:—"Having received intelligence yesterday that in three or four days the Duke of Villeroy, with his army, would join that of the Marshal de Tallard about Landau, in order to force the passage of the Rhine, I prevailed with Count Wratisslaw to make all the haste he could to Prince Louis of Baden's army, where he will be this night, that he might make him sensible of the great consequence it is to hinder the French from passing that river, while we are acting against the Elector of Bavaria. I have also desired him to press, and not to be refused, that either Prince Louis or Prince Eugene go immediately to the Rhine. I am in hopes to know to-morrow what resolution they have taken. If I could decide it by my wishes, Prince Eugene should stay on the Danube, although Prince Louis has assured me, by the Count de Frise, that he will not make the least motion with his army but as we shall concert. At this time it is agreed that Prince Louis shall act on the Iller, and I on the Danube. If the Marshal de Villeroy can be kept on the other side of the Rhine, we must be contented to suffer him to do what he pleases there, whilst we are acting in

* Wherever he went he sent forward assurances that the strictest discipline would be observed; and these promises were kept much better than they usually had been.

Bavaria. If we can hinder the junction of more troops to the elector, I hope six weeks after we begin may be sufficient for the reducing of him, or the entire ruining of his country." His rest at Erpingen was short; and on the 9th he crossed the Neckar in another part of its course, and advanced to Mondelsheim, where on the 10th he met for the first time Prince Eugene of Savoy, the partner or rival in his glory. Many compliments passed, and the prince bestowed great praise on the English cavalry, which has not usually been the best part of our armies. At Hippach* they halted three days, to await the arrival of the infantry and artillery, who were still behind, and to concert their future operations, which could only fully succeed by an entire understanding and cordial co-operation. The Margrave of Baden, after detaching some troops to secure the passage of the Rhine against Villeroy, came up and joined them at Hippach, where he saluted Marlborough as "the deliverer of the empire." Of necessity, this margrave was admitted into their councils and deliberations, and from that moment there arose differences and jealousies, which might have deranged the whole plan. Marlborough, as we have seen, wished the margrave to remain on the Rhine, and to have Prince Eugene as his colleague on the Danube, where the brilliant and decisive part of the campaign was to be enacted; but the margrave, who was older in rank than Prince Eugene, and unwilling to be kept in an inferior field of action, insisted on a right of choice, and, in fact, on a right of supreme command on the Danube; and it was not without difficulty that the obstinate German consented to share that command by alternate days with the English general. Greatly to the mortification both of Eugene and Marlborough, the former was therefore left upon the Rhine, while the latter moved towards the Danube with the Margrave of Baden. At the same time news was received that Auverquerque had been baffled in an attempt upon the French lines in Flanders, and had lost an excellent opportunity upon the Meuse. Nor was this all: there were misfortunes nearer at hand, for some Prussian and Suabian corps, that were appointed to join between the Rhine and the Danube, mistook their instructions and lost ten days in marches and countermarches. Marlborough, however, went on to Ebersbach, where he rested two days. Here Count Wratislaw waited upon him, on the part of his master the emperor, who was "desirous to write to the queen that he might have her consent to make the duke a prince of the empire, which he would do by creating some land he had in the empire into a principality, which would give him a privilege of being in the College, or Diet, with the sovereign princes of the empire." The aspiring general was wise enough to suppress any anxiety about this honour, and to declare that he must previously know the will of his mistress; saying, at the same time, that in his opinion nothing of the sort ought to be done until the fate of the war was decided. Yet in the letter to his wife in which he communicates this offer his exultation is very apparent, as is also that regard to money which marked his character from first to last.*

On the 15th of June, Prince Eugene was at Philipsberg, on the Rhine; and Marlborough, still hampered by the delays and blunders of his allies, was preparing to cross the range of mountains which separated him from the valley of the Danube, beyond which river he expected the Elector of Bavaria would retreat. It was not till the 20th that everything was ready, and then, while the States-General were sending courier after courier to induce him to weaken his army and send back troops to the Netherlands, he traversed the narrow and dangerous pass of Gieslingen with his entire force, and without accident.† Beyond that defile he came in communication with the troops of Prince Louis, who had taken up a position near Westersteppen. On the 24th he advanced to Elchingen, close on the Danube, thus compelling the Elector of Bavaria to withdraw from his post at Ulm. On the 25th, amid torrents of rain, which lasted several days, Marlborough fixed his head-quarters at Langenan, the Elector of Bavaria retiring along the bank of the Danube, to an entrenched camp constructed by himself and his French allies in the preceding campaign, between Lawingen and Dillingen, having broad morasses in front, and the Danube in the rear. On the following day Marlborough moved, and halted on the little river Brentz, only two short leagues from the enemy; but his brother, General

* He says to the queen, "What is offered will in history for ever remain an honour to my family. But I wish myself so well that I hope I shall never want the income of the land, which no doubt will be but little, nor enjoy the privilege of German assemblies. However, this is the utmost expression that they can make, and therefore ought to be taken as it is meant." In the same confidential letter his real eagerness for the honour and title pours out rather plainly:—"I know I wish the queen and me so well that you would be glad that nothing should be done that might do either of us hurt. Therefore, my opinion of this matter is, that there can be no inconvenience in allowing Count Wratislaw's master to write to the queen to ask her consent for the doing this, and then to bring the letter to the cabinet council. In the mean time I shall take care with Count Wratislaw, that no further step be made till I know the queen's pleasure, and the opinion of the lord treasurer. I am very clear in my own opinion, that if anything of this be to be done, it will have a much better grace for me when the business of the war is over; but I beg you to assure the queen, that I will with great pleasure obey in this matter, as well as in everything else, what is most agreeable to her." And a day or two after, in writing to Godolphin about the serious business of the campaign, he eagerly reverts to the subject, begging the minister to let nobody know of it but the queen and her husband. — Original Letters, as quoted by Coxe, Life of Marlborough.

† "There is a continued deluge, of about two English miles, which would take up almost a day's time in the best season of the year to pass with any number of troops; but it was much more difficult, now because of the excessive rains which had fallen for the last three or four days together, and had so levelled the rivulets and deepened the roads that they would have been thought altogether impassable by any but such as were carried on by an invincible resolution." — Here's MS. Journal.

* At Hippach Marlborough reviewed his cavalry in the presence of Eugene, "who expressed his surprise to find them in such excellent condition after so long a march, and told his Grace that he had heard much of the English cavalry, and found it to be the best appointed and the finest he had ever seen." "But," says he, "money (which you do not want in England) will buy fine clothes and fine horses, but it cannot buy that lively air which I see in every one of those troopers' faces." To which his Grace replied, that that must be attributed to their heatiness in the common cause, and the particular pleasure and satisfaction they had in seeing his highness. — Here's MS. Journal.

Churchill, did not arrive with the artillery and part of the foot till the 27th, when the combined army amounted to 96 battalions and 202 squadrons, with a train of 48 pieces of artillery, pontoons, &c. None of the expected forces were wanting except the Danish horse, under the Duke of Wirtemberg; but Marlborough did not think himself able to act against the Elector of Bavaria as he could wish until that Danish cavalry came up. While he was waiting, the elector and the French officers serving with him threw up some fresh works in front of their entrenched camp on the bank of the Danube, and detached General d'Arco with 12,000 men to occupy the Schellenberg, a commanding height overhanging the important town of Donawert. Marlborough saw clearly that by this skilful disposition the Elector hoped to cover his own dominions, and keep the allies in check, till he should receive reinforcements every day expected from France: he therefore insisted upon an immediate attack upon the heights of Schellenberg, representing to those who suggested doubts, that if time was lost the enemy would either escape or would have time to make an entrenched camp there more formidable than the one they occupied among the morasses. The Margrave of Baden hesitated, but at last consented to an advance; and on the 1st of July, when Marlborough had the command for the day, he defiled before the elector in his marshy camp, and directed his march to the foot of the Schellenberg. The roads were little better than bogs, the horses frequently sunk to their saddle girths, the artillery and heavy baggage waggons stuck in the mud, and the march was altogether slow and most laborious. Yet towards evening Marlborough rested on a convenient plain a few miles from the foot of the mountain, from whose summit the Gallo-Bavarians were watching his progress with evident uneasiness. Gazing on those heights, and foreseeing that they would not be carried without great bloodshed, he gave orders for establishing a hospital for his wounded—an attention not as yet generally bestowed by generals on suffering humanity. He also took 130 picked men from each battalion of the army, joined these, which, collectively, amounted to 6,000 foot, to 30 squadrons of horse and three regiments of Austrian grenadiers, and ordered that this detachment should precede the main body of the army and begin the attack. At three o'clock in the morning, as the first rays of the sun began to light up the Danube, the plain and the mountain, this column was put in motion by Marlborough in person, who, at five, followed with the rest of the army. There remained to be crossed, at about a mile from the foot of the Schellenberg, the Wernitz, a deep and rapid stream flowing into the Danube; but bridges had been prepared to throw across, and the van were provided with pontoons and fascines. It was about nine o'clock when Marlborough joined the head of the attacking column on the bank of this stream, where he was saluted by the enemy with a heavy cannonade, and whence he could see the very formidable nature of the attack he contemplated. The Schellenberg was rough and steep; the summit was covered with troops, and protected by an old fort and by entrenchments, which, though not completed, were in a rapid progress; and besides all this, there lay between him and the summit a thick wood, a rivulet, and a ravine; while on the opposite side of the Danube there was a regular camp, occupied by a strong detachment of cavalry, who could communicate with the town of Donawert and the acclivities of the Schellenberg by a bridge. About noon, Marlborough, without waiting for the Imperialists, who were still in the rear, crossed the Wernitz, and at about five in the afternoon he gave his last orders to the attacking column, the command of which was assigned to the Dutch General Goor, and the first line of which was led by Brigadier Ferguson, the whole being preceded by a forlorn hope of fifty English grenadiers, under Lord Mordaunt. The assailants advanced to the hill with a firm step, under a tremendous fire from the enemy's works. As soon as they arrived within the range of grape shot, the carnage became dreadful. General Goor and other officers fell, and for a moment the men paused and hung back. But other officers stepped forward to supply the places of those who had fallen, and then the column moved forward till they came to the ravine, which some of the men in their ignorance mistook for the ditch of the entrenchment, which could be made passable by the fascines they carried. While they were throwing in their fascines, standing exposed on the edge of the ravine, General d'Arco plied them with every gun he could bring to bear upon them; and when this tremendous fire had produced some effect, he threw out some French and Bavarian battalions, who, rushing from their works, charged with the bayonet. This charge was repulsed principally by a battalion of the English guards, who stood their ground almost alone, and kept in perfect order, though nearly all their officers had been knocked on the head before the charge began. The attacking column soon formed again, and advanced still nearer to the works. But d'Arco concentrated nearly his whole force in their front, by drawing in the men that had occupied the flanks, and he not only continued to ply the assailants with grape shot, but sent out beyond his trenches several strong sallying parties, who fought bravely, and used both musket and bayonet with great effect. Again the allies began to waver and to give way; and their repulse seemed complete, when General Lumley led forward a body of horse, threw back the enemy, and closed up or re-formed the ranks of the allies. During their severe sufferings, the French and Bavarians had not escaped tremendous loss: of some of the parties that sallied from the trenches scarcely a man had returned; and at this critical moment, the accidental explosion of some gunpowder in their works spread a sudden panic, which could not be overcome in the shortness of time allowed them. For the next moment the English and the Dutch burst into the entrenchments, and the Imperialists led on by the Margrave of Baden, were seen advancing towards the heights from under the walls of Donawert. While the English and the Dutch were, as yet, part in the ditch, and part scaling the entrenchment, the French and Bavarians, abandoning every part of the work, fled in complete disorder down the hill side, towards the bridge over the Danube. The fugitives were followed by the whole body of the allied cavalry, and the carnage was terrific. And when the unhappy fugitives reached the bridge, it broke down under their weight, and hundreds of them were drowned. Other bodies were driven over the banks; and in the end, between the sword and the Danube, 7,000 or 8,000 perished on that fatal evening. Of the whole force detached to Schellenberg, only 3,000 men rejoined the elector; but a considerable number came in as deserters to the allies. Sixteen pieces of artillery and all the tents were taken. The night set in with a heavy rain; and, in spite of the shouts of triumph, the allied camp presented a sight of horror: there were 4,000 men wounded, and at the very least 1,500 killed. The loss in officers was particularly heavy; eight generals, eleven colonels, and twenty-six captains being among the slain; and the Prince of Bevern and Count Styrum being mortally wounded. The sufferings of the wounded were, of course, greatly aggravated by the state of the weather; but Marlborough, it is said, paid particular attention to them. He then left a considerable body to keep possession of the Schellenberg, and withdrew to his camp on the Wernitz, attributing his success to the particular blessing of God, and the unparalleled bravery of her majesty's troops.*

After this battle of Schellenberg or Donawert, as it is variously called, fresh misunderstandings broke out between the English general and the Margrave of Baden. The German general had been slightly wounded in the engagement, and had entered the entrenchments before Marlborough came up in person; hence the margrave and his friends claimed for him the chief honour of the victory, regardless of the obvious facts, that the whole plan was the English general's, and that, without the decided will of Marlborough, there would have been no battle at all. Marlborough, on the other side, spoke with contempt of his colleague. A feud was the consequence, which spread from the army, where it might have proved very dangerous, to the Low Countries and the Hague, where the party inimical to Marlborough struck a medal with the effigies of the margrave on the one side and the lines of Schellenberg on the reverse to commemorate the victory. But the world at large took a juster view of the case, and of the relative merits of the two commanders: throughout Germany, throughout Italy, in every part of the Continent, by friends and by foes, the merit of the achievement was given to Anne's general, and the name of Marlborough was on every man's tongue. Even the French began to sing him in songs, and the Italians, farther off, dreamed of him as of some fierce conqueror of the old times.* But Marlborough had more serious thoughts to occupy his mind than these jealousies and bickerings. He received intelligence that Villeroy had promised the Elector of Bavaria that he would send him, by way of the Black Forest, fifty battalions of foot and sixty squadrons of horse—"the best troops of France, which would make him stronger than the confederates." The English general, however, relied much on the assurances of Prince Eugene, that he would venture everything rather than suffer these French reinforcements to pass quietly as the last had done. Marlborough also expected that the enemy would defend Donawert to the last extremity. But here he was agreeably disappointed, for the Elector of Bavaria withdrew his garrison, set fire to his magazines, abandoned all his positions, and commenced a retreat towards Augsburg, thus leaving his hereditary dominions open to invasion. On the 6th of July he wrote to Godolphin: "We are now taking care for a passage over this river of Lech, and then we shall be in the heart of the elector's country. If he will ever make propositions it must be then. The Marshals de Villeroy and Tallard are separated. The latter is to join the Elector of Bavaria, and the Duke de Villeroy is to act on the Rhine. Prince Eugene will be obliged to divide his army, so that he may observe each of their motions. As for his person it will be with that army that is to observe M. Tallard. By all the intelligence we have, our last action has very much disheartened the enemy, so that, if we can get over the river to engage them, I no ways doubt but God will help us with the victory. Our greatest difficulty is, that of making our bread follow us: for the troops that I have the honour to command cannot subsist without it, and the Germans, that are used to starve, cannot advance without us."

On the 7th the passage of the deep, broad, and rapid river Lech was effected at Gunderkingen, and upon this the Bavarian garrison at Neuburg abandoned that important place and retired to Ingolstadt. On the 10th, Marlborough was encamped near Mittelstetten with 73 battalions and 174 squadrons. He had now the whole of the army in the elector's country, and he announced that if that unfortunate prince would not come

* See note to the queen immediately after the victory in Coxe, Life. In taking Providence into partnership in these dreadful doings, Marlborough did no more than what was common with all commanders down to the time of our great living general, whose good sense and juster feeling put an end to the practice. Marlborough, however, in the hurry of the moment, used an awkward mode of expression. "Our success," he says, "is in a great measure owing to the particular blessing of God, and the unparalleled bravery of your troops."

* The Duke of Shrewsbury, in a congratulatory letter from Rome where he was still residing, says: "I will not suspend your time with politic reflections, which you can make much better than I, but must tell you that in this holy, ignorant city they have an idea of you as of a Tamerlane; and, had I a picture of old Colonel Mirch with his whiskers, I could put it off for yours, and change it for one done by Raphael."

descend to terms he would do his utmost to ruin that country. At this moment the elector, showing no disposition whatever to treat, lay strongly encamped at Augsburg, awaiting the reinforcements which Villeroi had promised. Bread was now plentiful in Marlborough's camp; provisions were brought out of Franconia, and the soldiers helped themselves in Bavaria, plundering the poor people without mercy. Marlborough exulted in this pleasant state of things, and still more at the promptitude with which he was obeyed on all hands. "I have the pleasure," he writes to his wife, "to find all the officers willing to obey, without knowing any other reason than that it is my desire, which is very different from what it was in Flanders, where I was obliged to have the consent of a council of war for everything I undertook." If we are to believe his own account, several unwise delays which now took place were owing entirely to the backwardness and wilful obstinacy of the Margrave of Baden. Rain, an insignificant fortress, detained him five or six days, and when he proposed a rapid movement for the reduction of Munich, the capital of Bavaria, he was unable to obtain the artillery and stores which had been promised by the Margrave. On the 31st of July he wrote to Godolphin:—"For want of cannon, and the King of France doing all he can to succour the elector, we shall be obliged to take such measures as our wants will permit us; but you may be assured if they give us any opportunity we shall be glad to come to a battle; for that would decide the whole, because our troops are very good. But our misfortune is, that we want everything for attacking towns, otherwise this would have been dated from Munich." In the mean time he had detached thirty squadrons to assist Eugene in disputing the advance of the promised French reinforcements, which were now known to be under the command of Tallard. Without cannon and without money, Marlborough was glad to receive, at last, some propositions from the elector. Though unwillingly, the emperor's ambassador entered into these preliminaries, engaging to obtain for the elector the restoration of his dominions, and a subsidy of 200,000 crowns, upon condition of his entirely breaking off from the French, and furnishing 12,000 men for the service of the emperor. But Villeroi's assurances and Tallard's advance revived the spirit of the Bavarian prince; he failed in an appointment to meet the Austrian plenipotentiary for the conclusion of the treaty, and sent a message to announce that the French general was approaching to his succour with 35,000 men, and that he should run the chances of his brave and steady ally. No doubt the elector's propositions and overtures had been illusory from the first, and meant merely to gain time. Marlborough felt it in this way, and, forthwith, he gave up the whole country, as far as Munich, to military execution. The sight of the burning towns and villages, however, went to his heart; and he deplored the cruel necessity which he considered he lay under.* On the other side Tallard got through the Black Forest, and, after losing five days in a fruitless and absurd attempt on Villingen, forded the Danube at Moskirk, and emerged into the plains about Ulm. He then struck away to the north-west, and, with a few rapid marches, came into communication with the electoral army, which continued to hold its ground at Augsburg. Prince Eugene, unable to prevent these movements, made a parallel march from the Rhine with an inferior force, and reached the plains of Hochstadt with his 18,000 men nearly at the same time that Tallard effected his junction with the Bavarians. He was still far apart from Marlborough and the rest of the confederates—he was precisely in that position where a Condé or a Turenne would have crushed him by a concentrated attack, and then marched away with a superior force, flushed with success, to crush Marlborough. The confederates were, in fact, in that very situation which the Austrians so often fell into, and which Napoleon Buonaparte, at a later day, so often revelled in. But Tallard had none of this genius and decision; and Marlborough and Eugene were left to exercise their superior abilities, and to join their separated armies in one compact and formidable mass. Marlborough fell back upon Neuburg, and, on the 6th of August, encamped on the Paar near Schrobenhausen. Here Prince Eugene, who had left his army, galloped into the camp almost alone and unknown, to concert measures with the English commander. One of their first resolutions appears to have been to get rid of the conflicting voice and authority of the Margrave of Baden, who fortunately consented to go with 23 battalions and 31 squadrons to lay siege to Ingoldstadt, a fortress which had never before opened its gates to a conqueror, and the possession of which was indispensable to the confederates if they meant to keep their footing in Bavaria. On the 8th, Marlborough approached the bridges laid near the conflux of the Lech and the Danube; and, on the morrow, upon intelligence that the united Gallo-Bavarians were marching down to the Danube, he advanced to Exheim. At this last point Eugene left him to bring up his own 18,000 men, but in an hour or two the prince galloped back to apprise Marlborough that the enemy were in full march towards Dillingen, in the evident intention of crossing the Danube and overwhelming his (Eugene's) little army. By joint advice Eugene's troops were thereupon ordered to fall back, and the mass of the forces of Marlborough were put in motion to recross the Danube, in order to be on the same side of the river with those of Eugene, and to join them as soon as possible. This operation was exceedingly difficult. Marlborough had

* In letters to the Duchess he says: "This is contrary to my nature, and nothing but absolute necessity could have obliged me to consent to it, for these poor people suffer for their master's ambition. There having been no war in this country for above sixty years, these towns and villages are so clean that you would be pleased with them. . . . You will, I hope, believe me, that my nature suffers when I see so many fine places burnt, and that must be burnt, if the Elector will not hinder it."

to traverse the Aicha, the Lech, and the Wernitz, as well as the Danube, and all these streams were swollen by the recent rains. The operations, however, were conducted with admirable skill and forethought, and by the 10th Marlborough had pitched his camp between Mittelstadt and Peuchingen, having, to quiet the alarms of the Margrave of Baden, promised to cover the siege of Ingoldstadt. On the evening of that day he threw across the Danube 28 squadrons of horse and 20 battalions to reinforce Prince Eugene, who was now at Donawert, and prepared to follow with his whole army as soon as he should be certain that the Elector of Bavaria and the French marshal had passed the Danube with their whole army. "When," he says in a confidential letter to Godolphin, "Prince Eugene and I have joined, our army will consist of 160 squadrons and 65 battalions. . . . The French make their boast of having a great superiority, but I am very confident they will not venture a battle. Yet if we find a fair occasion we shall be glad to embrace it, being persuaded that the ill condition of our affairs in most parts requires it." As he was retiring in the night for a short rest, Eugene announced, by express, that the enemy had crossed the Danube in force, and that he stood in need of instant succour. The prince had posted his infantry in d'Arco's old position on the Schellenberg, with orders to repair the entrenchments: his baggage he had left at Donawert, and he himself, supported by the Duke of Wirtemberg, was endeavouring to maintain himself on the Kessel. No time was to be lost, as the heads of the Gallo-Bavarian columns were already appearing near Steinheim. At midnight Marlborough ordered his brother, General Churchill, who had already crossed the Danube, to advance and join Eugene, and within two hours the whole of the main army was in motion, crossing the river at different points: but it was ten o'clock at night before the junction with Eugene was completed. Then the combined armies encamped with the Danube on their left and the Kessel in their front, beyond which rivulet General Rowe and some of the English guards were posted. At the dawn of day (the 12th) Marlborough's baggage and artillery came up. At the same moment the English guards moved in the direction of Schweningen, Marlborough and Eugene being with them to survey the ground. Presently these two generals, having ascended the tower of a church, discovered the quarter-masters of the Gallo-Bavarian army marking out a camp between Blenheim and Lutzingen, and instantly they resolved to give battle, and begin the attack before the confusion, inseparable from a change of camps, should be over. Some officers, acquainted with the superiority of the enemy's forces, and the strength of their position, ventured to remonstrate. "I know the danger," said Marlborough; "but a battle is absolutely necessary, and I rely on the bravery and discipline of the troops, which will make amends for our disadvantages." During the night, while the French and Bavarians were moving to the new camp they had selected, and extending their lines along the elevated ground which stretches from Blenheim to Lutzingen, Marlborough concerted with Prince Eugene the arrangements for a general battle. And as early as two o'clock in the morning of Sunday, the memorable 13th of August, these two generals broke up their camp, and by three crossed the Kessel with an aggregate force of 52,000 men and 52 pieces of artillery. Tallard watched their movement with joy, anticipating nothing less than cutting them off from their communications with the places Marlborough had taken in Bavaria, and sliding between them and the Danube. Meanwhile the confederates continued to advance over difficult ground, intersected with rivulets and ditches, Eugene leading the right wing and Marlborough the left. The water-courses, the woods, and the hills behind Blenheim, were scanned with a careful eye; nearer at hand every inch of ground was examined; and from a certain point Marlborough and Eugene rode forward to observe the positions of the enemy, being attended by a Prussian general, who was perfectly well acquainted with the ground and all the local peculiarities from having fought on it and been made prisoner the preceding year in the battle which Villars had gained over the Imperialists. At seven o'clock the outposts and picquets of the Gallo-Bavarians were running back from all points, and the columns were seen forming in the encampment in order of battle. In all they amounted to 56,000 or 57,000 men, or to 4,000 or 5,000 more than the confederates; and they had an immense advantage over the confederates in their ground. But in case of a defeat their situation must be hopeless, and Tallard and the elector had committed a great fault in forming in two separate bodies at a considerable distance from each other with hardly any infantry between them as a sentry.*

The united troops of the elector and General Marsin occupied the left, at Lutzingen; Tallard stood on the right, by Blenheim. A brigade of dismounted dragoons was posted behind a barricade of waggons between the village of Blenheim and the Danube, and three brigades occupied the village, and communicated with the dismounted dragoons. There were palisades, barricades, and gates, and the open spaces in the village between the houses and the gardens were blocked up with carts, felled trees, and boards, all having behind them well covered musketeers. There was also a small old castle by the village, and this and the church tower were garnished with muskets; while a battalion of artillery was distributed on various points in and about Blenheim, under the command of the French general Clerambault, who was instructed to maintain the village to the last extremity. It was to this formidable point, having the little river Nebel flowing before it, that Marlborough, after a short cannonade on both sides, during which he was nearly struck by a French ball, led his left wing, while Prince Eugene moved with the right to fall upon the Elector and Marsin. Marlborough sent the brave Lord Cutts to begin the attack on the village of Blenheim, he himself moving down the Nebel under a heavy fire of grape-shot, in order to seize an opportunity of throwing himself between the two divisions of the Gallo-Bavarians, whose communications were now maintained apparently by nothing but horse. Cutts, under another fire of grape, threw fascines into the bed of the Nebel, got across that stream, and deliberately advanced towards the palisades and enclosures. The French there held their fire till he was within thirty paces; and then they gave such a volley as laid prostrate a vast number of officers and men. But General Rowe, at the head of the leading brigade of English, walked on, and stuck his sword into the palisades, before he gave the word to fire. The French were covered, and the English uncovered; the palisades were strong; Rowe was mortally wounded by a musket-ball; his lieutenant-colonel and major were killed in attempting to remove his body; and the leading brigade, after losing one-third of its numbers, was driven back and broken, and charged by three squadrons of gens d'armes. But a body of Hessians moved forward to the support of the English, and drove the French horse back to their lines. Lord Cutts then got up five squadrons of cavalry, who experienced great difficulty in clearing the swamp, and who would have been driven back across the Nebel but for the steadiness of the Hessian infantry. After several sanguinary attacks and sallies on the part of the French, the brigades of Ferguson and Hudson crossed the stream at another point, forced the enemy to withdraw some artillery with which they had swept the forts, and advanced right in front of the village. The old national animosity and rivalry blazed out in a fury; the French and English officers crossed swords through the palisades, and fought hand to hand; and the English soldiery, here and there, losing patience for the operations of loading and priming, thrust at the French through the openings in their defences with the points of their bayonets, or beat them on the head over the barricades with the butt ends of their muskets. But Lord Cutts, who appears to have had not a single cannon with him, saw that there was no hope of forcing the village without artillery, and he was compelled to order back his thinned ranks to the cover of some rising ground. But in the mean time, Marlborough, with his eye on the wide gap that interposed between Tallard and Blenheim, and the Elector and Marsin, pushed part of his infantry over some little bridges, and then, by means of fascines and planks, sent his cavalry after them. Both horse and foot were enfiladed on their passage by a portion of Clerambault's artillery; nevertheless, they formed on the opposite bank of the rivulet, threw back the charges of the French and Bavarian cavalry, and kept their ground, waiting for the Prince of Holstein-Beck and his artillery,—an arm which seems to have been badly disposed of during the early part of this battle, for the prince had been cannonading the enemy from a point whence his balls could scarcely reach them, while Cutts and others had been hammered to death, without a cannon to reply. Holstein-Beck had scarcely got half his column across the stream when he was charged by the Irish brigade in the pay of Louis XIV., who fought most desperately, and by other fresh troops: his highness was mortally wounded, and made prisoner; his men, that were not driven back into the rivulet, were cut to pieces. It was at this critical moment that Marlborough in person galloped to the spot, and led a brigade across the stream, ordering at the same time some artillery to be brought up, and extending some Danish and Hanoverian horse along the banks. He compelled the French horse to fall back in an instant, and, by one or two simple movements, he established a connexion with the troops fighting under Eugene, and masked his own intended movement (with his entire centre) upon Tallard, who had committed a series of blunders, and who was now about to be entirely cut off from his ally, the Elector, having vainly trusted that the cavalry placed in the gap and his moving batteries would prevent any advance in that direction. By five in the afternoon (the English general) had formed his cavalry in two strong lines, and posted his infantry in their rear; and then, amidst a tremendous fire of cannon and musketry, he moved rapidly forward up a steep hill, upon which the French horse were now concentrated with a part of Tallard's infantry brought out from Blenheim. The summit of the hill was gained; but there Marlborough was brought to a pause by the firm array of the enemy, and even thrown back some hundred paces; but he repeated his attack with artillery and small arms, gradually overpowered the fire of the enemy, and then, with a charge, broke the French horse, and cut to pieces or made prisoners some regiments of infantry. Abandoned by the flight of their cavalry, Tallard now sent an officer to order the infantry to evacuate Blenheim, and another to press the Elector either to support him with a reinforcement, or to make a diversion in his favour by a dashing offensive movement in the opposite direction. But the Elector could do neither of these things; the Imperial cavalry and other masses of the confederate army now occupied the gap which the French horse had held before; and Prince Eugene, after sustaining several repulses, had driven the Elector's troops beyond Lutzingen, had turned his flank, and posted himself on the edge of a ravine where he could scarcely be attacked with any effect. Thus left to himself, and apparently before he could bring up or put in order the troops which had been stationed in the village of Blenheim, Tallard was charged with the overwhelming force of the allied horse; and, broken and dismayed at once, he fled with part of his cavalry to Sonderheim, while the rest fled towards Hochstadt. Marlborough followed Tallard with the sword in his loins, drove a vast number of his men down the declivity near Blenheim into the Danube, and took still more prisoners. At Sonderheim, with the Danube on one side and victorious enemies on all other sides, Tallard, who had seen his son killed, and who had been wounded himself, surrendered with many officers of distinction. Nor had those who fled towards Hochstadt a better fate: they got entangled in a morass; were cut off by dragoons, and, in the end, they were nearly all killed, made prisoners, or drowned in the Danube, except the famous brigade of Grignan and some of the gens d'armes, who fell back to some heights beyond Hochstadt. In one or two instances whole battalions laid down their arms, and cried for mercy. Prince Eugene witnessed part of the operations which ended in the flight of Tallard from the verge of the ravine above Lutzingen, where he had posted himself; and shortly after, observing Marsin's horse and the Bavarian infantry pouring along the Lutzingen road in great disorder, he judged that the Elector was about to retreat from that point. Although his way lay across the ravine and through woods, and although he had only two squadrons of horse with him, Eugene advanced to intercept this retreat, and emerging into the plain, he did some mischief, and then awaited the arrival of the confederate cavalry, who were pressing hard on the flying Bavarian horse. Marlborough, who had now nothing to do on his side, saw the flames rising from Lutzingen, which the retreating forces had fired, and, being made aware of the advance of Eugene, he detached a mass of cavalry to co-operate with that prince. But

night was now falling, and the smoke from the burning town, with that from the burnt gunpowder, prevented Hompesch, who led this mass of cavalry, from seeing distinctly. Eugene's force was mistaken for the Gallo-Bavarian army, and Hompesch drew rein and wheeled about, when a joint attack and pursuit must have destroyed all the forces that remained with the Elector and Marsin. As it was, the Elector fell back in tolerably good order upon Dillingen. But still the village of Blenheim was held by 12,000 men, who either had not had time to obey the evacuating order sent by Tallard, or who had fallen back into the village as the safest place in the headlong retreat. Clerambault, who had commanded there, was missing,—it was afterwards found he was drowned in the Danube,—but the French troops made a most resolute resistance. When they saw that Marlborough was surrounding the village with troops and artillery, they attempted to rush out and gain a road which led to Sonderheim, but here they were checked by the Scots Greys; and, when they tried in another direction, their way was barred by the cavalry of General Ross. Still, however, they sheltered themselves behind their barricades and the walls and houses of Blenheim, and kept up a sharp fire. At length, however, fire was set to the houses; batteries were planted all round within musket-shot; and every road, every path, was blocked up. Then a parley took place, and the French proposed a capitulation; but General Churchill rode to the spot, and insisted on an unconditional surrender; and to these hard terms they were forced to come at last, twenty-four battalions and twelve squadrons laying down their arms to the conqueror. The total loss of the Gallo-Bavarians on this decisive day, in prisoners, killed, and drowned, exceeded rather than fell short of 35,000 men. The army, which was to have overturned the empire, and to impose the will of Louis XIV. on the whole of Europe, was annihilated. Marlborough and his allies on their side lost above 12,000 men.*

We have entered into far more details respecting this brilliant and decisive campaign than we can attempt to do in any of the succeeding parts of this war. We were anxious to present something like a competent notion of the prowess and ability of one who is always ranked among the greatest of English captains. The plan of the campaign, the mode in which it was conducted, and the result of it, may, after every possible deduction, justify the laurels which have been put upon the head of the hero of Blenheim. Soon after the battle about 3000 Germans, who had been serving with the French, enlisted under the banner of Marlborough, and this number was subsequently increased considerably. The Elector of Bavaria, continuing his retreat, scarcely stopped till he reached Villeroy in Flanders. The whole of his dominions were abandoned to the conqueror. The court of Versailles had small comfort to offer their unfortunate ally, and the French nation fell for a time into gloom and despondency.†

On the 19th of August Marlborough and Eugene advanced in the direction of Ulm, in the hopes of obtaining that important place either by a siege or by a treaty with the unfortunate wife of the Elector. On the 21st Marlborough informed his duchess that he and the prince had offered to restore the whole of Bavaria, and obtain for the Elector 400,000 crowns per annum, if he would only enter into the confederacy, and furnish the allies with 8000 men. But he adds, "I take it for granted he is determined to go for France, and abandon his own country to the rage of the Germans." Leaving a force for the reduction of Ulm, the army, on the 28th, began to march in different columns to the Rhine; and by the beginning of September the different columns were all concentrated round Philipsberg. By the 8th the whole army had crossed the Rhine into Alsace, and commenced their march upon Landau, which was to be invested by the Margrave of Baden, while Marlborough and Eugene covered the siege; and before the campaign closed Landau and Traerbach were both taken, the besiegers being strengthened in men and in materials by the arrival of the greater part of the force left before Ulm, which had surrendered after a very short resistance.

Before Marlborough returned home, he received from the Emperor Leopold a letter addressed "TO THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS PRINCE OF US, AND THE HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE, JOHN DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH," &c., announcing in form his elevation to a place among the princes of the empire, &c. The fortunate soldier, however, liked not this empty title; he wished the lands: from which he was to take his title to be named beforehand, representing that he could not have a seat in the Diet till he was master of an imperial fief in the empire; his friends Godolphin and Harley raised other objections, and as Leopold was ready neither with money nor land, the high honour was held in suspense for the present. Marlborough, however, employed his influence and address to bring about a reconciliation between the emperor and his revolted subjects in Hungary, whose formidable insurrection, promoted by the French, had embarrassed the operations of this present campaign, by obliging Leopold to keep a large part of his army continually on the frontiers, or in the provinces of Hungary. His success fell short of his expectation; for Leopold, who would have listened to terms in the moment of danger, when Tallard and the Elector of Bavaria were upon the high road to Vienna, would give ear to none when Marlborough had dissipated the danger. In the month of November the English general, who was at least as able in negotiations and court proceedings as he was in war, made a journey to Berlin to engage the king of Prussia to suspend certain claims he had upon the Dutch, to enter into the confederacy still more earnestly, and to furnish still more troops. His Prussian majesty promised 8,000 men for the speedy relief of the Duke of Savoy; and then Marlborough travelled, in miserably cold weather, to Hanover, where he met with a warm reception from "the Protestant Succession"—the family which only waited for the death of Anne to ascend the throne of England. The elector was an ally, a member of the confederacy which had been the means of raising the general to the summit of honour; but, apart from the business of war, there were, of course, other powerful considerations to draw Marlborough to the court of the Guelfs. From Hanover he went to the Hague, and thence set out for England. He arrived at the palace of St. James's in the middle of December, carrying with him Marshal Tallard and the rest of his more distinguished prisoners, together with the standards he had taken and the other trophies of his great victory. His reception was in every way flattering, and all classes seemed in an ecstasy except the ultra-Tories, who threatened nothing less than an impeachment for † "Such," says Voltaire, "was the celebrated battle which the French call the battle of Hochstet, the Germans Plenheim, and the English Blenheim. The conquerors had about 5000 killed and 8000 wounded, the greater part being on the side of Prince Eugene. The French army was almost entirely destroyed: of 60,000 men, so long victorious, there never re-assembled more than 20,000 effectives. About 12,000 killed, 14,000 prisoners, all the cannon, a prodigious number of colours and standards, all the tents and equipages, the general of the army, and 1200 officers of mark in the power of the conqueror, signified that day! The fugitives dispersed in all directions; more than a hundred leagues of country were lost in less than one month. The whole of Bavaria, falling under the yoke of the emperor, experienced all the rigour of the irritated Austrian government, and all the rapacity and barbarity of a victorious soldiery. The Elector, flying for refuge to Brussels, met on the road his brother the Elector of Cologne, driven, like himself, out of his States: they embraced in a flood of tears. Astonishment and consternation seized the court of Versailles, so long accustomed to prosperity. The news of the defeat arrived there in the midst of the rejoicings for the birth of a great-grandson of Louis XIV. Nobody dared inform the king of so cruel a truth. what, even after its success, they chose to style his rash march on the Danube. The parliament had assembled on the preceding 29th of October, and on the 15th of December, the day after his arrival, Marlborough took his seat in the House of Peers, being welcomed by the lord keeper with an address of congratulation. On the same day a committee of the Commons waited upon him with the thanks of their House for his glorious services. Processions and city feasts followed in abundance.*

While Marlborough had been fighting on the Danube, another English force under the command of the Duke of Schomberg, and then of the Earl of Galway, had been engaged on the Tagus, the Douro, and the frontiers of Spain. The Archduke Charles, or, as he was now called, King Charles of Spain, had been conveyed to Portugal by our English fleet; and 6,000 English and Dutch troops were sent to assist him in his bold enterprise of invading Spain and dethroning Philip, the grandson of Louis XIV. Great preparations had been counted upon on the part of the King of Portugal, now a member of the confederacy; but when the English and Dutch arrived in his country they found that he had prepared nothing, and that they must distribute themselves among the garrisons on his frontiers, which were menaced by the Duke of Berwick, the natural son of James II. (by Arabella Churchill, the sister of Marlborough), but now a Spanish grandee, and in the service of the French King of Spain. And, in effect, Portugal, instead of invading, was invaded. Berwick entered at one point, and took the town of Segura, while Villadarias entered at another. Two Dutch battalions were surprised and taken by Berwick, who pushed forward for the Tagus, which his colleague Villadarias was approaching by another line of march. King Philip soon joined Berwick in person, and then Portalegre was invested, and the garrison, including an English regiment of foot, compelled to surrender. Philip or Berwick then moved to Castel Davide, and that place also surrendered at discretion. On the other hand, the allies, to make a diversion, sent Das Minas into Spain with 15,000 men; and this general took one or two places in Castile, and defeated a body of French and Spanish troops. In other quarters it was usual to suspend military operations on account of winter; but here the heats of summer had that effect, for Philip, finding the weather grew excessively hot, sent his troops into quarters, and the allies followed his example.

* "On the 3rd of January (1705) the trophies of the victory were removed from the Tower, where they were first deposited, to Westminster Hall. The cavalcade consisted of companies of horse and foot guards, intermixed with persons of distinction, who attended to do honour to the occasion, and was closed by 128 pikemen, each having an uplifted standard. Amidst the thunder of artillery, and the shouts of an exulting multitude, the procession moved through the streets of London and Westminster, in solemn pomp, and, traversing the Green Park, was viewed by the queen from one of the windows of the palace. Since the defeat of the Spanish Armada, so triumphant a spectacle had never gladdened the eyes of a British public; nor was the effect unworthy of the occasion: the pulse of the nation beat high with joy, and the names of Anne and Marlborough were mingled amidst the testimonies of tumultuous exultation which burst from all ranks and orders."—Cove, Life.

Schomberg, who had disagreed with the Dutch and Portuguese commanders, and who was disgusted with everything he saw, desired leave to resign his command. The Earl of Galway (Rouvigny) was then appointed; and that general arrived in the Tagus about the middle of July, with some reinforcements. All was quiet till the first rains of autumn had cooled the air, and then King Charles and the King of Portugal went to the frontiers of Castile, with an intention of doing great things. But they did nothing, nor did King Philip or the Duke of Berwick perform much more.

As for Villadarias, he had been recalled from his insignificant conquests in Portugal, and sent to recover THE ROCK OF GIBRALTAR, which had been taken by the English rather by accident than by any matured design. Sir George Rooke, after landing King Charles at Lisbon, sent a squadron to cruise off Cape Spartel, under the command of Rear-Admiral Dilkes, who took three Spanish men-of-war, after a smart engagement. Rooke himself soon received orders from the English cabinet to sail to the relief of Nice and Villa Franca, which were supposed to be in danger from the French: at the same time he was pressed by King Charles, who had been given to believe that the people of that city and all the Catalonians would declare in his favour, to appear with his fleet before Barcelona. Rooke was ready to perform both services: taking the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt on board, who had formerly been Viceroy of Catalonia, he sailed for Barcelona, and invited the governor to surrender to his lawful sovereign, King Charles the Third. The Spaniard replied that Philip V. was his lawful sovereign. Thereupon, by the advice of Hesse Darmstadt, who assured him that there were five to one for King Charles in the city, and that upon his landing some troops this popular majority would oblige the governor to surrender, Rooke disembarked his marines, and sent a new summons. But there was no rising, or sign of rising; the governor was firm, the place strong; and, after throwing some fifty or sixty bombs, the English admiral re-embarked his marines, and sailed up the Mediterranean to Nice. That place was in no danger; but Toulon was close at hand, and off that port he learned from an English scout that vast preparations were making, and that the Count de Toulouse (a natural son of Louis XIV.) was coming into the Mediterranean with the Brest fleet, in order to join that of Toulon. Rooke immediately slipped down the Mediterranean towards the Straits, where he was joined by a good squadron under Sir Cloudesley Shovel. No French fleet was in sight—Toulouse had passed Rooke on his way from Toulon;—the English fleet therefore sailed to the coast of Portugal, in order to protect that country against the French, who were invading it. But Rooke and Shovel soon returned to the Straits; and on the 17th of July, when they were about seven leagues to the eastward of Tetuan, a council of war was held on board the Royal Catherine, wherein it was represented that the most important of places of arms, Gibraltar, was at that moment weakly garrisoned, and resolved thereupon that an attempt should be made to carry the place by a sudden assault. On the 21st the whole fleet came to anchor in Gibraltar Bay. The marines, amounting to about 2000 men, were put under the command of the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, and landed on that narrow, short, sandy isthmus which connects the all but isolated rock with the main, and which is now known by the name of the Neutral Ground. Having thus cut off his communications with the country, Hesse summoned the Spanish governor, who, weak as he was, declared that he would defend the place to the utmost. On the following day, Rooke ordered Rear-Admiral Byng and Rear-Admiral Vanderdussen to range their ships in a line and batter the works: but the wind blew so hard all that day that they could not get into position and order. On the morrow, however (the 23rd), soon after day-break, the ships lay with their broadsides to the works: Rooke gave the signal, and the cannonading was commenced with tremendous effect. Fifteen thousand shots were discharged within five or six hours. The South Molehead was demolished, and the Spaniards at nearly all points were beaten from their guns. Captain Whittaker was ordered to take all the boats, filled with marines and sailors, and to possess himself of the South Molehead. The boats were soon ready, and Captain Jumper and Captain Hicks, being the foremost in their pinnaces, landed on the Mole sword in hand, being followed by their men and others from other boats. But their footing was insecure,—they were treading upon a mine, which the Spaniards now sprung. The explosion was terrific, and when the smoke cleared away two English officers and about a hundred men were found killed or wounded. The rest of the assailants, however, kept their ground; others followed them, the sailors climbing up the face of the rock as nimbly as the monkeys which are native to it. Captain Whittaker joined Jumper and Hicks on a platform, and then led the seamen up to a redoubt between the mole and the town. The Prince of Hesse, in the meanwhile, was doing what he could with the marines on the side of the isthmus—which, from the nature of the ground, was very little—and other bodies of sailors effected a landing between Europa Point and the town. Captain Whittaker's party soon carried the redoubt, and thereupon the Spanish governor capitulated, and threw open the gates which led to the isthmus, for the entrance of the Prince of Hesse and the marines. Thus was carried in three days the famous old rock, which has since sustained sieges of many months' duration, baffling more than once the united power of France and Spain—a place so strong by nature, and so fortified by modern science, by successive excavations and other works, that it can scarcely be taken from us so long as England remains sufficiently strong at sea to keep it supplied with provisions and ammunition. The Spanish general, Villadarias, who was sent from Portugal to recapture it, found he could do nothing against it. Admiral Rooke, leaving the Prince of Hesse and the marines to garrison the valuable conquest, sailed again up the Mediterranean. On the 9th of August he came in sight of the united Brest and Toulon fleets, all clean out of harbour and in excellent condition; whereas the English and Dutch ships were foul and thinly manned, having been long from home, and weakened by casualties, drafts, and the recent abstraction of nearly all their marines. Rooke, however, determined to engage, and on Sunday the 13th of August he came up with the French, under the supreme command of the Count de Toulouse, off Malaga. The count had fifty-two ships, many of which were first-rates, and twenty-four galleys: Rooke, between English and Dutch, had fifty-three ships, but scarcely any first-rates among them, and a few frigates, that were ordered to check the French galleys. The allies bore down upon the French, who were formed in line; and the battle began at ten o'clock. In the course of an hour or two some of Rooke's ships were obliged to quit the line for want of gunpowder! At about two in the afternoon the van of the French gave way; but the fight was maintained at longer shots till night set in, when Toulouse bore away to leeward, under a light breeze. On the following morning the wind shifted, and gave the French the advantage of the weather-gauge; but, though they were close within sight, they made no use of this advantage; and on the 15th Toulouse slid off for Toulon, followed closely by Rooke, who would have renewed the combat had he been able. As it ended, the affair off Malaga was little better than a drawn battle; not a ship on either side was taken or destroyed; but the loss of human life was great, and here the French suffered most.* Nor was the Count de Toulouse left in a state to take the sea again this summer. In fact, the French did not venture another great engagement at sea during the whole war. After the battle, Rooke sailed to his important conquest of Gibraltar to refit; and towards the end of August he sailed for England, leaving a squadron with Sir John Leake to protect the coast of Portugal, and to keep the Rock, threatened by Villadarias, well supplied.†

* The loss of the English and Dutch in killed and wounded was computed at nearly 3000 men; but, as the French lost 200 officers, it was assumed that, in proportion, some 4000 of their men must have been killed or wounded. Both sides most indistinctly fought with great bravery while the battle lasted. Sir Cloudesley Shovel, who commanded in the van, declared in his official letter "that the like never had been in any former time."

† Villadarias, marching from Portugal and concentrating all the Spanish forces in Estremadura and Andalusia, presented himself at the edge of the isthmus or Neutral Ground, and began to invest Gibraltar towards the end of October. As the Spaniard was thought deficient in activity and military science, the Marquis de Tesou was sent from France to supersede him in the command of the besieging army; but the Frenchman could do no more than the Spaniard, and, after four or five months of fruitless endeavours, the siege was raised. In the great importance of the acquisition of Gibraltar itself, historians have generally overlooked the timely and very important diversion

Every exploit was now weighed in England in the balances of party and faction. The Whigs had their pet hero, the Tories theirs; and each of these classes laboured to underrate the services of their opponents. In the House of Lords, where the Whigs prevailed, and where Marlborough was considered as a convert to the party, nothing was spoken of but the glory of our arms upon the Danube and the great battle of Blenheim; not so much as an allusion being made to Rooke's capture of Gibraltar, or to his hard-fought battle off Malaga: in the Commons, where the Tories still prevailed, and where Rooke was considered as a pillar of the party, they made as much of that admiral's skill and courage as of Marlborough's; and coupled in one sentence the battles of Blenheim and Malaga. Anne, in the speech with which she had opened the session, had again recommended that there should be no contention among them, and declared her intention of being kind and indulgent to all classes of her subjects. Yet the Occasional Conformity Bill, though twice rejected, was again brought forward, to the great disgust of Godolphin, who, after many vain attempts to moderate that party, abandoned the Tories altogether, and began to put himself in a hostile attitude towards them. The bill, still further mitigated, but still oppressive, was carried through the Commons, where Bromley, the mover, declared that the church of England was in as much danger from dissenters as it was in from papists when the tests were enacted: but it was again thrown out in the Lords by a considerable majority, Godolphin, who had formerly voted for it to conciliate the queen, now directly opposing it.*

The transactions of the Scottish parliament during their last session attracted the attention and excited the passions of the English Houses, both Lords and Commons. While Lord Wharton, to practise on the timidity of Godolphin, was openly boasting that he had the treasurer's head in a bag ever since the Scots had passed their Act of Security, Lord Haversham proposed a censure upon ministers, and was seconded by the displaced, discontented, and furious Earls of Rochester and Nottingham. It was proclaimed to the House that the Act of Security, pretended to have been granted in order to obviate a rebellion in Scotland, had furnished the Scots with an incitement to rebellion, and a sanction for resistance. The storm was terrible, but Lord Godolphin's friends and the Whig party prevented a direct vote of censure. They were, however, obliged to agree to a variety of resolutions, as also to present an address to the queen, praying her majesty (as if the Scots really intended an invasion) to fortify Newcastle, Tynemouth, Carlisle, and Hull; to call out the militia of the four northern counties; and to send a competent number of regular troops to the borders. A bill, founded upon their lordships' resolutions, was sent down to the Commons. But, though as furious against the Scots and their Bill of Security as the Lords could be, the Commons were still disposed to quarrel with everything that came to them from the Upper House, and they threw out the bill, and prepared one of their own, which so nearly resembled the other that the Lords passed it without difficulty.* Godolphin at this trying moment derived strength from the growing greatness of his near ally, Marlborough; and he and other statesmen seemed at last to have made up their minds to effect the Union.

A. D. 1705. On the 17th of February Anne informed the House of Commons that she purposed to convey to the Duke of Marlborough and his heirs the interest of the crown in the manor and honour of Woodstock, with the hundred of Wootton, and requested supplies to enable her to clear off the encumbrances on that princely domain. A bill was forthwith passed by both Houses, and received the royal assent early in March. And Anne accompanied the grant with an order to the Board of Works to erect, at the expense of the crown, a splendid palace, to bear the name of Blenheim. This work was presently commenced under Vanbrugh, the architect, poet, and dramatist; but Marlborough and, yet more, his wife, were annoyed almost to death during its progress, and the hero did not live to see the completion of this monument to his fame. Sir George Rooke, on the other hand, nearly got an impeachment instead of a palace and princely manor. The Whigs in the House of Lords commenced an inquiry into various mismanagements, alleged to have taken place in the navy and admiralty departments, which were chiefly under the direction of Rooke, whom the Commons spared because he

which the unexpected capture of that place caused in favour of Portugal.

* Anne herself was present in the House of Lords when the Occasional Conformity Bill was rejected. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Tenison, declared his decided disapprobation of the persecuting bill. "The employing of persons," said he, "of a religion different from the established in civil offices has been practised in all countries where liberty of conscience has been allowed. We have already gone further in excluding dissenters than any country has done. Whatever reasons there were to apprehend our religion in danger from papists when the Test Act was passed cannot be applicable to the dissenters at present. On the contrary, manifest inconveniences result from this exclusion." Deffe, who took up the pen whenever religious liberty was menaced, said at this time:—"But our eyes are at last opened; the name of Protestant is now the common title of an Englishman, the Church of England extends her protection to the tender consciences of her weaker brethren, knowing that all may be Christians, though not alike informed, and the dissenter extends his charity to the Church of England, believing that in his due time God shall reveal even this unto them. If this is not, I wish this were, the temper of both parties; and I am sure it is already the temper of some of each side, which few are of the wisest, most pious, and most judicious. But while fealty and infirmity are essential to humanity, and pride and hypocrisy are the two rampant vices of the Church, this good spirit cannot be universal, and we do not expect †—Discussed upon Occasional Conformity.

* The resolutions of the Lords were—1. That the queen be enabled by act of parliament to nominate commissioners, the former commission having expired, to treat concerning an union with Scotland. 2. That the natives of Scotland should not enjoy the privileges of Englishmen until an union be effected, or the succession settled as in England. 3. That the bringing of cattle from Scotland into England be prevented. 4. That the lord high admiral be required to issue orders for capturing such Scottish vessels as shall be found trading to the ports of France, or any other of her majesty's enemies. 5. That the exportation of English wool into Scotland be prohibited. The chief additions made by the Commons were the prohibition of Scottish linen in England or Ireland, and a permission to the Protestant freeholders of the six northern counties of England to furnish themselves with arms, &c.

was a Tory. Some doubt may be entertained whether the admiral was guilty to any serious extent; but the Whigs had now a firm hold on Marlborough, and, through him and his wife, upon the queen; and Rooke was dismissed when their lordships presented their elaborate representation, and Sir Cloudesley Shovel was appointed to the command of the fleet.

The Commons had not deemed it expedient to pursue the burgess of Aylesbury, who had questioned their authority in the preceding session. Upon their denunciation of all the lawyers who had assisted Ashby, the Lord Chief Justice Holt is said to have declared publicly that, if any messenger of the House of Commons presumed to enter Westminster Hall, in order to seize the person of any attorney or pleader, he would commit him to Newgate. Encouraged by these circumstances, and by the circular which the House of Lords had addressed to the sheriffs and borough-receves of the kingdom, five other burgesses of Aylesbury brought their several actions for damages upon the same grounds. The Commons on the other hand, resolute to maintain what they considered their privileges, committed the five burgesses, who lay in prison for nearly three months without offering any submission. No notice, it appears, was taken of their case till the money bills had been all safely passed; then a motion was made in the Queen's Bench for a Habeas Corpus: the puisne judges declared their opinion as before, that the court could take no cognizance of the matter; but the chief justice maintained that a general warrant of commitment for breach of privilege was of the nature of an execution; and, as it appeared upon the face of the warrant itself, that the five prisoners had been guilty of no legal offence, unless to claim the benefit of the law in opposition to a vote of the House of Commons was such, it was his opinion that they ought instantly to be discharged. The prisoners being, however, remanded by the decision of the majority of the court, moved for a writ of error in order to bring the matter before the Lords. As this writ could only be obtained by a petition to the throne, the Commons, anticipating, presented an address to the queen, in which they affirmed that in this case no writ of error could lie, and requested her majesty not to grant one. Anne replied that she hoped never to give her faithful Commons any just ground of complaint; but to obstruct the course of judicial proceedings was a matter of such importance, that she thought it necessary to weigh and consider carefully what it might be proper for her to do. Upon this the Commons ordered the five prisoners to be removed from Newgate into the custody of their serjeant-at-arms, lest they should be discharged by the queen's granting the writ of error; and, again striking at the lawyers, resolved that all such as had pleaded in behalf of the prisoners were guilty of a breach of privilege, and should be taken into custody. The Lords, on the other hand, passed resolutions declaring that for subjects to claim their just rights in a court of law was no breach of privilege; that the imprisonment of the men of Aylesbury was contrary to law; and that the writ of error could not be refused without a violation of Magna Charta. And they followed up this vote by an address to the queen, beseeching that immediate orders might be given for issuing the writ of error. The dispute was now complicated by a doubt whether a writ of error was of right or only of grace. And here the judges agreed that it was of right. Each House had recourse to the pen and the press; but in the end the victory remained with the Lords; for the queen declared to them that she would certainly have complied with their lordships' request in regard to the writ of error, but that, as it now became absolutely necessary to put an end to the session, she knew it could produce no effect: and, in fact, upon that very day, the 14th of March, she put an end to the session, by prorogation: and, on the 5th of April following, she dissolved this high Tory House of Commons by proclamation. "It was no small blessing," says the Whig Bishop Burnet, "to the queen and to the nation that they had got well out of such hands." According to the Tories, "the Whigs had leaped into the saddle again" by the practice of base arts and manoeuvres, had thrown open the flood-gates of Presbyterianism, of universal dissent and republicanism, and had exposed both church and state to inevitable destruction.* The Whigs certainly showed a disposition to get everything into their own hands: new promotions of men of their party were made in the church, in the navy, in the army; and there were many alterations in the lord-lieutenancies of the counties, all in favour of the Whigs.

In the month of April Marlborough went to the wars, hoping to be able to act with 90,000 men upon the Moselle. But he encountered innumerable difficulties on the part of the States General, the empire, and other members of the confederacy,

* "It has been thought strange, that, when both the queen and the Commons appeared so zealously affected to the established church, such a flood of Whiggism should so suddenly break in upon us. But if it be considered that the ministers, who countenanced the introducing them, were, or pretended to be, once the great patrons of the church; and, by this and other specious pretences, had established themselves in the queen's favour; that the moderate arms, during their administration, had met with great success, which rendered their leaders very popular; and that it was long ere they were suspected of any designs to the prejudice of the establishment, either by the queen or the Tories themselves; that some very crafty courtiers, who had been soured by prosecutions, out of revenge and hopes of a restoration, very readily joined with them; and that they were supported by a great assembly at home, and the allies abroad; we may cease to wonder how the Whigs leaped into the saddle once again. They drew gentlemen in gradually, from one step to another, till they rendered their resort difficult, and at length made them instruments in getting the parliament dissolved, and another House of Commons chosen after their own heart; inasmuch, that the church was really apprehended to be in distress by some, under a queen of known affection to her establishment. And when the Whigs had once engrossed all the posts of power and profit, and entered into strict engagements with foreigners of the same stamp, their next policy was to represent themselves as so formidable a body, that it was not safe to touch them: and it is a much greater wonder that her Majesty ever disengaged herself than that she remained under their influence so long."—Life and Reign of Her late Excellent Majesty Queen Anne, &c.: to which is annexed, some Political Remarks on Bishop Burnet's History of the Reign of Queen Anne. 8vo. 128.

and, instead of being opposed by Villeroy and the other French generals, who had found their way to promotion and command through the favour and countenance of Madame de Maintenon and confessors and Jesuits, he was fronted by Villars, almost the only real soldier left in a high command, and who, if not a great strategist, was dashing and resolute in the extreme. Prince Louis, the Margrave of Baden, was, or pretended to be, in very bad health; but Marlborough waited upon him at Radstadt, in the month of May, and induced the prince to promise to join him on the Moselle. Upon the faith of this promise the English general advanced with the intention of bringing Villars to battle; but the Margrave failed him altogether, and he was obliged to fall back with some precipitation to the Meuse, where the French, by a sudden effort, had captured Huy, taken the town of Liege, and invested the citadel; while the Dutch general Auverquerque was cooped up in a camp near Maestricht, with a force too weak to do anything but look on. The States General trembled for their own territory; but Marlborough re-appearing on the Meuse, recaptured Huy, drove the enemy from Liege, forced their lines at Tirlemont, and pushed them back to the Dyle. It is said that he got them into a position where he might have annihilated them, but that the Dutch field-deputies refused to let their troops act. Whatever was the cause, the enemy was allowed to retreat unmolested to Brussels, and the campaign of 1705 closed ingloriously for the allies.* "I never," says Burnet, who still maintained a close intimacy with the general, "knew the Duke of Marlborough go out so full of hopes as in the beginning of it; but things had not answered his expectations." In the course of the summer the Emperor Leopold died, and was succeeded by his son Joseph, both in his hereditary and elective dignities. According to our bishop, the deſunct emperor "was the most knowing and the most virtuous prince of his communion, only he wanted the judgment that was necessary for conducting great affairs in such critical times. He was almost always betrayed, and yet he was so firm to those who had the address to insinuate themselves into his good opinion and confidence, that it was not possible to let him see those miscarriages that ruined his affairs so often, and brought them sometimes near the last extremities: of these everybody else seemed more sensible than he himself. He was devout and strict in his religion, and was so implicit in his submission to those priests who had credit with him, the Jesuits in particular, that he owed all his troubles to their counsels. The persecution they began in Hungary raised one great war, which gave the Turks occasion to besiege Vienna, by which he was almost entirely swallowed up: this danger did not produce more caution: after the peace of Carlowitz, there was so much violence and oppression in the government of Hungary, both of Papists and Protestants, that this raised a second war there, which, in conjunction with the revolt of the Elector of Bavaria, brought him a second time very near utter ruin: yet he could never be prevailed on either to punish, or so much as to suspect, those who had so fatally entangled his affairs, that without foreign aid, nothing could have extricated them. He was naturally merciful to a fault, for even the punishment of criminals was uneasy to him. Yet all the cruelty in the persecution of heretics seemed to raise no relenting in him." The most favourable reports were spread respecting the character, habits of business, and intentions of his successor Joseph, who, in the course of the autumn was visited at Vienna by Marlborough, bearing a promise of a good English loan to that court, to enable it to equip an army for Italy, where the French were regaining the ascendancy. Prince Eugene was now on that side of the Alps with a weak army, and a dispirited colleague in the Duke of Savoy. After being shut up in the country about Bergamo, Eugene broke through the French lines and fought the Duke of Vendome at Cassano, on the Adda. Both parties claimed the victory; but the French were enabled to threaten Turin, to take one or two other places, and, at the end of the campaign, to reduce and demolish Nice. The campaign in Portugal opened advantageously for the allies, and more might have been done there had it not been for the jealousies and dissensions of the Earl of Galway, who commanded the English, Fagel, who commanded the Dutch, and Das Minas, who commanded the Portuguese. But, on the other side, a great error had been committed by the court of King Philip in sending back to France the Duke of Berwick, who had some of the qualities of a great general, and who was indisputably better than those who succeeded him. While the Gallo-Spanish court was concentrating a large portion of its disposable forces on the side of Gibraltar, Lord Galway crossed the frontier of Estremadura, took the towns of Valencia, De Alcantara, and Alvaquerque, and invested Badajoz. But here Galway's hand was carried off by a shot, a stern resistance was encountered, and, the French General Tessé coming up in force, and Das Minas, the Portuguese general, not appearing at all, the allies were constrained to give up the siege and to fall back upon Portugal. Spain, however, was invaded by sea by a small English army, under the command of the most daring and most brilliant soldier of the day, who only wanted a few sober qualities to be more than a rival to the fortunate Marlborough. This was the witty, eccentric, and unscrupulous Lord Mordaunt, now (by the death of his uncle, in 1697,) Earl of Peterborough, who sailed from Portsmouth in the month of June with about 5000 men, embarked in a fleet commanded by Sir Cloudesley Shovel. At Lisbon they took on board the Austrian claimant Charles. His majesty of Spain and the Indies was, like his brother the Emperor Joseph, in a sad state of impunctiosity; so Peterborough, who was as careless of money as Marlborough was fond of it, munificently entertained him and his suite at his own private cost on their voyage from the Tagus. At the rock some more troops were embarked; and then Peterborough, with Charles and the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, set sail for the coast of Valencia. Peterborough landed, took the small fort of Denia, circulated proclamations in the name of Charles III., and, finding the disposition of the Spaniards in those parts to be very favourable, and that insurrections against the French claimant Philip had broken out in other quarters, he, with his characteristic daring, proposed making a forced march inland, and setting the Austrian on the throne at Madrid, which capital he was confident he could carry by a coup de main. But those who were acting with Peterborough had none of his romantic boldness; his project was overruled, and he was constrained to go and undertake the siege of Barcelona. It may be doubted whether it would not have been easier to march and take Madrid. There were 5000 brave men within the walls of Barcelona,—the Spaniards in all ages have been famous for their resistance in such places,—and the fortifications had recently undergone considerable repairs. Yet Peterborough landed, and sat down before the place in the end of August with little more than 6000 effective men. The English and Dutch generals serving under him were all of opinion that the attempt amounted to madness; but he persisted; and, throwing off all the trammels of routine and military pedantry, he carried on the siege in a way that confirmed all the old generals in their notion that the man was mad. They said that it was impossible such wild and irregular plans could succeed; but they succeeded nevertheless. It was, for example, against all rule and precedent to attack the castle before taking the town; but Peterborough saw that, if he could only take the strong castle of Montjuich, which commanded the town, first, the town itself must soon fall: he perceived at once that the arduous part of the undertaking was the capture of the castle; and therefore he resolved to begin with it while his men were fresh and vigorous, and free from those casualties and miseries which inevitably attend protracted sieges. Accordingly he took a near view of the castle in person, discovered enough to convince him that the garrison in it was neither strong nor vigilant; and then, pretending to give up his enterprise, he re-embarked some of his troops, in order to make the Spaniards believe he was on the point of sailing away. Communicating his real design to none but the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, Peterborough, on the night of the 3rd of September, suddenly put about 1400 men under arms, and sent them by two different bye-roads to fall upon the castle. The first body, consisting of 800 men, he led in person, having the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt with him, who had volunteered to partake in the hazard. "The second body," says Burnet, "were led by General Stanhope, from whom I had this account." About day-break Peterborough fell upon the defences of the castle, and, with no artillery with him except a few small field-pieces and mortars, he established himself on the outworks; but the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt received a shot in his body, fell, and expired soon after; Stanhope, owing to some of his men mistaking their way, did not come up for some time; and the Spanish governor made a fierce sally from the body of the castle, hoping to sweep the assailants down the hill before him. But Peterborough and his brave men kept their ground: the Spaniard, thinking them more numerous than they were, wheeled round without coming to blows, and ran back within the castle. Then Stanhope's men came up, and Peterborough threw a few bombs into the castle. One of these bombs fell into the powder magazine, blew it up, and caused the death of the governor and some of the best officers, and thereupon the rest surrendered without delay. Then Peterborough directed his attention to the town below, reached the walls, and induced the governor, Velasco, to agree to surrender within four days, if not relieved. Relief was out of the question; and within the town the Austrian partisans were numerous and daring: bands of Miquelets, a sort of lawless association of Catalans, threatened to throw open the gates, and subject the whole city to fire, sword, and plunder; so that even before the time mentioned, Velasco was forced to capitulate, and to entreat the enemy to enter, and secure him and the respectable inhabitants from the fury of the Miquelets and the rabble of the town. Peterborough, like a preux chevalier, rode into Barcelona instantly with only a few attendants, and rescued from the rabble a beautiful lady, who proved to be the Duchess of Popoli, the wife of a grandee of Spain, who derived his title from a town in the Abruzzi, and who possessed, or rather had possessed, immense estates in the Neapolitan kingdom. He restored the fair lady to her lord; and, riding through a loose, mad fire of guns and pistols, and making use of persuasions and of the flat of his sword, he at last succeeded in reducing that rabble rout to order, and saved the lives of the governor and his officers.* "The Spaniards," says Voltaire, "were confounded at the sight of so much magnanimity in the English, whom the populace had taken for pitiless barbarians, because they were heretics." Immediately after this remarkable achievement, the whole of Catalonia and every fortified place in it, with the exception of Rosas, submitted to Charles. But Peterborough was not the man to sleep under his laurels; he flew in search of fresh exploits, and led his troops over the ground as fast as Spanish cabinet couriers travelled. St. Matteo, which had declared for the Austrian, was invested by an army which served King Philip; the place was thirty leagues distant from Barcelona, and the roads were like what Spanish roads have always been and still are; but Peterborough was there in a week; St. Matteo was relieved; and thence, continuing his meteor-like course, and never stopping till he reached the city of Valencia, he saw the whole of that province reduced to obedience, or confirmed in its submission, to Charles, with the exception of the sea-port of Alicante, which held out for Philip. The whole of this campaign is like a piece of romance, and by it Peterborough indisputably gave to the military history of his country one of its most sparkling episodes. The officers with him could scarcely believe what had been done with such insignificant means, even when the work was achieved. The Spaniards said he had a devil in him; and, besides that, the assistance of magic and necromancy.

* "The Prince of Baden's conduct, through this whole matter, was liable to great censure: the worst suspicion was, that he was corrupted by the French. Those who did not carry their censures so far attributed his acting as he did to his pride, and thought he envying the Duke of Marlborough, and apprehending that the whole glory of the campaign would be ascribed to him, since he had the stronger army, chose rather to defeat the whole design than see another carry away the chief honour of any successes that might have happened."—Burnet.

During these brilliant operations there was a party-war at home, which was prosecuted without any chivalry or romance, but with infinite cunning and still more animosity. The high Tories made a kind of death struggle; but the court-ground, their best position, sunk beneath their feet; and Anne, after a long struggle with herself, wholly deprived the party of the light of her countenance. The great seal was given to Mr. William Cowper, soon afterwards created Baron Cowper, one of the most accomplished orators and politicians of his time,—a Whig in all essentials, and an enthusiastic admirer of the principles of the Revolution. The Duke of Buckingham, the witty Lord Normanby of former days, who adhered to the high church party, though he was a sceptic in religion and of very doubtful morals,* was deprived of the privy seal, which was given to the Whig Duke of Newcastle. When the new parliament met, in the month of October, it was found that the Whigs had the majority, and that the Tories, in spite of their abstract doctrines, had resolved to show as little respect to the court as oppositions generally do. The nominee of the Whigs was elected to the speakership by a majority of 250 to 207. The queen's opening speech was the production of the Whig Lord-Keeper Cowper, and the whole

* "John, Duke of Buckinghamshire, &c., Lord Privy Seal, was Earl of Mulgrave in the reign of Charles II., had the Garter, and made a considerable figure at court. His presumption made him make love to the Princess Anne (now queen), for which he left the kingdom, but soon after returned, and was made Lord Chamberlain by King James. He opposed the Revolution; nor did he ever enter into the measures of the court all King William's reign, yet was created by that king Marquis of Normanby. On the queen's accession to the throne he was made of the cabinet. Lord Privy Seal, and Duke of Buckinghamshire. He is a nobleman of learning and good natural points, but of no principles. Very proud, insolent, and takes all advantages. In paying his debts unwilling; and is neither esteemed nor beloved: for, notwithstanding his great interest at court, it is certain he hath none in either House of Parliament or in the country. He is of a middle stature, of a brown complexion, with a sour, lofty look, near sixty years old."—Characters in John Marley's Memoirs.

* "The Earl of Peterborough, with Stanhope and other officers, rode about the streets to stop this fury, and to prevail with the people to maintain their articles of capitulation religiously; and in doing this, Stanhope said to me, they ran a greater hazard, from the shooting and fire that was flying about in that disorder, than they had done during the whole siege."—Burnet.

thing bore the impress of Whig feeling. In it Anne announced, more strongly than before, her intention of continuing the war till the Bourbon prince was driven from Spain, and the Austrian fully established upon that throne. "Nothing," she said, "can be more evident than that, if the French king continues master of the Spanish monarchy, the balance of power in Europe will be utterly destroyed; and he will be able, in a short time, to engross the trade and the wealth of the world. No good Englishman could at any time be content to sit still and acquiesce in such a prospect; and at this time we have great ground to hope that a good foundation is laid for restoring the monarchy of Spain to the House of Austria, the consequence of which will not only be safe and advantageous, but glorious for England. I may add, that we have learned, by our own experience, that no peace with France will last longer than the first opportunity of their dividing the allies, and attacking some of them with advantage." Then followed the usual pressing demand for supplies to carry on the next year's war; and after this there was a high encomium of the firmness and conduct which the Duke of Savoy had shown amidst extreme difficulties, and a flattering compliment to the vain-glorious King of Prussia. Her majesty told the lords and gentlemen that she had appointed commissioners to treat with Scottish commissioners concerning a nearer and more complete union between the two kingdoms, which would not only prevent many inconveniences which might otherwise happen, but must also conduce to the peace and happiness of both nations. "But," continued Anne, "there is another union I think myself obliged to recommend to you in the most earnest and affectionate manner—I mean a union of minds and affections among ourselves. . . . I cannot but with grief observe, there are some amongst us who endeavour to foment animosities; but I persuade myself they will be found to be very few when you appear to assist me in discountenancing and defeating such practices. I mention this with a little more warmth, because there have not been wanting some so very malicious as, even in print, to suggest the Church of England to be in danger at this time."—[Here allusion was made to "The Memorial of the Church of England," a furious pamphlet which had just been published by the high-church party, to show that the religion by law established must inevitably be subverted by her majesty's present advisers.]—The speech ended with assurances that her majesty's affection for the church was beyond the reach of a doubt; that the best proof of zeal for the preservation of that church would be to join heartily in prosecuting the war against an enemy who was engaged to extirpate our religion and our liberties; that her majesty was fully resolved to do her part to support and affectionately countenance the Church of England as by law established, yet, at the same time, inviolably to maintain toleration.

The Lords, in their address, not only concurred with her majesty, but also desired and besought her to prosecute and punish with the utmost rigour of the law all those who should suggest that the church was in danger; such men being the most spiteful and dangerous enemies to both church and state. The Commons also, in their address, expressed their indignation at the high church cry, and stigmatised those who raised it and kept it up as incendiaries. The first effort the Tories made in opposition was in the Upper House, on the 15th of November, when Lord Haversham violently censured the conduct of the Dutch, the Imperialists, and our other allies in this year's campaign;* and complained of the great decay of our trade and of the selfish policy of the Dutch, who were enriching themselves at our expense.† The queen's animadverting in her speech upon the heats between the two Houses in the last parliament, he also said, was unparliamentary, seeing that the prince ought not to take notice of anything transacted in parliament unless it was laid before the throne in a parliamentary way. But the principal object of the speech of Lord Haversham was reserved to the end, when he proposed that, for the security of the Protestant succession, the church, &c., an address should be presented to her majesty, praying her to invite over the presumptive heir of the crown to reside here,—that is to say, the Electress Sophia, who was, in religion, not an Anglican, but a Lutheran, and who was many years older than the queen. Haversham, who made this singular proposal, had been a Whig, but disappointment had made him join the Tories, who had now made up their minds to go beyond the Whigs themselves in their zeal for the House of Hanover. By this course they seemed to have promised themselves many advantages either direct or indirect: by expressing an anxiety for this Protestant succession they fell in with the prevailing popular feeling, and so might escape in part the old imputations of Jacobitism or a leaning to the Pretender after Anne's death; if the Electress Sophia came over, her son,

* He represented that the Imperialists did not join the Duke of Marlborough on his advance to the Moselle, and thereby made that design prove abortive; and that the Dutch had prevented the Duke of Marlborough's engaging the French after he had actually forced their lines. "We had then," said he, "a fair opportunity of putting an end to the war at once: but the Dutch held our hands, and would not let us give the deciding blow. Therefore, let our supplies be never so full and speedy,—let our management be never so great and frugal,—yet, if it be our misfortune to have allies that are as slow and backward as we are zealous and forward,—that hold our hands, and suffer us not to take any opportunity that offers,—that are coming into the field when we are going into winter quarters, I cannot see what we are reasonably to expect in this war." There was some truth as well as point in these remarks.

† Lord Haversham said, upon this subject, "that there was a word we were very fond of, which we call the balance of power; but the Dutch, who were a very wise people, had a double view, and took as much care of the balance of trade as they did of the balance of power, and were as much afraid of our power by sea as of the power of France by land:—that trade begets wealth, and wealth power;—that it was very hard for England, that, while the Dutch lived at peace under the protection of our arms, if we would have any part of trade with them we must have it under the protection of French passes; that the Dutch, indeed, complained of poverty, but he could not see how they had been out of pocket one shilling by this war, for they got more by remittances from England than all the money that went out of Holland to Portugal, Savoy, and the German princes."

Prince George, would be a resident or a frequent visitor, and then there would be two courts and two court parties, and the consequent dissensions and intrigues might lift them into the places from which the Whigs had made them descend,—might derange the whole scheme of the succession, and leave them the power of making a new one with a large margin for their personal interests and advancements. Many of the party most undoubtedly looked to the enthronement of the Pretender; but a still greater number had no very decided partiality either for the House of Stuart or the House of Hanover, except such as arose out of their interests and hopes of re-establishing themselves in place. Others there were that were actuated merely by spite against the queen for her recent abandonment of them; and these men well knew that the name of Hanover was odious to her ears,—that Anne could never hear mention of the electress or of her son (who had once rejected her as a bride) without irritation and extreme uncasiness. Princes pretty generally hate those who are to succeed them, even when they are of their own begetting; but in the present case the feeling was the more bitter on account of remoteness of connexion, difference in language, in manners, and in everything, and by reason of the slight which the unforgiving Anne had received in her youth. None knew this better than the Duke of Buckingham, her own uncle the Earl of Rochester, and her former counsellor the Earl of Nottingham, who all three supported Lord Haversham's motion. Buckingham, whose wrongs—as he considered his dismissal—were most recent, throwing aside all delicacy, all decency, put the case of the queen's falling into a state of dotage, and so becoming the tool of others; and he and his friends further urged, that, having sworn to maintain the Protestant succession, they were bound to take the step they now proposed; that the best way of securing that succession was to have the successor on the spot, ready to assert his rights; that, if the Archduke Charles had been resident in Spain at the demise of the late king, the present war of succession would, in all probability, never have existed. Anne, though probably unseen, was present at this debate—she was shocked at what she termed “malice and insolence,” and her partial and temporary conversion to Whiggism was perhaps more forwardly by this debate than even by the earnest advocacy of her grace of Marlborough. But while the queen raved under the infliction, the Tories, whose party motto was a delicate regard to and a quasi adoration of royalty, fancied they had put the Whigs between the sharp horns of a dilemma; for, if they opposed the motion, they must run a risk of losing their popularity at home and incensing the House of Hanover abroad; and, if they acquiesced, they would be sure to lose their hold upon the queen, who would as soon have seen his satanic majesty in person at the court of St. James's, as the Electress Sophia or her blunt son George. But the Whigs extricated themselves with address and eloquence: they represented the jealousies and many inconveniences which must arise from a rivalry between two courts settled in the same kingdom; and they maintained the propriety of keeping the successor or heir presumptive in a state of dependence upon, and subordination to, the sovereign actually upon the throne. The Earl of Wharton added to the more serious arguments wit and sarcasm. He had lately heard with delight the queen recommend union and agreement to all her subjects—it was now apparent there was a divinity about her when she spoke—the cause must be supernatural, as a miracle had been wrought, for now all were zealous for the Protestant succession: the miracle he alluded to was the sudden conversion of the ultra-Tories, but, like most other new converts, their zeal far exceeded their judgment and discretion. Instead of their dangerous measure, he proposed that the Hanoverian succession should be strengthened by bringing in a bill establishing an eventual council of regency, which should be empowered to act on the demise of the queen till the successor should arrive and take actual possession. Haversham's motion was lost, and this bill was brought in and passed. By it the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor or Keeper, the Lord President, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Privy Seal, the Lord High Admiral and the Lord Chief Justice of England, for the time being, were to form and constitute this brief regency whenever the sad event of her majesty's death should happen. And, as the Whigs knew that this unavoidable rub would cause unpleasant feelings in Hanover, they made haste to pass a bill of naturalization, extending to all the descendants of the Princess Sophia, wheresoever or whencesoever born, and to send over the courteous and accomplished Earl of Halifax with the Order of the Garter for the electoral Prince George. Besides this bit of ribbon, Halifax carried with him letters from Lord Somers, Cowper, and others of the Whig leaders, who were all anxious to explain their conduct in regard to Lord Haversham's motion, and to secure the goodwill of that illustrious house. The Duke of Marlborough, who knew more of the court of Hanover than any of them, also sent his letters. The result was that the electress and her son were “charmed,” and the Guelphs then commenced that close alliance with the Whig party which did not end, and was scarcely interrupted, until some years after the accession of George the Third.

Pursuing their great success, the Whigs resolved to take the cry of “the church in danger” out of the mouths of their opponents, by bringing the matter to a direct vote. Halifax moved that a day might be appointed to inquire into this alleged danger. The challenge was accepted; and on the 6th of December a vehement debate was begun. The Earl of Rochester, as loud-toned as ever, declared that the church of England was and must be in danger on account of the establishment of Presbytery in Scotland without a toleration;—

that it was further in danger because the Protestant successor was not yet resident in the kingdom, and because the Occasional Conformity Bill had not been passed. Halifax replied to this champion of the high church party, that, however inimical the kirk or the people of Scotland might be supposed, England was surely strong enough to defend herself—the strength of England having increased much more in proportion than that of Scotland; and, moreover, now an entire union of the two nations was soon likely to put an end to this source of danger. As to the absence of the Protestant heir, that, he said, was a danger but of eight days' standing, for a fortnight ago no one had dreamed that the absence of the Princess Sophia was a cause of danger to the church; and he insisted that the Occasional Conformity Bill, so far from being any security to the church, would, if passed, have put it really in danger. Halifax cuttingly reminded Rochester of his passiveness under the papist James II., and of his sitting in that prince's tyrannical High Commission Court, which was intended to annihilate the privileges of the established church; and he told the Tories in general that they had only begun their cry of 'the church in danger' when that essentially Protestant prince the late King William had acceded to the throne and taken to himself a Whig cabinet. The Bishop of London, the same fiery Compton who had been a cornet of dragoons in his youth, who had been sent to the Tower for resistance to the rescripts of James, and who had taken the Princess Anne into his protection when she deserted her father's palace of St. James's, now stood up in his place an advocate for passive obedience: he complained of recent sermons inculcating the doctrine of resistance, and of his own want of power to punish a disobedient parson of his diocese. Here he alluded to a sermon preached by Benjamin Hoadly, lecturer of St. Mildred's, in the Poultry, London, who subsequently became a bishop himself. Burnet vindicated Hoadly, whom he esteemed as a pious and judicious divine; and he very aptly reminded Compton of his appearance in arms at the Revolution. Sharp, Archbishop of York, held that the church was in danger from seminaries maintained by the dissenters, and he assumed the broad principle that the education of the nation ought to be left entirely in the hands of the established church. The Duke of Leeds (the Damby of former times) tried to recover a little consideration by siding with the high churchmen:—with a great show of zeal he averred that the intolerant 'Occasional Conformity Bill' was essential to the preservation of the church; and that the queen herself, in private discourse with him, had expressed precisely the same opinion. [We know from the Duchess of Marlborough that Anne really did entertain that notion, and that it had cost the Marlboroughs and the Whigs infinite trouble to remove it out of her head.] On the other side, Hough, the bold president of Magdalen College in

King James's time, and now Bishop of Lichfield, with Patrick, Bishop of Ely, charged the two universities with instilling wrong and uncharitable notions into the clergy, and rendering their pupils slavish to the crown, and yet insolent and contumacious to the authority of their bishops. Lord Wharton again enlivened the subject with his wit:—"In all," said he, "that I have read and heard, I can find but one fact, and that is that the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Rochester, and the Earl of Nottingham are out of place." In the end it was resolved "that the Church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the extremest danger by King William III., of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, under the happy reign of her majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition: and that whoever goes about to suggest and insinuate that the church is in danger under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom." This resolution was carried by a majority of 61 to 30: the queen was present at the debate. The Commons adopted their lordships' resolution by a majority of 212 to 160; and then the two Houses addressed her majesty, expressing their indignation against such wicked people as should again raise the alarm-cry, and begging her to cause their joint resolution to be universally known, in order to deter men from spreading such reports. Anne ordered a proclamation to be issued accordingly, and promised a reward for discovering the author and printer of "The Memorial of the Church of England." The Marlboroughs were now set down as renegades and deserters to the Whigs and the dissenters, and no opportunity was lost by the party he had abandoned of attacking the fortunate general. During one debate Mr. Cesar, member for Hereford, said, "There is a noble lord without whose advice the queen does nothing, and who, in the late reign, was known to keep a constant correspondence with the court of St. Germain." The fact was undeniable, but this did not prevent the Commons from voting that the words were highly dishonourable to her majesty's person and government, and that Mr. Cesar should be sent to the Tower. Edwards, the printer of "The Memorial of the Church of England," surrendered upon promise of pardon if he would discover the author: he named Sir Humphrey Mackworth, and some other members of the House of Commons; but, as the original copy or manuscript had been delivered to him by a third hand, he could not make good the charge, and so that mighty matter slept.

A. D. 1706. Still further to curb the high-church party the Whigs induced Anne to put an end to the vehement disputes which agitated the convocation of the clergy, by commanding the archbishop to prorogue the meeting forthwith. A few days after this, or on the 19th of March, Anne, with a very gracious speech prorogued parliament also. In April Marlborough left England for the wars. The presumptuous and incompetent Vil-

leroy, at the head of 80,000 men, resolving to risk a battle and to efface the disgrace which France had sustained at Blenheim, broke up from his strong positions behind the Dyle, crossed that river, and advanced to the Mehaigne, on the bank of which he encamped on the morning of Whit-Sunday, May 23rd (n.s.). He posted himself like a blockhead, and yet felt assured of victory. "You are lost," cried M. de Gassion, one of his lieutenant-generals, "if you do not change your order of battle. If you lose a moment there is no longer any resource." Other experienced officers gave the same opinion; but Villeroy remained as he was, with his left wing separated from his right, and so placed as to be unable to act; and Marlborough did not allow much time for deliberation. At about half-past one he began his attack with a tremendous fire of artillery, while the horse of his left wing, commanded by Auverquerque, moved gradually upon the right of the enemy. Soon the Dutch Guards carried the village of Tavieres, the key of Villeroy's position, intercepted reinforcements, and, by the help of the Danish horse, cut the French there in pieces, or drove them into the Mehaigue. Some fierce encounters ensued between masses of cavalry, in which the Bavarians, still steady to Louis, seem to have acted with far more bravery and steadiness than the French. But horse and foot, officers and men, on the side of the French had lost much of their former confidence, and during the three last campaigns had seemed to contend rather for safety than for victory. This was not extraordinary; they were discouraged by repeated defeat; their loss in men had been prodigious; and, to furnish recruits, Louis had seized the unwilling peasantry and sent them chained, like malefactors and galley-slaves, to his armies. The military morale was thus lost, and, when this is added to the incompetency of Villeroy, the disgraceful rout at Ramilies will be easily understood. That village, which gave its name to the battle, was occupied in force by Villeroy, and fronted by some heavy batteries. Marlborough sent General Schultz to attack it with twelve battalions. Schultz found hard work; and then Marlborough, throwing forward column after column and squadron after squadron, rode up in person to cheer the soldiers under a murderous fire. He was recognised by some of the French dragoons while talking with a few of his men that had recoiled from the guns, and in a moment he was surrounded; but he put spurs to his horse and went off at a gallop. In leaping a ditch, he was thrown and in great danger of being taken; but Captain Molesworth, one of his aides-de-camp, dismounted and supplied him with his own horse. As Marlborough was mounting, a cannon-ball struck off the head of Colonel Binfield, who was holding the stirrup for him; yet the fortunate general rejoined his lines in safety, with no other hurt than a bruise from his fall. His troops returned to the charge with new spirit, and the Duke of Wurtemberg and the Prince of Hesse Cassel got in Villeroy's rear. General Schultz then drove the enemy from Ramilies; and, when the battle had lasted above three hours and a half, Villeroy was beaten at all points. His troops retreated with some order till they were charged near the farm-house of Chaintrain by the regiments of General Wyndham and General Wood, when the Bavarians suffered greatly and nearly lost their Elector, and when a body of Spaniards,

On one side the Battle is represented at the moment of victory; on the other is an emblematic representation of the Union of England and Holland. no longer the best infantry in Europe, but perhaps the worst, were almost annihilated. From that moment all order disappeared, the troops fled without heeding their officers, and entire regiments threw down their arms and surrendered. They were followed by the English cavalry, which captured vast numbers. Almost all the cannon and the whole of the baggage fell into the hands of the victors. Lord Orkney, with some squadrons of light horse, continued the pursuit to the vicinity of Louvain, nearly seven leagues from the field of battle; nor did Villeroy consider himself safe until he reached the walls of Brussels. He had lost, in killed and wounded, upwards of 13,000 men, with 80 colours and standards; while Marlborough only acknowledged 1000 killed and 2000 wounded. By the battle of Blenheim, Marlborough had gained Bavaria and Cologne; by the battle of Ramillies, the French lost the whole of the Spanish Netherlands. In a very short time Louvain, Mechlin, Brussels, Antwerp, Ghent, Bruges, and other towns submitted without resistance, and acknowledged the Austrian Charles; Ostend, Den-dermond, Ath, and Menin made a show of resistance, but in sieges of from four days' to three months' duration they were all reduced. The victorious Marlborough entered Brussels in triumph, in the month of October, amidst the joyful acclamations of the inhabitants, whose magistrates presented him with the keys of the town, and received him with all the honours usually paid to their ancient sovereigns, the Dukes of Burgundy. The emperor and King Charles made an offer of the government of the country to him who had won it, and Marlborough accepted the grant, which would have been as lucrative as honourable, subject to the approbation of the Queen of England; but there were various interests and views which jarred with his; and, by the obstinate opposition of the Dutch, he found himself eventually obliged to decline it. He put his army into winter-quarters at the beginning of November, leaving the English at Ghent, the Danes at Bruges, and the Germans along the river Demer. He then went to the Hague to concert the plan of operations for next year's campaign, and to take a share in some negotiations which the Dutch government had opened with the French court, but which came to nothing.*

Louis XIV. recalled the Duke de Vendome from Italy to take that command which Villeroy had managed so fatally; and the old monarch, who began to think that fortune loved not to favour old men, tried to derive some consolation from the hope that his reverses and losses in Flanders might be balanced by the capture of Turin, the Duke of Savoy's capital. The Duke de la Feuillade was before that city with 100 battalions, 46 squadrons, 140 pieces of cannon, and 21,000 bombs, while the Prince Eugene, the sole buckler and defence of the falling state, was beyond the Adige, and to all appearance kept in check by a long chain of intrenchments. But in spite of the Duke of Orleans (afterwards the regent infamous by that name), who had succeeded Vendome in the supreme command of the army of Italy, Eugene, by an admirable intermixture of military science, courage, and perseverance, came up to Turin, attacked the French in their lines of circumvallation, defeated them with the loss of their cannon, baggage, and 9000 slain or prisoners, and drove Orleans and de la Feuillade out of Italy to the borders of Dauphiné. This battle, chiefly fought between the Doria and the Stura, was the more brilliant, as, besides their intrenchments, the French had the superiority in numbers, in artillery, in the fresh and unfatigued condition of their troops—in everything except in the genius of the commander. Marlborough felt the triumph of Eugene as he ought. "It is impossible," says he, "to express the joy it has given me; for I do not only esteem, but I really love that prince! This glorious action must bring France so low, that, if our friends can be persuaded to carry on the war one year longer with vigour, we cannot fail, with the blessing of God, to have such a peace as will give us quiet in our days:—but the Dutch are at this time unaccountable."*

In Spain the affairs of France had been much less unsuccessful, because on the opposite side there was no unity of command or of purpose, and because the genius of Peterborough was checked and night-mared by all kinds of mediocrity and imbecility. Under other circumstances that extraordinary man might possibly have placed his name with those of Marlborough and Eugene; but, as it was, he could only perform romantic exploits which had no lasting result. Peterborough and Galway both proposed marching upon Madrid, the one to advance from the shores of the Mediterranean, the other from the frontiers of Portugal; but early in the spring King Philip put himself at the head of a united Spanish and French army, in the hope of recovering Barcelona. He invested that city by land, while the Count de Toulouse bombarded it by sea. King Charles was cooped up in the town, and implored Peterborough to come to his relief. The eccentric English general flew from Valencia with a small force, which must have failed if the timely appearance of an English fleet, under Vice-Admiral Leak, had not put to flight the Count de Toulouse. Upon the hasty retreat of the French admiral, who did not stay to exchange a single shot with the English, Philip, who had taken the castle, raised the siege of the town and retreated. At this crisis the French claimant again called to his assistance the Duke of Berwick, who had been dismissed only because the young queen did not like his dark countenance and his dry manners, and who now gathered what forces he could to cover the capital. But when Philip arrived there from Barcelona, discomfited and dispirited, all idea was given up of defending Madrid, and Berwick and Philip retreated together. Lord Galway, who in the mean time had been moving from the Portuguese frontier, took possession of Madrid, without resistance, on the 24th of June. But Philip and Berwick rallied upon the frontier, and, receiving reinforcements from France, they turned back upon the capital, which Galway abandoned without a blow, marching away upon Aragon, where he hoped to form a junction with Lord Peterborough and King Charles. If that junction had been effected in time, Philip must have been again driven from Madrid, and a permanent occupation effected there by the allies. But the French prince was saved by the caution and cowardliness of his Austrian rival, who hesitated to venture so far into the interior of the country, who did not join Galway at Guadalaxara till the 6th of August, and who then seemed determined to remain there till Doomsday. Peterborough, who seems to have had the disadvantage of a bad, or at least a very fiery and impatient temper, prayed, remonstrated, stormed, and swore; and, finding all was in vain, he threw up the cards he was not allowed to play,* and, with some very uncourteous expressions about Charles, he went back to the coast of the Mediterranean, embarked in a new English squadron, and sailed away to relieve the Duke of Savoy (not yet made victorious by Eugene), and to conquer the island of Minorca. Upon his departure Lord Galway, the Portuguese general, and the leaders of the Spanish party in the interest of Austria, quarrelled among themselves, and united together in one general quarrel with the Austrian ministers, and in a unanimous complaint of the tardiness of King Charles. They were without money, without magazines, and almost without any kind of provisions. Berwick was near them with a superior force. Nothing was left to them but to retreat by the only roads which remained open to them; and about the middle of August they struck off, by hasty marches, towards Valencia and the mountains of New Castile. They suffered great hardships;† but by the 29th of September they reached Requena, the last town in New Castile, where they considered themselves safe and went into quarters. King Charles went on to the city of Valencia, where he was well received by most of the Spaniards, and whence he dispatched a letter to the Duke of Marlborough representing the great misfortunes he had experienced since joining Lord Galway and the army of his ally from Portugal. The letter, which was conveyed by Count Zinzerling, ended with solicitations for Marlborough's advice and support, and for fresh subsidies and other assistance from England and Holland. Peterborough, in the mean while, had been brought back to the Spanish coast, as the squadron in which he had embarked received orders from England to hasten to the West Indies, and as intelligence was received from Turin of Prince Eugene's great victory. His lordship remained a short time to press the siege of Alicant, which was taken by the allies; and then he embarked in a single ship for Genoa to endeavour to borrow money from that republic, and to act as a sort of loan-maker-general for the confederacy. It appears that there were great faults committed besides those which are attributable to King Charles and his generals in the field. The movements of the English fleet in the Mediterranean were badly concerted; and 6000 or 8000 men, or, according to other accounts, 10,000 well-disciplined land-troops were kept on board our ships, sailing from place to place, on pretence of making a descent somewhere in France, till half of the men perished of disease. "Had these," says a Tory writer, "been sent immediately to Portugal or Spain with five or six thousand more that might have been spared from other places, there had been almost as sudden a revolution in Spain in the year 1706 as there was in England in 1688, and a happy period had been put to this bloody and expensive war; but then that brave nobleman, the Earl of Peterborough, who had done such wonders in Spain with a handful of men, would have had too great a share in the honour of accomplishing it, and might have rivalled another illustrious hero in glory and merit. . . . The French king immediately saw the consequence of supporting his grandson's adherents while things were in suspense, and poured in troops into Spain from all parts, while the allies involuntarily looked on, and suffered their friends, who had declared for King Charles, to be abandoned to the rage of their incensed prince, the kingdom lost, and their own forces destroyed, for want of being supported in time. The Earl of Rivers was not suffered to sail to Portugal with the land-forces till the winter following; and, on his arrival at Lisbon in November, finding the communication between Portugal and the allies was cut off, he sailed round to Alicant, in order to join the Earl of Galway on that side; but his men had endured such hardships on board, that scarce half of them arrived there alive, though they had been in no action. The troops being landed in this miserable condition, the earl returned to England, together with the Earl of Essex and Brigadier Gorges, who embarked with those troops in the first design."* There can be no doubt whatever that there were a thousand conflicting jealousies and interests, and that the whole of the campaign was miserably managed; but, with our knowledge of what passed in this war of succession, and of the struggles which have repeatedly happened in that country since then, we may very reasonably doubt whether the greatest efforts of which England and her allies were capable, and the most perfect military and political skill united, could have so speedily terminated a war in a country where wars ever have been obstinate and protracted, or could have succeeded in the end in imposing upon the Spanish people a king they did not choose, or in dethroning the king to whom the vast majority of the nation had indisputably pledged their honour and affection.

But we return to our own island, where a much more important object for us, and one which had long seemed an impossibility, was carried and all but perfected in the course of this eventful year. The English commissioners appointed by the queen to treat about the Union with Scotland had been engaged very laboriously, having for their secretary that great writer Daniel Defoe, who has left us the completest account of that greatest of all our political transactions.* On the 3rd of October, when the aversion between the two kingdoms seemed at its greatest height, the Duke of Queensberry, who had acted throughout with wonderful prudence and circumspection, and who, with Dalrymple, Earl of Stair, had contrived to remove many of the difficulties on the part of the Scots, opened, as lord commissioner for Queen Anne, the last parliament that ever sat at Edinburgh. He read the queen's letter, which served instead of her opening speech: it informed the estates of Scotland that the articles of the Treaty of Union had been agreed upon in London by the joint commissioners appointed for that purpose, and it recommended the immediate adoption of that treaty "as the only effectual way to secure their present and future happiness, and to disappoint the design of her majesty's and their enemies, who would doubtless on this occasion use their utmost endeavours to prevent or delay this Union, which must so much contribute to her glory, and the happiness of her people." The queen assured them that Scotland should have its full share of all the advantages to be derived from this union of the two kingdoms—that there was no reason to doubt but that the parliament of England would do whatever was necessary on their part to remove all obstructions, jealousies, &c.; and after reading her letter, Queensberry informed them that the treaty which had been happily agreed on was in the Lord Register's hands, ready to be laid before them. His grace proceeded to declare that the Scottish commissioners had been diligent and zealous in watching over the interests and honour of their country, and in concerting just and reasonable terms; and that her majesty had most graciously received and approved of the treaty. He then spoke of that most delicate and difficult of all matters—the kirk. "The lords commissioners for both kingdoms," said he, "were limited in the matter of church government: for the security of Presbyterian government in this church you have the laws already made for its establishment, the queen's repeated assurances to preserve it, and I am empowered to consent to what may be further necessary after the Union." Queensberry was seconded by the Earl of Scaffeld, Chancellor of Scotland, who, as well as the duke, had been one of the commissioners. After a brief panegyric on the character and government of Queen Anne, the chancellor begged leave to say in general, "that it must be of great advantage to have this whole island united under one government, and conjoined entirely in interest and affection, having equality of all rights and privileges, with a free communication and intercourse of trade, which must certainly establish our security, augment our strength, and increase our trade and riches." He continued—"We can never expect a more favourable juncture for completing this union than at present, when her majesty has not only recommended it, but declared that she will esteem it the greatest glory of her reign to have it perfected; and when the parliament of England have shown their inclinations for it, by removing all those obstacles that lay in the way of the treaty: and it must also be acknowledged, that the lords commissioners for England did testify their good disposition all along in this affair: and the great and glorious successes where-

The chief scene of the labours of the commissioners was the council-chamber in the Cock Pit, St. James's. The commissioners were:—For Scotland: Earl of Scaffeld, Lord Chancellor; Duke of Queensberry, Lord Privy Seal; Earl of Mar, and Earl of London, Secretaries of State; Earl of Sutherland; Earl of Morton; Earl of Wemyss; Earl of Leven; Earl of Stair; Earl of Rosebery; Earl of Glasgow, Treas. Deput.; Lord Archibald Campbell, brother to the Duke of Argyll; Viscount Duplin; Lord Ross; Sir Hugh Dalrymple; Adam Cockburn, of Ormestoun; Sir Robert Dundas, of Arncliffe; Mr. Robert Steuart, of Tillicoultry; Mr. Francis Montgomery; Sir David Dalrymple; Sir Alexander Ogilvie, of Forglie; Sir Patrick Johnstone, Lord Provost of Edinburgh; Sir James Smollet, of Bonhill; George Lockhart, of Carwath; William Morison, of Prestongrange; Alexander Grant, younger, of that ilk; William Seton, younger, of Pitmedden; John Clark, younger, of Pennicook; Hugh Montgomery, late Provost of Glasgow; Daniel Stewart, brother to the Laird of Castlemilk; and Daniel Campbell, of Ardmintine.

For England: Archbishop of Canterbury; William Cowper, Esq., Lord Keeper; Archbishop of York; Lord Godolphin, High Treas.; Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Lord President of Council; Duke of Newcastle, Lord Privy Seal; Duke of Devonshire, Steward of the Household; Duke of Somerset, Master of the Horse; Duke of Bolton; Earl of Sunderland; Earl of Kingsmead; Earl of Carlisle; Earl of Oxford; Viscount Townshend; Lord Viscount; Lord Grey; Lord Powlett; Lord Somers; Lord Halifax; John Smith, Esq., Speaker of the House of Commons; Marquess of Hartington; Marquess of Granby; Sir Charles Hedges, and Robert Harley, Esq., Secretaries of State; Henry Boyle, Chancellor and Under Treasurer of the Exchequer; Sir John Holt, Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench; Sir Thomas Trevor, Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas; Sir Edward Northey, Attorney General; Sir Symon Harcourt, Solicitor General; Sir John Cook, Advocate General; and Stephen Waller, Doctor of Laws.

"I shall not," says Defoe, in his frank, earnest manner, "descend to encomiums on the persons of those promoters, for I am not about to write panegyrics here, but an impartial and unbiased history of fact. But since the gentlemen have been ill-treated, especially in Scotland, charged with strange things, and exposed in print by some who had nothing but their aversion to the treaty to move them to maltreat them; I must be allowed on all occasions to do them justice in the process of this story. And, as I must own that, generally speaking, they were persons of the greatest probity, the best characters, and the steadiest adherents to the true interest of their country, so their abilities will appear in every step they took in so great a work; the bringing it to so good a conclusion, and that in so little time; the reducing it to so concise a form, and so fixing it that, when all the obstruction imaginable was made to it afterward in the parliament of Scotland, the mountains of objections, which, at first, amazed the world, proved such mole-hills, were so easily removed, raised so much noise, and amounted to so little in substance, that, after all was granted that in reason could be demanded, the amendments were so few, and of so little weight, that there was not one thing material enough to obtain a negative in the English parliament."—Ibid. Union. The treaty was indeed a model of human ingenuity and statesmanlike ability. The great Lord Somers had a very important share in its composition. The deliberations upon it began on the 16th of April; and, as early as the 23rd of July, it was presented, complete in all its articles, to the queen. All its merits, and the entire merit of the Union itself, were due to the Whigs; for of the Tory chiefs none but Nottingham espoused that great measure. Seymour, and others of that party, denounced the Union altogether as disgraceful to England, and made ribald and indecent jests upon it. Their chief motive was an apprehension of the great strength the Whigs would acquire by carrying the arrangement which King William had several times recommended, but which his ministers of all parties and shades had shrunk from as a perilous experiment.

with God has blessed her majesty's arms, give us the hope of a near and advantageous peace, whereby we will be put in possession, and attain to the full enjoyment of all the liberties and privileges of trade now offered by the treaty." In conclusion, his lordship, like Queensberry, assured them that the Presbyterian church government was neither touched by the treaty nor in any danger. The treaty, as it was drawn up and signed, was then read, and after a loose and short debate, it was ordered to be printed, and copies to be delivered to all the members of parliament. Till this was done everything had gone on well; but no sooner were the articles printed and put into the hands of the people, than a tremendous storm arose. The elements of this tempest were many, but the popular arguments which most excited the Scots were these;—that the treaty was dishonourable to Scotland, as it surrendered her separate sovereignty and constitution, and subjected her to her ancient and implacable enemy—that it destroyed the dignity of a kingdom which had defended her liberty against England with such gallantry for so many hundred years—that it would make slaves of her brave sons, who must now be represented at Westminster by a handful of members, who would never be able to carry a question, or make any weight there, but just for form's sake sit in the English House, and be laughed at—that Scotland would not be like an ancient kingdom, but like a province of England—that one county in England (Cornwall) sent up as many members, one excepted, as the number allotted for the whole of Scotland—and that the kirk would inevitably be subjected to the votes, the power, and the oppression of the episcopal hierarchy in England, who would never rest satisfied till they had again set up the bishops and those other priests of Baal that had occasioned Scotland such measureless misery and bloodshed. In a frenzy of indignation the people began to cry out that they were Scotsmen, and would be Scotsmen still—that their commissioners and ministers were traitors—and that there should be "no Union." They insulted to their faces and threatened all the men in office, and all that expressed opinions favourable to the treaty. "Parties and people," says Defoe, "whose interests and principles differed as much as light and darkness, who were contrary in opinion, and as far asunder in everything as the poles, seemed to draw together here. It was the most monstrous sight in the world to see the Jacobite and the Presbyterian, the persecuting prelate Non-juror and the Cameronian, the Papist and the reformed Protestant, parley together, join interest and concert measures together—to see the Jacobites at Glasgow huzzaing the mob, and encouraging them to have a care of the church!—the high-flying Episcopal dissenter crying out, the overture was not a sufficient security for the kirk." According to the same great writer, who was on the spot,* and a most careful observer of all that was passing, the religious feeling was even stronger than the merely national one. To keep it alive, it was artfully represented by those inimical to the Union that the establishment of the kirk would be subjected to the votes of the British or united parliament, where the Scottish members would be few and powerless, and where the English prelates would have a voice against them—that, if these bishops should please to vote Episcopacy into Scotland, they might get a majority, and the thing would be done, the curse would be complete! The most that the kirk could expect would be a precarious and uncertain toleration, for which she must go a-begging to the law-sleeved legislators of England. And then there came a universal cry that such a union would be a plain breach of the national covenant and solemn league, by which the nation had bound themselves by oath to Almighty God to endeavour the pulling down the episcopal hierarchy, and to reform, in the utmost of their power, the church of England also. "All these things," says Defoe, "were not only brought as arguments, but pushed with so much heat, so much want of charity and courtesy, that really it began to break all good neighbourhood; it soured all societies, and the national quarrel broke into families, who were ever jangling, divided, and opposite one among another." The heat was still further kept up by Mr. Hodges, a political writer, who had formerly been in the pay of the Scottish parliament, and who now produced a big book against an incorporate union with England, which he described as a faithless, wicked, treacherous, and abominable nation, that would entail God's judgments upon Scotland by her national sins. Hodges insisted that the interests of the two countries were opposite and irreconcilable—that, in commerce, the English trade to the West Indies was carried on by exclusive companies, and that the pretending to let the Scots into that trade was an English cheat—that the whole ecclesiastical state of Scotland would be left at the mercy of the British parliament—that the Scottish members of the united parliament would be obliged to take the sacrament of the church of England, &c. From the 3rd of October to the 1st of November the ferment continued on my friends encouraged to think I might be useful there to promote a work that I was fully convinced was for the general good of the whole island, I was moved purely on those accounts to undertake a long winter, a chargeable, and, as it proved, a hazardous journey. I contented, as not worth mentioning, the suggestions of some people of my being employed thither to carry on the interest of a party.—I have never loved any parties, but with my utmost zeal have sincerely espoused the great and original interest of this nation, and of all nations, I mean truth and liberty—and whoever were of that party, I desire to be with them. However, by this journey, I had the opportunity of seeing and hearing all the particulars of the transactions, and of using my best endeavours to answer the many, many, and I must say of some of them, the most frivolous and ridiculous objections, formed and improved there with great industry, against every article of the Union; and this is my reason for mentioning it here, that I may acquaint posterity how I came to the knowledge of what I write, and for no ostentation at all: and as I had the honour to be frequently sent for into the several committees of parliament, which were appointed, to state some difficult points relating to taxes, trade, prohibitions, &c., 'tis for those gentlemen to say whether I was useful or not; that is none of my business here; but by this means I have the greater assurance to relate the circumstances and facts as they stood, and cannot be afraid of being detected in any material mistake."

* "I cannot forbear," says Defoe, "hinting here, that my curiosity pressed me to make a journey into Scotland, and, being by all the increase, and the whole kingdom seemed resolute to risk a war rather than submit to the proposed incorporation with England. A rumour was raised that the crown of Scotland, the sword, the sceptre, and all the insignia of royalty and nationality, which the English had not been able to acquire by force of arms, would be carried away into England by the act of the Union; and the boys and the mob of Edinburgh were invited by a great personage, in a melancholy tone, to come up to the parliament house and see the ancient crown of Scotland, for it would soon be ravished from them, and they might never see it more. "And such," adds Defoe, "was the clamour against the treaters, that I verily believe, and I assure you I do not give my private opinion in it, had the articles of the treaty been published before the treaters came home, and the feuds been the same against them as they were afterwards, there were not many of them who would have dared to have gone home without a guard to protect them." The whole of the party, or combination of heterogeneous parties, that opposed the treaty exerted themselves to the utmost in parliament, several then taking the oaths to Anne for the first time, in order to be able to vote against the Union. But as these gentlemen were visibly in the minority, a cry was raised out of doors that the members of parliament had no right to alter the constitution without the particular and direct consent of their constituents; and that therefore the session ought to be adjourned for some time, in order that the members might go down to the country, and know the minds of their respective constituencies. But finding that this was not much regarded by the members, and that precedents were against them, they resorted to public addresses, and harangues at market crosses; and they easily produced mobs, tumults, insulting of magistrates, flight of gentlemen from their houses, and all kinds of popular disorders. Still, however, when the opposing party or parties looked deeper into the matter, they saw it would be impolitic, and cause the falling off of many of their adherents, if they objected to the Union altogether, or to any sort of treaty of Union—"it would," says Defoe, "have been a too directly flying in the face of the queen's recommendation, and it would have not only appeared rude, but have lost them a considerable party, whose assistance they found very great occasion for." Their arguments were therefore pointed not against the Union in general, but against the terms of it—"against an incorporating union." They began to exclaim that a federal union would be the proper thing for Scotland, and to cry—"No incorporating union—let us have a union with England, with all our hearts, but no incorporation—let us keep our parliament, our ancient sovereignty, our independence, our own constitution, and, for all the rest, we are ready to unite with you as firm as you can devise."*

* "This brought them back to the several schemes of foreign unions of nations, such as Switzerland, the United Provinces, and the like; and some proposed one thing, some another, not foreseeing that, had even any of their proposals come to have been the real treaty, yet this party, who were against the Union as such, would

With this talk of a federal union they hoped to prevent the reading of the articles of the treaty, but upon this point they were defeated at the very opening of the parliament. Then they set to work to procure a multitude of addresses from the burghs and counties, all claiming on the part of the constituents a right to limit and instruct their commissioners or representatives, and containing a direction to avoid at all hazards an incorporating union. The language was sometimes courteous, and sometimes rough and menacing. On the 12th of October a motion was made in parliament for a public fast and day of prayer to Providence to guide them aright in their present difficulties; but this was opposed by the commission of the assembly, which was then met, "not for any dislike of fasting and praying, but to prevent the alarming and amusing the people, which was the principal work on foot at that time; however, not to neglect the work, or to be found opposing such a thing as praying to God, on whatsoever account, it was moved in the commission that they should set apart a time for themselves to fast and pray, as ministers assembled on so great an occasion; and that a circular letter should be sent to the several presbyteries to do the same in their several districts." On the 17th of October it was further agreed that the members of the commission, with such as pleased to join with them, should convene in the high church of Edinburgh for prayer the day following, when the moderator should begin with a short discourse from the pulpit, touching the occasion of that meeting, &c. On the 18th there was a very great congregation, including many members of the parliament, and the work of preaching and praying continued some hours, "very public and solemn, but without any of the excesses which some people flattered themselves to find there." On the 22nd the commission, without applying for the civil sanction of parliament, appointed a general fast. The opposers of the union again expected popular excesses to terrify ministers and defeat their plan. "But," says Defoe, "the prudence of ministers prevented all this designed mischief; and, though the day was observed with great solemnity and affection, yet it was to their great disappointment that the preachers generally, as well those who were against the Union, as those who were for it, applied themselves only summarily to the substance, nay, to the very words, of the assembly's act, namely, that all the determinations of the estates of parliament with respect to a union with England might be influenced and directed by Divine wisdom, the glory of

have been as much against that as they were against this; and so at last they must have divided, broke their interest, and lost the whole, which was the main thing aimed at. . . . This was thought, by most, to be just reviving the former notions of a federal union, with so many inconsistent noun-substantives in their government, that had upon all occasions been found impracticable; and which would so entirely have left both nations exposed to the possibility of relapsing into a divided condition, that it could not be expected England, whose considerations for uniting were peace, strength, and shutting a back-door of continual war and confusion from the north, should communicate trade, freedom of customs in all her ports and plantations, with egress and regress of manufactures, &c., and leave the main things yet precarious and uncertain."—Defoe.

PARLIAMENT HOUSE AND SQUARE, EDINBURGH

God, the good of religion, and particularly of the Church of Scotland." But, though no great combustion accompanied or followed the fast in the country, the people of Edinburgh continued to be exceedingly riotous and loud-tongued: all those nobles who were against the Union, like the Duke of Hamilton, the Duke of Atholl, and the Lords Annandale and Belhaven, were cheered and blessed whenever they appeared abroad; and all those that were for it, like Queensberry, Stair, Argyll, and Seafield, were hooted and cursed. "The Duke of Hamilton, being indisposed by some lameness, (I cannot describe the occasion), was generally carried to and from the House in his chair. The common people, now screwed up to a pitch, and ripe for the mischief designed, and prompted by the particular agents of a wicked party, began to be very insolent. It had been whispered about several days that the rabble would rise, and come up to the parliament house, and cry out, No Union; that they would take away the honours, as they call them, viz., the crown, &c., and carry them to the castle, and a long variety of foolish reports of this kind. But the first appearance of anything mobbish was, that every day, when the duke first went up, but principally as he came down in his chair from the House, the mob followed him, shouting and crying out, God bless his grace for standing up against the Union, and appearing for his country, and the like."* A few days after this his first appearance, they followed the Duke of Hamilton's chair quite through the city down to the gates of Holyrood. There the guards prevented their going farther; but as they went sul-

lently back they were heard to say that they would return on the morrow a thousand times stronger, pull the traitors out of their houses, and put an end to the Union in their own way. Nor was this an empty threat, for on the morrow (the 23rd of October) when parliament sat somewhat late, the people gathered so thickly in the streets, in the Parliament Close, and about the doors of the House, that the members could neither go in nor out without great difficulty; and when the Duke of Hamilton came forth they huzzaned as formerly, and followed his chair in immense numbers. The duke, instead of going to the Abbey of Holyrood, as usual, went up the High-street to the Lawnmarket, and so to the lodgings of his colleague in opposition, the Duke of Atholl. Some said he went this way to avoid the mob; but others maliciously maintained that he took that road to point them to their work. Whatever was Hamilton's intention, he led them opposite to the residence of Sir Patrick Johnstone, late lord provost, and one of the commissioners for the treaty; and as Hamilton went into Atholl's house the populace assaulted Johnstone's residence "with stones and sticks, and curses not a few." The mob then procured sledge-hammers, and ascending the stone stairs to his door they tried to break it open, and had they succeeded Johnstone would have been torn to pieces without mercy; "and this only because he was a traitor in the commission to England; for before that no man was so well beloved as he over the whole city." His lady, in an agony of fear, came to the window, with two candles in her hand that she might be known, and cried out for God's sake to call the town-guard. An honest apothecary cary, who knew her voice and saw the danger she was in, ran down for the town-guard, but they said they would not stir without the lord provost's order. This order, however, was soon obtained, and then Captain Richardson, taking only about thirty men with him, marched bravely up to the rioters, cleared the stairs and the besieged door, and seized six of the ringleaders. Sir Patrick Johnstone was thus delivered; but the rabble, still increasing, roved up and down the town, breaking the windows of the members of parliament, insulting them in their coaches, and putting out all the street lights. Defoe ran a risk of having his own light put out. "And the author of this account," he says, "had one great stone thrown at him for but looking out of a window, for they suffered nobody to look out, especially with any lights, lest they should know faces, and inform against them afterwards." At nine at night, when the mob seemed absolute masters of the city, the Duke of Queensberry sent a party of the foot guards and took possession of the Nether Bow, a gate in the middle of the High-street, something like Temple Bar in London. The rabble went raving about the streets till midnight, when Queensberry, being informed that there were a thousand seamen coming up from Leith to join in the riot, sent for the lord provost and demanded his permission to march the guards into the city. This it was alleged had never been known in Edinburgh before; but after some difficulty the provost yielded, and about one o'clock in the morning a battalion of the guards entered the city, marched up to the Parliament Close, and occupied all the avenues. The mob then gradually dispersed, and the tumult ended. "It is to be observed that this rabble was a mine sprung before its time, which blew backwards and destroyed the engineers rather than the enemies; the plot being otherwise laid originally, viz., that it should not have broken out till some days after; when, as was said, all would have been in readiness to have finished the work at one blow. . . . They had been tampering with the soldiery, in order to debauch them from their duty; and some people talked of retiring from the parliament, and of some great men heading the people; which, had their patience been more, and their conduct a little more secret, they had, without doubt, effectually brought it to pass: but they blew their own project up by their precipitation, and so saved their country by their very attempt to destroy it."* Queensberry wisely abstained from any severities upon the rioters; but from that stormy night the foot guards and two other regiments of infantry did constant duty in the city. A battalion of guards were stationed at the palace, while the garrison of the castle were kept on the alert, and troops of dragoons attended ministers wherever they went. The Union, the pledge and assurance of peace and tranquillity, was thus carried under cover of arms. The spectacle was too obvious to be lost sight of by those who opposed the treaty, and a new and a very exciting outcry was forthwith raised that the privileges of the old town of Edinburgh were invaded, and soldiers brought in to overawe and oppress the inhabitants—that the like had not been done in sixty years before, nor ever except in the time of war and tyrannic government—that this was a forerunner of the slavery of the nation—that the freedom of parliament was hereby annihilated. Queensberry and his party alleged, on the other side, that force and violence had commenced on the part of the populace—that the parliament was much more likely to be awed by the ungoverned rabble than by the regular forces brought in for the general security, and to keep that peace which the civil authority had not power to preserve—and finally, that it was incumbent on the government to take whatever steps might save the city from riot, plunder, and all kinds of disorders. Some of the lords in parliament protested against the bringing in of the troops, though there was nothing imposed upon them, nothing offered to be carried in parliament but by reasoning and fair voting. It was nevertheless pretended that traitors were cramping the Union down their throats with swords and bayonets, and that a few people in the House, because they had the majority within doors, and a band of soldiers to back them without, were imposing and forcing an odious incorporation with England. And, as the riot at Edinburgh had proved a failure, arrangements were made for more successful riots in other places. "Anybody may judge what a time this was, when every day the town was alarmed; to-day the North was up in arms, to-morrow the West; to-day such a shire, to-morrow another, the next day a third; Glasgow, Dumfries, Hamilton, Perth, all the places which the imagination of the people dictated, and the fears of others apprehended. It is impossible to express the consternation of this people. Those that wished well to the public peace, and who saw that a commotion at this time must immediately involve the nation in war and blood, not with England only, but also with one another—these trembled for fear of the desolation of their country, the blood and ruin that always attend a civil war, and the danger of the lives of themselves and their relations. Those who looked seriously into the drift of some of their party who most eagerly pushed on these divisions, who saw how the interest of a popish, jacobite, and a persecuting bloody generation, lately extinguished, and now full of hopes, was twisted and joined in anti-union principles, could not but be heartily concerned for the established religion and Protestant church. . . . To see others, whose designs could not be suspected of anything to the detriment of either religion or their native country, yet joining blindly with a wicked and degenerate race, and seeming to approve the steps which were taken—these were melancholy things. . . . And people went up and down wondering and amazed, expecting every day strange events; afraid of peace, and afraid of war: many knew not which way to fix their resolutions; they could not be clear for the Union, yet they saw death at the door in its breaking off—death to their liberty, to their religion, and to their country.*

The kirk, as represented by the Commission of the General Assembly, continued in the ways of moderation. Had they acted otherwise the scheme must have fallen to the ground, or been effected only by bayonets and cannon-balls. They acknowledged the wisdom and good intention of the commissioners, both English and Scotch, in leaving the respective parliaments full liberty so to establish the two national churches, as that all the security they could demand, one against the other, should be granted them; and they relied upon the queen's promise that in Scotland Presbyterianism should not be disturbed, and that the kirk should, at all hazards, be fully established with its proper rights and privileges. Thus "all the doors were shut against the fears which either (the Episcopalians and the Presbyterians) had entertained of each other; and which wicked men daily took hold of, as handles of contention, to keep open an eternal breach, and keep us always divided, Ephraim against Judah, and Judah against Ephraim, ever vexing and envying one another." Yet the Scots, while recognizing the hierarchy of England, had little intention of tolerating Episcopalians in Scotland, and no inclination to resign any of their Calvinistic dogmas, or to treat those who differed from them with Christian charity. Their advance in toleration was tardy and uncertain. The general assembly, for example, petitioned the parliament not to consent to any allowance whatever of the Anglican hierarchy and ceremonies in Scotland; and on another occasion they said—"We are persuaded, that to enact a toleration for those of the episcopal way—which God in his infinite mercy avert!—would be to establish iniquity by a law; and would bring upon the promoters thereof, and their families, the dreadful guilt of all those sins, and pernicious effects that might ensue thereupon." The more liberal minds that advocated the Union blushed at this intolerant spirit, which fell little short of the fiery heat of the old Covenanters; but they durst do or say little against it, lest a love of toleration should have been construed into Church-of-Englandism or Atheism. To explain away the clauses of the old Covenant, by which the zealous pretended to consider themselves bound to reform the church of Christ in the whole island and to set up Presbytery in England, it was urged that these very clauses implied that they were to use lawful and gentle means only, and on no account to resort to violence or force, or to any measures that might plunge the country into a double war—a civil war and a war with the English. Doctor Rule, a Presbyterian divine esteemed for his candour and learning, and then Principal of the College of Edinburgh, stated the obligation in these distinct words:—"What we are bound to by the Covenant is not to reform them (the Anglicans) but to concur with them, when lawfully called, to advance reformation; and it is far from our thoughts to go beyond that boundary, in being concerned in their affairs: we wish their reformation, but leave the managing of it to themselves."

While these things were debating at Edinburgh, the West-country Cameronians discussed them with much fiercer feelings, being incited by some who had always hated the Covenant and despised the martyr Cameron as a vulgar fanatic. That cloud in the West grew blacker and blacker, and a tremendous storm was expected from it: but all that happened was a tumultuous meeting in the town of Dumfries, where some two or three hundred Cameronians burnt the articles of the Union and a paper with the names of all the noblemen and gentlemen who had been commissioners for the treaty; and then fixed a paper of their own upon the market-cross, and marched off and dispersed very peaceably.† These performances were in themselves sufficiently alarming; but "the busy party," who were running throughout the country to agitate and disturb the minds of the people, centupled their importance, and added numerous little fictions to facts. It was reported, for example, that there were 6000 men in arms at Dumfries, and that, though only 2000 horse had entered the town to burn the articles of the Union, 4000 or even 5000 foot stood ready on the neighbouring hills to march with the horse—that the Cameronians were up to a man, and that all the West was in arms, there being at least 12,000 determined Scots ready to move to Edinburgh, to disperse the parliament and sacrifice the traitors as betrayers of their country and sellers of her liberty and sovereignty. But in reality, though every effort had been employed to exasperate these people in the West, and though they were heartily against the Union, "when they came to see a little into the hands that were at work against it," and with whom they must join if they would try the fortunes of a campaign against the treaty, even the hottest among them came to themselves and behaved with great calmness and discretion. Fortunately for the government Mr. John Hepburn, their chief preacher and leader, loved peace, and hated the Jacobites more than he hated the English; and he declared that, though he had apprehensions that the Union would be prejudicial to Scotland, though he did not like the articles, and thought the traitors had not done their duty as patriots, still he would never attempt to disturb the government by an appeal to arms, and, much less, would he adhere to or encourage the designs

* Second Vindication of the Church of Scotland.

† "When the report came to Edinburgh of this tumult, the concern of those who wished well to that country was very great, and wise men began to give the design of the treaty for lost; they knew the unhappy temper of those honest people, for such, however, I must call them, because I believe their intention is religious and honest, though they may be mistaken, and, no doubt, are mistaken, in their principles about government and obedience; but, as they knew, I say, the temper of these people, how tenacious of their own sentiments, and how precipitant in their prosecution, it bred no small concern in the minds of all people who were inclined to peace; concluding, that the party who opposed the Union from worse principles had gained their point, viz. to employ the hands of Protestants, one against another, in this dispute, and make the honest-meaning but warm people the tools to ruin both themselves and their country." — Defoe.

of the Jacobite French party whom he utterly abhorred. The government continued in the ways of moderation, carefully abstaining from any vigorous measures,—as they are called, though they generally spring from weakness and fear. A warrant was issued against the printer of the paper stuck up at Dumfries, but the man absconded; no pains were taken to pursue him, and all the other rioters were overlooked. Meanwhile the last of the Scottish parliaments continued its deliberations on the treaty. The first article, namely, whether there should be a union with England in the sense of the present treaty or not—that is, whether there should be an incorporate union of the two nations into one kingdom, to have but one name, head, signature, constitution and parliament, yea or no, was carried in the affirmative* on the 4th of November, the birthday of the late King William and the anniversary of his arrival at Torbay. “It was on this happy day that the first article of the Union was passed, after infinite struggles, clamour, railing, and tumult of a party, who, however they endeavoured to engage the honest, scrupulous part of the people with them, yet gave this evident discovery of the principles of their own actings, in that there was an entire conjunction of the Jacobite, the prelate, and the popish interest; and the very discovery of this opened the eyes of a great many people, who, in the simplicity of their hearts, had joined in the general opposition to the Union: but when they saw the tendency of things, and whither it all led; when they saw the society they were going to embark with; when they saw the enemies of the Protestant settlement all engaged, and those very people who had filled the land with the groans of oppression and the cries of blood, coming to join hands with them against a union with England—then the best, the most thinking and most judicious of the people began first to stop and consider, and afterwards wholly to withdraw from the party; and the clamour of the people, as if come to a crisis, began not to be so universal, but to abate; and the more it did so, the more the secret party, who lay at the bottom of all the rest, began to appear and distinguish themselves.†” The design of these opponents now was to load the treaty with a multitude of amendments, which would be sure to create delay, while it was probable, at least, that some of them might provoke the parliament of England to break off the treaty altogether. Every article, every clause was disputed word by word, and every possible objection was started. The matters of taxes, excises, customs, &c., seemed to give the party a hold on the popular feeling; and they represented that Scotland was too poor to pay taxes like England—her trade too unprofitable to support English excises and customs. Yet some of the amendments proposed, and which were not all carried, were proper and judicious; nor can all the Scottish orators that suggested them and cavilled at the treaty be set down as Jacobites or selfish intriguers, or unwise enthusiasts about nationality—though assuredly this last-named noble passion was prominent in the declamations of the best of them. Fletcher of Saltoun, who detested the name of the Stuarts, and who entertained such high notions of liberty that he would have probably preferred a republic to any other form of government, made a bitter speech “after the manner of the ancients,” and affirmed that Scotland had been betrayed by her commissioners. They called upon him for an explanation. “I can find no other word,” said Fletcher, “to express my ideas of their conduct. It is a harsh one, indeed, but it is true; and if the House think me guilty of any offence in using it, I am willing to submit to their censure. No one rose to propose a vote of censure.” But the oration that was most admired and the longest remembered in Scotland was delivered by Lord Belhaven, whose political honesty was much more questionable than that of Fletcher of Saltoun. After a classical peroration and a pedantic allusion to the ancient independence of the Scots, his Lordship continued: “We are the successors of those who founded our monarchy, framed our laws, and who, during the space of 2000 years, have handed them down to us with the hazard of their lives and fortunes. Shall we not then zealously plead for those rights which our renowned progenitors so dearly purchased? Shall we hold our peace when our country is in danger? God forbid!—England is a great and glorious nation. Her armies are numerous, powerful, and victorious; her trophies splendid and memorable; she disposes of the fate of kingdoms; her navy is the terror of Europe; her trade and commerce encircle the globe; and her capital is the emporium of the universe. But we are a poor and obscure people, in a remote corner of the world, without name, without alliances, without treasures. What hinders us then to lay aside our divisions, to unite cordially and heartily, when that liberty, which is alone our boast, when our all, our very existence as a nation, is at stake? The enemy is at our gates. Soon will he subvert this ancient and royal throne, and seize these regalia, the sacred symbols of our liberty and independence. Where are our peers and our chieftains? Where are the Hamiltons, the Douglasses, the Homes, the Murrays, the Gordons, and the Kers? Will posterity believe that such names yet existed when the nation was reduced to this last extremity of degradation, and that they were not eager in such a cause to devote themselves for their country, and die in the bed of honour? For the love of God let us, Scotsmen, unite among ourselves! God blesses the peace-makers. We want not the things necessary to make a nation happy. All depends upon management: concordia res parvæ crescunt. I fear not these articles, though

* The Duke of Atholl, however, gave in a protest that an incorporating union with England and the representation of both nations by one and the same parliament were contrary to the honour, interest, fundamental laws and constitution of Scotland, the birthright of the peers, the rights and privileges of the barons and burghs, &c., and this protest was signed by the Duke of Hamilton, the Marquess of Annandale, the Earl of Errol, the Earl of Strathmore, Lord Kilsyth, Lord Blantyre, Lord Balmerino, and others.

they were ten times worse than they are, if we could once cordially forgive one another, and, according to our proverb, 'let bygones be bygones and fair play to come.' For my part, I heartily forgive every man, and I do not humbly propose that his grace my lord commissioner may appoint an Agape,—may order a love-feast for this honourable House, that we may lay aside all self designs, and, after our fast and humiliation, have a day of rejoicing and thankfulness—eat our meat with gladness, and our bread with a merry heart: then shall we sit each man under his own fig-tree, and the voice of the turtle shall be heard in our land." The Earl of Marchmont rose up and said, he had heard a long speech, and a very terrible one, but he was of opinion it required a short answer, which he would give in these words:—"Behold I dreamed, but lo! when I awoke, I found it was a dream." Mr. Seton of Pitmedden, one of the commissioners, had already explained the advantages of the treaty, and the anomalous position in which Scotland would stand without it. He maintained, without any oratory but in the plain language of common sense, that the union of the two crowns, without the international union, must be fatal to the weaker and poorer country—that every monarch having two or more kingdoms must prefer the counsel and interest of the stronger, and that the greater disparity of power and riches, the greater would be the influence of England—that the parliament of Scotland could not be vested with the power of making peace and war, of rewarding and punishing, of exercising the veto; and that even if she were vested with these faculties they could be of no use to her in opposition to England, and to the will of a very large portion of the Scots themselves. "My humble opinion," said he, "is, that we cannot reap any benefit from these conditions of government, without the assistance of England; and the people of England will never be convinced to promote the interest of Scotland till both kingdoms are incorporated into one." Seton further showed that Scotland was behind all other nations of Europe, "with respect to the effects of an extended trade;" and that, being poor and without force to protect her commerce, she could reap no great advantages from it, till she partook of the trade and protection of some powerful neighbour nation, that could, and would, communicate both: and after showing that Scotland could only seek such alliance with Holland, England, or France, other countries being so remote and poor that their friendships could be of little use to them, he said—"With Holland we can have no advantageous alliance; with the English we can expect no profitable friendship if we continue separate from them, for they will be jealous of us; and from France few advantages can be reaped till the old offensive and defensive league be revived between France and Scotland, which would give umbrage to the English, and occasion a war between them and us. . . . From all these considerations I can see that this nation, by an entire separation from England, cannot extend its trade, so as to raise its power in proportion to other trafficking nations in Europe; but that hereby we may be in danger of returning to that Gothic constitution of government wherein our forefathers were, which was frequently attended with feuds, murders, depreciations and rebellions. I am sorry that, in place of things, we amuse ourselves with words. For my part, I comprehend no durable union between Scotland and England, but that expressed in this article, by one kingdom, that is to say, one people, one civil government, one interest." And then he exposed the impracticability of a federal union between two nations accustomed to a monarchical government—between a very poor nation and a very rich one; insisting that if such a federal compact could be made Scotland could have no security for its observance; and that the English would not, and in prudence ought not to, communicate their trade and protection unless upon the condition of an actual incorporation of the two states. He quoted examples from history of the weak and unbinding nature of the federal compact and of the firmer bonds of an incorporating union. "Two or more distinct kingdoms or states," said he, "by incorporating into one kingdom, have continued under the same sovereign, enjoying equally the protection of his government, and every part of the body politic, though never so far removed from the seat of government, has flourished in wealth, in proportion to the value of its natural productions or the industry of its inhabitants. . . . France was formerly divided into twelve states, which are now incorporated into the one kingdom of France: England was formerly divided into seven kingdoms, which are now incorporated into the one kingdom of England: Scotland itself was formerly divided into two kingdoms, which at present are incorporated into the one kingdom of Scotland."

The Duke of Hamilton, who had protested against the primary article, against the vote that sufficient security was given to the kirk, and against the determination to go on with the treaty without adjournments or delays, was at the very moment actively engaged in a correspondence with the court of St. Germain and the Jacobite agents. Of a sudden, however, the heat of his opposition seemed to cool; and few or none at that day knew or suspected the reason of his change of conduct. "At that critical juncture," says his grandson, "the Duke of Hamilton received a letter from Lord Middleton, Secretary of State to the court of St. Germain, wherein, after acquainting him with the recent engagements which his master had just taken with the queen's (Anne's) ministers, in order to procure a peace with the French king, to whom he stood so much indebted, he proceeds with telling him that 'he beseeched his Grace, in the behalf of his master, to forbear giving any further opposition to the Union, as he (the Pretender) had extremely at heart to give to his sister this proof of his ready compliance with her wishes; not doubting but he would one day have it in his power to restore to Scotland its ancient weight and independence." Middleton recommended Hamilton to keep the business "a profound secret," as he must be sensible that a discovery might materially prejudice their interests both in Scotland and in England. According to his somewhat partial descendant, Hamilton was thunderstruck at this unexpected request, wounded to the quick at not having had some previous notice of the secret negotiations, and reduced by anxiety of mind to the brink of the grave, and to a condition in which he was unable to exert himself.* It is said that the commissioners for the treaty were further assisted at this time by the remittance from England of 20,000*l.*, which was distributed so judiciously among the patriots that the voice of opposition became as soft as that of the turtle-dove which Bellhaven had dreamed about. It appears also that most liberal promises were made of places and honours and court distinctions, and of remuneration to those who had lost the most in the wild Darien scheme. Whatever were the influences exercised directly or indirectly—we do not pretend to have indicated or alluded to one-half of them—the Treaty of Union was approved of by a majority of 110; and on the 25th of March in the following year (1707) the last of the parliaments of Scotland rose never to meet again. The chief provisions of the Union thus finally effected were:—1. That the two kingdoms should upon the 1st day of May next ensuing, and for ever after, be united into one kingdom by the name of Great Britain. 2. That the succession to the monarchy of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, after her most sacred majesty, in default of issue of her body should be and continue in the most excellent Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess dowager of Hanover, and the heirs of her body being Protestants. 3. That the United Kingdom of Great Britain should be represented by one and the same parliament, to be styled the Parliament of Great Britain. 4. That all the subjects of the United Kingdom should, from and after the Union, have full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation, to and from any port or place within the United Kingdom, and the dominions and plantations thereunto belonging; and that there should be a communication of all other rights, privileges, and advantages, which did or might belong to the subjects of either kingdom, except where it was otherwise expressly agreed in the articles. 5. That all ships or vessels belonging to the subjects of Scotland, though foreign built, should be deemed and passed as ships of Great Britain, &c. 6. That all parts of the United Kingdom should have the same commercial allowances, encouragements, and drawbacks, and be under the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade, and liable to the same customs and duties on import and export, as were settled in England at the time of the Union; and that no Scots cattle carried into England should be liable to any other duties than those to which the cattle of England were liable; and that, as by the laws of England there were rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats grinded or ungrinded were not mentioned, and as Scotland produced oats, whenever oats should be sold at 15*s.* per quarter, or under, there should be paid 2*s.* 6*d.* for every quarter of oatmeal exported, &c. And, as the importation of provision and victual into Scotland would prove a discouragement to tillage, the prohibition in force by the law of Scotland against all importation of victual from Ireland or any other place should remain as it was, until the parliament of Great Britain should provide more effectual ways for discouraging such importation. 7. That all parts of the United Kingdom should be liable to the same excise upon all exciseable liquors, with the exception of beer or ale, where favour was shown to the Scots. 8. This very long article settled the duty upon salt, salted meats, salted fish, &c., and provided a premium for the encouragement of the herring-fishery, &c. 9. Whenever the sum of 1,997,763*l.* 8*s.* 4½*d.* should be enacted by the parliament of Great Britain in England as a land-tax, that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland should be charged by the same act with the sum of 48,000*l.*, and no more, free of all charges, as its quota to such land-tax; and so proportionally for any greater or lesser sum raised in England by a tax on land. Articles 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14 prescribed very nicely the rules as to other taxes to be paid by Scotland. The 15th provided that, as the subjects of Scotland would be liable to several customs and excises payable in England and applicable towards payment of the national debt of England contracted before the Union, Scotland should have an equivalent for what she should be charged with towards payment of the said national debt of England, and that the sum of 398,085*l.* 10*s.*, voted by the parliament of England for the use of Scotland should be employed in making good whatever losses private persons might sustain by the reducing the coin of Scotland to the same standard and value as the coin of England, and in covering the losses sustained by the African and Indian Company of Scotland, which, upon such reimbursement, should cease to trade and to exist as a company. [It was from this money that poor Paterson expected, but in vain, to have his own losses made good.] All the public debts of the kingdom of Scotland were also to be paid; and 2000*l.* per annum for the space of seven years applied towards encouraging the manufacture of coarse wool in Scotland, and after the lapse of the seven years in promoting the fisheries and other improvements in Scotland. The 16th article enacted that the coin should be of the same value throughout the United Kingdom, and that a mint should be continued in Scotland under the same regulations as that in England, but with its own officers. The 17th was, that the same weights and measures should be used throughout the United Kingdom as were then established in England.

* Transactions during the reign of Queen Anne, from the Union to the Death of that Princess. By Charles Hamilton, Esq. 8vo. Edinb. 1790, pp. 41, &c.

The 18th provided that the laws concerning trade, customs, and excise should be the same in both kingdoms; but that all other laws in use within the kingdom of Scotland should remain in the same force as before, but alterable by the parliament of Great Britain; with this difference betwixt the laws concerning public right, policy, and civil government, and those which concerned private right, that the former might be made the same throughout the whole United Kingdom, but that the latter should be subject to no alteration except for evident utility of the subjects within Scotland. By the 19th it was enacted that the Court of Session should remain in all time coming within Scotland, as now constituted by the laws of that kingdom, and with the same authority and privileges as before the Union, subjected nevertheless to such regulations, for the better administration of justice, as should be made by the parliament of Great Britain; that the Court of Justiciary should also remain the same, with the same authority and privileges as before the Union; that, though all admiralty jurisdiction should be under the Lord High Admiral, or commissioners for the admiralty, of Great Britain, yet the Court of Admiralty established in Scotland should be continued, subject however to future regulations and alterations by the parliament of Great Britain; and that the heritable rights of admiralty and vice-admiralties in Scotland should be reserved to the respective families as rights of property, subject, nevertheless, to such future regulations as should be thought proper to be made by the parliament of Great Britain; and that all inferior courts in Scotland should remain subordinate, as they then were, to the supreme courts of justice in the country, and that no Scotch causes should be cognizable by the Court of Chancery, Queen's Bench, or any other Court in Westminster Hall; that such courts should have no power whatever to review or alter the acts or sentences of the judicatures within Scotland, or to stop the execution of the same; that there should be a Court of Exchequer in Scotland wholly independent of the English court; and, finally, that her majesty and her successors might continue a privy council in Scotland, for preserving the public peace and order, until the parliament of Great Britain should think fit to alter it, or establish some other effectual method for that end. 20. That all hereditary offices, superiorities, jurisdictions, offices for life, &c., should be reserved as rights of property, and enjoyed as they then were by the laws of Scotland. 21. That the rights and privileges of the royal burghs of Scotland should remain entire. 22. That, by virtue of this treaty, of the peers of Scotland at the time of the Union sixteen should be the number to sit and vote in the House of Lords, and forty-five the number of the representatives for Scotland to sit in the House of Commons. That the sixteen peers should be elected out of and by their own body, and that, of the forty-five representatives of the Commons, two-thirds should be chosen by the counties, and one-third by the burghs of Scotland. 23. That the sixteen peers of Scotland elected to sit in the House of Lords should have all the privileges of parliament in common with the English peers; and that all peers of Scotland whatsoever, whether elected to sit in parliament or not, should have rank and precedence next and immediately after the peers of the like orders and degrees in England at the time of the Union, and before all peers of Great Britain, of the like orders and degrees, who might be created after the Union; and should be tried as peers of Great Britain, and should enjoy all privileges of peers, except the right and privilege of voting in the House of Lords, &c. 24. That there should be one great seal for the United Kingdom for sealing of writs to elect and summon the parliament, for sealing all treaties with foreign princes and states, and all public acts, instruments, and orders of state, which concerned the whole United Kingdom, but that Scotland should have a seal of its own, to be made use of in all things relating to private rights or grants within that kingdom; that the crown, sceptre, and sword of state, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and registers whatsoever, should continue to be kept as they were in Scotland, there to remain in all time coming, notwithstanding the union of the kingdoms. And then follow, with more brevity than might be expected, the provisions made for the rival churches of the two countries. It was declared that her majesty, with the advice and consent of her parliament, ratified, approved, and for ever confirmed the fifth act of the first Scottish parliament of William and Mary, entitled "An Act ratifying the Confession of Faith, and settling Presbyterian Church Government," with all other acts of the Scottish parliament relating thereto, and the claim of right which the Scots set forth at the Revolution. The kirk was to enjoy its "form and purity of worship presently in use," its Presbyterian government and discipline, that is to say, by kirk sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies; and for the greater security the Universities and Colleges of St. Andrew's, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh were to remain as they were, no professors, principals, regents, masters, or others being to bear office in any of them without owning and acknowledging the civil government, subscribing the confession of faith, and conforming to the presbyterian worship. And her majesty further declared that no oaths that were not already provided by Scottish parliaments, or that were against their conscience, should be exacted from any of the ministers, professors, &c. The Kirk was thus to remain exactly as it was in Scotland, but so also was the Church of England in England, and it was declared that the parliament of England might provide for the better security of their church in their own country as they should think expedient.

A. D. 1707. The English parliament, which had assembled on the 3rd of December, was informed by the queen on the 28th of January, that the Articles of Union had been adopted by act of parliament in Scotland, "with some alterations and additions;" and that the treaty as agreed upon by the commissioners of both kingdoms should be laid before them. "It being agreed by this treaty," continued her majesty, "that Scotland is to have an equivalent for what she is obliged to contribute towards paying the debts of England, I must recommend to you that, in case you agree to the treaty, you will take care to provide for the payment of the equivalent to Scotland accordingly."* This mention of money to be paid back to Scotland clouded the countenances of many of the English Commons; and when the treaty came under discussion other financial reasons were laid hold of, and joined with religious intolerance and with old but insane jealousies to obstruct or defeat the great political measure of that age. Some of the Commons said that they were absolutely against an incorporating union, because it was like marrying a woman against her consent—that this treaty had been carried in Scotland by corruption and bribery, fraud and open violence; and that the Scottish parliament, by giving up their separate and independent constitution, had basely betrayed their native country. The zealots of the high church faction pointed out what they called the irreconcilable contradictions in the Union, by which, among other things, the queen was obliged by oath to maintain the Church of England, and bound likewise by oath to maintain and defend the Kirk of Scotland, in one and the same united kingdom. They represented that the Church of England looked upon its establishment as jure divino, and the Scots pretended their kirk was jure divino too; that two nations that clashed in so essential a point could scarcely unite; and that, at the least, on such a critical point, involving the religion by law established, the convocation of the English clergy ought to be consulted. The Whigs and the low church party replied to this that they could not consider either church to be jure divino, any farther than that they had been established by God's permission; and that they thought it derogatory to the rights of the Commons of England to consult an inferior assembly, like the convocation, which had no share whatever in the legislature. Beaten, not by these arguments, but by the visible and vast majority against them, the Tories and high church men left the House, and scarcely re-appeared till all the articles were passed there. But, in the mean time, a bill was brought into the House of Lords for the security of the Church of England. Lord Haversham made a flaming speech on the occasion, her majesty, it is said, being present.†

* Anne said further, "You have now an opportunity before you of putting the last hand to a happy union of the two Kingdoms; which, I hope, will be a lasting blessing to the whole island; a great addition to its wealth and power, and a firm security to the Protestant religion. The advantages which will accrue to us all from a union are so apparent, that I will add no more, but that I shall look upon it as a particular happiness if this great work, which has been so often attempted without success, can be brought to perfection in my reign."

† If this was the case, no doubt the die-favorita was with her, and both her majesty and the Duchess of Marlborough must have been incensed at some parts of Haversham's speech. His lordship said, "that the articles of this treaty came to their lordships with the greatest countenance of authority; but, notwithstanding authority

He was for a federal union, and nothing more;—he held that it would be impossible, and, if possible, improper, to unite two nations which had different forms of worship and different church governments. "A union," he said, "made up of such jarring and incongruous materials, would require a standing army to keep it from falling asunder. He observed that above a hundred Scottish peers, and as many commoners, that had sat in the Scottish parliament, would be excluded from the British parliament, and so have no seats at all, although these gentlemen had as little thought of being excluded as the English lords did of being deprived of their hereditary rights. He insisted that the English bishops could never agree to that part of the treaty which guaranteed the Presbyterian Church of Scotland—that this would be giving up all they had been contending for so many years, and exposing the Anglican church to shame and ruin. But the Commons made amendments, and laughed some of the clauses of the bill out of doors; and all that could be carried there was a very short and simple provision for maintaining "for ever" the Church of England, its doctrine and government, within the kingdoms of England and Ireland; and in the same bill it was declared that the act and the articles for establishing Presbytery in Scotland were ratified, approved, and confirmed. In the Lords, several protests were entered against the bill for ratifying the Union. The lords Haversham, Granville, Stowell, North, Rochester, Howard, Leigh, and Guilford, all protested against the low rate of the land-tax charged in Scotland, complaining, with some reason, that the 48,000*l.* was fixed and not to be increased in time to come, without any reference to the improvement of the trade and resources of that kingdom, and consequently of the land, that were likely to result from the Union. Rochester, North, Guilford, and Leigh, protested against the 15th article, which provided the equivalent to the kingdom of Scotland, &c.; and those four lords, with the Duke of Buckingham, protested also against the 22nd article; reasoning here in a very different way from Lord Haversham: "We humbly conceive," said they, "that the number of sixteen peers for Scotland is too great a proportion to be added to the peers of England, who very rarely consist of more than a hundred attending lords in any one session; and for that reason we humbly apprehend such a number as sixteen may have a very great sway in the resolutions of this House, of which the consequence cannot be foreseen. In the second place, we conceive the lords of Scotland who are to sit in this House, being not qualified as the peers of England are, must suffer a diminution of their dignity to sit here on so different a foundation, their right of sitting here depending entirely on an election; and might be the strongest motive to incline the will, it was certainly the weakest in the world to convince the understanding. This was an argument, indeed, made use of by the church of Rome for their superstitious worship, where there were ten Ave Marias to one Paternoster; which he thought just as reasonable as if ten times the application and address should be made to a die-favorita as to the person of the sovereign; which was a kind of state idolatry."

that from time to time, during the continuance of one parliament only: and at the same time we are of opinion, that the peers of England, who sit here by creation from the crown, and have a right of so doing in themselves or their heirs for ever, may find it an alteration in their constitution to have lords added to their number, to sit and vote without the same right to their seats as the peers of England have." Lord North proposed a rider, declaring that nothing in the ratification of the Union should be construed to extend to an approbation or acknowledgment of the truth of the Presbyterian way of worship, or allowing the religion of the Church of Scotland to be, what they styled it, the true Protestant religion. This was supported by Nottingham, Buckingham, and seventeen other lords; but against these there was a majority of 55. When the bill ratifying the Union was passed in the Upper House, Nottingham and seven other peers entered another protest, without assigning any reason; and the Duke of Buckingham and five lords protested because, as they stated, they considered that the excellent constitution of England would be endangered by the alterations made by this Union, some of which were of such a nature as to show their inconvenience and danger so obviously, that they thought it proper and decent to avoid entering farther into the particulars. On the 4th of March, when Anne gave the royal assent to the bill, she expressed her satisfaction in the warmest terms. She said,—“ I consider this Union as a matter of the greatest importance to the wealth, strength, and safety of the whole island, and, at the same time, as a work of so much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that till now all attempts which have been made towards it, in the course of above a hundred years, have proved ineffectual; and, therefore, I make no doubt but it will be remembered and spoke of hereafter, to the honour of those who have been instrumental in bringing it to such a happy conclusion. I desire and expect from all subjects of both nations that from henceforth they act with all respect and kindness to one another; that so it may appear to all the world, they have hearts disposed to become one people. This will be a great pleasure to me, and will make us all quickly sensible of the good effects of this Union.” After congratulating them on “ the security of religion by so firm an establishment of the Protestant succession throughout Great Britain,” she reminded the Commons that they ought to make effectual provision for the payment of the equivalent to Scotland within the time appointed; and she then finished the speech with praising their past zeal and activity. On the 11th of March both Houses waited on her majesty with an address, congratulating her upon the conclusion of “ a work that, after so many fruitless endeavours, seemed designed by Providence to add new lustre to the glories of her majesty’s reign.”

Before the great subject of the Union came under discussion this parliament had been engaged upon the foreign wars and other matter. In the opening speech from the throne, the most was made of the battle of Ramillies, and of the glorious successes with which our arms had been blessed; and an assurance was held out that it would no longer be in the power of one prince at his pleasure to disturb the repose and endanger the liberties of Europe. But not a word was said of the negotiations which had been carried on, or of the great sacrifices Louis had offered to make to obtain a peace. On the contrary, the queen spoke of prolonging the war with an increase of vigour, which implied an increase of expense, and of other sacrifices on the part of England. In fact, both the queen, or those who directed her, and the parliament now fancied that France herself might be conquered, if not parcelled out among the allies; while Louis still insisted on the preservation of the Spanish monarchy, though mutilated, to his grandson Philip.* The House of Lords, in their address, congratulated her majesty on the events of this "wonderful year," especially "that ever-memorable victory gained at Ramillies, under her wise and valiant general the Duke of Marlborough,"—expressed their satisfaction on the declaration the ministers of her majesty and the States-General had made to the ministers of the rest of the allies, that no negotiations for peace should be entered upon but in conjunction with all the members of the grand alliance; trusting that this example would inspire the rest of the allies with a noble emulation of acting with the like vigour;—and they spoke again of securing the whole monarchy of Spain to King Charles, as the only condition and ground of a peace with France. Nor were the Commons, who presented their address the day after, a whit less warlike than their lordships. Both Houses passed a vote of thanks to the Duke of Marlborough, who had returned from the continent a few weeks before, and who, on the 5th of December, received the compliments of the Lords, delivered by the Lord Keeper. This was only a prelude to more important things. On the 16th their lordships voted an address, begging that her majesty would permit them to bring in a bill to settle and continue the titles and honours of the Duke of Marlborough in his posterity, whether male or female. [Marlborough had lost his only son the Marquess of Blandford.] Her majesty graciously replied that she would have the duke's titles and honours secured to his eldest daughter, and the heirs male of her body; and then to all his other daughters successively, according to the priority of their birth, and the heirs male of their respective bodies; and that she thought it proper that the honour and manor of Woodstock and the house of Blenheim should always go along with the titles. A bill was brought in accordingly; and so much dispatch was used, that in four days it was passed through both Houses, and received the royal assent.† Nor did the bounty of the queen and parliament to the posterity of Marlborough end here; for a pension of 5000*l.* a-year which Anne had granted the duke during her life out of the Post Office, was settled upon him, his widow, and descendants, by act of parliament.

We have now related the principal proceedings of this session, which lasted from the 3rd of December, 1706, to the 24th of April, 1707, and which was the last sitting of a separate English parliament, the next being the parliament of Great Britain, and including the Scottish members. But during this session, and before its commencement, the cabinet had been partially remodelled, and rendered still more a Whig cabinet. Somewhat against the inclination of Marlborough himself, who disliked or feared his own son-in-law, and sorely against the inclination of the queen, the Earl of Sunderland, the husband of lady Anne Churchill, was admitted into the government as one of the Secretaries of State, in lieu of Sir Charles Hedges; and this, in spite of the daring intrigues and skilful manœuvres of Mr. Secretary Harley, who was now the only Tory of any note suffered to retain office. It was with extreme difficulty that the Duchess of Marlborough induced Anne to consent to employ her plain-speaking and almost republican son-in-law; and it appears that her grace would have failed, but for a fear entertained by the queen that the Whigs might not only fall upon Harley, but turn their majority against measures which she had much at heart. After Hedges was dismissed a few other changes were made. Sir James Montague, brother of Lord Halifax, was appointed solicitor-general; and the three Tory Commissions of the Board of Trade—among whom was Matthew Pryor the poet—were removed to make room for three Whigs; Sir George Rooke and the two or three Tories that still held seats in the Privy Council, though they seldom appeared, had their names erased; and now Harley was left absolutely alone, apparently without support and without hope.* The way in which this adroit courtier rent the compact web of this Whig government will be alluded to hereafter; but to describe the manœuvres at full length would occupy hundreds of pages, and present a pitiable and disgusting picture of courts and of human nature—or of mons said to her Majesty, "that, as his grace had obtained the victory of Ramillies before the armies were supposed to be in the field, so the Commons had granted these supplies to her majesty before her enemies could know the parliament was sitting."

* The character of Robert Harley is thus hit off by Macky. "He is a gentleman of a good family in Herefordshire, who hath taken a great deal of pains to understand the constitution of this country thoroughly. He was active for the Revolution, but being misunderstood at court, and in the House of Commons, he openly voted against the principles he had always professed, when he said the court did not gratify him so well as he thought he deserved; and though some steps were made towards gaining him to King William, yet he made no advance till that parliament was called which impeached the Partition, to which he was chosen speaker, as he was to that which succeeded. No man understands more the management of that chair to the advantage of his party, nor knows better all the tricks of the House. He is skilled in most things, and very eloquent; was bred a Presbyterian, yet joins with the Church-party in everything; and they do nothing without him. He would make a good Chancellor or Master of the Rolls: he is a very useful man, and for that reason is well with the ministry. He never fails to make a clergyman of each sort at his table on Sunday; his family go generally to the meeting. He is of low stature, and slender, turned of forty."

* Louis offered for himself and his grandson to transfer to the archduke (King Charles) part of the dominions which composed the Spanish monarchy; to relinquish Naples, Sicily, the Milanese, the Principality of Tuscany, and the small island in that sea belonging to Spain, to the archduke, to be forever united to the house of Austria; and to give the United Provinces a strong barrier, a line of fortification which should cover them from future attacks. The rejection of these terms has generally been imputed to the ambition and avarice of the Duke of Marlborough, to whom war was in both senses so much more profitable than peace. Yet in spite of the position assumed by Lord Bolingbroke that this was the proper time to treat, and that the terms offered were a sufficient ground for a peace, we may doubt whether Louis was sincere in his overtures, or whether his main object in making them was not to divide the confederacy and destroy its strength. The offer to the house of Austria was rather tempting; but before Louis offered these terms to the allies in general, he had attempted to seduce the Dutch into a separate treaty; and he continued this attempt even while he was negotiating with the confederacy.

Confident in the support of this Whig cabinet, which in all probability would never have had an existence but for the wonderful influence which his wife had over the queen, yet still fearing the independent and not very amiable temper of his son-in-law Sunderland, Marlborough went over to Flanders, and having looked to the army hastened to pay his respects to the "Protestant succession" in Hanover, whose advent to the throne of Great Britain was made surer than ever by the Union. At this moment the conquering Charles XII. of Sweden, who in his boyhood had been saved from ruin by our late King William, was encamped at Alt Ranstadt, only a few marches from the Hanoverian court. The extraordinary achievements of the Swedish hero, who, with a small army, had defeated the Czar Peter, dethroned Augustus, King of Poland, and set up King Stanislaus in his place, had for some time fixed the attention of Europe. He was now laying Saxony, the hereditary dominion of the elective King of Poland he had dethroned, under contribution; and the emperor himself was standing in awe of his arms, and in an utter incapacity of understanding how to treat with so eccentric a sovereign. Louis XIV. saw more clearly the use that might be made of the Swede, and he sent to solicit an alliance with him. This design was penetrated by the allies; and Marlborough now went from Hanover to the camp in Saxony to defeat it. It is said that Charles had a great anxiety to see the renowned English general, and that he had refused to treat with any other personage. They met on the 28th of April. As Charles could not or would not speak French, and as Marlborough knew no Swedish, the conversation was carried on by means of interpreters. On the part of Marlborough it was sufficiently complimentary and high-flown. "I present to your majesty," said he, "a letter, not from the chancery, but from the heart of the queen, my mistress, and written with her own hand. Had not her sex prevented it, she would have crossed the sea to see a prince admired by the whole universe. I am, in this particular more happy than the queen, and I wish I could serve some campaigns under so great a general as your majesty, that I might learn what I yet want to know in the art of war." Charles told him that the queen's letter and his person were both very acceptable to him; that he had a great regard for her Britannic Majesty and for the interest of the grand alliance; that he had just cause to come into Saxony with his troops, and that it was his design to depart thence as soon as he obtained the satisfaction he demanded, but not sooner: "However," said he, in conclusion, "I shall do nothing that can tend to the prejudice of the common cause or the Protestant religion, of which I shall always glory to be a zealous protector." The king and the duke dined together, and were afterwards closeted together for some hours, having each his interpreter with him. According to Marlborough Charles approved of the conduct of the allies, censured the domineering spirit of the French, and said (this was the principle maintained by Marlborough and his Whig friends, who had rejected the overtures for peace) that France, although humbled, was not yet brought low enough to listen to reasonable terms; and that there could be no lasting security to Europe till she was reduced to the condition she was in at the peace of Westphalia. On the whole the assurances of Charles were satisfactory; and, what was more, his visitor saw or ascertained, by less direct means, that the Swede was thinking more of Russia and of his rival Peter, than of anything else, and that he had no design upon that part of Europe where the allies were engaged. The Swedish courtiers, who followed their king, who spent all his money on his army, and who had a great contempt for all luxury and finery, were miserably poor. To secure an influence among them, good round English pensions were offered to Count Piper, Charles's chief favourite, to Hermelion and Ciederholm. It is said that Marlborough, in this, followed the advice of the Elector of Hanover; but this was precisely the kind of case where the hero of Blenheim would require the advice of no one—his own natural disposition and large experience would be sure to suggest the course he took. It is said that Piper had some scruples, and that these were only overcome by his wife, after she had listened to the persuasive voice of Marlborough. It appears pretty certain, however, that the three Swedes accepted the pension and took a year's advance in ready money. It was probably owing to these little circumstances that Charles, who would permit no foreign minister to attend him in the field, permitted Mr. Jefferys, an English diplomatist, to accompany his army in the character of a volunteer. This Jefferys, of course, kept up a communication with Marlborough, informing him of everything that passed in the Swedish camp.

On leaving Charles XII. the English general proceeded to visit the King of Prussia, who, at parting, forced on him a diamond ring valued at 100*l*. He then came back through Hanover to the Hague, where his diplomacy was much applauded by the States-General, who had not been without their fears of a visitation from this new Lion of the North, as the ally of King Louis. Marlborough's diplomacy indeed was this year much more remarkable than his military operations. The Duke of Vendome, acting on the defensive, marched and counter-marched in the Netherlands: through a variety of causes the allies were never able to attack him; and the campaign closed without a single battle. But blood enough was shed in other quarters. By a strange and selfish treaty the emperor had consented to the undisturbed retreat of a considerable French army shut up in the Milanese; and these veteran troops the French king had sent to reinforce his grandson in Spain. On our side little was done to strengthen Charles, whose chance was now becoming every day less and less of nodding upon the Spanish throne.* According to an organ of the Tories it was no wonder how it came to pass that our forces in Spain were not properly reinforced:—"It was not the intention of some ministers that they should; for this would infallibly have brought a revolution in Spain, and put an end to the war; whereas they had then projected the conquest of France, and, had Spain been reduced, the parliament could never have been prevailed on to continue the war afterwards upon these romantic views. The Spanish war therefore was neglected, 'tis presumed, as incompatible with the designs of the leading men in the administration."† At the same time Charles and his Austrian generals and ministers continued to disagree with the English commanders, and the English to differ and quarrel with the Portuguese. Lord Peterborough, after visiting Italy and flying over more than half of Europe, with great profit to his own geographical knowledge, but without any great success as a loan-negotiator, had returned to Spain, the scene of his short but most brilliant glory, to serve as a volunteer. But, as he could no longer command, he took a pleasure in thwarting those who did; in uttering witticisms at the expense of the Austrian claimant, and in saying that men were great fools to fight for two such blockheads as Charles and Philip. It had been resolved in the preceding winter that the allies should unite all their forces and march again to Madrid by the way of Aragon; but Charles was deterred by the intelligence of the great reinforcements that had joined or were to join Philip; and he marched away with some detachments into Catalonia, in order to defend that province, which seemed really and steadily attached to his cause, against an attack which the French threatened from the side of Roussillon. He proposed that Lord Galway with the English and Dutch troops and the Marquis Das Minas with the Portuguese should dispose their forces so as to cover the frontiers of Aragon and Valencia, remaining on the defensive till supplies should arrive from England, or from Italy, where the war was at an end. But Galway and Das Minas would not follow this plan—perhaps they could not with safety to themselves adopt it: they were badly supplied in all respects; and they were tempted, by the easy prey of some of the enemy's magazines, to march to the frontiers of Castile. Then they turned and laid siege to the town of Villena, in Valencia. Before they made a breach they were warned of the approach, by forced marches, of the Duke of Berwick, who still commanded for Philip, who, like his competitor Charles, had no taste for pitched battles. Galway

* "Garth, the best natured ingenious wild man I ever knew, might be in the right, when he said, in some of his poems at that time,

— An Austrian prince alone,
Is fit to nod upon a Spanish throne."—Bolingbroke.

† "I verily believe, one great reason King Charles neglected so long to go to Madrid was in expectation of receiving succours from England, that might have enabled him to maintain himself in that capital, and without which he could not but apprehend he should be driven from thence again with disgrace, by the great efforts the French king was making to support his rival King Philip."

and Das Minas raised the siege of Villena, and boldly advanced to meet Berwick. They met on the plain of Almanza, on Easter Monday, the 24th of April (N.S.), and one of the hardest fought battles of this war was the consequence. The English, Dutch, and Portuguese, commanded by Galway and Das Minas, were far inferior in number to the French and Spaniards; they were deficient in cavalry, and what they had was not good; but the English and Dutch infantry kept the battle undecided for six sanguinary hours. According to Berwick's own account, his horse were repeatedly repulsed by those steady columns of foot—charge after charge was ineffectual, and, even when the French and Spaniards seemed victorious on both wings, their centre was cut through and broken, and the main body of their infantry completely beaten. But in the end victory remained with Berwick; Galway and Das Minas were both wounded, 5000 of their men were killed; and, in the course of that and the following day, nearly all the rest of their little army, to escape starvation, surrendered. The victory of Almanza was indeed complete. Without any force to oppose him, and with fresh reinforcements brought up by the Duke of Orleans, Berwick entered Valencia and took a number of towns, while the Duke of Orleans went to lay siege to Saragossa, which city, after a strange exhibition of superstition, surrendered to his royal highness without firing a shot.* From Valencia Berwick advanced towards the Ebro, suffering greatly, like the enemy he had recently defeated, from want of provisions. Indeed such was the wretched state of Spain that there were few districts of the kingdom where an army of either party could subsist for any length of time; and owing to the badness of the roads it was difficult and most tedious to collect provisions and bring them from other provinces. It was the 4th of June before Berwick crossed the Ebro at Caspe. Clouds of Spanish partisans and the wrecks of some English and Portuguese regiments had kept flying before him; and some of them now threw themselves into Lerida, a strong fortress before which the great Condé himself had been foiled. Berwick resolved to besiege Lerida, but he was badly supplied with artillery and ammunition, and had scarcely bread for his men to eat. From the middle of June to the middle of August he was unable to undertake anything; and on the 18th of August

* "I must not omit a singular circumstance. Count de la Puebla (who commanded in Saragossa for Charles), to endeavour to keep the people in order as long as he could, and by that means to retard the Duke of Orleans' march, made the inhabitants of Saragossa believe that the reports which were raised concerning a new army coming from Navarra were false; and even that the camp which appeared was not a real one; that it was nothing more than a phantom formed by magic art; upon which the clergy went in procession upon the ramparts, and from thence, after a number of prayers, exorcised the pretended spectres that were in sight. It is surprising that the people were credulous enough to give in to such an imagination; but they were not undeceived till the next day, when the hussars of the Duke of Orleans' army, after having briskly pursued a guard of cavalry of Count de la Puebla's as far as the gates of the city, cut off several of their heads. They were then seized with fear, and the magistrates sent out as quick as possible to submit to his royal highness. I could never have believed this story, if I had not been assured of the truth of it at Saragossa, by all the principal persons of the city."—Memoirs of the Duke of Berwick.

a cabinet courier from Paris brought him orders to repair in person with all possible speed into Provence, to assist, with his good generalship, the Duke of Burgundy, who was marching to the relief of Toulon, besieged by the Duke of Savoy, who had again carried the war into the grand monarch's own country. Berwick, travelling post, got to Toulouse, and, on approaching Beziers, learned that the siege of Toulon was raised without his assistance. Then, losing no time, he posted back to Spain, and joined the Duke of Orleans in the month of September, near Lerida. The French prince, notwithstanding all the exertions he had made to collect artillery and materials proper for a siege, was in want of almost everything—so bare and unfurnished was this great kingdom. He, however, would have opened the trenches immediately, if Berwick had not advised him to await the arrival of six battalions of infantry that were marching and starving through Castile. On the night between the 2nd and 3rd of October the trenches before the town of Lerida were opened, and not before; and if the inhabitants and the troops within that place and the castle had been only tolerably provided, the French must assuredly have sustained great loss and a final repulse, which would have ruined their affairs in all that part of Spain. But those within were still worse supplied than those without; and there was no concert between the English officers in the castle and the Spanish officers in the town. The town was taken by storm, and subjected to all the horrors of war, on the 12th of October; and the castle was forced to capitulate on the 11th of November. While the siege was in progress, such were the sufferings of the French, almost the slightest effort would have sufficed to raise it; but, though a kind of an army assembled in the neighbourhood, under the banners of Charles, to succour Lerida, they never came in sight till the town was lost, and the castle reduced to extremities; and then they wheeled about and fled after losing some forty or fifty men. The campaign ended on the side of the French with the capture of Morella on the 17th of December. The Duke of Orleans, who had shown both activity and ability, returned to Paris: Berwick remained in Spain, as Philip could not consider himself safe without him. But early in the spring Berwick received secret orders from the French court to hasten immediately to Versailles, without taking leave of the King of Spain, or even giving him any previous notice, lest Philip should be desirous of detaining him. Louis, in fact, seems to have set as high a value on this quasi-royal nephew of Marlborough as his grandson Philip did, and to have felt that Berwick was necessary in France. The siege of Toulon has been mentioned, but it was of such importance as to call for further notice. The project had been concerted between the courts of St. James's and Turin, between Marlborough and Prince Eugene; and when the latter general, with the Duke of Savoy and an army of 30,000 men, crossed the Alps by the Col di Tende, Sir Cloudesley

Shovel, with a combined fleet of English and Dutch, was off the coast of Provence to co-operate. On the 10th of July Eugene reached the Var. Sir John Norris, a gallant seaman, ascended that river with boats and gunboats, and landed his sailors, who carried some French entrenchments sword in hand, and cleared the passage for the army of Savoy, which crossed on the 11th. Then the Duke of Savoy made a halt, which, with the slow marching afterwards, allowed time for the arrival of strong detachments from the army of Villars in Flanders. The French, in fact, were drawing in troops from all parts; and they not only repaired the fortifications of Toulon, but covered that important place by a fortified camp, in which they had forty battalions. Prince Eugene, it is said, upon observing the disposition of the enemy, and finding he must fight an army entrenched on the outworks, and on the rough and steep heights that surrounded Toulon, and that were furnished with a vast number of guns, proposed retreating forthwith; but the Duke of Savoy was positive in his opinion that an attempt ought to be made. Accordingly a gallant and a very successful attack was made upon an outwork on the hill of St. Catherine, and upon two small forts near the beautiful harbour. But the loss, including the brave Prince of Saxe Gotha, was considerable, and Toulon not only remained as strong as ever, but was even made stronger, by the arrival of more and more detachments; and on the 15th of August the French recovered the position of St. Catherine, and attacked the Savoyards in their camp. It was now universally agreed among the allies to give up the siege; but, in retaliation for the ruin of his capital city of Turin, the Duke of Savoy gave directions for bombarding Toulon both by sea and land; and he and Prince Eugene viewed from one of the heights "the dreadful blaze, which was some consolation" to them under this disappointment." The bombardment from the side of the sea was indeed terrible; a great part of the city was ruined by it, the arsenal greatly injured, and the English and Dutch sailors destroyed two batteries, and eight ships of the line which were lying in the harbour. This being done, the confederates, on the 25th of August, retired in the night, in much greater haste than they had advanced. On the 31st the army of Savoy repossessed the Var, whence they continued their retreat to the maritime Alps. As the detachments from the army of Villars, from the Rhine, and other quarters, were wanted in their old positions, there was no pursuit; and when Eugene got beyond the Alps he was in a condition to attack Suza, an ancient town at the foot of the Alps, and one of the best defences to Turin on the side of France. The French garrison resisted for a fortnight, and then capitulated. If the Duke of Savoy had acted with more promptness and vigour, and if the emperor had sent to this invasion in the south of France all the disposable troops he had in the north of Italy, Toulon might have been taken, and the great commercial city of Marseilles as well, and indeed the whole of France, as far as the Rhone, might have been occupied in one short campaign. But again there were all kinds of jarring interests and jealousies, and the emperor had his eye upon the rich and fertile and undefended Spanish dominions at the southern extremity of the Italian peninsula. To him the enterprise in the south of France was nothing more than an opportune diversion; and, instead of sending the mass of his army of Italy across the Alps to Toulon, he threw it across the Apennines, to rush to the easy conquest of the kingdom of Naples. The Count Daun, the imperial general, with 5000 foot and 3000 horse, crossed the Neapolitan frontier without resistance, and advanced to the strongly fortified city of Capua, which commands the passage of the rapid Volturno. But instead of opposing his progress, that important fortress threw open its gates and welcomed the Austrian. The city of Aversa did the same, and the imperialists, in another pleasant morning's march, entered the capital, amidst the joyful shouts of the Neapolitans, a people naturally fond of change, but who, on this occasion, were exasperated against the Spanish viceroy of King Philip, on account of the enormous taxes he had laid upon them to support the war in Spain, and also on account of his arbitrary levies of men, and seizure of all the Neapolitan ships that were sent into Spain. The people cast down the statue of King Philip, which had been erected a few weeks before, broke it in pieces, and threw it into the sea; the magistrates presented to Daun the keys of the city; and the three castles which command Naples surrendered to him without firing a shot. Indeed, on the morrow, a garrison of Castel-nuovo, officers and men, Spaniards as well as Neapolitans, enlisted with Daun, and took the pay of King Charles. The Prince of Castiglione, with a thousand horse, took the road to Apulia, with the intention of preserving those provinces for King Philip; but the passes of the Apennines by Monteforte and Avellino were occupied by the imperialists, and the partisans of the house of Austria; and the prince was obliged to retreat in the direction of Salerno. He was soon followed by a superior force of German horse—his men deserted him, and he was taken prisoner, with a few of his officers. In the mountainous provinces of the Abruzzi, the Duke of Atri, one of the most ancient and powerful of the Neapolitan nobles, attempted to maintain the cause of Philip; but the people were indifferent or averse, and the Abruzzi, together with the strong fortress of Pescara, were soon occupied by General Vetzell. The flag of the Bourbon now floated only over the walls of Gaeta, in which the viceroy Ascalona had thrown himself. The Spaniard was soon besieged there by the Austrians, who carried the city by storm in the month of September, committing the atrocities usual on such occasions. Ascalona retired to the tower of Orlando, but he was obliged to surrender at discretion on the day following. He had committed great cruelties five years before in putting down a conspiracy and an insurrection in favour of King Charles, and now the Neapolitans took their revenge by loading him with insults. But for the exertions of the Austrian soldiery they would have torn him to pieces. At this easy rate was the fairest kingdom in Europe secured to the house of Austria, under whose dominion it remained for 27 years, or till 1734, when Charles of Bourbon conquered it with equal ease.* By very remarkable exertions the French were enabled to renew the war on the Rhine, and even to cross that river once more. They still retained possession of Strasburg; and Marshal Villars, crossing the river at that city, drove the imperialists before him, took Rastadt, penetrated to the Danube, and had some hope of recovering Bavaria for the unlucky elector. At this moment the commanding chief of the imperialists fell into the hands of the Elector of Hanover, afterwards George I., a brave and steady soldier, but no great general; a prince with some solid but with no brilliant qualities. George, however, was not put to the test in this campaign; for the fiery and daring old Villars, being obliged to detach a considerable part of his army to protect the south of France against the Duke of Savoy, fell back upon Strasburg, and recrossed the Rhine.†

* Storia del Regno di Napoli del Generale Pietro Colletta. After settling himself in Naples, Count Daun, by a series of small expeditions, got possession of the Presidii, on the coast of Tuscany, and of Porto Longone, in the isle of Elba. His successes would have been still greater if he had not been opposed by the pope, Clement XI., who resolutely refused to recognise Charles as King of Spain.

† The naval incidents of this year are thus condensed by Smollett, a very competent judge of such matters.—Sir Cloudesley Shovel having left a squadron with Sir Thomas Dilkes for the Mediterranean service, set sail for England with the rest of the fleet, and was in soundings on the 22nd day of October. About eight o'clock at night, his own ship, the Association, struck upon the rocks of Scilly, and perished with every person on board. This was likewise the fate of the Eagle and the Romney; the Firebrand was dashed to pieces on the rocks, but the captain and four-and-twenty men saved themselves in the boat; the Phoenix was driven ashore; the Royal Anne was saved by the presence of mind and uncommon dexterity of Sir George Byng and his officers; the St. George, commanded by Lord Dursley, struck upon the rocks, but a wave set her afloat again. The admiral's body, being cast ashore, was stripped and buried in the sand; but afterwards discovered, and brought into Plymouth, from whence it was conveyed to London, and interred in Westminster Abbey. Sir Cloudesley Shovel was born of mean parentage, in the county of Suffolk; but raised himself to the chief command at sea by his industry, valour, skill, and integrity. . . . In the month of May, three ships of the line—namely, the Royal Oak, of seventy-six guns, commanded by Commodore Baron Wylde; the Grafton, of seventy guns, Captain Edward Acton; and the Hampton Court, of seventy guns, Captain George Clements,—sailed as convoy to the West India and Portugal fleet of merchant ships, amounting to five-and-fifty sail. They fell in with the Dunkirk squadron, consisting of ten ships of war, one frigate, and four privateers, under the command of M. de Forbin. A furious action immediately ensued, and, notwithstanding the vast disproportion in point of number, was maintained by the English commodore with great gallantry, until Captain Acton was killed, Captain Clements mortally wounded, and the Grafton and Hampton Court were taken, after having sunk the Salisbury, at that time in the hands of the French. Then the commodore, having eleven feet of water in his hold, disengaged himself from the enemy, by whom he had been surrounded, and run his ship aground near Dungeness; but she afterwards floated, and he brought her safe into the Downs. In the mean time, the French frigate and privateers made prize of twenty-one English merchant ships of great value, which, with the Grafton and Hampton Court, Forbin conveyed in triumph to Dunkirk. In July, the same active officer took fifteen ships belonging to the Russian company, off the coast of Lapland. In September, he joined another squadron fitted out at Brest, under the command of the celebrated M. du Guai Trousin; and these attacked, off the Lizard, the convoy of the Portugal fleet, consisting of the Cumberland, Captain Richard Edwards, of eighty guns; the Devonshire, of eighty; the Royal Oak, of seventy-six; the Chester and Ruby, of fifty guns each. Though the French squadron did not fall short of twelve sail of the line, the English captains maintained the action for many hours, with surprising valour. At length the Devonshire was obliged to yield to superior numbers; the Cumberland blew up; the Chester and Ruby were taken; the Royal Oak fought her way through the midst of her enemies, and arrived safe in the harbour of Kinsale; and the Lisbon

During the whole of this year Scotland was the scene of intrigues, plots and conspiracies. The more remote consequences of the Union are blessings which we all, whether Scots or Englishmen, know and feel; but in its immediate effects the measure was far indeed from being productive of that peace and goodwill, and identification of interests, which the wisest of the statesmen of both kingdoms had looked for. The national pride—the most susceptible of passions—was hurt; and the Scots began to maintain that a separate existence, with honesty and danger, was preferable to an amalgamation with England, which, if it led to prosperity and wealth, was accompanied by a surrender of nationality. They looked back with fond affection to their ancient constitution, which, in sober seriousness, had little to recommend it. They complained (and this complaint was not unfounded) that by the gross prostitution of a majority, their legislative existence had been surrendered and sold, and everything that distinguished Scotland as a nation cast under foot to the English people. The Union was a matter of much less interest, and it was far from producing such exhibitions of popular passion, one way or the other, on this side of the Tweed: but English members of parliament had insulted the Scots in their debates, and English ministers had not only been slow in paying the equivalent, but permitted that money, when sent, to be applied to the most corrupt of purposes, or divided with shameful partiality. At the same time, while the wheels were preparing for a new machine, while the difficult questions of trade were settling, the whole commerce of the Scots was brought to a dead lock; and for some months their merchants and traders knew not what to do. When detected in any irregularity they were harshly punished by seizures and confiscations. Religious differences and other causes increased this disaffection, and, in a very short time, converted the majority of the Scots into anti-unionists. Nay, they even made downright Jacobites of the flaming Presbyterians, Covenanters, and Cameronians, who had suffered so cruelly from the persecuting spirit of the old dynasty, and who, up to the Union, considered the word Stuart as synonymous with devil. In all directions communications were opened with the Chevalier St. George (the Pretender), whose birthday was publicly celebrated in many parts of the kingdom. The boy-pensioner of France could do nothing without the assistance of Louis; but that king, beset on all sides and sinking, grasped eagerly at the hope of making a grand diversion by exciting a civil war in Great Britain; and he and his minister M. de Chamillart employed secret agents in Scotland, and eagerly received the reports and memorials of Colonel Hooke, an agent of the Jacobite party, who went and came between Versailles, St. Germain, and Scotland. This dark correspondence has since been brought fully to light. Towards the end of the preceding year, when the Union was as yet unfinished, Colonel Hooke informed the French minister that, upon his arrival in Scotland, he found that all that nation were extremely exasperated against the English; that the different interests of parties were in a manner laid asleep, and that every one was thinking of nothing but of shaking off the yoke of England. "The greatest part of Scotland," says the colonel, "has always been well affected to the rightful king; the Presbyterians, his ancient enemies, even wish for him at present; and, as they look upon him as their only resource, they offer to arm 13,000 men, and to begin the war upon the first orders that they receive. They require only a ship loaded with gunpowder, and a promise that the King of England (the Pretender) will go and put himself at the head of his friends in Scotland. I have seen a great number of principal lords who are all of the same opinion. Being assured that there will be an universal rising in Scotland, they have drawn up a memorial addressed to the king (of France), in which they give an account of the state of their nation. They have taken the instructions which you, sir, had the goodness to give me, for their rule, and they have answered them article by article. They oblige themselves to march into England at the head of 30,000 men, whom they will supply with provisions, clothes, carriages, and even in part with arms."* He inclosed a memorial to Louis from some of the chiefs, in the name of the whole nation, but more particularly in the name of thirty others who had appointed them their proxies. He describes these as being the richest and most powerful chiefs of Scotland; but he hints that they must be well assured of the probability of the fleet saved themselves by making the best of their way during the engagement. Since the battle off Malaga, the French king had never dared to keep the sea with a large fleet, but carried on a kind of piratical war of this sort, in order to distress the trade of England. He was the more encouraged to pursue these measures by the correspondence which his ministers carried on with some wretches belonging to the admiralty and the other offices, who basely betrayed their country in transmitting to France such intelligence concerning the convoys appointed for the protection of commerce as enabled the enemy to attack them with advantage. In the course of this year, the French fishery stages, ships, and vessels in Newfoundland, were taken, burned, and destroyed by Captain John Underwood, of the Falkland."—Ibid.

* Memorials and Letters presented to the Court of France by Colonel Hooke in 1707. Published at Edinburgh, 1760.—This Colonel Hooke is said to have been a brother of Nathaniel Hooke, the author of the well-known Roman History, and also the person employed by the Duchess of Marlborough in assisting her to draw up the account of her life, for which service she gave him 5000*l*. Before Hooke's expedition one Mr. Scott had been busily employed in examining the state of Scotland, and making reports to the Earl of Middleton, who, it appears, laid them before the Marquis de Torcy. This Scott in the month of July, 1706, had transmitted very minute accounts about the army, the different shires, &c., with nicely drawn distinctions between the well affected and the ill affected; and he had assured Middleton that in the northern shires nobility, gentry, and commonly, were all devoted to the Pretender, and that the far greater part of the nation was well affected, and none ill, "except that pernicious rebellious crew the Presbyterian ministers, and such as were entirely under their direction and influence, which were, for the most part, the common people." There was also another acti- correspondent, whom Maepherison supposes to have been a Captain Stratton, who had been appointed, by the unanimous choice of the Jacobites, to go to France. This secret agent, in September, 1706, informed Middleton, who, in his turn, informed the French ministry, that the Scots were longing for a French army under the command of their own young king—that they were making all their efforts to reject the Union, "and did not doubt to succeed, providing the prevailing party in England did not send money to gain votes in parliament."—Macpherson, Stuart Papers.

success of the enterprise before they would thus hazard their lives and families. "They were all," says he, "unanimous, excepting the Duke of Hamilton, and a lord, a friend of his." The sanguine plotter, who, as usual, saw more than the reality, goes on to say—"I am fully persuaded that they are in a condition to do more than they have promised. Several of them have done themselves the honour to write with their own hand to the king (of France); they have signed their letters, and have sealed them with their arms; and their subscriptions at the bottom of their memorial testify their zeal, for they thereby hazard their all. By the letters which I have received from that country, it appears that everything is ready. I have had the happiness to engage that whole nation in the service of the king; and at the same time I have not in the least brought any engagement upon his majesty. If he thinks proper to prosecute this enterprise, I will answer that in a short time the English will be in no condition to furnish either troops or money to the enemy, and that they will accept of peace on the terms that his majesty shall be pleased to prescribe to them." Hooke, in conclusion, flatters himself that his zeal will be approved of, and the great hazards he was running be rewarded by "a settlement"—that is, a good pension or place for himself. It appears that he was in Scotland again by the month of February of the present year (1707), and that his coming was favoured by the Duke of Hamilton. "I wrote to the Duke of Hamilton," says he, "begging of him to give notice to the well-affected of my journey, and that I was to bring them arms and ammunition: but, this resolution being changed, and new orders being given to me to go over to that country, only to treat with the principal men of the nation, I likewise acquainted the Duke of Hamilton with this, and entreated him to concert everything before hand with the other chiefs, who were then assembled to attend the parliament, and to send some one well instructed and fully authorised from them, to wait upon me at the Earl of Errol's, the lord high constable, where I was to land, and to whom also I gave notice of my journey." Hooke had orders to bring with him two Scotch Jacobites of good family, then in France, who were both "judged proper to facilitate the affair, especially one of the brothers, who, having come to France with the permission of the Scottish government, was at liberty to go openly everywhere upon his return." Hooke, of course, was obliged to play at hide-and-seek, as he had no pass, and was known as a Jacobite plotter. He and his companions, the brothers Moray, embarked in a French frigate, which landed them at Slainnes, a castle of the lord high constable, in the northern part of Aberdeenshire. Upon his arrival, he found that the Union had been ratified by the Scottish parliament, "to the great discontent and hearty dislike of the nation; and that all the peers and other lords, together with the members of parliament, had returned to the country, their ordinary residence, and that there remained at Edinburgh only the high constable, the Duke of Hamilton, and the Earl marshal, the two last being dangerously ill." But the Countess of Errol, mother to the high constable, met him at the castle on the sea-coast, and put into his hands several letters from her son, in which he expressed a great impatience to see Hooke, adding that all the well-affected would exert themselves to the utmost, being persuaded that they would obtain, sword in hand, better conditions than those of the Union. The countess also gave him a letter from Mr. Hall, a Catholic priest, who informed him that the Duke of Hamilton would treat with him, and with him only, at Edinburgh, and that all his friends were ready to risk everything for the Stuart, provided that prince would come in person. At the same time the countess told Hooke that he ought not to be in too great haste in trusting Hamilton; that that duke's affairs were greatly altered; that all the Scots had abandoned him, and that he was suspected of holding a correspondence with the court of London. While the French frigate cruised off and on, between Norway and the Scottish coast, Hooke lay snug in Slaines' castle, sending and receiving messengers. The Earl of Errol begged him to wait for him at the castle, whither he would come to arrange matters as soon as he could. The Lord Drummond, son of the Earl of Perth, (or, as he was generally styled in Scotland, the Duke of Perth, a title conferred upon him by James II., after the Revolution), went among the lords of the west and north-west to prepare them for a conference with the colonel, who had given his lordship a copy of the instructions he had received from M. de Chamillart, together with queries concerning the particular circumstances of the country, and of the things that would be most needed in the insurrection,* as likewise a copy of a letter from his majesty (the Pretender), who assured them of his resolution to come and put himself at their head, in order to recover their lost liberties and the crown of his ancestors. The Laird of Boyne, who had vigorously opposed the Union in parliament, was deputed by Hook to wait upon the Duke of Atholl, in whose confidence he stood high, and to bring in some other lords of his acquaintance. The colonel likewise dispatched messengers to the Duke of

Gordon, who was at one of his castles in the north, to prepare everything in that quarter, so as to be able "to enter upon the business" as soon as he (Hooke) should arrive among them. Lord Saltoun, a chief of one of the branches of the house of Fraser, went to visit the Countess of Errol at the castle of Slaines, where he assured Hooke of his zeal for the Pretender, and desired him to be on his guard against the Duke of Hamilton. "He told me," says Hooke, "that he believed he was in the interest of the court of London; that he had for a long time past held a correspondence with the Duke of Queensberry and the Earl of Stair, who are at the head of the party for the Union; that he had carefully concealed that correspondence, and had broken all the measures of the well-affected; that, after the ratification of the Union in the parliament, he had used his utmost efforts to get himself elected one of the peers to sit in the first parliament of Great Britain; and, although he had condescended to the greatest meanness, yet he had been unanimously rejected as a candidate." When Hooke had been concealed about a week in Aberdeenshire, the lord high constable (Errol) arrived at the castle from Edinburgh, very much dissatisfied with the Duke of Hamilton. "He told me," says the colonel, "that the duke for two months past had testified the utmost impatience to see me, but that he no sooner heard of my arrival than he changed his tone. He said that I had come too late, and that the animosity of the nation against the English was greatly abated. Mr. Hall had made a mistake in deciphering my letter; for, instead of explaining that I had letters from the French king and the King of England for the duke, he wrote that the letters were from the king and the queen, upon which the Duke of Hamilton cried out that his letters of two years' date were plainly not agreeable to the king, and that, as his majesty had not written to him, it was a proof that he wished him not to be concerned in the affair; that for the time to come, therefore, he would think only of the means of securing his own safety." The Earl of Errol added, "that all this was only a pretext which the duke used to cover his secret designs; that for some time past he had endeavoured to persuade his friends that there was nothing to be expected from the king (Louis); that his majesty was prevented, by the state of his affairs, from thinking upon them, and that, if he appeared disposed to do anything, it was only with a view to rid himself of the King of England (the Pretender) before the peace, or to excuse himself from doing any other thing for that prince, in case his subjects should refuse to receive him with a few troops; that the nation, therefore, should take some other measures for securing its liberties and independence." Errol confirmed what Lord Saltoun had said about Hamilton's being in correspondence and secret intrigues with Queensberry and Stair; stating that the Duke of Atholl was the first who discovered these intrigues, and made Hamilton confess to their existence. As he did so, however,

* The French minister had instructed Colonel Hooke "to be certain of making a diversion in Scotland, which would embarrass the English, and oblige them to bring back from the continent a considerable body of troops." And to this end "the Scottish nobility must be in a condition to assemble twenty-five or thirty thousand men, and to clothe, arm, equip, and maintain them, during the campaign; id est, at least six months, to commence at the beginning of May." "The favourable disposition of the nobility," says the Frenchman, "leaves no room to doubt but they will make their utmost efforts to withdraw themselves from the yoke which the English nation intends to impose upon them. But before a revolution, which should end in the restoration of the lawful sovereign, is begun, it is necessary to enter into a particular detail of the forces and means which the Scots can employ to accomplish it, and of the succours which they may promise themselves from the protection of the king (of France), who is no less interested in the success of this enterprise than his Britannic majesty." And he proceeds to point out particular inquiries to be made by Hooke in Scotland respecting the quantity of artillery and the condition of it,—powder, ball, bullets, mortars, bombs, grenades, camp-equipage, &c. &c.; as well as concerning generals, and other officers in the country competent to command an army, &c. See Instructions from M. de Chamillart to Colonel Hooke, dated February, 1707, in Marquesson's Original Papers.

Hamilton intreated Atholl to believe that he had no other design but to intimidate or win over the two chiefs of the English faction—the Duke of Queensberry and the Earl of Stair. The high constable further asserted (or so at least says Hooke) “that when all the counties and all the cities of Scotland declared against the Union, by their addresses to the parliament, the Presbyterians of the west of Scotland, who were all armed, sent to inform the Duke of Hamilton, that they were preparing to march to Edinburgh to disperse the parliament; that if he thought the enterprise too bold, he need not concern himself with it, but only leave them to act, and that the duke had charged them not to make any disturbance, saying, it was not yet time.” If Hooke was a liar, he was certainly a very circumstantial one. He says that the Earl of Strathmore, Lord Stormont, and the Lairds of Powrie and Finglas informed him that they had made the same offer of rising in arms from the shires of Angus and Perth, and that Hamilton had made them the same answer—that the Laird of Kersland, one of the chief men among the Presbyterians, also assured him that he and another west country laird had been equally ready, and that Hamilton had put a stop to their rising. Hooke says that, when he asked the high constable whether they could not act without Hamilton, who was considerable neither for his riches nor for the number of his vassals, Errol showed him a letter written by Father Innes, almoner to Maria d’Este, the Pretender’s mother, in which were these words:—“The King of England desires that his friends will follow the directions of the Duke of Hamilton, and not declare themselves till the duke has declared himself, when they may, without danger, follow his example.” At the same time Errol showed Hooke two letters written to Edinburgh by two Scottish gentlemen in France, who both declared that King Louis would do nothing for the Scots, and that Hooke’s journey was a mere feint. One of the letters strongly advised all those who were engaged in the hopeless plot to look to their own security. If we attentively consider these things, there would scarcely appear any discrepancy between Hooke’s account of Hamilton’s conduct and the account of that conduct given by Hamilton’s descendant, on the authority of family documents, and which we have admitted in a preceding page, while treating of his behaviour in parliament at the passing of the Union.

At one time the court of St. Germain may have thought of a rising, and the court of Versailles of sending arms, money, and men, into Scotland; but Louis had such numerous calls upon him as to be able to do little; and, if he hoped—as it is proved he did—that he might procure a peace with England, by removing the obstacles to the Union, he certainly had influence enough over the young Pretender and his mother, who were dependent upon him for their bread, to make them order the Duke of Hamilton “to forbear giving any further opposition to the Union.”* Hamilton, however, boasted some consanguinity with the Stuarts, and it is hinted that he indulged in a sort of forlorn hope of being one day King of Scotland. “The Duke of Hamilton,” says Hooke, “wanted them not to think of the King of England (the Pretender), by persuading them that the King of France neither had an inclination nor an ability to assist that prince; and, the despair of the people augmenting every day, the duke might flatter himself that they would at length address themselves to him.” Hooke and his colleagues, the two Morays, dividing the country between them into districts, travelled over nearly the whole of Scotland; and, if we may credit the colonel, they everywhere found furious Jacobites. Hamilton pressed him to go to Edinburgh, but he thought that too rash a step, and he satisfied himself with learning the duke’s intentions through Hall the priest. Hall asked him if the King of France would not grant 10,000 men? The colonel answered, No; and that he did not believe the Scots could be so unreasonable as to ask them. “However, that be,” replied the priest, “the Duke of Hamilton believes that it is the least that can be asked.” Hooke said that 5000 Frenchmen would be enough, and that, perhaps, after examining everything, it would be found that the Scots had no need of any foreign troops. According to the colonel, Hamilton behaved with great caution, avoiding everything that might commit him. The duke would not go out to meet him as he proposed. Hall, the priest, excused this by saying that his grace had had “twenty-nine fits of the fever;” but the colonel was incredulous as to the existence of any malady. Hamilton begged to be excused answering the letter of the King of France and the letter of the King of England, saying that he would do himself that honour by some other opportunity when he had recovered his strength. His grace assured the agent that he would concur in all reasonable measures, but was of opinion that the King of England ought not to risk himself without a considerable body of French troops. In concluding the last of his messages, which were all sent by word of mouth, he wished Hooke a good voyage back to France. Upon this, as the least and most that he could do, the colonel dropped all intercourse with the duke. The other Jacobite lords and the Presbyterian lairds continued

* Like all state intrigues, wherein several parties with different interests are concerned, this present one presents numerous difficulties and seeming contradictions, made still more puzzling by sudden changes of intention on the part of the courts of Versailles and St. Germain. In the month of February a declaration of war was delivered to Hooke in the name of “James the Eighth, by the grace of God King of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland.” In this paper the Pretender, after expressing his firm resolution to repair to Scotland as soon as the country should have declared for him, impowers, authorises, and requires all his loving subjects to assemble in arms, to seize the government and all forts and castles, to use all acts of hostility against those who should traitorously presume to oppose his authority, &c. And, together with this declaration, Hooke received instructions, apparently written by Lord Middleton, the Pretender’s head man, which were entirely in a warlike tone, with this qualification, however, that he was not to publish the declaration, nor attempt to levy war, except the Scots were quite ready to take the field. But on the 11th of March Middleton wrote from St. Germain to tell Hooke, who was then in Scotland, that it was not Louis’s intention that the Scots should stir, though ever so much inclined to it, till the treaty was finished.

to deliberate with him about arms, gunpowder, and money. As to troops, Hooke urged "that a body of foreigners would be of more detriment than service; that foreigners were not used to live upon so little as the Scots; that they did not understand their language, were not of their religion—that it would have the air of a conquest, especially among the English, which opinion would hinder their friends in England from joining them, and even influence them, perhaps, to join the other side." He represented to them that it would be easy for the Scots at this moment to make themselves masters, not only of Scotland, but also of England, as there was not a single fortified city in the two kingdoms except Portsmouth, a place of little importance; and as there were actually hardly any troops either in England or Ireland to oppose their progress. He alluded to the romantic exploits of Dundee; but fortunately for Scotland and for England there was no Dundee among his auditors. The lords and the lairds still insisted upon having a body of foreign troops; and in the end Hooke returned to France with a fair copy of a memorial to King Louis XIV.* Hooke also got letters from Lord Stormont, Lord Drummond, the Earl of Panmuir, the Duke of Gordon, the Earl of Errol, and some others, who all expressed their anxiety for the arrival of the Pretender with French troops and French money.† Most of these letters are dated in the month of May of the present year 1707, or about two months after the treaty of the Union was fully ratified by the English parliament. Hooke also gives a letter which he says was sent at the same time to the Pretender by the Duke of Hamilton, who, if he had forwarded the Union, in obedience to the instructions of the courts of St. Germain and Versailles, and in order to promote a peace with France, must have been disconcerted, like all the rest engaged in that scheme, by seeing England and her allies persevering in the war. In this letter Hamilton says, or is made to say, that he had always flattered himself that Lord Godolphin meant well (that is, that he still favoured the exiled house of Stuart, with whom he certainly corresponded); yet he had seen that Godolphin had been for the Union more than could be thought; that he knew, however, though perhaps Godolphin did not, that the Whigs in England had resolved upon that minister's ruin; and that Lord Marlborough had been as zealous as Godolphin for this Union, which would cause the ruin of all the royal family. "It is no longer time," says the duke, "to speak of things past, but if I had only had twenty thousand pounds sterling the Union would have been rejected!" Hooke had promised great things, but was not able to do even little things: a circumstance sufficiently accounted for by the perilous state of France this year.

* Hooke says that the first to sign the memorial was Lord Stormont. The other signatures were those of Lords Errol, Panmuir, Kinnaird, and Drummond, of James Ogilvie, N. Moray, N. Keith, Thomas Fotheringham, and Alexander Innes. Not one of these names, except that of Errol, the hereditary lord high constable, is a first name; but Hooke says that N. Keith, or the Laird of Keith, signed for the great Marshal of Scotland, his cousin, who was unable to travel to sign himself, on account of sickness, but who promised to be one of the first to join the Pretender upon his arrival, and to place at his disposal eight field-pieces and two battering cannon, which were in his castle of Dumottar. The agent further says that Errol signed not only for himself but also for the Earls of Caithness, Eglington, Aberdeen, and Buchan, for the Lord Saltoun, and for the shires of Aberdeen and Mearns. This could not have been very satisfactory to the French court, who had instructed Hooke "to get the writing signed by all the principal men of the country." "They (the memorialists) directed me," says Hooke, "to represent that the French as a nation loved in Scotland as they are hated in England; that the Scots retain a pleasing remembrance of their ancient alliances; that they still preserve several French idioms and turns of expression, which are not used in England; that France is therefore always dear to them; and that they promised themselves the deliverance of their country, and the restoration of their king, under his majesty King Louis's protection."

† If Colonel Hooke had promised them any great sums he had exceeded his instructions. The French minister had expressly told him to be careful about money matters, as coin was scarce in France. "You may give them assurances," says Louis's minister, "of his majesty's sincere desire to send them the succours which may be necessary; but his majesty recommends, in a very particular manner, to Mr. Hooke, not to engage him in expenses which those he is obliged to lay out elsewhere will not allow him to support, nor to give them any room to hope for more than he can furnish."—Instructions from M. de Chamillart to Colonel Hooke, in Macpherson. If Hooke had had a large supply of cash it is very probable that the returning Stuart loyalty would have been greatly quickened, and that many more lords would have signed the memorial which he carried back to France with him. But it appears that he was almost pennyless, and had to look, with microscopic eyes, for money in a country which had never yet abounded with that commodity.

In the month of August, the Duke of Gordon wrote to M. de Chamillart, minister and secretary of state, expressing consternation at not hearing from France, and entreating to know what the Scots might hope for from that quarter. "Secrecy," says his grace, "is necessary in great affairs; but too much mystery ruins all. May we know at least whether we shall be assisted or not? The Duke of Hamilton now begins to espouse our interests heartily." A few days after the Laird of Kersland, designated as chief of the Presbyterians in the five shires of the south-west, wrote to Chamillart that all was ready there. "But," says the laird, "if the succours do not come soon, or at least if we are not sure of being assisted within a limited time, all will go to confusion. The people complain that they have been often made to hope, without any effect. I will still answer for keeping everything ready some time longer, provided I am sure of the succours; but it would not be just that I should lose my fortune for my good will. . . . We are all convinced, that the only way to save Scotland is to restore our king. . . . The Union is so universally detested, that it has changed the hearts of the greatest enemies of the king. I should not wonder if this change should not be easily believed in France; for I am surprised at it myself, and yet it is true. . . . Once more, do not lose time, for if you do you lose everything." And on the 23rd of August, the Duchess of Gordon wrote in an agony of impatience to Chamillart for the Pretender. "For God's sake," says this feverish partisan, whose family and estates were in jeopardy, "what are you thinking of? Is it possible that, after having ventured all to show our zeal, we have neither assistance nor answer? All is lost for want of knowing what measures ought to be taken. Several of the greatest partisans of the Union acknowledge their error and come over to us. If we are left in the uncertainty we are now in, the people will grow cool. The chieftains will fear for themselves when they find they are despised, and will make their peace not to have a halter about their necks. Give me but a positive promise, and all will go well. The chieftains will then find no difficulty in keeping everything ready against the arrival of the succours; but our hearts are sunk by this continued uncertainty. Come when you please, and to what port you please, you will be well received; but if you do not come soon the party will be broken, and it will be too late.*

But the Pretender, a youth of nineteen, would have been of little use without the French succour, and this Louis or his ministers—who now frequently acted upon plans of their own in opposition to the wishes of the grand monarque—hesitated to furnish. So early as the 27th of July, Middleton had written a most urgent letter to M. de Chamillart. "The king, my master," says the earl, "has commanded me to tell you that Mr. Hooke has been here now for seven days. . . . I do not pretend to trouble you with tales of antiquity, but to remark what we ourselves see. What embarrassments have not the Hungarians given to the emperor? Who would have believed that a few peasants in the Cevennes, without any succours, could have occupied so many regular troops commanded by marshals of France, for three years? . . . Mr. Hooke has informed us of the good disposition of the Scots, whose fidelity and capacity are known to you. They demand their king, who wishes ardently to join them. If the affairs of the king (of France) are urgent here, that pleads strongly for the project in Scotland. If a small part of the money and of the troops which are employed here would finish the business there, it must be wrong to hesitate.†" But Chamillart continued to hesitate nevertheless, and nothing was done for some months, which were months of agony to the few Scottish lords and gentlemen that had fairly committed themselves. The House of Hanover, jealous of everything that threatened its succession, obtained, by some unknown means, a glimpse of these intrigues, which, perhaps, were still better known to Godolphin, to Harley, and to Queen Anne herself.

The first parliament of Great Britain met on the 23rd of October (1707). It had been proposed that the English parliament sitting when the Union was completed should be dissolved, so that the Scottish members that were to make up the parliament of Great Britain should be associated with a new House; but the Whig ministers, who had a staunch majority, were of course unwilling to run the chances of a new election, more particularly at a moment when the nation was in an ill humour at our failures this year both by land and sea, and they overruled the proposition. "It was generally thought," says Burnet, "that, though this was a parliament that had now sat two years, yet it was a new parliament, by reason it had been let fall, and was revived by a proclamation; and the consequence of this was, that those who had got places were to go to a new election. Others maintained, that it could not be a new parliament, since it was not summoned by a new writ, but by virtue of a clause in an act of parliament. The Duke of Marlborough, upon his coming over, prevailed to have it yielded to be a new parliament, though Harley was for maintaining it to be an old parliament. The House of Commons chose the same speaker (Mr. Smith) over again, and all the usual forms in the first beginning of a new parliament were observed." The queen's speech was not so confident as it had been the year before—"the year of wonders;" but still it was far from being desponding. If the attempt upon Toulon had not wholly its desired effect, it had nevertheless been attended with great and obvious advantages to the common cause of the allies; if the French had gained ground upon us in Spain, they had been wholly driven out of Italy, "by which it would be more easy for all the allies to join their assistance next year, for enabling the King of Spain to recover his affairs in that kingdom, and reduce the whole Spanish monarchy to his obedience." The "weakness and ill posture of affairs upon the Rhine" was frankly admitted; but her majesty hinted that all this would be fully remedied next campaign, "by the conduct and authority of the Elector of Hanover, whose reasonable acceptance of that command had strengthened and obliged the whole confederacy." It would be necessary, she said, to augment the supplies. But the subject of the recent Union occupied as much room as the war in this speech. In a work so great and so new in its kind, it was impossible but that some doubts and difficulties should have arisen; but it was hoped that these had been so far overcome as to have defeated "the designs of those who would have made use of that handle to foment disturbances." The Commons, in their address, thankfully acknowledged the divine goodness in making her majesty the glorious instrument of uniting the two kingdoms,—adding that they would embrace all opportunities of improving this happy union so as to make this island of Great Britain a terror to her enemies; and they assured her that the ill success of her arms the last campaign should not discourage them from making their utmost efforts for recovering the whole Spanish monarchy. But the Lords were in a very different humour. When it was proposed to vote the usual address of thanks, the opposition carried a vote for a previous inquiry by a committee of the whole House, into the state of the nation. In the course of the debate our failures at sea, and the mismanagement of the admiralty, at the head of which the queen's husband had been slumbering, were severely commented upon. Petitions were read from the sheriffs and merchants of London, complaining of the great losses at sea, and of the ruin of our foreign trade for want of cruisers and proper convoys. "The French," said Lord Haversham, "have been allowed to take our ships, as the Dutch take herings, by shoals, upon our coasts; nor has the royal navy itself escaped." The Dutch, he said, were carrying on an open and flourishing trade at our expence, trading even with the common enemy. It is said that Lord Somers and Lord Wharton encouraged these heats in order to remove the Prince of Denmark from the admiralty, and to drive Harley and St. John from office; while Rochester and Buckingham voted for the inquiry in order to ruin Marlborough, Godolphin, and their Whig allies or dependents in the cabinet. Yet Lord Haversham affected to believe that the navy was safer in the hands of the prince than in any man's. The Commons, meanwhile, voted liberal supplies, and adopted various resolutions for removing jealousies, religious and political, between the two kingdoms, and for supporting the Union by endearing it to both the contracting parties. Among these resolutions was one, apparently suggested by Somers, that there should be but one privy council, or, in other words, that the privy council in Scotland, which had been but too often little better than a Star Chamber, should be put down. As the Scots, or too many of them, were now clinging to curses as well as to blessings, provided only that they were old and Scottish, and had been a part of their separate political status, they complained of this, notwithstanding the notoriety of the fact that they had been tyrannised over, imprisoned, tortured by this privy council, as Jews and Moors and heretics were in Spain by the Inquisition. A bill, however, was brought in and passed, and that old tyranny, after a noble speech by Somers, was abolished.* The inquiries about the admiralty, the navy, and the nation came to nothing, as the Tories saw that in seconding them they must incense the queen by displacing her husband, and also lose the services of Harley and St. John, who were both intriguing in their favour. On the 18th of December the queen went down to the House to give the assent to the land-tax and to some other bills; and on the morrow the Lords, somewhat of the latest, presented their address of thanks, in which they applauded her majesty's great spirit and resolution in carrying on the war, and expressed their own great zeal for preventing everything likely to disturb the Union. This, however, did not prevent a loud debate in the Upper House; and on that same day (the 19th) their lordships took up the question of the war in Spain, and the shameful failure which had there followed the brilliant achievements of Peterborough. Many of the Tories did not hesitate to say that Peterborough was a greater general than Marlborough; both parties applauded his conduct; but a motion for giving that earl the thanks of the House was resolutely opposed by the Whigs and by all the present friends of the hero of Blenheim. It was represented by the old Tory, Nottingham, and others, that Spain was now abandoned to the enemy; but their opponents replied that measures were already concerted for sending powerful succours to King Charles. On the 23rd of December the Lords joined the Commons in an address, wherein it was stated again that the reducing the whole Spanish monarchy to the obedience of the house of Austria was the only proper ground for a peace; and that no peace could be honourable or safe, if Spain the West Indies, or any part whatsoever of the Spanish monarchy were suffered to remain under the power of the House of Bourbon. The address, however, besought her majesty to make the most pressing instances to the emperor for succour to his brother the King of Spain, for 20,000 imperialists to be put under the command of the Duke of Savoy, and for strengthening the army upon the Rhine, now happily commanded "by that wise and valiant prince the Elector of Hanover."

† Louis was now old and much broken, both in health and spirit. His time was chiefly passed with Madame de Maintenon, his mistress, who had become a sort of saint, and with his confessor and other priests. It is as certain as it was natural that the French ministers only regarded the interests of the Pretender inasmuch as they were subservient to their own. Macpherson remarks justly—"Louis XIV. himself seems at times to have been sincere in his professions to the excluded family. His ministers, however, justly judging that they could have only the uncertain gratitude of the person whom they should serve for the expense and hazard of an expedition, were extremely backward in making any effectual efforts for invading Britain. Besides, it was natural for them, considering their own attachment to monarchy, to suppose, that they derived great advantage from having in their hands the person whom they supposed to have an hereditary right to the British crown. The attempts, therefore, which were from time to time made for invading this island, were rather intended to engage the nation in a civil war, than to contribute effectually to restore the family of Stuart. The languor and caution of its court increased with the misfortunes of France in the present war."

A. D. 1708.—Though Harley had worked in the dark, and though Bolingbroke had practised a duplicity rarely excelled by any scoundrel of genius, they were by this time suspected and hated or dreaded by their Whig colleagues. With all their art, Harley and St. John would have failed in making any impression upon the queen but for a false step of the Duchess of Marlborough. Some few years before this the duchess, who was rich enough to have served her in another way, brought into court a poor cousin—Abigail Hill*—

* Minutes of Somers's speech in the House of Lords on the bill for abolishing the privy council of Scotland are preserved in the Hardwicke State Papers. His arguments were many and strong. The following are a few of them:—

"The Union cannot be at all perfect while two political administrations subsist, the one in England, the other in Scotland.

"The advantage of Scotland is to have the same easy access to the prince as the English; to be under the immediate personal care of the prince, and not to owe their protection and countenance to any subordinate institution.

"Worse state (for Scotland) after the Union if a distinct administration continue—now no parliament there to resort to.

"This privy council is not a constitution of state and policy, but, in effect, a sovereign court of justice, to see the laws effectually executed, and for preservation of the public peace. . . . I have heard much of the fitness of such a council for Scotland; but England would never agree with these courts that are mixed of state and justice. Policy soon gets the better of justice. We had a privy council in England with great and mixed powers. We suffered under it long and much. All the rolls of parliament are full of complaints and remedies; but none of them effectual till King Charles the First's time. The Star Chamber was but a spawn out of our council, and was called so only because it sat in the usual council chamber. It was set up as a formal court in the 3 Hen. VII., in very soft words; to punish great riots; to restrain offenders too big for ordinary justice; or, in the modern phrase, to preserve the public peace: but in a little time it made this nation tremble. The privy council came at last to make laws by proclamation; and the Star Chamber ruined those that would not obey. At last they fell together, but not without endangering the kingdom."

* Abigail Hill, or Mrs. Masham, was the daughter of one Hill, a merchant in the city, by a sister of my father. Our grandfather, Sir John Jonyas, had two-and-twenty children, by which means the estate of the family came to be divided into very small parcels. Mrs. Hill had only 500l. to her portion. Her husband lived very well, as whose father, Mr. Hill, once a merchant in the city, was nearly related to Mr. Secretary Harley. The duchess got this Abigail appointed bedchamber-woman to Anne, then only Princess of Denmark, and her younger sister settled as the Duke of Gloucester's laundress—"which," says the duchess, "was a good enough provision for her."* The two young ladies had two poor brothers;—the elder of these was put into a snug place in the Custom House, and the younger, after being clothed and put to school at St. Alban's by his great relative, was made page to the Prince of Denmark, groom of the bedchamber to the Duke of Gloucester, aide-de-camp to Marlborough, and colonel of a regiment.† Everything went on smoothly till the summer of 1707, when the duchess, who always treated her with great humeur, learned that her cousin Abigail was privately married to Mr. Masham, and was in the habit of being closeted with the queen without her grace's consent. Convinced that there was "some mystery," the duchess set herself "to inquire as particularly" as she could into it. "And," says her grace, "in less than a week's time I discovered that my cousin was become an absolute favourite; that the queen herself had been present at her marriage in Dr. Arbuthnot's lodgings, at which time her majesty had called for a round sum out of the privy purse; that Mrs. Masham came often to the queen when the prince was asleep, and was generally two hours every day in private with her: and I like-

I have been told, till, turning projector, he brought ruin upon himself and his family. But as this was long before I was born, I never knew there were such people in the world, till after the Princess Anne was married, and when she lived at the Cock-pit; at which time an acquaintance of mine came to me and said, she believed I did not know that I had relations who were in want, and she gave me an account of them. When she had finished her story, I gave her out of my purse ten guineas for their present relief, saying I would do what I could for them. Afterwards I sent Mrs. Hill more money, and saw her. She told me that her husband was the same relation to Mr. Harley as she was to me, but that he had never done anything for her. (The proud duchess, we observe, never calls her father's retained sister by the name of aunt.) I think Mrs. Masham's father and mother did not live long after this. They left four children, two sons and two daughters. The elder daughter, Abigail, afterwards Mrs. Masham, was a grown woman. I took her first to St. Alban's, where she lived with me and my children, and I treated her with as great kindness as if she had been my sister.—An Account of the Conduct of the Dowager Duchess of Marlborough, &c.

* "And when the Duke of Gloucester died, I obtained for her a pension of 2000*l.* a-year, which I paid her out of the privy purse. And in some time after, I asked the queen's leave to buy her an annuity out of some of the funds," &c.—Ibid.

† This poor cousin turned out a very poor soldier. "Jack Hill (whom the botchmen afterwards called honest Jack) was a tall boy, whom I clothed (for he was all in rags), and put to school at St. Alban's, to one Mr. James, who had been an usher under Dr. Busby, of Westminster; and whenever I went to St. Alban's, I sent for him, and was as kind to him as if he had been my own child. After he had learned what he could there, a vacancy happening of page of honour to the Prince of Denmark, his highness was pleased, at my request, to take him. I afterwards got my Lord Marlborough to make him groom of the bedchamber to the Duke of Gloucester: and though my lord always said that Jack Hill was good for nothing, yet, to oblige me, he made him his aide-de-camp, and afterwards gave him a regiment. But it was his sister's interest that raised Jack to be a general, and to command in that ever-memorable expedition to Quebec. I had no share in getting him those honours. To finish what I have to say upon this subject: when Mr. Harley thought it useful to attack the Duke of Marlborough in parliament, this Quebec general, this honest Jack Hill, this once ragged boy, whom I clothed, happening to be sick in bed, was nevertheless persuaded by his sister to get up, wrap himself in warmer clothes than those I had given him, and go to the House and vote against the duke! I may here add, that even the husband of Mrs. Masham had several obligations to me. It was at my instance that he was brought into court, first made a page, then an equerry, and afterward groom of the bedchamber to the prince; for all which he himself had thanked me, as for favours procured by my means."

wise then discovered, beyond all dispute, Mr. Harley's correspondence and interest at court by means of this woman." The duchess says she was struck with astonishment at such an instance of ingratitude. No doubt she might have added that she was struck also with dismay, for she must have known better than any one else the character of her royal mistress, of whom a great writer said, with perfect justice, that she "had not a stock of amity to serve above one object at a time."* Besides, her grace was now put in mind of several suspicious circumstances. She says herself, "particularly I remembered that a long while before this, being with the queen (to whom I had gone very privately by a secret passage from my lodgings to the bed-chamber), on a sudden this woman, not knowing I was there, came in with the boldest and gayest air possible, but upon the sight of me stopped, and immediately changing her manner, and making a most solemn curtsey, said, 'Did your majesty ring?' and then went out again. This singular behaviour needed no interpreter now to make it understood." The duchess hastened to communicate these great discoveries to her husband; and the lord-general left off looking after the French, in order to warn his wife to look well after Mrs. Masham and the dangerous Mr. Harley. "If you are sure," says Marlborough, "that Mrs. Masham speaks of business to the queen, I should think you might, with some caution, tell her of it, which would do good; for she certainly must be grateful, and will mind what you say." These words surprisè us in such a man! Marlborough ought to have remembered how very slight the tie of gratitude had been upon himself, and how generally unknown such a homely virtue was at the court. He ought also to have been aware that it was his own wife's speaking of business to the queen that had moulded the government to his wishes, that had done everything for him, and that if any other lady once got the same influence over Anne the game of the Marlboroughs was up. Sarah Jennings, to do her justice, had less meanness and more spirit than any of her court contemporaries, male or female: she openly taxed her cousin Abigail with practising with the queen to undermine her; and Mrs. Abigail, after a few excuses and evasions, finding herself backed by the queen, who had at last summoned courage to meet the frowns of the haughty duchess, set her at defiance. From this moment her grace saw clearly the end of all this, and she was not long in getting notice of Mr. Harley's practices both within doors and without. "He was endeavouring," she says, "to create in the Whigs jealousies of Lord Godolphin and Lord Marlborough, and at the same time assuring the Tories that they might depend upon the queen's inward affection to them; and that it was wholly owing to those two great lords that the Tories were not still possessed of all the places and employments. His design was to ruin the Whigs, by disuniting them from the ministry, and so pave the way for the Tories to rise again, whom he thought to unite in himself, as their head, after he had made it impossible for them to think of a reconciliation with the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Godolphin. But, that this able politician might in all things act suitably to his parts and genius, he, at the same time that he was employed in the manner that I have related, was endeavouring to blind the eyes of those whose destruction he aimed at by the most elaborate compliments, and the most nauseous professions of affection and duty.* The lord-treasurer Godolphin was as much alarmed as the lord-general, and, being upon the spot, he had almost daily consultations with the duchess, who appears to have conceived a momentary hope of brow-beating the weak and timid, though obstinate, queen, and of throwing Mrs. Masham back into the dirt, which she boasted she had raised her from. At first Anne flinched, and, both in conversation and writing, solemnly denied the charges against Mrs. Masham; and she continued to style herself Mrs. Freeman's (i.e. the duchess's) "poor, unfortunate, but ever faithful, Mrs. Morley." But, by degrees, the queen's new infatuation for Abigail, and the assurances she received in secret from Mr. Harley, who told her that he would take her out of the chains and thralldom of the Marlboroughs, and make her a queen indeed, infused a little more firmness into this singularly weak and essentially vulgar royal mind;—her civilities became mockeries and masks; her expressions of friendship, and devotion, and submission, mere sarcasms or double ententes. The Tories, who well knew that the high-church feeling of Anne still continued an absolute passion, threw two high-church persons in her way by means of Harley; and this widened the breach, and set Marlborough and Godolphin to coerce the queen on the point where even in their greatest favour they had found her difficult to manage. The bishopric of Chester became vacant by the death of Dr. Stratford, and the queen secretly engaged to give it to Sir William Dawes, an aspiring man, who aimed at becoming a head of the Tory party, though he always professed a strong attachment to the Protestant succession, calling himself (what the Whigs asserted was a contradiction in terms) a Hanoverian Tory. Godolphin and Marlborough scarcely knew of this secret promise until it was performed. Nearly at the same time Dr. Blackhall, who was as much a high Tory as Dawes, obtained the see of Exeter. The Whig divines, who had expected these promotions, and who had, indeed, made sure of them under a Whig cabinet, did not bear their disappointment either with philosophical calmness or Christian moderation; and the whole Whig party were astonished and incensed. Another appointment that fell vacant about the same time,—the Regius Professorship of Divinity at Oxford,—the queen had also promised to a high Tory candidate, Dr. Smalridge, though Dr. Potter (afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury) was recommended to the place by Marlborough and the ministers. Though the bishoprics were gone, Marlborough hoped to secure the Regius Professorship for Potter, who was much esteemed for his learning as well as for his liberal principles in politics, and who appears to have received positive assurances from Godolphin, Sunderland, and Marlborough, that he should have the appointment. The lord-general wrote repeatedly to his wife and to the queen. He also wrote to Godolphin, expressing his alarm at seeing that "Mrs. Morley's (the queen's) prejudice to some people was unalterable—that she would be disposing of preferments to such as would tear to pieces her friends and servants." The clerical nature of the dispute seems to have affected the great general's style, for in this letter he talks unctuously about reconciling himself to God, and withdrawing from court as well as from camp as soon as may be. In the end Anne was prevailed upon to let Potter have the professorship. But, notwithstanding, the Tories now clearly saw that their turn was coming again, that the honours and emoluments of office were gradually getting within their grasp. Hopelessly weakened and crippled by the Duchess of Marlborough's loss of her ascendancy over the queen,—disparaged in the eyes of the public,

* The Tory writers of the time do not pretend to deny that the secretary was enjoying the general, and undermining him all the time,—that Harley was constantly going up the back-stairs under the escort of his cousin Abigail; but they pretend that this clandestine conduct was absolutely necessary to get at the queen's ear at all, in order to warn her of her danger, and to rescue her from the thralldom in which they say she had been held for years. Nor do they attempt to rescue the character of Mrs. Masham, or disprove the story told of her by her cousin the duchess. On the contrary, they seem generally to admit that Abigail was a worthless, ungrateful woman; but then she was, and could be, so very useful. The author (understood to be Ralph, the Historian) of "The Other Side of the Question; or, An Attempt to Rescue the Characters of the Two Royal Sisters, Q. Mary and Q. Anne," which was published in answer to the duchess's Account of her Conduct, says that it was quite natural a person selfishly employed for unworthy purposes should act in an unworthy manner to her employer,—that it was neither through charity nor the bond of relationship that the duchess had provided for her cousin at court,—that it was the regular plan of the faction "to exclude the queen from access by plotting against her name but such as were the creatures of the Marlborough family." "Of this number," adds the writer, "was Mrs. Masham, and to answer this very purpose was she preferred, though the affair is set forth in so different a light by your grace: it was impossible for you to be always upon duty; it was necessary for the queen to be always observed; Mrs. Masham you had taken out of the dust; and you was not, it seems, enough acquainted with yourself to reflect or apprehend, that the creature would ever presume to rival its maker. It was not, therefore, the effects of your confidence in Mrs. Masham, but the presumption of your own strength and importance, lulled you in security so long." If all this be true (and it may be), it only adds a few more dark shades to a very disgusting picture. Ralph, or whomever wrote "The Other Side of the Question," subjoins:—"The grand inference your grace draws is, that you were betrayed. But the inferences of the world are rather such as these,—That the queen was a captive, and you her quaker,—that she was neither mistress of her power, nor free to express her own inclinations—that she was so far overruled, by a length of oppression, as to dread the very approach of her turncoats,—that she was forced to maintain herself by stealth,—and that she did not venture upon a contest with your grace, even to set herself free from your insupportable tyranny. A situation so terrible, that no private person would for any consideration submit to it; and, consequently, what a sovereign might justly endeavour, at almost any rate, to be delivered from."

* In "The Other Side of the Question" the duchess is trounced with over-estimating her weight and importance. "One of the few French noblemen whose curiosity leads them to visit Great Britain thought himself obliged, among the remarkable of the island, to pay a visit to your grace; on which occasion, to be exceedingly polite, he kept up the spirit of the conversation with a florid detail of the wonders performed by the Duke of Marlborough; to which your grace seemed to listen at first with a very sensible pleasure; but who saw that they could no longer appoint in the church the men of their choice,—the members of the cabinet were still further prostrated by divisions and jealousies among themselves. The Marquess of Halifax, the trust Whig of the lot after Somers and Cowper, had been left in the inferior post of auditor of the Exchequer, or gratified only with embassies to foreign courts—those convenient resources of ministers who wish to silence and keep at a distance any troublesome colleague or dangerous rival. Halifax considered that he was treated with great contempt or unkindness; and he very correctly attributed this treatment to the Duke of Marlborough, who always disliked him. Nor was this the only jarring chord: Marlborough's own brother, Admiral Churchill, who mismanaged the admiralty under the Prince of Denmark, remained an incurable and a furious Tory, and lost no opportunity of irritating the queen more and more against the Whigs. All these embarrassments had tended to hamper and to distract the attention of the duke during the whole of last year's campaign, and they grew rather than decreased after his return to England and the opening of this present session of parliament. It is made most evident by his own letters that Marlborough at one moment thought seriously of abandoning all his Whig colleagues together, and of making common cause with that hated Harley who was rising with his cousin Abigail. This course would have been no departure from the great system of his life—always to side with the strongest:—in politics he seems never to have known a high or generous feeling;—and it appears clearly that this course he would have taken if he could have brought himself to trust Harley, or to believe that the Whigs could be faced without danger to his own fame and interests. He advised his wife to be cautious and circumspect, mild and gentle, and to endea-

your to recover the queen's good graces by respectful and submissive behaviour: but the proud and fiery Sarah was by nature incapable of following this advice, and, moreover, she deemed that it would be useless if put in practice. She entertained a most sovereign contempt of her sovereign: after a close and familiar acquaintance, which had lasted forty years, or from the childhood of both of them, she fancied that she knew Anne better than any one else, and that her's was a mind rather to be subdued and terrified by the boldness of a superior intellect, than to be won back by submission and tears. Anne, we believe, was really what the duchess took her for; but there was one little quality which her grace had underrated, and the mighty strength of which she did not discover till it was too late;—this was obstinacy—a dogged, sullen obstinacy—which the queen had inherited from her father (perhaps also from her mother; for the Hydes, or at least their great maker, Chancellor Clarendon, were not deficient in obstinacy), and which in her, as in him, sometimes took the aspect of firmness and decision. More fortunate than her sire, Anne's obstinacy did certainly at times keep her right, or, at least, out of danger. During the Christmas holidays things came to a crisis between her and the duchess. "I went," says her grace, "to pay my respects to the queen in the holidays, and, before I went in, I learnt from the page that Mrs. Masham was just then sent for. The moment I saw her majesty I plainly perceived she was very uneasy. She stood all the while I was with her, and looked as coldly upon me as if her intention was that I should no longer doubt of my loss of her affection. Upon observing what reception I had, I said I was very sorry I had happened to come so unseasonably. I was making my curtsy to go away, when the queen, with a great deal of disorder in her face, and without speaking one word, took me by the hand: and when, thereupon, I stooped to kiss hers, she took me up with a very cold embrace, and then, without one kind word, let me go. So strange a treatment of me, after my long and faithful services, and after such repeated assurances from her majesty of an unalterable affection, made me think that I ought, in justice to myself, as well as in regard to my mistress's interest, to write to her in the plainest and sincerest manner possible, and expostulate with her upon her change to me, and upon the new counsels by which she seemed to be wholly governed." The letter she wrote was presented to the queen by the Duke of Marlborough or by Lord Godolphin,—at the distance of time when her grace wrote or dictated the account of her conduct she forgot which,—and it had the effect of startling the queen and of making her write an answer, "in which she very much softened what had passed."

While Anne was putting on fresh smiles for the duchess, and for Marlborough and his Whig colleagues, the plotting Harley almost got his neck into a noose. One William Grog, a clerk in his apprehending, as he went on, that his eloquence was like to be confined to the duke only, the spirit which had ever possessed you could not help bursting out — 'All this is true, sir: but you forget that all this, and much more, is owing to me.' Yet, if the proud, and then old, duchess really said this, she said not a word more than what was true: we may be confirmed in our opinion of her arrogance, but we cannot doubt her veracity. It was owing to her that the queen was a queen at all (as, but for her agency, Anne, in all probability, would, in the critical moment of the Revolution, have adhered to her father): it was owing to her that Marlborough had been intrusted with the supreme command of the armies, and that the Whig cabinet which enabled him to do such great things had an existence:—it was owing to her that the lord-general in the field was better supplied than ever English general had been before, and that the resources and the diplomacy of the country were put almost exclusively into his hands. Besides, in all things except in plans of campaigns and battles, the intellect of the duchess was superior to that of the duke, who never did anything without consulting with her, and who evidently thought she could do everything, except, perhaps, charge at the head of a regiment. Nay, even Godolphin, the most adroit of politicians,—the most experienced statesman or man of business of the day,—hardly ever took a step without previously deliberating with Sarah. The duchess was, in fact, a wonderful woman. None of the admiration which has been recently lavished upon her great abilities is ungrounded, except her genius as a letter-writer. She has been compared in this respect to Lady Mary Wortley Montague and Horace Walpole; whereas, it appears to us she could never write, of herself, a grammatical sentence. We form our opinion upon what are really her own letters. The letters and the papers contained in her book were all remodelled and dressed up by the person (a professed literary man) by whom the narrative itself, derived from her notes, was put into a shape fit for the press, and who is said to have been Hoake, the author of the Roman History.

office, was detected in a traitorous correspondence with Chamillart, the French minister: a letter of his writing was intercepted and thrown in his face; he was committed, arraigned, pleaded guilty, and was hanged for high treason. While Whig writers, both at the time and afterwards, assert that Harley, the secretary, was as guilty as his poor clerk, the Tories boldly and broadly maintain that it was Harley himself who detected Greg in his machinations,—that it was he that hurried on the trial and conviction,—and that the Whigs and his enemies in the cabinet (the Marlboroughs, the Godolphins, the Sunderlands) practised upon poor Greg in prison, and promised to bring him off unscathed if he would only accuse his principal, the obnoxious Harley. “Seven lords,” says a Tory organ, “were deputed from that House to examine the clerk in prison, and ’tis remarkable that they were all of one side. . . . But the secretary’s innocence was amplified, when the clerk (Greg), at his execution, delivered a paper to the ordinary of Newgate, declaring that his master was wholly ignorant of his treasonable correspondence till he made the discovery himself; and he thanked God that he gave him the grace not to do so vile an action for the saving of his own life, as some would have put him upon.”* When we remember how Marlborough hounded Sir John Fenwick to death, we confess, that, for our parts, we can believe him capable even of these atrocious practices; and so low is our estimate of the political morality, whether Whig or Tory, of the time, that we have no difficulty in believing that other men, in their hatred of Harley, and in their dread of losing their places, might have joined in the nefarious transaction. But we are bound to observe that the only proof, that is, the paper which Greg is said to have delivered to the ordinary, is a very doubtful kind of document, which was not produced until some time after the execution, and, apparently, not till Harley was completely the lord of the ascendant, and the Whig cabinet broken, cast down, and made the object of nearly every species of calumny.† The immediate effect of the detection and execution of Greg was, however, very mischievous to Harley. It seemed to calm and candid minds, that, at the very least he must be indolent and incapable, and that great dangers must spring from having a secretary of state that could give employment and confidence to such clerks. According to Burnet, Greg told the lords appointed to examine him, that he had but newly begun the business of betraying secrets to the enemy for money,—“that all the papers of state lay so carelessly about the office, that every one belonging to it, even the door-keepers, might have read them all”—and that “Harley’s custom was to come to the office late on post nights, and after he had given his orders, and wrote his letters, he usually went away and left all to be copied out when he was gone.” He also accused the secretary of employing, as spies of his own, a set of smugglers that took pay on both sides of the water, and betrayed all they knew about merchant ships, the ships of war that lay in the Downs, and the like, by which means the French privateers and cruisers were enabled to make so many prizes.

Harley attempted to save himself by coalescing with Somers and Cowper, who, notwithstanding their determined Whiggism, were much respected by the queen, and were still acceptable to her; but those two lords were too honourable to betray their colleagues, and much too honest and far-seeing to unite their political fortunes with so dissembling but so incompetent a statesman as Harley. Still, however, that secretary and Mrs. Masham had a firm hold on the queen, who could hardly be induced to give him his congé. Both Marlborough and Godolphin told her repeatedly, that it was impossible for them to serve her while Mr. Harley was in her confidence. Anne said that they were much mistaken in the gentleman and in their opinion as to the influence he had over her; and so the secretary continued to go up the back-stairs and to sit at the council table. At length the lord-general and the lord-treasurer both declared that they could no longer act with him; and that, if he were not dismissed, they must absent themselves from the council altogether. Still the obstinacy of Anne held out. Marlborough and Godolphin then made good their threat, and absented themselves. When the council next met in the queen’s presence, every member of it was reserved and confused, except Harley, who, with a show of confidence, proposed immediately proceeding to business. But the proud and stiff Duke of Somerset said he did not see how it could be to any purpose, when neither the general nor treasurer was present; and thereupon the council immediately broke up.* This had such an effect

* The Other Side of the Question; or an Attempt to Resene the Characters of the Two Royal Sisters, &c.

† Even according to the author of “The other Side of the Question,” the document was not published at the time. He indeed accounts for the delay, by saying,—“The ordinary was not permitted to publish this paper (as is usual), and so it was suppressed for a time, till care was taken to print it from a copy that had been given to another hand, and then Paul Lorrain got leave to publish it also.” Burnet, who was quite as zealous on the other side, and who can never be relieved from the charge of being a thorough party man, very readily admits that nothing arose out of Greg’s business on which to found a charge against Harley. He says that at his execution “Greg continued to clear all other persons of any accession to his crimes, of which he seemed very sensible, and died much better than he had lived.” But the Whig bishop says not a syllable about the paper delivered to the ordinary of Newgate, or about the foul accusations of the Whig lords contained in it. If such a serious charge had been seriously entertained, it would have believed him to have cleared his friends and his party; and most assuredly we should have heard something of the matter from him. Swift, indeed, brought the charge of subornation; but this was when he had forsaken the Whigs and was trying to rise to the top of the Church by a Tory ladder. Besides, this great wit and penman was a most virulent and unscrupulous libeller—one that could lie with a bold defiance of probabilities and possibilities. When the Duchess of Somerset (the wife of the nobleman who contributed to the dismissal, at this crisis, of his friend Harley, and also of the Godolphin administration in 1710), was, shortly after the latter interference, selected by the Tories for attack, this reverend scandal-monger, in his “Windsor Prophecy,” not satisfied with reproaching her with having red hair, accused her of having conspired at the murder of her former husband!

* Account of the Conduct, &c. Burnet tells the story much in the same way; but he adds that, the queen “would have put all to the hazard, if Harley himself had not apprehended danger, and resolve to lay down.”

upon the queen, that Mr. Harley was dismissed, and a fresh assurance of entire friendship and confidence given to Marlborough and Godolphin. Anne, who with the family obstinacy, had a considerable portion of the duplicity of the Stuarts, seems, for a moment, to have persuaded the Whigs that she bore no animosity, no rancour, when in reality her resentments were condensed into an enduring and most implacable hatred.* Under Harley, but greater than he—far greater both in ability and in boldness—was the famous Mr. St. John, secretary at war, who was turned out and succeeded by Mr. Robert Walpole. This was the beginning of a fierce jealousy and hatred between these two politicians; and ever afterwards it was sufficient for Walpole to be for a measure for St. John to be against it. Harcourt, the attorney-general, another ally or dependent of Harley, went out also. The successor of Harley himself, as secretary of state, was Mr. Henry Boyle, chancellor of the exchequer, who was succeeded in that post by Mr. Smith, the speaker. And presently an event occurred which seemed likely to strengthen the Whig cabinet.

For some time past the Jacobites in Scotland had been assured that their king was really coming; † the English cabinet had been receiving

* The duchess says—"Such a compliance with the ministers seemed to the eyes of the world a very great concession, but was in truth nothing. For it was evident by what followed, that this appearance of giving up Mr. Harley was with his own consent, and by his own advice, who, as long as Mrs. Masham continued in favour, could, under pretence of visiting her, (who was his cousin,) have all the opportunities he could wish for practising upon the passions and credulity of the queen: and the method of corresponding with him had been settled some time before. I was fully apprized of all this; yet I resolved to try, if by being easy and quiet I could regain an influence with her majesty. She had given me some encouragement to hope it. For when, a little before Mr. Harley's dismissal, lord Marlborough resolved to quit the service, and when on that occasion I had with tears (which a tender concern at the thought of parting from her majesty made me shed) represented to her, that if the duke retired, it would be improper, and even impossible for me to stay at court after him, she declared that she could not bear the thought of my leaving her, and that it must never be. And at that time she made me a promise that if ever I should leave her, (which she again said I must never do,) she would bestow my offices among my children."

† Marjorison publishes a set of instructions which was sent over by the Pretender, in the month of February, being brought by Charles Fleming, brother to the Earl of Wigton. The friends addressed were to assure the people that their king was coming with all possible diligence to assert his right and to protect his ancient subjects—that he would put them in possession of their liberties, religion, trade, &c., and that his brother, the most Christian king, would restore to the Scots their ancient privileges in France, and use his best endeavours to have them included in all treaties of peace. These friends were to select a number of the nobility and gentry to seize all suspected persons with their horses, arms, &c. They are also directed "to tell those who are trusted," that upon the first appearance of the French fleet they must proclaim him king wherever they have any interest, raise all the country in arms, seize as many as they can, and hasten to his standard. Moreover, such of his friends "as have had any correspondence in the north of England or in Ireland" were to renew it, by sending some trusty persons to persuade the friends in those parts to take up arms at the same time. They were also to keep a sharp look out for the public moneys, and for the stopping and seizing of all provisions. The eighth article of the instructions ran in these words:—"Those who are trusted, may take their own private methods to renew any correspondence they have had within the forts and garrisons; and to secure, upon the landing, any places of strength fit for magazines. All which is to be considered, with a special regard to the keeping of the secret, it being much safer that several things be omitted, which might be very useful, than that anything be recommended, which may be a means of discovery." This goes to confirm the statements of Hamilton's descendant and of other writers, that all the garrisons in Scotland had been tampered with, that all the regular troops, amounting to about 2000 men, were notoriously disaffected, that Stuart flags had been prepared to hoist over all the ports and castles, that a plan was laid for seizing the money voted by the last English parliament as for the completion for Scotland, and that now lay in Edinburgh Castle, &c.

warnings of great preparations for invasion making on the French coast; and, in the month of March, Anne announced in a speech to parliament that the Pretender was about to invade her dominions. Both Houses voted addresses to her majesty, desiring she would take care of her royal person, and promising to stand by her with their lives and fortunes—mixing these words with broad intimations that they apprehended treachery at home. A suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act at a moment of danger had been resorted to even in the time of the brave King William; and therefore it was no wonder to see that very questionable measure resorted to under the timid Queen Anne. With almost as little ceremony as attended the most common order of council, the Whigs brought in and carried through a bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, by empowering her majesty to secure and detain all persons suspected of conspiring against her person or government. As usual in all seasons of consternation, the Catholics were denounced; "and a proclamation was issued, declaring the Pretender, his accomplices and adherents, traitors and rebels; and for apprehending them; and requiring all popish recusants not to depart above five miles from their dwellings; and banishing papists ten miles from the cities of London and Westminster; and for tendering the oaths to disaffected persons, and taking away their horses and arms; which was put in execution accordingly."* The Duke of Hamilton, who was strongly and justly suspected, and twenty-one other Scottish lords and gentlemen, were arrested forthwith. Troops were marched off for Scotland, and Sir George Byng was sent with such ships as were ready to watch Dunkirk, the port in which the French expedition had been prepared. It consisted of five French ships of the line, and twenty frigates, commanded by Forbin, the best naval officer of Louis, and having on board 5000 land troops. The Pretender, styled by the English Jacobites James III., and by the Scotch James VIII., embarked in royal state: Byng was driven off the port by bad weather; and the French fleet got to sea. But the storm which had sent Byng back to the English coast soon forced Forbin to put back to Dunkirk; and there he and the Pretender lay for several days. During this time Byng collected many more ships, and stretched along the coast from the mouth of the Thames to the head of the Frith of Forth. At the same time a strong squadron was detached, under the command of Admiral Baker, to convoy to Leith the English troops that were at Ostend—it being perfectly well known that the Pretender intended to make for Edinburgh. Forbin had positive instructions to take the greatest possible care of his ships; and, therefore, when he got to sea again, and had run northward to the coast of Fife, he was deterred from entering into the Frith by the sight of Byng's far superior force. On the night of the 13th of March, O. S., after having just given the Pretender a glimpse of the hills of old Scotland, the Frenchman tacked about, and stood away under a press of sail. Byng gave chase,* and succeeded in capturing only one of his ships, which happened to be the "Salisbury," a man-of-war the French had taken from us. On board were found the Lord Griffin, a very imbecile old Jacobite, two sons of Lord Middleton, a French lieutenant-general, with some other French and Irish officers, and five companies of French soldiers. The two sons of Middleton, the Pretender's secretary, and the man that knew all the secrets of the court of St. Germain, were, after some time, released by order of the queen—an order which is supposed to have been owing to their father's possessing the power of proving to the world the long and traitorous correspondence of Marlborough and Godolphin.† Old Griffin was kept close in the Tower, and, as he had been already outlawed for high treason, execution was awarded against him by the Court of Queen's Bench: but her majesty was pleased to reprieve him from time to time, and in the end he died of old age in his not hard nor cruel prison. On the 13th of March, when the affair was as yet undecided, the Commons waited upon the queen with an address, wherein they observed, that, as on the one side the small number of ships and troops the French were employing in their expedition might be regarded with contempt, so on the other side it gave just cause to believe that their chief dependence was upon some of her majesty's own subjects, whose restless passions and arbitrary principles of government had for many years engaged them in forming designs to undermine and destroy the present happy settlement of England. The address desired, in the name of the Commons of Great Britain, that the severest punishments might be inflicted upon all those who should assist in this unnatural design of betraying their country; and that suitable encouragements and rewards might be given to such as should oppose the invader; and further it entreated her majesty not to permit their enterprise to divert her constant vigour in prosecuting the war abroad; and to discountenance all such persons as by sowing divisions among her subjects, or by artful methods, would lessen the esteem her majesty had of those who had so eminently commanded her armies and managed her treasure (Marlborough and Godolphin), to the glory of her majesty and the entire satisfaction of her people. The Lords sung precisely the same song, but with more bravura. In their address, presented on the same day, after thanking the queen for the vigorous methods adopted against the Pretender, they suggested that the inconceivable forces employed by the enemy must proceed from some invitation from hence,* and was an undeniable proof, that neither the mildness of her majesty's government, nor the successes of her reign, could reconcile some men to the establishment. They called the attempt a "hellish attempt;" they imprecated vengeance upon those who were misrepresenting the actions of her best subjects, and besought her majesty that no such persons (meaning Harley, St. John, and that clique) might have access to her for the future. Both to the Lords and Commons the queen replied that there were slight grounds for apprehensions while the cause of religion and liberty and the good affections of the people were on her side; that she would never countenance those who would lessen the just esteem she entertained for her eminent servants, and that she would always place her chief dependence upon those who had given proofs of their warm attachment to the principles of the Revolution, the Protestant succession, &c. All this was, indeed, a signal triumph for the Whigs, who are much applauded for not shedding one drop of blood upon the scaffold. There were great and good men among them in advance of the age, yet the bloodless suppression of this revolution must be mainly attributed to other causes than their humanity or the increasing mildness of the national character. Anne, though she had been one of the very first to question the pregnancy of Maria d'Este and the legitimacy of the child born at St. James's, and though she had joined in the recent opprobrium that designated him as "the pretended son of a pretended mother," seems still to have felt not only that James was her brother, but that he might be, after all, her successor; while at the same time—to say nothing of the Tories, whom Mrs. Masham still let up by the back-stairs—her prime directors, Godolphin and Marlborough, were haunted by the genius of the House of Stuart, and were, equally with her, in doubt whether fortune would not bring the exiled prince to the throne. This alone might account for the present gentleness of the government; but, as we have shown, there are good grounds for believing that Lord Middleton and other members of the court of St. Germain could, if driven to desperation, have retaliated upon Marlborough and Godolphin. Five years later,

* The reader will remember Colonel Hooke's negotiations, the hot invitation of the Duchess of Gordon, &c. Burnet says, "It appeared that the French relied chiefly on the assistance that they expected would have come in to them upon their landing: of this they seemed so well assured that the King of France sent instructions to his ministers in all the courts that admitted of them, to be published everywhere, that, the pretended prince being invited by his subjects, chiefly those of Scotland, to take possession of the throne of his ancestors, the king had sent him over at their desire, with a fleet and army to assist him; that he was resolved to pardon all those who should come in to him, and he would trouble none upon the account of religion. Upon his being re-established, the king would give peace to the rest of Europe. When these ministers received these directions, they had likewise advice sent them, which they published both at Rome, Venice, and in Switzerland, that the French had, before this expedition was undertaken, sent over some ships with arms and ammunition to Scotland; and that there was already an army on foot there that had proclaimed the pretended prince king."

* "It was strongly reported at this time, that Sir George Byng had orders from the queen to favour the Pretender's escape, nay, some went so far as to say that he did take him and let him go again. But this was an idle story, without any manner of foundation: I am satisfied Sir George did what he could to take him, and destroy the French fleet; and that, if the Pretender had fallen into his hands, he would never have escaped from him alive. The chevalier had not a bitter enemy among the officers of the navy."—Life and Reign of Queen Anne.—It is said that the English had but few clean ships, and that the French fairly outdid them. This was certainly not untrue, for, though the French did not fight them quite so well, they both at this time and long after built better ships than we did.

and thirty years after that, when we might have expected some advancement in the civilisation and humanity of the country, blood was shed in torrents upon the scaffold after butcheries in the field! And neither the rebellion of 1715 nor that of 1745 was half so dangerous as this would have been if the Pretender had effected a landing. When the whole thing was blown upon, it was pretended at Versailles to have been but a mere feint. The French have been too much in the habit of covering all their failures of the kind in this way, to obtain any very ready belief on this occasion; but the Scottish Jacobites certainly held the opinion that Louis XIV. never designed that the Pretender should land in Scotland, and that Forbin had secret orders from his master which he did not communicate to that personage.* And yet, again, it appears, on the other hand, from documents carrying along with them internal proofs of genuineness, that Forbin and the French officers with him, both naval and military, did their best to effect a landing on the coast of the Frith of Forth; and that, when they found themselves anticipated there, they endeavoured to make a descent at Cromarty, Inverness, or still further north; and that they would have done this, but for the hot pursuit of the English fleet, that allowed them no time anywhere for the always difficult operations of disembarking troops, artillery, &c. General the Count de Gasse, better known afterwards as Marshal Matignon, in writing to King Louis himself, speaks of the project as an important one, which it was really and earnestly intended to execute, and expresses his deep affliction at the bad success of the expedition. M. d'Andrezel, in an official report, speaks in the same manner of the expedition, and of the intention to try their fortune at Cromarty or Inverness. "But," he says, "the enemy's fleet pursued ours very close, and, after a smart engagement (in which the Salisbury was taken), our squadron was dispersed, and we judged that our only course was to return to Dunkirk." This M. d'Andrezel mentions, that, during the fight at sea, the Pretender, or, as he calls him, the King of England, several times entreated Admiral Forbin to put him on shore any where, declaring that he was resolved to remain in Scotland, although none were to follow him but his own domestics—and that M. Forbin, after representing to him that it was very improper, refused to grant his request. This matter, however, is susceptible at least of two interpretations; and instead of being taken implicitly as a proof of courage and resolution in the Pretender, it may be conceived that that young man might have been anxious to get out of the sea fight, which was at the moment very hot and all unfavourable to the fleet, in which he was embarked. Andrezel concludes his report by making the best of a bad job, saying that, though the landing in Scotland had taken place, the success of the expedition would have been, nevertheless, very doubtful, by reason of the uncertainty of the succours they could expect to join them; and that therefore they were very fortunate to have brought safe back to Dunkirk the King of England, the ships, the troops, and the money, after running so great a risk. Shortly after his return to France the Pretender went with the French army into Flanders to serve against the English and their allies.*

The abstinence from blood had been so perfect that not even one Irish papist was executed, though plenty of them were taken prisoners, and many more known to have been in the expedition. These circumstances, however, did not prevent a new attempt at insurrection in Ireland. Immediately after the failure of the Scottish expedition, Father Ambrose O'Connor, provincial of the Irish Dominicans, was sent over by the court of St. Germain to inform himself exactly of the state of affairs in that kingdom. The French King sent this monk in one of his frigates from Brest to Ireland, where he arrived early in the month of May. The frigate was seen landing him; and the monk was hotly pursued up the country; but he got to a safe hiding place, and the frigate returned unmolested to France. As soon as his alarm abated, Father O'Connor commenced his inquiries. He learned that all the Catholic lords, clergy, and gentlemen, had been seized, and that all their horses and arms had been carried off immediately after the Pretender's unfortunate voyage to Scotland. The monk waited upon those to whom he brought letters from St. Germain, and he found them all exasperated by the harsh treatment of the Protestant government—all loyal to the Stuart and anxious to strike a blow for him—but all pennyless and helpless, without horses, without arms, without ammunition, and as usual, without any concert among themselves. Like the Scots, the first and

* Lockhart's Memoirs.—Macpherson, Stuart Papers.—There are also good reasons for believing that Chamillart, the incapable, timid, and wavering minister of Louis was all along against the expedition,—was of opinion that the Scots were not to be counted upon for much,—that a diversion in Scotland would be of small benefit to his master's affairs,—that the fate of France or of the war must be decided in the Low Countries, on the Rhine, or in Spain,—and that it would be madness to risk much with or for the Pretender.

* Hooke's negotiations, where there are other letters from M. Berniers, the Intendant of the French army, to the same effect. In the Memoirs of the Duke of Berwick the enterprise upon Scotland is treated as a serious, but ill-managed affair, on the part of France. Berwick, who, however, says he had no share in it, and did not even know of it till after it was public, declares that "this affair had been very ill concerted, on account of the misunderstanding and jealousy between M. de Chamillart, minister for the war department, and M. de Pontchartrain, minister for the navy." He adds—"It is also said, that, if the Chevalier de Forbin, who commanded the squadron, would have risked the loss of his ships, the young king might have landed; for he had nothing more to do but to enter the Frith of Forth, and run aground there, by which means the troops might have landed. The English indeed might possibly have burned the ships, before all the military stores and provisions on board could have been cleared. But this consideration ought not to have prevented him; for the material point was, that the troops should land with the young king;—all Scotland expected him with impatience, &c. . . . It is even probable that his sister, Queen Anne, apprehending a civil war, would have endeavoured to come to some terms with him, by which means he would have been sure of ascending the throne of his ancestors. . . . The only person that profited by this expedition was the Count de Gasse. M. de Chamillart, his intimate friend, had caused him to be appointed to command the French troops, and he received, while he was on board, the brevet of Marshal of France. The Scotch had asked with earnestness for me; but the king (Louis) refused, saying he wanted me elsewhere; this was the effect of Chamillart's intrigue for the Count de Gasse."

the last thing they asked for was money—money! They told Father O'Connor that a fine opportunity had been lost, owing to the court of St. Germain having too much neglected them. "If," said they, "King James had sent over to us some person he could trust to inform us beforehand of his design upon Scotland, we might have prevented all these imprisonments and secured our horses." Notwithstanding his profession, the monk ventured among the Presbyterian heretics in the north of Ireland; and, according to his own account, he found those descendants of Scottish colonists "generally well affected to the party of the king," and that when they heard of his majesty's going to Scotland they had assembled secretly in several places to wish him success. Travelling from place to place, Father O'Connor was delighted to see how naked the land was of soldiers, how weak and ill defended and unsuspecting were the garrisons. "There were not," he says, "six thousand regular troops in Ireland—as for Galway and other important places, they might be surprised by a handful of men.*" The Catholics assured him that in five counties only they could presently raise 20,000 men—but then, as a sine quâ non, they told him that they must have "a considerable sum of money in hand," and a good supply of arms and ammunition from France, together with a certain number of French troops. The monk, however, inadvertently, lets out the important secret, that they were dispirited and timid in the extreme. He says, "I insinuated to the principal nobility, that they ought to send to the king a trusty person, to assure his majesty of their heartiness in his cause, and of all that is above mentioned; but it seemed to me that they durst not hazard a deputation in so dangerous a juncture, every place being full of spies to ensnare the faithful subjects, so that even their own shadow affrights them." And these Irish nobles, instead of hazarding a deputation, thought it would be more proper for Father O'Connor to return to France and inform his majesty of everything. "And I," says the Father, "thought myself obliged in honour and conscience to undertake the journey, though it should even cost me my life." These monks were wonderfully adventurous, and must have been exceedingly adroit: O'Connor before going to France came over to London, and—more than this—he even ventured into the Tower, and there held conferences with the Scottish lords, who had been arrested at the time of the threatened invasion. "These lords," he says, "knowing I was going to France, instantly charged me to tell your majesty that they, and generally all the Scottish nation, are faithful, and attached to the interests of their lawful sovereign; that they expected his majesty would make a second attempt, and the sooner the better; but that his majesty ought to bring with him, if possible, ten thousand men, and to send before a considerable sum of money, to be put into the hands of some Scottish lord of known loyalty and great reputation, to be distributed among the lords and gentlemen of that nation, who could best employ it for the interest and service of the king." The monk says that they further told him that before the king came again 5000 men at least ought to be landed in Ireland, while other 10,000 should be kept ready to throw ashore on the northern coast of England.* After these deliberations in the Tower of London, Father O'Connor got safely back to St. Germain, but nothing came of his secret mission and new plans—probably owing to the circumstances of Louis XIV. being again threatened on his own frontier, and being himself so miserably poor as not to be able to find money to pay his half-starving troops.

In the mean while parliament had been prorogued—on the 1st of April—and the Duke of Marlborough had gone to the Hague, where he was met by Prince Eugene, the Grand Pensionary, and the deputies of the States-General. Having concerted together the plan for this year's campaign, Eugene went to Vienna to bring up reinforcements, and Marlborough took the field. On the other side were the Duke of Burgundy (the grandson of Louis), the Duke of Vendome, Marshal Boufflers, and the Duke of Berwick, whom the French cabinet, by something very like a trick, had removed from Spain to serve in Flanders. Eugene did not keep Marlborough waiting long; but when they had joined they had scarcely more than 80,000 men, while the French counted 100,000. Emboldened by their numerical superiority, the French began on the offensive; and favoured by the Flemings, who disliked the English heretics and hated the Dutch, they took Ghent, Bruges, Ypres, and invested Oudenarde. But here their momentary success ended: they were presently obliged to raise that siege, and to retire across the Scheldt. Marlborough and Eugene, with one will, one

* The whole subject of the invasion had been for some time taking a financial character. The French government knew well that if the credit of England could be destroyed an end would be put to the war, if not to the present establishment. Father O'Connor says, "On the first rumour in England of the king's embarking for Scotland, there was a general run upon the Bank; and I have been informed by persons of rank, that, if his majesty had landed in Scotland, the government would instantly have found itself without credit and without money." And there really was a great run upon the Bank, and a fall of stocks, but the latter rose again as soon as the alarm was over. Burnett says, that, if the Pretender had landed in Scotland, "it might have had an ill effect on our affairs, chiefly with relation to all paper credit." At the moment the government had little but paper credit to trust to. The bishop adds, "If by this time the remittances to Piedmont, Catalonia, and Portugal had been stopped, in so critical a season, that might have had fatal consequences abroad: for if we had been put into such a disorder at home, that foreign princes could no more reckon on our assistance, they might have been disposed to hearken to the propositions that the King of France would then have probably made to them. So that the total defeating of this design, without its having the least ill effect on our affairs, or our losing one single man in the little engagement we had with the enemy, is always to be reckoned as one of those happy providences for which we have much to answer." Another circumstance that gave encouragement to Father O'Connor, was the division between the party of the Episcopal Church and the Presbyterians, which he represents as being greater than ever in England. "The Presbyterians," he says, "are for the prince of Hanover; but the greater party of the Episcopalian are for the king, out of opposition to their antagonists, who are at present the ruling party by their junction with Godolphin and Marlborough; and persons of rank have told me, that they believed, if the king had set foot on Scotland, his majesty would have drawn great advantages from this division.

notion, followed them; and on the 11th of July they fell upon the French army between the Lys and the Scheldt, opposite Oudenarde—while the dukes of Burgundy, Vendome, and Berwick were quarrelling about what ought to be done—and gave them the bitterest and most complete defeat they had as yet sustained in this long war. Fifteen thousand men, and above a hundred standards and colours, were lost; and the confusion of the French army was such, that the troops were neither sensible whither they fled nor by whom they were commanded. But for the coming on of night, Vendome, the Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Berwick, Pretender, and all might have been taken prisoners,—for the Pretender was there. Two very different accounts are given of his conduct. The party least friendly to him say that he acted like a coward, and, in company with his highness the Duke of Burgundy, saw the engagement from the church steeple of a neighbouring village, and was among the very first to fly: according to the Duke of Berwick, his half-brother, he showed “much courage and coolness in the battle.” George, the electoral prince of Hanover, was there, as well as the Pretender; and about his conduct there is no dispute,—it was that of a brave and sturdy cavalry officer; and he led a charge of German horse which routed the French guard. Vendome and Berwick managed the retreat with some skill, but they could never again face Marlborough and Eugene, who, after recovering several important fortresses, laid siege to Lille, which was considered as the key to Paris and one-half of France. The town capitulated on the 22nd of October, but the citadel held out till the 10th of December. The garrison, under Marshal Boufflers, was numerous and brave; the works had been recently improved by the great Vauban; and such were the difficulties encountered, that the allies are said to have lost from 12,000 to 15,000 men before they made themselves masters of Lille. But, even at that price, the important place, the loss of which struck a panic in France, seemed cheaply purchased. Ghent surrendered after a few shots. Bruges and other places were abandoned; and the French, with a drooping flag, retired into their own country, having, according to Berwick, committed absurdity upon absurdity in the course of this campaign. The unnationalised Englishman tells us that the Duke of Marlborough (his maternal uncle), during the siege of Lille, sent him a private letter, signifying that the present occasion was a very favourable one to set on foot a negotiation for peace; and that, if the proposals were properly made by France to the field deputies of Holland, to Prince Eugene, and to himself, he would do all in his power to get them accepted. “Nothing,” says Berwick, “could be more advantageous than this advice of the Duke of Marlborough: it opened to us an honourable way of putting an end to a burdensome war. I mentioned it to the Duke of Burgundy and to M. de Chamillart, who immediately dispatched a courier to the king to receive his orders with respect to the answer which was to be given. The king sent them to M. de Chamillart, who, through excess of policy, had taken it into his head that this proposal of Marlborough’s proceeded only from the bad situation the allied army was in. This reasoning, I own, was beyond my penetration; and by the manner in which Marlborough had written to me, I was persuaded that apprehension had no share in the matter, and that he had done it only from a desire of putting an end to a war which all Europe began to be tired of. There was not the least appearance of duplicity in what he wrote; and he addressed himself to me with no other view than that the negotiation might pass through my hands, thinking it might be of use to me. M. de Chamillart dictated to me the answer I was to make; and I thought it such an extraordinary one that I sent it in French, to show the Duke of Marlborough that it did not come from me: he was, indeed, so much offended at it, that no use could be made of this opening to bring about a peace. I am even convinced that this was the principal cause of the aversion which the Duke of Marlborough showed ever after for pacific measures." As these circumstances rest upon the single authority of Berwick's Memoirs they have been doubted. It appears, however, that there really was some talk of negotiating; but Lord Hardwicke asserts that the overture came from the Duke of Berwick, through whose hands the French court offered the Duke of Marlborough a large sum if he would procure a peace for them.* During the protracted siege of Lille, both Marlborough and Eugene were involved in considerable difficulties, as Vendome cut off their communication with Brussels, and for some time kept them short of provisions and ammunition. It is not altogether unreasonable to suppose that, under these circumstances, Marlborough may have proposed or listened to overtures. This was a ruse de guerre not uncommon. Besides, as he was constantly informed by the duchess of the growing boldness of Harley's intrigues, he may for a moment have felt his presence indispensable at St. James's; or he may even have conceived a disgust at the whole war, and a desire to end it. It is evident, from his correspondence, that he had rather frequently such visitations, and that he would sigh for peace and repose in the groves of Blenheim, though these visions were soon again dissipated by his ambition and by his avarice. The Tories exercised great ingenuity in misrepresenting the whole of this brilliant campaign; in trying to show that Marlborough had several times got into situations of extreme peril, and that he had been liberated from them rather by good luck than by his own genius. At the beginning of the campaign they revelled in the successes obtained by the French, and predicted that the English general would lose in one summer what it had cost so many years to gain. Marlborough disconcerted these prophets by his brilliant and decisive victory at Oudenarde; but when he sat down before Lille they recommenced their sinister predictions, and exaggerated the losses inevitable in such a siege. Lille fell, and Ghent after it; but at the latter place they got up a new panic, and the surrender of Ghent was held up as another piece of sheer luck. Matthew Prior, who had sold his wit and his pen to a party, thus dismisses the campaign, not without betraying his poetical vocation:—"It has been observed that his grace was never more fortunate than in the sudden reduction of this place (Ghent); for the articles were scarce signed when the severest frost began that had been known in the memory of man: the very horses' hoofs froze to the ground; and his army must infallibly have perished if the town had held out a very few days longer; which had been no difficult matter, since there was no breach made in the walls, and the Count de la Motte had a good army within the town supplied with all necessaries (and, indeed, less than an army could not have defended Ghent, which is twelve miles round upon the walls). The allies, it is true, were in the end very successful in Flanders this campaign; but they had two very narrow escapes—one at Wyvendale, and the other at Ghent. Had they miscarried at either place, that fine army of the confederates, consisting of veteran troops, would infallibly have been ruined—a loss that the allies could scarce ever have retrieved. It may be considered farther, that the siege of Lille was the unhappy occasion of the ill success of the war in other places in this campaign. Our affairs were again miserably neglected in Spain and Portugal, to humour the duke and Prince Eugene in this enterprise: we even broke our treaty with Portugal on their account, and sent Major-General Earl to Ostend, with 8000 men, to assist in protecting the supplies of ammunition and provision that were continually sending to Lille, when those forces were raised and embarked for the service in Portugal; which was the reason the Portuguese could make no diversion on that side, while the Duke of Orleans pressed the allies in Catalonia, and besieged Tortosa, which surrendered the 11th of July, as did afterwards the towns of Denia and Alicante in Valencia."†

These successes of the French in Spain had really happened; yet, on the whole, the English arms had not been unsuccessful in the Mediterranean. At the end of the preceding and very disastrous campaign, Lord Galway and Das Minas had been carried by an English fleet back to Portugal, whose frontiers were not considered safe. Galway was succeeded by General Stanhope, who was equally accomplished in oratory, diplomacy, and war; and who had the advantage, derived from a long residence in the country in former times as ambassador, of being perfectly well acquainted with the character and habits of the Spanish people: at the same time the emperor sent Count Staremberg, a general of high reputation, to serve in Catalonia; and, between Stanhope and the Count, the remainder of that province was saved. But the English general did more than act on the defensive; he joined Admiral Sir John Leake, who had just made the conquest of the island of Sardinia, and with him laid siege to St. Philip, the chief fortress at Port Mahon. In a very few days a breach was made and a redoubt carried by storm; and then, on the 30th of September, St. Philip capitulated, and the glorious harbour of Port Mahon, together with the whole island of Minorca, fell quietly into the hands of the English. Leaving a good garrison behind him, Stanhope returned to Catalonia. Besides contributing to this conquest, and taking by himself the island of Sardinia, Leake, in the course of this pleasant Mediterranean cruise, performed other exploits, which certainly had the effect of increasing the respect due to the arms of his country. Remembering probably the threat of Oliver Cromwell—that he could make the cannon of his ships be heard in the eternal city and within the walls of the Vatican—he appeared off the mouth of the Tiber, and threatened to bombard the pope's town and port of Civita Vecchia, in revenge for the assistance or countenance which the pontiff had publicly afforded the Pretender on his late expedition to Scotland. But, fortunately for his holiness, he had at last consented to recognise the Archduke Charles as king of Spain; and the intermediation of Austrian diplomatists saved the court of Rome from this humiliation and loss. Leake, however, took and destroyed many French and Italian vessels on that coast, and gave some timely assistance to Charles's general and viceroy of Naples, the Count Daun. On a wider and a rougher sea the English seamen had achieved a far more brilliant victory. In the month of May Commodore Wager, with only four English men-of-war, attacked seventeen Spanish galleons as they were creeping along shore from Carthagena to Portobello, in South America. For a long time his men had hoped for such an opportunity of capturing a plate fleet; and now they fought, according to the Spaniards, more like devils than men. The battle began at sunset, and soon after it was dark the Spanish admiral blew up with a tremendous explosion, and with a cargo and precious metals valued at three millions of pieces of eight. The rear-admiral struck about two in the morning; the vice-admiral escaped in a shattered condition, and some others of the galleons saved themselves by running behind a dangerous shoal off Carthagena. It appears that more property was destroyed than taken; yet Prior says that Commodore Wager's share of the prize-money amounted to 100,000*l*.

In the month of October died Anne's husband, the Prince of Denmark, and nominal head of the British navy, to none of whose exploits he can be said to have contributed even indirectly. His royal highness was altogether a neutral kind of personage, and the very best that can be said of him is, that, of himself, he never did either good or harm. Happy with his 50,000*l*. a-year and his bottle, he interfered as little as possible in politics with his wife or her ministers, except perhaps latterly with the queen, through his strong bias to the Duke of Marlborough and his party.* He had grown enormously fat, and had been long ailing, when a complication of asthma, dropsy, and the gout put an end to him on the 28th of October. If his post and its emoluments were dear to him he died just in time, for the decided Whigs, who could urge his incompetence with good reason, had fully determined to drive him from it. Immediately on his demise the Earl of Pembroke, resigning the presidency of the council and the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, was made lord high-admiral. Lord Somers became president of the council, and Lord Wharton lord-lieutenant. †

* Macky has hit off the character of his royal highness. "Prince George, husband to Queen Anne, and lord high-admiral of England, brother to the late King of Denmark, and uncle to the present, was chosen by King Charles II. to be husband to his niece, the Princess Anne, because, having no dominions of his own to gratify, he would have nothing else in view, but the interest of England. In the reign of King Charles II., having but little English, and being naturally modest, he made no considerable figure, nor in the reign of King James, till the increase of popery alarming the wifely nation, he concurred with the rest of the Protestant nobility for the bringing over the Prince of Orange, and with his princess left the court to join that party. During all King William's reign he never entered into the administration, yet came always to parliament regularly, and often to court; diverted himself with hunting, and never openly declared himself of any party. On the queen's accession to the crown, he was made lord high-admiral of England and warden of the Cinque Ports. He is a prince of a familiar easy disposition, with a good sound understanding, but modest in showing it: a great lover of the high church of England the nearer it comes to Lutheranism: this he often shows, by his vote in the House of Peers; otherwise he doth not much meddle with affairs out of his office. He is very fat, loves news, his bottle, and the queen, by whom he hath had many children, but none alive. He has neither many friends nor enemies in England. On the queen's accession to the throne he was towards fifty years old."—Characters of the Court of Great Britain in Memoirs of Secret Services.

According to the sarcastic and vindictive Duchess of Marlborough, Anne was not very much affected by her husband's death. Her grace says ungraciously:—"The queen's friendships were flames of extravagant passion, ending in indifference or aversion. Her love to the prince seemed in the eyes of the world to be prodigiously great. But if the passion of grief were great, her stomach was much greater: for that very day he died she eat three very large and hearty meals: so that one would think, that, as other persons' grief takes away their appetite, her appetite took away her grief."—Court's Copies of Marlborough's Papers in British Museum.

Hamilton, the author of the 'Transactions,' thus accounts for the admission into the cabinet and the high promotion of the witty

Pembroke, finding, as was said, the business of the admiralty too laborious for him, soon consented that it should be put into commission, with the mercenary Russell, Earl of Orford, for first commissioner. But, from the rapidity of these changes, it is believed that there had been all along a bargain of the kind among the Whig leaders. The post of warden of the Cinque Ports and constable of Dover Castle was, however, separated from that of lord high-admiral, and conferred upon Lord Dorset.

The administration, therefore, was once more constituted entirely of Whigs; but the appearances of success were deceptive, and the court-ground on which the party stood was completely undermined by intrigues and by the growing antipathies of the queen. In former times, before she took Mrs. Masham to her heart, and cast off the duchess, Anne's vanity had been gratified by seeing herself associated with the victorious Marlborough, and hearing poets celebrating her praise as another Bellona, or describing her like Jove lending his thunderbolts to the god of war;* but now all these things grated on her senses, and she wished every little candle put out that was lit by way of illumination and public rejoicing. The "bedchamber broils," as the answerer to the Duchess of Marlborough calls them, had kept growing louder and louder, and the queen was so provoked as to insult her grace in church, where they had met to return thanks to Almighty God for the great victory at Oudenarde. There is a bathos in the business, of which the greatest master in the art of sinking might have been proud. The duchess wanted the queen to wear her jewels at this thanksgiving, and, as part of her duty, had put the jewels out "in a way that she thought her majesty would like;" but her majesty went to church without any jewels, and her grace, immediately suspecting the cause, told the queen that none but Mrs. Masham could have made her refuse to wear them, in so unkind a manner. "I must needs observe," said this imperious, irritated woman in a letter, "that your majesty chose a very wrong day to mortify, when you were just going to return thanks for a victory obtained by my Lord Marlborough." Anne told her in return, that, after the commands her grace had given

Lord Wharton, who had always been hated or feared by Godolphin and Marlborough. The Marquess of Anandale had in his possession one of Godolphin's original letters to the court of St. Germain, and the marquess, after a regular bargain, transferred this "miraculous manuscript" to Wharton, who thereby had the lord-treasurer in a manner at his mercy; Godolphin imparted his alarm to Marlborough, "who directed him, by all possible means, to be speedy in hushing the business, by giving to the holder of the letter whatever he should ask." According to this authority, Wharton, "not being of a selfish nature," contented himself with the government of Ireland for his own share, a place for Lord Somers, another for Lord Dorset, and some other douceurs for other friends.

* The rhymesters of the day, including names that stand high in English literature, lost all discretion of praise, and completely exhausted the Pagan mythology. The following are moderate specimens from "State and Miscellany Poems,"—

"Whilst Anna's sword is lodged in Marlborough's hand,
"Tis victory to obey, and empire to command."

"And Albion's fierce artillery proclaim
Like Jove's dread voice, in thunder and in flame."

her on the thanksgiving-day not to answer her, she should not think of replying to this letter. The duchess wrote again to explain that her majesty had mistaken what she had said to her in church. "I desired you," continues her grace, "not to answer me there, for fear of being overheard: and this you interpret as if I had desired you not to answer me at all; which was far from my intention. For the whole end of my writing to you so often, was to get your answer to several things in which we differed; so that, if I was in the wrong, you might convince me of it, and I should very readily have owned my mistakes. But since you have not been pleased to show them to me, I flatter myself that I have said several things to you that are unanswerable." Anne left this letter unanswered. The duchess assures us that through the whole summer Harley continued in close and familiar communication with the queen. "And that this might be the better managed, she staid all the sultry season, even when the prince was panting for breath, in that small house she had formerly purchased at Windsor, which, though as hot as an oven, was then said to be cool, because from the park such persons as Mrs. Masham had a mind to bring to her majesty could be let in privately by the garden. And when upon the death of the prince, one would have thought that her majesty's real grief would have made her avoid every place and every object that might sensibly revive the remembrance of her loss, she chose for her place of retirement his closet, and for some weeks spent many hours in it every day. I was amazed at this; and when I spoke to her of it, she seemed surprised, just like a person who, on a sudden, becomes sensible of her having done something she would not have done, had she duly considered. But the true reason of her majesty's choosing that closet to sit in was, that the backstairs belonging to it came from Mrs. Masham's lodgings, who by that means could secretly bring to her whom she pleased." In consequence of these closetings Anne raised difficulties and objections to almost everything proposed to her by ministers; and, according to the duchess, when Harley and his associates had compassed their designs and got into power, they would often boast, "both in their cups and out of them," how they were frequently at court, in secret, and giving their advice, when Godolphin and the Whigs were fast asleep. The lord-treasurer found himself obliged to represent to her majesty that nothing could go well if she continued to discourage and perplex the cabinet; the lord-general wrote to the same effect from the camp; and his wife once more wrote a long letter "with her usual plainness and zeal." This only incensed the queen without producing any answer. Equally irritated, the duchess waited upon her, and desired to know what crime she had committed to produce so great an alteration in her majesty. Anne, in reply, told her grace that she was inveterate against poor Mrs. Masham, and had nothing so much at heart as the ruin of her cousin;—that, as to any misunderstandings between her majesty and her grace, they were only owing to this, that she could not see with the duchess's eyes, and hear with her ears—that it was impossible for her to return to her former kindness, but that she should always behave towards her as the Duke of Marlborough's wife, and her groom of the stole. Loth to give up the struggle however hopeless it might be, the duchess set herself to draw up a long narrative of her faithful services, and to represent how hard and unseemly it was that, after such a violent affection on the part of the queen, she should now lose her favour by the artifice of her enemies, and particularly of one whom she had raised out of the dust. The better to move the queen, in this paper, the duchess had recourse to divinity; and, with a heart almost bursting with envy, hatred, and uncharitableness, she had the face to recommend the duties of charity and Christian forgiveness. "Knowing," she says, "how great a respect her majesty had for the writings of certain eminent divines, I added to my narrative the directions given by the author of The Whole Duty of Man with relation to friendship; the directions in the Common Prayer Book before the Communion with regard to reconciliation, together with the rules laid down by Bishop Taylor upon the same head; and I concluded with giving my word to her majesty that, if, after reading these, she would please only to answer in two words, that she was still of the same opinion as when she wrote that harsh letter, which occasioned her this trouble, I would never more give her the least trouble upon any subject, but the business of my office, as long as I should have the honour to continue her servant." Anne never answered this paper; but one day, in church, as she was passing by her, in order to receive the sacrament, she looked with much good nature, and very graciously smiled upon her grace. "But," adds Sarah, writing in her old age, "that smile and pleasant look I had afterwards reason to think were given to Bishop Taylor and the Common Prayer Book, and not to me!"

If we leave these wretched trucesseries of three women, upon which, however, the fate of one of the greatest of European wars may be said to have depended, we shall hardly get to the contemplation of more honourable or pleasanter matter. The Tories had resolved to terrify Anne again with the House of Hanover; and they sent privately to acquaint her with a discovery they pretended to have made, of "a terrible design" formed by the Whigs to bring over the Electoral Prince George whether her majesty would or no. To preserve the decency and unity of this proceeding, the person they appointed to be their secret messenger to Anne was that very Lord Haversham, who, not two years before, had been the mover of the address for inviting and bringing over the Electress Sophia!* Anne, in a fury, wrote to the Duke of Marlborough to tell him, that, if this matter should be brought into parliament, whoever proposed it, whether Whig or Tory, she would look upon them as her enemies, nor would she ever make any invitation to the young man (Prince George) or his father, or his grandmother. The project was, of course, denied by the Whigs, but the queen continued to be haunted by apparitions of the "German boor." It is thought that, in this paramount dread of the Hanoverian, she would have summoned up spirit to break the cabinet, if it had not been for another fear, that, if she irritated them, the Whigs, who, in place or out, seemed sure of a majority, would, in their spite, have moved for the invitation of Prince George, with father, grandmother, and all.

The first British parliament, prorogued on the 1st of April of the present year (1708), had been dissolved by proclamation shortly after, and a new one summoned to meet in the autumn. The Houses met on the 16th of November. In the Commons, the Whigs elected for speaker Sir Richard Onslow, without opposition, as the Tories declined the contest which would have exposed their weakness. On account of the recent death of her husband, the queen did not attend in person, but her Whig lord-chancellor Cowper spoke in the name of the sovereign. He told the Houses that the extraordinary length of the campaign this year had obliged her majesty to put off their meeting longer than she had designed, in order that they might be informed with the greater certainty of the state and posture of the war; that in the interval the success of affairs abroad had been so great, as to justify the opinion that we were now brought much nearer than at the last session to the end of the war, and the reduction of the dangerous power of France; that her majesty therefore assured them that she had not the least doubt, but that this new parliament would be of the same opinion with the last, as to the vigorous prosecution of the war, believing it impossible that the representatives of the British nation could endure to think of losing the fruits of all our past endeavours, and all the great advantages we had gained, particularly in the present year, by submitting at last to an insecure and inglorious peace. The lord-chancellor further told them that the several parts of the war—that is to say, the struggle going on in Spain, on the Rhine, &c.,—would require their support and their supplies, at least in the same degree as in the preceding year; while in Flanders the nature of the war was much altered by the great advances made there towards entering into and invading France, which had so far alarmed the enemy, that they were drawing more troops daily to that side for the defence of their own country, so that an augmentation of our forces would be required, which, "with the continuance of God's blessing," must soon enable us to end triumphantly this long and expensive contest. A tribute was paid to the services of the fleet, and the importance of our cap ture of Port Mahon was fairly stated — “as it afforded the means of our co-operating with more readiness and effect on the enemy in those parts.” Timely and effectual supplies were also demanded for carrying on such fortifications at home as might extinguish the enemy’s hopes of profiting by disturbances in Scotland. [Since the Pretender’s attempt a few forts had been begun in that country.] The great subject of the Union was alluded to with just pride, as the greatest of all the great successes of this reign; and Cowper told the Lords and Commons that her majesty was anxious that they should prepare such bills as should be thought conducive to the confirming and improving this Union, and particularly to make the laws of both parts of Great Britain agree as near as might be, for the common interest of both nations, and more especially those laws which related to criminal cases and proceedings. The speech concluded with the confident assurance that her majesty would continue to defeat the designs of the Pretender, and his open and secret abettors, and make it evident that the true and lasting interest and well-being of her subjects was dependent upon their duty and loyalty. The Lords sent up an address by the Earl of Dorset in a private manner, Anne having intimated that this would be most agreeable to her feelings in her state of widowhood and mourning. Their lordships condoled with her majesty upon the loss she had sustained in the Prince of Denmark, whose eminent virtues must render his memory for ever dear to them and to the nation; but they entreated her to moderate her grief, and take care of her precious health, upon which the hopes of her people, and the safety of Europe so much depended. After following this condolence with congratulations on the success of her arms, they repeated the affirmation of preceding sessions,—that no peace could be safe or honourable till the whole monarchy of Spain was restored to the House of Austria: but their lordships desired that she would press her allies, who were more nearly concerned, to show a vigour equal to that of her own subjects. The Commons also sent up their address in a private manner by Mr. Secretary Boyle. They went beyond the Lords in applauding this year’s campaign, which, they said, showed that no difficulties were insuperable to her great commander, and that no force of the enemy could stop the progress of her victories. All this was gall and wormwood to the queen; but the mourning she wore for her husband helped to conceal the gloom which now overshadowed her brow whenever the name of Marlborough was mentioned, or whenever his successes were alluded to. While, in the eyes of the world, she appeared to be overwhelmed with grief for the loss of her consort,—shunning the conversation of her nearest friends, and almost the light of day,—she was plotting with Harley and Mrs. Masham against her ministers. Though the Tories were in a decided minority, there were various little accidents and circumstances which played into their hands: A writer, whose toleration and political wisdom were in advance of the time, had ventured to publish a pamphlet in favour of the abolition of the penal laws and Test Act. This was complained of in the Lower House; the most liberal of the Whigs were afraid of exciting suspicions as to their own steadiness to the established church; scarcely an effort was made to defend or to palliate the author’s propositions; and the Commons resolved that his pamphlet was a scandalous and seditious libel, tending to create misunderstandings among her majesty’s subjects; and they ordered it to be burned by the hands of the common hangman. In the Lords, the state of the nation at the time of the Pretender’s intended invasion of Scotland was taken into consideration. Lord Haversham opened the debate with a set speech, in which, knowing the wishes of the queen and the plans of Mr. Harley, he turned our glorious victories into mortifications; showed how our haughty neighbour Louis, notwithstanding all our conquests, had had the presumption to attempt an invasion; and insisted that he might repeat his attempt, and with better success. “Has not the French king,” asked his lordship, “as many ships, as many friends, and as great encouragement here, as he had last spring? For, notwithstanding all our inquiries, is it not as great a mystery as ever it was, who the persons among us were that were concerned in that black and unnatural design? It is true that several persons of great quality and interest have been taken up, whereby others have had an opportunity of supplanting them in their interest at the late election. I will not say whether this has proceeded from ill-will to some, or from favour to others; but has anything been proved against the persons arrested? The harsh proceedings adopted have rather proved vexatious to the subject than useful to the government: and I hope this will make them, for the future, set a greater value upon the Habeas Corpus Act. It has been said that men of arbitrary principles ought always to be suspected: but, if this is a good argument, it is as strong against some who are at the head of the present ministry, as against any men I know of who are out of it. Another character has been given of suspected persons; and it has been assumed as enough to prove disaffection, the casting reflections upon the ministry, or the attempting to lessen her majesty’s esteem of her ministers; but, if this doctrine be adopted, there will be an end to the constitution and to the uses of parliament, which are chiefly the redressing of grievances, and keeping great men in awe.” After a few words about Papists, Jacobites, and Nonjurors, Haversham made a home thrust at the lord-treasurer Godolphin. “I know,” said he, “that even among the apostles themselves, he that bore the bag proved the traitor.” He asked why the most usual and likely methods for a discovery (namely, promises of pardon and reward) had not been offered in Scotland and in England; he spoke of the run upon the Bank, which had been in danger of breaking, and which had not yet recovered from the blow; and he asked whether some men's mighty services must prevent their looking into other men's great miscarriages or misdoings. In spite, however, of this stirring speech, it was resolved by both Houses that no blame lay upon the present government, or—"that timely and effectual care had been taken by those employed under her majesty at the time of the intended invasion of Scotland to disappoint the designs of her enemies both at home and abroad."

A.D. 1709.—As Anne was now a widow, she ordered the prayers to be left out for making her a happy mother of children, that were used in all churches on the anniversary of her accession.* Upon this both Houses presented a humble address to her majesty, praying that she would not indulge her just grief so much as to decline the thoughts of a second marriage, upon which they professed all their hopes of future happiness did consist.† Anne, like an inconsolable mourner for her late husband, sent an answer thanking them for their frequent marks of duty and affection. She alluded to the provision already made for the succession in the person of a Protestant prince; and then delicately said, that the subject of their address was of such a nature that she was persuaded they did not expect a particular answer to it.

The ministerial party had assumed as a principle that a difference of laws must necessarily continue a dissimilitude of nations: Cowper, in his opening speech, had recommended the assimilating the criminal laws of England and Scotland; and now a bill was brought into the House of Commons for abrogating all the old laws of Scotland relating to high treason. In the preceding year, in Scotland, by the connivance, it is said, of the lord advocate and the judges, some persons deemed notoriously guilty of treason had been allowed to escape. It was urged that the same offence ought to be made liable in both countries to the same punishment; but this the Scots, who adhered to their old laws, which were in some respects better and in some worse than those of England, insisted might be done without altering their laws or interfering with their judiciary proceedings, the integrity of which was guaranteed to them by the Treaty of Union. And they declared that all Scotland would be thrown into confusion if any attempt were made to abrogate suddenly their old code or practice. They denied the right of the united British parliament to legislate upon this matter; and urged that the English could not with good faith oblige them to submit to English law when they preferred their own. Nor were there wanting English advocates to take the same view of the question. Sir John Hawles, who enjoyed great reputation as a constitutional lawyer, declared that, having compared the laws of both kingdoms, he preferred the laws of Scotland concerning high treason to those of England, and he proposed that there ought either to be a new body of law compiled out of the laws of both kingdoms, or else that each should keep their own. Though few matters could be so serious as this, there were some in the House of Commons that could make a joke of it.*

The Scots had the merit of proposing that in both kingdoms the horrid punishments of persons convicted of treason should be moderated. Sir Peter King, Mr. Wortley, Mr. Hampden, and other assertors of liberty among the English adopted this opinion; and the Tories, who were certainly then the party most in danger from high treason, had joined with the Scots and extreme Whigs. In the House of Lords the bill was taken up and managed with great zeal. It consisted of three heads:—1. All crimes that were high treason by the law of England were to be high treason in Scotland, and none other. 2. The manner of proceeding settled in England was to be observed in the Scotch courts. 3. The pains and forfeitures were to be precisely the same in both nations. The Scottish lords opposed every part of the bill, urging more particularly that their countrymen did not know the laws of England, and would have to study the English book of statutes to know when they were safe and when not. To this it was replied that the judges would publish an abstract of the laws bearing upon high treason, which would be sufficient information for any man; that the Scots, by the passing of the bill, would be in a much safer condition than now, for the laws they had were conceived in such general terms that their judges might put such constructions upon them as should serve the ends of any bad government. Under the second head, which went to alter the method of trial used in Scotland, it was provided that a grand jury should find the bill against the person or persons accused of treason; that the judges should only regulate the proceedings, and declare what the law was; and that the whole matter of the indictment should be left entirely to the jury, who were to be twelve in

* Anne was not a sterile queen,—she had plenty of children, but they were all born sickly, and with the germs of mortal diseases. Of three daughters and two sons, whose names are recorded, only one (the Duke of Gloucester) lived to be eleven years old. Of fourteen others many were still-born, and the rest died in their infancy.

† According to Roger Coke—"In this time an order of council was made for leaving out the prayer for the queen's having royal issue: but whether this or something else gave rise to the motion of an address that the queen should think of marrying again, a Whig member in the House of Commons, to anticipate the Tories, as was then suspected, actually did it: the House unanimously falling in with it, and, upon their desire, the Lords joining with them in an address to that end."—Detection. Anne had now reached her forty-fifth year.

* "Sir David Dalrymple, one of the most eminent lawyers, having made a learned speech two hours long, in the House of Commons, concerning the laws of Scotland, full of many cases collected out of the grounds of the laws and ancient histories, a certain member thought fit to answer him in a few lines borrowed out of Hudibras, an English burlesque poem, which, though it gave occasion for laughter, yet gave much offence to great and learned men, who judged it very improper that a matter of high importance should be talked of in parliament after a ludicrous manner; or that the famous constitution of our ancestors, and all the learning of antiquity, should be slighted for the sake of a ridiculous joke."—The History of Great Britain, from the Revolution in 1688 to the Accession of George I. Translated from the Latin MS. of Alexander Cunningham, Esq., Minister from George I. to the Republic of Venice.

number, and all to agree in their verdict.* The Scottish lords objected that neither judges nor advocates in Scotland would know how to manage a trial of treason in the English way; and they insisted upon having the names of the witnesses delivered to the prisoners fifteen days before the trial, as was allowed by the Scottish laws actually in force.† They said that surely a man ought to know who were to be brought against him, that so he might cause an examination as to their respectability, and the degree of credit to which they were entitled as witnesses. The English lords replied, that to allow this would be to open a door to many illegal practices either upon the witnesses themselves, in order to corrupt them, or in procuring and suborning other witnesses to defame them. The Scots rejoined, that, without any such notice, a guilty man, knowing what might be brought against him, could take many illegal methods; but that security ought to be made for innocent men, whose chief guilt might chance to be a good estate upon which some court favourite had an eye. At last the Scottish lords were willing to compromise; and they required that the names of the witnesses that had given evidence to the grand jury should be signified to the prisoner five days before trial. But, upon a division of the House on this point, the votes were equal; and so, by the rule that in such a case the negative prevailed, the amendment was lost. When the third head of the bill, which provided that the penalties for treason should be the same as in England, and that the forfeiture of estates should follow a Scottish sentence as it did an English one, was presented, the debate grew still warmer. It was represented that in Scotland there were many estates settled upon families by entails in perpetuity, and it was argued that, as by one of the articles of the Union all private rights were preserved, no alteration could be made in these settlements either by sentence of treason or otherwise. Bishop Burnet carried this further. "I thought," says he, "it was neither just nor reasonable to set the children a begging for their father's faults: the Romans, during their liberty, never thought of carrying punishments so far: it was an invention under the tyranny of the emperors, who had a particular revenue called the Fisc; and all forfeitures were claimed by them, from whence they were called confiscations. It was never the practice of free governments. Bologna flourished beyond any town in the Pope's dominions, because they made it an article of their capitulation with the Pope that no confiscation should follow on any crime whatsoever." He showed how, in many instances, prosecutions had been instituted only to obtain a confiscation of property; and he might have added that, in arbitrary times, few such prosecutions had ever failed. But none of the lords seconded him; and the most that he procured was an acknowledgment that what he said was just and reasonable, and fit to be passed into law in good times, when the nation should not be exposed, as it now was, to dangers from abroad. Clauses, however, were agreed to, and inserted in the bill, by which marriage settlements might be made in Scotland, as was practised in England, so that no estate should be forfeited for the crime of him who was only tenant for life. Though contrary to the letter of the law in Scotland as well as in England, horrible tortures had been practised at the command of the Scottish privy council; and from the time of the restoration of Charles II. down to the Revolution of 1688, these atrocities appear to have been far more frequent in Scotland than at any former time. The present Treason Bill had the merit of absolutely prohibiting the use of torture. It also empowered the queen to grant commissions of Oyer and Terminer, as in England, for trying treasons. Here the Scots objected that this was interfering with their separate establishment of courts of justice, which was guaranteed to them by the Union. The English ministers replied that their criminal courts would still sit, without any diminution of authority, at the seasons regularly appointed; and that these commissions would be granted rarely, and upon special occasions, in the intervals between the terms, upon such emergencies as would not admit of long delay. They also agreed that a judge of the criminal court of Scotland should always be one of the quorum in these commissions. In this shape the bill was carried in the Lords, notwithstanding the opposition of all the Scots there; "with whom," says Burnet, "many of the Tories concurred, they being disposed to oppose the court in everything, and to make treason as little to be dreaded as possible." When the bill was sent back to the Commons they objected to many things in it, and proposed two capital amendments of their own—1. That the names of the witnesses should be sent to the prisoner ten days before trial. 2. That my estate in

* "Anciently," says Burnet, "the verdict went with the majority, the number being fifteen; but, by a late Act, the verdict must be given upon the agreement of two-thirds of the jury. [A unanimous verdict is still unnecessary in Scotland except, as directed by this Act, in cases of treason.] In the sentence the law did not limit the judges to a certain form, but they could aggravate the punishment, or moderate it, according to the circumstances of the case (or their own view of it). . . . In one particular the forms in Scotland were much preferable to those in England: the depositions of the witnesses were taken, indeed, by word of mouth, but were writ out, and after that were signed by the witnesses: they were sent in to the jury; and there were made a part of the record. This was very slow and tedious; but the jury, by this means, was more certainly possessed of the evidence, and the matter was more clearly delivered down to posterity; whereas, the records in England are very defective, and give no light to a historian that peruses them, as I found when I wrote the History of the Reformation." The practice here lauded may have its conveniences for historians; but few reflecting persons will agree with the bishop, that it is better the jury should decide from a more written report of the evidence than from the whole testimony of the witnesses, as actually delivered, and including the thousand significant indications of deportment and manner, as well as the mere import of their words.

† "In Scotland the queen's advocate signed a citation of the persons accused of treason, setting forth the special matter of which they were accused. This was to be delivered to them, together with the names of the witnesses, fifteen days before the trial. When the jury was empanelled no peremptory challenges were allowed; reasons were to be offered with every challenge; and, if the court admitted them, they were to be proved immediately. Then the matter of the charge, which is there called the relevancy of the libel, was to be argued by lawyers, whether the matter, as upon it should be proved, did amount to high treason or not; this was to be determined by a sentence of the court, called the interloquitor; and the proof of the fact was not till then to be made: of that the jury had the cognizance."—Burnet.

land should be forfeited upon a judgment of high treason. This latter proposition answered fully to Burnet's motion. Both amendments, however, were resisted by the ministers in the Lords. Halifax proposed that they should not take effect so long as the Pretender was alive; and this opinion was seconded by Godolphin. After a long struggle, the success of which was dubious to the last, the amendments were adopted with this qualifying clause, extended by the House of Commons so as to postpone the operation in any case till three years after the accession of the House of Hanover; and the queen hastened to give the bill the royal assent, regardless of a protest which was signed by all the Scots peers. The Tory lords, who had opposed the Union, and what they called the dishonouring of their House by the introduction of elective Scottish peers, now fancied they might derive strength from them; and they began to strike up a wonderful friendship and affection for the northern Thanes. But the Scottish peers distrusted their motives and disliked their foreign policy, and seemed rather to prefer the Old Whigs—as the Whigs out of office, and unconnected with the ministry, were now called. After the Treason Bill for Scotland was carried, to obviate the suspicions of harsh designs and severities, an act of grace was passed, by which all treasons committed before the signing the act, or the 19th of April, 1709, were pardoned, those only excepted that were done upon the sea—an exception meant to include all those who had embarked the preceding year for Scotland with the Pretender.*

But, notwithstanding the act of amnesty on the one side, and the equalization of the laws of treason on the other, the Scots continued their plots and intrigues; and men of the greatest ability among them made a woful abuse of their ingenuity in suggesting to the French court a fresh expedition, and in demonstrating that nothing was so likely to end the war in favour of King Louis as an invasion. In a "New Scheme in relation to Scotland" which was presented to the court of Versailles this year, it was shown how his most Christian majesty had been able to carry on the war with advantage against the united force of the whole House of Austria, the Dutch, and all the princes of Germany, so long as Charles II. and the late King James had sat peaceably upon the English throne. The astonishing change that had since taken place and all the French king's ill successes were attributed wholly and solely to the Prince of Orange (the late King William) and to England's entering upon the war with such vigour. England had not only contributed immense sums of money—"as much as all the other countries put together"—but had given a new turn to the war by employing in it her own native and excellent troops. So long as the late Prince of Orange had been obliged to employ the English troops to reduce Ireland, France had maintained her wonted superiority; but had not the scale of victory turned as soon as the Irish wars were finished and the English troops sent into Flanders? "It is, therefore, evident," says the scheme, "that, of all the expedients that can be proposed to re-establish the affairs of France, the most effectual would be to make a powerful diversion in Great Britain." The French were again solemnly assured "that the greatest and most considerable part of that kingdom" were actually ready to have declared for the Pretender the preceding year if he had only landed; "and the council and ministers of the Princess Anne in Scotland were so convinced of this, that they had already taken measures to return to England, as soon as they should hear of his landing." But, though disappointed then, the Scots were still as willing as ever to join their lawful sovereign; and everything that had happened since had contributed to increase their hatred to England and to facilitate his return. There were, for example, fewer regular troops in Scotland now than then;—the Scots had been well informed of the great earnestness his Britannic majesty had expressed in that expedition, to run any hazard to land among them, and this had gained him the hearts of all more than ever;—they had been worse treated by the English than before, many of them, of highest rank, having been dragged into the prisons of England, upon bare suspicions, contrary to the laws of Scotland, and their ancient nobility, more considerable by the number and dependence of their vassals than by their riches, having been deprived of their rights of vassalage or fiefal superiority, which "touched them in the most sensible part;"—and, finally, the English, by building forts and putting garrisons in several parts of Scotland, had made appear their intention of destroying what remained of their liberty and nationality. The next clause of this scheme goes to prove that the anxiety of the government about the laws of treason had not been without cause. "We have," it is said, "a very recent proof of the dispositions of the Scots, who appeared publicly, with their vassals, in arms, in favour of the king, when he was upon the coast of Scotland. There were two thousand witnesses of the fact, which was notorious and public. The court, wanting to make an example to terrify others of the same party, ordered some of these gentlemen to be tried, not in the least doubting of getting them condemned: yet, though every precaution was taken, not a single witness could be made to appear against them, and the judges unanimously discharged them, and declared them innocent." Even without the letters and signatures which had been sent into France, "from the principal lords of the country," could there be any rational doubt of the disposition of the Scots for a general insurrection, the moment their lawful king should appear among them with the means necessary to back him? If this insurrection began in Scotland it would not end there, but that same confusion which was ready to break out in England last spring would certainly happen again. It was well known that England subsisted and carried on the war merely by the credit of the bills of the Exchequer and of the Bank of London. A run like that of last year, only a little longer, would ruin everything in England, where, moreover, the friends of the lawful sovereign were very numerous, and where the opposite parties were never before so animated against each other—"a circumstance which proved that one of the parties would want no other inducement to declare for the king, than because the contrary party would be attached to the established government." Ireland was represented as on the tiptoe for revolt; and the movement in Scotland would inevitably be followed by a rising there. The great numbers of Catholic bishops, priests, and monks, who had been obliged to take refuge in France, must have proved to his most Catholic majesty how much the true religion was oppressed in that country. 'This was our sore part, and the Jacobite schemer probed it to the quick. "Almost all the ancient families," says he, "are stripped of their estates; no Catholic is allowed to hold any employment, civil or military, and all of them are disarmed. Yet it is well known that there are in that kingdom at least six Catholics for one Protestant; and one may easily judge by the valour and irreproachable conduct of the Irish regiments which serve in France, what their countrymen would be capable of doing at home, if they had arms. In short, one may boldly say, that there is not in nature any one motive that can induce a man to espouse any particular clause or party which the Irish Catholics have not to take that of their lawful king." This universal rising in Ireland and Scotland would of itself make so powerful a diversion, that the grand alliance of the confederate princes would fall to pieces, and France would assuredly regain the superiority which she had lost. But still the most passionate Jacobites in Scotland would hardly consent to rise unless assisted with, at least, 8000 men from France, a good number of well-made and tried arms, with cannon, ammunition, and a certain sum of money. For his Britannic majesty to come with less than this, would be nipping the spirit of the nation. Mr. Ferguson had been among the Highlanders, who had always expressed the greatest inclination of any for the king, and who would run the least hazard by an insurrection; he had asked them whether they would not take up arms if their king should come among them with 400 or 500 men, to be followed by a greater number which his most Christian majesty would promise to send afterwards; and they had all in general rejected the proposal, though well disposed in other respects, and not in the least doubting of success, provided only that the king came well accompanied. But as King Louis could not afford the money and the other means, this new scheme fell to the ground like so many old ones.*

While the furious Scots had been inviting the French, the English government had incurred great odium by admitting a few thousand honest and unfortunate Germans. Upon no people had the curse of the continental war fallen so heavily as upon the Protestants on the Rhine or the subjects of the Palatinate. In time of defeat they had been plundered by the enemy, and in time of victory by their friends; on either side of the Rhine the country had been repeatedly ravaged, and there seemed no end to the march of destructive armies, and their passing and repassing that glorious river. Harassed and dispirited by these uninterrupted calamities, the poor people came to a resolution among themselves to remove far out of the way both of the French and of the confederates, and to seek their fortune in a strange land; and, at last, in an enthusiasm of despair, Papists as well as Protestants resolved to quit for ever their habitations and their native soil, and to transport themselves into England, that happy country which heard the rumours of wars only at a distance, and where, of late years, the common people had known little about campaigns except through illuminations and rejoicings made to celebrate brilliant victories! Some of these Germans, who were all called Palatines in England, came over in the autumn of 1706, others in the spring of 1707; and other bodies of emigrants, from time to time, continued to arrive on our then not very hospitable shores—"as if by direction of an oracle; not with expectation to settle here, but to be transported to America, there to cultivate some waste lands in the English colonies, and to acquire by their labour an honest livelihood."† They were of all kinds of persuasion in religion, miserably poor, and in want of everything. The queen, moved by compassion, had granted them permission to come into England; and the ministers, not fearing any ill consequences from an act of mercy, had given orders for admitting 5,000 of them. As they arrived they pitched their tents and huts on Blackheath, in the neighbourhood of Greenwich, where they remained many months. But the unhappy Germans soon found that the gracious permission to come signified little more than leave to starve in England: no ships were appointed to convey them to the western world, where the colonies were languishing through want of robust arms to till the rich soil; and employment in England was scarce, or rather was difficult to obtain, on account of the prejudices of the people. Some sums were doled out to them from the royal bounty, and some humane gentlemen made subscriptions for them, and began to employ them about their houses or grounds. The influx of so considerable a number into one district probably had the effect of somewhat reducing wages; and the English-workmen and labourers, seeing these Germans hire themselves out by the day at a lower rate than was customary, became furious against them, saying that an Englishman could now only earn eightpence a-day instead of a shilling. From words they proceeded to blows, and it is said that the French refugees who had sought shelter from persecution and misery on this side the Channel were even more pitiless towards the poor German wanderers than were the English boors. If ever there was a case where the voice of party ought to have been hushed, and where the more enlightened classes ought to have exerted themselves against popular ignorance and prejudice, it was assuredly this; yet the Tories did not hesitate to make a handle of it, and for factious purposes they still further inflamed the people. They represented that there was a dangerous plan on foot to supply the places of the native English, cut off in a uselessly protracted war, by importations of bands of foreigners; they maintained that an act of parliament lately made for naturalising foreign Protestants* was meant to forward this scheme; so that, in the end, England would be eaten up by these hungry Germans. These vulgar and atrocious declamations told the more because the price of bread was rather higher than usual. A writer of the day, who is himself not free from party heat, says that the hottest of the Tories always made it a point of religion not to relieve any but those who were of the same principles with themselves; and he charges them with having underhand stirred up the common people, who were naturally averse to foreigners.† But, happily for the character of the nation, there were even in those days public men of more philanthropy and wisdom: many of the bishops, and many other eminent persons, used their best endeavours to procure some substantial relief for the helpless, harmless sufferers, to send part of them into Ireland, and part of them to America. In many cases they took the Germans into their houses or otherwise provided for them; and when the rigours of a bad winter began to be felt they hired empty houses in the suburbs of the city or the villages round London, to shelter the rest of the poor creatures, who as yet had remained houseless and in the open fields. As corn grew dearer and dearer the ignorant mob clamoured that it was all owing to the Palatines and the Papists; and so the cry of the church in danger was revived—we shall presently find it louder than a hurricane;—for some men saw, or pretended to see, evil consequences from the sudden introduction of so many schisms and heresies, and of so much Papistry—for, as we have mentioned, Catholics as well as Protestants had abandoned the Rhine in search of peace and employment on the banks of the Thames, or of the mightier rivers of the American continent. By degrees, however, large parties of the refugees were shipped off for the colonies, and the rest of them, by being dispersed over England or sent into Ireland, were almost lost sight of.

The parliament this session was not less liberal than heretofore. Six millions and a-half were voted as supplies; 220,000*l.* of which was appropriated to the augmentation of the army in Flanders. It was found necessary to contract with the Bank of England for a loan of 400,000*l.*; and the Bank was compensated by the renewal of its charter for twenty-one years, with permission to double its capital by subscription. People complained of poverty, and timid minds were palsied at the spectacle of the fast increasing national debt; but nevertheless both money and confidence were so plentiful in the city of London, that the subscription book of the bank was filled up in one morning. The session closed on the 21st of April. Among its acts was one which defined and limited the privileges of foreign ambassadors. The ambassador from the court of Russia, or, as it was then the fashion to call him, “the Muscovite ambassador,” had been arrested by Mr. Morton, a liceman of Covent Garden for a debt of 100*l.* His excellency claimed his privilege, but the London tradesman obliged him to find bail. Hereupon the emperor’s ambassador and the Prussian and other foreign ministers applied to the court, and demanded satisfaction for the great affront put upon the representative of a sovereign prince and great nation. The Czar Peter thought that hanging was the mildest punishment his sister Anne could inflict on the liceman, the sheriffs, and their officers; and it appears that ministers had some difficulty in convincing this most absolute prince of a semi-barbarous country that matters could not be so managed in England. It was, however, considered necessary to protect diplomatic persons from such suits; and a bill “for preserving the privileges of ambassadors and other public ministers of foreign princes and states,” was brought in and passed. By this act all suits and actions against the Muscovite ambassador or his bail were made void, and it was declared that all process whereby any ambassador or public minister or any of his servants might be detained, or his or their goods distrained, should for the future be adjudged void; that the prosecutors of such suits should be deemed violators of the laws of nations, and suffer such penalties

* An act passed this session that was much desired, and had been often attempted, but had been laid aside in so many former parliaments, that there was scarce any hopes left to encourage a new attempt: it was for naturalising all foreign protestants, upon their taking the oaths to the government, and then receiving the sacrament in any Protestant church. Those who were against the act soon perceived that they could have no strength if they should set themselves directly to oppose it: so they studied to limit strangers in the receiving the sacrament to the way of the Church of England. This probably would not have hindered many who were otherwise disposed to come among us: for the much greater part of the French came into the way of our church. But it was thought best to cast the door as wide open as possible, for encouraging of strangers; and, therefore, since, upon their first coming over, some might choose the way to which they had been accustomed beyond sea, it seemed the more inviting method to admit of all who were in our Protestant communion. This was carried in the House of Commons with a great majority; but all those who appeared for this large and comprehensive way were reproached for their coldness and indifference in the concerns of the church; and in that I had a large share, as I spoke copiously for it when it was brought up to the Lords: the Bishop of Chester spoke as zealously against it, for he seemed resolved to distinguish himself as a zealot for that which was called high church. The bill passed with very little opposition.—Bornet.

and corporal punishment as the lord chancellor and the chief justices, or any two of them, should determine; provided only that no bankrupt putting himself into the service of an ambassador should have the benefit of this act, nor the servant of such ambassador, unless his name were previously registered in the office of one of the principal secretaries of state, and transmitted to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who should hang the list of such servants up in some public place of their office. A copy of this act, engrossed on vellum, and handsomely ornamented, was transmitted to Russia, with a very civil message of apology from the queen; and the great Peter was obliged to content himself with this amount of satisfaction.

During this session the queen appointed a third secretary of state, whose province was to be the kingdom of Scotland; and his grace of Queensberry, who had done so much for the Union, received the appointment. Queensberry, moreover, had been created a peer of England, with the high title of Duke of Dover. This circumstance gave occasion to some debate. Sitting in the parliament of Great Britain, Queensberry yet claimed the right to vote as a Scottish peer at the election of representative peers of Scotland; but it was resolved by the Lords that no peer of Great Britain, whether Scotch or English, sitting in the House by right of a new peerage, should have any such vote. It was also resolved by the other House, that the eldest sons of the Scots peers should be incapable of sitting in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom. This last resolution was invidious as a distinction, and caused a great disgust in Scotland. It has since been rescinded.

The Duke of Marlborough had not returned to England, as usual, in the autumn. After his great successes at Lille and Ghent, he was seriously occupied by some bold movements of the Elector of Bavaria, who besieged and well nigh took the city of Brussels. But, when all the troops had gone into quarters, Marlborough still lingered in the Low Countries, where, indeed, he spent all the winter. As his presence seemed highly necessary in England—as all were aware that he was fully informed of the disgrace of his wife, and of the dangerous ascendancy of Mrs. Masham, his absence seemed strange and unaccountable. It has since been accounted for by ascribing to him very disreputable motives; it has been said that ever since the victory at Ramillies his conquest in Flanders had yielded him a considerable revenue; and that he stayed to get his money together and to make the most of his market while it lasted.* It is fair, however, to observe that Marlborough had other strong motives for remaining on the continent: from the Hague he could keep a better eye upon France, whose condition seemed every day growing more desperate; and, besides, he was aware of overtures and negotiations, private as well as public, that were going on between French agents and Dutch deputies—two classes of men whom he disliked and distrusted for many reasons. His confederate, Prince Eugene, was at Vienna; and there is some probability that it had been arranged between them that Marlborough should remain at the Hague to counterwork the manoeuvres of the French diplomatists and to keep the Dutch—among whom there was always a strong French party—steady to the grand alliance. On all hands the condition of France is represented as most calamitous. The government was in the hands of a set of mean, jealous, and incapable intriguers; the people were in the talons of disease and famine. The dearth of the preceding year had been terrible, and this winter was so cold and so long as to destroy the seeds in the earth. Many thousands died of hunger; and everywhere the peasantry were reduced to scanty supplies of bad food. What in England had been merely a malicious, pointed, but untrue sarcasm, was in France a real truth—money had made itself invisible. Louis's treasury was empty, his debt great and increasing. M. Bernard, the principal of his bankers, with many more of his brethren, broke, and a vast number of persons, before in flourishing circumstances, who had lodged flour in their hands, were reduced to a state of beggary. The system of finance, always defective, had been rendered worse than ever under the pressure of difficulties and the sudden exigencies of the state caused by the defeat and destruction of successive armies. Nearly all the resources of the state were farmed out to those notorious precursors of the greatest of modern revolutions, les Fermiers Généraux: and, what was worse, the public taxes, exposed in open market, were afterwards exacted again of the farmers, whose houses were never free from king's collectors and the collectors of the fermiers généraux, both demanding the same tax. Pensions and public payments were suspended, and the tallies which the king had commanded to pass as money sunk to half of their value; and at last, after frequent alterations and paltry subterfuges, they would not pass at all. If even before this long and ruinous war there were few people of substance in France, except the fermiers généraux and their collectors, the commanders of the army, the untaxed clergy, and some lawyers, the number of people of property now became much less. The loss of the public credit was followed by a stop to private trade, whereby the customs were lessened when the government most wanted them. After everything had been taxed that was possibly taxable, money was raised upon all the provinces under the name of a donative—a thing of the nature of our old English benevolences. Chamillart, and Pontchartrain, and other ministers made a progress through all the countries and towns to raise money for the king's service; or, in other words, they went a begging: a poll-tax was laid upon all servants and children; the high roads swarmed with collectors, tax-gatherers, governors, and intendants, whose rapine and violence were unchecked, and whose double object was to get money for themselves as well as for the government. Since the taking of Lille the question seemed to be, no longer whether France should be victorious, but whether she should continue to exist as an independent kingdom. The confederates had repeatedly crossed her frontier and made plundering incursions into some of her northern provinces: the road to them seemed open to Paris; and a more daring enemy, or one less subjected to the superstitious dread of the time—the leaving fortresses in one's rear,—would in all probability have marched to the Seine and dictated the terms of peace under the walls of that capital. [It is assumed for Marlborough, that he entertained this bold plan, the non-execution of it being attributed to the timidity of the States-General.] A flying party, consisting chiefly of French Huguenots, in the service of England, penetrated as far as the neighbourhood of Paris, and nearly succeeded in their daring enterprise of carrying off the dauphin. It was time to ask what had been the fruits of the grand monarque's insatiable ambition? One of his grandchildren, the Duke of Burgundy, the pupil of Fenelon, is said to have put the question to the old king himself, and to have asked why the Spanish succession should be preferred to the welfare of France—why his brother (King Philip) should be preferred to himself, to all his family and countrymen. The proud old man at last became a supplicant for peace; and he began with the Dutch, whom in his early days he had treated with so much contempt. He dispatched M. de Rouillé, president of the council, to pray for a truce in Flanders. At the Hague this agent was met by Buys and Vanderdussen, who remarked, that, as the allies were stronger in Flanders, so were the French stronger in Spain; that, if Louis would consent to a cessation of arms in Spain, they would also agree to a cessation in Flanders, provided the French king would first of all put some cautionary towns into their hands. Rouillé could not consent to this demand; the Dutch would not yield; and the afflicted president of the council informed Louis that no truce could be hoped for upon his conditions. When his dispatch was read in the French council, it dissipated all hope of peace, making men, however, feel more and more the necessity of obtaining a peace at whatsoever price it might cost. The Duke of Beauvilliers, in pathetic and touching terms, described the fatal consequences of a war which it was no longer possible to sustain; Pontchartrain, the chancellor, made the picture still more dreadful, and both he and the duke implored the rest, as faithful ministers, to tell his majesty the real state of the troops and of the finances. "A scene so sad," says a person principally concerned, "would be difficult to describe, even were it permitted to reveal the secret of what was most touching in it. The king then felt that the condition of a monarch, the absolute master of a great kingdom, is not always the happiest or the most to be desired."* This Frenchman of the old regime adds, in courtly guise, that Louis bore his reverses with the firmness of a hero and the submission of a Christian; that he acquiesced in the dispensations of Providence, and that, consenting to new sacrifices, he instructed Rouillé to recommence the conferences at the Hague with larger promises on his part. But it appears, from better authority, that the grand monarque wept like a whipped schoolboy, and yet was unwilling, in his pride, to concede anything. His instructions, however, imported that Rouillé must do the best to conclude a peace before the opening of another campaign. An offer was made to purchase back Lille, the last great conquest of Marlborough, by yielding up Tournay, or by demolishing the fortifications which Louis had erected at Dunkirk: Sicily Louis was willing to leave to the allies, but he still claimed the kingdom of Naples, which had now been for two years in the undisputed possession of Austria, in lieu of the whole of Spain and the Indies, which his grandson Philip was to resign; he was willing to submit to a congress the interests of his faithful allies, the Electors of Bavaria and Cologne, who had been ruined by their fidelity to him, and who were not likely to obtain mild conditions in any conferences wherein the ministers of the emperor had a voice: and, continuing this species of vicarious sacrifice, Louis engaged to send out of France the Pretender, upon condition that his security and subsistence should be provided for and secured by treaty. But time pressed; it was the end of the month of April before this dispatch was ready, and the opening of the campaign was delayed only by the unusual severity of the season. If there was the slightest delay the war would begin on the French frontier before the negotiations at the Hague could come to anything—nay, if any difficulty occurred, there would scarcely be time for Rouillé to send a courier and receive his answers by another courier from Paris. In short, every moment was of value; and at this crisis the Marquis de Torcy, secretary of state and minister for foreign affairs, volunteered to go to the Hague in person, and take the entire negotiation into his own hands. Louis, after some hesitation, consented to send him; and de Torcy, with a courier's passport, not without fear of being seized by the enemy's troops, or denied access by the Dutch ministers, travelled with speed to the Hague with a dispatch signed by the king himself. He was near being discovered and arrested at Brussels; but, aided and guided by a Dutch banker, who had connexions with France, he reached the quiet door of the Pensionary Heinsius, at the Hague, on the 6th of May, late in the evening. After the minister of the proudest monarch in Europe had waited some time in an antechamber, the pensionary appeared and admitted him to a close conference. A few years before, when Heinsius went to Versailles on a mission from William III., Louvois, the insolent prime minister there, had threatened to throw him into the Bastille;—now the court of France was at his feet. The Dutch statesman, however, was too high-minded to show any triumph.* De Torcy attempted to demonstrate that Holland and England, and all the nations in the confederacy, had blindly engaged themselves to bear the weight of a war which must be useless, or useful only to the house of Austria. He also attempted to prove that Ypres, Menin, Condé, and one or two other third-rate fortresses, would be a sufficient barrier for the United Provinces. But here Heinsius let him know that the late King William had been of a very different opinion, having always recommended Lille as a place necessary for the solidity and strength of a barrier; and he further told him that, if the United Provinces had not hitherto been in a condition to get that place comprised, it behoved them, now that they had got it into their hands by conquest, to keep it. Lille, he added, was no new pretension—it had been demanded before the peace of Ryswick. Nor, when de Torcy passed to the subject of the Spanish succession, did he find any agreement of opinion in the pensionary. Heinsius reminded him of the treaty to which the grand alliance owed its existence, and assured him that it would be impossible to consent to the dismemberment of the Spanish monarchy, or to the cession of the kingdom of Naples or even of the island of Sicily. The Frenchman hereupon said that he had nothing to do but to return to Paris. Heinsius told him that the States-General, without whom he could engage for nothing, would meet in a day or two. To this de Torcy replied that to submit the question to the States would only produce a long-spun negotiation, for which he had no time, his post as secretary of state not permitting him to engage formally in the trade of a negotiator—that the king, his master, had commanded him to address himself directly and solely to him (the pensionary) in order either to finish the work of peace, or to inform himself clearly of the intentions of the States-General. Heinsius then proposed calling in Buys and Vanderdussen, who had been authorised by the States to treat with Rouillé. This de Torcy also declined, repeating the order he had received from his master to address himself only to the pensionary. But, after some diplomatic ruses, the Frenchman consented to confer on the morrow with Buys and Vanderdussen. He found them quite as high in their pretensions as Heinsius, and he was told by them that there could be no thought of peace unless Sicily as well as Naples was given up to the Austrian. "But," says de Torcy, in writing to Louis, "I believe, after all, that they are really interested only about their own barrier. . . . Impatient to return to this article, they left off talking about Spain and Naples, and Sicily, to ask me what your majesty would really do for the Dutch." Notwithstanding his haste, the French minister was detained nearly a month at the Hague. Finding he could do nothing separately with Holland, he agreed to meet the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene. Marlborough, who had made a hasty journey to England, returned accompanied by Lord Townshend, an experienced negotiator, and who was believed to be well disposed to a peace: the Prince Eugene came accompanied by the imperial minister Zinzendorf. De Torcy on his side was assisted by Rouillé, who had begun the negotiation by demanding a truce in Flanders. At the same time he availed himself of the secret services of emissaries and of partisans of France, who went and came between him and the merchants of Amsterdam, notwithstanding the order of the States-General that nobody should visit the French minister's house without a license from the pensionary. As soon as Marlborough arrived, de Torcy saw that the negotiation would end in words; but he thought that an immense moral advantage would be obtained if he could make the world believe—and his own suffering countrymen, in particular—that the heart of Louis was bleeding for suffering humanity; that the great king was ready to purchase peace at any sacrifice short of the independence and honour of his country: and in France he succeeded in producing this impression, although at the Hague he absolutely refused any security for the accomplishment of the evacuation of Spain, and for the other sacrifices that were offered.* He insisted that the promise of his sovereign was security enough: but even this promise he did not pledge very directly, endeavouring rather to make the allies take his own word—with the evident intention of saving his master's honour. Marlborough, Eugene, and those acting with them, maintained that it would be the height of insanity to rest satisfied with a few words, that might be broken as easily as in former times; that it was most unreasonable to expect that while they were treating about terms they should let slip the time for carrying on war, and suspend their preparations for the field, without any security given them on the part of the French King. Then de Torcy said that his

* De Torcy thus describes the friend and confidant of our late King William—"Heinsius, counsellor pensionary of the province of Holland, had been placed in that post by the protection of the Prince of Orange, afterwards king of England. That prince, persuaded of his zeal, and of his attachment to his person and his house, placed an entire confidence in him. . . . He had a consummate knowledge of business, the fruit of a long experience; intimately connected with Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, he deliberated with them on all their projects, and regulated the time of their execution. These three together directed everything; they were the soul of the confederacy. But the pensionary was neither accused of a desire to prolong the war on account of the consideration it gave him, nor suspected of any view to his personal interest. His exterior was simple. No pomp in his house; his establishment consisted merely of a secretary, a coachman, a footman, and a female servant, which did not indicate the greatness of a prime minister. The appointments he received from the republic amounted to 24,000 florins, the greater part of which he received as keeper of the seal. His manners were cold but without any rudeness; his conversation was polite; and he rarely grew heated in argument or dispute. All the recent treaties, including the Partition Treaty, had passed under his hands."

* The security demanded by the allies was, that some cautionary towns should be put into their hands till Philip had delivered up the whole of Spain to Charles.

king's good inclination, his great age, and the situation of his affairs, were in themselves a sufficient security for all that was promised. During these discourses the eyes of the French minister were frequently flooded with tears. These may have been forced from him by the miseries of his country; but they were certainly not calculated to make the allies cede any of their resolutions. The ambassadors of every court represented they had heard, in the days of his prosperity, little else than insult and bravado from Louis at Versailles; and the inference now to be drawn was, that his fortunes must be low indeed, and his spirit gone, when one of his cabinet ministers could weep before an assembly of Dutchmen, Englishmen, and Austrians. The Dutch negotiators, however, continued to be rather lukewarm on the question of Spain; and in the end they agreed to take "the word of a king" on that point. At the end of May the confederates gave de Torey their ultimatum in forty preliminary articles. Their chief demands were—1. That the French king should acknowledge the succession of King Charles III. to all the rights and dominions of the crown of Spain. 2. That the Duke of Anjou (King Philip) then in possession of the greater part of Spain, should, within the term of two months, depart out of that kingdom with his whole family; that the French king, within that time, should cause Sicily to be delivered to King Charles; and that, if the Duke of Anjou should not assent, then the French king should unite with the confederates in reducing him to obedience, "so that all Europe might enjoy a perfect tranquillity." 3. That the French king should recall, within two months, whatever forces he had in Spain, Sicily, or the Indies; and promise, on the word of a king, not to support the Duke of Anjou, nor assist him with troops, money, or provisions. 4. That the monarchy of Spain should remain whole and entire to the House of Austria; that none of the dominions of it, either in whole or in part, should ever be united to France by any tie or authority whatever, or by legacy, covenant, succession, marriage, purchase, contract, free gift, or by any other title whatsoever; that no prince reigning in France, nor any prince of the House of Bourbon, should ever acquire any right to any cities, places, or jurisdictions within the dominions of Spain, either by exchange or by marriage, by purchase, or by any other right whatsoever; and that this should apply particularly to Spanish Flanders. 5. That the French king should never become possessed of the Spanish Indies, nor send any ships thither for commerce, either directly or indirectly. 6. That the French king should deliver up to his imperial majesty the city and citadel of Strasburg, together with Port Kehl and its appendages; that he should also deliver up to the emperor the town of Brisac, and at his own expense demolish all the fortified places he had on the Rhine between Basle and Philipsburg: Alsace he was to retain; but the emperor was to be at liberty to demolish Landau

if he thought fit. 7. That the French king should acknowledge the title of the Queen of Great Britain, and the succession of her crown according to the Act of Settlement; that he should deliver up to her Britannic Majesty all that he then possessed in Newfoundland; and that he should, within the space of two months, and at his own expense, raze or fill up all the fortifications on one side of the port of Dunkirk, according to the direction of the Queen of Great Britain and the States-General, with all the works, moles, bulwarks, banks, and sluices; that he should demolish the other half within two months more, and never repair the same, nor suffer it to be made a port capable of receiving ships for the future. 8. That the person calling himself King of Great Britain should be sent out of France, and that a treaty of commerce should be arranged between France and England. 9. That the French king should yield and make over to the States-General, as a barrier, the places of Furne, Fort Kenou, Menin, Saverge, Ypres, Warneton, Comines, Wervick, Lille, Condé, Tournay, and Maubeuge. 10. That, further, he should be obliged to deliver up all the fortified places, castles, and cities which he had taken in the Spanish Netherlands. 11. That Louis should acknowledge the new King of Prussia and the new Elector of Hanover; and restore to the Duke of Savoy whatever he had taken from him in the duchy of Savoy or the country of Nice, and make over to him the town of Exilles, Fenestrelles, and Chaumont, together with the valley of Pragelas. 12. That, as to what formerly belonged to the electors of Bavaria and Cologne, their rights and pretensions should be referred to the congress which was to settle this peace. 13. That the congress should meet forthwith, and that the general treaty of peace should, if possible, be concluded within two months after its opening. 14. That, in order to the conclusion of this peace within the space of two months, there should be a cessation of arms, to commence immediately after the ratification of these present articles. De Torey, instructed by a special dispatch from Louis, attempted to procure better conditions by bribing the Duke of Marlborough, whose love of money, increasing with his years, was notorious to all Europe. "I doubt not," says his most Christian majesty to his minister, "but that you profit by every opportunity of seeing the Duke of Marlborough, in letting him know that I am informed of the efforts he has made to hinder the progress of these conferences for a peace, and even to break them; at which I am the more surprised, as I had room to believe, after the assurances he had given, that he would have contributed to the peace; and I should be happy if he would so act as to get the recompense I have made be promised to him.* And, to enable you to explain yourself more clearly with him, I wish you to give him a positive promise that I will cause to be remitted to him two millions of livres, if he will contribute by his good offices:—the reservation of Naples and Sicily for the king (Philip), my grandson; or, at the worst, the reservation of Naples alone. I would give him the said gratification if he would preserve to me Dunkirk with its port and fortifications, without the reservation either of Naples or of Sicily: I would give as much to be enabled to keep Strasburg: but, of all these different advantages, the one I should prefer is the reservation of Naples. I would consent to raise his gratification to three millions of livres, if he would contribute to procure for me both Naples and Dunkirk. . . . Finally, I wish you to offer the Duke of Marlborough even as much as four millions, if he will facilitate for me the means of obtaining both Naples and Sicily for my grandson, and retaining Dunkirk, its ports and fortifications, and Strasburg and Landau for myself.* When de Torcy made these tempting offers, Marlborough blushed, and changed the conversation. It is stated, on the authority of manuscript letters and of a conversation of Rouillé, that Harley had his spies upon the duke; and that the offer of the bribe was discovered and communicated through Mrs. Masham to the queen.† De Torcy, upon the rejection of the millions of livres, intimated to the duke that he was in the secret of his intrigues with the court of St. Germain: and here he says that Marlborough blushed again, yet still refused to become a mediator for King Louis. The Frenchman then pretended that his master would make a virtue of necessity, and submit to these hard conditions in order to prevent further misery and bloodshed; and he set off for Paris with the preliminaries in his portfolio. He had kept off hostilities till the 1st. of June, and he hoped, at least, to gain a few more weeks. At Douay he met Marshal Villars, showed him the hard articles, and advised him to put his army in order. Old Villars expressed his confidence in the bravery of his troops, but told the minister that, in the course of a month, the men would be without bread, and obliged to trust to Providence for their subsistence. When de Torcy reached Paris, Rouillé was recalled from the Hague; Prince Eugene was informed that his most Christian majesty could never accept the terms proposed by the allies. The confederates, on their part, declared that, unless he accepted the articles as now proposed by the 15th of June, they would never again offer him such good terms. By the advice of de Torcy, the grand monarque condescended to write circular letters to the local authorities throughout all the provinces of France, declaring that he had tried all methods in order to restore peace; that he had spared himself no sacrifice, but that he had been opposed and disappointed by the insatiableness of his enemies—by men who delighted in war for the sake of their own private interests. “The more easy I was,” said this royal apologist, “the more hard and difficult they became. If I granted all they asked it would be to the ruin and perpetual infamy of the nation and French name.” He also declared in his council, that, if he must make war, he would rather make it against his enemies than his own family. That susceptible people were warmed and excited, and, half-starving as they were, they applauded the patriotism of their aged king, and exerted themselves to their utmost to support him. His letters and speeches, and the representations of his skillful emissaries, produced an impression in other countries, until it became an article of belief with many, even at London and Vienna, that the allies had exacted far too much, and that they might and ought to grant peace upon milder conditions. The article in the preliminaries most generally criticised was that wherein the confederates would have bound Louis to make war upon his own grandson King Philip. But it was as positively affirmed by others that the French king had procured the conference at the Hague, and proposed the treaty of peace, only with a design to avoid the pressing danger and to gain time,—that he never for a single moment seriously intended to give up Spain or to agree to any other important sacrifice. Prince Eugene declared that the only proper place to treat with the French was a field of battle; and by the 21st of June he and Marlborough took the field; crossed the frontiers of France, and drew up in a large plain not far from Lille. Villars occupied a well-entrenched camp in their front, covered on each side by impassable morasses. The confederates, not daring either to attack him there or to march upon Paris and leave him where he was, struck off by night, on the 27th of June, for Tournay, a strong place, but insufficiently garrisoned. Villars vainly attempted to throw into it a reinforcement of 7000 men; the besiegers broke ground before it on the 7th of July; but Tournay did not surrender to Prince Eugene till the 30th, and then it was only the town that capitulated, the citadel not being taken until the 3rd of September. On the same day, leaving a force under the Earl of Albemarle to level the works, Marlborough and Eugene marched into Hainault to lay siege to Mons. Villars, having quitted his entrenched camp, manœuvred with the view of guarding the approaches to Mons and cutting off the confederates’ van, which was commanded by the Prince of Hesse. Marshal Boufflers joined him at this critical moment, and shared the command with him. On the 9th of September the outposts of the two armies were slightly engaged; but the French fell back to an encampment near the town of Malplaquet, and passed the night in fortifying their front. Marlborough and Eugene were waiting for their rear guard; and for the two following days the hostile forces stood opposite to each other. On the evening of the 11th, when the forces they expected had come up, Marlborough and Eugene, in spite of the objections of the Dutch field-deputies, who represented that it would be a hopeless attempt to force Villars and Boufflers in their camp, resolved to give battle on the morrow. And accordingly, on the 12th of September, they fought and won the battle of Malplaquet—a battle more terrible than either Ramillies or Blenheim. After fighting from eight in the morning till three in the afternoon, the French retreated upon Maubeuge, Valenciennes, and Condé; leaving the field of battle, strewed with 30,000 dead, to the confederates. The forest of Ardennes served to protect the French from pursuit, and to enable them to carry off most of their artillery and standards. Villars was badly wounded in the battle, and forced to quit the field before the decisive moment; Prince Eugene was wounded; and the Duke of Argyll, who led the van, and fought most gallantly, had his coat cut and shot through in many places; Colonel Cranstoun was killed by a cannon-ball as he was upon his knees at prayer. A vast number of officers were killed and wounded, but Marlborough escaped unhurt. The conquerors proceeded to Mons; but that place detained them till the 23rd of October, when it was deemed too late a season to undertake anything else. The bloody tragedy of Malplaquet, however, reduced Louis to sue again for peace. Through the medium of Petikum, the resident of the Duke of Holstein at the Hague, he proposed that the negotiations there should be renewed. The States refused, but consented that Petikum should go to France in order to concert some expedient. Petikum went to Versailles in the month of November; but in the mean time King Philip published a manifesto protesting against everything that might be done to his prejudice, and declaring his resolution to adhere to his faithful Spaniards as long as there was a man among them that would stand by him; and Petikum on returning to the Hague carried with him an open declaration from his most Christian majesty that he would not pledge himself to drive Philip out of Spain. This declaration put an end to Petikum's mediation, and the States-General advised their allies to prepare for prosecuting the war with more vigour next campaign. The course of military operations in the Peninsula, though far from being decisive, had this year been favourable to Philip. Lord Galway, with his British and Portuguese troops, had been again defeated on the frontier of Estremadura. Alicant, after a very long siege, had been reduced by a French and Spanish force, and nothing had been gained by the allies except the town of Ballaguer, on the frontier of Catalonia. But we pass to a new species of war,—

For Saccheverell of Southwark a sermon has preach'd,
For which he must stand by the Commons impeach'd.*

On the 15th of November Anne had opened the session of parliament in person. She declared that the common enemy of Europe had been using all his artifices to amuse with false appearances and deceitful insinuations of a desire for peace, in the hope of creating divisions or jealousies among the allies. She was happy to state that the operations of the war had not been delayed, and that the campaign had been at least as glorious as any that had preceded it. France was now much more exposed and open to the impression of her arms than at the beginning of the campaign, and consequently more in need of a peace. She then asked, as usual, for liberal supplies, that she might put the last hand to this great work of reducing the exorbitant and oppressive power which had so long threatened the liberties of Europe. The Lords, in their address, fully approved of her majesty's rejecting the proposals of Louis, and resenting his artifice and insincerity; they praised the Duke of Marlborough; and they encouraged her majesty to carry on the war till France should be compelled to submit. The Commons made precisely the same kind of address, and soon proceeded to vote an increase of the army, and 6,200,000*l.* as supplies. They also waited upon the Duke of Marlborough, on his return to England, to thank him for his eminent services: but on the side of the court Marlborough saw nothing but clouds.

For some time past the Tory leaders had been at work with the more combustible portion of the high church preachers, and the pulpits of the kingdom had been resounding with new cries of the church in danger. There was one Dr. Henry Sacheverell, an obscure divine of little moral character and still less ability—a fellow that had been a furious Whig, but, getting no promotion, had suddenly turned Tory, heaped abuse upon the party he deserted, and talked his way to the living of St. Saviour's, Southwark. His impudence was measureless; and he had a very loud voice. There was nothing original in his proceedings, for there were several models to follow. One Francis Higgins, for example, a debauched Irish Protestant clergyman, had recently performed before the people, and made loud and lamentable outcries about the dangerous state of the church, the hardness of the times, the wickedness of the ministry, the lord-general, and all men in place. He had bawled in churches till the roofs shook; he had gone about the streets and suburbs of London raving and declaiming; retiring, after the spiritual exercises, to his ale and his women. But, though Sacheverell followed, he had the fortune to surpass this model. At an assize sermon preached at Derby on the 15th of August, he had made a terrible onslaught upon the government; and on the 5th of November, the anniversary of the gunpowder plot, he had preached before the lord mayor and corporation of London, in St. Paul's Cathedral, upon the words of St. Paul,—“Perils from false brethren.” In the latter sermon he excelled himself in abuse and scurrility; he held up Godolphin, the lord-treasurer, by the name of Volpone, to the detestation of all good Christians; and he inveighed against some of the bishops as perfidious prelates and false sons of the church, because they approved of toleration and were against persecuting the Dissenters. He asserted in the broadest terms the exploded doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance, and spoke of the Revolution as an unrighteous change and an unpardonable offence. With foaming lips and with fists thundering, he proclaimed that the Church of England, the Church of Christ, was assaulted by deadly enemies, and only faintly defended by professed friends; that it was necessary—now or never—to put on the whole armour of God, and to stand up in defence. The magistrates and common-councilmen, who, it is said, did not attentively observe his words (probably they were thinking more of the good dinner which always followed the Fifth of November sermon), gave thanks to the preacher as a matter of course; but Sir Peter King, who was one of them, “and the quickest of them all,” complained that the sermon contained many things which were false, injurious, impious, and tending to sedition and schism in the church. Another alderman, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, “a man both eloquent and rich,” was of the same opinion; and insisted that Sacheverell ought to be called to account. Nevertheless the doctor proceeded to print his inflammatory discourse with a flaming dedication to the lord mayor. The Tories, and all that opposed the ministry, cried the sermon up to the skies, and took so much pains about it that it was calculated above 40,000 copies were printed and distributed throughout the kingdom.—[Dr. Samuel Johnson said he was told by his father that nothing ever sold like it except ‘The Whole Duty of Man.’]—The ministers were irritated, and the queen herself pretended to be much displeased. The matter was laid before the council. The solicitor-general and others thought that the best way of dealing with Sacheverell was to burn his sermon and keep him in prison during the session; but the great Marlborough was for more violent proceedings, saying that such preachers might preach them all out of the kingdom: Godolphin also, who had been described in the sermon in a manner that was next to naming him, proposed severe measures; and the whole council agreed that the offender should be prosecuted. But still there remained a question among them as to the court in which he should be tried; nor were they unanimous as to the degree of punishment which ought to be adopted. Some were for leaving him to the ordinary judges in courts of law; some for calling him before themselves; but others were of opinion that he ought to be impeached before parliament. Sunderland was for the impeachment; Somers was against it. “I think it best,” said Somers, “to make use of that ordinary method of process which our laws have provided. If the majority of the noble lords should absent themselves, or if the members of the Commons should revolt to the other party, you will then find it too late to have recourse to judiciary proceedings: for when your adversaries perceive you are feeble they will become the more daring. Order a charge to be drawn up against the offender; but still take care not to consult your passions or affections more than your own dignity and usage: we are all of us liable to passion; and no man looks upon the injuries done to himself as small ones: for my own part, indeed, I look upon those which Dr. Sacheverell has done to the ministry to be very great; but, in the punishment thereof, let no hatred, revenge, anger, or passion interpose; for where these take place, the mind does not easily discern the truth; or, if it does discern it, it is not apt to embrace it; and that which would pass among others as anger only our people would call cruelty in the government, which is odious to all men." But this opinion, which tended to clemency, was overruled by the Duke of Marlborough, the Earl of Sunderland, and their friends; and an impeachment was resolved upon. When the impeachment was moved in the House of Commons, Garrard, the lord mayor of London, and a member of the House, was examined upon the point whether the sermon was printed at his order or not. "Upon his owning it," says Burnet, "he would have been expelled the House; but he denied he had given any such order, though Sacheverell affirmed it, and brought witnesses to prove it: yet the House would not enter upon their examination; but it was thought more decent to seem to give credit to their own member, though, indeed, few believed him." Some opposition was made in the Lower House,* but the motion for impeaching Sacheverell was carried by a great majority. The proceedings, however, were so slow that the high church party, and the intriguing politicians in league with them, had abundance of time to agitate and prepare the people, who, among other things, must certainly have been moved by unpleasant traditions of the starchness and tyranny of the mass of the Dissenters when they had the upper hand. It was given out boldly, and in all places, that the Dissenters, the Puritans, and the Presbyterians were about to recover their old ascendancy; that a design was formed by the Whigs to pull down the church; that the prosecution of Sacheverell was only to try their strength; and that, upon their success in it, they would proceed to their object openly and fearlessly. It was observed that the trumpeters of alarm, the spreaders of these reports, were well supplied with money; and that a zeal for the establishment was kept warm and glowing by copious libations of strong ale. The common clergy generally espoused Sacheverell as their champion, who had stood in the breach, and they reckoned his cause their own. Hence the batteries of the pulpit were all on one side. Many sermons were preached both in town and country to provoke the people, in which design they succeeded beyond expectation. Their success, perhaps, would have been less but for the dearthness of provisions, which put the poor in bad humour, and kept them in a state of mind proper for violence or revolt.

A. D. 1710.—Moreover, the Duke of Marlborough played into the hands of his enemies by causing fresh delays and interruptions. The Commons had voted the sermons of Sacheverell to be malicious, scandalous, and seditious libels, highly reflecting on her majesty and her government, the late glorious Revolution, and the Protestant succession, as early as the 13th of December, and they had impeached him and taken him into the custody of their serjeant on the 15th; but the articles were not carried up to the Lords till the 13th of January (1710); and then, through Marlborough, who made many pretences to excuse himself from coming to parliament, saying that he was busy in preparing for the war, and that his duty called him over to Holland, the trial was not commenced before the 27th of February. There were also several significant little circumstances, which tended to convince the people of the truth of the assertions of the preachers and trumpeters, that the heart of the queen was wholly with the doctor, and that the honest and noble men in parliament would see the error of their ways and prevent cruel extremities. For example, when Sacheverell was brought before the Commons he was attended by Dr. Lancaster, vice-chancellor of Oxford, and by above a hundred of the most eminent clergymen in town, among whom were several of her majesty's chaplains. And though the Commons refused to admit the doctor to bail, and kept him in the custody of their serjeant, the Lords admitted him to bail as soon as the Commons gave him over to the black rod. In the mean time the clergy flocked together, and traversed both town and country, so that many places were full of riot, and little was heard in the land except the old war-ery of the church in danger. The lowest in condition were the loudest in their outcry: in the city of London butchers' boys, chimney-sweepers, scavengers, costermongers, prostitutes, formed the most conspicuous part of the church chorus and of the defenders of the doctor. It seems certain that the veteran Marlborough was more afraid of this kind of war than of stern contests in the field, like those at Blenheim and Malplaquet. Perhaps he had still some faint hope of recovering ground with the queen, by falling in with her well-known prejudices, or, at least, by withdrawing from the contest with the doughty divine. His friends were offended at his lukewarmness, as they could not so

* Harley attempted to palliate the offence, and described Sacheverell's sermon as too silly a thing to be dangerous—as "a circumgyration of incoherent words, without any regular order;" he would not say but some of the passages were such as he could not approve of, although he could not think them deserving a charge of high crimes and misdemeanors: the sermon seemed to him rather offensive than religious; but, then, the man was too inconsiderable to be prosecuted by impeachment. One of the members replied that Mr. Harley was making use of such a circumgyration of incoherent words as he had himself been condemning in Sacheverell; so that the House could not discover from his expressions whether he spoke for the doctor or against him. During all these proceedings Harley was in the habit of feasting with the zealots, and inviting them to dinner in his own house. The Earl of Nottingham also took extraordinary pains in favour of Sacheverell.

well answer for the success of their proceedings in his absence; many of the peers complained that he showed a disregard to his own honour in keeping away from parliament. And, while his friends were thus uneasy, his enemies availed themselves of the opportunity of his going over to Holland to insinuate, through Mrs. Masham, that he was gone to procure a petition from the army for the immediate removal of the favourite from the queen. It appears that Anne had for some time past entertained a dread that some motion might be made in parliament against Mrs. Masham: and now she sent about in much concern to many persons, imploring them to stand by her, as if some great attack were really going to be made. She invited a number of the peers to attend her, and earnestly pressed them one by one to be mindful of their duty to her, and to resist any petition of the army which the Duke of Marlborough might present to the parliament, and any attempt whatsoever to deprive her of the society and services of her present favourite.* Marlborough and his party denied that there had ever been any such project; but Cunningham asserts that some persons of distinction were reported to have proposed in secret conferences, held late at night, something tending to an address for removing Mrs. Masham, which was opposed by Somers, Cowper, and Godolphin, as too harsh, and not agreeable to the laws of the land, but hotly seconded by Sunderland, who was boiling with revenge. "The Earl of Wharton and the Lord Halifax," adds Cunningham, "who, with all duty to the queen, were desirous of having the kingdom governed according to the constitution, are said to have modestly insisted that evil counsellors of one sex, as well as of the other, might be lawfully removed from the throne, by the advice of parliament. But this affair continued still a secret: so that I know not anything of certainty more than that many were of opinion at that time, that the peers should provide for their own safety and that of their allies, and take care that the kingdom should not receive any damage. It appears that the Duke of Marlborough neglected the opinion of the Earl of Sunderland, who declared that he could find out and name such men as would manage this affair in parliament, and that he came into Lord Somers's sentiments, rather to wait for a favourable opportunity, than to expose himself and the government to hazard, upon the uncertain and not sufficiently approved custom of former times. He is therefore said to have politely waived certain petitions presented to him, when he was in his chariot, entreating him to put off his journey. He persevered in his resolution of going to Holland, even before Sacheverell's trial should be over: nor did the seditious tumults in the city detain him." London, indeed, had been a scene of riot ever since the arrest of the troublesome doctor. There was every day a prodigious mob, and the more respectable class of the citizens began to apprehend that all this drinking and rioting might not pass unattended with robbing and killing, or maiming. The susceptibilities of the purse were excited, and many declared that the cause ought not to be tried in a public and ostentatious manner at such a turbulent and dangerous time,—that it would be better to leave Sacheverell to be dealt with by his bishop, or, otherwise, to put off his trial till another time. The Lords, however, ordered the trial to be at the bar of their House; but, it being moved that Westminster Hall would be a proper place, they changed their resolution, and Westminster Hall was prepared accordingly, exactly in the form of the House of Lords; and the trial opened on the 27th of February, as appointed, with a wonderful deal of show and ceremony. A box was prepared near the throne for the queen, who attended in a private character. On the one side of the hall benches were erected for the Commons of Great Britain, and accommodations were provided for noble ladies and gentlewomen. There was a kind of platform raised for the managers of the impeachment, and another for the doctor and his counsel. There were galleries erected at the end of the hall for the people, who flocked thither in such vast numbers as to excite a dread that the whole erection would come toppling down upon the heads of those beneath. "The noble ladies who attended the trial were very much afraid lest somewhat in their dress or behaviour there should give occasion to the 'Tatler' or 'Observer' to turn them into ridicule in their papers: they came thither to see and be seen, or else out of a groundless opinion, that the church of England would be ruined by the punishment which was to be inflicted upon this one priest."[†]

When their lordships were seated, the Lord Chancellor (Cowper) asked whether it was their pleasure that Dr. Sacheverell should be called to appear before them? Their lordships, going through the form, answered aloud in the affirmative; and then Sacheverell came to the bar with great boldness and confidence, being attended by Dr. Smalridge and Dr. Atterbury, who stood by his side during nearly the whole time of his trial. The frog in the fable was nothing to the doctor! He was so swollen and inflated, so lifted up with the sense of his recently-acquired importance, that men who knew him well could hardly recognise in him their old acquaintance, the minister of a poor church in the Borough. Besides Smalridge and Atterbury (both learned ecclesiastics), Sacheverell had the assistance of counsel learned in the law, at the head of whom were Sir Simon Harcourt

* Cunningham. The Duchess of Marlborough says: "This application and the closting some persons, who were known enemies to the Revolution, gave encouragement to the Jacobites; several of whom were now observed running to court with faces full of business and satisfaction, as if they were going to get the government into their hands. And this being represented to the queen, as a kind of victory gained by her over the Marlborough family, was doubtless one means of hindering all thoughts of a real accommodation."—Account of Conduct.

and Mr. Constantine Phipps. The managers for the Commons were the Lord William Paulet and Lord Coningsby, Sir Thomas Parker, Sir Joseph Jekyl, Sir John Hollis, Sir John Holland, Sir James Montague, and Sir Peter King; Mr. Henry Boyle, Mr. Robert Eyre, Mr. James Stanhope, and Mr. Robert Walpole; Mr. Spencer Cowper, Mr. John Smith, Mr. John Dolben, and Mr. William Thomson; Sir David Dalrymple, who was appointed to be one of them, was by some sickness or indisposition prevented from attending the trial. Proclamation being made for silence, the doctor was asked if he was ready to take his trial before their lordships? He replied that he was, and should ever be ready to submit to the laws of the land. The articles of impeachment were then read, reciting—1. That Dr. Sacheverell, in his sermon, had publicly reflected upon the late Revolution, and suggested that the means used to bring it about were odious and unjustifiable. 2. That he had opposed and defamed the toleration granted to Dissenters, and had cast scurrilous reflections upon those who favoured and defended liberty of conscience. 3. That he had seditiously suggested that the church of England was in great peril under her majesty's administration. 4. That he had suggested to the people that the constitution, as well ecclesiastical as civil, was in danger of destruction; and had reproachfully called those, whom her majesty had promoted to high stations in church and state, spurious and false brethren: that he had plainly called the lord high treasurer of the kingdom Volpone: and had also given opprobrious names to the rest of the ministers; and, in the exercise of a sacred function, had wickedly wrested and perverted the Holy Scriptures.

Several of the managers for the Commons spoke long and eloquently in support of these charges; but the speech of the rising Robert Walpole was much admired by the Whigs: "I hope," said Walpole, "that your lordships' just judgment will convince the world that every seditious, discontented, hot-headed, ungifted, unedifying preacher, (the doctor will pardon me for borrowing one string of epithets from him, and for once using a little of his own language,) who has no hope of distinguishing himself in the world, but by a matchless indiscretion, may not advance with impunity doctrines destructive of the peace and quiet of her majesty's government, and the Protestant succession; or prepare the minds of the people for an alteration, by giving them ill impressions of the present establishment and its administration. . . This doctrine of unlimited, unconditional passive obedience, was first invented to support arbitrary and despotic power, and was never promoted or countenanced by any government that had not designs some time or other of making use of it. What then can be the design of preaching this doctrine now, unasked, unsought for, in her majesty's reign, when the law is the only ruling measure both of the power of the crown and of the obedience of the people?"* After his counsel had pleaded Sacheverell offered a defence of his own, but which was suspected not to be of his own composition. He had probably been assisted in it by the learning and literary habits of Smalridge and Atterbury, who both, and especially the latter, must have despised the low-minded ignorant block-head they were helping to convert into a champion of the church and of Toryism. In the first place the doctor dwelt at some length upon the dignity of the holy order to which he belonged, and which was equally concerned with himself in this cause. Then he excused his conduct with subtle arguments, expressed in logical forms; and he finished by calling God and his Holy Angels to witness that he had never been guilty of the wicked, seditious, or malicious intentions imputed to him in the Commons' impeachment. The Countess of Sunderland, one of Marlborough's daughters, and a lady as generally admired for her piety and virtue as for her exceeding beauty, was so much affected at this appeal to God to witness what she was convinced was a falsehood, that she could not refrain from shedding tears. But the majority of the "noble ladies" present felt the appeal in a very different way: they believed it to be the bold voice of innocence and truth; and some of them fancied that they almost saw ministering angels hovering round the wig of the impeached priest. The Duchess of Hamilton, in particular, "who always favoured the prevailing cause," exhausted her strength and spirits in proclaiming the doctor's innocence: and others likened him to St. Paul, who had said—"I could wish myself accursed or cut off for my brethren." When Sacheverell left the hall on the first day of his trial to return to his comfortable and well-stocked lodging in the Temple, the countless mob that had stood shouting during the proceedings in Palace Yard followed him with tremendous huzzas up Whitehall and all along the Strand. His more immediate body-guard was a company of London butchers, who are said to have been hired for the occasion. His chairmen—for the doctor used a chair—walked erect and elate as if they were carrying a queen, or something higher. The streets were thronged; and people of both sexes, "better born than bred," saluted him with great ceremony and profound respect from the balconies and windows; while some of them even threw down presents for him. The doctor officiously returned these compliments from his chair, nodding and bowing like a Chinese idol. He expressed a sovereign contempt for his adversaries, and behaved as if he were the doctor of doctors. "This huzzaing," says Defoe, "made the doctor so popular, that the ladies began to talk of falling in love with him; but this was only a prelude to the high church affair: an essay was to be made on the mob, and the huzzaing by the rabble was to be artfully improved.† On the very next day, the 28th of February, the second day of the trial, those who had attended the doctor to Westminster Hall in the morning assembled about dusk in the evening, together with a gang of sweeps, link-boys, and people of similar condition, and forthwith began to plunder and burn the meeting-houses of the Dissenters. The Tory writers represent that, as at the Revolution, when they thought their religion to be in danger from the Papists, the Londoners pulled down Catholic chapels and broke into the houses of several that were marked as zealots of the church of Rome; so now, when they regarded the church of England to be in an imminent danger from the Dissenters, they, in the like manner and of their own impulse, expressed their resentment against the Dissenters, which was a thing so natural as to excite neither astonishment nor any serious blame. But in reply to this miserable tu quoque, the writers on the other side maintain that it was not a spontaneous movement—that the fellows who began the riot acted according to instructions. [We should hint, however, that some men of the most liberal minded of the Whigs looked upon the riots at the Revolution and the present disturbances in a very different light, and that, while they held it to be an atrocious crime to make a bonfire of Dissenters' chapels, they could look upon the burning of the Catholic chapels in 1688 as a very venial offence. So slow have been the steps of religious toleration.] The first attack was made upon Mr. Burgess, minister of a dissenting congregation, in a court near Lincoln's Inn Fields. They broke into his meeting-house, now called Gate-street Chapel, carried off cushions and bibles, pulled down the pulpit and the pews, collected the benches, the curtains, the sconces, and everything that was combustible, carried them all into Lincoln's Inn Fields, and there made a bright bonfire, shouting as it burned, "High Church and Sacheverell! Sacheverell and High Church." A similar destruction, with the same sort of bonfire, took place at the meeting-houses of Mr. Earl, in Long-acre, of Mr. Bradbury, in New-street, Shoe-lane, of Mr. Taylor, in Leather-lane, of Mr. Wright, in Black-friars, and of Mr. Hamilton, in Clerkenwell. When the mob came to Clerkenwell they destroyed the chapel belonging to St. John's parish—a chapel of the establishment, but which, in their ignorance, they mistook for a meeting-house, as it had no steeple. In outward and visible matters, they could only distinguish between a steeple and no steeple; and, if the conflicting creeds had been submitted to their examination, it may be doubted whether they would have known the one from the other. On the other side of the square, close to St. John's chapel, Clerkenwell, lived Bishop Burnet, who was certainly among the prelates that Sacheverell had denounced, and who, whatever may have been his other merits, was always the active advocate of toleration. The mob made a rush upon his residence, and would have treated it as if it had been a meeting-house; but the respectable people in the neighbourhood had the spirit to resist them; and upon the timely arrival of some of the queen's guards the rabble desisted. By this time the court was in a consternation, and presently information was received from the Directors of the Bank of England that the rioters were moving in that direction. The queen and all about her were seized with a paleness and trembling; but the Earl of Sunderland sent for Captain Horsey, and commanded him to march immediately with a detachment of the guards into the city. Horsey asked whether he was to preach or to fight. Sunderland replied that he must use his judgment and discretion, and forbear to resort to violent means, except in case of absolute necessity. But the skirmishers for the high church had not the least inclination to come to blows; and when George Purchas, one of their ringleaders, who had formerly been a life-guardsmen, tried to make a stand with a few of the most resolute of them, crying out "High Church and Doctor Sacheverell," he soon found that he was left to cry alone, and that even his staunchest adherents were running away as fast as their legs would carry them—and, thus circumstanced, the hero was obliged to make a hasty retreat likewise. There was a slight show of opposition near Fleet Ditch, but, after receiving a few sabre cuts, and losing some of their number as prisoners, the rabble rout there fled likewise, leaving the guards in peaceable possession of the streets of the city, where they patrolled all night. Yet even in these disgraceful scenes there were encouraging symptoms of the national and deep-rooted aversion to blood—that most glorious attribute of the English people. Not a life was sacrificed, either by the mad mob or by the provoked soldiery: the maximum of the mischief to the person lay in a few broken heads and a few flesh wounds. Bishop Burnet says, that the rioters were directed by some of better fashion, who followed the mob in hackney coaches, and were seen sending messages to them. Cunningham says it was whispered that the tumults were excited, and the rioters directed by many gentlemen in disguise, who threw money out of their coaches. "But of this," he adds, "there never appeared any legal proof: however, among others, there were some of her majesty's guards and watermen taken in the very act of rioting, so that the court itself was not free from suspicion: but the queen, in order to prevent all the reflections on her own conduct, issued orders to repair the damage, and promised that her servants should be brought to a fair trial." Yet "the trumpeters" were so far from condemning the riot or clearing themselves from the suspicion of being concerned in it, that on the morrow they reported with radiant countenances, that the like demonstrations of popular feeling had already been made, or soon would be made, in every country town of England.* If the mob believed that Anne disapproved of their violence, they continued nevertheless to believe that her heart was with the doctor. On one of the days of the trial, as she was on her way to Westminster Hall, they gathered round her chair shouting "God bless your majesty and the church! we hope your majesty is for Doctor Sacheverell." And at the same time they made several members of parliament, who were passing in a coach, take off their hats and shout, "Sacheverell for ever!" Throughout the whole of this famous trial, which interested and agitated all ranks and conditions of people, and which was continued upwards of three weeks, the Duke of Buckingham declared plainly that he considered it merely as a trial of strength between the two parties. The earl of Nottingham insisted that the ordinary forms of judicial proceedings ought to be strictly adhered to, and that the lords ought to determine and give judgment, like the ordinary judges, according to the law of the land and the rules of court. Several of the lords opposed this, urging that they had a legislative as well as a judicial authority—could make new laws as well as administer old ones—and were at liberty to proceed whichever way they chose, without being limited by any of the forms of an ordinary court. Somers and Cowper both spoke upon this important point: they confessed that nothing ought to be more carefully maintained in any country than the law of the land; which if once injured or taken away, no man could have any certain rule to know what was his own, and what another man's,—who was innocent, and who guilty: and therefore, there were judges appointed to interpret the laws and bound to proceed according to their very letter. But, on the other hand, since all contingencies and new circumstances, or new combinations of circumstances, could not possibly be conceived in express words, it was equally necessary to have other judges competent to determine according to the equity of the case, and not according to the strict letter of the law; that, therefore, the law of the land was not the rule in all causes, but that there must be on some occasions a power paramount to the written law. And to whom could this power be so fitly intrusted as to those who made the laws, and had made whatever was law in England? Nottingham then proposed that a question in reference to the particular point in dispute should be put to the judges;* but this was very consistent with herself."—Conningham.—This author continues, rather ungraciously. "However, that a woman should be inconsistent is not to be wondered at, since the wills of women are nothing but humour or fancy, which, when it is rendered peevish by old age, is apt to turn to revenge, especially if it be irritated by any affront offered to their age, their lust, or their beauty; of this the French were fully aware, when they excluded them from all administration of government; which, if they had not done, all France had, before this time, under the name of pious donations, fallen into the hands of the clergy."

* The question put to the judges was—"Whether, by the law of England and constant practice in all prosecutions, by indictment or information, for crimes and misdemeanours, by writing or speaking, the particular words supposed to be criminal ought to be expressly specified in such indictment or information;" and the opinion of the judges being demanded, they unanimously declared, "That the particular words supposed to be criminal, ought to be specified in such indictment or information."

resisted "lest the judges should, by degrees, come to determine concerning the rights and privileges of parliament." At last, however, it was agreed that the question should be put to the judges, but for their opinion only, not for their determination or sentence. The judges declared in favour of the jurisdiction and uses of their own courts, which, even at that time, was thought perfectly natural, and was foreseen; but the lords nevertheless proceeded in their own way, without admitting the opinion of the judges to be any impediment to their proceedings. The Duke of Leeds, now seventy years of age, delivered a speech that might almost make us pardon all his former misdoings, tergiversations, and meannesses. "What do I hear?" said he, "King William set down in sermons as an usurper! The Revolution a rebellion. Indeed if that enterprise had not succeeded to our wishes, both these assertions had been true; and the judges would have pronounced all of us who then stood up in defence of our country, our religion, and our laws, rebels; but, since the Prince of Orange's cause has been avowed both by God and man; since he has been acknowledged in our public records as the deliverer, guardian, and preserver of our nation; and his enterprise to be most glorious, and the establishment of our present government; I wonder how there can be any debate among your lordships about this matter. I am now in my old age to defend that cause in parliament, in which, on mature deliberation, I engaged and took an active part; and, if need should require, I promise, in support of the same cause, to meet you in the field. My lords, suffer not such matters as these to be made subjects of debate, nor any question to be started in parliament about what was done at the time of the Revolution." There were others who spoke to the same effect, and who yet, when the question came to be put, voted for the acquittal of Sacheverell, and this they are said to have done either out of resentment or out of disappointment of their expectations of places and employments. At last a question was separately put to each lord whether Sacheverell was guilty or not guilty; and he was found guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanours laid in the indictment by a majority of 68 to 52. Three days after this, on the 23rd of March, the doctor was brought to the bar on his knees, and the lord chancellor pronounced this judgment:—"You, Henry Sacheverell, doctor in divinity, shall be, and you are hereby, enjoined not to preach during the term of three years next ensuing; and your two printed sermons shall be burnt before the Royal Exchange, at one of the clock in the afternoon, by the common hangman, in the presence of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London." This mild sentence was looked upon by the doctor's friends and admirers rather as an acquittal than as a condemnation, and as an indubitable proof of the weakness of his enemies and the growing impotence of the Whig party. On that night, and for several nights following, there were illumina-

MEDAL STRUCK IN LONDON ON THE OCCASION OF SACHEVERELL'S TRIAL.

The Doctor's Portrait was accompanied by different Reverses, to suit the opinions of purchasers. In one case the Reverse would be a Mitre, emblematic of the Church of England; and in the other a head of the Pope, as the representative of the Roman Catholic Church. The Inscriptions, which are continuous, would then, in either case, read—"H. Sac. D.D. is firm to thee."

tions in London and Westminster, with boufires in the streets—made, however, of less valuable materials than dissenters' pulpits and pews;—there was a deluge of ale and beer; and every one that passed by was compelled by the mob to drink to the health of the glorious Sacheverell. A few obstinate heads were broken, but generally these champions of the high church party were peaceful and merry in their cups. As for the doctor he was a greater doctor than ever: he returned from Westminster Hall in a grand ecclesiastical triumph; his chair was carried on high, and he was huzzaed by the mob like a victorious prize-fighter, or like a candidate for parliament coming successfully out of a contested and hard-drinking election.* For several days he employed himself in going from house to house to thank those lords and gentlemen who had voted for him, or befriended him in other ways: he congratulated them on their common delivery and present safety—for, since the Whigs and Dissenters had been able to do so little against him, it was as clear as daylight that they could not prevail against the mansion built on a rock, and therefore the church was safe. Wherever he went he was followed by a prodigious train, much more remarkable for their enthusiasm than for decency: they were butchers' boys, link-boys, and the like, who made the welkin ring. When the doctor came thus attended to return thanks to the Duke of Argyll, that nobleman commanded a servant to check him, and refused to receive either him or his thanks. "Tell him," said the duke, "what I did in parliament was not at all done for his sake." Many a lord might have said as much; but it was considered that the bold-fronted man might yet be useful; and therefore the high church party and the Tories in general continued for some time to pet and applaud him. The university of Oxford gave way to paroxysms of sympathy and gratitude. But it should be mentioned that that alma mater underwent a similar castigation at the hands of parliament; for the famous Oxford decree was ordered to be burnt at the same time and place with the doctor's sermons, and the whole university was held up by the Whigs as a nursing-place of slavery. If the House of Commons had had the power, neither the university nor the doctor would have been let off so easy: they complained bitterly of the slight punishment which had been awarded Sacheverell after so much parade and combustion, and so much bullying on the part of the preachers and the populace: they represented that the doctor, though condemned by parliament and by the bench of bishops, would be rather benefited than otherwise by being relieved from the discharge of his clerical duty, since he would receive his pay without work, and so be enabled to travel the country at his ease. On the other side, to keep his spirit up, presents were showered upon him; Lord Weymouth gave 50*l.*, and some more, some less, according to their means and inclinations. And Dr. Sacheverell, presently making a progress through the kingdom, was looked upon "as another Hercules of the church militant." Wherever he went his emissaries were sent before him, with his portrait, or engraved effigies, properly "done in brass;" pompous entertainments were made for him, and a mixed multitude of clergymen and sextons, country singers and fiddlers, a mob of all conditions, male and female, crowded

* The doctor as he has been ably painted by the Duchess of Marlborough:—"It must be owned that a person more fitted for a fool could not have been picked out of the whole nation. For he had not learning enough to write or speak true English (as all his own compositions witness); but a heap of bombast, ill-connected words at command, which do excellently well with such as he was to move. He had so little sense as even to design and affect that popularity which now became his portion, and which a wise and good man knows not how to bear with. He had a haughty insolent air, which his friends found occasion often to complain of; but it made his presence more graceful in public. His person was framed well for the purpose, and he dressed well. A good assurance, clean gloves, white handkerchief well managed, with other suitable accomplishments, moved the hearts of many at his appearance; and the solemnity of a trial added much to a pity and concern, which had nothing in reason or justice to support them. The weaker part of the ladies were more like mad or bewitched than like persons in their senses. . . . Several eminent clergymen, who despised the man in their hearts, were engaged to stand publicly by him in the face of the world, as if the poor Church of England was now tried in him. A speech, exquisitely contrived to move pity, was put into his mouth,—full of an impious piety, denying the greatest part of the charge (which the man had been known to boast of before), with solemn appeals to God, and such applications of scripture as would make any serious person tremble."

together to meet and welcome him. When the reader understands that this progress was made after the dissolution of the Whig parliament, which had prosecuted him, and during the turbulence of a new election, he will conceive the motives of the journey and the successes and excesses with which it was attended. The doctor, in fact, represented not merely the high church, but the whole Tory party; and wherever he appeared the Whig candidates and canvassers were put to the rout. In many of the country towns he found open houses, entertainments, and feasts provided for him as if he had been the foremost man in the land, and the person most entitled to reverence and gratitude. In one respect the fellow had a strong head, and his faculty of bearing an immoderate quantity of wine was of vast service to himself and to his party; for men still considered it essential in a Tory and high churchman to drink a great deal more than other people. One bottle was deemed puritanical, two looked lukewarm, but three bottles and a magnum were pure orthodoxy! But such drinking and feasting as now prevailed had not been seen for many a day; perhaps not since the Restoration, in 1660, when the same party drank upon their knees healths fathoms deep to the worthless Charles II.—There was, in fact, a universal swilling; for, in spite of prohibitory acts of parliament, that grossest kind of bribery—the corrupting of the poorer electors with drink—was practised to an unprecedented excess: every public house was thrown open, and every house was filled with riot and drunkenness. The University of Oxford held a high feast to welcome the champion of the church; but it is said that his arrogance and insolence and unspeakable ignorance disgusted most of the learned doctors there. The stately mansions of the Tory nobility were thrown open at his approach; and in several towns he was received by the mayors and magistrates in their formalities. He was generally attended by a numerous and mounted escort; and, but for his bands and his cassock, he might have been mistaken for a trooper. The avenues to these towns were lined with spectators, the hedges and trees were hung with garlands of flowers, flags were displayed on the church steeples, and the air resounded with cries of “Sacheverell and the church.”* But there were some towns that would never join in this carnival; and, after a few weeks, when sobriety began to return, the doctor’s picture, instead of being received as ready money, was frequently torn in pieces or converted to the vilest uses, and in many places he was rudely treated and refused admittance. When he was going towards Ely the people there were so provoked, that they threatened to do him a mischief; and in other towns he was saluted with stones as well as curses. Being far from any ambition of the honour of martyrdom, the doctor made the best of his way back to London. There he was very earnest for permission to make an harangue to the Company of the Bank of England; but the directors gave orders to turn him out of their doors. Sacheverell, however, had done his work, and had, more than any other single cause, helped the Tories back to their places. Five years after this, Bolingbroke and some others of that party thought that he would be a useful man to help to bring in the Pretender!*

* “Everybody knows that he was afterwards sent about several counties, where, with his usual grace, he received, as his due, the homage and adoration of multitudes; never thinking that respect enough was paid to his great merit, using some of his friends insolently, and raising mobs against his enemies, and giving ample proof of how great meanness the bulk of mankind is capable; putting on the air of a saint upon a lewd, drunk, pampered man; dispersing his blessings to all his worshippers, and his kisses to some; taking their good money as fast as it could be brought in, drinking their best wines, eating of their best provisions without reserve, and without temperance. And, what completed the farce, complaining in the midst of this scene of luxury and triumph, as the old fat monk did over a hot venison pasty, in his barbarous Latin—‘Hec, quæ sit parvas pro ecclesia!’—Oh, what dreadful things do we undergo for the sake of the church!”—Duchess of Marlborough’s Papers.

The Whigs were disheartened, and the cabinet was distracted with opposite views and conflicting intrigues and interests. Some of them, upon seeing the humour of the queen, would have resigned at once; but Marlborough still indulged in some hopes of recovering the royal favour; and Somers, whom Anne continued to receive with a semblance of friendship, advised his friends to keep their temper and wait with patience till the humour of abetting and applauding Sacheverell should cool of itself, and die away like other aberrations of the popular mind. The session of parliament, which had been chiefly occupied by the doctor and his nonsense, was closed on the 5th of April, with a hearty wish (in words) on the part of the queen, “that men would study to be quiet, and do their own business, rather than busy themselves in reviving questions and disputes of a very high nature, and which must be with an ill intention.” And every one knew that, though timid at the height of the storm, Anne rejoiced in the effects of the Sacheverell tempest, and was now looking confidently forward to the formation of a court and cabinet in which Harley should be predominant, and Mrs. Masham safe and honoured. The Duchess of Marlborough, who did many things both in the way of submission and cajolery, and in that of threatening and intimidating, unworthy of the high-mindedness and pride of character to which she pretended, had widened the breach instead of closing it; Marlborough himself had had the folly to quarrel with the queen about appointments and promotions in the army, which things were now getting into the hands of Mrs. Masham, who, in the first place, favoured her own relations, and, in the second, those that bribed or flattered her. It was a common saying in the army that the best way of becoming a general was not by fighting in the field, but by carrying the favourite's lap-dogs, or by paying court with a well-filled purse to "Mrs. Abigail Farwig;" and the lord-general bitterly complained, in a letter to the queen, that all his victories, and all his zeal for her majesty's service and glory, could not protect him "from the malice of a bedchamber-woman." A few days after the rising of parliament, Anne gave an unequivocal proof of her intentions. The Duke of Shrewsbury, once the staunchest of Whigs, and one of the greatest promoters of the Revolution of 1688, returned with an Italian wife from a long residence at Rome, and joined the Tories in voting in favour of Sacheverell; and the queen now turned out the Marquess of Kent, and gave the office of lord chamberlain to Shrewsbury, in spite of her premier, the Lord Treasurer Godolphin.* By the month of June people began to talk publicly of the dismissal of Marlborough's son-in-law, the Earl of Sunderland, the worst tempered, but probably (after Somers) the honestest man in that cabinet. Anne hated him on account of the boldness of his language and of his projects about Mrs. Masham, which were all betrayed to her by some un-named member or members of the council.

Though Marlborough disliked the political principles of his son-in-law, and had even, in the first instance, opposed his admission into the government, he now considered his remaining in it as essential to his own security; and both he and his duchess made the most strenuous exertions to induce the queen to alter her resolution in this respect. "No consideration proper to myself," says her grace, "could have induced me to trouble the queen again after our last conversation. But I was overcome by the consideration of Lord Marlborough, Lord Sunderland, and the public interest; and wrote in the best manner I could to the queen, June 7, 1710, begging, for Lord Marlborough's sake, that she would not give him such a blow, of which I dreaded the consequence, putting her in mind of her letter about the duke upon the victory at Blenheim; and adding the most solemn assurances that I had not so much as a wish to remove Mrs. Masham, and that all the noise which had been about an address for that purpose had been occasioned by Lord Marlborough's discontent at that time, which most people thought were just. To this the queen wrote a very short and harsh answer, complaining that I had broke my promise of not saying anything of politics or of Mrs. Masham; and concluding, that it was plain, from this ill usage, what she was to expect for the future." The duchess wrote again to vindicate herself for what was now made the pretence for turning out Sunderland and driving her husband to extremities. "I told her," says her grace, "that all the politics in my letter was my concern for Lord Marlborough; making it, at last, my most earnest request that her majesty would only defer the hear to the end of this campaign. This, I added, I begged upon my knees." But Anne, as we have said, was at least as obstinate as her father had been before her; and she turned out Sunderland, and gave his office of secretary of state to Lord Dartmouth, whose Jacobitism was only exceeded by his love of jests and sarcasms. To soften the blow a retiring pension was offered; but Sunderland, who did not share in his father-in-law's passion for money, indignantly refused it. "If," said he, "I am not fit to serve my country, I am incapable of plundering it." On this occasion several great men, "who wished well to their country," and who feared that the Duke of Marlborough, who was with the army in Flanders, might in disgust quit the service, as by this time he had repeatedly threatened to do, addressed to him a joint letter, imploring him, as he valued his glory, the success of the grand alliance, and the safety of his friends at home, to continue where he was and prosecute the war. This letter was signed by Cowper, Somers, Halifax, Devonshire, Newcastle, Henry Boyle, Godolphin, and Orford, who all remained in the cabinet, though they must have seen that the floor was sinking under their feet. The removal of Sunderland, who was so nearly allied to the Marlboroughs, spread alarm through all the courts of Europe, except that of France, where it was hailed with transports of joy, as a forerunner of the entire downfall of that able general who had so long been heaping defeat and disgrace upon their arms. Anne, however, instructed Secretary Boyle to write to the allied courts, in her name, to assure them that all their fears were groundless, and that she would continue the administration of her affairs in the hands of her present ministers, and continue to intrust her army to the duke. Yet, within a few weeks, the queen commanded Godolphin to break his staff of lord-treasurer, put that office in commission, and appointed Harley chancellor of the exchequer. Harley made some attempts on the Whigs, and endeavoured, in particular, to effect a coalition with Chancellor Cowper and Robert Walpole; but his overtures were in all instances rejected. Thereupon Harley, knowing that he could do nothing with a Whig House of Commons,

* Godolphin wrote a strong letter to the queen, expressing his conviction "that she was suffering herself to be guided to her own ruin and destruction, as fast as it was possible for those to compass it to whom she now seemed so much to hearken." But this epistle was not likely to be of much use, particularly as Anne had privately given the chamberlain's staff to Shrewsbury two days before the letter was written. At this check Godolphin ought to have resigned; but it is evident at every step that our modern notions of ministerial consistency, dignity, and decency are very modern, and were altogether unknown to the politicians of those times. Robert Walpole, however, who subsequently gained power and kept it for many years, not less through his boldness and decision of character, and by the bribery he exercised and the eminent abilities he possessed, recommended an instantaneous and a universal resignation, which in all probability would have intimidated the queen. It is added that Walpole's colleagues were duped by Harley, who persuaded them that he only wanted to remove Godolphin and Marlborough, and "intended a Whig game at the bottom."—Archdeacon Coxe, Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole.

and knowing, also, that Dr. Sacheverell had done, and was actually doing, great things for the Tories, boldly proposed an instant dissolution; and the queen, after some misgivings, made up her mind to follow this advice. When her majesty appeared in the council-chamber to give orders for a proclamation to this effect, the Chancellor stood up to speak; but the queen silenced him instantly by saying, "Such is my pleasure—the parliament shall be dissolved." The proclamation was accordingly issued, together with writs for a new parliament; and then began that uproar which we have already briefly indicated. The canvassings and elections were said to have been carried on with such feuds and violence as had never before been known in England. Encouraged by the spectacle of the triumphant progress of Sacheverell, and of the high hand with which the Tories and high churchmen were carrying their elections, Anne proceeded to sweep court and council clean of Whigs. Lord Somers was turned out, and the queen's maternal uncle (the boisterous, hard-drinking Rochester) was made president of the council in his stead; the Duke of Devonshire, lord steward, gave place to the Duke of Buckingham; Secretary Boyle made room for St. John (Bolingbroke); the great seal, held by Cowper, was given to Sir Simon Harcourt; Lord Wharton was succeeded by the Duke of Ormond in the government of Ireland; Lord Orford was removed from the Admiralty, and his office was put in commission; the Duke of Somerset had already thrown up his office of master of the horse, and entered into new measures with the Whigs, of whom, in a few days, not a vestige was to be seen anywhere in St. James's, except, indeed, in a few understrappers without name, character, or weight of any kind. If we are to believe the caustic Swift, who was struggling in the dirty streams of political faction to obtain promotion in the church, Mr. Harley himself would not let the Tories be too numerous, for fear they should be insolent, and kick against him; and for that reason they kept several Whigs in employment, who expected to be turned out every day.* It was confidently reported that the queen would not allow the Duke of Marlborough the opportunity of insulting her by resigning on a sudden, and leaving the army in confusion. Many conjectures were hazarded as to the great man to whom her majesty would confide the command of her victorious troops: some said it would be the Earl of Rivers; others, that it would be the Elector George: "but," says a Whig writer of the time, "those who gave credit to the latter report neither knew the Elector of Hanover's sentiments nor the queen's intentions, who never thought it advisable to arm the successor to her throne with her own forces."†

The inevitable consequences of all these sudden changes were doubt and discouragement on the part of the allies, indecision on the part of Marlborough, and an almost universal discontent in the English army serving abroad. Early in the year, before the Tories began to rise by clinging to the skirts of Sacheverell's black gown, Louis XIV. again made overtures for peace; the Marquis de Torcy, who had done all the preceding year that a good diplomatist could do, was sent again to the Hague; and Petikum re-appeared on the scene as a mediator, having promised himself some mighty reward if he could succeed in obtaining tolerable terms for the French. This busy minister of an insignificant power went to Versailles, carrying with him a message from Pensionary Heinsius, proposing that if Louis was really anxious for peace he should immediately sign the preliminaries proposed before, leaving the articles to which he objected open to future discussion in the conferences which must precede the definitive treaty. A difficulty arose immediately: Louis wished the negotiations to take place at the Hague; but the Dutch insisted they should be held in the obscure town of Gertruydenberg; and Louis was obliged to yield the point. The Abbé de Polignac and Marshal d'Huxelles were the French plenipotentiaries, and they were sent on their journey with instructions to be cautious, patient, and submissive.* On the 19th of March (1710) the two Frenchmen arrived at Maërdik, where they were expected by Buys and Vanderdussen, who were on board a yacht, and who were so punctilious as only to meet them half way upon the water. The negotiators accompanied the Dutchmen back to the yacht, near to which there were two other vessels, one destined for the plenipotentiaries, the other for their servants. Buys and Vanderdussen left it, however, to their choice whether they would live on board the vessels or in lodgings ashore. The Frenchmen, of course, preferred the shore: the Marshal, under pretence of sickness, landed immediately; but the Abbé passed one night in the yacht. The first conference lasted three hours; and, according to De Torcy, fully proved the necessity of that patience which Louis had recommended. The great stumbling-block was still the Spanish question. Buys, in a long speech, established, for the thousandth time, the rights of the House of Austria to all the States of the monarchy of Spain: Polignac and d'Huxelles insisted that Philip, the king de facto, ought to have some portion of that vast monarchy for his peaceful resignation of all the rest. The Dutch negotiators treated the proposition of a partition with contempt, and maintained that nothing was due to Philip for consenting to descend from a throne which he had unjustly occupied. During these first debates, which lasted with some interruptions from the 9th to the 24th of March, Buys and Vanderdussen received frequent dispatches and instructions from the Hague, where the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene were residing, and making their preparations for a new campaign. From his declining influence at home, Louis had hoped that Marlborough would be indifferent to the success of the war abroad, and even disposed to make a peace while the army was yet left in his hands; but the French negotiators saw, to their surprise, that Marlborough was as anxious about the war as ever.* To avert another campaign they offered to acknowledge the Archduke Charles as King of Spain—to withhold all aid from Philip—to give up four cautionary towns—to restore Strasburg and Brisac—to destroy all their fortifications on the Rhine from Basle to Philipsburg—to destroy the port and fortifications of Dunkirk—and to give up to the Dutch Maubeuge, Condé, Furnes, Menin, Ypres, Tournay, and Lille. They seemed to waive the question of dédommagement for Philip, not even proposing the kingdom of Sicily; but, as Sicily was actually occupied by the French, Louis was resolved to keep it, with or without the treaty. Buys and Vanderdussen, however, spoke to this point; and, when forced to explain, Polignac declared that the kingdom of Naples was expected as well as the island of Sicily—that the union of those two States, now called the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, was indispensable to the security of France, the liberty of Italy, the durability of the peace, and the balance of power in Europe. It appears to us that this difference would have caused the negotiations to fall to the ground, and that Louis and his diplomatists artfully shifted the cause of the failure from this point to fix it upon another, which far more interested the feelings of mankind, and which put his most Christian majesty in an amiable light. The allies had insisted that Louis should compel Philip to surrender the throne of Spain within two months, and join his arms with theirs to that effect, if judged necessary; and Louis and his diplomatists declared, that to enforce this condition was to outrage the ties of blood and family affection. Men forgot how small a share these feelings had ever had in the transactions of princes; and the grand monarque was pitted as a harshly treated old grandfather weeping over the fate of his grandson, and resolving, even in his extremity, to maintain a war against all the powers of Europe rather than fight his own flesh and blood. It was upon this point that the conferences at Gertruydenberg actually, or at least ostensibly, broke up. While they were going on, Philip, who had wonderfully increased his army in Spain, applied to his grandfather for the services of the Duke of Vendôme; and, before they broke off, Louis sent that duke into Spain to take the supreme command of the troops under Philip. It appears to us the height of absurdity to believe that there was ever any sincerity in the offer of withdrawing all French assistance from Philip, or in the declaration of Louis that he really intended that his grandson should evacuate that kingdom. But, again, Philip was by this time strong enough to defend himself if France would only keep closed the passes of the Pyrenees, and remain as a neutral but impenetrable body between him and the allies. The confederates knew this, and therefore it was they had asked for Louis's co-operation; and, in denying that co-operation, the French court gave what was equivalent to a positive refusal of the great sine quâ non of the allies, which, right or wrong, was, that Philip should cease to be King of Spain, and that the Archduke Charles should be put in his place. As Marlborough and Eugene took the field, and were obtaining other successes, the French renewed the conferences at Gertruydenberg, and offered that Louis, instead of taking up arms against his grandson, should be allowed to pay a certain sum to assist the allies in dethroning him. Buys and Vanderdussen opened their ears to this proposition, and asked how much Louis would pay per month, and what security he would give for such payments. Polignac and his colleague begged to be excused the naming of any precise sum; but they were quite sure that their master would pay liberally, and that this money would be of great help to the confederates in carrying on the war against Philip. According to de Torcy, Louis instructed his plenipotentiaries to offer 500,000 francs a month, and then to raise it gradually to a million of francs per month, if less would not satisfy the Dutch deputies. At this moment Louis had neither the money to pay, nor the intention to pay it if he had; and, on the other hand, the Dutch deputies had very high notions about the securities to be given. The French ministers then spoke of giving up the whole of Alsace; but this was to be upon condition that the Electors of Bavaria and Cologne should be re-established as they were before the war, and that there should be no question about any ulterior demands whatsoever. But the negotiations again came to nothing, and each party accused the other of insincerity and of an entire want of a desire for peace. The ministers of Holland, of the emperor, and of England, published to the world that France, always artful, had explained herself obscurely, and that, if the intentions of King Louis had been sincere, his ministers would have spoken more clearly, instead of leaving it doubtful to the last whether they did not intend to secure Spain for Philip, and to keep possession of nearly all the places they talked of giving up.

In the mean while Marlborough and Eugene, at the head of 60,000 men, had invested Douay. Marshal Villars, after coming in sight, gave up his intention of attempting to raise the siege, and that important place capitulated in the month of June. The allies then moved upon the frontier town of Arras, but they found that place so well

* De Torcy, however, takes credit to himself for more sagacity. He says that he foresaw that Marlborough would be more eager than ever for the war, since now he could be nothing in England. "We learned about this time that his duchess had been completely disgraced. The Duke of Marlborough himself sent this news to his nephew, the Duke of Berwick. That disgrace was the first effect of internal agitations in England, and the secret intrigues of that court. . . . Those who had most foresight judged that such a change, far from facilitating the peace, would raise new obstacles to its conclusion: they founded their conjecture upon the interest which Marlborough would have to prolong the war, as the sole means of rendering himself necessary, and preserving his employments and high authority, then violently attacked by the persons that were most constantly about the queen."—Mémoires.

defended that they did not attempt a siege. Turning to easier prey, they captured Bethune, while Villars kept retreating, in order to avoid a battle and to bar their road into the interior of France. It was observed, both by friends and foes, that Marlborough was no longer the same man: his confidence of success and his cheerfulness seemed to have abandoned him; and several sinister accidents, such as had not been known before in any of his campaigns, embarrassed his movements and augmented his too apparent vexation. A great supply of powder and other stores, under the convoy of 1200 foot and 450 horse, was intercepted and destroyed. This was but the beginning to other misfortunes. At the same time his attention was constantly distracted by the thickening reports of changes at home. He gave up the notion, proposed by Godolphin of attacking Boulogne and opening the road to Paris; and the campaign closed with the capture of two fourth-rate towns on the French frontier. As if one of these wars could only be brilliant by the eclipse of the other, the campaign in Spain was this year active in the extreme. General Stanhope, after attending to his duties in parliament, returned to Catalonia in the month of May, and there joined the Imperial general Staremberg. These two generals and King Charles remained on the defensive till some reinforcements arrived from Italy. Then they marched into Aragon, where King Philip was at the head of an army of Spaniards. On the 27th of July, Stanhope, leading the van, brought Philip to action near Almanara, and routed him in half an hour. Philip retired with his foot—his horse were almost annihilated—under the cannon of Lerida; but want of provisions presently forced him to continue his march to Saragoza. On the 19th of August Stanhope and Staremberg overtook him near the town of Saragoza, and defeated him a second time. Saragoza surrendered to the victors; and Philip, flying with a miserable wreck of an army, abandoned the whole of Aragon. After spending nearly a month at Saragoza, King Charles set out with Stanhope and Staremberg for the capital. On the 21st of September, Stanhope, still leading the van of the army, took quiet possession of Madrid, which seemed to be playing the part of a shuttlecock between the rival sovereigns. On the 28th King Charles made his triumphant entry, and paid his devotions, as became a Spanish king, to Our Lady of Atocha. A detachment was sent forward to take possession of Toledo, and keep clear the passage of the Tagus, it being expected that a Portuguese army would again advance from that side to co-operate with the allies in the heart of Spain. But the Portuguese came not; and Philip, still supported by the loyalty and affection of the Castilians, was preparing to return in force. Nor were these the only misfortune that attended the Austrian claimant: his communications were frequently cut off by flying bands of partisans,—the peasantry carried off “a war to the knife,” and fell upon all stragglers that wore his uniform,—and, moreover, advice was received that the French were in motion on the side of Roussillon, as if they intended to invade Catalonia, the only part of the kingdom really attached to the Austrian cause. Provisions also began to grow scarce at Madrid. The whole of the army moved to Toledo: that place was soon as uncomfortable as the capital; and Charles, thinking he could be safe nowhere but in Catalonia, fled back thither with the best part of his cavalry. Stanhope and Staremberg, with half-starving troops, soon followed his footsteps, leaving King Philip to enter Madrid once more. On the 8th of December, Stanhope, when separated from Staremberg, who was moving in a parallel line, was surrounded at Brihuega by a Spanish army under the command of the Duke of Vendôme; and, after making a gallant resistance, and burning nearly all his gunpowder, he was compelled to surrender with his 5000 English on the morrow. On the 10th of December Vendôme fell upon Staremberg at Villa Viciosa, where a battle was fought in which both sides claimed the victory. It appears that Vendôme suffered very severely, and that the Spaniards were completely beaten on their left wing; yet Staremberg was glad to continue his retreat, which he did the faster upon learning that the French had got into Catalonia, and that Girona had surrendered to the Duke of Noailles. He arrived at Barcelona with the remnant of the army of King Charles, who, in the autumn, had regarded himself as master of all Spain, but who now had nothing left to him save Catalonia, and that invaded. In the course of the summer an attempt was made to light again the flames of civil war in France,—or, as it was expressed, “a humane project had been formed for the relief of the Cevennois.” The English and Dutch fleet in the Mediterranean, after conveying the reinforcements from Italy to Catalonia, landed 700 men in Languedoc, hoping they would speedily be joined by the Protestants in that province; but, after taking two or three villages, this paltry force retreated before 10,000 militia and 400 dragoons, and got back to their ships with the loss of about a hundred men.

But the war of parties at home was now exciting a far deeper interest than our foreign wars. Indeed, independent of other circumstances the latter had long since lost the charm of novelty; people were tired of long gazettes, rejoicings, and illuminations, and wanted a new excitement. The new parliament met on the 25th of November. Bromley, member for the University of Oxford, and chief urger of the bill against occasional conformity, was elected without opposition in lieu of the late speaker, Onslow. The queen, in her opening speech, showed that she was in the hands of new advisers. She no longer condescended to use the word toleration; but, in mentioning her resolution to support and encourage the church, she spoke of indulgence to be allowed "to scrupulous consciences." This term of indulgence was the more observed because it was the pet word of Dr. Sacheverell, who held that whatever liberty of conscience Dissenters enjoyed was a matter of indulgence, and not of right. The Whigs, though in a minority, were still formidable, and the chief managers of the Sacheverell impeachment were in the House, in spite of the exertions made to prevent their re-election. On the other side, the queen had knighted Constantine Phipps, who had been counsel for the doctor on his trial, and made him lord chancellor of Ireland; and other Tories had received different honours and employments. As for the doctor himself, he had been gratified with a new living, and with as ample a licence of speech—out of the pulpit—as even he could desire.

A. D. 1711.—When the Duke of Marlborough arrived from Flanders during the Christmas holidays he met with the coldest reception possible. The usual motion of thanks to him had been dropped by his friends for fear of its being negatived by the Tory majority. The new ministers, however, waited upon him, promising that he should have all his present military commands, and also the nomination of the generals that were to serve under him. His wife had never ceased making efforts at court, by means of "one person" there, who happened to be in good favour with the queen, and to whom the duchess wrote long accounts of the past, justifying herself, and exposing the ingratitude as well as malice of her enemies. All these accounts that gentleman read to Anne, but he might as well have read them to a stock or a stone. According to her grace, the queen never offered a word good or ill, except on one particular point: Mrs. Masham and Harley had employed Swift and other writers to accuse the duchess of having grossly cheated her royal mistress of vast sums of money; and on that occasion her majesty was pleased to say, "Everybody knows cheating is not the Duchess of Marlborough's crime." Where there was so much received in what was deemed an honourable as well as a regular way,* there was no great temptation to embezzle and cheat; and the duchess was in all respects a higher-minded person than her husband, in whom the love of money became at last the ruling passion to such a degree as to make him stoop to all kinds of mean and paltry actions. The duchess, as mistress of the robes, boasts that she had dressed the queen for nine years for thirty-two thousand and some odd hundred pounds; and she asks if ever queen of England had spent so little in robes! "It evidently appears," says her grace, "that, by my economy in the nine years I served her majesty, I saved her near 90,000*l.* in clothes alone."† Anne's sister and immediate predecessor, Queen Mary, had been charged 12,600*l.* for her dresses one year, and 11,100*l.* another year. Just at this moment the duchess thought herself obliged to appear at court, "on account of some new clothes; which, as groom of the stole, she had by her majesty's order bought for her;" but the queen charged the only friend her grace had there to advise her, as from himself, not to come. It was scarcely possible, after this, to think of retaining her office, and it appears that the duchess of her own accord sent in her resignation. Lord Dartmouth, however, says that it was Marlborough that intimated the necessity of her resigning, and that she threw her gold key on the floor, and told him to do what he liked with it; and that then Marlborough carried it to the queen.* About one point there is no doubt—Anne accepted the resignation with eagerness and joyfulness, and divided the duchess's court places between Mrs. Masham and the Duchess of Somerset. It astonished most people to see the duke consent to serve when his wife was dismissed—to see him continue to hold the command of the troops under the ministry which had sprung out of a bedroom squabble, and which was sure to thwart him in all his measures. His enemies have generally accounted for this by assuming that the duke's avarice was at the bottom of it; but his lady assigns very different reasons. "The Duke of Marlborough," she says, "notwithstanding an infinite variety of mortifications, by which it was endeavoured to make him resign his commission, that there might be a pretence to raise an outcry against him, as having quitted his queen's and his country's service merely because he could not govern in the cabinet as well as in the field, continued to serve yet another campaign. All his friends here, moved by a true concern for the public welfare, pressed him to it, the confederates called him with the utmost importunity, and Prince Eugene entreated him to come with all the earnestness and passion that could be expressed." These were certainly powerful inducements, and they may have been mingled (together with that passionate fondness for a fine army which every good general must contract) with Marlborough's dean." These words are from a MS. paper, written by, or rather for, the duchess, in the year 1713, but not published. In the printed "Account" the direct reference to Swift and the Examiner is suppressed, and it is merely said that Harley, afterwards lord treasurer and Earl of Oxford, "hired his creatures to misrepresent me (her grace) throughout all the nation as a pickpocket."

* The Duchess herself says, "When, after a very successful campaign, the Duke of Marlborough was returned to London, the queen most readily accepted the resignation which he carried her from me of my office."—Account. There is a reason given by Horace Walpole for the implacable hatred conceived by the queen against the duchess, which is almost too gross to be mentioned to modern ears, but which, nevertheless, may have been perfectly true.—See his Reminiscences.

Mr. Hallam says, with strong and proper feeling—"It seems rather a humiliating proof of the sway which the feeblest prince enjoys even in a limited monarchy, that the fortunes of Europe should have been changed by nothing more noble than the insolence of one waiting woman, and the cunning of another. It is true that this was effected by throwing the weight of the crown into the scale of a powerful faction; yet the House of Bourbon would probably not have reigned beyond the Pyrenees, but for Sarah and Abigail at Queen Anne's toilette."—Const. Hist.

* The Marlborough family were said to be in the receipt of 90,000*l.* a-year, including all their places and pensions!

† "Notwithstanding this," continues the duchess, "my lord treasurer (Harley) has thought fit to order the Examiner (Swift) to represent me in print as a pickpocket all over England; and for that honest service, and some others, her majesty has lately made him a love of money. Lord Peterborough, who had fondly hoped to eclipse his fame, and who was held by the Tories to be a far greater general than Marlborough, meanly joined in an outcry against him in the House of Lords, where a vote of censure was carried against the late Whig ministers for the ill successes of the war in Spain. The eccentric lord was rewarded by an embassy to Vienna, and Lord Galway, his rival in Spain, and the man he most hated, was disgraced and censured by parliament. But it was in the House of Commons that the great strength of the Tories now lay. There they attacked the late Lord Treasurer Godolphin, and heaped all kinds of censures on the fallen ministry. Among other things they charged the Whigs with having preferred profligates and blasphemers to the true friends of the church; and they declared that both church and state had been saved from destruction solely by the great goodness and wisdom of her majesty. The Bishop of London, still the fiery Compton, had been labouring during the preceding autumn with the clergy of London and Westminster, and had got up an address to her majesty, which seems to have been held as giving a clerical sanction to this last proceeding of the laymen in parliament. In this address Compton had spoken of "the unprecedented attempts lately made to undermine not only our excellent constitution in church and state, but all religion and government whatsoever." To gratify the clergy, a bill was brought in for building fifty new churches in the cities of London and Westminster—the want of which was said to have contributed to the great increase of schism and irreligion; and, that this church business might be done by proper hands, that devout Christian, Henry St. John (Bolingbroke), had been charged, as secretary of state, to communicate the queen's message upon it and the address of the archbishops, bishops, and clergy in convocation assembled. The Commons voted 350,000*l.* for building the said churches—being, as they said, "entirely disposed to promote everything that was for the interest of the established church."

For some time the Tories had been complaining that far too many seats in the House of Commons fell to men of no hereditary rank and of no landed property—that officers in the army, lawyers, merchants, and others living in towns and trading cities were gradually assuming that superiority which naturally ought to belong to the lords of the soil. During this session a bill was brought in for securing the freedom of parliaments by farther qualifying the members to sit in the House of Commons. Hitherto no such qualification had been thought of; but now it was enacted that no man should represent a county unless he had a real estate in land of 600*l.* a-year, nor a borough unless he had a real estate in land worth 300*l.* a-year. Scarcely any resistance was made at the time by the Whigs to this qualification act, which has since become a solemn mockery, and an opprobrium to the British parliament.*

Harley, by this time, felt his position a very uneasy one, and it is supposed that he must have fallen through the intrigues of his colleague St. John, but for a lucky attempt which was made upon his life, and which rendered him for a short time popular with the nation. Although it had been so often proved that such money was thrown away, or worse, the different governments of England, whether Whig or Tory, continued to spend large sums on secret services. Germans, Italians, Frenchmen, Spaniards, Poles, all found encouragement; and the majority of these adventurers seem to have taken money from both sides, and to have betrayed the secrets (when they really knew any—which was not often) of both parties. Among the foreigners that fattened on this secret service money was a Frenchman who called himself the Marquis de Guiscard, and who got 500*l.* a-year. It is said that he was indebted to St. John for this liberality, and that he had recommended himself to that accomplished and then dissipated scoundrel of genius by administering to and sharing in his pleasures. Harley, who had no taste for such revelries and excesses, thought 500*l.* a-year too large a sum, and reduced the amount. Thereupon the Frenchman hired himself to the cabinet of Versailles, and began to supply the ministers of King Louis with secret intelligence. The correspondence was discovered, and he was arrested and brought before the English council. There he desired to speak in private with Secretary St. John; but the secretary assured him that this was a favour not to be granted to a man in his situation. Guiscard then advanced towards the table as if he would say something to Harley, and stabbed that minister in the breast with a pen-knife. Fortunately for Harley, the pen-knife, striking against a bone, broke about half an inch from the handle. Guiscard struck again and again, and Harley fell to the ground with blood flowing from his breast. Then St. John, crying out "The villain has murdered Mr. Harley," drew his sword; and the rest of the ministers followed his example. As in all cases of this sudden and alarming kind, the scene is differently

* Previously to the introduction of this bill, an attempt had been made to carry an old bill, already lost more than once, for disabling all persons holding places from sitting in the House of Commons. This project failed again. Burnet says, then "another bill to qualify members, by having 600*l.* a-year for a knight of the shire, and 300*l.* a-year for a burgess, succeeded better; the design of this was to exclude courtiers, military men, and merchants from sitting in the House of Commons, in hopes that, this being settled, the land interest would be the prevailing consideration in all their consultations. They did not extend these qualifications to Scotland; it being pretended that, estates there being generally small, it would not be easy to find men so qualified capable to serve. This was thought to strike at an essential part of our constitution, touching the freedom of elections; and it had been, as often as it was attempted, opposed by the ministry, though it had a firm appearance of securing liberty, when all was lodged with men of estates; yet our gentry was become so ignorant and so corrupt, that many apprehended the ill effects of this; and that the interest of trade, which indeed supports that of the land, would neither be understood nor regarded." From the operation of this qualification bill a considerable portion of the aristocracy were exempt; for it was provided that the eldest sons of peers, or any persons qualified to serve as knights of shires, should not be incapable of being elected though they had no such landed estates. The universities also were favoured, it being provided that those learned bodies should return their members as formerly.

described even by the eye-witnesses and actors in it; it is said, for example, that Guiscard attempted also to stab other members of the council, who all defended themselves with whatever came first to hand; that every one struck him as hard as he could with his naked fists, but that Mr. St. John pierced him through with his sword; that, on hearing the noise, the door-keepers and messengers in waiting rushed into the room, laid hands upon the assassin, and dragged him, with his bones almost all broken, to prison. Another account affirms that St. John was not the only one that used his sword, that Guiscard was wounded by several swords, and would have been dispatched but for Lord Paulet, who entreated they would not kill the assassin, but keep him to see what discoveries he might make. It is said, too, that Guiscard begged the Duke of Ormond to dispatch him outright; and that his grace answered, that that was not work fit for a gentleman. Lord Dartmouth, who was then one of the three secretaries of state, says—"He (Guiscard) behaved himself with great confidence before the council; and denied everything, till he was shown one of his own letters, which he endeavoured to snatch out of Lord Harcourt's hand. Having thrust himself between the Duke of Ormond and Mr. Harley, in such a manner that he could easily have drawn the duke's sword, if he had not depended on the other tool, when Mr. St. John refused to speak with him, he bent down as if he would have whispered with Mr. Harley, and gave him two or three violent blows upon the breast before anybody could stop him. When Boucier, the surgeon, came, Mr. Harley asked him if he were in immediate danger, (the pen-knife having been broken in his body), that he might settle his affairs, for he did not fear death, which was visible by his countenance, which was not in the least altered. After Guiscard was carried into another room, he desired to speak with the Duke of Ormond, which the Duke refused, unless I would go with him, which I did. He (Guiscard) lamented Mr. Harley, who, he said, was truly a great man, and to whom he had many obligations; and several times repeated that the duke of Marlborough was a lucky man. We asked him what he meant by that. He said he had often designed to have done as much for him (Marlborough), and now it was fallen upon a man that he would be glad to be rid of."* Notwithstanding his being an eye-witness, this rabid party-man is scarcely more entitled to implicit credit than Burnet, or any other writer on the other side. Burnet says not a word about Marlborough, but declares that it was Guiscard's intention to assassinate St. John, who, however, was so placed as to be out of his reach, whercupon he struck at Harley, who was within his reach—"and wounded him as much as could be done with so small a tool." The bishop adds, that the other members of the council drew their swords and stabbed Guiscard in several places; and then the attendants being called in dragged out the all but murdered assassin. Harley's wound appeared to be a slight one, yet he remained a long time in the hands of the surgeon. Some imputed this to an ill habit of body; some, among whom was his friend Swift, to the unskilfulness of his surgeon; and some thought it was a mere artifice to increase the popular interest. There can be no doubt, however, that Guiscard was left in much worse case. Whether wounded by the single sword of St. John or by the swords of all the company, he had wounds that were deep and dangerous, and when he was carried to Newgate he was considered by those who saw him as a dying man. Some of the members of the council visited him in Newgate, in order to examine him. Burnet says that his confession was kept secret,—Lord Dartmouth, that he confessed nothing, as he could not expect a pardon. "Two days after," adds Dartmouth, "he desired to speak again with some of the council: he began a story of a man, who, he said, had ill designs, but would not name him; and stopped short, and said it would make against himself; and rambled like a man that was light-headed; upon which we left him. His correspondence with France seemed to be but of a late date; and the intelligence that he gave was of a matter few of the cabinet had any knowledge of before they had read his letters; and he was never asked who he had it from—the answer being evident." This means that Guiscard had had his intelligence from his quondam ally and associate, St. John. If Guiscard discovered more than this, it was kept as under the seal of confession, and the unhappy man, whose intellect in all probability was deranged, died of his wounds in Newgate.* "This accident," says Burnet, "was of great use to Harley; for the party formed against him was ashamed to push a man who was thus assassinated by one who was studying to recommend himself to the court of France, and who was believed to have formed a design against the queen's person. Her health was at this time much shaken. She had three fits of an ague; the last was a severe one: but the progress of the disease was stopped by the bark." Both houses of parliament hastened to address her majesty, touching the late horrible and villanous attempt made upon the person of Mr. Harley by a French Papist. They affirmed that that minister's fidelity and zeal had drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of Popery and faction; they pledged themselves to defend her majesty and all such faithful servants against all the attempts of her enemies,

* Notes on Burnet. There was a rumour as if the assassin had intended to murder the queen. On this head Lord Dartmouth says:—"If Guiscard had any designs upon the queen's life, his heart failed him, for he had been with her the evening before, and nobody in the outer-room but Mrs. Fielding, or within call but Mrs. Kirk, who was commonly asleep. The queen told me he was very pressing for an augmentation of his pension, and complained that he was ill paid."

* "This bold attempt having incited the curiosity of multitudes to go and see Guiscard in Newgate, the turnkey kept his corpse in pickle after he was dead, and showed him for money several days; which coming to the queen's ear, she ordered the body to be buried: and a law was made this session, which made it felony to assault a Privy Counsellor in the execution of his office."—Life of Queen Anne.

whether open or secret; and they desired that she would cause all Papists to be removed from the cities of London and Westminster. And accordingly a proclamation went forth, and the English Catholics, who had no more to do with Guiscard than the Mufti had to do with the church of Rome, were harassed and annoyed after the old fashion. If Harley had died they would have made a sort of saint and martyr of him; as it was he was revered as one that had run extreme danger for the Protestant cause, and there was no longer any doubting of the patriotism, and orthodoxy, and anti-Jacobitism of one who had had a French knife in him.* When he first appeared in the House of Commons, the speaker made a very pompous and very absurd discourse on the past dangers of the great minister; who, a few weeks after, was made lord-treasurer, and elevated to the House of Lords with the high-sounding titles of Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer. The death of Lord Rochester, which happened just at this time, was considered as another signal piece of good fortune for Harley. But at this moment his colleague St. John was undermining his authority, and laying, among other plots, plans to monopolise the favour of Mrs. Masham, who continued to monopolise that of the queen. It is scarcely possible to conceive a more degrading state than that into which the government, as well as the court, had fallen: there were manoeuvres, intrigues, back-door influences, bribery, and corruption everywhere, and frankness, sincerity, honesty, and disinterestedness nowhere. Even what was good and commendable in itself was brought about generally by base and treacherous means: Harley, or, as we must now call him, Lord Oxford, indolent and indecisive, did very little, and all that was done was done slowly, and every great state measure was made to partake of the character of a trick or a juggle at cards. On the 12th of June Anne prorogued this Tory parliament, which had voted with exemplary readiness upwards of six millions and a-half, though they had assured the people that their very first step would be to curtail the supplies, as passed by the improvident Whigs.

In the mean while Marlborough had gone to the wars—and this was for the last time. Earnestly summoned by Prince Eugene and most of the leaders of the allies, he went into Flanders and took the command; but he presently found that his authority was diminished and his force weakened, that many of his best regiments were drawn off for the now altogether hopeless war in Spain, or to be sacrificed in a paltry expedition to Quebec, under Mrs. Masham's brother, Jack Hill. On the other hand, the French had regained new spirits by the proceedings of the Tory cabinet at home, and by the assurances of their emissaries, that it was the main object of Lord Oxford to hurry on a peace—to secure a peace at any price, or at least without any nice attention to the treaties of the grand alliance, or to the great principle of dethroning King Philip,—and they seemed confident, both in camp and court, that they would see disgrace brought upon a general who had so often humbled them, and whose very name had been a sound of terror in their ears. But Marlborough's masterly conduct disappointed alike the hopes of the French abroad and of the Tories at home. Oxford and St. John, Dartmouth and the rest had been confident that in going to Flanders this year he was going to certain defeat and humiliation; and Marshal Villars, who had established lines which were deemed impregnable, and called Marlborough's ne plus ultra, all the way from Bouchain to Canche, and who had directed movements to be made on the Upper Rhine, which compelled Prince Eugene to quit his friend to watch the French in that quarter, anticipated nothing less than full security for the whole summer, if Marlborough remained inactive, or a victory if he attempted to force those wonderful lines. Yet the result was altogether different: Marlborough, with admirable generalship, distracted the attention of Villars, forced his impregnable lines at Arleux without losing a single soldier, and then calmly proceeded to invest Bouchain under the eyes of Villars, who either could do nothing, or relied too much upon the prodigious strength of that frontier town. In twenty days Bouchain was in the possession of Marlborough, and Villars was covered with shame. These brilliant successes, however, only forwarded the secret negotiations between the Tories and the agents of King Louis. The Tories had pledged themselves to the queen to draw the country out of a war which had been too much prolonged, and to disentangle her from those alliances which William III. had made, and which Marlborough and the preceding Whig ministry had maintained and strengthened: they had proclaimed, as an unquestionable axiom in politics, that England ought to watch the balance of power, but to keep aloof from the disputes of foreign states—to engage in commercial relations with every country in the world, but to contract alliances offensive and defensive with none. This was neither the first nor the last time such principles were announced: they were clearly impracticable, and would have been very questionable in many cases, in reference both to honour and interest, if they could have been acted upon; but, this notwithstanding, they were acceptable to the masses of the people, who had had

* Yet only a few months before Guiscard's attempt—that is, about the end of 1710—Harley had sent the Abbé Gaultier (of whom more will be heard in the sequel) to the Duke of Berwick with authority to treat about the restoration of that duke's half-brother, the Pretender. By this plan Anne was to continue to hold the crown till her death, and then the Pretender, upon assurances and securities touching the national religion and liberties, was to be brought in upon the shoulders of the people. Nor were these secret negotiations without an effect. Berwick and the other advisers of the Pretender directed the Jacobites in the English parliament to fall in with the court and with Harley, by their means would be enabled to obtain a decided superiority. At the same time the conclusion of a peace was an indispensable condition. When Harley had attained all his ends, he took no steps whatever to forward the great Jacobite plan; though he continued to lean upon that party for support at home, and to correspond with it abroad, representing the necessity of caution, yet still speaking as if the succession of the House of Hanover would be easily set aside on the death of Anne.—Memoirs of Berwick.—Atterberson's—Lockhart Papers.

a surfeit of military glory, and who were now thirsting for a peace, which, however, they hardly desired with more eagerness than they had at the beginning desired the war. This popular feeling would in all probability have been less violent if Marlborough had been less grasping and avaricious, and his wife less arrogant. Another circumstance that made many men impatient for any kind of peace was their natural, and, we think, commendable preference of the pleasant light wines of France, to the strong and heavy wine of Portugal. It may look like a joke, but it is certain that this cause is very seriously mentioned by several writers of the day, and classed with the love of the church, and a hatred and jealousy of the Marlboroughs, as a contributor to the inglorious peace of Utrecht. "And now," says Cunningham, "I shall take this opportunity to speak of the French wine-drinkers as truly and briefly as I can. On the first breaking out of the confederate war, the merchants in England were prohibited from all commerce with France, and a heavy duty was laid upon French wines. This caused a grievous complaint among the toppers, who have great interest in the parliament, as if they had been poisoned by port wines. Mr. Portman Seymour, who was a jovial companion, and indulged his appetites, but otherwise a good man; General Churchill, the Duke of Marlborough's brother, a man of courage, but a lover of wine; Mr. Periera, a Jew and smell-feast, and other hard-drinkers, declared that the want of French wine was not to be endured, and that they could hardly bear up under so great a calamity. These were joined by Dr. Aldridge, who, though nicknamed "the priest of Bacchus," was otherwise an excellent man, and adorned with all kinds of learning. Dr. Ratzliffe, a physician of great reputation, who ascribed the cause of all diseases to the want of French wines, though he was very rich, and much addicted to wine, yet being extremely covetous, bought the cheaper wines; but at the same time he imputed the badness of his wine to the war, and the difficulty of getting better: therefore the Duke of Beaufort and the Earl of Scarsdale, two young noblemen of great interest among their acquaintance, who had it in their power to live in magnificence or luxury, merrily attributed all the doctor's complaints to his avarice. All those were also for peace rather than war. And all the bottle companions, many physicians, and great numbers of the lawyers and inferior clergy, and, in fine, the loose women too, were united together in the faction against the Duke of Marlborough."

* * Hist. Gr. Brit.—To gratify these claret and champagne drinkers, an act had been passed in the preceding session, repealing the act of the 3rd and 4th of Anne, so far as they related to prohibiting the importation of French wines. "This," says Burnet, "was not much to the honour of those who promoted it; the interest of the nation lay against it so visibly, that nothing but the delicate palates of those who loved that liquor could have carried such a motion through the two Houses. But though the bill passed, it was like to have no effect: for it was provided that wine should be imported in neutral vessels; and the King of France had forbid it to be exported in any vessels but his own; it seeming he reckoned that our desire of drinking his wine would carry us to take it on such terms as he should prescribe."

Ever since the beginning of the year secret messengers had been going and coming between London and Paris—some employed and received by Lord Oxford, some by St. John, who, though equally determined on a peace, as the only means of keeping down Marlborough and Godolphin, were by no means agreed as to the means of obtaining it. It appears proved beyond the reach of a doubt that St. John wrote repeatedly to the Pretender at this moment, while Oxford, less enthusiastic or far more cautious, contented himself with sending word of mouth messages, unmeaning compliments, and vague hopes. Oxford, however, is generally believed to have been the first to make a direct overture of peace to the French court.

There was in England a certain Abbé Gaultier, an adept in gallantry, and in intrigues, political as well as amorous, even above the degree common to a certain class of French priests before the Revolution, who were little more than priests by name, or little better than profligates, panders, and chevaliers d'industrie. This Gaultier knew England well, and was in the closest intimacy with the Catholic Lady Jersey, the wife of a Tory minister. Oxford preferred him to others on account of his equivocal character, which would make it easy to deny and disavow his proceedings if they should fail of success and come to be discovered by the Whigs. The abbé, without papers, but fully instructed, repaired secretly to Paris, and easily obtained an audience of de Torcy. "Sir," said the confident priest, "do you wish for a peace? I am come to give you the means of treating, and of concluding one independently of the Dutch, who are unworthy of the honour done them by our king, who has so often addressed himself to them for the pacification of Europe." According to de Torcy himself, whose account we follow, "to ask a minister of France then, whether he wished for peace, was like asking a man suffering under a long and dangerous malady, whether he wished to get better." This minister, however, well aware of the fact that there were mountebanks and impostors of all descriptions going about to profit by the difficulties of their country, made Gaultier explain himself thoroughly before he would trust him in the slightest degree. "As to the means of conducting this negotiation," said the abbé, "only give me a letter for my Lord Jersey, saying that you are glad to have heard from me that he is in good health, and that you have charged me with your thanks for his inquiries. That letter alone will serve as my passport, and as my powers to listen to the propositions they are disposed to make." De Torcy was charmed at the facility of negotiating without committing himself. "This peace," says he, "was as absolutely necessary to us as it was unexpected by us. All our negotiations and attempts at negotiation in Holland had only produced a greater animosity and a more obstinate determination to continue the war; and England, more than any other power, had hitherto blown the fire. Yet the new ministers of that crown now held a language totally different from that of their predecessors; and the advances they were making were the less open to any suspicion, as it was for their evident and personal interests that the war, the prop of the credit of the Whigs, their enemies, should finish immediately. They asked from the king no sort of engagement—no, not so much as the shadow of an engagement; Gaultier had orders to be satisfied with a simple letter of compliment, by which it would be understood that the general proposition had been favourably received in France." By order of Louis, de Torcy wrote the note to Lord Jersey, and gave it to Gaultier with vivâ voce instructions to assure the ministers of her Britannic majesty, that his master, justly irritated at the conduct of the States-General, would never again treat for a peace through them, but solely with England. The abbé travelled back to London, and shortly after was back again at Paris to inquire as to the advantages which Louis was disposed to offer to England as the price of her abandoning her allies, and recognising his grandson as king of Spain. Encouraged by the defeat of the Archduke Charles, the surrender of General Stanhope and the whole course of events in Spain, and not as yet alarmed by Marlborough's forcing Villars's boasted lines and capturing Bouchain, Louis was not disposed to offer very much; and all that he did offer was, that we should keep Gibraltar and have a free trade with Spain and the Indies. The secret of these negotiations was not long kept—probably Gaultier himself sold them to the Dutch—for, presently, Petikum intimated to Louis that, if he would enter again into negotiation with the States-General, he would certainly have reason to be satisfied with the Dutch. When neither party could hope to deceive the other any longer, Lord Oxford and St. John explained themselves to the States-General; and then it was represented that both England and Holland would be happy to contribute to the conclusion of a general, a definitive, and a lasting treaty of peace; that the republic was ready to join the queen of Great Britain to this effect; but that the propositions to be offered by France must be large and definite.* At this point the business became heavy, and Oxford slower even than usual. If Marlborough had been well beaten by Villars, the lord treasurer might have taken heart; but as the lord-general had gained, without loss of blood or loss of any material kind, advantages equivalent to a great victory, it seemed dangerous to run on too rapidly to make a treaty which could only have been justified by the annihilation of our army abroad and the defeat of our fleets. The people of England wished for peace, but were anxious that that peace should be an honourable one: if they should be irritated by any sudden and disgraceful treaty, their blessings upon the present pacific ministry were pretty sure to be converted into curses. Lord Raby, our ambassador at the Hague, represented that it was advisable and necessary to be open with the States-General, lest they should have reason to accuse us of taking our measures without them; and his lordship further said that all the letters from France agreed, that all the hope the French king had was to sow jealousies among the allies. But Mr. Secretary St. John soon prepared his excellency to entertain other sentiments, by acquainting him that it was her majesty's pleasure he should make all possible haste to St. James's, as there were many intrigues expected upon the tapis, concerning which the queen thought it expedient that he (Lord Raby) should confer with her ministers here. This Raby had been very anxious for an English peerage and for the title of Earl of Strafford, being a Wentworth, and cousin to the son of the man that had made the name of Strafford for ever memorable in English history: therefore, St. John, in the same letter, tells him that her majesty designs, upon his arrival in England, to give him the promotion in the peerage which he desired; and then, "that his excellency might begin to have some notions agreeable to the sense of her ministers," the secretary tells him that Britain "had gone so much too far in weaving her interest into that of the continent, that it would prove no easy task to disentangle our affairs without tearing or rending." Raby, in his reply, thought far more of his peerage than of the Dutch. He seems to have been in a paroxysm of gratitude. "You may be assured," he writes to St. John, "that I will venture anything, and undertake anything, to serve the queen: you may venture boldly to trust me with the real intentions. . . . If you have a mind I should come over for the queen's service, I am ready to come in a yacht, frigate, packet-boat, or any way."* And in such ways as these did the court overcome the scruples of the few Tories that had any, about rushing on to a disgraceful peace as the termination of a long and glorious war. Harley, Jersey, and Shrewsbury pressed the queen not only to send the Abbé Gaultier back to France, but to send him in company with one of her own subjects—"a man of wit and fidelity, in whom she might put confidence." As the proper person they proposed Matthew Prior, the poet, who was already well known in France, where he had passed some years as secretary of embassy to the Earls of Portland and Jersey. "Prior," says de Torcy, "was renowned in England for his wit and poetry; but his best quality, at the present conjuncture, was a sincere desire for the peace, and his attachment to the Lord Treasurer Oxford." Accordingly, in the month of July, Matthew Prior was dispatched for France with the abbé, and with a paper signed "Anne R." at the top, and "A. R." but not countersigned, below, importing that he was fully instructed and authorised to communicate to France the preliminary demands of the queen, and to bring her back the answer. These preliminary demands, or private propositions, were, that the Dutch should have a barrier with a security to their trade; that the emperor should have a barrier on the Rhine; that another barrier should be erected for the Duke of Savoy, who should recover possession of all the places he had lost, and keep possession of all those which he had gained, or which had been conferred upon him by the emperor; that care should be taken to establish a proper balance of power in Italy; that positive assurance should be given that the crowns of France and Spain should never be united; that all the allies should be satisfied according to their agreements and treaties with England, and that their pretensions should be regulated and terminated to their common satisfaction: and, in relation to Great Britain in particular, that trade and commerce should be so settled as to give satisfaction to her majesty's subjects; that the government as now settled should be acknowledged in France; that Gibraltar and Port Mahon should continue in our possession; that Dunkirk should be demolished; that the Assiento should be entirely in the hands of Great Britain;* that Newfoundland should be entirely given up to the English; that the trade of Hudson's Bay should continue in the hands of the French and English; that all things in America should continue in the possession of those they should be found to be in possession of at the conclusion of the peace; that all advantages, or liberty of commerce, that had been or should be granted to the French by the Spaniards, should be equally granted to the subjects of Great Britain; and, finally, that the secret of the present overtures should be closely kept, till allowed to be divulged by the mutual consent of both parties concerned.† Upon the poet's arrival at Paris, de Torcy wrote to Secretary St. John, to express his great pleasure at seeing Mr. Prior again after an interval of so many years; and, at the same time, his regret that he had not greater liberty to employ those talents which he was persuaded he could have made a good use of. In his Memoirs the French minister says that Prior had good intentions, but very limited powers; that he could only listen to the answers made to the propositions he brought. The French minister conceived that the advantages demanded by England would ruin the trade of France and of other nations; but Prior told him that the service his mistress was willing to render the House of Bourbon, in maintaining King Philip on the throne of Spain, merited advantageous distinctions for herself and her kingdom. Prior further attempted to prove that England ought to be gratified with four establishments in Spanish America, anywhere between California and the straits of Maghellan. England, he said, had contracted immense debts, and must find some means of paying them—nothing was so likely to answer the purpose as to advantages resulting from her trade in America—King Philip ought to consider the sacrifices it would cost the queen of England to support him; for the Austrian claimant had promised her majesty all possible advantages, and had engaged, by secret treaties, to admit the English flag into the ports of South America as freely as the flag of Spain. But de Torcy represented, with good effect, that these bargains with Charles were very unlikely to be realised: that the throne of King Philip had taken good root in the soil of Spain, and that, except the Catalans, and a few bands of malcontents scattered here and there, the people of that country had unequivocally proved their attachment to the Bourbon, and their resolution to have him and none other for their sovereign. But there was yet another argument of which the French diplomatist could hardly make too much: by the death of his brother, the Emperor Joseph, which happened at Vienna in the month of April of the present year, the claimant, Charles, had been called to the empire and to the hereditary states of the House of Austria. If to these dominions this prince were allowed to join Spain, Naples, and Sicily, the Milanese, and the two Indies, his power must be excessive and dangerous to Europe. Were the allies anxious to see again the colossal might of the Emperor Charles V.? In beginning this war they had declared that their motive was a fear of seeing the crowns of France and Spain, the Indies, &c., united on one head; but would that union be less dangerous which they now seemed aiming at? Charles had put forth no declaration that the Spanish inheritance should be held separate, by a prince of his house, from the Austrian inheritance and the empire; but Louis had bound himself, and was ready to repeat the pledge, that, though a Bourbon prince should reign in Spain, that crown should never be worn by the same person that wore the crown of France. These particular arguments were overpowering; and if the expulsion of Philip and the establishment of Charles ought never to have been made a condition in the Grand Alliance—as it never would have been if William III. had lived to work out his own plan—it was now certainly time to think of abandoning that principle. There was, therefore, in the great change of circumstances resulting from the death of the Emperor Joseph, sufficient ground to justify a change in policy, and an advance towards peace—though never such a peace as the Harleys and St. Johns were now precipitating.

As Matthew Prior was so limited by his instructions, the French cabinet sent him back to London, accompanied by M. Ménager, a very expert diplomatist, and by the poet's old friend, the Abbé Gaultier. All these measures were concerted with great secrecy; and in some respects there was a double mystery, for neither Prior nor even Gaultier was made acquainted with the instructions with which the French cabinet furnished

Ménager. These instructions were full and significant. Ménager was to demand an equivalent for the ruin of Dunkirk; he was to demand the restitution of some of the places which Louis had lost in Flanders, and particularly of Lille and Tournay. He was to offer some other places in exchange for these; but, above all things, he was to be circumspect, and only bid by degrees like a cautious man at an auction. The English poet, the French abbé, and the homme de bureau got safely and secretly into England; but at Canterbury they were discovered, and, having no regular passports, were seized by the master of the packet-boats, Mr. Macky,—the author of the Memoirs, from which we have quoted some quaint and amusing characters of the personages of the English court, cabinet, and parliament,—who had got information of Prior's illegal journey. If the Whigs had been in power there were acts of parliament which would have justified stretching the poet's neck at Tyburn; but, under the Tories, who had employed him, he was safe; and, after a short detention, he was liberated by my Lord Treasurer Oxford or by Secretary Bolingbroke.* One fine evening in August Prior was admitted into the queen's apartment; and on the same evening he waited on Ménager with her majesty's compliments, and her regrets that he had been obliged to come in so secret a manner. The poet also delivered courteous messages from Oxford, Jersey, Shrewsbury, and St. John, who had been appointed to open the conferences with the French agent. Anne, however, demanded, in writing, a categorical answer to all the propositions which she had sent to Paris by Prior. Ménager was greatly embarrassed at this demand; but he drew up a paper full of double meanings and equivocations, and with this the English ministers were so far satisfied as to proceed to the first conference, which was held privately in the house of Lord Jersey on the 26th of August, when Marlborough was bombarding Bouchain. But, notwithstanding every precaution, the conferences were discovered, and a large part of the nation became convinced that the Tory ministry were resolved to conclude a peace upon any terms. By the beginning of November preliminary articles were signed between England and France, and communicated to the ambassadors of the emperor and Holland. The emperor's minister instantly made the articles public through a London newspaper, and was forbidden the court. The Dutch minister was equally dissatisfied with them; but, after some altercation and correspondence, in which the able pen of Matthew Prior was employed, together with the still abler pen of St. John, they found themselves forced to consent to a congress, which was to treat for a general peace, and to meet on the 1st of January at Utrecht. The representations of the States-General, made on both sides the water, produced, however, some impression; and, though Anne's ministers declared, in a memorial, that the queen remained firm in her resolution of adhering to the preliminaries signed by Ménager and her ministers, it was also declared that a delicate attention would be paid to the interests of all the members of the Grand Alliance, and of those who had been concerned with them, or encouraged by them to take up arms in Spain, Italy, or elsewhere, and that care should be taken to obtain from his most Christian majesty full explanations of his intentions on these points. In France the signing of the preliminaries was hailed as an omen of success and triumph, and de Torcy wrote to Secretary St. John that his master, King Louis, "wholly depended upon the secrecy and good use he would make of the entire confidence he testified to the queen of Great Britain." On the other hand, the Emperor Charles called upon the princes of the empire, in a circular letter, to persevere in all the objects proposed by the Grand Alliance; and the Elector of Hanover, who was only a step from the throne of Great Britain, remonstrated against the preliminaries in a strong memorial.

In the mean while Marlborough, crowned with fresh, but worse than useless, laurels, had returned to England to be insulted by the mob, to be baited by the ministers, and to witness the throwing in the dirt of most of the fruits of the most brilliant war in which England had been engaged in modern times. In taking leave of the States-General he said, he was grieved that he was now obliged to return into England, where all his services to their republic were to be turned to his disgrace. If he could derive satisfaction from the miserable failure of the new pet general of the Tories—Jack Hill, the brother of Mrs. Masham—there was certainly occasion for indulging in that

* The account given of this odd transaction in the Memoirs of the Secret Services of John Macky, Esq. is very amusing. This Macky had partaken plentifully of the secret service money in King William's time, and had been instrumental in detecting several persons that were carrying on treasonable correspondence with France, with the exiled King James, and his son, the Pretender. These services were not much appreciated when the Tories got into power, and when St. John, the foreign secretary, was himself undeniably engaged in similar intercourse. "But," say the Memoirs, "the fatal information which was Mr. Macky's ruin, and which he hath never been able to retrieve, was a letter he received from Calais, that an English gentleman arrived there that morning in a boat directly from the river Thames; that he took post immediately for Paris; and that the boat waited his return. Mr. Macky sent this account to my Lord Bolingbroke, then secretary of state; who, by his secretary, Mr. Tison, desired him to say nothing of it, but to look out for his return: accordingly Mr. Macky employed all his people between the Forelands, by which the boat must pass to return, to look out for her, and at last had advice that she landed at Deal three persons with my Lord Bolingbroke's pass. Mr. Macky, upon this advice, made haste to Canterbury, through which they must pass, and, to his surprise, found the gentleman going by the name of Matthews to be his old acquaintance Mr. Prior, and Monsieur Ménager, and the Abbé Gaultier. Mr. Macky dispatched an express that night to the Duke of Marlborough, then at the siege of Bouchain, with this important news; but whether his grace could not believe that the ministry would make such a step without him, Mr. Macky's letter was exposed, and a copy of it sent by Mr. Watkins to Lord Bolingbroke. Mr. Macky also took horse for Tunbridge, and acquainted the Bishop of Winchester and Admiral Aylmer with the matter, that they might inform my Lord Sunderland; he alarms Count Gallas and Mr. Vryberghen; and Mr. Macky being found to be the person who laid the train that sprung the mine, it brought down the indignation of the ministry furiously upon him. My Lord Bolingbroke threatened to hang him for keeping a correspondence with France. The Earl of Oxford ordered the postmaster to send his contract for the packet-boats to the attorney-general, for his opinion in point of law; his creditors were hounded out upon him; he was thrown into prison, and there he lay at the king's accession to the throne."

feeling. While they were making their pacific overtures to France, in which they bargained for retaining every place in America which might be in their possession at the time of signing the definitive treaty of peace, Oxford or St. John* dispatched that precious brigadier-general to Quebec, to make the conquest of Canada, with 5000 land-troops, and a fleet under the command of Sir Hovenden Walker. Hill, after various unnecessary delays and absurd manoeuvres, entered the Gulf of St. Lawrence in the end of the month of August. He began to ascend the mighty river that pours itself into the gulf, but before he could reach Quebec he was overtaken by fog and tempest, and driven among sands and rocks. Some of the transports foundered in the river; others were stranded on its banks with their crews, troops, and stores. The poor soldiers and sailors thus cast away were tomahawked and scalped by the wild Indians, or were subjected to scarcely less horrible treatment at the hands of the French colonists. Yet still, when the storm abated, and the fog dispersed, a brave man might have seen his way clearly, for the English force was still considerable, and the French ill prepared to meet it. But Hill, who was not a brave man, and who had as little military skill as the Abigail that had procured him his appointment, hesitated and quailed, and then called a council of war, in which it was agreed to return home as fast as possible. Hill reached Portsmouth in the month of October; but the fatality which attended the expedition was not yet over;—she had scarcely reached port, when the admiral's ship—a fine seventy-four—blew up with every soul on board.

During the recess of parliament the Tory ministry had been engaged in strengthening their interest by the distribution of titles and promotions. Wentworth Lord Raby, of course, got his earldom of Stafford—though, according to Swift, he was scarcely worth the buying, being “possessed of no parts, infinitely proud, and wholly illiterate.” Sir Simon Harcourt, who held the seals, was created Baron Harcourt, and soon after was made lord chancellor: the Duke of Hamilton, who persisted

* It is suspected that St. John, who was as thorough-paced an intriguer as any French abbé that ever lived, promoted the expedition, and procured the appointment of Hill, to gratify his sister. All public men knew by this time—and St. John better than any of them—that the subjection of the queen to the low-minded Mrs. Masham was as absolute as it had been in former days to the high-spirited and clever wife of Marlborough; and it was precisely in his character and habits, in order to undermine Oxford, whom he despised more than he hated, to win over the bedchamber-woman at all hazards. Cunningham says decidedly, that Mrs. Masham was a principal projectress of the Quebec expedition, which was undertaken for her private interest. “The Earl of Oxford said, he had always opposed this undertaking; and that the managers of this American expedition had never given any account of the money, to the amount of 20,000*l.*, issued out of the Treasury for it; of which loud complaints were afterwards made by the impatient people. But all these things, through the queen's connivance, were overlooked; and the multitude of impositions was so great, that none of the public defaulters were compelled to refund their peculations.”—Hist. Great Brit.

in his devious course, but kept mostly on the side of hot Jacobitism, was made an English peer under the title of Duke of Brandon: the Duke of Buckingham, being made president of the council in the room of the Earl of Rochester deceased, was succeeded in the office of steward of the household by Earl Paulet, who had been superseded in the Treasury by the promotion of Harley, Earl of Oxford, to the lord-treasurership; and Robinson, bishop of Bristol, on the decease of the Duke of Newcastle, was made lord privy seal—an appointment which reminded people somewhat too strongly of Archbishop Laud and his times, when churchmen of the most despotic principles monopolised so large a share of state business. Encouraged by all these symptoms and by the seeming prostration of the Whigs, who had achieved or completed the Revolution of 1688; convinced that it was the intention of the queen and of those who now governed for her to bring in the Pretender on her death, the enthusiastic Jacobites in Scotland had proceeded to some startling demonstrations of loyalty to the old dynasty. The Duchess of Gordon, who had so earnestly written to the Pretender—"Come when you please, and to what port you please, and you will be well received"—sent as a proper present to the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh a medal with a head on the right side, with the inscription "Cujus est?" and on the reverse the British island, with the motto "Reddite." The head was that of the Pretender, and it was reputed a good likeness. The advocates, whose loyalty must have been enlivened by claret, voted by a majority of 63 to 12 that the medal should be accepted as a good and honourable present: and Mr. Dundas, of Arniston, in the name of the whole faculty returned the Duchess of Gordon most hearty thanks for this medal of their sovereign lord the king, hoping and trusting that her grace would soon have the opportunity to compliment the faculty with a second medal, struck upon the restoration of the rightful monarch, and the termination of rebellion. This was too flagrant to let pass: the Duke of Queensberry, secretary of state for Scotland, was informed of the proceedings, and the resident minister of Hanover remonstrated against them in a formal memorial, to which Anne and her ministers could not turn a deaf ear without openly declaring against the act of succession. But the vindicatory steps taken were in reality worse than no notice at all. The lord advocate, Sir David Dalrymple, a staunch Whig and friend to the Protestant succession in the house of Hanover, was disgraced on pretence of remissness in not prosecuting the makers and distributors of the medal; while Dundas of Arniston was let off, notwithstanding his printing and publishing a vindication of his treasonable speech and conduct, in which paper he out-Heroded himself, and treated the acts of the British parliament with contempt.

The session did not begin this year before the 7th of December. The queen delivered the opening speech in person. As long as the Duchess of Marlborough had enjoyed her good graces, Anne had to all appearance delighted in the war; and she had certainly, year after year, witnessed its continuance, and heard of the bloody battles and losses in the deadly breach without any visible emotion. Her weak and timid mind had even rejoiced in the fictions of the poets that made her a Bellona; but now the Tories were anxious to make her figure as a most tender-hearted sovereign, and as the proper type of the goddess of peace. They had represented that her majesty's heart was set upon putting a stop to that vast effusion of blood; that she had beheld with tenderness and grief the sufferings of her people, forced into the field, not to defend their native country, not to uphold the church and state, but to gratify the covetousness and ambition of her allies abroad and of her late ministers at home—"to the eternal reproach of Christianity." Although these precludes had prepared parliament for what they might expect, they were somewhat startled by the bold and reproachful paragraph with which Anne began her speech. "I am glad," said she, "that I can now tell you, that, notwithstanding the arts of those who delight in war, both place and time are appointed for opening the treaty of a general peace." Marlborough was in the house when he was thus ungraciously reflected upon. Without the least regard to obvious truths, the queen declared that all her allies were ready to concur with her, and had an entire confidence in her. The more she had gone into measures or intrigues for sapping and undermining the Act of Succession, the louder had become her declarations, in public, of attachment to the house of Hanover, and of anxiety for securing the rights of that house to the crown as limited by parliament. On the present occasion, this matter, together with the Protestant religion and the liberty of the nation, was proclaimed to be her "chief concern." On proposing an address of thanks, ministers found themselves abandoned by Nottingham, who was jealous of Harley, and who had been in treaty with some of the Whigs. Nottingham rose and made a long and striking speech against the address, against the policy now pursued, against such a peace as was now proposed, against the occupancy of the throne of Spain by a Bourbon, and against everything that had been done or was doing by the ministry. He moved that a clause should be added to the address, declaring that, in the opinion of that house, no peace could be safe or honourable to Great Britain or Europe, which allotted Spain and the Indies to any branch of the house of Bourbon. This gave rise to a violent debate, in the course of which Marlborough spoke with unusual heat and at a great length, being stung to the quick by the invidious implications of the speech from the throne. "I can declare," said he, "with a safe conscience, in the presence of her majesty, who knows me, and now hears me, of this illustrious assembly, and of Almighty God, who is infinitely above all the powers upon earth, and before whom, according to the ordinary course of nature, I must soon appear to give an account of my actions, that I ever was desirous of a safe, honourable, and lasting peace; and far from any design of prolonging the war for my own private advantage, as my enemies have most falsely insinuated." Upon the question being put, it was carried in favour of Nottingham by a majority of 62 to 54, in spite of all the exertions of the court, who thus saw they had nothing to hope for in the House of Lords. When their lordships went up with their address, the queen told them very coldly that she was sorry any one could think she would not do her utmost to recover Spain and the Indies from the house of Bourbon. This pious queen seems never to have hesitated at similar falsehoods and evasions: at this very moment she had entirely made up her mind to leave Spain and the Indies to Philip. In the House of Commons the Tories had it all their own way: the address, echoing part of her speech, assured Anne that they would use their utmost endeavours to disappoint as well the arts and designs of those who for private views might delight in war, as the hopes the enemy might have vainly entertained of receiving advantage from any division among themselves. Robert Walpole proposed an amendment similar to that carried in the Upper House by Nottingham, but he found himself left in a minority of 106 to 232.

For some time matters remained in this state, the Tories carrying what they chose in the Commons, the Whigs in the Lords. In the latter House there was a strong antipathy to the Scottish peers, who were almost to a man Tories, if not Jacobites, and who began, as a body, to show too early a disposition to be bribed and bought by the ministry. The Duke of Hamilton, as we have seen, had been lately created Duke of Brandon. When he claimed the place in parliament which appertained to him in that quality, his demand was resisted by the Whig lords, who conceived the assumption to be incompatible with the limitation of Scottish peers in the Act of Union, and who urged the extreme danger to the constitution if the crown were allowed to crowd their House with Scottish lords, notoriously poor for the most part, and still more notoriously venal. After a vehement debate Hamilton's claim was rejected by a majority of five. It happened rather unfortunately for the consistency of the Whigs, that they had, before this, permitted the Scottish but Whiggish Duke of Queensberry to take his seat in their House as Duke of Dover, and had thus established a precedent directly in the face of their present decision. The Scottish peers, in a representation to the queen, complained of all this as a breach of the Union, and as a mark of disgrace put upon the whole nobility of Scotland, who thus seemed to be stigmatised as the only description of persons in the realm incapable of being admitted to the honours of the English peerage. For a time they kept away from court and parliament; but they were useful—particularly in the latter place—and the queen brought them back by kind promises and (it is said) by liberal donations of money. Nottingham soon proved himself an unsafe ally: he persuaded the Whigs that, if they would only allow the passing of a certain bill through the Lords, he could bring over to them from Oxford and St. John many of the Tories and high churchmen; and the Whig lords, in their anxiety for place, foolishly and basely consented. The bill in question was none other than the old Occasional Conformity Bill, which had been rejected three several times by the Upper House; but which now, somewhat, yet not much, shorn of its intolerance and fierceness, was carried through both Houses with little or no opposition. The Whigs, of course, hereby lost the sympathy and support of the Dissenters, without gaining that accession of strength which Nottingham had promised them from his high churchmen. According to Lord Dartmouth—"the court were glad to be rid of a bill they knew would signify nothing when passed, though often trumped up to make divisions and unbusiness; and Lord Nottingham had the mortification afterwards to see his bill repealed with some scorn, and himself not much better treated."*

The complaints and protestations of the Duke of Marlborough, who had hitherto borne his ill-treatment with astonishing meekness, inflamed the queen, and his steadily adhering to their opponents in parliament determined Oxford and St. John to complete his disgrace. The lord-treasurer had declared in a letter to the new Lord Strafford, that the general had put himself at the head of the Whigs, and had united himself with the foreign ambassadors, who were loudly complaining of the conduct of our court; and St. John had declared to the same party that Marlborough had been pursuing every counsel which was the worst for him. If the great general had bound himself to support the present cabinet, it is quite clear he would have escaped without further punishment; but his steadiness to the Whigs sealed his fate. Ministers matured their plans; and, on the 21st of December, Marlborough was charged in the House of Commons with having appropriated more than half a million of the public money, by taking and keeping 2½ per cent. out of the pay of the foreign troops maintained by England, and 63,000*l.* from Sir Solomon de Medina, and Antonio Alvarez Machado, the contractors for bread to the army. It was also made to appear that his secretary Cardonel, with his permission, had exacted from the contractors 500 gold ducats every time a new contract was signed. Marlborough pleaded established usage, and showed many precedents to justify these practices. He also maintained that his percentages and "perquisites" fell far short of the amount now stated, and were fully legalised by the queen's warrants. The truth appears to be, that the whole administration of the army was very defective; that enormous perquisites, as they were called, were and had been left to the commander-in-chief; that Marlborough, in his inordinate appetite for money, had made the most of these sources of revenue, without, however, exceeding law, or rather usage and precedents, for law and rule there was none; that it was not always easy to separate the expenditure of the army from diplomatic and political outlays; that the queen's warrant expressly authorised Marlborough to reserve $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. out of all money payable to the foreign troops, "to defray such extraordinary contingent expenses as could not otherwise be provided for;" and that she had approved and confirmed all such agreements as he might have cause to make hereafter respecting the said $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., &c.*

A. D. 1712. Anne, however, after the Christmas recess, during which ministers had matured their plans, declared in council, that, as an information was laid against the Duke of Marlborough by the commissioners of public accounts, she thought fit to dismiss him from all his employments, that the matter might have an impartial examination. And then the queen herself, a stranger to all magnanimity, wrote him a letter announcing his disgrace, and attributing it to ill-treatment which she had received personally. The folly of the thing was equal to its meanness and pitiful spite, as she herself had just declared that his dismissal was owing to the charges brought against him in the House of Commons; while her ministers were representing that the duke's dismissal was a cruel necessity imposed upon her, by his putting himself at the head of those who opposed the blessed peace, on which the pious and compassionate queen had set her heart. Marlborough, whom Bishop Burnet compares to "Belisarius in Justinian's time," told her majesty that this was an ill reward for his long services, and that the inveteracy of his enemies had been more powerful with her than any other consideration.

But this was not the only work done during the Christmas holidays. Irritated and alarmed by the majority against them in the House of Lords, Anne and her ministers had endeavoured to "reconcile"—that is, to bribe and win over—some of the peers; and, finding their most strenuous endeavours unsuccessful, they had then resolved to turn the scale against the Whigs by making a new batch of peers. On the 1st of January the queen signed twelve new patents; and on the very next day twelve new lords in a troop took their seats in the Upper House.* These matters were not regarded so slightly as they have since been. "At the sight of this new proof of the ruined rights of the peers," says Cunningham, "the Tory party was observed, by their mutual congratulations, to be highly elated; while all sober men of the Whig party looked down upon the ground, as if they had been invited to the funeral of the peerage, and could not tell what to say. When the rights of the peers were thus violated, all things succeeded in parliament to the queen's wish; and the conditions of peace were approved just as her majesty, not to say as the French king, pleased." When the ceremonies of the introduction and oath-taking of the twelve new lords were over, a message was delivered from the queen, commanding the House to adjourn till the 14th, when her majesty would lay matters of great importance before them. Hereupon there arose a great debate; it was said that the queen could not adjourn one house of parliament and leave the other sitting; that, in convening, dissolving, proroguing, or ordering the adjournment of parliaments, the crown always addressed both Houses, never one House by itself. The Whig lords said, that, if this were allowed to pass, it might be established as a precedent for ordering one House to adjourn and leaving the other sitting—a thing which would amount to a total disjoining of the constitution. The question served as an immediate proof of the efficacy of the new creations; for it was carried

* In a letter presented to the commissioners of inquiry by Mr. James Craggs, Marlborough said—"Having been informed, on my arrival here, that Sir Solomon de Medina has acquainted you with my having received several sums of money from him; that it might make the less impression on you, I would lose no time in letting you know that this is no more than what has been allowed as a perquisite to the general, or commander-in-chief of the army, in the Low countries, even before the Revolution and since; and I do assure you, at the same time, that whatever sums I have received on that account have been constantly employed for the service of the public, in keeping secret correspondence, and in getting intelligence of the enemy's motions and designs; and it has fallen so far short, that I take leave to acquaint you with another article that has been applied to the same use, and which arises from her majesty's warrant, whereof the enclosed is a copy." The "other article" here mentioned, was the 24 per cent., which Marlborough said had been applied from time to time "for intelligence and secret service, with such success, that, next to the blessing of God and the bravery of the troops, we might in a great measure attribute to it most of the advantages of the war." The chief witness against him—Sir Solomon de Medina—was a Jew, who, no doubt, had made a good bargain for himself in the contracts. It was attempted to prove that for all the large sums paid annually to him, Marlborough had been permitted to feed the army with very bad bread; but the soldiers themselves denied the fact. When Sir Solomon first appeared before the commission of inquiry, he expressed "much uneasiness of the apprehensions he had of being thought an informer, and of accusing a great man." But it is quite certain that this great contractor was at the moment convinced that he should never more get any profitable contracts from Marlborough, though he might make some good bargains by obliging the men who had supplanted the duke and the Whig cabinet. Those who are anxious to know the whole matter may be referred to Arvideuson Cox's papers, in the library of the British Museum.

* Several of these new peers were very considerable persons in all respects. The twelve were—James, styled Lord Compton, eldest son to the Earl of Northampton, made Baron Compton; Charles, styled Lord Bruce, eldest son to the Earl of Aylesbury, made Baron Bruce; George Inys, styled Lord Duplin, eldest son to the Earl of Kinnoul of Scotland, who had married one of the lord treasurer's daughters, and who was made Baron Hay; Thomas Viscount Windsor, in the kingdom of Ireland, who received the title of Baron Mountjoy; Henry Paget, eldest son to Lord Paget, who was made Baron Burton; Sir Thomas Mansell of Margam, in the county of Glamorgan, made Baron Mansell; Sir Thomas Willoughby of Nottingham, made Baron Middleton; Sir Thomas Trevor, chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, made Baron Trevor; George Grenville, Esq., of Stow, in the county of Cornwall, made Baron Lansdowne; Thomas Foley of Whitchy, in Worcestershire, made Baron Foley; Allan Bathurst of Battledien, in the county of Bedford, made Baron Bathurst; and, taking place before the two last, Samuel Masham of Oates, made Baron Masham. This Samuel Masham had no other merit than that of being husband to the favourite, Abigail Hill, Mrs. Masham, and now, my lady. It appears that Anne had some scruples about this last promotion. Lord Dartmouth says, "The queen told me she never had any design to make a great lady of her, and should have a useful servant about her person; for it would give offence to have a peeress lie upon the floor, and do several other inferior offices; but at last consented, upon condition she remained a dresser, and did as she used to do."

against the Whigs by a majority of twelve.* The sarcastic and witty Wharton compared the twelve new lords to a jury, and asked one of them whether they did not intend to vote by their foreman. In the mean time the powerful Tory majority in the Commons pressed on their measures. They voted that the 2½ per cent. deducted by the Duke of Marlborough was public money, which he ought to account for, and that proceedings should be instituted by the law officers of the crown; and they expelled Cardonel, the duke's secretary, from his seat in their House. They also attacked Robert Walpole, who had excited the animosity of the party by rejecting overtures made to engage his great abilities on their side. Walpole, it will be remembered, had been secretary-at-war; and it was resolved, upon the report of the commissioners of public accounts, that he, Robert Walpole, Esq., a member of the House, in receiving the sum of 500 guineas, and in taking a note for 500*l.* more, on account of two contracts for forage for her majesty's troops quartered in North Britain, was guilty of a high breach of trust and notorious corruption; secondly, that for the said offence he should be committed prisoner to the Tower; and, thirdly, that he should be expelled the House.† Walpole justified his trifling "perquisites," as Marlborough had done his great ones, by quoting usage and the precedents of former secretaries-at-war; but this did not prevent all the Tories, and a few of the Whigs, from saying that expulsion and imprisonment were too slight a punishment—that he deserved to be hanged.

The House of Lords re-assembled on the 14th; and on the 17th of January the queen sent a message to both Houses. After stating that she had not "recovered strength enough, since the return of her gout, to be present in person," Anne told them that her plenipotentiaries were now arrived at Utrecht, and had begun to concert the most proper ways of procuring a just satisfaction to all in alliance with her, according to their several treaties, and particularly with relation to Spain and the West Indies. She assured them that they might depend on her communicating to her parliament the terms of peace before the treaty should be signed and concluded. "Thus," she added, "will the world now see how groundless those reports are, which have been spread abroad by men of evil intentions, to serve the worst designs, as if a separate peace had been treated of; for which there has not been the least colour given." The message ended with a sentence of alarm about the great freedom of the press, to whose attacks the Tories showed themselves far more sensitive than the Whigs had been, although the latter, when in power, had been assailed by all the concentrated malice of Swift, and by every possible species of abuse and vituperation. "Her majesty," said the message, "finds it necessary to observe, how great licence is taken in publishing false and scandalous libels, such as are a reproach to any government: this evil seems to be grown too strong for the laws now in force; it is, therefore, recommended to you to find a remedy equal to the mischief." By means of the new batch the address of the Lords upon this message was harmonious, and the highest satisfaction was expressed at her majesty's declaration, that there had not been the least colour given for those false and scandalous reports about a separate peace. But the Commons, in their address, went much farther than the Lords: they declared that the seditious reports which had been industriously and maliciously spread abroad to the dishonour of her majesty, that a separate peace had been treated of, could have been raised only "by some factious incendiaries, who, to cover their own disaffection to the present establishment and administration, and such secret designs as they dared not to own, had endeavoured to distract her subjects with unreasonable and groundless distrusts and jealousies." And, whereas the Lords had left unnoticed that part of the queen's message which bore upon the liberty of the press, the Commons, exceeding the royal alarmist, said, "We are very sensible how much the liberty of the press is abused, by turning it into such a licentiousness, as is a just reproach to the nation; since not only false and scandalous libels are printed and published against your majesty's government, but the most horrid blasphemies against God and religion. And we beg leave humbly to assure your majesty, that we will do our utmost to find out a remedy equal to this mischief, and that may effectually cure it." After this, persecutions of writers, and prosecutions of printers and publishers, were to be expected; and they soon followed.

The ascendancy of the high-church party in England, and the promulgation of principles which savoured strongly of Laud and those days when it was attempted to force episcopacy and the Liturgy upon the Scots by bullets and broadswords, greatly alarmed the Presbyterians of Scotland, who, on their side, had halted or made but a slow march on the road of toleration. This session a bill was brought into the House of Commons to prevent the disturbing those of the episcopal communion in Scotland, in the exercise of their religious.

* "It is true," adds Burnet, "that the odds in the books is 13: but that was, because one of the peers who had a proxy, without reflecting on it, went away when the proxies were called for." It is said that these creations, which were then considered as a very bold measure, were urged on by St. John, and that he declared, in his doubting way, that, if these twelve lords had not been enough, they would have given the Whigs another dozen. Dartmouth says, "I asked Lord Oxford afterwards, what was the real inducement for taking so odious a course, when there were less shocking means to acquire the same end. He said the Scotch Lords were grown so extravagant in their demands, that it was high time to let them see they were not so much wanted as they imagined; for they were now come to expect a reward for every vote they gave."

† Mr. Robert Man, Walpole's agent, refusing to deliver a copy of the promissory note for 500*l.*, the House ordered that he should be taken into custody of the serjeant-at-arms, for having contemptuously refused to be further examined before the commissioners of accounts. The borough of Lynn, for which Walpole sat, presently re-elected him, and thereupon it was resolved by the House that he was incapable of serving in that parliament, and that the said election was void.

worship, and their use of the Liturgy of the Church of England; as also for repealing an act passed in Scotland before the Union against irregular baptisms and marriages—that is to say, against all baptisms and marriages performed by the Episcopalian or any other dissenting clergy. This increased the alarm north of the Tweed; and the commissioners of the general assembly drew up a representation to the queen, setting forth that the act of 1707, for securing the Protestant religion and Presbyterian government in Scotland, was declared to be an essential and fundamental condition of the Treaty of Union, and was placed for ever out of the reach of any alteration or derogation, and even beyond the power of parliament itself. These zealots further represented to her majesty, that it was with extreme surprise and deep affliction that they had heard of a bill offered for such a large and almost boundless toleration, not only threatening the overthrow of their kirk, but giving a large licence to almost all errors and blasphemies, to the throwing up of all good discipline, to the dishonour of God, the scandal and ruin of the true Christian religion, and the infallible disturbance of their nation. They called upon her majesty, they besought and obtested her in the name of God, to interpose for the relief of the kirk, and set her veto upon the bill. But her majesty, who loved bishops above most things, thought that the toleration of episcopacy in the north was as reasonable as the toleration of presbytery in the south; and when the bill was passed by both Houses, she gave it the royal assent. This Scottish toleration bill included an important clause, prohibiting the magistrates of that kingdom from executing the sentences of the judicatories of the kirk, which was by this means deprived of some of its power of persecuting, and made less formidable in temporal matters. Nor was this all: another bill was brought in for restoring the rights of patronage in the kirk to the noblemen, landholders, &c., which rights had been set aside by the act passed for the restoration of Presbyterianism after the Revolution. The latter act, which gave the presentation to the kirk sessions, was held by the generality of the presbyterians to be almost a fundamental part of their establishment; yet the new bill “was passed through both Houses, only a small opposition being made in either. By these steps the Presbyterians were alarmed when they saw the success of every motion that was made on design to weaken and undermine their establishment.”*

In the month of January, a few days after the disgrace of Marlborough, the companion of his glory, Prince Eugene, came over to England, charged by the emperor with the most difficult of commissions. Eugene was to endeavour to replace Marlborough in his sovereign's good graces; to represent the fatal consequences which would attend the defection of England from the Grand

Alliance; to urge on her majesty that she was bound, not merely by honour, but also by interest, to continue the war till France should submit to all the conditions laid down in 1706; and to propose a new plan for the future conduct of the war, in which the emperor engaged to take upon himself a larger proportion of the burden than had been required from his brother and predecessor, Joseph. The English people received their distinguished guest with enthusiastic acclamations. “That prince's character,” says Burnet, “was so justly high, that all people for some weeks pressed about the places where he was to be seen to look on him.”* For a time both parties treated him with marked respect, and in a manner laid siege to him—the Tories to win him, the Whigs to retain him: but he destroyed the hopes of the former, and incensed the queen by passing the greater part of his time with the disgraced Marlborough; a circumstance, however honourable to himself, fatal to the objects of his mission. The Lord Treasurer Oxford, who, as Mr. Harley, had extolled the duke above all warriors, ancient and modern, one day attempted to make court to the prince, whom he was entertaining by styling him the first general in Europe; but Eugene replied—“If I am, it is to your lordship that I am indebted for it”—alluding to the recent dismissal of Marlborough, who was no longer a general. After feasting him with wonderful magnificence, and exhibiting to his eyes proofs of the wealth of the English aristocracy and the profitableness of places and employments in England, the Tories turned against the prince; and began not only to abuse him, but to charge him indirectly with a share in many desperate plots and intrigues in favour of the Marlboroughs and against the queen and government. At that time, as the readers of our classical essayists are well aware, there was a fashion, among dissipated young men, of rioting about the streets of London at night—a mania which lasted for a time, and which, shorn of some of its brutalities, has been revived in a more civilised and altogether better age. The “Mohawks” of the period were, in fact, nothing more than the “Corinthians” and “Tom-and-Jerryists” of our own day. But malice is inventive, and faction scruples at nothing: the Tories coupled the drunken brawlers and rioters with Prince Eugene and the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough, and made some unthinking people really believe that the end of all this would be the assassination of her pious majesty and all her cabinet at the least; and if Eugene had been familiar with our vernacular, his ear must have been vexed with some very bad and very indecent rhymes; for some ballad-monger made songs about his mother, Olimpia Mancini, who was niece to Cardinal Mazarin, and not more

* “I had the honour,” adds the bishop, “to be admitted at several times, to much discourse with him: his character is so universally known, that I will say nothing of him, but from what appeared to myself. He has a most unaffected modesty, and does scarcely bear the acknowledgments that all the world pay him: he descends to an easy equality with those with whom he converses, and seems to assume nothing to himself, while he reasons with others.”

immaculate than the other princesses of her time ; and these ballads were sung or bawled about the streets of London, by night and by day, unchecked by those who were expressing so much wrath at the abuses of the press. When the brave, accomplished, and modest Italian took his leave (in the month of March), the queen gave him a fine sword, with some assurances that she would be steady to the interests of the Grand Alliance ; but these insignificant things could not conceal from one of the most acute men of that or any other time, that he had completely failed in his mission. Secretary St. John had declared before his coming that the allies were leaning " on the broken reed of a routed faction," and that they could and should obtain nothing through Marlborough and the Whigs. During the prince's stay—on the 14th of February—the Commons resolved that, in the treaty between her majesty and the States-General, for securing the Hanoverian succession to the crown of Great Britain, and for settling a barrier for the States-General against France, there were several articles destructive to the trade and interest of Great Britain, and highly dishonourable to her majesty : and, secondly, that it appeared the Lord Viscount Townsend, who negotiated and signed, and all those who advised the ratifying, the said treaty, were enemies to the queen and kingdom. This was a proceeding the boldness of which must have been suggested by St. John—for the timid and vacillating Oxford was scarcely capable of it. Although rather too much was given or promised to the Dutch, the double object of the treaty was consecrated in the eyes of a very large portion of the nation : nothing seemed more fitting or desirable than to strengthen by diplomacy and treaty the cause of the Protestant succession, which was sure to be opposed by all the force and all the arts of France ; and Holland, in contracting this obligation, had asked that England should guarantee her safety and integrity by procuring a chain of barrier fortresses along her frontiers to secure her from France—that is, the Dutch had only bargained for what the best and wisest of English statesmen had considered essential to the balance of power and to the safety of our own coasts and commerce.* Yet, although the treaty had been solemnly ratified by her, Anne, from a variety of motives, among which we may suspect an intention of weakening the claims and the means of the hated House of Hanover, was grateful to the Tory Commons for branding the barrier treaty and for reprobating so roundly the conduct of her displaced ministers. The States-General took the alarm, and remonstrated in forcible but courteous language. The Commons, set on by Oxford and St. John, drew up " a representation of the state of the war." In this very long paper they represented that the Dutch and all the allies had pursued selfish measures, and had failed to contribute their proper quotas to the war, the great weight of which had fallen upon England ; that the Dutch had made great acquisitions, both of revenue and dominion, while the English had gained scarcely any territory and had sustained great losses in trade. The paper was presented to her majesty, who, in her answer, said she took it as a further instance of the dutiful affection of her House of Commons, who might be assured of her compliance with their wishes. She forthwith instructed the Earl of Stafford, now ambassador at the Hague, to intimate these complaints to the States-General, and to tell them, that unless they immediately increased their army in Flanders her majesty would decrease hers. The States, on their side, instructed their envoy extraordinary to represent to the court of Great Britain, that they could not admit the suppositions on which her majesty's declarations were grounded ; to desire that her majesty would not diminish her troops at the present critical conjuncture, nor insist that the States should so suddenly augment theirs, when the condition of their affairs made it difficult or impracticable. The envoy also presented a memorial from the States, in which they insisted that by the letter of the grand alliance all the confederates were bound to employ all their strength by sea and land against the common enemy ; that, as England was more powerful than Holland, so it ought to bear a greater share of the burthen of the war ; that Holland had been exhausted by former wars with the French—wars that tended to the general security of Europe against the inordinate ambition of Louis XIV.—while England, no disinterested party in the struggle, as the conquest of Holland would be a great step gained to the conquest or invasion of her own land, had remained at peace ; that England was now, and always had been, as much interested in the struggle as Holland, seeing that the French had set up a competitor for the British throne, and had threatened the annihilation of her trade in both Indies, in the Mediterranean, and in the Levant ; that the States had, in fact, maintained upwards of a hundred thousand men in the Netherlands, while the English troops had fallen below seventy thousand ; and that it was owing to the queen's not sending more troops in that direction, that they had been unable to send more than they had done to Spain, where, they acknowledged, their efforts had been inferior to those of the English. When contracting parties have made up their mind to differ,

* By this Barrier Treaty, which is less known than the famous treaty that goes by the same name and was signed in 1713, Anne, on the Protestant succession in England being guaranteed by the States-General, engaged to exercise her arms and policy in such a manner as to obtain for the Dutch the right of garrisoning certain fortified places in the Spanish Netherlands, which, moreover, should serve as the barrier to the United Provinces against France. The States-General charged themselves with the support of the said garrisons, and with the proper maintenance of the fortifications ; but England engaged to furnish 10,000 men and twenty ships of war, in case the barrier fixed by this treaty should be attacked, and, in case of this aid proving insufficient, she farther engaged to declare war against the aggressor. As early as 1701, when the Grand Alliance was formed under the auspices of King William, the Dutch had proposed these conditions, and had explained how essential such a barrier was to their existence ; but the treaty was not concluded by Lord Townsend until 1709.

or when one of them is tired of the alliance, the best treaty that ever was penned may be interpreted in different manners and explained away; and in a war carried on for such a length of time, and on so many different points at once, it must be always easy to misrepresent the relative efforts and objects of the parties engaged, and most difficult to obtain a true view of the whole case, even if honestly desired. Anne replied to the memorial of the States-General by a counter memorial, which was written by St. John with his usual point and clear style. It was short and insolent, and ended with an epigrammatic sentence, stating that, according to the Dutch, England could never give enough, nor the United Provinces too little. This English memorial was dated on the 8th of May (1712). More than three months before this, or on the 29th of January, the congress at Utrecht had been opened with a devout exhortation from the Bishop of Bristol, lord privy seal, whom the Tories had thought proper to employ as their principal diplomatist. "We are this day met together," said the English prelate, who was an ungodly heretic in the eyes of most present, "in the name of God, to lay the foundation of a general peace between the high allies, and the French king your master: we bring sincere intentions, and also positive orders from our principals, to concur in everything on their parts which may tend to the furtherance and happy conclusion of so beneficial and Christian-like a work." He added that he was in hopes the other negotiators would be of the same mind, and that their instructions were so full as to enable them to explain themselves "clearly, roundly," and "without loss of time." But if the bishop really entertained these hopes, he soon saw that they were deceptive; the conferences became embarrassed by all sorts of conflicting pretensions; and nothing was so apparent in them as the returning confidence and assurance of the two French diplomatists, the Marshal d'Huxelles and the Abbé Polignac. The abbé took occasion to show that matters were now different from what they had been at the conferences at Gertruydenberg, where he and his colleague had been humiliated, if not insulted, by the Dutch deputies Buys and Vanderussee; and when the Dutch ministers resumed their former tone the abbé told them disdainfully that circumstances were changed, and that they ought to change their language accordingly—that, if they persisted in their obstinacy, the rest of the diplomatists there assembled would treat without them, and about them, and that, too, in their own city of Utrecht. This abbé, who distinguished himself much more than the marshal, declared that the propositions made at Gertruydenberg were not to be considered, but that the propositions signed by Ménager at London were to be the basis of the treaty. In a project of peace delivered on the 11th of February, Louis agreed to recognise the title of the Queen of Great Britain, and the succession of the crown in the House of Hanover; to demolish Dunkirk, upon condition of receiving an equivalent; to cede the island of St. Christopher, Hudson's Bay, and all Newfoundland, except the town of Placentia, to England; and to strengthen the present Dutch barrier with the fortified towns of Furnes, Ypres, Menin, and Fort Kenog. But at the same time Louis demanded for himself, as a proper barrier for France, that Aire, St. Venant, Bethune, and Douay, with their dependencies, should be delivered up; that his frontier on the side of the empire and of Italy should be the same as it was before the war; and he further required that the Spanish Low Countries should be given to the Elector of Bavaria; and that Lille and Tournay should be considered as the proper equivalent for Dunkirk. As for the Spanish succession, Louis only engaged that his grandson Philip should relinquish all pretensions to Naples, Sardinia, and Milan, in favour of the emperor. The ministers of the Emperor, of Holland, and of the other confederates that still clung to the great principle that a Bourbon should not reign in Spain, offered a counter project, requiring the restitution of the Spanish crown to the House of Austria; and, notwithstanding that Anne had renounced this pretension in the separate articles signed with Ménager, her plenipotentiaries made a show of agreeing with the allies. A specific answer was demanded in writing, but the French abbé and marshal hesitated, and at last refused, proposing to enter into a verbal conference on the subject. The demand was made by the ministers of the allies on the 5th of March, and on the 15th of April, when nearly six weeks had been wasted in pour-parlers, the Bishop of Bristol informed his employers that he did not find the French "much convinced of the necessity of dispatch;" that they took delays, and hints about breaking off the conferences, "with a great air of indifference, well knowing their business was not to be done at Utrecht, but by a negotiation carried on directly between London and Versailles."⁶

In the mean time Marshal Villars, drawn up behind his formidable lines, which he had strengthened since Marlborough broke through them the preceding campaign, covered Arras and Cambrai, disciplined his numerous recruits, and gathered reinforcements and materials of war from nearly every part of France. The truce which usually precedes or accompanies negotiations for peace was not bargained for on the present occasion; and the French had never been more active in their warlike preparations than they were now, while the congress was sitting at Utrecht. They were, in fact, in a position, where defeat seemed almost impossible, and they were favoured by circumstances that seemed to give an assurance of victory. The English army were discontented and discouraged by the removal of the general who had led them so often to conquest and triumph, and never to defeat; and the Duke of Ormond, to whom Anne and the Tories had given Marlborough's military appointments, was distinguished more as a decided Jacobite* than as a good soldier. Moreover, the Dutch having no confidence either in the sincerity of the queen or in the ability of her new general, refused to entrust their troops to Ormond, and appointed Prince Eugene to command them. There were thus two commanders-in-chief, and Eugene despised Ormond as much as he had revered Marlborough in the field. The States-General, however, not knowing but that they might be attacked by Villars, hastened to act on the offensive, and King William's old friend, the Dutch Earl of Albemarle, opened the campaign in the month of April, by burning and destroying some French magazines near Arras. In the month of May, Prince Eugene and the Duke of Ormond assembled the allied army near Douay; and upon a review it was found to amount to upwards of 120,000 fighting men. Eugene proposed that with this imposing force they should immediately attack Villars in his lines, or invest Quesnoy, if the lines were found too strong. Ormond gave his consent. On his arrival at the Hague, that nobleman had declared to the States-General that his mistress intended a cordial co-operation with her allies, and especially with the Dutch; † and from his own letters it should appear that he was duped, and that he really believed he was to fight. But in a few days, when he was preparing to move with Eugene, Ormond received secret and positive orders from Secretary St. John to avoid engaging in any siege or hazarding any battle. The secretary further told him, that he must disguise and conceal the receipt of this order, which had been communicated to the court of France; and that if Marshal Villars should take any private notice of it Ormond was to answer him accordingly. And shortly after, Ormond received a very polite note from Villars, felicitating himself on their being no longer enemies. Ormond, though a Jacobite, a bad patriot, and a man of intrigue, was not without sentiments of honour, and he felt deeply the embarrassment of his situation. He represented to St. John the extreme difficulty of disguising the true reason of his conduct, having nothing to offer as an excuse for not marching upon the French with Prince Eugene: and, a little later (on the 8th of June), when he was harassed by the allies, who insisted upon knowing why he was ruining the hopes of the campaign by refusing to move, he again addressed the insidious secretary, stating "the extreme uncasiness of his situation"—that many of the allies "scrupled not openly to say, they were betrayed." Yet in the end of this dispatch Ormond professed his willingness to submit in all things to her majesty's will and pleasure; and, as he submitted, to continue to play a delusive and treacherous part, his honour, after all, could not have been very delicate. Before this letter was written the States-General had remonstrated with the lord-treasurer or prime minister Oxford, who had amused their ambassador with a flow of fair words, "as his manner was." But on the 7th of June the Whigs took up the subject in the House of Lords, having been incited by letters from Prince Eugene; and Lord Halifax moved an address to the throne, requesting a copy of the secret orders transmitted to Ormond, and beseeching that that commander might be ordered to act in concert with the allies. The lord-treasurer declared that the orders asked for were not proper to be divulged; but he assured the House he could be positive in saying the duke would not decline joining the allies in a siege. The Duke of Marlborough here rose and said that a siege of necessity implied the eventual risk of a battle, in case an attempt were made by the enemy to raise it.* To this military reasoning the very unwarlike lord-treasurer said not a word; but he thought it necessary to reply to accusations, now publicly made on all sides, that the queen intended to make a separate peace, and leave her allies in the lurch; and he solemnly declared that nothing of that nature was ever intended; that such a peace would be "so base, so knavish, and so villainous a thing, that every one who served the queen knew they must answer it with their heads to the nation." Upon Halifax's motion being put, it was negatived by a majority of 68 to 40. The defeated Whigs thereupon drew up a protest, which was signed by 25 of them, and which declared the order sent to the Duke of Ormond to be derogatory to her majesty's honour, to public faith, and to that justice which was due to the allies. This protest was printed and sent to the continent, translated into French and other languages. Oxford, St. John, and the rest of the cabinet, were highly incensed and offered a high reward; but they could never discover who had given the paper to the printers, or who had printed and published it. In the House of Commons the Whigs were equally indignant at Ormond's proceedings, and equally unsuccessful. Mr. Pulteney proposed a vote of censure upon ministers for the orders they had sent to the duke; but he

* "At this time the Pretender was taken ill of the small-pox: he recovered of them; but his sister, who was taken with the same disease, died of it. She was, by all that knew her, admired as a most extraordinary person in all respects; inasmuch that a very great character was spread of her by those who talked but indifferently of the Pretender himself: thus he lost a great strength which she procured to him, from all who saw or conversed with her."—Burnet.

† But shortly before Ormond went to the Low Countries, Mr. Thomas^a Paulet, a near relation of the lord-treasurer, arrived at Utrecht accompanied by the Abbe Gaultier; and these two secret agents told the English plenipotentiaries that the English government was determined to be at peace, and not to take part in the campaign. They also communicated the scheme of a treaty, which was kept carefully concealed from the Dutch.

* Voltaire says that, when he was in England, such was the violence of party that he heard people call Marlborough a coward, and Pope a blackhead. In the course of the present debate, Lord Paulet, a member of the Tory cabinet, hinted that Marlborough never exposed himself in battle, while he exposed his officers in order to benefit by their deaths. "No one," said Paulet, "can doubt the courage of the Duke of Ormond: he is not like a certain general who led troops to the slaughter, and got officers knocked on the head, in order to fill his pockets by the sale of their commissions." For this gross attack, Marlborough sent Paulet a challenge; and Paulet, who could talk of a courage that he did not possess himself, let his wife know that he was going to fight a duel. The consequence was, Lord Dartmouth pinned two sentries at his door, and told his lordship he was under arrest; and the queen laid her orders upon Marlborough not to fight—and so the affair ended.

was defeated by a majority of 203 to 73. During the debate, St. John behaved with exceeding arrogance; telling some of the Whigs that men had been sent to the Tower for saying less against the sovereign than they had said, but that some members who were ambitious of that honour should be disappointed of it. A letter sent over by the States-General, and represented as being calculated chiefly to raise the passions of the mob and give them ill impressions of her majesty and the treaty she was carrying on, was printed and dispersed throughout England, and was the cause of fresh ministerial execrations of the press. The letter itself contained statements of facts difficult to answer or to excuse. The Dutch reminded her majesty of the assurances she had given them, that her army should act with its usual vigour, and that if she broke her engagements there could be for the future no faith put in any alliances or treaties. While Mr. Thomas Harley and the Abbé Gaultier intrigued and corresponded with the French ministers and their agents in Holland, Secretary St. John kept up a close correspondence, begun several months before, with the Marquis de Torcy. In St. John's earlier letters he talks about a renunciation by Philip of the French crown; but de Torcy shows him that any such renunciation would be null and invalid according to the laws of France; that there, when the king died, the next of the blood royal succeeded him on the throne, which he did not hold of the former king, nor of the people, nor of his own will, but by the right of blood as sovereign lord of the kingdom; that these laws could be abolished by God alone, and could not be overruled by any renunciation, abdication, or edict whatsoever; and that, though Philip, as King of Spain, should, for the sake of peace, give up his right to France, his cession would be invalid, and he would still be King of France, if no nearer heir stood before him, by the law of nature or the law of God. In reply to this the English secretary had stated—"It matters not much to us, what opinion is entertained in France as to the right of succession, so long as we in Britain believe that any one may give up his own right, and that the sureties of that cession may maintain the validity of it by force of arms. In short it is her majesty's resolution to have it done." The necessity, indeed, seemed imperative. By succeeding to the empire and the hereditary dominions of Austria, Charles had arrayed against his Spanish claims a host of politicians, who had formerly preferred him to Philip; but death had been still busier in the house of Bourbon than in the house of Hapsburg: the Dauphin, Louis XIV.'s son, had gone to the grave the preceding year, the Dauphin's son, the Duke of Burgundy, had followed in the spring of the present year, and Burgundy again had been followed by his eldest son, a child of six years; so that there now remained nothing but a sickly child, two years old,* between Philip King of Spain and the throne of France. Hence the Union of the two crowns—the Hydra of Europe—seemed almost certain, and, if not prevented, a ten years' war had been useless. If it was dangerous to see the Spanish crown re-united with Austria as it had been in the time of Charles V., it was still more dangerous to the independence of Europe to see it joined with France, the neighbour country—the country in itself so square and compact, and so powerful as to have been able, even by itself, to face the whole might of the Emperor Charles V.! This was the reasoning of every statesman in Europe, not a Frenchman. In England old national prejudices and jealousies were thrown into the same scale, and Anne's ministers were compelled to insist upon the renunciation, though they seem to have cared little about the fact, that it was and would be considered of no effect by the French, and that, if the infant nephew of Philip should die—and there was every prospect of that—Philip would step into his place. Louis XIV. was so aged that it was scarcely safe to count upon his life for three months. St. John therefore pressed de Torcy, and the French court finally complied. On the 18th of May de Torcy assured the English secretary that the king, his master, had sent King Philip positive orders either to renounce his right to the kingdom of France, or to give up the kingdom of Spain. At this point the Bishop of Bristol had intimated to the Dutch that, unless they coincided with his mistress, her majesty would consider herself disengaged from any treaty or alliance with them; and nothing was done to soften this declaration, except talking about the concession of some fortified places, in which the Dutch had their own garrisons.

On the 5th of June Anne went down to the House of Lords; and in a long speech announced to both Houses the terms upon which an honourable and profitable peace might be made with France. These terms or conditions were, that Louis XIV. should remove the Pretender out of his dominions, acknowledge the Protestant succession, &c.; that the crowns of France and Spain should never be united on one head; that King Philip should renounce the succession of France if it should devolve on him, and put the next heir to himself in that succession; that the respective kings of France and Spain should make solemn renunciations for themselves and their heirs for ever; that England should have Newfoundland, Hudson's Bay, Nova Scotia, Gibraltar, Port Mahon, &c., and also the Assiento, or the right of furnishing Spanish America with slaves from Africa; that Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, and Milan, should be separated from Spain; that the allies should be satisfied in a reasonable manner, and that proper barriers should be established for the Dutch, the emperor, and the Duke of Savoy. The House of Commons hailed the speech with rapture, and, having voted an address of confidence and thanks, they went up in a body to present it. But in the House of Lords the address encountered violent opposition. Lord Wharton proposed a clause directed against a separate peace, and the Duke of Marlborough supported his lordship, declaring that the late proceedings of ministers had sullied the glories of the queen's reign, and converted her victories and triumphs into shame and disgrace. Lord Strafford, who had returned from Utrecht to defend the still unfinished negotiations in which he had been himself engaged, charged Marlborough with labouring to prevent this blessed peace by corresponding with her majesty's allies, and promising them the support of his party. Lord Cowper retaliated upon the illiterate Strafford. "The noble lord," said the accomplished ex-chancellor, "has been so long abroad, that he has forgotten, not only the language, but the constitution of his country. According to our laws, it could never be suggested as a crime in the meanest subject, much less in any member of this august assembly, to hold correspondence with our allies: but it would be a hard matter to justify, and reconcile either with our laws or the laws of honour and justice, the conduct of some persons in treating clandestinely with the common enemy without the participation of our allies." Wharton's clause, however, was rejected by a majority of 81 to 36. On this defeat the Whig lords entered a strong protest. And thereupon the Tories moved that the protest, as too violent and indecorous, should be expunged; and they carried their vote by 90 to 64. The protest, signed by nineteen lay lords and four bishops, was struck out of the journals accordingly; but the press again lent its efficient aid to the weaker party,—the protest was printed and widely circulated. The ministers were again in a fume; but, as they could not discover the printers and publishers, they left off thinking about the effects the paper would have on the public mind, and proceeded boldly with their treaty, having secured, before signing and sealing, the parliamentary protection of a vote of confidence and thanks. Yet the Whig protest, and still more the queen's speech, had the effect of sinking the funds, which had begun to rise at the near prospect of peace, but which fell again immediately that the conditions were known. The court, however, got up a new set of addresses, full of flattery and congratulation. "Some of these addresses," says Burnet, "mentioned the Protestant succession and the House of Hanover with zeal; others did it more coldly; and some made no mention at all of it: and it was universally believed that no addresses were so acceptable to the ministers as those of the last sort."

In the course of this session, the Tories in the House of Commons retaliated upon a Whig bishop something of the trial and treatment of Dr. Sacheverell. Fleetwood, Bishop of St. Asaph, in a preface to a small volume of sermons, cast some reflections upon her majesty's change of ministers and upon the proceedings of the present cabinet. The Commons, by a large majority, voted—1. That the said preface was malicious and factious, highly reflecting upon the present administration, and tending to create discord and sedition; 2. That the said preface should be burnt by the hands of the common hangman in the Palace Yard, Westminster, and that the sheriffs of London and Middlesex should assist the serjeant-at-arms in the execution of this sentence. The bishop's preface was burnt accordingly. On the 21st of June the parliament adjourned to the 8th of July, after hearing a speech from the throne, in which it was openly implied that the queen considered her scheme of peace to be fully approved by both Houses, though neither of them had, in fact, gone further than an indefinite vote of confidence. The Earl of Strafford was again sent over to induce the States-General to accept the offers the French were making, and to consent to a cessation of arms. From this moment the Dutch, seeing that nothing could be done in conjunction with the English, and that Anne was ready to sacrifice their interests, began to think and to act for themselves, and commenced, or rather renewed, underhand negotiations with the court of Versailles. Secretary St. John soon discovered these manœuvres, which encouraged him to declare that steps must be hastened, and that the conditions of peace and war were no longer the matter in question, but, whether her majesty should have the management of the negotiations, or the Dutch. The situation of the Duke of Ormond was far more embarrassing than ever. His employers had been obliged to declare in parliament, that the English army might assist at a siege, and afterwards to send orders to Ormond to co-operate with Prince Eugene, who, by the 8th of June, had invested Quesnoy. It appears that Ormond at first only sent, and that very reluctantly, sixteen battalions of foreign mercenaries, that were in the joint pay of England and Holland; but he forthwith assumed an attitude as if he would cover the siege with the whole English army, while Eugene prosecuted it with the Dutch and the imperial troops. Marshal Villars, who had written to Ormond as a friend, and who had received assurances from his court that the English were no longer to be considered as enemies, was mortified and irritated, and, being a plain-speaking man, he expressed to Ormond in very uncourtly terms his sense of this perfidy, or the perfidy of his sovereign and her ministers. At the same time Prince Eugene, who wanted more active assistance, and who apprehended that the English troops would soon cease even to cover his siege, complained and remonstrated with Ormond, who knew not what to say in defence or excuse, except that, with regard to his own conduct, he knew no other difference between what was shameful and what honourable than obedience to the orders of his queen. But Secretary St. John soon relieved Ormond from part of his difficulties, by letting him know that he must demand from Villars the town and port of Dunkirk as the previous condition of a cessation of hostilities or an unqualified truce on the side of the English. Dunkirk, it was said, was only to be held by the queen of England as a pledge that France should perform all that she had promised.

in the still incomplete negotiations at Utrecht; and Villars and the other French officers were instructed to put the English troops in possession. Then Ormond personally communicated to Prince Eugene and the Dutch field deputies that he could no longer cover the siege of Quesnoy or do anything whatever against the armies of Louis XIV. Eugene was indignant, and his choler was further increased by Ormond's endeavouring to carry off with him not merely the English troops, but also the foreign mercenaries, who had been in the pay of England, but who were ready to take pay from any one of the allied powers, war being their trade, and their hatred to the French, provoked by past injuries, an enduring passion. Ormond treated clandestinely with the commanders of these troops, who were for the most part Germans, and who, though they had accepted English pay, had engaged in the war at the instance of the emperor and for the objects laid down in the Grand Alliance. It seemed to these men the height of dishonour to desert the old cause, and they one and all refused to march off with the English troops, or to abandon Prince Eugene, who, by himself, would be too weak to cope with Villars. Even as matters went, Eugene, as we shall see, suffered severely; but if these troops had left him, it is difficult to calculate what would have been the extent of his reverses. Secretary St. John, writing to Ormond, stormed like a madman at the obstinate Germans. "We are much at a loss," said he, "to imagine what the princes can mean or propose to themselves, to whom these troops belong. A beggarly German general commands the troops which have been so many years paid by her majesty, and which are actually so at this time, to desert from the queen, and to leave her subject forces, for aught they know, exposed to be attacked by the enemy." But Eugene, on the other side, represented that the sudden withdrawing of the English troops left him open to the attack of the French; and other persons, less closely concerned, applauded the conduct of the foreign mercenaries. "Up to this time these mercenaries had punctually obeyed orders; but now, when they were required to separate from the allied army, the men made answer to their own officers, that they would obey the Duke of Ormond in everything else but in this single point, in which the common safety and their own honour were in the utmost danger;—that in this particular point they could not be prevailed with, by any promises or threatenings, to follow him, without the commands of their respective sovereigns; and they would rather perish than desert their allies."* Nearly all of the little princes of Germany, who had furnished these auxiliaries, approved of the conduct of their soldiers, calling God and man to witness that they had not hired out their troops for the sake of the pay only, but also out of regard to the common safety of Europe and in observance of the duty they owed to the German empire. Hereupon Ormond declared that these poor Germans should never get the arrears of pay due to them; and he proclaimed in his camp a truce for two months, according to her majesty's commands, as signified to him by Secretary St. John, who was by this time raised to the peerage by the titles of Baron St. John and Viscount Bolingbroke. But Ormond was pledged to make the auxiliaries in British pay observe this truce as well as the native troops of Great Britain; and, as these Germans would not obey him, Villars objected to the giving up of Dunkirk; and an English detachment, which had been sent thither, found the gates of Dunkirk shut in their faces. Hereupon, the British troops cursed the Duke of Ormond "as a stupid tool, and a general of straw." The officers, it is said, and all the veterans, were overwhelmed with shame and vexation; and whenever they recollected Marlborough and the late glorious times, tears gushed to their eyes. But the allied army being now divided into two parts, and the pontons, baggage-waggons, and military stores shared between them, Ormond, seeing no prospect of drawing off the auxiliaries, packed up his baggage and decamped on the 17th of July. "This," says Cunningham, "was the inauspicious day which caused so much sorrow and disgust to the allies, and branded the British name with infamy and disgrace." Nor, in the course of the hundred and twenty-eight years which have rolled away since that inglorious day, has all the argument urged in its defence done aught to prove that the transaction was not base, treacherous, and detestable. Louis had sent orders that, notwithstanding the conduct of the German auxiliaries, Dunkirk should be given up, and Sir John Leake had already arrived off that port with an English fleet. As Ormond advanced in that direction he was refused admittance into Douay and other towns occupied by Dutch garrisons, and Villars thought fit to give him notice that, in case he should find himself under any difficulties, he would be welcome to a retreat in France. Ormond halted at Ghent loaded with vexation and disgrace; while Admiral Leake landed a detachment commanded by that great soldier, Brigadier Hill, and took formal possession of Dunkirk and all its forts, the French garrison marching out to a man. Ormond lay some time at Ghent; but he detached six battalions to reinforce Brigadier Hill in Dunkirk, whither he also sent a portion of his artillery and ammunition. He soon followed himself with the main body of the English army, which (at the end of October) embarked and returned to England. Ormond was received in a kind of triumph by the Tory ministers, who pretended to consider that he had acted more gloriously in shuffling out of the war than Marlborough had ever done in conducting it.* Quensoy had fallen

* Ormond, who will soon re-appear on the stage, is thus described (in 1706) by Macky:—"He is certainly one of the most generous, princely, brave men that ever was, but good-natured to a fault; loves glory, and consequently is crowded with flatterers; never knew how to refuse anybody, which was the reason why he obtained so little from King William, asking for everybody. He hath all the qualities of a great man, except that one of a statesman, having business; before he declared himself, and from that capture Eugene, with the imperialists, the Dutch, and the German auxiliaries, marched to lay siege to Landrecy. The Bishop of Bristol and Lord Strafford strenuously recommended to the allies the example of the queen of England, and a general truce; but Eugene thought he might yet cope with Villars, and the Dutch joined him in rejecting this advice and in reprobating the withdrawing the forces of England. For a time fortune seemed to smile on the brave prince, who made incursions by detachments far into the interior of France, and threw the gloomy court of Versailles into fresh agonies of alarm. But Eugene was not strong enough to cover properly his far-extending lines, and the want of the steady veteran British infantry, who stood then, as they have so often done since, better under fire than any other troops in the world, was soon grievously felt. On the 24th of July Marshal Villars crossed the Scheldt with great secrecy and dispatch, and with a far superior force fell upon Albemarle, who was posted with a division of the allied army at Denain. Eugene, who was attending to the siege of Landrecy, and who was as rapid as Villars, came in sight, but he was detained by the breaking down of a bridge, and Albemarle was defeated and taken prisoner almost under his eye. The French then pushed along the scarp to Marchiennes, where the allies had made a central dépôt of arms, ammunition, and provisions, but where the people favoured the French, and furnished them with intelligence. Indeed, in all this part of the country the stoppage of the secret service money, which Marlborough had been accustomed to distribute, had a prodigious effect upon the political disposition of the inhabitants, who, instead of giving intelligence to the allies, now carried all that they considered valuable or marketable to the French. Marchiennes was taken and plundered by Villars with surprising facility, considering that the place was garrisoned by 4000 men. When the news of this disaster reached the Hague, the States-General were as much alarmed and perplexed as had recently been the French court at Versailles, and they recommended the immediate raising of the siege of Landrecy. Eugene accordingly raised that siege; but, even with his army disengaged, he could not prevent Villars from investing Douay. The garrison there scarcely behaved better than the troops in Marchiennes had done; and they surrendered after a short siege. Quesnoy, which Eugene had so recently taken, made a better resistance, but it too fell before Villars. The States-General checked Eugene, who would have risked a battle to save these places, representing to him that, in their present circumstances, it would be unwise and unsafe to risk their army. "In this scandalous disjunction of the confederates, not only the cities and provinces taken in the war, but even the fidelity and constancy, and other virtues of the allies, which had shone forth in such splendour in the midst of arms, were now all lost; while the courage of the French, which was before so low, began now to revive at Utrecht, where they behaved with such insolence, that even their lackeys were not afraid to insult the Count Van Richtenen, one of the plenipotentiaries, and were protected in their insolence by the French king."* Indeed, by this time the grand monarque was singing Te Deums in the cathedral of Notre Dame, and happy in the conviction that, without the English, the allies could never prevail against him. He challenged the recent successes obtained by Villars as visible marks of the protection of God, who, he said, knew the rectitude of his intentions and his sincere desire of peace. It was natural that an old man of seventy-four should wish for peace, and it was just and proper to grant it him: the question is only about the terms granted and the manner in which the business was managed. Upon the return of the army of the Duke of Ormond, the troops were mostly disbanded, and a general disarming was begun in England. At the same time Secretary Bolingbroke, who had told de Torcy that his queen "had taken steps beyond ordinary rules," was sent over as ambassador to Paris to facilitate the conclusion of the peace begun to be negotiated at Utrecht, which he went prepared to do, by playing into the hands of France and the Pretender. He was accompanied by Prior, the poet. Shortly after his arrival a cessation of hostilities was agreed to for Italy; together with a safe passage for all the Austrians from Spain back to Italy. It was also agreed that the Pretender should retire to Lorraine, and that security for his person during his residence in that country should be demanded from the Duke of Lorraine and the emperor. De Torcy presented the draft of Philip's act of renunciation, which Bolingbroke knew to be worth nothing, and which he sent to the lord treasurer. Bolingbroke further agreed to a truce with France by land and sea for four months longer, and invited the allies to join in it. He then returned to England elate with the flattering distinctions he had received at Paris, the atmosphere of which place seemed native to him; for, in head and heart, in his good qualities, as well as in his evil ones, in his style and in his thoughts, Bolingbroke was more French than English. He left Matthew Prior behind him to finish loves and is beloved by the ladies; of a low stature, but well-shaped; a good man and address; a fair complexion, and very beautiful face." These characters were drawn in the year 1706, for the particular information of Princess Sophia, the Electress of Hanover. During a tour on the continent Macky took Hanover in his way, waited upon the princess, who was very anxious to know something about the English court, and, at her desire, he gave her "the characters of the great men of England and Scotland." The portraits themselves seem to show that they were drawn for a lady. Macky never forgets externals and personal appearance: he marks as much of the stature, the complexion, or good looks of a man, as of his virtues or vices, his Jacobitism or Hanoverianism. He was rather a coarse painter. In many instances he describes noble lords and statesmen much after the fashion in which a groom describes a horse. One is described as a "black man," another as a "very black man," another as a "brown man," another as "fat and round," another as "very thin and lean;" and wherever small-pox has been busy upon a face Macky never omits setting it down for the princess's information. These traits, however, only render his characters the more amusing, and their general accuracy as likenesses seems to have been admitted.

the negotiations. On the 10th of September the Secretary wrote from London to tell the poet that it had been determined to send Lord Lexington to Madrid to compliment Philip, King of Spain, as such, and to be a witness of the several renunciations, and other acts requisite to complete the execution of the article agreed upon as necessary to prevent the union of the two monarchies of France and Spain; after which he (Lexington) was to proceed to settle such matters of commerce and other affairs as were for the mutual interest of Spain and England. "For God's sake, dear Mat," adds Bolingbroke, "for God's sake hide the nakedness of thy country, and give the best turn thy fertile brain will furnish thee with to the blunders of thy countrymen, who are not much better politicians than the French are poets!" The secretary recommended "management," and "appearance." "The queen," he said, "can never do anything which shall look like a restraint on her allies from demanding what they judge necessary: but, as long as they act the part which they now do, she can very justly be passive and neuter as to their interests; and, if her peace be made before their's, which she will not delay for them, she can with the same justice leave them to make their own bargain." It was, therefore, high time for the Dutch to think for themselves: and early in October they most reluctantly yielded many of their pretensions, and declared "that, for the good of peace, the States were willing to yield Lille to France, and to recede from their claims to have Douay, Valenciennes, and Maubeuge, provided Condé and Tournay were included in their barrier, the tariffs or commercial duties with France restored to what they were in 1664, and the island of Sicily yielded to the emperor, and the city of Strasburg to the empire." But now the demands of the French rose as those of the Dutch declined, and they advanced claim upon claim till even Bolingbroke was obliged to exclaim, "By heaven, they treat like pedlars, or, which is worse, like attorneys."* But this mode of dealing was the inevitable consequence of the unwise and ungenerous measures which had been adopted by the English cabinet—the signing the separate truce, the withdrawing our army from Flanders, and the whole tone of our diplomacy—measures in which Bolingbroke himself had undeniably been a conspicuous counsellor and chief actor. If he went into these measures with a clear intellect, and with the conviction that they must neutralise or prostrate the Grand Alliance and raise the power of France, he must have done so because he preferred his interests or private ambition to the good of his country, and was resolved to retain place at all costs; if he favoured them, as is more than suspected, as a means likely to contribute to placing the Pretender on the British throne, he acted equally unpatriotically. If he did not foresee the consequences of those measures when they were adopted, he had no right to complain of the effects when they happened. We cannot help thinking that the brilliant qualities of this intriguing politician, his masterly pen, his ready and searching wit, aided by many amiable and engaging traits of personal character, have too much blinded the world to his political profligacy, and even occasioned far too high an estimate of his political knowledge and address. A few more such brilliant men as Bolingbroke would have given us something like a French despotism in government, together with a French code of morals.

In the mean while Lord Lexington had proceeded to Madrid, where, on the 5th of November, and in presence of the council of state and of the chief nobility, King Philip signed his renunciation of the French succession, and swore upon the Holy Evangelists to observe it in all time, and under all temptations. Ever since the fatal blows inflicted upon the free old Spanish constitution by Charles V. and Philip II., the cortes of Spain had been little more than a piece of stage pageantry—seldom employed, because, weak and despicable as it had become, it served to revive recollections inimical to despotism. When the miserable Charles II. was disposing of his vast dominions by will and testament, it had been proposed that the representatives of the nation should be summoned to deliberate upon the momentous subject; but timid and corrupt ministers effectually opposed that project. Now, however, the Spanish cortes were summoned to meet at Madrid, to confirm and approve Philip's renunciation of the French crown. In a well penned speech Philip told them that the efforts the Spanish nation had made for him could never be forgotten; that, to show his gratitude, to procure peace for his people, and to be never separated from them, he had renounced all pretensions, which either he himself, or his issue, might have to the crown of France. The Spaniards at Madrid and in all parts of the kingdom, except in a corner of it, were contented and jubilant; but in that corner, which was the exception, the predominant feelings were a hatred of the Bourbon and a detestation of the English, who had given them up to his dominion. The Catalonians had been invited and incited to take up arms by the English, who had most solemnly engaged never to forsake them or betray them; yet all the British troops there had been recalled; the Imperialists, the troops and officers of the claimant Charles, had thus been obliged to withdraw for their own safety; and, forsaken by all, the poor Catalans were left to the vengeance of the king whom they had so long and so bravely opposed, and to the fierce retaliation of the neighbouring provinces. Our troops were also withdrawn from Portugal, but the sovereign of that country had been brought into the truce, and could depend upon being secured in the definitive treaty—the blackest of all the black spots in which was, the infamous abandonment of Catalonia.

Matthew Prior, after all, was only a poet;—it seemed necessary to the Tories to have a duke at Paris. And which of all the dukes of England and

Scotland was the one appointed at this critical juncture to represent Queen Anne at the French court? It was that shuffling Jacobite, the Duke of Hamilton, who had continued in constant correspondence with the court of St. Germain, and with the numerous agents the Pretender kept scattered about in various parts of the continent and in England. Even before Mrs. Masham and Harley had undermined the Whig ministry, Hamilton had always been an acceptable visitor at the court of St. James's; but since the absolute prevalence there of the Tory party, he had been closeted far more frequently with the queen than before. It was impossible to avoid dark suspicions. Burnet says, "The Duke of Hamilton's being now appointed to go to the court of France gave melancholy speculation to those who thought him much in the Pretender's interest; he was considered, not only in Scotland, but here in England, as the head of his party; but a dismal accident put an end to his life, a few days before he intended to have set out on his embassy." His grace of Hamilton had been engaged in some law-suits, and had contracted a violent hatred against Lord Mohun, a man whose fierce passions were little short of madness.* At an accidental meeting, the duke, it is said, grossly insulted his lordship, who thereupon sent him a challenge. The spirit of party has so completely seized this subject as to make it difficult to ascertain the true story. It is said on one side that the duke was very reluctant to fight, and was with difficulty induced to accept the challenge; and this account seems to agree with Hamilton's general character and habits, which were marked with cunning and caution, but certainly not with bravery; but on the other side, the Tories, Jacobites, and all the anti-union Scots, whose idol he was, affirm that his grace behaved with the greatest gallantry on this occasion. On Saturday morning, the 15th of November, the keepers of Hyde Park heard a clashing of swords, and, running to the spot, which was in Kensington Gardens, they found both the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Mohun weltering in their blood and dying. Colonel Hamilton, the duke's second, and near relative, remained on the field, and was taken prisoner; but General Macartney, Mohun's second, ran off and escaped. Colonel Hamilton, when brought before the council, deposed that the seconds, that is, himself and Macartney, had fought as well as the principals; and he hinted that his grace had had foul play at the hands of Macartney. The colonel's deposition is far from being entitled to implicit credit; it seems to have been rambling and inconclusive, and the relation in which he stood to the deceased duke, and his political and personal prejudices, render his testimony suspicious. It is true General Macartney fled to the continent, instead of staying to explain the duel and rebut his adversary's charges; but, in such a business, an innocent and a brave man may reasonably have dreaded the vengeance of the powerful Tory party and the violent excitement of the people, who had been assured by some about court that the duel was from beginning to end a most foul and premeditated murder, undertaken at the desire and instigation of a desperate Whig faction, that had posted other men of the same stamp as Macartney all round Hyde Park, to assassinate the duke in case he had escaped the swords of Lord Mohun and his second. Swift, in the 'Examiner,' held up Lord Mohun as a profligate, whose hands had been already dyed with three foul murders; and generally the writers on the Tory side maintained that both Mohun and Macartney had been "incited to undertake the quarrel, by a certain party of men who were no great friends to the government." The Whig writers, on the other side, maintain that the combat of principals and seconds had been savagely but fairly fought, and that there was no incitement to it beyond the old animosities existing between Hamilton and Mohun, and the recent insult offered by his grace to his lordship. Burnet says, "Both being hurried by false points of honour, fatally went out, and fought with so violent an animosity, that, neglecting the rules of art, they seemed to run on one another, as if they tried who should kill first; in which they were both so unhappily successful, that the Lord Mohun was killed outright, and Duke Hamilton died in a few minutes after." Cunningham, though on the same side, says, that Hamilton, "being challenged to a duel by the Lord Mohun, killed his antagonist; but was himself also killed, as was supposed, by General Macartney, Mohun's second." But this does not imply that there was anything unfair in the proceeding; for the combat was general; Macartney, on the fall of his friend, was left single-handed to face two adversaries; and the instinct of self-preservation and the desire of avenging Mohun, would account for, and in such a business justify, his attacking Hamilton. Colonel Hamilton's story about disarming Macartney may or may not be true, but he becomes utterly incredible when he talks of throwing down both swords, and so giving Macartney an opportunity of arming himself again. But still better proof on the side of the general are, that the (Macartney) afterwards returned, and submitted to a fair trial, on which Colonel Hamilton prevaricated, while several persons who had seen the combat at a distance directly contradicted some material parts of his testimony.

* This is Mohun's portrait as drawn by a not unfavourable hand:—"Charles, Lord Mohun, is the representative of a very ancient family, but had the misfortune to come to the title young, while the estate was in decay; his quality introduced him into the best company, but his wants very often led him into bad; so that he became one of the arrantest rakes in town, and indeed a scandal to the peerage; was generally a sharer in all riots; and before he was twenty years old was tried twice for murder by the House of Peers. On his being acquitted at the last trial, he expressed his confusion for the scandal he brought upon his degree as a peer by his behaviour, in very handsome terms, and promised to behave himself so, for the future, as not to give further scandal; and he hath been as good as his word; for now he applies himself in good earnest to the knowledge of the constitution of his country, and to serve it; and having a great deal of fine and good sense, turned this way, makes him very considerable in the House: he is brave in his person, bold in his expressions, and rectifies, as fast as he can, the slips of his youth by acts of honesty, which he now glories in more than he was formerly extravagant: he was married, when very young, to a niece of my Lord Macclesfield; who, dying without issue, left him a considerable estate, which he well improves. The queen continues him colonel of a regiment of foot: he is of a middle stature, inclining to fat, not thirty years old."—Mackay's Characters.

But though the Whigs exculpated themselves from the foul charge of promoting a murder, they scarcely pretended to conceal that they were glad at Hamilton's death; and they interpreted the rage of their opponents into a proof of the hopes they had entertained from that Jacobite nobleman's embassy to France, and his conferences there with the Pretender. In lieu of the deceased duke, the Duke of Shrewsbury was now nominated, and he proceeded forthwith to Paris, where Mathew Prior still remained to assist in the negotiations. The Tories, on the Jacobites, had not hesitated to accuse the Duke of Marlborough of being concerned in Hamilton's death; and, as the fallen and discontented lord-general left England shortly after to fix his residence on the continent, his departure was construed into a proof of his guilt and of his fear of the consequences. But Marlborough's silent and apparently secret departure out of England has been accounted for upon other grounds. Godolphin, his best ally, "the man of the clearest head and the calmest temper," had died in the preceding month of September, and since then the court fury against the Whig party and against the Marlboroughs in particular, had increased, as in due proportion had the audacity and unscrupulousness of the general's personal and political enemies. Burnet, after eulogising the late lord-treasurer's abilities, disinterestedness, and freedom from the all-prevailing corruption of the times, says—"Upon the Earl of Godolphin's death, the Duke of Marlborough resolved to go and live beyond sea; he executed it in the end of November; and his duchess followed him in the beginning of February. This was variously censured. Some pretended it was the giving up and abandoning the concerns of his country; and they represented it as the effect of fear, with too anxious a care to secure himself: others were glad he was safe out of ill hands; whereby, if we should fall into the convulsions of a civil war, he would be able to assist the Elector of Hanover, as being so entirely beloved and confided in by all our military men; whereas, if he had stayed in England, it was not to be doubted but, upon the least shadow of suspicion, he would have been immediately secured; whereas now he would be at liberty, being beyond sea, to act as there might be occasion for it. There were two suits begun against him: the one was for the two and a half per cent. that the foreign princes were content should be deducted for contingencies, of which an account was formerly given; the other was for arrears due to the builders of Blenheim House. The queen had given orders for building it with great magnificence; all the bargains with the workmen were made in her name, and by authority from her; and in the preambles of the acts of parliament that confirmed the grant of Woodstock to him and his heirs it was said the queen built the house for him: yet, now that the tradesmen were let run into an arrear of 30,000*l., the queen refused to pay any more; and set them upon suing the Duke of Marlborough for it, though he had never contracted with any of them. Upon his going beyond sea, both those suits were stayed, which gave occasion to people to imagine that the ministry, being disturbed to see so much public respect put on a man whom they had used so ill, had set these prosecutions on foot, only to render his stay in England uneasy to him." The departure of Marlborough has, however, been accounted for in other ways far less honourable to his character, but yet consistent with it. It is said, for example, that Lord Oxford had got possession of the treasonable and infamous letter he wrote in King William's time, to betray the expedition intended against Brest. "I was told," (says a writer industrious and successful in discovering in France materials for the secret history of England, but who was not distinguished by sagacity or critical acumen, and who is little to be relied upon except when he takes his stand upon a real document) "by the late Principal Gordon, of the Scots college, at Paris, that, during the hostilities between the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Oxford, near the end of the queen's reign, Lord Oxford, who had got intelligence of the duke's letter, and pretended, at that time, to be in the interests of the exiled family, applied for, and got an order for the original; and that his making the duke know that his life was in his hands, was the cause of the duke's going into a voluntary exile to Brussels, in the year 1712; and, indeed, so extraordinary a step as that exile must have had an extraordinary cause. It is known, too, from the history of the times, that there was a private meeting between the duke and Lord Oxford, at Mr. Thomas Harley's house, to which the duke came by a back-door, immediately after which he left England. I have also heard from the late Archbishop of York, grandson to the earl of Oxford, that he had been informed that the Duchess of Marlborough, after the death of those two persons, had contrived to get the letter from Lord Oxford's papers, and destroyed it." But whatever was the motive for his going, Marlborough, who was followed a few weeks after by his duchess,† never returned to England until Anne was safely deposited in Westminster Abbey. Another fact, which is equally certain, is, that from his foreign retirement Marlborough, notwithstanding his frequent correspondence with the house of Hanover, continued also to correspond with the court of St. Germain, and to express his unalterable attachment to the Pretender. In one of his letters, written before his final overthrow, he says, "As for myself, I take God to witness that what I have done for many years was neither from spleen to the royal family, nor ill-will to their cause, but to humble the power of France; a service as useful to the king (as he styles the Pretender) as it is beneficial to his kingdom." He also says, "The French King and his ministers will sacrifice everything to their own views of peace. The Earl of Oxford, and his associates in office, to take, as usual, the ground of their adversaries, will probably insist upon the king's retiring to Italy; but he must never consent. He must neither yield to the French King, nor to the fallacious insinuations of the British ministry, in a point which must inevitably ruin his cause. To retire to Italy, by the living God, is the same thing as to stab himself to the heart. Let him take refuge in Germany, or in some country on this side of the Alps. He wants no security for his person; no one will touch a hair of his head. I perceive such a change in his favour, that I think it impossible but he must succeed. But when he shall succeed, let there be no retrospect toward the past; all that has been done since the Revolution must be confirmed."* It is clear that nobody more needed or would be more benefited by this confirmation than the wealthy and selfish Marlborough, whose chief anxiety had ever been to keep what he had gotten, and to maintain a good correspondence with both parties, so that he should be secure under either of them that should eventually prevail. It was, therefore, no new process with him to assure the Electress Sophia, her son, and her grandson, and the ministers of the house of Hanover, that no Englishman was now half so anxious as himself for their interest and succession to the British throne. As, however, no one can accuse this extraordinary personage of a want of political information and political foresight, it must be admitted that at this moment the chances of the house of Hanover and the chances of the house of Stuart were pretty equally balanced, and that England ran a near hazard of a second Restoration. But Marlborough played this game too long to escape suspicion; and it should appear that by this time his professions imposed upon neither party, but were regarded with a feeling nearly allied to contempt by both—by Stuarts as well as Guelphs. Yet he sent a secret agent to Bar-le-duc, in Lorraine, with fresh letters to the Pretender, and with others to the Duke of Berwick, containing the most solemn protestations of loyalty to the Stuart, whom he assured, with an oath, that he would rather cut off his own right hand than oppose the views he had on the throne. He declared that, provided the king would render him secure, he would no longer hesitate to lose all his credit, both privately and publicly, for his service; and he added that the Duke of Berwick, his nephew, was instructed more largely as to his loyal intentions. But even before this it was a principle

† If the duchess hated Swift as the maligner of her husband and all her family, and as the tool of Harley Lord Oxford, there was certainly no love lost between them, and the churchman could hate with a virulence at least equal to that of her grace. In his Journal, under the date of January 17th of the following year, 1713, he mentions dining with the lord-treasurer Oxford and talking about the speech which the queen should make in parliament; and he says that the treasurer asked him how he would make the speech. "I was going to be serious," adds Swift, whose jests were always bitter as gall, "but I turned it to a jest: and, because they had been speaking of the Duchess of Marlborough going to Flanders after the duke, I said the speech should begin thus:—'My lords and gentlemen, in order to my own quiet and that of my subjects, I have thought fit to send the Duchess of Marlborough abroad after the duke.'"

* With respect to Queen Anne, Marlborough says—"I know perfectly the sister's disposition of mind. She is a very honest person, easily won, and without difficulty swayed. She is extremely cautious, as she is to the last degree subject to fear. At bottom she has no aversion to her brother's interests; but she is one that must not be frightened. An external force would terrify her, and alienate the mind of the nation. Leave us to ourselves, and all our hopes will be crowned with success."

A. D. 1713.—To allow time for the conclusion of the treaty of Utrecht and the arrival of Lord Bolingbroke, who had returned to the continent to hasten it, the meeting of parliament had been put off by seven prorogations. At length, however, on the 3rd of April, Bolingbroke arrived, and the session opened on the 9th of the same month.† When the treaty was submitted to the council at Whitehall for ratification, Lord Cholmondeley made several objections to it, and was removed from his office of treasurer of the household. The Duke of Atholl and one or two other thorough-going Tories had just been admitted into the council; and the ratification passed as a matter of course. The queen, who attended in person, declared in her opening speech that the treaty of peace was signed, and that in a few days the ratifications would be exchanged; and she added that, as the negotiations had been drawn into so great a length, all her allies had had sufficient opportunity to adjust their several interests. It was indispensable to reply to the insinuations and even open declarations of the Whigs, that there was a coldness between her majesty and the House of Hanover, and an intention on this side of the water of playing into the hands of the Pretender. The queen, therefore, said—"What I have done for securing the Protestant succession, and the perfect friendship there is between me and the House of Hanover, may convince such who wish well to both, and desire the quiet and safety of their country, how vain all attempts are to divide us; and those who would make a merit by separating our interests will never attain their ill end." The war of pens had been more fierce than ever since the cessation of the war of bullets and cannon-balls; and the Tories either felt that they had the worst of it, or, with their old susceptibility, writhed under the blows they had received. As Swift, the foulest of calumniators, had been consulted in the composition of this opening speech, and had revised it, we must give him some of the credit due to the following clause:—"I cannot," said the queen, "but express my displeasure at the unparalleled licentiousness in publishing seditious and scandalous libels. The impunity such practices have met with has encouraged the blaspheming everything sacred, and the propagating opinions tending to the overthrow of all religion and government. Prosecutions have been ordered, but it will require some new law to put a stop to this growing evil, and your best endeavours, in your respective stations, to discourage it."‡ The addresses of the two Houses were little

† As early as the 5th of December, the Marquis of Monteleone, one of the plenipotentiaries at Utrecht for Philip, king of Spain, arrived on a special embassy at London, where he returned her majesty infinite thanks for the great pains she had taken to restore peace to Europe. In the course of the same month the Duke d'Aumont was received as ambassador from Louis XIV.

‡ The speech also mentioned that "the impious practice of duelling required some speedy and effectual remedy." This was, no doubt, called forth by the catastrophe of the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Mohun. But, if there had been any grounds to go on, more more than an echo to the royal speech; but the Commons took particular care to dwell upon her majesty's concern and laudable care for the Protestant succession in the House of Hanover.*

On the 4th of May, exactly eleven years after the proclamation of this costly war, peace was proclaimed in London. Holland, Portugal, Prussia, and Savoy had reluctantly signed the treaty of Utrecht; but the Emperor, both in his hereditary capacity of sovereign of Austria, Hungary, Bohemia, &c., and as head of the German empire, persisted in refusing to be a party to it, and in proclaiming in protests and manifestos that he, a principal in the Grand Alliance, had been abandoned and betrayed. As finally settled, this famous or infamous treaty left, or seemed to leave, France more powerful than she was at the commencement of the war. Its main articles were—1. That the French king recognised the Protestant succession of the House of Hanover, and engaged for himself, his heirs, and successors, not to suffer the Pretender to return into his dominions, nor in any way to succour or assist him. 2. That the crowns of France and Spain should never be united. 3. That the fortifications of Dunkirk should be demolished, and the harbour filled up, never to be repaired. 4. Hudson's Bay and straits were to remain to Great Britain, and satisfaction was to be made by France to the Hudson's Bay Company for damages received; the whole island of St. Christopher, Nova Scotia, and the island of Newfoundland were to belong of right to Great Britain, the French having huts there to dry their fish, and liberty to fish only from Cape Bonavista to the northern point of Newfoundland. 5. The French in Canada were not to molest the five nations of Indians subject to Great Britain. 6. All letters of reprisal, mark, and countermark, were to be annulled. 7. England was to retain Minorca and Gibraltar, as provided in a separate treaty with Philip, as King of Spain. (This was all of the treaty that directly regarded the interests of Great Britain.) 8. Naples, Milan, Sardinia, and the Spanish Netherlands were to be ceded to the emperor, in lieu of his claim to the Spanish crown. 9. Sicily was to be disjoined from Naples, and transferred to the Duke of Savoy with the regal title; and the eventual succession to the crown of Spain was, in default of descendants from the Bourbon Philip, to be vested in the House of Savoy.† 10. In addition to the places anciently poss-

word have been made of this matter against the Whigs and the now absent Marlborough.

* Clinch, one of the numerous agents of the Pretender in London, writes at this moment—"Our addresses all make mention of the succession in the House of Hanover, except one or two Scotch ones; but this I look upon to be no more than matter of form, mixed with a little politics. The King's pictures I have brought over; I have given away; and I wish I had brought over more, since I found them so very acceptable here, and so little trouble in getting them over. I gave one to the Earl of Winchelsea, who took it very kindly, and said—which I am sure he wishes very heartily—he hoped to see the original here." In the same letter the secret agent says—"I scarce know what to make of Harley. I don't think that he means to serve you out of point of conscience, or love, but only as he knows that he hath no other way of serving himself."—Macpherson's Stuart Papers.

† That the Duke of Savoy, comparatively an insignificant power, gained so much by the treaty of Utrecht, was attributed to the partiality and to the strenuous exertions of Queen Anne, who considered by the Dutch, to strengthen their frontier, Luxembourg, Namur, Charleroy, and Newport, were to be assigned as a perpetual barrier, as had been previously stipulated by the new barrier-treaty signed by the ministers of Great Britain and the States-General on the 30th of January. The emperor was to be allowed to the 1st of June to declare his acceptance or non-acceptance of the terms proposed.*

Volumes have been written in reprobation of the treaty of Utrecht; but we can do no more than cite a short and powerful passage, in which a great living writer has condensed his sense of its improprieties. "Whatever judgment we may be disposed to form as to the political necessity of leaving Spain and America in the possession of Philip, it is impossible to justify the course of that negotiation which ended in the peace of Utrecht. It was at best a dangerous and inauspicious concession, demanding every compensation that could be devised, and which the circumstances of the war entitled us to require. France was still our formidable enemy; the ambition of Louis was still to be dreaded, his intrigues to be suspected. That an English minister should have thrown himself into the arms of this enemy at the first overture of negotiation; that he should have renounced advantages upon which he might have insisted; that he should have restored Lillie, and almost attempted to procure the sacrifice of Tournay; that throughout the whole correspondence, and in all personal interviews with de Torcy, he should have shown the triumphant queen of Great Britain more eager for peace than her vanquished adversary; that the two courts should have been virtually conspiring against those allies without whom we had bound ourselves to enter on no treaty; that we should have withdrawn our troops in the midst of a campaign, and even seized upon the towns of our confederates, while we left them exposed to be overcome by a superior force; that we should have thus deceived those confederates by the most direct falsehood in denying our clandestine treaty, and then dictated to them its acceptance,—are facts so him, on account of his descent, as a prince of the blood-royal of England. "That prince," says de Torcy, "was the cherished ally of England, and the one the ministry had most at heart." The Savoyard was, in fact, after the Pretender, the nearest, in the legitimate order of succession, to the English crown; Bolingbroke bore this in mind. "I know," said he to the ambassador from the court of Turin, "that, in exciting the lords plenipotentiaries to espouse the interests of the House of Savoy, I make my court to the queen my mistress." According to a letter of the hair-brained Earl of Peterborough, who was displaying his wit and eccentricities at Venice, the Duke of Savoy was not satisfied with what he got, but pretended that he ought to have had the Spanish crown.—Bolingbroke's Correspondence.—Somerville's Queen Anne, Appendix—De Torcy.

* Many of the princes of his empire seemed determined to support the emperor in resisting the treaty. This was particularly the case with Hanover. In the debates in parliament some of the Whigs objected that this peace could not be called a general peace, since the emperor, the Elector of Hanover, and other princes and states of the empire, were not yet come into it. But ministers replied that, indeed, the peace was not universal, but still might be called general, since the major part of the allies had signed it.—Roger Coke, Detection. Hanover and others of the associated states of Germany continued, however, to complain that they had performed all the conditions to which the Grand Alliance obliged them; that they had stood the brunt and suffered the worst of the inconveniences of a bloody and ruinous war; that they had been encouraged to hope they should reap some fruit in a future security; but that no amends, no barrier or security whatsoever, was stipulated for them by this treaty.

disgraceful to Bolingbroke, and, in somewhat a less degree, to Oxford, that they can hardly be palliated by establishing the expediency of the treaty itself.”*

Fortune, or the better power that regulates human events, nullified in the end the fears which Europe had entertained of a Bourbon reign in Spain; but at the time when those fears originated, and even when the treaty of Utrecht was signed, they were neither unfounded nor unimportant; they were, on the contrary, of the highest importance to every power in Europe, and we believe that, under similar circumstances, Europe would again contract a grand alliance like that framed by William III., and again prosecute as long a war, if needful, to curb the ambition of France. It happened that the sickly boy that stood between Philip and the French throne lived to be king, and to beget and leave heirs behind him, so that neither Philip nor his successor was tempted to break the solemn engagement and renunciation made; but if the boy Louis (afterwards the fifteenth of that name) had died, can it be believed for a moment that Philip would not have grasped at the succession? As for the solemn act of renunciation and the swearing upon the Evangelists—these ceremonies were repeated in France by the princes of the blood swearing on their side never to pretend to the Spanish crown, as Philip had sworn not to pretend to the French one—they would, of themselves, have signified next to nothing. They were held to be illegal and unbinding by the French jurists; and similar oaths had been broken over and over again. In fact, but for the breach of a solemn act of renunciation made by the Infanta Maria Theresa at the time of her marriage with the French king, the Bourbons could not have had any claim to the Spanish succession, which had caused these long years of bloody strife.† Yet this long war, so ingloriously terminated, had not been without its effects; all the blood and treasure spent had not been absolutely thrown away. The haughtiest, the most arrogant, overbearing, and ambitious sovereign of Europe, had been checked, humiliated, and brought to reason; the spell of the French name,—the belief that they were all but invincible in the field,—had been thoroughly broken, and this mainly through the valour of British troops and the military genius of an English general; our military reputation had been raised to the highest pitch—a thing insignificant only in the eyes of a few dreaming theorists and impracticable humanists; France had been so weakened and exhausted as not to be in a condition to give any serious alarm to the world for some generations; and Holland, for the present, was comparatively secured from attack. At home this long war had given fresh vigour and impulses to the mind of the people, and rubbed off the rust which had been contracted under the two last princes of the House of Stuart.

Such as it was, the treaty of Utrecht was easily swallowed by the sitting parliament, who, however, raised strong objections to the commercial treaty with France by which it was accompanied. Bolingbroke, and those who acted with him or under him, had agreed that all the goods and commodities of France should be received in England on the footing of the most favoured nations; and that the goods and commodities of England should be received in France on the like terms. This appears like a dawning of the reciprocity system of our own day; and the merit of it is attributed to the bright intellect of Bolingbroke. It should appear, however, that the merit was really due to Mr. Arthur Moore, who had risen from the humble condition of a livery-servant to be a merchant of great wealth and influence, and a political economist far in advance of his time. If, as it is reported, Bolingbroke had adopted this commercial treaty in a hurry, and without examination, he would have been guilty of criminal negligence; but it appears, from his own correspondence, that when the treaty was negotiating he was not only attentive to it, but also fully awake to the immense advantages of free trade, or at least of reciprocity.* But the parliament and people of England had very little of this illumination, and presently a tremendous storm was brewed. The English manufacturers, particularly of woollen and silk goods, complained loudly against the commercial treaty; and many arguments were used to prove that, labour being cheap and the currency debased in France, she could afford to undersell the English manufacturers and dealers. Nearly every possible bad argument in political economy was brought into play; and every prejudice—we can scarcely call them antiquated, as they still continue to form a part of the trading creed of several European nations, and are still advocated even in England by sundry public men and orators—was raised with porcupine quills against the reciprocity will of France. Sir Charles Cooke, Sir Theodore Janson, and other eminent merchants of London, launched a periodical paper to make war on the project.† Among other things, these wiseacres asserted that a free trade with France would be a greater calamity than the fire of London; that country gentlemen and landholders would be brought to poverty by the rapid decay of their rents, and that the working people would be reduced to the cruel alternative of starvation or emigration. General Stanhope, one of the wisest and best of the Whigs in parliament, took this view of the treaty, and applauded in the House of Commons the rancorous and stupid act passed in the time of Charles II. absolutely prohibiting the importation of French wines, silk, and every other commodity of the growth, product, or manufacture of the territories and dominions of the French king. Numerous petitions and remonstrances were presented all in the same spirit. The entire Whig opposition resolved to annul the treaty, and hoped, in the contest, to cripple the Tory ministry, who on this point were abandoned by many of their staunchest adherents in the Commons. The resolute stand was made on the 8th and 9th articles of the treaty, which went to provide that all acts passed since the year 1664 for prohibiting the importation of French goods should be forthwith repealed; and that within two months a law should be made that, for the time to come, our duties should be on the same scale as those of France. This, it was said, would be a direct violation of the Methuen Treaty, according to which the duties on the Portuguese wines were always to be one-third less than the duties on French wines; and it was argued that, by thus violating the Methuen Treaty, England would lose her trade with Portugal, which was the most thriving and advantageous she possessed.

† Cardinal Mazarin had urged on the marriage of Louis XIV. with the Spanish Infanta, because he hoped eventually to secure for the Bourbon line the sovereignty of Spain; for Philip IV., though the reputed father of at least thirty-two illegitimate children, had only one legitimate child, the sickly and wretched Charles II.: The Spanish grandees, however, took the alarm, and, in order to prevent their country from becoming a dependence of France, they proposed that the young bride, the Infanta Maria Theresa, should renounce for ever for herself and her children all right or pretension to the crown of Spain or to any part of the Spanish dominions. The renunciation was made accordingly, and it was inserted in the contract of marriage, which was an integral part of the famed treaty of the Pyrenees. The grandees and the ministers of Spain seemed to be perfectly satisfied with the act; but Philip IV. had sagacity enough to foresee that it would not be of the least effect; and he is said to have called the renunciation a patarata—in plain English, a humbug!—Dunlop, Memoirs of Spain.

On the 14th of May, when it was moved that a bill should be brought in to make good the 8th and 9th articles, the ministers had a majority of 252 to 130. On the 9th of June the House resolved itself into committee on the bill, and heard several merchants at their bar, who all argued and protested against it. For several successive days other petitioners were heard, and new arguments were propounded against the reciprocity. Sir Thomas Hanmer, a Tory in his general politics, sided with the Whigs, and moved the rejection of the bill; and on the 18th of June the bill was lost by a majority of 194 to 185.* But Hanmer, a few days afterwards, proposed and carried an address thanking her majesty for the great care she had taken of the honour and security of the kingdom in the treaty of peace, and likewise for having laid so good a foundation for the interest of her people in trade; but praying at the same time that she would appoint commissioners to explain and perfect those articles which related to commerce. It is not determined whether this address proceeded from the Tory qualms of Sir Thomas, or from a mere blunder: the baronet's edition of Shakspeare will at least justify a suspicion that his head was none of the clearest. But the use to be made of the thing was obvious: the queen, in her answer, considered the address as an approbation of all the arrangements of the treaty, the commercial as well as the political;—"and the opposition, by a manoeuvre which is not uncommon, thus found their victory explained away by those who had helped to gain it."† But an equivocal sentence or a forced meaning were ineffectual, as opposed to the sense or the nonsense of the nation. The commercial treaty fell to the ground, and helped to destroy the ministry, who also soon began to find that the popular joy for the peace was a very evanescent feeling, and that all classes were beginning to criticise even the main treaty of Utrecht. By that treaty the Pretender had been obliged to withdraw from St. Germain: Louis, indeed, was bound to send him out of France; but he allowed him to take up his residence at Bar-le-duc in Lorraine, which, though nominally a separate country, was as entirely a portion of France as its geographical position and the insignificance of its rulers could make it. Concluding that it would be as easy for the Pretender to carry on his intrigues with Scotland and England from Bar-le-duc as from St. Germain, Lord Wharton, on the 29th of June, without notice given, moved in the Upper House for an address entreating the queen "to use her most pressing instances for removing the Pretender from the Duke of Lorraine's dominions." Not one of the court party ventured to oppose the motion—so powerful was the dread of any suspicion of Jacobitism, and even with those who fondly fancied that at the queen's demise it would be an easy thing to restore the outcast Stuart; but at length Lord North timidly observed, that to carry the motion would show a distrust of her majesty; and he asked where they would have the Pretender live, if they insisted upon driving him from all the states that were then in friendship with England?† The motion, however, was unanimously carried; and, two days after, General Stanhope made precisely the same motion in the Commons. Here was the same timidity also. Only Sir William Whitelock said, drily, that he remembered how the like address was formerly made to Oliver Cromwell for having Charles Stuart removed out of France;

* Lord John Russell, Hist. of the Principal States of Europe from the Peace of Utrecht.—Lord Mahon, Hist. of England from the Peace of Utrecht.—Tindal.—Bolingbroke.—Burnet.—Nobody, perhaps, has been more decidedly against the commercial treaty than the famous Whig bishop, if we except the noble Tory historian of our own day. Burnet says, "If even we had been as often beat by the French as they have been by us, this would have been thought a very hard treaty;" and Lord Mahon thinks that we may fully agree with the bishop. His lordship, moreover, takes occasion to sneer at "theorists and speculators," in which class he includes the masterminds that have endeavoured to liberate commerce from the shackles that confined it, and kept masses of mankind starving in the midst of plenty. He says (as something of great weight) that "the merchants and practical men of business" were opposed to the treaty. And but for the men he calls theorists, his merchants and practical men of business,—the men of routine, that were content to do as their fathers did before them,—would have kept the same narrow notions still prevalent everywhere, and the trade and good of mankind would have been everywhere impeded and dwarfed ten times more than they are. What has been said in particular of the Austrian government may be repeated of persons of his lordship's way of thinking—they would always sell, and never buy.

† Lord Peterborough said, with more wit than feeling, that, as the Pretender had begun his studies at Paris, he had better go and finish them at Rome.

* If we are to believe Bolingbroke, who was now openly quarrelling with Lord Oxford, and endeavouring to supplant him as head of the ministry, "the reason of the majority was, that there had been, during two or three days' uncertainty, an opinion spread that the lord treasurer (Oxford) gave up the point."—Letter to Lord Strafford, dated June 20, 1713. There are, however, some other indications that Oxford was lukewarm about the bill, if not anxious to discredit it and ruin his rival Bolingbroke, who had managed the Commercial Treaty, by the rejection of it. The hatred of these two plotting politicians seems only to have been mitigated on Bolingbroke's side by a sovereign contempt.

and yet Charles had been brought back to the throne. It is surmised that the Jacobites in the House remained so quiet from having the fear of the approaching elections before their eyes.* The two addresses were carried up to the queen, who, probably without doing much violence to her feelings, pretended to be satisfied with them, and promised to act accordingly, or to use her best endeavours to get the Pretender removed out of Lorraine. ["It was generally believed," says Burnet, "that the Duke of Lorraine did not consent to receive him till he sent one over to know the queen's pleasure upon it, and that he was very readily informed of that."] The negotiation for the removal was intrusted to Bolingbroke and Prior, who both, together with the French minister de Torcy, treated it as a jest. It appears, indeed, that Bolingbroke himself privately furnished the Duke of Lorraine with pretexts for eluding the very demands which he (Bolingbroke) was making publicly.†

When the House of Commons—pressed for large supplies notwithstanding the peace—were proceeding to renew the malt-tax for another year, it was proposed, and eventually carried, that this tax should be extended to Scotland, which had hitherto been free from it. The Scottish members and the Scottish peers, who had many other grievances, some imaginary, but others real and serious, held a meeting, and deputed two lords and two commoners to remonstrate with the queen against "such a breach of the articles of Union as prompted them to declare it dissolved." Anne reproved them for their precipitation, and thought the threat would end there. But, on the 14th of June, Lord Findlater moved in the Upper House for leave to bring in a bill to dissolve the Union. His lordship gave the following as the principal reasons which induced the Scots to demand this disseverance:—1. Their being deprived of a privy council. 2. The laws of England in cases of treason being extended to Scotland. 3. The Scotch peers being incapable of being made peers of Great Britain, as it had been adjudged and declared in the case of the late Duke of Hamilton. 4. The Scots being subjected to the malt-tax. What followed upon this motion is one of the most atrocious instances upon record of the rancour and recklessness of party or faction. The Whigs, whose brightest work had been the carrying of the Union in the teeth of the all but unanimous Tory opposition, now changed sides, and, like foul infanticides, endeavoured to destroy the best of their progeny, that they might step over its bleeding body into the cabinet. Perhaps it may be said that the Whigs did not intend the disseverance to be lasting; but, if it had happened only for a day, the advancing clock of British civilization would have been put back a whole century. And yet, what with Whig lords that were scheming, and Scottish lords that were furious, or sold body and soul to the Pretender, the motion was rejected only by a majority of four. Some good, however, seems to have come out of this madness. Several injuries inflicted upon Scotland were exposed, and English legislators were reminded of the necessity of proceeding more gently with a high-spirited and resolute people. Peterborough confessed to the contentment and strife; but, said his lordship, with his customary wit, "though sometimes there happens a difference between man and wife, yet it does not presently break the marriage; so, in the like manner, though England, who in this national marriage must be supposed to be the husband, may in some instances have been unkind to the lady, yet she ought not presently to sue for a divorce, and the rather because she has very much mended her fortune by this match."

On the 16th of July, Anne, after giving her assent to several bills, closed the session with an energetic speech, in which she took honour to herself for having concluded a war which she found prepared for her on her accession by a safe and honourable peace. With relation to the commercial treaty, she said, in a tone which resembles reproof, that she hoped that, at their next meeting, the affairs of commerce would be so well understood that the advantageous conditions she had obtained from France might be made effectual for the benefit of our trade. There was not a word about either the Pretender or the House of Hanover; and this may justify the assertion of Burnet, that the speech was more severely reflected on than any other similar discourse. As its three years had expired, the prorogation of this parliament was followed, on the 8th of August, by its dissolution by proclamation. It obtained the designation of the "pacific parliament;" but Burnet, who concludes his history at its dissolution, calls it the worst parliament he ever saw. "No assembly," says he, "but one composed as this was could have sat quiet under such a peace."⁶

Robinson, Bishop of Bristol, lord privy seal and one of the negotiators of the peace, was promoted to the see of London, became vacant at last by the death of the turbulent Compton. The learned and accomplished Doctor Atterbury, who had assisted Sacheverell at his trial, and who is believed to have composed the speech that mountebank delivered on the occasion, was made Bishop of Rochester on the death of that voluminous scribbler Spratt. Atterbury was a decided and honest Tory, with a strong leaning to Jacobitism—Spratt had been a mean time-server, with no decided bias except to his own interests and to the power that was. Sacheverell himself expected to get a mitre, but in this he was disappointed. He, however, was not without his reward. The sentence of the Lords, forbidding him to preach during the space of three years, had expired in the month of March; and on the first Sunday of his taking re-possession of his church in the Borough, he had taken for his text—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"—and had compared his own sufferings to those of Christ. Sacheverell told Swift that a bookseller had given him a hundred pounds for this sermon, and intended to print 30,000 copies; but Swift thought that the bookseller had been "confoundedly bit, and would hardly sell above half."* The popular frenzy indeed had subsided, and when people got into their senses they said that the doctor was a blockhead. Still, however, the Tory House of Commons, to mark their disapprobation of the Whig proceedings against him, or their own zeal for the high church principle, had appointed him to preach before them on the anniversary of the Restoration, and he had been rewarded with the rich rectory of St. Andrew's, Holborn.

* On the day of the prorogation gold medals, with the effigy of the queen, and a Latin motto in praise of the peace, were distributed among the members of both Houses; and, as this parliament assumed to itself the merit of effecting the pacification of Europe, and procuring a peace advantageous and glorious to the country, it was hoped that this would procure the re-election of the Tories in the Commons.

Some important changes were made in court and cabinet. The Duke of Shrewsbury, who had been negotiating at Paris in conjunction with Matthew Prior, was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland; the Duke of Ormond, one of the most resolute of the Jacobites, was appointed governor of Dover Castle and warden of the Cinque Ports, as if to facilitate the landing of the Pretender in England; Lord Lansdowne became treasurer of the household, and Lord Dartmouth privy seal; Bromley, the Tory leader in the Commons, was made joint-secretary with Lord Bolingbroke; Benson was created Lord Bingley, and sent on an embassy to Spain, being succeeded in his post of chancellor of the exchequer by Sir William Wyndham, then a friend of Bolingbroke. In these changes the ascendancy of Bolingbroke was made visible: and, indeed, by means of Lady Masham, his intriguing secretary seemed to be getting the treasurer's staff within his grasp. Emboldened by success, Bolingbroke now gave a freer scope to the evil genius by which he was possessed; and the suspicion he excited in the House of Hanover, and the mortal offence he gave them, made his case hopeless if they should ascend the English throne, and therefore urged him forward in his by-paths and intrigues, as offering his only chance of self-security in after-time. The frequent illnesses of the queen must have forced these considerations upon him incessantly; and we believe that in them, and in the pride of the man's heart—in the satisfaction of overcoming difficulties which seemed insuperable to every other statesman,—may be found the motives of Bolingbroke's proceedings to bring in the Pretender. Perhaps, also, part of Oxford's timidity on this subject may have arisen out of the circumstance that he enjoyed less of the queen's confidence than his rival, and had infinitely less art than Bolingbroke in detecting secret and studiously-concealed inclinations. The secretary had been for some time convinced that Anne, more out of her hatred to the House of Hanover than out of any family affection, would gladly contribute to placing the crown on the Pretender's head after her own death, if she could be certain that she could do it without danger to herself, and also certain that the Pretender would enter the pale of the Church of England, out of which she seems conscientiously to have believed that there was no salvation, and no possibility of ruling the English people. The genius of Bolingbroke, overlooking these ifs and hypothecals, and the startling array of national feeling and parliamentary authority, presumed that, through the partialities of a weak woman and the energies and resources of his own mind, he could set aside the Act of Succession, and bring in the Stuart. At this time the diplomatic intercourse between England and Hanover was anything rather than smooth: the queen considered herself highly insulted by the elector's adhering to his liege lord the emperor, and by the obstacles he had raised to the treaty of Utrecht. Anne, in her own court, spoke most disrespectfully both of George and of his aged mother, and encouraged the jests and satires that were made upon their serene highnesses by her familiars. Baron Schutz, the Hanoverian resident, knew not how to act or what to think—except that there was a design on foot against his master. The Lord Treasurer Oxford, who was most anxious to commit himself with neither party too openly, was a complete riddle to the bewildered German. "One is at a loss," says the baron, in a letter to Bothmar, "what character to give of this man. He told a stranger, who wanted to put him upon his guard against some one, I never trusted any one; I am determined not to trust any one for the future; consequently, no one has deceived or can deceive me." Galke, the secretary to the Hanoverian embassy, was equally perplexed by Oxford, and affirmed that, in transacting business with him, it was impossible to understand the answers he gave.

Letters were brought over from the Pretender and his chief advisers (as they had been before) to entreat all the friends of the good cause to vote for the Tories, and to exert themselves strenuously in the elections for the new parliament. [Yet Oxford, according to a Jacobite letter, had "lately put in some of the most violent Whigs to be high sheriffs in some counties, on purpose to influence the next elections in favour of the Whigs."]* The

* Extract of a letter from Father James, in Macpherson, Stuart Papers. The very next letter in this strange repository of intrigue and business is from a Mrs. White in England to the Pretender's minister in France. After speaking about a considerable sum "for him that was of the best quality"—meaning Secretary Bolingbroke, Mrs. White says that she cannot change her opinion about the trimming and shuffling Harley (Oxford). "He would," she says, "engage all; but keeps the balance in his own power, to give a turn the way he thinks will prove most suitable to continue for his own private interest. He makes himself many enemies, and secures few friends; for those that are in the king's interest abominate the trimming way he takes; and he will not be able to go on much longer without giving some other demonstration than he yet has." In another letter in the same collection, in which Lord Newcastle gives an account to the Pretender's chief adviser, the Earl of Middleton, of a conversation he had held with a Jacobite agent, it is said, on the authority of the said agent, "that, when one examined nearly several things that he (Oxford) does, a body might believe he had no good intentions; but that he was so cunning and close a man, that one should not despair of him, though he does things that seem very opposite to our master's interest."—"I told him," adds Lord Newcastle, "that since their queen could not live for ever, that notwithstanding Mr. Harley would do very prudently to strike up with the king, to have all confirmed upon him and continued to him by the king, after the death of their queen. He answered that, if the king were master of his three kingdoms to-morrow, he would not be able to do for Mr. Harley what the Elector of Hanover had done already."

Tories stood upon the peace and upon the broad basis of the high-church interest, and so despondent were the friends of the Protestant succession, that General Stanhope told Schutz that the majority of country gentlemen would surely be against them; and that, if things continued on their present footing, the elector would not come to the crown unless he came with an army. Still, however, the Whigs made extraordinary exertions, taking their stand upon the treaty of commerce and the old jealousies of the nation against everything French. This last was their best card; and, to show their concern for trade and the staple commodity, they wore pieces of wool in their hats, while the Tories wore green boughs, to recall the memory of the oak of Boscabel and the Restoration of King Charles II. After the two parties had tried their strength in all the counties and boroughs, it was found that the Whigs were a trifle more successful in this election than at the last: they still, however, continued a weak minority in the Commons; and the hopes of the party rested with the Lords.

The foreign transactions of the year 1713 heaped fresh disgrace upon the flag of the government of England. Philip, as King of Spain, had renewed the treaty of commerce and navigation of 1667, which granted to England the monopoly of a detestable traffic—"the Assiento," or the exclusive right of supplying the Spanish colonies in America with African slaves. He had also, on the representations of the English government, engaged to grant their lives, estates, and honours to the steady and unfortunate adherents of the Austrian claimant, the brave Catalans, for all that had been done by them during this war. There were to be exceptions, as a matter of course; but as many of the Catalans as pleased were to be allowed liberty to remove to Italy with their effects. But the people of that province, who before now had braved for years the whole power of Spain, distrusted and refused the conditions offered to them, and prepared once more to defend themselves against the armies of Philip. If the Bourbon had had only Spanish troops, the struggle might again have lasted twelve years; but Philip got veteran troops from France, and the Duke of Berwick for his active and able general; and the "rebellion," as it was now styled even by some of the powers that had landed the Austrian Charles there, and put arms in the hands of the natives, was quenched in a sea of blood—leaving the Catalans good cause to curse the name of England and of Austria. As for the emperor, he would have assisted them, or at least for his own interest he would have prolonged the struggle in Spain, if he had been able; but, left to carry on the war single-handed, it was with extreme difficulty he could defend himself upon the Rhine, where the French re-took Landau, and gained other decided advantages, which made him listen to pacific proposals, that led, in the autumn, to a conference at Rastadt between Prince Eugene and Marshal Villars. Eugene endeavoured to recover by negotiation provinces which had long been wrested from the empire; Villars demanded huge sums of money for the expenses of the war; Louis was resolved to keep all that he had got; and the emperor had no money to give. The negotiations were broken off, but each party soon saw the propriety of yielding something; Eugene and Villars met again at Rastadt, where it was finally agreed that France should continue in possession of the whole of Alsace, with Landau, Strasburg, and the fortresses of Huninghen and New Brisac, in their integrity, and not dismantled as proposed in the treaty of Utrecht; and that the allies of France, the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria, should be relieved from the ban of the empire, and reinstated in their respective dominions. It was further agreed, however, that there should be a kind of congress held at Baden in the spring of the following year, to regulate other matters so as to perpetuate the peace between the French king and the emperor. We may mention here, that when that meeting took place the pope's nuncio was present as one of the congress, and that when the emperor desired that ministers of England and Holland should also be admitted it was resolutely refused by France. When Anne complained of this the French king replied that he would do her majesty all good offices, and take all possible care of the interests of Great Britain. "This," adds Cunningham, "was looked upon as a most dangerous juncture to the Protestant succession. The Pretender to the British crown, residing in Lorraine, sent expresses to Baden and everywhere; and, by the advice of the pope, demanded in marriage the daughter of the Emperor Joseph. He also solicited all the Popish princes, and the pope himself, by all the motives of religion, not to have anything more at heart, in this critical juncture, than the Popish religion and his cause, which were always united. About this time his favourers in England propagated a rumour that there were good grounds to hope that he would renounce the Popish religion and conform himself to the church of England. The Lord Bolingbroke came rashly into their sentiments, and even treated with the Earl of Oxford about paying the dowry of the queen dowager, widow of King James, then in exile in France. But the Earl of Oxford hesitated on this point, till it should appear on what grounds it might be done. The widowed queen herself had given occasion to this scruple, by claiming that money under the title of queen mother instead of queen dowager. And this, the Earl of Oxford said, could not be lawfully admitted after her son was attained by law." The Emperor Charles was solicited, like the other Catholic princes, by the court of Rome and by the Pretender; and it was feared that, to avenge the faithless defection of Queen Anne, which had cost him so dear, his imperial majesty might make com-

It is believed, however, that George had done, and as yet could do, nothing but give promises of future reward to the double-faced lord-treasurer, who was certainly, at the moment, promising all his interest to the House of Hanover, who did not trust him, but who may have thought it worth their while to delude him, and meet cunning with cunning.

mon cause with France and Rome in abetting the outcast Stuart, and forcing him back upon the English nation. It was even rumoured that the emperor had expressly stipulated to support the cause of the exiled family, and to give one of his nieces in marriage to the Pretender. Oxford, in a conversation with the Whig ex-chancellor Lord Cowper, accused the Duke of Marlborough of promoting this marriage.* The conferences both at Rastadt and Baden were therefore watched with the greatest anxiety in England; and so low had the real victrix in the war now fallen, that she was grateful for an assurance that the emperor would not interfere in the internal concerns of England. Her name, in fact, was not mentioned in the treaty.

In the mean time the government of England had fallen into contempt at home, and the intrigues of the court had thickened, and continued still to thicken, with every new attack of the gout or other illness of her majesty. Anne's own mind was divided and agitated by different partialities and conflicting passions; and the two women whom she chiefly consulted, and upon whose advice she relied, as she had done in former times upon that of the Duchess of Marlborough, entertained notions diametrically opposite. The Duchess of Somerset was favourable to the house of Hanover, and wrought upon the weak mind of Anne through her dread of Popery and her high Church-of-Englandism, not hesitating to hint that she would risk her soul's eternal welfare, if she exposed her people to the dangers of Popery by contributing to the succession of a prince who had been nurtured in the Roman creed, who had lived all his life in Roman Catholic countries, and who had rejected every overture made to him about changing his religion or conforming, even in outward appearances, to the Anglican church. Lady Masham, on the other side, was enthusiastic for the Pretender. As early as the year 1710 that bedchamber-woman had put herself at the head of schemes and projects for changing the destiny of her country: according to the Duke of Berwick, the Abbé Gaultier, when charged with the secret negotiations between France and England, waited upon him at St. Germain to communicate secret messages and overtures from Lord-Treasurer Oxford, and told him of the designs of the English minister in favour of the Pretender, stating, however, that Oxford insisted on three conditions:—1. That no one at St. Germain, not even the Pretender's mother, should be let into the secret; 2. That Anne should enjoy the crown during her life; 3. That security should be given for the church and constitution of England. Berwick informs us that he willingly agreed to all this, and that the Pretender did the same; but when he tried to bring the abbé to a clearer explanation he was told that the peace on the tapis must be concluded before such details could be safely entered upon.

In consequence of the clandestine expedition to Paris of Gaultier and Matthew Prior, M. Ménager, it will be remembered, came over to England.

* Lord Cowper's Diary, in Coxe's Life of Marlborough.

An important part of the mission with which Ménéger was charged was, to ascertain what could be done for the Pretender, and what was the real state of Anne's feeling towards him. Lord Bolingbroke, then Mr. St. John, introduced Ménéger to the she favourite; saying, that he did not choose to meddle further in the matter himself, but that her majesty had allowed him to introduce Ménéger to Mrs. Masham. When the Frenchman and the bed-chamber-woman came together they presently agreed upon two points;—1. That, for the satisfaction of the people at home, the King of France should be required in Anne's name to abandon her brother and his interest, on pretence of adhering to the succession as it was now established; 2. That, nevertheless, the seeming to abandon the said interest was to be so understood, that the king should not be obliged, in case of her majesty's decease, not to use his endeavours for the placing the said prince on his father's throne, to which he had an undoubted right. "Mrs. Masham further told me," says Ménéger, "that it was the present unhappiness of the queen to possess the throne of her brother, which she had no other claim to than what the political measures of the state had made legal, and, in a sort, necessary; which, however, she believed, gave her majesty oftentimes secret uneasiness; that this was not all the misfortune, but that, by the same necessity of state, she was obliged, not only against her disposition, but even against her principles, to further and promote the continuance of the usurpation, not only beyond her own life, but for ever: that I might be sure, under such circumstance, it would be an inexpressible satisfaction to her majesty, to see herself delivered from the fatal necessity of doing so much wrong, and if it could be possible, with safety to the religion and liberties of her subjects, to have her brother restored to his right, at least after her decease, if it could not be done before: that it was true the queen did not see through this; and it seemed next to impossible, 'the rage and irreconcilable aversion of the greatest part of the common people to her brother being grown to such a height;'—nay, she said, the queen found it would be impossible to enter upon any treaty of peace, or so much as to let the people hear of putting an end to the war, without entering into the strongest engagements possible for the confirming the succession in the House of Hanover; 'a thing that I am sure,' says she, 'is all our aversion;' and we have no retreat but to his most Christian majesty, in hopes of his ordering things so at this treaty, that he may be at liberty to support and assist in the work, whenever an opportunity should present itself: that, to this end, the plenipotentiaries from hence, 'though there was no communicating anything to them by way of confidence,' should be instructed not to insist upon things more than necessity obliged; and 'some reserves, sure,' says she, 'may be made, to leave room for justice to take place in time to come.'" With the perfect understanding that the renunciation of the Pretender and the recognition of the Hanoverian succession was a mere show—a thing to be said and written, but not observed by his master Louis, Ménéger repaired to Utrecht, where he was a principal negotiator, and where he found that the English plenipotentiaries had not received any such private instructions as Lady Masham had given him reason to expect would be sent to them: and he afterwards discovered that the agents of the court of St. Germain had made the interests of the chevalier or Pretender the subject of a private negotiation with the ministry in England. When Oxford had amused these agents as long as was thought necessary, he began to start numerous objections and difficulties, and to urge the necessity of time and patience in working out so great and perilous a scheme. And the Jacobite agents were at last obliged to represent to the court of Versailles, "that the ministry in England were men of no honour; that they had held them in suspense for a long time; and that now, they not only did not come to the point with them, but declined any conversation on the subject; only said in general, that a person would be sent over to Utrecht, who should discourse by word of mouth freely, and should settle that affair so as to be agreeable to all parties." Lady Masham, who had wished the Pretender to depend upon, and to owe his fortunes to, Bolingbroke, afterwards wrote to Ménéger to express her disappointment and vexation. "I take it for granted," says the bed-chamber-woman, "that they (the court of St. Germain) are fallen into the hands of my lord treasurer (Oxford): he loves a secret, and is famous for making intricacies, where there is a sterility of intrigues; and no less renowned for causing everything of such a nature to miscarry. If their assurances are from him, I doubt not, he values himself upon having deceived them."* It appears that the Duke of Berwick began to suspect Oxford's duplicity at rather an early stage of these intrigues, but that he was not thoroughly convinced that that minister was only serving his own turn by strengthening himself with the support of the Jacobites in court, parliament, and country, till some time after the peace of Utrecht was signed.† "In this manner," says the duke, in his Memoirs, when treating of the year 1714, "did Oxford amuse us, and it was difficult to prevent it; for to break with him would have been the destruction of everything, because he had the power in his hands, and governed Queen Anne. We were, therefore, forced to pretend to trust to him; but, at the same time, we neg-

† Berwick says, that when he saw Gaultier again in France he expected him to be more explicit; but that the abbé only told him they must still have patience till the peace of Utrecht should be entirely finished: that the least hint of Queen Anne's intentions in favour of her brother would rouse the Whigs, and might not only destroy the necessary business of the peace, but perhaps even occasion the overthrow of the ministry and a revolution in the state; that it was, moreover, essential to make sure of the British army, which could not be done till after the peace was signed, when they "would profess to a reduction of it, and care would then be taken to keep only such officers as could be depended upon." We shall presently see Anne and her ministers carrying into effect this last-mentioned design, and re-officering the army with determined Jacobites!

lected not to concert measures privately with the Duke of Ormond, and many other persons, in order that we might bring about this matter by their means, if Oxford should fail us." Among the many other persons thus alluded to as trusty Jacobites, was the Duke of Buckingham, who, it is said, had once been the lover of Anne, in whose good graces his grace personally stood higher than any other man about the court. Under the name of Mr. Matthews, the Duke of Buckingham (who had taken to himself, as his third wife, the Lady Catherine Darnley, a natural daughter of King James II., by Catherine Sedley) wrote to the Pretender's minister, the Earl of Middleton, to assure him how truly he loved the king, and how earnestly he desired to have him back on the English throne, "notwithstanding the difference of religion." Under the cloak of nicknames and ciphers his grace went on to say, that the Pretender ought to think of the steps he had best take to please his aunt Anne, and get the good will of the English people; that he thought, for his own part, the people would be better inclined to him than to the Hanoverian; and that the only difficulty with the queen seemed to be the Pretender's religion. According to his grace, the queen had complained of his obstinate adherence to the faith in which he had been bred, and had said to him, "What would you have me do? You know, as the law stands, a papist cannot inherit the crown; and, therefore, should I alter my will, it would be to no purpose; the law would give all to Hanover, and therefore I had better do that with a good grace that I cannot help. . . . I do not see how I can undo what I myself have done, and done in such a manner. He may thank himself for it. He knows I always loved him better than Hanover." Buckingham also relates with some humour in this letter a recent journey he had made into the country, where he had been caressed by many loyal noblemen on account of his known Jacobitism. Lord Mulgrave, he says, had told him a thousand stories about the House of Hanover, and had said that if the king was not a papist they would soon give the elector his belly-ful of law. [But it was precisely this great if that deterred, after all, the majority of the Tories.] To his grace it seemed perfectly natural and easy for the Pretender to change his religion—at least in appearance; and he reminded him that he was not the first of his family who had thought a crown worth changing an opinion for—alluding to Henry IV. of France, who had given up the Protestant religion, in which he had been bred, in order to gain possession of the French crown. This change of religion, he says, would be expected by the queen, "who is, and ever was, very obstinate in all her opinions."* To the honour of the Pretender, he was incapable of these compliances, which, in all probability, would, in the end, have been as useless as they were base. During the winter (1713-14) Anne was seized with a dangerous illness at Windsor; and for some time it was believed that the gout had mounted to her stomach. The nation was thrown into alarm—the intriguing ministry into an agonising panic. Oxford, the very last man that had a right to complain of indecision and procrastination, said to his penman and confidant Swift, "These people, when the queen's ill, think she has not an hour to live, and when she is better, they act as if she were immortal."* A run was made upon the Bank; it was reported that an armament was prepared in the ports of France to bring over the Pretender; and the funds, ever susceptible and ever timid, fell. To quiet these alarms, the suffering Anne was obliged by her ministers to write a letter to the lord mayor of London, to assure him, that, though an aguish indisposition, succeeded by a fit of the gout, had detained her longer than usual at Windsor, yet she intended soon to return to town, and open the session of parliament in person; and, in effect, her maladies yielding once more to the force of medicine, she returned to London; and, as it was ascertained that the Pretender continued quiet and helpless in Lorraine, the alarm vanished and the funds rose again.

A. D. 1714.—The new parliament, which had been originally summoned for the 12th of the preceding November, met on the 16th of February. Sir Thomas Hanmer was chosen speaker. Mr. Richard Steele, one of the most delightful writers of that or any other day, but who was new in the House, had risen to support the nomination. "I rise up," said the essayist, "to do him honour." He could get no further in his speech, for many members cried out "Tatler," "Tatler!" and as he went down the House several said aloud, "It is not so easy a thing to speak in the House! He fancies, because he can scribble, he can speak!" On the 2nd of March her majesty delivered the speech from the throne. She told the two Houses that she had great satisfaction in being able to assure them that the ratifications of the treaties of peace and of commerce with Spain had been exchanged; that, by the blessing of God, an honourable and advantageous peace had thus been secured for her own people, and for the greatest part of her allies; and she congratulated her subjects upon their deliverance "from a consuming land war, &c. She took to herself the merit of holding the balance of Europe, of promoting trade, and encouraging the right application of our naval force. After asking supplies for the current service of the year and for the discharge of debts, she reverted to the old sore subjects—the press and the House of Hanover. "I wish," she said, "that effectual care had been taken, as I have often desired, to suppress those seditious papers and factious rumours, by which designing men have been able to sink credit, and the innocent have suffered. There are some, also, arrived to that height of malice, as to insinuate that the Protestant succession in the House of Hanover is in danger under my government. Those who go about thus to distract the minds of men with imaginary dangers can only mean to disturb the present tranquillity, and to bring real mischief upon us. After all I have done to secure our religion and your liberties, and to transmit both safe to posterity, I cannot mention these proceedings without some degree of warmth ; and I must hope you will all agree with me, that attempts to weaken my authority, or to render the possession of the crown uneasy to me, can never be proper means to strengthen the Protestant succession." We are not told that either Anne or her ministers blushed at the inevitable recollection of their recent schemes and correspondence with the Chevalier. But several members of both Houses must have known enough to be quite aware of the insincerity of her majesty's expressions. The repeated denunciations of the press from the throne had not been altogether idle thunder. Bolingbroke, who prided himself, and who had a right to pride himself, on his pen, had caused the arrest of eleven printers and publishers in one day ;* and it had been perfectly well known to the trade that great risks must be run in printing anything displeasing to the ministry. The latter body, however, had not for this moderated their own attacks, slanders, and libels, and Swift was still retained by the lord treasurer, who flattered that evil-hearted and bright-headed priest with the hopes of promotion to some of the highest dignities in the church. Richard Steele had recently written a warm Whig pamphlet, called 'The Crisis,' to sound the alarm on the dangers that beset the Protestant succession. To this, Swift had replied in one of the bitterest of his productions, entitled 'The Public Spirit of the Whigs,' containing, among other offensive passages, a most scurrilous abuse of the Scottish peers and of the whole Scottish nation. It appears that the style betrayed the man, that Swift was known to be the author, and, as it was suspected that his intimate associate Bolingbroke had assisted him in the composition, the Whig House of Lords were provoked, and were urged by Lord Wharton to prosecute. The printer and publisher were both brought in custody to the bar. "We have nothing to do with the printer and publisher," exclaimed Wharton ; "but it highly concerns the honour of this august assembly to find out the villain who is the author of this false and scandalous libel, in order to do the Scottish nation justice." Oxford protested that he knew nothing of the pamphlet or of its author ; and, on going out of the House, he wrote a letter to his creature Swift, enclosing a 100*l.* note, and promising "to do more." Lord Wharton, however, pressed to have Barber, the printer, closely examined, but this was defeated by Oxford's having directed a prosecution against that person, which rendered his evidence as to the author inadmissible. The Scottish peers, headed by the Duke of Argyll, went up to the queen, and demanded satisfaction. Anne, by proclamation, offered 300*l.* for the discovery of the author ; but Swift was, of course, perfectly safe, and in the end, printer and publisher were dismissed, and the business was let drop. The Whigs, in the Lords, had thus taken the initiative, and had miserably failed : the Tories in the Commons followed the example, but with far more success. Steele, who had put his name to his pamphlet, and who was obnoxious on account of many former witticisms in the 'Tatler,' was singled out for a surer vengeance, and was hit by the shaft which the anonymous and protected Swift had escaped. Hungerford, a lawyer who had been expelled the House in the time of King William, for accepting a bribe for his vote, called attention to certain scandalous and seditious papers, published by Richard Steele, esquire, a member of that House. Harley, brother to the lord-treasurer, auditor Foley, a kinsman of the same minister, and Sir William Wyndham, chancellor of the exchequer, followed the branded lawyer, and fell without mercy upon the poor author, whom they charged more particularly with his late pamphlet, the 'Crisis,' and with two numbers of his periodical paper, called 'The Englishman.' So violent were they, that they proposed proceeding immediately to extremities, without allowing Steele to answer at all. Next they were for allowing him only till the following Monday, or three days, to prepare his defence. Steele asked for a week. Putting on a sanctified countenance, and adopting the whining tone of the conventicle, the witty essayist said—"I own in the meekness and contrition of my heart, that I am a very great sinner, and hope those members who spoke last, and who are so justly renowned for their exemplary piety and devotion, will not be necessary to accumulating the number of my transgressions, in obliging me to break the Sabbath of the Lord, by perusing such profane writings as shall serve for my defence." The members who spoke last were Harley and Foley, who had both been Puritans, and who had both deserted the conventicle for the church. The humorist's attack was effectual ; Steele was allowed his week for preparation. On the appointed day he stood up to deliver his defence, and the sneering members found, that though a writer, he could speak. He spoke, in fact, for three hours, and with great ability ; being assisted by his friend Joseph Addison, who was no orator himself, but who sat beside him, and "prompted him on occasion." Steele was charged with insinuating that the Hanover succession was in danger under Queen Anne and her majesty's present ministers. He was also accused by recent converts or renegades of being no true Church-of-England-man. Here the wit and humorist again made use of his best weapons. "I cannot tell," said Steele, "what they would have me do to prove myself a churchman ; but I think I have appeared one even in so trifling

* The attacks on the ministry generally appeared in short pamphlets, newspapers, and loose sheets, which were sold at a penny a piece. Oxford and Bolingbroke laid a tax of a halfpenny on these cheap productions ; but they failed in their intention of suppressing them. Swift complains, that while the Tories were discouraged by the additional halfpenny, and left off buying the loose sheets of their party, the Whig papers continued to flourish under all the disadvantages of the tax : "a proof," says Lord John Russell, "of the superior wealth, popularity, or wit of the opposition."—Ibid. Europe.

a thing as a comedy; considering that as a comic poet I have been a martyr and confessor for the church, for my play was damned for its piety.* It was expected that the ci-devant puritan, auditor Foley, would reply in detail to Steele's defence; but Foley, sure of his Tory majority, and having no wit to throw away, thought this would be an unnecessary trouble, and merely said—"Without amusing the House with long speeches, it is plain that the writings that have been complained of are seditious and scandalous, injurious to her majesty's government, the church, and the universities; and I move that the question be put thereupon." Robert Walpole rose and threw his shield between Mr. Auditor and the Essayist. In a forcible speech, full of liberal sentiments and clever home-thrusts, Walpole said, "Why is the author answerable in parliament for a book which he wrote in his private capacity? And if he is punishable by law, why is he not left to the law? By this mode of proceeding, parliament, which used to be the scourge only of evil ministers, is made by ministers the scourge of the subject. . . . From what fatality does it arise, that what is written in favour of the Protestant succession, and what was countenanced by the late ministry, is deemed a libel by the present administration? General invectives in the pulpit against any particular sin have never been deemed a reflection on individuals, unless the darling sin of those persons happens to be the vice against which the preacher inveighs. It becomes then a fair inference, from the irritability and resentment of the present administration against its defender, that their darling sin is to obstruct and prevent the Protestant succession."† In other particulars the debate in favour of the man of genius was singularly interesting. Steele, in one of his papers in the Guardian, had, to his honour, refuted a scandalous libel on Lady Charlotte Finch, afterwards Duchess of Somerset, which appeared in the Examiner, where Swift frequently wrote. Lady Charlotte was daughter to the Tory leader, the Earl of Nottingham, and sister to Lord Finch, then a young member of the House of Commons. Lord Finch remembered the obligation, and was eager to show his gratitude to his sister's defender. Like Steele, he was unpractised in public speaking; his ideas quitted his head as he got upon his legs, he hesitated, and at last floundered into a hopeless silence. But, as he sat down, his lordship said, loud enough to be heard, "It is strange, I cannot speak for this man, though I could readily fight for him." The generous words excited universally a generous feeling in the House, which resounded with cries of "Hear him, hear him." Lord Finch rose again; and, as if a floodgate had been opened, he poured forth a copious, flowing, and eloquent speech. His lordship particularly justified what Steele had said about the disgraceful peace of Utrecht; and adopting that writer's language, he exclaimed—"We may, if we please, give it fine epithets, but epithets do not change the nature of things: we may, if we please, call it here honourable; but I am sure it is accounted scandalous in Holland, Germany, Portugal, and over all Europe, except France and Spain. We may call it advantageous; but all the trading part of the nation find it to be otherwise: and if it be really advantageous, it must be so to the ministry that made it." Sir William Wyndham, chancellor of the exchequer, here rose to insist that it could not be said that the peace was advantageous to ministers. "Then," retorted Lord Finch, "it is plain it is advantageous to no one but our late enemies." But this was all irritating language—this was not a course likely to serve Steele:—the generous feeling passed off in a moment; and the Tories, by the overwhelming majority of 245 against 152, voted that Steele was guilty of a scandalous libel, and should be expelled the House.*

Nevertheless the Whigs remaining in parliament resolved to prove the truth of the essayist's position, that the Protestant succession was in danger. They began in the Lords, where Sunderland, Cowper, Halifax, and Wharton urged the perils arising from the Pretender's continuing in Lorraine, and carried an address praying for an account of what steps had been taken by government to procure his removal. Lord Oxford had recourse to one of his tricks; and he moved for a bill "for the further security of the Protestant Succession, to make it high treason to bring any foreign troops into the kingdom." He thought that this would have the outward appearance of zeal and patriotism; but his real intention was to prevent the landing of the Electoral Prince of Hanover with an armed force, a desperate expedient which now began to be talked of, and which had been recommended—among others by the Duke of Marlborough!—to the house of Hanover as the only likely means of making sure of the succession. But the lord-treasurer's device was transparent: he was called upon to explain his meaning, and, upon being compelled to say that he meant the bill to apply only to foreign troops introduced by the Pretender, he was told that then it must be altogether unnecessary, for by all laws such troops, if foreigners, would be public enemies, and if natives, rebels. The bill was accordingly lost, and Oxford greatly disconcerted. The Whig lords continued their attack; and Lord Wharton moved, in direct terms, that the Protestant succession was in danger under the present administration. The debate was exceedingly hot. Lord Anglesa said, that, "as the honour of his sovereign and the good of his country were the rule of his actions, so he had no respect of persons; and, if he found himself imposed upon, he durst pursue an evil minister from the queen's closet to the Tower, and from the Tower to the scaffold." Several peers who had hitherto figured as warm Tories and supporters of the administration—as the Archbishop of York and several bishops, the Earls of Abingdon, Jersey, and Anglesea himself, and the Lords Ashburnham and Carteret—turned round on this critical occasion and voted with the Whigs. Yet, in the end, the vote that the succession was not in danger was carried by a majority of twelve—exactly the number of the recently created peers. The House of Commons, however, on the motion of Sir Edward Knatchbull, resolved itself into committee on the same question. In that House also many Tories, of the class generally styled the Hanoverian Tories, quitted the ministerial ranks and voted with the Whigs. The speaker, Sir Thomas Hanmer, was one of these seceders; and he delivered a speech which was considered powerful and effective by many who were Tories without any taint of Jacobitism. Hanmer said that so much had been advanced to prove the succession in danger, and so little said on the other side, that he should vote against ministers. A minority of 208 voted with him against 256—a diminution in the majority which spread consternation in part of the cabinet, and gave joy to the rest, for Bolingbroke's main endeavour was at the moment to overthrow the lord-treasurer. The Tories too—Jacobites and all—were obliged, for the sake of appearances, to agree with the Whigs in a resolution that the queen should be desired to renew her instances for the removal of the Pretender from Lorraine. This address was also carried in the Upper House, where Lord Wharton further moved that her majesty should be desired to issue a proclamation, promising a reward to any person who should apprehend the Pretender, dead or alive. Notwithstanding their desire and their interest in keeping up the popular excitement, and notwithstanding the risk they incurred by being denounced as Jacobites, several of the Whigs opposed this motion. Lord North and Grey said that such a proclamation, with the words dead or alive, would look like an encouragement to assassination, and he implored the House not to take a step so inconsistent with its high character, and with the character of a nation and government famed for lenity and clemency. Lord Trevor declared that no man had more respect and affection for the house of Hanover, but that they must excuse him if he would not venture his soul's perdition for them:—and he proposed as an amendment, “that the reward should be for apprehending and bringing the Pretender to justice, in case he should land or attempt to land either in Great Britain or Ireland.” This was carried; the time of issuing the proclamation was left to the queen's own discretion; and Anne was thus relieved from the necessity of putting a price upon her brother's head. But in the strife of parties, and in the well-founded apprehensions of the time, the merciful alteration was carried by a majority of no more than ten. When the address was carried up to Anne she said, “It would be a real strengthening to the succession of the House of Hanover that an end were put to those groundless fears and jealousies which have been so industriously promoted. I do not at this time see any occasion for such a proclamation. Whenever I judge it necessary I shall give my orders to have it issued.” At this moment Anne was in the worst of humours; irritated on the one side by the almost total defection of the bench of bishops, and the open hostility of many formerly deemed the most submissive of Tories; and scared on the other side by endeavours made and making by the Whigs to bring over the Electoral Prince of Hanover. Baron Schutz, the Hanoverian envoy, had standing instructions to adhere to, and constantly consult with, the Whig leaders, Somers, Halifax, and Cowper, and with other lords and members of the Commons that were the undoubted and zealous friends of that succession. The envoy's house had thus become a place of constant resort and consultation; and, as they grew bolder with their growing strength in parliament, the Whigs proposed that Schutz should demand from the queen a writ of summons for the electoral prince, who, having been created a British peer by the title of Duke of Cambridge, only wanted the writ to be able to come over and take his seat in the House of Lords. The envoy, doing readily what he was asked to do, went at once to the Lord Chancellor Harcourt. “I told him,” says Schutz himself in his dispatch to Robethon, “I had orders to thank him from the electress for the assurance he had given me, the first time I saw him, that he had her interests so much at heart, and made other compliments of the same kind; to which he answered as I could wish, protesting his profound respect and duty to her royal highness, of which he would be happy to give proofs on all occasions. I then told him that the electress ordered me to ask of him the electoral prince's writ, as Duke of Cambridge. He changed colour upon this, and looked down and told me that he would speak of it to the queen, not daring to give it me without her orders; but added, after being silent for some time, he did not recollect that a writ was demanded of him since he was in her majesty's service (to this I might have easily answered that the reason was he never retained any), nor that any was sent beyond sea. On which I answered that, by delivering it to me, he did not send it out of the kingdom; entreating him to give me his answer before this evening, in order that I might acquaint the electress by this day's post with what I had done to execute her orders. To this he answered simply that he intended to go to the queen to speak to her about it: so that I waited for the result of what was deliberated in the council, which I hear was called yesterday evening, and continued sitting until after midnight. Upon leaving him, he told me, at the door of his room, that he hoped I did not think that he refused me the writ, as he wanted only to know the queen's orders first.”* Schutz expected the chancellor's answer on the morrow, and as it came not he wrote his lordship a pressing note on the subject. This drew forth an immediate reply, which was to this effect:—"When you came to me yesterday, and told me that, by orders of the Princess Sophia, you demanded a writ of summons for the Duke of Cambridge, I let you know that I thought it my duty to acquaint her majesty therewith. I have accordingly laid this matter before the queen, who was pleased to say, that, not having received the least information of this demand from you, or in any other manner whatsoever from the court of Hanover, she could hardly persuade herself that you acted by direction from thence; that she, therefore, did not think fit to give me any other answer than this. The writ for the Duke of Cambridge was sealed of course when the writs of summons to all the other peers were sealed, and lies ready to be delivered to you, whenever you call for it." In a letter written on the same day to Bothmar, Schutz says that the coming of the electoral prince was absolutely necessary, as the fears of the Pretender's coming were but too well founded. [Probably the Whig party had by some means or other received intelligence of a bold design conceived by the Duke of Berwick, of which we shall speak presently.] Schutz also declared that the Whigs were delighted with the order which the electress Sophia had sent him to demand the writ—"and," says he, "before I did anything in that affair, I asked the advice of the following persons, and they were all of the same opinion:—Devonshire, Somerset, Nottingham, Argyll, Oxford, Somers, Cowper, Halifax, Wharton, and Townshend. Anglesea being in the country, I could not consult him before last night, when I saw him at Sir Thomas Hanmer's. He said that you could not do anything more to the purpose, and that this is the last opportunity of saving your succession; being very sure that, unless you apply a speedy remedy, it will be too late before the end of six months, as everything will be then ruined. Therefore he, as well as all our other friends, conjure the elector to send over the prince immediately, although the writ should be refused, as his presence alone can re-establish everything yet; and as everything will be lost after taking such a step (that is, the demanding the writ) if we go no further. Sir Thomas Hanmer is of the same opinion, and promised, as well as Lord Anglesea, to employ his influence with all those who depend upon him in the House of Commons to make them declare themselves, assuring me he is fully convinced the court will not be in a condition to hinder them." The lord treasurer Oxford had taken the alarm. The refusal of the writ, or any coldness or anger on the part of the queen, would, he knew, be imputed in part to himself; and, on the very day after the lord chancellor had sent Schutz his ambiguous answer, Oxford wrote a letter of solemn protestations to the Hanoverian court, and dispatched it by an express messenger. "I do, in the most solemn manner," said the lord treasurer, "assure you that, next to the queen, I am entirely and unalterably devoted to the interests of his electoral highness. This is not only from the conscience of my oaths, but out of profound respect to the elector's great virtues. I may, without vanity, say that I had the greatest hand in settling the succession. I have ever preserved the same opinion; and it is owing to the declarations the queen has so often made in their favour, that the generality of the people are come to be for that House." Not satisfied with protesting and lying for himself, Oxford proceeded to lie for the bedchamber-woman, whose great influence over the concerns of the government was as notorious as it was disgraceful, and also to lie for the pious queen, whose aversion to the Guelphs amounted to a downright loathing. "I am sure," he adds, "that Lady Masham, the queen's favourite, is entirely for their succession. I am also sure that the queen is so; and you may do me the justice to assure his electoral highness, that I am ready to give him proofs of my attachment to his interest, and to set in a true light the state of this country; for it will be very unfortunate for so great a prince to be only prince over a party, which can never last long in England." And after this he laboured to show that the coming over of the electoral prince would be far more fatal to the interests of his family than it would be unpleasant to her majesty. "Let me, in confidence, tell you," said he, "that there is but one thing that can be any way of prejudice to the succession, and that is the endeavour to bring them, or any of them, over without the queen's consent. Two courts in this country have been so fatal, and the factions are so high, that it must be very mischievous both to the queen and to the serene House, to have any such thing enterprised, that may create a difference between the queen and that family: that will change the dispute to the crown and the succession; whereas now it is between the House of Hanover and a popish pretender. I will add but this one word, that I will assure you that, upon any advances of kindness from the House of Hanover, I will pawn my life for it, they shall receive most essential proofs of the queen's friendship; and I am sure that is the best confirmation of their succession." Even thus lightly could the prime minister of England speak of the solemn and repeated acts of parliament, which alone were competent to decide the question, putting before them and above them the will or caprice, the sympathies and antipathies, of the weak yet headstrong occupant of the throne. On the following day Baron Schutz went to the lord chancellor's, to take up the writ for the Duke of Cambridge; "but," says he, "the Chancellor and all his clerks had gone out, so that I returned empty-handed." From the chancellor's the envoy went to Lord Oxford's, where the treasurer drew him aside and asked him if he had not got the writ. "I told him," says Schutz, "that I had not. He inquired if the chancellor had not written to me, and I acquainted him how I had missed him. He then said to me, that the queen was very much surprised I had never said anything to her about it; adding that she had never been treated in that manner. I answered that, my orders having been addressed to the lord chancellor, I went to him; that I was surprised he did not warn me of my mistake if it was necessary to address myself to the queen, which he might and should have known better than I. He appeared to be in very bad humour and much embarrassed.* The envoy, however, was assured by Lord Anglesea and all the rest of his friends that he had taken the proper way of asking for the writ, and the only way to obtain it, that, if he had addressed himself first to the queen, their enemies would have endeavoured to divert the thing, with as much warmth as they were now employing to hinder the coming of the prince. These noblemen also told Schutz that the embassy to Hanover of Lord Paget which was hastily preparing,† had no other object than to hinder the electoral prince's journey. "There have been, however," says Schutz, "great rejoicings over all the city, since it was made public that I had asked the writ for the prince; and some have no doubts of his coming speedily, as others most certainly fear it. The bells were ringing for some days past, and healths drunk to his good journey." The envoy, from all that he saw, was convinced more and more of the needfulness of the journey; and he was further urged and impelled by the Whig leaders, who seem scarcely ever to have left him. "The report," says he, "which our enemies spread everywhere, and which found credit with a great number, that we are very indifferent about the succession, will be considered perfectly true if, after having demanded the writ, the electoral prince does not come over immediately." On the next day the Hanoverian envoy went again to the lord chancellor's; but, although it was only nine o'clock in the morning, he was assured that his lordship had been gone out an hour—"which," adds Schutz, with some reason, "I considered as if they had a mind to amuse me, and not to give me the writ." Still, however, he insisted on the prince's coming, and declared that good effects had already been produced by the steps he had taken. Some time before this Oxford had dispatched his brother, Mr. Harley, to keep matters smooth at Hanover; and he now sent an express to his relative, "who, no doubt," says Schutz, "will do all he can to intimidate our court, and particularly the electress, with complaints of our demand." The Hanoverian adds, "But, in the name of God, do not hesitate at anything which Mr. Harley can say to you. It ought rather to determine you speedily. This is the general opinion of all our friends here, who deserve, on account of the danger to which they expose themselves, that you should not lose a moment in coming to their relief." Lord Townshend joined the envoy in making these representations. In a remarkable letter, in which his lordship briefly reviews the disadvantages and dangers of Queen Anne's recent and present foreign policy, he tells the Hanoverian court that they are far too secure as to the Pretender. "You seem," says his lordship, "to think it impossible for the Pretender to make any attempt during the queen's life. In this we are absolutely of another opinion, for reasons, as we think, so very obvious to those who observe with the least attention the present conduct here, that there is no need of entering into particulars on this head; and, this being the settled notion of all your friends here, you will easily imagine into how great a degree of despair we were all thrown by that part of your letter, where you mention the elector's resolution of not sending the electoral prince without a previous invitation. For it is but a small comfort to us to see how diligent and careful you are in taking remote precautions abroad, whilst we are convinced that the danger is so imminent here that we shall in all probability be totally ruined before any of those supports can possibly come to our relief. But now I must congratulate with you upon M. le Baron de Schutz's last orders for demanding the electoral prince's writ of summons. This I can assure you is thought by everybody, both friends as well as enemies, to be the first step that your court has made that looks as if you were in earnest about the succession. Nothing can be more effectual if it be supported by the immediate sending the prince, nor more reasonable than it was at this time; for the queen had just then given a most unkind answer, to give it no worse term, to an address for the support of the succession; and, when the House of Lords came to consider of this answer, the effect of the electoral prince's having demanded his writ appeared most plainly by the behaviour of a great number of lords upon that occasion, though that news was not then publicly known. Monsieur Schutz will acquaint you with the consternation our ministers were under upon this occasion, and the fright the chancellor was in lest it should be thought he had denied the writ. They are so sensible that this step, if it be followed by the immediate coming of the prince, will so effectually ruin their designs, and tend so directly to the securing the succession from all future danger, that you may depend upon their making use of all arts and contrivances imaginable to prevent his coming. Neither threats nor flattery will be spared. They are so intent and so bent upon prevailing with you to stop the prince, that they will not rely upon Mr. Harley's dexterity, but have determined to send to you my Lord Paget. You must therefore prepare to be very vigorously attacked by way of message; they see the spirit of the people here runs so high in your favour, that they have no hopes of bringing either them or parliament up to anything that may discourage the prince's coming. They are, therefore, forced to turn all their views towards you, and are reduced to the miserable necessity of trying whether they can persuade your court to betray itself. I shall trouble you no further than only to give you the unanimous opinion of all our friends upon this occasion. They are persuaded that you must be convinced, by the manner in which this writ was granted, that you have opened a most unexceptionable way for the coming of the prince. It is plain the writ would not have been granted, could they, by law, have justified the refusing of it; and the uneasiness they expressed, both when it was granted and since, shows plainly they would not have failed to have attempted something in parliament, in order to have discouraged him from coming, could they have had the least hopes of carrying it.* On the 16th of April, or four days after his first demanding the writ, Schutz informs Robothon of an interview he has had with Oxford. "The lord-treasurer," he says, "told me that he never saw the queen in a greater passion. All the reason he alleges to me for this is, that she had no notice from me of the demand which I was to make of the writ, and although he could not deny but the chancellor prepared and delivered writs. From whence I wanted to prove to him that it was therefore to the chancellor I was to address myself, as he was the minister to whose department such things belonged; besides that my orders imported to go to him, and that he did not discover to me that I addressed myself improperly; yet he said that I ought to have addressed myself to the secretary of state, or to him, who would not have failed to advise very properly in the affair; protesting that he had no service more at heart, after the queen's, than that of the electoral family, and that he was vexed at what had happened, the queen taking it as the greatest mark of contempt that could be given to her; telling me, that had it not been for this incident, her majesty would have invited the electoral prince to come to pay her a visit next summer; without recollecting that he had told me but a moment before that she was two much afraid to see any of the electoral family here; and that, this alone excepted, she would willingly grant everything else that could be demanded of her. He heaped together several very unintelligible things in this discourse, to which I made no other answer than that, having addressed myself to the proper officer for a thing which the law determined in our favour I could not imagine that the queen was angry at it, nor that she would interpret wrongly a measure of that kind." Schutz

* Marphersin, Hanover Papers.—Lord Townshend says in conclusion, "From this we cannot think but that you must be satisfied that the inclinations of the people here are so strongly in favour of the house of Hanover, that the prince may come, not only with great security as to his person, but also that he will be received with all the respect and honour that is due to him. But if, after you have raised these expectations through the whole kingdom to the highest degree by the step you have made, you should be prevailed upon to abandon the thoughts of sending the prince, or be persuaded even to delay it, such a proceeding will be so fatal, that no man can be answerable for the consequences of it. I cannot conclude this without doing justice to Mons. le Baron de Schutz, who has upon this and all other occasions behaved himself with so much zeal and prudence, that he has deservedly got the entire esteem and consideration of all, both Whigs and Tories, who are well affected to the house of Hanover."

pleaded the custom of the country in peers' writs, and the orders he had received from the electress; but Oxford advised him not to appear any more at court. The Hanoverian envoy not being disposed to take this advice, Sir Charles Cotterell, master of the ceremonies, waited upon him, and read him a letter from Bromley, one of the secretaries of state, in which it was intimated that the queen commanded Bromley to tell Schutz, in plain terms, not to appear again at her court, as her majesty looked upon it as an affront done to her to have asked the chancellor for the writ to the Duke of Cambridge, a prince of her blood, and that for that reason she had ordered Mr. Harley to solicit the elector and electress to recall their envoy immediately. Lord Strafford, who was at the Hague, wrote to the Electress Sophia to advise her and her son the elector to disapprove of Baron Schutz's conduct, and to vindicate the ministry from entertaining any designs in favour of the Pretender. Strafford assured the aged princess that the embassy of Lord Paget was meant "to explain matters, and set them in so true a light that no artifice of a faction or party, for private views and interests, might be able for the future to cause any inquietude between the queen and that illustrious family." His lordship said that he was sorry to find her ministers in England had lately acted as if he, at least, was governed by the party that was against the court, because the chief amongst them have no longer the chief employments in the government. He said that Schutz's behaviour was resented as irregular and disrespectful to the queen, adding, "for though, by strict law, a peer, though absent, may demand his writ of the lord chancellor, yet it is never done; but the lord chancellor keeps it by him till such time as the absent peer returns and demands it himself to sit in parliament. I know this better than any man, it having been my case under several lord chancellors, as I have been abroad ever since the first year her majesty came to the crown, and, having often had leave to take turns into England, the chancellors have always kept my writ till I came and demanded it to sit in parliament, which they immediately were obliged to send me; and so it would have been with the Duke of Cambridge whenever he should come into England to sit in parliament." His lordship then, at great length, followed out the royal lie, that it was only because the writ had been improperly demanded that she objected to it—that both her majesty and her cabinet entertained the most perfect affection for the Protestant succession,—and that the danger of the Pretender was all a foolish and malicious outcry. As to obliging the Duke of Lorraine to send the Pretender out of his dominions, it was a thing not to be thought of, for he had engaged with France not to do it; and the French king, when spoken to on the subject, represented that he had fulfilled the treaty, having removed the chevalier out of his dominions. On the other side, Schutz, being forbid the court, made haste back to Hanover to justify himself, and the Duke of Marlborough wrote to recommend that the electoral prince should set out for London before Lord Paget arrived at Hanover. "By this remedy," says Marlborough, "the succession will be secured without risk, without expense, and without war; and likewise it is very probable that France, seeing herself anticipated in that manner, will abandon her design of assisting the Pretender."^{} General Cadogan and other leading Whigs wrote pressing letters to the same effect. Lord Townshend announced that the Tories had changed their tone, and were so far from exclaiming against the coming of the electoral prince, that they were now applauding it, and advancing pretensions to have the principal share in his highness's good graces. "This," adds Townshend, "we will not envy them, providing they attach themselves to him, as they appear resolved to do; and it is not to be doubted but, as soon as he appears, the lord treasurer will seek his protection, and both parties pay their court to him. There is no question, therefore, of sending the prince to be the head of a party, but to have the glory of uniting the two parties, who will concur together in parliament to settle a revenue of thirty or forty thousand pounds sterling upon him; but, for this purpose, he must come before the end of the session." The Archbishop of York also sent professions of attachment, having previously been written to by the court of Hanover as a personage worth securing. "I hope," said the archbishop, "your royal highness will every day more and more have the satisfaction of seeing, not only I myself, but the whole body of our clergy, are faithful and zealous, as becomes us, in this respect; and that the same good spirit is still among us, which so laudably, and, through the blessing of God, successfully, opposed and got the better of the attempts of France and popery in King James's reign." A day or two after writing this letter, the Archbishop of York was sent for by Queen Anne, who was now greatly alarmed at the nation's apparent conviction that she and her ministers were betraying them to France and the Pretender. Kreyenberg, an Hanoverian secretary, who had remained in London after Schutz's departure, says, "The queen made the archbishop the greatest protestations, founded on conscience and sentiments of religion, that she was sincerely for the Protestant succession. This prelate cannot reconcile all this with what he himself and every one sees. She said nothing at all of the coming of the electoral prince, but only of the disobliging manner in which the writ was demanded." The secretary was convinced that the queen would agree to everything that could be asked of her, and perhaps sacrifice Bolingbroke, and turn others out of the ministry, if the prince would only give up his journey and not come into England at all. In the mean while, Harley, at Hanover, continued to show cause why the prince should not come, and to deluge that court with protestations of her majesty's attachment. Upon his asking what they wanted to be done for the greater security of the Protestant succession established in their family, the electress and her son, the elector, gave him a memorial, in which they represented the necessity of her majesty obliging the Pretender to remove to Italy without loss of time, as the Pretender's adherents were then publicly boasting, with the utmost assurance, that he was actually preparing to make a descent in the north of Great Britain, while the kingdom was unfurnished with troops. They also represented that it was necessary for the kingdom and for the Protestant religion, that a member of the electoral family should be settled in Great Britain; and that a pension and establishment should be fixed by act of parliament on the electress, as the nearest heir to the crown. "Their electoral highnesses," said the memorial, "did not choose to form any pretensions in this respect, while the nation was burdened with the expenses of the war; but these expenses being discontinued, they hope, that during this very session of parliament her majesty will be so good as to procure them a thing which is so just, and which is but a natural consequence of all that she has done already in their favour." And the last demand or request of the memorial was, that her majesty would be pleased to grant titles belonging to the princes of the blood of Great Britain, to such of the Protestant princes of the electoral family as were not yet invested with them. All these demands and proceedings vexed and alarmed Anne, and brought back her old sickness. This indisposition was a fresh cause for excitement to both courts. Her majesty, however, took great pains to make known the conversation she had had with the Archbishop of York and the assurances she had given that prelate. She, moreover—at least in outward appearance—withdrew her confidence from Bolingbroke, and put herself again in the hands of the cautious Oxford. "The lord treasurer," says the Hanoverian agent Galke, "is more than ever in credit with the queen, and appears disposed to attach himself to the Electoral Prince, as soon as he appears, in order to gain him her majesty's

* In this letter, dated Antwerp, May 5, Marlborough, who had been so recently engaged in the same intrigues himself, says, "It is so evident that the queen's ministers are determined to place the Pretender on the throne, that it would be losing one's time to produce proofs of it. . . . A more proper time for demanding the writ for the electoral prince could not have been chosen: for you see how many of the richest and most considerable among the Tories declare for you, and acknowledge that they were deceived by the ministry, who lose so much ground in both Houses, that you may depend upon it, they will take care not to call the second session in this parliament before they have executed their design in favour of the Pretender. . . . Luckily, this session is to continue for two months longer, so that the electoral prince will have time enough to arrive and take his seat in parliament; in which case the balance will incline entirely to your side, as it begins to do already, upon the mere rumour of his coming; so that you may judge what effect his presence would produce. Accordingly, our friends write to me that, in that case, the parliament will not rise before they have settled a pension of 40,000*l.* sterling, for a subsistence to the prince, who will have nothing to do but to make his court to the queen, and caress the ministers, without meddling in anything. . . . I may add further, that, the prince being but the third in the order of succession, and coming alone without troops, the queen cannot be justly offended." —Nucheron.

* This intelligence they said was confirmed by different advices from persons who had been lately at Bar-le-duc, in Lorraine, and who asserted that he would begin very soon to execute his enterprise, and that he depended upon a powerful foreign assistance.

good graces, and to overturn Bolingbroke. . . . Bolingbroke is enraged at this, and it is not doubted but he will take his measures upon it in a manner suitable to his humour.* Yet, on the other hand, Lord Broadalbane, a declared Jacobite, was sent down to Scotland; and letters from that country stated that the Jacobites were giving out that the Pretender would be there before the end of May; and that one Mackintosh, of Bolan or Borlum, had arrived lately from Bar-le-duc with a great number of commissions from the Chevalier. Cadogan wrote again to the Hanoverian court, stating in the strongest manner that, if Prince George's journey was put off, the succession would be inevitably lost. "You would see by the Gazettes," he adds, "that the stocks rose very high when the prince's journey was spoken of; an undoubted sign of the good disposition of this nation." After assuring the Hanoverians that all the Tories who were not downright Jacobites would declare against the present ministry as soon as ever the prince should arrive, Cadogan speaks of the two conflicting heads of the cabinet, and of the queen's favourite, who appears in all these transactions the most important of personages. Oxford and Bolingbroke, he said, were more exasperated than ever against one another: the lord treasurer had found means of reconciling himself with Lady Masham, and was boasting that he would very soon turn out both Lord Bolingbroke and the Lord Chancellor Harcourt: the treasurer's friends, moreover, were beginning, by private rumours, to charge Bolingbroke and Harcourt with the design of bringing in the Pretender. In consequence of these changes the court of Hanover made a show of being satisfied with Oxford's intentions, and set some of their ministers to renew a friendly correspondence with him. The Baron de Wassenaer Duvennerde, however, represented on the 7th of May, that, with regard to the electoral prince's journey, he was charged to tell my lord treasurer that it was considered essential by his court; and that, in making use of his writ of summons, the prince would only make use of what was his indisputable right, intending, however, if he went to England, to continue inviolably attached to the queen and to her ministers, and to his lordship (Oxford) in particular. The baron continues,— "I hope, my lord, that you will have no difficulty of conceiving the elector's views; and I pray God, with all my heart, that the measures taken to secure the Protestant succession to the crown of Great Britain may succeed, persuaded, as I am, that the preservation of our holy religion and the safety of Europe depend upon it. Your lordship is in a situation which enables you to procure so great a benefit, by uniting still more clearly the queen with the family of Hanover. In the name of God, my lord, employ your influence and your prudence to promote this salutary end. You will gain the blessing of heaven, and the applause of all honest men."

But a week after the date of this letter the electoral house received fresh warnings from an "unknown friend," who stated that the Jacobites in London were inventing lies of every kind to destroy all hopes of the prince's coming, producing letters from Hanover to show that Schutz had been disavowed and very ill received there, and that it was quite certain that the elector would not send his son to England. Mr. Bromley, one of the secretaries of state, in particular, had spoken in this manner; and the effect was, that the Pretender's faction were in transports of joy, and the friends of Hanover, both Whigs and Tories, in the utmost despair. The Duke of Argyll had been heard to exclaim that if the elector abandoned them in this manner, and refused to embrace an opportunity so favourable, so easy, and so conformable to English laws, sacrificing them and abandoning them to the rage of their enemies, after all they had done for him, the Whigs could have no other resource, but to go to the other extremity, and invite the Pretender to come over on tolerable terms, and without a French army. Insults were still openly offered to the acts of succession and to the right of the House of Hanover; and the queen had granted a pardon to Dr. Bedford, the author of a book on hereditary right, which attempted to disprove the claim of the electress to the British crown. All this was very significant; and the "unknown friend" conveyed another piece of information which was equally so. This was, that, while the queen seemed to be dying, or at least in extreme danger, ministers were remodelling the army. "They continue," he says, "to dismiss all the officers, civil and military, who presume to show any attachment to the Hanoverian succession; and yet they give out that they have the greatest zeal and attachment to your court. It would be very curious if they should succeed to persuade you of this." The Jacobites, he says, were now laughing everywhere at the Whigs and the other friends of Hanover, and asking, "Where, then, is your Duke of Cambridge? Where is your succession? Is it not more than a month since the writ was demanded?" "But," says the unknown friend, in conclusion, "a proper resolution on the part of his electoral highness would make them change their language soon." Lord Anglesea, Sir Thomas Hanmer, and other Hanoverian Tories, wrote letters equally urgent, and pledged themselves to preserve the right of the electoral house as fixed by parliament; and Galke informed the Hanoverian ministers that their friends expected that Prince George would set out on his journey immediately, thinking this "absolutely necessary, and that without it the Pretender would be soon at

* In the same dispatch Galke speaks of another powerful and determined Jacobite. "L'Hermitage told me to day (the 30th of April) that Lord Portmore employs all imaginable persuasions to invite the Duke of Anmond, who is more firm than ever in the interests of the Pretender, with more favourable sentiments towards the succession; but that he has not been able yet to make great progress, his grace being constantly beset by three women, who are Lady Oglesborne and two others, who will overturn to-morrow what he hath built to-day."

the English court, and be very well received there." Sir Richard Onslow, who had formerly been speaker of the House of Commons, wrote to Robethon, on the 11th of May: "We live here," said Onslow, "in the hope of seeing the electoral prince arrive, and of seeing him introduced to parliament, by virtue of the writ which was given; and this expectation is so strong, that a disappointment would discourage entirely his friends, and encourage his enemies; . . . the presence of the Duke of Cambridge among us, being the surest means to curb the great and continued efforts of those who act for the Pretender, and give themselves out to be a very powerful party, with a view of gaining over many to their faction at home, and of encouraging France to send them the Pretender with French troops; for upon that assistance their greatest expectations are founded." As Anne grew worse, Cadogan wrote again to declare "the inexpressible impatience shown by every one here for news of the electoral prince's departure;" and his confirmed conviction, "that everything was irreparably lost if the resolution of sending him over were changed or delayed." "As to the queen," he says, "she continues much indisposed: the St. Anthony's fire (erysipelas), which broke out in her leg and thigh, has considerably diminished the violence of her fever; but it is believed, on the other hand, that a mortification may follow. She sleeps little, and eats nothing, and she is in such a dreadful anxiety, that her mind suffers no less than her body." This close and acute observer also intimated that the discussions in the cabinet were increasing—that the quarrels between the lord treasurer and Bolingbroke were greater than ever. "It is true," he adds, "their common friends reconcile them for a day or two, but they quarrel more violently afterwards. The partisans of both the one and the other give out, that their leader possesses all the favour and confidence of the queen; but it is impossible to write anything positively on this subject, this scene at court having lately changed as frequently as the wind. The fact is, these two ministers exert themselves very openly to ruin one another, and, as this division among the leaders reigns also among their followers, it is very certain that, if the electoral prince comes over, both of them will be very soon overturned; to which I may add, that, at bottom, the treasurer would not be sorry that the electoral prince were here, although he is obliged to declare and to publish the contrary, for fear of losing entirely the queen, who cannot hear the prince's journey spoke of without putting herself in a passion, and the more so, that she perceives the nation desires it with ardour." Cadogan further says, the "real sentiments" of the treasurer had been made known to him by General Erle, who had them from Lord Oxford's own brother; that Oxford had likewise opened secret negotiations with the Whigs, and that that party had answered, that, if he would consent to the coming of the prince, and exert himself seriously to secure the Hanoverian succession, they would not only forget the past, but would also endeavour to support and maintain him in his authority and high office. It is clear that no such man as Oxford should ever have been trusted—that the Whigs, to gain him, were bargaining for far too much; but Cadogan takes this as a shining proof of the disinterestedness of his party.

While thus pressed on the one side by the Whigs, the House of Hanover was cajoled on the other by Mr. Harley, and by letters from England, assuring them of the steadiness and affection of the queen. In these circumstances it was natural that that little court, always slow and circumspect, should hesitate and procrastinate. To remove these delays, the Duke of Marlborough, who at this moment seems to have been sincerely earnest for their succession, sent an agent of his own to Hanover, in the person of Mr. Molyneux, recommended to that court by his grace as "being a man of quality, who had very large possessions in Ireland, but principally as a man of parts and of merit, with whose good principles he was well acquainted." Molyneux was exceedingly well received by all the members of the Electoral House, and helped to defeat the mission of Mr. Harley, and to prove that his brother, the lord treasurer, was not to be depended upon in the slightest degree. Molyneux, who maintained a constant correspondence with the duke, and occasionally wrote to the Duchess of Marlborough, was useful in other respects, and more particularly in exalting the merits of the illustrious general, and proclaiming his entire devotion to the old electress and her family. But he soon saw some reasons to despond and to doubt whether that succession would ever be secured. His great hope, and the general hope of the party with which he acted, lay in the disagreement of Oxford and Bolingbroke; and he was thrown into a consternation by accounts of a sudden reconciliation between "the sorcerer and his familiar"—as he styles the lord treasurer and the chief secretary. His alarm was increased by seeing that the article in the elector's answer to the English court, stating that he thought it would be for the good of both parties that some one of his house should go to England, was carried with great difficulty in the Hanoverian council; and that this was the only step taken to support the demand of the prince's writ, while there was every ground for believing that it would remain the only step, and that nothing more would be done by these little potentates to make sure of three great kingdoms. On the 29th of May (N. S.) Molyneux writes to Marlborough—"I am more amazed at the difficulties the succession meets here, than at those it meets in London. I do believe the prince will not go over, and for this session it is almost despaired of by his best friends, and God knows what may happen before the next.* . . . There are here such humours, such jealousies, and such villainies, as will one day undo us, if it be not done already."

On the very day next to the date of this letter, or on the 30th of May (n.s.), Anne, finding, or fearing that the electoral house was no longer to be cajoled by professions and promises, resorted to threats, and wrote, or rather signed, a most bitter and reproachful letter to the elector. This royal epistle, which was carefully suppressed at the time, while others, addressed by her majesty to the same personage, were as carefully published and distributed to prove her affection to the Guelphs, ran in these words:—"As the rumour increases, that my cousin, the electoral prince, has resolved to come over to settle, in my lifetime, in my dominions, I do not choose to delay a moment to write to you about this, and to communicate to you my sentiments upon a subject of this importance. I then freely own to you, that I cannot imagine that a prince who possesses the knowledge and penetration of your electoral highness can ever contribute to such an attempt; and that I believe you are too just to allow that any infringement shall be made on my sovereignty which you would not choose should be made on your own. I am firmly persuaded that you would not suffer the smallest diminution of your authority: I am no less delicate in that respect; and I am determined to oppose a project so contrary to my royal authority, however fatal the consequences may be. Your electoral highness is too just to refuse to bear me witness, that I give, on all occasions, proofs of my desire that your family should succeed to my crowns; which I always recommend to my people, as the most solid support of their religion and their laws. I employ all my attention, that nothing should efface those impressions from the hearts of my subjects; but it is not possible to derogate from the dignity and prerogatives of the prince who wears the crown, without making a dangerous breach on the rights of the successors; therefore, I doubt not but, with your usual wisdom, you will prevent the taking such a step; and that you will give me an opportunity of renewing to you assurances of the most sincere friendship, with which I am, &c."²⁸

This letter is said to have had among other effects the very serious one of killing the old Electress Sophia. It was delivered at Hanover on Wednesday the 6th of June (n. s.), together with a letter from Oxford, and by order of the electress a copy of both was immediately sent to the Duke of Marlborough by Mr. Molyneux, who in enclosing the paper said—"I have not time, or I had translated the queen's for you; but my lord will explain them to you, and let you know that there is no hand villainous enough to write them, but that one from whence they come. This court is so openly honest in their proceedings, that they would be glad to disperse these letters among their friends in England; whereas their correspondence is so false and hidden, as that the express declared,* till the moment the letters were read, that they were to invite the prince over, and I would lay my life the ministers declared the same in London." Only two days after writing this letter, Molyneux sat down to a longer and sadder one, to announce to Marlborough the sudden death of the electress. The old lady was 84 years old, and had been accustomed to say, that, if she could only live to have "Sophia, Queen of England," written on her tombstone, she should die content. Marlborough's correspondent states, that on the evening of the 28th of May (o. s.) he went to Herhenhausen, the country-house of the court, and that there the first thing he heard was, that the old electress was just dying in one of the public walks. What follows is written with much feeling—"I ran up there, and found her just expiring in the arms of the poor electoral princess, and amidst the tears of a great many of her servants, who endeavoured in vain to help her. I can give you no account of her illness, but that I believe the chagrin of those villainous letters I sent you last post has been in a great measure the cause of it. The Rheingravin, who has been with her these fifteen years, has told me she never knew anything make so deep an impression on her as the affair of the prince's journey, which, I am sure, she had to the last degree at heart; and she has done me the honour to tell me so twenty times. In the midst of this concern those letters arrived, and those I verily believe have broke her heart, and brought her with sorrow to the grave. The letters were delivered on Wednesday at noon. That evening when I came to court, she was at cards, but was so full of these letters, that she got up and ordered me to follow her into the garden, where she gave them to me to read, and walked and spoke a great deal in relation to them. I believe she walked three hours that night. The next morning, which was Thursday, I heard she was out of order; and on going immediately to court, she ordered me to be called into her bedchamber. She gave me the letters I sent you to copy; she bid me send them next post, and bring them afterwards to her to court. That was on Friday. In the morning, on Friday, they told me she was very well, but seemed very chagrined. She was dressed, and dined with the elector as usual. About four she did me the honour to send me to town, for some other copies of the same letters, and then she was still perfectly well. She worked and talked very heartily in the

was the duplicity or the shifting and changing of him who had sent him to Hanover (with Marlborough intrigue had become an incurable habit), he seems, like many other honest and enlightened men of the day—we believe the vast majority of that class—to have been thoroughly convinced that the succession of the House of Hanover was a thing to be despaired of, and that the re-elevation of the Stuarts would be fatal to the liberty and property of Englishmen. In this same letter to the duke he says, "For my part, I prepare myself for poverty and banishment, and I no more employ my thoughts on the happiness of England, but where to find the most easy retreat. This is a melancholy prospect."

orangery. After that, about six, she went out to walk in the gardens, and was still very well. A shower of rain came, and, as she was walking pretty fast to get to shelter, they told her she walked a little too fast. She answered, I believe I do; and dropped down in saying these words, which were her last. They raised her up, chafed her with spirits, tried to bleed her; but it was all in vain, and when I came up to her, she was as dead as if she had been four days so.* The journey of the electoral prince was now entirely given up. It appears that while he and his grandmother had been most eager for the expedition, his father, the elector, had been strongly opposed to it. By some the objections of the elector are attributed to caution and forethought, by others to mere constitutional irresolution; but there are others again who attribute them wholly and solely to his jealousy of his son, and to his fear that, if the young man got well established in England, he might, at the queen's death, keep the throne to himself, and get a parliamentary sanction for setting aside his senior and his parent. It is proved incontestably, that this jealousy of the next heir was a violent and unchanging passion in the breast of at least the two first Georges; and it is about equally certain that at this time the House of Hanover was divided against itself, and its court the scene of domestic quarrels and conflicting political intrigues. This was equally the case with the court of Berlin, the near ally of Hanover; and it may be said that in both, but particularly in the latter, there was as much looseness of manners as had ever prevailed at Versailles, with this difference, that there was no French polish spread over it.

On the side of the Pretender there had been no want of new intrigues and schemes. Every day, indeed, seems to have produced one. At the beginning of the year, the busy little Abbé Gaultier and the Duke of Berwick met again in France.† Berwick, disgusted, as he says, with the slowness, irresolution, and coldness of the lord treasurer, at last determined to bring him to the point, so as to leave him no opportunity of further shuffling; and, by means of the abbé, he recommended to Oxford the following project:—That the chevalier should go privately, and by himself, into England, and get access to the queen, his sister, who should then go down to the parliament, and there explain that her brother's right to her crown was incontestable; that she had taken a resolution to restore to him what belonged to him by all laws divine and human; that she nevertheless had taken proper measures with him to prevent any danger to the church of England; it having been settled between them, that she should enjoy the crown during life, and educate him in England as her son. After this the queen was to promise to pass all such acts as might be deemed necessary for the security of the religion and liberty of the kingdom; and then she was herself to introduce her brother in full parliament, and to say—"My lords and gentlemen, here he is, ready to promise you himself religiously to keep all I have engaged for him, and to swear to the observance of it: I therefore require of you instantly to repeal all the acts passed against him, and acknowledge him immediately as my heir, and your future sovereign, that he may owe you some good will for your concurring with me in that which your conscience, your duty, and your honour should already have prompted you to do." The Duke of Berwick was an excellent soldier, and a clever man in other respects; but his foreign education, habits, and associations had left him deplorably ignorant of the real condition of England, of the temper of the English people, and of the means of proceeding with them. He had, however, a strong paternal affection for this bold, but forward and unpromising, offspring of his brain, as projectors usually have. "An unexpected step of this sort," he says, "would have so astonished the factious, and delighted the well-affected, that there would not, certainly, have been the least opposition. There is no reason to doubt, but that everything would immediately have been executed agreeably to the queen's command; for no person would have doubted but that the queen had taken her measures to insure obedience; so that, on one hand, the fear of punishment, and, on the other, the hope of taking advantage of a new change would have determined the parliament immediately to restore all things to their natural order, according to the fundamental laws of the kingdom." Though not so confident of success as Berwick was, several recent writers seem to be of opinion, that if the Pretender had had the courage to throw himself into London, and into the House of Lords, there would have been an end to all the hopes of the House of Hanover. But it appears to us that this opinion is ill grounded, and that such a step, if it had been practicable, would only have made the cause of the Stuarts still more hopeless. It would at once have convinced the parliament of the truth of all the rumours afloat about the ministers' treasonable correspondence with the chevalier and with France. The Hanoverian Tories would have coalesced entirely with the Whigs, and have turned the majority even of the House of Commons against the cabinet; nor does it seem at all unlikely that at this sudden surprise, and in the excitement of the nation, they would have sent the Pretender and the ministers to the Tower. View-

* "No princess," Molyneux adds, "ever died more regretted, and I infinitely pity those servants that have known her a long time, when I, that have had the honour to be known to her but a month, can scarce refrain from tears in relating this."

† The character the duke draws of the abbé is not very flattering—"I shall only say a word of the Abbé Gaultier, whose fortune has been very singular. He was of the meanest extraction, and very poor; being sexton of the parish of St. Germain, he was ambitious of becoming one of the clerks of the chateau, which may be worth about 300 or 400 livres a-year. L'Abbé du Vivier, master of the chapel, being displeas'd that he should solicit for this little employment through any channel but his own, did not speak favourably of him to the king, and, as other persons who were trying for the place exclaimed against him, Gaultier took the resolution of seeking his fortune elsewhere."

ing it under its most promising aspects, the project was fraught with danger, and this alone was enough to deter the timid queen, without whose consent, and active and public co-operation, nothing could be done. We fancy that Anne would just as soon have thought of walking up to the mouth of a loaded cannon, or of storming a breach, as of going down to the parliament with such a message and such a companion. But there were other reasons, besides her fears, to induce her to turn with horror from the proposal. Though she was so little capable of using it—though she shared it with a base-minded chamberwoman—Anne clung to her prerogative as a shipwrecked mariner does to his last plank; and her brother would have been as odious in her eyes as the Guelph, if he had been established in England with a court of his own, with a separate revenue, and with a party ready to rally round him and intrigue against himself. From the whole course of her conduct, it may be presumed that she fancied at times the chevalier ought to be, and would be restored, after her death; but as long as she lived she must have been anxious to keep him out of England. But even here again her thoroughly conscientious scruples about his religion, and her apprehensions as to her beloved church, were known to keep her often wavering. Continuing his relation on this important point, Berwick says, that the Lord Treasurer Oxford was thoroughly informed of the plan by the Abbé Gaultier, who went from his (the duke's) house in Picardy into England; "but," he adds, "although the abbé wrote regularly to me, I could never get any answer from him upon this head." As no other plan was suggested by Oxford, as time was slipping away, and as the queen's health was daily on the decline, Berwick began to suspect more than ever that the lord treasurer was deceiving him. His suspicions were the stronger when he was informed that Oxford was writing friendly letters to the Elector of Hanover, and had sent his cousin, Mr. Harley, to that court. He then conferred with de Torcy, the French minister of foreign affairs, who must have been deeply engaged in the intrigue, as Berwick's correspondence with the Abbé Gaultier and the lord treasurer was carried on through him, and as he was himself corresponding with the Pretender on one side and with the English minister on the other. According to Berwick, de Torcy now agreed with him, "that the lord treasurer's conduct was very extraordinary;" and that a joint letter should be written to that lord to represent that, as Queen Anne's death might happen very shortly, it was necessary that he should inform them what measures he had taken to secure the interests of the Pretender, as also to suggest what steps that prince ought to take. Oxford, in reply, told them, "that if the queen were to die, the affairs of the prince, and the affairs of the cabinet, were ruined without resource." Berwick took this, the only answer they could ever obtain, as a clear proof that Oxford was imposing upon them. "For," says he, "if he had really entertained the intentions he had declared to us, he would not have been so long without thinking of the means of carrying them into execution; nor would he have neglected, for his own sake, and that of his party, to secure himself against the rage of the Whigs, who, he well knew, would never forgive him, if once they got the power in their hands. This lethargy could not proceed from his want of understanding or courage, for no man had more; it was therefore morally certain, that his sole motive, in the advances he had hitherto made to us, had been his own interest in joining the Jacobites with the Tories, and by that means securing the majority in parliament to approve of the peace of Utrecht. As soon as he had compassed this end, he thought of nothing but to be upon good terms with the House of Hanover; and as to the king—he amused him, from time to time, with some new proposal about changing his religion. The court of France, as well as we, were therefore persuaded that Oxford was playing double with us; but, as the French had concluded their principal business by his means, they were easily comforted."* From this moment the chief effort of the Jacobites was to obtain the dismissal of Oxford, and the promotion of Bolingbroke—an effort in which they were materially aided by the she-favourite Lady Masham, whose Jacobitism was made to throw out fresh and vigorous shoots by some cold water which the lord treasurer cast upon her greediness for money. Oxford felt himself tottering, and saw no prop at hand in any party. Berwick also wrote to the Duke of Ormond, and many other persons, urging them to awake from their lethargy, and take their precautions before the queen should die, and leave them and their schemes open to their enemies the Whigs. He represented that their private interest was inseparably linked with the interest of the Pretender; that the time for hesitation was past; and that they must now choose the alternative of ruin or a restoration. The Pretender at this moment was moving from place to place; and every movement seems to have been reported by secret agents both to the court of Hanover, and to the Whig leaders in England, who were equally suspicious and anxious as to its meaning. In the month of May, the Chevalier de St. George was reported to be at Plombiere, taking the mineral waters of that place. On the 1st of June (n.s.) it was announced, from Luneville, that a report was spread there that the Electoral Prince of Hanover had embarked for England, and that, in consequence of this report, the Chevalier had suddenly left Plombiere, and was hastening back to Bar-le-Duc. Four days after, another letter from Luneville conveyed still more alarming intelligence. "It is likely," says the anonymous agent, "that the Chevalier is preparing for some great design, which is kept very private. . . . He sets out to-morrow very early for Bar; Lord Galmoy went before him, and set out this morning. Lord Talmo, who came lately from the French court, is with him, and some say that the Duke of Berwick is incognito in this neighbourhood. The Chevalier appears pensive: that, indeed, is his ordinary humour. Mr. Floyd, who has been these five days at the court of his royal highness, told a mistress he has here, that, when he leaves her now, he will take his leave of her perhaps for the last time. In short, it is certain that everything here seems to announce preparations for a journey: it is said likewise in private, that the Chevalier has had letters that the queen's very ill. I have done everything I could to discover something of his designs. I supped last night with several of his attendants, thinking to learn something; but they avoid to explain themselves.*

Up to the end of May, or beginning of June, the Whigs in England remained uncertain whether the electoral prince would come or not. Sir Thomas Hammer, and others of the party called Hanoverian Tories, intimated that, as the affair had spun out to such a length, it might be better to wait for the next session of parliament, and to see, in the mean time, what might be done to secure that succession: but Halifax, Sunderland, Townshend, and the rest of the great Whig leaders, continued in their old opinion that there was no time to lose, and that the electoral prince ought either to come at once, or to declare the reasons of his not coming, in order that his friends might consider of something else, and concert the conduct best to follow to keep up the spirits of their party. These representations were made in a letter dated the 5th of June (s.s.); and thus urged, the elector, on the 11th of June, or twelve days after receiving the queen's threatening letter, sat down to reply to it. But he merely excused himself for his delay, and announced to her majesty the great loss and affliction he had sustained by the sudden death of his mother; and it was not till the 15th of June (s.s.) that he spoke of business. In a letter of that day he neither pressed the queen to consent to his son's journey into England, nor formally renounced that project; he merely said, that he had flattered himself he had given her majesty convincing proofs of his respect and gratitude; that he had always relied upon the justice and wisdom of her government, without taking the smallest concern in factions; and that he always wished her authority, and the royal prerogative, to be maintained in all their lustre; as no one, after her majesty, had more interest therein than he and his family. He added, however,—“It is so essential to me to cultivate the honour of your good graces, that it is natural to imagine the presence of one of the princes of my family in your kingdoms could never have any other design than to confirm a good understanding between the two courts, and to render to your majesty all possible service.” And on the same day, his son, the electoral prince, the guest rejected by Anne, wrote a letter to her majesty to express his great grief at the endeavours which had been used to excite her majesty's suspicions against him, and to represent him as capable of exciting troubles and encouraging factions. “As these,” said the prince, “are designs of which I would never forgive myself even the very idea, I should ardently wish to be within reach, to be able to undecieve your majesty, and to be more nearly known to you.” As it became evident, however, that the prince would not come over without that hopeless condition,—the consent of the queen,—the Whigs insisted that new instruments of regency should be forwarded without loss of time, and that new credentials for the Hanoverian resident at London should be sent with them; as these things would be of the utmost importance in case of the queen's death. On the other side, Oxford was renewing his compliments to the Hanoverian diplomatists at London, at the Hague, and at Hanover, and was re-pledging himself to an entire friendship and a devotion to the cause of that House. “This,” says Bothmar, who was at the Hague, “is a proof that Oxford finds himself falling. I shall make the most obliging answers to him, and will endeavour to make use of him, without giving my confidence to a man so double: perhaps we may draw some advantage from him, even though the other (Bolingbroke) should turn him out.” Lord Paget, who had been appointed to proceed on the special embassy to Hanover, had been stopped when ready; and now the silly and incompetent Earl of Clarendon, with a “Jacobitish secretary,” was sent in his stead. Bothmar describes this grandson of the renowned chancellor as “a selfish and presumptuous fool,”—“a fool to such a degree, that, being appointed governor, by the queen, of the colony of Pennsylvania, he thought that it was necessary for him, in order to represent her majesty, to dress himself as a woman, which he actually did.” This Hanoverian minister further adds, that the appointment of this “fool Clarendon” had been brought about by Bolingbroke, without the knowledge of Lord Oxford. But Anne herself, in a very brief note to the elector, says, that her experience of the Earl of Clarendon's capacity had determined her to send him to that court to declare the sentiments of her heart concerning everything which regarded the interests of the electoral family, and to maintain the friendship which she hoped would always subsist between herself and them. Clarendon's instructions were written out by Secretary Bromley, and the great gist of the whole was, that he should make the queen's mind easy, and prevent by all means the coming at any time of the prince. His lordship was instructed to satisfy the elector that the queen had no intention but to secure his succession; and that she was ready to do everything, consistent with the safe and quiet possession of the throne during her own time, that might contribute to that end: he was to make the elector speak freely on this subject, and to declare what foundation he had for his suspicions, assuring him that her majesty would not continue in her service any person against whom he could show reasonable grounds of suspicion. His lordship was to repeat and enforce the declaration that nothing would be so injurious to the Protestant succession as the coming of the prince. "But," added the instructions, "if you find the resolution has been taken, that the prince shall not come, your lordship will let the elector know that this deference and respect for her majesty will lay such an obligation upon her as will entitle him to all the good effects he can expect from it." The resolution which the elector had come to, or which he probably had all along entertained, was confirmed; but, not to trust too much to her majesty, or her ministers, he ordered Bothmar to repair from the Hague to London, and attend to the suggestion touching the instruments of regency.*

The session of parliament, in which the Whigs had hoped to welcome Prince George into England, still lasted; and that now disappointed party continued to exercise the greatest vigilance. They were still alarmed by letters from France, importing that the Pretender was, with the utmost diligence, making preparations for some secret expedition; that he would soon be again in Scotland, or would go to Ireland; and some went so far as to say that he had actually reviewed his troops, and that vessels were already privately prepared in different French ports. What was calculated to add materially to these alarms was the apprehension of several Jacobite agents that were impudently enlisting recruits for the Pretender's service in London and in different parts of the country. Lord Wharton waited upon the lord chief justice Parker with positive information that two Irish officers in particular, named Hugh and William Kelly, were enlisting men in the city and in Westminster, almost under the eye of parliament. Parker issued warrants, and the two Irish officers were arrested, the one at Gravesend, the other at Deal, having about them passes from the Pretender's minister, the Earl of Middleton. They had not been very fortunate as recruiters, or the recruits were fortunate enough to escape detection, for not more than half a dozen were seized. The daring attempt, however, called for some severity; and after some short debate in the Houses, where all the Hanoverian Tories joined the Whigs, ministers, on the 23rd of June, issued a proclamation for apprehending the Pretender whenever he should attempt to land, and promising a reward of 5000*l.* to any person or persons that should do that service, and bring him to justice. Both Lords and Commons expressed their approbation; but the latter were desirous that the promised reward should be raised to 100,000*l.*, and they passed a resolution to that effect. A bill was also rapidly passed making it high treason to enlist, or be enlisted, in the Pretender's service. Bolingbroke afterwards told the Abbé Gaultier that the proclamation had been proposed in council by the lord treasurer, and that he (Bolingbroke) had not thought it prudent or safe to oppose him. But the arch-plotter assured Iberville, a French agent, that "in fact this would make no difference." There is, however, something like consolation in seeing that this man's peace of mind was completely destroyed, and that the bed of intrigue he had made for himself was a bed of thorns. In a letter to Swift, Bolingbroke says, "If my grooms did not live a happier life than I have done this great while, I am sure they would quit my service."

This session of parliament was made infamous by the passing of an act as intolerant and as tyrannical as anything that was ever done or attempted in the worst days of the House of Stuart. With party feelings all on the other side, but with perfect justice, and with a moderation of censure, Lord John Russell says:—"This bill may serve to show the principles, the views, and the intentions of the Tory party, and thereby give a notion of what might have been expected from them had they succeeded in keeping the government of the state in their own hands during the succeeding reign."* The Hanoverian Tories were at least as averse to the dissenters as to the Pretender; the surest way to conciliate them was to give a bonus to the high party in the church; and the high-churchism of the queen naturally grew higher with sickness and danger, and thoughts of another world. Bolingbroke, who could scoff and sneer at Christianity in all its branches and modifications, again put himself forward as a champion for the high-church party, trusting that whatever blows he dealt, and whatever wounds he inflicted, would tell against his rival Oxford, who, in his difficulties, was again attempting to effect a reconciliation with the low-churchmen; and who, moreover, at all times, was reluctant to adopt any decided measure. Bolingbroke, closeted with Atterbury, devised the infamous Schism Act: Bolingbroke drew it up in council, giving it the character of a government measure; and Bolingbroke, through the mouth of his friend Sir William Wyndham, brought it into parliament on the 12th day of May. The object of the bill was to prevent education by dissenters in any way; to vest the right of educating, as a monopoly, in the church of England, and to prevent dissenters from keeping schools even for their own children. In other words, it enacted that no person in Great Britain should keep any public or private school, or act as a tutor, unless he had previously subscribed the declaration to conform to the Church of England, and obtained a licence from the bishop of the diocese, which licence was not to be granted until the party produced a certificate of his having received the sacrament, according to the communion of the church of England, within the last year, and also subscribed the oaths of allegiance and supremacy: and any person acting in contravention of

* In a letter written to Hanover by Secretary Galke, about this time, is this curious passage:—"I am assured, from very good authority, that Bolingbroke, having heard that Oxford said of him that he could prove he was a Jacobite, told one of his friends that he had proofs in his hands to convict the other of being in the interests of the Pretender."—Macpherson.

these arbitrary enactments was to be committed to prison without bail. The Whigs stood up to a man, and opposed the bill with all their might. Mr. Hampden, Mr. Robert Walpole, Sir Joseph Jekyll, and General Stanhope, particularly distinguished themselves in the debate. Stanhope, who had lived much in popish countries, and who recognised everywhere the necessity of a wider toleration than then existed anywhere,—“showed, in particular, the ill consequences of this law, as it would of course occasion foreign education, which, on the one hand, would drain the kingdom of great sums of money, and, which was still worse, would fill the tender minds of young men with prejudices against their own country. He illustrated and strengthened his argument by the example of the English popish seminaries abroad, which, he said, were so pernicious to Great Britain, that, instead of making new laws to encourage foreign education, he could wish those already in force against papists were mitigated, and that they should be allowed a certain number of schools.” In the murky bigotry of the day this latter proposition must have been considered as blasphemy, not merely by the Tories, but even by a majority of the Whigs, whose doctrine of liberty of conscience did not as yet extend to papists. Bolingbroke had made no mistake in his calculations as to the strength of the high-churchmen: the third reading of the Schism Bill was carried in the Commons by the great majority of 237 to 126. In the Lords, Bolingbroke fostered his ill-favoured project, by moving the second reading. Lord Wharton, in opposing him, said,—“It is somewhat strange that they should call schism in England what is the established religion in Scotland; and, therefore, if the lords who represent the nobility of that part of Great Britain are for the bill, I hope that, in order to be even with us, and consistent with themselves, they will move for the bringing in another bill to prevent the growth of schism in their own country.” After this sharp side-blow at the Scottish lords, who, it appears, were ready to do the bidding of the court, Wharton turned to the bench of bishops, and said,—“Precedents and authorities have been cited in favour of the present measure, but there is against it an authority of the highest weight which has not yet been mentioned. I acknowledge that it would have come with most force and propriety from that venerable bench; but, since their lordships have been wholly silent in this debate, I will myself tell them that it is the rule of the Gospel to do unto others as we would be done unto.” Lord Halifax drew a striking contrast between the humane and enlightened toleration of some former periods and the return to intolerance and persecution now intended: he showed how Queen Elizabeth, by protecting the Protestant Walloons who were flying from the Spanish inquisition, had benefited the nation by settling an ingenious and industrious people, and establishing, by their means, our superiority in the woollen manufacture; and how the protection which the late King William had afforded the French Huguenots had done honour to our character, and produced other benefits to our trade. Halifax also entreated the House to be warned by the terrible example of Charles I., who, by indulging Laud and persecuting the dissenters, had brought ruin upon himself and the nation. Lord Townshend illustrated the blessings of toleration by his travels abroad: he said, that he had lived a long time in Holland, and had observed that the wealth and strength of that great and powerful commonwealth lay in the number of its inhabitants; that he was convinced that, if the States-General should cause the schools of any one sect to be shut up, the United Provinces would soon be as thin of people as Sweden or Spain. Lord Cowper remarked that, in many country towns, reading, writing, and grammar schools were chiefly supported by the dissenters, so that, to put down those schools would be like suppressing the reading of the Holy Scriptures. That member of the church militant, Compton, was quiet at last, under the aisles of his cathedral; but Robinson, his successor, who had been translated from Bristol, was as intolerant as he. Forgetting that he thereby implied a lack of industry or ability on the part of his brethren, Robinson urged that the church was in danger, and ought to be fenced and guarded;—that the church was in danger from the growth of schismatics, and that the dissenters, by drawing the children of churchmen to their schools and academies, had made this bill necessary. Lord Nottingham, who had gone over to the Whigs, and who entirely overlooked his old affection for the high church faction in his hatred to Swift, who had lampooned him, and who to all appearance was very likely to be soon a bishop, said vehemently—“My lords, I have many children, and I know not whether God Almighty will vouchsafe to let me live to give them the education I could wish they had. Therefore, my lords, I own I tremble when I think that a certain divine, who is suspected of being hardly a Christian, is in a fair way of being a bishop, and may one day give licences to those who shall be entrusted with the education of youth.” All eyes were fixed upon the lord treasurer, who was known to have proposed in the cabinet that the bill should be softened: the Tories seem to have fancied that he would have declared against them in the House, the Whigs that he would speak and vote with them, even though it must cost him his office. That shuffling minister tried to please both, or, at least, to give to either as little offence as possible. He declared that he had not yet considered the whole bill,—that his mind was not made up; but he persuaded the opposition to allow the second reading without a division; and on the day when the bill was finally put to the vote he absented himself from the House. This conduct had its usual result; it incensed both parties, and was as favourable to the views of Bolingbroke as anything could be—more favourable, perhaps, than if Oxford had acted the bold and open part of declaring against the bill.

The Whigs, who could not negative the bill, attempted to soften its severities; but a clause they proposed, to allow the dissenters to have schools for children of their own persuasion, though for none others, was rejected upon a division. Other modifying clauses, however, were carried, the high-churchmen consenting that the dissenters should be allowed dames or schoolmistresses of their own persuasions, to teach their children to read; and that the conviction of offending schoolmasters and tutors should take place in the ordinary courts of justice, and not by summary process before a magistrate, as originally proposed. They also allowed a right of appeal to a higher court, and impudently added a clause to exempt from the act any tutor employed in the family of a nobleman! The Hanoverian Tories were, after all, unfit and unsympathising allies of the Whigs, whom they could only meet upon one ground, or the common preference of the Guelfs to the Stuarts: their conduct on this occasion proved that, in getting rid of their superstitions about hereditary and divine right, they had not freed themselves from the old concomitants of those superstitions. Not satisfied with the operation of the act in Protestant England, they proposed that it should be extended to Catholic Ireland, and they carried their clause by a majority of six, in spite of the representations of the Duke of Shrewsbury, the lord-lieutenant. The third reading of the bill was carried by 77 to 72—a weak majority, considering that the queen had so recently made twelve new peers to vote with ministers. Perhaps it would have been greater but for the schism between Oxford and Bolingbroke, and some compunctious visitings of the Presbyterian peers of Scotland. Thirty-three lords, of whom five were bishops, entered a strong protest against the whole bill. When the bill, as amended, was sent down to the Commons, General Stanhope proposed that the tutors in the families of members of the House might be put upon the same footing as those who taught in the families of noblemen; but Mr. Hungerford represented that any the least alteration would cause delays and might lead to the loss of the valuable bill; and, the whole ministerial pack joining the zealots in full cry, the bill was passed as it was, by 168 against 98. It was to come into operation upon the 31st of August; but on that very day Queen Anne died, and, under the opposite principles which rose to the ascendancy in the reign of her successor, it remained practically almost a dead letter, till it was a few years after formally repealed.

On the 9th of July Anne closed the session with a speech from the throne. "I hope," said she, "to meet you again early in the winter, and to find you in such a temper as is necessary for the real improvement of our commerce, and of all the other advantages of peace. My chief concern is, to preserve to you, and to your posterity, our holy religion, and the liberty of my subjects, and to secure the present and future tranquillity of my kingdoms: but I must tell you plainly, that these desirable ends can never be obtained, unless you bring the same dispositions on your parts; unless all groundless jealousies, which create and foment divisions among you, be laid aside; and unless you show the same regard for my just prerogative, and for the honour of my government, as I have always expressed for the rights of my people." Upon the rising of parliament, Oxford looked around him for some plank to support him. Although he had given the Whigs abundant reason to despise him, he renewed an underhand intercourse with the chief of that party, and the Duke of Shrewsbury and other leaders seem to have considered that he was still worth securing, or that every possible means was to be adopted to defeat the schemes of the bold and able Bolingbroke. The Hanoverian secretary, who had been very uneasy, now says, "They flatter themselves especially that they will be in a condition to overturn Bolingbroke. . . . I believe now it is God's will undoubtedly that we should have the succession." Oxford also had some friendly conferences with Cowper, Halifax, and other great Whigs, and he wrote letters or sent messages to the Duke of Marlborough, who was now intently watching events in England, and beginning to think that it was time for him to return home. But it was soon evident to the elector's envoy, the keen-sighted Bothmar, that nothing could save Oxford. Several days before the rising of parliament he assured his court that Bolingbroke would maintain himself, and that the lord treasurer must fall very soon. "Some of those," adds Bothmar, "who would have assisted him to bring down his rival say now, according to the maxim which prevails much here, that he does not deserve to be assisted, as he does not choose to assist himself."* Swift, the friend of both, endeavoured to effect a reconciliation between the treasurer and the secretary; but there were other influences at work which rendered the thing impossible, and Swift, despairing of his bishopric, and, probably fearing danger to himself, left his two patrons to play their own game, and withdrew into the country. On the 13th of July Bothmar says—"It is thought that a reconciliation is making by the mediation of their friends; but that Bolingbroke has always most credit with the queen. They say that not only the favourite, but the Duchess of Somerset, is secretly for him, by the persuasions of her daughter, who is married to (his friend) Sir William Wyndham. The two ministers have been for a long time on bad terms from the opposition of their tempers and manners. But what gave occasion to complete their diffidence of one another, and their disunion, was a project which had been formed of dividing in sixteen shares the profits which the queen was to have from the trade to the South Sea, of which five were designed for the treasurer, five for Bolingbroke, four for Lady Masham, and two for Arthur Moore. The treasurer, having had his reasons for refusing the share destined for him, was suspected on that account, and at last became odious to the other sharers. He afterwards furnished their enemies with means of discovering this mystery.* Bothmar was not quite so confident as his secretary about the Hanoverian succession. In this same letter he says—"Lord Bolingbroke, they affirm, will be prosecuted vigorously in the next session; but, as he apprehends this himself, it is feared he will bring over the Pretender before that time, to save himself and to finish his grand scheme, from which he expects the completion of the fortune which his ambition promises him."† According to Bothmar, a reconciliation between the rivals was effected; but he saw through its hollowness and declared that it could not be durable. Lady Masham decided the point. Full of wrath against Oxford, for his having dared to oppose her will and disappoint her of money, she told this falling minister, and once loving cousin, to his face, that he had never done the queen any service, and was incapable of ever doing her any. Oxford retaliated: "I have been," said he, "abused by lies and misrepresentations; but I will leave some people as low as I found them." This passed in the queen's cabinet and in her majesty's presence, and the altercation between the titled waiting-woman and the lord treasurer is said to have lasted till two hours after midnight. The end of all this was, that Anne demanded his white staff, and Oxford was left low indeed.‡ The Jacobites, who had been for some time impatiently desiring his disgrace, seem to have taken credit to themselves for effecting it. The Duke of Berwick says, that it had been intimated to the queen, through Lady Masham, that his removal from office was indispensable. "Convinced," says Berwick, "by our continual representations, they (the Jacobites about court) exerted themselves; and, by means of Lady Masham, prevailed upon the queen to remove the lord high treasurer, as it was not possible to conduct the affair properly while he remained in office. She therefore dismissed Oxford on the 27th of July." Bolingbroke, of course, rose upon the fall of his rival. This man of intrigue, though he did not grasp the treasurer's staff, became, in fact, everything that he wished, and distributed offices among men who were bound to him, and who were all Jacobites. Nominally, he merely retained the seals of secretary with the sole management of foreign affairs; he put the treasury into commission, with William Wyndham at its head; the privy seal he allotted to Atterbury; Bromley, the other secretary of state, he allowed to remain; the third secretaryship, or that for Scotland, was put into the hands of that desperate half-mad Jacobite, the Earl of Mar; the Duke of Ormond was to be commander-in-chief; the Duke of Buckingham lord president; and Harcourt, as one upon whom he could entirely rely, was to remain lord chancellor. Many minor officers remained to be disposed of, and, in the words of one of the party, "the sterility of good and able men," to put in these places, was "incredible." The truth is, that, beyond a few personal friends, and a few determined Jacobites, there were none that Bolingbroke could or would trust. Before drawing up his scheme for the new cabinet, he made an attempt upon the principles of some of the old Whig placemen. On the day after Oxford's dismissal, he gave a dinner party at his house in Golden Square to General Stanhope, Robert Walpole, Pulteney, Craggs, General Cadogan, and other chiefs of the party; but his cajoling overtures came to nothing, as those Whigs demanded, as a sine quâ non, that, for the better security of the Protestant succession, the Pretender should be compelled to remove to Rome, or, at the least, to some place much farther from the English coasts than Lorraine; and Bolingbroke declared that the queen would never consent to this persecution of her brother. To have a correct estimate of Bolingbroke's sincerity and singleness of dealing, we need only mention that, on the very same day on which he gave this famed dinner, he had an interview with Gaultier, and assured him that he entertained the same sentiments as ever for the king, provided only his majesty took such measures as would suit the good people of England. At this moment the Duke of Marlborough, who had sent his friend General Cadogan into England before him, was staying at Ostend, watching the game that was playing, with the evident intention of striking in at the decisive round. His real intentions were matters of anxious surmise and speculation to all parties; and such was his personal importance, or the high opinion entertained of his selfish sagacity, that it appears to have been considered as certain that whichever party he embraced and adhered to must in the end be the prevalent one:‡ according to Bothmar the Hanoverian ambassador, Marlborough, forgetting his old ani-

* Bothmar gives the following reasons for Oxford's timid vacillating conduct:—"1. His own humour, which does not allow him to keep himself entirely to one side. 2. The hopes of maintaining himself still in the queen's good graces, by the same means by which he introduced himself into her favour. 3. The hopes of entering again into favour, by degrees, although he should now lose his employment, providing he does not declare openly against the court party. 4. That he is engaged so deeply in certain projects with Lord B. that he dares not attack him openly, for fear of being involved in his ruin; nor dares ally all these reasons contribute to influence his conduct."—Marsham.

* Mathereson. A few days before this, Bothmar thus describes the state of the queen:—"I find her paler than formerly, but in other respects she looks well, and seems to be in health, excepting that she cannot walk nor stand up."

† The lord treasurer was wanting to himself; and his habits of procrastinating and treating the most serious business as if it were a joke (a fatal and a disgusting quality in a minister of state) made even some of his best friends indifferent to his fall. "Lord Oxford," said Pope, "was not a very sensible minister, and had a good deal of negligence into the bargain. He used to send trifling verses from court to the Scriblerus Club almost every day; and would come and talk idly with them almost every night, even when his all was at stake."—Spence, Observations, Anecdotes, and Characters of Books and Men.

‡ George Lockhart, of Carnwath, the author of the Memoirs, one of the most active and distinguished of the Scottish Jacobites, who was very constant in his attendance about court, says, that there was a report that the Duke of Marlborough had refused the loan of 100,000*l.*, which the Pretender had demanded from him as a proof and a pledge of his fidelity. If this demand were really made, it must have tended very materially to strengthen the lord general's new fidelity to the Protestant succession, to whose interests he wou over or secured the affection of the British troops, at Dunkirk, and other places.

mosity against that man, had listened to overtures from Oxford before his fall. On the 16th of July, Bothmar says—"It is surprising that the Duke of Marlborough comes over at such a crisis, and does not rather wait until it is seen which of the two competitors (Oxford or Bolingbroke) will carry it with the queen; Lord Sunderland himself does not comprehend this. . . . The impetuosity of the duchess has probably precipitated this journey. . . . They are surprised that the duke should be in a hurry to come here at this juncture. If he adheres to his old friends, he will run a risk with the minister; and if he wants to please the latter, he will be abandoned by the former, without gaining much upon the court. It is thought that the lord treasurer has led him into this step by the means of Cadogan." On the 27th of July, Bothmar says—"The Duke of Marlborough is not arrived yet. It is probable he wants to remain beyond sea until he knows that there is a change in the ministry." Three days later the Hanoverian ambassador says, very significantly—"I am very curious to know if there is any foundation of a good understanding between the Duke of Marlborough and the Pretender. His electoral highness (Prince George, afterwards George II.) can himself give a great deal of light in this affair, as I am assured that the Lord Treasurer Oxford showed him, by his cousin, (the Mr. Harley who had been sent to Hanover) the originals of the letters between the duke and the Pretender." Bothmar adds, that this correspondence appeared to him incredible, and inconsistent with all that he had ever heard or seen of the duke: but we now know that the correspondence was real. In the same letter Bothmar speaks of the communication made by an unknown person to the Duke of Marlborough, touching the weak state of the Protestant succession, and the advantages which the duke might find in embracing the part of the Pretender without running any risk.* In a postscript to this letter, Bothmar says that the queen was so bad as not to be expected to live through that night. It seems certain that, notwithstanding an offer the money-loving duke had recently made to lend 20,000*l.*, to enable the Electoral Prince George to come over to England to look personally to the interests of his family, the whole court of Hanover looked upon Marlborough and his movements with distrust, fearing to confide in him, and yet fearing to offend him, hopeless of securing him unless he were convinced that their cause would triumph, and bring him more advantages than the other.

Bothmar had not exaggerated in speaking of the queen's dangerous state. On the 30th of July, only three days after the stormy scene at court, and the dismissal of Oxford, she was seized with an apoplectic fit. Ever since that tempestuous night she had been in a deplorable condition; agitated and shattered, and confident, as she told her physicians, that she should never recover; and after the fit she sunk into a stupor. There was a display of grief both real and affected; but the funds rose considerably, as soon as it was known in the city that she was dying. The most intelligent part of the nation had become convinced that nothing was so likely to endanger property, and the constitution, as a prolongation of the royal life and of the ministry of the plotting insidious men upon whom she had thrown herself. On the other side, Bolingbroke, Ormond, Harcourt, and the rest of that party who had been rather named to office than put in possession of it—so rapid was the course of events—were bewildered, and apparently all but stupified at this sudden blow. They met in council at Kensington, in a room not far from that where the queen lay dying; and they were presently thrown into consternation by the arrival of the Dukes of Argyll and Somerset, who said that, understanding her majesty's danger, they had hastened, though not summoned, to offer their assistance. The Duke of Shrewsbury, who had been for some time playing a very ambiguous part, but who had returned to his old Whig principles, and held private deliberations with some of the chiefs of that party, rose up and thanked Argyll and Somerset for their unexpected attendance and the offer of their services. Somerset and Argyll then took their seats at the council board, insisted on examining the physicians, and upon their report urged that it should be proposed to the queen that the post of lord treasurer should be instantly filled up, as at such a moment it was essential to have a recognised prime minister; and they further insisted that the Duke of Shrewsbury should be at once recommended to her majesty, as the nobleman most fit to manage affairs at that crisis, and to secure the succession as fixed by parliament. Bolingbroke thus saw his grand scheme vanish into thin air, like an unsubstantial palace at the touch of the enchanter; but he said nothing, did nothing, remaining in amaze like one under a spell; and he followed Shrewsbury and the other lords to the death-bed side, where the recommendation of the council was intimated in a discourse which the sufferer, in all probability, did not understand. A sign or a nod from Anne was, however, interpreted as a sufficient assent, and as a sufficient warrant for a most momentous change

* Pope, no incompetent judge, who knew the man well and intimately, says—"As inconsistent as the Duke of Marlborough's character may appear to you, yet may it be accounted for, if you gauge his actions by his reigning passion, which was the love of money. He endeavoured at the same time to be well both at Hanover and St. Germain: this surprised you a good deal when I first told you of it, but the plain meaning of it was only this—that he wanted to secure the vast riches he had amassed together whichever should succeed. He was calm in the heat of battle; and when he was so near being taken prisoner, in his first campaign in Flanders, he was quite unmoved. He was like to lose his life in the one and his liberty in the other, but there was none of his money at stake in either. This mean passion of that great man operated very strongly in him in the very beginning of his life, and continued to the very end of it. One day as he was looking over some papers in his scrotorio with Lord Cadogan, he opened one of the little drawers, took out a green purse, and turned some broad pieces out of it, and after viewing them for some time with a satisfaction that appeared very visible in his face, 'Cadogan,' says he, 'observe these pieces well; they deserve to be observed. There are just forty of them: 'tis the very first sum I ever got in my life, and I have kept it always unlooked from that very time to this day.' This shows how early and how strong this passion must have been upon him."—Spence.

—a change which involved the interests of millions. Thus was Shrewsbury, already lord-lieutenant of Ireland and lord chamberlain, made lord treasurer and prime minister, and from this moment the deciding card was in his hand, rather than in that of Marlborough, who, when the critical moment came, found himself detained at Ostend by contrary winds. The Duke of Argyll, a man of action and a man of ability, and who had carried the somewhat incompetent Somerset along with him to Kensington, was the real evil genius before which Bolingbroke stood rebuked; and now in conjunction with Somerset and the new Whig prime minister, Shrewsbury, Argyll moved that every privy counsellor whatsoever, that happened to be in London or in the neighbourhood, should be immediately summoned to attend. The Ex-Chancellor Somers, whose character and influence stood highest, forgot his own infirmities, and hastened to the place where the queen was expiring; and he was accompanied or followed by many other Whigs, who had not seen the interior of the court for a long time. If Bolingbroke and his coadjutors were bewildered before, they were now crushed and ridden over by the Whig party, who, without losing time, ordered four regiments up to London, recalled seven battalions from Dunkirk, laid an embargo on all the sea-ports, sent out orders for the immediate equipment of a good strong fleet, and took other measures to secure the throne to the House of Hanover, and defeat any attempt that might be made by France and the Pretender. Indeed, before the result of the visit of Argyll to the council-chamber was known, the Whigs, principally guided by the active and able General Stanhope, had concerted measures calculated to lead to the same result: Bolingbroke, who knew everything, must have known this. Knowing the course that had been taken with the army and the numerous commissions which had been given to determined Jacobites, they had entered into an association, and had even collected some arms and ammunition. They had also badges or tokens in brass, silver, and gold, to distribute among their followers; and Stanhope had formed a plan for seizing the Tower, and securing in it, at the moment of trial, the persons of the principal Jacobites. On the day after the appointment of Shrewsbury, while Anne was in a lethargy, and the physicians expecting every moment to be her last, the council sent their orders to the heralds-at-arms, and to a troop of the life-guards, to be in readiness every moment to proclaim the rightful successor George I.; and they hurried off Mr. Craggs to Hanover to hasten the journey of the elector, who was requested to repair to the coast of Holland, where the English fleet would be ready to receive him. The council also sent letters to their high mightinesses the States General, who for some time past had received nothing from England but cold or insulting language, to call their attention to the important fact that Holland had by treaty guaranteed the succession of the House of Hanover. Well knowing how hotly the Jacobite fever was raging in many parts of Scotland, they determined that an able general should be sent down to that country to take the command of the troops. All this was decided on the 31st of July, and on the following morning Anne, who had not recovered sufficiently from her stupor either to sign her will or to take the sacrament, expired in the fiftieth year of her age, and thirteenth of her reign. "The Earl of Oxford," says the still bewildered Bolingbroke, in a letter to Swift, "was removed on Tuesday; the queen died on Sunday. What a world is this, and how does fortune hunter us!" Nearly at the same moment the same plotting statesman assured an agent of the French king that measures had been so well taken, that in six weeks' time things would have been put in such a state as to have left him nothing to fear from the queen's demise. On the evening of the 1st of August the Duke of Marlborough approached the English coast: near Dover his vessel was boarded by a messenger from Sir Thomas Frauklin, the post-master-general, who told his grace that the queen had died that morning, and that the Elector of Hanover had been joyfully proclaimed. And, in fact, George was proclaimed with acclamations in London, in York,* and in the other principal cities, where no Jacobite had courage to raise his voice, or even to show himself in public. In the capital, only one man, and that man a Protestant clergyman of the high-church school, had the courage to propose proclaiming the Pretender. It was Doctor Aterbury, Bishop of Rochester.†

* It was not without a meaning and motive that the court of Hanover had opened a correspondence with Dawes, Archbishop of York. That prelate looked after their interest in the north of England, and gave importance to the possession of proclamation in the city of York. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, who was on the spot, thus describes the scene, in a letter to her husband:—"I went to-day to see the king proclaimed, which was done, the archbishop walking next the lord mayor, and all the country gentry following, with greater crowds of people than I believed to be in York; vast acclamations and the appearance of a general satisfaction; the Pretender afterwards dragged about the streets and burned; ringing of bells, bonfires, and illuminations: the mob crying Liberty and Property! and Long live King George! . . . All the Protestants here seem unanimous for the Hanover succession."

† "Upon the death of the queen, Ormond, Aterbury, and Lord Marshal, held a private conversation together, in which Aterbury desired the latter to go out immediately and proclaim the Pretender in form. Ormond, who was more afraid of consequences, desired to communicate it first to the council. 'Damn it,' says Aterbury, in a great heat (for he did not value swearing); 'you very well know that things have not been concerted enough for that yet, and that we have not a moment to lose.' Indeed it was the only thing they could have done; such a bold step would have made people believe that they were stronger than they really were, and might have taken strangely. The late king, I am fully persuaded, would not have stirred a foot, if there had been a strong opposition: indeed, the family did not expect this crown; at least nobody in it but the old Princess Sophia."—Lockier in Spence.—The mayor of Oxford received an anonymous note desiring him to proclaim the Pretender; but the mayor was too wise, and both the city and university remained perfectly quiet.

GREAT SEAL OF GEORGE I.

GEORGE I.

A. D. 1714.—The Regency Bill passed in 1705 had provided for the government on the demise of Anne; and the seven great officers of state, together with eighteen peers, named in an instrument signed by the Elector of Hanover, took upon themselves the temporary administration. Of the eighteen peers named by George the greater number were determined Whigs; and Argyll, Cowper, Halifax, Townshend, and Devonshire were among them. Marlborough was not named, nor was his son-in-law, Sunderland: this was not extraordinary, but it excites some surprise to see the illustrious Somers excluded also. The great general, on landing at Dover, received an enthusiastic welcome, and his entry into London was like a triumph. Two hundred gentlemen on horseback met him on the road, and the procession was joined by a long train of horse and carriages. Marlborough went straight to the House of Lords and took the oaths to King George; but then, mortified at his exclusion from the regency, he retired into the country.* The lords justices appointed Joseph Addison to be their secretary, and ordered that all dispatches addressed to Bolingbroke should be delivered to Addison.† In the Scottish capital King George was proclaimed without opposition; but for some days there prevailed great doubt and anxiety as to Ireland; and the lords of the regency, or lords justices, thought at one moment of dispatching thither General Stanhope as commander-in-chief, and Marlborough's son-in-law, Sunderland, as lord-lieutenant, without losing time in waiting for the king's instructions; but they soon received intelligence that all was quiet, and that King George had been peaceably proclaimed at Dublin by the lords justices of Ireland, the Archbishop of Armagh, and Sir Constantine Phipps, whose Toryism had formerly been suspected to be of the Jacobite bias. The Hanoverian ambassador felt convinced that the Jacobites would not stir anywhere, unless they were assisted by France; and the French ambassador declared that the king, his master, was determined to observe religiously the treaty of Utrecht, which recognised the succession of the Elector of Hanover.

Not a moment was lost by the Whigs in England in putting forth claims to the honours and emoluments of office, and in scheming what should be the new cabinet. The bishopric of Ely, and every good thing that happened to be vacant in the church, was asked for, and every place at court, such as the captaincy of the band of gentlemen pensioners, the groomship of the bedchamber, &c., was grasped at by several competitors. Baron Bothmar, who was made the medium of these applications to Hanover, recommended Lord Halifax to be first lord of the Treasury, with Mr. Boyle and Mr. Walpole for his colleagues, and Lord Orford, the double-sided Admiral Russell of former times, to be first lord of the Admiralty. He afterwards recommended strongly that the Duke of Shrewsbury, who had received the treasurer's staff from the hand of the dying Anne, should be allowed to retire; that Marlborough and Sunderland should be satisfied, Stanhope and Cadogan provided for, and that then they should think "of

* Bothmar, writing to the court of Hanover on the 5th of August, says, "The Duke of Marlborough came to town yesterday amidst the acclamations of the people, as if he had gained another battle of Hochstet. He will be of great service if the Pretender makes any attempt. He is not pleased that he is not of the regency, and that there is any man but the king higher than him in this country."—Macpherson.

† In the letter referred to in the last note Bothmar mentions the services which Addison's friend Pterle had rendered to the House of Hanover, as if to procure that admirable writer some good appointment in the new government.

doing something for Lord Somers." On the 10th of August Bothmar, continuing his recommendations, proposed General Erle for the government of Portsmouth, and pointed out Brigadiers Honeywood and Dormer as proper men to be made grooms of the bedchamber, "the last being recommended by the Duke of Marlborough." He also forwarded a letter to King George from the Earl of Manchester, who had been ambassador in France and at Venice, and secretary of state at home, and who yet only begged now to be made a lord of the king's bedchamber; a favour which he (Bothmar) thought might be granted, though he proposed that no answer should be given to Manchester's lady, who wanted to be of the princess's bedchamber. As for the rest, Bothmar suggested that "it would be sufficient now to give general promises to all such as asked favours, and to fulfil them when the king had formed his plan." "He may then," adds the ambassador, "turn out in general all the late queen's court and council." Cadogan told Bothmar that Lord Sunderland wanted to be secretary of state; and the Hanoverian, who, whatever he might think of Marlborough, had good reasons to think highly of the ability and patriotism of his son-in-law, suggests that, in case the king should be disposed to gratify him, Lord Townshend might be provided for in another way. Bishop Burnet recommended his own son for one of the grooms of the bedchamber; but Bothmar thought it would be better to give him some employment in the law. To pass over numerous other claims advanced by Tories* as well as by Whigs, and ranging from places at court to places in the excise, Lord Hertford, the Duke of Somerset's eldest son, wanted to be a lord-in-waiting either to the king or to Prince George; the Duke of Buckingham requested that his duchess might be made lady of the bedchamber to the princess. "She is handsome," says Bothmar, "and appears to me fit for such a place; but she could not obtain it from the late queen, although she was her natural sister.† I do not know if it was for that reason she did not choose to have her so near her, but preferred rather to give her a pension." The Duke of Grafton, one of the natural sons of Charles II., whose mother had married the speaker, Sir Thomas Hanmer, also desired earnestly to be of the king's bedchamber, and Bothmar gave him a good character, and recommended him.

But we may turn from these pettinesses, which were the inevitable consequences of a demise and a new succession, to matters of greater weight, in which the interests of three nations were concerned, and in which they were but too often sacrificed to private ambition and the interests of worthless in-

* "We are as full in the House of Commons," says a Tory, "as at any time. We are gazing and staring to see who is to rule us. The Whigs think they shall engross all. We think we shall have our share."—Erasmus Lewis to Sieff, August 7. This Lewis was a ready penman, who had done work both for Bolingbroke and for Oxford. That lord treasurer was accustomed to call Matthew Prior his verse man, and Lewis his prose-man.

dividuals. According to a very important provision in the act of regency, the Houses of Parliament met on the day of the queen's death, though it was a Sunday, and all such members as were in or near to town hastened to their seats. The Tories attempted to procure an adjournment till the following Wednesday; but Sir Richard Onslow represented that the state of the nation was too critical to allow of delay; and the Houses met again on Monday. Three days were spent in administering and taking oaths to the new sovereign. On the 5th of August the lords justices recommended to the Commons to provide for the dignity and honour of the crown by voting the continuance of several branches of the revenue which had expired with the late queen. "We forbear," said these lords, "laying before you anything that does not require your immediate consideration, not having as yet received his majesty's pleasure. We only exhort you, with the greatest earnestness, to a perfect unanimity and a firm adherence to our sovereign's interest, as being the only means to continue among us our present happy tranquillity." The Commons instantly returned a very loyal and an unanimous address—for, though the Tories were the more numerous, the Jacobite Tories were comparatively few, and in no humour to provoke a committal to the Tower. In the same breath and with the same drop of ink they expressed their deep grief at the death of their late sovereign lady Queen Anne of blessed memory, and their lively pleasure at the accession of King George, whose right to the crown was so undoubted, and whose virtues were so princely. The most that the Hanoverian agents hoped or expected was, that the House of Commons would grant the king the same civil list enjoyed by the late queen, and that a new parliament would augment it on account of Prince George and his family; but the Tories, either to secure favour at court, or to produce in the beginning an extravagant notion of the avaricious and grasping disposition of the new sovereign, had the face to propose that the civil list should be raised to 1,000,000*l.*, or to 300,000*l.* more than had been granted to Anne; but the Whigs wisely discouraged this very suspicious liberality, and the sum voted was 700,000*l.* A clause was inserted in the bill for the payment of 65,000*l.* due to the Hanoverian troops in the pay of England, but hitherto withheld by the court because those troops had refused to join the Duke of Ormond in 1712 in his base desertion from the allies. A reward of 100,000*l.*, to be paid by the treasury, was offered to any person that should apprehend the Pretender in case of his landing; and, after the passing of some other money-bills, this short session was closed by prorogation.

A report was spread that they were arming and preparing transports in France; and some suspicions fell upon the wit and poet who had been left as secretary of embassy at Paris. "It is surprising," writes Bothmar, "that Mr. Prior sends no intelligence of these things from France, and that he writes in ciphers things which he might very safely write plain. Some members of the regency suspect that letters are concealed from them." But at this moment Lord Peterborough, whose delight it was to fly from country to country more rapidly than any one living, and to boast that he knew personally more potentates and postboys than any one, came posting from Paris with an assurance from the aged Louis XIV. that he wished to live in peace, and had no intention of abetting the Pretender. In effect, when the Pretender, upon the news of Anne's death, had quitted Lorraine, and repaired incognito to Paris, to consult with the queen, his mother, and his other friends, being, according to the Duke of Berwick, "fully resolved to go over afterwards into Great Britain, to lay claim to his right," the French court sent M. de Torcy to persuade him to return whence he came; and, if fair reasons should not prevail, de Torcy had orders to declare that they should be indispensably obliged to use compulsion. "And, therefore," adds Berwick, "receiving no comfortable intelligence from his friend in England, where a universal consternation prevailed, and not knowing where he could land in safety, the king determined to go back to Bar-le-duc." The assurances brought over by Peterborough, added to those previously and subsequently given by Louis's ambassadors, and to intelligence received from France touching the Pretender's movements and his visible despondency, quieted alarm; and it was confidently hoped that the Guelphs would be firmly settled on the throne without the curse of a civil war waged for the Stuarts. But yet all those who wished well to the Protestant succession were impatient for the arrival of the new king, whose delay on the continent excited universal surpris. Other princes had shown the extreme of eagerness for a far less glittering prize, but the phlegmatic George I. seemed to look almost with indifference to the crown of three great and rising kingdoms; and it was not till six o'clock in the evening of the 18th of September, or nearly seven weeks after the death of Anne, that he landed at Greenwich with his eldest son, Prince George. His subjects of Hanover had witnessed his departure with regret and tears—his English subjects received him with joy and acclamations, although on a near view they saw little to admire in his personal appearance or in his bearing, which were plain and undignified. He showed marked attentions to the leading Whigs, to Marlborough, to Sunderland, to Somers, and others; but looked coldly on the Tories, who had equally run to welcome him, and abruptly dismissed the Chancellor Harcourt, who had hurried with a patent in his pocket for the peacage of the Prince of Wales. That other pledged Jacobite, the Duke of Ormond, was stopped on his road to Greenwich by the unwelcome intelligence that his majesty would not admit him to his presence; and the late Lord Treasurer Oxford was barely admitted in the crowd to kiss the royal hand, though, in order to efface former ill impressions, he had made a display of infinite joy and satisfaction in proclaiming the new king. As for Bolingbroke, he did not run down to Greenwich, for his fate had been sealed before, the king having sent from the Hague an order that he should be removed from his office of secretary of state, and that Lord Townshend should be put in his place; and in the grief of his soul Bolingbroke had exclaimed that the Tory party was gone! "The removal of the Lord Bolingbroke," says Addison, in a letter to the Hanoverian cabinet, "has put a reasonable check to an interest that was making in many places for members in the next parliament, and was very much relished by the people, who ascribe to him in a great measure the decay of trade and public credit."

His majesty presently proceeded to complete his ministerial arrangements: Lord Halifax was appointed first lord commissioner of the Treasury and chancellor of the Exchequer; Lord Cowper again chancellor; Nottingham president of the council; Marlborough commander-in-chief and master-general of the Ordnance; Wharton (who was made a marquess) lord privy seal; Oxford first lord of the Admiralty; Shrewsbury lord chamberlain and groom of the stole; the Duke of Devonshire lord steward of the household; the Duke of Somerset master of the horse; Sunderland lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and Robert Walpole, whose ability in debate was worth a high price, paymaster of the forces. With the single exception of Nottingham, who, latterly, had been more than half a Whig, there was not a decided Tory in the whole batch. The arrangement, however, was far from giving universal satisfaction to the Whig party: Sunderland was disgusted at being relegated to Ireland instead of having the prime direction of affairs in the English cabinet; and Marlborough was scarcely more pleased with the share allotted to him, particularly when he found that his voice at the council-board was not heard with much deference, and that his command of the army was little more than nominal—nearly all commissions and promotions being put in other hands. As for Lord Somers, he was overlooked altogether. It was represented, with seeming truth, that his infirmities prevented him from taking any important department, and that an inferior office could not be offered to so great a man;* but others interpreted the omission of him, the sending of Sunderland into Ireland, and the little countenance shown to Marlborough, into a fear on the part of the new king of the old junta which, for a time, had monopolised the authority and the government under the late queen. On the other hand, the wholly excluded Tories complained as loudly as if, instead of being in a good part Jacobites or trimmers that had waited upon events, they had been the constant, consistent, and warmest friends of the Hanoverian succession. In Scotland the Jacobite Earl of Mar was turned out, and the Duke of Montrose put in his place; and the Duke of Argyll was intrusted with the supreme command of the forces there: in Ireland Sir Constantine Phipps was deprived of the seals, and Mr. Broderic made chancellor. These ministerial arrangements were all completed before the 20th of October, upon which day the coronation was performed at Westminster with the usual solemnities. The old abbey was thronged with nearly all the peers, whether Whig, Tory, or Jacobite; and the indolent insouciant-looking Oxford was there, and so was his keen-eyed, animated rival, Bolingbroke. The usual promotions in the peerage followed the ceremony. The people in many parts disgraced their loyalty by insulting the Jacobites; and the Jacobites in some places, and especially at Norwich, Bristol, and Birmingham, cried up Sacheverell and the church, and damned all foreign governments, and, being drunk, committed serious riots. The learned University of Oxford did not riot, but it chose that very day of the coronation of King George to confer upon Sir Constantine Phipps, the late Jacobite chancellor of Ireland, an honorary degree in full convocation, thus giving a gentle indication of its political sympathies.

On the 29th of August (n.s.) the Pretender, who had gone from Bar-le-duc to drink the mineral waters of Plombiere, signed and sent forth a manifesto asserting his right to the throne of Great Britain, and explaining somewhat too clearly the causes of his inactivity up to "the death of the princess our sister, of whose good intention towards us we could not for some time past well doubt: and this was the reason we then saw still, expecting the good effects thereof, which were unfortunately prevented by her deplorable death." This was at once a capital blunder and a glaring proof of the little attention the exiled prince paid to the safety of his friends in England. The Whigs instantly caught at the words as additional and incontrovertible evidence as to the intentions of the late ministry: the Tories insisted that the manifesto was a false document basely forged by the Whigs to throw discredit upon them and dishonour the late queen; but they were driven from this position by the thick-headed and thick-hearted Pretender, who openly acknowledged the authenticity of the manifesto. Both parties applied themselves to the press; and, together with some good writing and a little wit, Whigs and Tories poured out an amazing stream of malice, dulness, and abuse. The best hit was made by Addison, who exposed the absurdity of the revived Tory cry of the church in danger, and showed that it was rather more rational to hope the church would be safe under a Lutheran like George than under a Papist like James. The Tories, however, had scarcely fair play allowed them in this war of wet sheets and broadsides, for the lord mayor, with the approbation of Secretary Townshend, committed a number of their hawkers who cried their papers about the streets to Bridewell.

ment, the other calling a new one. In the latter the late government was severely reflected upon, and the electors, in the choice of members, were advised to have a particular regard to such as showed a firmness to the Protestant succession when it was in danger. At the preceding election, only two years before, five sixths of the successful candidates were Tories; yet at the present election the Whigs were returned in triumphant majority. The new parliament met on the 19th of March, and Mr. Spencer Compton, the ministerial nominee, was chosen Speaker without opposition. A few days after the king went down in person, but, being unable to pronounce English, he gave his written speech to be read by Chancellor Cowper. After thanking all his loving subjects for their zeal in defence of his succession, he lamented that many conditions of the late peace had not been performed, and showed the necessity of defensive alliances in order to ensure their due execution: he regretted the injuries suffered by trade, and expressed his surprise at finding that the public debt had been increased since the treaty of Utrecht. He alluded frankly to the Pretender, and to his boasting of assistance he expected to derive from England; but, in conclusion, he declared that he would make the constitution in church and state the rule of his government, and devote his chief care to the happiness, ease, and prosperity of his people. Both Houses joined in expressing their sense of the dishonour of the peace, and the delinquency of the late ministers.* The Commons, in their address, said, strongly, "We are sensibly touched, not only with the disappointment, but the reproach brought upon the nation by the unsuitable conclusion of a war, which was carried on at so vast an expense, and was attended with such unparalleled successes: but, as that dishonour cannot in justice be imputed to the whole nation, so we firmly hope and believe, that, through your majesty's great wisdom, and the faithful endeavours of your Commons, the reputation of your kingdoms will, in due time, be vindicated and restored." The king, in his speech, had spoken of the continued residence of the Pretender in Lorraine; and upon this point the Commons said, "It is with just resentment we observe that the Pretender still lives in Lorraine, and that he has the presumption, by declarations from thence, to stir up your majesty's subjects to rebellion. But that which raises the utmost indignation of your Commons is, that it appears therein that his hopes were built upon the measures that had been taken for some time past in Great Britain. It shall be our business to trace out those measures wherein he places his hopes, and to bring the authors of them to condign punishment."

This was the first public intimation of the intention of the present cabinet to call their predecessors

in office to account; and the intention was further avowed in the course of debate by General Stanhope. This leader of the Commons—for at first Stanhope, rather than Walpole, was the leader—said that a report had been industriously spread that it was not intended to bring the late ministers to trial, but only to censure them in general terms: that he could, however, assure the House that, notwithstanding all the endeavours which had been used to prevent a discovery, by conveying away several papers from the secretary's offices, yet his majesty's present government had sufficient evidence left to prove the former ministry the most corrupt that had ever sat at the helm; and he also declared that it would appear that a certain English general (Ormond) had acted in concert with Marshal Villars, if he had not received orders from him. The Tory opposition had objected to a part of the address, which they said did injustice to the memory of the late queen; but Walpole insisted that nothing could be farther from their intention; that they rather designed to vindicate her memory by exposing and punishing the evil counsellors who had deluded her; whereas they, the opposition, were endeavouring to screen those counsellors by throwing all the blame and odium upon that "good, pious, and well-meaning princess." The Tories found themselves in a minority of 138 to 244 on the address. The proclamation for calling a new parliament was soon afterwards attacked by Sir William Wyndham, who called it "not only unprecedented and unwarrantable, but dangerous to the very being of parliaments." Being called upon to explain himself more fully, he merely said, without going into the obvious grounds of objection to the clause in the proclamation which pointed out the Whigs as the only party fit to be returned, that in that House every man was free to speak his thoughts. They called upon him again to explain, and, when he again refused, some members cried out, "The Tower! the Tower!" But Walpole rose and said, quietly, "I am not for gratifying the desire which the member who occasions this debate shows of being sent to the Tower. It would make him too considerable." The House then obliged Sir William Wyndham to withdraw, and contented themselves with a resolution that he should be reprimanded by the Speaker.

With all his vivacity and rashness, Bolingbroke seems to have had less moral courage than his rival Oxford, whom he had always despised as irresolute and timid. His danger, however, was probably somewhat greater, and he may have apprehended that there was better evidence to convict him on an impeachment than what could be brought against the ex-lord treasurer. But, howsoever this may have been, Oxford remained to face the storm, while Bolingbroke fled from it. On the evening of the 26th of March he appeared publicly at Drury Lane Theatre; and at the close of the performance he bespoke, according to the custom of the time, the play for the next night. But, upon leaving the theatre, he disguised himself as a servant to La Vigne, a French cabinet messenger ; set off for Dover, and landed with the Frenchman at Calais.* We shall soon find Bolingbroke figuring as secretary of state to the Pretender. Nor was the Duke of Ormond much more courageous than Bolingbroke, though, for a short time, he seemed to defy his enemies, and kept up his spirits by a continual excitement. He gave the most magnificent fêtes ; held public levées at Richmond as if his house had been a court ; gathered around him the most fiery of the Jacobites ; and gave his countenance to the mob and to the hottest of the high-church party.

* In the Lords there were some very sudden conversions. "I saw," says Bolingbroke, "several lords concur to condemn, in one general vote, all that they had approved of in a former parliament by many particular resolutions." The majority which carried the address in the Lords were 66 to 33.

In the mean while all the papers that could be found of Bolingbroke, Strafford, and Prior had been seized, and the poet had been recalled from Paris and kept under surveillance. On the 9th of April Stanhope laid these papers, with an immense heap of instructions, memorials, &c., relating to Ormond's withdrawing the troops from the allies and to the treaty of Utrecht ; and, representing that they were too voluminous to be perused by the whole House, he moved that they should be referred to a select committee of twenty-one members. This proposal was adopted without opposition, and a thoroughly Whig committee, called a committee of secrecy, was appointed forthwith. The twenty-one commenced operations that very evening, appointing Robert Walpole their chairman. The task was long and tedious, and, as week after week passed over without any report to the House, Shippen, a decided Jacobite member, insinuated that, notwithstanding the great noise which had been made, the committee of secrecy would not be able to produce any proof of the guilt of the late ministry. But Shippen was silenced by Walpole, the chairman, who declared that, so far from this being the case, he wanted words to express the villainy of the late Frenchified ministry, as it appeared from the evidence in hand. At last, on the 9th of June, two months after the appointment of the committee, Walpole presented the report to the House, and read it himself. The reading occupied five hours. When it was over Sir Thomas Hanmer moved that the report should be printed, and the further consideration postponed for twelve days. But Walpole, Stanhope, and all the Whigs resisted this reasonable proposition, and went headlong into the matter. Hanmer's motion having been negatived by a majority of 280 to 160, Walpole presently rose again, and, observing that he made no question but that the whole House was now fully convinced of Bolingbroke's guilt, exclaimed that he, therefore, impeached that late minister of high crimes and misdemeanors ; adding, however, that if any member had anything to offer in his lordship's behalf, he had no doubt the House was ready to hear him. A profound silence followed. The report, ably drawn up, had filled the vast majority of the House with rage and indignation, and had even called some blushes to the faces of those who had sanctioned the dishonourable Treaty of Utrecht, the disgraceful conduct of Ormond, the baser betrayal of the Catalans, and the altogether unnecessary gift of Tournay to France : and if on one important point—the traitorous correspondence of Bolingbroke with the French court—the report did not produce such indisputable evidence as has been laid before the world since the prosecution, and in part very recently, there was yet enough to excite and justify the darkest suspicions. When the silence had lasted for some minutes, Mr. Hungerford ventured to say, that in his opinion, there was nothing in the report relating to Lord Bolingbroke that amounted to the crime of high treason. General Ross also made use of a few timid expressions to the same effect ; and this was all that was said in the House of Commons in support of the brilliant but flagitious minister ; and the vote for his impeachment passed without a division. Lord Coningsby then rose and said, “The worthy chairman of the committee has impeached the hand, but I do impeach the head ; he has impeached the clerk, and I impeach the justice ; he has impeached the scholar, and I the master : I impeach Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer of high treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors.” More was said for Oxford than had been said for Bolingbroke ; yet it amounted to very little. Mr. Auditor Harley, and Mr. Foley the ex-lord treasurer's brother-in-law, defended their relative ; and Sir Joseph Jekyll, who had been on the committee of secrecy, said that, although they had more than sufficient evidence to convict lord Bolingbroke, he much doubted whether they had sufficient evidence to convict Lord Oxford. It was stated, however, by another member of the committee, that, besides the papers, they had in reserve some vitâ voce evidence ; and this resolution of impeachment was also carried without a division, and the committee of secrecy were ordered to prepare their articles against the two accused lords. It appears to have been for some time a matter of doubt whether they should impeach the Duke of Ormond, who, in withdrawing the troops from the allies had only obeyed positive orders or not ; and that ministers were provoked to the affirmative by that weak and vain man's bravados. It was, however, not till the 21st of June that Stanhope stood up and impeached Ormond. Luckily for him, his correspondence with the friends of the Pretender was less susceptible of proof than even that of Oxford. Many members, including some that were devoted to the House of Hanover, spoke warmly in his favour ; the discussion lasted nine hours and a half, and Stanhope

* Bolingbroke, in a letter from Dover, thus excused his sudden flight :—“I had certain and repeated information from some, who are in the secret of affairs, that a resolution was taken, by those who have power to execute it, to pursue me to the scaffold. My blood was to have been the cement of a new alliance. Had there been the least reason to hope for a fair and open trial, after having been already prejudged, unheard, by the two houses of parliament, I should not have declined the strictest examination. I challenge the most inveterate of my enemies to produce any one instance of criminal correspondence, or the least corruption in any part of the administration in which I was concerned. It is a comfort that will remain with me, in all misfortunes, that I served her majesty faithfully and dutifully, in that especially which she had most at heart,—relieving her people from a bloody and expensive war ; and that I have always been too much an Englishman to sacrifice the interests of my country to any foreign ally whatsoever.”

carried his motion by a majority of only 47. On the very next day Mr. Aislable stood up and impeached the Earl of Strafford, one of the two plenipotentiaries at Utrecht; but the charge was lightened to high crimes and misdemeanors, without the treason. As nothing was said against the other plenipotentiary, Robinson, Bishop of Bristol, who, since the treaty had been translated to London, Mr. Hungerford observed that the Bishop of London was, it seemed, to have the benefit of clergy. The Duke of Ormond, after listening to a variety of Jacobite projects, which he had not sufficient spirit or talent to execute, followed Bolingbroke's example, fled secretly into France, and joined the Pretender. It is said that, before he went, he visited Lord Oxford in the Tower, and advised him to try and escape also; that, finding the ex-treasurer determined still to face the storm, he took leave of him, saying, "Farewell, Oxford without a head;" and that Oxford replied, "Farewell, duke without a duchy." Bolingbroke we shall meet again on a busy stage in England; but Ormond never returned, living in exile and dying in it, at the age of fourscore, in the year 1745.

On the 9th of July Lord Coningsby, followed by a great part of the House of Commons, carried up to the bar of the Lords the articles of impeachment against Oxford: they were sixteen in number, but afterwards six were added to them. The first fifteen related to the peace of Utrecht; the sixteenth to the sudden creation of twelve peers, made on purpose to obtain a Tory majority in the House of Lords—"by which," it was alleged, "the said Earl of Oxford did most highly abuse the influence he then had with her majesty, and prevailed on her to exercise, in the most unprecedented and dangerous manner, that valuable and undoubted prerogative, which the wisdom of the laws and constitution of the kingdom hath entrusted with the crown, for the rewarding signal virtue and distinguished merit; by which desperate advice he did not only, as far as in him lay, deprive her majesty of the continuance of those seasonable and wholesome counsels in that critical juncture, but wickedly perverted the true and only end of that great and useful prerogative, to the dishonour of the crown, and the irreparable mischief to the constitution of parliament." After the articles had been read a debate arose as to whether any of them amounted to high treason. As was not unusual on such occasions, it was proposed that the judges should be consulted; but a motion to that effect was negatived by 84 to 52. The next motion was, that Oxford should be committed to the Tower. Hereupon that earl addressed the House in a short speech, protesting his innocence and screening himself under the worn-out and now scarcely admissible excuse; that in all that he had done, he had only, as a servant, obeyed the late queen's orders. In concluding his speech, he said that if ministers of state, acting by the immediate command of their sovereign, were afterwards to be made accountable for their proceedings, no ministers would ever be safe. But this line of argument went directly to establish the irresponsibility of ministers, a thing exploded under the modern spirit and form of the constitution; and Oxford, after being reprieved for a few days, on account of a real or pretended indisposition, was committed to the Tower by the House. Part of the virâ voce evidence, alluded to by the committee of secrecy, was that of Matthew Prior, who, seven days after this, or on the 16th of June, underwent a long examination before the committee. It had been reported that Prior, to secure himself, would make ample revelations, and disclose quite enough to make out a case of treason against Bolingbroke and Oxford; but the poet refused to disclose the secrets with which he had been entrusted, and abhorred the idea of criminating his patrons and employers. If we are to believe his own account, though "in outward appearance they were all very civil," the committee did not treat him very generously, or act with the calmness and dignity becoming such an occasion. He says that, they asked him what he knew of the negotiation for the peace—how long he had been acquainted with the Abbé Gaultier—whether the propositions for peace came first from France or from England; that several members spoke at once, and very vaguely; that they desired him to give them an account of whatever he knew of the whole matter, "which," he adds, "it seems they thought I was so ready to do, that some of them took their pens and paper as if I were to begin a sermon, and they to take short notes." But, as to any information they got from the poet, their readiness in note-taking was thrown away. To punish this obstinacy, Walpole, on the 10th of June, moved the House for an impeachment against Matthew Prior, Esquire, who had been for some time in the custody of a messenger, and who, on the 17th of the same month was ordered into close custody, where no person was to be admitted to see him without an order from the speaker. In the following year, when an act of grace was passed, the poet, who still lay at the mercy of the House of Commons, was one of the persons excepted out of it. But being discharged soon after, he quietly retired into the country, and spent the remainder of his days at his own villa of Down Hall, or at Wimpole, a seat of the Earl of Oxford, where he died on the 18th of December, 1721. Oxford was left in the Tower, and his opponents continued long to deliberate whether there was sufficient evidence to convict him of high treason, or only enough to prove the point of misdemeanor. In the heat of their animosity they seem to have overlooked the fact, that his ministerial proceedings had been approved of by two parliaments, which, notwithstanding their corruptness and the unjustifiable measures resorted to in cramming the House of Commons with Tories and Jacobites, were still parliaments of Great Britain.

The easy accession of the House of Hanover, after all the plots and plans that had been laid, and all the pledges that had been given to the Pretender, struck the world with astonishment. Efforts, however, were made at a very early period to shake the new throne; and it was the high church party that first applied their broad shoulders to this work. In their sermons, and still more in their pamphlets, they irritated the populace with suspicions of the king's temper and orthodoxy; they painted his religion in bad colours, representing that the old tyranny of the Presbyterian government, that the starch days of the Puritans were to be restored; they drew an odious distinction between a native and a foreign prince, and they prophesied that England would be eaten up by Hanoverian rats and other foreign vermin. Presently loud cries were heard throughout the land of "High Church and Ormond for ever!" "Down with the Puritans!" "Down with the Dissenters!" and where the orthodox mob was strongest they soon proceeded to realise the metaphor, and to knock down the meeting-houses of the dissenters. In Staffordshire, one of the least civilised and most Tory counties, these excesses were greatest; and scarcely a Whig or Dissenter there could escape insult or more serious injury.* To stop these excesses the legislature had recourse to the well-known riot act, which was carried through both Houses of parliament, and which provided that, if any twelve persons should unlawfully assemble to the disturbance of the peace, and any one justice should think proper to command them by proclamation to disperse; if, in contempt of his orders, they should continue together for one hour afterwards, such contempt should be felony

* The Reverend Robert Patten, a high-churchman, who was chaplain to Mr. Forster, and who took a share in the rebellion which broke out in the north of England, puts in the strongest light the effects of the cries of The Church in danger, &c. — "It is worth observation, that nothing contributed more to raise the people of this nation to a spirit of rebellion, than the licentious freedom of some in their public discourses, and others in their addresses, to cry up the old doctrines of passive obedience, and to give hints and arguments to prove hereditary right; then public shows were encouraged with designing emblems and legible badges of their ends; then ill-natured distinctions and designations were fomented, and with malice upbraiding one another. This introduced notes; so that the party in disgrace with the court had their own houses, and those of their worship, pulled about their ears—themselves insulted and assaulted by the very drags of the people: like a flood they carried all before them without check or control. Nay, their ill nature could not be confined within these restraints; but they found means to raise the basest reflections, and the worst of lying stories, upon the most illustrious house in Europe, that had a just title to the imperial diadems of these kingdoms, with no other design but to blacken with their foul breath their persons and bright characters. I am assured that I, with so many deluded people, upon bare reports, should be blindly led to give credit to such incredible legends and lies reported by the fomenters of the late rebellion; but, being prepared with the noisy notion of the church's being in danger, easily complied with the party. Healths and full bumpers were tossed about with disguised names, characters, and wishes, and concluded with confusion, damnation, and destruction, to others whom they durst not name. Did not all these concurrences stir up the populace to be guilty of so many egregious miscarriages, as they have been of late towards his sacred majesty King George?"—Preface to Patten's Hist. of Rebellion in the year 1715.—Patten, however, after having gone as far as any body in the rebellion, was now working hard to secure his head, or at least to pay the price for which his forfeited life had been given back to him, by writing down and blackening the cause he had joined before it was unfortunate. He had already come forward as king's evidence on the trials of some of his former associates—"which," says he, "I am far from being ashamed of, let what calumnies will follow;"—and he appears to have been, in all respects, a pitiful creature, without either nerve or shame. The whole of this preface is in a style of bluster and exaggeration, inspired by the ardent servility of the writer's penitence or terrors, which considerably detracts from the historical value of its assertions.

without benefit of clergy. The ill humour of the people, however, was not to be repressed, and the more they saw of the new king and the new court, the less they liked both. And, indeed, though possessed of some solid qualities which seem to have fitted him for the difficult position in which he was placed, the first George was far from being a very prepossessing or brilliant prince. He was fifty-four years old, had a heavy countenance and a clumsy figure, and was plain in his dress, almost a sloven: he was taciturn and phlegmatic, and yet subject to violent fits of passion. He could neither confer a favour with grace nor refuse one with blandness. There was, in fact, little that was courteous, or graceful, or princely about him; and men so inclined, and the mob of all kinds that attaches so much importance to externals, and show, and appearances, could easily draw a striking contrast between this homely prince sinking into the vale of years, and the Pretender, who was said to be very good looking and very graceful, and who was only half the age of George. To make matters worse, the king had imported rather a strange and uncouth court, and two very ugly mistresses. For a king to break the seventh commandment was so universal a practice as to excite little or no attention anywhere, and the morality or decency of the nobility and gentry of England was not in those days at a very elevated point: royal mistresses would have been tolerated without difficulty, if they had been handsome and English; but the mob, and many above them, had no patience with Mademoiselle Schulenberg and the Countess Platen, who were both Germans and both so very ugly! These ladies, moreover, either were avaricious, or, at first, got little money to spend; and thus a report was spread that they were plundering the country to remit the money to Hanover. The London mob was particularly uncourteous and loud-tongued, seldom hesitating to insult the strange sultanas when they found them abroad taking the air. One day a German lady of the court, who was irritated or perhaps alarmed at their outcries, put her head out of the carriage window and said in her broken English, "Why do you abuse us, good peoples? We come for all your goods." To which a fellow in the mob roared out in reply, "Yes, damn you, and for all our chattels too." In the midst of this personal unpopularity of George and his court, numerous papers in behalf of the Pretender were written, printed, and circulated. One of them, attributed to Mr. Leslie, drew a charming portrait of the chevalier—he was described as active, tall, and graceful, resembling in his countenance that respectable sovereign Charles II.; and as to his moral qualities, it was affirmed that he was candid, tolerant, and benevolent, just, firm, and altogether a prince of excellent principles. Men, who knew the chevalier better, knew that he was a bigot, a coward, and a Frenchman in heart and soul; but this did not prevent Mr. Leslie's portrait from telling with the multitude, who no doubt recollected, as a favourable circumstance, that Charles II., though he had kept a great many, had kept none but very handsome mistresses, who had been exceedingly lavish of their money. As the popular discontent grew and increased, the Jacobites, and some of the selfish traffickers of state, who had been disappointed in their expectations, began to cabal again, and to renew or commence a correspondence with the Pretender—and foremost among these scoundrels was the illustrious Marlborough, who, though commander-in-chief of the British army under George, sent a sum of money to France as a loan to the chevalier, who was at the moment planning how to kindle the flames of civil war in Scotland.* Unhappily for that country, it was there that the Pretender fancied he had the best chance of success, well knowing that the Highland clans would unhesitatingly follow their hereditary chiefs in any enterprise, however desperate, and that the majority of those chiefs detested the Hanoverian succession, and were ready to take up the sword, either out of a point of honour connected with the old loyalty to the Stuart, or in the hopes of bettering their fortunes—the latter, we candidly believe, being the stronger or more general motive among that wild race, whose adventures have been made striking and romantic by warm imaginations, but whose ordinary course of life was selfish, brutish, and tyrannical. The disaffected in England, as well as in Scotland, thought they had a tower of strength in Bolingbroke, whose genius was indisputable, and they opened a regular intercourse by letters and messengers with that fugitive. On his first arrival in France Bolingbroke had had a long interview with Lord Stair, who was residing at Paris as a diplomatic agent for King George, and he had solemnly assured that nobleman that he would enter into no plot or contract any engagement with the Jacobites; but, at the same time, he had privately seen the Duke of Berwick, and pledged himself to assist the Pretender openly whenever a promising opportunity should arise. Lord Stair, however, knew his man, and, having his misgivings, he set a person to watch Bolingbroke. About the beginning of July, Bolingbroke, who was then residing in Dauphiné, received at his house a Jacobite agent, sent over by the plotters in England, to assure him that the people of England were so exasperated against the new government, that a revolution would be easy and sure of success; that the whole Tory party would become Jacobites; that the army was ready to revolt, and the city of London to rise; that the Duke of Ormond had pledged himself to his old friends, and that these friends had already engaged for him (Bolingbroke). The agent also brought him a letter from the Pretender himself, inviting him to repair to his court, which was then at Commercy. It appears that nothing more definite than this was offered to that sagacious but desperate man, who forthwith went to the Pretender, and took office under him as principal secretary of state. He found that prince without a state as ignorant as himself as to the preparations which had been made in England or in Scotland. All that Bolingbroke could learn was, that the Duke of Ormond (not yet a fugitive) had asked from the French court a detachment of regular troops, some money, and some arms and ammunition; that the French had told the duke he must not expect them to send any troops, though they gave him hopes in vague terms as to arms and ammunition, and readily advanced him a small sum of money. This was not very encouraging; but, at the instigation of Louis XIV., his grandson, the King of Spain, promised a loan of 400,000 crowns to the Chevalier, who had been enabled to borrow privately 100,000, and to buy 10,000 stand of arms; and, at the same time, the Scottish Jacobites sent to say that they wanted nothing but arms, a little money, and the presence of their lawful sovereign King James. But the Pretender liked not the risk nor the tempting price set by the English parliament on his apprehension; and the Duke of Ormond was one day all for war and an instant invasion, and the next day all for caution and due preparation. As the best thing that could be done, the Pretender, who could not openly appear there himself, sent Bolingbroke to Paris, the great centre of the intrigue, the workshop of a multitude of unskilful workmen, who spent more of their time in quarrelling with one another than in any other occupation. "Here," says Bolingbroke, "I found a multitude of people at work, and every one doing what seemed good in his own eyes; no subordination, no order, no concert. . . . The Jacobites had wrought one another up to look on the success of the present design as infallible. . . . Care and hope sat on every busy Irish face. Those who could write and read had letters to show, and those who had not yet arrived to this pitch of credulity had their secrets to whisper. No sex was excluded from this ministry."† In fact, one of the busiest persons in this strange heterogeneous conclave was a Mrs. Trant, a lady who had more Jacobitism than virtue. With such agents and such a rabble rout it was not difficult for Lord Stair to discover most of their secrets. After a suspicious conference with an Irish friar, in which each suspected the other, Bolingbroke dined with M. de Torcy, who, though French minister for foreign affairs, was corresponding with the Pretender, and forwarding his views as much as the policy of his court would permit. Bolingbroke then wrote to his new master to assure his majesty that things were not yet ripe in England, or that at least he could not tell with certainty whether they were so or not. "At present," says Bolingbroke, "the correspondence wants that preciseness and exactness which is indispensably necessary."‡ But, shortly after, he received from England something more concise and exact in the shape of a memorial drawn up by Lord Lansdowne, Lord Mar, the Duke of Ormond, and other great Jacobite lords, who, though they urged the importance of procuring the assistance of an armed force from the French king, thought that the Pretender might venture without it, provided only he brought with him a train of artillery, arms for 20,000 men, 500 officers, and a good sum of money. These plotters recommended that the expedition should be so timed as not to land until the end of September, when parliament would be prorogued, and the Jacobite lords and members of the Commons in the country ready to co-operate; and they promised, as soon as the Pretender should be ready, to give him notice of the place where he ought to land. With this memorial in his hand, and with assurances that the plot was a good plot, and would not fail, Bolingbroke again waited on de Torey and other French ministers, whom he found ready enough to embroil England, but yet fearful of openly committing themselves and of provoking another war, which France was ill able to bear. De Torey assured him that his court would grant secret supplies, and had allowed a small armament to be fitted out at Havre for the expedition; but that the sending of troops or the contracting any open engagement with the Chevalier was a thing not to be named to his master. In the mean while Bolingbroke had had long conferences with the Duke of Berwick, who concurred with him in impressing upon the French court "how practicable, how morally certain the enterprise would prove, if it was avowed and supported by Louis and a French army." Bolingbroke was much disconcerted by the constant discovery of some of his secrets, and by the alarm that had begun to spread in England of a design of invasion this summer; but he was apparently still full of hope, when two events occurred to derange everything. The first of these was the flight from England of the Duke of Ormond, who had engaged to keep his ground to the last moment, and then to fly, not out of the island, but into the West, where measures had been concerted for revolutionising Bristol, Exeter, and Plymouth. When, instead of doing this, Ormond arrived a helpless fugitive, the French court, who had been taught to consider him as the mightiest champion of the Stuarts, began to perceive that, after all that had been said, the House of Hanover was not to be so easily overthrown. The second event fatal to the plotters was the death of Louis XIV., who died at last, and in a very contemptible manner, on the 1st of September. "He was," says Bolingbroke, "the best friend the Chevalier had, and when I engaged in this business my principal dependence was on his personal character. . . . My hopes sunk as he declined, and died when he expired." The dissolute Duke of Orleans, who obtained the regency of France in spite of the opposition of Madame de Maintenon, Louis's last mistress and left-handed wife, and of the bastards which that old king had left behind him, was more averse even than Louis to a new war, and had far less consideration for the cause of legitimacy in the abstract, or for the Pretender in person. Orleans had, on the contrary, friends among the present English ministers, who, it should appear, made him offers of money and troops to secure his regency; and he was particularly on a footing of intimacy with the new secretary of state, General Stanhope, whom he had known well in Spain. The regent, moreover, as a matter of course, had entirely changed the French cabinet, and adopted a new line of policy. The Jacobites now hardly knew whom they could apply to without risk of having their propositions and schemes divulged in England. The fugitive Ormond, however, hit upon a scheme that was quite suitable and in character. Mrs. Olivia Trant, the intriguing lady we have mentioned, was very beautiful—the regent the most lascivious of men. Ormond, doing the part of Sir Pandarus of Troy, brought the precious couple together, and Mrs. Olivia became, for a time, the mistress of the regent of France. But the Duke of Orleans was too thoroughly a man of the world to disclose his state secrets to his mistresses, and he changed them too often, and kept too many at a time, to allow any one lady to acquire any great influence over him; so that Ormond's scheme and Mrs. Trant's prostitution were little better than thrown away. Lord Stair, a man of as much address as Bolingbroke himself, was not idle; he got a clue to every mystery, and he positively demanded from the regent, that certain ships at Havre, which he named, and which he correctly alleged were equipped for the Pretender, should be given up to England. As this demand was seconded by the appearance of Admiral Byng off Havre with a stout squadron, the regent, though he would not give up the ships, laid an embargo on them, and seized the arms on board, which were deposited in the king's arsenal. It should appear, however, that the regent was either unable or unwilling to seize all these materials of war; for, on the 21st of September, Bolingbroke writes to the Pretender—"There are at Havre 1300 arms, 4000 weight of powder, and other stores on board another ship which is not yet discovered. I intend to send her, as I write, to Lord Mar."

Bolingbroke had been all along of opinion that the Scottish Jacobites could do little or nothing without the co-operation of the English, and that they ought to be kept quiet till the insurrection was fully organised south of the Tweed. He despatched a trusty messenger to Lord Mar; but, when that messenger arrived in London, he learned from Erasmus Lewis, a very active member of the conspiracy, that Mar had already gone to the Highlands to raise the standard of the Stuarts. This seemed a strange want of judgment and of concert; but the fact, as stated by the Duke of Berwick, the party most likely to know the truth and least disposed to speak ill of his half-brother, the Pretender, was, that that personage, unknown to Bolingbroke, who fondly believed that nothing was or would be done without his advice, had sent orders to Mar to begin the insurrection at once in Scotland. "The Earl of Mar," says Berwick, "who had been secretary of state for Scotland in the time of Queen Anne, and had been removed from that post by George, received, in the month of September, a secret order from the king, to go immediately into Scotland and take up arms. Neither Bolingbroke nor I knew anything of this, although we were his principal ministers, through whom all the correspondences in England and all the plans passed: this circumstance gave us no favourable opinion of the enterprise, since there could have been nothing concerted without our knowledge." There is another remark which is called for, though Berwick does not make it—it is this: that the Pretender must have been as unfeeling as he was foolish, since he could thus urge a few rash men to their inevitable destruction. Mar, however, had set out by sea from London, and taken with him Lieutenant-General Hamilton, who had served with distinction in Holland and Flanders, and who had been second to the Duke of Hamilton in his unfortunate duel, one Colonel Hay, another good officer, and two servants. He landed at Elie, in Fife, on the coast of the Frith of Forth, and immediately repaired to the house of John Bethune, of Balfour, who was called "the honest laird." From this laird's house Lord Mar soon went to the house of the laird of Invercauld: on his road he met several Fifeshire gentlemen, who complained that government was going to deprive them of their arms, and who were advised by this hair-brained revolutionist to gather in a body and rise at once, though nothing was ready, nothing even devised. At Invercauld, where he stayed about eight days, Mar held conferences and concerted something like a plan for future operations; and then he went to Aboyne, where he met Lord Huntley, Lord Tullibardine, the Earl Marshal, the Earl of Southesk, Glengarry, and others, and received messages from the Earl of Breadalbane and General Gordon. Mar pressed for an immediate rising, and the rest were absurd enough to follow his advice: and on the 6th of September (o. s.) Mar, who had collected an insignificant force, not exceeding 500 men, erected the standard of the Stuart at Brae Mar. On the 9th, he issued a declaration, calling upon the people to take arms, and assuming the title of lieutenant-general to King James.* But, thanks to the vigilance of Lord Stair and the manifold imprudences of the conspirators at home and abroad, the government was not taken by surprise. By an act of parliament just passed, the king was empowered to summon all the chiefs of the clans to Edinburgh by a certain day. The order had been sent down, and, though many of the Highland chiefs hesitated and eventually joined Mar, others repaired quietly to the capital, where an attempt by the insurgents to surprise the castle failed completely, because the persons employed neglected their business and sat drinking whisky in a public-house till it was too late. As soon as the government received intelligence that Mar was up in the Highlands, other orders were despatched to Edinburgh for apprehending suspected persons; and the Earls of Hume, Wigtoun, and Kinnoul, Lord Deskford, Mr. Lockhart of Carnwath, and Mr. Hume of Whitfield, were soon laid fast in Edinburgh Castle. Major-General Whetham was ordered to march with all the regular troops that could be spared to Stirling, where he was to occupy positions so as to secure the bridge and the passages of the Forth. The Duke of Argyll went down as commander-in-chief, and the Earl of Sutherland hastened to his part of the Highlands to raise his clans for the service of the House of Hanover. When the clans of Argyll and Sutherland were firmly united, the struggle, even if confined to the Highlands, was scarcely doubtful; and the followers of Argyll in particular, and every man that bore the name of Campbell, entertained an implacable hatred to the Stuarts.

But at this moment the attention of the government was distracted and its anxiety greatly increased by the discovery of a dangerous conspiracy in England, and by intelligence that the Duke of Ormond was expected on the coast of Devonshire to head a formidable insurrection. Ormond, it appears, was betrayed by one of his most active agents, by a certain Maclean, whom Bolingbroke sets down as a villain.* Forthwith the titular Duke of Powis, a Roman Catholic, Lord Lansdowne, and Lord Duplin were arrested, and a warrant was issued for the apprehension of the Earl of Jersey. At the same time a royal message was sent down to the Commons, informing them that his majesty, having just cause to suspect that Sir William Wyndham, Sir John Pakington, Mr. Edward Hervey, senior, Mr. Thomas Forster, junior, Mr. John Anstice, and Mr. Corbet Kynaston, were engaged in a design to support the invasion of the kingdom, had given orders for apprehending them. The messengers sent to apprehend Sir William Wyndham at his house in Somersetshire, not far from the place where Ormond had appointed to land, found him in bed: upon the baronet's coming out in his dressing-gown he was arrested, but, craving permission to return and take leave of his lady, he escaped by a secret door. Some important papers, however, were secured, and a few days after Wyndham, finding it impossible to escape, repaired to the house of his father-in-law, the Duke of Somerset, and surrendered himself. The duke offered to be his bail, but his offer was refused, and, for the violence of his language, and probably for other reasons, his grace was deprived of his high court office of master of the horse. Sir John Pakington was taken, examined, and then discharged. Mr. Hervey and Mr. Anstice were secured in prison; but Mr. Forster rose in rebellion in Northumberland; and Mr. Kynaston made his escape. Troops were hurried down to the west, Bristol was secured by the Earl of Berkeley, the lord-lieutenant of the county, who discovered and seized their several cases of fire-arms and about 200 horses prepared for the use of the insurgents. Exeter was looked to, and Plymouth well guarded; and Sir Richard Vivian, a stirring Cornish gentleman, was sent up to London in the custody of a king's messenger. Other west-country gentlemen were either watched or made fast; and this occurred also in other parts of the kingdom, where the lately insulted dissenters were active in making discoveries and directing the vengeance of government.

Oxford, the high church and Tory alma mater, had committed itself too deeply to escape suspicion and chastisement. "Here," says an undergraduate, "we fear nothing, but drink James's health every day." On the flight and attainder of the Duke of Ormond, the chancellor of the university, that learned body had elected his brother the earl of Arran; and, still further to show their principles and predilections, they reserved all their honorary degrees for non-jurors and high Tories. They also gave shelter to Colonel Owen and several other Jacobite officers who had been turned out of the army; and it soon became known to ministers that Owen was projecting an insurrection to go hand in hand with movements at Bristol, and other places. At this moment it was good to have a secretary of state who had been a soldier. Stanhope sent off General Pepper, a brave and determined officer, who had served under him in Spain; and Pepper, marching all night with a stout squadron of horse, entered the slumbering city of Oxford at day-break, on the 6th of October. As soon as he was there he summoned to his presence the vice-chancellor of the university and the mayor of the town, delivered a letter from Stanhope, and told them that he must seize eighteen suspected persons. It was said figuratively, that the Muses were scared at this sudden apparition of an armed force; but, whatever may have been the case as to the Muses, it appears quite certain that the gowned men were scared completely, particularly when the grim officer with the hot name told them that if any interruption were attempted, or any disturbance happened in the streets, he would order his men to fire. Pepper then began his search. Colonel Owen, who was lodging at the Grayhound Inn, leaped over a wall in his bed-gown and escaped into Magdalen College, where he was concealed; but ten or twelve of the other marked persons were taken, and the revolutionary aspirations of Oxford were effectually checked.

The Catholics in the north of England were more hardy and far more difficult to deal with. The Mr. Forster, junior, who had escaped from the warrant, began the movement in Northumberland, his native county; and he was soon joined by the young and gallant Earl of Derwentwater, who was descended from an illegitimate daughter of Charles II., and who had been also marked out for arrest. Both Forster and Derwentwater had intended to take up arms, but not so soon. As, however, the king's messengers were hunting for them, they thought there was nothing left for them to do but to fight for it, and they met at the small town of Rothbury, with a joint force not exceeding sixty horse. But proceeding to Warkworth they were joined by Lord Widdrington, another Catholic peer, with about thirty more horse. This Widdrington was the great-grandson of the Lord Widdrington, who was killed fighting for Charles II. in 1651, and who is one of the idols of the partial Clarendon. Forster was appointed general of this army of ninety men, and, in disguise, he proclaimed the Pretender at Warkworth, with sound of trumpet.* From Warkworth the insurgents marched by Alnwick to Morpeth, which they entered with about 300 horse. More, it is said, would have joined them on their march through Northumberland, but Forster and Derwentwater had no arms to give them, and thought it advisable to take up none but such as came mounted and equipped of themselves.

By this time these north-of-England insurgents had opened a correspondence with the Earl of Mar, who remained undecided and inactive on the skirts of the Highlands, and with Lord Kenmure, who had undertaken to head another insurrection in the south-west of Scotland, and who, on the 12th of October, proclaimed the Pretender at Moffat. Forster and Derwentwater had also their friends in Newcastle, and they seem to have expected an easy capture of that important city; but they were cruelly disappointed; the burghers of Newcastle, like those of all the thriving towns in the country, were zealous for the Protestant succession; they flew to arms, repaired their walls, and blocked up their gates; and Forster moved off to Hexham, to wait for reinforcements from the disaffected parts of Lancashire and from Lord Mar, who had promised to send some Scottish foot towards the borders. It appears that the Papists from Lancashire and Cheshire were not very alert in taking the field; but the insurrection continued to grow in the south-west of Scotland, where Kenmure was joined by the Earls of Nithsdale, Winton, and Carnwath, and by other Jacobites of name and influence. Kenmure having failed in an attempt to surprise Dumfries, resolved to unite his army—it amounted to some two hundred horsemen—with that of Mr. Forster, and, passing through Jedburgh, he crossed the borders and effected the junction near Rothbury. The united force, which is differently rated at from 600 to 800 horse, then faced about, crossed the Tweed, and entered the pleasant little town of Kelso, whither Mar had bargained to send Brigadier Mackintosh with two thousand foot. That rash earl, being joined by a considerable force under the Marquess of Tullibardine, was, some weeks before this, at the head of 6000 or 7000 men, nearly all foot, for he had scarcely more than three or four squadrons of horse. This infantry consisted solely of Highlanders, active, indefatigable, and as brave as steel; but sadly deficient in discipline, in arms, and even in gunpowder. One of the chieftains remarked that he feared these Highlanders would desert in three cases. 1. If they were long without being brought to action, they would tire and go home. 2. If they fought and were victorious, they would plunder and go home. 3. If they fought and were beaten, they would run away and go home.* As for the squadrons of horse, they were composed of Jacobite gentlemen and their dependents from Perth, Fife, and Angus, of men that were as ignorant of war as they were blind or short-sighted in their politics—and every laird among them considered himself entitled to dictate and command. On the other side, however, the Duke of Argyll and General Whetham could at first scarcely muster 2000 men—the whole regular force in Great Britain at the moment fell short of 8000—and, if Mar had at once led his Highlanders to battle, victory could scarcely have been doubtful. But Mar was an incompetent commander, and, we apprehend, deficient in courage. According to the Duke of Berwick, who would have made the struggle a far more serious one if he had had the command, Mar amused himself with forming his army, and settling all his affairs, as if he were sure of having all the time he wanted: had he marched forward he certainly could not have met with any opposition, and Argyll would have been obliged to quit Scotland; he might then have been able to put his army in order, to assemble a Scottish parliament, and to march to the borders, either to defend them against King George's troops, or to advance into England and join the friends of King James: but his little skill in military affairs made him lose this opportunity, and he allowed time to the troops that were marching from all quarters to join the Duke of Argyll.* Berwick adds, "A man may have a great deal of understanding, a great deal of personal bravery, and be a very able minister, without having the talents requisite for an enterprise of this nature. It is certain that Mar had them not; and we must not therefore wonder that he did not succeed. After he had drawn the sword, he did not know in what manner to proceed, and by that means missed the most favourable opportunity that had presented itself since the Revolution in 1688." But it should appear that by this time the Pretender had become suspicious and jealous of his able half-brother; and that, having never trusted him fully and frankly, he was now disposed wholly to withdraw his confidence and friendship from him.* At last, when the Covenanters in the Low Country had had good time to recover their spirits and sharpen their broadswords, Mar began to do something: he detached General Gordon to seize the Duke of Argyll's town and castle of Inverary, to check and chastise the Campbells, and then turn upon the English force from the west; and he threw two thousand men across the Forth, as promised, under the command of Brigadier Mackintosh of Borlum, a veteran distinguished by bravery, zeal, and military talent. Mackintosh's passage of the Frith of Forth, almost under the guns of three English men-of-war, was the brilliant episode of this campaign; yet some of the boats, with about forty men, were taken. The Earl of Strathmore, with some three hundred, was obliged to put in at the little island of May; and not above sixteen hundred men landed in the Lothians, at the ports of Aberlady and North Berwick, only a short morning's march from Edinburgh. That capital, unprovided with troops, was thrown into consternation; and, though Mackintosh had no orders to attack it, he was tempted by what he heard and saw, and, instead of pushing southward for Kelso, where Forster and Derwentwater expected him, he marched straight to Edinburgh, and occupied an eminence called Jock's Lodge, within a mile of that city. But he had stopped a night at Haddington to refresh his men; and Sir George Warrender, the provost of Edinburgh, a zealous Whig, and a man of courage and ability, had made good use of the time allowed him in barricading the gates, in arming the citizens, and in sending to the Duke of Argyll for succour. And Argyll, leaving a part of his force to watch the bridge at Stirling, was in full march with the rest upon the capital, and arrived there almost as soon as Mackintosh reached Jock's Lodge. The Jacobite brigadier therefore turned aside to Leith, and took up his quarters in a citadel which had been built in Oliver Cromwell's time, but had been since allowed to fall to ruin. On the following morning the Duke of Argyll appeared before the citadel with 1200 men, consisting of regular troops, the city guard, and volunteers from Edinburgh; and he summoned the Jacobites to surrender, threatening them with a refusal of quarter if they should oblige him to take the place by assault. A fiery Highland laird—the Laird of Kinnachin—answered this summons by a bold defiance. Surrender, he said, was a word they did not understand,—quarter they were determined neither to take nor to give,—and, as for an assault, if his grace were ready for that, they were no less prepared to receive him. Argyll dismounted, and examined minutely the half-dismantled citadel:—the ditch was dry; the demi-bastions were crumbling; but Mackintosh had mounted eight pieces of cannon, which he had taken out of ships in Leith harbour, upon the ramparts, had raised barricades, and had altogether put the place in so formidable an attitude, that it seemed to Argyll, who had no artillery with him, too rash an enterprise to attempt to carry it by storm, particularly as the force within was far superior in number to that which he had without. Argyll therefore marched back to Edinburgh to obtain some artillery; and Mackintosh, instead of taking that capital, was fain to steal out of the citadel of Leith under cover of night, and to direct his march, as originally intended, upon Kelso. He entered Musselburgh before midnight, and early on the following morning—Sunday, the 16th of October—he arrived at Seaton Place, the seat of the Catholic and Jacobite Earl of Winton. Here, however, he was only seven or eight miles from Edinburgh, and, fearing that Argyll would give pursuit, he examined the house and grounds, and fixed upon a strong garden wall as a covering for his men. In the mean while Mar had been informed of Mackintosh's movements, and, in order to prevent the pursuit in that direction, he advanced towards Stirling. General Whetham, who remained there with a very inferior force, was presently alarmed by the shrill sound of bagpipes and the appearance of loose columns of Highlanders; and he despatched a messenger with breathless speed to entreat Argyll to return to Stirling as soon as possible. This messenger, late on Sunday night, found Argyll preparing to attack Mackintosh at Seaton House on the following morning; but it was far more essential to prevent the rout of Whetham, and the approach upon Edinburgh of Mar, than to crush Mackintosh; and the duke quitted the capital between night and morning, and, with the whole force he had brought thence and a considerable number of volunteers, made a forced march back to Stirling. If Mar had been a Montrose or a Dundee he would have annihilated Whetham some hours before Argyll could come up; and with troops clad with victory he would have met the duke on his march, defeated him, and then taken possession of the capital. But, though this course was pointed out to him, Mar stayed deliberating and see-sawing at Dunblane, six miles from the English camp, till Argyll arrived at it; and then he called in his advanced divisions, wheeled round, and retreated upon Perth without striking a blow. On this retreat there was such a total want of discipline and military conduct, particularly on the part of the lairds and wadsetters that called themselves the cavalry, that, if they had been pursued, the army must inevitably have been scattered and destroyed. For nearly a month Mar lay at Perth, and Argyll at Stirling. In the mean while Mackintosh, after staying two days at Seaton House, marched across the hills of Lammermuir, and by the 22nd of October reached Kelso, where he found Lord Kenmure, Forster, and Lord Derwentwater. The insurgent force, Scotch and English, thus united, exceeded 2000 men. But they no sooner joined than they began to quarrel, the Scots proposing one plan of operation, the English another; and, while they were making a useless promenade along the Cheviot hills, General Carpenter, who had been sent to the north by Stanhope with 900 horse, got close in their rear, and watched their senseless proceedings. Mackintosh, who was not to blame for these blunders, halted at Langholm, and, seeing no hope of carrying the town of Dumfries, a project warmly recommended by the Scots, he was induced by the English insurgents to march southward and invade Lancashire, where they assured him of the co-operation of the numerous Roman Catholic gentry. Upon this decision 500 Scots, refusing to cross the borders, abandoned Mackintosh, and returned, some to the camp of the Earl of Mar, and some to their own houses in the mountains. By the 2nd of November, Mackintosh and Forster, with those who had chosen to follow them, were at Penryth in Westmoreland, where the posse comitatus had been called out to oppose them by the Bishop of Carlisle and Lord Lonsdale. But from eight to ten thousand unwarlike rustics fled in a panic before the insurgents, leaving a great many of their horses and rude weapons behind them. From Penryth the insurgents marched by Appleby and Kendal to Kirby Lonsdale, proclaiming the Pre-tender as they went, and seizing all the public money they could find. They were, however, disappointed at not being joined by the Catholic gentry of Cumberland and Westmoreland. The government had arrested the most considerable of these, and they were now fast in Carlisle Castle. But at Kirby Lonsdale, a considerable number of the Roman Catholic gentry of Lancashire, with whom Forster had been corresponding, came up and enrolled themselves. They then pushed forward for Lancaster, the capital of that county, which abounded with Papists. The notorious Colonel Charteris commanded in the town for King George: he proposed stopping the march of the rebels by blowing up the bridge over the Lōyne, but the inhabitants prevented this, forced the colonel to retire, and then opened their streets and spread their tables for the insurgents. From Lancaster they advanced to Preston, a town equally Jacobitish and Catholic, from which Stanhope's regiment of dragoons and a body of militia thought it prudent to retire. At Preston nearly all the Roman Catholic gentry of the districts joined, with their servants and tenantry; and Forster began to assume the airs of a conqueror, in spite of the misgivings of the veteran Mackintosh, who knew the value of such an undisciplined rabble.

In the mean time General Carpenter, leaving the range of the Cheviots behind him, had turned back into Northumberland, and by forced marches had reached the city of Durham, where he combined with General Wills, another distinguished officer, who had been sent down to the north-west some time before to quell the many riots and disorders that were the prelude to this insurrection. Wills presently concentrated six regiments of cavalry, for the most part newly raised, but commanded by experienced officers, at Manchester, whence he moved to Wigan. There it was arranged that Wills should march straight upon Preston, while Carpenter, advancing in another direction, should take the insurgents in flank. As the royalists approached, Mr. Forster, or General Forster as he was called, gave very satisfactory proof that he was no soldier;—he fell into a fright and confusion, and betook himself to his bed. But Lord Kenmore roused him, and in a hurried council, where all the gentlemen had a voice, and where those spoke loudest who knew least of war, a plan of defending Preston was adopted. But this plan, at least as executed, consisted merely in erecting a few barricades in the streets of the town, and in posting the men in the centre of it. Brigadier Mackintosh either knew not the ground, or his better judgment must have been overruled; for Preston offered many advantages as a defensive position, which were all entirely neglected. In the front of the town there was a bridge over the Ribble that might have been held by a handful of men; and from the bridge up to the town the road, for the distance of about half a mile, ran in a hollow between two high and steep banks. But river, bridge, and road were all left open to the assailants. When Wills rode up to the bridge and saw that it was not protected by so much as a musket, and that the road beyond it was unoccupied, he could scarcely believe his own eyes; and then he concluded that the insurgents must have abandoned Preston and begun their retreat to Scotland, so that there would be no fighting that day. But as he came up to the outskirts of the town he heard a tumultuous noise within; and saw the barricades which Forster had ordered to be thrown up; and he was soon saluted by a shower of musket-balls. He ordered his dragoons to dismount and attack two of the barricades. This service was gallantly performed; but the regulars were sorely galled by a fire from the houses as well as from behind the barricades; and as night began to fall Wills withdrew them, after they had suffered considerable loss. Early on the following morning General Carpenter came up with a part of his cavalry; and then Forster, who had scarcely lost a man, and whose force more than doubled that of all the regular troops, lost heart entirely, and, without consulting his friends, sent Colonel Oxburgh to propose a capitulation. General Wills, irritated by the loss he had sustained on the preceding evening, seemed at first disposed to reject the proposition altogether; but at last he agreed “that, if the rebels would lay down their arms, and surrender at discretion, he would protect them from being cut to pieces by the soldiers until further orders from the government.” When Oxburgh’s mission was known in the town, and the result of it, the more warlike portion of the insurgents were indignant and furious against the coward Forster, who, according to an eye-witness, would, if he had ventured out into the streets, have been slain though he had had a hundred lives. The brave Highlanders, seeing that nothing was to be expected from the Lancashire boors that had joined them, proposed rushing out sword in hand, and cutting their way through the king’s troops; but this would have now been a most desperate enterprise, and many of their chiefs thought it better to surrender. They gave up Lord Derwentwater and Colonel Mackintosh as hostages, and induced the clans to lay down their arms and submit. Including English and Scotch, only seventeen men had been killed in the defence of Preston: the Lancashire peasants and others got out of the town or escaped recognition; but fourteen hundred men were made prisoners by a thousand, or at most twelve hundred, English horse. The most distinguished of these captains were lords Derwentwater, Widdrington, Nithsdale, Winton, Carnwarth, Kenmore, Nairn, and Charles Murray; and members of the ancient northern families of Ord, Beaumont, Thornton, Clavering, Patten, Gascoigne, Standish, Swinburne, and Shafto.

Thus ingloriously ended the insurrection in England. On the very same day the banner of the Pretender was struck to the dust in Scotland. On the 10th of November Mar seemed to awaken from his long slumber, and, moving from Perth, he was joined by General Gordon, who had been very unsuccessful in his expedition into Argyllshire, but who brought, in addition to the forces he had carried with him, some reinforcements from the Western Highlands. When Mar counted his forces after this junction he found that they amounted to some ten thousand men, including about fifteen hundred foot, and two squadrons of horse that had been brought up by Lord Huntly. But of this force a considerable number had no proper arms; and the whole of the cavalry, whether composed of Lowland lairds or of Highlanders, was contemptible, and an object of ridicule even with their associates. In the interval the Duke of Argyll had received reinforcements of a very superior quality—veteran troops from Ireland; for, in despite of the advice formerly given by Father O’Connor, no care had been taken to revolutionise Ireland, though the Papists there were still for the most part Jacobites, and though any serious insurrection in that country must effectually have prevented the sending any troops to Argyll. Mar, however, having begun, continued his advance, and on the 12th of November he halted at Ardoch, about ten miles from Argyll’s position at Stirling. Argyll, upon learning his approach, boldly quitted the passes of the Forth, where his cavalry could not act, crossed the river, advanced to and occupied Dunblane, and resolved to give battle in the plain, though in so doing he must have the disadvantage of fighting with a river in his rear. He rode over an open moor, which, from having been the place of meeting and exercise for the militia of the sheriffdom of Menteith, was called the Sheriffmuir. The ground, though somewhat rough, admitted of cavalry evolutions and charges of horse, of which, much more than of any other arm, the wild Highlanders stood in dread; and therefore he resolved to make that place his battle-field. Mar did not keep him long waiting, though it appears somewhat doubtful whether that timid and unskilful general was either confident of success or disposed to fight at all. Upon coming in sight of Argyll's columns he called a council of war, and spoke of a retreat; but the Highlanders cried out, with one voice, "Fight! fight!" Then, without heeding the warning voice of Huntly, orders were given to form the field. "We were no sooner got to our posts," says one of the Highlanders, "than a huzza began, with tossing up of hats and bonnets, and it ran through our whole army, on the hearing we had resolved to fight. No man who had a drop of Scots blood in him but must have been elevated to see the cheerfulness of his countrymen on that occasion."* The infantry formed in admirable order, for at that work the Highlanders were peculiarly apt and quick. "I never," says General Wightman, "saw regular troops more exactly drawn up in line of battle, and that in a moment." But the horse was all wrong; three squadrons mistook the left for the right, abandoned an important position with which they had been entrusted, and began a confusion even before a shot was fired. The right of the insurgents was commanded by the Earl of Mar and Lord Drummond; the left by Gordon and Huntly; and General Hamilton, the best tactician on that side, acted as chief of the staff, and kept an eye on the whole line. Argyll had not more than 3500 men; but this number included three good cavalry regiments. The duke commanded the right, General Whetham the left, and General Wightman the centre. The battle began on Sunday morning, the 13th of November, with an attempt made by the Highlanders to outflank the king's troops, and by a tremendous fire opened by the Highlanders on the Duke of Argyll and his right wing. The duke suffered severely; but his tired soldiers kept their ground, extended their lines, and leant upon a morass. Upon examining this swamp, which was usually impassable, Argyll perceived that it was frozen over by the last night's frost; and he instantly threw Major Cathcart and a squadron of horse across it; and, while Cathcart took the Highlanders in flank, the duke, leading the attack in person, charged them full in front with the rest of his cavalry. After a desperate resistance the clans thus assailed gave way; but there was no running, and not much disorder; for they retreated slowly with their faces to the enemy, and in the short distance of two miles they attempted ten times to rally. But at length, when the battle had raged nearly three hours, the Highlanders were driven beyond the river Allan, in whose waters not a few of them perished. But while Argyll had been gaining these advantages his left wing had been signally defeated by the right of the insurgents, who rushed upon the English infantry before they were well formed. This headlong ardour of the Highlanders was somewhat cooled by an English bullet which mortally wounded their chief, Clan Ronald, a brave veteran who had served abroad under the Duke of Berwick, and who was famed at home for his hospitality and feudal state: but Glengarry, who had carried the royal standard at Killcranky, throwing his bonnet into the air, cried out, in Gaelic, "Revenge to-day, and mourning to-morrow;" and then the Highlanders rushed forward to the muzzles of the English muskets, pushed aside the bayonets with their light targets, fell upon the infantry with their broad-swords, and drove them from the field; and in a very few minutes the whole of Argyll's left wing was broken and routed, General Whetham galloping from the field in such a panic as never to draw rein till he got to Stirling. Argyll was away with the right; but General Wightman kept the centre in tolerable order, though even there some troops turned their faces towards Stirling, and ran after Whetham. If the insurgent horse had charged this wavering centre at the proper moment it must have been broken; but the insurgent horse, as we have hinted, was worth nothing, the opportunity was lost, and General Wightman moved away to the right with three regiments of foot, and then followed in the footsteps of Argyll, who halted on the bank of the Allan, ignorant of the fate of his left wing. The duke, however, was soon informed of the flight of Whetham, and then he wheeled round and joined Wightman and the three regiments as they were advancing to meet him. In the mean time the Earl of Mar, equally ignorant of the discomfiture and rout of his left wing, had pushed after Whetham as far as Corn-toun; but there he was brought to a halt by intelligence that his left was in full retreat, and that Argyll was following them to the Allan. He had thereupon marched back to Sheriffmuir and taken up his position on an eminence which offered several advantages both offensive and defensive. Mar was on that eminence when Argyll with his tired troops began to wind round it in the design of getting to Dunblane. Argyll and Wightman saw the danger they were in, and, fully expecting an attack down hill, they drew up their men behind some inclosures, and put two pieces of cannon in their front. "If," says Wightman, "they had either had courage or conduct, they might have entirely destroyed my body of foot." "If," says Scott, "they had but thrown down stones they might have disordered Argyll's troops." But Mar, it appears, had had fighting enough: he neglected all his advantages, stood at gaze, and when Argyll began to move again round the foot of the hill, he descended from it in the opposite direction. One of the highland chiefs—Gordon of Glenbucket—exclaimed, "Oh! for an hour of Viscount Dun-dec!" Mar fell back upon Ardoch, and Argyll, scarcely believing his own good fortune and his adversary's cowardice or stupidity, went quietly on to Dunblane, where he fixed his quarters for the night. The insurgents are said to have lost in this strange battle of Sheriffmuir 700 in killed, including the young Earl of Strathmore and other men of rank, and 200 in prisoners, among whom was Lord Strathallan. The Earl of Panmuir and other noblemen had been taken also, but had been liberated in the affray. The loss of the king's army is stated at 400 in killed and wounded, and nearly 200 in prisoners, the Earl of Forfar and Colonel Lawrence being among the latter. On the following morning Argyll kept possession of the field of battle, and showed as his trophies four pieces of artillery, thirteen stand of colours, two standards, and the royal standard of the Stuarts called "The Restoration." But he was in no condition to follow up the insurgents, who had also their trophies to show: he withdrew to Stirling, the Earl of Mar to Perth—the points from which they had respectively moved to fight the battle.

In France the most wonderful reports had been spread of the success of the insurrection both in Scotland and in England; and it was some time before men could believe in the catastrophe of Preston, and the serious check at Sheriffmuir. Nearly every possible effort had been made to induce the Regent Orleans to espouse the cause of the Pretender, and to assist him openly with troops; and more than once these efforts, being no doubt seconded by false or most exaggerated accounts of success from England, seemed to have an effect on that dissolute and ease-loving prince. On the 1st of October the vigilant Lord Stair was informed that "there was a man arrived from England with letters, who came over as a servant to a French gentleman; that the party was mightily up; that they depended upon succeeding in England; that the regent would be favourable to them; that the Pretender had had all his things given back to him, his plate and his equipage in the Scotch ships that were unloading in the night; and that the powder and ammunition were secured for his use." In the course of the same night Stair was further informed that the Duke of Ormond was to go into England, to land in Wales, or on the coast of the Severn; that Bolingbroke and he were to go by Bordeaux or by some place on the west coast of France, where there was no suspicion; that both Ormond and Bolingbroke had been secretly with the regent, and had been well received; and, finally, that it was now resolved that the Pretender should not go himself either into Scotland or into England, till the Tories had declared for him. Two days after this, Stair waited upon the regent, and "gave him thanks for seizing the arms and ammunition at Havre, and for refusing to see Ormond and Bolingbroke." "The regent," continues Stair, "looked very cool, and seemed to have a great mind to have a short conference. I told him that his royal highness was in the right the other day, when he told me the Pretender did not intend to depart; that I had since discovered their design was not to pull off the mask at first, but to act under the disguise of the church; but that it was the same thing under what disguise they went, as we were very well informed of their designs, and of the manner they intended to carry them on." As the danger to the Hanoverian succession seemed to grow in England, Stair waited upon the regent with fresh assurances of the friendship of King George, who would regard his royal highness's interests as his own, and never give him leave to repent of any good offices that he and the French government might do him at this time; and, as something more positive, Stair informed the regent that King George had sent him full powers to conclude a treaty mutually guaranteeing the two successions, and for the assurance and maintenance of the French regency under his royal highness. He represented that, as this treaty was likely to be the foundation of a peace for the two kingdoms and for all Europe, the king, his master, had been unwilling to lose a moment in beginning it: but, on the other side, he represented that, if the regent sought for delays, the English government would attend to putting down the rebellion in Scotland before concluding any treaty. His royal highness must know what suited his own interests, and the interests of France—England would not press him, but would attend to her own affairs, and take her own course, being able to wait with patience for the conclusion of this treaty.* In the month of November, when the course of the Pretender's affairs seemed successful in England, the regent carefully avoided Stair, who waited upon him four times at court without being able to obtain an audience, or even to see him.† Even when news arrived that the insurrection had been put down in England, and that the rebels had surrendered at discretion in Preston, the Duke of Orleans shunned an interview, and the Jacobites manfully asserted that the news was altogether false, and that, so far from surrendering, General Forster and Lord Derwentwater were in full march upon London. But, when the dispatch of the English government was confirmed, and when it was known that Mar, if he had not been beaten, had certainly not obtained a victory, the whole tone and demeanor of the regent's court changed at once. "At the court," says Lord Stair, "they are now all astonishment: the wisest now begin to treat the Chevalier de St. George as a pretender." Two days ago he was the king of England everywhere, and every one had thrown off the mask—there was no longer a single Frenchman, scarcely a person attached to this court, that put his foot within my
