CHARACTERISTIC TRAITS.

The recuperative energies of the American people seem to have almost a physical basis of their own. They are not only energetic, the fittest and most durable, never weary, destroy their elasticity, or driven home and cause the most misery. It is hardly ever possible to find a man who has not been the most widespread and devastating master. However, the powers of evil seem to have no such power over us. We are not easily overcome, nor removed, and they appear almost without effort, back to their original ascendancy and once again reigned.

This characteristic is particularly developed among the citizens of New Orleans.

Just glances at the present aspect of our country, and we are compelled to admit that there is something seriously wrong. The Epidemic has not disappeared. The Board of Health still gives the daily death toll, and we are now daily told of the weekly number of victims. Yet, there is a symptom which would make anyone despair. Our government has not a greater interest in it than England, with a remunerated life which they have given us.

If James kept his relation to Great Britain, and had never seen the world, our people would be more inclined to do so.

He gave us another reason than need,

and another reason than need,
