

Boston, March 3, 1843.

Dear bro. George:

I am happy to send you the intelligence, that, since my last letter, mother has continued steadily to improve in health, and may now be regarded as decidedly convalescent, and therefore out of danger. She is, of course, yet weak, but her appetite is good, and by care it will not be long before she will be about the house again.

I do not know who was the author of the communication from Dorchester, that was published in the Liberator, giving a thrust at your Association about equal rights, &c. I published it without note or comment, feeling quite certain that I should be furnished with such a reply, as was sent to me by Wm. Adams, a man who would be constantly rising in my estimation, if that were possible; for I have long regarded him as one of the noblest specimens of manhood to be found among our race.

We (that is, myself and household) are highly gratified at the fiscal success of your operations, thus far, and trust you will have no occasion, on any ground, to regret the experiment you are making.

The bearer of this, (a son of Peleg Clarke, of Coventry,) is probably well known to you. He informs me that he visits Northampton to take a peep at your little community, with some intention of becoming an individual part of it.

I talk of leaving Cambridgeport, by and by, and removing to the city. Ellis Gray Loring is desirous that we should occupy his house, and we shall probably do so, but not till the fall. Our friends in Lynn are anxious to have me locate myself in ~~that~~ place. James St. Buffum has an excellent house to let, in a very pleasant situation. On some accounts, I should like to reside in Lynn; but the distance is rather too great from the city.

Give our united loving remembrances to Catherine, and our friendly regards to all who are with you.

Yours, ever,
Wm. Lloyd Garrison
