B O O K XI.

HE time fettled for the agreement about the marquifate of Saluces, of which the terms were referred to the pope, had lapfed without any decifion by his holinefs, because the duke of Savoy, who knew better than any other person that it could not be favourable for him, had, to * elude the sentence, made use of all those arts that were generally practised in this little court, whose policy it was, when its safety or advantage was in question, to employ cunning, treachery, submission, and the appearance of the strongest attachments. The first thought that presented itself to the duke of Savoy's mind was, to revoke an agreement which had only been made to gain time, or with a hope that France would embroil itself with the holy see: but as this proceeding seemed too disingenuous, he had recourse to another artistice to make the pope voluntarily resign the arbitration: he apprised his ambassador at Rome, that he had certain intelligence from France and Italy that Clement VIII. had suffered himself to be gained by the king, on a private condition, that his most christian majesty should engage to yield afterwards to the pope himself all his claims upon the marquilate of Saluces. The ambassador, who was first imposed upon by his master, explained himself in such a manner upon this collusion, that his holiness, who had only accepted of the arbitration for the advantage of both parties, resigned it with indignation.

THE duke of Savoy, who had not doubted but that the pope would act in this manner, gave the king, however, to understand, that he would rely entirely upon him, without having recourse to any foreign arbitration upon the dispute. He thought, by piquing this prince upon his honour, to obtain that which was the subject of their contest, which he took care to have represented to him, as a thing of such small value, that it could not merit the attention of so great a king. And it was with these instructions that the sieurs de Jacob, de La-Rochette, de Lullins, de Bretons, and de Roncas, the duke of Savoy's agents, came to Paris.

WITH views of this nature the minister and the confidant of the prince is commonly the person whom they begin to engage in their interest, or (to be plainer) whom they endeavour to corrupt; and if he should not appear very virtuous, do not even conceal from him the defign with which they come, and in their discourse make no longer any use of that caution which is observed in a congress. These gentlemen therefore told me, that their master did not pretend to hold the marquifate of Saluces of his majesty any otherwise than as a meer gift of his munificence; and at the same time infinuated to me plainly enough, that this prefent would produce from the duke of Savoy advantages for me proportionable to the importance of the request, and my folicitude to fecure its fuccess. I would not feem to underftand these last words; and with regard to the first, I told the agents drily, that fince, as they well knew, no one could bestow upon another what was not immediately in his own possession, it was necessary the duke of Savoy should first begin by resigning all claim to the marquifate of Saluces; and that then his majetty, who I assured them had no less greatness of mind than his highness, would use his power royally. And I very earnestly intreated them to address themselves directly to the king: which they did, discouraged with the manner I spoke to them. Henry treated them with great civility, but appeared fo resolute upon every thing that regarded the state, that after several veral useless attempts, they laid aside all thoughts of succeeding this 1599.

FINDING all France, and the court itself, filled with malecontents and mutinous persons, they imagined that by puthing them on to some violent refolution, they might give Henry fufficient employment within his kingdom, to make him lofe fight of all that paffed without. The duke of Savoy's presence appeared to them absolutely necessary to engage more closely those lords that listened to their suggestions, and they wrote to him, that his interest required that he should take a journey to Paris. This project was perfectly fuited to the duke's character *: he consented to it, and ordered them to demand his majesty's leave for that purpose; which the king would have denied, if he could have done it with any appearance of reason. But the duke of Savoy had deprived him of the least pretence, by protesting, that he undertook this journey, in order that he might himself treat with his majesty; or rather, that he came to submit entirely to the king's will. This declaration he accompanied with fo many complaints against Spain, that he feemed to be upon the point of coming to an open rupture with that crown; and that henceforward he would place all his hopes of fecurity on an union with France. He had a short time before refused an advantageous proposal made him by the king of Spain, to fend his fon and his eldest daughter to the court of Madrid, to appear there as princes of the blood-royal of Spain.

By this ftep of the duke of Savoy, the pope was fully determined to concern himfelf no further with the affair of Saluces: but nothing could make the king neglect two things, which from the very first appeared to him absolutely necessary; namely, to give up no part of that satisfaction which was due to him by the duke, and to discover all his transactions with the malecontents of his court.

Among these the king always gave marechal Biron the first rank. His majesty knew, that during the stay this marechal made in Guienne, he had solicited the nobility of that province to engage in his interests; and that at his own table he had had such conversations with them, as proved him to be an enemy to the royal authority. All this might have been attributed to the pride and insolence of his disposi-

* It is faid, that this prince, during his refidence at the court of France, one day let fall the following words, "I am not

1500, tion; but what gave most weight to this behaviour was, that his intrigues at the court of Savoy, although carried on with all possible caution, came at the fame time to his majesty's knowledge. And the journey the king took this year to Blois, had in reality no other motive than to disconcert the projects of Biron, and to retain the people in their duty; but in public, the king talked of it as a party of pleafure, to pass the summer in that agreeable climate, and to eat, he said, some of the excellent melons there. His removal from Paris likewife. in the state things then were, was a matter of indifference.

> I ATTENDED his majesty, whose stay at Blois produced nothing of confequence enough to be mentioned: he passed his time there in the employment I have already mentioned, and in endeavouring to procure the so earnestly defired dissolution of his marriage with Margaret of Valois. As long as the duchefs of Beaufort lived, no one was folicitous to press Henry to a divorce, either because they apprehended that their endeavours would turn to the advantage of his mistress, who was univerfally hated, or that they did not care to expose themselves to the rage of this woman; who was always to be feared, even though her defigns should not succeed: but as foon as she was dead, there was a general combination of the parliament, all the other bodies, and the people, to folicit him on this fubject. The procurer-general came to his majesty, and intreated him to give his subjects this satisfaction. The king, though he was not determined upon his choice, promifed, however, to yield to the defires of his people.

I now refumed my correspondence with queen Margaret with more ardour than before: I had taken no pains to remove the obstacle which this princess made, on madam deBeaufort's account, to the confent that was required of her; for I looked upon it as a refource to which, probably, every one must have applied; and it was this only that could have restrained the court of Rome, if the king had suffered himself at last to be gained by his mistres: besides, the compliance I observed in Margaret affured me that she did not make it a pretence for an absolute refusal. I was confirmed in this opinion by the answer she wrote me from Uffon, to a letter I had just fent her, in which I mentioned the facrifice that was expected from her, in very respectful but in very clear terms, as such negotiations require. Margaret, on her fide, to shew that she perfectly understood what was to be done, explained herfelf abfolutely upon the bill of divorce, annexing to it fuch reasonable conditions as took away all difficulty for the future; she

It was not easy to find a man who was more capable of bufiness: he brought his majesty an answer from Margaret *; for the king thought he likewise was under a necessity of writing to her, which he did with equal goodness and complaifance, but in terms far less explicit than I had done. With the letters, Langlois brought a flate of this princess's demands, which were immediately granted. To render the thing more firm, Langlois undertook to make her write to the pope in terms that gave his holiness to understand, that she was far from being constrained to this act; that she had the same solicitude for the conclusion of this fair as all France had. D'Osfat, provided with a writing of the same kind, found no more obstacles: he was feconded by Sillery, who endeavoured to efface the scandal of his first commission. The holy father used no more delays in granting the favour that was demanded of him, than what decency and ceremony required; and did not fuffer himfelf to be influenced by fuggestions of envious persons, a detestable fort of men who are to be found in every place. He appointed the bishop of Modena, his nephew and nuncio, to put the finishing hand to this affair, which could be only done in France; affociating with him two commissioners of that nation, the archbishop of + Arles, and the cardinal de Joyeuse: the course they were to take, was to declare the parties free from all engagements, by the nullity of their marriage.

WHILE this affair was haftening towards a conclusion, Henry returned to Fontainebleau; and giving great part of his time to diver-

+ Horace del Monte, the archbishop of Arles, and Francis de Joyeuse, the second fon of William de Joyeuse. These three commissaries having met in the palace of Henry de Gondy, bishop of Paris, after maturely examining the reasons alledged on both fides, declared the marriage void, by reason of consanguinity, different religion, fpiritual affinity, compulsion, and for want of the confent of one of the parties: for Henry IV. and Margaret de Valois were related in the third degree; the mother of Jane d'Albert, who also was called Margaret, being the fifter of Francis I. See the history and pieces concerning this divorce in Matthieu, tom. II. b. ii. De Thou, liv. cxxiii. La Chronologie Septennaire, ann. 1599.

fions, and the pleasures of the table, heard mademoiselle d'Entragues * often mentioned. The courtiers, eager to flatter his inclination for the fair, spoke so advantageously of the beauty, wit, and sprightlines of this young lady, that the king had a desire to see her, and became immediately passionately enamoured of her. Who could have foreseen the uneasiness this new passion was to give him! but it was Henry's fate, that the same weakness which obscured his glory, should likewise destroy the tranquillity of his life.

THE lady was no novice: although fensible of the pleasure of being beloved by a great king, yet ambition was her predominant paffion; and the flattered herfelf the might make fo good use of her charms, as to oblige her lover to become her hufband. She did not therefore feem in hafte to yield to his defires; pride, chaftity, and interest, were employed in their turns; she demanded no less than one hundred thousand crowns for the price of her favours. And perceiving that she had only increased Henry's passion, by an obstacle, in my opinion, much more likely to cool it, fince his majefty was obliged to fnatch this fum from me by violence, she no longer despaired of any thing, and had recourse to other artifices; she alledged the restraint her relations + kept her in, and the fear of their resentment. The prince endeavoured to remove all these scruples, but could not fatisfy the lady, who taking a favourable opportunity, at length declared, that she would never grant him any thing unless he would give her a promife, under his hand, to marry her in a year's time. It was not upon her own account, the faid (accompanying this strange request with an air of modesty, with which she well knew how to enflame the king) that she asked for this promise, to her a verbal one had been fufficient, or, indeed, she would have required none of any kind, being fenfible that her birth did not allow her to pretend to that ho-

The writings of thofe times reprefent her as not fo beautiful, though younger, than the fair Gabrielle, and ftill more gay, ambitious, and enterprizing. This fketch, which correfponds with what the duke de Sully fays here, will be very much confirmed in the fequel of these Memoirs.

+ This fear was not entirely without foundation. If we may believe the marechal de Baffompierre, in his Memoirs, her mother was indeed very condefcending in this affair; and it was even the that drew the king to Maletherbes, a houfe where the lived: but her father was not fo complying, any more than the count d'Auvergne, half-brother by the mother to the lady. They wanted to pick a quarrel with the count de Lude, whom Henry IV. employed upon this occasion; and they carried the lady to Marcoussis, where the king nevertheles went to see her. Tom. I.

nour, but that she would have occasion for such a writing, to serve as an excuse for her sault to her relations; and observing that the king still hesitated, she had the address to hint, that in reality she should look upon this promise as of very little consequence, knowing well the king was not to be summoned to a court of justice like one of his common subjects.

What a striking example of the tyranny of love! Henry was not so dull but that he plainly perceived this girl endeavoured to deceive him: not to mention likewise those reasons he had to believe her far from being a vestal, or those intrigues against the state of which her father, mother, her brother, and even herself, had been convicted, and had drawn upon this family an order to leave Paris, which I had so lately signified to them from his majesty; notwithstanding all this, the king was weak enough to comply with his mistress's desires, and promised to grant her request.

One morning, when he was preparing to go to the chace, he called me into the gallery at Fontainebleau, and put this shameful paper into my hands. It is a piece of justice, which I am so much the more obliged to do Henry, as the reader must perceive that I do not endeayour to palliate his faults, to acknowledge that, in the greatest excesses to which he was hurried by his passions, he always submitted to a candid confession of them, and to consult with those persons whom he knew were most likely to oppose his defigns. This is an instance of rectitude and greatness of foul, rarely to be found amongst princes. While I was reading this paper, every word of which was like the flab of a poignard, Henry fometimes turned afide to conceal his confufion, and fometimes endeavoured to gain over his confidant by condemning and excusing himself by turns; but my thoughts were wholly employed upon the fatal writing. The clause of marrying a mistress, provided the bore him a fon in the space of a year (for it was conceived in these terms) appeared indeed ridiculous, and plainly of no effect; but nothing could relieve my anxiety, on account of the shame and contempt the king must necessarily incur, by a promise which, sooner or later, would infallibly make a dreadful confusion. I was also afraid of the consequences of such a step in the present conjucture whilst the divorce was depending; and this thought rendered me filent and motionless.

HENRY, feeing that I returned him the paper coldly, but with a visible agitation of mind, faid to me, "Come, come, speak freely, "and

" and do not affume all this referve." I could not immediately find words to express my thoughts, nor need I here affign reasons for my perplexity, which may be eafily imagined by those who know what it is to be the confidant of a king, on occasions when there is a necessity of combatting his resolution, which is always absolute and unalterable. The king again affured me, that I might fay and do what I pleased without offending him; which was but a just amends, he said, for having forced from me three hundred thousand livres. I obliged him to repeat this affurance feveral times, and even to feal it with a kind of oath; and then no longer hefitating to discover my opinion, I took the paper out of the king's hands and tore it to pieces, without faying a word. " How!" faid Henry, aftonished at the boldness of this action, " Morbieu! what do you mean to do? I think you are mad." I am mad, I acknowledge, fire, replied I, and would to God I was the only madman in France. My resolution was taken, and I was prepared to fuffer every thing rather than, by a pernicious deference and respect, to betray my duty and veracity; therefore, notwithstanding the rage I saw that instant impressed on the king's countenance, while he collected together out of my hands the torn pieces of the writing, to serve as a model for another, I took advantage of that interval to represent to him, in a forcible manner, all that the subject may be imagined to fuggest to me. The king, angry as he was, listened till I had done speaking, but, overcome by his passion, nothing was capable of altering his resolution; the only effort he made was not to banish a confidant too sincere. He went out of the gallery without faying a fingle word to me, and returned to his closet, whither he ordered Lomenie to bring him a standish and paper; he came out again in half a quarter of an hour, which he had employed in writing a new promife. I was at the foot of the staircase when he descended; he paffed by without feeming to fee me, and went to Malesherbes to hunt, where he staid two days.

I was of opinion that this incident should put no stop to the affair of the divorce, nor hinder another wife from being sought for for the king, but rather that it should hasten both: his majetty's agents at Rome made therefore the first overture of a marriage between Honry and the princes Mary of Medicis*, daughter to the grand duke of Florence. The king suffered us to proceed in this business, and, by the force of repeated importunities, even named the constable, the chancellor, Villeroi, and me, to treat with the person whom the grand duke should send to Paris. We were resolved not to let the affair sleep. Joannini, the person deputed by the grand duke, was no sooner arrived, than the articles were instantly drawn and signed by us all.

I was pitched upon to communicate this news to the king, who did not expect the business would have been concluded so suddenly. As foon as I replied to his question from whence I came, " We come, " fire, from marrying you," this prince remained a quarter of an hour as if he had been struck with a thunderbolt. He afterwards walked up and down his chamber haftily, delivering himfelf up to reflections, with which his mind was fo violently agitated, that for a long time he could not utter a word. I did not doubt but that all I had represented to him had now a proper effect: At length recovering himfelf like a man who had taken his resolution," Well!" faid he, rubbing his hands together, " well, depardieu! be it so, there is no remedy: if for the good " of my kingdom I must marry, I must." He acknowledged to me, that the fear of fucceeding no better in his fecond than his first marriage was the cause of his irresolution. Strange caprice of the human mind! A prince who had extricated himself with glory and success from a thousand cruel diffensions, which war and policy had occasioned, trembled at the very thoughts of domestic quarrels, and feemed more troubled than when, that very year, upon notice fent from a capuchin of Milan*, an Italian, who had come to Paris with an intention to poignard him, was feized in the midst of the court. The marriage, though concluded on, was not folemnized till the following year.

OTHER foreign affairs in this, which remain to be mentioned, are thefe; the war in the Low Countries, which was vigoroufly begun when the archduke went into those provinces; the king, upon reiterated complaints from spain, forbad his subjects to bear arms in the service of the States, but this was merely for form's sake, policy not permitting him to suffer the Flemings to be oppressed. His majesty not only forbore to punish those who disobeyed these orders, but likewise affished that people privately: the war in Hungary, which I shall say made him by his ambassador at Romes Matthieu, tom. II. liv. ii. p. 302.

> WITH respect to my own personal affairs, this was the most considerable. This year the princess d'Epinoi +, came to me when I was at Blois, to engage my interest with the king against the princes of Ligne, who had attempted to usurp her estate, and that of her children. These children were five in number, four of whom, three fons and her eldest daughter, she had brought with her; the youngest was educated under the care of madam de Roubais, widow of the vifcount de Gand her uncle and mine. The princess told me, that the nearest relation by the father's fide which her children had in France being myfelf, it was fit I should be their guardian. I accepted willingly of this trust, to procure them justice; and had the satisfaction at the end of feven years, during which time I took the fame care of these children as my own, to restore to them the possession of all their estates, which amounted to a hundred and twenty thousand livres a year. I shall have occasion hereafter, to take notice of the obligations they received from his majesty.

> About the fame time the merchants of Tours came to intreat my affiftance in procuring leave for them to establish manufactures of filks. and of gold and filver stuffs, which had not yet been made in France, together with a prohibition for importing any from foreign countries for the future, affuring me that they had fufficient for to fupply the whole kingdom. Before I gave them their answer, I required time to examine if their report was true; and being convinced it was not, I endeavoured to diffuade them from an enterprife which could not mifcarry with impunity: I could not prevail. Upon my refufal they addreffed themselves directly to his majesty. I thought it necessary not to oppose an establishment, which, if well conducted, might be of great use. The king, overcome by their importunity, granted all they asked; but fix months were scarce passed, when, for want of having taken proper measures, they came to get their commissions revoked, which had given general discontent, on account of the inconveniency and increase of expence to the purchasers, which had been produced by this new regulation *.

THE king believing the affair of the marquifate of Saluces would not be finished without striking a blow for it, had, for some time, thought of getting a man to perform the duties of grand master of the ordnance, who was capable of acquitting himself well of them, and above all of acting by himfelf; this good old d'Estrées was not able to do: however, his majefty would not take away the post from him for his children's fake, of whom monfieur d'Estrées was the grandfather; but the expedient he hit upon was, that the elder de Born being defirous of refigning the post of lieutenant general of the ordnance, I might treat with him for it, and unite the duties of that employment to those of the grand master of the ordnance, although I was not invested with this last. He even offered, in my favour, to augment the privileges of the first, already very confiderable, by raising it into an office, giving it authority over all the lieutenant-generals in the provinces, augmenting the falary, and lastly by granting the patents gratis. However, I must acknowledge, that I was not to be won by these offers, and could not refolve to ferve under another, after having been disappointed of the first place: I therefore excused myself, upon the business I was already charged with, from not complying with the king's intentions. The king was not to be imposed upon by this answer, and, after many solicitations which I knew how to defend myself against, he left me in anger, telling me that he would mention it to me no more, but, that fince I would liften to nothing but my own caprice, he would take his own way.

* The murmurings of the bankers and the public farmers of the revenue, whose profits the new prohibition had considerably diminished, likewise contributed not a little to its revocation. Chronologie Septennaire, p. 94. an. 1599. The case is the same with regard to these sufficient and the other parts of traffic. The freedom of trade which should subside between all the nations of the world, will not give us, in this respect, any advantage over our neighbours, farther than we can find out the methods of manufacturing these stuffs ourselves of a more betterful, finer, ocheaper fabric. At this very day a great number of foreigners take them off our hands, and the prohibition is in force only as to Indian stuffs and printed linens; but it were to be wished that we would be more careful to forbear the use of the latter, or rather make in France such itusts as would ferve instead of these which are fo commodious and serviceable.

His kindness for me made him that moment forget this threat. He caused a proposal to be made to monsieur de Estrées to resign this employment, which, as foon as I was informed of, I offered, by monfieur and madam du Peche, three thousand crowns to madam de Nery, who governed the old man entirely, to procure his confent; the master of the ordnance being importuned by this woman, told the king that he was willing to accept of an equivalent for his post. The king immediately acquainted me with his refolution, adding, that he required nothing of me for the offence I had given him, but to put his artillery into a condition to obtain the marquifate of Saluces for him, which, he was every day more convinced, would not be yielded without force, that is to fay, without a great number of very difficult fieges; for that is the usual way of carrying on a war in Savoy. I thanked his majesty, and agreed with d'Estrées for eighty thousand crowns; all these petty claims rising to a considerable sum more, I was, on this occasion, obliged to take up rents to the value of a hundred thousand crowns from Morand, Vienne, and Villemontée; and three days afterwards I was folemnly invested with the dignity * of grand mafter of the ordnance, and took the usual oath for it. was the fourth great office with which I was then honoured; the annual produce of it was twenty four thousand livres. I thought myfelf obliged, in gratitude to his majesty for this last instance of his bounty, to give all my cares to the artillery. I vifited the arfenal, where every thing feemed to me in fuch a miferable condition, that I refolved to take up my refidence there, that I might apply myfelf wholly towards its re-establishment, although this castle was then very ill built and destitute of every conveniency.

THE affairs of the artillery were still worse. I began by a reform of the officers of this body, who, not having the slightest notion of their trade, were, in fact, only the servants of the officers of the court of justice. I cashiered about five hundred of them at one stroke. I conferred next with the commissaries for saltpetre, and agreed with them for a confiderable provision of powder, which I shewed to the king. I treate I likewise with the masters of great iron-works, for iron to make carriages and bombs; with foreign merchants for the metal; and with cart-wrights and carpenters, for the wood-work necessary for the designs I had formed. His majesty came to visit his arsenal himself, fifteen days after I was settled there; and these visits became afterwards one of his chief amusements: he took pleasure in seeing all the preparations that were making there, and the extreme diligence with which I applied myself to them.

THAT diligence indeed was no more than necessary in the present posture of affairs in Savoy, the detail of which, and that of the war they produced, will make up the subject of these Memoirs for all the following year. It was at the end of this, that the duke of Savoy left his own dominions to come into France with those intentions I have already mentioned, but they were too well known to produce those effects he had promifed himself from his artifices. The reflections which the past conduct of this prince, together with that of his agents, and a knowledge of his character gave rife to, were far from being favourable to him. There was likewise something still more certain against him: Lesdiguieres had sent advice to his majesty, that the duke was fortifying his castles and towns with great care, especially those of Breffe, and furnishing them with ammunition and provisions. It was known, by means of the count de Carces and the fieur du Passage, that he had ftrongly folicited the court of Madrid, and preffed the pope; to procure a fecond reference of the affair; representing to him, that it was the interest of all Italy not to suffer that his most christian majesty should possess any thing beyond the Alps. The French residents at Florence fent advice, that the duke's purpose, by coming into France, was to circumvent the king; who, on his fide, was perfuaded, that it was M. de Savoy himself that would be the dupe, not only of him, but of the king of Spain and other princes of Italy; for these last were at no pains to conceal their diflike of the duke of Savoy's ambitious and restless spirit: and the king of Spain had not forgot the public complaints he made, that while they gave the Low Countries and Franche Compté, of more value than the two Castiles and Portugal, as a portion for one of their infantas, the other, whom he had married, had nothing but a crucifix and an image of the Virgin Mary. Many other indecent fallies of the like nature, followed by reciprocal complaints, had absolutely ruined their former good correspondence.

The event proved the justness of those observations which the letter the king shewed me from Lessignieres occasioned; but in public he shewed no resentment at what he had learned of the duke's proceedings; he even ordered me to spare no expence to give him, at Lyons, such reception as is due to foreign sovereigns. This prince, I believe, had no cause to complain of me upon this account: but messives the counts of Saint-John * did not act in the same manner; they denied him certain honours which the dukes of Savoy claimed in the assembly of canons as counts of Villars. It was at Fontainebleau and at Paris where the shew was most magnificent. The † duke of Savoy, on his part, appeared with splendor suitable to his rank.

THREE days after his arrival at Paris, the king, who was defirous of shewing him the new regulations in the arfenal, fent me notice that he would come and fup there with the duke and chief lords and ladies of his court. The duke of Savoy came fo long before, that I could not impute fuch extraordinary hafte to mere accident. He defired to fee the magazines; which was not what I wanted; I was ashamed of the poverty of the old magazines, and therefore carried him into the new work-houses. Twenty cannons lately cast, and as many more in a readiness for it, forty completely mounted, and several other works which he faw carrying on with great diligence, furprifed him fo much, that he could not help asking me what I meant by all these preparations? Sir, replied I, fmiling, to take Montmelian. The duke, without giving any indications that this reply had a little disconcerted him, with an air of gaiety and freedom asked me if I had ever been there; and upon my answering him in the negative, "Truly, I thought " fo, faid he, or you would not have talked of taking it; Montme-" lian is impregnable." I answered in the same tone, that I would not advise him to oblige the king to make the attempt, because I was fler, and giving him rank in the church among the canons.

* It was by order of the king, according to F. Matthieu, vol. II. b. ii. p. 323, that the canons of L. ons refuefed the duke of Savoy the place of honorary canon in their cathedral, which they had granted to the former duke his father, and that for a very obvious reafon, the house of Savoy having fince that i me loft possession of the cardom of Villars. This ceremony consisted in presenting some facered vestiments to the duke at the entrance of the cloy-very certain Montmelian would, in that case, lose the title of im- 1599. pregnable.

THESE words gave our conversation immediately a very serious turn. The duke of Savoy taking occasion to mention the affairs that had brought him into France, had already, in a polite manner, begun to make me fensible that he knew I was not in his interest, when we were interrupted by the arrival of his majesty: and afterwards nothing was thought of but pleafure. However, that fame night commissioners were named for examining the occasion of the contest: the constable, the chancellor, marechal Biron, Meisse, Villeroi, and myself, were appointed for the king; and for the duke of Savoy, Belly his chancellor, the marquifs de Lullin, the fieurs de Jacob, the count de Morette, the chevalier de Brétons, and des Allymes.

THE duke of Savoy had already brought over the greater part of 1600. our commissioners to his interests: he gained them completely at last, by the liberal gifts which he bestowed both on them and the whole court * at the new year. But I was the person that gave him most trouble; for every time, when the question was debated amongst the commiffioners, I constantly held firm to this determination, either that a restitution should be made to his majesty of the marquisate of Saluces, or that Breffe, and all the border of the Rhône from Geneva to Lyons, should be given him in exchange. But for the apparent incivility of fuch a proceeding, they would have folicited my exclusion from their meetings: therefore they had again recourse to an attempt to gain me, which they refolved to do at any price whatfoever.

On the 5th of January, des Allymes + came to make me the usual compliments, in the name of his highness: he intreated me,

* The duke fent the king two large bafons and two cryftal vafes, as a newyear's gift. " In return of which, the king " gave the duke a crotchet of diamonds, " where, among others, was one with his " majesty's picture: it was a very fine piece, " and the duke had a great value for it: he " made prefents to all who came to com-" pliment him." Chronologie Septen. ann. 1600. It was faid that he had gained over the duchess of Beaufort to his interest. So that if this lady had not died, it is probable the restitution of Saluces might have been dispensed with. The duke of Savoy playing at primero with Henry, on a bett of 4000 pistoles, the king neglected his play, fuppofing that he had already won the game: but the duke, who had it in his own hand, contented himfelf with fhewing the cards to the dukes of Guise and D'Aubigné, who were present, and then shuffled them together. It is D'Aubigné that relates this circumftance of the duke's generofity or policy.

with great politeness, to attend to his master's reasons; that is, in plain terms, to approve of them; for at the fame time that he made me this request, he prefented me with his highness's picture, in a box enriched with diamonds of fifteen or twenty thousand crowns value. To affift me in making a composition with my conscience, he told me, that this picture came from a daughter of France; and while he perceived me bufy in admiring the brilliants, added, that it was given me by a prince whose attachment to the king was equal to his friendship for me. I still kept the picture in my hand, and asked Des Allymes what were the proposals he had to make me? He, who thought the decifive moment was now come, immediately difplayed his whole stock of eloquence; and for want of good reasons, endeavoured to prove the advantage that was to be gained by the pretended rupture of his mafter with Spain, who offered to affift the king in conquering Naples, Milan, and the empire itself. All this cost him nothing; and to hear him, one would have thought that he had been able to dispose absolutely of these dominions; for which he added, that he did not doubt but the king would yield willingly to the duke a paltry marquifate.

I COULD keep filence no longer. I told Des Allymes, that if the king demanded the marquifate of Saluces to be reftored to him, it was not on account of its value, fince that was very inconfiderable; but that he could not in honour fuffer the crown to be diffmembered of one of its antient domains, and which had been usurped at a time when the duke of Savoy, having received the highest obligations from Henry III. at his return from Poland, ought in gratitude to have abstained from it. I thanked the deputy for his obliging expressions in my favour; and to pay his compliments with others, affured him, that when the duke of Savoy had made an absolute restitution of Saluces, I would not forget to use my interest with his majesty, to engage him to procure those opulent kingdoms for the duke which he had offered to the king, and which would be much more convenient for him than his majesty. Saying this, I opened the box, and after praifing the workmanship and the materials, I told Des Allymes, that the great value of the prefent was the only reason hindered me from accepting it; but that if he would allow me to return the box and the diamonds, I would keep the picture with great pleasure, in remembrance of a prince fo obliging. Accordingly, I separated the box and diamonds from the picture, when Des. Allymes telling me, that it did not belong to him to make any alterations in his mafter's prefents, I 1600. intreated him to take back all together. And he left me in defpair of ever being to engage me in his mafter's interest, and appeared but little fatisfied with my behaviour.

All that remained now to be done was to exclude me from their meetings. Upon his majefty's refufing to gratify them in this requeft, the duke of Savoy took it in his head to defire, that the patriarch * of Conflantinople might affift at these meetings in the name of the pope; which the king agreed to, not thinking of the artifice concealed under this proposition. The next day, the king having an inclination to play at tennis, appointed the affembly to be kept at the conflable's house, because he could conveniently make his party when he went from thence, after he had seen the conference begun: but before he lest us, he exhorted all the commissioners to have a strict regard to justice; and whispering me in particular, "Take care of every thing, said he, "and do not suffer them to impose upon me."

Upon the king's departure, I found, that instead of taking their feats, they divided into parties, two and three together, and the nuncio fometimes conferring with one fet, fometimes with another, not fuffering the business to be entered upon regularly; and, above all, carefully avoiding to fay any thing to me. At length, Bellievre told me, that the good patriarch could not fubdue his scruples about conferring with an huguenot; and intreated me, in the name of the affembly, to abfent myfelf, fince nothing could be done while I was present. I instantly comprehended the cause of this behaviour; and bowing profoundly low, withdrew, intending to go and give the king an account of what had passed. I met him in the gallery, where he had stopped to speak to Bellengreville: he asked me, with some surprife, if all was over already? and upon my acquainting him with the truth of the matter, he fell into a great rage, and ordered me to return to the commissioners, and tell them, that if there was any person amongst them to whom my presence was displeasing, it was his business to withdraw, not mine. I disturbed a little the joy of the astembly, by repeating this new order of the king's. The measures they took were, to waste the hours in seeking for expedients, till dinner-time approached; and then they deferred entering upon the que-

1600. Ifion till the afternoon. But notwithstanding all their endeavours with his majesty, I continued still in the number of the commissioners, and the nuncio was obliged to vanquish his reluctance.

Bretons and Roncas turned themselves on every fide, to avoid yielding to a refliction of the marquilate; they offered to do homage for it to his majesty, and if that was not sufficent, to hold Bresse upon the same conditions. I easily rendered all these proposals ineffectual, and got it unanimously declared, to give the duke of Savoy this alternative, either to resign Saluces to the king, or, in its place, the county of Bresse as far as the river of Dain, the Vicarship of Barcelonette, the valley of Sture, that of Perouse, and Pignerol; in which case, all the towns and fortresses taken on both sides were to be restored *.

THE duke of Savoy expected a quite different conduct from the commissioners; but the truth is, they durst not openly oppose a determination which they knew to be the king's: all the resource they had left was, to join with the courtiers in supporting the interests of the duke of Savoy; and were continually representing to the king, that he ought not to act too rigorously with a prince, whose alliance he might purchase at a very inconsiderable price, and would be much more advantageous than a fief of no value, and which would be very difficult to preferve. The alternative they offered the duke of Savoy afforded them a pretence for granting him fix months to come to a refolution: he defired eighteen; and I maintained, there was no neceffity for any delay. I went to his majesty to acquaint him with this resolution, which was taken in spite of me, and represented to him the great inconveniency of giving the duke of Savoy fo long a time to renew his correspondences, and to prepare for war. Henry, prejudiced by the discourse of the courtiers on the necessity of granting a delay to the duke of Savoy, asked me how it was possible to do otherwife? "By granting the duke of Savoy, faid I, an honourable efcort " of fifteen thousand foot, two thousand horse, and twenty cannon, " to conduct him to Montmelian, or what other place he shall chuse

* A kind of agreement was concluded upon this plan between the commiffaries, which it was much fufpected the duke of Savoy would not observe, because of the delays he defired: whereupon, as Le-Grain relates it, a certain person proposed to Henry, that the duke of Savoy should be feized, and by that means obl ged to perform his part of the articles. But this profeid was rejected by the king. See the particulars of the negotiation, and of the duke's refidence at Paris, in M. De Thou, and Le Septennaire, an. 1599, 1600.

"to go to, and there oblige him to explain himfelf upon the alternative that has been proposed to him." The king did not approve of my advice, his word was given to the contrary: I was truly grieved at it; for I have been always firmly perfuaded, that, but for this compliance, his majefty might have avoided a war, and have received complete satisfaction. All I could obtain was, that three months should be taken from the fix that had been agreed upon.

The duke of Savoy, finding that his majefty, who was weary of the continual folicitations that were made him on this fubject, would no longer answer otherwise than in these few words, I am resolved to have my marquisate, set out a little time after for Chambery, where, till the expiration of the time prescribed, which was in the month of June, he employed himself in preparations for his defence. He would have had no occasion for them, if the plot of a woman, named Nicole Mignon, had succeeded. She had undertaken to poison the king *, and thought to have engaged the count of Soissons, who, on all occasions, made known his discontent, in her design; but he conceived so great an horror at it, that he discovered her immediately: she consessed her crime, and was burnt.

NOTHING remarkable happened during these three months, except the dispute between messieurs Du Perron and Du Plessis. Towards the latter end of the last year, appeared a book + of Du Plessis upon the eucharist, which was looked upon, by the protestant party, to be a master-piece, and which I sent immediately to the bishop of Evreux,

* By procuring her hufband to be admitted into the number of the king's cooks, by the interest of the count de Soissons, steward of the houshold. She was well known to all the princes of the blood, and to Henry, himself at St. Denis, where she kept one of the principal inns during the war. The count of Soiffons, to whom the had hinted, that it would be his own fault if he was not one of the greateft princes in the world, fuspecting that this woman had fome bad delign, caused Lomenie to conceal himfelf in a closet, which gave him an opportunity of difcovering what means the intended to use. † This book is intitled, Instructions de la sainte eucharistie, and attacks the mass by pretended arguments drawn from the fathers. As soon as it appeared in public, many catholic divinues exclaimed against the falshood of a great number of the quotations it contained. This obliged Du Pleffis to offer a kind of challenge, which those doctors prevailed upon the bission of Evreux to accept. After several letters and steps taken on both sides to settle the method in which they were to proceed, and in which it appears that Du Plessis repented more than once of having gone so far; the king determined that there > fhould be a public dispute between the two antagonists, wherein fifty of these passages were to be made good every day, till all the five hundred and fifty were gone through, which M. Du Perron had excepted against. They met in the councilchamber at Fontainebleau, in the prefence of the king and commissaries appointed by him: those for the catholics were the prefident De Thou, the advocate Pithou, and the fieur Martin, reader and phyfician to his majesty; for the calvinists, Fresne-Canave, and Cafaubon. They met on Thursday the 4th of May, at one o'clock in the afternoon. Of fixty one paffages which Du Perron fent to his antagonist, the latter was only prepared on nineteen of them, which he had felected from all the rest: as to these, said he to the king, I will lose my reputation or life, if one of them be found false. However, he was convicted of an unfair representation in all those that were examined: and they could only go through nine of them: the chancellor then declared the opinions of all prefent, upon these nine articles severally, that in the first, which was from Scotus, and the second from Durandus, Du Plessis had taken the objection for the answer; in the third and fourth from St. Chryfoftom, and the fifth from Jerom, that he had omitted fome of the most material words; in the fixth, that it was no where to be found in St. Cyril; on the feventh, which was taken from the Code, that it was indeed from Crinitus, but that Crinitus had falfified the text: as to the eighth, which included two propositions from St. Bernard, that Du Plessis ought to have separated them, or at least to have put an &c. between: with regard to the ninth from Theodoret, that it was mutilated, and that the word idols was taken for ima ges. This was the only conference that was held. Du Pleffis Mornay, being feized with an indifposition next day, went to Saumur fome days after, without taking leave of the king. Fresne-Canaye one of the commissioners, and Saint Marie du Mont, another eminent protestant, were foon after this difpute, in which Henry himself sometimes spoke, converted to the catholic faith. Du Plessis pretended to prove, by the authority of St. Cyril, that it was not a custom among the primitive christians to adore the cross, and yet he alledged the reproach which the emperor Julian throws on them upon this very account. " It is not very likely," returned the king, " that Julian the apostate " would have reproached the christians for " adoring the crofs, if they had not ac-" tually done so; otherwise he would have " exposed himself to be laughed at." It was the king likewise who said, that at least an &c. ought to have been put in the paffage from St. Bernard.

book I had fent him, that the errors and falfhoods it contained were fo numerous, and followed one another fo clofe, that the whole book was juftly cenfurable. "Not that I would accuse monsieur Du "Plessis of infincerity," added the bishop of Evreux, with equal moderation in his adversary's regard as politeness in mine, "but I am "forry for his misfortune in having given credit to the confused collections of compilers, who have greatly deceived him." The remainder of his letter contained only compliments upon my late preferment to the post of grand master of the ordnance, and assurances of the pleasure it would give him "to see me" he faid, "who commanded the cannons of France, obey the canons of the church."

I NEVER had so good an opinion of Du Plessis as the rest of the party had, who were all prejudiced in his favour; and I would not have chosen to have been security for the exactness of those large volumes, which he sent into the world in so quick a succession, for that on the eucharist had been preceded by a treatise upon the church. To write well, and upon these subjects especially, long reflexion is necessary. This I told the bishop of Evreux in my answer, but at the same time I observed to him, that I could not believe Du Plessis's book was, as he said, a series of errors. I told Du Perron, at the same time, that this would be the subject of a great dispute between them, for Du Plessis would not suffer his accusations to pass unanswered; this was all the serious part of my letter, the rest of it was filled with compliment, praises, and an invitation to visit my new dwelling, which do not deserve to be repeated*.

What I had foreseen happened. However, I had expected only a private not a public dispute. I would have interposed the king's authority, to have hindered the two champions from proceeding so far, but Du Plessis was the most difficult + to be persuaded, and persisted in his resolution to measure his weapons with those of the bishop of Evreux. Every one knows how the dispute was terminated. Du Pless's defence was weak, and ended in his disgrace. The king, who would honour this challenge with his presence, gave a thousand praises to the wit and learning of monsteur d'Evreux. "What do you think "of your pope," said Henry to me, during the debate (for Du Plessis

IT was upon this occasion, that his majesty, in a letter to the duke of Epernon, told him, that the diocese of Evreux had vanguished that of Saumur; that this was one of the greatest advantages, that for a long time had been obtained for the church of God; and that fuch a proceeding would draw more protestants to the true church, than a course of violence for fifty years. This letter, the turn of which was no less fingular than the choice Henry made of the duke of Epernon to addrefs it to, made as much noise as the dispute itself, when it became public, which could not fail of happening when it was in fuch hands. Some faid that the king wrote it to destroy the suspicions of his not being a fincere catholic, which, notwithstanding his conversion, prevailed during his whole life, and gave room to the Jesuits to mention him disadvantageously in their letters to Rome: others imagined that this letter had a meaning which was not at first perceived, and maintained, that the king had a view in it to perfuade either Spain or the protestants, that all efforts to induce the council of France to take violent and fauguinary methods with them would be useless.

THE fix months that had been given to the duke of Savoy were now expired, yet he had taken no care to fatisfy his engagement. His majefty began to think he should obtain nothing but by force; but, befides the perfuafions of his courtiers, who all feemed to have fold their voices to the duke of Savoy, this prince was then retarded by an obstacle far more powerful, his fondness for his new mistress, to whom he had given the title of marchioness of Verneuil. He was no longer able to think of a feparation, and (it is with fome confusion that I mention it) after I had, by repeated importunities, prevailed upon him to take the rout to Lyons, he deliberated whether he should not carry her with him, to which he was farther incited by the flatterers about him *. She was now with child; and, having the promise of marriage in her possession, the affair bacame of great consequence to Henry. Proviciled: after which, this prince carried his mittress to Grenoble, where he continued with her feven or eight days, and afterwards to Chambery, tom. I. p. 86, &c.

* She came to meet him at St. André de la Coste. Bassompierre, who was with Henry, fays, that the lovers quarrelled at their first meeting, but were soon recon-dence once more interposed in his favour. Madam de Verneuil was 160 frightened by the thunder during a storm, that she was delivered of a dead child. The king was informed of this accident at Moulins, whither he had advanced, and from whence he sent many a melancholy look to the place where he had left his mistress; but, restored to himself by seasonable reflexions, he continued his rout to Lyons, where his troops had orders to join him.

I INTENDED to follow, as foon as I had fettled all affairs relating to the government, and taken proper measures to secure the necessary supplies for the war, which I did not delay till the moment of execution. I had written to the receivers-general, that, according to the king's order, they were no longer to pay any bills drawn upon them, except those which were for the support of the frontier garrisons and the payment of the troops, because all others would be immediately discharged at the treasury, to which I ordered all their money to be carried directly. I likewise forbad those that paid rents, to discharge any bills without a new order, to keep them from paying, as they were accustomed, such notes as had been revoked or created without money. I raifed fome militia which I chofe rather to incorporate in the old corps, than to compose new regiments of. I applied myself more particularly to the affairs of the ordnance. I fent orders to the lieutenants of the ordnance of Lyonnois and Dauphiné, and to the commissioners of that of Burgundy, Provence, and Languedoc, to collect all their best pieces, and to make a great number of carriages for cannon and balls in proportion, and fend them all with the powder and other ammunition to Lyons and Grenoble: and fearing, left my orders should not be punctually executed, I went myself to Lyons, and returned in three days.

I GAVE the like orders in all the other provinces, and brought carriers to Paris, whom I obliged to enter into an engagement before a notary, to carry, in fifteen days, three millions three hundred thou-fand weight to Lyons, without explaining to them what kind of merchandife it was. They were greatly altonished when they found their loading was twenty cannons, fix thousand balls and other things belonging to the ordnance not very portable. They alledged, that such heavy pieces could not be comprehended in goods of carriage; but having threatened to seize their carts and horses, and themselves not being willing to lose the expences they had been already at, refolved to do what was required of them: and I had the satisfaction to fee all this luggage arrive fafely in fixteen days at Lyons; whereas, by the ordinary methods, it could not be done in less than two or three months, and at an infinite expense.

IT was always doubted whether the king would feriously renew the war, till his majesty was seen to take his rout to the Alps. The chancellor Bellievre, who had perfifted in his endeavours to diffuade him from it, finding my advice prevailed, came to me with an intention to make me approve, if possible, of the reasons he had against it. I did not regard him as one of those persons with whom to enter into an explanation would have been useless. His fincerity appeared in the manner in which he spoke to me, and the reflexions with which his mind feemed to me to be agitated: the condition France was in, for which a war of any kind whatever could not but be fatal: the king's honour, which was engaged to maintain a work fo folid as that of the peace of Vervins: the reproach of the infraction of that peace to which he exposed himself: the fear of bringing all the duke of Savoy's allies upon him, to oppose whom he had an army sufficiently provided with artillery indeed, but confifting only of fix or feven thousand foot, and twelve or fifteen hundred horse, and (for so Bellievre imagined) destitute of all necessary provisions. This was the sum of the chancellor's objections.

I no not think that, in any paffage of these Memoirs, or in the conduct of my whole life, especially since I have been called to the government of public affairs, there is any thing that can lay me under the necessity of justifying myself with regard to too great a propensity for war. Should it appear to any one that, on this occasion, I acted in contradiction to my own maxims, I answer, that, in reality, no maxim, however general it may be, can suit all cases; and supposing war to be (as I really believe it is) an evil at all times, it is also certain that it is often a necessary and even an indispensable evil, when by that only those claims can be supported, which it would be a baseness to renounce; since it must be likewise confessed, that generosity and mildness, two qualities absolutely necessary in sovereigns, yet when employed against the common rules of prudence, degenerate into weakness, and are looked upon as instances of bad conduct.

To this general reply I added the particular reasons for the present war. I shewed the chancellor, that he suffered himself to be unseasonably alarmed: the king of Spain was the only formidable ally, whom it might be apprehended would join the duke of Savoy; but it was to 1600, be confidered, that the reigning king of Spain was a young man, without experience or abilities for war, fufficiently employed in reducing his own fubjects, and wholly guided by a minister as little inclined to war as himself, by the natural turn of his disposition, and a defire of keeping to himself the money which must be confumed by a war; and lastly, that he bore no good-will to the duke of Savoy, and was convinced, as well as all Europe, that the king demanded only a restitution of what belonged to him: that this war would appear a mere difference between the king and the duke of Savoy, or rather an effect of the intoxication of the latter, occasioned by an ill-grounded presumption, and the intrigues carried on in his favour in the council of France: and this prefupposed, the fuccess of the war depended upon its being pursued with expedition. I maintained to the chancellor, that, with four themfand men this year, the king would gain greater advantages, then with thirty thousand the next: but I did not neglect to prove to him, that his majesty was not so unprovided as he imagined, at least, it at he should not want for two things, which, in the offices I held, it dopended upon me to furnish him with, that is, money and artillery, Bellievre was so far from being convinced by my arguments, that he left me with chagrin: the event will shew which had the best reasons on his fide.

The duke of Savoy feeing that, contrary to his expectation, a French * army was ready to fall upon him, had recourfe to his ufual artifices, to prevent, at leaft, any act of hostility before the winter was begun. He sent deputy after deputy to his majesty at Lyons; sometimes he appeared willing to perform the agreements, sometimes he eluded them by specious reasons, and at other times, he proposed advantageous projects for his majesty, and continued to impose upon this prince so completely, that Henry, believing he should be under no necessity to go farther than Lyons, staid there much longer than he ought to have done. While I continued with Henry in this city, I guarded him against the subtilities of the duke of Savoy; but, as soon as I left him to return to Paris, to hasten, as I have said, the preparations for war, the king was so effectually deceived by the duke's pretended sincerity, that he wrote to me to suspend my cares, for every thing was settled in an amicable manner.

that proved very true, fays Perefixe, for at that time he was victorious in the heart of Savoy.

* He was encouraged, it is faid, by certain idle predictions of aftrologers, who gave out that, in the month of August, there would be no king in France: a thing Vol. II.

In effect, the duke of Savoy had agreed to all that was demanded of him, but this was a mere verbal agreement, and proposed that hostages should be given on each fide; a very proper management to delay the performance of his word, by the time that was necessarily taken up in naming those hostages, and fending them to each other. I wrote to the king very freely my opinion of this pretended accommodation, and did not feruple to disobey his orders, by forwarding the ammunition*, and came myfelf to Montargis, from whence I fent my baggage up the Loire, intending to ride post myself. Here it was that I received a letter from the king, which contained only these few words, "You have gueffed truly: the duke of Savoy has deceived us; " come to me as foon as possible, and neglect nothing that is necessary " to make him fenfible of his perfidy."

> I was informed more particularly of all that had passed, by a letter from Villeroi. The king had fent for Roncas, from whom he had received fo little fatisfaction in the explanation he demanded of him, that, refolving to press him in such a manner as to leave him no subterfuge to have recourse to, the Savoyard deputy at length betrayed himself by his equivocations, which threw the king into so great a rage, that he would hear no more, and inflantly took his rout towards Chambery; and it was from this place that the abovementioned billet was dated. His majesty imagined that this city would surrender at his approach, and that he should not be at the trouble of investing it; but in this he was mistaken.

> This interval was employed by the king in foliciting his marriage with the princess Mary of Medicis; and this negotiation, which was highly pleafing to the pope, was of fervice to the king, in hindering his holinets from taking any part in the affairs of Savoy. D'Alincourt, whom his majesty had fent to Rome on this occasion, obtained all that he demanded: the marriage was concluded on, and nothing now remained but to fend fome perfon to Florence, to folemnize it by proxy. Eellegarde earnestly solicited for this honour; but all he could obtain was to be the bearer of the procuration, which was given to the duke of Florence.

* Matthieu, in the account which he gives of this expedition into Savoy, betovs, in feveral places, high encomiums e a the doke of Sully, and in a great mea-

While this ceremony was performing in Florence *, Henry thought it necessary that he should seem wholly taken up with balls, plays, and entertainments: however, that did not hinder him from laying out no less affiduously the whole plan of the campaign; he ordered Lesdiguieres to take an exact view of the castle of Montmelian; and upon his report, that with twenty pieces of cannon, and twenty thousand discharges, it might be taken, he resolved to attack it. He likewise caused that of Bourg-en-Bresse to be reconnoitred by Vienne and Castenet, who were with me; and it being their opinion that the place might be carried, it was resolved to endeavour the taking of these two cities by petard, and in the same night; and in proper time besiege the two citadels in form. Marechal Biron, to whom his majesty committed this enterprise, gave the expedition of Montmelian to Crequy, and reserved that of Bourg to himself.

The king had, without knowing it, pitched upon him, amongst all his general officers, who was the least likely to give fucces to the enterprise. Biron was at that time deeply engaged with the duke of Savoy. It is thought that his treaty might have been at least rough drawn or sketched out by this time. He sent word to Bouvens, the governor of Bourg, to be upon his guard, and informed him of the night and the hour when it was designed to surprise him. All this was afterwards proved. But what is singular enough, this treachery did not hinder the taking of Bourg, and on the same night that it had been resolved to attack it.

Bouvens communicated the advice he had received to the garrifon and inhabitants of Bourg, exhorted them to defend themfelves bravely, kindled great fires, doubled, nay, trebled the corps-de-guard, and, in a word, took all possible precautions on the night that he expected to be attacked, even to the standing centinel himself. Every one impatiently expected the hour mentioned in the billet, which in reality was to be that of the attack. However, it happened that marechallion, who was himself at the head of his troops, either to give the governor more time, or to render the enterprise impossible to be executed, or perhaps by mere chance, took a road so far about, that instead of midnight, it was break of day when he appeared before Bourg. He would then have persuaded his officers to defer till ano-

But his opinion was so strongly opposed by Saint-Angel, Chambaret, Loustange, Vienne, and particularly by Castenet, who had undertaken to fix the petard in open day, even though the bastions should be filled. and likewise by Boësse, to whom his majesty had promised the govern-Peter C' Esco Peter C ERC ment of it; that Biron, fearing left he should incur the imputation of cowardife, and believing that the defign would miscarry, was obliged to confent to it.

> THE affair turned out quite otherwise: the garrison and the citizens having been upon the watch till two, three, and even four o'clock, were of opinion that the enterprise was blasted, or that it was merely imaginary; and when day appeared, went to breakfast, and to refresh themselves with sleep; leaving the care of guarding their walls to some centinels, who being oppressed with sleep, acquitted themselves very ill of their charge. Castenet, with three faithful men whom I had given him, advanced as far as the counterfearp, with each a petard in his hand, followed by twelve men well armed, and of tried bravery: the centinel cried, "Who goes there?" Castenet, whom I had instructed, answered, That they were friends of the city, who were come to advertize the governor, that fome troops had appeared at the distance of two thousand paces, and were gone back: he added, That he had much more to fay to monfieur Bouvens from the duke of Savoy; and defired the foldier to go and inform him of it, that the gate might be opened. The centinel quitting his post to go to the governor's house, Castenet, without lofs of time, advanced to the gate and fixed his petard, which carried off the draw-bridge, and made a breach, through which, the ditches not being very deep, twelve men, by the help of short ladders, entered immediately, and after them the whole army. All this was executed with fuch rapidity, that the city was filled in a moment with our men, and Bouvens had only time enough to retire precipitately, with his garrifon, into the citadel.

THE city of Montmelian * was taken in the fame manner; and Chamberry, by his majefty's orders, was invested: the citizens, full of terror, thought not of defending the city, but fortified themselves in the castle, where at first they made a shew of resistance; however, they capitulated the next day, being intimidated by a battery of eight pieces of cannon, the fire of which they durft not stand. By the order his majesty caused to be observed, there was not the least violence committed. The French ladies, who followed their husbands in this expedition, settled at Chamberry; and the next day after the reduction of it, my wife gave a ball to the principal ladies of the city, where all appeared as gay as if it had not changed its master.

AFTER this, the king fent me to Lyons, to give orders for the furnishing and conveyance of the orduance; and commanded me to visit, in this journey, the citadels of Saint-Catherine, Seiffel, Pierre-Chatel, l'Ecluse, and other fortresses of Bresse, particularly the castle of Bourge he ordered me likewise to provide a quantity of gabions, three feet in heighth and nine in width; upon which I answered him, that such gabions were only proper to make an enclosure for sheep newly bought up in the country. The king, on his fide, in the mean time, went to possess himself of Conslans, Miolens, Moutiers, Saint-Jacome, Saint-John de Morienne, and Saint-Michael: not one of these places held out against the cannon. The taking of Miolens restored liberty to a man who had been detained in the prisons there fifteen years; Feugeres brought him to me on account of the fingularity of a prediction that had been made him, upon the duration of his captivity, and the person by whom he should be delivered; which was found to be exactly fulfilled.

I LEFT Lyons, to execute the commission his majesty had given me. In the Upper I reached Villars by dinner-time, and Bourg in the evening, where Bresse. I was received and treated with great politeness by marechal Biron. When he found that I came to take a view of the citadel, he used his utmost endeavours to dissuade me from it; representing to me, that I exposed myself to evident danger. He was certainly right: the enterprise was full of hazard; but it was because that this marechal, having failed in his attempt to hinder me from executing my design, had given the enemies (for I cannot think otherwise) such exact informations, that where-ever I presented myself I sound a battery against me. Notwithstanding this, I continued there night and day, till I had simished all my observations.

Biron, who probably had expected that I should pay the price of my curiosity, finding that I had escaped, laid other shares for me: on the day that I was to leave Bourg and return to Lyons, I received advice, that a party of the enemy, consisting of two hundred men, had arrived 1600. rived at a castle near the place where I was to lodge that night. I took notice of it to Biron, who then had none of that obliging folicitude for my fafety which he had discovered before, and treated the information as a jest; which raised my suspicions. I asked him for an escort of foldiers; which he excused himself from granting, telling me, that he would commit this care to his own guards: but he privately ordered them to return, and leave me at Villars; which they did, notwithstanding my intreaties to the contrary, as soon as I alighted at Villars, and my mules were unladed. The defign of this proceeding appeared now but too plain. I ordered my mules to be loaden again, and travelled four leagues farther, nor stopped till I came to Vinny, where I thought myself in safety. My suspicions that Biron had undertaken to deliver me up to the duke of Savoy were changed to a certainty. Three hours after I had left Villars, the two hundred men came and stormed the house I had been at, and seemed very much concerned that they had missed their blow.

> A courier from his majesty waited for me at Lyons; his bufiness was, to get a train of artillery to force Conflans, the only one of those little cities which the king had attacked that made any refistance, and which furrendered immediately at the approach of the cannon. The king, whom I went to vifit at Saint-Pierre d' Albigny, told me, that he was afraid he should not accomplish so easily his designs upon Charbonnieres and the castle of Montmelian; and seemed to make forne difficulty about undertaking those sieges at the approach of winter. I assured his majesty, that instead of five months (for so long he imagined the fiege of Montmelian would last) it might be ended in fo many weeks, provided that during that time the works were carried on with vigour. The king gave no credit to what I faid on this head, and after I had left him faid to my brother and La-Varenne, that my enemies would take advantage of my prefumptuous manner of talking. However, the attention with which I had examined the weak parts of this castle, which had apparently escaped the observation of others, convinced me that I had not advanced any thing lightly.

> THE next day, the king taking a journey to Grenoble, left the command of the army in his absence to me. During this time, I no longer employed myself in observing Montmelian, under the cannon of which we were, but in making the plan of the out-works, and of the disposition of those batteries with which I expected to carry the fort. I went afterwards to the king at Grenoble, who had paffed his time time in deliberating with his council upon this enterprize, which he had forbad me abfolutely to begin in his abfence. I infifted again upon the reafonableness of undertaking it; and again found the same opposition. I know not whether it was through enmity to me, or attachment to the duke of Savoy, that the count of Soiffons, the duke D'Epernon, La-Guiche, and many others, appeared so unreafonable: amongst all the counsellors, only messieurs de Lesdiguieres and de Crequy were of my opinion. I laid the plan I had just sinished upon the table, and went out, saying, that while they deliberated whether Montmelian should be attacked, I would go and put myself in readiness to take it; and in the mean time would fall upon Charbonnieres, that the example of this fort, for the taking of which I demanded only eight days, might teach them what to expect from Montmelian.

ACCORDINGLY I laid fiege to Charbonnieres, where I suffered incredible fatigues; the first difficulty was to bring the cannon to bear on the place; the only road that led to it was extremely narrow, bordered on one fide by the river Arc, of which the bank was all along perpendicularly steep, and on the other by impracticable rocks: they could with difficulty travel a league a day, because they were every moment obliged to unharness the cannon, one of the wheels almost always running over the fide of the precipice. We were certain at least of favourable weather; for in this climate it is generally fair during the autumn; however, there now fell fuch violent rains that the road was all under water, and the eight days, which I had thought fufficient for the taking the place, had been almost wholly consumed in bringing up the carriages. This was my excuse in the council, against the malicious remark which the count of Soiffons and others did not fail to make upon the promife I had given. The king, who that moment looked at me attentively, perceiving that my face was very red, and all overspread with pimples, ran to me, and unbuttoning my clothes, examined my neck and breaft, crying, "Ah! my friend, you are very ill." He fent immediately for Du-Laurens **, who, after examining those pimples, faid, that by bleeding and taking a little care of myfelf they would be removed. I had, indeed, over-heated myfelf with labour; and, when in a violent fweat, had been wet quite through my clothes with the rain, without perceiving it. I was bled as foon as I got to my quarters, which were at Semoy: the king had his at Rochette, from whence he 1600. fent Thermes the next day to know how I was; and was greatly furprifed to hear that his messenger had found me on horseback, visiting my batteries.

> BEFORE I erected them, I was willing to take a more exact view of the place, beginning with Aiguebelle, for that was the name of the little city at the foot of the fort. It feemed to me that I was known every where, and that there was a general conspiracy against me; for, as often as I appeared in view, a volley was discharged upon me. The rock upon which Charbonnieres is fituated, appearing inacceffible on all fides, and not to be taken by the cannon, I was greatly afflicted: however, examining it more narrowly, I thought that I had found out a part where what feemed outwardly a natural rock, might probably be a place filled up with earth covered with green turf. I repressed the joy this discovery gave me, till the night afforded me an opportunity of being convinced of it. I approached very near the wall, being favoured by the darkness of the night, and was transported with jov, when, upon trying the ground with my pike, I found that it went down as I defired, and that this baffion was fuch as I had believed it to be. I was no longer in doubt on what fide I should batter the fort, and no difficulty now remained, but to find out some place proper for erecting these batteries; for Charbonnieres is, indeed, furrounded with mountains that command the town, but so steep that a man can hardly afcend them on foot. I began again to creep along these mountains, which, in reality, had a terrible appearance, and all feemed wholly inacceffable to the cannon, except one, upon the declivity of which, I faw a road where it was not impossible but some pieces of cannon might be heaved up by main strength. Unfortunately the access to this road was by another which passed so near the fort, that they might pelt us from thence with stones.

This was another obstacle, which did not, however, cool me in my attempt. I chose out two hundred French, and as many Swiss, to each of whom I promised a crown, provided they could, by this road, bring up fix cannon, which I gave them, and mount them on an eminence that I pointed out to them. I pitched upon a very dark night for this work, recommending to them particularly, to make as little noise as possible; and, to prevent the besegged from observing it, caused horses and carmen to advance in the opposite roads, whose cries and the sinacking of the whips, drew all the enemy's fire to that side, but with no effect, for these carts were covered, in their march, by trees, gabions, and even by the walls, while my men that were employed in forcing up the cannon, efcaped the notice of the befieged, who were deafened with the noise of their own fire. I appointed La Vallée*, lieutenant of the ordnance in Brittany, and other officers, to watch over and encourage my men in this uncommon method of carriage. It rained so violently, that La Vallée and the rest of the officers left their post to go to supper, and the foldiers their cannon, when they were got about half way. This was what I had expected; and, having taken that road, I met them in their retreat, and gave them a severe reprimand, threatning them that they should have no pay for three months, and brought them all back that instant to their task, which they refumed, and the cannon again began to move. I did not quit them till I saw them out of danger, which did not happen without receiving some check: their delay at length occasioned their being discovered, and fix were killed and eight wounded.

I GOT back to my quarters while it was yet dark, foaked through with the rain, and so disguised with dirt, that I was not to be known, but full of joy that my fix pieces of cannon were out of danger, though not yet upon the top of the rocks. I flept an hour, and breakfasted, and returning to my work, met La Vallée, who, not knowing what I had done, began to value himself upon the performance of the night. The reproaches I loaded him with, while I contradicted what he faid, ought to have covered him with confusion; but he was the most undaunted lyar I ever knew. " What! you have been there "then," faid he, without the smallest discomposure. "Well, I sin-" cerely confess I am a fool." "You are so, indeed," replied I, " and fomething worfe, but avoid fuch a behaviour for the future, " and repair your fault." It was not doubted, but the befieged would endeavour to make themselves amends for their being surprised; which did not hinder the cannon, by the mere force of my men's labour, without any affiftance from the horses, from being placed upon the rock at nine o'clock, where, during that time, I had made provision of gabions, planks, and every thing that was necessary to make plat-

BUT, when the gabions came to be filled, no earth was to be found within half a league of the place: all that could be got in this flubborn ground was flony, and could not be used for making port-holes and

The officers, for want of this usual defence, feeing themselves exposed to the whole fire of the place, came, in great consternation, to acquaint me with the condition they were in. I told them, without any appearance of emotion, that they should begin directly the palifade, which I had ordered them to erect along the borders of the rocks, making it very high and thick to deprive the enemies, at least of the fight of the cannon, which otherwise, they would be able to difmount; and this was performed immediately, these mountains being almost all covered with wood. To supply the rest, I ordered the carpenters, and pioniers of the army, to cut down two hundred large beech trees, which were cleaved into billets, fome round to fill up the gabions, others fquare, to make a fecure lodgment for the fix pieces of cannon; and the better to conceal their last situation from the enemy, to which the branches of the palifade greatly contributed, I contrived, that there should be on each fide several openings filled with baskets of earth; upon which the enemy made a continual fire, without knowing at what part of the palifado the artillery was placed, till the moment when we were prepared to dismount the: battery of the fort, and throw down the palifade by which our cannon had been concealed. At two o'clock in the afternoon, this work was completed; and about an hour afterward his majesty came to visit it, and embracing me, affured me of the fatisfaction it gave him. He faw no obstacle that should hinder us from beginning to batter the place. I represented to him, that it was still necessary to delude the befieged till night: this prince submitted to my opinion, but the count: of Soiffons, d'Epernon, La Guiche, and Villeroi, who followed him, making observations that his cannon was pointed against a rock, on. which it would be useless to lose more time, Henry came to me and faid, that he would have them fire, that inftant, fome vollies upon the opposite ravelin: again I contested this point with him, and perhaps with rather too much heat; for it gave me great uneafiness to see a work, that had cost me so much labour, likely to be ruined by too much precipitation. My refistance put Henry into a passion, and he again, and in a very absolute manner, commanded me to obey him, even adding, that I forgot he was the master. "Yes, fire," replied I immediately, " you are the master, and shall be obeyed, though at " the expence of ruining every thing." I caused the palisade to be thrown down, and gave orders that they should fire, but I would not be a witness of it, and withdrew in great discontent. As the guns were were not aimed, every body took upon them to direct them according to his own mind, but no one hit the right place. After a hundred ineffectual discharges, the king sent La-Guesle for me, to complain to me of the faults of my batteries. I replied, that I intreated his majesty would excuse me, for it being now sunset, it was no longer time to undertake any thing. His majesty ordered the firing to cease, and every one withdrawing, I came and lay in the midst of my batteries, which I caused to be completed during the remainder of the night, notwithstanding the rain that fell in great abundance. The besiged, on their side, laboured as hard, and were not without some apprehensions that they should sind the place, to which they gave the most attention, desective: I judged so by the fires and candles which I saw lighted up in the fort, and contented myself with interrupting their security, by string some discharges from time to time.

AT the break of day, there arose so thick a fog, that, at six o'clock, the fort could not be feen: this unlucky accident gave me great uneafiness, because all my batteries were ready; and I had boasted over night, that I would take Charbonnieres the next day. I fancied, however, that the agitation of the air, occasioned by the cannon, might possibly disperse the fog, and I caused some vollies to be fired. Either by chance, or by a natural effect, that which I had jeftingly proposed, succeeded almost beyond my hopes. No sooner had the rest of the artillery answered the cannon from the top of the mountain, than the fog wholly difappeared. The befieged had been all night employed in erecting a battery of four pieces of cannon overagainst my fix, which the imprudence committed the day before had discovered to them, and which, at that instant, they endeavoured to difmount. I found that there was no time to be given them, and caufed a piece to be pointed directly opposite to their port-holes, which rendered two of their four cannons useless, killed one gunner, and wounded two others: but this did not happen till after their discharge had killed, on our fide, fix gunners and two pioniers, and at length made our pieces useless, till they were dislodged from thence.

THE king ran thither, upon the noife, at nine o'clock, and ordered his dinner to be brought to a place which I had contrived in fuch a manner, that he might fee every thing that paffed without danger. This was an enclosure made with the largest trees, laid at their length one upon another, in the form of a rampart. I shewed his majesty the bodies of those that had been just killed, and made him sensible, that 1600. this was the confequence of the bad counsel that was followed the day before. I did not fay this without defign, perceiving that the fame perfons continued still to find fault with my work, and to prejudice his majefty against me. I did not suffer myself to be at all discomposed with their observations, and told them haughtily, that, not having yet eat any thing, though I had laboured hard all night, I would leave the place free to any of them that were defirous of playing the grand mafter of the ordnance, but that, at my return, if they did not permit me to order my batteries as I pleased, I would abandon them entirely. My table, as grand mafter, confifted of forty covers, and was placed under a kind of half arch, formed by nature in the rock, and hung with ivy. The king fent me a large trout pye, which was fent him from Geneva. My dinner was foon over, and I went again to intreat his majesty that he would suffer me to perform the duties of my employment alone, and renewed my promifes that I would make him master of Charbonnieres that day. The king replied, that he would be contented if it was taken in three days: upon which La Guelle. faid, that, if he was in the place, he should know how to hinder it from being taken in a month. Go there then, faid I to them all, fatigued with their impertinence, and if I do not hang you all to-day, let me pass for a boaster.

THE king then withdrew into his enclosure, and delivered me from the importunate presence of his courtiers for three hours, which he passed in waiting for his dinner, at table, and in surveying the park of artillery. At the end of this time, I faw him come back with the count of Soiffons, to whom he faid loud enough for me to hear, "This " place will not be taken to-day." The count answered, with great complaifance, That his majefty, who had more knowledge of war than any person whatsoever, ought to make use of his authority to force me to obey, instead of wasting time in battering a rock, which could not be hurt by the cannon. I had my revenge that instant. The king came just at the time that the enemy beat a parley, and the lieutenant of the place came out to treat with me. I intreated his majesty to have no part in the capitulation; and I told the lieutenant that he might go back again, for I would have the garrison furrender at discretion. The lieutenant returned with a personated boldness, saying that there were still two hundred men in the fort that were able to hold it out eight days longer. Henry withdrew, leaving Lefdigueres. and Villeroi with me, who perfuaded me to accept of the conditions offered by the befieged. Lefdigueres even carried me towards the fort, to shew me that the enemies were not reduced to extremity. I stopped him when we came within two or three hundred paces of the curtain, telling him, that it would be rashness to expose himself to the mouth of the cannon of the fort; and I withdrew to a rock a hundred paces distant, which served me as a shelter, while these gentlemen very unseasonably rallied me for my caution: but they soon changed their tone when a terrible sire obliged them to follow me.

THE lieutenant of the fort returned a fecond time, but with propofals little different from the former. I fent him back without hearing him: upon which Villeroi faid, That, if the city failed of being taken that day, he could not dispense with himself from acquainting the king that it was owing wholly to me. I pretended not to hear him: and, fending the befieged my last resolutions in writing, ordered the artillery again to play: the fecond discharge set fire to the powder of the befieged, and killed twenty or twenty-five of their men, and fix or feven women; at the third, the little ravelin fell down entirely, and they could no longer bring any affiftance to the breach, because the cannon, fweeping along a low path that led to it, at every fire destroyed some of their best soldiers. This made them resolve to beat a parley once more, which I pretended not to hear, although I saw their drummer carried up in the air at the heighth of twelve feet, by a cannon ball which entered the ground where he stood, but did him no other hurt. The befieged then held up a pike, with a flag fastened to the top, crying out that they furrendered, and implored us to cease firing. Yet the artillery continued to play, till the enemies, holding out their hands over the breach to our foldiers, I was afraid some French would be killed amongst them. I then mounted my horse and entered the city on full gallop. It was lawful to treat it as one carried by affault; but that heart must be wholly impenetrable to compassion, that could not be foftened by a fight fo truly pitiable as now prefented itself: it was the women, the wounded and fcorched by the fire, who came and threw themselves at my feet. I never in any other place beheld the fex so lovely as in this city, nor fo finished a beauty as one in particular who came to implore my mercy: instead of executing my threat, to hang all the inhabitants, I gave the fame conditions I had offered at first. and caused the garrison to be conducted to a place of security which I had appointed for them.

Notwithstanding this fucces with Charbonnieres, I still found great opposition in the council to my proposal of attacking the castle-

1600. of Montmelian. The debate ran very high: "Take care what you "do," faid his majesty to me, carried away by the great number that disapproved of the attempt, " for if we are obliged to raise the siege, " every one will exclaim against you, and I possibly shall be amongst " the first." They were not sensible at that time what a strong train of artillery, well conducted, was able to do at a fiege: what had happened at Charbonnieres had so confirmed me in my opinion on that head, that I did not scruple to engage that I would carry Montmelian in five weeks, as I had already promifed in a former council: I stipulated only for one condition, which his majesty could not deny me, because he had accepted it, without its being named, and this was, that he should not be present at the siege. I foresaw that it would be very bloody. I produced a plan of the city, and of the attack; and every one agreeing that I should make the attempt, I laid siege to the castle of Montmelian.

> This castle is situated on a rock almost as hard as that of Charbonnieres, and so high, that it commands the whole country about it; steep and inacceffible on all fides except that next the city, where the afcent is less difficult, but on which, to make amends, there runs a ditch, cut in the rock itself, and which must have been done with infinite labour with the point of a sharp chiffel; besides which, there were three bastions, that could neither be sapped nor undermined, their foundations being of rock itself, almost impenetrable, and above a toise and a half deep. The country is ffrewed with feveral mountains, but some are fo distant, that they appeared to be absolutely out of the reach of cannon, and the rocks that are nearest are so steep and pointed at the top, and fo rugged and bare, that far from being possible to carry up and make use of cannon, it is difficult to believe that a man could climb up. The castle was then provided with thirty pieces of cannon, with powder for eight thousand vollies at least, a proportionable garrison, and ammunition in great abundance.

> THE first thought that occurred to my mind, and supported it against obstacles in appearance unfurmountable, was, that however folid and continued the rock feemed to be, upon which, or rather in which, the bastions were raised, it was not possible that it should be all of equal hardness; and if one part of it only was ever so little weaker than the rest, the artillery I had would secure me the means of opening a pasfage through it. In order to be convinced, I began to open the trenches before the bastion called Mauvoisin; for otherwise it would have been impossible impossible to have approached near enough to discern whether this whole mass was an entire rock, cut with a chiffel; but the rock which we found even with the ground hindered us from carrying on the trenches.

I was obliged to have recourse to artifice; and one very dark night caused a hut to be built with clay, and thatched over, very near this bastion, and so low that it could not be thrown down by the cannon: it was fhot through and through with the finall arms as foon as the day discovered it to the besieged; but it was not overturned, and none of our men were in it. I suffered the enemy to discharge their rage for some days upon this hut, till of themselves they should cease to fire; which at length they did, fuppofing it had been built there to make them spend their powder in vain. When I found the besieged neglected it, I entered it in the night, taking no other arms with me but a buckler, with which, upon occasion, I could entirely cover my body against the fire. From this hut I carefully examined the whole baflion; I perceived there a light at the bottom, from whence I concluded that it was hollow, and that it was not an entire rock which could be cut into so deep. Without doubt the besieged were then making some repairs there. The day beginning to appear, I perceived likewife that the flank was uncovered; and this was proof that it was not a folid rock that formed either; and that this flank prefented itself naked, and easy to be pierced with the cannon. I was now satisfied, and had no other care but how to get out fafely, which in broad day could not be done without difficulty, the hut not being above a hundred paces difant from the parapet, which was lined with foldiers, and I had above two hundred to go before I could shelter myself. I seized that moment when the guards being relieved the foldiers began to be careless, and leaving my buckler in the hut, I began to run as fast as I was able; four centinels perceiving me, cried out, and fired upon me at the fame time; their musquet-shot whistled about my ears and covered me with gravel and flint stones, but did not wound me; before the other soldiers were ready, I had gained the nearest lodgmeut.

I HAD at first resolved to place a battery of cannon on an eminence on the side of the Isere, where they might be carried up more easily by the help of steps cut by the hands of men; but having observed, on the opposite side of the water, another eminence which saced the citadel, and which had this advantage, that from thence might be seen the road that led to the wells of the castle, and to the magazine, the en-

1600. trance of the donjon, and the guard-house: I preferred this last, and confidered upon the means to carry up fix pieces of cannon. This eminence was perpendicularly steep on all sides but one, and even on this fide of the afcent was a league about: but this was not the greatest difficulty; to plant them there we must level rocks of such hardness, that most of the officers thought the enterprize ridiculous.

> THE enemies were not of the same opinion: as soon as they found that we had undertaken to make a lodgment upon the edge of the rock, they pointed fix pieces of cannon there likewife, and made a continual fire: the first volley was shot one day when I was giving directions about the works, with my ftaff of command in my hand, dreffed in a green coat laced with gold, and a plume of green and white feathers upon my head. I observed that this shot had passed a good deal above my head, and that which followed it as much below: perceiving that they were going to fire a third time, I faid to Lefine, Maignan, and Feugeres, that this would be between both, and that, without doubt, the befieged having perceived me would take an exact aim. I retired two or three steps behind a shelving part of the rock, from whence I held my pike in one hand fixed in the place where I had flood myself; one ball threw down the pike, the others killed three pioniers and two gunners, and broke fome glaffes and bottles that had been brought for a refreshment, and were placed in a hole of the rock. This accident was related to his majesty, as an instance of rashness in me; and he wrote to me immediately, that my person being still more necessary to him for the business of the state than war, he defired that I would not act like a meer foldier of fortune, who had a reputation to raise; and that he would recal me, if I disobeyed this command.

> HENRY could not refiff the defire he had to fee the disposition of this fiege, and wrote to me a fecond time, defiring I would difpenfe with the promise he had given me to the contrary, affuring me, that he would go to those places only that I should appoint, and with no other attendants than the count of Soiffons, D'Epernon, Bellegarde, and me. I entreated him at least to disguise himself in an ordinary cloak; and, above all, to shun, at the expence of going half a league about, a certain field, ffrewed over with flint flones, opposite to which the besieged kept a party of thirty or forty foldiers continually, armed with mufquets; and ten or twelve pieces of cannon were pointed there, because they knew that our men passed every moment through this field, to go to the new battery raifed upon the rock. I did not doubt but that he would have complied with this request; but when he was upon the spot, he could not resolve to use this precaution; and my intreaties being ineffectual, we marched all five in a file. Some musquet-shot that we were exposed to at first made two or three of the company look pale; but it was much worse when we entered the field; there was at once so terrible a discharge of the heavy cannon and small-shot, that we saw ourselves in a moment all covered with earth, and our skin feratched with a shower of those little slint-stones. Henry making the sign of the cross, "It is now, said I, that I acknowledge you to be a "good catholic." "Let us go, said he, this is a bad place." We doubled our pace, esteeming it a singular piece of good fortune that none of us were killed, or at least lamed. No one thought of returning the same way, but took the road from the mountains, where I caused horses to be brought for the company.

THE king was a little ashamed of his unnecessary rashness, which was the cause, that some days afterwards, when I fent him notice that all my batteries were finished, his majesty, who was then returned to the Tarantaife, having an inclination to fee them, ordered me to make a truce for fome hours with the governor. The king's curiofity being fatisfied, I was feized with an inclination to exert the prerogative of a grand mafter exercifing his office in the royal prefence; but as this could not be done without a discharge of the artillery, which would have been confidered as an infraction of the truce, which was not yet expired, to induce the befieged to break it I ordered fome commissaries to fend certain ammunitions to the battery upon the rock, which they had an occasion for there. The enemy, who had not lost any part of their fierceness, and probably repented of having granted the truce, cried out that it was violated, and that they were going to fire. Accordingly, they fired twelve or fifteen cannon-shot. I had given my men orders, in case this happened, to hold themselves in readiness to answer them immediately by a general discharge. This was the first, and afforded matter for serious reflection to the besieged, when they faw their tower battered by fifty cannon: they were the first to demand a continuation of the truce; especially when a second discharge succeeded so rapidly. From that moment they began to alter their opinion, that the citadel was impregnable, and privately fought out ways to procure an honourable composition.

Two women were by chance the first movers * of this accommodation. Madam de Brandis, wife to the governor of Montmelian, and then with him in the castle, amused herself with making little glass toys and pieces of chair-work. My wife being then in the city, the fent her a pair of ear-rings and two chains of exquisite workmanship. Madam de Rosny, in return, sent her wine and venison, and desired to know if it was not possible for them to see each other: they obtained permission for it, and passed three asternoons together with such familiarity, that at length they began to confider how Montmelian might be furrendered with honour. They acquainted their hufbands with the fubject of their conversations, who were so far from opposing them, that they were authorifed to go on, each concealing from the other that the acted by permission. Madam de Brandis had an indisposition that made the country air necessary for her. Her husband thought he could procure this favour through the interpolition of my wife; and the made to reasonable a representation to him of the condition to which he would be foon reduced, without being able to obtain honourable terms afterwards, that he confented to treat with me, and fent me a deputation for that purpose. I dispatched notice of it to the king, who proposed it to his council; and it was there refolved, that a month should be granted to the governor, after which, if he was not relieved, the place should be surrendered. I was very fure that it could not hold out fo long, and that it was relying too much upon the doubtful fincerity of an enemy to grant fuch conditions. I gave my opinion freely, but it was to no purpose to oppose a resolution in which envy had as great a share as fear.

The king did not begin to repent of having followed the counsels of marcchal Biron and d'Epernon rather than mine, till, a little while before the expiration of the time granted to the befieged, a report was spread, that an army of twenty-five thousand men was coming over the Alps to their affistance. The king acquainted me with the perplexity into which this news threw him: he was determined to meet the enemies and fight them; but he was fensible of the danger he ran, in leaving behind him such a fortress as Montmelian. He asked me if by some means or other there was not a possibility of putting him in possession of it before that time. Difficult as it appeared, it was neverthelesaccomplished, and in this manner.

EVER fince the suspension of arms, the count of Brandis suffered all 1600. strangers to enter his castle who brought provisions and necessaries which the wounded, and even madam de Brandis herfelf, had occasion for. As there was only one gate to enter by, the crowd was often fo great that fome blows passed between them; for which the governor could not chaftife them, because there were a great many Frenchmen amongst them, and therefore intreated me to apply a remedy to this inconvenience: and I now believed that I had found the opportunity I fought for. I placed a guard of fifty chosen men at the gate of the castle, commanded by officers, who, being informed of my design, accustomed the guards of the castle to see them enter it at first three or four only in number, afterwards more, till at length, the garrifon not daring any longer either to hinder or fire upon them, they found themselves almost masters of the castle itself, without giving them any affiftance; but, on the contrary, inflead of leffening the diforder, thefe French did all they could to increase it.

Brands imputed all to the licentiousness of the soldiers, and complained to me of it. I told him, that he might sall upon all these strangers, whom I supposed to be country people. He replied, that he would have done so, but for the great number of my soldiers that were amongst them; and that rather than do them any violence, although without any intention to break the conditions, he chose to conside to me the care of putting an end to the disorder. I seemed to yield to this expedient (which was what I most ardently wished) only to restore order and quiet, and told the governor, that I could easily accomplish it, if I had a guard within equal to that without: he consented to it, and I caused sifty soldiers to enter; but these were not all, thirty had got in before, and a much greater number had slipt in with them; I came thither myself likewise, with all my train: and from that time our party was so strong, that the fort and part of the tower was at our disposal.

Brands then found the fault he had committed, but could repair it no otherwise than by shewing himself still more generous. He came to me and told me, that he consented I should take possession of the tower, and that he remitted it wholly upon the security of my word. I resolved not to abuse his considence, and faithfully observed all the articles. I supped and lay in the tower that night; and the next day after that in which I had received this committion from the king, I

1600, went to tell him, that without any fears from Montmelian, he might march to meet his enemies; which he did in good order, and at the head of his army; but the information he had received was found to be false.

> THE garrifon of Montmelian marched out after the month was elapsed, and yielded the place to his majesty, who commanded me to fettle Crequy there with his company. The garrifon was reinforced, and provided with great plenty of ammunition of all kinds. I would have perfuaded the king to have difmantled this place, as it must undoubtedly be restored to the duke of Savoy in case of a peace; and to have done the same by all the other conquered fortresses: but the advice of the courtiers, who all feemed to be in the pay of the duke, faved Montmelian from a treatment that good policy required.

> THE mystery of this conduct with regard to Montmelian, as well as many other things, was explained two years afterwards, by the difcovery of fome letters of marechal Biron in cyphers: he told the duke of Savoy, to whom they were addressed, that he had obtained a month for the garrison of Montmelian, to give him time to raise the fiege: that he had nothing to expect from his friends, unless he made an effort to fave this place, which could hold out three months longer; and affured him, that the reduction of it would give him great concern. In the letter he wrote to this prince after the castle was taken, he tells him, that his negligence in fuccouring it had filenced the French lords in his party, who would have declared against the king, if, by advancing to join them, he had put it in their power to do so with safety. Notwithstanding the caution he observed in not writing their names, they were all to well described that it was not difficult to know them. The filence I keep with regard to these names, is only in favour of some whom the public perhaps has not uspected.

> MONTMELIAN was not yet furrendered, when it was known in the French army that cardinal Aldobrandin, the pope's nephew and legate, was on his way to come and treat with his majefty concerning a peace and his marriage. The king having appointed me to go and receive his eminence with all imaginable honours, I advanced to meet him with a body of 3000 foot, and 500 troopers, all spruce fellows. It was not difficult for him to perceive that it was the grand mafter of the ordnance who waited for him, by the manner in which he was received at his approach to Montmelian. The truce affording me an opportunity portunity to make use of the artillery of the place as if it had been my own. Upon this occasion I joined them together, to pay him the greater honour: the fignal was given by a white flag raised on the battery of the rock: mine began after a great fire of the small-shot, and was answered by that of the castle, in such a manner, that both having time to load again, this double discharge of an hundred and seventy cannons, performed with the utmost regularity, and multiplied by the echoes formed amidst the mountains, had the noblest effect imaginable, though not in the legate's opinion, I believe, who was more frightened than soothed, by an honour so magnificently dreadful, believing all the mountains about him were going to fall down, and had several times recourse to the fign of the cross.

I CARRIED the cardinal to dinner at Notre Dame de Miens, and forewarned him of two things relating to the business he mentioned to me; one was, that he should give no credit to any of those persons who would make a boast to him of their interest with his majesty; the other, that if they promised him to get all the places taken from the duke of Savoy to be restored without being demolished, he should believe them still less, for he might be assured this would never happen. After this caution, I resigned him freely to those sent by his majesty to fetch him, and continued my hostilities, by besieging the citadels of Bourg and fort Saint-Catherine.

THE latter was attacked before the other, at the intreaty of the city of Geneva, whom the king was glad of an opportunity to oblige. Upon our arrival at this fort, which is fituated on a rifing ground, in an open field, of which it feems to be the centre, marechal Biron, who by chance was near me, asked me to go that instant, on horseback as we were, and reconnoitre the place with him. I told him that we were too gayly dreffed, and had too many plumes on, to examine it in open day: for the marechal was mounted on a white horfe, and wore a large plume of feathers of the fame colour. " No, no, faid he, " you need not be under any apprehension: morbieu! they will not "dare to fire upon us." "Let us go then, replied I, if you will, for " if it rains upon me it will fprinkle upon you." Accordingly, we came within two hundred paces of the fort, and observed it a long time, while they only fired twelve or fifteen vollies of fmall-shot, and I believe in the air, although we were about twenty horse; which surprised me greatly. " Certainly, fir, faid I to the marechal, there is no one " within, or they are afleep, or afraid of us." The king could with difficulty 1600, difficulty believe this, because being there himself the day before, with fix horse only, they fired repeated vollies at his approach; and when I returned the next morning at the break of day, on foot, and with no other company than Erard and Feugeres, I was received with fo great a noise of the artillery, that the king fent Montespan thither, believing it was a fally. "Whom are these fellows aiming at?" faid Montespan to me, finding no-body in fight. "At me, I believe, re-" plied I, but I have feen all that I wanted to fee." However, I gueffed foon after the reason of that respect which they shewed marechal Biron. I perceived that the flank of the bastions of Saint-Catherine were fo bad that great part of them had fallen down, and that the ditch was in no better a condition. I affured his majefty, that as foon as the trenches were carried to the extremity of the ditch the place would furrender. In effect, the befieged, who were likewise in want of every thing, demanded to capitulate, if they were not fuccoured in fix days.

> AFTER I had opened the trench, I defired leave from the king to make a tour to Geneva: I arrived there the next day, with an hundred horse, and came very seasonably to relieve this city from the terrors which the presence of a great number of catholics within their walls occasioned. Messieurs de Guise, d'Elbeuf, d'Epernon, de Biron, de la Guiche, and many others, were there, with their feveral followers. I affured them, that his majesty had their interest at heart, and that I would not leave them while those gentlemen continued amongst them: but the remembrance of the late persecutions was yet too recent in the minds of the citizens; they could not be fatisfied till I had removed the occasion of their fears; which I did that evening by speaking to those gentlemen, who all left Geneva the next day. The city deputed twelve of their chief citizens, with Beza, their minister, at their head, to compliment his majesty; . and to endeavour to obtain a request that they kept very fecret; this was, the demolition of fort Saint-Catherine, which they were most ardently defirous of. Beza delivered himself like a man of sense, and one who knew how to praise with delicacy; congratulating the protestants upon the happiness which the reign of so good a prince promised them. Henry thanked the deputies and the city, offering to bestow upon it any of his conquests which should be most convenient for it; and preventing their request, told them in a low voice, that they should have the pleasure to be masters of the fate of fort Saint-Catherine; and that he gave them his word, in my presence (for he held me by the hand at the same time) that no intreaties whatsoever 1600. should hinder him from razing it. Upon which the deputies withdrew, extremely well pleased.

HIs majefty, at cardinal Aldobrandin's request, consented that the conferences on the subject of a peace should be held at Lyons, and named the cardinal Du-Perron, the constable, the chancellor, Villeroi, and Jeannin, to treat with the legate: they had yet come to no agreement, when the future queen arrived in that city. As soon as the king was informed of it he quitted his quarters, and fet out in very rainy weather, riding post, with great part of the lords of his court. It was twelve o'clock at night when we got to the bridge of Lyons, and waited there a full hour, wet through with the rain, and almost perished with cold, before they would open the gate; for his majesty, that he might have the pleasure of surprizing the queen, would not suffer himself to be named. They had not yet seen each other. The marriage ceremony was performed without any pomp. We attended

* This princess lest Florence on the 17th of October, having embarked at Leghorn, and, with an efcort of feventeen galleys, landed at Toulon, from whence the came by the way of Marfeilles and Avignon to Lyons, where the king arrived post on the 9th of November. As soon as he alighted (I take the following account from the most authentic Memoirs of those times) the queen happened to be at supper; and having a defire to fee her at table without being discovered, he went in as far as the drawing-room, which was very much crowded; but he was known the moment he appeared by those nearest the door, who opened to make way for him : upon which, his majesty went away directly, without going farther. The queen, in the mean time, was well aware of all this, but ftill gave no other figns than by putting the plates away as often as fhe was ferved with any thing, and eat fo little, that fhe feemed to have fat down rather for form's fake than to fup. After the table was removed, fhe returned immediately to her chamber. The king, who waited only for this, came to her chamber door, and ordering M, le Grand to go before, he knocked fo hard, that the queen thought it must be the king: upon this she stept forward at the very instant that M. le Grand entered the room, who was followed by his majesty, at whose feet she immediately threw hersel. The king raised her up, embraced her with great tenderness, and allthat was polite, passionate, and respectful, passed on both sides. After the first compliments were over, the king took her hand, and led her to the fire-place, where he continued talking with her above half an hour; he afterwards went to supper, but eat very sparingly. In the mean time, he bid madam de Nemours tell the queen, that he had not provided himself with a bed, expeding the would give him part of hers, which from that time was to be in common between them. Madam de Nemours carrying this message to the queen, the returned for answer, That she had come thither only to obey his majesty as the humblest of his fervants. Upon this, the king undreffed, and went directly to the queen's chamber, who by this time was in bed. 1600. the king at supper, who afterwards difmissed us to refresh ourselves likewise; and he retired to the queen's apartment.

His majesty's arrival only increased the warmth with which they contested the articles of the peace: the plenipotentiaries were almost all in the duke of Savoy's interest, and glad of an opportunity to make their court to the legate; which was the cause that Henry thought it necessary to make them give an account of their negotiation, and feverely blamed the commissioners for having exceeded the power that was given them. Bellievre and Villeroi had promifed the legate, that none of the fortreffes that had been taken should be demolished, but especially Saint-Catherine, for which the legate particularly folicited, as being the best, and even the only bulwark the duke of Savoy had against the republic of Geneva. Henry made them fensible, that their precipitation in subfcribing to an article of this importance without confulting him, had given him some suspicion of them; and added, that in a few days he would acquaint them with his intentions upon that head. Then fending for me, he told me, that the shortest way to prevent the solicitation which he expected from the legate, would be to blow up the five bastions of the fort, and to fend word to the citizens of Geneva to come and complete the demolition of it. No order was ever more expeditionfly nor more effectually executed. The Genevois, in one night, laid this citadel even with the ground, and carried away all the materials fo carefully, that the next day it could with difficulty have been believed that there ever had been a fort in the place; and at first the report ran, that it was destroyed by lightning. When the truth was known, the legate expressed great resentment at it, and did not fcruple to confess, in the heat of his passion, that I was the only person who had not deceived him with flattering hopes on this head, and that he had not sufficiently attended to my admonitions. But his having, upon the faith of the commissioners, given very different expectations to the pope, was what he was chiefly concerned at. For three or four days the negotiation was intirely broke off; and when it was afterwards refumed, it was with fo much animofity on his eminence's part, that he rejected all the propositions that were made him. These propositions were, That the duke of Savoy should yield to the king the course of the river Rhone and its borders: That he should not erect any fort within a league of it to favour the Spaniards paffage: That he should leave to the republic of Geneva the enjoyment of certain villages specified likewife: That Béche-Dauphin should be demolished, Chatcau-Dauphin

Frontier of Dauphiné. phin reftored: and laftly, that the duke flould pay an hundred and 1600. fifty thousand crowns for the expences of the war.

THE king looking upon this affair as wholly impracticable, through the obstinacy of the legate, resolved to carry on the war more vigorously than before, and communicated his defign to me, which was, to go in fearch of the duke of Savoy at the head of his army; while I, with the artillery, battered the citadel of Bourg. Each of us had particular obstacles to this double project, besides the want of money, which was common to both. I found the enterprise on Bourg very difficult to be executed, the feafon being now fo far advanced: the difference between this castle and that of Montmelian, with which I think it may be compared, is this, that for those that have only ten or twelve pieces of cannon, Montmelian is equivalent to ten such places as Bourg, because that the reduction of Montmelian depends upon having artillery fufficient to batter the out-works; but for an army fixty cannon flrong, the citadel of Montmelian is not more difficult to carry than that of Bourg; because this last being more regular than the other, it can only be attacked methodically and by flow degrees. Had the counsel I gave, to attack this fort immediately after the furrender of Montmelian, been followed, it would have been now in the king's possession.

WITH regard to this prince, his perplexity was occasioned by his knowing in what manner the greatest part of his general officers conspired with Spain and the duke of Savoy against him: he had great reason to be apprehensive of engaging himself in the enemy's country, if they were with him: Lefdiguieres was the only one on whom he could depend; he had lately given an instance of his fidelity, in sending notice by Calignon, that the duke of Bouillon made use of a man named Ondevous to carry on his correspondence with the great lords of the kingdom. It is certain, that if Calignon had been more diligent to acquit himself of his commission, Ondevous would not have had time to escape as he did, and his detention might have laid open all the schemes of the seditious; but there is no appearance that this happened through the fault of Lesdiguieres. I advised the king to rely entirely upon him, and to bind him still closer to his service, by making him a marechal of France, and governor of Piedmont. As for the rest, it was easy to prevent the consequences of their ill intentions, by giving them employments at a diffance from the body of the army.

But the affair that appeared most pressing to us both, being to procure a supply of money, it was resolved that I should set out for Paris in sour days: and that I might be enabled to pass fix entire weeks there, I employed these four days in making all the necessary preparations for the attack of Bourg, in paying the soldiers out of what little money remained, and in providing for the ordinary as well as extraordinary expences of the king's houshold. The very next day I sent away my wife and my equipages before me, with directions to wait for me at Rouanne, where I proposed, as soon as I arrived, to sent down the Loire as far as Orleans: they waited there for me three or sour days longer, because that my measures were broke by the alterations that happened in the affair of the peace.

WHEN I went to take leave of the king, he advised me to visit the legate also before I set out, he having always expressed great esteem for me. I went to vifit him booted, my post-horses waiting for me on the other fide of the river, opposite to his lodgings. He asked me where I was going in that equipage? "To Italy, replied I, and I shall " go with good company to kiss the pope's foot." "How! to "Italy," faid he, in great amazement: "no, that must not be, sir; "I beg you will affift me to renew this peace." I feemed to confent, in respect only to his mediation, the king having laid aside all thoughts of it. I repeated, in a few words, all the principal articles that had been already proposed, and afterwards asked him if he would give credit to what I was going to fay to him? Having affured me he would, I told him, that he might be absolutely certain, that of these articles, his majefty would abate none of his demands with regard to the borders of Rhone, the villages in the neighbourhood of Geneva, Chateau-Dauphin, and Beche-Dauphin; because that I was well acquainted with the king's intentions in all these respects. He defired to know my reasons: which I excused myself from telling him, on account of the short time I had to stay. After walking, thoughtfully, feveral times backwards and forwards in his chamber, he asked me if, with the fame protestation of fincerity, I would affure him, that, provided he agreed to all these points, there should be no mention made of the other. I told him, that I believed I might promife this. Upon which, he entreated me to go and acquaint the king with what he had faid. Henry was glad to fee me come back: and I returned a moment afterwards to the legate with full powers from his majefty. And we concluded concluded * that inftant a treaty which had languished so long a time; 1600. the conditions of which were as follows.

THE duke of Savoy, in exchange for the marquifate of Saluces. which the king of France gave up, was to make a cession to his majesty of the fortresses of Cental, Monts, and Roquesparviere, all Breffe entirely, the borders and country of the Rhone on both fides as far as Lyons, except the bridge of Grezin, and fome passages necesfary for his highness to enter Franche-Comté; but he was not by this cession to acquire a right to raise any tribute from these places, or to build any fort there, or to ferry troops over, but by the king's permission, and on condition that for this privilege of paffing the bridge of Grezin the duke should pay France one hundred thousand crowns: That he should likewise refign to his majesty the citadel of Bourg, the bailiwic of Getx, Chateau-Dauphin and its dependencies, with all that could be comprehended in the province of Dauphiné on this fide the Alps: That he should likewise renounce the property of Aus, Chousy, Vally, Pont d'Arley, Seissel, Chana, and Pierre-Chatel, to the borders of Geneva: That the fortifications of Beche-Dauphin should be rased: That the king should on his side restore all the other places he had taken that are not specified here, withdrawing the artillery and ammunition that were then placed there. The other articles related to criminals and prisoners of war that had fled on either fide, church benefices, exchange of estates between private persons, &c. It was articled for the duke of Nemours, part of whose estate lay in this country, that he should not be disturbed in the possession of it, neither for the part which held of the king, nor for that which held of his highness. The other clauses common to all treaties I shall not mention.

NOTWITHSTANDING this treaty was figned by me for the king, by the legate for the pope, and the duke of Savoy's agents, yet the duke, influenced by the count of Fuentes, put off fo long the entire conclusion of it, by his complaints and delays, that the king thought it necessary not to lay down his arms: he took post to Paris+, where he waited for the duke's determinations.

In case there should be a necessity for his returning into Savoy, he had certain measures to take for the affairs within his kingdom, and in Paris especially, at a time when every place was filled with ill-intentioned persons. He left the constable and Lesdiguieres, till his return, with fome good troops upon that frontier; and Villeroi and two or three other commissioners at Lyons, to conclude the business of the peace.

But his majesty found no occasion to return into these provinces. The duke of Savoy, after having long amused himself with expectations from the disaffected French lords, gave place to more prudent thoughts; and reflecting on what he had already loft by his obstinacy, he thought himself very happy to accept the treaty in the form already mentioned; accordingly the last formalities were added, and the peace was published at Paris and Turin with the usual ceremonies: however, the articles were not executed without many difficulties being raifed by the duke of Savoy, which detained Villeroi at Lyons part of the following year: it was not till then that every thing was entirely agreed to; and Spain, who had taken great interest in the affair, even advised the duke of Savoy to comply with the articles of the treaty. On all these occasions Henry paid great deference to the pope. He granted all the delays which the duke of Savoy, by count Octavio Taffone, engaged the legate to demand; which was contrary to Villeroi's advice: but his majesty having in reality obtained all that he could demand, thought he ought not to observe too rigorously the manner it was yielded to him, nor hazard, for fuch a trifle, a renewal of the war. This produced as many advantages to the king as any war ended in a fingle campaign could possibly do. His majesty declared, that Breffe should not be comprehended in the district of Lyons, but that it should be re-united to Burgundy, and be under the jurisdiction of the court of aides of Paris.

THE queen did not fet out immediately after for Paris. She had brought with her her uncle Don John, a bastard of the family of Medicis, Virgilius Urfinus her coufin, who being brought up, while young, with 14600. her had conceived hopes above his condition. Many more Italians of both fexes were in her train; amongst others, a young man named Conchini, and a girl called Leonora Galigaï, who afterwards played a great part in France. I went to Paris eight days before the queen, to make preparations for the ceremony of her entry *, which was performed with great magnificence. The next day, the king brought the queen and the whole court to the arfenal to dine with me; the queen was attended by all her Italian ladies, who being pleafed with the wine of Arbois, drank more of it than was necessary. I had some excellent white wine that was as clear as rock water: I ordered fome decanters to be filled with it, and when the ladies asked for water to temper the burgundy, they were presented with this liquor. The king fufpected by their gaiety that I had played them a trick. This winter was wholly taken up with parties of pleasure, on account of the king's marriage.

In Flanders, this year, the war broke out with great violence; prince Maurice of Orange gained a battle in the month of May againft the arch-duke Albert, in which the + admiral of Caffile, the man on whom he chiefly depended, was taken prifoner. He afterwards laid fiege to Nieuport, but was obliged to raife it. All I shall say of the war between the Emperor and the Grand Signior in Hungary, is, that the duke of Mercœur was made lieutenant-general there by his imperial majesty. I suppress a detail of the grandeur and magnificence of the secular ‡ jubilee at Rome, and shall conclude the Memoirs of

The citizens, fays the Chronologie Septennaire, would have prepared a very magnificent one for her, and addressed the king for that purpose, but his majesty chose rather that the expence of the entry should be laid out on other things that were more necessary. It afterwards adds: Upon her arrival at the postern-gate of the suburb St. Marcel, the marquis de Rosny caused all the cannon of the arfenal to be fired three times. She was carried in a litter along the moats of the city, and that day lodged at the fuburb St. Germain, at Gondy's house, and the next at Zamet's, and after that at the Louvre. Ibid.

† This was the battle of Nieuport, that was fought in the month of July, wherein the Spaniards loft 3000 men. The prince of Orange was nevertheles obliged to raife the fiege of Nieuport and retire to Holland. The greatest part of these foreign transactions are neither fully nor exactly related in our Memoirs; and I therefore think it unnecessary to give an account of them in the notes, but rather refer the reader to the Memoirs and Hiltories of that time. In like manner confult the general and particular accounts of the military expeditions between the armies of the emperor and the Grand Signior, which are mentioned here.

B O O K XII.

N the foregoing book I finished the last military narration that will be found in these Memoirs in which the last military narration that will - cerned. The life of Henry the great, hitherto wholly paffed amidst the tumult of arms, will in the sequel exhibit only the actions of a pacific king, and the father of a family. The manner in which the campaign in Savoy had been conducted and terminated, leaving no room to fear that the peace would be again infringed by these antient enemies of the monarchy, or that it would not subfift as long as his majesty pleased, I refumed, by his orders, and under his inspection, those schemes with regard to the finances that the war had suspended, and were now to meet with no more interruption. After the reprefentation I have already given of the state of affairs within the kingdom, it would be injurious to confider the life which the prince and myfelf now embraced as idle and inactive: if it is less noisy and tumultuous, it is probably more laborious. Behold me therefore again thut up in my closet, where I applied myself with the utmost attention to the examination of all the abuses that still remained to be rooted out of the chamber chamber of accounts *; the offices of the finances, the crown lands, the aids, the fubfidies, the equivalents, the five large farms, the tenths, and all the rest. I laboured at once for the present and the future, by taking fuch measures, that the method I established in the direction of every part of the finances should not be afterwards subject to any alterations. I confidered of means to enrich the king without impoverishing his subjects, to pay his debts, repair his palaces; and strove, with still more assiduity, to complete the art of fortifying his cities, than that of attacking and defending them; and to make provision of arms and ammunition. I extended my cares to the repairing and renewing public works, fuch as roads; bridges, keys of rivers, and other buildings, which reflect no lefs honour upon the fovereign than the fplendor of his own palaces, and are of general utility: for which purpose I began to look into the application that had been made of the money granted for those uses to the cities and corporations, or rather into the frauds that had been used in the management of these funds.

> THE scheme of drawing up an account of every part of the finances. under the title of a general state, which should lay down their nature uniformly and clearly, feemed always fo happy a thought, and fo proper to bring them to the utmost exactness, that wherever this method was practicable I made use of it. On the first day of this year, when I presented to the king the gold and filver medals, as usual, I gave him at the same time five of these general states, each of which related to one or other of my employments, bound up in one volume very neatly. In the first, which was of the greatest importance, because I there gave an account of all that concerned myself as superintendant, was fet down on one fide, all the money that was raifed in France by the king from every tax whatever; on the other, all that was to be deducted for the charge of collection, and consequently all that was to be brought clear into his majesty's coffers. I cannot persuade myfelf that this method was never thought of by any one fince the finances were subject to some regulation; but interest alone prevented the execution of it. However that may be, I shall always infift upon it, that without this guide there is no proceeding without mistakes or roguery.

> THE second of these states was drawn up merely for the use of the keeper of the royal treasury; here was set down, whence and upon what account he received all the king's money that passed through his hands during the year of his office, and how much he was at liberty to difburse out of the whole sum, and for what purposes. The third was compiled for the use of the master of the ordnance, containing an exact account of money received and expended; with a true inventory of all that relates to the artillery; the number and forts of cannon, and of other arms, the quantity of instruments of war, and provisions of victual, laid up in different places, or magazines; the state of the arfenals and fortified places, and other observations of the same fort. The fourth related to the chief furveyor of the roads, and gave an account of all the money difburfed or to be difburfed for the repair of every thing under his charge, whether it was to be done at the expence of the king or of the provinces. And, to conclude, the fifth contained a catalogue of cities and castles, particularly those on the frontiers, that required any money to be laid out upon them; with a kind of rough draught of the works necessary at each place, formed with due regard to their natural fituation and prefent state.

THE king, upon my representation, reformed many abuses with respect to money, which had caused a decay of commerce, of which money is the chief instrument; the first was the practice which was then allowed, of putting money to interest at eight, or even at ten per Cent. * a practice of equal mischief to the nobility and the people; to the nobility, because they being forbidden to engage in trade, have no other riches but the produce of their grounds, of which the price was brought down by high interest; to the people, because, by putting out money to interest, they made as great profit by fitting still as by labour, and thereby kept immense sums of money useless to the publie, which, without that method of growing rich, they would have improved by fome means advantageous to the commonwealth. The interest of eight per Cent. was abolished, and fix per Cent. allowed in its stead.

THE coin of different countries was till this time current in France. and passed in commerce equally with that of our own sovereign. prohibition was iffued, by which all money was put down but the coin of France *, that of Spain only excepted, which would have been too much miffed in commerce had it been at once forbidden. But it was more necessary to rid ourselves of the merchandise of our neighbours than of their money, for the whole kingdom was filled with their manufactures; and it is incredible how much mischief was done by foreign stuffs, particularly those of gold and filver. The importation of these, and of all others, was forbidden under severe penalties: and because France had no means of supplying herself with them out of her own stock, we had recourse to the true remedy, which is, to do without them; the use of all stuffs wrought with gold and silver being forbidden by an edict †.

* It is thus that a prince, in our times, remarkable for his abilities and superior skill in politics, has judged: being firmly perfuaded, that the flate would receive great advantages in every respect from a regula-

ALL these declarations tended to introduce one, by which it was forbidden to carry any species of money out of the kingdom, under the penalty of a confication of all that should be intercepted in the carriage, and likewife of all the estates of the offenders, as well those that favoured as those that were guilty of the infringement of this law. The king gave a public proof how much he had this affair at heart. by the oath he made, not to grant any pardon for this fort of mifdemeanors; and even to hold all those suspected that should dare to folicit him to the contrary: yet all this could only oblige those persons that carried on fuch practices to conceal them more carefully. I was of opinion, that one example would be more efficacious in correcting this obstinate evil than all the threats that had been published against it. I was not ignorant that a great many very confiderable persons, and even amongst the courtiers themselves, made a fund out of this pernicious traffic, either by fuffering this money to pass under their names, or by felling, at a high price, the authority which enabled them to

* It is true, that the species of foreign gold and silver coin ought not to pass current and be consounded with that of the prince in interior commerce, and in payments made between individuals; but is it not evident, that the more such coin abounds among our own money, the more shourshing will our commerce be? The historian Matthieu observes, tom. II. I. iii. p. 446. that this prohibition made the commerce in France fall almost entirely; and the duke of Sully himself agrees, a little lower, that he was obliged to have recourse to other means to retrieve it. We will examine this question with him, when he comes to handle it, in the following book. As to the prohibition of using gold and filter in cloads and boulfold furniture, we shall also have occasion, in the sequel, to give our cipinion on the principles he establishes with regard to luxury.

+ He shewed, by his example, how to retrench the superfluity of dress, for he commonly went clad in a coat of grey cloth, with only a pourpoint of sattin or taffety, without any indented edgings, lace, or embroidery: he commended such as dressed in that plain sashion, and ridiculed others, who carried, said he, their windmills and their old woods on their backs. Peref. part iii.

correspond with the foreigners, and secured the privileges of passage. I thought it most prudent to apply myself to those who were employed by them for these correspondences, and promised them that, as a recompence for their discovery, they should have the fourth part of those sums that were seized by their informations; for the king having made over these confiscations to me, I had a right to dispose of them. By these means I was well served.

A MONTH was fcarce elapfed, when I received notice from an inconfiderable man, the authors not being willing to make themselves known, that there were two hundred thousand crowns in gold collecting to fend abroad, which was to be fent at two different times, and that the first carriage would be much less than the second. After having taken all the necessary precautions, this fum appearing rather too confiderable for me, I thought myfelf obliged to mention it to the king, who made this qualification in the right he had given me, that if the fum did not exceed ten thousand crowns, I might appropriate it to myfelf, but that the overplus should be his, "Which will " come, faid he, very feafonably, having had fome lofs at play that I " durst not tell you of, nor make up with my own money." I was not mercenary enough to wait for the profits of the fecond carriage. I ordered the first to be dogged, and with such vigilance, that it was stopped half a league beyond the territories of France. It could not be done in the kingdom, though but a quarter of a league from the frontier, without furnishing the offenders with a pretext for getting it released. There was found in pistoles, double pistoles, and crowns of the fun, to the amount of eight and forty thousand crowns, which had been concealed in fome bales of common goods for exportation. The king's refolution on this article was fo well known, that the conductors named no person as proprietor of it; and notwithstanding all the noise this seizure made at court, it was disavowed by every one; and the fum was, by his majefty, divided in this manner: feventy-two thousand livres he reserved for himself, five and twenty thoufand he ordered should be given to the informer, and the remaining forty-feven thousand he left to me; promising me, that however large any future capture might be, he would take no part of it from me. But after this, no more money was attempted to be carried out of the kingdom; this example had given a general diflike to fo ruinous a traffic.

THOSE that composed the chamber of justice * which was erected against the contractors, treasurers, receivers, and others who had been guilty of misdemeanors in their offices, were likely, in appearance, to exercise far greater severities. It was my advice, that these offenders should not only be obliged to refund, but that those who were convicted of embezzling the public treasure should be corporally punished. Money, however, the possession of which coversall crimes it is the cause of, excepted this from the just rigor of the law +. I would, were it possible, transfuse into the breasts of my countrymen some part of that indignation that fills mine, against so pernicious an abuse, and all that contempt which I feel for those that owe their elevation to it. If we consider as a slight matter, the despicable light we appear in to our neighbours by this shameful custom (for none strikes more directly at the honour of the nation) we cannot conceal from ourselves the evils it has given rife to; nothing has contributed more towards perverting our ideas of probity, candor, and difinterestedness, or to turn those virtues into ridicule; nothing has more strengthened that fatal propenfity to luxury, which is natural to all men, but is with us become a fecond nature, by that peculiarity of temper which makes us fasten eagerly upon every thing that can gratify our passions; and nothing in particular has fo greatly degraded the French nobility, as the rapid and dazling fortunes of contractors and other men of bufiness, by that opinion which they have circulated every where, and which is indeed but too well grounded, that in France this is almost the only method of arriving at the highest honours, and first employments of the state, in the possession of which all is forgot, and to the attainment all is permitted.

To go to the fource, military virtue is almost the only quality by which true nobility can, in France, be obtained, preserved, or dignified:

Otherwise called the royal chamber: it consisted of a president of the parliament of Paris, two counsellors, two masters of request, a president and four counsellors of the chamber of accounts, a president and three counsellors of the court of aids, and one of the general advocates of the parliament, &c. Commissioners were sent into the provinces, to give them informations of such as were guilty of any malversations.

† The duke of Sully feems to me to reason justly, when, in supposing the utility of the chambers of juffice, he requires, that they flould not confine their proceedings to pecuniary mulcits only, but join to these corporal punishments. And he seems to me to have still greater reason, when, in the sequel, he advises to suppress this method as absolutely useless; and entirely abolish, in France, the usage of compositions in farming the sinances: and this is likewise the opinion of cardinal Richelieu. Testament Polit. part 1, ch. iv. § 5.

and in this practice there will be found no prejudice or empty opinion, if it be confidered, that precedence must naturally be granted to that rank, by which all other classes of the community are preserved and supported in that security without which there can be no property: but this state of life is not the way to a great fortune; this fimplicity and feparation from lucrative purposes shew the antiquity and purity of the first institution. By bravery nothing but honours could be got, because in those times honour was the only reward of glorious actions: in later days, fince the notions of mankind are changed, and every thing is rated by the money which it brings, this generous body of nobility is brought in comparison with the managers of the revenue, the officers of justice, and the drudges of business. But this comparison terminates in a universal agreement, to pay to these gatherers of money that respect which must always be shewn to those who are possessed of power, and are, in fact, our superiors, an advantage which the former have loft *. And, indeed, how should it be other-

* The fame cardinal Richelieu complains of this abuse, and proposes a remedy for it, according to the duke of Sully's scheme. "Gentlemen, says he, cannot " be promoted to places of trust and dig-" nity, but at the expence of their ruin; " for at prefent all forts of people are ad-" mitted to them through the infamous " traffic carried on by means of money. " For the future, all perfons should be " excluded from those posts, but those that " have the good fortune to be of noble birth." This minister concludes, in another place, after M. de Sully, "That " the means of continuing the nobility in " that purity of manners which they derive " from their ancestors (these are his words) " is to retrench that luxury and intolerable " expence which have been gradually in-" troduced." Part I. ch. iii. § 1. However, the impartiality which I profess obliges me to agree, that the notions of the duke of Sully are overstrained; and that in this passage there is a little of what may be called invective and idle declamation. I anticipate a remark, which we shall have occasion to make in what follows, and that is, the alterations which have happened in the political state of Europe from different conjunctures, and especially from the spirit of commerce, which at this day feems to animate it, have obliged states to recede a little from these old maxims which relate to luxury and expence; and therefore what follows feems to me to be the most reasonable method upon the whole. It is true, that that profession which has for its end the defence of the flate, ought to be in the possession of its principal dignities,; or, which is much to the fame purpose, all manner of regard, honour, and respect, should be paid to them. The duke of Sully has therefore good reason to observe, that of all the professions this has most to fear from luxury and effeminacy. Hence that reluctance officers flew to refide with their regiments: and that aversion of the young nobility to a fludy, which ought entirely to engage their attention. Hence that afiatic pomp of high living, and those excessive pleasuresinto which armies are usually plunged. Hence it follows, that foldiers, who from their youth have been only habituated to debauchery, are unable to undergo the fatiques and inconveniences of a campaign. And, laftly, we will farther agree with M. de Sully, that the abuses accruing from unequal marriages, are at this day carried to an almost shameful height; and that, in general, we have too much neglected a piece of policy, which has always been looked upon, and that with very good rea-wife, when we fee the nobility of the fame mind, with regard to this point, as the meanest of the people, and making no scruple to mingle the most illustrious blood in a shameful alliance with a dirty pedlar, who knows nothing but the change, his shop, his counter, and his knavery? This abuse is necessarily productive of two others, confusion of ranks, and degeneracy of families; which last is better proved by experience than argument. We need only take a view of that great number of mongril gentry with which the court and city is filled, and we shall find them wholly destitute of the plain and manly virtue of their ancestors: no depth of thought, solidity of judgment, rash, inconfiderate, a strong passion for play, a natural propensity to diffoluteness, a folicitude for dress, and vitiated taste in every kind of luxury; that one would imagine they thought to exceed even the women in the effeminacy of their manners: yet these people engage in the army, but with fuch dispositions, to which is often added a fecret contempt for the profession they embrace, what can be expected from them? This subversion of all order is indeed to be lamented. but is inevitable, while that profession, which has only glory for its object, is not exalted to the highest rank, and dignified with the chiefest fon, as one of the principal foundations of the strength of a state, a strict attention in making matrimony be honoured and respected. But after all these concessions, we must likewise agree, that one of the chief cares of a fovereign being to maintain and Arengthen unanimity between his subjects, by banishing jealousies from among the different ranks, and the mutual animolities of the feveral orders towards each other, and war not being, as formerly, the true, and even the only means, of rendering a kingdom flourishing, the greatest part of the maxims laid down with this view are unsupported. Would it not be much fitter to oblige the numerous families to divide themselves equally among the different employments in the army, the navy, the church, and commerce, and to permit the nobility to engage in trade, as a means without which it will henceforth be impossible for the great families to support themselves? We will refume the handling this subject pretty often; but it is certain, in general, that a mederate degree of attention is fufficient to make it plain, that the maxims of government, as to politics and commerce, should not at present be absolutely the same as they were a thousand years ago. It may be imagined, that as to the alterations necessary to be made in all these refpects, we could not do better than rely upon the various conjunctures, and the natural dispositions, which render all mankind so clear-fighted with regard to their own interest and welfare. However, a fatal experience has but too well taught us, how dangerous it is to leave to the giddy multitude the choice of the means how to arrive at it. Of these alterations there are some which ought to accompany, or follow, and be naturally subordinate to, each other; a thing which the rabble can neither differn nor relish. There is in every thing excess or abuse which they can neither foresee nor prevent. And this is the great point in the art of government, an art which requires continual application and attention. The hand of the pilot is not necessary to bear up the veffel upon the waves; but without it, the will in the end be dafted againft rocks, or at leaft never be able to reach her wished for prit.

honours, which, for that purpose, ought to be taken from the upflarts of 1601. fortune; and fince the infamy which we should find these creatures of chance stained with, if we took pains to examine them, is not sufficient to draw our contempt, it is necessary they should be branded with public marks of difgrace, to fignify the rank they ought to hold.

THE king was convinced by the justness of this reasoning. However, in this chamber of justice, the same thing happened that generally does: the little rogues paid for all the reft; the principal delinquents found their fecurity in that very metal for which they were profecuted; they made use of a small part of it in presents, which saved the other. This qualifying would not have prevailed with the king had it been employed directly; but it found acceptance with the ladies of the court, and even with the queen herfelf; they gained the constable, Bouillon, Bellegarde, Roquelaure, Souvré, Frontenac, and fome others, who, though not of this high class, knew as well how to work upon the king's inclinations; fuch were Zamet, La Varenne, Gondy, Boneuil, Conchini, and many more of that fort. The complaifance of this prince for all those whom he suffered to live in some degree of familiarity with him, and especially for ladies, deftroyed all his fine resolutions, so that the storm fell only upon those that had reason to reproach themselves with not having yet stolen enough to put their thefts in fecurity. The retrenching of part of those officers of all ranks, with which the bar and the finances abounded, and which was done at this time, was looked upon as the work of the chamber of justice. The great number of those officers, as well as their extreme licentiousness, are indubitable testimonies of the calamities that are introduced into a state and the forerunners of its ruin.

In May the king and queen had the devotion to celebrate the jubilee at Orleans. I attended their majesties as far as half a league beyond Fontainebleau, from whence they proceeded that evening to Puiseaux. I took advantage of this little vacation, to visit the lands of Baugy, which had been just awarded to me by a decree, for the great fums which were due to me from these lands, and upon which I began to build immediately with the confiscated money I have lately mentioned. I was stopped within two leagues from the place where I intended to lie, by a courier from his majesty, who called out to me while I was yet a great way before him. He brought me a letter from the king which contained only these few words. " I gave " you fix days for your journey to Baugy, but I have received "letters of great confequence from Buzenval, which I want to shew you; you will oblige me if you will come and lie to-night here at "Puiseaux, whither you need bring no necessaries. I have given orders for your lodging, and sent thither my hunting bed, and have ordered Coquet to get your supper ready, and your breakfast in the "morning, for I will detain you no longer. Adieu, my beloved friend."

I WISHED my wife, who accompanied me, a good night, and, taking with me only two gentlemen, a page, and a valet de chambre, and one groom, I turned back to Puiseaux, where I found the king, who was amufing himfelf with making the youth of his train wreftle and leap in the court-yard of the priory. As foon as he faw me, he called Pasquier, who had been sent to him by Villeroi with Buzenval's letters, which informed the king that prince Maurice had taken the field with his army which he had increased with garrisons drawn out of their quarters, and efcorted by two thousand waggons: that, with this army, he intended (as Buzenval had learned from the prince of Orange's officers, and from the prince himself) to cross Brabant, the country of Liege, Hainault, and Artois, to gain by it the rivers along the frontiers of France, from whence he expected affiftance, and bring the war to the neighbourhood of Gravelines, Berque-Saint-Vinox, Dunkirk, and Nieuport; that the archduke, greatly inferior to the prince of Orange, not having yet received the troops which he expected from Italy and Germany, beheld those preparations with aftonishment, and durst not oppose his march, but that he contented himself with being near him, that he might oblige him to keep in a narrow compass, and that while he obstructed him he might be himfelf near the place where he perceived the ftorm would fall; that, finding this step, which had been communicated to him, of great importance, he thought it was necessary to inform the king of it.

The knowledge I had of the Low Countries made this defign of the prince of Orange appear to me fo dangerous, that I thought it likely to draw upon him a total defeat. He would be obliged to march a great way within view of the enemy and upon their frontiers, through countries to full of woods, hedges, and hollow ways, particularly in Liégeois, that I hought them impaffable for fuch a number of waggons; and the king was of the fame opinion. After we had conferred together a long time, he refolved to fend prince Maurice his fentiments of it, and I refumed my route to Baugy, in which I vifited the lands of Sully, that I had a defign of purchasing, and did so accordingly the following following year. The king continued his pilgrimage to Orleans, and 1601. laid there the first stone for the rebuilding the church of the Holy Cross: he afterwards returned to Paris, to which place I had come three days before his majesty.

HENRY's letters changed the defign of Naffau; he befieged Rhim-On the berg, and took it on the tenth of June. The archduke Albert, in revenge, invested Ostend on * the fifth of July. Maurice, on his fide. laid fiege to Bolduc, either to force the archduke to abandon his enterprize, or to indemnify himfelf by the reduction of this place, which was looked upon to be the most important fortress in Brabant. I was still of opinion that he would do neither; and when the king fent for me to hear my fentiments of it in the presence of the courtiers who were by when the pacquet which brought the news was opened, and who all spoke differently of it, I said that, although I was very young when I had vifited Bolduc, I had nevertheless preserved the remembrance of the place, and, that not to mention its fituation, which rendered the fiege of it a work of immense labour, it seemed to me impossible, considering the extent of the place and the great number of its citizens, to furround it in fuch a manner as to hinder any one from going in or out, at least without an army of twenty five thousand men. In effect, the prince of Orange failed in his attempt upon Bolduc: but all this did not happen till November.

THE war breaking out so near our frontiers, made Henry resolve to go to Calais, as if he had no other defign but to visit that country. Although he always suspected the Spaniards, he was not apprehensive, in the present state of the affairs of that crown, that they would be prevailed on to break the peace: but he was not displeased at having an opportunity to give them a little uneafiness, in revenge for the daily occasions of discontent which he received from them. They acted, indeed, in a manner-fufficient to have obliged his majefty to do fomething more, had not policy prevailed over refentment. After many fruitless attempts to break the alliance between the Swifs cantons and France, and to hinder the pope from acting as arbitrator in the dispute about the marquifate of Saluces, because his holiness could not dispense with himself from giving judgment against the duke of Savoy, they had fent troops to that prince in the last campaign, under the command of the count de Fuentes. Their continued intrigues with marechal Biron, Bouillon, D'Auvergne, the prince of Joinville, were publicly known. Biron himself had confessed it to his majesty: and lastly, the king, at his return from Orleans, received certain intelligence of their practices with the cities of Metz, Marseilles, and Bayonne.

> ALL this his majesty dissembled his displeasure at; but nothing provoked him against that crown so much, as the outrage * which La Rochepot, our ambaffador at Madrid, his nephew, and his whole train had received from that court. La Rochepot gave an account of it in his letters. " I fwear by heaven," faid Henry transported with rage, " that, if I can but once fee my affairs in order, and get a fuffi-" cient supply of money, and whatever else is necessary, I will make " fo furious a war upon them, that they shall repent of having obliged " me to take up arms." However, he still shut his eyes upon so glaring a violation of the rights of nations, but it was not without doing great violence to his inclinations. " I fee plainly," faid this prince to me fometimes, " that through emulation, jealoufy, and interest of " ftate, France and Spain can never be on friendly terms with each "other, and that a proper fecurity against that crown must have some other foundation than words." He was sufficiently convinced of the error in Villeroi and Sillery's policy, who often, in his prefence, maintained against me, that a strict union with Spain was not only neither impossible nor dangerous for France, but likewise the most reafonable system of politics that ought to be embraced. To their arguments I opposed that competition so natural to these two crowns, the opposition of their interests, and the remembrance of so many recent injuries; and I concluded that, with a neighbour fo artful and unjust, the necessary measures to be taken were to hold them always suspected, and to be always prepared for defence. The last news that came from Madrid gave me, for this time, the advantage over my opponents, at least in the king's opinion, who hesitated no longer about going to and thence diagged his nephew to prifon, with others of his affociates that had taken fliciter there. This difference was compromifed by the pope, who caufed the prifoners to be fent to him to Rome, and celivered them to the count de Bethune, brother to M. de Sully, ambaffator of France at that court. See the abovementioned historians for the year 1601.

His nephew happening to bathe himfelf with fome French gentlemen, was infulted by fome Spaniards who flung his cloaths, and those of his companions into the river. Oftend, after he had diffinified two celebrated embaffies, which he 1601.

ONE of these embassies was from the grand seignor, who, knowing that the fophy of Persia his enemy had sent a solemn deputation to the pope, the emperor, and the king of Spain, without taking any notice of the king of France, against whom he seemed to make an overture of his friendship at the same time that he asked for theirs, he was returning one act for another. His highness, on this occasion, made use of his physician, who * was a christian, and invested him with the dignity of his ambaffador. The terms in which this haughty potentate expressed himself, with regard to the French +, discovered a distinction and respect, of which there are few examples; he set a higher value, he faid, upon the friendship and arms of the French, than of all the other christian nations together; and that although they should all unite with Persia against him, he should think himself in a condition to despise their attempts, as soon as he had secured the alliance and affiftance of a king, whose superiority over all his neighbours, as well as his great personal qualities, he appeared not to be ignorant of. The Turkish ambassador presented his majesty with several rich presents, and gave me two fcymetars of exquifite workmanship, which I keep with great care.

The other ambassador was from the republic of Venice. This state had been a long time, by a particular alliance often renewed, and by their common interest, united with France against the Spanish power: it had been amongst the first in complimenting his most christian majesty upon his marriage and the peace, by the seurs Gradenigo and Delfin, the last of whom was likewise in this embassy. Henry was defirous that these ambassadors should be received with the utmost distinction in Paris. He ordered them to be served with his own plate, and loaded them with presents of equal value with those he gave the first. The letters he then wrote to me turned almost wholly upon far advanced in her pregnancy, upon which account the king could not come immediately to Paris, and fill lefs the queen who had fo great a concern in this embaffy. His majefty flewed fo much refpect for the Venetian ambaffadors, as not to fuffer them to wait for his return to Paris, but let them know that he would receive them at Fontainebleau, to which place his coaches and equipages attended them.

The archdukes could not fail to suspect, that the king, by marching-towards Calais, would endeavour to obstruct their designs upon Ostend, by way of reprisal for the ill treatment La Rochepot had received. In order to discover the purport of this journey, they deputed to him the count of Solre in the quality of ambassador, under a pretence of making him the same compliments on the queen's pregnancy which he received from all parts; enjoining this ambassador to infinuate a complaint of his journey, by which Solre gave a fair opportunity to the king, who, instead of satisfying him as to the occasion of his complaints, made, in his turn, very heavy ones against Spain, assuring him however, but in a general manner, that he would not be the first to come to a rupture, provided that the Spaniards did not force him to it by continuing their unsair proceedings. With this promise the ambassador pretended to be satisfied.

The queen of England hearing the king was at Calais, thought it a favourable opportunity to fatisfy her impatience of feeing and embracing her beft friend. Henry was not lefs defirous of this interview, that he might confer with the queen upon the affairs of Europe in general, as well as on their own in particular, especially those which had been just hinted to him by the English and Dutch ambassadors when he was at Nantz. Elizabeth first wrote him a letter equally polite and full of offers of service; she afterwards made him the usual compliments, and repeated those assurances by the lord Edmund, whom she dispatched to Calais, till she herself could arrive at Dover, from whence the fent the lord Sidney with other letters.

HENRY refolving not to be outdone in complaifance, answered these advances in a manner that shewed at once his respect for the sex of Elizabeth, and his esteem and admiration of her character. This intercourse continued a long time, to the great mortification of the Spaniards, whose jealousy was strongly excited by proximity and close correspondence. Of all the letters wrote by their two sovereigns on this occasion, I am possessed only of that in which Elizabeth informs the king of those obstacles that prevented her conferring with him in person, lamenting the unhappiness of princes, who, contrary to their inclinations, were slaves to forms and settered by circumspection. This letter *, because it was the occasion of the voyage I made to this princes, I have kept in my hands; in it she tells her most dear and well beloved brother (for so she called the king of France) that her concern at not being able to see him was so much the greater, as she had something to communicate to him which she durst not confide to any other person or commit to paper, and yet that she was upon the point of returning to London.

The king's curiofity was strongly excited by these last words; in vain did he torture his imagination to guess their purport. Secretary Feret being sent by him to fetch me, "I have just now received let-"ters," faid he to me, "from my good fister the queen of England, whom you admire so greatly; they are more full of statteries than ever: see if you will have more success than I have had in discover-"ing her meaning." I agreed with Henry that it must be something of great consequence which induced her to express herself in this manner; it was resolved therefore, that I should embark the next day for Dover, as if with no other design then to take advantage of the shortness of the passage to make a tour to London, which would give me an opportunity of seeing what step the queen would take upon my arrival, neither the king nor I doubting but that she would be immediately

* This letter, and this whole relation of the duke of Sully's concerning Henry the IVth's journey to Calais, and Elizabeth's to Dover, appear fufficient, without any other reflections, to shew the error of all those various judgments current at that time, and which have been mentioned by different historians concerning these two potentates. It was faid Elizabeth propofed to Henry, either that he should come to Dover, or at least confer with her in a veffel half way between thefe two towns, and that this propofal concealed a fnare in which El zabeth hoped to entrap Henry, by feizing upon his perfon in the interview, and keeping him prisoner till he restored Calais, and that Henry excused himself from complying with her request, only because he fuspected the delign; others fay, because his fears of the fea were fo great, that he duist not venture into a veffel. No one fuspected the true motive for proposing this interview, which was the occasion of all these letters that passed between them, and caused the duke of Sully to make the secret voyage to Dover, of which he here gives an account. Siri, on this occasion, builds upon the refentment which he supposes E-izabeth always preferred, both of the peace of Vervins and the furrender of Calais, as well as her fear left Henry should aggrandif: himfelf too much, and on the jealouly which the English entertained of the French. Mem. Recond. vol. I. p. 130, 150, &c. But this writer, fo well acquainted with foreign negotiations, especially those of Italy and Spain, is not right, neither in the facts nor the opin ons which he produces concerning the interior of our court and councils under the reign of Henry the IVth. informed 1601. informed of it. I acquainted no one with my intended paffage, but fuch of my domestics as were to attend me, and of these I took but a very small number.

I EMBARKED early in the morning, and reached Dover about ten o'clock, where, among the crowd of those who embarked and disembarked, I was immediately discovered by the lord Sidney, who five or fix days before had feen me at Calais: with him were Cobham, Raleigh, and Griffin, and they were foon after joined by the earls of Devonshire and Pembroke. Sidney embraced me, and asked me if I was come to see the gueen; I told him I was not, and even assured him that the king knew nothing of my voyage: I likewise entreated him not to mention it to the queen, for not having had any intention of paying my respects to her I had no letter to present, my design being only to make a short tour incognito to London. These gentlemen replied fmiling, that I had taken a useless precaution, for that probably the guardship had already given a fignal of my arrival, and that I might quickly expect to see a messenger from the queen, who would not fuffer me to pass in this manner, having but three days ago spoke of me publicly and in very obliging terms. I affected to be extremely concerned at this unlucky accident, but to hope nevertheless, that I might still pass undiscovered, provided that these gentlemen would be fecret as to the place where I was to lodge; from whence, I affured them. I would immediately depart as foon as I had taken a little refreshment: faying this I left them abruptly, and had but just entered my apartment, and spoke a few words to my people, when I felt somebody embrace me from behind, who told me, that he arrested me as a prisoner to the queen. This was the captain of her guards, whose embrace I returned, and replied fmiling, that I should esteem such imprisonment a great honour.

His orders were to conduct me directly to the queen; I therefore followed him. "It is well, M. de Rofny," faid this princes to me as soon as I appeared, "it is thus that you break our fences and pass "on without coming to see me; I am greatly surprised at it, for I "thought you bore me more affection than any of my servants, and I "am persuaded that I have given you no cause to change those senting ments." I replied in sew words, but such as so gracious a reception required. After which I began, without any difguise, to entertain her with those senting my master had for her. "To give you "a proof," replied she, "that I believe all you have told me of the "good-

" goodwill of the king my brother, and of your own, I will discourse " with you on the subject of the last letter I wrote to him; though -" perhaps you have feen it, for Stafford (that is the name of the lord " Sidney) and Edmund tell me, that the king conceals few of his fe-" crets from you." She then drew me afide, that the might fpeak to me with the greatest freedom, on the present state of affairs in Europe; and this she did with such strength and clearness, beginning from the treaty of Vervins, that I was convinced this great queen was truly worthy of that high reputation she had acquired in Europe. She entered into this detail, only to shew me how necessary it was that the king of France should, in concert with her, begin to execute those great defigns which they both meditated against the house of Austria. The necessity of this she founded upon the accessions this house was daily seen to make: she repeated to me all that had passed on this fubject in 1598, between the king and the English and Dutch ambuffadors, and asked me if this prince did not still continue to have the fame fentiments, and why he so long delayed to begin the enterprize.

To these questions of queen Elizabeth, I answered, That his most christian majesty still continued to think of that affair as he always had done: that the men and money he was raifing, and the other warlike preparations he was making, were deftined to no other purpose than the execution of the concerted plan; but that in France things were far from being in fuch a state, as to enable him to undertake the destruction of a power so solidly established as that of the Austrian princes. This I proved, by the extraordinary expences Henry had been at fince the peace of Vervins, as well for the general necessities of his kingdom, as to restrain the attempts of the seditious, and to carry on the war which he had just ended with Savoy. I did not diffemble with this princess the opinion I had always entertained of this enterprize, which is, that though England and the United Provinces should use their utmost endeavours to reduce the house of Austria, unless they were affifted by all the forces of the French monarchy, and on whom, for many reasons, the chief weight of this war must fall, the house of Austria, by uniting the forces of its two branches, might, without any difficulty, not only support itself against them, but even render the balance equal; it would therefore be useless, and even an imprudent attempt, to endeavour to fap the foundations of fo formidable a power, by the fame means only that ferve merely to keep upon the defensive with it: and it would be indispensably necessary to defer the attempt for fome years, during which, France would acquire all she now wanted, to enable her to strike more effectually the blow that was preparing for the common enemy; and would, in conjunction with her allies, endeavour to engage the neighbouring princes and states in their defign, the princes of Germany especially, who were more immediately threatened by the tyranny of the house of Austria.

IT was easy for the queen of England to comprehend, by the manner in which I expressed myself, that these were not so much my own as Henry's fentiments which I communicated to her, and she gave me to understand as much, by confessing, that they appeared so just and reasonable to her, that she could not avoid adopting them: adding only, that there was one point on which all the parties could not be too foon agreed, which was, that the ultimate view of the intended combination being to confine the power of the house of Austria within just bounds, it would be necessary that each of the allies should so proportion all his defires or expectations which he might conceive in confequence of the event, as that none of them might be capable of giving umbrage to the rest: supposing, for example, that Spain should be deprived of the Low Countries, neither the whole nor any part of this state was to be coveted, either by the king of France, or the king of Scotland, who would one day become fo of Great Britain, nor yet by the kings of Sweden and Denmark, already fufficiently powerful by fea and land to make themselves respected by the other allies; and that the same conduct ought to be observed with regard to all the other spoils that might be taken from the house of Austria by those princes whose dominions should happen to be nearest to the conquered countries; "For if my brother, the king of France, faid she, should " think of making himself proprietor, or even only feodal lord of the "United Provinces, I should never confent to it, but entertain a most " violent jealoufy of him; nor should I blame him, if, giving him " the same occasion, he should have the same fears of me."

These were not the only reflections made by the queen of England; the faid many other things, which appeared to me so just and sensible, that I was filled with associational and admiration. It is not unusual to behold princes form great designs; their sphere of action so forcibly inclines them to this, that it is only necessary to warn them of the extreme, which is, the projecting what their powers are so little proportioned to person, that they scarce ever find themselves able to execute the half of what they proposed; but to be able to distinguish and form only such as are reasonable; wisely to regulate the conduct of them; to foresee and guard against all obstacles in such a manner, that when they happen, nothing more will be necessary, than to apply the remedies prepared long before. This is what few princes are capable of. Ignorance, prosperity, luxury, vanity, nay, even fear and indolence, daily produce schemes, to execute which there is not the least possibility. Another cause of surprize to me, was, that Elizabeth and Henry, having never conferred together on their political project, should agree so exactly in all their ideas, as not to differ even in the most minute particulars.

THE queen observing my eyes were attentively fixed on her without speaking, imagined she had expressed herself so confusedly in fomething the had faid, that I was unable to comprehend her meaning. But when I ingenuously confessed to her the true cause of my filence and furprife, the then, without scruple, entered into the most minute parts of the defign: but as I shall have an ample occasion to treat of this, in relating the great schemes which were prevented by the untimely death of Henry IV. I shall not trouble the reader with useless repetitions; but in this place just shew the five principal points to which her majesty reduced so extensive a scheme, as from the fequel of these Memoirs this will appear to have been. The first was, to restore Germany to its antient liberty, in respect to the election of its emperors, and the nomination of a king of the Romans. The fecond, to render the United Provinces absolutely independent of Spain; and to form them into a republic, by annexing to them, if necessary, fome provinces difmembered from Germany. The third, to do the fame in regard to Switzerland, by incorporating with it fome of the adjacent provinces, particularly Alface and Franche-Compté. The fourth, to divide all christendom into a certain number of powers, as equal as may be. The fifth, to reduce all the various religions in it under those three which should appear to be most numerous and considerable in Europe.

Our conference was very long: I cannot bestow praises upon the queen of England that would be equal to the merit which I discovered in her in this short time, both as to the qualities of the heart and the understanding. I gave an exact relation of every thing that passed between us to the king, who very highly approved all the had faid to me. Their majesties corresponded by letters, during the rest of the time they stayed at Dover and Calais. All preliminaries were agreed on; measures were taken even on the grand object of the design, but Vol. II.

with fuch fecrefy, that the whole of this affair remained to the death of the king, and even much longer, among the number of those in which only various and uncertain conjectures are formed.

The king did not return to Paris till he had carefully examined all the fortreffes upon his frontier, and provided for their fecurity: in every other refpect, he appeared an indifferent fpectator of the quarrel between the Spaniards and the Flemings; and all he did in favour of Oftend, the fiege of which was fill continued, was not to hinder fome French from engaging in the fervice of the prince of Orange, in which feveral of them loft their, lives; amongft thefe, the death of young ** Chatillon-Coligny, whose head was shot off by a cannon-ball before Oftend, deferved to be particularly lamented. The king, when he was told it, faid publicly, that France had lost a man of great merit: myself, in particular, was sensibly afflicted at his death. Coligny, at an early age, had already united almost all the qualities that form a foldier; valor, moderation, prudence, judgment, and the art of making himself equally beloved by the foldier and officer.

But Coligny was a protestant; and the jealoufy of the courtiers foon converted all these virtues into so many crimes, in the opinion of the king; they told his majesty, that Coligny already aspired to the diffinction of being head of the protestants, both within and without the kingdom, to which he was folicited by the duke of Bouillon; that he defired nothing with fo much ardour as to equal, or even to furpass, the actions of his father and grandfather; and had been heard to declare, that he should not regret the loss of life, if he had the satisfaction to lofe it at the head of an army, fighting for the prefervation of his friends. His affection for the foldiers was treated as an artful and dangerous artifice. They hinted to the king, that he had already raifed a jealoufy in the prince of Orange; and that his majesty would one day have reason to fear a shoot from a stock that had given fo much trouble to our kings. Henry was fo far influenced by these infinuations, that when I went to ask some favours of him for the mother and brother of Coligny, he dwelt continually upon what he had heard, and had given but too much credit to, and appeared

THE king, at his return to Fontainebleau, had the pleasure to find the queen in as good a flate of health as he left her. He was feldom from her during her pregnancy, and took all possible care of her health *. In a letter he wrote to me some days before the queen lay in, he fays, "Bring no people of bufiness with you at this time, " no mention must be made of it during the first week of my wife's " lying in; we shall have sufficient employment to hinder her from " getting cold."

AT length, the moment that was to fill the king, the queen, and the whole kingdom with joy, arrived; the queen was, on the 17th of September +, delivered of a fon, whose strong health, as well as the queen's, filled the kingdom with the most agreeable hopes ‡. I believe I may venture to affirm, that this incident gave me more joy than any one else. I was attached to the king's person by the most tender ties of affection, an affection which I felt in a higher degree than the most faithful of his subjects, and was therefore more interested in his happiness. He was so convinced of this truth, that he did me the honour to give me notice of the birth of his fon in a billet, which, at ten o'clock at night, he fent from Fontainebleau to Paris, where I then was; it contained only these few words: "The " queen is just delivered of a son; I send you the news, that you may " rejoice with me." Besides this billet, which he wrote as to a friend, he fent me another the next morning by La-Varenne, as grand master of the ordnance; he there mentioned the birth of the Dauphin as an occasion of inexpressible delight to him, "Not so much, said he, for "the near concern I have in this incident, as for the general good of "my subjects." He ordered me to fire the cannon of the arsenal; which was performed in such a manner, that the report was heard even at Fontainebleau. On this occasion it was not necessary to order public rejoicings: all his majesty's subjects, from the first to the meanest, concurred in giving demonstrations of it, in which fear and policy had no part.

THE king's fatisfaction was only interrupted by a flight indisposition, which he had drawn upon himfelf. La-Riviere * was his first physician, a man who had little more religion than those generally have that blend with it the profession of judicial astrology; yet the world did him the honour to suppose, that he concealed the principles of a protestant under the appearance of a catholic. Henry, who already felt a tenderness for his son, that filled him with an eager anxiety to know about his fate, having heard that La-Riviere had often fuceeded wonderfully in his predictions, commanded him to calculate the Dauphin's nativity with all the ceremonies of his art; and that the exact moment of his birth might be known, had carefully fought for the most excellent watch that could be procured. It appeared, that the king thought no more of this defign till about a fortnight after, when he and I being alone together, the conversation turned upon the predictions of La-Brosse, which I have formerly mentioned, concerning his majesty and me, which we had found so exactly accomplished. Henry's inclination to make the experiment with his fon receiving new strength by this discourse, he ordered La-Riviere to be sent for.

The phyfician, without taking any notice of it, had proceeded in his work. "M. de La-Riviere, faid the king to him, we have been "talking of aftrology; what have you discovered concerning my son?" I had begun my calculations, replied La-Riviere, but I left them "unfinished, not caring any longer to amuse myself with a science "which I have always believed to be in some degree criminal." The king immediately discovered that this answer was not sincere, and that he concealed his thoughts, either through an apprehension of offending his majesty, or from an effect of ill-humour, whim, or the caution of an astrologer, who held it dangerous to disclose his secrets.

* La-Riviere fucceeded D'Aliboust in in the family of the duke of Bouillon, who the place of first physician: he had been refigued him to the king,

La-Riviere fuffered himself to be pressed still longer; and at last, with a discontented air, either real or dissembled, said, "Sire, your son will " live to be a man, and will reign longer than you; but his inclina-"tion and yours will be very different; he will be obstinately wedded " to his opinions, often governed by his own whims, and fometimes " by those of others: it will be fafer then to think than to speak: " impending ruin threatens your former fociety: all the effects of " your prudence will be destroyed: he will perform great things, will " be fortunate in his defigns, and make a great figure in Europe: in " his time there will be a viciffitude of peace and war: he will have " children; and after him things will run into confusion. This is all " you can know from me, and more than I had refolved to tell you." The king, after musing a little while on what he had heard, faid to La-Riviere, "You mean the protestants, I know; but you speak thus " because you are well inclined towards them.". "I understand, " faid La-Riviere, what you would have, but I shall say no more." His majesty and I continued together a long time in conversation, making reflections on every word that had been spoken by La-Riviere, which continued strongly on the king's mind.

It was not possible for me to stay long at Fontainebleau; but the king continued to give me, with great kindness, an account of every thing that happened. "You cannot imagine," says he in one of his letters, "how well my wise is recovered of her lying-in; she dresses "her head herself, and talks already of getting up." In another, nine days after her delivery, he says, "The queen goes already into her "closet; she has a constitution surprisingly strong: my son likewise is "very well, I thank God: these are the best news I can send a faith- sulphy strong that the same strong strong that his son to Saint-Germain to be nursed, on account of the goodness of the air: and by one of those little strokes of popularity which shew the heart better than more oftentatious actions, he would have him shewn to all Paris; for which purpose, he was carried openly through

The king had made a promife to the queen that, if she brought him a son, he would present her with the castle of Monceaux. "My "wife," said he, in a letter to me, "has gained Monceaux, by giv-"ing me a son; therefore I desire you will send for the president Forget, to confer with him about this affair, and take his advice con-"cerning the security that must be given to my children, for the sum which I pay for Monceaux." The city of Paris having likewise promised the queen a present of a suit of tapestry hangings for her lying-in, his majesty, in this letter, reminded me to demand it: an infanta * was born in Spain, about the same time that providence gave a prince to France.

The negotiation, so many years depending with the grand duke of Florence, was concluded this year: that the reader may understand the occasion of it, it is necessary he should know, that, under the reign of Henry the third, Ferdinand de Medicis, grand duke of Florence, took advantage of the troubles that then raged in France, to possess the state of the little isles of Pomegue, Ratoneau, and If, with its castle in the neighbourhood of Marseille. Henry, fully resolved to make the grand duke restore them, ordered d'Ossat, who was then on the other side of the Alps, to demand them, in the year 1508. The grand duke not daring to resuse them absolutely, represented only, that he had expended great sums of money upon these isles, which he could not resolve to lose: d'Ossat of himself removed this obstacle, by engaging that the king his master should indemnify him for these expences, by paying him three hundred thousand crowns, for which twelve of the richett and most considerable persons in France should be security †, as

† This is, in effect, the import of the fifth article of the treaty that paffed on the aft of May 1598, between the king of France and the grand duke of Tufcany, by the intervention of cardinal d'Offiat, which may be feen at full length at the end of the collection of this cardinal's letters. The duke of Sully does not here reproach M. d'Offat with any thing which he had not already excufed in the letter which he wrote to his m-jefty, on the 5th of May 159%, immediately after the conclusion of this treaty, and likewife in that to M. de Villeroi, of the 4th of August following. He afterwards cleared himself more fully, in a long memorial, which is also inserted at the end of this collection. However, we cannot think the reasons which M. de Sully produces against this convention groundless, nor believe that the duke of Florence would have broke the treaty without that condition.

The king, without greatly attending to this condition, ratified this treaty; and a short time after the chevalier Vinta was sent by the duke of Florence to conclude, with Gondy, the business of the isles upon this plan.

THE two agents did not go out of the council to feek for their fecurities, and the affair was proposed to me among the rest: this method of proceeding with a king, whose power no part of Europe was ignorant of, appeared to me fo uncommon, that I could not help laughing at those who mentioned it to me. Villeroi took pains to represent to me the necessity of disengaging d'Ossat from his word: I replied, that there never had been any bankers in my family; for indeed, this was rather the business of bankers than of gentlemen. None of the others, faid Villeroi, have made any difficulty about it. I believe it, answered I with some indignation, for they are all either defeended from traders or lawyers. Hereupon there arose a dispute in the council, which was reported to the king, who only smiled and said they had done wrong to mention it to me without first informing him. fince he had not acquainted me with it himself. I am astonished, added he, that he did not give a still ruder answer: you cannot be ignorant of his temper, and how highly he values himfelf upon the nobility of his birth: let this affair be concluded without his or any other persons entering into any obligation: I gave no permission to the bishop of Rennes to agree to fuch an expedient. The grand duke did not allow himself to be solicited upon this head; he set the king free from the obligation of the twelve fecurities out of regard to his person. The act for it was passed on the fourth of August 1598, but the affair was on

I was likewise employed to settle certain estates in Piedmont, for which the count of Soissons was desirous of treating with his majesty: they came to him by the death of the princess of Conti, in right of his wife who was of the house of Montassié*. My report was not very favourable for the count: I represented to the king, that these estates, which had been too highly valued, were likewise subject to so much litigation, and were so disadvantageously situated, that these confiderations ought greatly to lessen the price. FRESNE-CANAYE * was named ambaffador to Venice, and Bethune my brother to Rome, to the great mortification of the other ministers, especially Villeroi and Sillery, with whom I had often disputes, which the king had many times endeavoured to prevent. These two gentlemen had undertaken to exclude me from any concern in foreign affairs, the cognizance of which they pretended belonged only to them. The nomination to embaffies falling under this head, they told his majesty, in my presence, that, for the embassy to Rome, they had abler persons to propose to him than Bethune, who, they faid, had no knowledge of the affairs of that court, and had yet performed no confiderable fervice to the state. My brother had, however, already been charged with the embaffy to Scotland, of which he had acquitted himself well; and it could not be denied that he was circumspect, wife, and honest; qualities which, in my opinion, are not among the least that are effential to an ambassador. What these gentlemen said, therefore, was as false as it was contemptuous; and this I made them fensible of in my answer, by shewing them the value of those services which the state received from the military art, and which those gentlemen feemed to place below all others.

VILLEROI, piqued in his turn that I had not given the first rank to his, maintained his cause with great heat and animosity. His majesty found himself obliged to command us to be filent, telling us, that he was offended at our holding fuch discourse in his presence; and that, without entering into a discussion of our services, we ought to be satisfied that he was pleafed with them. I asked the king's pardon for daring, after this prohibition, to add a few words to close the mouths of perions who fo unjustly placed the lazy business of the law, and the quiet employments of the cabinet, above the toils, the dangers, and expence of the military professions; and I truly spoke my sentiments of fuch partiality. "Well, well," faid Henry, interrupting me, " I " pardon you all, and take your words, as I must, but upon condition "that, for the future, you will avoid these little debates, and that when one of you recommends his friend to my favour, the others " do not oppose it, but submit to my choice: at present I determine " in favour of the figur de Bethune, whose family, wisdom, probity,

" and even capacity, I efteem, having employed him in many affair " both of peace and war, which he has acquitted himself of worthily." The king promifed Villeroi that, after my brother's return, he would dispose of the embassy to Rome according to his recommendation. He then put an end to his walk, which this quarrel had protracted to more than two hours, and went to dinner. I went feveral times this year to Fontainebleau, to receive his majesty's orders concerning affairs that could no otherwife be communicated to him, and, being often and for a confiderable time at a diffance from each other, I received, as usual, a great number of letters from this prince: that in which he mentions the marechal d'Ornano *, who had given him some causes of complaint, has fomething fingular in it. "I never, fays Henry, " faw fo much obstinacy and ignorance together in one man, but I " pronounced him dangerous; he has reached the fummit of info-" lence. The flates of Languedoc meeting this year, the king wrote to me, that he must transfer the place of their sitting to the Lower Languedoc, "that my fervants, faid he, may not go " first to those of the league." In another letter, he ordered me to fend for fome foals of his breed of horses + at Meun; and in another, to decay, and were in a worfe condition than they were under Henry II. That of Meun, or Mehun, in Berry, was the only place of those before mentioned, where horses were bred for the king's use; and these stables were very inconsiderable, as may be seen from the archives of the secretary of the king's houshold, which are kept at Petitsperes in Paris, where Meun is called Main, apparently to distinguish it from another Meun upon the Indre, that is also in Berry.

+ " From his early years," fays Brantome, speaking of Henry II. in his Vies des hommes illustres, tom. II. p. 24. "he was " always very fond of the exercise of rid-" ing, and kept always a great number of " them in his grand stables of Tournelles, " which were the principal, as also at " Muns, at St. Leger, and at Oyron, " under the inspection of M. de Boisly mas-" ter of the horse, the most valuable part of " which was his breeding mares, wherein he took great delight." He adds, that, this prince having one day shewn his stables to the emperor's mafter of the horse, the latter told him, that his mafter had not near fo fine a fet of horfes, extolling them very highly, especially as the greatest part were of his own breeding. The troubles, during the last reigns, were the cause that the king's breeding stables had then fallen into Vol. II.

In 1604, the duke de Belleguide, mafter of the horfe, caufed Mark Antony de Bazy, captain of the breeding stables, to remove the king's set of mares to 8t. Leger, a forest belonging to the crown. In 1618 some considerable additions and improvements were made; and greater still about 1665, when the late M Colbert, minister of state, enlarged the bounds, made parks therein, and got together a great number of stoned horses and young

I shall comprife, in one article, with which the memoirs of this year will be concluded, all that relates to marechal Biron, of whose revolt there was at length the most convincing proofs. After the king had been at Lyons, and had there entertained very strong sufpicions against this marechal, his majesty had a private conversation with him in the convent of the Cordeliers, and appeared so well informed of all his transactions with the duke of Savoy, that Biron, either because he then thought that, after such a discovery, all he could now do was to repair his fault, or that he sought only to deceive the king, confessed to him, that he had not been able to resist the offers made to him by the duke of Savoy, joined to his promise of giving him the princess * his daughter to wise. He asked the king's pardon for these proceedings, and protested to him, with the utmost appearance of sincerity, that he would never again suffer himself to be intoxicated with such expectations.

HENRY thought he might depend upon a promife, which was nevertheless forgot in the instant that it was made. Biron resumed his first designs; went, according to his custom, at different times into the provinces, carefied all the malecontents he sound amongst the gentry, entertained them continually with the injustice he received from the king, and his credit and the correspondence he carried on without the kingdom. He entered into stronger engagements than ever with Bouillon, d'Entragues, d'Auvergne, and others †. He, who was pride and cohs, by means of Alain de Garfault, who was then captain. It continued in this flate till 1715, at which time it began to be fettled in Normandy, under the direction of Francis Gideon de Garfault, Lewis de Lorraine count d'Armagnac being then mafter of the horfe in France: fince this laft effabl'fhment, it has every day more the appearance of the fables of the most powerful prince in Europe

The marechal de Biron, by marrying the duke of Savoy's third daughter, was to have received from the king of Spain, and that duke, the feigniory and inveftiture of Burgundy, Franche Comté, and the County de Charlois: this was one part of the grand project of both these courts, which consisted in dismembring, in this manner, the kingdom of France, and parcelling it out among the governors of its provinces. The proof of this may be seen in Vittorio Siri, Mem. rec. vol. I. p. 103: 127: who likewise extols the services which the count de Bethune, our aug thor's brother, performed on this occasion. It lenry IV, during his embality at Rome.

† The author fays nothing, in all this account, of the confpiracy of the marefierceness itself, laid such a restraint upon his inclinations, as to appear to the soldiers the most humane and affable man in the world, and drew the affections of the mob by playing the hypocrite and the devotee; for what appearance will not ambition affume to attain its end? Hitherto, however, it might still have been doubted, whether he had not concealed his designs within his own breast, and if this conduct was not an effect of that disposition which is observable in many persons, who, by their discourse, appear restless, disturbed, and fond of novelies, yet are far from any intention of throwing themselves headlong into rebellion.

HENCE arose Henry's suspense concerning the conduct of marechal Biron, though he still continued to have him carefully observed, and could not help being moved at the accounts that were brought him, of Biron's conduct in the last journey he had taken to Dijon, where he had passed the end of the preceding year and the beginning of this. Biron, who on his fide had his fpies at court, being apprehenfive of the impression that his behaviour made on the king, thought proper to write to me on that subject. His letter is dated the third of January; it turned only upon the ill offices that were done him with the king, and the injustice even his majesty did him in believing him capable of defigns he had never entertained. He excufed his journey to Burgundy, on account of some domestic affairs that made it absolutely necessary; and assured me, that he should leave that province in two days; he concluded with entreating me to believe all that would be told me from him by Prevot, one of his agents, whom he had fent to me. This letter was too foon followed by incontestable proofs of his treachery, to make it be thought fincere; and I was fo far from believing his professions in it, that they only increased my suspicions.

DURING the king's flay at Calais, he received ftill clearer and more circumftantial informations againft Biron, doubtlefs because this marechal, believing himself lefs suspected than before, took greater liberties than usual: but Henry, instead of taking those measures that in prudence ought to have been no longer delayed, could not yet look upon this man as incurable; resolved, if possible, to bring him back to his duty, by gentle-

chal de Biron, his imprisonment, and the process against him, but what is confirmed by the histories and memoirs of that time: they mention these extravagant words of his; "The king does not at all hurt me, "for I know how to be revenged on "crowned heads, and even emperors." Matthieu, tom. II. liv. 2, p. 333.

gentleness, kindness, and such distinctions as make the strongest impressions upon the heart of an honest man. Biron having demanded a gratification of thirty thousand crowns from his majesty, the king thought it very reasonable, and granted it immediately; and because that no obstacles should retard the payment of it, this prince ordered me to take proper measures to satisfy Biron without delay; accordingly I paid him instantly one half of the sum in ready money, and assigned him the other half at the expiration of a year.

BIRON thought there was a necessity for coming to thank me for this favour; he told me, that he was more obliged to me for it than the king, complaining to me that he had been forgotten and even defpifed by this prince, now that he had no longer occasion for his fword, this fword, faid he, that has placed him upon the throne. It was impossible for me to keep filence upon this occasion; I represented to the marechal, with a kind of reproach, that he accused Henry so much the more unjustly, as this prince, to whom alone he was obliged for this gratification, had not disdained to solicit for its payment: hence I took occasion to speak with still greater freedom to Biron; I remonstrated to him that, although he should even have proofs of his neglect, he ought always to remember that he spoke of his master, and of a master who, by his personal qualities, still more than by his rank, engaged the efteem and respect of his subjects. I told him, that there was nothing which kings were more fensible of than difrespect to their persons, an envious desire to lessen the glory of their arms, and ingratitude for their benefits. Thefe terms were fufficiently plain, yet I went farther, and if I did not tell Biron politively that I thought him both ingrateful and a traitor, there was nothing to hinder him from concluding it by all my discourse. I exhorted him to nourish a nobler emulation in his foul, which might give him a title to real praifes; I dwelt upon the difference there was between making one's felf beloved by one's prince and country, and endeavouring to become the object of its fear; a deteftable attempt, and almost always fatal to those that make it. I told him, that if he would join with me in mutual labours for the glory of the state and the public good, we might, in some degree, make both depend upon us; he by his abilities for war, I by the fhare I had in the government a' home; and hence we should taste the refined pleafure of knowing ourfelves to be either the authors or inftruments of every public benefit. I finished my remonstrance by endeavouring to prevail upon him to go and return his majefty thanks for the gratification he had just received. To

To all this Biron, neither moved to gratitude by kindness, nor to 1601. repentance by conviction, answered only by exaggerating his own merit fo unfeafonably and in fuch boaftful terms, that I was now convinced of a thing that I had hitherto only suspected, which was, that the harshness of his manners and the inequality of his humour proceeded from a flight taint of madness, for which so much the less allowance was to be made, as that, hindering him from reasoning, it could not hinder him from fpeaking and acting ill: what appeared to me a complete proof of it was, that, after what I had just faid to him. having reason to look upon me as a man in whose presence he could not be too cautious, he was imprudent enough to let something escape him concerning the defigns that filled his head. I took no notice of it, but he perceived the error he had been guilty of himself, and to repair it pretended to acquiesce with my reasons, and to approve of my sentiments: from that moment, I fo absolutely despaired of ever being able to recal this man to his duty, that I thought mine obliged me to difguise from the king nothing which I believed him capable of doing.

IT was always a part of Henry's character, to be with difficulty perfuaded of the treachery of any person about him: he answered, that he knew Biron perfectly well, that he was very capable of faying all that was related; but that this man, who, in confequence of his natural violence, the effect of melancholy, was never contented, and exalted himself above every one else, was nevertheless, a moment after, the first to mount his horse, and dare all dangers for those whom he had railed at fo much before; therefore he well deferved fome indulgence for a little intemperance of tongue: that he was affured Biron would never be induced to rebel against him; that if this should happen, as he had already given a proof on those occasions where he had faved the life of this marechal, and in the last place at Fontaine-Françoise, that he did not yield to him in courage, he knew likewise how to shew him that he did not fear him. The king therefore made no alteration in his behaviour to Biron, except that he gave him still greater demonstrations of kindness, and loaded him with new honours, which he looked upon as the only remedy for his defection.

HE was fent ambassador to queen Elizabeth, with whom he had a very extraordinary conversation *. He was imprudent enough not

1601. only to mention the earl of Effex to this princefs, whom the had lately beheaded, but likewise to bewail the fate of that nobleman, whose great fervices had not been able to preferve him from fo tragical an end; and Elizabeth had the complaifance, in answer to this impertinent discourse, to justify her conduct with regard to the earl, by thewing the necessity the was under to punish him: the told him, that Effex had madly engaged in schemes that greatly exceeded his abilities; and that after many proofs, and a full conviction of his rebellion, he might have still, by submission, have obtained her pardon; but that neither his friends nor his relations could prevail upon him to ask it. I know not whether the queen of England perceived any marks of refemblance between the French ambassador and the English favourite, but the reasonable observations on the nature of royal heads, and the duty of subjects, with which the concluded her discourse, feemed to infinuate as much; but Biron drew no advantage from it.

> AT his return from London, the king named him likewise ambasfador extraordinary to Switzerland, to renew the treaty of alliance between France and the Cantons; still continuing to believe, that an employment which would take off his thoughts from arms, and engage him in a commerce with a body fo wife and politic as the Helvetic Senate is, would fubdue at length all inclinations to fedition: but ambition, envy, and avarice, are passions that can never be wholly quelled; and had the heart of Biron been thoroughly founded, it might probably have been found tainted with all the three. No fooner was he returned from his fecond embaffy, than, as if he endeavoured to make amends for the time he had loft, he laboured more affiduously than before to bring all his chimerical schemes to perfection; either perfuaded thereto by the duke of Bouillon and the count of Auvergne, who had likewife formed their party, or having drawn them into his.

To strengthen their mutual engagements, these three gentlemen figned a form of affociation, of which each kept an original: in this uncommon piece, which was produced in the process against marechal Biron, they reciprocally promifed, upon the faith and word of gentlemen and men of honour, to continue united for their common fafety, to and against all, without any exception (these terms deserve a particular observation) to keep inviolably secret whatever might be revealed to any one of them; and to burn this writing, in case any accident should happen to either of the affociates. There was no prospect of succeeding in their designs, but through the operation of Spain and and Savoy; they therefore renewed their correspondence with these two powers, and on their side, to second their endeavours, went about picking up all the disaffected persons they could find amongst the gentry and soldiers. To draw into rebellion many of the cities at the greatest distance from Paris, particularly those in the provinces of Guienne and Poictou, they took advantage of the sedition occasioned by the establishment of the penny in the livre, which I had opposed so ardently in the assembly des Notables, and which I had not afterwards the power to suppress; however, it could not possibly be raised according to the original plan: it had been changed into a subsidy of eight hundred thousand franks, of which one half was sunk in the taille, and the other in the customs.

BIRON and his affociates, to increase the discontent of these people, already strongly incited by that impost, persuaded them, that to complete their calamities, they would shortly be burthened with a duty upon salt; and many persons were kept in their pay in each of these provinces, to terrify the it habitants with perpetual alarms. What government can expect to be free from these disturbers of public tranquillity, if that of Henry the great, so wise, mild, and popular, was not? This evil, however, took its rise from the unhappy influence the civils wars had on the manners of the people; that was the posson which produced those turbulent spirits to whom quiet was painful, and the happiest condition, a languid inactivity: hence arises that restless ambition, which keeps their reason enslaved, makes them murmur at heaven, and quarrel with mankind for torments they bring on themselvs; and raises their malice against princes, whose whose power, so obnoxious them, is not sufficient to gratify their inordinate desires.

HENRY'S eyes were at length opened with regard to the real character of Biron, which he had hitherto flattered himself he knew so well, and he began to sear he should be obliged to have recourse to the most violent remedy to stop the contagion: informations multiplied every day, and came from persons that could not be suspected; all agreed in the chief point of the conspiracy; some mentioned the act of affociation, and, having seen it, related the very terms in which it was conceived. Calvairac * gave the king the most circumstantial and most probable account that had been yet transmitted to him; besides the public rumour, he informed him, that Biron and his

1601. collegues had received feveral thousand pistoles from persons that came from Spain; that they expected fums still greater, and a supply of forces; that the council of Madrid had agreed to it, on condition that the rebels should begin by seizing some strong maritime places, or frontiers of Spain; that, conformably to this plan, enterprizes were already formed upon Blaye, Bayonne, Narbonne, Marfeilles, and Tou-In Upper Au- lon; and that the count of Auvergne was to wait only till these were vergne. executed, to begin openly his attempt upon Saint-Flour.

> All these informations made it absolutely necessary to examine the matter thoroughly. The king came on purpose to the arsenal, where he found me bufy in completing the labour I had begun, to communicate to me what he had learned, and gave me the detail, leaning upon the balcony over the great walk: he went afterwards to Fontainebleau, whither I followed him; and it was in this place that we were to proceed to the last extremities with marechal Biron. He had for a long time made use of La-Fin * to carry on his foreign negotiations, a lively, cunning, intriguing fellow, whom Bouillon and he often called their kinfman. La-Fin had been fent feveral times to the king of Spain, the duke of Savoy, and the count of Fuentes; but afterwards, upon some difgust Biron had given him, he retired to his house, where he remained unemployed. It was not thought imposfible to gain him; and for this purpose his nephew, the vidame of Chartres +, was made use of, who endeavoured to prevail upon his uncle to come to Fontainebleau. In the mean time I returned to Paris, to make preparations for a journey his majefty thought it necessary to take immediately into all those places through which Biron had paffed, namely, Poictou, Guienne, Limofin, and especially about Blois.

> LA-FIN having at length refolved to come to Fontainebleau, revealed all that he knew concerning Biron's conspiracy. The king was desirous that he should be detained and lodged at Mi-Voie, that 1601. he might be feen by none but those that were fent to confer with him. His majesty judging by what he had first declared, that my presence would be necessary, wrote these few words to me: "My " friend, come to me immediately, on an affair that concerns my " fervice, your honour, and our mutual fatisfaction. Adieu, my dear " friend." I took post immediately, and on my arrival at Fontainebleau, I met his majeffy in the midft of the large avenue to the caftle, ready to go to hunt. I threw myself at his feet: " My friend," faid this prince to me, preffing me in his arms, "all is discovered; the " chief negotiator is come to ask pardon, and to make a full confession: " in his accufation he includes a great number of perfons of high " rank, fome of whom have particular reasons to love me *; but he " is a great liar, and I am determined to believe nothing he fays with-" out good proofs: he accuses one man, amongst the rest, whom you " little think of; come, guess who this traitor is." "That is not " in my power, fire," I replied. After preffing me fome time longer, but to no purpose, "You know him well, said he, it is M. de Rosny." " If the others are no more guilty than I am, replied I, fmiling, your " majesty need not give yourself much trouble about them." " I be-" lieve fo, faid the king; and to shew you that I do, I have ordered " Bellievre and Villeroi to bring you all the accufations against you " and the others; I have even told La-Fin, that I would have him " fee you, and speak to you freely: he is concealed at Mi-Voie, and " will meet you on the road from Moret; appoint the hour and place, " and none shall be present at your conference."

I could not imagine how my name happened to be found in this wicked cabal; whether it came from fome one of Biron's people, who supposed me to be a friend of their master, or from Biron himself and his affociates, who thought it was lawful for them to make use of it to the Spanish ministers, to swell the number of their partisans; or of the malecontents of the kingdom: it was not impossible, that two letters I wrote to the marechal, through zeal rather than complaisance,

* We may, doubtles, rank among the number of these, the charge which La Fin brought againt Biron, of his having attempted the king's life, and the Dauphin's, according to Chron. Septennaire, fince his friends made use of the proofs they had of the contrary, to obtain his pardon: "Sire, might have involved me in the number of these conspirators; and the rather because, in allusion to the conversation that passed between Biron and me, which I have formerly mentioned, I told him plainly, that there was nothing to hinder him from making himself useful and dear to the kingdom, by those measures I had marked out to him: I likewise told him, that although I was almost always about the king's person, yet I had never heard him express any resentment against him: and I advised Biron not to affert such a thing publicly, because the world would not fail to believe, and to report, that he only seigned to have received some disgust from his majesty, because his own conscience reproached him with having deserved it. Thus what I said with an intention to bring Biron back to his duty, was interpreted to my disadvantage.

"we have at leaft this advantage," faid M. de La-Force to Henry IV. throwing hmfelf at his feet, "that there is nothing proved as to his having made any attempt on your majefly's perfon." Vol. 9129 of the MSS. in the king's library.

Henry's opinion, as he has fince told me, was, that this accufation of me did not take its rife either from Biron or any of his affociates, but from La-Fin alone, at the inftigation of fome persons who hoped by that means to accomplish my disgrace: however that may be, it made so little impression on the king's mind, that his majesty, who had lately given me the government of the Bastile, and thought that the patent for it should not appear in my name, but only in that of La Chevalerie, altered his opinion on this occasion, and caused it to be expedited under mine, knowing none, he said, but me, by whom he could expect to be served with sidelity, in case he should have birds in the cage. Accordingly, Villeroi was ordered to bring me the patent a few days after, which was the beginning of the following year.

Matthieu, vol. II. b. iii.! p. 482.

I had a long conversation with La-Fin alone, in the forest; after which, Bellievre, Villeroi, and myself, examined, with great care, all the papers that contained any proofs against the duke of Bouillon, marechal Biron, and the count of Auvergne; such as letters, memorandums, and other writings of the same kind. The names of many persons besides these three gentlemen were mentioned in them; but as it was probably with as little justice as mine own, which was there likewise, I shall not, on so slight a foundation, give them a place in these Memoirs, which, to distruss profons, might make them still more liable to suspicion, than the depositions of La-Fin. After this examination we returned to his majesty, and a council being held, the result of it was, to keep every thing secret, that Biron might not be warned of the measures that were to be taken to bring him to court, that he might be arrested with the greater security. It was likewise resolved, refoved, that his majefty should set out immediately on the journey 1601. before mentioned. We shall see in the following year what these measures produced.

It is necessary to take some notice of what happened this year in the several states of Europe: the court of London was thrown into consustion by a rebellion that was stirred up by the Spaniards in Ireland; Elizabeth sent to besiege Kinsale, the strongest place which the rebels were in possession of; the earl of Tyrone, their leader, and Don Alonzo del Campo, who commanded the Spanish troops in Ireland, hastened to relieve it with all the forces they could get together, which were cut in pieces by the lord Piercy. Alonzo remained prisoner there, and Kinsale surrendered.

VERY different reports were raifed concerning the destination of the fleet which was fitted out about this time by the king of Spain, but nothing could be certainly known about it; for after it had rode fome time in the Mediterranean, it was attacked by a tempest, and was obliged to re-enter the port of Barcelona, which it did in a very shattered condition: the command of this fleet had been given to prince Doria. Probably it was defigned against Portugal, where the true or the false Don Sebastian * still continued to have a great number of partisans: Some secrets which he revealed, that it seemed could have been only known to the king of Portugal; certain natural marks upon his body which he shewed, and some other circumstances of the same kind, confirmed his affertion. However, to confess the truth, none of these proofs appeared unanswerable; nevertheless, the king of Spain thought it the wifest way to rid himself privately of this pretended prince: fo that the truth was never known, or at least to a few perfons only, whose interest it was not to publish it.

* There is fomething furely very furprifing and uncommon in this perfect refemblance of all the parts, features, and even the defects of the body, which, according to all the hiftorians, was between the real Don Sebaftian and this man, who is faid to have been a native of Calabria; and it is no less difficult to guess, how he could come to the knowledge of the circumflances of this king of Portugul's life, which were fo peculiar and fecret, as to aftonifh all the world. The Portugues, fill more deceived through their natural affection for the blood of their kings, as also through their natured for Spain (this laft motive might likewife be applied to M. de Sully) than from any evidence they had, perfifted in supporting the claims of this impositor. The Septennaire is very favourable to him, an. 1601. p. 217. See what has been said a little higher. The Spaniards were so thoroughly convinced of their having discovered the cheat, when Ferdinand, grand duke of Tuscany, had delivered him up into the hands of the Viceroy of Napl.s, that they no longer scrupied to expose him as a public gazing-flock, mounted him on an ass; after which they sent him to the galleys. See Matthieu, tom, II. J. iii. p. 451.

A DIET

A DIET was convened at Ratifbon, with intention to make fome composition between the popish and protestant religions, but this hope came to nothing: upon the first question proposed, which was concerning the authority of the holy scriptures *, such heat was raised among the disputants, that an accommodation became impracticable. The papifts maintained, that their authority was derived wholly from the confent of the church, that they might add the prerogative of infallibility to the other rights with which they have so liberally, and with fo little reason, invested the Pope: the protestants treated this doctrine with contempt and ridicule +.

THE war in Transylvania still continued disadvantageous to the Vaivodes, Battory and Michael, who had revolted from the Emperor: they were defeated by George Baste, and Clausembourg was taken. The duke of Mercour fignalized himself no less at the head of the Imperial troops against the Turks ‡; he took Albe-Royale in Hungary, a fortrefs efteemed impregnable; and afterwards drove away the Ferdinand of Turks from it, who had returned to befiege it. The arch-duke, lefs fortunate than Mercœur, was beaten before Canife; and the Knights of Malta took and destroyed the city of Passava in the Morea.

Austria. By the christians called Chateauneuf:

Constantinople and the palace of the Grand Signor was in no less commotion, through the discontent of the Janizaries, who proceeded fo far as to strangle, in the presence of Mahomet III. himself, feven of the favourites of his feraglio, and threatened to depose him: he was a man, indeed, whose vices rendered him unworthy of a throne; he was cruel, treacherous, flothful, avaritious, and funk in every kind of voluptuoufness.

* This question was publickly debated, during feveral fittings, between the carhohe divines of Maximilian duke of Bavaria, and the protestant divines of Ludovic count palatine of Neubourg, and of the electors of Saxony and Brandenbourg.; the two first of these princes affisted at it in person, and were obliged to put an end to this difpute, the advantage in which, each of the parties, as is always the case, afterwards ascribed to themselves. De Thou, Chron. Septen. for the year 1601.

† This, however, will always be, in the opinion of unprejudiced persons, one among the false doctrines of Calvin, the most untenable, namely, that scripture is the best interpreter of scripture; or, what is far worse, that its sense may be determined by private persons. This is the chief fource of that monstrous confusion of sects with which the pretended Reformation was immediately over-run.

I The duke of Mercœur, by his great exploits, acquired the reputation of one of the first warriors of his time. See them, as also the other facts that are here spoken

GITATED as the minds of the people were by all those domestic insurrections we have seen in the preceding book, yet it did not hinder them from refigning themselves, this winter, to their accustomed pleasures and shews. By the queen's order, and for her amusement, a magnificent interlude was composed: the arsenal was the place the king chose for the representation of these shews. on account of the conveniency its spacious apartments afforded both for the actors and spectators. At the time that this interlude was to be played, the wound I had received in my mouth at the fiege of Chartres happening to open again, I was not in a condition to give the neceffary orders at the arfenal, and they had already pitched upon another place for its representation; but the king chose rather to wait till I was cured, which retarded it eight days.

Towards the middle of lent, the count of Schomberg, grand marechal of the empire, and envoy from the court of Vienna, arrived at Paris, into which he made his entry with a train of forty or fifty horse: the king ordered the fame honours to be paid him that the marechal 1602.

1602. de * Bois-Dauphin had received at Vienna. The prince, fon to the marquis of Brandenbourg, staid likewise some time at Paris. It was not usual by defray the expences of persons of his rank, especially, as it was observed by his majesty, if they did not follow the court: but the king was refolved to shew a particular respect to a prince, whose family, one of the most illustrious in Germany, had always professed a remarkable attachment for France; and I was ordered to fend him every day, in his majesty's name, presents of the richest wines, and provifions for his table.

WHEN every thing was ready for the king's departure, and that his majesty, in the several journeys he had made to Paris, had given all the necessary orders for securing peace and tranquillity in that city, and in the provinces he was going to remove from, as well as those through which he was to pass, he left Paris on the twentieth of May, and came to Fontainebleau, from whence he took the road to Blois. The queen and all her houshold accompanied his majesty in this journey; I likewise attended him, but did not set out till a few days after: the king fent me notice of his arrival at Blois, and his intention of staying there eight or ten days. This delay was no more than necessary for a regimen that was prescribed him by his physicians, to cure a defluxion of humours that had fallen on one of his legs, and for the time it lasted, as Henry wrote to me, might well be called the gout. Blois likewife was the most proper city he could chuse to discover the secret practices of marechal Biron: Henry had many persons in this province in whom he could confide, who applied themselves solely to the making those discoveries, and almost every hour sent couriers to him with the intelligence they had procured; by them the king was informed that Biron's cabal extended to Anjou, the higher Poitou, Xaintonge, Mirebalais, Châtelleraudois, Angoumois, Perigord, Limofin, Marche, and Auvergne, and even took in the higher Guyenne, and Languedoc; that it was supported by four or five noblemen of the court, whose names were not expressed, for fear of advancing any thing that was yet doubtful: the connexions with Spain, the schemes for surprifing the frontier cities, and the arguments they made use of to disgust the people with the prefent government (the fame which I have already mentioned) made up part of these advices, to which the following new informations were added.

THE feditious, to prepoffess the people with unfavourable thoughts of his majefty's journey to Blois, which was doubtlefs a fource of uneasy apprehensions to them, gave out every where that Henry had only undertaken it with a defign to chaftife feverely those that had refisfed Jambeville, d'Amours, and the other commissaries that had been fent to exact the penny in the livre, upon the rivers and other places of paffage, and to fettle it himfelf in fuch a manner, that, by a new regulation of the rates, it should produce thrice as much, and to force the duty on falt to be every where received by taking possession of the falt-pits, for which the proprietors were to have no other recompence than some rents ill paid from the town-house of Paris; and, lastly, to ftop the murmurs which it was expected the exacting of two tenths would raife (which, they made them believe, Henry had obtained the pope's permission to levy) and the revocation of the draw-backs. granted on the taxes of 1594, 1595, and 1596, which I have already mentioned in the account of my journey into the feveral districts.

Thus was this good prince reprefented, throughout his whole kingdom, as a furious and implacable tyrant. They were never without one fet of arguments to engage the catholic nobility in a rebellion against him, and another to fow sedition amongst the protestant officers and gentry: to the first they represented, that this treasure and this formidable artillery, which the king was providing, were to be employed in depriving them totally of their privileges, and reducing them to a state of slavery; they persuaded the second, that the persecution against them was already begun, that the payment of their garrisons, the funds for the preservation of their cities, the pensions of their leaders, their officers, and ministers, would be lessened this year by one third, and the next by two, after which there would be fo much the less difficulty in depriving them of all their strong places, as it was already a point agreed upon by the council, to exclude the protestants from all public offices and employments, by refusing to expedite the patents for them.

If the proofs against the persons of the conspirators had been as clear as those of their plots, the king might have that instant given free course to his justice; but, with regard to the dukes of Bouillon and Tremouille, for example, there was as yet less certainty of their guilt, than of marechal Biron and the count of Auvergne's; for at the most there were only suspicious, though those indeed were very strong, 1602. against them: the other lords of the court, whose names, to the number of eight, were found in the lift, might be well ranged under a third class of persons, whose doubtful conduct required some explanation. The dukes of Bouillon and Epernon attended the king in his journey to Blois, and his majefty was of opinion he might be able to draw from themselves a proof of their real sentiments, by attentively observing the air and turn of their countenance, during the recital he made them of the news he received: he began first with d'Epernon. A just regard to truth has so often reduced me to the necessity of speaking difadvantageoufly of this nobleman, that it is with a real fatisfaction I feize this opportunity of shewing his innocence, and giving him the praise he deserves.

> D'EPERNON hearing whispers about the court of intrigues and cabals, eafily apprehended that, as it is usual to judge of the present by the past, his name would not fail to be mentioned amongst those that were called enemies to the flate; for which reason he took the precaution to renew to his majesty at Fontainebleau his assurances of fidelity: these assurances were all the proofs he had to offer, and unfortunately Henry, who had been long prejudiced against him, did not give much credit to them. Notwithstanding this step, he still continued to suspect him, and because d'Epernon in speaking to him had referred to me, the king wrote to me at Paris an account of what had passed between him and the duke, letting me know, at the same time, that d'Epernon seemed to have an intention to make up matters with me, and he ordered me to make the first advances to him, to the end that, if the crime with which he was charged should appear to be yet only intentional, his majesty might not have any cause to reproach himself with having suffered the duke to rush into actual treason, when there needed only good advice and kind treatment to prevent him.

> I OBEYED the king's orders, and from that moment became convinced of the duke of Epernon's innocence: he faid the fame to the king at Blois as he had done to me, and did not deny his having heard of fome commotions and fecret intrigues, but faid that thefe were always fo general, and fometimes fo full of contradiction, that he could not imagine that any credit was to be given to them; that those who were faid to be the authors or favourers of these plots having never given him the least intimation of them, he had treated as a fiction, a project which appeared to him wholly extravagant, the present fituation of affairs rendring the execution of it absolutely impossible;

but whether real or not, he offered the king to continue about his perfon, as a fecurity for his own fidelity, during fix months; and if that time was not fufficient, he fwore to him that he would not quit him till his fuspicions were entirely erased. The king could have no objection to fo reasonable a proposition, and began, as well as I, to believe that the duke of Epernon was guiltlefs.

THE duke of Bouillon discovered far less fincerity: on the first mention his majesty made of the plot to him, he treated it as a calumny invented by spies and informers, against the nobility of the kingdom, to exaggerate their own fervices, and appear at least to gain the money that was given them to exercise this employment: to this reproach, which tacitly attacked his majesty, he added an application of a pasfage in the New Testament, It is impossible but that offences will come, but woe unto him through whom they come, a passage, which, if taken in its true fenfe, might have been with more justice applied to Bouillon and his adherents. Bouillon did not ftop here; he added, that it was true he was told, that the catholics, as well as the protestants, complained of their being oppressed with imposts, and that in proportion as the king's riches and happiness increased, they became poor and miferable; that, besides these general complaints, he had, in a certain place, heard protestants say, that sooner or later it would be their defliny to be looked upon as the plague and nufance of the state, that both they and their children would be hated, perfecuted, and profcribed, that they would be excluded from all honours and employments, and that the kingdom would never be quiet till they were totally extirpated: he added, that the more credit was given to these reports, because that persons of the greatest abilities in the kingdom, not being admitted to the council, nor confulted on affairs relating either to the difference of religions, or to the new imposts that were established, they could not inform the people of the true motive of those resolutions that were taken there, nor could the people attribute them to any thing but to a defign to enflave them.

IT was fufficiently plain that the duke of Bouillon, by talking in this manner, fought to infinuate to the king, that all these reports of a rebellion had no other foundation than the cries of the people oppreffed with a multitude of taxes; and that this feeming discontent was put on to conceal from his majesty his real fentiments: but the insolence and the feverity of his expressions shewed plainly enough that he could not refift this opportunity of discharging some part of his malice; he Vol. II. even 1602. even added, with the fame fubtilty and with equal chagrin, that they had endeavoured to perfuade himself, that his majesty intended to abolish the privileges of his viscounty of Turenne, and to purchase the rights and claims of the house of Mark upon Sedan; but to this, as well as to every thing elfe, he had only replied, that he was perfuaded the king would never act in fuch a manner, on account of the fervices he had at all times received from the protestant body; he finished by protesting to his majesty, that, although all that had been told him concerning the feditious and traiterous attempts in the kingdom should be as true as he believed them false, yet it should never lessen his duty and fidelity.

> THE king, diffembling to the duke of Bouillon the opinion he conceived of him from this discourse, made him a proposal of the same nature with that which the duke of Epernon had of himfelf fo frankly made, and which he expected would throw him into great confusion: he told the duke, that he was fatisfied with this affurance, and that he would no longer preferve any remainder of diffrust of him, provided he would give the fame fatisfaction that Epernon had offered, which was not to remove from the court while this affair continued in agitation, and that he might depend upon it he would not keep him about his person without communicating to him all his designs, and calling him to his councils, as he feemed to defire, that he might be himself a witness of his solicitude to relieve the people, and be able to give both the protestants and catholics an incontestable proof of the purity of his intentions. Bouillon preferved an uncommon prefence of mind under this blow; he broke out into an exclamation of joy and furprise at the fentiments his majefly discovered for him; and as to the proposal he made him, he told him that he would go and put himself into a condition to fatisfy it, not for fix menths only, but for his whole life if neceffary, by taking a journey throughout all his estates, that nothing might afterwards interrupt the long stay he intended to make at court. In this manner, by appearing to do all that his majesty required, he referved, nevertheless, the power of doing only what he pleased himself, and of making a plausible excuse for the sudden departure he was meditating.

> HENRY, comprehending his defign, refolved to call a fecret council to deliberate upon the measures that were necessary to be taken in this conjuncture. The count of Soiffons, the chancellor, Villeroi, Maiffe, and myfelf, were all that were prefent at this council: all other affairs were postponed till Descures was heard, who had been sent by his majesty to invite marechal Biron to court, and whose report was such that it was unanimously resolved to arrest this marechal and the count of Peter Fou-Auvergne as foon as they were arrived. The king afterwards de-Defcures. manded if it would not be proper to do the like by the dukes of Bouillon and Epernon, while they continued at court: almost all the counfellors were of this opinion, and the most distinguished amongst them qualified it no otherwife, than by faying that Biron was the only one to whom mercy might be afterwards extended, because that acting nothing by himself, he would easily be reduced to reason, when he was feparated from those who hurried him on to his ruin. I took particular notice of this advice upon account of its fingularity: mine, however, was directly opposite; I could not approve of the arresting of Epernon, or even of Bouillon: if in such cases suspicions were to serve for proofs, it was likewise necessary, I said, to arrest all whom La Fin had accused, and myfelf the first; that in case they should afterwards be found innocent, they would, by this precipitate action, lose an opportunity of feizing Biron and Auvergne, whose treasons were manifest, since it would be impossible to arrest them all at the same time, and their flight would put it out of our power to prove any thing against the prisoners. The arresting of Bouillon and Epernon, I added, would have this farther ill consequence, that, whether guilty or innocent, his majefty could not dispense with himself from treating them as traitors, through a just fear of what their refentment only of such a public outrage might induce them to act against him. The king yielded to this advice, and the council broke up, it being already dinner time. His majesty being desirous of conferring with me alone upon what had been debated in the council, bid me fnatch a foldier's dinner, and come back to him before the court filled again.

When I went down into the hall, where I was waited for by a crowd of people who attach themselves to men in power, I saw the duke of Epernon advancing to meet me, who, with the same air of conscious innocence that I had before observed in him, told me, that such long and secret councils alarmed a great many persons, but he was not of the number, because he had nothing to reproach himself with. I replied, that he had then nothing to fear, the king being more disposed to pardon the guilty, who consessed their crimes, than to punish the innocent on suspicions only. "I perceive," added I, "many people who are leaving the court; but those whose consciences "are clear need not have recourse to that expedient. I am one

" of

" of these," added Epernon, " and I am resolved not to leave the 1602. " court while these discontents continue." "You cannot do better,

" monfeigneur," replied I; "and I promise you, that, on this occasion,

" you shall not lose the merit of having taken so good a resolution."

WHEN I came home, I ordered my maitre d'hotel not to furnish my table as usual, but to serve me up any thing that was ready. Nicolas * came in just as I was sitting down to table: "Come wash immediately," faid I, without telling him of the orders I had just given, " and take " your place." He was greatly aftonished to hear me, after I had drank two glasses and eaten a hasty morsel, ask for the fruit, and, at the same time, order my horse to be got ready: he who loved good cheer as well as mirth, was not pleased at this order. " Pardieu, mon-" fieur," faid he, " I am not furprifed that you pass for one of the " wifest noblemen in France, I don't know any one who can drink. " three glasses during the whole time you are at dinner." " Well, " well, monfieur Nicolas," replied I, " do you make an end of your

"dinner, as for me I have bufiness that calls me elsewhere."

I RELATED to his majesty what d'Epernon had said to me a little time before. The king agreed with me that d'Epernon had no inducement to engage in an affair that was carried on by persons, whose religion and disposition were different from his, by which likewise, while he had no advantages to hope for, he run the hazard of being stript of his estates and employments. D'Epernon had judgment enough to know that the scheme of these rebels was likely to be a fatal one. " Not," faid the king, " that probably in his heart he is not " glad of these disorders, that he may become more necessary to me; " but he knows by experience fuch defigns are often blafted." His majesty charged me to make another effort to prevail upon the dukes of Bouillon and Tremouille to flay at court, but to wait till he went to Poitiers, because he might then receive intelligence that would determine him. I used my utmost endeavours for this purpose, in the prefence of messieurs de La Nouë, de Constant, d'Aubigne, and de Preaux, but all were ineffectual.

* Simon Nicolas was the king's fecretary, "a poet, a facetious man, and an old " offender, fays the Journal of Henry the " IVth. believing in God only for interest, " and, for this reason, he became the

&quot;times. He died two years after in the " 70th year of his age, in his last illness ex-" preffing himfelf with infamous impiety."

During their majesties stay at Blois, an affair of a very different 1602. nature was in agitation at court, which I am under fome perplexity in relating, for it made too much noise to be passed over in silence; yet I am not at liberty to enter into an explanation of it here, left I should betray the fecret confided to me only by the king and queen, whom it personally concerned; the medium therefore which I shall observe, is to recount only fo much of it as got air, and came to the knowledge of the courtiers.

IT was reported that the king and queen had had some difference together, which was confirmed by the king's fending Armagnac for First gentleme so early in the morning, that he was still in bed, as well as the man of the bed-chamber queen, and, contrary to their usual custom, each in their several apart- to the king, ments. It was observed that I had been several times backwards and forwards between them, and I had been feen kneeling three or four times before the king and queen, as if I was endeavouring to obtain fome great favour of them. As nothing in fuch cases escapes the inquifitive courtiers, each formed particular conjectures upon these circumstances, as also that with the names of the king and queen, they heard those of the duke and duchess of Florence, and Mantua, Virgil Urfin, Don John, Bellegarde, Trainel, Vinti, Joannini, Conchini, la Leonor, Gondy, Catherine Selvage, and the marchionefs of Verneuil; other persons, they said, were hinted at, under the covert name of the colour of tan. They endeavoured to discover something by my wife, having learned that Conchini, who had often business with her, and who publicly paid her the same respect as a servant to his mistress, and often addressed her by that title, had been several times sent by the queen to bring her, and that she passed many whole afternoons shut up with her majesty in her closet, when she was alone, or when only la Leonor was with her.

Bur that which afforded most matter for discourse, was that, at the time when these disputes ran highest, La Varenne came one morning to acquaint me, that the king waited for me in the new gallery that he had lately caused to be built at Blois, over those that were the length of the garden below; it is that in which there is the odd representation of a hind with a stag's horns. It was observed, that his majesty ordered two Swiss, who understood not a word of French, to be placed centinels at the end of this gallery which was not yet closed up, and that, during two hours and more which we continued together, 1602. we feemed to talk with great earnestness and action. They might, notwithstanding the distance, hear some of our words, from which they could draw no lights; but it was not the fame with those which his majesty spoke when he went out; these they understood, and carefully remembered. " No more need be faid of it. I will regulate my " whole conduct by your advice, faid the king, that I may be no " longer reproached with obstinately following my own will; but re-" member, that we may probably both repent it one day, for you " cannot but be affected with any misfortunes that happen to me. "I know the disposition of those persons who foment our differences, " they will be the cause of great uneafiness to the state: gentleness " and indulgence are laudable qualities, I confess; but you cannot de-" ny alio, that their 'extremes are dangerous." It was not difficult for them likewise to distinguish the latter part of my reply to the king: " It was, indeed, a part of prudence, I told him, to foresee and to " prevent bad accidents, but it was equally necessary to avoid haften-" ing them by useless precautions." On this they founded their sufpicion, that the king had a defign to proceed to some violent measures against certain persons of the queen's * houshold, and who were most in her confidence.

FROM Blois the king came to Poitiers; he afterwards shewed himfelf in the Limosin and Guienne: his presence produced every where so good an effect, that he found no opposition to his will, not even to the establishment of the penny in the livre †: he might have afterwards continued this impost, and the collecting of it would have met with no difficulty; but, satisfied with the submission of his people, he took that opportunity to change it into a small subsidy, and afterwards to suppress it entirely. The edict of revocation expressed, that his majesty was wholly induced to it by the obedience of his subjects. Henry, pleased

** This is fpeaking very plainly; and as the other Memoirs of that time all agree with this notion, it can fearce be doubted, that Henry had not only taken a refolution to clear the court of thefe informers, who exafperated the queen's mind againft him, but likewife to make this princefs fentible of her indiferction, by forbearing to fee her, and obliging her to live at a diltance from him in one of his palaces, and perhaps by fending her back to Florence. We may fee, in the Hiftory of the Mother and Son, tom. I. p. 9. that this prince had threatened her both with the one and the other. It is probable that M. de Rofny thought this laft course rather too violent, as, in fact, it was, all circumflances considered.

+ La Septennaire fays, that M. de Rofny was fent for this purpofe by his majerfy to Rochel; and that he was commissioned by the Rochellers to make remonstrances to the king, for suppressing the pancarte or

with the fuccess of his journey *, returned again to Fontainebleau, 1602. whither he was foon followed by marechal Biron.

THE consternation his party was thrown into by the king's journey, convinced him that his affairs were not fo far advanced as he had been willing to believe; this made him take a refolution to go to court, which feveral other motives contributed to confirm. His treaty with Spain and Savoy was not yet upon fuch a footing, as could give him hopes of having an immediate supply of what troops and money he had occasion for. Too glaring a resistance of the king's will might raife suspicions of his treasonable practices, which hitherto he imagined had escaped notice; nor was it unlikely, as the baron de Lux, his friend and confidant, represented to him, that the king, upon his repeated refusals to appear before him, would march directly to him with an army, as to a declared rebel; which would be a fatal stroke to the marechal, who was neither in a condition to defend himfelf, nor to retire into any of his fortreffes, which were unprovided with ammunition of every kind, particularly of artillery.

I HAD prepared Biron for this stroke, by the precautions I took fome months before: I represented to him, that it was necessary all the pieces of cannon in the fortified places of Burgundy should be cast over again, and the powder new beat. The attention with which I applied myself to all the duties of my employment, as grand master, was alone sufficient to have made this proposal pass unsuspected; but that I might not give the leaft umbrage by it to the marechal, I was the first to offer him to supply the deficiencies, by furnishing him with plenty of every thing that was necessary from the arfenal of Lyons, which I had lately filled with great care. I confented that Biron should dispatch some of his foldiers to Lyons, to escort the boats that were to be loaded with the pieces of cannon I was to fend him, and that he should receive them before he sent away those he already had. He was ignorant that I had taken fuch measures every where, that the boats from Lyons which went up the Saone very flowly, were stopped by the way, till those that came from Burgundy had got beyond the places under his jurisdiction; and when both were in my power, my boats proceeded no farther.

ceedings were held, except at Blois: allwhich was owing to the public and private disquiets of Henry, of which mention has already been made.

BIRON did not perceive the artifice I had made use of till it was out of his power to prevent it: he discovered so violent a rage against me, and boafted fo publicly that he would poignard me, that the king wrote to me never to go out without a good guard. I had likewise, as if without defign, posted the light horse upon the passage of the Loin. But all this, which Biron probably believed to be done only to mortify him, could not open his eyes: De Lux and he drew no other inference from the impossibility they were now under of defending themselves, but that it was necessary they should deceive the king, till by foreign affiftance they had provided for their fecurity. Descures and Jeannin acted in fuch a manner with them, as to increase this confidence; and La-Fin had not only given Biron * the strongest asfurance that he had not betrayed him, but likewise, that he had fought for an interview with the king with no other view than to found him, and that he had found him very far from gueffing the truth; this he again confirmed to him at Fontainebleau, where, as he paffed him, he faid these words; "Courage, my master, and speak boldly." The council had likewise so carefully kept the secret, that the court was wholly unacquainted with what was defigned against Biron; and d'Epernon hearing of his arrival at Fontainebleau, fent him fuch offers of fervice as are usual amongst persons of high rank +; in which,

* The marechal de Biron imagined that he had feen the treaty that was made with Spain flung into the fire; but La-Fin deceived him, by burning, inflead of it, a piece of waste paper.

† The duke d' Epernon did not deny, that upon this occasion he had performed all the offices of a friend to marechal de Biron: "When he converfed with him " upon this affair, fays the historian of 66 his life, he did not do it in ambiguous " terms, as others did, but with great o-" penness and fincerity. He acquainted " him with La-Fin's treachery, and shew-" ed him all the proofs-of it, and exhorted " him to throw himfelf upon the king's " mercy. This clears the duke d'Epernon. " Du Plessis-Baussonniere, a gentleman of " honour, and very much attached to the " duke (it is the same whom he sent to " meet the marechal) was the person emes ployed to use all forts of arguments to " prevail with him to ask the king's pardon; " hence this gentleman, affured of his own " and his patron's innocence, could never " be induced to retire into a foreign coun-" try, after that the king, who was not " ignorant of this step, had caused the " marechal de Biron to be arrested; in " which he did the duke d'Epernon a con-" fiderable fervice. And he afterwards " gave him a fecond piece of advice, which " proved very fuccessful, and that was, to " confess freely to his majesty all his pro-" ceedings with the marechal Biron, with what views and intentions he had treat-" ed with him." The fame historian, in this account, throws in fome hints, which discover the very bottom of the duke d'Epernon's fentiments, and which at the fame time ferve to shew his character: "The "duke d'Epernon, fays he, and Biron, " having gone together to the Louvre to " pay their compliments after dinner, his " majesty being told beforehand of their after after what had passed at Blois, he was guilty of great imprudence, as he has since confessed himself.

I had taken a tour to Moret when Biron arrived at court; the king fent me notice of it in the following billet: "My friend, our man is "come: he affects great modefty and referve; hafte hither speedily, "that you may advise us what is to be done: Adieu, my dear friend." I returned immediately, and found the king walking before the pavillion where I was lodged, with Praslin*, whom he left to come to me. He took my hand, and continuing his walk, told me, that he had in vain endeavoured, by every method he could think of, to extert from Biron † a confession of his crime, although he was so little capable of concealing his thoughts, that he read them plainly in his countenance. His majesty afterwards laid open to me his most sceret fentiments with regard to the marechal; he still felt for him all his former tenderness, and beheld him not with resentment, but compas-

" coming, placed himself at a window, to " observe, through the glass, their mo-" tions and countenance. A friend of the " duke d'Epernon, who was about the "king, gave him notice of this, that he " might regulate his behaviour according-66 ly. But he acted quite contrary to what "he was advised; and being more and more " confirmed in the testimony he received " from his conscience of his innocence, and " filled with a just and high indignation " to fee his fidelity fuspected, he walked on of with an upright countenance, and his " eyes directed towards the window where " he knew the king leaned. This his ma-" jefty took particular notice of, and made " those about him do so too. The king " afterwards made a match at tennis, in " which the count de Soiffons, with the "king, played against the duke d'Eper"non and the marechal." It is at this match that the historians of that time make the duke utter a good faying, telling the marechal, " that he played well, but chofe " his fide badly." Hift. de la vie du duc d'Epernon, an. 1602. p. 205.

* Charles de Choifeul, marquis de Praflin, captain of the first company of guards, died a marechal of France in the year 1626.

+ The king, wearied out with his obstinacy, suddenly left him, saying, as he went away, "Well, I must learn the " truth elsewhere: Adieu, baron de Bi-" ron." These words were like lightning before a clap of thunder, that ftruck him to the ground; the king thereby degrading him from those many high dignities to which he had advanced him. The fame day, after supper, the count de Soissons alfo exhorted him, in the king's name, to own truth to him; and concluded his remonstrance with this sentence of the wife man, " The anger of kings is the forerun-" ner of death." Peref. ibid. After dinner, fays le Septennaire, he came to wait on the king, who was walking in his grand hall, where his majesty, shewing him his statue in relievo triumphing over the vanquished, fays to him, " Well, cousin, if " the king of Spain had feen me thus, " what would he fay?" 'To which he lightly made answer, "Sir, he would fear " you but little." All the lords that were present took notice of this presumptuous answer, and the king looking sternly at him, Biron, who observed it, explained his meaning, by adding, "I mean, Sir, that " ftatue, but not this perion."

fion: ardently he wished, that I would suggest to him the means by which, without incurring any danger, he might avoid treating him as a state criminal: but this was not easy to be done, considering the disposition Biron was known to be of; if it was dangerous to suffer him to escape, when he shewed no signs of repentance, it was no less so to release him upon his word, after letting him know that he had proofs of his treason.

The king once more refumed a refolution fuggested to him by the natural sweetness of his temper, which was, to endeavour to restore the marechal to a right way of thinking; but as he had not been able to succeed in this attempt himself, he ordered me to undertake it, and promised me to avow all I should say to Biron to engage his submission, provided that I gave him no hint of what La-Fin had said, to prevent the design of arresting him, to which he must have recourse if the marechal persisted in his obstinacy. "If he opens himself freely to "you, said the king, upon the confidence you must endeavour to insert figure him with of my favourable intentions towards him, assure him, that he may come to me without sear, and confess all; and if he disguises no part of the truth, I promise you, upon my royal word, I will pardon him chearfully."

I WENT to the castle to see the marechal, who was in his majesty's chamber, talking to La-Curée at the head of the bed. I had a fufficient number of attendants with me: and the marechal, feeing his people make way at my approach, advanced to falute me, but did it very coldly. I thought I ought to begin, by endeavouring to foften the refentment I knew he entertained against me: "How is this! " monfieur, faid I, embracing him, you falute me with the gravity " of a fenator, contrary to your usual custom; you must not be thus " referved, embrace me a fecond time, and let us talk freely." When we were feated, and out of the hearing of any person in the room, "Well, monfieur," faid I, in an obliging tone, "what a strange man " are you! have you yet paid your respects to the king? how were " you received by him? what has he faid to you? you know his dif-" position is frank and open, he likes others to be fincere with him; " I am told you behaved in a very referved manner to him, which " was far from being feafonable, nor did it fuit with either his temper " or yours: I am your kinfman, your friend, and your fervant, take " my counsel, and you will find it will be useful to you; tell me " freely what you have upon your heart, and depend upon it I will " procure

" procure you fatisfaction; be not apprehensive that I will deceive you." To all this Biron contented himself with replying in a cold and indifferent manner, " I have waited on the king with all the reverence and " respect that I owe him; I have answered all his questions, which " were only on general matters, nor had I any thing more to fay to " him" " Ah! monfieur, replied I, it is not thus that you ought " to act with the king: you know the goodness of his heart, open " yours to him, and declare freely to him, or to me, if you had ra-" ther it should be so, all your grievances, and I promise that, before " night, you shall be satisfied with each other." " I have nothing " more to fay either to the king or to you than what I have already " faid, returned the marechal; but, if his majesty entertains' any suf-" picion of me, or thinks I have given him any cause of complaint " against me, let him or you acquaint me with the occasion of these " fuspicions and disgusts, and I will give you satisfaction." " The "king", faid I, in my eagerness to save him, " is offended at your " coldness, for as to other particulars, added I immediately, he is " quite ignorant: but let your conscience be your judge, and act in " the same manner as if you knew we were informed of your most " fecret actions, nay even your words and thoughts; for I protest to " you upon my honour, this is the most certain way to obtain what-" ever you can defire from the king. The method I recommend to " you I always follow myself: if it ever happens that I commit any " little fault, I acknowledge and exaggerate it to the king, who " then grants me all I wish: if you will believe me and take my " counsel, dear marechal, pursued I, you and I shall govern the " court and be at the head of affairs." " I am willing to believe you," replied Biron with the same coldness, " but I have nothing to accuse "myself of; I feel my conscience perfectly at ease, since the confession I made the king at Lyons." Although I had probably said but too much already, yet I could not hinder myself from making him still feveral other inftances, which he received no better, and foon after withdrew to his own lodgings.

THE king entering that moment, I repeated to him all that I had faid to Biron, and his answers. "You have gone rather too far, said this prince to me, and have said enough to create some suspicion in him, and even to induce him to fly. "Go into that gallery," added his majesty, after reflecting some moments upon the blindness and obstinacy with which the marechal hurried on to his ruin, "and wait P 2 " for

" for me there; I would talk to my wife and you alone." Accordingly he returned a fhort time afterwards with the queen, and shutting the door of the gallery, he told us, that the double obligation he was under, as a king and father, to watch over the fafety and happiness of the state, leaving him no other part to take but that of arresting marechal Biron and the count d'Auvergne, all that now remained was to consider how to do it securely *. His majesty was of opinion, that we should wait till the marechal and the count were retired each to his respective lodging, and that then soldiers should be sent to invest them. I proposed that they should be in the king's closet till the night was far advanced, and that, after the greater part of the courtiers, weary of waiting for his majesty's retiring, should be withdrawn, they should then be seized as they went out of the king's apartment. " I do not fee how this can be done, replied Henry, " without having my chamber and closet filled with blood; for they " will not fail to draw their fwords and defend themselves, and if this " should happen, I had rather it were in their apartment than mine." I thought it of most consequence, upon this occasion, to avoid, as much as possible, all noise and confusion; but the king continuing firm in his first proposal, took leave of me, bidding me go home to fupper, " and at nine o'clock, faid he, let your horses be prepared, " and you and all your people be booted, ready to mount and fet out " when I fend for you."

I withdraw to my pavillion, where, after giving orders conformable to those I had received from his majesty, I went into my closet, from whence I could see all that passed about Biron's apartment, which was in the pavillion opposite to mine. I read and walked about alter-

* It would not have been done, if the marechal de Biron had taken advantage of the notice that was given him. A certain perfon put a letter into his hand, as he was going to wait on the king after fupper, in the name of the countefs de Rouly his fifter, and, as he inquired what news, upon finding that the bearer made no answer, he doubted fomething elfe was the matter, and, after opening the letter, he found notice given him that, if he did not make his retreat in two hours, he would be arrefled, and directly fhewed it to one of his friends called De Carbonnieres, who faid to him, Then, adieu, fir, I wish I had a poignard in my breaft, provided you were now fafe in Burgundy. To this he made anfwer, fuppole I were there, and that I were to have four in mine, upon receiving the king's orders, I would immediately come hither. Notwithflanding this, he went into the king's chamber, where he played at primero with the queen, and in the midft of his game, the fieur de Mergé, a gentleman of Burgundy, was observed to whifper fomewhat in his ear, which the marechal not regarding, the count d'Auvergne came also and twice touched him on the side, telling him, "I It is not fase "for us to be here." Sept. ibid.

nately, without neglecting to observe what was doing on that fide where I expected fron to see the attack begun, and to receive new orders from the king. The clock struck nine, ten, and eleven, yet nothing was done; at length midnight came, yet all was quiet: I am afraid, faid I, returning into my chamber, where all my domestics waited for the seen that was preparing, some at play, some in conversation, and others asleep, I am afraid, said I, that they have not taken their measures right, and have suffered the birds, which with so little difficulty they might have taken, to escape, and which will not be easily entrapped again. I then ordered them to saddle my horses, and pack up my baggage, while I went into my closet, and wrote a few words.

I CONTINUED there half an hour, after which I heard a noise at the door of my pavillion next the garden, and a voice that cried, Monfieur, the king fends for you. I looked out at the window, and knew the messenger to be La Varenne, who went on faying, "Monsieur, come " immediately, the king wants to fpeak with you, and to fend you to " Paris, to give the necessary orders there, for messieurs de Biron and "d'Auvergne are made prisoners." "And where were they taken, faid I *." " In the king's closet," hereplied. " God be praised, said I, that the king " has followed that advice." I ran directly to his majesty's apartment. " Our men are feized, faid he to me, mount your horse, and go and " prepare their lodgings in the Bastile; I shall fend them in a boat to " the gate of the arfenal next the river: make them land there, that " they may not be feen, and carry them without any noise through " the midst of your courts and gardens. When you have made pro-" per dispositions in the arfenal for their reception, if you can, before " they arrive, which they will do foon after you, go to the parliament " and the town-house, and declare there what has happened; tell them, " that, at my arrival, they shall know the reasons for this proceeding, * Vitry arrefled the marechal de Biron as be came out of the king's antichamber.

'Sir, fays he to him, the king has com'manded me to give him an account of 'your perfon, deliver me your fword.'
'You but jelt,' replies Biron to him.
'Sir, rejoins Vitry, the king has fo commanded me.' 'Eray, fays the marechal again, let me fpeak to the king.'
'No Sir, returns Vitry, the king is retired to relt.' Praflin waited at the fame time for the count of Auvergne at the gate of the casses, to whom, as he came out, he said, "You are the king's prisoner."

'What I, I," returned the count d'Auvergne much surprised. "Yes you, Sir, 'says Praslin to him, I arrest you in the 'king's name, deliver me your sword."

'Here take it, replies the count, it has 'never killed any but wild boars; if you 'had acquainted me sooner of this, I would have been in bed and assept two 'hours ago.

1602. " which they will find to be just." All these orders were happily and exactly executed. At the very moment that the prisoners landed at the arsenal, my wife was brought to bed of that daughter of mine. who bore the title of mademoifelle de Sully.

I GAVE the care of the prisoners to the foldiers of the king's guards joined to my own, and posted them in such a manner that they might be faid to be guards upon each other. I likewife placed a guard upon the bastion opposite to the windows in the prisoners apartment, and another upon the terrace of the tower; fo that, as I wrote to the king. it was impossible they should escape unless by the interposition of angels. The repeated advices I received from his majesty obliged me to take all these precautions. A few days after the detention of the prisoners, the king wrote to me, that he was informed, there was a scheme laid to procure their escape, ordering me to watch them carefully, for that I should answer for them. I consented to this condition, relying on the fidelity of my foldiers, who, to make an escape practicable, must have been corrupted every one. Another time the king fent me notice, that the plot which was formed for delivering Biron and d'Auvergne, was also against my person: a boat full of soldiers was in the night to come up the river, and the men were to land at the steps of a gate behind my apartment which looked upon the river, that they were to force open this gate with a petard, to do the same by the second. and get into my chamber while I was in bed and carry me to Franche-Comté, fresh horses being in readiness for them at the end of every ten leagues, and that, when in possession of my person, they were to deal with me by way of reprifal, as Biron should be dealt with. This last information, although fo circumstantial, appeared to me as frivolous as the rest: I thanked his majesty, however, for giving it me. He had the goodness to command me to be strictly attentive to my own safety, affuring me, that, if the defign which was laid against me should succeed, he would not hefitate a moment to purchase me at the price of freeing the prisoners, and, if there were occasion, by a still greater concession. To satisfy him, I placed a small guard likewise at this gate.

THE first president, the president de * Blancmesnil, and the two counsellors de Fleury and de Thurin, were named by the parliament to interrogate the prisoners, whom, for this purpose, I ordered to be carried into a small pavillion in the midst of the great walk of the arfenal: as it was necessary likewise that they should be examined in full parliament, I caused a covered boat to be prepared for them, in which they were carried thither and brought back again without being feen. The history of this trial, and all the particulars of the event I am now relating, are known to every one, and that marechal Biron *, feeing Miron, the lieutenant-civil, at the foot of the fcaffold, gave him a caution against La Fin, took his leave of the elder Rumigny, entreating him to bear his respects to mademoiselle de Rumigny, which, he faid, was all the present he had to make her; and many circumstances of the like nature. The fudden fallies of rage, the terrors and weakneffes which this man +, who, amidst the greatest dangers of war, had

I cannot forbear mentioning to the honour of learning, that marechal Biron the father was as remarkable for erudition, as the fon for ignorance: he could scarcely read. The following account of him from the Chronologie Septennaire, will ferve to finish his character. The author, after observing that he had almost all the qualities

The author after this gives an account of an adventure that happened to him as he was going to confult, under a borrowed name, the old astrologer La Brosle, the same of whom M. de Sully speaks so often in his memoirs. "This good man, fays he, who was then 1602, acquired the character of intrepid, shewed at his execution, have furnished matter for much discourse, and doubtless will not be forgot by historians: as for me I have nothing new to relate, except, perhaps, fome circumstances that regard me personally.

> While preparations were making for trying the two state prisoners, they often defired to speak with me *: two considerations hindered me from giving them this fatisfaction; first, because it would be to no purpose to hear the prayers and folicitations of Biron, whose death was too necessary for the good of the state, and too firmly resolved by the king, to give hopes of obtaining his pardon; and fecondly, having been comprehended myfelf in La Fin's depositions, I was not willing to give either weak or malignant persons room to suspect that I had used any endeavours with the prisoners to keep them filent with regard to me, or that I had any occasion to speak to them. It was my defign, on the other hand, that, if any supposed me to have had the least connexion with Biron, they should think that, by thus refusing to fee him, I should make him resolve to live no longer on terms of civility with a man whom, upon that supposition, he must, for many reasons, regard as a traitor. He reverenced my innocence, and if he spoke of me, as he often did, it was only to praise the counsels I had given him, and to condemn himself for not following them.

> DEFFUNCTIS, grand-provoft of the Isle-de-France, took down in writing all the conversations in which marechal Biron had men-

* He requested the fieur de Baranton, M. de Prassin's lieutenant, to wait on M. de Rofny from him, and tell him that he defired to fee him; but, if that favour could not be obtained, he earnestly begged of him to intercede with the king for his life, a piece of fervice which he expected from him, as he always had a great effeem for him, and found him to be his friend, and fuch a friend that, had he been perfuaded by him, he would not have been in the place where he then was; that there were perfons more guilty than himfelf, but that he was the most unfortunate of them all; that he was content to be confined between four bare walls and chained down. The earnest entreaties which the figur de Baranton made in his name fo greatly affected M. de Rofny and his lady, the fieur Zamet and others who were prefent, that they were unable to fpeak for fome time, and fat listening in tears. At length M. de Rosny broke filence and faid, "I cannot fee him " nor intercede for him, it is now too late : " had he been perfuaded by me, he had not " been in this melancholy fituation, for he " ought to have declared the truth to his " majesty from the time of his arrival at " Fontainebleau; and fince he did not fo, " he has taken from the king the means of " giving him his life, and from all his " friends that of interceding for him." By that I learned that Biron, when he came out of the chapel, where he had made his confession to the seurs Garnier and Maignan doctors of the Sorbonne, asked if there was no person there belonging to monfieur de Rofny; and being told that the younger Arnaud was there, he called him, and faid, " Monfieur Arnaud, I de-" fire you will carry my last farewel to monfieur de Rosny, and tell " him, that to-day he lofes one of his best friends, and the most af-" fectionate kinfman and fervant he ever had: I have always highly " efteemed his merit and valued his friendship. Another time Biron talking of me, faid, " The "king has, in monsieur de Rosny, a faithful servant, and a wise and " prudent counsellor; his majesty has done well to make use of him; " for while he continues to direct his councils, France will be happy, " and I might have been so likewise had I governed myself by his " advice." On any other occasion I should have avoided inserting, in these Memoirs, such discourses in my praise; but on this I did not think myself at liberty to make the least alteration in the marechal's words. I was ignorant of his having given these public testimonies of his esteem for me, when I joined with the rest of his relations + in im-

+ Mefficurs or Saint Blancard, de la Force, the count de Roufly, de Chateauneuf, de Thémines, de Salignac, and de Saint Angel, went three days after the arreft of marcehal de Biron, to throw themfelves at the feet of his majefly, who was then at S. Maur des Foffés, but they could obtain no other favour than that which our author fipeaks of here. Henry comforted them by reminding them of the example of the conflable de Saint Paul, allied to the house of Bourbon, who was beheaded for a fimilar crime, and the prince of Condé, who would have undergone the fame fate had it not been for the death of Francis If. &c. the place destined for his execution; accordingly, instead of the Greve, which was named in the sentence that was passed upon him, his majesty permitted the marechal to be beheaded in the court of the Bastile.

THE death of Biron entirely disconcerted all the schemes of the cabal. Lavardin, who had been fent at the fame time by his majesty into Burgundy, at the head of a body of troops, took possession of all the places there which had been held by marechal Biron, without striking a blow, and fent Senecé to inform the king that this province had fubmitted. The government of it was given to the dauphin, to whom M. Le Grand was made lieutenant. The proceedings against the conspirators stopped here; and, except Fontenelles *, whom Henry thought it necessary to punish for an example to others, although he was not one of the principal criminals, he pardoned all the rest. The number of the conspirators was very great, and, upon examination, many of the most considerable courtiers + were involved in the guilt. I strengthened as much as possible the king's inclinations to lenity: I forewarned those whom I knew to have had some share in the confidence of Biron, and represented to them so plainly, that all they had now to do was to throw themselves at the king's feet, and implore his pardon, that almost all pursued this method: the secresy which I promifed them will not permit me to mention their names here, and, far from having any cause to repent of a step of which the king and myfelf only were witnesses, they were soon convinced that his majesty not only took care to shew he had no refentment against them, but likewise appeared to hold them in higher esteem than before. Hebert, who was fecretary to the party, and had been feveral times fent into Milan and throughout all Italy by marechal Biron, was likewife arrested. I was ordered to interrogate him in the presence of the count d'Auvergne, and to receive his depositions, the king having promised him a pardon upon condition that he fincerely declared all he knew.

The principal difcovery he made, and that which gave the fullest conviction of the perfidy of Spain, was, that Roncas and Alphonso Cazal had been sent by that court at different times with large sums of money to marechal Biron. To convince Hebert that his majesty had no design to deceive him, before I began to examine him, I delivered his pardon, signed by the king, into the hands of the count d'Auvergne.

THE baron de Lux was not excepted out of the general amnesty; his perplexity, when he heard of the imprisonment of his friend, had been very great, because he found it equally dangerous to leave, as to flay in, the kingdom; he was still undetermined what to do, when La Plume came from his majesty with an order to attend him. promifing him his pardon, at the fame time, if he would endeavour to deferve it by his obedience and repentance. De Lux, fenfible of his guilt, was now more alarmed than before; yet he told the mellenger that he was ready to obey the king's orders, provided he would affure him that he should not be exposed to the shame of a public examination, nor be confronted with his accufers; that he should be continued in his post *, and permitted to retire from court after his confession: he was afraid of being detained, under pretence that it was either not full enough or infincere. There being no letter from his majesty, De Lux appeared contented with a promise under my hand that he should receive no harm.

The king having granted all that the baron De Lux demanded, he came to Paris, and meeting his majefty as he was going to hunt, threw himfelf at his feet, and was beginning a long fpeech, when the king, who had not leifure to hear him then, stopped him short, by saying, "Go to monsieur de Rosny, and I will talk to you afterwards." This order, the tone with which De Lux fancied it was given, and the place to which he was sent, raised such apprehensions in his mind, that he was upon the point of making his escape. However, he came to the arfenal, but under such terrors, that, instead of listening to any thing I said to him, he was continually looking round him, and his apprehensions were increased when he saw his majesty's guards enter and file off in the court of the arfenal, the king having sent them thither, because he intended to pass by the arfenal in his return from the chace. De Lux now thought himself lost. "Ah! monsieur, said he "to me, I came hither upon the king's word and yours; do you in-" The guards, faid he, which I perceive entering " in files, perfuaded me that it is not the king who is coming, but " that they are probably fent for me." Without giving me time to undeceive him, he entreated me to allow him to speak to the king before he was confined, promifing, and I believe very fincerely, to conceal nothing from him. " I have observed your uneafiness, replied I, " but be not afraid, I have no orders to arrest you; speak freely to the " king, fwear to be faithful to him, and keep your oath, you will then " have nothing to apprehend; had the duke of Biron acted in that man-" ner, he would have been now alive." That moment a messenger informed me that the king was returned to the Louvre, and defired to speak with me: the evening was so far advanced before the chace was ended, that, instead of coming to the arfenal as he had proposed, he went directly to the palace. This message relieved the baron De Lux from his terrors.

THE next day he had a conference with his majesty, which lasted above four hours; he gave no cause for accusing him of indiscretion in concealing his accomplices, but named fuch a prodigious number of persons, that Henry, glad to find in such general accusations a pretence for believing none and for making himself easy, treated all those whom De Lux accused, and who were continually about him, no less favourably than before. It is certain, however, that many of them were acquainted with marechal Biron's defigus, but the hope of remaining unnoticed amongst the crowd, determined them not to own their connexions with him, notwithstanding all the advances and promises which I made them. The constable had indeed kept up a fort of intimacy with Biron, which in prudence ought to have been avoided; but, as I was perfuaded that it was merely perfonal and extended no further, I thought myself obliged to justify him to his maiesty, on whom his affurances of fidelity made fo little impression, that he could not help regarding him with an eye of fuspicion: I may fay with truth, that my endeavours did not a little contribute towards restoring him to the king's favour; and this prince had no reason to repent of his clemency, either to him or any of the others *, except only the count of Auvergne, to whom it is time to return.

* It is not certain that Henry the IVth never had reason to repent of this indulgence. As to the assistance of this prince there remains a great many doubts, the

THE nature of that crime which he, as well as the duke of Biron, 1602. had committed, and the equality of the proofs against them, made it highly probable that their punishment would be alike; however, their fates were very different; the king not only gave him his life, which he caused to be intimated to him by the constable, but also foftened, as much as possible, the inconvenience of his imprisonment: he permitted him to agree with the lieutemant of the Bastile for his table, discharged him of the expence of the officers and soldiers appointed for his guard, and reduced them afterwards to five, comprehending the exempt, upon my reprefentations that a greater number was useless. At first, indeed, he was not allowed to walk upon the terraffes, but afterwards he was indulged in all his defires; and at length wholly * discharged from his confinement. He had been so little accuftomed to be treated as a criminal, that when he was told the king had granted him his life, he faid, it fignified nothing, unless he gave him his liberty likewise.

THOSE who praise alike the good or bad actions of kings, will not want arguments to justify Henry in this different treatment of two equally guilty; they will alledge, as it was then reported at court, that the services his majestly might expect from the count of Auvergne, in discovering to him the plots of the Spanish party against France, made it necessary to pardon him for his own interest. For my own part, I am too candid not to confess, that on this occasion the king gave no proof of his elemency, but of his passion for the marchioness of Verneuil, sister to the count of Auvergne; which was the sole cause of the indulgence he shewed to the count. However, I concealed my thoughts with great care, and, during two years, never mentioned a word to the king upon the subject, being persuaded, that all the arguments I could use at the time would have no force against the prayers and tears of a mistress; and when the thing was done, it was to no purpose to shew him his error. It was not till after confpiracy here spoken of, we may still believe that this catastrophe had not happen ed, if the conspirators had been profecuted with more severity: in this case it must be allowed, that Henry IV. and M. de Rosiny were deceived by their too great lenity, of which the prince became the victim. What the author says four lines higher of those who boldly concealed themselves among the croud, sufficiently shews, that the spirit of revolt was not extinguished by the death of its head.

the count of Auvergne had, by new inftances of ingratitude, obliged his benefactor to proceed against him as a criminal, that I just hinted my thoughts of his former conduct, and then I was forced to it by the king himself.

ONE day, when the king and I were alone, the conversation turned upon this subject; and Henry, after viewing me filently for some time, at length told me, that he had been often greatly furprized at my not asking him his reasons for preserving the count of Auvergne. I replied, that I had thought it my duty to keep my conjectures on that head to myself, among which there were two that appeared to me to be the most probable, but that I never chose to explain myself to his majesty for fear of offending him. Henry answered immediately, with his usual vivacity, that he could easily guess, that one of the motives to which I attributed the favour he had shewn the prisoner, regarded the marchioness of Verneuil; and affured me, that that alone had been but fufficient to have commuted his punishment into a perpetual imprisonment; but that he was absolutely ignorant of the second, to which I supposed his deliverance had been owing, and pressed me repeatedly to tell him what it was. I confessed to him, that it had been always my opinion, that his majesty would not inflict a shameful death upon a man who would be always confidered as the uncle of his children, in case he should have any by the marchioness of Verneuil. Henry fwore to me, that he had not hitherto carried his reflections fo far, although that confideration, if it had occurred to him, would have had great weight with him; and he infifted upon my gueffing, in my turn, the true reason that had induced him to set Auvergne at liberty: he again repeated to me, that the folicitations of his miftrefs, the intreaties of the constable, his three daughters, and of Ventadour, who had all thrown themselves at his feet, had not had so great a share in that refolution as I imagined, they having contented themselves with asking only the life of the prisoner. And at length, after all this winding, he declared to me, tha this chief inducement to pardon Auvergne was the great promifes he made him, and the air of fincerity with which they were accompanied: he then related to me all that had paffed between himself and Auvergne, when the latter implored the favour of a conference with him: he told me, that the count, after many affurances of a fincere repentance, and protestations of inviolable fidelity for the future, had promifed him, with the most facred oaths, if he would reftore him to liberty, to get him intelligence of the most fecret resolutions that were taken in the council of Spain; to accomplish which, he had only to resume, in appearance, his former engagements with 1602. that court, well knowing how to deceive them, and to make them take for true, what on his fide would be only feigned: but that this diffimulation might not, in Spain, draw upon him the punishment of a traitor, it was necessary that his majesty should not reveal to any of his minifters what he then faid, nor take umbrage at his journeys to Spain, nor the packets he should receive from thence.

THE king, after this recital, added, that it was with difficulty he could bring himself to believe the promises Auvergne made him, or suppose that he could fall so low, as to take up the trade of a spy, and become a double traitor; but that after the count had affured him he really meant to perform all he had engaged for, although he hated him more than ever, yet he was determined to expect the effect of his promifes, and make use of him to procure such intelligence concerning the proceedings of Spain, as he could obtain by no other means; and in this expectation, he had promifed Auvergne fecrefy, and the other condition he had demanded.

THE conclusion I came to, from what the king told me, was, that he was every way deceived by the count of Auvergne, or rather, I repeat it again, betrayed by his passion for his mistress; this was the safcination that closed his eyes upon the artifice of Auvergne; and after having prevailed upon him to spare his life, snatched from him likewise the grant of his liberty, and that upon fo flight a foundation, as does little honour to the prudence of Henry. It is not clear, indeed, whether Auvergne had not then an inclination to keep his word, but by fuffering himself to be seduced a second time, became once more a traitor to his prince.

IT must likewise be confessed, that he was ingenious, subtle, penetrating, and naturally eloquent; qualities very fit for the part he had undertaken to act: but, not to mention his ambition, his inclination to debauchery, and other dangerous paffions, he had in his heart fuch a fund of malice and perfidiousness, that it was easy to see he would refume his former dispositions; but he refumed them with so much address, that the king did not perceive when it happened, taking it for granted, that it did not happen the very moment he found himself secure. He often conferred with his majesty concerning the king of Spain, and related very bad things of him, the better to play his part; but all he faid might be reduced to matters of little confequence;

while to the court of Spain he gave very exact and very material informations of every thing that pailed in France. I shall return to him again in the sequel.

THE prince of Joinville *, to whom Henry likewife extended his clemency, was a young man of a different character; nothing could be more light, more whimfical, and more unleady; he had engaged himself with bad company, among whom, to be in the fashion, and to appear a man of confequence, it was necessary that he should have correspondences without the kingdom; this was sufficient to spoil him entirely. His majefty being informed that he carried on his intrigues with Spain by the count of Chamnite, governor of Franche-Comté for the king of Spain, and one of his ministers, he ordered him to be arrefled: as foon as he found himfelf in cuftody, he, like all the others, declared, that he was ready to make a full confession, provided that it was to the king in person, and that I should be present. I had left Paris in the evening, to vifit my new acquifition of Sully, and to trace out the plan of fome buildings there, to render it more habitable than it was at prefent. I was just arrived, and preparing to fit down to fupper, when I heard his majefty's postilion blow his horn, and immediately suspected my stay at Sully would not be long. He gave me a billet from the king, which contained only an order to come to him, without explaining himself any farther. Believing the business to be of the utmost importance, I set out so early the next morning, that I only faw Sully by the light of the flambeaux. When I was made acquainted with the affair, I thought it my duty to intercede for an unexperienced youth, who was drawn into errors by his rashness and folly. Joinville being brought before us, confessed all he was defired to do. The king entering immediately into his character, treated him as he deferved; he fent for his mother, the dutchess of Guise, and the duke, his brother, and taking them into his closet, "Here, faid he, is the prodigal fon " himself, I shall use him like a child, and pardon him for yours and " monsieur de Rosny's sake, who has entreated for him; but I do it " upon condition that you will all three reprove him feverely, and that " you, nephew," added he, turning to the duke of Guife, " will an-" fwer for his conduct for the future: I give him to your care, make " him wife, if it be possible."

* Claude de Lorraine, fourth fon to Blois; he was afterwards duke de Che-Henry duke of Guife, who was killed at vreufe, and died in 1657.

This change was not so easy a thing to effect on a young man of 1602. lively passions, incapable of instruction, and whose disposition had already taken its bent: he was fuffered to remain in prison for some months, where at first he was obstinately sullen, then insolent and surious, and at last, through mere weariness, promised to behave well, if he was taken from thence. The king confented to his removal, and he was told, that he might go and live in the castle of Dampierre. Joinville was not much better pleased with this place than his prison, and represented to the king, that he could not refide in a castle which was not furnished. Unfortunately for him, the king knew this to be a falshood: having often hunted near that castle and Chevreuse, which is but at a small distance from it, the keeper of those two houses had offered to accommodate him with apartments and beds there; and he had been told by the duches of Guise, that Dampierre was as well furnithed as Chevreuse. This behaviour of Joinville's so incensed the king against him, that he reproached me for the too great interest I took in the affairs of that family, and ordered me to concern myfelf less with them for the future. And now his majesty, instead of revoking his te itence, declared that the prisoner should be again examined before he was enlarged; which renewing his former fears, he promifed to make a fuller confession than he had yet done; but being, as he faid, apprehensive that his majesty was still angry with him, he again entreated that I might be the person to whom he spoke.

THE duke of Bouillon took care not to return from his estates, as he had promifed the king; therefore, after Biron was arrested, his majesty judged it necessary to write to him, to see if upon this occafion Bouillon would not give fome proof of his connexion with the prifoner: he informed him, that marechal Biron had been convicted of conspiring against the state; and that when he came to court he would shew him the proofs of his treason, and acquaint him with all the particulars of it; fatisfying himfelf with thus infinuating that he expected the performance of his promife, without giving him a direct order to come. The duke of Bouillon eafily comprehended the defign of this letter, and answered it no otherwise, than by sending a gentleman of his retinue immediately to his majefty, to congratulate him upon the danger he had escaped. By this person he sent a letter to me, in which he carefully avoided faying any thing from which the least advantage could be taken, either because he had already learnt that his affociate was feized, or that his imagina-VOL. II. R tion

1602. tion fuggested to him immediately the behaviour which it was proper for him to assume. He told me, that never had any one's astonishment equalled his, when he learned that the state and the king's perfon had been in danger; that his fidelity, and the readiness he shewed to go to every place where his duty and the king's fervice called him, would, he hoped, convince his majesty, that he should never have the like reason to be apprehensive of him; and that he would expect the king's orders, and my good advice, that he might obey the one, and follow the other. The whole letter was conceived in terms fuch as these: he could not, however, hinder himself from hinting something in favour of the accused, but in a manner so general as could not hurt him. After expressing his wishes, that this event might not give his majesty any disturbance, he added these words, " nor alter the natural " fweetness of his disposition."

THE king, when I shewed him this letter, thought he might make use of it to draw Bouillon to court, for he durst not send him an absolute command to come, lest by a refusal he should lay him under the necessity of punishing him for his disobedience by the force of arms, which he neither chose nor could conveniently do; he therefore told me, that fince Bouillon asked my advice concerning what it was proper for him to do in this conjuncture, I should reply, that it was true, the king had been informed he was not wholly unacquainted with the duke of Biron's intrigues, but that this ought to strengthen his resolution of coming to his majesty, either to justify his innocence, or, by confessing his fault, to obtain a pardon for it; and that I should assure him, that I would give him my word, or if necessary become his furety, that fo far from having any thing to fear, he should be received by the king with open arms. Henry knowing my delicacy on these occasions, prevented my fcruples, by telling me, that he would engage his royal word that Bouillon should be treated in whatever manner I promited him; and not fatisfied with this verbal affurance, he gave me a writing conceived in these terms: "I promise to M. de Rosny, that if the duke " of Bouillon comes to court upon his letters, and the promifes he shall " make him, I will observe them all faithfully, or give the duke free " leave to retire where-ever he pleases; and neither in his journey to " or from the court shall he receive any disturbance: for all which I

" engage my faith and royal word to the faid fieur de Rosny. Given

I WROTE to the duke of Bouillon, and without telling him of the engagement his majefty entered into with me concerning him, preffed him in the strongest terms, and by every argument I thought could have any weight with him, to come and fettle for some time at court. This letter Bouillon received almost at the same time with the verbal answer the king fent him by his deputy, and took occasion, from his majesty's not having himself pressed him to come, to tell me in answer, that the advice I gave him being inconfiftent with the king's orders, he could not govern himfelf by it, whatever inclination he might have to do fo; and that he would content himself with sending to court, as his majesty required, a person who should give as satisfactory an account of his conduct as he himself could do, and ought to be equally depended upon. This perfon was a gentleman named Rignac, who accordingly came to court about the same time that I received Bouillon's answer to my letter, and whose expences were all defrayed, as if his journey had been of great importance, because, in appearance, he came by his majefty's orders: but the duke of Bouillon, instead of coming himself, removed still farther from court and went to Castres.

I AM not furprifed that my arguments had on this occasion so little weight with him, fince he regarded me as his enemy, and did not scruple to call me so in public; nor was the king ignorant that this was his opinion, having informed me of it himself in a letter dated the 28th day of December this year: nor was I more furprized at the manner in which the duke of Bouillon acted with his majesty. As soon as he perceived (which was no very difficult matter for him to do) that the king had recourse to diffirmulation with him, he supposed it easy enough to impose upon his majesty and his council without risking any danger; for this purpose, all that was necessary was, to answer. in * appearance, always with great submission, without taking any of those measures which they durst not formally prescribe to him. This artifice fucceeded fo well, that he made use of it a long time. Nothing could be conceived in more modest or respectful terms, than the letter he wrote on this subject to Du-Maurier; and which, after his majesty had perufed it, was given to me, to be communicated to the chancellor of having been concerned in marechal de Biron's plot, his refufing to come and wait upon the king, and his flight to Castres. Liv. v. p. 222, & feq.

and the duke d'Epernon, with whom, by the king's orders, I treated this affair methodically. The king ftrongly interefted himfelf in it, and had a conference with Conflant and Saint-Aubin about the duke of Bouillon, that lafted a whole afternoon, but it produced nothing.

The game which upon this occasion was played by the king of Spain and the duke of Savoy was still more uncommon. All the foreign powers in alliance with Henry, more especially England and Scotland, whose ambassadors were still at Paris, congratulated his majesty, upon his having so happily crushed this dangerous conspiracy. Philip and Charles-Emanuel appeared more eager than any of the others in complimenting the king upon this event: unless fear was their motive, it is not easy to guess what could oblige them to have recourse to so gross an artifice. Henry was more sincere with them; he declared to them, that he was well informed of the part they had both had in the plot; all the blame of which they threw upon the count of Fuentes, as boldly, as if it had been possible to have persuaded him that this Spaniard would have dared, without their permission, to act in concert with Biron and the other conspirators.

THE king, fome days after the execution of marechal Biron, coming to the arfenal, I had a conversation with this prince that well deferves to be related: "You fee," faid he to me, after making some reflections, as usual, upon the ingratitude of messieurs de Biron, d'Auvergne, de Bouillon, and three more of the most considerable noblemen of the court, whom he had pardoned, and whose names he mentioned, "you · fee that those on whom I have bestowed the greatest favours, are the " fame persons by whose ambition and caprice I have suffered the " mott." He then observed to me, that these fix men had, at different times, received larger fums from him, than the five kings his predeceffors, except Henry III. who had been accused of such great prodigality, had given to their favourites. Henry added, that to filence thoic who always unreasonably enumerated the services of these six gentlemen, he would have me draw up a memorial of all the rewards they had received from him fince they had entered into his fervice; in which he did not pretend to include any thing but those presents which his liberality only had induced him to make them, and not fuch possessions as they had acquired by his assistance, and enjoyed through his protection; fuch, for example, was the principality of Sedan, for which Bouillon was doubly obliged to him, having first procured, and then fecured him the possession of it, as has been feen, on an occafion fufficiently perplexing.

THE king, whose fole view in entering upon this subject was to make a particular application to me, told me, that by this discourse, which might have some relation to the present state of my fortune, he had no intention to give me a lesion, being too well perfuaded of my fidelity to think there was any occasion for it; but that having seriously reflected upon the manner in which it was necessary he should behave to me, that he might not expose himself to the mortification of seeing the confidence he had in me leffened, he thought prudence required that he should take two precautions, with respect to me, in the rewards my fervices and family deferved from him; "One of these precautions, " faid the king, has a reference to the world, the other to myfelf: " first, that these rewards should neither succeed each other so rapidly, " nor in themselves be so excessive, as to render you the object of pub-" lie hatred, always ready to break out against first ministers: and the " fecond, that these estates and these honours should be of such a na-" ture, as, if it should happen that through religion, or any other mo-" tive, you should be capable of violating your duty, they may not "put you into a condition of giving any umbrage to your benefactor " himfelf, or, after his death, of diffurbing the tranquillity of his fuc-" ceffor, or of putting the state in danger: in one word," faid this prince, after giving me to understand, that as he spoke without any difguife, he would permit me to tell him my fentiments freely likewife, " I would take from myfelf the least occasion of suspicion against you, " that my friendship for you may continue unalterable. I daily expe-" rience so many instances of ingratitude, which I never expected, " that, contrary to my inclinations, I am obliged to be distrustful. " Do not imagine, therefore, that I shall put you in possession of great " cities and strong fortreffes, which, in the high credit you are in, and " the great abilities you are master of, might make you independent " of me, and enable you, whenever you pleafed, to throw the king-" dom into confusion. I cannot do more for you than ought to be " done for a fervant, however faithful he may be, by a prince who " has his honour, his reputation, and the interest of his people, at " heart."

HENRY, without giving me time to reply, added, that till proper opportunities offered for completing my fortune, he, from this moment, would join to my falaries and penfions, which were but fufficient 1602.

to answer the expences of my table and house, an extraordinary gratuity of fixty thousand livres a year; that by uniting this sum to my own estate I might purchase more lands, build upon them, furnish and embellish my new houses, and more advantageously settle my children; telling me graciously, that he still reserved to himself to give me other proofs of his friendship and liberality: "And this, pursued he, I shall do with the more willingness, as I am affured you will more funander these sums soolishly on entertainments, dogs, horses, birds, and mistresses."

During this long discourse of Henry's my mind was agitated with various thoughts, which made me liften to him in filence; the reflections it occasioned left me still more moved with his freedom, and the confidence he repoted in me, than discontented with a caution which many others in my fituation would have thought excessive. The king having commanded me to be very fincere in my reply, I told him, that although I had at this moment an absolute certainty in my own mind, that neither his majefty, nor his fuccessors, nor the state, should ever have any cause for those apprehensions of me which his wisdom had fuggested, yet I myself did not think he carried it too far; it being, in my opinion, one of the chief maxims of government, that a prince ought never to deliver himfelf up blindly to one person, whatever services he may have received from him, fince it is next to impossible that any one should be able to answer for the wisdom and justiness of his counsels for the future: therefore, instead of thinking myself injured, I found cause, in all his majesty had faid, to admire his prudence, and to acknowledge his goodness, fince whatever bounds he should prefcribe to his favours, they would always equally exceed my expectations and my fervices.

As I could not doubt but that the malignant infinuations of the courtiers, who were jealous of my favour with his majefty, had had fome share in those fears he expressed of me, I seized this opportunity to explain myself on an article, which from this moment I foresaw I should be under a necessity of returning to more than once. I begged his majesty would permit me to represent to him, that he ought not to give faith to the poisonous reports of informers, without having first had good proofs of my crime, and given me an opportunity of defending myself. I assured him, that he would find me sincere enough to consess my faults, which alone deserved that he should treat me in this manner; and that he should be convinced that what my enemies imputed to criminal views, could but at most amount to a failing, which I would not scruple to confess that instant, and for which I had some occasion for his indulgence; and this was, that, through impatience of any obstacle or delay in any resolution that I judged necessary to be taken, some words of complaint or anger might escape me against the too easy disposition of his majesty, of which my enemies would not fail to take advantage, although the purity of my intentions might be easily perceived in the words themselves that served for a foundation for the calumny.

WHAT I then faid to the king, I now repeat to my readers, and not through an affectation of modesty, which holds the place of justification; I am confcious I have no occasion for it, but because that, however irreproachable my conduct may have been, I have, neverthelefs, been more than once obliged to juffify myfelf to the prince whom I ferved: if this confession does not hinder them from denying me that justice I have deserved, it will not make them judge less favourably of Henry, if they attend to the conjunctures and maxims of the times in which we both lived: and at all times, there is nothing against which it is so difficult to defend one's felf, as the secret machinations of envious courtiers: what effect might they not be expected to produce in the mind of a prince who could collect a thousand examples of treachery, difloyalty, and disobedience to himself, and hardly one of real attachment? To judge clearly of the fentiments which Henry entertained for me, we must not consider him in those moments when the remembrance of fo many inftances of ingratitude, awakened by the most artful impostures, opened his heart in spite of him to distrust and fuspicion; but, when recovered from those impressions which the plots they endeavoured to comprehend me in had made on his mind, he gave me the fincerest proofs of his tenderness and esteem. The world therefore may judge as it pleases of those little disgraces which I have been obliged to fustain during the course of what will be called my glory and prosperity, and which probably any other might have suppressed, for the honour of having it said, that he directed as he pleased the inclinations of his mafter; on this subject I shall use neither difguife nor concealment, for truth is my guide, and instruction is my end.

THE duke of Luxembourg having had a cause brought before the parliament this year, the advocates that pleaded for him had the affurance

The duke complained of this extortion to the king, who ordered the parliament to issue out an arret, by which the lawyers fees were reduced and fettled, and they obliged to give receipts for all the money they received, and a general receipt for what papers were put into their hands, that they might be constrained to deliver up these, which they generally kept till their demands were fatisfied. The necessity of putting a Ordonnance curb to the avarice of these people had always appeared so strong, that de Blois, art. the States had already given the fame orders, but to no purpose. The parliament granted the arret that was demanded of them, but the lawyers, instead of submitting to it, went, three or four hundred of them, to return into the public register the enfigns of their office, which produced a total ceffation of law proceedings. There was almost a general murmur throughout Paris, particularly among pragmatical coxcombs and badauds *, a fet of wretches with which the town is crowded, who, taking upon them to be wifer than the king, the peers, and the states of the kingdom, decided against them in favour of the advocates +, and found fome abettors, even at court, who, with fo much power and art exaggerated an evil, petty in itself and easily remedied, that the king was stunned with their clamours, and began to be in pain about

> WHILE this affair was yet in agitation, his majesty being one day in his closet conversing with some of the courtiers, and relating the continual folicitations that were made him in favour of the advocates, " Faith, Sire, I am not furprifed at it," faid Sigogne, raifing his voice and affuming the air of one in a violent paffion; " these men make " it plainly appear that they know not how to employ their time, fince " they diffurb themselves so much about a trifle: to hear their excla-" mations, one would think the flate, without these bawlers, would be " ruined; as if the kingdom under Charlemagne, and fo many other " great kings during whose reigns neither advocates nor attorneys were " heard of, was not in as flourishing a condition as it is at present " when we are devoured by these vermin." cient, produced the register of the chancery, of which the first paper is intituled, A permission to plead causes by an advocate; and, perceiving that he was liftened to with pleafure, he added, that this science was established to the ruin of the nobility and the people, and the destruction of trade and agriculture. "There is not, faid he, any artist, " or even any fimple labourer, that is not of more use to the com-" munity, than this fwarm of men who enrich themselves by our " follies, and the artifices they have invented to stifle truth, throw " down all right, and darken reason. If we are so blind," continued he, with a vivacity truly diverting, " that we will not, and fo un-" happy that we cannot, do without them, nothing remains to be done " but to command them to refume the exercise of their employment " within eight days at farthest, upon the conditions prescribed by the " court, upon pain of being obliged to return to the shop or the " plough that they have quitted, or elfe to ferve the state in Flanders " with a musquet upon their shoulders. I'll answer for it, if this me-" thod be taken with them, we shall soon see them run with eager-" nefs to refume these magnificent ensigns, like vermin towards a heap " of wheat."

THERE was not one in the company who could forbear fmiling at this lively fally of Sigogne's, and the king was among the first, and confessed that his arguments were very convincing; but whether it was that he suffered himself to be overcome by the folicitations * that were made him, or alarmed by the sears of the consequences that might attend his joining this new disorder to those troubles by which the kingdom was then agitated, or that, as he afterwards declared, he had reserved to himself the making one day such a general regulation in this affair, that not only the advocates, but the attorneys and the whole body of the law should be comprehended in it, he consented that the arret should, for this time, continue without effect: and thus was this ludicrous business terminated; for reflexions upon which, I refer the reader to Sigogne's own words: so the world was left to think that it was I who made him speak them †.

* The medium made use of by the king's people, who underhand favoured the advocates in this affair, was, that the king should fend new letters to the parliament, whereby the advocates were ordered to refume and continue their functions, on condition, however, of obeying the arrets of parliament, and the ordinances of the states. But, as these letters did at the Vol. II. fame time allow them to make such remonfirances as they should think reasonable, with regard to the exercise of their several employments, and as they were particularly affured that they might act as before, they had no difficulty to submit thereto. De Thou, liv. exxviii. Sept. an. 1602.

† Le Journal d'Henry IV. relates a little piece of history which I shall set down S This

This naturally leads me to take notice of the great law fuit commenced this year by the third estate of Dauphine against the clergy and nobility, upon the manner in which the taxes were fettled and affized in this province: myfelf, together with thirteen other commissaries, chosen amongst persons of the highest distinction in the kingdom, were named to take cognizance of it, but it was fix years before it could be decided; the animofity between the parties concerned was fo great, that there was a necessity for sending a second time to take informations upon the fpot. I took a more fpeedy method to bring a man, named Jouffeaume, to juffice; he had been a receiver-general in the revenue, and, becoming a bankrupt, had carried off a great deal of the royal money. I caused him to be seized at Milan, whither he had retired, and he was hanged on a gibbet. All crimes that draw along with them the ruin of a multitude of families, cannot be too feverely punished. The king again shewed himself solicitous for the interest of his finances, in the affair of the receivers and treasurers-general of Burgundy: fome draughts had been made on them for the charges of garrisons and works of fortifications, which they had not paid, either through negligence, or with a bad defign. I advised his majesty to fend thither a commissary on whose probity he could depend; he did fo, and this man began by suspending those men from their employments, and himself performed the duties of treasurer. The money that was expended upon this occasion was raised out of the falaries of these receivers and treasurers, " That I, said Henry, may not pay " the penalty for the fault they have committed against my fervice " and their duty."

here. Henry one time hunting on the fide of Großois, dropt his company, as he frequently did, and came by himfelf to Creteil, which is a league on the other fide of the bridge of Charenton, and that at noon-day, and as hungry as a hunter. Going into an inn, he inquired of the landlady if the had any thing for him to ear, to which the anfwered no, and that he was come too late, taking him only for a private gentleman. Henry then afked her, for whom is this roaft-meat I fee at the fire? For fome gentlemen, replies the, that are above, and whom I take to be folicitors. The king fent, in a civil manner, to afk them to let him have a piece of their roaft-mear, or to give him leave to fit at one end of their table upon paying for it, both which they refufed him. Upon this, Henry fent privately for Vitry, and eight or ten more of his attendants, whom he ordered to feize these folicitors, and carry them away to Gresbois to have them well whipped, to teach them more complaisance to gentlemen another time. "This the said seum 'Vitry saw punchually and speedily per-"formed, says the author, notwithstand-

To prevent the exportation of gold and filver coin I found a method less tedious and severe than punishments and confiscations, which was only to raise their value *, there being no reason why they should

* The crown called écu d'or au soleil, which was valued at fixty fols tournois, was raifed to fixty-five; that called écu piftolet of fifty-eight fols, to fixty-two, and fo of the other gold species: the filver franc of twenty fols was raifed one fol and four deniers, and the rest in proportion. It was in the month of September that this double ordonnance paffed, about the raifing the value of money, and the re-establishing of reckoning by livres; for the reckoning by crowns had only taken place about twentyfive years before, that is, fince the ordonnance of 1577, which had abrogated the reckoning by livres. Matthieu very highly approves of both these regulations of the duke of Sully's, tom. II. liv. iii. p. 540. Le Blanc, on the contrary, fays, p. 351. 372, et seq. that, whatever cogent reasons they might have had for abrogating this famous ordonnance of 1577, it was very ill done, either with regard to the money itfelf, because the gold and filver species were atterwards raifed as much in feven years alone, as they had been during the fpace of feventy-five years before; or with regard to commerce, because that goods and merchandise were proportionably enhanced in their prices. The opinion of this last writer feems, to me, to be grounded upon itronger reasons. The reckoning by crowns had been in favour of those who had their revenues in filver, those who improved their money in the public funds and otherwife, and those who fold goods upon credit payable at a certain time: the ordonnance of 1577 fecured the effects of a confiderable number of the natives; and befides, if there had been any confusion found in the coin, this neither was, nor could be, the cause of it, but only the miserable condition into which the civil wars had reduced France. The duke of Sully projected these two regulations here spoken of, to prevent these disorders, which were, according to him, the too great plenty of foreign species that, in commerce, occupied the place of our own; fecondly, the enhancement of the price of merchants goods; and laftly, the exportation of the gold and filver coin to our neighbours. It was equally eafy to have made him fenfible, that his complaints, in all these respects, fignified nothing, any more than the remedy which he applied to them. We have already shewn, a little higher, in what fense it is that this quantity of foreign coin, which abounds in our commerce, is an advantage; and if it could be called an evil, the augmentation of the nominal value of coin, to wit, in reckonings, to which he has recourfe, would be more proper to heigthen than leffen it.

As to the raifing of the price of goods, the fame augmentation could not but make way for it still more; and the reason for obviating it, which he draws from the computation by livres, will appear, to every one, very infufficient, and even frivolous. Moreover, it appears to me, that the enhancing of the price of goods follows as a necessary consequence and effect of the multiplication of gold and filver in Europe, fince the discovery of America. In order to prevent it, we must have prohibited all commerce, not only with Spain, whose mines furnish us now with these metals, but also with all our own neighbours. among whom they circulate as well as among us. A flate that flould be conducted by this principle, would, among the other states of Europe, make the same figure, as the republic of Lacedemon did with respect to the rest of Greece. The only thing to be attended to, and which is of very great consequence, is, that all the merchandife and goods, and generally whatever conflitutes a part of commerce, should rife at the same time and in the same proportion in value. If the production of manufactures be enhanced without raising the price of corn, for example, then agri-be carried out of the kingdom, but that they would pass for more in the neighbouring countries than at home. At the same time, I settled, over all the kingdom, the way of reckoning by livres, instead of crowns, as had been till then the practice: by some this may be thought an culture is neglected. If the wages of journeymen be not proportioned to the one and the other, those people can no longer live and pay the taxes. As to the exporting of coin out of the kingdom, which feems to have been the chief view of the duke of Sully, it is true, that the augmentation of its current value in reckoning might, in fome measure, prevent it, in annihilating or diminishing the profit of the dealers in bullion; and, apparently, this was the only reason that determined him. The narrow views of his age, with regard to the finances, and still more as to commerce, did not allow him to fee that he destroyed a flight corruption by one a great deal more confiderable, nor fuffer him to go up to the fource of the evil: he would have perceived that the advantage of commerce, and confequently the greatest quantity of gold and filver, will remain in that nation which shall have made all others depend most upon them for riches, either natural or acquired; and that as long as the ballance of trade shall be in favour of fome one neighbouring nation, this prohibition of exporting gold and filver, is neither reasonable nor practicable. At present, when we begin to see a little more clearly into these matters, there is no one but agrees, that all thefe regulations, and this whole train of reafoning, did not reach the end proposed. Though the exigency of circumstances, which is almost endless, does not permit either the providing against, or the fubjecting every thing to a fingle rule, we may, however, aver, that on the article of money and commerce, there are two general and very fimple maxims which may be looked upon as invariable; and thefe are, to avoid, with the greatest care imaginable, meddling with the coin, and endeavour, continually, to render the French as laborious, industrious, and frugal as possible. The frequent variations in the coin give mortal wounds both to domestic and foreign trade, by the extinction of credit, the flutting up of private purfes, the embarrafiment and disdavantage of exchange, and the ruin of estates: all this is palpable and obvicus. To this we may add, that the king, who appears to be the only one who gains by such proceedings, to put the case impartially, always loss considerably more thereby than he gains; besides, that the infolvency of his subjects is an evil which he always hares with them, and even sees much longer than they do; all his expences increase with the coin, so as not to be diminished even when that does.

The other principle has still less need of proof. It feems, that nature has referved to France the fovereignty of trade, from the advantage of her fituation, and the goodness of her foil, which obliges a great part of her neighbours to have recourse to her for all those things that supply the first and effential necessaries of life: she has no more to do than to share, at least equally with them in the commerce of all those things that serve but for mere conveniency, or which luxury has introduced into Europe. If the confumption of the latter should exceed the produce of the former, we shall complain unjustly of our condition; for to pretend to hinder the exportation of our materials of gold and filver to foreigners, when it is we that are indebted to these foreigners, is endeavouring to make the effect cease, without removing the cause; but to set a Frenchman to commerce that is carried on by fea, to manufactures and arts, to hinder him as much as possible from expending too much on things that come from abroad, and which are but fuperfluities, and, on the other hand, to increase his proper riches, by encouraging the cultivation of his lands; this is what we may truly call promoting the interest of trade. useless refinement, fince all the ways of reckoning must come to the fame thing at last: I am, however, of opinion, experience having thewn me, that the custom of talking always of crowns, for want of a denomination of a money more convenient for petty traffic, had im-fixe, and other writers of that time, in order to find out the hiflory of these regulations of the sinances and commerce; for in reality the reasonings of these writers on this whole matter are but little fatis. Tho' this writer feems not even to understand the flate of the question, and speaks not very favourably of the king and his ministers. " At that time," fays he, fpeaking of all the deliberations which were entered into upon this fubject in 1609, " there was " brought upon the carpet, and propofed " to the council, a new edict for the " coin, which they wanted to diminish " and alter, that is, to raise its value, 44 and by the fame means to ruin the " people. Every one murmured at this " propofal: the king alone finding his " account in it, laughed at it, and at all 66 the world, even at his own ministers, " and their remonstrances, as he did at " the first president of the mint (William " Le Clerc) who being disconcerted in his " fpeech, having been twice interrupted " by his majesty's breaking into a fit of " laughter, which made him ftop short in " the middle thereof; and upon his ma-" jesty's observing it, he says to him, Go " on, Mr. prefident, for I am not laughing " at you, but at my coufin, the count of " Soiffons, who is near me, and tells me, " that he fmells a fhoulder of mutton. 1602. perceptibly raifed all that was bought or fold to more than its real value.

THE interest of commerce was still more concerned in the news the king received from feveral parts of the kingdom, that those who had been employed to feek for mines, had discovered a great number of * gold and filver ones. This report was fpread at court with fo many appearances of probability, that every one reprefenting to himfelf the direction of this new labour as a fource of immense riches. there was not one who did not use his utmost endeavours to procure the grant of it. Monfieur Le Grand obtained the office of superintendant, and Béringhen that of comptroller-general. This gave occasion for La Regnardiere, a buffoon whose jests were equally satirical and agreeable, to fay, " that they could not have made a fitter " choice of a man for the direction of the mines, than one who was " himself a composition of mines +." The improvement and working of filk, of which I shall have more occasion to speak in the following year, commenced in this, and an edict was published for the planting of mulberry trees.

Among all these different edicts, none made so much noise as that against duels ‡. His majesty went so far as to make death the punishment of those who disobeyed; in which, I confess, he acted contrary to my advice. I have too plainly declared my thoughts of this perni-

* Le Septennaire mentions the places where these mines of all forts were discovered: " In the Pyrennees mines of tale " and copper, together with fome of gold " and filver; in the mountains of Foix, " mines of jet and precious stones, and " even carbuncles, tho' but few; in the " lands of Gevaudan, and in the Cevennes, " mines of lead and tin; in those of Carcaffonne, mines of filver; in those of " Auvergne, mines of iron; in the Lyon-" nois near the village Saint-Martin, of " gold and filver; in Normandy, filver " and very good tin; at Annonay in the " Vivarais, mines of lead; in La Brie " and Picardy, mines of marcalite of " gold and filver. Some of these mines, 45 but especially those of gold and filver, are very difficult and troublesome to " work, and at the same time of so little " profit, that M. De Thou had reason for disfluading them from meddling with them ever fince that time." liv. exxix.

† The jest lies in the word mines, which in French signifies grimace and affectation.

† This clift, in which duelling is declared to be high treason or leze maipste, was passed at Blois in the month of Jone, and is a very severe one: this is the edict which first gave the constables and marechals of France a power of prohibiting violent methods, and appointing the reparation of the injuries received. This the parliament refricted, in the registring, to those rencounters alone that concerned the point of honour, and excepted all other crimes as debts, assaults, &c. M. de Sully, in the course of these Memoirs, handles this affair of duelling at greater length.

cious and favage abuse, to fear the accusation of having endeavoured to tolerate it; but I forefaw, that an excess of severity in the means would be the principal obstacle to the execution. When it becomes necessary to declare the will of the sovereign to the subject, it is of the utinost importance to examine carefully, whether the thing to be forbidden is of fuch a nature that the fear of death may prevent difobedience; for otherwife those extremities are, in my opinion, less efficacious than degradation or disgrace, or even than a pretty high fine or forfeiture. If the practice of duelling be feriously attended to, it will be found to be of this nature; for it is commonly persons of quality, and even of the greatest distinction, who are guilty of it; for whom folicitations are fo much the more ardent and fuccefsful, as the punishment with which they are threatened is great and infamous: it is not therefore to be doubted, that many pardons will be granted, the example, and the hope of which, are fufficient to encourage others to infringe the law. It often happens, that those punishments are most regarded, for which a pardon dare not, nor cannot be implored.

Besides those embassies I have already mentioned at the beginning of this year, the king received a folemn deputation from the thirteen Swifs Cantons: forty-two deputies from that nation came to Paris to renew the alliance *, which had been the occasion of marechal Biron's journey to those Cantons. I was appointed, together with Sillery, De Vic, and Caumartin, to treat with them; but, not being able, on account of my other employments, to attend this business constantly, I fatisfied myfelf with getting exact informations from Sillery of all that passed at their meetings. The only difficulty I started, was concerning the three millions that were granted them, besides the forty thousand crowns to which their usual pension was raised: I could have wished that they had deducted certain sums paid on their account. during the campaign in Savoy, and on some other occasions: as for the rest, these gentlemen thought good chear, and deep drinking with them, the most effential parts of their reception. The king presented them with gold chains and medals, and fent back the pope's chamberlain, who came to compliment him in the name of his holinefs. loaded with prefents: he gave his confent to the alliance which the republic of Venice made with the Grisons against Spain.

The great armaments and other warlike preparations which this crown was making for the following year, kept the crown of France in continual attention to their motions, and were the cause that Henry, who held it for an incontestable truth, that it was by the military power alone a state could be rendered flourishing, not only rejected the proposal I made him, to disband part of his troops, particularly to lessen the number of his guards by twelve or fisteen hundred men, but also that he took a resolution to make a new levy of six thousand Swiss; and it was with great difficulty that I prevailed upon him to defer this levy till the month of September. He was more folicitous than ever about the payment of his army, and I was obliged to the constable for having solicited with great earnestness the payment of my company of gendarmes. And at last he determined to take another journey to Calais, which was the most considerable of all his majesty made this year, except that into the provinces.

HENRY took his route through Verneuil * towards the latter end of the month of August, leaving his queen in the same condition she was the preceding year, that is, far advanced in her pregnancy, for she lay in of Madame, her eldest daughter, in November +. He recommended to me with great earnestness to be assiduous about her, and endeavour to make her approve of this journey; as likewise to procure her every kind of diversion that might alleviate her concern during the first days of his absence. He never wrote to me without making inquiry about the flate of her health, and the manner in which the paffed her time: and it may be truly faid, that he never omitted giving her every inflance of respect and tenderness that was able to make her forget the uneafinefs she received from his amours. It was about this time that he legitimated the fon he had by the marchioness de Verneuil #, which was among the number of those things that gave the greatest offence to the queen. Henry was detained a little time at Monceaux by a fever, cocasioned by a cold he got in walking late in the evening to fee his masons work; the remedy he made use of was, to go to the chace the next day. As foon as I had acquainted him at Boulogne, that every thing relating to the queen was in fuch a fituation as he wished, he wrote to me to come to him in this city, with the 1602. prefident Jeannin, whom he expected to have occasion for.

IT was from this place that his majesty was a witness of part of the event and exploits of the campaign between the Spaniards and the Flemings, without having any inclination to difarm, whatever affurance might be given him by the king of Spain, till he had feen what turn affairs would take in the Low Countries; where, however, they still continued to be on the same footing as before. The siege of Oftend was not carried on with fo much vigour by the beliegers, as it was fustained by the besieged. Prince Maurice of Nassau, after continuing some time at Berg, uncertain of what he should next undertake, went on the 19th of September to invest Grave, and entrenched himself, not doubting but he should receive some opposition in this enterprize. Accordingly, the admiral of Arragon, in the absence of the arch-duke Albert, who was detained by fickness at Brussels, endeavoured, by means of a bridge which he threw over the river, to beat up one of the quarters of the befiegers, and to fuccour the place; but he did not fucceed: and he had even the mortification to find, that many of his Spanish companies mutinied, and, after separating from the main body of his army, possessed themselves of Hoestrate and Dele. He took fuch wrong methods to engage them to return, that they came to a resolution to apply to the prince of Orange, who gave them the city of Grave for a retreat, which he had taken, and which these Spaniards restored to him, when the ravages and violences they committed upon the territories of the arch-duke obliged him to treat with them, and to accept of very strange conditions from them *.

THE council of Spain, through a defire of carrying on the war, refolved to make new and more vigorous efforts. A fquadron of twelve large gallies and pinnaces, fitted out at Sicily with great care, manned with a fufficient number of foldiers, and plentifully supplied with all necessary provisions, failed for this purpose out of the Spanish ports, to cruife in the channel: the command of this squadron was given to Frederic Spinola, coufin to the marquis of that name, who conducted the fiege of Oftend; he flattered himfelf that he should become master of the fea, and complete the ruin of the Flemings. But this proved a vain hope; of twelve veffels, two of them perifhed ere he had quitted the coasts of Spain; the ten others, meeting with a Dutch squadron, were almost all either taken or sunk; the last that escaped, and in which Spinola himself was, happened to run a-ground within view of Calais, but so disabled by the cannon, and in such a shattered condition, that the slaves who rowed it having revolted and fled, the general sound himself obliged to land alone, and with great labour, at Calais, from whence he went to Brussels, to complain to the archduke of the sea and the winds.

SPAIN made herfelf amends for these misfortunes by the acquisition of the marquisate of Final, which was taken by the count of Fuentes." There was not the least shadow of a pretence for this usurpation; this little state, which is on the coast of Genoa, being incontestably a fief of the empire; nevertheles, when the Emperor, to preserve, in appearance at least, the right of the empire, offered to send commissioners to discuss this affair upon the spot, his offer was rejected with contempt by the king of Spain*. He used the same violence with regard to Piombine, a fiel likewise of the empire, which afforded him a convenient port; and had likewise the same views upon Embden, when he undertook to support against the inhabitants + the lord of this city, although he was avowedly a protestant; but in this he did not succeed: the citizens of Embden maintained their liberty against both the one and the other, and joined themselves to the states.

The duke of Savoy fucceded no better in the attempt he ordered d'Albigny ‡ to make upon the city of Genoa. This expedition ended unfortunately for the affailants, although they had opened themfelves a paffage into the city, by applying foldiers to the walls, and above two hundred of them had already entered, after cutting the centinel's throat whom they had forced to tell them the watch-word, which ferved them to get clear of the patrole till they had found their way through the first guard; and now they thought themfelves secure of the city: but the citizens, deriving new strength and courage from the extremity they beheld themfelves in, charged them with so-much sury, that they drove them back, and sorced them to abandon their city. Some of these Savoyards threw themselves off the walls, to cscape the

Let us likewife hear this writer concerning the death of the duke de Mercœur: "Having " an inclination, fays he, to return to "France, in order to prepare for fome " greater expedition against the Turks, he " went from Vienna to Prague, where he " took his leave of the Emperor: but " while he was at Noremberg he was " feized with a pestilential spotted sever. The whole of what this author adds concerning the acls, fayings, and fentiments, of the duke of Mercceur. till the moment of his death, is quite affecting, and ferves fufficiently to form a high enlogium of his character: " His fu-" neral oration was pronounced in the " church of Notre Dame at Paris, by mon-" fieur François de Selles, coadjutor and " bishop elect of Geneve. The Turks " imagined that the affairs of the Chri-" flians did not profper but where-ever this " prince was." An action of George Baste, the imperial general, has been very much and very deservedly applauded. The rebels in Battori's party having seized Bistrith, Baste retook this place by a capitulation, which during his absence was violated by some German foldiers. As soon as he was apprised of it at his return, he hanged up all those foldiers, and out of his own money satisfied the inhabitants for the damage they had received. The rebels were so greatly affected with the generosity of this action, that they all submitted to the Emperor, and demanded no other security than the general's word.

HE city of Metz had been, for some time, shaken with those intestine divisions, which broke out in the beginning of this year. The duke of Epernon, who was governor of it, and of the whole country of Messin, had placed Sobole * and his brother as his lieutenants there; who made fuch an ill use of their authority, that they were foon hated by the whole body of the citizens. This hatred was ftrengthened by the difference of their religions; and there was fuch a general outcry amongst the citizens and country people, against the lieutenants, that d'Epernon was obliged to go himself to Metz, to hear the complaints of both parties, and to endeayour to conciliate them to each other. Sobole complained, that the city refused to furnish the troops with victual, and the city, in their turn, threw the whole blame upon Sobole. Some disputes had also risen concerning a certain Provençal prisoner at Vitry; which, through rancour and a defire of revenge, occasioned several others on matters less confiderable; and these heats had already proceeded so far as to make a revolt be apprehended.

The

The duke of Epernon was foon convinced that the two Soboles * had not juftice on their fide, at leaft, with regard to the first complaint, which was indeed the chief, and by them made the occasion of a quarrel, with no other view, than to afford them a pretence for opening the magazines of the citadel, which was never permitted but in case of a war or a siege, and this to make themselves masters of them. D'Epernon would have been glad to have pacified matters, without being obliged to deprive his two creatures of their posts; for he well knew, that this was an exertion of authority, which he would have fome difficulty to support himself in, the two brothers being at the head of a party, strong enough to oppose the governor as well as the citizens.

THINGS were in this state, when the king received advice of what was doing at Metz: he fent me notice that he would come to the arfenal to confer with me, and defired that I would have a supper prepared for him, and fix other perfons whom he should bring with him. He made me follow him alone into the great store-houses of cannons and arms, and, beginning, as usual, to discourse about the fituation of affairs within the kingdom, with respect to the malecontents, he told me the news he had just received from Metz. Henry, without any hefitation, refolved upon taking a journey thither, upon his reflecting that if Metz, a city fo very lately difmembered from the empire, should unfortunately happen, in the present conjuncture, to separate itself from France, it would be a difficult matter to recover it. Several other political motives made this journey absolutely necessary, befides that of taking from the duke of Epernon a citadel, which he might make use of to very bad purposes, and a confiderable extent of country, wherein, under the reign of Henry the third, he had behaved more like a fovereign prince than a governor; and, upon a fupposition that he should one day carry his great defigns into execution, there would be a necessity for having, in this country, fo important by its fituation, a governor from whom he could promife himself more affistance, than he could expect from d'Epernon. It was probable at least that some favourable opportunity would offer to join Lorrain to France, and in that case it imported his majesty highly to go himself in person, and procure a persect knowledge of this state, and give the government of that province, which was upon its confines, to a man on whom he could depend. This journey likewife would be of use to him, in allowing him an opportunity of becoming acquainted with some of the princes of Germany, and of sounding their inclinations with respect to the house of Austria, to know if he might expect any affishance from them in an advantageous conjuncture, and even to attach them to himself, by reconciling them to one another, for he was not ignorant that many differences subsided amongs them.

It was agreed between us, that his majefly should set out without loss of time, to the end that, by appearing at Metz with his whole court (for it was resolved that the queen should accompany him) at a time when the two factions, not having yet proceeded so far in their insolence as to embrace a party contrary to the king, both the one and the other should think of nothing but of justifying their conduct, and submitting to his determination. The king would not even stay till the coats of his guards, for about this time they were to be all new cloathed, were ready; but leaving me at Paris to correspond with him, ordered only Villeroi among his secretaries of state to attend him, and lest Paris the latter end of February, notwithstanding the rigour of the season, which made the roads very bad for the ladies to travel, and took his rout by La-Ferté-sur-Jouarre, Dorman-sur-Marne, Eperanai, Châlons-sur-Marne, and Clermont: the court stopped at Verdun, and four or five days after arrived at Metz by Freine-en-Verdunois.

Henry's arrival put an end to all disputes, and nothing was talked of but submission and obedience: not but Sobole, who was sensible this affair would be terminated by his expulsion, had ambition and refolution enough to maintain himself in the citadel in spite of his majesty, and disclosed his thoughts to his particular friends; but the most prudent amongst them represented to him, that, if he engaged in such a design, he would be irretrievably ruined; so that, submissing to the arret for his banishment, he gave up the citadel without making any conditions, and quitted Metz and the whole country of Messin. The king appointed Montigny * to be his lieutenant in this province, in the room of Sobole, and d'Arquien his brother to act as lieutenant for the governor in the city and castle of Metz. Montigny, for this new post, quitted his government of Paris, the salary of which, however, he received this year. It was thought that d'Epernon was far from being satisfied with all these changes, as may be easily imagined, the two lieutenants being under no obligation to him for their preferment; but he could have nothing to say, he himself, through necessity, being the first to require the banishment of the two Soboles, so that every thing seemed to be done with his consent.

I HAVE taken this whole detail from the letters his majesty honoured me with during his flay at Metz, in which he informed me fuccinctly of all these incidents, and dwelt still longer upon the manner in which he was received at Metz, and upon the city itself, which he said was three times larger than Orleans, and finely fituated, but that the caftle was not worth any thing; he likewise told me, that he wished for my presence in that country, that he might send me to visit the frontier. and that, before fix days, he should settle every thing in such good order, as to be able to leave Metz. In effect, the king accomplished it in much less time, and was only detained there by an indisposition, which obliged him to take fome medicines, after which he found himfelf quite well, although it was followed by a fit of the ague, which he thought had been occasioned by a cold. The duchess of Bar, fifter to his majefty, came to Metz on the fixteenth of March, and the duke de Deux-Ponts, with his wife and children, arrived three days afterwards. The remainder of the time his majesty staid in this province was employed in concluding a marriage between mademoifelle de Rohan, and the young duke de * Deux-Ponts; in composing a difference between the cardinal of Lorraine, and the prince of Brandenbourg +, concerning the bishopric of Strasbourg, which was accomplified by dividing the revenue of this bishopric equally between them, without having any regard to their titles and pretenfions; in refloring tranquillity to that city, and in being ferviceable to all the princes who required his interpolition in any of their affairs. Henry became so revered in this country, that several sovereigns of 1603. Germany took a resolution to come thither and pay their respects to him, to offer him their service, and demand his protection; which, however, they could only do afterwards, and by ambaffadors, the neceffary preparations for their equipages taking up more time than his majesty had determined to stay at Metz. There were only the cardinal of Lorrain, the duke de Deux-Ponts, the marquis of Brandebourg and Pomerania, the landgrave of Hesse, and three or four others whose dominions lay nearest the Rhine, that came thither in person.

THE Jesuits, who ever fince their banishment had been using their utmost endeavours to procure their re-establishment in France, appeared no less solicitous to make their court to the king; for this purpose, they made use of the good offices of the fathers of their order at Verdun *, supported by La-Varenne, who declared himself their protector, that they might one day become his, and repay his zeal by the advancement of his children, for whom he already thirsted after the most eminent dignities in the church. D'Osfat, though not in France, laboured with equal ardour and fuccess in their favour. The ambitious defire of being arbitrator of the affairs of Europe had often made this man undertake to treat of matters quite foreign to his commission: the obstacles he raised at Rome to the marriage of Madame, the king's fifter, is one proof of it, and his folicitations for the Jesuits another; for the re-establishment of this society was regarded by him, Villeroi, Jeannini, and other creatures of the Roman court in France, to be the most effential part of that fystem of politics, which they endeavoured to have preferred there, to that purfued by the council.

against cardinal d'Ossat, the author quotes fourteen letters, taken out of the collection printed in 1627, eight of them to the king, and fix to M. de Villeroi; and he principally fixes on two of the fix last mentioned, of which he has even given an abffract. There are fome errors in these quotations, which may be placed to the printer's account; but truth compels us to acknowledge, that there are others of more moment than mere faults of the impreffion, which may be laid to the charge of the presended author of the memorial from Rome; and that though the abstract of these letters be conformable to the words of the text, yet it may be faid to be not more exact on that account, fince one cannot help taking notice of the visible attempt to suppress those explanations and expedients which foften, and even fometimes totally destroy the bad constructions which it has been endeavoured to put on them. I apprehend it will be necessary here to make fome thort observations on each of those letters, as well to fland in the place of a disquisition, more satirical than historical, which I thought it incumbent on me to suppress, as to do justice where it is due, and to make known the real fentiments of a man, esteemed amongst us as a great negotiator, and a very able politician.

The first of the eight letters to the king (though the author reckons only seven of them) is dated the 19th of February, 1600. It only contains an account given by the cardinal d'Ossat to his majesty, of some complaints made by the pope, by reason of the king's having created M. de la Tremouille, who was a protestant, a duke and a peer of France, and of his intending to make him admiral afterwards, as he had been informed. D'Ossat does not, in this letter, say any thing as being his own sentiment, and even takes some pains to justify Henry IV. In the second letter of the 2th of April, it is again the pope who in-fifts on the publication of the council of Trent, and the re-admission of the Jesuits into France, and who, at the fame time, complains of some abuses in the Gallican church; to which the cardinal makes no other answer, but that his majesty fincerely labours to give his holiness all possible satisfaction. The third of the 22d of May, the fourth of the 17th of June, and the fifth of the 30th of the same month, turn on the affair of the dispensation for the duke and duchess of Bar: he therein acquaints the king with the difficulties that affair meets with at Rome; he adds his own opinion, which, in truth, is not in favour of his majesty's intentions, but nevertheless does not prevent his being ready to fecond them, by all the reasons he can think of, and his shewing himself, above all things, exceeding fenfible of the fhame that would redound to the house of France, if, as the duke of Bar fometimes gave out, it should be determined by the court of Lorraine to fend the princess back to France. The fixth letter of the 26th of November 1601, contains nothing for which this prelate can be blamed, but his discovering, perhaps with too much complaifance, to Henry IV. the defign his holiness had formed, on the death of queen Elizabeth. to transfer the crown of England to the house of Parma. In the seventh of the 22d of December in the fame year, d'Offat also, poffibly with too much zeal, fuftains certain rights of the pope, in the matter of elections. His fentiments, which must appear to be fingular in France, oblige me to let forth some of the terms he employs. "If the popes, fays he, have encroached " on the liberties of the church, the kings, " fire, (I fay this only to yourfelf, and " even in doing fo, fhew the great opinion "I have of your generofity and goodness) " have made no less attempts on their

"kingdoms, and even their churches; and voured, both in his difcourfe and in his writings, to give a bad impression of the king and his ministers. When removed from the center of business, all the informations he could obtain must be through the canal of wretches, to whom a man of sense and judgment ought to

"ginal state, as is attempted to be done on your side in the pope's case, in regard to the elections, the kings would be greater

" fufferers by it than the popes." The first of the fix letters, directed to M. de Villeroi, is dated the 23d of July 1621. Our author's exceptions to this letter are, because d'Offat therein maintains, with fome warmth, that the protestants ought not to be suffered in the Italian cities, ceded to the king by the treaty of Savoy. The fecond of the 23d of September, is m fdated. If the author meant to fpeak of that of the 3d of September, he is fo much the more in the wrong, because the Spaniards are handled very roughly in that letter: but he probably speaks of that of the 17th of that month, for there the pretended reformed religion, and the cities of Savoy, are again brought in question. The third of the 16th of December 1602, on the affairs of the duchess of Bar, contains this circumstance in favour of d'Offat, that he therein declares the fuspicion he had conceived, that the duke of Lorraine might have some evil intentions against her. The fame thing may be faid of the fourth of the 30th of December, in which his eminence feems perfuaded, that Spain appears to enter fo strongly with the pope, into the affair of the fuccession to the crown of England, for no other reason than to cover her own defigns with the cloak of religion. As to the fifth of the 7th, or rather the 27th of January 1602, which is one of the two the author applies himfelf to cenfure particularly, because it points out, though but in general terms, the abuses in the government of France; he is doubly to blame for concealing that D'Offat adds, at the fame time, that the wisdom of Henry IV. had already redreffed them in part; fince those words contain the real meaning, and an explanation of the cardinal's fentiments, and, at the fame time, a commendation which might be made to rebound from thence on M. de Rosny: The fixth of the 10th of February, is produced as being the most vehement; and, in truth, in this letter he expresses himself with more freedom, on the evils with which the kingdom is internally afflicted, on the injustice of the war carried on against Spain in Flanders, and on the advantage of uniting the two kingdoms of France and Spain in interest and politics, by the marriage of the dauphin and infanta; yet, when all thefe circumstances are drawn together, and placed in the most unfavourable point of light, as the author has done, he should, in justice, have remarked that d'Offat, in this letter, candidly states every fide of the question; that he fays, he is convinced the Spaniards discover a defire for an alliance with us, only to gain time to do their own bufinefs, and to amufe the king with a treaty, to furprise him the better afterwards; that he inveighs, perhaps with equal force, against the rapacioulnels, ambition, arrogance, and perfidy of the council of Madrid. Certainly, it is not the proper time to flew this prelate's opinion, whilst he is thus balancing the reasons on each fide; but when he recapitulates what he has been faying in this letter, which is very long, he at last speaks in his own name: and this is the manner in which he delivers his fentiments. " Upon " the whole, I apprehend that his holi-" ness ought to be undeceived, in the "" wrong notions he has formed of us; that " we ought, fincerely and faithfully, to " observe the peace made and sworn with " the king of Spain and the archdukes on " our fide, provided they also keep it on " theirs, as they have by the pope offered " to do; that this peace should still be " ftrengthened by all forts of honourable " and advantageous obligations; yet that " we fhould not place more confidence in 66 it than reason warrants, nor abate our " vigilance and precaution; but that we 66 should, in all other respects, leave the 1603. be cautious of giving credit. It is not difficult to perceive that this passage tends partly to justify myself against the censures of d'Osfat, this cardinal having about that time wrote a letter to Villeroi, in which he did not fcruple to attribute marechal Biron's rebellion, and the difcontent of the other French lords, to the very little fatisfaction they received from Henry, and the oppression the people groaned under through the tyranny of his counsellors: and that he might not do things by halves, this able man, who valued himself upon his nice discernment in affairs of state, prefumed, by desiring Villeroi to shew his letter to the king, to advise his majesty to remit his confidence and his authority into other hands. Possibly if this proceeding of d'Ossat's was thoroughly examined, it would be found to have more artifice than mistake in it; for it is not likely that a man, who received such exact informations from Villeroi of everything that happened, could be ignorant that what he represented as a general conspiracy of all the states in the kingdom, was, in reality, only a faction composed of a few persons, whose heads were turned by ambition, and the licentioulness of the late times; and that all the rest of the French nobility placed their glory and their happiness in their firm attachment to their prince; that the clergy, on their fide, praifed him no lefs, and, in effect, had no less reason to praise him, having but lately received a

> " king of Spain and the archdukes on the " footing they now fland with other na-"tions, not from any evil defign or inten-"tion against them, but for our own pre-" fervation; that we should not furnish an " opportunity to those who have shewn " an inclination to turn all their forces " against France; and that whilst the rest " are at war with one another, we should " employ the peace and quiet God has " bleffed us with, in doing what is right, improving what is good in the kingdom, " and extirpating what is bad."

> This disquisition confirms me in the opinion I have given above, of the fentiments of the cardinal d'Offat: for what he fays of the Spaniards, besides the letters already quoted, fee p. 51, 504, 540, 692, 705, &c. on the publication of the council of Trent, 217, 256, 354, 396, 400, 433, 466, 613, 615, and many other places; on the Jesuits, 69, 302, 303, 287, 309, 351, & fig. 613, & feq.

Had the cardinal d'Offat even meant what his adversary pretends he did, it could not be at all confiftent with the character of fo prudent and cautious a negotiator, as he is allowed to have been, to make an open discovery of fuch blameable sentiments: his prudence appears from his letters amongst other occasions, where, unqueftionably against his own advice, he defends the edict of Nantz before the pope, p. 391, 393, 400, where he approves of the imprisonment of marechal de Biron, 705, and where he takes the part of queen Elizabeth, 243.

In fhort, nothing can be a stronger proof that this cardinal had no perfonal diflike to M. de Rofny, as it has been infinuated, than his having never once mentioned his name with ill nature. He is spoken of, p. 440, 377, 723: this last is the only place where he complains of him, though with all possible moderation, on account of his having suspended the payment of his al-

very confiderable gratification from him; and laftly, that the people, befides the suppression of the penny in the shilling, had, by his majesty, been farther relieved by an abatement of two millions in the land-tax.

I was not unacquainted with any of d'Offat's malicious proceedings, nor of his personal complaints against me, for not paying his pension exactly. Villeroi undertook to recommend the speedy payment of it to me, and acquitted himself of this commission, by exalting, as usual, the great abilities and services of this cardinal. Some days afterwards, I was accosted by a banker, who made me a proposal to discharge certain pensions, given by his majesty to persons at Rome, among others d'Offat's, which he did with the same unpolite freedom that the cabal of my enemies affected to use me with. There are fome offices in themselves of such dignity, as to draw respect and consideration upon the persons that possesses them. I was not forry that the banker was fenfible of this truth, and I fent him away coldly enough. D'Offat found himfelf obliged to write to me four months afterwards, and I received his letter at the fame time that one was brought me from my brother, who was ambassador at that court. D'Offat expressed himself in so insolent a manner in this letter, that it certainly deferved no better an answer than I had given the banker. However, being of opinion that I ought not to regard it, I was going to make out a draught for his payment, when I received an incontestible proof of the injurious language he publicly used against me: that inftant, I confess, I withdrew the warrant, which was a very exact one, and substituted another in its room of a more doubtful payment, and from that time refolved to expediate no more, but by the king's express command. I wrote to Villeroi at Metz, and acquainted him with this refolution, and, in the postfcript of my letter, gave him a detail of the speeches and letters of d'Ossat, in which I was concerned, and, in the heighth of my just indignation, gave this cardinal the epithets of ingrateful and imprudent; which, if what I had heard of him was true, he deserved; if false, I gave Villeroi to understand, that I would pay a proper regard to his interpolition in favour of d'Offat. He was still more affected by my threat to acquaint the king with the infolence of his agent, and conjured me to be pacified: I confented, and all the revenge I took upon d'Offat, was to render his intrigues at Rome ineffectual: those in favour of the Jesuits were continued only during this year, for the fociety returned to France in the following year.

I shall refume this article in a proper place, and shall have occafion once more to introduce d'Osfat, on account of a memorial which was addressed to me from Rome against him. At present, what remains to be said of him regards the coadjutorship of Baïeux, and the abbey of Coulon, if the affair was worth a long detail; but as it is not, I shall content myself with only informing the reader, that d'Ossat procured himself to be made coadjutor of Baïeux, and treated with the Maintenons for his abbey of Coulon, by an agreement not very advantageous for them. His majesty gave me this abbey, after performing the promise he made to the Maintenons, that they should lose nothing by it, since they obtained an equivalent upon the bishopric of Evreux. Villeroi earnessly solicited his majesty for d'Ossat, and endeavoured to engage my interest for his friend; Maintenon, on the contrary, was highly distatissed that this savour was granted him.

The pope's nuncio made me another complaint in the king's abfence, upon the journey his majefly had undertaken. That his holiness interested himself in it, was occasioned by the Spaniards having joined to the notion they formed to themselves of the occasion of this voyage, that which was conceived of his majesty's armaments and treasures, which common same had greatly increased, and insected even the holy father with their apprehensions. Henry, whom I informed of the nuncio's fears, ordered me to reassure him, without troubling myself to draw either Spain or Savoy out of their opinion.

His majesty and I treated by letters of many different affairs, and amongst others that of Flanders. It was computed that, the last of February this year, the Spaniards had loft eighteen thousand men, and fired above two hundred and fifty thousand volleys of cannon before Oftend; nevertheless the fiege was but very little advanced, and, in the month of April, the befiegers attempting to make a general affault, they were repulfed with great lofs. From this, the archduke was convinced that, notwithstanding all his efforts, it would be time only, and a total want of men and ammunition of every kind, that would deliver the place into his power. Naffau, on his fide, after the reduction of Grave, laid fiege to Rhinberg, and from thence went to invest Boisleduc, not confidering that this enterprise exceeded his strength, it being impossible, as I have already observed, to take Boisseduc with so finall a number of troops. Accordingly he was on the point of lofing both his army and his reputation there; but, in revenge, he had the fatisfaction fatisfaction to drive the Spaniards out of the castle of Vactendonck, where they were, in a manner, already masters. The garrison of this place, too weak to refift them, and no longer thinking of any thing but retreating, had abandoned the city and the castle to their discretion, when they were joined by fome Dutch troops, who paffed by that place in their march to the army of prince Maurice, and altogether attacked the Spaniards, and dislodged them from the castle.

IT may be easily imagined, that the United Provinces could not carry on this war without being at a great expence both of men and money, to which it was absolutely necessary that France should continue to contribute. The fiege of Oftend alone had coft them one hundred thousand vollies of cannon, and seven thousand men. His majefty, for the interest of both the powers, kept Buzenval in those Paul Choart provinces, who was then upon the point of returning to France; and de Buzenval. the states agent to the king was a man named Aërsens *; this agent represented to me, that his countrymen would be soon in no condition to keep the field, unless his majesty would permit them to recruit the French companies that were in their fervice with Frenchmen. The king fent me an answer from Chalons-sur-Marne to this request, which I had communicated to him, and told me that he confented to it, but, to avoid an open rupture with Spain, upon these conditions, that it should be Aërsens himself that should raise the recruits, and not the officers, who would do it too publicly, having already acted in fuch a manner, as to draw upon him some reproaches from the king of Spain: that the recruits should be raised with the utmost expedition and the utmost secresy; and that the soldiers who listed, the number of which he defired to know, should file off, without any noise, to the place where they were to embark, marching fix in a company at most, with no other arms than their fwords, and no more money than was necessary to answer their expences till they got there; that they should take shipping rather at Dieppe than Calais, this last city being too much crouded with foreigners; and that notice should be sent to Chastes, * Francis Aërsens, resident, and afterwards ambaffador from the states of Holland at the court of France. The memoirs of that time represent him as a man of a fubtil, artful, and even dangerous turn of mind. Cardinal de Richelieu speaks of him, Oxenstiern, chancellor of Sweden, and Guifcardi, chancellor of Montferrat, as the three only politicians he had ever known in Europe. "It was the received opinion of that time, fays Amelot de la Houssaye, that " Henry IV. had an amour with Aërfens' " wife, and that the husband was content who was governor of it, and vice-admiral de Vic, whose concurrence was necessary to the design, and for whom he sent me a letter without a seal. Some alterations, however, were made in these orders; Aërsens could not levy the men alone; and it being my opinion, that I ought not to meddle in it, the officers raised the recruits, but did it with all possible secresy. His majesty thought it would not be amis to send the garrison he had forced to leave Metz to Flanders, and, for fear that they should enlist with the arch-duke, cast his eyes upon my cousin Bethune to conduct them. As for the pension for which Aërsens strongly importuned me, the king deferred taking a resolution about it till his return.

History of Henry duke of Bouillon, book v.

During the stay his majesty made at Metz, the duke of Bouillon brought his affair likewise upon the carpet: he had retired to Germany to the elector Palatine, to whom he was allied by the electress: he prevailed upon this elector to undertake his justification to Henry, or to deceive him again by a letter, which his majesty sent me immediately to have my opinion of it. The purport of this letter, in which the elector Palatine very unfeafonably affected to treat with the king of France as with an equal, was to represent to him the great affliction it gave the duke of Bouillon to have his fidelity suspected by the king, and to assure him, that he himself was convinced of his innocence, by proofs that he thought unanswerable. The king had fent for Bouillon to come to him and clear up his conduct, and afterward gave him notice by La Tremouille that he should at least stop at Sedan, but Bouillon had done neither the one nor the other; the Palatine therefore, to excuse the duke, alledged, that with regard to the first complaint, the quality of his accusers made it imprudent for the duke to go and abandon himself to them; and to the second he said, that the gentleman who brought his majesty's letter had found Bouillon at Geneva, from whence he had a fincere intention to go and expect his majeffy at Sedan; but that thinking it necessary to take his route through Germany, that he might avoid the countries in dependence upon Spain and Lorrain, and also to pay his respects to the elector and electress, his kinswoman, whom he had not yet seen, it was owing to this tedious journey that he had miffed the opportunity of receiving his majesty at Sedan. The letter concluded with repeated affurances of the duke's attachment to his majesty, for the sincerity of which, the elector brought the connexion there was between them as a proof.

HENRY answered the elector's letter with more politeness than he had reason to expect, and promised, as he had always, to restore the duke of Bouillon to his friendship and esteem, but upon conditions which Bouillon knew himself to be too guilty to accept. In effect, at the very time that he was making these new protestations, his majesty received, while at Metz, advice from Heidelberg, which he communicated to me, that a man, named Du-Plessis-Bellay, brother to the governor of the young Chatillon, had been fent by the duke of Tremouille to the duke of Bouillon with dispatches, in which his majesty was nearly concerned, that this courier, who was to fet out from Longjumeau, had orders to pass through Sedan without making himself known, not even to Du-Maurier; and at his return, he was again to pass through Sedan, and afterwards Paris, with the answer to Tremouille's dispatches, whom he was to meet at Comblat. His majesty would not have entered into so circumstantial an account of this affair, but that he wished (which however was not practicable) that I, in concert with Rapin, could arrest this courier, not before his arrival at Paris, but in the road from Paris to Thouars, after he thould have received letters in that city, which would fully discover the nature of his commission.

His majesty had certainly no occasion for farther proofs of the duke of Bouillon's guilt. I may venture to affirm, without any danger of judging too rashly, that the submission which appeared in that step he had lately prevailed upon the elector to make in his favour, was only diffembled, with a view to two things; to inspire the king with a fecurity in regard to his person, and to continue to draw from him those sums which for a long time he had regularly received for the support of his fortreffes. This demand he renewed by Saint-Germain, with whom Henry was highly displeased. His majesty recommended it earnestly to me, to have no regard to the instances that were made me from Bouillon, but at the fame time to give him no reason to suspect that I had any knowledge of what he had just related to me. These orders were indeed unnecessary, after the discoveries I had lately made of the new discontents which Bouillon and Tremouille had excited in the provinces amongst the protestants, and from the refult of the conversation I had with Henry at the Arsenal, before his departure for Metz, of which I have only mentioned what related to this journey.

To proceed, after having long confidered the cast of the cabal, which fruck a mortal blow to the heart of Henry, I found means at last to fet him at peace, by shewing him, that however formidable might be its present appearance, it would, after some ineffectual struggles, fall into nothing. Whatever notions may be formed of the levity and inconfiderateness of those whom we are pleased to term the vulgar, I have always found, that though they may fix upon some particular aims, and follow them not only with raffiness but rapture, yet these aims are always to a certain degree general, and directed to fome common interest; but that any private one's ends, such as proceed from the anger or wishes of a particular man, or of a small number, are never long or much regarded. I will venture to fay farther, that of general interests the voice of the people will give the most certain judgment: allowing this principle, I confidered the feditious party as terrible, only on account of the mischievous influence that it might have in the provinces, by mifrepresentations of the king and government; and the dread that might be raifed of oppression and flavery. And as those influences and those terrors would be made every day less by effects of a contrary kind, and had never infected the principal governments, or great cities, the court could never fee itself opposed but by a paltry rabble, and a few petty places, unable to stand a fortnight against a royal army.

The king was at Metz when he heard the first news of the sickness of queen Elizabeth, which was sent to him by the count de Beaumont*, our ambassador at London: his majesty, thereupon, resolved to hasten his departure from that city. At his sister's request, he went from thence to Nancy, where she had caused a magnificent ballad or interlude to be prepared for his entertainment. He remained there for some days in great anxiety about the next advices which he expected to receive concerning the health of Elizabeth. The death + of this

† Elizabeth died the 4th of April, N.S. in the 70th year of her age, and the 44th of her reign. The public report, and the common opinion of the historians at that time, were, that her death was occasioned by a fecret gricf and melancholy which she could not conquer; the occasion of while was attributed to her remorse and self-reproach for being the cause of the earl of Effex's death, for whom, among all her favourities, the had shewn the greatest affection. This is the opinion of Matthieu, tom. II liv. iii. p. 570. Thuanus and some others say nothing of this supposed grief, but, on the contrary, say, that, like Augustus, the died without grief or sear, and only through the mere failure of nature. Her hatred against our religion, and her great queen, which he heard foon after, was an irreparable loss to Europe, and to Henry in particular, who could not hope, in the faceeffor of Elizabeth, to find the fame favourable difposition to all his defigns as he had in this princes, "the irreconcileable enemy of his irreconcile-"able enemies, and a second self: fuch were the terms which Henry made use of in a letter he wrote to me on this event, which was almost wholly filled with the praises of this great queen, and expressions of forow for her loss.

His majesty, who was immediately sensible how greatly this event might influence the political affairs of Europe, determined, as I have already faid, to fend me in quality of ambaffador extraordinary to king James. He informed me of this his intention in the letter above mentioned; and fearing, perhaps, that I should oppose it, as I had formerly done, endeavoured to prevail upon me to accept this commission by the strongest motives, and such as he knew most likely to make an impression on me. I was the only person Henry could think of for this purpose; I repeat his words, and that because I was the only man in France who had any knowledge of the affairs that were to be negotiated in this embaffy. My religion, probably, had already disposed the new king in my favour, and would gain me free access to him. I dare not mention what his majefty further faid, in regard to that reputation of honour and fidelity which he faid I had acquired among foreigners. Henry foon followed his letter: from Nancy he returned through Toul, Vitry, Rheims, Villers-cotterets, and Saint-Germaineen-laye, to Fontainebleau, which, within a few days, completed a tour of two months.

I HAD received a fecond letter foon after the first, in which his majesty ordered me to meet him fifteen or twenty leagues from Paris. A report was current, that immediately upon the death of Elizabeth the Spaniards began to use their utmost efforts to gain the new king; we shall afterwards see that this report was but too well grounded. Henry had a thousand things to say to me on this head, which made him ex-cruelty in putting her first coosin, queen Mary, to death, have tarnished the lustre of her reign: nevertheles, I acquiesce in the clogy bestowed upon her by Thuanus, who concludes his enumeration of her great abilities by saying, she had those of a king, not merely as such, but of a very great king. She spake Latin, Greek, French, Italian, and Spanish; she was also well versed in the mathematics, history, policies, &c. Besides particular histories of her life, see Thuanus, Peresixe, Journal de Hen. IV. La Septennaire, an. 1603. Memoires d'Etat de Villeroi, tom. III. p. 2093, and other French historians.

1603. tremely defirous of an opportunity to converse freely with me about it. I joined him at the house of Monglat, where he had scarce any attendants with him, at which he expressed great satisfaction. He embraced me closely three times, faid a few words publicly to me on the fuccess of his journey, and enquired more particularly of me about his buildings * at Saint-Germain and Paris. Materials were then collecting for building his grand gallery at the Louvre, for the arfenal, and for other works, of which I had the inspection and conduct, and which had been partly the subjects of those letters I had received from him; therein he had also directed me to proceed in the execution of what had been projected in regard to that apartment of the Louvre called la Sale des Antiques.

> AFTER I had, in a concise but satisfactory manner, replied to all these articles, Henry took me by the hand and led me into the garden, at the door of which he ordered some of his guards to be placed. The embaffy to England was the fole subject of our conversation. His majefty had at first imparted to his court his resolution to fend this embaffy, but without naming the person whom he had fixed upon to execute it. The knowledge of this alone had excited fome murmurs among the partifans of the Pope and Spain; and it was faid, that Henry fought allies only among princes who were of a different religion from his own. But when his majesty, notwithstanding, declared publicly his intention to invest me with this employment, their disgust then shewed itself without restraint. This whole cabal, which I had good reason to think was made up of my most inveterate enemies, boldly represented to his majesty, that to fend a huguenot to treat concerning the interest of the kingdom, with a prince of the same religion, would be highly dangerous to the state; and more especially so, were he intrusted with a full power. Finding they could not prevail upon his majesty to revoke my nomination, they contented themselves with getting my commission confined only to condolances upon the death of the late queen, and compliments for the new king; or, at most, to an infpection into the state of affairs in England; but without any power to act, or even to confer, on the principal occasion of my journey.

> HENRY, at the same time that he informed me of these secret practices in his court, of which I was till then ignorant, repeated to me his affurances, that he had not been influenced by them to alter 1603. his defigns, either with respect to the embaffy, his choice of me, or of the particular point which he had at first in view: and he further confirmed this his refolution, by judiciously observing, that an embassy, whose commission should be confined merely to ceremony, would be useless and vain; and that, if there were any hopes of ever seeing the new king of England pursue the maxims of Elizabeth, in regard to the political engagements of that princess, it would doubtless depend chiefly on the manner in which he should be at first prejudiced against the house of Austria, and in favour of the alliance with France and its antient partifans: but he confessed to me, that this point appeared to him, in all respects, so extremely difficult, that, unless it was managed with the utmost dexterity, both in the council of France, and at the English court, it would, perhaps, be better not to think of it at all. He further faid, that it would first be necessary so to impose on the enemies which I had in the court and council, that they might suspect nothing in my commission more than what should be declared to me in their presence, and even with their consent. His majesty, on this occasion, repeated a simile, which he often used of La Riviere's, that the kingdom of France may be compared to an apothecary's shop, in which are contained not only the most salutary remedies, but also the most fubtile poisons, and that the king, like an able apothecary, ought to make the best advantage of both, by mixing them in the most proper manner. In regard to the propositions which I should make to the English ministers, he faid, I ought to be cautions not to expose the sovereign of the principal kingdom in Europe to the shame of having made advances which should be neglected or defpifed, and perhaps to a necessity of revenging them: and as to the more fecret propositions, which, at a proper opportunity, I should make to king James, he faid it would require great judgment and dexterity, to avoid hastening, by any imprudent step, his engagements with Spain, which as yet were, perhaps, uncertain, or at least far from being concluded. His majesty supposed, that all causes of disfatisfaction might, as much as it was possible, be obviated, by giving me, in writing, and in open council, fuch instructions, in regard to my embaffy, as should appear to be only general, and merely complimentary, which I might publicly produce in England as well as in France, but which, however, should not prevent my seconding his majesty's more particular intentions, whenever a favourable opportunity might present; provided, nevertheless, that I did it as of myself, and without giving this prince to understand, that I was authorised herein by the king my master.

WHAT his majesty thus acquainted me with, appeared to me of fuch great confequence, that I defired him to grant me four days to confider of it, before I gave him my answer. I immediately set out post for Paris, to be at liberty to make my reflexions, and Henry departed from thence for Jully. I eafily perfuaded myfelf to comply with the king's defires, but I thought it a necessary precaution to have his majesty's more immediate avowal and authority for all these propositions which he had enjoined me to make to the king of England, as of myfelf, without which I thought it would be rifquing too much. To be favourably received and heard by king James, it would be preper to begin by gaining his confidence, to which my religion gave me the best claim; but I was sensible, that, by this, I should be obliged to break through those bounds of circumspection, which, in France, I had prescribed to myself, out of a deserence to the religion of the prince. I had no reason to doubt but that, whatever words might escape me, which, in this respect, should appear somewhat free, would be as industriously reported by the enemies I should have in that court, as they could have been in France; and I had equal cause for being apprehensive, that something of this kind should be afterwards represented in such a manner, as to appear criminal in the eyes of his majesty, who, as well as other good princes, had his moments of mistrust and ill humour; and sometimes one of these moments is fufficient to ruin a minister, however firmly supported; a reverse of fortune which it was not impossible but I myself might experience.

ALL these considerations confirmed me in a resolution, not to depart without a writing signed by his majesty, and known only to us two, whereby, whatever my conduct might be at the court of London, and whatever expressions I might use to the king of England, I might be able, if necessary, to justify myself, and shew that I had done nothing but to promote the success of our affairs, and that by his majesty's express orders. Thus I declared myself to Henry, when, at the end of four days, he came to the arsenal to receive my answer; though indeed I made this declaration no otherwise than by saying, that I was full of sears lest any part of my conduct, on this occasion, should draw upon me the missortune of his displeasure.

WE were at this instant alone. Henry, after having taken a short turn among the workmen in the grand walk, and commended what they were doing, called me to him, and we went, as was his custom, to the end of this walk, which terminates in a kind of balcony, from whence there is a view of Paris. My propofal gave him a moment's thought, after which he confessed I was in the right, and in a few days he brought me himfelf the writing I required, and, having read it to me, gave it into my hands. It was expressed in such terms, as rendered it highly probable that Henry would never oblige me to make it public. I was permitted to appear, to the king of England and his ministers, so zealous for the reformed religion, as to give them asfurances that I preferred it both to my country and king, to whom, on this account, I was not more attached than to the king of England. The propositions which I was to make this prince were also enumerated, which I shall here omit, as being already related in the account of my conference with queen Elizabeth, and of Henry's grand defign: I was also directed to defire the king of England, in case he should not approve of what I had to propose to him, not to let it be known in France, because I was not authorised to make any such propositions; and further (fuppofing king James approved them) I should feign to defer communicating to the king my master what might be agreed between us, till I should see whether it would be as favourably received by the northern crowns, and the states-general of the United-Provinces, as by his Britannic majefty.

Such was my fecret credential letter, which I then confidered as a great acquifition, and no doubt the king, on his fide, thought it as great a compliance; yet it is certain, we had neither of us hereby done what was fufficient. It was necessary to be prepared for the king of England's absolute and entire compliance with all his majefty's intentions, and to be able to make the best of an opportunity, which perhaps might never offer again. In a word, to conclude a treaty, I ought to have carried with me a blank figned by the king; but our fear of the faction we had to combat in council did scarce permit us even to think of this.

In regard to the general inftructions which I have mentioned, the king deferred having them drawn up till he came to Fontainebleau, for which place he set out, attended by his whole court; and in three days his council were to follow: but they were countermanded on account of a violent disorder, which seized Henry immediately after his arrival at Fontainebleau, which was about the twentieth of May *: this was fo strong a retention of urine, that his physicians at first despaired of his life. The king himfelf was ftrongly perfuaded that his last hour approached, and being defirous to divide the few moments which he had yet to live, between the care of his foul, and that of his kingdom, he addreffed himfelf with great fervour to God, and then dictated the following letter, which was immediately dispatched to me at Paris, where I was making the necessary preparations for my voyage, and little expected fo melancholy a meffage. " My friend, I find myfelf " fo ill, that it feems highly probable God will foon dispose of me; " and it being my duty, next to the care of my foul, to make the " necessary dispositions to secure the succession to my children, that "their reign may be prosperous, and may promote the happiness of " my wife, my kingdom, my good and faithful fervants, and my dear " people, whom I love equally with my own children, I defire to " confer with you on all these matters: come to me therefore with " all diligence, and fay nothing of it to any one; make an appearance " only of going to the conventicle at Ablon; and having privately " ordered post-horses to be there in readiness, proceed immediately " to this place."

The perusal of this most sensibly affected me. I set out with the greatest precipitation. When I entered the king's chamber, I sound him in his bed; the queen was seated by him, and held one of his hands between hers; he held out the other to me, and said, "My good set friend, come and embrace me, I am extremely glad you are come; is it not strange that, two hours after I wrote to you, my excessive pains should begin to abate? I hope, by degrees, they will entirely leave me, for I have made water three times, the last most profusely, and with but little pain." Then turning to the queen, "This, said he, of all my servants, is he who best understands, and is most careful of, the interior affairs of my kingdom, and, had I been taken from you, would have been best able to serve both you and my

* The king, fays the marcehal de Baffompierre, was feized with a retention of u ne on the eve of Pentecoft, which gave him great pain, but he was foon freed from it. The phyficians being affembled, (thefe are the words which we find in the Journal de L'Etoile) the refult of their confultations were in these terms: Abslinear à quavis muliere, etiam regina; sin minus, periculum est ne ante tres mense elapsos vitam com morte commutet. Henry the IV th did not strictly observe what was here enjoined him, nor did any bad consequence arise therefrom.

"children: I know, indeed, that his temper is fomewhat auftere, that he is often rather too plain for fuch a fpirit as yours, and that, on this account, many have endeavoured to prejudice you and my children againft him, that he might be removed from you; but, if ever this event should happen, and you should employ such and fuch persons (naming them softly in her ear) and, instead of following the good counsels of this man, should be wholly guided by their opinions, depend upon it, it will prove destructive to the state, and may, perhaps, ruin my children and yourself. I have sent thus fuddenly for him, that, with him and you, I might consult upon the means to prevent these evils, but I thank God my precautions will probably not yet be necessary."

Couriers upon couriers were the next day dispatched, to dissipate the difagreeable rumours which were already spread in all places. I did not myfelf return to Paris, till I had feen the king make water: he would have it fo, and he did it twice with fuch facility, that I was perfectly fatisfied all danger was over. Three days after, I received a letter from him, wherein he informed me, that, having been blooded in the left arm by La Riviere the evening I left him, he had been greatly relieved, and, having refted well the whole night, found himtelf grow better and better every hour. He thanked me for the interest I seemed to take in his health, and for the advice which, on this occasion, I had been free enough to give him, to be more moderate in hunting; and he promifed to observe what I had faid. He was already able to be as circumftantial as usual in those details with which his letters were commonly filled: he directed me in this, to fend two hundred crowns to each of the perfons afflicted with the evil, whom his own diforder had prevented him from touching, and whom nevertheless he would not fend back. Herein also, he thanked me for the portraits of the new king and queen of England, which I had fent him. His majesty's physicians were unanimous, on this occafion, in making him the fame representations which I had done, in regard to the injury his health received from the violence of his exercife in hunting. He followed their advice, and found himfelf confiderably better for it: he also received great benefit from the waters of Pougues, which he drank this year for fome time, during which the young princess his daughter was taken so ill, that her life was despaired of; both the king and the dauphin his fon went frequently to fee her.

Together with this letter from his majesty, the contents of which I have here related, I received another much longer, which Villeroi wrote to me by his order, upon the affairs of England. Herein he informed me, that his majesty had sent to acquaint the count of Beaumont with his recovery, that he might notify it to the king of England; also that I was expected by his Britannic majesty, who a tributed my delay to the king's indisposition, and to the baron Du-Tour's not having notified to the king in form, the death of Elizabeth, and the accession of James the VIth * to the crown of England. The baron Du-Tour was, for this purpose, sent by James to his most christian majesty: he left London on the day after this prince's entry there, and arrived a few days after at Fontainebleau, where he acquitted himfelf of his commission. Villeroi further informed me, that my departure for England, for these reasons, being no longer to be deferred, the king would foon fend for me and inform me of the day: but his majesty changed his intention in this respect, and came himself to Paris. The heat which had begun early this year was excessive, and rendered the fands of Fontainebleau insupportable to one but just recovering from fickness.

Two days after his majesty's arrival at Paris, he affembled the chancellor Bellievre, Villeroi, Maiffe, and Sillery, on the fubject of my departure, and that I might receive my public instructions in their presence. When I entered the king's closet, where this council was James Stuart, at first king of Scotland, and afterwards of England, was his fon, and died in 1625. On his accession to the crown of England, the marquis of Rofny wrote the following complimentary letter to the archbishop of Glasgow, at that time his ambassador in France; the original of which is in the cabinet of the prefent duke of Sully.

To the Scots ambaffador.

SIR,

Your most humble cousin and fervant.

> Signed , ROSNY: held,

held, I told his majefty that the count of Soiffons was in the chamber without, and that it appeared to me neceffary that he likewise should be introduced to be a witness of my deputation. Henry replied, that he did not know the count was there; and that, from what I had just said, he would take occasion to reconcile us to each other; for the count of Soiffons' resentment still subsisted. Accordingly, the count meeting me two days after, as I entered the palace, told me, that he had learned from a good hand that I had rendered him an office which he had no reason to expect from me; he thanked me for it, assume that he would forget the past, and for the future would be my friend: but he did not long continue in these sentiments.

THE principal object of these instructions had always been a close alliance between France and England against Spain, notwithstanding all that had been done to prevent it by the partifans of that crown in France. The principal difference between thefe, and the fecret inftructions which I had received from his majesty, was, that in the former he had concealed the true motives to this alliance: I will not transcribe them here, as the particulars would be too long and circumstantial. The substance of them was briefly as follows: To take every opportunity of discoursing upon, and informing the king of England, of all the unjust and violent proceedings of Spain, thereby to inspire him with an aversion to that crown: to represent the various arts employed by her to embroil Europe; her new usurpations in Italy; her fecret practices in England, by means of the Jefuits; her intrigues in Ireland and Scotland, under the fanction of the authority which the Pope pretends to have over those kingdoms; her designs upon Strasbourg, by forcing the cardinal of Lorrain to confent to the Pope's giving the coadjutorship of it to the brother-in-law of the catholic king; finally, her proceedings to obtain univerfal monarchy: all which did but too evidently appear.

In consequence of these representations, the king of England mustieither have concluded a peace with Spain, or have entered into an open or secret war against that crown: in the first case, I was to convince this prince, that a peace would enable Spain to get possession of the Low Countries: after which, she would not fail to turn her arms either against France or England; and most probably towards the latter, on account of the Pope's long inveteracy to it. I was also to undeceive the king of England, in regard to the report industriously spread by Spain, that the had no intention to get possession of the Low Countries, but only to form them into a diffinct kingdom, such as that of Burgundy had been, to be given to the arch-duke. As a last resource, I was to insist, that Spain should at least be made to purchase this peace at a high price, or should be obliged to the king of France or England for it; and especially that the should give up Ostend. In case an open war should be resolved upon, I was to endeavour to discover the intention of the king of England on that head, and if possible prevent it, and represent to him the necessity of beginning by giving a powerful assistance to the States.

FINALLY, if a fecret war was refolved upon, in which I was to use my endeavours to confirm or engage the king of England, in this case I was to represent to him, that prudence required that he should begin by strengthening himself upon the throne, securing it to his descendants, and by gaining Europe in his interests; whereby Spain might be one day irrefiftibly attacked: that till this was effected, it would be proper only to keep this power in awe, or engage her in a fruitless employment of her forces against Flanders; that in the mean time the conditions of the union might be agreed on, and cemented by a double marriage between the children of the two kings; which, however, should not be declared till they had begun the execution of their defigns. I was moreover to be particularly careful to regulate and determine the nature of the fuccours which were provisionally to be given the States; and prevent the English council from demanding the three hundred thousand livres which that crown had lent the United Provinces, left they might thereby be induced to throw themselves into the arms of Spain: on the contrary, I was to perfuade his Britannic majesty to be at new expences, equally with his most Christian majesty, in favour of these people, and to affist them with the same number of ships as queen Elizabeth had done; also to obtain permission, that the four hundred and fifty thousand livres, which this queen had lent France, might be applied as exigencies should require in Flanders; and that three hundred thousand livres more might be added to them by England, whereby, with the feven hundred and fifty thousand livres which Henry obliged himself to join to them, a fund would be formed of fifteen hundred thousand livres for the present necessities of the States-General. In case I could not gain a compliance with these articles, I was to endeavour to get the States debt to England of three hundred thousand livres discharged, France obliging herself to pay it; also, to manage this affair in fuch a manner, that the king of England might not have the maritime towns of Holland delivered to him as fecurities for these succours; and to found his intentions in regard to those of which he was already possessed in Zealand. In pursuance of this plan, I was to consult with Barnevelt, act in concert with him and the States deputies at London, seem attached to their interests, entertain them with agreeable hopes, persuade them that their interests were the care of the British council, without giving umbrage to this council, and make the best advantage I could of the knowledge they might have acquired of the new court and the king.

THESE were the principal points of my instructions: there were fome others which did not relate to the fame subject, or at least not immediately; fuch was that in regard to the piracies of the English. I was charged to complain, that fince the treaty of Vervins they had taken from France to the amount of a million; and I was to endeavour to get a diffolution of the treaty of commerce concluded between England and France in 1572, as being disadvantageous to France, which thereby had not the same privileges and immunities in England that the English had in France. The close union between Elizabeth and Henry had caused all things to be equal on both fides during the reign of that queen, and this treaty was then confidered as void, though it had never been formally annulled. My orders were, however, to be extremely circumfpect on this head, and even to entirely suppress it, if I found that by bringing it upon the carpet I might run any rifque of raifing a fuspicion in the new king, from which Elizabeth herself had not been exempt, that France only fought to embark England in a war with Spain, out of which she would then easily extricate herself. If what the baron Du-Tour had faid in France, of his Britannic majefty's resolution to succour Ostend, should appear to be well grounded, I might then spare myself part of these precautions.

The manner in which I was to treat with the ambaffadors of the king of Spain and the arch-dukes; the attention which I was to beflow on the affairs of Ireland and Scotland; and the jultification of Beaumont, againft whom king James had been prejudiced, and for whom I was charged to procure the fame privileges of this prince which were enjoyed by his agent in France: these were other articles of my instructions. There was one article concerning the duke of Bouillon, in respect to whom I was to be filent, unless the king of England should speak to me about him, to which he would probably be induced by the elector Palatine; and in this case I was to draw the duke of Bouillon in his real character, and not to engage the king of France in any thing on his account. We may observe, that the subjects of my negotiations were fufficiently extensive, for I was to gain a knowledge of the dispositions of the king and people of England, not only with respect to Spain and Flanders, but also to the Northern crowns: to say the truth, the political state of all Europe was concerned in my ensuing conduct and its consequences.

These inftructions*, in which, to my other titles, his majefty had added that of marquis, having been read to me aloud, were then delivered to me in prefence of the count of Soiffons, Sillery, and Jeannin, figned by his majefty and Villeroi. Henry alfo gave me fix letters, one from his majefty to the king of England, befides another for the fame prince for form-fake counter-figned; two others, in the fame manner, from the king to the queen of England, and two others from the queen of France to the king and queen of England: his majefty alfo gave me a cypher, with which the council was acquainted; but he likewife fecretly gave me another, of which none but we two had the key. When I went to take my leave of this prince, he prefented me his hand to kifs, then embraced me, wished me a good voyage, repeated his reliance upon me, and his hopes of my good fucces.

THE beginning of June I fet out for Calais, where I was to embark, having with me a retinue of upwards of two hundred gentlemen, or who called themselves such, of whom a considerable number were really of the first distinction. Just before my departure old Servin came and prefented his fon to me, and begged I would use my endeavours to make him a man of some worth and honesty; but he confessed it was what he dared not hope, not through any want of understanding or capacity in the young man, but from his natural inclination to all kinds of vice. The old man was in the right; what he told me having excited my curiofity to gain a thorough knowledge of young Servin, I found him to be at once both a wonder and a monfter; for I can give no other idea of that affemblage of the most excellent and most pernicious qualities. Let the reader represent to himfelf a man of a genius fo lively, and an understanding so extensive, as rendered him scarce ignorant of any thing that could be known; of so vast and ready a comprehension, that he immediately made himself de Villerei, according to his defire, to affift him in preparing my instructions. This piece is only a recapitulation of all the points which were the objects of his embass, to London. Cabinet of the duke of Sully.

mafter of what he attempted; and of fo prodigious a memory, that he never forgot what he had once learned; he possessed all parts of philophy and the mathematics, particularly fortification and drawing; even in theology he was fo well skilled, that he was an excellent preacher whenever he had a mind to exert that talent, and an able disputant for and against the reformed religion indifferently; he not only underflood Greek, Hebrew, and all the languages which we call learned. but also all the different jargons or modern dialects; he accented and pronounced them so naturally, and so perfectly imitated the gestures and manners both of the feveral nations of Europe, and the particular provinces of France, that he might have been taken for a native of all or any of these countries; and this quality he applied to counterfeit all forts of persons, wherein he succeeded wonderfully; he was, moreover, the best comedian and greatest droll that perhaps ever appeared; he had a genius for poetry, and had wrote many verses; he played upon almost all instruments, was perfect master of music, and fung most agreeably and justly; he likewise could say mass; for he was of a disposition to do, as well as to know, all things: his body was perfectly well fuited to his mind, he was light, nimble, dextrous, and fit for all exercises; he could ride well, and in dancing, wrestling, and leaping, he was admired: there are not any recreative games that he did not know; and he was skilled in almost all mechanic arts. But now for the reverse of the medal: here it appeared that he was treacherous, cruel, cowardly, deceitful; a liar, a cheat, a drunkard and glutton; a sharper in play, immersed in every species of vice, a blasphemer, an atheist: in a word, in him might be found all the vices contrary to nature, honour, religion, and fociety; the truth of which he himself evinced with his latest breath, for he died in the flower of his age, in a common brothel, perfectly corrupted by his debaucheries, and expired with the glass in his hand, curfing and denying God.

From the moment of my departure to that of my return, I wrote regularly to his majefty, and gave him an exact account of whatever happened to me. My letters were of three kinds: for indifferent things. I used only the common character; my general cyphers I used for such matters as were to be known only to the council; and my secret cypher I employed in what I addressed to the king himself, which was to be seen only by him: his majesty chose to have the greatest part of my letters in this cypher, though he found the difficulty of decyphering so great, that he at last entrusted the key to Lomenie, whom he encouraged from time to time to render himself well skilled in it; but the difficulty difficulty which I experienced myself in the use of this cypher, whenever I wanted to descend to particulars, compelled me to abridge the ordinary length of my letters; however, I complied with his majesty's desires in this respect as well as I could, more especially after the affair of the lost dispatch. All these letters, which I have preserved, I shall here reduce to the form of a narrative, wherein the public may be exactly informed of every material circumstance relative to my embassy at London, and my negotiations with king James.

I STAYED a day at Calais, waiting for Saint-Luc and fome others who had honoured me with their company. I found the vice-admiral * of France ready to receive me: and the vice-admirals of England and Holland alio came and defired I would embark in their fhips. The report current at Calais, of the good understanding between the English and Spaniards, occasioned by what had passed at the embarkation of count d'Aremberg, ambassador from the arch-dukes, and the complaints which I saw made to De-Vic, of the enterprises of the English cruizers upon the coast of France, inclined me at first to refuse their offers; but finding nothing in the letters which I received at Calais from Beaumont, concerning what I was told, to prejudice me against the new court of London, I changed my design in this respect; and that I might not begin by giving them any cause of complaint, I accepted the two vessels are the same and the English vice-admiral.

I EMBARKED the 15th of June at fix o'clock in the morning. The English, by whom I was ferved, paid me a respect which appeared to me to degenerate into servility: but I had very soon reason to alter this opinion of them. Even at the very moment when they desired I would command them in every respect as if they were of my own nation, De-Vic, who only sought an opportunity of shewing the English his resentment of the violences committed by their pirates, advancing, bearing the French slag on his main-top-gallant-mast, I sound these complaisant English were enraged at an offence, which, according to them, was equally injurious to the king of England, and the king of France, whom I represented: and I had reason to think them still more rude and unpolite, when, without deigning to consult me, fifty shot were immediately fired against De-Vic's † ship. It was with great difficulty that I made myfelf heard; which, however, I at last effected, by representing to them, that De-Vic acted thus only to do me the greater honour; and also to give me a more distinguished mark of his respect, by dropping his stag upon my first command so to do. I thought it would be most prudent to do this; and my English hearing what I said, were so far prevailed upon by it, as to make their next discharge at random. I made a signal to De-Vic, which he perfectly well understood, and took in his stag; but, as I was afterwards told, he swore at the same time to be revenged on the English whenever he should again meet with them. Though I much question, had ship in which M. de Rosny was, did actually fire upon the French vice-admiral. But as I suspect our Memoirs, either for the honour of our nation, or perhaps from vanity, have fomewhat qualified this matter, I will here lay it before the reader as it is related in the Chronology above mentioned: "De-Vic, vice-admiral of France, " foon after he had cast anchor in Dover-" road (at which place he had landed part 64 of the retinue of M. de Rosny) failed " from thence on his return to Calais, and " piffing by the flip on board of which " M. de Rofny then was, he ordered his " flag to be hoisted, and gave him a fa-" lute; foon after which, the flag was a-64 gain taken in. The English captain of " the ship wherein M. de Rosny was, fee-" ing the French flag hoisted, commanded " his men to fire upon the vice-admiral of " France, fwearing he would fuffer no flag " to be feen in thefe feas but that of Eng-" land. A gun was immediately fired upon "De-Vic's ship, who, having demanded " the reason of it, prepared to desend him-" felf. M. de Rofny complained of it to " the English captain, and represented the " firing this shot as an offence done to " himself; but he talked to a man who " refused to hear reason, and who answer-" ed him only with rage and fury; he was " therefore forced to fubmit, and made a " fign to the vice-admiral of France to " take in his flag, which he did. De-Vic 66 thinking himfelf injured, demanded fa-" tisfaction of the English admiral; who " answered him, that the king of England, 46 his mafter, did not permit what the

" captain had prefumed to do, defired that " he would excuse his indiscretion, &c. " and promifed that nothing like it should " ever happen again. This reply appealed " and quieted all parties." Chron. Septen. and Thuanus, an. 1603. Cardinal Richlieu, in his Testament Politique, makes use of this as an argument, to demonstrate to Lewis XIII. the absolute necessity there was for a naval power: " The cannon-" fhot, fays he, by piercing the veffel, " pierced the hearts of all true Frenchmen; " and if the words of king James were " civil, yet were they of no other effect, " than to oblige the duke of Sully to ob-" tain his fatisfaction from his own pru-" dence, by feigning to be contented, tho" " his discontent, and his reason for it, was " really greater, and farther from being " removed than ever. The king, your " father, was under a necessity to use dif-" fimulation on this occasion, but he did " it with the resolution, whenever it " might again be necessary, to maintain " the just rights of his crown by fuch a " naval force as time would furnish him " with the means to acquire." Part II. chap. ix. In regard to the fact, which is also related in the Testament, the circumstances are told in a manner almost entirely different. We may farther observe, that M. de Sully, in that part of his Memoirs where he fpeaks of the fatisfaction which he defired king James to grant him, paffes it over very flightly; doubtless, because he would not appear to have been fo very grievously offended as perhaps he really the opportunity now been given him, whether he could have obtained the revenge he threatened: be that however as it will, the diffrate was ended by this means, and our passage met with no further interruption.

I ARRIVED at Dover about three o'clock in the afternoon. Beaumont, together with Sir Lewis Lewkenor, were there waiting for me. Sir Lewis had the fame office in England, which Gondy had in France, being that part of the reception of ambassadors, which consists in providing them with lodging, provisions, horses, or chariots, and other things of this nature: the mayor of Dover also came and complimented me; and the acclamations of the people were fo great, that it was faid, that nothing like it had ever before been feen for any ambaffador. But I was not now to be imposed upon by these appearances, having fo lately received a different specimen of the English politeness, of which I had a second example, even before my departure from Dover.

THE governor of this place fent his nephew to me, to defire I would come with him and see the castle, he not being able to wait on me himself, being confined to his bed by the gout. This invitation was followed by a fecond, from which I conceived a good opinion of the person by whom they were sent; and I thought the imputation of want of civility might justly have fallen upon myself, had I after this quitted Dover, without waiting on the governor. I therefore went to the castle the next day, with all my retinue; but I soon discovered, that the chief motive to this civil invitation was the pecuniary reward exacted of those who have the curiofity to see the castle of Dover. This was demanded of every one of my retinue, and that too rudely enough, which was followed by the ceremony of making all, except myself, quit their swords. Being introduced to the governor, whose name was Thomas Wymes, he received us feated in his chair, but, perceiving that some of us were looking at the towers and walls of the castle, he put on so sour a countenance, that, pretending to be afraid left our presence might incommode him, I immediately withdrew, without looking at any thing further. I had exhorted my retinue, whatever might be faid or done to them, not to forget the rules of French politeness; and this proved to be no unnecessary caution.

WHEN we were upon our departure for London, Lewkenor no longer shewed himself that polite and obliging person, who but just before before had demanded a lift of those who accompanied me, that, as he said, they might all be furnished with the necessary horses and chariots; and I could not but suppose his sole design, in getting this lift, was that he might send it to London; for he suffered all my retinue to provide themselves horses as well as they could, and at their own cost; and these mild people lent them at so high a price, and at the same time with so much arrogance, that they seemed to think they did us a favour. However, we all carefully concealed our sentiments of so rude a treatment. My own conveyance I got in the coach of the count of Beaumont.

I HAD more reason to be pleased with the behaviour of the gentry in and about Canterbury: they came to meet me upon the road, and that they might pay me all imaginable honours and respects, they pretended to have received orders so to do from the king of England. Canterbury is but a finall city, but extremely populous, and fo polite that, in no other place, I received fuch diffinguished honours and civilities as there; fome came to kifs my boot, others to kifs my hands, and others to make me prefents of flowers; all which must be attributed not to the English of this city (they every where preserve their character of aversion for the French) but to the Walloons and Flemings, who, having at many different times taken refuge in this city on account of their religion, have at last almost entirely changed it, and, at this day, compose two thirds of its inhabitants. I visited the church, and was prefent at the fervice, wherein the music was excellent. The church is extremely beautiful and magnificent. When the canons understood that I was of their religion, they redoubled their careffes and civilities: one of them shewed himself so well affected to France, as to give me an information of fome confequence, which was afterwards confirmed by Aërsens to Henry himself. This canon had been intimately acquainted with Arnold, the father of him whom I had with me as one of my fecretaries; and being informed that this was the fon of his old friend, he came to fee him, and, among other things, told him, that he had been informed by the fecretary of count Aremberg *, ambassador from the archduke, who had passed through Canterbury only a few days before, that his mafter was charged to reprefent to the king of England, with a view to engage him in an alliance with Spain, that Henry meditated great defigns against England, which would openly appear in less than two years; and, at the same time, to make offers to his Britannic majefty of powerful fuccours from the king of Spain, with which he might prevent the defigns that Henry meditated, by feizing certain provinces of France, on which the king of England had much juster pretentions, than any Henry could have upon England.

HERE my lord Sidney came and complimented me from the king of England, and made me many obliging offers of fervice. I knew that the person who had been charged with the same commission to count d'Aremberg, was my lord Howard, whose rank was much superior to Sidney's, being the duke of Norfolk's nephew, uncle to the great chamberlain, and member of the privy council: at first, therefore, I was apprehensive that this deputation might be a mark of some contempt from the king of England; but, afterwards reflecting that the quality of the person who had received the ambassador from Spain was inferior even to Sidney's, I concluded that all this might be merely accidental, more especially as I could not receive greater honours than those which Sidney, and others by his direction, paid me. I nevertheless communicated my thoughts hereupon to Beaumont, by desiring him to get an explanation of it, but to do it with fuch address, that no cause might be given to perceive a misunderstanding, where, perhaps, none was intended to be shewn. Beaumont addressed himself to Sidney himself, and managed the affair with him so well, that he immediately wrote to the court of London, to inform them that they should fend an earl of the privy council to receive me, which was done accordingly. The earl of Southampton, one of the ministers and confidents of James, came to me from that prince at Gravefend, accompanied by a numerous train of nobility and gentry. In our way to Gravefend we passed through Rochester, where our reception was extremely different from that at Canterbury; the inhabitants of that city had effaced the marks which were placed by the king of England's meffengers on those houses where we were to be entertained and lodged if necessary.

AT Gravesend I was received in the king of England's barges, a kind of covered boats, which are very commodious and richly ornamented; and in one of these I was carried up the Thames to London, where, upon my arrival, the Tower alone saluted us with upwards of three thousand guns, besides the discharges from several ship-guns, and the musquetry from the mole and fort before this tower: I tearce ever saw a finer salute. I landed near the Tower, where many coaches, of which which Southampton and Sidney performed the honours, were ready 1603. to carry me, and all my retinue, to the house of the count of Beaumont, which I had chosen for the day. The confluence of people was fo great, that we could fcarce open ourfelves a paffage.

THIS very evening, I had an opportunity of being better acquainted with the character of the two English lords who had been fent to conduct me. Upon my arrival at Beaumont's, my lord Southampton took me aside, and having told me, that the king, who was at Windfor, a castle about twenty miles from London, had ordered him to come to him there that day, however late it might be, to inform him of the particulars of my arrival, he earnestly desired, having first expressed to me his zeal, that I would impart something to him which he might communicate to his majesty, no doubt with an intention to do himself honour by it, and gain the favour of that prince: after him my lord Sidney came and made me the fame request, by ingeniously telling me, that he hoped the honour which he had received by being deputed to me the first, and the respect and attachment which he had for his most christian majesty, might merit my referving for him at least some part of the affairs with which I was charged; and he added, that I should not disclose myself entirely to Southampton. I plainly perceived these gentlemen had a mutual jealoufy of each other, and contended who should be the first that should give the king any informations. I very civilly thanked them. and appeared obliged to both, but gave the preference to Sidney; that is to fay, the former received only false, and the latter nothing farther than general informations of but little consequence, and such as I should have been glad to see published.

THEY both made what use of them they thought proper: as to myfelf, I supped and lay this evening at Beaumont's, and I dined there the next day; for fo thort a time had not been fufficient to procure and prepare me lodgings, till the palace of Arundel, which was destined for me, could be got ready. This palace was one of the finest, and from its great number of apartments upon the same sloor, the most commodious in London: but this greatly embarrassed my retinue, which could not be all lodged at Beaumont's. Houses and apartments were fought in the neighbourhood, but the difficulty was to get them; for the inhabitants refused to receive us, on account of the misbehaviour which they had but lately experienced in some of marechal 1603. Biron's people; the greatest part therefore had like to have been obliged to pass the night in the street.

Biron's

IT must indeed be confessed, that, if what I heard on this subject was true, Biron, by the excesses which he had suffered his whole retinue to commit, had not ineffectually laboured to justify the animosity of the English nation against us. I am accustomed to speak my sentiments freely, and never more so than when they may be of use in correcting our manners. The youth of our nation have not yet divested themselves of that vain, pert, and conceited air, nor those licentious and even audacious manners, with which we have, in all ages, been reproached: unfortunately too they are not more circumspect among foreigners than in their own country, where they are accustomed to spend their lives at ganing-tables, and other places of debauchery, and run into boundless excesses.

I was fully refolved, that, if my conduct could not clear France from this reproach, it should not, at leaft, be incurred by those over whom I had authority; and I determined to exercise this authority in such a manner, as to oblige all my people to a strict regularity of behaviour: but in these cases precepts are feldom effectual; I therefore ensorced them by an example, for which an opportunity happened almost immediately.

I was the next day accommodated with apartments in a very handfome house, situate in a great square, near which all my retinue were also provided with the necessary lodgings; some of them went to entertain themselves with common women of the town; at the same place they met with some English, with whom they quarrelled, fought, and one of the English was killed. The populace, who were before prejudiced against us, being excited by the family of the deceased, who was a substantial citizen, assembled, and began loudly to threaten revenge upon all the French, even in their lodgings. The affair foon began to appear of great confequence; for the number of people affembled upon the occasion was presently increased to upwards of three thousand, which obliged the French to fly for an asylum into the house of the ambassador. I did not at first take notice of it; the evening advanced, and I was playing at primero with the marquis D'Oraifon, Saint-Luc, and Blerancourt; but, observing them come in at different times by three and four together, and with great emotion, I at last imagined something extraordinary had happened, and, having questioned

THE honour of my nation, my own in particular, and the interest of my negotiation, were the first objects that presented themselves to my mind. I was also most fensibly grieved, that my entry into London should be marked at the beginning by so fatal an accident; and at that moment, I am perfuaded, my countenance plainly expressed the fentiments with which I was agitated. Guided by my first impulse, I arose, took a flambeaux, and, ordering all that were in the house (which was about a hundred) to range themselves round the walls, hoped, by this means, to discover the murderer, which I did without any difficulty by his agitation and fear: he was for denying it at first, but I soon obliged him to confess the truth. He was a young man, and the fon of the fieur de Combaut, principal examiner in chancery, very rich, and a kinfman likewife of Beaumont's, who, at entering that moment, defired me to give young Combaut into his hands, that he might endeavour to fave him. "I do not wonder," replied I to Beaumont, with an air of authority and indignation, " that the English and you " are at variance, if you are capable of preferring the interest of your-" felf and your relations, to that of the king and the public: but the " fervice of the king my mafter, and the fafety of so many gentle-" men of good families, shall not suffer for such an imprudent stripling " as this." I told Beaumont, in plain terms, that Combaut should be beheaded in a few minutes. "How, fir, cried Beaumont, behead " a kinfman of mine, poffeffed of two hundred thousand crowns, an " only fon; it is but an ill recompence for the trouble he has given " himself, and the expence he has been at to accompany you." I again replied, in as positive a tone, " I had no occasion for such com-" pany:" and to be short, I ordered Beaumont to quit my apartment; for I thought it would be improper to have him prefent in the council, which I intended to hold immediately, in order to pronounce fentence of death upon Combaut.

In this council, I made choice only of the oldest and the wifest of my retinue, and the affair being presently determined, I sent Arnaud to inform the mayor of London of it, and to desire him to have his officers ready the next day, to conduct the culprit to the place of execution, and to have the executioner there ready to receive him. The mayor returned me for answer, that his first care had been to quiet the tumultuous populace, not doubting but I would do him justice, and that 1603. that he was just coming to demand it of me, when he received my letter and the fentence; he moreover exhorted me to moderate it. either because my severity had disarmed his, or, which seemed most probable, because he had already suffered himself to be corrupted by presents from the friends of the criminal. I fent again to this magistrate to inform him, that as no fuperior authority, nor respect for any person whatever, had determined me to pronounce this sentence, I could not confent to revoke it; that, by carrying it into execution, I should justify the king my master, and give the English nation a convincing proof, that I had done every thing upon the occasion which my duty required; therefore in fuch an affair, I could only acquit myself of it by committing it to him, and by refigning the prisoner to fuch punishment as justice and the laws of England required. I accordingly fent Combaut to him; fo that the whole procedure became a particular affair between the mayor and Combaut, or rather Beaumont, who, without much difficulty, obtained this magistrate's confent to fet Combaut at liberty, a favour which none could impute to me: on the contrary, I perceived both the French and English seemed to think, that, if the affair had been determined by me, it would not have ended fo well for Combaut; and the confequence of this to me, with respect to the English and French, was, that the former began to love me, and the latter to fear me more.

> This removed at least one obstacle to the success of my negotiation; but there still remained many to encounter, from the nation in general, from the king, and from other particular persons, according as their different interests might incline them to traverse it. It is certain, that the English hate us, and this hatred is so general and inveterate, that one would almost be tempted to number it among their natural dispositions: it is undoubtedly an effect of their arrogance and pride; for no nation in Europe is more haughty and disdainful, nor more conceited of its superior excellence: were they to be believed, understanding and common sense are to be found only among them; they are obstinately wedded to all their own opinions, and despife those of every other nation, and to hear others, or suspect themselves, is what never enters into their thoughts. This temper is more injurious to themfelves than to us, as from hence they are at the mercy of all their caprices: fometimes one would be induced to think they have contracted all the inflability of the element by which they are furrounded; with them all things must submit to the reigning dispositions, and the fole difference between them and any the most inconstant people in Europe,

Europe, is, that their inconstancy proceeds not from lightness, but from their vanity, which continually shews itself in a thousand different shapes. Their self-love renders themselves shaves to all their cappicious humours. What they at one time believe to have wisely performed, or firmly resolved, is at another time destroyed, without their knowing or being able to give a reason; they are accordingly so undetermined in themselves, that frequently one would not take them for the same persons, and from hence they themselves sometimes appear surprised on perceiving their own continued irresolution. If we examine what are called their maxims of state, we shall discover in them only the laws of pride itself, adopted by arrogance or indolence.

FROM this portrait, it may at first appear not to be extremely difficult for an ambastador to inspire them with new resolutions; and this is true; but then it is only for the present moment: this being elapsed, they no longer remember what you may have enforced to them in the strongest manner. So that a king of France must continually have near them a person of understanding and authority, who might compet them, as it were, to hear him, and force them to be reasonable; and even in this case, such a person would always have their pride to combat, which inspires them with a belief that they are infinitely superior to all the other nations in Europe *.

France therefore can no more depend on the English than on any of her other neighbours; her true interest and best policy is to render her own interior state and condition such as may make her not only entirely independent, but also able to compel all Europe to feel its want of her; and this, after all, would only be difficult to ministers who can conceive no other methods to effect it than war and violence, methods that ought never to be pursued without an absolute necessity; but let the sovereign shew himself a lover of peace, disinterested in what regards himself, and strictly impartial with respect to others, he will then be certain to preserve all his neighbours in that dependence

* I wish, with all my heart, I could heart, entirely supported every thing in this character, and in this whole relation, so little advantageous to a nation, whose virtues and genius have rendered it equally well respected and esteemed. To reconcile truth with the veracity of the author, we can only fay, that he has here painted the Engliffs fuch as they appeared to him at that time: one of the most happy effects of the cultivation of arts, and the improvement of sciences, is, that those prejudices and partialities which were the cause of hatted and jealousy, have hereby been distingated. 1603. which is only durable, because it conciliates the affections, instead of subjecting the persons *.

I DARE farther maintain, that peace is the great and common interest of Europe, the petty princes of which ought to be continually employed in preferving it between the greater powers, by all the most gentle and persuasive means; and the greater powers should force the leffer into it, if necessary, by affisting the weak and oppressed; this is the only use they ought to make of their superiority. When I consider Europe as composed of such civilized people, I cannot but be aftonished that she still continues to be governed by principles so narrow, and customs so barbarous. What is the consequence of that profound policy of which she is so vain, other than her own continual laceration and ruin? War is the resource in all places and upon all occasions; she knows no other way, nor conceives any other expedients; it is the fole refource of the most inconsiderable sovereign, as well as of the greatest potentate; the only difference between them is, that the former makes it with less noise, and in conjunction with others, while the latter does it with great preparation and frequently alone, that he may shew his grandeur, though in reality he only shews himself more signally despicable. Why must we always impose on ourselves the necessity of paffing through war to arrive at peace? the attainment of which is the end of all wars, and is a plain proof that recourse is had to war only for want of a better expedient: nevertheless, we have so effectually confounded this truth, that we feem to make peace only that we may again be able to make war. But let us now return to our English.

The court of London might be confidered as composed of four forts of persons, who formed so many different sactions; and from this circumstance only one may infer, what in reality was true, that this court was full of suspicion, mistrust, jealously, secret and even public discontents. I shall here advance nothing, the truth of which I was not well convinced of, either by my own observations, or from the

* It is not surprising to hear such reafoning as this now we have acquired jufter notions in war and politics, and that France is arrived at so great a degree of glory, that conquests can add nothing or but very little to it: but what opinion must we conceive of the views and penetration of the duke of Sully, when we behold him establishing principles, in appearance so improper for the flates of milery and weaknefs, in which the kingdom was at that time, or at leaft from whence it was but just recovered? It is by such true, folid, and wise maxims as these, that the memoirs of Sully have become a rich mine, from whence all our able ministers have since drawn incitionable treasures. lights I received from the partifans of France, from those who called themselves such, from the discontented, and in short, from many other opportunities which occasionally occurred. The first of these factions was the Scotch, at the head of which were the earl of Mar, lord Mountion, lord Kinloss, and other gentlemen of the king's bedchamber; they were in the interest of France, and endeavoured to engage the king in their party, who feemed disposed to suffer himself to be governed entirely; fome of them were tolerably skilled in military affairs, but not one of them was acquainted with the business of the cabinet. I have not mentioned the earl of Lennox in this number, because, though he was equally well inclined to France, he had nevertheless a party among the Scots which was separate from that of the earl of Mar, and even opposite to it, not indeed in its political principles, but only in a competition which should have the advantage in the king's favour, and there was a reciprocal and inveterate hatred between them. Thus the Scotch faction had fubdivided itself into two.

THE fecond, in all respects entirely opposite to the former, was the Spanish faction: in this all the Howards were engaged, having at their head the admiral of that name, the great chamberlain, the mafter of the horse, the Humes, and others of less note. The third was composed of a number of old English, who, considering France and Spain as equiponderous, or being equally jealous of these two nations, were attached to neither, and fought to render Flanders independent of both, by restoring the antient kingdom of Burgundy. The first movers of this faction were the chancellor, the high treasurer, and Cecil the secretary of state, at least as far as one could judge of a man who was all mystery; for he separated from, or united with all parties, according as he judged it most advantageous to his own particular interest: he had borne the principal sway in the late government, and he endeavoured with the same subtilty to acquire an equal share in the present; his experience, joined to his address, had already made him be confidered by the king and queen as a necessary man. Lastly, there was a fourth faction, composed of such as meddled in affairs, without having any connexion with those before mentioned, and even without having any agreement among themselves, unless that they would not separate nor unite with any other; their character was purely English; they breathed a spirit of fedition, and were ready to undertake any thing in favour of novelties, even were it against the king himself. They had at their head the earls of Northumberland, Southampton, Aa2

NOTHING could as yet be discovered with regard to any of these factions, except that they mutually hated and were jealous of each other; and it was impossible to foretel which would at length obtain the ascendant, and gain the prince in its interests. To judge from appearances, his favour would be disputed only by the men of learning, and the favourites of his bed-chamber; the first, because by their superior knowledge and dexterity they commonly succeed better than others in gaining their master; the second, because they had the advantage of familiarity, and of being admitted into all his parties of pleasure: but the king's humour and inclinations were not yet sufficiently known, besides that his accession to such a crown as that of England might occasion such alterations in them as would render any judgment on this head extremely precarious.

ALL that I had to fear was, lest, among the different sentiments with which endeavours would be used to inspire James, those should prove to be most difficult that were to attach him to the interests of France. Hitherto his inclinations had been conformable to those of the Northern powers, who were for making three divisions of the house of Austria; Spain, Germany, and Burgundy: they detested the first, as being too powerful and enterprising; the second they despised, but would however have been reconciled to it, by difuniting it from the Pope, Spain, and the Jesuits; the third was as yet only imaginary, but was what they so passionately defired, that they would have spared nothing to restore it, provided they would have also separated its interests from those of Spain and Germany, or at least have obliged these powers to renounce all pretensions upon one another.

King James was not fo well disposed in favour of Henry as Elizabeth had been; he had been informed that Henry, in derision, had called him, Captain of arts, and clerk of arms. There was some reafon to apprehend, that it would be difficult at first to hinder him from entertaining thoughts of renewing the antient pretences of England upon France, of which his courtiers had not failed to talk to him very earneftly. As to myself, it had been hinted to him, that both I and my brother had spoke of him in terms not very respectful. But to give the readet a more perfect knowledge of the character of this prince, let me add, that he meant well, was conscientious, eloquent, and had some erudition; though less of the latter, than of penetration and a disposition to learning. He loved to hear discourses on state—affairs, and to be entertained with great designs, which he himself confidered and disposed with a spirit of method and system; but he never thought of carrying them farther, for he naturally hated war, and yet more to engage in it himself. He was indolent in his actions, except in hunting, and wanted application in his affairs; all which were signs of an easy and timid disposition, that made it highly probable he would be governed by others; and this was farther confirmed by his behaviour to the queen, his wise *.

THE character of this princess was quite the reverse of her hufband's; she was naturally bold and enterprizing; she loved pomp and grandeur, tumult and intrigue. She was deeply engaged in all the civil factions, not only in Scotland, in relation to the catholics, whom the supported, and had even first encouraged, but also in England, where the discontented, whose numbers were very considerable, were not forry to be supported by a princess destined to become their queen. Every one knows that women, though but weak inftruments in folid affairs, often act a dangerous part in intrigues. The king could not be ignorant of this, but he was fo weak as never to be able to refift. nor personally to contradict her, though she made no scruple publicly to shew that she did not always conform to his fentiments. He came to London long before her: The was still in Scotland when I arrived at that city, and James wished she would not have departed from thence fo foon, being perfuaded that her prefence would only be detrimental to affairs. He fent to acquaint her with his defire, and that with an air of authority, which costs nothing to assume against those who are absent, but she was very little affected by it,

INSTEAD of obeying, the queen prepared to quit Scotland, after having, of her own accord, and against the king's express defire, appointed herself a great chamberlain of her houshold. She was also attended by the earl of Orkney, and another Scotch nobleman; and brought with her the body of the male child of which she had been delivered in Scotland, because endeavours had been used to persuade the public, that its death was only seigned. She also brought with her the prince, her eldest fon, whom she in public affected to govern absolutely, and whom, it was said, she sought to inspire with sentiments in favour of Spain; for it was not doubted but that she was inclined to declare on that side. Nevertheless, the young prince gave her no room to be pleased with his deference for her: he naturally hated Spain, and favoured France; and this presage was so much the more happy, as from the assemblage of ambition, greatness, and generosity, already perceiveable in him, he promised one day to become one of those princes who are the subject of much conversation. He was, from report, acquainted with the character of the king of France, and he proposed making him his model; which was certainly very disagreeable to the queen his mother, who, it was said, had resolved to destroy his French disposition, by having him sent to be educated in Spain.

Thus I have given fome account of the state of the court of London, at the time when I began my negotiation. The character of the rest of the principal persons who composed it, will more particularly appear in the ensuing part of these Memoirs. Here therefore I will only add, that besides count d'Aremberg from the arch-dukes, prince Henry of Nassau, and the other deputies from the States General, whom I sound here upon my arrival, the ambassaor from his Catholic majesty, and the envoys from Sweden * and Denmark, were also hourly expected, and they accordingly arrived the day after me. There were likewise some others, but not of sufficient consequence to be particularly mentioned. Upon the whole, it appeared as though all the princes of Europe considered the gaining England in their interests, to be of the utmost consequence.

The first of the foreign ministers whom I saw at the court of London were those of the elector Palatine, who having already made their compliments to the new king, and being prepared to return home, came to take their leave of me, almost immediately after my arrival, but nothing particular passed between us. Soon after they had left me, Cecil sent his principal secretary to be informed by Beaumont, at what hour he might conveniently see me; and he accordingly came in the afternoon. So long as we had any witnesses, Cecil talked to me only of the king of England's affection for the king of France, of the defire which he had of giving him proofs of it, and other things in the same strain, which could only be regarded as compliments; nevertheles, when we were in my chamber only with Beaumont, I pretended to confider what he had faid as very ferious; and this I did to gain an opportunity of reprefenting to him, how highly advantageous an union between the two kings would be to both, and of urging the engagements they had formerly contracted, and the fervices each had received from the other.

This general introduction ferved me at least to form a judgment of the disposition of the person who spoke to me; and from his reply, I perceived it was not favourable to France. Cecil made me a long harangue, the defign of which was, to convince me that his mafter ought not to meddle in any of the affairs of his neighbours, but leave Holland to act as it should judge proper, in regard to its disputes with Spain. He spoke of Ostend as a place little worth the pains which had been taken to preserve it; and of the commerce of the Indies, as an advantage, of which, in good policy, the Low Countries ought to be deprived. I opposed these sentiments; and though he seemed convinced by my arguments, he nevertheless appeared very little inclined to enforce them to the king his master. He changed the subject, by informing me, that his majesty was gone to Greenwich, in order to avoid the folicitations which count D'Aremberg would not have failed to make, to obtain his audience before mine, which his majefty could not have refused him, because he had arrived before me, and which, nevertheless, he was not disposed to grant. To this favour, which Cecil gave me to understand was not inconfiderable, he also added that of offering me my audience, which was a fecond obligation, no less valuable than the former, as all ambaffadors were customarily obliged to demand it of the king; neither was it his fault, if I did not also regard the deputation of fuch a man as him as a particular mark of respect. I was not, however, deficient in my acknowledgments to Mr. deputy, and I defired he would give himself the trouble to testify my gratitude for it to the king.

Notwithstanding all the pains this fecretary had taken to perfuade me, that no one, after the king, had so much power as himself, and that he even governed in the councils of the prince, I thought I perceived the contrary. I likewise imagined, that, fearing lest some of his competitors should deprive him of any of his important employments, he had solicited, and perhaps with great assiduity, of the king his master, that of treating with me, wherein he acted as if he thought himself degraded by the execution of it. La-Fontaine, and the deputies of the States-General, who entered just as Cecil went out, 1603. were, from his behaviour, of the same opinion; and this did not appear to us an unfavourable circumstance, no more than the observation which they had made, that fince James had been informed of my departure from France to London, he had begun to treat them with more kindness; having before than refused both to see or speak to the prince of Naffau, and even publicly given the States the epithet of feditious rebels. These deputies began to persuade me, that the king of France ought not only to inspire the king of England with more favourable fentiments in regard to them, but should openly declare himself their defender. They had much more to fay on this head, but it was late. and fupper was on the tables, I therefore difmiffed them, with general affurances that they should be satisfied.

> I GAVE then a more politive answer to Barnevelt * their principal, when he came to see me at the palace of Arundel, of which I had taken possession. Barnevelt, like his collegues, began by magnifying the mifery to which the United Provinces were reduced, the expences they had been at fince the peace of Vervins, their debts, and their exhausted condition. He said the States could no longer keep Ostend, nor refift the Spaniards, unless the king of France caused a powerful army to advance without delay, and either through the frontiers of Picardy, or the territories belonging to the arch-duke, enter Flanders from the land-fide, which was the only means of forcing the Spaniards from before Oftend, having proved, they faid, by experience, that the Spaniards could eafily destroy, one after the other, all the little fuccours that were fent them by fea, and that immediately on their landing. After all these complaints, he concluded, as his collegues had done, that Henry ought to declare himself their protector, and enter into an offensive and defensive alliance with them.

> I TOLD Barnevelt, in plain terms, that he must renounce any such hopes, for that Henry was not at all disposed, through complaisance for them, to draw upon himfelf the whole force of Spain, nor alone to support the burden of a war, in which supposing the king of England should refuse to be concerned, he could not expect to have the advantage. For this reason, I told him, as was really the case, that I could neither take any refolution, nor fay any thing positive to them, till I had at least founded the dispositions of this prince with regard to them. Barnevelt having been at London for a confiderable time, might reasonably be supposed to have acquired some knowledge of the king, I therefore asked him what discoveries he had made? He replied, that this prince having from the first been inclined to peace, both by the advice of his counfellors, and his own paffive disposition, had long deprived them of all hopes; but, having apparently reflected that this peace would coft England dear, if by his inaction the Flemings should return under the dominion of the Spaniards, or should be obliged, in order to free themselves from it, to accept that of France; and having perhaps been made fensible what even England had to fear from a power, who, without any regard to justice, attempted whatever feemed for its conveniency, when all other objects became infufficient to fatisfy its unbounded defire; these considerations seemed to have thrown James into a state of perplexity, out of which he had probably not yet extricated himself; for he had said nothing more to them, than that he would not separate himself from France; on the contrary, that he only waited the arrival of the French ambaffador, to unite more closely with Henry, by concluding a double marriage between the two families.

THESE informations which I received from Barnevelt would have diffipated part of my fears, had the king of England been one of those princes on whom one could depend: but in all this, with respect to himself, I could only perceive diffimulation, or, at best, irresolution; for those of his ministers, whom I had reason to believe were best acquainted with the fecrets of his councils, upon every occasion constantly faid, that all endeavours to inspire them with a dread of Spain would be vain, the fituation of their island protecting them against the enterprises of any foreign power whatever. It would indeed have been highly imprudent in the States and Barnevelt to have judged any otherwife, or have deferred taking measures to prevent their final ruin, till James had taken his refolution; and I believed the States were too good politicians to have committed fuch a mistake. In confequence of this opinion, which I communicated to Barnevelt, I conjured him, by all the interest of his country, not to conceal from me any of the most fecret refolutions which had been there taken, upon a supposition that England would abandon them, or even, which was but too likely, that the would endeavour to augment their diffrefs, by taking this opportunity to demand the cautionary towns offered to Elizabeth.

longer hesitated to discover all to me: and after having intimated the merit of so important a secret, he informed me, that the council of the United Provinces had resolved, at all events, to avoid giving up the cautionary towns; that the terms of their treaty with Elizabeth would furnish them with the means of doing this, by the time which might be required to examine the tenor of it; that in case they found themselves too closely pressed by the English and Spaniards, they would endeavour to bring upon the carpet the treaty of Brunswic and Vandrelep, offering Ostend to be sequestrated till the conclusion of the treaty; that during this interval, some event might perhaps happen in their favour, and thus, at least for the present, a stop be put to the powerful forces preparing in Spain against Ostend.

In order to understand what is here said of the treaties with Elizabeth and Spain, it is necessary to know, that the late queen of England had demanded of the States certain towns *, as a fecurity for the money which she had lent them, with this gracious clause in their favour. that they should not give her the possession of them, unless they entered into an accommodation with Spain without her confent. As to the other treaty, it was proposed, in the height of the hostilities between Spain and the United Provinces, to put the contested countries under the power of the house of Austria; not the branch which reigned in Spain, but that which poffeffed the empire of Germany. But whether the States or Spain, or, which is most probable, both, were the cause of it, the treaty that was begun by the duke of Brunswic, and continued by count Vandrelep, came to nothing: the former demanded, that the provinces and towns which Spain still preserved, or had regained in Flanders, should be comprehended in the treaty, because, faid they, they rifqued too much by being fo near the power of Spain, who taking advantage of a pretended peace, might eafily regain poffession of what she appeared to abandon; and the latter could not but with regret think of separating so brilliant a gem from her crown.

In the afternoon of this day, I was vifited by the refident from Venice, who was the fecretary of that republic: he was as free and unreferved in his difcourse with me as Barnevelt had been; for his flate was in the same situation of jealousy and complaints against Spain, and of union with France: he surther confirmed to me what I had before strongly suspected, of the irresolution of James; he told me, that this prince, who fo often and fo loudly repeated the high founding words the policy of Europe, did, in reality, concern himfelf with nothing lefs; and that his diffimulation which his flatterers complimented in him as a virtue, had always confifted in giving hopes to all, but accomplishing none; that it was not to be expected he would change his maxims, having frequently been heard to fay, that it was to fuch an artful conduct alone he owed his fecurity when king of Scotland; and therefore it was highly probable that he would again put those arts in practice, and pursue them more steadily than ever, at the beginning of a reign, and at the head of a great kingdom, whose people, affairs, and neighbours, he was utterly unacquainted with; all which were circumstances favourable to his maxim.

THESE reflections of the Venetian were at once fensible and just. He afterwards informed me of the duke of Bouillon's proceedings with the new king, whom, by the envoys from the elector Palatine, he had folicited to speak to Henry in his favour: but James stopped them by faying, that it did not become a great prince to intercede for a rebellious fubject. After this mortifying reply, I know not what were Bouillon's thoughts of that scheme which had been concerted between La Tremouille, D'Entragues, Du-Pleffis, and himfelf, and had bore in their opinions fo favourable an aspect: this scheme was to make the king of England protector of the calvinist party in France, and the elector Palatine his lieutenant. Bouillon's agent in London was an Englishman named Wilem, who had entered into his fervice after having quitted that of his majesty, to whom he had been huntsman, and one of his grooms of the chamber, known under the French name of Le Blanc. D'Entragues' agent was named Du-Panni: he was very frequently at Beaumont's, and his principal correspondence was with the duke of Lennox and his brother. Henry had informed me of all these particulars in his letters, and having by his order made enquiries concerning them, I found they were exactly true. D'Entragues was certainly in the right thus to negotiate by others; for had he appeared at London, he would foon have been discovered to be a man of many words and but little understanding. The testimony which I on all occasions bore to this truth, did not advance his affairs.

THE fame day also count d'Aremberg sent one of his retinue to wait upon me, excusing his not coming himself, as custom did not permit such visits till after he had received his first audience of the B b 2 king.

king. All that paffed between me and this person consisted in compliments, offers of service, and affurances of peace and friendship, in all which nothing was wanting but sincerity.

THE king of England, who had before acquainted me that he would grant me an audience on the twenty-fecond, which was Sunday, fent a gentleman to confirm it to me, to defire I would not think the time tedious, and to be informed how I was lodged, and whether I wanted any thing. To this favour was also added the present of half a buck, which, as this prince informed me by the bearer, was the first he had ever taken in his life, though he was a great lover of the chace; the reason was, there was none in Scotland. From hence he took occasion to make Henry a compliment, by faying that he attributed his good fortune to the arrival of a man, who came from a prince that was looked upon to be the king of hunters. I replied, that this conformity of inclinations in their majesties was to me a presage of their personal union, unless a jealousy of the chace should prevent it; that, in this case, I would take the liberty to offer myself as arbiter between their majesties, being so disinterested and indifferent in this article, that when the king my mafter made a party for the chace, he was fo far from thinking, like the king of England, that my prefence would contribute to its fuccess, that he generally fent me to pursue other affairs in the cabinet, where, he faid, I was more happy. Though there was nothing ferious in all this, I was nevertheless glad of the opportunity that was afforded me to infinuate myself into his British majefty's favour, and with this view I turned my compliment in fuch a manner as might please the self-complacency of James, who, I very well knew, was extremely flattered by any comparison with the king of France. I returned the compliment which count d'Aremberg had paid me, and, at the fame time, fent him half of my prefent.

ONE part of the orders I had given with regard to the ceremony of my audience, was, that all my retinue should appear in mourning, to execute with propriety the first part of my commission, which confisted in complimenting the new king on the death of Elizabeth, though I had been informed at Calais, that no one, whether ambassador, foreigner, or English, was admitted into the presence of the new king in black; and Beaumont had since represented to me, that what I intended would most certainly be highly disagreeable to the court, where so strong an affectation prevailed to obliterate the memory of that great princess, that she was never spoke of, and even the mention of her name industriously avoided:

I SHOULD have been very glad not to have been fenfible of the neceffity under which I was of appearing in a garb, which would feem to cast a reproach on the king and all England: but my orders hereupon were positive, not to mention that they were also most laudable; and this was the reason I paid no regard to Beaumont's representations, who entreated me to defer putting myfelf to this trouble and expence, till he had wrote about it to Erskine and some others, who were best acquainted with the court ceremonial. He wrote accordingly, but received no answer on Thursday, Friday, nor even all day on Saturday; and I still persisted in my resolution, notwithstanding the reasons which he continually gave me to the contrary. On Saturday night, which was the evening of the day preceding my audience, and fo late that I was in bed, Beaumont came to tell me, that Erskine had fent to acquaint him, that the whole court confidered my intention as a premeditated affront, and that I had so offended the king by it, that nothing would more effectually prevent the fuccess of my negotiation, from its very commencement. This information agreeing with those of my lord Sidney, the vifcount de Saraot, La-Fontaine, and the States deputies, it was impossible for me to be in doubt about it; and, through fear left a greater evil should ensue, I caused all my retinue to change their apparel, and provide themselves others as well as they could. Lewkener coming the next morning to inform me that I should be presented to the king at three o'clock in the afternoon, I perceived, from the fatisfaction which he expressed at the new orders I had given, that it was indispensably necessary to vanquish my repugnance; nevertheless it publicly gained me almost as much honour, as if I had perfifted in my intention, because none were ignorant that I had complied only through absolute necessity.

BOOK XV.

HE king of England's guards, with the earl of Derby at their head, came to attend me from the palace of Arundel, and efcorted me to the Thames, whose banks they lined whilst I went down to Greenwich. This passage I made in the king's barges, being attended by one hundred and twenty gentlemen, selected from my whole retinue. Upon my landing, I was received by the earl of Northumberland, who, through an infinite number of people, conducted me to the king's palace.

I ENTERED into a chamber, where we were prefented with a collation, though contrary to an established custom in England, never to treat ambassadors, nor even to offer them a glass of water. His majestly having sent to desire my appearance in his presence, I was above a quarter of an hour before I could get to the foot of his throne, occasioned both by the great numbers that were already there, and because I made all my retinue to walk before me. The prince no sooner perceived me than he descended two steps, and would have descended them all, so very desirous he appeared to receive and embrace me, had not one of his ministers, who stood next him, whispered softly in his ear, that he ought to go no farther. "If, said he aloud, I shew this "ambassador particular marks of honour, and such as are contrary to "custom."

" custom, I mean not thereby to give a precedent to others: I parti-" cularly love and estem him for the affection which I know he has " for me, for his firmness in our religion, and his fidelity to his master." I dare not repeat all that he faid in my favour. I received fo obliging a favour with all due respect; and replied, not by an harangue, such as fome may, perhaps, expect to fee here, and with which court pedants would be more pleafed; but only by a compliment, which, in reality, comprehended as much, and was more fuitable to my fituation. Henry's affliction for the death of Elizabeth, his joy for the acceffion of James to the throne of England, the praises of the two kings; all these I comprised in very few words. I excused myself from my want of rhetorical abilities, and from his most Christian majesty's having himself explained his fentiments in his letters, which I at the same time presented, distinguishing to his Britannic majesty, that which Henry had wrote with his own hand. He read them himself, and then gave them to Cecil; expreffing, at the fame time, how fenfible he was of their contents, by these words, "That he had not left in Scotland the " paffion with which he had always loved the king of France, and "defired the prosperity of his crown." I continued to compliment his majefty, though in the ftyle of common conversation; for that of haranguing was extremely difagreeable to me. I faid, that Henry had given public demonstrations of his joy, on feeing the throne of England filled by a prince who was so worthy of it, and for his having been fo readily and univerfally acknowledged; that if there had been occafion for the presence of his most Christian majesty, he would have given proofs of his fincere attachment to his interests, and union with his person, and have come with pleasure to any place where his prefence might have been necessary. I did not repent my having made this compliment. James replied, that if he had even found the English at war with the French, his endeavours would, nevertheless, have been to live in peace with a prince who, like himself, had been called from the crown of Navarre to that of France: "It being always com-" mendable, faid he, to overcome evil with good." But that he had had the double fatisfaction, of quitting a crown in friendship with France, for another that was not less so. The late queen was mentioned on this occasion, but without one word in her praise.

AFTER this, his majefty being defirous to discourse longer and more familiarly with me, he made me ascend all the steps leading to the throne. I took this occasion to make my particular compliment, for which he thanked me with an air of fincerity and affection.

affection. He did not conceal from me the information which he had received from Paris, of the discourses attributed to Henry, to me and to my brother, after his return from Scotland: he confessed that he had for some time believed them, but that he had at last discovered the whole to be only an artifice of their common enemies, who, by using such means to open themselves a passage to universal monarchy, had rendered themselves much more odious to them. He exclaimed in very fevere terms against the Spaniards, which could not but give great pleasure to Nassau, who was near enough to hear something of what was faid; and also to the Flemish deputies, who were prefent, the' incognito, having not yet been able to obtain audiencee. He spoke of their endeavours to kindle the slames of war among their neighbours with the greatest abhorrence; protested that he would oppose their unjust defigns; and talked of the king of Spain, as a man too weak both in body and mind to think of the great chimera's of his predecessors. The pleasure which I received from this discourse was fufficient to make me defirous of continuing it. I told the king of England, that he was extremely happy in being fo well acquainted with the character of the Spaniards only by the experience of others, but that it was not fo with the king of France: to prove which, I instanced what they had done fince the conclusion of fo solemn a peace as that of Vervins; the revolt of Biron, the war of Savoy, and some other grievances. I added, that fuch was the artifice of the Spanish councils, that to put the change upon Europe in regard to its injuries, they always began by complaining first: which conduct was equally dangerous and detestable with that which they usually practised, of treating with their neighbours only with the premeditated intention of deceiving them, even by that fecurity which treaties ought to give. James replied, that all this he knew very well. In a word, I could no longer doubt, that the refentment which he shewed against Spain, before so many witnesses, was as sincere as it was violent. From this moment the first dawn of hope began to appear in my favour.

The king of England changed this subject to that of hunting, for which he discovered an extravagant passion. He said, that he knew very well I was no great lover of the chace; that he had attributed the late success of his sport to me, not as marquis of Rosny, but as ambassador from a king who was not only the greatest prince, but the greatest hunter in the world; and added very politely, that Henry was in the right not to carry me to the chace, because I was of greater service to him elsewhere; and that if I pursued the chace, the king of France

France could not. I replied, that Henry loved all the exercises, but that none of them made him neglect the care of his affairs, nor prevented him from a close inspection into the proceedings of his ministers; being far from that blind credulity which the king of Spain had for the duke of Lerma. Hereupon James faid, that without doubt I had found it very difficult to regulate the finances, and refift the importunities of the great men of the kingdom: and of this he produced fome inflances, of which I had loft the remembrance. He then fuddenly asked me, as it were by interrupting himself, how the king of France did? I judged, from the manner in which this question was asked, that endeavours had been used to persuade this prince, that Henry, fince his late indisposition, could not live long; that he had given credit to it; and that this opinion would be the most powerful motive to prevent his union with France, as he could have but little dependance upon a minor king. I endeavoured therefore to undeceive him, in regard to all these false reports, and succeeded. But he further said, that he had been told one thing in regard to Henry, for which he was extremely forry; and this was, that his phyficians had forbid him the chace. To this I replied, that fuch advice was, perhaps, what he himfelf would do well to purfue. In reality, James had but lately narrowly escaped breaking his arm in the chace, the manner of which accident he had related to me.

WHEN I acquainted Henry with this part of our conversation, he, in his answer, ordered me to tell the king of England, that in pursuance to the advice of his phyficians, he was more moderate in his hunting than he used to be, and that since my departure he had been at the death of five or fix stags without the least inconvenience. "Well," faid the king of England to me, still continuing the same fubject, " I understand you have sent part of the produce of my sport to " count d'Aremberg; and how do you think he received it? I affure " you, it was not at all agreeable to him. He fays, you fent it only to " fhew that you was more regarded than he; and he is in the right, " for I furely will make fome difference between my good brother the "king of France, and his masters, who have sent me an ambassador " who can neither walk nor talk; he demanded an audience of me in " a garden, because he could not walk up stairs into a room." James then asked me, whether the Spanish ambassador, who had been sent to him, had passed through France? and upon my replying that he had: " Spain, faid he, fends me an ambassador post, that he may arrive the " fooner, and finish our affairs in post-haste." Thus upon every occafion VOL. II. C c 1603. casion he enveighed against the Spaniards. Taxis *, courier-major to his Catholic majesty, had, in effect, taken his rout through France into Flanders, from thence to repair to London; and this journey he had performed with great expedition, though his orders extended no farther, than merely to discover the intentions of the king of England. The real ambaffador was Valasco +, constable of Castile, who soon followed him.

> AFTER all this, James asked me (for he did not dwell long upon one subject), whether I went to the protestant church in London? Upon my replying that I did: "Then, faid he, you are not refolved, " as I have been informed, to quit our religion, after the example of "Sancy, who thought by that condescension to make his fortune; " but, by God's providence, did just the contrary." I treated this report as a calumny, and faid, that my living in France in friendship with so many ecclesiastics, and being so frequently visited by the Pope's nuncio, might perhaps have given rife to it. "Do you give the Pope " the title of Holine's?" faid James. I replied, "That to conform to " the custom established in France, I did." He was then for proving to me, that this custom was an offence against God, to whom alone this title could justly belong. I replied, that I supposed that a greater crime was not hereby committed, than by the frequent giving to princes fuch titles as they were well known not to deferve. He spoke to me of Du-Plessis, and appeared somewhat concerned for his fortune and present condition: he said, that I ought not entirely to forget him; that it was true, that he had been greatly to blame, to publish his last book. under his own name; because, by the titles which he therein gave himfelf, he obliged the king of France to take notice of it; but that this ought not to obliterate the remembrance of the services which he had rendered the protestant religion. He said not a word to me, either of Holland, or the duke of Bouillon; but he highly approved Henry's chastisement of the duke of Savoy, who was, he said, an ambitious and turbulent man.

> I THINK I have omitted nothing of any confequence of what was faid to me by the king of England, in this my first audience. When he was inclined to put an end to it, he entered into his cabinet, faying, it would be time for me to go to supper, and to my repose. Upon my coming out of the chamber, I was accosted by admiral Howard, lord

Mountjoy, and Stafford, and the great chamberlain. Erskine, in conducting me cross the court of the palace, spoke to me of his attachment to his most Christian majesty, and his desire of being ranked amongst the number of my friends. The earl of Northumberland, who had received me at my landing, and who again attended me to the river upon my departure, said pretty near the same to me: no one among all the English lords has more understanding, capacity, courage, nor possessed more authority, than he: he manifested a great desire to have a private conversation with me upon the present affairs. I gathered from what he said, though he did not speak in plain terms, that he was not satisfied with the government; that he blamed the greatest part of the king's actions; in short, to say it in a word, that he had no great share either of fidelity or esteem for James. It is not necessary to say with what reserve and circumspection I listened to such discourse.

THE open declaration which the king of England had made against Spain, had given me some hopes that the court of London would be infensibly prejudiced against that court. In the interval between my first and second audience, several things happened which increased these hopes. An English catholic, who was likewise a jesuit (as was at first reported) was seized in the habit of a poor traveller, and being questioned, he confessed that he had disguised himself in this manner, to deliver the catholic church from the oppression of the new king of England, unless he re-established the romish religion in his dominions folely, or at least with privileges equal to those enjoyed by the protestants, and unless he likewise declared himself against the protestants of Holland; that eight other jesuits had conspired with him in this defign, and that they had actually dispersed themselves in different parts of London, in order to embrace any opportunity that might offer to destroy this prince. But the report was false, in regard to the person of this suspected Englishman, for he was not a jesuit *, but only a seminary priest. Had the truth of all the other circumstances been equally well discovered, probably the whole affair would have been reduced almost to nothing; but this was not done. James, according to his character, taking umbrage immediately, imagined that the reason count d'Aremberg deterred demanding his audience, was not on account of his indisposition, which was diffembled, and that he only waited till in this conspiracy, which is the same that will be mentioned below, b. 129.

the supposed conspirators had accomplished their design, or at least till by their intrigues in the kingdom they had occasioned a revolution, which would have released him from his obligations to wait on the king at court.

IT is inconceivable to what a length this frivolous suspicion was carried. The queen was at the fame time coming to London: this, faid they, was to favour the Spanish faction; which so disturbed James, that he immediately fent the earl of Lennox expresly to forbid that princess to continue her journey: but whether the earl could not, or whether he rather chose not to succeed in his commission, the queen did not obey. Lennox was recalled, and the king remained only the more perplexed. After his example, his ministers, courtiers, and particularly the old court, being prejudiced in favour of the maxims of the preceding reign, began to flew themselves greatly disgusted both with the queen and with Spain. They called to mind the conduct and policy of Elizabeth, who had lived in a perpetual mistrust of the court of Madrid. And now they lavished upon her those praises of which they had been before fo sparing, and seemed displeased with themselves at the indifference they had shewn to her memory: nor must I forget that it was not without doing violence to myfelf, that I refrained following fuch a general example.

I BELIEVE the Spanish faction, during all this, was in no little pain; for instead of talking, as before, only of peace and neutrality with all the world, nothing was now more common than to hear it faid, that fo far from having any dependence on what Spain called her friendship and alliance, it was not even fafe to contract with her; that the ambaffador of this court had not dared to prefent himfelf in London, and that most certainly he could not come thither, for fear of becoming the object, and perhaps the victim, of the public indignation. conduct of his Catholic majesty was compared with that of his most Christian majesty. Henry's procedure appeared so open and ingenuous, and fo far from all deceit, that it carried conviction with it: he, faid they, would never have fent into England the man who, of all others in his kingdom, was most necessary to him, to machinate a deceit unworthy of them both; nor would I myfelf, in quitting the court, have thereby left an open field to the malignity of my enemies, only to come and act one of those characters, whose conclusion is generally that of beholding one's felf at once both dishonoured and facrificed to the public indignation. In fhort, if a union between the two crowns, which which I proposed, was not in all respects the best conduct that they could pursue, it was at least the safest; for what would Spain be able to do, when the two confederate kings should consider all dangers which might happen to either, as equally common to both? It was thus that they sometimes reasoned in the council, and in the presence of the king of England, very much to the satisfaction of those counsellors who were in our interests, and who neglected no opportunity of gaining the prince in their party. My lord Montjoy, whom I had made my intimate friend, on account of the almost public profession which he made of attachment to France, herein used his utmost interest and endeavours.

Bur all this only diffipated part of my fears; I perceived fo many other obstacles, that they almost entirely discouraged me; what I might expect from the queen only scarce appeared surmountable. My apprehensions from the secretary Cecil, were but little inferior to those from the queen. He was at this time separated from his former friends, and had united with the Scots. I endeavoured to penetrate into the real motives of this separation; for I was strongly persuaded of the infincerity of this fubtle minister's proceedings. Perhaps his hopes might be in time to become head of the Scotch party, and afterwards to unite it with the English, whom he might have abandoned only in appearance; but these Scotch lords were so difficult to manage, and so much upon their guard against the English, that he could not but be baffled notwithstanding all his efforts; and he was himself too penetrating not to be perfectly fensible of it. Accordingly it was said (and when I became acquainted with the arts of this minister I was myself of the same opinion) that he had fought the Scots, who were real confidents and favourites of his majefty, only to make himfelf known, and render himself necessary to this prince; that, having succeeded thus far, he knew perfectly well how to center all power in himself, and, making use of the king's name and authority, would silence the queen, the English, and even the Scots themselves, or at least would leave to those he should judge proper only some faint shadow of favour, and would then reaffume his real character. And what is most remarkable, it was not unlikely that this fubtle man was himfelf the dupe of the Scots, who pretended to be fuch to him; for is it possible that Cecil, known in England by every one to be the most ambitious and most tenacious of power of all men, should remain unknown only to them? But no doubt they all knew that the prince's ear was not alone fufficient to maintain them at the head of affairs, with which they

1603. were not in the least acquainted, and of which the secretary only could give them the best information.

Supposing also that the Scotish party was undoubtedly firm in the interests of France, there still remained a material doubt, whether so haughty a people as the English would submit to be governed by foreigners, and more especially by the Scots, who at all times had been the object of their aversion; and besides, it was far from being certain that the Scots would always continue to possess the king's favour; for the regard which he already began to shew to the earl of Essex, Southampton, and my lord Mountjoy, plainly proved that they might eafily lose their influence. Lastly, to increase this unpromising aspect, the two kings of Sweden and Denmark, whose representations might have been of great weight in determining this prince, and who had hitherto been so unanimous with Henry, that they had concurred in all his defigns, now either did it not at all, or did it with fuch indifference, that their example was far from inspiring a proper resolution. In the frequent conferences which I had with their ambaffadors, in prefence of the earl of Mar, lord Mountjoy, and Erskine, who was present three times, as being a common friend, they made me the fairest speeches imaginable; their aversion for Spain appeared equal to mine; they even proceeded so far as to draw up a kind of scheme, whereby they ratified whatever Henry might do for all of them, even in regard to the divifion of conquests, which they agreed might easily be performed by means of a firm and durable union. But our conference being ended, they no longer remembered any of their promises, and beheld nothing but obstacles, in regard to which in my presence they had kept a profound filence. A strange behaviour this! from whence, however, I made fome discovery of what fort of men I had to deal with.

My lord Mountjoy told me one day in confidence, that he had been prefent at a meeting of these ambassadors, wherein only those of his majesty's council and the states-deputies were admitted; that here, instead of labouring mutually to strengthen themielves in laudable resolutions, each of them had only sought to draw himself out of the affair. He gave me an account of their deliberations. The Danish deputy represented, that indeed his master possessed a great extent of territory, but for the most part barren, and, by the inconveniency of its situation, rather expensive than profitable; that the submission and tractableness of the people was an advantage of no use to the king his master, because, from the prodigious variation of their manners and customs, he could could neither understand them, nor could they understand one another; and that he was now actually engaged in endeavours to establish a general and uniform regulation among them, which did not permit him to be concerned in any other enterprise. The Swede faid, it would be highly imprudent for his mafter to engage in a foreign war, because his nephew, the king of Poland, had not yet forgot his pretensions to the crown of Sweden, but, on the contrary, seemed disposed to renew them with more vigour than ever; fo that the preservation of his own dominions might probably find him fufficient employment. Barnevelt, in the name of the rest of his brethren, explained himself in a manner so different from his usual complaints, that, I confess, I am at a loss to conceive what could be the intention of so ftrange a procedure: he spoke of Spain only with contempt; in the revolt of the Spaniards, and the forces of the States, he found refources fufficient to preferve them from all oppression; he seemed no longer to despair of the success of Ostend as formerly, and intimated, that his mafters had conceived a defign which would more than indemnify them for that loss supposing it should happen. The English ministers taking their text from a faying of the king of England, That every new king, if he had the smallest degree of good conduct, ought at least to let a year and a day pass before he made any innovation, though of the smallest consequence; concluded unanimously, that it would be most prudent to wait, and they remained firm to this determination. If we consider these geniuses of the North * with some little attention. we shall perceive they constantly preserve some affinity with the nature of their climate; they have but little vigour of thought, few refources in their imagination, little constancy in their resolutions, and not the least tincture of good policy. The example of Elizabeth is an exception to this rule, and is so much the more glorious to that great queen.

I now only wanted to be as well acquainted with the Spanish councils, as I was with those of Britain and the north; or, in other words, I wanted only to know what were the real defigns of that crown, what propositions she had already made to the king of England, how they had been received, and finally what steps she intended to take for the accomplishment of her defires; for barely to understand that the king of Spain sought to detach England from France and the Low

Countries,

It was fuspected that Spain meditated fomething of much greater importance : this might be conjectured from the information which I had already received from the canon at Canterbury; and it appeared fo much the less to be neglected, because Aërsens and Barnevelt both at the same time affirmed the certainty of it, the one at Paris, the other at London. I therefore used my utmost endeavours to come at the truth. What I was told by my lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh was conformable to this information: but what made the greatest impression upon me, was, that the earl of Northumberland, whom I had gained by the offer of a confiderable pension, under the name of a present, with great fecrefy, one night when I was going to bed, fent his fecretary to acquaint me with the following particulars.

> From the moment when king James ascended the throne of England, faid this fecretary, the king of Spain has not ceased to follicit him, either by his own agents, or those of the archdukes, or by the English catholics, to enter into an offensive and defensive alliance with him, against France and the United-Provinces, whom he calls their common enemies. He has omitted nothing which might perfuade him that both of them, but more especially that his Britannic majesty, had a title fo clear and incontestable to several provinces in France, that it would be shameful in him not to make use of it, at a time when the exhausted condition of that kingdom presented so fair an opportunity: and the means proposed by Spain to secure the success of this enterprise, were, that James and his catholic majesty should, at the same time, demand of France the restitution of Normandy, Guienne, and Poitou, for the king of England; Bretagne, and Bourgogne, for the king of Spain; and, upon a refusal, to fall upon these provinces with all their united forces. His catholic majesty, for this purpose, has even offered to draw all his forces out of the Low Countries, moreover to renounce all his pretenfions upon the United-Provinces, and grant them that liberty which they fo ardently defire, upon a supposition, however, that, in consideration of this favour, they would confent to strengthen the league by joining it, and by concurring in all their defigns. The king of England having made no answer to all these great offers, farther than by saying, that they were premature, and that he chose to begin his reign by gaining a knowledge of all his new fubjects, and by strengthening himself upon the throne, Spain eafily perceived that this reply was a civil refufal; and James not being disposed by open force to attempt the recovery of his antient antient possessions, Spain then turned her endeavours to persuade this prince, at least to favour the French provinces in their design (of which The informed him) to erect themselves, after the example of Switzerland. into an independent republic. All this has been represented to James to be extremely easy to effect. It has been faid, these provinces impatiently waited a favourable opportunity to shake off their insupportable yoke; the Spanish emissaries, feconding these dispositions, have every where reported that it only depended upon themselves, whether they would enjoy a profound tranquillity without taxes, subsidies, or military garrisons, under shelter of the two crowns their protectors. and that they had no cause to apprehend either the resentment of Henry, or the violences of his troops, because care would be taken at the fame time to involve him in fo many other perplexities, that he would be under a necessity of fuffering them to prescribe their own laws. We do not yet hear, added the fecretary of the earl of Northumberland, what James replied to this fecond proposition; we conjecture that it was not more favourably received than the former, because the Spanish emissaries, in their conferences with his Britannic majesty, have several times been obliged to change their system, or succeffively to repeat the same again with different modifications. Sometimes they have offered him the whole force and all the treasures of Spain, to use them against France in whatever manner he should judge proper, without requiring any thing more in return, than that he should conclude no treaty without their confent, nor should concern himself in any manner in their quarrel with Flanders; at other times, they have descended only to desire that he would give no assistance to the United-Provinces.

If the whole of what was here related to me was true, from thence might be concluded that France, without knowing it, was actually in the most imminent danger, because a single word of approbation from king James would have drawn upon her a most terrible storm. But for my own part I consess, that to me this appears so extravagant and so much beyond the bounds of probability, that, from whatever places it might come confirmed, I cannot believe that Spain would ever think of proposing to king James any thing like the first propositions which are here related. Supposing all difficulties were removed between Spain and England, in regard to the armament and the partition, which, however, would be no inconsiderable discussion, yet had they well considered how many other difficulties would arise from a disserence of religions, interests, manners, and customs, both between Vol. II.

1603. themselves and with the French provinces which they supposed conformable to their sentiments.

THAT article which concerns the United-Provinces, alone destroys the whole of this project. If Spain began by endeavouring to subject them, this crown and that of England could not be ignorant that fuch an enterprife was alone capable to deftroy, or at least for a confiderable time to prevent the execution of their common defigns, because France, being once convinced that her own fafety depended on the prevention or retarding of this conquest, would have considered assisting the States as defending herfelf: and if Spain proposed to gain these provinces in her interests, she would herein have been more grosly deceived; for no offer, not excepting even that of liberty, would have been able to reconcile them with their most mortal enemy, much less to incline them to affift her in her conquests, and that too of their antient and only ally. I am not ignorant of the manner in which the States deputies have always thought; they upon all occasions have constantly faid that Spain deceived them, that England trifled with them, and that France alone was favourably disposed towards them; and if fometimes they have talked in a different manner, as in the conference above mentioned, it was either to excite the French to make still greater efforts in their favour, or to inspire the English with the fentiments of France in regard to them: belides, will any one believe that Spain would voluntarily relinquish territories, which her own force might acquire?

In regard to the informations which Henry and I received on this head, neither the canon of Canterbury nor Barnevelt, who with Aërfens must be considered only as one, because the former received his information from the latter, could be sufficiently depended upon; the first might have been deceived, and the second might have sought to deceive us, which deceit was not ineffectual in promoting the success of their affairs. In regard to the three English lords, I was so far from depending upon what they said, that, on the contrary, I suspected they were themselves the sole authors of the whole scheme; that they had concerted it together, and then, with proper alterations, presented it to the king of England, to me, to the States deputies, and to the public, thereby to appear as persons of consequence; which was quite suitable to their characters. In regard to Spain, I made no doubt but the would be pleased to hear such reports spread, and even that she would gladly use her endeavours to make them believed, not with any intention seriously to confer with his Britannic majesty concerning them, nor even that they should come to his ears, but only with design to encrease the discord, and augment the number of the seditious in those provinces of France which were interested therein. It was in these terms that I wrote about it to Henry, who sometimes considered the whole as an artifice of the States to accelerate a rupture between him and Spain, and sometimes believed it true in regard to Spain, who, from a desire to destroy Henry, and a hope of profiting from the inexperience of James, attempted every thing. I told Henry, that, though all these schemes ought to be treated only as chimerical, it would be proper, nevertheless, to be attentive to whatever passed in Poitou, Auvergne, Limosin, Pays d'Aunis, in short, through all Guienne, in which places they were capable of producing the same bad effects as though they had been true.

THE day after my audience, being the 23d of June, and a day on which his British majesty conferred the honour of knighthood on several persons, he sent to acquaint me, that he would grant me a second audience the day on which I myfelf had desired it, being Wednesday the 25th; that I should be with him at two o'clock, and bring but few persons with me, in order to prevent the inconveniences caused by great numbers, and, faid he, that he might confer with me alone with greater freedom. Upon this occasion, I was accompanied from London to Greenwich by my lord Hume, who, in France, had had the honour of feeing and discoursing with his most christian majesty. I took some refreshment in the apartment wherein I was conducted to wait till I could be introduced to the king; and here I was accosted by little Edmonds *, who made me a long discourse, in which he complained, that he was not treated fo well as his past fervices, and his knowledge of the affairs of France, deferved. The earl of Northumberland put an end to our conversation, by coming to require my appearance in the king's apartment.

IMMEDIATELY upon my entrance this prince arofe, and, having commanded that no one should follow him, he conducted me through several apartments into a little ordinary gallery, wherein we held our conference. I began it by thanking his majesty for having thus given me an opportunity to disclose myself to him, on the subject of my com-

he had really acquired a perfect knowledge of the affairs of France.

* Edmonds had been agent and afterwards ambassador from Elizabeth to Henry IV. during the wars of the league; and mission, without reserve, and without witnesses; " Not, said I, that " the king my mafter has fent me to require any thing of your ma-" jefty, but only to be informed of your intentions in regard to affairs " wherein your majesties may both be equally concerned; and that the " king my mafter may conform to them, as a good brother." The king of England replied, that the manner in which he plainly faw the king of France and I acted, with respect to him, required that he should not conceal any thing from me; and that he would therefore discover to me his most important secrets. He then, in a few words, pretty justly described the present political affairs of Europe; "in which, " faid he, it is necessary to preserve an equilibrium between three of " its powers," meaning the houses of Bourbon, Austria, and Steuart. He faid, that of these three powers, the house of Austria in Spain, from the spirit of dominion with which she was possessed, was the only one who fought to make the balance incline in her favour; that a knowledge of this unjust defign was the cause that the king of France and he, though in appearance in peace with that crown, were, however, really though fecretly at war with her; that Spain was not ignorant of it, but that the could not complain, the having herfelf fet them the first example; to Henry by her combination with marechal Biron and the disaffected in France, by the succours she had given the duke of Savoy when at war with his most Christian majesty, by the enterprise upon Geneva, finally, by feveral other proceedings of the like nature; to him, by instigating and encouraging the Jesuits and the English catholic faction. From hence it appears, that the affair of the Jesuit had gained but too much credit with James. But that all this could, by neither fide, be confidered as sufficient cause for an open war, and, as they were upon equal terms, it would therefore be best to avoid it. by continuing, as before, fecretly to favour the enemies of Spain, though with a resolution to pursue more vigorous and effectual measures, in case Spain should herself resolve upon any open rupture.

I VERY highly applauded fuch laudable fentiments, and indeed they really deserved it; nor could I have said any thing further on the subject, had I not, at the same time, perceived in the person from whom they came a disposition to peace, or rather to indolence and inaction, which in a manner contradicted his words, and feemed to tell me, that, having promifed a little, he should perform nothing. This obfervation induced me to tell his Britannic majefty, that the plan of conduct which he had laid down to be purfued with Spain, was exactly conformable to the fentiments of his christian majesty; and that Henry only feared it would be infufficient to prevent their one day feeling the fatal effects of the refentment of that crown, whose character, upon this occasion, I endeavoured to paint to him in the most natural colours. I represented to James every thing which Spain had been accumulating for one hundred years past; the earldoms of Flanders and Burgundy, the kingdoms of Granada, Navarre, and Portugal, the empire of Germany, the states of Naples and Milan, all the Indies, and, but for mere good fortune, France and England also, both these crowns owing their preservation, next to the firmness of Elizabeth and Henry. only to the lucky incident of the revolt of the Low Countries; and I concluded, that as both James and Henry would one day be indiffeenfably obliged to enter into an open war with Spain, in order to fap the foundation of fo vast a dominion, it was therefore absolutely necessary now to concert the proper measures for it, that no step might be taken to the contrary; and that this, together with the means whereby the preservation of the United Provinces might be provisionally secured, was all that I had to defire of his majesty. " But, faid the king of " England, what better affiftance would you that the king of France " and I should give the Low Countries, than to comprehend them " with us in a general treaty of partition and pacification between them " and Spain, upon conditions of which we shall ourselves be guaran-" tees? whereby, should Spain first fail in the observation of them, we " shall then have just reason to take arms against her, and drive her " entirely out of these provinces: and I consent, added he, upon a " fupposition that this will be the case, immediately to determine with " you, what means and what forces we shall employ for the execution of it." James was not fensible of all the objections to this partitiontreaty which he proposed between Spain and the Low Countries; or if he was, he artfully endeavoured to avoid entering into any engagement with me. The council of Spain would not have failed to appear fatiffied with what he proposed, but during the delays which negotiating this treaty would produce, especially with a court whose dilatoriness was one of the chief arts of her policy, Oftend, which was reduced to extremity, would fall into the power of its enemy, and with it a part of Flanders, Holland and Zealand being separated from it; and Spain would in the mean time strengthen herfelf in what she did possess, and would be preparing the means for fucceeding more effectually in her defign of subjecting the rest of this state.

I DESIRED his Britannic majefly to befow fome ferious reflection upon the confiderations which I had thus laid before him. He remained 1603. for some time in silence, and seemed deeply immersed in thought; after which, in a hefitating and irrefolute voice, he faid, that it must be confessed I was in the right; that the affair was of great consequence; that he had often thought of it, though his reflections had not as yet produced any effect; and that he had waited my coming, to determine him in his resolution. At this moment I penetrated into all which this prince refused to tell me; and I thought I ought not to hesitate attacking him in his inmost recesses: I therefore replied rather to his thoughts than his words, and faid, that as often as this affair had been debated in his majesty's council, and as often as he had heard his minifters utter fentiments different from mine, his majefty might eafily have been convinced, that they did it only from fome motives of felfinterest, because there was not herein the least room for doubt; that one fingle examination would demonstrate, as evidently as a million, that it was indispensably necessary to prevent the rest of the Low Countries from being subjected by Spain, because, were she to succeed in this, she might, with the same forces, fall very roughly, and without ceremony, upon France and England. Upon this occasion, without exposing these English counsellors so much as I could, by a discovery of part of their intrigues, I fo far acquainted the king of England with them, as to make him fensible that I was not ignorant that they had endeavoured to make him turn those forces against France, which I would perfuade him to employ against Spain.

> JAMES entered of himself into the sentiments with which I wanted to inspire him, in regard to this council: he told me, that he was very far from being of the same opinion with some of his courtiers, in respect to the antient pretensions of England upon France; that, besides that the present conjuncture and political state of affairs did not permit him to think feriously about them, he also considered these pretended rights as annulled by divine providence, which irrefiftibly gives and takes away crowns; and by time, whose prescription was more than centenary; which words he repeated feveral times: that this confideration being of no weight with him, he could therefore previoufly affure me, that whatever his final refolution might be, at least he would not fuffer the United Provinces, nor even Oftend, to come under the dominion of the Spaniards: that for the present I ought not to require any thing farther of him, nor press him to a conclusion, till he had first conferred with two or three of his ministers, whose knowledge, as well as honefty, he was well convinced of; that befides, from the reflections which I had fuggested to him, he was now able to di-Ringuish flinguish and resist the voice of passion and prejudice: and lastly, that he would in a short time acquaint me with what might be farther necessary for me to know, in regard to his sentiments and final resolution.

I should have been very glad not to have concluded our conference on this head to foon, but James broke it off, by faying, that he should finish the remainder of it another time, because he wanted now to have some conversation with me concerning the duke of Bouillon. He informed me, that the deputies of the elector of Palatine had strongly folicited him in favour of the duke; but that, not being perfectly well acquainted with the affair, he had refused to concern himself in it at all, through fear lest he should savour a rebel. He desired me to relate to him all the circumstances of it: which I accordingly did very succinctly; whereby the whole affair sufficiently declared its own merits. James gave me his word, that however he might be solicited by the Palatine, he would never concern himself in it; and said, he wished others would meddle as little in the affairs of the English catholics. I readily apprehended, by the manner in which he uttered these last words, that they carried with them a kind of reproach.

In order to understand what is here meant, it is necessary to be informed, that some time before the death of Elizabeth the partisans of Spain, having, as usual, the jesuits at their head, had raised disturbances in the three kingdoms of Great Britain. Though religion was their pretence, their real views were political, either because the king of Spain, as his flatterers had persuaded him, really believed his rights to the crown of England were so well founded, that after the death of the queen he might openly declare his pretensions, or because he sought to involve the successor of Elizabeth in such perplexities as might prevent his engaging in any thing else. The jesuits, upon this occasion, very imprudently, it should seem, had differed with the English catholic secular clergy: this was chiefly occasioned by their endeavouring to create a certain arch-priest*, which the English catholics would not admit of. The affair was brought before the Pope, who upon this

* Cardinal D'Offat, in his letter of the 28th of May, 1601, to M. de Villeroi, fays, that at the fuggedtion of an English jestist, whose name was father Persono (or Parsons) rector of the English college at Rome, and devoted to the king of Spain, if he was so to any, the Pope created in England a certain arch-prieft, to whose authority all the ecclessiants, and even all the other caetholics of England, were to be subject. By this means, adds he, it was proposed to have the greater part of the catholics of England under the Pope's influence.

occasion, for reasons of which I am ignorant, neither concurred with those jesuits, nor Spain, but, on the contrary, listened very favourably to the secular clergy, who had deputed three of their body to Rome, having a pasport under the hand of Cecil himself: which is a proof that Elizabeth thought she ought to defend the seculars; and also, that she looked upon the others as her real enemies. Henry had been of the same opinion with Elizabeth, and the common interest had from the first determined him at the court of Rome to support the English clergy against the Spanish cabal.

From hence it was that the enemies of France had taken occasion to prejudice James against us *, by infinuating to him, that Henry had supported the English clergy only with design to gain them in his own interests, and that from the same views with Spain. It was not difficult for me to undeceive the king of England in this respect. I represented to him, that Henry having considered, that to prevent the whole body of the catholics of Britain from entering into the Spanish interests, was a point of the utmost consequence; he had therefore been indispensably obliged to appear in their savour upon several occasions; but that he had been so far from having had any thoughts of entering with them into any design prejudicial to his authority, that, on the contrary, his sole intention had been to oppose this common enemy; and that had the catholics departed in the least from their duty, or even appeared so to do, he would from that moment have abandoned them.

James was fo fully fatified with this account, that he acquainted me with the regulations which he meditated in regard to the roman catholics of his kingdom; "from your information, faid he, and with "the approbation of Henry." He had afterwards feveral opportunities of being convinced that I had not imposed on him, particularly by a letter which the Pope's nuncio wrote to him from Paris, relating to the English catholics. James answered this letter in a more obliging manner than was usual with the court of London to letters received

* The king of England cannot be confidered as blamcable for having taken umbrage against France upon that account. The same cardinal give us to understand, that the political views of the Spanish party were by this means to unite the Pope, the king of France, the king of Spain, and the English catholics, whereby to place a catholic king upon the throne of England. But it is likewise thee, that Henry IV. was not only ignorant of this design, but also that he had acquiesced with Elizabeth in quite different purposes. This fact is related in the Septennary, an. 1604. from the court of Rome; and being perhaps determined by my reasons, he not only entered into the same views in regard to this affair which a good policy had suggested to Henry, but it also seemed probable, that to fecure the English catholic party, he would chuse rather to have recourse to the Pope and his ministers, than to any foreign prince. The Pope, on his side, did not shew himself insensible of this preference *: one Colvil having dedicated a book to him which he had wrote against that prince, when only king of Scotland, his holiness would neither receive the work, nor permit the author to stay in Rome. Henry had acquainted me with this circumstance, that I might, if I thought proper, relate it to the king of England; and Henry had been informed of it in the letters which my brother wrote to him from Rome.

Upon my departure, at the conclusion of this my second audience, I was informed that this prince was to set out the Monday following to meet the queen; and I judged, that the audience which his majesty promised to grant me on Sunday the 29th, would, on this account, probably be the last I should obtain; and as I was afraid I should not be able to conclude my negotiation in one more, I determined to demand another of him before that on Sunday. James replied, that he could not grant this request, all his time being absolutely engaged till Sunday; but that he would send his ministers on Friday the 27th, to confer with me and prepare matters.

ACCORDINGLY, on Friday, at three o'clock in the afternoon, there came to me admiral Howard, the earls of Northumberland and Mar, lord Mountjoy, lieutenant general in Ireland, and the fecretary Cecil, who was the speaker. After the first compliments were over, Cecil told me, that the king of England thought that he could not better shew his most Christian majesty how sensible he was, both of the uprightness of his intentions, and his ability in the conduct of great affairs, than by wholly relying upon him in regard to the relief of Ostend, and the support of the States.

* We must believe either that his Holiness had no concern in the political design which I mentioned in the preceding note, as related by cardinal D'Oslat; or that, perceiving it had miscarried, he had conceived that of gaining, if it were possible, the king of England, who had at first shewn himself so favourably disposed to the eatholies, that it was reported he would become so himself; and that he had only pretended to be of the reformed religion, in order to accend the throne without opposition.

I was immediately fensible of this fecretary's artifice, and the defign of it, in thus construing what I had faid to the king of England in a manner different to my real meaning. I replied, that indeed the king my mafter would have been extremely glad to have had fome measures taken in Europe, to prevent the invalions of Flanders by Spain; but that he was fo far from having fent me to give law to his Britannic majesty, that he did not himself know what conduct to pursue in regard to the affairs of those provinces, with the true state of which he was not even well acquainted; that it was therefore vain to think of penetrating into what Henry might have determined in his mind with regard to the States, because, in reality, he had not as yet determined on any thing; that nothing farther could be concluded from what I had faid to his Britannic majesty, than that when he should be well disposed towards them, I could engage that the dispositions of his most Christian majesty would not be contrary to his; and, in a word, that I was come about no other defign, than to be informed of the intentions of the king and parliament of England.

> CECIL replied, that he had no furreptitious defign upon me by what he had faid, but only to hear my fentiments of the prefent fituation of affairs, and to know whether any expedient had been thought on in the council of France, to obviate the difficulties which at London this enterprise seemed to be so full of, that it appeared impossible to be executed. He confessed, in setting forth these pretended difficulties, that a pacific agreement between Spain and the Low Countries would, in the prefent fituation of affairs, occasion the loss of these provinces. Then reasoning from the salse conclusion, that there was no medium between fuch an agreement and an open war with Spain, he endeavoured to. shew, that the war would be still less agreeable, than the peace, to England, which was already exhausted, though at a time too when great expences were requifite in confequence of the coronation: and he concluded yet more peremptorily than before, that France must alone be engaged in the execution of her defigns. He added, indeed, that England might in a year be able to fecond them. The riches and power of France were also a subject which did not escape him. Finally, he attempted, with all the address he was master of, to make me declare, that the king of France, being refolved to make the business of the States his own, defired no other favour of England than that of a neutrality, to which, no doubt, he would give his confent with joy.

I GAVE Cecil to understand, by smiling at his last words, that he had laid this snare for me in vain; and I told him, that, without seriously replying to propositions which I plainly perceived he had made only to give me an occasion of speaking, it was sufficient for me to defire him to take notice of one thing, which he ought to know as well as myfelf, and this was, that England, by fuffering France to act alone for fome time before the joined her, instead of laying the foundation of an alliance with her, would thereby rather lay the foundation of a rupture, because one would expect to enjoy the conquests which she might make during this time, and the other would doubtless require to partake of them. I addressed myself personally to Cecil, and told him, that, nevertheless, this would not prevent my agreeing with him, in case his proposal for an union with France within a year had been fincere on his part, because the king of France would rather chuse to defer the declaration of war against Spain, which he mentioned, till this time, an open war being altogether as inconvenient to France, in the present situation of her affairs, as it was to England.

Upon this occasion, I thought I ought again to repeat, and in terms the most explicit, that I was not come to propose to the English council a declaration of war from the two kings of France and England against Spain; but only to represent, that go'd policy required them not to suffer the United-Provinces to be oppressed for want of succours, which might be given them without disturbing the quiet of the rest of Europe; and to confer with his Britannic majetty upon the nature of these succours, and the other steps to be taken, both at present and in future, in favour of the Flemings. Upon this, the king's counsellors thanked me for the sincerity with which I had spoken; and Cecil, having nothing farther to reply, told me, that he would go and confer with his majesty hereupon, that then he would converse with the deputies of the States about it, and, if I desired it, even in my presence, which I did not think proper to oppose: having said this we separated.

COUNT d'Aremberg, having long deferred from time to time demanding his audience, fent at last to desire the king of England would dispense with it entirely, on account of his indisposition, and that he would only send one of his counsellors to confer with him. James did not appear fatisfied with this procedure; he however granted him what he desired, and Cecil was the person charged with this competition.

mission. Cecil, who was perfectly well acquainted with the reports current at that time concerning himself, being desirous to avoid giving any new cause to vilify him upon this occasion, sought to be excused, and desired that he might, at least, have an adjunct, that is, a witness of his words and actions, though he affected not to receive him in that quality. This sact alone unanswerably proves, that he was far from enjoying that savour which he was desirous the public should believe he absolutely possessed. Kinloss, a Scotchman, was the person associated with him.

D'Aremberg confined himself wholly to compliment, and to the most general terms: when pressed to come to particulars, he replied, that he was a foldier, and had no skill in negotiation; that he was come only to hear what the king of England had to fay to him, and that, after him, his mafter would fend a man of business. These words were repeated and spread throughout London, with all the ridicule and contempt they deserved: indeed no ambassador was perhaps ever before guilty of fo great an imprudence, nor can one but with difficulty believe it of a people fo acute as the Spaniards; it was of great differvice to them in the English council, and brought part of those who composed it over to favour me; and if the designs of Spain were not hereby entirely frustrated, which they might have been, it was because this aukward behaviour was repaired by the address of the other partisans of this crown, having Cecil himfelf at their head, notwithstanding his endeavours to make the contrary be believed; it was even entirely forgot, when it was faid that the Spanish ambassador, who began to be no longer expected, would foon arrive. Cecil, no doubt, waited his arrival, to begin the diffipation he was preparing for my projects, and the other counsellors appeared disposed to fall into their former irresolution. I was even informed from good hands, that it not being doubted but this ambaffador would make propofals to his Britannic majesty, accompanied by irrefiftible offers, part of these counsellors had begun to draw up an account of the debts of France and the States to England, whereby from the fums contained in this account on one fide, and the treasures of Spain disbursed in London on the other, nothing might be proof against them.

What was most remarkable in my reception on Sunday the 29th of June, was, that all the gentlemen of my retinue had the honour of being treated with a dinner by his majesty, and I had that of being admitted to his own table. In pursuance of his majesty's directions, I arrived rived at Greenwich about ten o'clock in the morning, and was prefent with him at divine fervice, in which there was a fermon: he faid nothing particular to me from the time of my arrival to our fetting down to table; the convertation turned almost entirely upon the chace and the weather; the heat was exceflive, and much more violent than was usual at London in this month. There were only Beaumont and myself who fat with James at table, where I was not a little furpriftd to behold that he was always ferved on the knee: a furtout, in form of a pyramid, was placed in the middle of the table, which contained most costly vessels, and was even enriched with diamonds.

THE conversation continued the same as before, during great part of the entertainment: but an opportunity offering for the king to speak of the late queen of England, he did it, and, to my great regret, with fome fort of contempt; he even went fo far as to fay, that, in Scotland, long before the death of that princess, he had directed her whole council, and governed all her ministers, by whom he had been better ferved and obeyed than she. He then called for some wine, his cufrom being never to mix water with it, and holding the glass in his hand towards Beaumont and me, he drank to the health of the king, the queen, and the royal family of France. I returned him his health, and that too without forgetting his children. He inclined himself to my ear when he heard me name them, and told me softly, that the next health he would drink should be, to the double union which he meditated between the royal houses. He had never till now faid a fingle word to me about this; and I thought the opportunity which he had thus taken for it was not extremely well chosen. I failed not, however, to receive the propofal with all possible marks of joy, and replied foftly, that I was certain Henry would not hefitate in his choice between his good brother and ally, and the king of Spain, who had before applied to him upon the fame subject. James, furprized at what I told him, informed me in his turn, that Spain had made him the fame offers of the Infanta for his fon, as the had to France for the Dauphin. The king of England appeared to me to be still in the fentiments in which I had left him in our last conference; though he gave me no opportunity of converfing with him in private. He told me, indeed, before all who were present, that he approved every thing that had been done in the last conference between the counsellors and me; that he would not suffer the States to be overwhelmed; and that the next day, the manner in which fuccours were to be granted them should be settled. For this purpose, he gave orders 1603.

ders that his counfellors should, the next day in the afternoon, repair to London, there to conclude the affair with me. I thought these words sufficiently authorised me immediately to put into the hands of his Britannic majesty the form of a treaty, which I had drawn up and brought with me; and this I accordingly did in the presence of his ministers. Having found means, in the course of the conversation, to drop some sew complaints of the piracies of the English upon the French, the king said, that this happened contrary to his intentions; and he was even angry with the English admiral, who appeared himself inclined to vindicate what had been done. At last, he quitted the company to go to bed, where he usually passed part of the afternoon, sometimes even the whole of it.

The journey which James was to have made having been prevented or deferred, I hoped I should, without difficulty, be able to find an opportunity of telling him what I had yet to say; and this gave me some consolation for having done so little this day. For notwithstanding what has here been said of resolutions and succours in support of the States, I was not ignorant that affairs were not as yet brought to the issue which I desired; for the king of England still referred me, for the conclusion of them, to the same persons as before; and these, I very well knew, were not disposed in my savour: nor did Barnevelt and the deputies from hence draw a more happy presage, for they were very far from considering themselves as having succeeded in their offensive and defensive alliance with France and England, with which they had sometimes slattered themselves. They resolved to make a sinal effort with me, that they might at least secure France in their interests.

For this purpose Barnevelt repaired to me before any of the others, and after having made me acquainted with his apprehensions in regard to the present situation of affairs, and the effects of the arrival of the Spanish ambassador, which was always said to be very near, he told me, that the Hollanders, being reduced to the lowest ebb of despair, would abandon every thing, and seek an asylum out of their provinces. Barnevelt observed, from my reply, that I was not the dupe of his exaggerations: I told him, that it was the English council, and not I, which was to be perfuaded; because I was sufficiently convinced the States were really in a perplexed situation. He endeavoured to prove to me, that if nothing could be obtained of the king of England, good policy required that France should openly and alone espoule the cause of the United Provinces, before their strength and spirits were entirely fpent and exhausted. I replied, that he required of me what was not in my power, because I was come to London only, if it were possible, to enter into an affociation with the English, and in case they refused this, to know their reasons.

AFTER this, we had some discourse about the towns destined for cautionaries. Barnevelt informed me, that Cecil, in a conference with Caron, one of the Flemish deputies, had given him to understand, that England, being refolved to maintain peace with Spain, would require Holland to make the cession of those places as a security; and in confequence of this ceffion, Cecil had only promifed him, that these towns should be preserved in a strict neutrality, till the payment of the States debt. Barnevelt, who perceived that this affair appeared to me as interesting as it really was, acquainted me, though with all the referve which ought to be observed by a man entrusted upon oath with the fecrets of his council, that the States had put things in fuch a train, that the council of London would have many difficulties to remove before it could fee itself in possession of those places. But from hence he also inferred, in order to gain his point with me, that as the confequence of this would probably be a war between England and the United Provinces, it was therefore for this reason that he pressed me immediately to join the forces of France with theirs, without which there would be no equality between the parties. I confessed to Barnevelt, that I could not blame the resolution of his masters; but that the king of France, upon this occasion, could only lament their fituation, not being in a condition to support them with open force against Spain and England together.

In the afternoon, all the Flemish deputies came in a body to affist in the conference; and foon after them the English counsellors, appointed by his Britannic majesty, also arrived. Cecil being, as usual, the speaker for all of them, began by saying directly, that the king of England was really in the interest of the States. And turning to me, he asked me, whether this was not what I defired, and the real defign of my commission? I concealed what I did but too plainly perceive, from this blunt hafty procedure of the secretary; and instead of giving him a direct answer, I addressed myself to the deputies, and told them, that two great kings defigning to interest themselves in their affairs, they ought therefore justly to represent the state of them; that from a full and perfect knowledge of their necessity, the succours which they

1603. wanted might be afcertained. Barnevelt, as usual, drew a picture of the miseries to which Spain had reduced them; and these he described in as lively and affecting a manner as he possibly could. But to come more immediately to the business, he faid, it was necessary that the Spaniards should be driven entirely out of Flanders; and that the States were in hopes of being able to succeed in this in the space of a year, by means which he deduced in the following manner: That the whole force of the United-Provinces amounted to about twelve or fifteen thousand infantry, not including the garrisons, and three thousand cavalry, besides fifty ships actually in a condition to serve, with artillery and ammunition in proportion; that therefore nothing more was necessary, than for the two kings to double these forces, by furnishing an equal number of each as above mentioned.

> I was apprehensive these propositions would not be received very favourably; and that I might not appear to authorife the deputies in demands which were really too great, I told Barnevelt, that he should have been more careful only to ask what could be granted. I then asked Cecil, in a manner somewhat peremptory, to acquaint me what were the real intentions of his mafter, in regard to what was here proposed to him. Cecil replied, that his Britannic majesty would have been glad to have maintained himfelf in a folid and fincere peace with all his neighbours; that, as far as could be judged from the state of France, and from mere appearances, his most christian majesty was probably of the same sentiments. Nevertheless, that from the remonstrances which I had made to the king of England, this prince was determined to pursue the medium between his own defires and those of the States, that is, he would confent privately to affift the United-Provinces: that perhaps a time might come when more could be done for them, but that at present they must expect nothing farther.

THE deputies not doubting but this resolution was really fixed, withdrew to confer among themselves upon what had been said by Cecil, who in the mean time continuing his discourse, said, that indeed the king of England was very willing to affift the States, but that he had no defire to ruin himself for them. He avoided entering upon any particulars, in regard to the nature of these pretended succours, that he might not be afterwards answerable for any promises or positive engagements; but he faid, that in case Spain should carry her resentment so far as personally to attack the two kings, protectors of the liberty of Flanders, in order to make all things equal on both fides, France must contribute contribute eight thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry, and Eng- 1603. land one half of that number; and the same rule might be observed in regard to the foundrons which it would be necessary to have upon the coast of Spain, and in the Indies: and he farther declared, that England had no fund to defray the expences of these forces, except the money owing from France, which was to be paid in two years; but that the king of England would willingly facrifice it for the fervice of the common cause.

I was extremely diffatisfied at the English secretary's thus endeavouring to avoid coming to any positive agreement, by purposely evading the state of the question, and by raising only anticipated difficulties; but I concealed my indignation as well as I could, and replied, that this was not a subject to be talked of in so vague a manner; that it was above all things necessary, without any equivocation, absolutely to determine what should be done in favour of the United-Provinces, and for the relief of Oftend; that, after this, whether the council of his British majesty might be inclined to a war, or whether it might be forced into one by Spain, there would be many other confiderable matters to discuss, in regard to the following suppositions; first, that this crown should attack only one of the two kings, or should attack them both; fecondly, that the two kings should declare thomselves the aggreffors; and laftly, that they should endeavour to make conquests. upon the Spaniards in the Low-Countries.

To make Cecil yet more fensible that he scarce entered at all into the affair, I represented to him, that, in case of the rupture with Spain, which he mentioned, to render the superiority in favour of the two kings, that of France, befides twenty thousand men which he would have in Flanders, would also be indispensably obliged to have the same number upon the frontiers of Guienne, Languedoc, Provence, Dauphiny, and Breffe, not to mention the fquadrons of gallies which he must also have to secure the mediterranean; that it was necessary even now to determine these matters, and to prevent being exposed to a thousand perplexing discussions, sufficient to destroy the harmony between the allied princes.

THEN replying more particularly to what Cecil had faid, I told him, I could not conceive for what reasons he was for casting upon the king of France the whole or greatest part of the expence of a war, in which Henry would be only equally concerned with the king of England; VOL. II.

1602! that if by fuch means the British council fought to distress Henry, it but ill understood its interests, nor considered that, though an equality of expences should be stipulated. France would certainly have other expences to defray, perhaps even greater than these; such were those for the defence of her coasts and frontiers, which, by diverting part of the enemy's forces, would not be less serviceable to England than to France. I added, that, for all these reasons, I thought the English council took a very improper time to demand the payment of the fum lent to France; that Henry was so far from expecting any such matter, that he had given me no orders about it; that I only knew, from the place which I filled in the council of finances, that his intention was to discharge it by annual payments, as had been agreed with the late queen; and that within the current year he proposed to pay two hundred thousand livres; but again, that the British council took a very wrong method to obtain the payment of this debt, by shewing, from their unreasonable difficulties and suspicions, that their sole view was more and more to exhauft France; which conduct was very malignant, and absolutely opposite to that of Henry, who, in all his actions, manifested nothing but honesty and good faith, and laboured only for the public good.

> WHAT I faid made not the impression upon my hearers which I defired; on the contrary, the English took fire, and protested, if any thing farther was infifted on, they would abandon the States entirely. Cecil more especially, in this conference, completed his making himfelf known to me for what he really was; he made use only of double expressions, vague proposals, and false meanings, being perfectly sensible that reason was not on his side. The moderation and sincerity which I opposed to his ill defigning subtilties, forced him into contradictions, which, when by a word I made him feel the ridiculousness of what he faid, put him into confusion. Sometimes thinking to intimidate me, he magnified the forces of England; fometimes he endeavoured to shew the advantages to England of the pretended offers of Spain; he watched opportunities to wrest any words which might drop from me or the deputies to his advantage, and even maliciously supposed that we had faid things which we never thought of; he proceeded fo far, as to endeavour to raife difcord between me and the deputies, by casting upon me the refusal of openly affishing the States: he, and his collegues by his direction, demanded that France should immediately pay to England, in part of what she owed, forty or fifty thousand pounds sterling; and he told the deputies, that these sums fhould should be employed for the relief of their mast pressing necessities, and, upon my refusal, they all said it could be imputed only to met, because, faid they, all the money in France was in my disposal. If all the merit of those we usually call able politicians consist in thus endeavouring to ensnare the open and undesigning, and to make these bear the blame of their wickedness, while they at the same time enjoy all the benefits of it, a politician is then truly a very despicable thing. What piqued me the most was to see that these ministers, who were here only to fet forth the intentions of the king, impudently substituted their own instead of them; for I knew well, and was firmly perfuaded, from the manner in which this prince had, talked to them in my prefence, that he had given them quite contrary commands.

THE deputies, who had returned, and were present during this, again retired, greatly diffatisfied no doubt, and in greater perplexity than before; whereupon Cecil once more changed his battery: he faid, that fince the king of France could not enter into a war but in conjunction with England, the latter could not do it, unless her expences therein were defrayed by France and the States; which neither of them being really able to do, the best conduct therefore which the two kings could purfue, would be to continue to live in friendship, but without intermeddling with any foreign disputes whatsoever. This, probably, was what the fecretary really purposed; and, notwithstanding the length and frequency of his discourses, was all he had ever uttered with fincerity.

As I did not think proper to make any reply to this, the English, believing perhaps that they had gained their point with me, faid, they would relate to the king every thing which had passed in the conference, and would demand an audience from him for me, wherein all things should be expeditiously fettled on this footing, and this audience would probably be my last, and that wherein I should take my leave, because, after this, nothing more would remain to be done. If I kept filence upon this occasion, most certainly it was not because I acquiesced in what they said; on the contrary, the manner in which they had again exposed themselves, and as it were confessed themfelves to be liars and impostors, had inspired me with the utmost contempt for them; but I judged, that expostulation or passion would be fo far from making them quit a resolution which they had concerted together, that perhaps it might rather tend to promote a rupture, whereas, as matters were at prefent fituated, friendship at least sublisted be-Ff2

tween the two kings, and as this friendship might be more strongly cemented by a double marriage (which was publicly talked of) some more favourable opportunity might probably hereaster occur. However, I did not absolutely despair of the success of my commission, because I thought I perceived the king had no concern in the designs which his counsellors thus endeavoured to put in execution.

To come at a certainty in respect to this, was what I proposed in my third audience, for I do not consider as such my reception on Sunday. Cecil had demanded it for me from the king, and this prince fent Erskine to tell me, that it should be on the day after the conference here related, and that I should bring but sew of my retinue with me, because he wanted to discourse with me in particular; and this was further confirmed to me by a Scotch lord, who was extremely intimate with my friend the earl of Mar. The lords Hume and Seaford about noon came to accompany me from London, and, upon my landing at Greenwich, I was received by the earl of Derby, who conducted me into the king's apartment. I had with me only four gentlemen and two secretaries.

THE king of England took me by the hand, and, commanding that no one should follow him, he led me through his cabinet into his gallery, the door of which he also secured. He embraced me twice, with expressions that shewed how greatly he was satisfied with the king of France and me, and how fenfible he was of his most Christian majesty's having fent him the man who, of all his kingdom, was most necessary to him; he insisted, that making use of the present opportunity, I should speak to him without any reserve. This moment therefore feemed favourable to me, to complain to him of his ministers; and, after the usual complimentary thanks, I accordingly told him, that it was much more advantageous to me in all respects to confer with him than his counsellors, who, after having very ill executed his orders in the last conference, had also, without doubt, given him a false account of what had passed between them and me and the Flemish deputies; and I promised, if he would give me leave, to give him a fincere and just relation of every thing.

The king approving my proposal, II acquainted him with all that had passed between us the preceding evening; II insisted more especially upon the demand to discharge the debt owing to England, and on the aspersion upon his most Christian majesty and me, with which it had been been accompanied; I added, that if after having filled my letters to Henry only with elogies on the generofity, the prudence, and the perfect friendship of the prince to whom I had the honour of speaking, and this because he himself had authorised me do it, both by his words and actions. I should be obliged, on a sudden, to write to him in a quite contrary ftyle, without having any reason to alledge for it, other than difficulties entirely frivolous, the king my master could not but think I had acted the part of a flattering, and perhaps an unfaithful minister, to the interests with which he had entrusted me; and it would besides. be confidered as the effect of a determined friendship with Spain, from whence, perhaps, a rupture might enfue between the two kings, whose interest as well as inclination required their continuing in a constant state of union. I thought I ought not to hesitate upon informing the king of England, that there were several of those whom he admitted into his council who were neither well disposed in themselves, nor well affected to his person; that, without naming them to him, he ought to confider as fuch all those who appeared so little solicitous for his glory, and the honour of his crown, as to advise him, under the name of an ally, to render himself the slave of Spain; that he would do well to be, in some degree, distident of such persons whose characters he was not perfectly well acquainted with, and to be guided rather by his own wisdom, than the representations of his ministers.

IT was no difficult matter to inspire the king of England with a diffidence of his ministers, for he was naturally but too much inclined to it. The change which I perceived in his countenance when he heard my last words, his gesture and some expressions that escaped him, convinced me my observation was just; I even thought I plainly perceived, that, either from an effect of this diffidence, or from the praises.I lavished on him, this prince was at last in the most favourable disposition I could wish him; I therefore embraced this opportunity to introduce in our conversation some general hints of a project, by which, with the affiftance of his Britannic majefty, the tranquillity of all Europe might be fecured. Having faid this, I remained filent, as though I had been apprehensive of fatiguing him by too long a discourse: but I knew the curiofity of James would be excited by the little I had faid; accordingly he replied, that my discourse had not appeared tedious to him, but that it would be proper to know what o'clock it was. He went out, and asked some of his courtiers whom he found at the end of the gallery, and they telling him that it was not three o'clock, Well, Sir, faid the king to me, returning, I will break off the party se for 1603. " for the chace which I had made for this day, that I may hear you " to the end, and this employment will, I am perfuaded, be of more

" fervice to me than the other."

THE reason that induced me to hazard a step of such consequence, as that of communicating to king James the great defigns upon Spain and all Europe, which had been concerted between Henry and Elizabeth, was, that being perfuaded this prince was already of himfelf inclined to the alliance with France, he only wanted to be determined in this resolution from some great and noble motive; and because, on the other fide, his ministers constantly brought him back to their manner of thinking, apparently because he could not support himself against them, from a perfuation that they opposed his fentiments only through ignorance of them. However, this did not prevent my taking the following precaution, which I judged to be very necessary.

I THEREFORE refumed the discourse, and told him, that, without doubt, he had fometimes thought, and with good reason, that a man in possession of the places and honours with which I was known to be invested, never quitted his post but for a very urgent occasion; that this was my case; that though my commission was only to require an union between France and England, yet nevertheless, from the opinion I had conceived, which fame had not been filent in reporting, of his genius and abilities, I had refolved, before I quitted the kingdom. to discourse with his Britannic majesty on something infinitely more confiderable; but that what I had to acquaint him with was of fuch a nature, that I could not reveal it to him without exposing myself to ruin, unless he would engage by the most solemn oath to keep it a fecret. James, who liftened to me with a profound attention, hefitated however at taking the oath which I required; and, to render it unnecessary, he endeavoured himself to discover what it was of so interesting a nature which I had to communicate to him. But finding my answers to the different questions which he successively asked me gave him not the least light into the affair, he satisfied me at last by the most facred and folemn of all oaths, I mean that of the holy facrament.

THOUGH I had now nothing to fear from his indifcretion, yet, however, I carefully weighed all my words; and, beginning with an article, in which I knew the king of England was most interested, I mean religion, I told him, that however I might appear to him engaged in worldly honours and affairs, and how indifferent foever he might perhaps perhaps have supposed me to be in matters of religion, yet it was no 1603. less certain that I was attached to mine, even so much as to prefer it to my family, fortune, country, and even king; that I had neglected nothing which might incline the king my mafter to establish it in France upon folid foundations, being under great apprehensions lest it might one day be overwhelmed by so powerful a faction, as that of an union of the Pope, the Emperor, Spain, the arch-dukes, the catholic princes of Germany, and so many other states and communities interested in its suppression; that my success hitherto had been tolerable; but that perhaps I was indebted for it only to conjunctures purely political, which had engaged Henry in a party opposite to the house of Austria. That because these circumstances might change, or because I, who was the only person that would use any endeavours to make Henry continue firm in this political plan, might lofe my place and his favour, I did not fee how the king of France could refift a party, which both his religion, and the example of others, would call upon him to embrace. That this confideration had long inspired me with the thoughts of finding a person for the execution of this design, who by his rank and power would be more proper than me to accomplish it, and fix Henry in his fentiments. That having found all that I had fought for in the prince to whom I had the honour of speaking, my choice had not been difficult to fix. In a word, that it depended only upon himfelf to immortalize his memory, and become the arbitrator of the fate of Europe, by a defign to which he would always appear to have put the finishing hand, though he might not be more concerned in the execution than his most Christian majesty.

There remained only to explain to him the nature of this defign, of which at first 1 gave nothing farther than a general idea, under the notion of a project for an affociation of all the princes and states in Europe, whose interest it was to diminish the power of the house of Austria, the foundation of which should be an offensive and defensive alliance between France, England, and Holland, cemented by the closest union of the two royal houses of Bourbon and Stuart. I represented this affociation in a light which shewed it might be very easily formed. There was not the least difficulty in regard to Denmark, Sweden, in a word, all the protestant princes and states; and it might be rendered sufficiently advantageous to engage in it the catholic princes also: for example, the turbulent and ambitious disposition of the duke of Savoy might be soothed with hopes of obtaining the title of king; and the princes of Germany, with promises to distribute among them those parts of it which the house of Auslria possesses, as Bohemia, Austria, Hungary, Moravia, Silesa, &c. and to re-establish their antient privileges: even the Pope himself might be gained, by granting him the property of those countries of which he only possesses the feedality. In regard to the king of France, though I endeavoured to persuade James that he had hitherto had no concern in this project, which I pretended was entirely of my own forming; I, however, said, that when I should have communicated it to him, I could safely engage he would have no thoughts, either of retaining any conquests which might be made, or of being recompensed for them; though, according to all appearances, the greatest part of the burthen would fall upon him, as well in the expences necessary for the carrying on the enterprise, as his own personal services. I imagined it was most proper to give the affair this turn in regard to Henry, that he might not be under too absolute an obligation.

The king of England immediately flarted fome objections, upon the difficulty of uniting fo many different princes fo differently difposed; the same nearly which Henry had made when we had last discoursed upon it at Montglat, upon his return from Metz: though from the slight sketch which I had given him of the design, he, however, appeared highly to approve it, and expressed a desire of being more circumstantially informed of it. In conformity with which desire, the following is the substance of what I said to his Britannic majesty.

EUROPE is divided into two factions, which are not so justly distinguished by their different religions, because the catholics and protestants are confounded together in almost all places, as they are by their political interests; the first is composed of the Pope, the Emperor, Spain, Spanish Flanders, part of the princes and towns of Germany and Switzerland, Savoy, the catholic states of Italy, which are Florence, Ferrara, Mantua, Modena, Parma, Genoa, Lucca, &c. Herein likewife must be comprised, the catholics dispersed in other parts of Europe, at the head of which may be placed the turbulent order of Jefuits, whose views, no doubt, are to subject every thing to the Spanish monarchy. The fecond includes the kings of France, England, Scotland, Ireland, Denmark, and Sweden; the republic of Venice, the United-Provinces, and the other part of the princes and towns of Germany and Switzerland: I do not take in Poland, Pruffia, Livonia, Muscovy, and Transilvania, though these countries are subject to the christian religion, because the wars in which they are almost continuallv ally engaged with the Turks and Tartars, render them in some manner foreign in regard to those of the western part of Europe.

Were the power to be estimated in proportion to the pomp of titles, the extent of territories, and the number of inhabitants, it appears, on the slightest glance, not very favourable to the second of these factions, and the superiority would apparently be determined in favour of the superiority would apparently be determined in favour of the superiority would apparently be determined in favour of the superiority that the superiority is more erroneous than such an opinion, which may thus be proved: Spain, which must here be named first of her faction (though from rank and dignity she is only the third) because she is in reality the soul of it; Spain, I say, including her dominions in the East and West Indies, does indeed possess a extent of territory as large as Turky and Persa together. But if it be true (and that it is so cannot be doubted) that the new world, in recompence of its gold and other riches, deprives Spain both of her ships and inhabitants, this immense extent of territory, instead of being serviceable, is hurdensome.

AND if we confider the other powers of this party, we shall every where find reason to diminish our ordinary ideas. The Pope seems firmly attached to Spain; and, surrounded as he is on all sides by this formidable power, and having no reason to expect succours from any of the other catholic princes, it is, no doubt, his interest to be so. But as he does, in fact, consider his situation as but little different from real servitude; and as he is not ignorant that Spain and the Jesuits only make a vain appearance of supporting his authority; it may, doubtless, be concluded, he only wants an opportunity to free himself from the Spanish yoke, and that he would readily embrace a party which should offer to render him their service, without the running any great risk; and Spain has in reality this opinion of him.

In regard to the emperor, he has nothing in common with Spain except his name, which feems only to ferve to increase the jealousses and quarrels which so frequently arise between these two branches of Austrian power: besides, what is his power? it consists merely in his title. Hungary, Bohemia, Austria, and other neighbouring countries, are little better than empty names. Exposed as he is, on one side, to incursions of the formidable armies of the Grand Signior; liable, on the other side, to see the territories under his dominion tear themselves in pieces, by the multiplicity and diversity of the religions which they contain; under continual apprehensions also, left the electoral princes Vol. II.

should rise and make an attempt to regain their ancient privileges. Indeed the present Emperor, all things justly considered, might perhaps be classed among the most inconsiderable of the European powers : befides, this Austrian branch appears to me so destitute of good subjects, that if it hath not foon a prince, either brave or wife enough to unite the different members of which Germany is composed, it will have every thing to fear from the princes of its circles, whose only aim it is, to get their liberty, in religion and election, restored to them. I do not except even the elector of Saxony, though he appears the most fincerely attached to the Emperor, as to him of whom he holds his principality, because it is evident his religion must, sooner or later, fet him at variance with his benefactor. But supposing the Emperor to receive all the returns of gratitude which he can expect from this elector, this will amount to nothing, or but very little, fo long as he shall be under apprehensions from the branch of John-Frederic, whom he has deprived of this electorate.

Thus, from a thorough examination of all particulars, it appears, that almost all the powers on which Spain seems to depend for aid, are either but little attached to her, or capable of doing her but little fervice. No one is ignorant, that the general view of the princes and cities both of Germany and Switzerland is to deliver themselves from the dominion of the Emperor, and even to aggrandife themselves at his expence. Nor has he any greater dependence on the ecclefiaftical princes, than on the others. A foreign Emperor is what they most wish, provided he is not a protestant. Nothing could give the arch-dukes a greater pleafure, as much Spaniards as they are, than a regulation, by which they should, in Flanders, become sovereigns independent of Spain, weary at length of being only her fervants. It is the fear of France alone that binds the duke of Savoy to the Spaniards; for he naturally hates them, and has never forgiven the king Spain, for doing fo much less for the daughter which he bestowed upon him, than for her younger fifter. As to Italy, it need only be observed, that it will be obliged to acquiesce in the will of the stronger party.

It is therefore certain, that the fecond of the factions here described has nothing to fear, provided it understands its own interests well enough to continue in a constant state of union. Now it is also certain, that in this scheme these so natural motives to distunion do not occur; and that all of them, even that caused by the difference of religion, which in some fort is the only one, ought to give place to the hatred against Spain, which is the great and common motive by which these powers are animated. Where is the prince, in the least jealous of his glory, who would refuse to enter into an affociation strengthened by four fuch powerful kings as those of France, England, Sweden, and Denmark, closely united? Is was a faving of Elizabeth's, that nothing could refift these four powers, in strict alliance with each other.

THESE truths being supposed, it only remains to examine, by what methods the house of Austria may be reduced to the monarchy of Spain. and to possess that dominion only. These methods consist either in artifice or force, and I have two means for each of these. The first of the secret means is, to divest the house of Austria of the Indies; Spain having no more right to prohibit an intercourse with these countries to the rest of the Europeans, than she has to destroy their natural inhabitants; and all the nations of Europe having also a liberty to make establishments in the new discovered countries as soon as they have paffed the line, this enterprize would therefore be eafily executed, only by equipping three fleets, each containing eight thousand men, all provided and victualled for fix months; England to furnish the ships, Flanders the artillery and ammunition, and France, as the most powerful, the money and foldiers. There would be no occasion for any other agreement, than that the conquered countries should be equally divided.

DURING this, the fecond of these means should be secretly prepared, upon occasion of the succession to Cleves, and the death of the Emperor. which cannot be far diftant, in fuch manner, that under favour of the orportunities which these two incidents might furnish, reasons might be found to divest the house of Austria of the empire, and her other dependencies in Germany, and therein to restore the antient free manner of election.

THE first of the two open and declared means is, in conjunction to take up arms, and drive the Spaniards entirely out of Flanders. in order to erect this state into a free and independent republic, bearing only the title of a member of the empire; and this, when the forces of the allies are confidered, will not be found difficult. The United Provinces, comprehending in them Liege, Juliers, and Cleves, form a triangle; the first side of which, from Calais to Embden, is entirely towards the fea: the fecond is bounded by France, viz. by Picardy, as far as the Somme; and by the country of Messin, as far as Mezieres: the third extends from Metz, by Triers, Cologn, and Gg 2 Mentz, 1603. Mentz, as far as Dusseldorp. It is only necessary to secure these - three fides in fuch manner that they may be inacceffible to Spain, which may be done without difficulty, England taking upon her the first, France the fecond, the electors and the other interested princes the third. All the towns which should happen to be upon this line, except perhaps Thionville, which might require to be forced, would, upon a menace to be put under contribution, immediately submit.

> THE fecond of the two last means, is for the league above mentioned generally and in concert to declare war against Spain and the whole house of Austria. What is most effential to observe in regard to this war, is, that France and England should renounce all pretences to any share of the conquest, and relinquish them to those powers who were not of themselves capable of giving umbrage to the others. Thus Franche-Comté, Alface, and Tirol, naturally fall to the Switzers. The duke of Savoy ought to have Lombardy, to be erected, with his other dominions, into a kingdom; the kingdom of Naples falls to the Pope, as being most convenient to him; Sicily to the Venetians, with what may be convenient for them in Istria and Friuli. Thus it appears, the most folid foundation of this confederacy would arise from all the parties being gainers by it. The rest of Italy, subject to its petty princes, might perhaps be fuffered to continue under its present form of government, provided that all these little states were together considered as compoling only one body or republic, of which they should be so many members.

> This is a pretty just account of the manner in which I acquainted his Britannic majesty with the design to which I endeavoured to gain his approbation. I farther added whatever I thought might tend to obviate his doubts, and confirm him in favour of it. I confessed that I was not myfelf able to elucidate the defign; that I was not furprifed that his majesty had at first perceived great difficulties in it; that Henry would, no doubt, find many in it also, but that they only proceeded from my own weakness, and the impossibility of shewing clearly what to be perfectly explained required much time and long discourses; that I was convinced in my own mind, the defign was not only poffible, but that also the success of it was infallible; that if any thing was found defective in the scheme as I had conceived it, it might easily be rectified by the genius and abilities of four great kings, and fome of the best generals in Europe, to whom the execution of it would be entrufted.

I THEN returned to the alliance between the two kings of France and England, and I told his Britannic majefty, that this alliance being the chief and neceffary foundation of the confederacy which I had proposed to him, this must therefore necessarily begin it, without paying any regard to the discourses of prejudiced persons, or being affected by such frivolous considerations as those of the debts of France and Flanders to England. I affured him, that England had nothing to fear from France, for that Henry's great preparations of arms and ammunition, and his amassing such vast sums, were only designed hereafter to enable him of himself to accomplish the greatest part of this important design; at least, that I could flatter myself with success in engaging him in it, from motives of glory and the public service, which were to powerful upon the mind of this prince. I touched James in his most sensible part, his ambition to immortalize his memory, and his desire of being brought into comparison with Henry, and of sharing his praises.

My earnestness to succeed gave such force and clearness to my expressions, that this prince, entering into my full meaning, embraced me with a kind of transport proceeding from his friendship for me, and a fenfe of the wrong measures which hitherto endeavours had been used to make him purfue. "No, fir, faid he, do not fear that I shall ever " fail in what we have together agreed upon." He protested with the fame ardour, that he would not on any confideration have remained ignorant of what I had told him; that he would never contradict the good opinion which the king of France and I had conceived of him; that he really was what I thought him; that his reflections upon what I had faid would yet farther confirm him in the fentiments with which I had inspired him; that he would even now engage to fign the plan of alliance which I had prefented to him on Sunday, and wherein he had himself made some inconsiderable alterations; that I should also fign it in the name of the king of France, unless I rather chofe to carry it with me unfigned, to shew it to his most Christian majesty, in which case he gave me his royal word, that upon my bringing or fending it back at the end of a month or fix weeks, approved and figned by Henry, he would immediately, and without the least difficulty, join to it his own fignature. He concluded, by obligingly affuring me, that for the future he would do nothing but in concert with the king of France. He made me promise the same secresy in regard to all persons, except the king my master, which I had had the boldness to require of him; and this he extended so far, as to forbid bid me ever putting upon paper certain things, which upon this occasion he revealed to me, and which I therefore suppress.

Our conference had begun about one o'clock, and continued upwards of four hours. The king called in admiral Howard, the earls of Northumberland, Southampton, Mar, lord Mountjoy, and Cecil, and declared to them, that having deliberately confidered my reafons, he was refolved to enter into a close alliance with France against Spain. He reproached Cecil in very strong terms, for having, both in his words and actions, acted contrary to his commands; which explanation the secretary received very aukwardly. "Cecil, said this prince to him, I command "you, without any reply or objection, in conformity to this my defigin, to prepare the necessary writings, according to which, I will then give the dexter *, and all assurances to the ambassadors of messeurs the States." This was the first time he had distinguished them by this title. Then turning to me, and taking me by the hand, he said, "Well, Mr. ambassador, are you now perfectly satisfied with "me?"

I REPLIED by a profound reverence, and by making his majefty the fame protestations of fidelity and attachment as if it had been to my own king, and I desired he would let me confirm it to him by kissing his hand. He embraced me, and demanded my friendship with an air of goodness and considence which very much displeased several of his counsellors that were present. Upon my departure, he gave orders to the earl of Northumberland to accompany me to the Thames, and to Sidney to escort me to London.

LL that now remained to be done, was to put the finishing hand to the several particulars agreed on between the king of England and me, and signified by this prince to his ministers, and to form them into a treaty, or rather into a project of a treaty, between the two kings: for indeed a piece, whose final and principal effect was to proceed from the acceptation of his most Christian majesty, into whose hands it was first to be transmitted, could be called by no other name. And, upon this occasion, I was perfectly sensible of the injury my negotiation received from the unhappy precaution which necessity had obliged Henry and me to take in the council of France, not to propose any thing to the king of England but as of myself.

James, being more entirely perfuaded than I could have wished him, that I had acted only from the suggestions of my own desires, and for the security of the protestant religion against all events which might happen, had never, from the secrets which I had revealed to him, considered me as the instrument of the king my master; and looked upon it as doing a great deal, to engage himself first, upon very promising appearances, indeed, that the king of France would concur with 1603. with him even with greater readiness. But how great is the difference between fuch a general engagement, liable to many various interpretations, and a treaty, wherein, by virtue of a full power from the king, I might, with all the care and exactness possible, have inferted every particular in that clear and diftinct manner, from whence the bonds of all political treaties acquire their strength and duration. I should not fo confidently affert, that, upon this occasion, instead of the mere formula, I had reason to expect his Britannic majesty's fignature of a complete treaty, which it would not be possible for him to retract, had not the murmurs, of which the letters of the count of Beaumont to the king are full, in regard to this deficiency of a figned blank, been an authentic testimony, that I have here advanced nothing from suggestions of vanity or felf-love.

> Bur I should reproach myself with being guilty of injustice, were I to appear fuspicious of the good faith of king James; on the contrary, I affirm no prince in Europe could shew himself more jealous of it. But it happens, from I know not what fatality, that the thing in the world which one would think ought to be least exposed to the caprice of fortune, I mean a political agreement or treaty, the pure effect of a mind free in its operations, and master of its sentiments, is, however, the most changeable and uncertain; the contracting parties in no other inflance would incur the imputation of having forfeited their word, yet in this they almost always fail in the execution, provided they can find the smallest colour or pretence for fo atrocious a perjury; as if eluding a folemn promife or engagement were not the fame as a direct violation of it. I did not doubt, that, as foon as I was gone, the counfellors of his Britannic majesty would use their utmost efforts to render ineffectual what they had not been able to prevent; and I expected that Cecil would be one of the most active for this purpose, for the victory which I had gained over him, the reprimand which he had received from the king on my account, and his confusion from the conversation which I had had with him, when it came to be publicly known, were fo many wounds which altogether had abfolutely mortified him.

NEVERTHELESS, it will readily be admitted that I had reason to be fatisfied with the fuccefs of my negotiation: my own fituation in the affair confidered *, its conclusion was as happy and advantageous as it without taking notice of many modern writers who have spoke of it in the same manner, though fome of them, as the au-could be; for I had gained the glory of having succeeded in an enter- 1603. prife that was thought to be extremely difficult, without running the risque of being accused of exceeding the bounds prescribed by my commission. The king and his council had it in their option to retrench, augment, or alter whatever they thought proper, in an agreement, of which I had neither made them nor myfelf the guarantees; and this was performing all that it was possible for me to effect: as to its real utility, when confidered in respect of Henry's defign, to which I would readily have facrificed all other confiderations, if I had not completely fucceeded, it was because I could not perform more, without shewing a difregard to the terms prescribed, not only in my public, but even in my private instructions. However, from what I had done there arose one real and very sensible advantage; and this was, that, in a conjuncture, wherein there were so many just causes to fear an intimate union between England and Spain, this union was absolutely frustrated, and his Britannic majesty engaged in another, from which he could neither fo foon nor fo eafily return to the former.

I THEREFORE immediately fet about drawing up the form of a treaty, which having finished, I presented to the king of England and his counsellors, to be by them finally revised and examined: they read it several times, successively retouched it, and made some inconsiderable alterations; at last it was absolutely determined in the following manner.

THE king of England, after returning his most Christian majesty many thanks for the very agreeable manner in which he had prevented him, and for the quality of the ambassador he had sent him, renewed and confirmed the antient treaties of alliance between Elizabeth and Henry, and also between Scotland and France, and expressed his intention of applying them personally to himself by the present treaty, which, in a manner, comprehended them all, besides its other principal design of their own personal desence against Spain, and the safety and preservation of their dominions, subjects, and allies, in such manner and at such times as thors of Villeroi's memoirs of State, and of the history of the duke of Bouillon, had no interest in exalting the glory of that minister. P. Befides the detail of the marquis de Rofny's embafly to London, which in every point agrees with what has been faid here, p. 26, & feq. we find quite through this historian many very curious remarks on the council and person of king James, as well as on the affairs of the English court.

Hh

- the

1603. the two kings should judge proper. The United-Provinces were declared to enjoy the benefit hereof, and they were the only allies herein expressly named; in regard to whom it was also stipulated, that proper measures should be taken, either perfectly to secure their liberty, or at least, that in case they were considered as subjects to Spain or the empire, it should be on conditions which would procure them perfect peace and tranquility, and at the same time free the two allied kings from all apprehensions of a too powerful and absolute dominion of the house of Austria in these provinces.

> However, besides that the two princes mutually engaged to declare themselves openly, when either should require it of the other, in order to prevent the effects of the court of Madrid's artifices, it was also agreed immediately to furnish the States-general with succours sufficient to fecure them from oppression; the number of men who were to compose these succours was not determined; it was only agreed, that they should be fent from England alone, and that the expences of the whole armament should be defrayed by his most Christian majesty, one half purely with the money of France, the other half in deduction of the jum due from France to England. It was likewise agreed, that these proceedings of the two crowns in favour of the Low Countries should be purfued with as much fecrefy as was possible, to avoid a direct infringement of the treaty of peace concluded with Spain. On a supposition that this power, confidering this action as an absolute infraction. should make reprifals upon the two protecting kings, the following refolution was taken: if the king of England were attacked alone, the king of France should furnish him with an army of fix thousand French at his own expence, during the whole time of the war, and in four years, and by equal proportions, discharge the remainder of his debt. England should act precifely in the same manner, in regard to France, in case the storm should fall upon her; the choice of either sea or land should be in the option of the party attacked, nor should England in this case require any part of her debt. Finally, should Spain at once declare war against both the allied princes, in order to act offensively, and at the same time promote the security of Flanders, his most Christian majesty should have an army of twenty thousand men on the frontiers of Guienne, Provence, Languedoc. Dauphiné, Burgundy, and Breffe; he should likewise have the same number of forces in Flanders; and should farther divide the Spanish forces, by directing his galleys to cruize in the Mediterranean. His Britannic majesty on his side, besides a land army of at least six thousand men, which he should keep in constant readiness, should fend a fleet into the West-Indies, and should order another to cruise upon the coasts of Spain. All payment of debts should be suspended, and each should defray its own expences. The alliance, hitherto kept a profound fecret, should now be made public, by a treaty offensive and defensive between the two kings; neither of whom, without the other's confent. should either lay down his arms, diminish the number of forces agreed on, nor begin any preliminaries or conference for an accommodation.

Such was the substance of the projected treaty which had given me fo much trouble and anxiety. James figned it, and I figned it after him; after which, I thought of nothing but returning as foon as possible into France, where it was to be changed into a treaty with all the forms. I did not fail to advise Henry of it, from whom, however, I concealed or difguifed part of this important information, and likewife the detail of what had last happened to me with the king of England, in presence of his counsellors: my dispatches had been so long, so frequent, and yet so imperfect, and written in so much haste, that perhaps it was not acting amiss to spare his majesty the trouble; for he must have armed himself with great patience to read them. This, however, was not the only cause of my silence; for the regularity which Henry observed in writing to me, both to inform me of all material transactions in the council of France, and to fend me new orders and new instructions, conformable to the several changes that happened in the business of my negotiation, sufficiently persuaded me nothing of this kind either fatigued or difgusted him; but, besides that upon these occasions, it is a stroke of good policy, always to keep something in referve, to insure a better reception upon one's return, I was unwilling to expose the whole secret of my negotiation to the hazard of a discovery. An accident which had but lately happened, contributed still more to increase my circumspection. I have not mentioned this in its proper place, that I might not interrupt the relation of matters of greater consequence.

Among the great number of letters which I fent from London, some directed to Villeroi and the council, and others to the king only, one of these last, dated the 20th of July, was never received by Henry, which he discovered from the contents of my dispatch by the next post, and gave me immediate notice of it: it was a letter of the greatest confequence. The courier to whom I entrusted it was one of my own domestics, of whose fidelity and honesty I was perfectly satisfied: I Hh 2 questioned questioned him, and he answered, that, upon his arrival, the king being gone to the chace, he had carried the letter to Villeroi, and had given it to one of his clerk; that he did not know this clerk, and had forgot to ask his name, being at that moment interrupted by Louvet, who also came and spoke to this clerk, and at the same time delivered him several other packets directed for his master. This account I sent to his majesty, entreating him to make all possible inquiries about it. After great trouble, and many informations, his majesty was able to give me no other satisfaction than that he had been told, and did believe, the sault was in the post-master of Ecouan.

I HAD before had reason to be suspicious, and the affair of the clerk, whose roguery I was also well acquainted with, having entirely opened my eyes, I no longer doubted, that there was a traytor employed in the king's office, and even that this could be no other than one of those under Villeroi. I wrote to Henry, and told him, that notwithstanding his account of this affair, I was of opinion it could only have happened at the time and place which I had described to him in my former letter: this clerk, whoever he was, being gained by the enemies of the state, to discover the contents of the letters which I wrote to his majesty from London, could not resist his desire to open this, the direction of which excited his curiofity, for I wrote upon the cover; Packet to be given into the king's own hands, without being opened. He repented it no doubt, when he found he could make no use of it, its most effential contents being expressed in a cypher, the meaning of which he could no ways discover; and this consideration consoled me for the lofs: but he had committed the fault, and apparently thought it better to throw the letter into the fire, than deliver it opened. I afterwards discovered the truth, which justified these conjectures.

Henry could have wished that I had practifed upon the queen of England and the prince her son, as I had on king James, thereby to gain a perfect knowledge of both their characters and inclinations; but as, notwithstanding the reports which had been current, this princes remained still in Scotland, and would not arrive for some time, his majesty did not think it a sufficient consideration for me to make a longer stay at London, whilst several other affairs almost as important required my presence at Paris; and he was the first to press me to return as soon as possible. This order was perfectly agreeable to me: envy and malice triumphs most over the absent; my friends lost yet more than me from my not being among them. I entrusted Vaucelas * my brother-in-law with the care of carrying the queen of England the letters from their majesties which I had brought for her; and I instructed him in what he should do and say, to obtain what the king desired to know concerning this princes.

Whilst I was very bufily employed in preparations for my departure, the wound which I had received in my mouth at the fiege of Chartres broke out afrefh, and caufed a fever, which retarded my departure for fome days, and even prevented my writing as ufual to the king. But as foon as I was fomewhat recovered, I demanded my audience of leave of the king of England, who had the goodness to fpare me the trouble of going to Greenwich upon this occasion, by fending to acquaint me, that he would come to London on purpose to receive me, and that he should be at Westminster ready to give me audience in the morning as early as I pleased, because he proposed to go a hunting the same day, "to distipate the uneafiness, added he, very "obligingly, which he should feel for my departure."

I ATTENDED his majesty so early in the morning, that he was not dreffed, and waited near an hour, which time I employed in viewing the magnificent tombs and other curious antiquities for which the cathedral of St. Peter's Westminster is celebrated. I was received by his Britannic majesty with all possible marks of esteem and affection; and he replied to the compliment which I made him on the regret I felt from my departure, that his own, of which he had informed me, was also most true, and the more so as he could not hope for my return, because my many and various avocations would detain me in France; but he protested, and confirmed his protestations in the most solemn manner, that, by whatever person his most Christian majesty should fend back the treaty, of which I carried the form, he would fign it without any farther discussion. He spoke of this his new alliance with Henry in a very affecting manner, faid he confidered this prince as his fole model as well as his friend; and protested, that he should look upon all those who were enemies to him, as enemies to himself. To shew me that he had not forgot any of his promifes, he made a kind of recapitulation of all of them. He promifed not to permit any interceffion or access to him, from any of the subjects of the king of France; and required the fame deference from the king of France, particularly with regard to any jesuits who might be found in disguise, either within his dominions, or on board any of his ships; he praised Henry extremely for having banished this order out of the kingdom, and faid, that he advised him from his heart, never to be guilty of fuch an error as to recall them; he infifted on this article the most: for indeed he hated the jefuits no less than he did Spain; and this aversion was increased by his considering them as his personal enemies; nor did he appear perfectly fatisfied till I had engaged, as abfolutely as I could, to fend these assurances, which he required of his most Christian majesty, in writing. He gave me two letters for the king and queen of France, purely complimentary, in answer to those which he had received from them, wherein the article of the French ambassador was not flightly touched *.

Being furnished with these letters and the form of the treaty, I refolved to stay no longer than the next day. Having taken my leave of all those gentlemen who were with me for this purpose, I departed from London, taking the same road as at my arrival. Sidney and the English vice-admiral escorted me to the sea-fide, and took care to provide me and all my retinue with every thing we wanted, both for our journey by land and passage by sea.

But I should before have mentioned the presents which I made in England, in the name of his most Christian majesty. That to king James was fix fine horses richly caparisoned, to which Henry added also another gift, which ought to be esteemed still more considerable; this was a gentleman called Saint-Anthony, in all respects the best and most complete horseman of the age; that to the queen of England, was a large and most beautiful Venetian glass, the golden frame of which was covered with diamonds; and that to the prince of Wales, was a golden lance and helmet, enriched likewise with diamonds, a fencing master, and vaulter: the duke of Lennox, the earl of Northumberland, in a word all those whom I have occasionally mentioned, besides some others, were presented, some with boxes, and others with crotchets, buttons, egrets, rings, and chains of gold and diamonds; several ladies also received rings and pearl necklaces. The value of all these presents, including twelve hundred crowns which I left with Beaumont to be distributed in certain places, amounted to fixty thou-fand crowns. Henry's views in making so many rich presents, a confiderable part of which were even continued as pensions to some English lords, were to retain them, and attach them more strongly to his interests. I made them partly from my own knowledge, and partly from the recommendations of Beaumont, my chief care being to distribute them so as to avoid giving any cause of jealousy between these English lords, and to prevent king James himself from conceiving any jealousy of my intention. The precaution which I used for this purpose was to ask his permission, by some small gratifications to acknowledge the services I had received in his court.

AT Dover I received a letter from Henry, wherein he acquainted me, that he had arrived at Villers-Coterets the 9th of July, at which place he impatiently waited for me: he paffed fome days here, during which the queen made a journey to Liesse. I did not take any rest at Dover, and ordered all things to be in readiness to embark the next day. The weather was so bad in the night, that the English viceadmiral very feriously advised me to alter my resolution. The least delay appeared no less insupportable to all my retinue than to myself, especially to those city sparks who find themselves out of their element, when they are off the pavement of Paris: they all preffed me with fuch eagerness immediately to quit Dover, and Henry's letter flattered me with fo favourable a reception, that I confented to fail as foon as we could. Repentance foon followed our precipitation; we met with fo violent a tempest, that we were in the utmost danger; we were the whole day in croffing the channel, and fo extremely fea-fick, that though we were three hundred of us, had a veffel with only twenty men attacked us, we must have surrendered.

A SECOND letter which I received from Henry at Boulogne, rendered it necessary for me not to lose a moment. At this place, I quitted those who had accompanied me, after having thanked them for the honour they had done me, and lest them to go wherever they thought proper. His majesty had taken care to order post-horses to be in readines in all the proper places upon the road, in case my health would permit me to make use of them. I therefore took post at Abbeville, at three o'clock in the afternoon, and arrived the next day at eight in the morning at Villers-Coterets.

I would not take any repose till I had first received the honour of saluting his majesty. I sound him in that walk of the park which leads to the forest, where he proposed to take an airing on some horses that were to be brought there to him; Bellievre, Villeroi, De Maisses, and Sillery, were walking with him, and in one of the walks adjacent were the count de Soissons, Roquelaure, and Frontenac. Immediately upon his perceiving me, though at a distance, he said, as De Maisses afterwards informed me, "There's the man I have so much "wished to see, he is at last arrived; my cousin the count of Soissons "must be called, that he may be present at the brief relation he will "give us of what he has seen, heard, faid, and done, of which he has wrote me nothing: let my horses be sent back, I shall not now go into the forest."

His majesty would not suffer me to kneel to kiss his hand, but embraced me twice very closely. His first words were, that he was perfectly fatisfied with my fervices; that he had not thought my letters tedious, and that he should take pleasure in hearing what I had not related in them. I replied, that this relation would be formewhat long, and could not well be made, but as opportunity should present, to discourse on so many different matters. I began with the person of the king of England, which I described to him nearly the same as I have already in these Memoirs: I did not omit either the admiration which this prince expressed for his majesty, or the delight he took on being compared with him, nor his defire to render himfelf worthy of the comparison. I related the proofs which he had given me of his attachment to France, of his contempt for the chimeras with which Spain had endeavoured to inspire him, and how far he was from espousing the party of the revolted French calvinists. King James was fenfible from his own fituation, how very unfit this last procedure would have been, having fo great a number of feditious in his own dominions, that I was very much deceived, if they did not one day cause him much trouble. I added, that if I had myself been disposed to give ear to them, the chiefs of this faction had given me fair opportunities to enter with them into very ferious enterprifes: I mentioned the affair of the lost dispatch, and spoke my sentiments of it with freedom. I then returned to the king of England, and acquainted his majefty with what he was ignorant of in regard to my last audience, and, together with the form of the treaty figned by us both, I presented to him the two letters from his Britannic majesty, and another letter wrote wrote to his majefly, fince my departure from London, by the count of 1603. Beaumont, which I had received upon the road. Henry ordered Villeroi to read all those letters to him.

BEAUMONT in his letter acquainted the king, that the queen of England, with her children, was instantly expected in London, from whence the would go directly to Windfor to refide there with the king; that many were apprehensive her arrival would cause disturbance in affairs, and might inspire the factious with courage; that happily there was no able man among them; that the Spanish ambassador was at last arrived in England, and, with another from the duke of Brunfwic, was faid to be actually at Gravefend, from whence they were immediately to proceed to London, his Britannic majesty having sent ships to protect the Spanish ambassador in his passage against those of the States; that count d'Aremberg depended fo entirely upon the alterations which this ambaffador would make in affairs, that being informed of his arrival, he was gone before him to Windsor, there to wait his coming: nor did Beaumont diffemble his own fears of the effects which it might have on a prince fusceptible of new impressions, not so much from what he would gain from the magnificent offers of Spain, as from his own natural timidity, his weakness, and even scruples, lest, in supporting the United-Provinces, he should countenance a parcel of rebels.

BEAUMONT wrote thus from the communication which had been made to him of a plan for an agreement between Spain and the States, defigned and drawn up in Germany, of which he even gave the purport in this letter; but he feemed perfuaded the deputies of the Low Countries would never confent to it, though the emperor should be guarantee of it, because they thought it neither strong enough to oblige Spain to observe it, nor even sufficiently impartial, to hope from it a perfect peace with that crown; befides, that they had a general fuspicion of all propositions wherein France and England were not concerned. He observed, that these deputies were likewise upon the point of returning home, with a refolution to animate their republic to a vigorous defence, from the certainty my convention with his Britannic majesty had given them, that they should not be abandoned by the two kings, and from the permission which James had given them to raife foldiers in Scotland, to be commanded by my lord Buccleugh, whom they had accepted as colonel of these recruits: finally, Beaumont concluded his letter, by faying, that, in order to be still more perfectly informed of every thing that paffed, and to remind the king VOL. II.

of England of his promifes if necessary, he was going himself to Windfor. I take no notice of those passages in this letter, wherein Beaumont gave the highest praises to my conduct and my negotiation.

VILLEROI having finished reading the plan for a treaty, " Well, " coufin, faid Henry, addressing himself to the count of Soissons, " what do you think of all this? give me your opinion of it freely." I readily imagined what reply he would make, and the count did not deceive me. "Since you require it of me, faid he, I must say, that "I think the marquis of Rosny has very great credit with the king of " England, and that he is in a marvelous good intelligence with the " English, at least if his relation, and all which you have been informed " of, is true; for which reason he ought to have brought much more " advantageous conditions, and a treaty in a better form than that " which he has prefented to you, which is really nothing more than " a mere project of hopes and fair words, without any certainty that "they will ever be executed." "What you have faid is truly very " fine and good, replied Henry: nothing is so easy as to discover faults " in the actions of others." His majefly still continued to speak, as if to make my apology, and altogether my elogy. He faid, I was the only person in France who, with so limited a power, could have persormed what I had; that my credential letters were not even demanded of me at the court of London, which behaviour was not to be paralleled; that he had foreseen and expected the difficulties with which I had struggled, and that he had not hoped I could have fo eafily conquered them; that he was perfectly fatisfied, and that he only repented his not having given me Carte-blanche. "Rofny, faid he, in his conduct " has given me an example, which confirms to me the truth of a Latin " proverb, though I do not know whether I speak it right, Mitte " fapientem, & nibil dicas: and I am certain, that, if his prefence " should again become necessary on the other side, he will always be " ready to return, and ferve me with the fame ability and address " which he has here shewn." I do not relate all by a great deal with which, upon this occasion, the generous foul of Henry inspired him for my defence: what gave me the most fensible satisfaction, and which I confidered as infinitely fuperior to all the praifes he bestowed upon me, was his adding, that he had nothing to fear from thus praising me to my face, because he knew that, instead of those praises making me vain and less diligent, they would only increase my defire of acting fill better. These words filenced the count of Soissons.

I THEN answered several questions which the king asked me, touch- 1602. ing the nature and power of the three kingdoms of Great Britain, on the character of the English, and what they thought of their new king. After this, the conversation turned on the affair of Combaut. Henry, after I had given him a circumstantial relation of it, gave his entire approbation of my conduct therein, confidering it as equally dangerous either to favour, or pretend ignorance of the escape of the criminal, to endeavour to excuse him, or openly to vindicate him. I acquainted his majesty with the character of young Servin *, such as I have already given. The king having twice asked whether dinner was ready, went in to fit down to table, having first directed Villeroi to provide me my dinner, and ordered me to go and take my repose till the next day, as being what I must very much want, after having rode post, and that fucceeded by a pretty long walk. He ordered my good friends Frontenac and Parfait, to serve me from his kitchen, till my own equipage and attendants were arrived; "And to morrow morning, faid he, we " will renew our discourse."

In the afternoon, the king took the airing in the forest, which he had intended in the morning; in the evening at supper, he fent me two excellent melons and four partridges; at the fame time acquainting me, that I should come to him early the next morning, before any of his counfellors were with him, which I accordingly did. Though it was very early, he was dreffed, and had breakfasted, when I entered his apartment, and was diverting himself with looking at a game of tennis then playing in the little court of the caftle, which was generally used for this diversion. "Rosny, faid he, we will take a walk while the " freshness of the morning continues; I have some questions to ask " you, and fome matters to discuss, on which I have been thinking " the whole night. I arose at four o'clock, these things having present " my thoughts fo strongly, that I have not been able to sleep." He took me by the hand, and we walked into the park, where we continued near two hours alone. Bellievre, Villeroi, and Sillery, having joined us, the king continued walking another hour with us four. Our mornings were generally spent in the same manner; during the three following days which his majefty paffed at Villers-Coterets. In these conversations, I gave him an exact and particular account of all 1603. the most secret and important matters, with which he still remained to be acquainted with.

I RECEIVED feveral letters from Beaumont, the contents of which may serve as a supplement to the affairs of England, which I have already related. The arrival of the queen at London did not occasion all that disorder which had been apprehended; the discontented found her not to be what they had conceived. It feemed as though her fudden change of fituation and country had made as fudden a change in her inclinations and manners; from an effect of the elegancies of England, or from those of the royal dignity, she became disposed to pleafures and amusements, and seemed wholly engaged in them and nothing else: she so entirely neglected or forgot the Spanish politics, as gave reason to believe she had, in reality, only pretended to be attached to them through the necessity of eventual conjunctures. Kinlofs, who had accompanied her, openly continued his profession of attachment to France. Some ladies, in whom this princess reposed the greatest confidence, positively affured Beaumont she was not so perfect a Spaniard as was believed. Beaumont contrived to get himself prefented to her, and made my excuses to her for not having been able to flay till her arrival, nor wait upon her myfelf with the letters from their majesties.

DURING all this the Spanish ambassador, whose arrival in England had been so positively afferted, was not yet come. Count d'Aremberg, who was fo far deceived in his expectation as to go and wait his arrival at Windfor, found himfelf at last obliged without him to demand his audience of the king, who granted it. I am ignorant of what paffed in it: I only know that he demanded a fecond, for which the king made him fuffer a thousand delays, which however can only be attributed to this prince's distaste of business, and his passion for the chace, which feemed to make him forget all other affairs; for at this very time, his conduct and discourse was so far from giving the Spanish partifans any cause to despair, that, on the contrary, he appeared ditposed again to fall into his former irresolution. Beaumont did not know to what to attribute this change, whether to his natural disposition, or to the infinuations of Cecil, who used all the means he possibly could to make him fail in the observance of his promises. Happily many new incidents concurred to support this prince against all temptations of this kind; and the Spaniards were so imprudent in their conduct, as to be themselves the principal causes of it.

No fooner was the Spanish ambassador arrived in London (for he did at last arrive there) than both court and city, and all affairs were put into a violent ferment, the effects of various cabals, intrigues, mistrusts, and fuspicions. He foon multiplied the number of his creatures, by his extraordinary liberalities to all those whom he considered as necessary to be gained. He endeavoured to tamper with the Scotch troops, and engage them in the Spanish service, as the States had done in theirs: this would have been a decifive stroke, which Holland could not evade any otherwise than with the assistance of her protectors, by retaining these troops in her own service. All these proceedings of the Spaniard, being purfued with a spirit of pride and independence, were so much the more difagreeable to James, as his natural weakness produced in him a repugnance to oppose them by an exertion of his authority. He would have given the world to be freed from his perplexity, by the departure of the ambaffador. A whifper was likewife current concerning a conspiracy of the English catholics * against James's person. Beaumont constantly treated this infinuation as a calumny; and indeed, whoever is acquainted with the true state of this body in England at this time, will, in its weakness and the meanness of its sentiments, discover an unanswerable argument to disprove it.

Bur a more certain and undoubted conspiracy was that of some English lords, who formed the defign of stabbing the king. Their chiefs, for the defign was proved, and it was believed they had undertaken it at the instigation of Spain and the archdukes, were lord Cobham, Raleigh, Gray, Markham, and feveral others of the principal fervants, and even the intimate confidants, of the late queen, though they had appeared among the most forward to do homage to her succeffor. Nevertheless Cecil was not named in the cabal; the affair was public, and was the subject of much discourse. A religious dispute, which arose in the conference between the protestants and puritans, increased the disorder. The conversation of the court turned entirely upon the difputes and quarrels which happened between particular perfons. The earl of Northumberland struck colonel Vere in the face, in presence of the whole court, and was confined at Lambeth by the king's order, who was justly incenfed at so disrespectful and outrageous an infult. The earl of Southampton and lord Grey gave each other the 1603. lie in the queen's presence, and used several other atrocious expressions; but they were reconciled to the king by asking pardon for their impudence of the queen, and to each other by an intervention of the royal authority, commanding them to forbear any acts of violence. After which, without any other fatisfaction, they converfed together as friends: from whence one would be apt to imagine they were of opinion, that the king's name and authority preferves the honour of those who cannot vindicate it for themselves.

When from the accounts which Beaumont gave me in his letters, of all these public and private differences, I found the affair was in the most favourable situation I could desire it, I embraced the opportunity to put the finishing hand to the work which I had begun at London: I did myfelf the honour of writing to his Britannic majesty; I informed him, that the king of France had with pleasure ratified the plan concerted between his majesty and me, and that he had sent the count of Beaumont the necessary power to reduce it into such a form as his majesty should judge proper; I repeated the protestations of obedience and attachment which I had before made him; I affured him, that by this I was fo far from offending the king my mafter, that, on the contrary, I ferved and obeyed him.

I WROTE at the same time to Beaumont, and informed him of what had happened to me upon my return into France, of my conversations with the king, and his inclination to fend me again at a proper time into England. With this letter I also sent Beaumont the treaty figned by his majefty, and gave him likewise the necessary instructions for maintaining the good intelligence which this treaty established between the two crowns: this would in some measure depend on that which should subsist between the ambassisdor of France at London, and that of England at Paris. This latter had taken offence at the fuperscription of a letter, wherein a title had been given him which was either improper, or fuch as he did not like. I took the blame of this upon myfelf, and repaired it as well as I could.

Beaumont having received the treaty, acquainted the king of Fngland therewith, who referred him directly to Cecil. He was aftonished to find this fecretary on a fudden become tractable, give his approbation of it with great readiness, and without making the least difficulty; on the contrary, he was lavish in his praises of his most Christian majefty and me: all things conspired to promote it; the treaty was therefore received, figned, and accomplished, in the most authentic and folemn manner. Dauval being arrived in France from Beaumont with an account of this good news, I made my acknowledgments to his Britannic majesty in a second letter: and to employ all forts of counterbatteries against the Spaniards, who set no bounds to their presents, we imitated them in this respect, and even gave pensions to all the most distinguished persons in the court of king James; the best and most beautiful horses were industriously procured wherever they could be found, and they were sent, together with magnificent furniture, as presents to this prince.

Thus was Spain disappointed in those great hopes she had conceived to our prejudice, from the accession of the king of Scotland to the throne of England, and which probably were the motives for her making those great armaments which she did this year. On the 27th of May, a squadron of twelve Spanish galleys, mann'd with three thoufand soldiers, and completely equipped, were beaten by only four Dutch vessels; which was the second loss of this kind that Spain had lately suffered: Frederic Spinola, who commanded this squadron, was killed in the engagement. Spain, to retrieve these missfortunes, made such preparations on every side for war, as spread a terror amongst all her neighbours; she made herself mistress of the Mediterrancan, by the galleys that Charles Doria commanded there; and vessels in the mean time were building in the port of Lisbon, for the embarkation of twenty thousand foldiers. This work was pursued with such indestatigable labour, that it was not remitted even on Sundays and holidays.

Every one talked his own way about the occasion of such formidable preparations: some said, that they were designed against Flanders, particularly Ostend; others, that they were destined for the conquest of Barbary, because the king of Cusco having promised the council of Madrid to affist that crown in the reduction of the important city of Algiers, they provided a supply of men and money, which that prince kept to himself, without being at much trouble about the performance of his word. Many persons were persuaded that Spain had a design upon France itself: the first notice his majesty received of it, was at the same time that he was advised to be attentive to the castle of If, and to the islands on the coast of Marseilles. I was then in England; his majesty wrote me an account of it, but did not seem to give much credit to those informations, although he was not ignorant that the duke of Savoy was very solicitous to do him this bad office; but he knew likewise 1603. likewise that Spain thought this advice of the duke's very interested; and the pope gave him repeated affurances of the contrary, which there was great room to think proceeded indirectly from the council of Spain, who had reasons for not provoking this prince too far.

> In reality, all this was unravelled by taking into confideration, what was carrying on with king James, by a double negotiation of France and Spain at the same time; and his majesty took the side which prudence directed, which was, to give new orders for the ftrict observation of discipline in Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné. Monsieur Le-Grand, who had lately obtained that the artillery of the city of Beaune should not be taken away, was fent into his government of Burgundy, with orders to act in concert with Lesdiguieres, and to throw himself into Geneva, if the duke of Savoy feemed to have any intention of making a new attempt upon this city, although the council of France at the fame time earnestly advised this little republic to listen to the mediation offered by fome Swifs cantons, to terminate by an advantageous agreement that kind of tedious and long war which had fo long fubfifted between them and Savoy. However, the transportation of arms from France into Spain, or Spanish Flanders, was prohibited; and Bar-

Emerick Go-rault caused four thousand five hundred pikes of Biscay to be seized at bier de Bar-Saint-John-de-Luz, which a French merchant of Dieppe had emrault. barked for the Low-Countries, notwithstanding this order.

> THE long flay which was made by Doria on the coast of Genoa with the galleys before mentioned, was another mystery that could not be found out. He had failed for the coast of Villa-Francha, as if with a design to take the three sons of the duke of Savoy on board, who appeared to be waiting at Nice only for an opportunity of being conveyed to Spain; their father, it was faid, fent them there to be educated, and to be raifed to the first dignities of the state *, the government of Milan, and the viceroyship of Naples and Sicily, being those he most eagerly panted after, probably because he flattered himself, that those titles would afford him an opportunity to fnatch some part of those territories for himself. But every one was deceived; Doria pasfed by without landing or stopping at Villa-Francha: nevertheless, there were persons who continued to believe that it had been his design, but that his refentment for Savoy's not paying him those honours, nor efteeming him so highly as he thought he deserved, had prevented his execution of it; others maintained that it was agreed upon between the duke of Savoy and him, that he should act in this manner, to give the duke a pretence for staying longer at Nice, where, faid these conjecturers, he only waited for an opportunity to make an attempt upon Provence; and others again thought they had discovered the reason of his departure, to be an order which they supposed he had received from Spain to go and join his fquadron to the great naval army of the Spaniards: or possibly the council of Madrid had nothing else in view, but to accustom her neighbours to preparation and motions, for which they could not guess the cause. However that may be, this did not prevent the voyage of the children of Savoy into Spain; after a delay of fome time longer at Nice, they passed on the twentieth of June within view of Marfeilles, without faluting the castle of If; their convoy confifted of nine galleys, four of Malta, three of the Pope's, and two of Savoy.

In the mean time, some other Spanish troops were upon their march from Italy to Flanders. His majefty was the more attentive to their motions, because he was informed that Hébert, who had lest France and retired to Milan, continued his former intrigues with the count of Fuentes: the fecret was discovered by a letter that Hébert wrote to his brother, who was a treasurer of France in Languedoc. These troops, as I was informed by his majesty's letters to me at London, quitted Savoy, and passed the bridge of Gresin on the first of July; they confifted of ten Neapolitan companies, commanded by Don Imgo de Borgia, and only Don Sancho de Lune remained in this canton with a finall body of troops, with a view no doubt to haften the treaty depending between Savoy and Geneva, which was concluded accordingly on the 15th of the same month. The remainder of the Spanish troops that were drawn from Italy, confifted of four thousand Milanois, commanded by the count de Saint-George, who took the fame rout.

Notwithstanding these supplies, by which the archdukes received a great accession of strength, yet Henry was still of opinion, that the Spaniards would not complete their enterprise upon Ostend this year; they themselves seemed to think that time alone could bring it about, their forces being considerably diminished. The thousand horse that attended the duke of Aumale were reduced by desertion to less than five hundred, and those that remained were so great an expence to their own commanders, that they expected to be soon obliged to Vol. II. Kk difband them. Such was the fituation of the United-Provinces during this year, wherein they gained likewife another advantage over their enemies; a finall number of Dutch veffels who were going to load fpices, meeting with fourteen Portuguese galleys belonging to Goa, gave them chace, took five, in which they found great riches, and dispersed the rest.

EUROPE, during the course of this year, had not more tranquillity in the east, than the west. Mahomet the third, to secure himself as he thought in the throne, cut the throats of twenty of his brothers. Buried in the recesses of the feraglio, he did not perceive that his mother, to whom he entirely abandoned the government, abused his authority: and was first informed of it by the Janizaries, who came one day in a body, and in a manner that shewed they would neither brook a denial nor delay, demanded the head of the two Capi Agas, who directed the council of the sultana-mother, and the banishment of this fultana herself, which he was obliged to comply with immediately. He afterwards put his own son, and the sultana his wife to death, and was himself seized with the plague, of which he died.

BUT it is now time to resume the affairs of the kingdom. His majesty having returned from Villers-Coterets to Fontainebleau, I left him in this last place, and came to Paris, to attend my usual employments: these were to make the receivers-general of the districts, and other persons in office, bring in exact accounts; to cashier those who were convicted of any mildemeanour, as it happened to Palot a receiver in Languedoc and Guienne; to make a provision of fums necessary to keep the old allies of the crown, and to acquire new ones, and the maintenance of those that resided in foreign courts for this purpose; and lastly, by the mere force of frugality and economy, to enrich the treasury, by discharging all the debts his majesty had contracted during the league, and the other engagements of the state, at the head of which his majefty generally placed the penfions he allowed the Swifs cantons, and was always very folicitous to know if they were discharged: the fewer allies we had in Italy, the more necessary the king thought it to footh and manage them. He made a prefent of a fuit of armour, which he had one day worn in battle, to the Venetian refidents at Paris; that republic earnestly requested it of him, and fet fo high a value upon this prefent, that they hung up the fuit of armour, with a kind of ceremony, in a place where it was publicly exposed to view, and served for a monument to posterity, of their veneration of a prince who was so justly famous for his military virtues.

As the new economy, which I had introduced into every branch of the revenue, cut off the greatest part of those profits which the courtiers and other persons about the king drew from different places, and lesfened the prefents his majefty made them from his own purfe, they fell upon methods to fupply this vacuity; to which the prince, delighted with an opportunity of fatisfying them, confented fo much the more willingly as it cost him nothing; this was to prevail on his majesty to pass innumerable edicts, granting certain privileges and tolls upon particular parts of trade, to be enjoyed by them, exclusively of all others. When this trick was once found, there was nothing that promifed profit, which did not get into the brain of one or other among those who thought they had a right to some favour from the king; interest gave every man invention, and the kingdom immediately fwarmed with those petty monopolies, which, though fingly of little confequence, yet altogether were very detrimental to the public, and particularly to commerce, in which the least obstruction produces mischief. I thought it my duty to make frequent and earnest remonstrances to the king on this fubject, and therefore made no scruple to expose myself to the anger of the count of Soiffons, with whom, as I have already faid, I could never live three months together without a quarrel.

THE count of Soiffons presented a petition to the king at Fontainebleau, in which he proposed that a grant should be made him of fifteen-pence upon every bale of goods exported; a defign that must certainly have been fuggested to him by some of his friends, for he could never have thought of it himself; nor did he know all the consequences of it, at least he affured the king that this toll would not bring in more than thirty thirty thousand livres a year; and so well persuaded him of the truth of what he had afferted, that his majefty, who thought himfelf obliged to bestow a gratification of this value upon him, and being likewise vanquished by repeated importunities, granted his request, without giving me, who was then at Paris, any notice of it. Henry, that he might be troubled with no farther folicitations about it, caufed an edict to be expediated for the count, which he figned, and the feal was placed to it; but some remains of a scruple with regard to trade, the importance of which he was fully fenfible of, made him, in granting this favour, referve a verbal condition, that it should not exceed fifty thousand livres, press too hard upon the people, nor be too great a burthen upon trade.

THAT very evening the king reflecting upon what he had granted, began to have fome fulpicion that he was imposed upon: he wrote to me inflantly, and proposed the thing to me as an indifferent question, without telling me what had paffed, or naming any perfon. I knew not what to think of such a demand, but set myself to work, and, taking to my affiftance the accounts of the customs and domain, and entries of provisions, I found that the annual amount of this tax would not be less than three hundred thousand crowns; and I could not but think it still of more importance, when I reflected on the trade of hemp and linen, which it feemed likely to ruin in Brittany, Normandy, and great part of Picardy; I therefore went immediately to Fontainebleau, to make my report to his majesty. The king confessed to me all that had happened, with many marks of astonishment that his confidence had been thus abused. The true remedy had been to have caused the edict to be brought back, and have entirely suppressed it, as being obtained by a false pretence: but, that I might not be embroiled with the count of Soiffons, who could not be long ignorant that it was I who had opened his majesty's eyes, it was agreed upon between us to have recourse to another method, which was to hinder the parliament from registering the edict. All that was necessary for this purpose, was to fend no letter with it, either under the king's hand or mine: this was an agreement that had long been made between the king and the fovereign courts; and without this formality, whatever other orders were produced, the parliament knew what they had to do, and would not register any thing. I was certain however, and I told his majesty so, that this expedient would not preserve me from the resentment of the count, and of the marchioness of Verneuil, who I discovered was concerned in this business; but I resolved to hold firm against the count, provided his majesty would be proof likewife to the folicitations of his mistress, which he promised me, and added, that he would openly support me.

Two or three days after my return at Paris, the count of Soiffons came to my house, and paid me many compliments, having, as he faid, occasion for a Maximilian de Bethune at full length: he thought by shewing me great kindness, and condescending to be familiar with me, he should easily obtain my fignature, without being obliged to tell me for what purpose he demanded it. I answered coldly, pretending to be quite ignorant of the matter, that I never figned any thing without knowing what it was: the count then found that he must have recourfe recourse to other means; he acquainted me with what his majesty had lately done for him, and said, that as he was not ignorant of the private agreement between the king, the sovereign courts, and me, the signature which he demanded was a letter to the parliament of Brittany, and the court of aids at Rouen.

AT this declaration, I assumed an air still more serious, and pretended to be greatly furprifed that the king had given me no intimation of the affair, nor communicated it to the council, to whom refolutions of fuch confequence were always made known; and from thence took occasion to tell the count, that an edict of this nature, which bere so hard upon the public interest, deserving to be excepted from the general rule, I could not take the danger upon myfelf; that therefore he must address himself directly to his majesty, or bring me at least an order figned by him, which would serve to justify me against the reproaches I could not fail to draw upon myfelf fome time or other for my compliance. The count replied, with much bitterness, that I only made use of this extreme caution to ruin his design, and to break with him entirely; but finding these words could not alter my resolution, he went away grumbling. I heard him mutter fomething between his shut teeth concerning our former quarrels, and went to difcharge his choler at the house of the marchioness de Verneuil.

This lady, although as much enraged with me as the count of Soiffons, was yet come to make me a vitit, just as I was coming out of my closet to go to his majesty, who had returned to the Louvre. She could not have chosen a worse time; the too easy king had just suffered a score of edicts, all in the spirit of the first, to be extorted from him, and, to fay the truth, of but little consequence. I fet out with a full resolution to make a new attempt upon the king, in favour of the people who would be prevented by these extortions from paying the landtax. The marchioness asking what paper it was I had in my hand, "This is a pretty business, madam," answered I in a passion, yet affecting to be much more angry than I really was, " you are not the " last among those that are concerned in it;" in effect, her name made the fixth article. I then opened the memorial, and read to her all the names, with the titles of the edicts. " And what do you intend to " do with this?" faid she. " I intend, answered I, to make some " remonstrances to the king upon it." " Truly," replied she, no longer able to contain her spleen, " he will have little to do to take " your advice, and offend so many great people. And on whom, pray,

"would you have the king confer favours, if not on those who are mentioned in this writing, his cousins, friends, and mistress?"
"What you say, Madam, replied I, would be reasonable enough, if his majesty took the money all out of his own purse; but to make a new levy upon the merchants, artists, labourers, and countrymen, it will never do; it is by them that the king and all of us are supported, and 'tis enough that they provide for a master, without

" having fo many coufins, friends, and mistresses to maintain."

MADAM de Verneuil lost none of my words, she dwelt particularly upon the last; and, in the rage with which she was transported, made use of them to form a thousand wicked flanders. She flew immediately to the count of Soiffons, and told him, that I had faid the king had but too many relations, and that it would be happy for him, and his people, if he could get rid of them. The count, mad with rage, went the next morning and demanded a conference with the king; after a long enumeration of his fervices, he told him, that I had fo outrageously injured his honour, that he must absolutely have my life, unless his majesty would himself do him justice. Henry, seeing him in fuch violent emotion, asked him, with great composure, what I had done or faid, and whether the affront he had received was directly from me, or had been related to him by another person. The count, not caring to enter into any explanation, replied, that if we were both together in his majesty's presence, not all the respect he ought to have for a person who was dear to him should hinder him from doing himfelf justice; and added, that what he had faid was true, and he ought to be believed on his word, for he was not accustomed to lie. " If "that was the cafe, cousin," faid the king, in a voice such as must naturally put him into confusion, " you would not be like one in your fa-" mily; for we always produce your elder brother, in particular, as " remarkable for this: but fince it was a report made to you, tell me " who made it, and what he faid, and then I shall know what I ought -" to do, and will endeavour to fatisfy you, if you are to be fatisfied " with reason." The count replied, that he had taken an oath not to name the person from whom he received his informations, but that he was as well convinced of his veracity as his own. "So then, coufin, " answered the king, you excuse yourself from answering my question, " on account of an oath you have taken to the contrary; and I like-" wife will take an oath to believe no more of your complaint, than " what monfieur de Rofny himfelf shall acknowledge to me; for I " have as good an opinion of his veracity, as you can possibly have of 1603. " those who tell you these fine tales."

THE count of Soiffons, when he went out of the king's prefence. discovered such an excess of fury against me, that his majesty thought it necessary to give me notice of it; which he did by Zamet and La Varenne, whom, at the fame time, he ordered to ask me, if I had not by some word or action given offence to the count. I answered, that ever fince the vifit I had received from the count at the arfenal, which was above fifteen days ago, I had never fpoke to him, or any of his people; that the marchioness de Verneuil indeed had been at my house. but neither she nor I had mentioned the count. " Oh!" faid the king, when these words were repeated to him, " we need not doubt any " longer from whence this mischief proceeds, since Madam de Ver-" neuil is named, for the is fo full of malice, and has fuch a ready " invention, that to the last word of monsieur de Rosny's she would " add a hundred, nay a thousand; but for all that, this affair must " not be neglected." The rage in which his majesty had seen the count, gave him reason to apprehend that he would take some violent refolution against me; he therefore sent La Varenne to tell me, that I should never stir out of my house without being well attended, and that he defired I should spare nothing for my security; adding, with great goodness, that all the expence I could be at in guarding myself, would be far below what it would cost him if he should lose me *.

I CANNOT quit the article of this new creation of edicts, without taking notice of an arret of council, much more antient, by which a tax of anchorage was ordered to be levied upon all foreign veffels that anchored in our ports. This at the bottom was no more than what was paid by our veffels in foreign ports; nevertheless it was with regret, and only by his majefty's express orders, that I carried it into execution, * L'Etoile's Journal treats at large of this difference, which the king put an end to, by obliging the count of Soiffons to be contented with a letter of fatisfaction which M. de Rofny wrote to bim: and, according to Matthieu, Henry IV. made the count de Soissons and the marquis de Rofny come into his apartment, and reconciled them, ibid. 592. De Thou also speaks of it, b. cxxix. The steddiness of M. de Rofny has procured him great commendations from our hittorians, " He had looking upon it to be one of those exactions which was most likely to deprefs the vigour of our trade. The parliaments of Rouen and Rennes made great opposition to the registering them, and the marechal d'Ornano bestirred himself greatly, having money owing him from the state, which had been charged upon that part for his reimbursement. The establishment of commissioner-examiners, lieutenants particuliers, affeffeurs-criminels, and other officers of justice, met with no less difficulty from the same court of Rouen, which more than any other opposed these new edicts; the last were made with an intention to fatisfy and fend back the colonels and captains of companies, who had waited at Paris a long time for their pay, in confequence of these new regulations: probably it was the meeting with fuch obstacles as these to his designs, that had long made Henry solicitous to suppress the chamber of requests in all his parliaments. He had laboured very earneftly to effect this, and actually began with that of the parliament of Toulouse this year, which continued to be suppressed, notwithstanding all the objections that were made to it by his own council, in which all the debates ran contrary to him.

THE quarrel between the count of Soiffons and me made a great noise; but the king, to shew me that it had produced no alteration in his friendship, fent me notice by Beringhen some days afterwards, that he intended to pass by Rosny, in the journey he was upon the point of making to Normandy, and that he expected I should treat him there with his court. The princes, princesses, and the constable, were all that the king permitted to be of this party. The preparations I made were worthy of him who did me the honour to be my guest: but the entertainment was disturbed by an unforeseen accident; the rivers were to much swelled by a sudden storm, that the offices of Rosny were overflowed *, the fruit spoiled, as well as the labour of his fervants; the ladies were terrified, supposing the danger to be much greater than it really was. I removed their fears by caufing a conduit to be opened, through which the water used to have a passage, and which had been filled up to make the paffage more commodious for his majefy and for the carriages, I had already begun to make the road and the bridge at the entrance to Rosny, but neither were yet completed.

" boldly to take care of himfelf."

&quot; de Rofny, that heaven and earth were combined againft him, and that he ought

The waters did great damage for ten leagues about, but I came off for two or three hundred crowns.

His majefty proceeded as far as the Lower Normandy, but did not go beyond Caën: he took the government of it from Crevecœur-Montmorency, who was accused of carrying on correspondencies with Bouillon and d'Auvergne, particularly with Tremouille, whose kinsman he was; and gave it to Bellesonds. From Caën the king passed through Rouen *, where he settled entirely all the affairs of that province. In this city he declared his pleasure concerning the marriage of my daughter, whom, as it was formerly mentioned, the princess Catherine had proposed for the duke of Rohan, and who had since that time been demanded in marriage by monsieur and madam de Fervaques, for monsieur de Laval the son of that lady. His majesty at Rouen ordered me rather to prefer Laval; but he once more altered his opinion.

THE affairs of religion were in part the occasion of the journey his majesty had lately taken; and the duke of Bouillon had likewise a share + in it. He was not yet quite discouraged from his attempts upon the king of England: he was still in the court of the elector palatine, whom he advised to build a citadel upon the ground which divided his territories from France, for the defence, he faid, of the true religion; and had the boldness, without asking his majesty's leave, to solicit Erard, his first engineer, to come and draw the plan of this fortress for him. To ferve his ambition every thing feemed lawful, and facred as well as profane things were profituted to that purpose. He published a writing this year, in which he exclaimed, in a most outrageous manner, against the whole body of the protestants: he had already drawn great advantages from this stratagem, and seconded it on his fide by counterfeiting perfectly well great uneafiness and apprehension of the miseries which hung over the protestants, in consequence of the new resolutions that were taken by the council of France, to whom he attributed these libels. However, it was no difficult matter to prove, that they had been composed by his friends, and fent into England with a view to hinder his majesty from succeeding in his endeavours to gain king James: but it was upon weak and hot-headed persons that Bouillon always imposed; and on them indeed his pains were not all cast away. An assembly of protestants was held at Saumur and Poitou, on occasion of the king's last indisposition, in which Du-Plessis extolled this duke in a manner not only ridiculous, but likewise insolent and presumptuous; for the praises he gave his hero seemed to be all at the king's expence, whom he calumniated without any respect to his person or dignity.

OF all these assemblies, none made so much noise as that which was held at Gap, the latter end of this year. The elector palatine, and the duke of Bouillon, by their letters and creatures, caused questions to be proposed in it which had a strong tendency to the rekindling a war. The minister Ferrier, by their orders, used his utmost endeavours to prevail upon the protestants to insert amongst their articles of confession, that the Pope is the antichrist: furely it could not be called a spirit of religion, but rather of discord and intrigue, that presided at the decision of this ridiculous tenet, which they likewife proposed to send printed to all the universities of Europe. As soon as the king was informed of this fcandalous proceeding, he fent me orders from Fontainebleau, where he had refided fince his return from Normandy, to put a stop to this licentiousness of the protestants, and, above all, to hinder this new article of faith * from being received. Villeroi likewife, by his commands, pressed me to exert myself on this occasion. I wrote immediately to Saint-Germain + and Desbordes; and whether it was owing to the arguments I made use of to shew them the folly of their conduct, or the advice I gave them not to irritate Henry, who they faw was refolved not to spare them, I know not, but the article in question was at length fuppreffed. The Pope, I believe, was under great apprehensions about it; for he was so extremely enraged, that it was with difficulty his majefty could appeare him: and probably it was to this incident, that the jesuits owed their re-establishment in France. The holy father had the confolation to fee his dominions filled with an acceffion of monks of every kind, Augustins reformed, Recolets, barefooted carmelites, ignorant fryars; and amongst the other sex, capuchin nuns, folietans, and carmelites: fo many religious orders were never instituted at one time as in this year.

THE boldness of the protestants, on this occasion, will not appear fo furprising, if it be confidered that they had even gone greater lengths upon another, when they were infolent enough to offer their mediation to the king, in favour of certain foreign princes with whom he had reason to be diffatisfied. I was continually repeating to them, that those rebellious proceedings would fall heavy upon them one day or other, and that they would groan for them a long time: but they had prophets whose predictions were far more agreeable to them than mine. Bouillon, La Tremouille, Lesdiguieres, and Du-Plessis, to render my representations ineffectual, and myself the object of their hatred, infinuated every where, that I facrificed, on all occasions, that very religion for which I pretended fo much zeal; and that, by this practice, I enriched myself with wealth and preferment, to which other men had a better claim: nor did the Papists, except perhaps a very few, confider themselves as at all obliged to me for that which I did upon principles of pure equity; for by the malignity of my stars, or the invidiousness of my place, I must honestly own I lost my labour.

WHILE these complaints of the protestants against me ran highest, I went one day to his majefly, with an intention to make him fuch representations as would secure me against the effects of their malice. The king was then in a gallery near his chamber, walking with the duke of Montpensier, cardinal Joyeuse, and the duke of Epernon: he made me a fign to approach, and asked me whether I could guess the fubject of his conversation with those three gentlemen. I answered only with a bow. " We were talking, faid the king, of the govern-" ment of Poitou, and they have advised me to give it to you; could "you have imagined this? they being fuch good catholics, and you fuch an obstinate huguenot." I did not even know that this government was vacant. Lavardin, who was governor of Perche and Maine, had the reversion of it after the death of Malicorne, who was very aged and infirm, and intended to refign his own for it; but reflecting that all his estates were situated in the provinces he was at prefent governor of, he releafed Malicorne from his engagement, and both together came to refign this government to the king, that he might dispose of it in favour of one of his natural children.

HENRY likewise insisted upon my guessing his motives for preferring me to this post, rather than any other person, or those even that were so near to him. I had nothing to alledge, but the knowledge his malesty.

L12

1603. jefty had of my fidelity and ardour for his fervice. The king replied, that his true reason for giving it me, was, because I was an huguenot, but a reasonable one, and zealous for the good of my country; that the protestants beholding me in this light, could not but be highly satisfied with his choice; and that he did not doubt but that his whole kingdom would be no less so, fince I was capable of inspiring them with more dutiful fentiments, of giving them just notions of their king, and of teaching them to rely on his goodness, and to respect and love his person; and that, by fuffering the gratifications which he granted to the principal members of this body to pass through my hands, the authority which the duke of Bouillon still preserved amongst them might be destroyed. His majesty added (without doubt because these three gentlemen, who were also joined by Briffac, Ornano, and Roquelaure, were present) that although he felt so strong an affection for his religion, as to wish with the utmost ardour to see it embraced by all the huguenots, and by me in particular, yet he could never forget that God had made use of that body, and of the cities of Rochelle, Bergerac, and Montauban especially, to free him from the oppression of Spain, to assist him in fupporting his just claims, and to fave even his life from the fury of the leaguers; that, on this account, however discontented he might be with those cities for discovering less duty and affection for him than formerly, yet nevertheless he thought himself obliged in honour, to continue to them the same gratifications he had always made them for their fortifications and colleges. The king repeated feveral instances which the province of Poitou had hitherto given, of its inviolable attachment to its lawful prince, " when no Bouillon, faid he, was there to excite " them to fedition;" and could not hinder himfelf from faying, that, at this very time, the welfare of the kingdom depended upon maintaining a peace with the protestants.

> AFTER this, his majesty told me, that I might treat directly with messieurs de Lavardin and Malicorne, repeating, that it was more for the interest of the state, and therefore more agreeable to his inclinations, to give this government to me, than to his own children. All that were present said something in approbation of what his majesty had done, and praise of me; and I made my acknowledgement to all, either in words or gestures. I dispatched Montmartin immediately to Lavardin and Malicorne, and he transacted the business with such prudence, that, by a feafonable prefent of a thousand crowns to those whose advice they took in this affair, I got this government from them for twenty thousand crowns. Upon their refignation, Du-Fresne sent me, on the fixteenth of December, the patents for the government of Poitou, Châtelleraudois, Loudunois, &c. This made my revenue from governments amount to thirty thousand livres; namely, twelve thou-fand livres from the governments of Mante and Gergeau, which I already possesses, and were both very lucrative for private governments, especially Gergeau, on account of the garrisons; and eighteen thousand livres from that of Poitou: in this sum, however, I have always included my salaries for the two posts of superintendant of the fortifications, and of the works.

I MUST not omit giving some account of the attempts that were made this year in France, to establish the stuff manufactures, and especially silk ones. Henry, who was carried with ardour to every thing which in his opinion could contribute to the glory and utility of the kingdom, suffered himself to be persuaded, by Les Bourgs and Des Cumans, that it was a mighty easy matter not only to supply silks for our home consumption, which used to be brought from foreign countries and distant regions, but also to carry on a considerable trade with foreigners for this merchandise. For this purpose, all that is necessary, said they, is to give encouragement to silk weavers to come amongst us, to increase the breed of silk-worms, plant mulberry-trees, and erect large buildings sit for these fort of manufactures. I exclaimed loudly against this scheme, which I never approved: but the king was so prejudiced in favour of it, that all my remonstrances were inestectual.

I REMEMBER that one day, when his majefty did me the honour to vifit me at the arfenal, to confer with me upon the necessary methods for establishing these manusactures, which could not be done without a great expence, we had a pretty warm debate about it. "I know not," said he to me, finding I received all the proposals he made me on this subject, with that reserve and coldness which I always assumed when I was not in his opinion, "I know not, what whim this is is that you have taken in your head, to oppose a scheme so well calculated to enrich and embellish the kingdom, to root out idleness from among the people, and which I should find so much satisfaction in completing." I replied, that this last reason had so much weight with me, that, if I could see the least probability of succeeding in the schemes for a filk manusacture, I should content myself with representing to his majesty that he would purchase this satisfaction at rather too high a price, and destroy by it that which he proposed to himself 1603. himself in the execution of those great designs, which, by his command, I had mentioned to the king of England; but that I entreated him not to be offended with me, if I prefumed to tell him, that I could not, as he did, fee either glory or utility refulting from this establishment. I then asked him, if he would permit me to give him my reasons for thinking so differently from him. " I give you leave, " faid he, but upon condition that you afterwards hear mine, which "I am perfuaded, are more convincing than yours." I then made the following observations to his majesty.

THAT it was through a wife dispensation of providence, which defigned that all the nations of the earth, or of one continent, should be liged by their common necessities to have an intercourse with each other, that this country was fitted to produce one thing, and that another, exclusively of all the rest: France had the good fortune to be so favourably diffinguished in this distribution of benefits, that no country probably, except Egypt, fo univerfally abounded with whatever supplied the necessities, or contributed merely to the conveniences of life, to the rest of the world; her corn, grain, and pulse, her wine, cyders, flax, hemp, falt, wool, oil, dying drugs, that immense quantity of cattle, great and fmall, which usually serve her inhabitants for food, putting her in a condition not only to envy none of her neighbours on the score of any of these advantages, but even to difpute with them those which make up all the trade they carry on: Spain, Italy, and Sicily, are of this number.

IT is certain that her climate refuses filk; the spring begins too late, and an excessive moisture almost always prevails; and this inconvenience, which is absolutely irremediable, affects not only the filk-worms, which, on this account, are hatched with great difficulty, but likewife the mulberry-trees that these insects feed upon; for which a mild and temperate air is necessary in the season wherein they put forth their leaves. The difficulty of multiplying them in a country where none ever grew, cannot but be very great: it will be five years at least before there can be any certainty of their coming to perfection; during which we risk the loss of time, labour, and the produce of the ground they are planted in. But are these difficulties, which ought to diffuade us from engaging in an enterprize, the fuccess of which they do not render doubtful but impossible, a real loss to us? That is the question.

A COUNTRY life affords fo many various labours and employments, that in France none need be idle but those who resolve against all, work; therefore it is necessary to begin, by curing people of this lazy disposition, which, if real, is the only thing worthy of attention. But how is this done by offering them the culture of filk for an employment? first, they leave one profession, which brings them in a certain and fufficient income, for another, where their gains are cafual and doubtful. It would not indeed be very difficult to make them prefer this to the former, because it is but too natural to quit a hard and laborious kind of life, fuch as agriculture is, confidered in its full extent, for one that, like working upon filk, does not fatigue the body by any violent motion. But even this is another argument to prove the dangerous confequences of fuffering the country people to be thus employed: it has been a common observation, at all times and in all places, that the best foldiers are found amongst the families of robust, laborious, and nervous workmen: if, instead of these, we enlift men who are brought up to no other labour than what a child, if taught it, has strength to perform, we shall be soon convinced they are no longer fit for the military art, which requires, as I have often heard his majesty himself observe, a strong constitution, confirmed by laborious exercises, that tend to maintain in its full vigour the whole ftrength and force of the body. And this military art, the fituation of France, and the nature of her politics, makes it absolutely necessary to hinder from being depressed or degenerating.

AT the same time that we enervate the country people, who in every respect are the true supporters of the state, among those of the city we introduce luxury, with all her train of mischiefs, effeminacy, sloth, voluptuousness, and that domestic extravagancy, which is not to be feared that people who have but little, and know how to be fatisfied with that little, will ever plunge into. In France we have already too many of these useless citizens, who under habits glittering with gold and embroidery conceal the manners of weak women.

THE objection, that immense sums of money are carried out of France into foreign countries for the support of this luxury, proves the truth of what I have just observed, and destroys the inference they pretend to draw from it: would they reason justly upon the inconveniency that arises from this commerce, and this importation of vain and unneceffary merchandifes, they would be convinced, that the best thing 1603. thing that could be done, would be to suppress the use of them entirely, and absolutely prohibit their being brought into France; at the same time to fix, by good and severe regulations, the richness of cloaths and furniture; and to put every thing of this kind upon the fame footing as they were in the reigns of Lewis XI. Charles VIII. and Lewis XII. * That necessity which obliges us to dress in one fort of stuffs rather than another, is the mere vice of fancy; and the price that is fet upon them, an evil we fall into with full conviction. Were we to confider, though but with the flightest attention, the source of what is called the fashion, we should find, to our shame and confusion, that a fmal' number of persons, and those the most despicable of a great city, which incloses all forts indifferently within her walls, for whom, if we were acquainted with them, we should feel that contempt we have for men without morals, or that compassion we have for fools, that these very men dispose nevertheless of our purses, and keep us enflaved to their caprices.

> But filk cloaths are not the only things which require reformation by the royal power; there is as much to be done with respect to diamonds, jewels, statues, and pictures, if it be considered as a grievance, that foreigners take away our gold and filver: we must likewise take into confideration, equipages, kitchen-furniture, moveables, and every thing in which these metals are made use of. If we restect upon the amazing extravagance that prevails in France, the fums fquandered foolifhly in gardens, buildings, coftly works, entertaiments, liquors, and what not; if we think on the exorbitant price paid for offices, of marriages fet up to * Many edicts of this kind were iffued at different times during the reign of Henry IV. against which the dealers in filk at Paris presented many useless remonstrances to the king and M. de Rofny. The Memoirs for the history of France relate in what manner that minister received the fieur Henriot, who spoke for them, a good old merchant, whose manners and dress bore the marks of the fimplicity and plainness of the tradesmen of former times .-"The next day, fays the writer of the " Memoirs, they waited on M. de Sully, " who answered them only with disdain 44 and ridicule; for Henriot having put one " knee to the ground, that nobleman im-66 mediately raifed him up; and having auction, what is there that wants not reformation? we cannot charge to foreign manufactures the tenth part of the money that is thrown away in France, without the leaft necefity. The care which the law and the finances would require, would engage us in an endlefs digreflion: these two bodies of men, of which the one ought to be the guardians of regularity, and the other of parsimony, seem only to have been brought into the world, to destroy both the one and the other. These are the only people that know what it is to be rich; and how they come by this wealth, may be seen by the manner in which they spend it: the old chancellors, first presidents, counsellors of state, and the heads of the courts and revenues, if they were to come into the world again, would not know how to find those who now fill their places, and resemble them in nothing but their titles *.

I SAID every thing I could think of on this subject, that carried with it any force, to bring the king over to my opinion; but I could not

* Though filk, and other materials of luxury, are in strictness no otherwise good or bad, than according to the good or bad use made of them; yet, as it is really more common to apply them to bad than to good purpofes, the good intention of the author, and the purity of his morals, cannot be fufficiently praifed. The rigid defenders of the christian doctrines do, and always will, espouse his sentiments: but it must be acknowledged, that the politicians of the prefent times, even those who are most fevere, think differently; they find nothing concluive in those examples of antiquity which are produced against luxury, even in respect to the times from which they are taken, much less in regard to the present. According to their opinion, other causes brought about those revolutions which were attributed to it; which causes having now loft their force, fuch revolutions do not, nor can they happen again: the increase of gold and filver in Europe, occasioned by the mines of those metals discovered in America, and whence this part of the world has been enriched within the last two centuries, has introduced by its natural confequence luxury or fuperfluity, which makes the necessary exchange against the redundance of money, otherwise an useless drug. This has entirely changed the face of Europe, unavoidably influenced the systems of government, and left no means of aggrandizing any state except by commerce, which opens every inset to luxury; no inconveniences arise from hence, till it exceeds what the profits of commerce will afford; befides, experience demonsfrates more clearly than reasoning can, that it is not at all incompatible, either with order, subordination, or a military spirit.

As to what relates to filk, should we even suppose with M. de Sully, that France is improper to produce it, his manner of reasoning will nevertheless be imperfect, as he feems to have been ignorant how much the manufacture adds to the value of the original materials, and of what advantage that is to the kingdom. If any one should still remain unconvinced of this truth, he ought to be fent for conviction to our manufactures of filks at Lyons, Tours, &c. and in fpight of what our author fays in this place, the establishment of the manufacturers of stuffs of all kinds, which was begun in the reign of Henry IV. will always compel us to speak in praise of him. prevail. "Your arguments are very ftrong, faid he to me; and I "would rather chuse to fight the king of Spain in three pitched " battles, than engage all these people of the law, the offices, and the " city especially, their wives and daughters, whom you have brought " upon my back, with all your whimfical regulations." " Then it " is your pleafure, Sire, replied I, that I should speak to you no " more upon this subject: however, time and experience will convince " you, that France is not fitted for these gewgaws." I was obliged to content myself with endeavouring only to prevail upon the king, to alter his intention of taking the Tournelles, and that whole enclosure, for the new buildings he projected for his filk manufactories. I represented to him, that he would one day destroy what it would cost him fo much to build, and brought to his remembrance, that once, when he was laying with me the foundations of a defign, far more noble and just, the Tournelles had been destined for another building of a very different kind *. " As things shall fall out," replied Henry; and this was all I could get from him. He followed Zamet, who came to tell him, that the dinner he had ordered to be prepared for him at his house, was ready.

IT was not, I confess, without deep regret, that I saw such large sums of money squandered, which might have been employed to so many useful purposes. I made a calculation of the expence Henry was commonly at every year, in buildings, in play, for his mistress, and hounds, and found that it amounted to twelve hundred thousand crowns, a sum sufficient to maintain a body of sifteen thousand foot: I could not, though I risqued the danger of losing his affection, be silent upon this subject. He commanded me to give six thousand livres to madam de Verneuil, too happy once more to purchase, at this price, that domestic quiet which was so often interrupted by his wife and his mistress: but fortunately for him, he escaped any broils this year. It was the current report at Fontainebleau, and for a long time believed, that the queen was again with child, but it was afterwards found to be a mistake; which the king did me the honour to inform me of.

names of fo many provinces. The defign for it was made in 1608, but the death of Henry IV. put a flop to the execution of it: under the following reign it was executed in part, and was called the royal fourts.

* See in the Septenary, the description of a voyage made to Canada by the fieur Du-Mont. There is also a relation of the manners of the inhabitants of this part of the new world; but it is very unfaithful, and filled with fables. M. de Sully is again mistaken in this point; our new colonies are a proof of it. We refer for a further account of this matter to L'Eslai politique

Liberty and protection, these two words which comprehend the only true means of bringing the internal commerce of a nation into a flourishing state, may, in another fense, be applied to the trade carried on to the two Indies; that is to fay, as the author of these Memoirs remarks, that none of the trading nations of Europe should be excluded from it, but that it should be indiscriminately shared amongst them all; and that the method of carrying it on to the most general advantage, is by exclusive privileges, granted not to private persons, but to whole companies, acting under the name, and by the authority of the king.

I ought not to forget observing here, that the first company for carrying on a trade to the East-Indies was established in France, under the reign of Henry IV. and in the year after his death. It was formed by a Fleming, called Gerard-le-Roy. The edict of its establishment, which bears date the 1st of June 1604, grants many exemptions and privileges to this company: the fifth and fixth articles are fomething remarkable, it being therein faid, that gentlemen might become members of this company, without derogation to their gentility. The difficulty of procuring the necessary funds, the difunion amongst the members, and all the other causes, which have so often fince occasioned the destruction of this institution, prevented its having the proposed effect at that time: it was referved for the celebrated M. Colbert, to place it on a more folid and durable basis. The hiftory of this company, the many advantages whereof are at present more known than ever, would carry me too far; and moreover is to be found already in many good books.

BEGAN this year, as I had done all the preceding ones, by the performance of a ceremony annexed to my employment, which was to prefent their majesties with two purses of filver medals. When I went to pay them the accustomed compliments on the first day of the new year, I came into their chamber fo early in the morning that I found them still in bed. Besides the purse of silver, I had caused two purses of gold medals to be ftruck, which they received with great pleafure. Roquelaure, Frontenac, and La-Varenne, coming that moment into the room, the conversation turned entirely upon these medals, of which the emblem was an open granado, and the device alluded to an anecdote in ancient history concerning Darius * and Zophyrus. The king was the more pleafed with the defign, because he found it affect the malecontents of France in fuch a manner, as he had a few days before directed me to make it affect them. His majeffy the next day made me a present of his picture, in a box ornamented with diamonds; and the queen fent my wife a diamond chain and bracelet of great value.

Those who interest themselves in subjects of this nature, may see the series of these medals, vol. II. p. 6. of the Old Memoirs, where they are collected by the author.

* As an explanation of these medals would be of little consequence, I sorbear to give any; nor do I take any notice of them in the beginning of any other years.

THE death of the duchess of Bar, his majesty's only * fister, was the first interesting event to the court this year: Henry appeared greatly afflicted at it; he wore deep mourning, and not only ordered the whole court to do so likewise, but also the first gentlemen, and

* The suspicion some conceived of this princess having been poisoned, was entirely groundless: her death was attributed by others to the potions she took to make her pregnant: it rather feems to have been occalioned from her phylicians having treated her as being with-child, tho' she was not. Andrew Du-Laurens, whom the king fent to her, was not miftaken in this respect, as the rest were; but the princess herself was fo firmly perfuaded of her being with-child, by the extreme defire she had to find it so, that she refused to take any of the medicines prescribed by that physician; imagining he wanted to fave her life, at the expence of the child's she believed herself to have conceived; whereas the was not at all folicitous about the preservation of her own life, provided that of the supposed infant could be faved. She perfifted in this notion and these fentiments till the last moment of her life, always crying out, "Save my " child." Her body having been opened, it clearly appeared Du-Laurens had been extremely right in his judgment; that inflead of a real pregnancy, her illness was on an inflammation.

This princefs was a rare example of conjugal affection; whenever the faw or heard any new-married women spoken of, she used to make it her wish, that they might love their husbands as affectionately as the loved hers. She often repeated this verse of Properties, changing the word Venus into Dans.

Her corpfe was carried to Vendome, and depolited by her mother's, queen Jane of Albret. The Pope had at length granted this difpenfation, which had been to long folicited, but the duchess died before it arrived in Lorrain.

Henry IV. took it much amis, that the Pope's nuncio, instead of the compliments of condolence, which he received from all the princes in Europe on this death, only fpoke to him of his holiness's fears for the falvation of that princefs, who had died out of the bofom of the church; and answered him with fome warmth and indignation, but very judiciously, that it was a notion inconfistent with the goodness of God, to fuppofe, that the moment when a perfon breathes his last was not sufficient for his mercy to open the gates of heaven to any finner whatever; "I have not, added he, " the least doubt of my fister's being fav-" ed." De Thou, and Chronol. Septen. annò 1604.

What Amelot de la Houssay advances in his notes on cardinal D'Offat's letters, that this princess had no more affection for her hufband than he had for her, is contrary to the opinion of all other historians: there is more foundation for his notion, that the defign of the journey the duke of Bar took to Rome, was less to solicit the dispenfation for his marriage, than to oppose it; but that the Pope did not suffer himfelf to be fo imposed on. The palace here fpoken of is the palace of Soiffons, formerly called, The queen's palace, because it had belonged to queen Catherine of Medicis, who left it by her will to her granddaughter, Christina of Lorrain; but by reason of queen Catherine's debts, it was fold in 1601, and bought by the duchefs of Bar. It was fold again in 1604, for one hundred thousand livres, or thereabouts, to the count of Soiffons, whose daughter, Mary of Bourbon, transferred it, as part of her portion, to prince Thomas Francis of Savoy-Carignan, grandfather of prince Eugene.

officers of his bed-chamber, the grand master, and officers of his wardrobe, the pages, and, in a word, all his houshold; the same regulation was observed in the queen's family.

THE duchess of Bar, before she left France, had contracted some debts in Paris, which were not yet paid. Without doubt, this princess had been prevented only by death from discharging them, since she had sent jewels from Lorrain to be pawned to her creditors, who had made a feizure of her houses, furniture, and other effects. Her houses were, a palace at Paris, a house at Fontainebleau, and another at Saint-Germain, which the king her brother had given her; and, among other furniture, there were pictures in her gallery, chamber, and closets, which were well worth keeping in the royal palaces, and which the king wished to have for that purpose; but they had made the duchess's debts so considerable, that he did not think it fit to desire them till they were all cleared. These debts amounted to twenty thousand livres.

I was afterwards commissioned by his majesty to take an inventory of the furniture and jewels belonging to this princess: that which rendered this employment very difficult to execute, besides the different kinds of debts and effects, was the specifying of those that the king of France and the duke of Bar had a right to, and the claims they both made to the rings the princess had pawned in Paris, Madame de Pangeas gave us a very exact account of what rings and other jewels the princess was possessed of, either before or after her arrival in Lorrain, and of what her movables in France confifted; and the inventory was regulated by this writing. The whole was registered with great exactness, in the presence of two or three members of the council, named by his majesty, and the duke of Lorrain's commissioners; and this done, each of the two princes took possession of those effects that either belonged, or were to be returned to them. The duches's palace at Paris was, by the king, destined to be fold, because part of the money for which it was first purchased was not yet paid; and the sum produced by this fale was fufficient to fatisfy the first owner of it, and all the other creditors. The king gave the house of Fontainebleau to the queen, and that at Saint-Germain to the marchioness of Verneuil. But as this fale could not be made immediately, and the creditors demanding fureties, it was, by their confent, agreed between the two princes, that the jewels should be deposited in my hands, without any other fecurity than my word: they remained there till the following year, when the queen having taken them, I was discharged by a writing, dated dated 28 June, 1605, and figned by Des-Marquets and Bontemps. I 1604. fhall now proceed to the re-establishment of the Jesuits, which I have promised to give some account of.

Notwithstanding the arret that feemed to deprive them of all. hopes of ever fettling again in France, yet they had found means to engage the court in their interests, and to make, even in his majesty's council, such a great number of protectors, whose voices, joined to the earnest and almost continual folicitations of the Pope, the house of Lorrain, and many other persons both within and without the kingdom, so greatly strengthened their party, that it was not possible for Henry to refift any longer; and indeed it must be confessed, that he yielded without much reluctance. Some Jesuits who had gained access to his person on account of what had passed the preceding year during his journey to Metz, behaved with fo much address, and made fuch advantage of that permission, that Henry began to see them with pleasure *, and even to admit them familiarly to his presence. Those who were thus fent to try their fortune, and who we may be affured had been chosen with all the discernment of a society that understood mankind perfectly well, were the fathers Ignatius, Mayus, Cotton, Armand, and Alexander; for father Gonthier did not vet shew himself; his turn of mind, which was rather ardent than complying, was not yet wanted.

When the Jesuits were thus secure of great part of the court, and stattered themselves that their enemies in the council would be either the weakest party, or such as would not contradict a proposal they knew to be agreeable to the king, they presented a petition in form to his majesty; who having in effect taken a resolution very savourable for them, ordered the constable one day to assemble a council at his house, composed of the chancellor, messieurs de Chateau-neuf, Pont-

* The favourable reception the Jesuiss met with at court and in Paris, was principally owing to their qualifications as preachers; those who are named here were excellent in that respect. We shall soon have occasion to speak of father Cotton. Father Laurent Mayus, or Mayo, was born in Provence; he was a man of great wit and conduct, and one of those who the most effectually afsifted the Pope's nuncion procuring the re-effablishment of the Jefuits. This Jefuit putting Henry IV. in mind of his promife to recall that order at a proper time, faid to him, "Sire, your "time is now come, it is nine months." fince you made this promife, and women are delivered at the end of nine "months." "True, father Mayo, ansufwered that prince, but don't you know "kings go longer than women do." Chronol. Septen. anno 1604.

arré, Villeroi, Maisses, the president De Thou, Calignon, Jeannin, Sillery, De-Vic, and Caumartin; there to hear from La-Varenne, the most zealous solicitor the Jesuits had, the society's proposals, and what arguments they could offer to support them; to deliberate upon them; and to bring him an exact account of what passed *.

His majefty would have been very well fatisfied to have had me of this council, and his reason for not naming me to the constable among the others, was (as he told Oserai, the first groom of his bed-chamber, who afterwards repeated it to me) because he believed this commission would not be agreeable to me. But Sillery here exerted all the arts of a courtier; he affected to his majesty so much surprize that this council should be held without me, accompanied with all those treacherous praises that envy and malice make use of on certain occasions, that he laid the prince under a necessity of telling him I should be there like-wise. The views of this artful courtier were, to make me only answerable for all the inconveniences which they foresaw might equally attend a denial, or grant of the Jesuis request, for every one knew it was a ticklish affair. I guessed sillery's motive for acting in this manner, and it was not long before my suspicions were fully confirmed.

+ The parliament of Paris having been informed of the king's resolution touching the recal of the Jesuits, fent the first pretident de Harlay as their deputy to his majesty, to present their remonstrance against it. The president spoke to the king with great vehemence; the fubstance of his speech may be seen in De Thou, who after having related, as an eye witness, what paffed on this occasion between the king and his parliament, complains of a writing which come abroad at that time, under the title of, The king's answer to the remonstrance of the parliament; and which is a continued feries of reproaches from that prince to the first president, and of praises of the Jesuits: whereas the only answer the king made to the deputies of the parliament was, that he thanked them for the folicitude they discovered for the preservation of his life, and that he would take all necessary measures not to run himself into any dangers. The length and spirit of this writing testify in favour of M. De Thou;

but, on the other fide, this answer of Henry IV. whether true or fictitious, is fet forth in the 4th volume of Villeroi's State Memoirs, p. 400. and confirmed by Matthieu, that prince's historiographer, whom Henry IV. himself surnished with memoirs of his hiftory, vol. II. book iii, On this authority, which is of great weight, father Daniel has cited it in his Hiftory of France, in folio, vol. III. p. 1939. Thefe things would induce one to believe this was the real answer of Henry IV. at least in fubstance; and M. De Thou agrees, that after the king's answer, which contained an order to register his edict, the parliament having made a farther attempt to avoid registering it, his majesty sent for them a second time, and declared his will to them with authority, and even with anger; and afterwards fent Andrew Hurault de Maisses, one of his secretaries of state, to the parliament, to cause his edict to be registered without any modification.

THE council being affembled, and myself prefent, as one of the members, the question was put to the vote; when Bellievre, Villeroi, and Sillery, directing their eyes to me, Sillery spoke for the others, and faid, that these gentlemen, as well as himself, yielded to me the honour of deciding upon this question, as to one who was better acquainted with the affairs of state and the king's inclinations than any that were present. I was already not too well disposed towards Sillery, and this stroke put me quite out of humour with him: instead of a compliment, with which any other courtier would have paid his flattery, I answered to his meaning, and that without any difguise. I told him, that I faw no reason for altering a custom so generally received as that of voting according to rank, especially on a subject that my sentiments, whatever they were, would, on account of my religion, be fuspected of partiality; unless it was with a defign to give the world a disadvantageous interpretation of my words, as I knew many that were present expected to have an opportunity of doing; and had even done it beforehand, by groundless charges upon a point on which I had not vet declared my thoughts; and added, in plainer terms, that although I should vote first, yet I would not give the person that spoke to me fo great an advantage as he feemed to hope for; but that I would do nothing till I had first consulted my oracle. And I was resolved to have a conference with his majefty, before any refolution was taken in the matter in debate. " I find then," faid Sillery, fmiling malicioutly, and affecting ignorance of the meaning of my last words, "that " we must wait for your opinion till you have taken a journey to the " banks of the Seine, four leagues from hence." Ablon it was that he meant, the place where the protestants had their affemblies, "Monfieur, replied I, your enigma is not very obscure; however, " I affure you, that as in religious matters, not men, but the words of "God, are my oracles, fo in affairs of state I am guided only by the " voice and the will of the king; which I intend to be particularly " informed of, before any thing be determined upon a business of this " importance." Then addressing myself to the whole company, I told them, in a tone of voice fomewhat raifed, that great inconveniences must infallibly be the consequences of a precipitate resolution in this case.

AFTER this discourse, which might be taken for that act of deliberation I had just before declined, the constable taking advantage of the hint I had furnished him with, and pleased likewise with having an opportor. II.

tunity to do me fome fervice, for, ever fince that he had received from me in the affair of marechal Biron, his former prejudice against me was changed into a fincere affection, faid, that he was entirely of my opinion, as to the necessity there was of knowing the particular inclinations of his majesty, before any thing was resolved on; and added, that it would not even be improper to defire him to be present at their debates, if it was only to put a ftop to those little heats and animolities, that had already begun to appear in our first sitting. Villeroi, shewing an impatience to proceed, which furprifed every one that knew his disposition, said, that since this affair could no otherways be terminated than by the re-establishment of the jesuits, it was needless to protract it any longer; and, after giving all the weight he could to his holiness's interpolition, and answering for the faithful performance of the promifes made by the fociety, he explained the motives of the king's conduct in this affair, who had not, he faid, referred it to a council, the members of which were all named by himself, to be contradicted, but to avoid taking upon himself the annulling, by his authority, so solemn an arret of parliament as that against the jesuits; and concluded, by complaifantly faying, that it was fit his majefty should be spared the difagreeable necessity of deciding folely this question. Villeroi certainly highly honoured us all by this speech; and the council, no doubt, owed him great acknowledgments. De Thou ridiculed this opinion, as Villeroi had done ours; he shook his head, and said, that, if his majesty's design had been such as Villeroi represented it to be, not to meddle in this affair, he would have referred it to the decision of the parliament, as likewise the examination of the jesuits proposals; and hence taking occasion to give his own fentiments of the matter, he added, that if the king would avoid the blame he would incur by acting otherwife, and the danger that would refult from it both to the flate and his own person, this was the only part he could take, namely, to refer it to the parliament. Certainly this was not speaking like a courtier: but neither his advice nor that of Villeroi was followed. The rest of the counsellors declared, by a fingle word, that they thought it necessary his majesty should be applied to, before they proceeded any farther; and this was the end of our first sitting.

The next day I had a private conference with his majefty; and the first thing I brought upon the carpet being the debates on the preceding evening, I perceived the king expected I should tell him my fentiments of them. I did not hefitate a moment as to the part I should take; and truth obliges me to confess, it was not very favourable for the jesuits *. I told his majesty, that I could not possibly comprehend how, after an arret of parliament published by his order, and for a cause as necessary as just, he should suffer himself to be still prejudiced in favour of an order, from which both himself and the state had nothing but mischief to expect. Here I could not help bringing the king of England to his remembrance; and, having no intention to protract my discourse to any length, I contented myself with barely entreating him to dispense with my affisting at such hateful deliberations; or if not, to let me know his will precifely, and command me fo absolutely to regulate my vote according to it, that I might find my excuse in the necessity of obeying him. "Well, said "Henry, fince we are alone, and you have leifure to discourse on this " matter, tell me freely what it is you fear from the re-establishment " of this fociety, and afterwards I will tell you what I hope from it, " to the end that we may judge whose arguments have the most " weight." I would ftill have excused myself from this task, saying, that it was absolutely needless, fince his majesty had already taken his resolution. But he replied, that that should not hinder him from paying some regard to my reasons; and commanded me so positively to enter into this discussion, that I could no longer refuse to satisfy him.

The public has no advantage to hope from the restoration of the jesuits in France +, which it may not promise itself from any other religious order; and for the exclusion of the jesuits there are particular reasons, artsing from the inconveniencies which follow from their establishment in this kingdom. These reasons and inconveniencies

* It is faid in the manufcript of the king's library, which we have quoted before, that mefficurs de Sully, de Bouillon, de Maupeou, &c. did all they were able to divert the king from this resolution.

+ The following difcourse does not contain any thing more, nor is even so frong as the president de Harlay's, which we see in De Thou, nor than what all the writings at that time or since are silled with against the jesuits: I feel no less repugnance in transferibing it, than I have owned myself to be sensible of in the presace to this work. But the reader will easily observe here, that it has been endeavoured to impose mere conjectures on him as certain facts, and bare possibilities as avowed designs. The pages of vain declamation never will counsages of vain declamation never will counsage.

terbalance the least real fact ascertained in four words: and, to speak justly, M. de Sully does not prove any thing here, but his passion and animosity against the jesuits. It gives one horror to repeat, or even to think, of what he fays of stabbing and poifoning, which could only come from the mouth of a calvinist, and an inveterate enemy; but it ought to furprise us the less in coming from M. de Rofny, who was under folemn engagements to the king of England to act and speak in that manner, whenever the recalling of the jesuits should come in question, for the interest of herefy, their common cause, of which he was as zealous an espouser, as the king of Great Britain a declared enemy of the church.

are reducible to four heads, which are immediately feen to be of the alt importance; religion, the conduct of government with respect to foreign nations, the interior government of the kingdom, and lastly the person of the king. Let us now speak of the first: the only sure foundation upon which the system of government, which the council will henceforth follow, can be supported, is union and peace between the two religions prevailing in France: the jestits must be supposed, by those who savour them, to promote this peace and union; but in truth, this can be less expected from them than from any other men. Their first statute places them in such a blind subjection to their general, or rather to the Pope*, that, though as particular men they might have the most pure and pacific intention, they can move only by the will of these two superiors, of whom the Pope has a great deal of mischief in his power; and their general is always either a Spaniard

* It may be observed, in relation to the article in the inftitution of the jesuits, which enjoins a blind fubmission to their general, that by this submission or blind obedience is meant, first, the vow they enter into alter a noviciat of nine years: now this vow is exactly in this, as in all other religious orders; its nature is perfectly the fame, and nothing is required of the jesuits, but that fubmiffion and obedience, which the holy fathers of the church enjoined to the faithtul, who particularly confecrated themfelves to the service of God: besides, this obedience ought never to be blind, but in points of perfection and religious observance; it can never derogate from the laws of nature, nor those of divine, ecclesiaftical, or civil inflitution, for the prefervation of order in the government of nations.

By this lubmiflion or obedience is allo meant, feconoly, the fourth vow which the protelled of that company make, and which is superadded by them to the three ordinary wows of the religious orders. Now this fourth vow imposes no other obligation on them, in regard to the sovereign Pontiuff, but merely to obey him, when he shall command them to go on missions for the salvation of fouls. This is the whole substance of it, notwithstanding what multitudes say of it, who continually represent this yow in the most odious light, and who from thence incussionly take occasion to inveigh against the society: Insuper promitto specialem obedientiam summo pontifici, circa missiones: " Moreover, I promite a special " obedience to the fovereign Pontiff, in " relation to missions;" these are the express terms in which this vow is made. It contains four circumstances which comprehend the whole extent of it; which may be feen in the book of the inflitution of the Jesuits, or in the abridgment of it, printed at Bruffels, in 1690, part 3. chap. 3. fect. 3. These circumstances are, first, the jefuits are forbid to folicit the Pope, either themselves, or by other persons, to be sent to one country rather than another; fccondly, they must obey, whether they are fent amongst the Turks, or other infidels, or even to the Indies, whether they are appointed to labour in the conversion of heretics and schismatics, or in the perfection of the faithful; thirdly, they must set out immediately for the places of their destination, without any wilful excuse or delay; fourthly, they are not to demand any necessaries or expences for their journey, but must be ready to go on foot or horseback, with monev or without, as his holine's shall think proper, having regard only to God's fervice. Can a vow of this nature afford any manner of foundation for the injurious reflections that have for two centuries past, both in writing and by word of mouth, been cast on the society on this account?

born, or a dependent upon Spain. Now it cannot be imagined, that the Pope, and the general of the jefuits, will ever contentedly fee the protestant religion forming a distinct interest in France; it must therefore be, that the jefuits, filled with the notions of Rome, men likewise of dexterity and intelligence, and to complete their character jealous of the honour of their own party, will, by their consessions, their sermons, their books, and their conversations, keep up a perpetual schissin among the people; whence will ensue dissort and contention between the different members of the body politic, which will soon or late produce such another civil war, as that from which we are got free.

Nor are they less capable of diffurbing our concord with foreign nations, which is the fecond reason for which good policy would oppose their revocation; the Pope either favouring Spain by inclination, or depending against his will upon that crown, particularly fince the Spaniards last invading Italy; and the great view of Spain being the destruction of the French monarchy; when we confider that the jefuits are connected with both the Pope and the Spaniards, by principles, cuftom, and religion, what can be concluded, but that France will have in her bosom a body of men always ready to side with her enemies? Here religion comes again into the question: the scheme formed by Henry, for the glory and tranquillity of Europe in general, requires, that at some time he should send an army into Italy, capable of setting the Pope free, even without his own confent, from the shackles in which he is kept by the power of Spain; in this defign the help of the protestants will be necessary, without which nothing can be done against the Spaniards: but the jesuits will never like a scheme of general policy, which will make the protestants important, and establish them in Europe.

RATHER than fee the execution of fuch a defign, and become enemies to Spain, as they must then do, they will endeavour to waste the forces of the king upon his subjects, which is the third reason against recalling them: and, what will produce almost as much disorder in the government of the kingdom, their access to the prince, and the influence which they will have over the exercise of his power, will enable them to commence another kind of war against the ministers, and men in office, under the suspicion that they have not the same designs with themselves. I reckon myself among those who will be first facrificed to these new favourites. And to conclude, has not the king himself had a dreadful instance of their hatred, without giving them new opportunities of daggers and poisons? and does he not know the reasons for which the jesuits would have put another prince upon the throne of France in his place? such a one as they hoped to make more easily concur in their schemes, both general and particular. If he had any doubt of it, I offered to prove it evidently to him, by a paper sent me from Rome against the cardinal d'Ossat, of which I shall speak presently; and I then added a few reslections, with which that paper had supplied me.

The king answered me, that he should like to see that paper, and ordered me to shew it him; but he remained invincible in his purpose, notwithstanding all the reasons that I could offer him. He told me, he had only two things to oppose to my discourse, which he found I had formed by long premeditation; the first was, that it was natural for the jesuits to be devoted to Spain, the only power which had courted and caressed them, when they were scorned or hated almost every where: that if they had found the same reception in France, or should now begin to find it, they would soon forget Spain *. For the truth of this, he quoted father Mayus, who had declared to him, as he told me, in the name of the whole society, their sincere attachment, and consirmed it with the strongest oaths, submitting that he and his associates should

* Without any defign of fpeaking in fayour of the French jesuits of that time, I would only observe, that Henry IV. formed a true judgment of the dispositions they have fince manifested. The services France has received from them, have diffipated the reproach so often found in the mouths of all who then were enemies, that they endeavoured to exalt Spain on the ruins of the French monarchy: besides, the jesuits did not become engaged in the league from their connexions with foreign nations, but from the prefent fituation of affairs of religion. If, from an error in judgment, in which they were authorifed by the opinion of the Sorbonne, and most good Frenchmen, they conceived it expedient to strengthen themselves by a foreign support, it was not because they were enemies to the nation, their country, or the government, but because they apprehended such connexion necessary to promote the interests of religion; and because they, like many other catholics, blinded by an excess of zeal, erroneously imagined, that whatever was done in defence of the faith was justifiable : they however observed more decorum than many others; for none of them appeared in Paris at the time of the barricade; nor were any of them feen to join in the odd and ridiculous procession of 1590. Vide father Daniel's history of France, vol. III. It may be further observed, that the jefuits were perfecuted in Spain, for being too zealous in the interest of France; at the fame time, they were charged in France with being too closely engaged to Spain. No one, in fact, laboured fo effectually to obtain the absolution of Henry IV. and his reconciliation with the Pope, as cardinal Tolet, a Spanish jesuit. This appears from the letters of cardinal D'Offat, between the years 1595 and 1603. Hence arose the pique Spain, and Philip the fecond, had against the jesuits, and father Aquaviva their general, whom, for that reason, they were continually involving in troubles, be considered as the most flagrant traitors, if his promises were not 1604. fulfilled.

THE king added, that these oaths and promises perhaps would not fo fully put me to filence, but that I might have fomething to reply; but that a sense of his own interest, and care for the preservation of his person *, determined him, he said, not only to receive the jesuits to mercy, but to treat them well; for if he once reduced them to despair, and deprived them of all hopes of returning to France, there was nothing which they would not attempt against him. His majesty then dilated at large upon the credit, the artifices, and the expedients of that fociety, by which he endeavoured to perfuade me, as he appeared himself persuaded, that this society, to whatever distance it might be driven by banishment, would have a thousand means of practifing on his life, and that he was defirous to fet himfelf free from perpetual disquiets. He concluded with this expression of Cæsar +, That it was better to put one's felf at once into the power of those that one fufpects, than to be continually using precautions against them.

By these words, and the tone with which they were pronounced, I easily comprehended that his majesty had already resolved upon the re-establishment of the jesuits, and that nothing could dissuade him Therefore, inflead of oppofing this refolution by new obiections, many of which, and those very folid, I had still to offer; I told him, that fince he feemed to make the fafety of his person, and the happiness of his life, to depend upon the recalling this society, that was fufficient to make me labour for the fuccess of the affair as zealoully as La-Varenne himfelf could do; and that, when the council again affembled, he should have proofs of it. I saw joy sparkle in the eyes of this prince at my words; and that the facrifice I made him might not go unrewarded, and that I might have no cause to apprehend the blame of what might happen should fall upon me, he promifed me two things that inflant, and gave me his royal word for the faithful performance of them. One was, that neither the jesuits, nor any other

I AM not fure whether he did not exert himself on this occasion that very day; for I had a vifit from La-Varenne the next morning, who defired as a favour, that a jefuit, who, he affured me, was still more a Frenchman by inclination, than birth, might be allowed to pay his respects to me. I answered La-Varenne, that he well knew every one was fure of a polite reception at my house, and ecclesiastics especially, who never perceived any more of my religion, than the obligation I thought it laid upon me to treat them with a diffinguishing respect; and that, if this were not the case, the character he gave me of this jesuit was fufficient to infure his welcome. † Peter Cotton, born 1564 at Neronde, of one of the most distinguished families of Forez. Great changes ought to be made in the idea the author here and elsewhere endeavours to give us of him: he was a man endowed with great fenfe, an extraordinary eloquence, and all the necessary qualifications to make himfelf univerfally agreeable. " The king, fays the Chronologie Septennaire, " conceived fo great an " affection for him from the first moment 66 he faw him, that ever after he acquainted " him with whatever he was going to un-" dertake. He first preached at Fontaine-

" hearing him; and it is no wonder they " fhould, for he has fo engaging a manner,

"that one can never be weary of giving the utmost attention to him."

He narrowly escaped, about this time, being affaffinated by the king's pages, who wounded him in feveral places with a fword, as he was coming in a coach to the Louvre; because some of the lords of the court havving complained to the king, that the pages feeing him pass by, had cried, Old Wool, Old Cotton, (one of the cries of Paris) his majesty had ordered some of them to be whipped for it: he would even have punished this attempt on his life with great severity, if father Cotton had not earneftly befought him to pardon them; they were therefore only drove from court. " The " king, fays the fame writer, on this ac-

hall to give audiences as usual after dinner. The jesuit approached me with all imaginable demonstration of veneration and respect, and was lavish in his praises of my great capacity, my services, and likewise upon the protection which he faid he had been affured I was disposed to grant his fociety, intermingled with the most profound bows, and repeated affurances of gratitude, devotion, and obedience. I was not deficient in a return of compliments and ceremony, being folicitous to omit nothing the person and present occasion required.

THE next day the council, still composed of the same members as before, affembled for the fecond time; and no affair was ever more quickly dispatched, without entering into any discussion, or making a needless display of arguments in favour of a question already decided. I faid in brief, that the present conjuncture of the times required, that the jesuits should have a settlement in France. It was resolved, that they should take an oath to hold all the principles of true Frenchmen, and elect no one for a provincial *, who was not French by birth: this they fwore to perform, and all the past was buried in oblivion.

" by politically refufing to accept of this " offer, did a fignal fervice to the order of " which he was a member."

The author of the Chronologie Septennaire, had spoke more correctly, if he had faid, father Cotton was firictly obliged to refuse the bishopric offered him by the king, and that he did, in reality, refuse it in confequence of this obligation; for the jefuits make an express vow not to accept of any ecclefiaftical dignities; and they can have no dispensation from this vow, but from the Pope himself. Father Cotton, if we form our judgment of him from his life as wrote by father Orleans, was too religious a man to be influenced in his refusal of this offer, by any other motives than his principles of difinterestedness and modesty. Matthieu also speaks of father Cott on with great elogiums, vol. II. b. iii. Henry IV. in this year, made him his confessor, on the refignation of René Benoit, parish priest of Saint-Eustache: and he further infisted, that the office of fuperior of the college of Navarre, which had always, till that time, been joined to that of the king's confessor, should from henceforth be disunited from

* I do not find that, in the edict for reftoring the jefuits, any mention is made of this election of a French provincial; if there is, it is only by implication. These are the conditions expressed in it; That the jefuits shall not found any college in France, without the king's permission; that all of them shall be Frenchmen born; and that no other shall be suffered in the kingdom; that one of them shall always reside near the king's person, to be answerable to him for the conduct of all the rest; that, on their entering into the fociety, they shall take certain oaths before the officials, that they shall not make any attempts on the king's person; that they shall not engage in any affairs to the prejudice of the flate, &c. that they shall not do any thing to infringe the laws of the kingdom, the jurifdiction of bishops, or the rights of the clergy, the universities, &c. that they shall not preach or administer the sacraments in any diocese, without the confent of the bishop of such diocese; that whatever had been taken from them shall be restored, but that they shall not be permitted to make any new acquisitions, without the king's express approbation; nor shall they be fuffered to claim All

All I have to add is, that during the whole time, I was extremely referved, and acted with great circumfpection, as well with regard to father Molina's opinion of grace, that was published this year, as upon some propositions of three jesuits, which occasioned high debates between those that favoured, and those that opposed them, especially these two; that the Pope's being the successor of Saint Peter was not a point of faith, and that confession might be made by letters. On this occasion, the jesuits were soon sensible how necessary the royal interpolition in their favour was to them. Had they been given over to the parliament, the Sorbonne, the univerfities, and the most part of the bishops *, and the cities in the kingdom, their doctrine had not taken deep root: but the king did not abandon his new favourites; and even, at the folicitations of La-Varenne, gave them his castle of La-Fleche, where they foon founded a very fine college.

any fhare with their relations in the inheritance of the effates or effects of their families. The city of Lyons and La-Fleche were the only places where they were allowed new establishments; those of former foundation are enumerated in the edict, amounting in all to eleven, viz. Toulouse, Auch, Agen, Rhodès, Bourdeaux, Perigueux, Limoges, Tournon, Le-Puy-en-Velay, Aubenas, and Beziers. We will fuffer M. De Thou to complain, that fome of these conditions have fince been annulled, but not from thence to claim a right of charging the jesuits with having failed in the observance of them.

As to the general of their order being a foreigner, which gives fo great offence to M. de Sully, it could not be required of them, that they should never have any but a native of France; the choice of a general being made by different members of the fociety, deputed for that purpose, and chofen out of different nations; therefore, to have required this of them, would have been requiring an impossibility. As to the manner of this election, nothing is positively laid down, either by the laws or practice of the fociety; for every jefuit, who shall be deemed qualified for the office, whether a Frenchman, or of any other nation, is liable to be chosen, as the whole depends on an absolutely free choice. The only reason why father d'Aubenton, a Frenchman, confessor to his catholic majesty, was not appointed the last general but one, was because the French jesuits themselves opposed his being chosen. Father Charles de Noyelle, on whom the office was conferred in 1685, was a gentleman of Artois, and a fubject of France.

* The Septennary, on the contrary, informs us, that immediately after the restoration of the jesuits, they were invited by many cities, bishops, &c. to come to them. ibid. f. 438. "It was, fays Matthieu, p. 606, "the general defire of all the ca-" tholics to fee them restored, from the " conviction their absence had given how " necessary and advantageous their pre-" fence was for the instruction of youth, " and the direction of men's confciences. " They afforded their enemies no advan-" tage over them, either from their mo-" rals or actions, which were fo conform-" able to their doctrines, that not one " fingle difcord broke the harmony between " them, their hearts and their tongues " being in the fame tone," &c. This writer had before spoken of them in the most advantageous terms, vol. II. b. ii. p. 270; and his evidence is rendered less lible to fuspicion, by his having a personal difference with the fociety, as appears in the third book, p. 681.

The reftoration of the jesuits afforded matter for a real triumph to Villeroi, Jeannin, Du-Perron, and above all to D'Osfat, who had not neglected their interests at Rome, where he still resided to manage his majesty's affairs at that court. And here it seems proper to introduce that memorial, which was addressed to me from Italy against this ecclessaftic, and which, as has been observed, I had already mentioned to the king.

His majesty was then gone to Chantilly, to spend a few days there in the month of April, on account of the pure air, the agreeableness of the place, the conveniency for hunting, and other country amusements, which his physicians seemed to think necessary for his health. Upon some letters I wrote to him, in which I could not dispense with myself from observing that by his absence a great number of affairs were left undetermined, he returned immediately to Paris, notwithflanding all the entreaties of his physicians to prevent him. The same evening that he arrived, he remembered the memorial in question, and asked me for it, by which he only prevented me, it being my intention to shew it him that day. I had brought it with me, between my coat and waiftcoat, and I left it with him that he might examine it at his leifure. I had made no alterations in it; and added nothing, except perhaps a few reflexions, which this paper had no great need of, to draw upon the person against whom it was wrote his majesty's utmost displeasure.

THE author of this memorial, who had his reasons for neither mentioning in it his own name, nor that of the perfon to whom it was addreffed, endeavoured to prove, that D'Offat had prevaricated in every point of his commission, and had accepted it with no other design, but to bring matters to that pass, that the king should be obliged to enter into the views of the catholic leaguers of his council, and to purfue a political plan very different from that they found he had hitherto conducted himself by. This new plan, which still breathed the spirit of the league that gave it birth, confifted in uniting France in interest and friendship with the Pope, Spain, the archdukes, and Savoy, against all the protestant powers of Europe in general, and the protestants of this kingdom in particular; to make Henry concur with the Pope in placing a catholic prince on the throne of Great Britain; no longer to protect the United-Provinces; to use his authority to procure a general submission to the council of Trent; in a word, to make him adopt all the 002 Austrian Austrian schemes, and all the maxims of the other side of the Alps. The jesuits were to undertake the task of cementing this union, which was to be founded upon a marriage between the children of France and Spain, and the first effects of it the dethroning of king James *.

THE author of this memorial, to prove that he did not bring thefe heavy accusations against D'Ossat like a mere declaimer, justified the truth of them by that cardinal's own letters, as well those I have formerly mentioned, as others which he had collected, and by his common discourse at Rome, either in public, or to my brother, ambassador to that court, and others in private: he explained the mystery of those almost infurmountable obstacles the holy father made to the king's abfolution, and the marriage of the princess his fifter: he shewed that they proceeded from D'Offat himfelf, who during the whole time that those affairs were depending, abused with impunity the confidence his master reposed in him; and, to prevent the reproaches he had reason to expect from him, gave him to understand, that he was under an absolute necessity of persuading the court of Rome, that his majesty was of the same opinion, and that it was with great difficulty he suppreffed those reports which from time to time were spread to the contrary.

IT is certain, that throughout this whole affair D'Offat acted with great art, as likewife in the infinuations he fecretly gave the king, that Spain, with respect to him, had only the most pacific intentions, for which the Pope was ready to be security. All this is so clear, and supported by the author with such incontestable proofs, as forces belief, notwithstanding that spirit of hatred and sury, which it cannot be denied every part of this paper breathes against D'Ossat; he is also reproached in it with assuming the character of a great politician, and a consummate statesman, when he had so much reason to blush for his ignorance and incapacity; and that in this ecclesiastic nothing was to be sound but the meanness of his original, having, before his advancement to the purple, been a pedagogue and a sootman +, and owed all have come from Rome against cardinal D'Ossat. His gratitude in many places obliges him to speak of monsieur de Villeroi his protector, and to make an almost open profession of his attachment to him. What can be concluded from hence? certainly nothing in derogation of the qualities of the feveral advantageous changes in his fortune to the fawning arts he practified on Villeroi, and to his flavifly ferving the hatred of other catholic leaguers to the protestants. At the conclusion of this memorial, the author earnestly entreats the person into whose hands it should happen to fall, to show it to his majesty.

SETTING afide all that this paper contains of the extravagant or outrageous, which shew it came from a declared enemy, it must faill be confessed, that D'Ossat could not escape the reproach of having slandered his sovereign, and being ungrateful to his benefactor; and that he even left to posterity the means of convicting him of those two crimes, in the letters which through vanity he caused to be printed, wherein he calumniated Henry IV. as a prince who oppressed the clergy, destroyed the nobility, ruined the third estate of the kingdom, and acted like the tyrant of his people.

Nor is truth less violated in those furious exclamations he makes against the protestants. What can one think of the epithets of impious, horrid, detestable, facrilegious, with which he brands a body that makes profession to agree with him in the belief of all the fundamental articles of the doctrine of Jesus Christ, and have the same veneration his mind, and every thing in favour of the goodness of his heart. One cannot avoid observing, how palpably the author here abuses the liberty of thinking freely: he endeavours to extend it over matters of religion, almost the only ones which ought to be exempt from it; and feems defirous to exclude it from political affairs, which of all others ought to be most subject to debate; nothing being fo uncertain, fo much dependant on the caprice of fortune, or fo hable to change as they. As to the private history of cardinal D'Osfat, it must be allowed he was of the lowest extraction; fome fay he was the fon of a quack doctor; others, a bastard son of the lord of Cassanabere; whilft others, with more probability, make him the fon of a farrier, of the diocese of Auch. He was tutor to the young lord of Cattlenau-Marnoac; afterwards he went to Rome, in the quality of fecretary to Foix, and was there appointed fecretary to cardinal Lewis d'Efte, protector of the affairs of France at Rome. He was then sent by his majesty to Florence; and at last went ambassider to Rome, Venice, &c. The bishopric of Rennes was conferred on him in 1596; and in 1600, that of Bayeux: M. de Rossy obtained Henry IV's permission for him to resign the last. He intended to pass the rest of his days at Rome; and actually died there on the 13th of March, 1604, a month after the death of the duches of Bar, aged fixtyeight years. The last letter he wrote was to M. Villeroi, fix days before his death.

See the other particulars of his life in Amelot de la Houffaye, prefixed to the edition of this cardinal's letters publifhed by him: he has carefully avoided taking the part of the cardinal in the little differences which happened betwirt him and the duke of Sully; and he afferts, I don't know on what grounds, that the reason why that mioister would not write to him, was, because he could not prevail on himself to give him the title of Monseigneur. Note on the 329th letter.

1604. for the divine writings in which they are contained, the Apostles Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer *.

As to his political errors, though in D'Offat they may well be imputed to views too narrow and confined, yet they are not the less palpable. At a time when the ambitious projects of the house of Autria were in a manner posted up throughout all Europe, he exposed France to the danger of being the first victim of them, by breaking off for ever with all her allies that were to support her against this proud and insolent monarchy. And what is still more surprising, this destructive policy communicated itself, as if by contagion, to the greatest part of those who were employed in the administration of public affairs: and what is yet more to be lamented, it gained ground upon the wisest as well as the simallest party †.

It was this policy that in the month of April this year exposed Villeroi to one of the greatest mortifications that could happen to a man in a public employment. The king, when he set out for Fontainebleau, where it was his custom to keep his Easter, during which there was a cessation of all business in the council, took leave of his council.

* This reason of our author's is a very weak one; but every one knows that the prosession of the new religion do not acknowledge the authority of the holy fathers, the councils, or any other sources of tradition or faith.

+ This fystem of politics has not been productive of the mifchiefs M. de Sully apprehended it would occasion; on the contrary, the event of it has been as favourable as it possibly could have been. It is neverthelefs true, and will in fome degree be a juffification of our author's manner of reafoning on this occasion, that if the execution of these designs, of which the destruction of the protestant religion in France was the principal, had fallen into the hands of any other than cardinal de Richelieu, the fuccefs of it would not only have been doubtful; but if an attempt of fo great confequence as this had by any means mifcarried, France would, in all probability, have been replunged into the frightful fituation the was in during the reign of the children of Henry II.

Cardinal de Richelieu did not, however, in every respect follow the plan attributed to D'Offat, Villeroi, &c. fince during his whole life he was engaged in war with Spain. The perfect knowledge he had of the particular resources on which France could depend, and which, if we may judge from appearances, he had acquired principally from Sully's Memoirs, made him take in, and in fome degree reconcile, both these opposite systems, by entring into the defign of weakening the house of Austria, in pursuance of the one; and of destroying Calvinism in France, according to the other of them. I don't know of any one instance that fo evidently proves as this does, what a fingle man is capable of. The protestants of France, who had obtained a toleration of themselves, after having remained undiffurbed full thirty years, were, almost at once, brought into an entire subjection: this happened, because on the one fide there was a cardinal de Richelieu, and on the other there was no longer a Henry of Navarre.

fellors till the Sunday after Easter; but on Good Friday he recalled me by a letter, in which he informed me, that he had discovered some treasonable practices in his court, and that he wanted to confer with me; for which purpose he would order post-horses to be ready for me at Ablon on Easter-Sunday, that I might set out for Fontainebleau when the communion was over. I did fo, and this was the affair in question.

VILLEROI had a clerk in his office named Nicolas L'Hote, whose family, Or, as others from father to fon, had been attached to that of Villeroi; but the per- tail, fon of whom we are now speaking, before he entered into his service, had been fecretary to the count de La-Rochepot, when he was fent ambaffador from France to Spain. L'Hote had wit, but of that fort that strongly inclines the owner to artifice and intrigue. During his stay in Spain he contracted an intimacy with the Spanish secretaries of state. Don Juan Idiaques, Francheses, and Prada, to whom he betrayed the fecrets of the ambaffador his mafter. When La-Rochepot returned to France, L'Hote finding himfelf without any employment, folicited Villeroi, whose godson he was, for a place in his office, and was by him entrusted to decypher his dispatches; which was very agreeable to L'Hote, as it afforded him an opportunity of carrying on his first trade with fecurity.

BARRAULT *, who fucceeded the count de La-Rochepot in Spain, perceived, a short time after, that the secrets of his prince were known to that court; and in vain tortured his imagination to discover from whence this misfortune proceeded. Not being able to fix upon any parcicular person, he entreated his majesty, in a short letter addressed to himself, to look upon all the clerks in his secretaries offices, especially those belonging to Villeroi, as suspected persons. This treachery extended its influence to all our other ambaffadors to the feveral courts of Europe, who were extremely aftonished, and complained to the king, as Barrault had done, that the contents of their dispatches were known at these courts as soon as they received them from France, and very often before.

* Emeric Gobier de Barrault. It is related of this ambaffador, that being one day at a comedy in Spain, in which the battle of Pavia was represented, and feeing a Spanish actor throw him down who performed the character of Francis I, fet his foot on his throat, and, in the most outrageous terms, oblige him to ask quarter, he got upon the stage, and in fight of the whole house, ran the actor through the body with his fword. Amelot's notes on D'Óffat.

But neither Barrault nor they could penetrate any farther into the affair, till Barrault was one day accosted by a Frenchman of Bourdeaux, a refugee in Spain, whose name was John de Leyré, but better known by that of Rafis, which he had borne when he was in the fervice of the league, having been one * of the most active of the incendiaries, and on that account not being able to get himself comprehended in the pardon, was obliged to fly into Spain, where his fervices, which confifted in revealing some advices he still received from his affociates in France, were rewarded by a good penfion that was allowed him by that court, and which was continued to him, till the council of Spain having procured by other means more certain intelligence than any they could get from Rafis, he foon perceived, by the contempt he was treated with at Madrid, and the discontinuance of his pension, that his credit was funk all of a fudden; and changing his battery that infrant, he applied himself with the utmost diligence to find out who was the traitor in France that had enriched himself with his spoils, not doubting but that if he should succeed, this discovery would purchase his recal to his own country, which he had always in his view, and probably procure him greater advantages than those he lost in Spain.

Men educated in the arts of faction, and the myftery of intrigue, have talents for these fort of discoveries peculiar to themselves. Rafis got acquainted with another Frenchman, named John Blas, who had settled in Spain, and it was from him that he learned in what manner L'Hote had abused the considence of his first master. Rafis, struck with this hint, fixed, as by instinct, on this man; and having procured from other persons information that he was actually one of Villeroi's secretaries, at that distance his sagacity alone discovered to him what so many others upon the very spot were ignorant of.

H1s suspicions being changed into a certainty, he went to Barrault, and offered to point out the traitor of whom he complained, but that care must be taken to prevent his having any suspicion that he was discovered, on condition, that if his informations were found to be true, the king would give him a free pardon in form, and a decent pension. Barrault thought the affair of such importance, that he made no scruple to promise both. Rasis likewise exacted a promise from Barrault, and this with a view to his own safety, that he should proceed slowly and cautiously in the affair; and that when he wrote to France upon the proposals that had been made to him, he should address himself to none but the king. But Barrault understood this last request as an excefs of unneceffary caution, which did not exclude him from acquainting his majesty's chief ministers with the affair: and it was Villeroi himself that he informed of Rafis's offer and proposals. Villeroi, who did not imagine that the traitor was in his own office, fent the dispatches immediately to the king: but L'Hote being with his master when this packet from Barrault was opened, drove directly at his purpose; and reflecting upon the importance of the advice, acted in the very manner that Rafis had with fo much reason been apprehensive he would do; for he wrote instantly to his correspondents in Spain, defiring them to take all the necessary measures, and that without delay, to prevent Rafis from discovering more. This was the best method he could think of to fecure himself, and to prevent any bad consequences; and it would probably have fucceeded, had the person concerned been any other than Rafis.

This man, when he received his pardon, which his majesty sent him, together with his answer to his proposals, observed that it was not figned by Lomenie, to whom the king would naturally have referred it, if it had not been offered him by another train of conveyance; and concluding from thence that it had paffed Villeroi's office, he went directly to the ambaffador, and complained that he had deceived him: and now thinking it no longer necessary to conceal any thing, he told him his reasons for pressing him to write only to the king, and to Villeroi less than any other person: he gave him, in a few words, all the informations he had promifed him concerning L'Hote's intrigues; that done, he told Barrault, that to avoid, if it was still possible, the danger with which he was threatened at Madrid, he had nothing left for it but to endeavour to gain the French territories with the utmost expedition. And accordingly he mounted his horse that moment; and it was happy for him that he did so, for the next morning his house was invested by archers, who were fent after him with orders to make all possible haste, that they might come up with him before he reached the frontier: but Rafis, by good fortune, or rather by his own extreme diligence, escaped with Descartes, Barrault's secretary, whom this ambaffador permitted to accompany him, to prefent him in France. They never rested till they found themselves at Bayonne, from whence continuing their rout without delay, they came to Paris, and hearing the king was at Fontainebleau, fet out directly for that place. VOL. II. Pp ON

On the road they met Villeroi, who was going from Fontainebleau to his house at Juvisy; and believing they ought not to conceal any thing from him, intreated him to have his clerk arrested by way of security; and that they might have the sole honour of the affair, offered to return themselves to Paris to arrest him. Villeroi neither approved of their proposal, nor the offer they made him of their persons; which, it must be confessed, was an instance of great imprudence; but he. doubtless, imagined, that it was not possible for L'Hote to escape. He told the two couriers, that this clerk was to come to him the next day, and that it would be then time enough for them to fecure him; it being likewise his opinion, that his majesty ought first to be spoke to about it; and that they risked nothing by this delay, provided they kept a profound filence. Surprised and distatisfied as they were at this proceeding, it was their business to obey; and they delivered the packets they were charged with, to him, to be given to his majefty, which he did the next day.

THE king had not yet received these packets on Easter-day when I came to Fontainebleau, nor by consequence knew of the two couriers arrival, or the name of him that betrayed him; the only certain intelligence he had was, the warning that had been given him to hold all the clerks of Villeroi fuspected. As I did not reach Fontainebleau till it was very late, and was greatly fatigued with my journey, I did not wait on his majesty till the next morning. I found him up and dreffed, though it was fcarcely fun-rife. Barrault's informations had given him great uneafinefs. This prince took my hand, and leading me into the gallery that joined to his apartment, conferred with me there a long time upon the news he had just received from his ambasfador. The dispatches from London that had been lost coming into his mind, and all that I had faid when I imputed this misfortune to Villeroi's people, which at that time he took for an effect of jealoufy and hatred, now appeared to him fo well founded, that he acknowledged to me he began to give credit to it, and to conceive very unfavourable thoughts of Villeroi. As he did not expect that Descartes and Rafis would arrive fo foon, he ordered me to fift this matter to the bottom, and use my utmost endeavours to find out the truth.

His majesty and I had been three days employed in endeavouring to make discoveries, when Villeroi arrived with the packets beforementioned. I was walking with the king in the long gallery of the garden garden of Pines, and preparing to take leave of him for my return to 1601. Paris, at the very moment that Villeroi came up to us. His countenance expressed all that grief the consciousness of having such news to The gallery of Ulvilles. inform his majesty of must necessarily inspire; and I may venture to fay, that for a man who had some cause to wish to humble a rival, or at least to rejoice in his humiliation, I sympathised truly with him in his affliction. While he read the papers, his majefty often looked at me, and pressed my hand several times. He did not give him time to read them out, but interrupting him at the name of L'Hote, "And " where is this L'Hote, your clerk?" faid his majefty, with fome emotion, "have you not caufed him to be feized?" "I believe, fire," replied Villeroi, in great consternation, "that he is at my house, but he " is not yet arrested." "How!" returned Henry, in a rage, "you " believe he is in your house, and yet you have not ordered him to be " feized! Pardicu! this is great negligence indeed; how could you " trifle thus when you knew his treachery? this business must be at-" tended to immediately: go back with all possible haste, and seize " him yourself."

VILLEROI departed in the utmost grief and consusion; and I did not delay a moment my return to Paris; when the next-day I received a letter from his majesty, who charged Descartes to tell me from him all that had passed. Since I find myself engaged to relate this affair, that I may avoid the reproach of having supported such accounts of it as have been given by the enemies of Villeroi, in what remains to be said I shall sollow the detail he himself gives of it, in the apology for his conduct, which he thought it necessary to * make public. After having recounted, in a manner advantageous for himself, all that had passed from the moment wherein he spoke to the two couriers, to the time that he went to the king at Fontainebleau, he proceeds in the following manner.

THAT at his return to his house, he found the bishop of Chartres and some other persons of distinction, who waited for him, and detained him a long time in his closet, the subject of their conference being the settling some points relating to the approaching ceremony of minister, it being strictly conformable to the accounts given of it by M. De Thou, the Chronol. Septen. Matthieu, and all other historians of credit of that time.

* See the original of this apology in Villeroi's Memoirs of flate, pag. 522. it bears date the 3d of May. There can be no doubt of its containing a faithful relation of the fentiments and actions of this the order of the Garter. When Descartes came to his apartment, to acquaint him that L'Hote, with Desnots, were just arrived from Paris, his respect for his company hindered him from interrupting them. L'Hote, on his first entring the house, was saluted with the news of the arrival of the two couriers from Spain, yet preserved presence of mind enough to appear but little concerned at it; and pretending that he was hungry, and would go and eat a morfel in the kitchen, only paffed through it telling the maitre d'hotel that he would go to a public house and refresh himself, and get his boots taken off, that he might be in a condition to appear before his mafter. Villeroi, after his company went away, asked where L'Hote was; and being informed that he was in the offices, as every body thought he was, he thought he could not do better than fend a fervant to tell the maitre d'hotel, that he should amuse L'Hote with some discourse, and not lose sight of him: he himfelf, in the mean time, went to Lomenie, to defire that he would lend him Du-Broc, lieutenant du prevôt, who he intended should arrest him. He brought back Lomenie with him, and they placed themselves at a window that looked into the court where the whole transaction was to pass. But these precautions were too late, L'Hote had already escaped.

Those who judge favourably enough of Villeroi to take the whole recital upon his word, will at least probably exclaim here against the dilatory manner in which this secretary of state executed those orders he had just received from the king's own mouth, and in a tone as absolute as it was pressing: he would be still more culpable, if a thousand circumstances of L'Hote's escape, made public by Descartes and Rasis, which were not mentioned in his apology, were true: however, it would be certainly great injustice to believe every thing that on this occasion was said against Villeroi *; his enemies had too good an opportunity afforded them to rail, not to take advantage of it; the protestants, especially, painted him in the blackest colours, not able to deny themselves the pleasure of being revenged on him, who had contributed more than any other to the king's change of religion. But, on the other side, it is not fit to hold him clear of any blame, as those that are devoted to him do, who insist, that his whole conduct in this affair was justifiable. All my friends did not scruple to say publicly, that, if 1604. fuch an accident had happened in my family, I should have been much more feverely reflected upon. The foreign ambaffadors refiding in France, and even the Pope's nuncio, came to my house at Paris, and declared to me, that if, after fuch a discovery, their dispatches must still pass through Villeroi's hands, their masters would not venture to mention any thing of confequence in them.

As to the traitor, all that could be done was to fend fome archers after him, who purfued him fo closely, that when he came to the fide of the river Marne, with a Spaniard who accompanied him, and at a small distance from a ferry-boat, he could not hope to reach it before they came up with him, and faw no other way to avoid their purfuit, than to throw himfelf into the river, thinking to fwim over it; but he was drowned in the attempt. The Spaniard chose rather to be taken; and he was brought back to Paris, with the body of L'Hote, which was drawn out of the water. Villeroi feemed truly afflicted that they had not been able to feize his clerk alive: indeed he had reason to regret it; it was the only means he had left to stop the mouth of slander. He was the first to propose to me, in a letter he wrote to me about this affair, to have the carcase * treated with the utmost ignominy, and to punish the Spaniard in an exemplary manner.

ALL this could not appeale the king. He knew not, for a long time after this adventure, in what light to behold Villeroi; and was three days in doubt whether it was not fit to banish him from his prefence. But Villeroi threw himfelf at his majesty's feet, with so many marks of a profound forrow, shed tears in such abundance, and made

The Septenaire takes no notice of this examination by the furgeons, but gives an ample detail of the particulars if L'Hote's flight, and the manner in which he was found, which totally destroys the validity of the account given b, L'Etoile, who, upon other occalions, has given fufficient proofs of his diflike to M. de Villeroi, and fuch deep proteflations of his innocence, that Henry could not help believing him (though the world would never be perfuaded, but that he only feigned to believe him) and with that goodness, so natural to him, granted the pardon he so vehemently implored.

MATTERS were in this state, when I returned to Fontainebleau, to inform his majesty what I was indispensably obliged to do, of the representations made me by the foreign ambassadors. It was resolved, that the cypher made use of by our ambassadors should be changed; and the king now thought only of taking advantage of this incident, to make Villeroi more exact (I repeat the king's own words) more cautious in the choice of his clerks, and less haughty than he had formerly been. His majesty concerted with me a letter, which he thought likely to produce this effect, because I was to make it public: this letter was brought to me at Paris by Perroton from the king, as if to acquaint me with the indulgences he had thought fit to shew Villeroi. The contents were, that his majefty could not refuse a pardon to the tears and entreaties of this fecretary; that I ought no longer to diffrust him, fince he did not; and that, in his present condition, charity required, that I should write to him a letter to give him comfort, and an affurance of my friendship; and this he entreated me to do.

I SECONDED the good intentions of his majesty without any reluctance, and, I may even fay, with more fincerity than he required of me, except that I could not prevail upon myfelf to write to Villeroi, that I held him entirely disculpated. This I thought would appear a ridiculous piece of flattery: I faid enough to afford him the means of perfuading the public, by my letter, that I was convinced he was innocent of the capital crime of which he was accused. I gave him the hint of the declaration he published some days afterwards, and reprefented to him, that he ought to endeavour to shut the mouths of the protestants, to whose censure he had laid himself open, and that the only method he could use for that purpose, was to relax a little of that violence he had shewn against them, by feeking to inspire the catholics with more benevolent fentiments of them; and laftly, to appear publicly the promoter of that regulation I had fo often proposed to him, to establish a perfect concord between these two bodies. If in this letter I added, that his absolute justification in the king's opinion depended upon his future behaviour, and if as to what had paffed I produced the example of marechal Biron, it was only in obedience to the king's commands, who was willing to appear indulgent, but not weak. VILLEROI. VILLEROI, in his answer to my letter, thanked me for the advice I had given him, which he affured me he would exactly follow, and for my good offices, which he protested he would never forget. He consessed, that he ought not to have so blindly confided in a young man like L'Hote, and was candid enough to acknowledge, that although his conscience did not reproach him with the guilt of any crime against the king, yet the error he had fallen into was sufficient to cast a stain upon his reputation, which all the faithful services he was resolved to continue to render his majesty, during the remainder of his life, would never wipe off. In his defence he only said, that the great obligations L'Hote had received from him were what made it so difficult for him to believe he could sail in his duty. Villeroi seldom wrote to me without renewing the mention of his fault, his missortune, and his innocence, and almost always the obligations he thought he owed to me on this occasion.

IT appeared, that Barrault did not give credit to the injurious reports that were fpread of Villeroi by his enemies, fince he wrote to him, a fhort time afterwards, and gave him an account of a converfation between himfelf and Prada, of which L'Hote was the fubject. Rafis had reason to be fatisfied with the recompence that was made him; besides the sum of fifteen hundred and fixty livres, which he received from Barrault when he left Spain, a gratification of a thousand crowns was bestowed on him, and all the conditions agreed to by the ambassador were fulfilled. This did not hurt Barrault himfelf, being paid in the last quarter of his pension. Descartes represented to the king, that a man could not live in Spain but at great expence; and that, notwithstanding all my letters, his master had not been able to get any thing from that quarter.

The paper upon religion, that has been mentioned before, confifted of fome articles, which, if received by the catholics and protestants, appeared to me capable of uniting the two religions, by destroying that detestable prejudice which makes them load each other with the harsh accusations of herefy and treason, impiety and idolatry. This paper I had drawn up with the consent and approbation of his majesty; and I shewed it to him several times, in the presence of the bishop of Evreux, Bellievre, Villeroi, Sillery, and father Cotton.

If the protestants do not believe all the catholics profess, it cannot at least be denied, that we believe nothing which they do not likewise; and that what we believe contains all that is effential in the christian religion, the Ten Commandments, the Apostles Creed, and the Lord's Prayer, being the great and general foundation * of our common faith. Here then let us ftop, and confider the rest as so many dubious points, about which men may be left at full liberty to have different opinions. We are perfuaded, that it is not only useless, but criminal, to fearch into the fecrets of the Almighty; but, we not only fearch into his fecrets, but fet up ourselves as judges of them, when we charge one another as criminal for having different opinions, and different degrees of knowledge, with relation to speculative truth, though knowledge, in all its different degrees, is received from God. Let us leave to him alone the knowledge of his fecrets, as well as the dispensations of his providence: let us allow to the fovereign magistrate, what the public good requires, the power of punishing those who violate the laws of charity in any fociety; for it belongs not to any human judicature to punish errors only cognizable by God. Let us confider this in another view; if our unhappiness be such, that the error is on our side, can the catholics imagine that they shall bring us into their notions by abuse and persecution? Compassion and tenderness are the only means that do any fervice to religion, and the only means that religion dictates: the zeal which is fo much boafted, is only rage or obstinacy, disguised under a reputable appellation. This was the ground-work of my paper: nothing can be more plain or more true; but the power which men allow truth to have over them is very small; and what is generally called reason in religion, if examined well, is, in most men, nothing more than their own paffion.

If to reconcile the two religions is morally impossible, it may, with equal certainty, be said to be politically impossible, since it cannot be done without the concurrence of the Pope, which cannot be expected, since it was not obtained in the pontificate of Clement VIII. who, of all the Popes that have for a long time sat in the see of Rome, was most free from party prejudices, and had more of that gentleness and compatition which the gospel prescribes to all its followers.

cian, we may, without injustice, deny his qualifications as a profound divine. What he fays here may be called treating religion politically.

* I do not think it necessary, to lose any time in giving a scrious answer to these arguments of our author. After having allowed him the character of an able politi-

The holy father was at this time fo old and infirm, that his death was hourly expected. The king thought it necessary to send the cardinals de Joyeuse, and de Sourdis to Rome, to manage the interests of the nation in the approaching conclave. His majesty, by the advice of cardinal Joyeuse, gave de Sourdis nine thousand livres for his equipage, and the expence of his journey, with a pension of two thousand four hundred crowns a year, during the time that he staid at Rome upon his affairs.

ONE of the last actions of Clement the eighth was the promotion of eighteen cardinals at one time, which made it generally believed that this Pope, finding himself near his end, was defirous of giving his nephew cardinal Aldobrandin a last proof of his affection, that, according to all appearances, would place him upon the pontifical throne; by the great number of dependents on his family that were introduced into the conclave, or, at least, that the papal dignity should be conferred on one under whom this cardinal might expect to govern. Two of these hats were to be given to France; and the choice of the two men, whom the king was to name to his holiness for this dignity, was the occasion of a strong intrigue at court, between the bishop of Evreux and Seraphin Olivary * on one fide, and mefficurs de Villars, archbishop of Vienne, and de Marquemont on the other. The two last were supported by the interest of Bellievre, Villeroi, Sillery, and all their friends; and I thought myself obliged to range myself on the side of Du-Perron, and Olivary, the one being my bishop and particular friend, and the other remarkably diftinguished for his eminent piety. Notwithstanding all the intrigues of the opposite party, Du-Perron and Olivary were preferred; and the former, by my advice, wrote a letter of thanks to Villeroi, as if he had really follicited his advancement: fuch is the cuftom of courts.

The prefling affairs that had obliged his majefty to leave Chantilly, and at the beginning of fpring, was the clearing and figning the common computations for the expence of his buildings, his hunting, his privy purfe, as likewife of the fortifications, artillery, and roads. When the day was fixed for the tranfacting this bufinefs, his majefty, to fluin that crowd of petitioners who waited only for an opportunity of feeing us together, fent the younger Lomenie to tell me that I need not come and accordingly he came so early in the morning, that many of the officers, concerned in the affairs that were to be settled, all of whom I had sent for, were not yet come. The number of these was far from being inconsiderable, governors of fortresses, engineers, intendants, and comptrollers of the buildings, the several persons belonging to the board of ordnance, overseers of bridges and causeys, and others.

Henry had fomething of consequence to impart to me; I judged fo by that deep melancholy which, notwithstanding his endeavours to disguise, appeared in his countenance and language, and also because he led me into the great gallery of arms, the place where he generally communicated his secrets to me: and here the reader may expect to find one of those remarkable conversations that he has already met with in these Memoirs.

Our discourse did not begin with the chief causes of his uneasiness: the heart, involved in its own vexation, has need, in the first instant, of the help of other objects to be disentangled, especially if with this vexation be mingled something of confusion. Therefore the dukes of Bouillon and Tremouille, with the rest of that cabal, were the subject he first led to; these persons having lately through malice united themselves with the prince of Condé, the marchioness of Verneuil, and the samily of d'Entragues; and those from whom his majesty had received this information, offered to prove the truth of it by their own letters, and other undeniable testimonies.

Having defired this prince to allow me a whole day to confider what advice it was most proper to give him on occasion of this new intrigue, he changed the discourse to his excursion to Chantilly, his hunting; and afterwards he gave me an account of his losses at play, the money he laid out in presents to his mistresses, and other superfluous expences, which were to have their place in the expence of the current year, as well as the money applied to the manufactures and other buildings, which altogether made up so considerable a sum, that Henry, who secretly reproached histisself for these extravagancies, could think of no better expedient to prevent the confusion he expected my remonstrances would give him, than to add, before I had time to reply, that I might also place there a gratification of six thousand crowns, which he now granted me. This precaution could not hinder me from giving evident marks of my association and grief at the increase.

increase of such trifling expences. Henry again endeavoured to avoid 1604. coming to any explanation with me, by faying, that, after spending fo great a part of his life in continual labours and fatigue, he had a right to allow himself now some indulgence in his pleasures. I answered the king with my accustomed fincerity and firmness, that what he faid was indeed very reasonable and just, if, instead of those great projects he had communicated to me, and which by his orders I had imparted to the king of England, he had resolved to pass the rest of his life in the enervating pleasures of luxury; but that if he still retained any thoughts of pursuing his former schemes, he would deceive himself greatly if he supposed them compatible with such expensive amusements, and therefore he must determine his choice upon the one or the other. I stopped at these words; Henry having silently listened to me while I was speaking, like a man who was full of anxiety, and wholly abforbed in thought. But the present disposition of the heart, whatever that may be, always governs our first emotions, and in him that moment produced nothing but vexation and rage: yet he contented himself with telling me, that he perceived I had entertained very unfavourable thoughts of him, and commanded me, without troubling him any more, to carry the fums he had mentioned to account.

STILL, however, I was not discouraged. I knew the heart of this prince as well as my own; I had always found him fensible to glory, and open to conviction, and I could not believe him changed in fo short a time: instead therefore of having recourse to the ordinary palliatives, after telling him, that I faw plainly the freedom I had formerly used in my representations was now become displeasing to him, I again renewed the former subject, and talked to him of the measures he had already taken in Germany and Italy, to prepare the way for those glorious actions he one day intended to perform, and the success the persons he had employed there for that purpose had already found. I repeated, that it was useless to take all this trouble, if the money that should be destined for those great enterprises, was squandered away on unnecessary expences. I convinced him, by a very exact calculation, that he could not engage in the execution of these designs, without having before hand forty-five millions entire, that is, the revenue of two years, which it required the strictest economy to keep together; and that with this fum the war could not be supported more than three years, without anticipating the royal revenues, or burthening the people with extrao dinary taxes. This the following calculation makes evident.

THE maintainance of an army of fifty-thousand foot, which is the - least that could be employed on this occasion, will cost nine hundred thousand livres a month, and nine millions a year, allowing only ten months to the year; fix thousand horse, which is the number answerable to fuch a body of infantry, will require three hundred and forty thoufand livres a month, that is, three millions four hundred thousand livres a year; a train of artillery of forty pieces of cannon, cannot well be supplied at a less expence than a hundred and fifty thousand livres a month, and fifteen hundred thousand a year. These three articles alone make up fourteen millions each year; and by confequence, near forty-two millions will be required for the three years together, on a supposition that the war will continue so long. The expence of making levies, of hiring carriages, of victual, and other things abfolutely necessary at the beginning of a war, cannot be estimated at less than a hundred and fifty thousand livres; the waste of that victual, with other unforeseen expences in ammunition, must amount likewise to the same sum. The remainder of the forty-five millions, it may easily be imagined, will be confumed in extraordinary expences, too tedious to infert here.

The king ftill answered, that, before every thing could be in readines for the execution of these schemes, so many obstacles would arise as to render all his endeavours useless: but while he spoke in this manner, I perceived that his anger was already wholly extinguished, and that he approved of all I had said to him. This he immediately after confessed, and, at the same time, declared, with a sincerity truly commendable in an absolute prince, that the obstacles he had raised, and the severe things he had said to me, proceeded only from the anxiety of a heart oppressed with a more cruel affliction than that he had at first complained of when he mentioned the traiterous cabal, and that his peace was wholly ruined by the behaviour of the queen, land the marchioness of Verneuil. These words, unhappily but too sincere, changed the subject of our conversation.

HENRY's passion for mademoiselle d'Entragues was one of those unhappy diseases of the mind, that, like a flow poison, preyed upon the principles of life; for the heart, attacked in its most sensible past, feels, indeed, the whole force of its misfortune, but, by a cruel fatality, has neither the power, nor the inclination to be freed from it. This prince suffered all the infolence, the caprices, and inequalities qualities * of temper, that a proud and ambitious woman is capable 1604. of shewing. The marchioness of Verneuil had wit enough to difcover the power she had over the king; and this power she never exerted but to torment him. She talked to him continually of her fcruples, and regreted the facility with which she had yielded to his defires; fcruples which he refented with fo much the more reason, as he was not ignorant that the forgot them entirely with persons of inferior rank. They now feldom met but to quarrel: Henry paid a high price for favours which were not endeared by that tender fympathy which forms the happiness of lovers, and which, to complete his misfortune, occasioned almost continual uneafiness between him and the queen his wife.

This princess, on her fide, who had from nature a temper too uncomplying, and from her country a ftrong propenfity to jealoufy, not being able to make her rival feel all the effects of her hatred, revenged herself upon her husband: and thus was this unhappy prince exposed to the fury of two women, who agreed in nothing but in separately confpiring to deftroy his quiet. Whatever endeavours were used to produce a reconciliation between the king and his wife, were rendered ineffectual almost at the same moment: the queen began immediately to require a facrifice that Henry could not make her; and his refufal, though foftened with the grant of every other wish, affected her so fenfibly, that the forgot all his compliances, and laboured herfelf to continue the cause of her own uneafiness, by depriving him, together with the privileges of a hufband, of all that tenderness and regard that conciliates affection and fixes inclination.

1604. formerly mentioned, had been torn by me, but another had been drawn up by the king; and the never ceased tormenting him till he had promised to get from his mistress this paper, which all the ecclesiastics whom the confulted affured her was of no force. Henry, merely to oblige her, at length resolved to desire the marchioness to restore it; and he demanded it of her in a manner that shewed he would not be refused. He had just left her when he came to the Arsenal: the effort he had made upon himself to take this step, the little advantage he had drawn from it, and the offensive language with which his mishad accompanied her refusal, had all together produced that deep affliction in which I faw him.

> THE marchioness of Verneuil, upon the first intimation that it was expected the should refign the promife of marriage, threw herfelf into the most violent transport of rage imaginable, and told the king. infolently, that he might feek it elfewhere. Henry, that he might finish at once all the harsh things he had to say to her, began to reproach her with her connections with the count d'Auvergne her brother, and with the malcontents of the kingdom. She would not condescend to clear herself of this imputed crime, but assuming in her turn the language of reproach, the told him, that it was not possible to live any longer with him; that as he grew old he grew jealous and fuspicious, and that she would with joy break off a correspondence for which she had been too ill rewarded to find any thing agreeable in it, and rendered her, the faid, the object of the public hatred. She carried her infolence fo far, as to speak of the queen in terms so contemptuous, that, if we may believe Henry, he was upon the point of striking her; and that he might not be forced to commit fuch an outrage to decency, he was obliged to quit her abruptly, but full of rage and vexation, which he was at no pains to conceal, fwearing that he would make her restore the promise that had raised this storm.

> AFTER giving me this account of the behaviour of his miftrefs, the remembrance of which renewed all his rage, he was forced to grant (and without his confession I should have much suspected it) that he would with difficulty bring himfelf to a refolution of keeping the oath he had made in the first fallies of his fury: and as it usual with lovers, who never have fo strong an inclination to praise the object of their passion, as after they have faid all the injurious things possible of them, Henry fell again upon the good qualities of his mistress, when out of those capricious humours, and when those sudden gusts of pasfion fion had fubfided. He praifed, with a transport of delight, the charms of her convertation, her sprightly wit, her repartees so poignant, yet fo full of delicacy and spirit; and here indeed he had some foundation for his praises. The queen's temper and manners were so different, that the contrast made him still more fensible of those charms in his mistress. " I find nothing of all this at home, faid he to me, I receive " neither fociety, amusement, nor content from my wife; her conver-" fation is unpleafing, her temper harfh, the never accommodates her-" felf to my humour, nor shares in any of my cares; when I enter " her apartment, and offer to approach her with tenderness, or begin " to talk familiarly with her, the receives me with fo cold and forbid-"ding an air, that I quit her in difgust, and am obliged to seek con-" folation elsewhere. When my cousin Guise is at the Louvre, I have " recourse to her conversation to banish my uneasiness; yet she often " tells me plain truths, but it is with fo good a grace that I cannot be " offended, and am forced to laugh with her." Such was the difpofition of this prince; and probably the queen had only herfelf to blame, that she had not been able to draw him out of the snares of her rival. or to difengage him from every other intrigue of gallantry: at leaft, he appeared to me to be abfolutely fincere, and to have the best intentions imaginable, when he preffed me, at the conclusion of this difcourfe, to use my utmost endeavours to prevail upon the queen, his wife, to alter her behaviour, and accommodate herfelf more to his humour.

I was about to answer, for this subject seemed not yet half discuffed, when we were interrupted by mefficurs De-Vic, de Trigny, de Pilles, de Fortria, and others, who entered that moment, and told his majesty, that the persons whom he had ordered to attend him had waited more than an hour, and that it was so late it would be imposfible to do all the business that morning. The king, after recommending fecrecy to me, followed them into the hall, and gave the rest of that day, and the two following, wholly to the affairs that had brought him to the Arfenal. The office of furveyor of the highways in Guienne was given, at my folicitation, to Biçofe, who was then in his fervice. A N. de Biçofe, commissioner was named to go and pull down the fort of Craon. Many or Vidoule, he was letteother new dispositions were made, which I shall not mention here.

THE king did not fail to take the first opportunity to renew the conversation that had been so unseasonably interrupted: he had a reconciliation with the queen so much at heart, that he wrote me billet after billet, enjoining me to undertake the task he had proposed to me.

1604. I was fenfible I run great hazards by obeying him: a too free and too ardent zeal on these occasions with persons of this rank often exposes the mediator to the refentment of one of the parties, and fometimes to that of both; besides, to speak candidly, this employment was less fuitable to me than to any other person, these little broils being extremely disagreeable to my temper.

> I THEREFORE refolved to omit no perfualions that I thought capable to make Henry himself take the only reasonable measures that were left him. I brought arguments, exhortations, examples, to prove that it depended upon himself to regain his quiet, and fix it upon solid foundations; and all that was necessary for this purpose, was to exert the mafter and the king, oblige the queen to keep her ill humours to herself and forbear her reproaches, and, above all, her complaints in public, which produced nothing but indecent reflections: and as to those who by their malicious informations embittered the mind of this princels, to punish them severely for the slightest word they dared to utter against him. I represented to this prince, that to secure his own peace and the happiness of his life, required only that he should exert a very small part of that courage and strength of mind he had shewn on occasions of a very different nature; that his reputation suffered from that tender fault in his conflitution, almost incomprehensible in fo great a prince. I told him, that a fovereign, without incurring the imputation of tyranny, and by the fole privilege of his high office, might exact from his subjects and family, as well for his own person as his flate, that obedience fo necessary to preferve a just subordination and fecure respect; and that it was absolutely fit and just, that he should chastife such persons who made it their business to destroy his domestic quiet. To these arguments I added the strongest entreaties; I conjured Henry with lifted hands, and eyes swelling in tears, to employ his authority on this oceasion: the condition I saw him in filled me with the deepest concern.

IT is certain that this prince had no other part left him to take; and I could never comprehend why he appeared fo strongly averse to it. He remembered the advice I had given him at Blois, which being fo different from that I pressed him now to follow, gave him a kind of advantage over me: he feemed to be pleafed with having an opportunity to tell me, that I perhaps was the true cause of all that had fince happened. But there was nothing folid in this objection, if well examined; and when I diffuaded his majesty from having recourse to measures, which might have produced dangerous consequences (this I cannot speak intere clearly, without betraying the secret I then vowed to keep) I had no intention to exclude him from taking such gentle and easy methods as would be justifiable in the father of a family to secure the tranquillity of his house. And Henry was reduced to the neetestity of owning, that if I were well acquainted with his disposition, I would be convinced it was absolutely out of his power to act with rigor towards persons with whom he was accustomed to live in familiarity, and above all to his wife.

I MAD nothing left but to tell him, that then he must banish his mistress, and give his wife all the satisfaction she could require. But he prevented me, by faying, that he was ready, if it must be so, to remove all cause of complaint from the queen, provided he could be affured, that after making her fuch a facrifice, he should find her fuch as he wished: but that he forefaw he should be plagued all the remainder of his life, because this princess was weak and obstinate enough to believe, that by acting in the manner she did, she only followed the dictates of reason; when, in effect, she was only governed by her pasfions. Henry, to convince me of the justness of this fear, entered into a long enumeration of the queen's faults, in which he but repeated to me what he had faid before, upon the delight she took in contradicting and teazing him; he only added, that she had discovered the most violent hatred to all his natural children, although born before she came into France, which it was not probable she would ever remit; he dwelt upon the little fenfibility she had shewn to his tenderness and regard for her, or gratitude for the extreme attention with which he prevented all the occasions she might have for money, although he was not ignorant that the never received any but to fquander upon Leonora and her husband, and some others, who were continually filling her ears with malicious stories, and giving her bad advice: he took me to witness, that never queen of France had received so many and such confiderable grants; and it is certain, that I had been the first to favour and folicit for them by my wife, and this I did with a view to peace, which is often purchased by these means, and always by the king's orders. By the rage this prince expressed against Conchini and his wife, whom he confidered as the creatures of Spain, and spies of the duke of Florence, no one, doubtless, would have chosen to be in the place of these two Italians; but this rage had no other consequences than making him condemn himself for not following the advice I was free VOL. II. Rr enough enough to give him when the queen came into France, which was, to forbid all her Italian attendants to pass the Alps with her.

This long convertation concluded with the fame request as the preceding one had done, that I should attempt, by the gentlest methods I could think of, to persuade the queen to more condescension to her husband's will, without giving her cause to suspect that I acted by his orders. Henry used every argument which he thought likely to have any force with me to engage me to undertake this task, telling me he did not doubt my success, having, on an occasion similar to this, prevailed upon the queen to write a letter to him, when no one else could.

The very time that the king gave me this commission to the queen, chance offered me a very favourable opportunity to execute it. The most common method of making grants to this princess, was either to create edicts in her favour, as those which I have just mentioned, or by granting to her the money paid upon contracts and bargains which succeeded through her interest and protection. These edicts and contracts always passed through my hands before they took effect; and it was my business to name, examine, and authorise the persons concerned.

The queen was offered four and twenty thousand livres, to procure the grant of an edict concerning the officers of the excise in Languedoc *. She sent d'Argouges to shew me the edict, and acquaint me with the proposal. I told d'Argouges, that his majesty might indeed, without doing the public any injustice, grant the favour the queen required, but that I did not think she took a good opportunity to obtain it; the king appearing to me so discontented with some late proceedings of this princes, that I was afraid he would not have this complaisance for her, unless she first endeavoured to remove his displeasure; and I took the liberty to offer her my advice and services on this occasion, if she thought I could be of any use to her. The queen, tempted by a sum so considerable, accepted my offer, and promised every thing, believing that, by writing a submissive letter, to the king, as she had done before, she should certainly succeed: accordingly she wrote a letter, and sent for me to shew it me, appearing willing to alter whatever I judged improper in it.

NEVER had any step she had taken cost her so much. She had so great an aversion for the marchioness of Verneuil, that she would hardly deign to pronounce her name: but if any circumstance occurred to introduce the mention of her, her gestures, her emotions, her very silence itself, expressed, in the most lively manner, what she would not say. As it was absolutely necessary to accustom her to hear her rival spoken of, I put her upon this subject without reserve; and then she consoled herself with giving the marchioness the most severe epithets her imagination could furnish her with; she said she never could refelf in comparison with ther; and inculcated the same insolence and want of respect for her in her children, who embroiled the state by countenancing the malecontents, while the king, blinded by his passion, took no care to restrain her.

I BEGAN by fympathifing with her in her griefs; but shewing her how much the cause of them was increased by her behaviour to the king, I made her so fully sensible of her fault, that she wrote another letter in the terms I dictated to her, and fent it to the king, who had left her at Fontainebleau, and was then at Paris. While he was under the impression of the joy this letter gave him, he returned her an anfwer to tender and polite, as it might naturally be expected would produce one from the queen in the fame firsin: but unfortunately, just before this letter was delivered to her, her emissaries had informed her, that the king was gone as usual to the marchioness de Verneuil, and infinuated that he was diverting himfelf with his miffrefs at her credulity. She now forgot all that the had promifed, faid the king had deceived her; and, instead of writing, told the messenger that brought her his majefty's letter, with a cold and contemptuous air, that the need not write, fince the expected to fee the king the next day, as he had promifed mifed her. The king was piqued, as it was natural he should be, at this behaviour, and could not be silent: those that heard what he said in the first emotions of his anger, were not persons that he could expect would be secret as I was, to whom he wrote directly. All that was said on both sides was reported to each of them, and matters were now in a worse state than before.

I was now engaged in a new affair, that of fettling the debate; but at most I could expect only an interval of peace, that would continue no longer than others had done, while his majefty could not prevail upon himself to take the only effectual methods that remained. These proposals I again made him, when he fent La-Varenne for me one day, to find, if possible, some remedy for his continual disquiets, which became every day more insupportable. I found him in the Orangerie of the Tuileries, which a shower of rain had obliged him to enter; and as he was repeatedly preffing me to tell him what he should do, and, upon my refufal, absolutely commanded me to give him my advice, "Then oblige four or five persons, said I to him, to pass the sea, and " as many others the Alps." The king answered, that half of my counsel he could follow without any difficulty, fince nothing hindered him from exercifing fome feverity upon those feditious persons that were conspiring against him in his court, but that it was not the same with the Italians; because that he not only had every thing to apprehend from that vindictive people, but likewise by removing her favourites, he should give such offence to the queen, as would render her for ever implacable. The king, after reflecting a little upon the propofal I had made him, fell upon a very fingular expedient, which was, to get this princess herself to consent to what I had advised. He stopped there, as if the thing had really been possible, and insisted upon my using all my endeavours to work this miracle, promising me, that if I fucceeded, he would, from that moment, renounce all his gallantries. After the king had given me this new commission, he left me, as he faid, to meditate upon it, and continued his walk alone in the garden. the rain having cealed during our conversation. 7.11.17

I DID not begin with the queen, by asking immediately a facrifice which I saw she was not disposed to make; I believed, that if ever a favourable opportunity offered to prevail upon her, it would be when there was a perfect agreement between their majesties; and this I laboured with so much assiduity to produce, that at length I reconcile them more thoroughly than they had ever been before; they agreed to forget forget all the past, and for the future to be deaf to all malicious informers. This calm lasted three weeks, and during that time the court was full of joy, and different amusements were thought of every day: but some new stratagems of the marchioness de Verneuil's having produced their ordinary effect, these good resolutions vanished again, and it became necessary, as a last resource, to attempt the expedient proposed by the king.

Ir may eafily be imagined, in what manner the queen received a propofal to fend away, in fome fort shamefully, those persons of her houshold whom she loved the most. I expected she would refuse me, and I had no hopes but from my obstinacy in returning often to the charge: but this princes continued inflexible; and, to say the truth, Henry, on his side, so ill performed the promise he had given me, to reward this facrifice by that of renouncing all other attachments but to his wife, that she drew from thence her best arguments for not yielding to mine.

WHAT I had foreseen, really happened; the queen, instigated by those whom I directly attacked, began to feek a quarrel even with me, and complained that I had not kept my word with her, as if it had been in my power to separate Henry from his mistress. But I did not fail to observe to her, that the performed her promife no better; and by that appearance of coldness and dislike, which, after so many relapses, the king looked upon as infurmountable, the was herfelf the cause of that evil the imputed to me. I proposed Madam de Guise to her as an example she should follow, if she ever hoped to fix the king's affection folely upon herself. She afterwards complained publicly, that I did not pay all the respect I ought to have done to her letters: this I was acquainted with by the wife of Conchini, who was less unreasonable and imprudent, than any other of her favourites, by whom the was absolutely governed: To this complaint I answered, that it was indeed true I did not always pay regard to letters which I faw written by the hand of any of her fecretaries, because they were either dictated without her knowledge, by unjust folicitors who abused her name, or written with a view to draw her refentment upon me if I refused to comply with them; but as for those written with her own hand, I defied any one to accuse me with having neglected to answer them with the utmost deference and respect.

To fay the truth, it was abfolutely necessary that I should continually call to remembrance, as I did, the duty I owed to the wife of my king, that I might not be carried by her unreasonable importunities to any 1604. failure of respect or obedience; for indeed there was no end of her demands: the expences of her houshold alone cost the king every year three hundred and forty-five thousand livres; all the gratifications, contracts, and edicts, that were made in her favour, were not fufficient to fupply her other expences; the one day, in a fit of ill humour, pawned her rings and jewels, or rather those that belonged to the queens of France, and there was a necessity for drawing money from the exchequer toredeem them; the edict of exempts was passed in every parish for her advantage; fome receivers of Roerue and Quercy being behind-hand in their payments, the money was applied to her uses; she took upon herfelf to pay the nuptial expences of Santi, her Italian gardener, and asked me for six hundred livres for that purpose: thiswas indeed but a trifling fum, but by fuch trifles as these one may judge of this princess's disposition with regard to economy. What could I do in this perplexing fituation, fince the inconvenience was equal, whether I granted all, or refused all, but to refuse whatever was really an encroachment upon justice, and a detriment to the public good, and in fuch demands as must indispensably be granted, and especially edicts, to prevent any oppression in levying the money? As to their majesties personal quarrels, it must be confessed, that in the king's conduct there were unaccountable weaknesses, and in the queen's inexcufable irregularities.

From the little fuccess I had met with ever since I had first interposed in these domestic debates, I at length was fully convinced, that in these affairs such only as were interested should undertake to mediate between the parties: I therefore quietly flipped my neck out of the collar, and willingly left the field open to Sillery, whom the king likewife made use of on this occasion. He sometimes sound that Sillery managed the two ladies better than I, which I had no difficulty to believe: this employment required complaifance and diffimulation; I could neither flatter the fentiments of others, nor difguise my own; and without this there was nothing to hope for, and every thing to fear: and here the refentment of a wife and a miftress both was to be dreaded, which made the danger fo much the greater. By what has been related, my first observation has been fully made out; and the fecond, I may fay, was no less verified by the event, fince, if I had not been extremely cautious, I should have certainly been the victim. of the lover and the mistress, and upon the following occasion.

AT the time when the mifunderstanding between Henry and the marchioness of Verneuil increased every day, I was defired by the king to make her very fevere reproaches in his name. Instead of relenting, or confessing her fault, she assumed so haughty an air, and answered with fo little respect, that this once I began to hope the affair would not end but in open rupture, which was what I most ardently defired: the not only refused to give his majesty the satisfaction he demanded of her, but appeared fo fully determined to break off all commerce with the king, that she even went so far, as to solicit me in the most earnest manner imaginable, to prevail upon the king to confent to this refolution, as being equally necessary to the future happiness of them both; and defired, that as foon as I went home I would write a letter to the king, which had been concerted between us, in which she expreffed herfelf in terms strong enough to make me conclude she acted fincerely. However, the knowledge I had of this woman's character was sufficient to give me apprehensions that she would disavow all that I should write to the king, and pretend that I had endeavoured, by underhand practices, to widen the breach between her and this prince: a conduct which, indulgent as he was, he would have never been able to pardon; for in affairs of love he carried his fenfibility and delicacy very far. I therefore took the precaution to fend this letter to the marchioness before it was given to the king, and at the same time defired she would read and examine it with attention, that she might be convinced I had faid nothing in this letter (which was very long) more than she had dictated to me; and entreated her to let me know, whether I had not fcrupulously observed the purport of her words. I recommended it in a particular manner to the bearer, to bring me back no verbal message, but to oblige this lady to write what she thought necessary to be altered in the letter, and all that she would have me add to it.

She had already relaxed much from the feverity of her first resolution; my messenger perceived it, by her caviling at the terms, and appearing distatissied, though she did not give the least hint that the letter should be suppressed. My servant finding that she returned the letter, after all this vague declamation, without any positive answer, remembered the orders I had given him, and told her, that having a very indifferent memory, he entreated that she would write down what she had just said to him, that he might not incur any blame from his master for his having forgot, or impersectly reported, any of her words.

She

She understood his meaning, but had gone too far to recede; she therefore took the pen, and wrote to me, that she approved of the whole letter, except one expression, which was sufficient, she said, to put the king into a violent passion. I had told the king in this letter, that the marchioness entreated him still to allow her the honour of seeing him sometimes, but to have no private correspondence with her; the last words she softened by adding, "that might be prejudicial to him," which made no great difference.

I CAREFULLY deposited the marchiones's letter, and fent mine to the king, not without having some hopes, that pride, and affronted love, if not reason, would prevail upon him to concur in the resolution his mistress had taken, and that he would at length cease to be the flave of a woman. In effect, he read my letter twice over with all the indignation and rage which might naturally be expected, "How! said "he, does she desire our correspondence may be broke off? I desire it more ardently than she does; she shall be taken in her own snares." The king uttered these words in a low voice, but my messenger heard them. He asked for paper and pens, and wrote a billet to me that instant, in which he promised, that on the Monday following the marchiones's of Verneuil should receive a letter from his hand, which should prove that he still knew how to command his passions.

This billet of the king's was dated the 16th of April, but that of Monday never came; but on his arrival at Paris, he flew immediately to his miftress's house, flattering himself that he should at least overwhelm her with confusion, and force from her a thousand painful regrets. Far from it, it was himself that played this part; he disavowed all that his agents had done, he condemned himself; in a word, he threw himself upon the mercy of her that had just treated him with the utmost contempt. Then it was that I thought myself happy to be possessed of a letter from the marchioness that could restrain his resentment against me. She however imagined, that this letter could not hinder me from appearing, through her reprefentations, as an incendiary and flanderer. I would not take upon me to answer for Henry's good opinion of me that moment; the letter I shewed him when he came to the arfenal undeceived him, but it could not open his eyes upon the arts of his unworthy mistress; he told me at parting, that he would chide her feverely. I did not believe him; and indeed how could I after what had just happened?

AFTER the reconciliation between the king and the queen, which was made, as has been feen, at the expence of the marchioness of Verneuil; this woman, who for the first time thought herself really abandoned, undertook to ruin this peace, and unhappily but too well accomplished her purpose. It is wonderful to think how many springs fhe put in motion to awaken the king's love for her, and excite his jealoufy; even religion was profaned to ferve her purpose; she would be a nun, and devote herielf to perpetual confinement; the openly joined the party of the malecontent, she fought out all the young women to whom Henry had discovered any attachment, and prevailed upon them to forge such promises of marriage as that he had given to her; she made so insolent a use of that, as to pretend to derive from it a chimerical right to get the queen's marriage annulled; and, what is hardly to be credited, found ecclefiaftics who countenanced her in these extravagances, and who were hardy enough to publish the banns of marriage which she boasted she would oblige the king to contract with her. At the same time a great number of letters and memoirs were distributed among the public, in which the ridiculous pretensions of this woman were supported *. Henry would have given any reward for a discovery of the authors of these writings, his whole court were employed to find them out, and myfelf among the rest.

I SHOULD never come to an end if I undertook to relate all the circumstances of this affair, which, trifling as the greater part of them are, brought a good deal of trouble upon some that had a share in it: but I am weary of displaying those little weaknesses in a prince, who, on other occasions, has afforded me so many opportunities of admiring the heroic firmness of his mind. This storm, which was occasioned by a mere love quarrel, ended, as usual with Henry, in an increase of tenderness for his unworthy mistress, which carried the misunderstanding between him and the queen to greater heights than ever +t.

It was fixed, that by a most unaccountable contradiction in the nature of things, this prince should, throughout his whole life, seek his pleasures and gratifications at the expence of his quiet and his health. These two motives made me still interest myself in these unpleasing affairs; for I could not, without the most sensible affliction, see the health of a prince so dear to me declining every day. He had not indeed any illness this year that immediately threatened his life, but he never gave fo much employment to the physicians, La Riviere and Du-Laurens; he was obliged to use bleeding often, and observe a strict regimen, to prevent the bad effects of a blood heavy and inflamed, which brought frequent indispositions upon him: rage, grief, and impatience, threw him into fuch an agitation, that one day, being violently offended at some late proceeding of the marchioness de Verneuil, the arm in which he had been bled the evening before, opened again, as he was fitting down to dinner. The queen accompanied him this year in his journey to Monceaux, whither he went to drink the waters of Pougues and Spa *, with the greater conveniency.

NOTHING would have been wanting to complete the unhappiness of these domestic quarrels, if queen Margaret had borne a part in them: this was the only misfortune that Henry escaped; and certainly this princess merited the highest encomiums for the sweetness of her temper, her resignation, and, above all, for her disinterestedness, in a situation that afforded her many arguments to urge a compliance with all she could desire; her demands were few, and for things not only necessary in themselves, but such as she had an incontestable right to, the fulfilling such engagements as had been made with her, and some exemptions for her borough of Ussion; her chief solicitation was on account of succeeding to the possessions of her mother queen Catherine: this princess, by her contract of marriage with Henry II. was entitled to leave her effects, after the death of her sons, to her daughters, presentable to the natural children of her husband. Although this disposition was absolutely equitable, yet Charles of Valois, count of Auvergne +,

Henry III. had made to him of these estates. In 1006 the parliament confirmed the will of Catherine of Medicis, and adjudged these festates to Margaret of Valois. Brantome, in vol. VII. of his Memoirs, p. 38, gives an enumeration of these estates, consisting of the earldoms of Auvergne, Lauragais, S s 2 pretended pretended a claim, to the prejudice of Margaret. She had not the principal writings that proved the legality of hers: but the king interposed his authority to make it be given her, and that she should obtain the justice that was due to her. Margaret, during her whole life, maintained the same rectitude of conduct; and from her behaviour it could never be discovered that she had once been the wife of the king. I should not confine my praises to what I have already said of her, were I not apprehensive of being accused of partiality; since the interest which this princess had always the goodness to take in my fortune is well known; her letters to me were such as one would write to a sincere and unalterable friend, "You are always (thus she expresses herself" in one of them) my resource, and, after God, my surest reliance."

But let us now pass to other cares and uneasinesses that the king suffered this year from a traiterous cabal, in which the marchioness de Verneuil will again have a place. Without repeating incessantly the names of the dukes of Bouillon, La-Tremouille, and de Rohan, the count d'Auvergne, d'Entragues, his wife, Du-Pless, and the rest, it may be easily imagined that these are the persons I mean. The same spirit of sedition, by which they had acted in the intrigues they had set on foot with the protestant party in the synod of Gap, still directed their enterprises, and suggested to them innumerable stratagems, either to raise an insurrection among the king's subjects, or make him new enemies abroad. It is scarce credible how many slanderous lies were propagated of his majesty, how far they extended their influence, and how many plots were formed against the government by the authority of these leaders.

The king, when he fent me to Paris, by d'Efcures, fome advices he had just received at Saint-Germain-en-laye, began in this manner: That although I had not already too favourable an opinion of this whole body, yet I should with difficulty believe what he had to write to me concerning it. Indeed I am obliged to confess, that the proceedings of the French protestants were such, as left them no reason to complain of any one but themselves, if they one day met with a severe punishment for them. They boasted almost openly, that they would oblige his majesty, not only to receive the duke of Bouillon in his kingdom, but also to invest him with honours and offices worthy of a chief of the religion. Du-Pleffis, the foul that animated this body, fuggested only such thoughts; La Tremouille had prepared his creatures for undertaking all things, by perfuading them, that they would very fhortly behold a surprising revolution in France; the duke of Rohan, in the mean time, took upon himfelf to spread this report in foreign countries. and in England especially, by a trusty emissary named Durand, who used his utmost endeavours to draw off his Britannic majesty from Henry's party. This man, who at London assumed the title of M. de Haute-Fontaine, shewed himself so faithful and officious a servant, that the king, as well as every one elfe, was perfuaded that he had exceeded his commission; for it was affirmed, that he had treated on conditions for the establishment of his master in England, where he wanted to get him naturalized: if this defign was not Durand's alone, it could only be fuggested by the duchess dowager of Rohan. It is also certain, that the duke of Rohan ordered Durand to prefent the king of England, in his name, with a horse of great price, which, in the present conjuncture, it was not justifiable for him to do, without Henry's confent.

But it was more necessary to enter into a strict examination of the count of Auvergne's conduct, than any of the others; few persons were ignorant of his connexion with Spain. He was then in Auvergne, where he was not idle, either with respect to the common cause, or his own particular one; he had made use of the promise of marriage, given by Henry to * the marchioness de Verneuil his sister, to serve

* The historians give no clear account of the purport of the treaty entered into by the count of Auvergne with the Spanish council; but Amelot de La Houssaye will help us out on this occasion; and he is the more worthy of credit, as he affures us, that the count of Auvergne, and the marchioness of Verneuil, entrusted the original of this treaty to his grandfather on the mother's fide, their near relation and intimate friend, called Antony-Eugene Chevillard, paymafter-general of the gendarmery of France. He further informs us, that Chevillard, being involved in the difgrace of the count of Auvergne, and fent to the Bastile, he kept the original of the treaty fo well concealed in the fkirt of his doublet, that no one discovered it; and, finding himfelf treated as a flate criminal, he, by degrees, eat both the treaty, and the ratification of it by the court of Spain annexed to it, up in the foups and other victuals, which were brought to his table. The king of Spain thereby promifed to affift the count of Auvergne with troops and money, to place his nephew Henry of Bourbon on the throne, who was the fon of Henry IV. by the marchioness of Verneuil, and who, in that writing, is flyled dauphin of France, and lawful heir to the crown. Art. Entragues-Balfac, Touchet. Amelot de la Houssaye further assures us, in the note on the cardinal D'Offat's letters above mentioned, that two capuchins, than this writing: but in Spain he found perfons credulous enough to confider them both in a ferious light: it is certain, that he had acquired great credit and ftrong influence there; we shall soon see to what it conducted him.

The methods his majefty made use of to render all these intrigues ineffectual, were to apply himself with his accustomed attention and assiduity to the affairs both within and without his kingdom, and to fill the intendances and other public offices with such men only as were diffinguished for their merit, their probity, and zeal for his service. Boucault was an example of this, who, from an advocate only, was made president of the court of aids in Montpelier, in reward for having usefully served his majesty in Languedoc. Henry likewise commanded me to affemble the chancellor, Villeroi, and Sillery, who with me composed a kind of council, to consider of this matter. By his orders, I still kept up a correspondence by letters with the principal protestants, which I own was of little service to his majesty: his chief dependance, and with reason, was upon the journey he proposed to make this year to Provence and Languedoc, while I on my side was to visit Poitou, and the western part of France.

I GREATLY approved of this defign when Henry communicated it to me; and we employed ourselves together a long time in making preparations for these two journeys; the necessity for going to take possible of my government served me for a pretence for mine; the king wanted no excuse for his: on the contrary, it was fit he should not appear ignorant of the occasion that made his presence necessary in the southern provinces of his kingdom, and openly avow his expectations of the good effects it would produce. On some pretence or other, I was to viit, either in my rout, or by going a little about, Orleans, Touraine, Anjou, Poitou, Saintonge, Angoumois, and Guyenne; and his majesty was likewise to take Berry, Bourbonnois, Lyonnois, called father Hillary of Grenoble, and father Archangelo, the one at Paris, and the other at Rome, had the guidance of this conspiracy.

M. de Sully feems to infinuate, as if fomething further had been intended in favour of the count of Auvergne himself: perhaps he had fome defign of fetting up fome writing or disposition of his father Charles IX, by virtue whereof he might pretend to claim the crown in his own right. See also, on this subject, the Memoirs of the life of the president De Thou, and in particular his History, anno 1605. Vitt. Siri's Mem. recond. vol. I. p. 297.

and Danphiné, in his way *, fo that between us we were to go through almost all France. We settled the time of our departure, our stay, and even the place of our meeting, which was to be at Toulouse; and I looked upon his majesty's journey to be so certain, that I thought of nothing but of coming immediately to Paris (for all this was resolved on at Fontainebleau) to settle the affairs of the government, that our journey might not suffer any delay, it being resolved that we should set out some time in the present month of June at farthest. Such persons as had business depending in the king's council, pressed the conclusion of it with the utmost affiduity, as soon as the king's intention was made public; and the counsellors rejoiced at this eagerness, because, that great part of them being to attend the king in his journey, they did not chuse to leave the business they had begun, to be sinished by the new council which his majesty would name during his absence.

This fcheme, fo well concerted, was never carried into execution, with respect to the king's part in it. As soon as his majesty's intended journey was declared to the courtiers, all was presently in an uproar; and it caused, as usual, great emotions at court. There was not one to whom this design did not give great uneasiness, and who did not use his utmost endeavours to dissuade him from it; some, such as the ministers and great officers that were about his person, to spare the expences of so tedious a journey, and the gay delicate youth of the court to avoid the fatigue and other inconveniencies usual in such expeditions; so that, when his majesty proposed the affair in form to his counsellors of state, whom he sent for expressly to Fontainebleau, and the principal lords of his court, assembled for that purpose, they opposed it with innumerable obstacles, without ever reaching the true one.

They alledged the uncertainty of the fieges of Oftend and Sluys; the fear of a league between England and Spain; the treaty of commerce depending between France and that crown; the affair of the count d'Auvergne and the marchiones de Verneuil; the mifunderstanding that had rifen lately between the republic of Grisons, and the count de Fuentes, concerning the Valtoline, in which France was indispensably obliged to interest herself, on account of the Venetians and the Swiss. All those affairs I have already mentioned, or shall do immediately: in a word, * See the original of a letter written by Henry IV. to M. de Rosny, on the subject of this journey to Poitou, dated the 20th of July 1604, with an indorfement thereon, as most of his letters have, in the hand-writing of this minister. Henry IVth's letters.

they found fo many inconveniences likely to accrue from this journey, and knew fo well how to aggravate them, that the king was prevailed upon to alter his refolution.

They even fuggested reasons to his majesty, to make him change his opinion as to the necessity of mine. The affairs that then lay before the council began to appear to him of such importance, that, to prevent losing sight of them for so long a time, he, for this once, desired me to confine my endeavours to what I could do, without going farther than Poitou, and remit, to another opportunity, my defign of visiting the maritime coasts. I do not pretend to deny, that part of the arguments they made use of, to distuade the king from his journey, had some weight: however, I believe I have mentioned the most important of them; and I still persisted in my first opinion, of the great advantage it would be to the state.

ONE man, whom the news of his majefty's intended journey did not a little perplex, and whose name probably the reader will not expect to find here,was Lesdiguieres; and a report being then current, that the count of Soissons was shortly to be put in possession of those cautionary places given to Lesdiguieres, it was natural for him to believe that he was personally concerned in the resolution his majesty had taken. His correspondence with the duke of Bouillon was just come to light; Morges, who had given secret advice of it from Dauphiné, brought proofs of it when he came to Paris, which were confirmed by Du-Bourg.

I SET out from Paris in the month of June, and took the shortest road to Poitou, accompanied by several persons of quality of that province, who, upon the report of my journey, ranged themselves about me, some of them with no other intention, but to pay me those honours which they thought due to their governor: but others, among whom, I may, without scruple, put * Richelieu and Pont-courlai, attended me in my expedition with no other view, but to get more certain intelligence of my designs, either from my own mouth, or by tampering with my people, to learn all that should be done or said in my samily, that they might afterwards give the chiefs of the protestant party notice of all, and prepare them to oppose such measures, as they imagined I might be ordered to take against them in favour of the catholics; in a word, to take advantage of every little inadvertence, if it thould happen that any did efcape me, to render me criminal, or raife sufficions in the king's mind to my prejudice. But in this, my enemies did not fucceed, however they might in some other of their designs; the correspondence his majesty did me the honour to keep regularly with me, when I was at any distance from him, still continued as usual; and I had even more frequent opportunities of entering into his considence, and knowing to what degree he interested himself in the safety of my person. He often, with great goodness, bid me remember, that I was in a country where, whatever appearance the inhabitants might assume as a continually on my guard against them.

IT was but too true, that the king's enemies and mine, had taken measures before hand to renderall my endeavours fruitless, and to animate the populace against me: that which appeared most likely to produce this effect, was to spread a report, that the design which brought me to Poitou, was to force the proprietors * of the falt-pits to yield up their property, and to purchase them for the king. Those in whom I discovered the greatest malevolence towards me, were such from whom it was least to be expected, my brethren the protestants: but I mean the principal ones only; yet these affected to pay me outwardly all imaginable honours; and, although they refused to let me into the fecret of their debates, yet it was always upon fuch plaufible pretences, that I had room to feign myself entirely satisfied. They were apprehenfive of Parabere, who was more particularly attached to me than any of the others, though they well knew his ardent zeal for his religion, because he was naturally frank and open in his temper, and had intentions far more equitable: they therefore commissioned d'Aubigné and Constant to watch him narrowly, and never to quit him while he continued about me. But this malignancy, with respect to me, extended no farther than to a finall number of perfons; or if it did, they concealed it with great care. I was received with the most diftinguishing marks of respect in every place where I made any stay, and in those that I only passed through; they came to meet me, harangued me, and escorted me with ceremony on my way. The ecclesiastics feemed most eager to shew me respect; and I never heard the least the gabelle or falt duty, which, he afferts, this prince was fully determined to abolish, as well as the taille, p. 369.

* Perefixe makes no doubt, but Henry IV. really had formed this defign, and greatly commends him for it, as being the only certain method to free his people from Vol. II.

1604 expression that suggested a doubt of my religion: the inhabitants of Poitieres, who have the reputation of being naturally rude and unfociable, gave me, by their polite and respectful behaviour, a very different notion of their character.

> I was still more surprised at the conduct of the Rochellers: this imperious city, that usually makes it her boast to have only the king himself for governor, and under him that haughty and important mayor, who is generally elected out of there perfons proposed by them to his majesty, might have laid great stress upon those mighty prerogatives with fo much the more reason, in respect to me, as their city was not properly within the limits of my government; however, they gave me as honourable a reception as they could have done to a governor chosen by themselves. I entered the city with a train of twelve hundred horse: such an efcort gave me the less room to be apprehensive of those attempts his majesty warned me to be careful of; the Rochellers opened their gates to this train, without any distinction of persons or religions; they were all lodged within the walls, and most of them in the houses of the citizens. At a public dinner, which was given on my account, and to which I was invited with great ceremony, they drank the king's health, and faid, that, if his majefty had done them the honour to present himself before their gates, though followed with thirty thousand men, they would have opened them to him; and that, if their gates were not wide enough to admit them, they would have thrown down three hundred feet of their walls. I faw nothing but respect and submission, and heard nothing but praifes of this prince; they likewise affured me, with the most flattering encomiums, that, if I had brought a train much larger with me, they would have acted in the same manner.

THE dinner I have mentioned confifted of seventeen tables, the least of which had fixteen covers; and the next day they gave me a collation as magnificent as the dinner had been; they added to it, the reprefentation of a naval fight between Correilles, and Chef-de-Baye, in which twenty French veffels attacked a like number of Spanish veffels. The vanquished Spaniards were brought bound hand and foot, before a picture of the king, exposed to public view; and they were preferred to me as to his lieutenant-general: nothing was wanting to render this shew complete; dresses, arms, pavillions, and escutcheons different. I repaid this good reception, by granting the Rochellers, in the name of the king, whose elogium I pronounced publicly, the deliverance of their prisoners: excepting these, and the sieur de Luffan. Luffan, I punished severely all that had infringed the treaties of commerce. His majesty was satisfied with having obliged the city of Rochelle to ask him for this favour, which he well knew how to make them pay for. At Poitiers, I learned fome circumstances which perfuaded me, the count of Auvergne was much more culpable than I had hitherto believed.

THE king had allowed me fo little time to regulate the affairs of this province, that I was obliged to defer vifiting the Upper and Lower Poitou till another opportunity. I could only obtain permission from his majesty to go to Saint-John d'Angely, and to Brougage, by representing to him the necessity there was for undertaking this journey to undeceive the people of that diffrict, who suspected that the king had an intention to deprive them of their falt-pits. I fet out from Rochelle, to go to these two places, and was received by messieurs de Rohan and de Saint-Luc still better than I expected. I used my utmost endeavours to recall Rohan to his duty and allegiance; I mentioned his intrigues in England, and exhorted him to recall Durand from thence; he appeared greatly aftonished at this discourse, complained of the calumnies his enemies spread abroad of him; disavowed the agency of Durand; and, to convince me of his fincerity, acknowledged circumstances unasked, as the horse presented by him to king James, but affured me, he had obtained his majesty's permission for it, which he could eafily bring to his remembrance.

FROM Saint-Jean I refumed the road to Paris through Thouars, where I was desirous of having a conference with the duke de La-Tremouille. I did not expect to polite a reception from him as I really received, sensible that he must be greatly mortified to see me possess a government, and receive honours, to which he had afpired with fuch extreme ardency, as to folicit them publicly. Our conversation often turned on the many causes of complaint the protestant party had given the king; and even in the presence of Parabere, Saint-Germain-de-Clan, Besses, La-Valliere, Constant, d'Aubigné (these were hardly ever absent) Preaux, La-Ferriere, and La Sauffaye; they all exclaimed loudly upon the injuffice that had been done them by the king, protesting their fidelity and attachment to his majesty; and the better to impose upon me, accompanied their affurances with fo much civility to myfelf, and fuch gross flatteries, that they fell into the other extreme of a too glaring affectation. Tt2 Tt2

In the midft of all this art and difguife, I did not cease to penetrate into their defigns, by turning the discourse, in their presence, upon the state of affairs in Spain and England. They betrayed themselves then in fpite of their endeavours to the contrary; and it was no longer possible for me to doubt, that all this little court of people attached to the dukes of Rohan and de La Tremouille were, in reality, fuch as they were represented to his majesty: but I discovered at the same time, and the intelligence which the post I possessed in that province, afforded me an opportunity of procuring, gave me, in the fequel, the utmost certainty that these gentlemen had no power with the rest of the protestant party; they were no longer, as formerly, those absolute leaders that, with a fingle word, drew all their fuffrages; but, on the contrary, they were shunned as men infected with the plague, when they came to deliberate in the affemblies. This they had brought upon themselves by their own imprudence, in putting the party upon such dangerous and ridiculous enterprifes, as had at length undeceived the most credulous amongst them; and the highest idea that could be now given of them was, that they formed a party in the midst of the party itself, and only supported themselves by a vain exertion of authority, of which they but possessed the shadow.

I DID not neglect to make all the advantage I could of fuch favourable dispositions, and entirely undeceived the people with regard to the injurious reports that had been spread among them concerning the faltpits, the excise, and other monopolies, which had been made use of to excite them to sedition. They now began to have a more perfect knowledge of their king; their notion of his tyranny and their slavery were wholly effaced. I made the protestants comprehend how groundless their suspicions were, that Henry had ever designed to exclude them from any of the offices and dignities in the state, since it had always been his chief maxim to keep the balance even between the two religions; I convinced them likewise, how much they had been blinded by prejudice, with respect to Clement the eighth, who was so far from endeavouring to extirpate the protestants, that he had, on all occasions, strongly opposed making war against them.

My actions completed the work my discourses had begun; I distributed pensions among those of the party who had advised peace, and served the king faithfully; and, to convince them absolutely that they were not deceived, with regard to the equitable intentions of their sovereign, I shewed them the paper that contained all the reformations he proposed to make in the state, the same that I have formerly mentioned, with which they were fully satisfied. By these means I so shook the duke de La-Tremouille's party, that he could never afterwards strengthen it with six persons of any consequence. The duke of Bouillon was so greatly affected with the knowledge that he had lost all the remaining interest he had hitherto preserved in this district of France, that he determined to pass the rest of his days in that kind of exile that kept him in the court of the elector Palatine quiet in spite of himself. Saint-Germain, who was not unacquainted with any of the duke's secrets, wrote an account of this design to La-Saussaye, of whom he thought himself absolutely secure; but La-Saussaye gave me Saint-Germain's letter, which I shewed to his majesty.

HAVING thus performed all that the prefent conjuncture, and the fhortness of the time permitted me, I obeyed the king's repeated commands (which every one of his letters brought me) to return as foon as possible, and followed in a few days my last letter, which I wrote to his majesty from Thouars on the 16th of July. Before I went away I visited the duke de La-Tremouille for the last time; he was indisposed when I came to Thouars, and I left him at the point of death when I set out from thence; he died * without being prevailed upon to promise that he would come to court, and his death deprived the malecontents of one leader.

I ARRIVED at Paris on the 22d of July, where I found a billet from his majefty, dated the 18th, in which he defired me to fend into every part of Normandy, Britanny, and Poitou, whither I had had a defign to go myfelf, two persons on whose fidelity and understanding I could rely, and to come myself to him at Monceaux, where he waited for me, having given over drinking the waters. I was sensible, by the kind and obliging reception this prince gave me, that I had been fortunate enough to give him satisfaction that to the business that had occasioned my.journey; and I now related to him, during the course of three days, all that I had omitted in my letters to him or to Villeroi.

vol. II. b. iii. p. 663. † De Thou fays, this journey of M. de Rofny freed Henry IV. from great disquiers book xxxi.

It has been reported, that the duke of Epernon behaved at that time in fuch a manner in Guienne, as to give his majefly more cause than ever to suspect him; that I distrusted his fidelity, and on this occasion did him all the bad offices that could proceed from a mortal enemy. This report, with regard to myself, I here declare to be absolutely salse; and I believe what was said to the disadvantage of d'Epernon to be so likewise; and that the unsavourable sentiments they attributed to his majesty of this duke, has no better soundation. One would imagine, that the opinion Henry entertained of him was sufficiently clear, by the letter this prince wrote to the duke on the subject of the dispute between Du-Plessis and the bishop of Evreux, in which he treated him as a friend, a title he never gave to those whom he did not think worthy of it. And here I may add a circumstance of which I am absolutely certain, and speak from my own knowledge.

His majesty, after the time here meant, granted D'Epernon a thousand things unask'd, and often pressed me to visit him, and give him other instances of kindness, even before I had received thelike from him. If Henry heard any thing to the duke's disadvantage during his flay in Guienne, it is what I am wholly ignorant of; this only I know, that his majefty was eafily freed from any remains of fuspicion, after the letters that d'Epernon fent to him and to me by Perronne, in which there were fuch evident marks of fincerity and confcious innocence confirmed by the offer he made to attend his majefty upon the very first order he should receive, that he might put his person in his power, to answer for the loyalty of his intentions, that there was nothing left to reply. No one is ignorant of what paffed between the king and the duke of Epernon during the life, and even after the death of Henry III. and that this prince had discovered some resentment towards him; but this was at an end; forgetfulness of injuries is a virtue very rare among princes, and is thought yet rarer than it is. Sufficient regard has not been shewn to the proofs which Henry has given more than once of that true greatness of mind which is capable of pardoning; and all that he did for the duke of Epernon may be confidered as an inflance of his clemency.

For myfelf, I was fo far from being an enemy to d'Epernon, at the time I have been fpeaking of, that I can bring a thousand instances to prove we had been in a perfect good intelligence with each other: but it is fit I should be believed upon my bare word, as I have hitherto shown myself equally incapable of disgussing my sentiments, whether of friendship or hate, or of accusing the innocent, or justifying a traitor. D'Epernon had the missfortune to fall off his horse in Guienne, by which he broke his thigh and his thumb, and brussed himself likewise in the shoulder and elbow; which obliged him to keep his bed forty days, and lie during all that time upon his back. I wrote to him a letter of condolance upon this accident; and he thanked me with the same affection which he usually expressed in all his letters, for he then treated me as a friend; and I was likewise his consident in all that regarded the king*. Another of my friends, but one who had never been otherwise, from whom I this year received letters equally polite, friendly, and unreserved, was Bellegarde; they are dated from Dijon; he was then in his government of Burgundy. But it is time to return to the count of Auvergne.

It now depended wholly upon the king to deprive this rebellious fubject of all means of confpiring againft the flate: the unfeatonable clemency with which he had been treated by his majefly at the time that marefehal Biron fuffered a just fentence, was the cause of his relapse; as the tenderness his majefly had shewn for this whole family, on account of the marchioness de Verneuil, had first encouraged him in his revolt. It would not probably have been difficult to find such another opportunity as his majefly had suffered to escape him, when he received notice of the new intrigues which the count was carrying on in Spain, and that fuller discoveries concerning those intrigues might be expected from the seizure of Morgan *, his chief agent, who was just then arrested, but the king was contented with suffering D'Escures to go, by my orders, to Auvergne, where the count then was, to discover the plot, and by gentle methods persuade him to come and throw himself at his majesty's feet.

In effect, d'Auvergne was convinced that this was the wifeft and the only part he had to take; the feizing of Morgan had wholly difconcerted him, and the measures he had taken had been too imprudent to leave him a hope that his defigns could be concealed, or that they were in sufficient forwardness to enable him to throw off the malk; he feared that by flying he should expose the count and countess d'Entragues and his whole family, to a shameful treatment; he therefore yielded to d'Escure's arguments, and promised to go with him to coare, and reveal to the king his closet secrets, and even to shew a letter from his sister, which he said was of the utmost consequence, provided that his majesty would grant him the pardon he had promised. The original of this letter from the marchioness de Verneuil was not produced till the following year, and it was not very certain what credit should be given to it, because the brother and sister sometimes appeared to be on friendly terms, and often in such high disgust that they could not bear each other's sight. That which appears most worthy of observation in this letter is, that in it she exhorts her brother to a secure retreat in a foreign country, and appears herself determined to do the like.

THAT the count d'Auvergne was not very fincere in the promise he made d'Escures, appears by his sending Yverné to Spain, at the very time that he fet out himself for Paris. The bishop of Montpellier discovered this intrigue, and fent the king notice of it: but this prince was willing a fecond time to listen to his fine promises. He only ordered, that the parliament should finish Morgan's trial, that the crime being made public might give more weight to the pardon he was refolved to grant to the whole family of Auvergne, which was comprehended in it. All that this prince gained by the profecution was, to get that famous promise * of marriage he had in vain solicited his mistress to return, restored to him by d'Entragues; which was done in the presence of the count of Soiffons, the duke of Montpenfier, the chancellor, Sillery, La-Guêle, Jeannin, Gevres, and Villeroi; that this restitution might not be afterwards eluded by any restriction or disavowal; and an act was made, importing, that this was the true and only writing given by his majesty on that subject; and the declaration of d'Entragues confirming this, was joined to the paper.

This conduct of Henry was not calculated to make the count of Auvergne lefs rash and enterprising; and, in effect, he renewed his former intrigues almost before his majesty's eyes: his whole care was to deceive the king, who for a long time was imposed upon by his France to the count of Entragues, who had never been in any military action. De Thou, book cxxxii.

* Henry IV. in order to gain this promife, was obliged to pay the marchionefs de Verneuil, twenty thousand crowns down, and to promife the baton of a marechal of appearances of fincerity: but at length the whole mystery was discovered by some letters written and received by d' Auvergne, which sell into the hands of Lomenie, and by him carried immediately to the king. This prince was then convinced of the full extent of his crimes; but this conviction came too late, for the count, either by his own penetration, or that he received notice of what had happened, had time to leave the court before the resolution that had been taken to arrest him could be executed, determined within himself never to return to it again after the danger he had so lately escaped, and even to leave France altogether, upon the least information that any thing was resolved on against him.

The king acquainted me with the perplexity he was in through his own fault. D' Escures was sent again to Auvergne: he went a third time, but to no purpose: the methods that had formerly succeeded were now ineffectual. D'Auvergne always knew how to elude his return to court, to which he was earnestly pressed, but with such appearance of indifference and unconcern, that it was not possible to draw from his resusal a conviction of his crime, as it was expected they should do. He made the fairest promises imaginable, and always appeared disposed to set out. There was a necessity at length for making use of the only method yet unattempted, which was to secure his person; but this did not seem easy to effect.

I CAST my eyes upon a man who feemed to me likely enough to fucceed in fuch an attempt, and this was the treasurer Murat; his personal hatred to the count d'Auvergne, his knowledge of the country, the convenience he could have of staying a long time upon the foot without giving cause of suspicion, his resolution in any arduous enterprize, and his zeal for the service of his majesty, all promised a happy and honourable end of this commission. I proposed him to the king when his majesty mentioned the affair to me, and upon his approbation I fent for Murat; to whom at first I acted with all the referve and precaution that a matter of fuch consequence required. When I found that instead of bringing arguments for being dispensed with for fuch a fervice, he himself prevented my offers, I explained myfelf clearly, and perceived that the propofal was far from being difpleasing to him; he only required a commission for it under the great feal, which was granted, and kept very fecret. As we had not yet lost all hope that d' Escures might be able to draw the count to court. and in that case Murat would have nothing to do, when I gave him VOL. II. Uu 1604. his instructions I enjoined him not to act but in concert with d'Escures. and to conceal from every one the part that was to be given him in this business, if he found there was no longer any occasion for him.

> D'Escures set out for Auvergne on the 17th of August (this was the third or fourth time of his going) and Murat followed him a few days afterwards, provided with blank letters for the cities and officers des presideaux, which were to be filled up at the places themselves. In the mean time fome letters from d'Auvergne came to hand, in which he expressed so much fear and shame, that the king rightly judged he would never be prevailed on to appear at court, and therefore thought it best for d'Escures to avoid pressing him to take that step, lest he thould increase his apprehensions. Murat had now orders to act fingly; and d' Escures, on his side, to use his utmost endeavours to procure certain intelligence of all d'Auvergne's practices in Spain, and, if poffible, to intercept the treaty which it was thought he had already made with the council of Madrid. All this d'Escures executed with such dexterity, that he prevented the count, artful and penetrating as he was, from suspecting any of those measures the council was now pursuing.

A LITTLE affair between a brother of Murat's and the count of Auvergne gave this trufty agent a pretence for going to the count; which having fettled between them, the count, of himfelf, entered into a conversation with him concerning the state of his affairs at court, which gave Murat an opportunity of feeming to regulate the advice he offered him upon what he himself had said. D'Auvergne founded violent fuspicions upon the infinuations that were given him, that the king expected he should shew himself at court; and upon d'Escures's endeavouring to perfuade him to go, yet pretending not to know that it was the king's defire, he therefore affured Murat that he would not go; and that rather than expose himself to the fury of his enemies, he would fubmit himself to a voluntary exile in a foreign country: he mentioned the fate of marechal Biron, which feemed to give him great apprehensions; and faid, that having formerly had the misfortune to offend his king, he could not refolve to appear before him till he had effaced the memory of his fault by new fervices, and till the pardon his majesty had granted him was confirmed. At length he gave Murat to understand, that his reason for not being willing to trust the intentions of the court, arose from the informations he had received of the danger he was threatened with if he appeared there, this notice having been fent to him from some of the courtiers themselves, persons of the first distinction, who were well acquainted withthe affair, and de- 1604. ferved to be relied on.

MURAT finding himself thus made a confidant of, answered with great feeming fimplicity, that fince the count had confessed his error to the king, he faw no inconvenience attending his return to court; that the pardon he had obtained made a wide difference between his case and that of marechal Biron; and that nothing but a relapse into the fame error could authorize his fcruples, fince Henry had never yet broke his word with any one; therefore his best counsellors would be his own confcience. D'Escures likewise laboured with equal folicitude to re-affure him with regard to the king, and to give him a diffrust of those persons that sent him the informations he had mentioned.

To all this the count only replied, that when his life was in question he would not run any hazard; that neither the king, the queen, or the princes of the blood, were his friends, and the mafter of the horse his mortal enemy; that the silence of his friends on this occafion was one proof of his ruin being determined; that no one folicited for him to the king; that he now never received any letters from Villeroi, Sillery, or me, because we were not willing to reproach ourselves with having been the inftruments of his fate; that the constable no longer corresponded with him, for fear of rendering himself suspected: but it was with the marchioness de Verneuil he appeared to be most discontented; he knew his fifter, he faid, to make her peace with the king at his expence, was capable of charging him with false crimes, if she could not with real ones; and concluded with new protestations, that nothing should draw him from his retreat. As he did not suspect that d'Escures and Murat were come with an intention to persuade him to go, he told them, that he supposed Vitry would arrive in a few days, and expect to gain him with fair words, but that he would lose his labour.

THE retreat he was resolved not to be prevailed upon to leave was Vic, a poor house, without any conveniences, but fituated in the midst of a wood, where d'Auvergne passed whole days, under pretence of hunting. Although there had been no other proofs of his crimes, his fears, his continual alarms, the agitation of his thoughts, the wildness of his look and air, and the disorder of his whole person, would have been a fufficient testimony against him: nothing could be more miterable than the life he now led; and the terror and anxiety that preyed upon his heart, revenged, by anticipating his punishment, both the king and the state. He was afraid to stay in his house, yet durst not trust himself at any considerable distance from it; he was never seen in the neighbouring towns; he had lest off visiting his friends, nor durst even conside in his mistress, a certain lady, named madame de Chateau-gay; he no longer visited her at her house, but when he chose to see her they met in an obscure village, or in the midst of the fields, always in the night, and never twice together in the same place. His servants, whom he posted on eminences in the neighbouring places, were ordered to give him notice when they saw any one appear, by blowing a horn; and sometimes he made use of dogs for his guard.

WITH these precautions he defied all his enemies, and infolently, as well as imprudently, boafted, that he should always be able to deceive and escape them: nevertheless, his resolutions were always varying, he never continued two moments in the fame mind. And this man, fo wife, fo fagacious, penetrated fo little into the intentions of those that came to destroy him, that he made them his friends, took them for his counfellors, and was many times upon the point of abandoning himself to their discretion. But prudence is a quality seldom found with a bad confcience; had d'Auvergne possessed ever so little of it he would have known, that there was no fafety for him but in an immediate flight to Spain; and this, probably, was the only scheme that never entered into his head. At the very moment that he appeared determined to d' Escures and Murat not to expose himself to the danger of going to court, he talked to them in a strain quite different. He once fent to them to come and meet him at a place three leagues distant from his own house: though this summons gave them at first some uneasiness, not knowing what his intentions might be, yet they went, and found that he had fent for them only to tell them he was now resolved to go and present himself to the king. His majesty, to whom they fent immediate notice of this resolution, and who gave the more credit to it on account of a false report that was added to it, wrote to me on the 19th of November, that d'Auvergne was at Moret, ready to fet out for Paris. In this it was not d'Escures and Muret that were deceived by the count, but the count by his own inconfrancy; for he was the first to retain them with him, when they appeared willing to go back, and to refer them for his last answer to the return of Fougeu, from whom he expected to draw a great deal of intelligence; to which the two agents feemed to confent, purely through complaifance to him. THIS This whole account I take from Murat's letters. I received, at the fame time, a letter from the count d'Auvergne himfelf. He complained to the two agents, that he never had any answer to four letters, which, he said, he had wrote to me. I received, indeed, four from him, but altogether; and the writing so like, although of different dates, that I perceived immediately what credit I ought to give to them. It was probable, that d'Auvergne did not think of me at first, or believed that it would not be proper to make any application to me; but that afterwards, supposing this method was likely enough to make his peace, for he often mentioned me to the two agents, he had recourse to it, with the well known artifice of antedating his letters, to prove to me that this had always been his design.

If the count had any intention to draw a promife from me, which, on this occasion, he might make use of as a security, he deceived himfelf greatly: I fent him an answer indeed, but as if I had nothing more nor better to fay to him, than what I had faid before to marechal Biron in the same circumstances, I treated him like a state criminal, without augmenting his fuspicions; the letter I wrote to Auvergne, in a word, was but a copy of that which I had written to marechal Biron; and he could not be ignorant that it was fo, fince I acknowledged it plainly. It is by this counterstroke, which is doubtless of new invention, that I gave d'Auvergne to understand, he ought neither to attribute to the king, fuch fentiments of him as he really did not entertain, neglect the advice I had often given him, relating to his conduct, nor lay a stress upon actions and reports, that had no foundation but in his own unquiet conscience. This was all that I wrote to Auvergne; and after his conviction, this proceeding appeared to candid, and so free from all artifice, that he praised it greatly.

Descures and Murat at length found the opportunity they had so long waited for. M. de Vendome's regiment of light horse being to be reviewed, they imparted a scheme that they had concerted to D'Erre, who commanded it; and the general officers of this body being all ready, it was effected in the following manner: D'Erre went to the count, and told him, that he being colonel-general of the light cavalry, he ought certainly to be present at this review. D'Auvergne apprehended no danger, because he was not only mounted upon a horse, which, as he said, outstripped the wind; and, indeed, he was accustomed to make him gallop sen leagues without intermission; but he 1604. was refolved not to enter any narrow place, or to difmount during the whole time. Accordingly he came to the review. Nerestan advanced to falute him, followed only by four footmen, in appearance; but, in reality, four Cout and resolute soldiers, whom they had disguised in liveries. At the inflant that Nerestan was paying his compliments, two of these soldiers seized the reins of the count's bridle, and the two others, at the fame time, laid hold of his legs and pulled him off his horse, throwing themselves upon him so suddenly, that he had neither time to lay his hand upon his piftols, nor draw his fword, and ftill less to fly. He was immediately conducted, under a good guard, to Paris, and shut up in the Bastile*.

> D'ENTRAGUES was arrested at the same time that the count d'Auvergne was; and the marchioness de Verneuil was, in some fort, affociated with the two criminals, fince the king confented that she should be confined in her house +, where she continued under the guard of the chevalier Du Guet. It was this affociation that faved the lives of the father-in-law and the brother. At first they had not dared to hope for so much lenity; nor could the public expect it, after fuch frequent relapfes, especially as they found that preparations were making for their trials with the utmost severity. The count of Auvergne gave the king an exact account of his correspondencies, as well within as without the kingdom; and he was obliged to give up that promife of affociation made by him and the dukes of Bouillon and Biron, which has been mentioned before, and till now could never be forced from him.

MESSAGES

MESSAGES at the same time began to be carried between Henry and 1604. the marchioness de Verneuil, not on the same account; for I am perfuaded, the reader does not expect to fee any great feverity used towards her. The king could not refolve to leave her a fingle moment in doubt of her pardon; with difficulty it was that he endeavoured to fave appearances, by fending different messengers to tell the marchioness, that the should purchase this pardon, by an absolute submission to such conditions as he should prescribe to her. La-Varenne, Sigogne, the whole court was employed in these messages, which, by the manner in which they were delivered, were indeed the real advances of a lover. who feared, notwithstanding his anger, that he should raise too strong an obstacle to his reconciliation with the object of his passion. The marchioness discovered and well knew how to make her advantage of this weakness. I likewise served Henry for an interpreter upon this occasion, although I plainly perceived that he would not come off with honour: but he infifted upon my interpoling, and I obeyed him, with an intention to make the conclusion of this affair as honourable as I could for him.

THE first order his majesty gave me, was to go to the marchioness de Verneuil, and hear what she had to say concerning the crimes she was accused of, to draw from her a confession of them, and make her fensible of her ingratitude. I cannot say that my commission went farther, unless one takes in feveral bitter reproaches, and some advice which proved to be useless, concerning the manner in which she ought to have behaved to a prince who had laid fuch great obligations upon her. I did not see her the first time I went to her house; she ordered me to be told, that a defluxion which was fallen upon her face, hindered her from receiving any visits. I fent a gentleman to her, to know at what hour I should attend her; but, before my messenger was returned, a fervant, whom she had sent in the mean time, came to tell me, that she would see me at two o'clock in the afternoon.

I FOUND a woman whom difgrace could not humble, whose infolence detection could not abate *, and who, instead of endeavouring to

I was not a person on whom these arts were to be played off; I neither stattered her pride, nor soothed her resentment; I began with the greatest of her crimes, and reproached her with having joined herself to the enemies of the state; I told her that she would have reason to think herself happy, if her punishment was confined to a permission to banish herself out of the kingdom, to end her days in any country but Spain; and that this savour would not be granted her, till she had submitted to be examined as a criminal, and asked the king's pardon for her disobedience.

I PROCEEDED in the next place, to her unworthy behaviour towards the queen. I made her fenfible, that to offend, as fhe had done, a princes, who was her queen and mistress*, by a thousand injurious reflexions, was to attack the king himself, and expose her own personto a severe punishment: I reproached her with her ridiculous affectation of equalling herself to the queen, and her children to the children of France; with her haughty and insolent behaviour; and especially her malignity in sowing discord between their majesties: and added, that she would be compelled to throw herself at the queen's feet, to implore her pardon for all the faults she had committed against her.

his majesty would never have opposed her retreat into a convent, if he 1604. had perceived in her behaviour any figns of true devotion.

I GAVE her, at length, all forts of good counfels, which indeed the did not defire, nor was disposed to follow. She ought, at least, to have appeared willing to do fo; but she contented herself with answering coldly, after hearing me the whole time with great indifference, that the thanked me, and would confider of what I had faid. When I asked her what causes of complaint she had received that had thus carried her to violate her duty to the king, her answer was, that if the king had asked her this question, he would have been to blame, since he knew them better than any other person; and if it came from myself. I was no less so, fince I had no means of satisfying it.

CONTINUING still to question her, I asked what it was that she requested of his majesty. She answered, that although she knew well the king's inclinations would not be conformable to hers on this article. yet the still perfisted to demand permission for herself, her father, mother, brother, and her children, to go and fettle themselves somewhere out of France: and added, in naming her brother, that he fuffered only on account of his affection for her. I could hardly perfuade myfelf this resolution was fincere. I contrived it so as to make her repeat it feveral times, and she never varied from it in the smallest article. It was natural enough that the rage and grief she conceived at the imprisonment of her family, and at the treatment she herself fuffered, should make her form such a design; and the conditions she annexed to it absolutely convinced me that she was in earnest. Upon my obliging her to explain herfelf farther as to this intended retreat out of the kingdom, the faid, that the would not go among foreigners to starve; the queen should not have the satisfaction to know that she dragged on a miserable life in poverty and exile. She therefore insisted, that an estate in lands should be given her of a hundred thousand francs at least, which was but a trifle, after all she might have lawfully expected from the king. These words, which she pronounced with great bitterness, doubtless related to the promise of marriage given her by Henry, the loss of which had affected her strongly: and she endeavoured, but in vain, to conceal her rage from me.

I HAD never formed to myself any great expectations from an interview with the marchioness of Verneuil; but I could not help laying VOL. II.  $X \times$ fome fome firefs upon her repeated requeft, to be allowed to fettle herfelf out of the kingdom; the more I reflected on it, the more I was convinced that it was the only method by which this whole intrigue \*could be unravelled; and all which now remained to be done, was to prevail upon Henry to confent to this proposal of the marchiones, by which he would remove from his eyes an object that drew him into continual weaknesses, and purchase the future peace and tranquility of his family. Money was all that was required of him to procure these advantages: ought the effort then to be so painful? I was determined to use my utmost endeavours to accomplish it.

I WENT to his majefty; and, after giving him an account of the fucces of my commission, proposed to him the expedient that prefented itself to free him from all his uneasines. I was not surprised to find, that it did not appear so happy to him as it had done to me; but I was armed with strong arguments of every kind to support it: what did I not say to this prince? what persuasion did I not use? policy, interest, quiet, reason, each of these motives I dwelt upon, and exhausted all; I brought to his remembrance his own unfavourable opinion of this woman and her family; I repeated circumstances so much the more likely to re-kindle his anger, as they had already often produced that effect; the harsh epithets he had given the counters d'Entragues and her daughters; the intrigues so well known and so incontestable, that had given cause for them; the sum of money granted by his order, to pay for an imaginary sacrifice in the first favour, which he consessed, at the same time, was no longer in the power of his mistress to bestow;

* M. de Sully had made Henry IV. lofe a favourable opportunity of getting handfomely rid of his miftress, if we may believe Baffompierre's Memoirs, where the thing is thus related, vol. I. p. 90. " The king 66 afked, whether he should give Madam " de Verneuil any thing to enable her to " marry a prince, who, fhe told him, was " willing to have her, provided the had a " hundred thousand crowns more than she " then was worth. M. de Bellievre faid, "Sire, I am of opinion it will be well " worth your while to give that lady a 66 hundred thousand crowns, if she can " find a good match by that means: to " which M. de Sully answering, that it " was an easy matter to talk of a hundred " thousand crowns, but very difficult to " find out the means to raife them, the " chancellor, without taking notice of " what he faid, went on; Sire, I am of " opinion, that you should take two hun-" dred thousand good crowns, and if that " is not fufficient, three hundred thousand, " or, in fhort, any other fum that may be " fufficient, and give them to this fair lady " to get her a hulband; this, I repeat it, " is my advice. The king repented after-" wards, he did not follow this advice." But fuppofing this pretended match to be fomething more than a mere artifice of the lady's, I believe it miscarried through Henry IVth's fault rather than the duke of Sully's.

the untimely birth of the infant by a ftorm, and other anecdotes of 1604. the fame nature, capable of difgufting a delicate lover. Never before had I made a discourse so pathetic, nor, in my own opinion, so convincing: all my tenderness for the honour of this prince was alarmed by the shame I saw ready to overwhelm him; I entreated, I implored every power of persuasion I had; I was not discouraged by an ineffectual attempt: again I returned to the charge; my zeal became perfecution; and sometimes carried me out of myself, as it did in a converfation we had in the garden, belonging to the conciergerie at Fontainebleau, where we fpoke fo loud, as to be heard by Baftien and Brunault.

Nothing certainly was ever more fingular or incomprehenfible; a prince, whose great qualities might ferve for a model for other monarchs to form themselves upon, reduces us to the necessity of either throwing a veil over one part of that heroic mind, or of confessing that it dishonours the other. I take, without hesitation, this last path, while I lament the force of human frailty, for I hold myfelf under an obligation to do it; and should think I had laboured but by halves for the instruction of mankind in general, and of princes in particular, if I threw any part of this picture into shade. I therefore open to them the recesses of that heart, where so much greatness was blended with fo much weakness, that, by the contrast, each may become more conspicuous; and that they may be upon their guard against that dangerous passion, so capable of inspiring shameful affections, and of tainting their fouls with vices abhorred before; mean artifices, cowardly fears, jealoufy, rancour, rage, and even perjury and lies. Yes, I repeat it again, perjury and lies; Henry, that man on every other occasion so upright, fo open, fo fincere, became acquainted with all these vices. when he abandoned himself to love. I often found that he deceived me by false confidances, when he was under no obligation to enter into true ones; that he feigned returns to reason, and resolutions that his heart rejected; in a word, that he pretended to be ashamed of his fetters, when he fecretly vowed never to break them.

IT was but too true, that he was infected with that jealoufy his miftrefs publicly reproached him with. This was eafy to be perceived by the efforts he made to supplant rivals, whom he was too weak to despife, and too timid to punish. Aut Cafar, aut nibil, fays he in one of his letters to me. What a strange contrast of caprices and extravagances! He was convinced that the marchioness of Verneuil

1604. had recourse to the affectation of devotion to conceal her libertinism; and this conviction pierced his heart with a thousand cruel and insupportable wounds; but he felt, no less forcibly, the delight which the defire of triumphing over a real devotion gives to a depraved heart.

ONE of those caprices which most surprised me, and persuaded me that it was abfolutely impossible to cure this unhappy prince, was, that at those very times when he appeared most cool and indifferent in all he faid of his mistress, yet the letters he wrote to be shewn to her, expressed quite contrary sentiments. I have made the same observation of the marchioness, but with less surprise. It must be therefore, that these lovers, amidst the wildest transport of their anger, could not hinder themselves from still depending a little upon the latent tenderness of each other; and that their tenderness still subsisted without their perceiving it themselves: or that the king, ingenious in finding out methods to debase himself, had a long time before furnished his mistress with arms against him, which he would not oblige her to make use of, by driving her to extremities: or lastly, and this is the least unfavourable judgment that can be formed of this prince, that some private transactions had paffed between them, which Henry, through regret or shame, could not resolve to impart to me, or to any one whatever.

I have thrown together all that relates to the present subject, although part of the facts, as has been seen, such as the seizing of the count d'Auvergne, and the process carried on against his family, did not happen till towards the end of the year, that I might not be obliged to interrupt the narration fo frequently*. I shall resume it at the

* I here subjoin an anecdote of Vittorio Siri's, relating to the amours of Henry IV. and the conspiracy of the count of Auvergne. This writer afferts, Mem. recond. vol. I. p. 297, that one object of this conspiracy was to seize the king's person, by laying an ambuscade for him, and then putting him to death; and that d'Entragues, who had undertaken the execution of this project, intended to make use of the pasfrom he had discovered the king to have newly conceived for his fecond daughter, who is reprefented as much handfomer than her fifter, to draw him into the fnate. He therefore fent his wife to fetch her away from Fontainebleau, making no question but the king would expose himself to any danger to come to fee her at Malesherbes, which place is but three leagues distant from that palace: and truly, Henry immediately fent message after message to ma-demoiselle d'Entragues, by some of his courtiers difguifed in the habit of peafants. Her answer to which was, that she was so closely watched, that there was not the least probability of her being able to see the king. At last he could not forbear going there in person, accompanied by marechal Baffompierre; and not daring to go into the house for fear of being discovered, he was obliged to content himfelf with speaking to her at the window of a lower room : he wrote to her every day, and fent her verfes of gallantry, which he got the best poets of the court to compose for him. At last they agreed to meet one another on a day appointed, at a certain place, in a meadow named by the king, where they might be at full liberty, and where he promised to come in difguise. D'Entragues seemed to be entirely ignorant of all this contrivance; but either having mentioned to his daughter, or accidentally given her fome reason to suspect, his design, whether the really loved the king, or was apprehenfive of the confequences, fhe broke off the appointment, and took other precautions against the danger to which Henry IV. was going to expose himself on her account. The king, wearied out by fo many obstacles to his wifhes, renewed his amour with the marchioness of Verneuil; and, if we may believe Siri, often was exposed to the fame dangers with her: one day in particular, as he was going in difguife from Fontainebleau to vifit her at Verneuil, he fo narrowly avoided falling into the hand of fifteen or fixteen of D'Entrague's relations, who were upon the watch for him in the fields, in order to affaffinate him, that his efcaping them may be confidered as a particular instance of his good fortune. But, as these circumstances are not taken notice of in any memoirs of credit of those times, they feem to be only some of those strokes, with which a foreigner, on the authority of popular report, may think he has a right to enliven his fubject.

Mademoifelle d'Entragues, of whom we have been speaking, seems to be her of Henry the IVth's mistresses, whom he has celebrated under the name of Lifa: and there are ftill fome original pieces of poetry in being which he fent her; amongst others a fonnet, of which I shall only repeat the four first verses:

Je ne sçais par où commencer, A louer votre grande beauté; Car il n'est rien, ni n'a été, Que vous ne puissiez effacer, &c. What tongue can tell, what words exprefs. The beauties of thy charming face; Since all we've feen, and all we fee, Appears but as a foile to thee, &c.

What follows is in the fame strain. Though there is a remark at the head of this fonnet. of the hand-writing of Henry IV, that it was made by Collin, a poet whose pen that prince often was pleafed to make use of in works of this kind, these compositions are neither too correct, nor too poetical, to prevent our believing Henry himfelf might he the author of them, or at least in some degree concerned in them.

MEMOIRS OF SULLY.

XIX.

HE king, from the year 1602, looking out for a fafe and convenient place where he might lay up his revenues, and the money which he fet apart for the execution of his defigns, fixed upon the Baftile, where he ordered chefts to be made, and all other necessary conveniences: for this article he was obliged to publish a regulation that might bring this new disposition of money into method, to prevent the confusion of different offices, and to hinder the receivers from being entangled with the chamber of accounts: the regulation was thus.

No money was to be carried to the Bastile but that which remained clear in the king's hands; all charges, both ordinary and extraordinary, being first taken out of the revenues of the quarter in which they fell. The money was put into the hands of the treasurer in office, in the prefence of the superintendant of the finances, and the comptroller-general, who at that time was John de Vienne; the comptroller and I had each of us a key, and the treasurer had likewise a third; when his year of office was over he received a certificate, figned by me and Vienne, of the sums that had been put in the king's chests during his administration; this he put into the hands of his successor, and received from him an acquittance, which he was at liberty to shew as his discharge. The new treasurer had a right to know whether the certificate was exact, by inspecting the money contained in the treasury; upon this acquittance, the treasurer was authorised to draw up his account, which the chamber of accounts was obliged to pass without further examination.

HIS majesty was of opinion, that he ought early to publish his intentions and justify his conduct, both with respect to that accumulation of riches, and to the changes which had been already made, and which were still to be made in the finances. This was done in a council extraordinarily affembled for this purpose. The chancellor received from the king, and published, the lift of those who were to compose the council, confifting of deputies of the fovereign courts of Paris. named by his majesty, the principal members of his council, and the chief administrators of justice, the revenues, and police. They met on the appointed day in the great closet of the Louvre, which is at the end of the guard-room, joining that of the king's chamber. When they were all affembled the king came in, and having ordered the whole affembly to be feated, he explained to them the motives of his conduct. in a difeourse of which this is the substance: The civil wars, he told them, had reduced the revenues of the kingdom to fuch a flate, that the annual income was fcarce fufficient to clear the annual debt; and it was necessary therefore to improve the state of affairs, not only by enquiries and profecutions, which had already fo far benefited the nation, that it was cleared of part of the debt, but likewise to form new funds, that if there should either happen a war of consequence, or a troublesome minority, the king might neither be obliged to become bankrupt, nor to let public affairs fink into their former confusion, to fupport the expences which could not otherways be raifed for this purpose; that the best use was to be made of peaceable times, in which there was nothing of that kind to be dreaded; that the means necesfary to this, which however should be practifed, without doing any mischief by precipitation, were the extinction of revenues granted by the state on several pretences, the reimbursement of offices, and the refumption of crown-lands that had been given away.

His majefty was refolved to begin by examining the feveral grants of revenues; and this was to be entered upon this very year: upon this head he let fall an expression to prepare their minds for the just severity of this procedure, by saying, that in the first place he should endeavour to make a rigorous discrimination between those that had really paid in money the principal of the arrears, which they were now receiving back from the king's revenues, and those who had made false claims upon the king. Henry added, that he reckoned so much upon the economy with which he intended to manage his revenues for the time to come, that he considered a design which required the amassing of large sums in the treasury, as by no means inconsistent with his purpose of easing the people by lessening the taxes, which he should always keep before his eyes. He exhorted the affembly to affist such just and upright intentions, and directed that they should twice a day, during eight days, deliberate maturely upon this proposition, and at the end of that time, should lay before him the result of their deliberation. He promised to follow any good scheme that should be offered, with the same sincerity which he had discovered in imparting his own; and not to forget those who should give proofs on this occasion of their regard for the public.

Assemblies of this kind are, in my opinion, not to be condemned, even when they are only called to keep up a form which may be of no great use, fince they serve, it may be faid, no other purposes than to notify to the ministers, with less appearance of absolute power, the decrees of the prince already fixed in a fecret council. This very affembly did not escape this reflection; the proposal of the king, though in itself unquestionably just and beneficial to the community, did not met with the more approbation for its usefulness. I know not what will be faid on this occasion by the affertors of the authority of the people, but I for my part am of opinion, that as multitudes of instances like this fufficiently prove, that the defigns of a good and wife king must not be at all times, and in every situation, the same with those of the people. The considerations which regulate popular opinions are feldom free from interest or passion, and never, or almost never, reach farther than the present. Those who judge best are themselves deceived by their own sense of interest, and seem, one by one, to have determined, though they will not confess, and perhaps do not know it, to procure their own fatisfaction, without any care about the future.

This corruption arises from the desire, natural to man, of present happines; and unhappily it falls out in government as in policy, that there may be just reasons for desering this completion of felicity for ten, twenty, or fifty years, and sometimes for a longer time. What means can be contrived to make this delay not offensive to the common people, and even to those who, tho' they have more knowledge, have the fame passions with the vulgar. The case is otherwise with a wise and good king, or with a minister who represents him, and performs the acts of government. His inclinations, it is true, ought to be directed to the good of the fubjects, but he always knows, that by catching too foon at happiness it is almost always missed, and that there is no proportion between the real evils into which men are plunged by fuch mistaken precipitations, and the vexations merely ideal and imaginary, which are complained of by those that think they want fomething. Happy is the public when it is governed by fuch principles of policy, as put it in the way to tranquillity; all regard to short-lived and transitory advantage is cast aside in consideration of general good, and a wife king is not less a father of those subjects who shall live at the distance of three or four generations, than of those who live in his own time; and confiders the false tenderness which he might have shewn to his own time, at the expence of fucceeding ages, as the partiality of a father in favour of some of his children, which is to end in the ruin of his family.

The scheme, which Henry had formed for the interest of his kingdom, making it necessary that he should take all measures to encrease his revenues, instead of making all those defalcations about which some who pretended great zeal for his service were continually talking to him, he required my private advice. The advance which I had made in the knowledge of the finances enabled me to discover some sources of large profit which would very little burthen the people; of these I put nine iato a memorial which I presented to his majesty, as follows.

I. The contractors who in late times managed the chief farms of the revenue, had, under pretence of feveral employments which they represented as necessary, misapplied the money which they had received, and made those sums pass in their accounts, to the ruin of the exchequer, which was represented as having received them, though not a penny came to it. By this article alone the crown was robbed of several millions. Of these accounts and details I therefore demanded an exact revisal, that I might lay hold on the contractors, who had not been able so completely to conceal themselves under the different names by which they carried on their robberies, but that I should be able to trace them.

2. The clergy of France had, by the mouths of the cardinals, archbishops, and bishops, accused Castille, their receiver-general, of having detained their money. The petition which had been presented to me, You. II.

Yy y was 1604. was accompanied with an account of the articles of accufation fo positively and clearly stated, that nothing remained but that the king should reclaim the immense sum which the receiver appeared to have embezzled.

- 3. All the managers of the finances, and the people of business. particularly the treasurers of France, who had contributed much to the ruin of the finances, might be affociated with Castille, by the erection of a chamber of justice; which must produce great advantages, if private intrigues and fecret artifices could be kept out, by which these enquiries are often defeated.
- 4. THE abuses in the alienation of the king's lands were so gross, that many of those who had them in their hands held them by mere usurpation, without any title; and the others had them at a price fo fcandaloufly low, that they were repaid by the income of the very first year at fix per cent. which was the interest then current. Of this I made his majesty fully sensible, who would not suffer these alienations to be exactly verified, that he might be drawn to confent to the refumption of all those possessions, or to some measures for obliging the possessions to pay the true price.
- 5. In the other offices and employments there was the fame corruption to be removed by the fame means; the perfons in possession were to be obliged to supply the deficiences of their first payment in proportion to their falaries, or to give back their employments for the iame fum for which they had purchased them.
- 6. The debts due to the Swifs Cantons were, by a bad regulation, fo far from being leffened, that they had been always encreasing. I had already made fuch an alteration in that part of our affairs, that by the feafonable payment of one million, I had obtained an acquittance of eight; half of it reckoned to the principal and half to the arrears; and by taking the same method with the rest, the public was soon cleared of that debt.
- 7. As it was easy for the king to recover the possession of the crown lands that were alienated, fo it was of great advantage to him to alienate I know not how many little parts of them, confifting in groundrents, and particular claims, of which the expences for repairs, leafes, and receiving, fometimes under pretence of profecutions, fometimes of drawbacks, and improvements, were rifen, by the connivance of the treafurers treasurers of the finances, who alone made their advantage of them, to such a prodigious heighth, that according to a calculation which I made, by reckoning ten years, one with another, a fifth part must have been added, before a fingle penny could come to the king. This was the chief source of plunder to the officers of the revenue. By alienating all these parts at the rate for money settled by the last edict, the king would be more than doubly a gainer, because he might buy with the money which this rate would bring in, those parts of this revenue which were mortgaged at ten per cent.

- 8. The profit was yet greater with respect to the resumption of the royal revenues that had been alienated; some of the contractors had offered me to purchase them back to the king for forty millions, without obliging him to repay any part of the sum, provided he would let them take their choice of the part to be purchased, and allow them to enjoy them for a certain number of years, after which they would restore them to the crown clear of all debts and incumbrance. The king, instead of accepting their proposal, had nothing to do but to get himself the money which they would have gotten by the bargain.
- 9. France had in her hand an infallible power to draw unto herfelf all the commerce of the Ocean and Mediterranean, and to fee them, without any great expence, in the middle of her provinces: all this would coft her nothing but the labour of cutting a canal from the Seine to the Loire, from the Loire to the Saone, and from the Saone to the Meuse *; and the first glance of this project presents us with

* Before the duke of Sully came into the ministry, it had never been thought of in France to derive any advantage from the rivers; to which, nevertheless, it must be owned, the kingdom is indebted for its wealth and commerce. He began with the canal of Briare, but was not able to proceed farther. Perhaps nothing will contribute so much to render the reign of Lewis the Great immortal, as that wonderful canal for joining the two feas: the great benefits refulting to the nation from thefe undertakings, fo happily executed, paffing over the example Holland affords us, points out to us what remains to be farther done, and at the fame time proves, that however difficult attempts of this nature may appear, they are yet far from being impossible.

The joining rivers, and making roads, which render the communication either of different provinces, or different parts of the fame province, more easy and commodious, are perhaps the two most important objects to which a wife government can apply its attention in time of peace; and by employing the foldiery, who are at fuch times uselefs, or that prodigious number of beggars, who are always fo, in performing works of this nature, they will be executed at a moderate expence. Idlenefs, which generally makes beggars and vagabonds turn thieves and robbers, at the fame time will be banished from the nation, and commerce introduced into every part of it.

more than two millions a year, which we should get from Spain alone, and which would be real and folid wealth, as all that is which is produced by commerce.

I ENTERED into a long feries of particulars, when J gave in my report to the king; and I accompanied it with a paper, in which I cleared up the reality of some of the revenues which were not comprifed in these articles. The prince, who to be sure expected a very different scheme, and whose natural liveliness of temper kept him from attending to my discourse so closely as was necessary, at first raised a thousand difficulties to all my designs; he said, that indeed the schemes were great, but some of them were wild and unsettled; others of no great profit; some difficult to be executed, and some hard to be made confistent with each other. All this was because he did not underfland them. I knew well enough what his majesty was wanting, and what propofal would have fuited his inclination: an augmentation of the customs, creation of new offices, or a further alienation of his crown lands: if I would have shewn him a scheme which I had myfelf drawn up upon these means of raising money, I might have brought fourfcore millions of ready coin into his coffers; besides fixty millions more, by letting a leafe of five millions a year, to which I had raifed fix of his farms above their former value. But I easily brought the king to allow, that though these methods were easily practicable, they were at the same time very burthensome to the people; that we ought not to have recourse to them but in the most pressing exigences; and that the leifure of a time of peace should be employed in carrying on measures that required more time and application. Such were the nine schemes that I had laid before him, of which I affured him, that although he seemed to rate them at so little, that if they were skilfully managed and brought on one after another, they would in time make him richer than he was by two hundred millions.

The king fell into my opinion, and we determined to begin by the re-establishment of the public revenue, when I had shewn, by good

It is necessary there should be some principal center for the riches of a nation; but neverthcles other cities should not fall a facrifice to the capital; which being in the body politic, what the heart is in the human body, constantly receiving the blood, and as constantly propelling it, even to the most extreme parts, they cannot be deprived of it without bringing a languor on the whole machine. Much trouble might be faved in fludying the nature of those secretarians which give motion to the most minute branches of commerce, were due attention given to that simple and obvious principle, of only supplying the country people with the means of living in ease and plenty.

extracts and authentic papers out of the chamber of accounts, the court 1604. of aids, and other offices, that this regulation would, without the least injustice, bring fix millions into the royal treasury. He engaged in this afterwards fo warmly, that he shewed the highest impatience to begin, and never writ me a letter in which he did not mention it. To fucceed in this, I thought it necessary that a new council or office should be erected: to this an opposition was made by the chamber of accounts, but no regard was had to their arguments. This council was composed of Chateau-neuf, Calignon, and Jeannin, the presidents De Thou and Tambonneau alternately, and of Rebours; a treasurer, and a register, who were Le-Gras, and Regnouard; and I was the chief of it, and prefent at it as often as my other business would give me leave; but whether I was there or not every thing went forward according to a scheme which I had drawn as the rule * of their operations. All our proceedings would be tedious to relate, it is sufficient to say, that I had made a clear and exact distinction between the grants made at different times and from different funds; fome had been bought for the payment of the third part of their price in ready money, some for half, others for the whole fum; there were some that had cost their possessors very little, fome were obtained by mere fraud, and others honeftly procured; these last were never touched otherwise than to settle them more fecurely according to their original condition; as for the reft, according to the degree of fraud and injustice with which they had been procured, we either struck them entirely off, or ordered the full purchase to be paid; there were some, of which the possessors were obliged to pay back the arrears, which they had fo unjustly got into their possession; and others, who for having embezzled the arrears were obliged to deduct them from the principal, which it was so much easier to pay off. The public gained another advantage, by suppressing a number of receivers of the revenue, who were an ufeless burden upon it, and of whom I left only one remaining.

THE enquiry which I had schemed out against monopolizers and officers of the revenue was afterwards carried on by the erection of a chamber of justice; but as the corrupt management of folicitation and intercession was not cut off, nothing was produced, but the common consequence, the chief criminals escaped, and those who were less considerable suffered all the severity of the law: fome remedy was found for this abuse, at least in the time immediately following my enquiry; for I took great care, that when any man was found guilty of corruption he should be immediately punished. Exact information was given of those that were committed at Rouen. Mankind now began to give to all these strokes of art the name that they deserved; and those unlawful gains which had so long impoverished France, and enriched the officers of the revenue, were treated, without ceremony, as robbery and rapine; and honesty began to shew her head in a sanctuary where she had never resided before.

The treasurers of France having this year presented their accounts full of blanks for nonpayment, I could think of no better method to cure them of a practice which I very much suspected of dishonesty, than to assign them these pretended blanks for the payment of their next year's wages. The removal of Drouart, whose place was given to Montauban, and some other strokes of the same kind, taught the chief of these men of business to do their duty, and to do it well. By a decree passed against one Le-Roi, they were forbidden, under a penalty of an hundred thousand livres, to take any foreigner as a partner in the king's farms. This decree was declared in the name of Charles Du-Han, farmer-general of the five great sarms, to the chief persons interested in the revenue, and the other farms of the king at Paris, and the other principal cities in the kingdom.

I COMPLAINED to the king of an invasion made by the parliament of Toulouse on his authority, by forbidding of any corn to be carried out of the province of Languedoc. I was informed of this by the treasurers of the province, because it threatened the ruin of the foreign customs, the farmers of which demanded a very considerable abatement: it likewise reduced both the galleys and the garrisons into difficulties, as they were generally victualled from that part of the kingdom.

The four hundred thousand livres raised by augmenting the taille, into which half of the tax of a penny in the shilling had been changed, continued still to be paid; as likewise the other half, laid upon merchandises: though the edict by which these taxes were established was settled but for two years. The officers of the revenue made representations to the king upon this account: they complained of the low value to which certain farms were fallen which depended upon commerce with Spain, by the prohibition of that trade, as well as by the multiplicity of edicts daily issued by the council, and which they represented presented as more dangerous to the public, than the taille itself. I allow, for my part, that their complaints were just, and had myself remonstrated to the king long before them. He had written two letters upon this subject, one to the council, in which he shewed them, that the present state of affairs, and particularly the armament of Spain, did not allow him to make any abatement in his revenues for the present year; and the other to me, to prevail upon the council to come into his opinion.

I GAVE him what affiftance was in my power, as grand mafter of the ordnance. The arfenal was at that time flored with an hundred pieces of cannon; there were in the galleries, final arms for fifteen thou-fand foot, and three thoufand horfe; and in the Temple and at the Baftile, were two millions of pounds of powder, and a hundred thou-fand bullets. I remember, that one day as Henry was walking with me in the Arfenal, he feemed alarmed at the number and power of the enemies that threatened him: but I shewed him the formidable store, by which he would be able to bring them all to terms. He then demanded a list of his arms, ammunition, and artillery, with a summary account of his ready money, and what could be added to it, in the years 1605 and 1606. He entered into my cabinet, and made my secretaries write these minutes, that he might have them always in his pocket.

THE regulation and discipline of the soldiers was an article of government most necessary to be considered in order to its reformation. It is hard to conceive, that, in a nation that from its first establishment has been engaged in war, and has indeed purfued no other trade than that of arms, no care should have been hitherto taken to form and methodife them. Whatever related to the foldiery of France, was offensive and disgusting. The foot soldiers were enlisted by violence, and made to march by a cudgel, their pay was unjuftly withheld, they heard of nothing but a prison, and had nothing before their eyes but a gibbet. This treatment drove them into all methods of defertion, which was prevented only by the prevots, who kept them in their camp like men befieged: the officers themselves being ill paid, had some kind of right to violence and plunder. Henry would often fay, and he spoke according to his own experience, that the public could never be well ferved, till the troops were put into another flate.

THE first point, on which this new regulation must depend, was exactness of payments, which the king began by settling it so, that, for the future, it could neither be delayed, nor the money appointed for it applied to any other use. This regulation was followed by another equally just and equally proper to reconcile the mind to the trade of arms: by this there was a provision made for the relief of soldiers, when, by wounds or sickness contracted in the service, they were unable to live either by war or labour: things were managed so, that, in this state of misery, they wanted nothing, either for their living or their cure*.

The liberty with which I have told the king's faults gives me a right to praife him for his good qualities. He was born with the virtues and method of economy, and therefore practifed them without any conftraint: particular details of bufiness were to him merely an amusement. The princes that engage personally in the administration of government, fall commonly into one of these two inconveniences; either they are incapable of submitting to moderate views, or they cannot raise themselves into any elevation. The mind of Henry adapted itself with the same easiness to things small or great, of which his letters give sufficient evidence, and a way that was then used of applying to him immediately, sometimes for mere trifles, shew it still more plainly. There had been long due two hundred and fifty crowns to a wine merchant of Gifors, who had formerly surnished the houshold with wine. His majesty sent me to pay him, and to recompence him

* By the king's edict, dated the 7th of July 1605 (for pofibly this affair could nationally be concluded till the year after) his majefly granted to the gentlemen, officers, and foldiers difabled in his fervice, the royal house of christian charity, built with the money arising from the furplus of the accounts of hospitals, alms-houses, and tritials for lepers, &c. and from the pensions of lay-monks, and the oblats †: the superintendance of it belonged to the high conslate of France. This effablishment has fince been changed, or rather totally abolished, by what Lewis the great substituted in 18 flead, in building and endowing the royal hofpital of Mars, or the Invalids, a monument alone fufficient to immortalife his memory. This boufe of chriftian charity was before this only an hofpital, without any revenue belonging to it, built by Henry III. for maimed foldiers; it flood in the fuburbs of Saint Marcellus, in the fireet called rue de l'Ourfine, and was ready to fall down. 'Two years after, Henry IV. alfo caufed the hofpital of Saint Lewis to be built; for this purpofe, he granted to the Hotel Dieu, ten fous on every minot the falt, within the diffrict of Paris, during fifteen years, and five fous for ever.

1 A minot of falt contains four French bushels, and is formething less than an English bushel.

for the delay; "my conscience, says he, obliges me to pity that poor "man." I have, perhaps, told too many of these kind of stories; but my book would make quite another kind of a figure, if I presented to the public all the letters which the king wrote to me.

As to those other ideas that had a higher object, either of interest, of glory, or public happiness, the king never lost sight of them, either in his vexations or his pleasures: to see whether my ideas agreed with his, he made many enquiries; and concluded at last, that I should give him an enumeration of all those things, by which I thought the glory of a powerful kingdom might be destroyed or sullied. I thought there was no better way of complying with his intention, than that of presenting him a sketch, written with such simplicity, and with such sew useless ornaments of style, that he might at once glance it over: it contained an enumeration, without proof or exposition, of those abuses which commonly find their way into public affairs. I here lay it before my readers, to whom it may serve as a compendium of the principles, which they have seen, and must expect to see, diffused through our Memoirs.

The causes of the ruin or decline of monarchies are exorbitant fubfidies, monopolies, chiefly those relating to corn; neglect of merchandise, trade, agriculture, arts, and manufactories; the great number of public employments, the sees, and excessive authority of men in office; the cost, the delay, and the injustice of tribunals; idleness, luxury, and all that is connected with it, debauchery and corruption of manners, confusion of ranks, changes of the value of money, unjust and imprudent wars, the despotic power of sovereigns, their blind adherence to particular persons, their prejudice in savour of particular conditions or professions; the greediness of ministers and savourites, the degradations of persons of quality; contempt and neglect of men of letters; the connivance at bad customs, and infraction of good laws; an obstinate adherence to customs, either mischievous or indifferent; and the multiplicity of edicts and useless regulations.

IF I was to chuse among all the forms of government, of which this monarchy has furnished examples, I should propose Clovis, Charlemagne, Philip the august, and Charles * the sage; and I should wish that the eye might never fall so low, as upon the reign of Charles VIII. and our itimes; and if I was to establish a single principle of government, it should be this, That good laws and good manners produce each other. But such is our unhappiness, that we never perceive this valuable connexion, till corruptions and abuses have been carried together to the highest points; so that among men, the principle of good arises always from the extremity of evil.

The regulations, for the augmentation and fecuring of commerce, appearing to Henry to be of the first importance to the public, he laid out the greatest part of his care upon them. The project of the canal for joining the Seine to the Loire* being ratisfied, I removed myself to those parts, that there might be no millake in the preparations that were previous to the execution; whether in taking heights, or levelling the ground, or laying hold of any advantages that might occur. I spent but little time in this journey, for the king recalled me as soon almost as I was gone. In the like manner I regulated several affairs of commerce in the journey I made to Poitou, as has been already related.

both these principles. I have observed before, what correctives were necessary to modify the too auftere temper of the duke of Sully: I shall here take the same liberty with the too warlike disposition of Henry IV. A military spirit is undoubtedly neceffary to defend a flate; it ought therefore to be nourished with the utmost care; but it should notwithstanding be kept in the same state we do a mastiff, for the defence of our house, that is, chained up, and very feldom indulged with the liberty of perfuing its own course, lest it should turn upon its masters and tear them to pieces. The reputation alone of courage produces almost the same effect as the exertion of it can. It may be laid down as a principle, that there are no means but what are preferable to war, if the fame end can be obtained by them.

* This is the canal of Briare, which from that little town runs to Montargis, about ten leagues diffant from it. It was to have been continued to Moret; but this part of the defign was left unexecuted, and the canal itself was neglected, after more than three hundred thoufand crowns had been laid out upon it, through the malice of those who envied M. de Rosny, or, according to Mezerai, through the change that happened in the ministry. This work was far advanced at that time; it has fince been refumed, and at length finished. M. De Thou bestows great commendation on M. de Sully, for being the inventor of this delign, b. exxxii. A further proof of this may be drawn from the filver and copper plates, or a kind of medals found in 1737, when they were at work on the fluices in this canal, and which it was certainly wrong to take from thence. The count of Buron, one of the parties interested in this canal, fent the copper ones to the prefent duke of Sully, which are now in the duke's cabinet of medals, but kept the filver ones on account of their value. One of thefe copper medals is charged with the duke of Sully's arms, and another bears this infeription: 1607. Maximilian de Bethune, under the reign of Henry IV. by the hands of Messire Peter Ozon, at this time mayor and governor of Montargis-le-Franc. The duke of Sully, has also lately recovered part of the memorials and other writings relating to this canal.

Or these affairs, the most important and most perplexing, was an unforeseen quarrel which happened this year with Spain, concerning the mutual traffic carried on between the two nations. The king of Spain had, in the preceding year, laid a duty of thirty per cent. upon all French goods imported to Spain or Flanders; as likewife upon all goods exported from these two states into France; a heavy imposition, which was at once an infult upon our nation, tended to revolt the minds of his own fubjects. The king returned it by expressly prohibiting all commerce with the fubjects of Spain, and the arch-duchies, and by a duty still larger upon all the Spanish goods landed at Calais: but this prohibition could not prevent the fraudulent carriage of our provisions to the enemy's country. The French merchants, notwithstanding the new monopoly, still found there were such great profits to be made on our grain and other goods, from the fcarcity of them in Spain, that they exposed themselves, for those profits, to all the rigour of the law; and, on that account, there was a kind of fedition raifed in the city of Marfeille, of which the president Du-Vair sent immediate notice to the court. The merchants of this city loft all patience, when they found themselves obliged to fit idle and inactive, while the Italians came and carried away their provisions, and deprived them of their usual profits. This permission, which was granted by his majesty to the Italians, was, in my opinion, ill judged.

THE English were pleased at this new incident; and so far were they from endeavouring to accommodate the affair, that they fecretly strove to make it worse, because they carried on the same trade fraudulently, which the Italians were authorised to do. It was discovered, that eight or nine English vessels had taken in their loadings of grain at Olone, and went from thence to Saint Sebastian, to disembark them: this, doubtless, was the resource the Spaniards depended upon, otherways their prohibition would have fallen heavy upon themselves, which Henry, from the beginning, had flattered himself would happen: and it was the hope, that Spain would fuffer more from it than we, joined to his folicitude to maintain the honour of his crown, that it might not be faid his enemies could dispose of its commerce, which made him still require a strict observation of the prohibition he had published. He commanded me to fend a person of probity and underitanding, to vifit all that part of the country, from the mouth of the Loire to the Garonne, and all along the borders of these two rivers, to fee that this ordonnance was punctually obeyed; and he was empowered to punish all that should be found to have acted contrary to it; those being generally the places where such illegal practices were carried on. I gave this commission to La-Font, who executed it so well, that his majesty kept him afterwards about his own person.

HENRY, at the fame time, ordered his ambaffador in England, to complain to king James, of the practices of his subjects; and to give him to understand, that, if he made peace with Spain, with a view to appropriate to himself the trade we carried on with that kingdom, he would take fuch measures that France should not suffer alone, but that England should lose more by it than she. This was tacitly to defire, that he would offer his mediation to compose the difference between the two crowns; for Henry thought it probable, that the king of England might be tempted by the apparent advantage of fuch an accession to the trade of his kingdom, as to make peace with Spain; and he was now fenfible, though too late, of the injury he had done himfelf, and that the arguments his council had made use of were all false: this threw him into great perplexity. Villeroi and Sillery were appointed by his majesty, to attend this affair with the utmost assiduity; and I likewife was ordered to confer about it with the conflable, the chancellor, the commandeur de Chastes, and vice-admiral De Vic.

WE found many difficulties to struggle with on both sides. Trade must necessarily suffer great injury, if the prohibition remained in force; and if repealed, great shame must reflect upon the crown. Henry could not refolve to do any thing that, in his opinion, feemed to acknowledge his fears of Spain, which had not condescended to take any step that led towards an accommodation with him; and all that could be hoped for from his most Christian majesty was, that, although he fuffered the prohibition to remain in force, he would wink at the infringement of it by the merchants, that he might be at liberty to repeat it again if they too openly abused this indulgence, to the prejudice of the royal authority: as for me, the wound that was given to trade, was the only thing almost that I considered; therefore, on this account, England and Spain were equal to me; and I reprefented to his majesty, that the damage we must inevitably sustain, made it necessary that he should use no more severity with the one than the other.

The king of England did not refuse his mediation in this difference; he even offered to engage for the faithful performance of the promifes both both parties should make on this occasion: but he affected to act as an arbitrator between the two crowns; and the king, offended with his vanity, would not accept of his mediation, but in the quality of a common friend. The Pope likewise began to interest himself greatly in the dispute, being apprehensive that a more dangerous rupture might ensure the prance and Spain. He wrote to cardinal Eusalo, his nuncio in France, to use his utmost endeavours to prevent it; and this cardinal, a short time afterwards, found a savourable opportunity to obey him.

THE count of Beaumont, who still continued to be our ambassador at the court of London, had often mentioned the late dispute concerning our trade, in the prefence of the counts de Villa-mediana and d'Aremberg, the one ambassador from the king of Spain, the otherfrom the archdukes; and had even drawn up a kind of an agreement with their concurrence, together with that of the prefident Richardot, and Lewis Vroreylzen, which had been communicated to the conftable of Castile, who was likewise at London: but his sudden departure, together with fome other difficulties that came in the way, hindered this matter from proceeding to far as to get the preliminary of this agreement figned. The constable of Castile passed through Paris, and had an interview there with cardinal Bufalo, who preffed him so earnestly, and upon fo many motives concerning this affair, that he obtained a promife from him that it should be referred to the examination of some commissioners, whom he named for the king his master: the council of France appointed some on their side. But this method of proceeding was not likely to bring the affair to a conclusion, which, by being fubmitted to fo many arbitrators, was protracted to an infufferable length. Bufalo prevailed upon Don Baltafar Stuniga, the Spanish ambassador in France, and upon Alexander Rovidius, a senator of Milan, who were interested in a cause for one of the parties, to refer every thing relating to it to him; this done, that the business might on the fide of the other party be wholly configned to one person, he defired the king to give me a power equal to his, and without any fecond: from that time, the affair was thought to be in great forwardness. I went to visit the cardinal, and animated his zeal by a new incitement, telling him, that we were upon the point of declaring war, and that his majesty was busied in making great preparations for it. In a few days I prevailed upon him to agree to the articles I had drawn up, by which the freedom of trade was fecured: these articles were almost the same with those that had been proposed and discussed at London.

THE substance of this treaty, for such it became afterwards, although every thing had been agreed on only between cardinal Bufalo and myfelf, was, that the edict of thirty per cent. and that for the suspension of trade between the two crowns of France and Spain, should be and continue repealed; this was the great point. But the two princes having both endeavoured to justify their conduct by many reciprocal complaints against each other, which likewise related to the trade of their kingdoms; many other articles were added, that tended to remove these grievances.

IT was specified, that his most Christian majesty should publish an edict, forbidding all his subjects either to export or authorise the exportation of any Dutch goods into Spain, or any state under the dominion of that crown, by lending of veffels, waggons, or any other fort of carriages; that the real French goods should be stamped with the feal of the city which furnished them, and should be inserted in a regifter: this was done with a view to obviate the inconveniences which might arise from a resemblance in the goods, which otherways should be liable to confiscation; but they were not upon a bare suspicion of fraud to stop or retard the exportation of these goods; that all the Dutch, who were taken in French vessels, should be seized; that the French should not carry Spanish goods into any part of the Low Countries, but those that should be specified in the bills; and that, to prevent any breach of faith, they should enter into an obligation in writing before the Spanish magistrate of the place from whence they set out, to pay the thirty per cent. which obligation should be returned to them upon their bringing back, within a year, a certificate from the magistrate of the place where they disembarked, either in France, or in any part of Flanders where trade was permitted; that the king of France should order all Spanish goods to be seized, which were brought by his fubjects in Spain, to be carried into any of the prohibited places, half of which should be given to the informer, the thirty per cent. deducted : that the French magistrate, who should be convicted of having given false certificates of discharge, should be prosecuted and punished; and that the two kings should mutually engage to leave the places of passage free. The article of the imposts, which ever fince the peace of Vervins, were laid upon goods carried from Spain to Flanders, or from Flanders to Spain through Calais, and when they entered this port. having been already fettled in the presence of this cardinal, nothing remained to be added to it. It was stipulated, that forty days after the date of this treaty, it should be published in the respectives states on 1604. the same day: it was dated the 12th of October, and signed at first only by cardinal Busalo and me *.

ALTHOUGH I was very fure that Henry would approve of this treaty, as he had been first consulted upon every article in it, yet I was apprehensive of the eavi's of Sillery and the other commissioners, from whom the cognifance of this affair had been taken: the expedient I made use of therefore was, to fend Arnaud the elder with the articles to Sillery, with a civil request that he would give me his opinion of them. Sillery, without looking into them, answered quick, that the affair was in very good hands, and that the person who had transacted it alone might also conclude it alone. This answer would not fatisfy me: I fent Arnaud back again to tell him, that it appeared to me neceffary that the treaty should be figned by him and the other commisfioners first named, and that I entreated he would come to my house and fign it; but that if he refused, I could not dispense with myself from fending the treaty to his majefly by Arnaud; letting him know at the same time, that the difficulty he made in figning it would delay the conclusion for two days: and this was no more than the truth. Sillery, being afraid that if any accident should happen during this interval that might prevent this agreement on trade from taking effect, he should be answerable for it, went to cardinal Bufalo's house and figned the treaty, as did also Villeroi.

The king, when he received a copy of these articles, confirmed by these free signatures, bestowed great praises on the cardinal nuncio, and made him a present of a cross of diamonds; he recommended him to the Pope, in a letter which was conceived in terms very advantageous for him, and honoured him with the distinction of eating at his table. His majesty would not publish the treaty of commerce till the ratisfication of it arrived from Spain, but he still secretly permitted the exportation of grain, which was what the people ardently desired.

About this time another treaty was concluded at London between England and Spain, in which France could not avoid interesting her-fign it, but only mefficurs de Rofny and de Sillery; Don Balthazar de Cuniga, for the king of Spain; and the fenator Rovidius. Matthieu, vol. II. b. iii. p. 655.

* See the treaty itself in the Chronologie Septennaire. The king gives the marquis de Rofny no other titles in it but that of great master and captain-general of the ordnance of France. Cardinal Bufalo did not reforming felf greatly, after what had passed the preceding year between her and England. To be thoroughly informed of this treaty, it is necessary to represent the affairs, both political and military, in Spain and Flanders, with which those of England have in this respect an unavoidable connection.

THE flege of Ostend continued to be still carried on with the fame obstinacy by the Spaniards: in the mean time, the prince of Orange, at the beginning of the campaign, attacked the isle of Cadfan, which he made himself master of on the 10th of May, and afterwards of all the neighbouring forts, defigning to open himself a way from thence to the frontier of Calais; and at length laid fiege to Sluys. From Bruges the king received advices, that the arch-duke, who beheld this attempt with grief, was gone to affemble fifteen or fixteen thousand men, with whom he hoped to fuccour this place, by storming Ardembourg, which covered it; but that Maurice had so well intrenched himself there, that it was not believed he could be forced out, provided he had a fufficient number of men to guard his intrenchments: the Flemish general took likewise the precaution to carry his trenches as far as Ardembourg, that if he should be obliged to draw off his troops from the operations of the fiege, he might be in a condition to reduce the place by famine, if he could not by force. Sluys furrendered on the 10th of August.

THE Spaniards, animated by the vigorous refistance of their enemies, and a fense of the prodigious losses they had suffered before Oftend, thought their honour still more concerned after this success of the prince of Orange, to prevent their being foiled in an enterprise which had lasted so long. De-Vic informed his majesty by D'Auval, who was returned from England, that he had caused three mines to be blown up before Oftend, but without fuccess: however, it is certain, that Oftend was reduced to the last extremity; the Spaniards boafted that they would take it before the end of July; and that they should still have time to go and deliver Sluys with all their forces re-united. No one gave credit to this boaft, especially when Persi le riche, captain of the regiment of Nerestan, who came lately from that place, faid positively at Paris, that it would still hold out fix weeks or two months. In effect, Sluys furrendered before Oftend, for the Flemings defended themselves with a courage that has few examples: they were feconded by a reinforcement of eleven companies, which made made up between a thousand and twelve hundred men, all fresh, which had been just sent them by the States, under the conduct of general Marquette. They fell upon an expedient to make an inner intrenchment, which might enable them, when reduced to a necessity of capitulation, to obtain more advantageous terms, by holding out there; and they found means, pressed as they were, to throw in ammunitions and money.

This was a new and furprifing spectacle for all Europe, that a little state, which forms but a scarce perceptible point in the map, should dare to raise her head from the midst of her marshes, and brave, during so long a time, the formidable power of Spain. It is surprising to think where they found forces, or funds to pay them, for it was computed that this war cost the States twenty thousand florins a day; the perplexities to which they were often reduced were not indeed known; they hardly any longer knew to whom they should have recourse, and were obliged to apply to every one for relief. The duke of Bouillon having promised them a sum of money, they sent captain Sarroques to receive it; but he came back without any thing, but the regret of having put his masters to the expence of sour or five thousand florins, which their compliments to the princes of Orange cost them.

HENRY was their usual resource: sometimes they requested an hundred thousand crowns; at other times, two hundred thousand weight of powder, for they confumed great quantities of it: there was no end of their demands. Buzenval, whom his majesty ordered to reside in those cantons, to give him an account of all that passed, was of great use to them in supporting their folicitations with the king, who at length was the only power that continued to be their friend, when all the others had abandoned them. The Dutch expressed great fondness for Buzenval, and kept him amongst them as it were by force when he was recalled home. And who indeed was there whom they did not footh, and endeavour to engage in their interests? They would have made me a very confiderable prefent, but Buzenval, whom they acquainted with their defign, affured them I would not accept of it: and they contented themselves with offering me, by Aërsens, some curious pieces of shell-work, and some coach-horses of their country for my wife. Henry shewed a readiness to oblige them, which could not proceed from felf-interested motives, and which, with that people, ought to have given him the merit of one of the founders of their liberty. They must be ungrateful in the highest degree, if they ever VOL. II. Aaa abandon 1604. abandon a crown to which they owe fuch great obligations *. Henry wrote to me this year, when I was in Poitou, that Buzenval had made him new requests in favour of the States, which probably it was not prudent to grant; but that he could not refolve to abandon them, whatever reports might be raifed in England, or whatever threats Spain might throw out against him.

> IT is easy to judge what the present war must have cost Spain, which was in effect the affailant, by what I have just related of the United Provinces, who kept themselves merely upon the defensive, and did not flir from their own doors; and the refentment that Spain preserved against us. The council of Madrid, enraged at the losses they fustained by a war that had almost drained their treasury, which, however, they concealed with the utmost care, often threatened never to forgive the treatment they received from the French. Henry affected to be ignorant of these threats, and he acted wisely; the council, by this impotent anger, shewed its own weakness; and it was well known in France, that his Catholic majesty's revenues were exhausted.

> OSTEND + was taken at length on the 22d of September, and Henry had the confolation to fee, that for five or fix hundred thousand crowns, which this expedition had cost him every year since it first began, he had confiderably advanced the ruin of his enemies the Spaniards.

> IT might reasonably be expected, that the treaty I had negotiated with England the preceding year would have produced greater things. Spain was convinced that the should lose Flanders entirely, if the did not find means to make some change in those dispositions in which I had left the king of Great Britain. After my departure, therefore, from London, the renewed her intrigues and folicitations to obtain at least a neutrality in what concerned the United Provinces, if she could not bring his Britannic majesty over to her party. The Spaniards, at first, thought they ought to make very high demands; and afterwards their offers also were as high to procure a grant of part of those demands. Their first proposals were rejected without being examined; but these were followed by another, which gave them hopes that they should prevail upon the English to abandon the Dutch, knowing they had nothing so much at heart; this was to make the Indian trade free to both nations. But this offer proved ineffectual, because Spain, of foreseeing that there would be still a necessity of abating something in her demands, added a condition that destroyed its force, and required, that England should enter into a league offensive and defensive with her. The king of England's council having many strong reasons for rejecting this alliance, made no scruple to confess, that it was the interest of their crown to support Holland, instead of openly taking part with her enemies.

IT was now absolutely believed, that the Spaniards had nothing to hope for from England: Beaumont was the only one that was of a contrary opinion, and foretold, that notwithstanding all these apparent obstacles they would come to an agreement, which in effect they did. The Spaniards, fome time afterwards, returned to the charge, still leffening their demands according to their fubtile maxims of policy, and commissioners were named on both sides; the disputes ran so high, that they were many times upon the point of breaking off the conference. The affair imperceptibly turned into a negociation more peaceable; the English commissioners reduced the Spanish ones not only to express no resentment against France, but they were the first to say, that the ought not in any manner to be excluded. They never mentioned the two kings without joining the third to them; and even treated the States with respect and consideration, appearing inclined to come to an agreement with them at all events. All this was done to conceal from his Britannic majesty whatever was contrary in the real defign of this negotiation to the first, and to remove all his scruples.

To this battery they joined the affistance of little anonymous writings, in which the authors endeavoured to prove, that peace was equally advantageous for the three kings. In one of these papers, which was supposed to be written by an Englishman, because the power of the king of England was greatly exaggerated, who, says the author, can subsist independent of any other state, tho' none can without him: as if the Spaniards were not capable of so high a slight of stattery to secure the success of their designs: in one of these papers, I say, it was maliciously infinuated, that this peace was desired with equal ardour by the three kings; but that their most Christian and Britannic majesties secretly wished, at the same time, that it would give them a claim to the possession of Flanders.

However, they could come to no agreement during the space of a year; and it was not till the 21st of June this year that the negotiation was likely to succeed; but it went on rapidly at the beginning of July, and was so far advanced, that no one in England doubted of its being concluded, as soon as the constable of Castile arrived, who was upon the point of going to London in the quality of ambassador extraordinary from his Catholic majesty, and surnished with full powers to conclude the peace: the same opinion prevailed in Paris; and it was even believed there, that not only England but the United Provinces, had secretly made conditions of agreement with Spain; and that the States, by the interposition and arbitration of his Britannic majesty, had put an end to the disputes on occasion of the cautionary cities, the navigation of the Indies, the liberty of trading without paying the thirty per cent. and others. But why, if this was so, did we not see the siege raised, and other hostilities cease on both sides?

This report, however, was abfolutely false, at least with regard to the imaginary agreement and arbitration. The States perceived but too foon, and even while the conferences were fubfifting, that they had nothing more to expect from his Britannic majesty. This prince became weary at length of struggling so long with his inclinations; he affected to be the common friend of all Europe. He had lately given the name of Great Britain to his united kingdoms, and had made a folemn entry into London, where a conference was held by his orders to reconcile the church party and the puritans; for his pacific notions extended to all things: he did not reflect, that by this conduct he was going to exclude from the benefit of a peace those very persons that had most need of it, who were the Dutch, whom he left to the mercy of their enemies. The English already began to abuse every one of that nation whom they found trading in their ports; and when the Dutch alledged, as usual, that the English ought not to concern themselves with a certain kind of traffic upon their coasts, they replied, that they had permission to do it from the king of Spain their sovereign. Nothing so irritated the Dutch as speeches of that nature; and if the inhabitants of Flushing had been suffered, it is believed they would have murdered all the English they had amongst them: but the fatal confequences of fuch a proceeding being represented to them, they restrained their rage.

THE States had expected a quite different treatment, when, at the beginning of the conferences between the commissioners, his Britannic majesty insisted that they should be admitted, and their agent, the sieur Le Caron, heard there. Le Caron acknowledged, that at first he had good reason to be satisfied with the English commissioners: upon the Spaniards introducing the fubject of the Dutch cautionary cities, which they paffionately defired should be put into their hands, the English told them, that they could do no otherwise than surrender these cities to the council of the United Provinces, when the money lent upon them was repaid: and when the Spaniards retorted, with fome refentment, that the restitution of them ought to be made to those who had given them as hoftages, the English counfellors only answered, that if the States refused to pay the money that was lent, they would make the same proposal to the Spaniards. They were likewise favourable enough to the Dutch in the article concerning trade, which held them a long time in difpute; the Spaniards infifted, that Holland should open to them the trade of the Flemish coast, and particularly that of Antwerp, which she had, as it were, locked up, by building several forts upon the Scheld, and among others that of Islot: but the English soon cooled in these favourable intentions for their neighbours. Buzenval, whose letters furnished me with great part of what I have related concerning these conferences, judged thus of the event, that the English knew well what would be the confequences of this new plan of politics which they had embraced; but that great jealoufy of us, and a little folly, had fuggefted all that had been done on this occasion.

MATTERS were in this state, when the king of England thought proper to inform his most Christian majesty, by his ambassador at the court of France, of his intentions to conclude a treaty with Spain, the English ambassador presenting the memorial to the king at the same time. His Britannic majesty, in this memorial, persisted still in the strange opinion, that this treaty was not inconsistent with that of the preceding year. James had attempted to persuade Beaumont to believe the same, and promised Henry that he would defer the conclusion of it till the disputes which then subsisted between the two crowns of France and Spain concerning trade were terminated. The commissioners, however, did not scruple to sign the *treaty between Spain and dom, who are all named, except the United Provinces alone: it is fet out at large in the Septen, an. 1604. Matthieu, 650, &c.

The constable was applied to when he passed through Paris in his way to London; but he prevented, by obstacles which he raised on purpose, the concluding upon any thing with cardinal Bufalo, who had already begun to interest himself in the affair. But what was still more surprifing, these commissioners, without giving Beaumont any satisfaction on that head, had the affurance to demand the impost on the port of Calais to be taken off. Beaumont, who knew it was his majesty's intention to continue it, even after the affair of the thirty per cent. was concluded, which had no relation to that, evaded the propofal, by making one of the fame nature to them.

> THE constable of Castile passed through France again the latter end of September, in his return to Spain, carrying with him the treaty concluded, and arrived at Paris just as the treaty of commerce was concluded there likewise. He demanded permission, the next day, to pay his respects to the king, to whom he presented himself with an air and countenance full of fatisfaction; he made him a studied compliment, which for that reason was perhaps the less fincere; taking for his subject the two agreements lately made, he endeavoured to persuade this prince, that France and Spain being the two most powerful moparchs of Christendom, a strict union between them was the necessary and infallible means of accomplishing every enterprize they should undertake in concert; he laid great stress upon the alliance which had at all times been between France and Castile; he dwelt upon the advantages of this affociation, which would give the same friends and enemies to the two crowns, and upon the means of rendering it indiffoluble; which was, he faid, to be wholly free from all partiality; to divest themselves of all jealousy of authority, and preeminence; to explain and determine, in an amicable manner, their pretentions upon certain cantons and cities of Europe; he did not forget to infinuate to his majefty, that the protestants were enemies which policy required should be humbled: he concluded his speech with representing to the king, the advantages which would accrue from a double marriage between the children of the two kings; which feemed (he faid) by the circumstances of the times, to be already determined in heaven. He artfully affured the king, that he had no authority from his mafter for what he had faid on this subject, but entreated him to acquaint him with his fentiments on it; because, though they were only overtures made by himself, yet if they had the good fortune to be approved by his his majefty, he should with the greater confidence propose them afterwards to the king his mafter.

I was not prefent at this discourse, but the king came to the arsenal on purpose to give me an account of it. He stopped, after relating the Spaniard's proposals, telling me he desired to know what answer I should have made to them, before he repeated that which he had given himself. I replied, with the same gaiety, that I could tell him immediately, but that I would deser satisfying him till the next day, that I might take time to consider of it, and prevent him from accusing me of precipitation, as he often did when my opinion had not the good fortune to please him. His majesty consented to it, smiling, and gave me a little tap on the cheek, as was his custom when he was in good humour.

I WENT the next day to the Louvre, to acquit myself of my promife, and found the king walking upon the terras of the Capuchins; I told him, that if he still remembered a sentence which I had once applied to the Spaniards, and which he thought diverting enough, "that they preferred works * to faith," he would not be long at a lofs to know what answer I would have made to their ambassador; that after fo many breaches of faith, fo many perjuries, and violations of truth, with which Spain had dishonoured herself in the fight of all Europe, the constable of Castile's discourse would have seemed to me to be a new stratagem of the king of Spain, to break off the alliance between his majesty and the United Provinces, and the other protestant powers his friends, that he might find a still more favourable opportunity of invading his kingdom than his father had done. This being a fact of so atrocious a nature that palliation of it ought not even to be attempted, I recalled it to his remembrance, and added, that but for England, Holland, the French and foreign protestants, but for his incredible labours and inceffant fatigues, Spain had probably at this day talked to him in the stile of a master: that the council of Madrid, accustomed to profane all that is most sacred in religion, abused the name of marriage, which had nothing binding enough in it to restrain their lawless attempts. And here I made an observation to Henry, which appeared to me to have great weight in it.

IT was not, I told him, a ftroke of fuch wife policy as was generally believed, to marry the fons of France into families almost equal to their own, such as that of Spain *; for besides that there was no alliance, however close, but must yield to the hatred which ambition inspires for a rival, the advantage that was expected from these unions might be destroyed by the very cause which made it too considerable: but it was quite different with marriages contracted with inferior families; from them, at least, we might promise ourselves all the affiftance they are in a condition to give: the honour of an alliance with the most illustrious house in the world is too flattering for them not to make them contribute with all their power towards the support of its grandeur, and the increase of its glory. Spain +, by this practice, has found the fecret of confiderably augmenting her power, by means less rapid, indeed, but also less hazardous, than war.

I TAKE this occasion to observe, that I am not of the common opipion with respect to the falic law; that law so much talked of, which is no where to be found in writing, but whose original is sufficiently demonstrated by the name it bears: as its antiquity is proved by the uncertainty even of this origin ‡. It has been generally confidered as the

+ "The house of Austria, said Guy-" Patin, has gained great inheritances, per " lanceam carnis; that is, by alliances and 66 marriages." I As to the Salic law, the abbé du Bos speaks of it as follows, in his Critical history of the establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul, vol. III. b. vii. p. 290, 291. " it probably obtained its " name from its being already in force 66 amongst the Salian Francs, when Clo-" vis incorporated into their tribe all the "tribes which acknowledged him as king, " in the year 510, except the tribe of the "Ripuarii. The most ancient digest we " at prefent have of this law, is what was " made by the order of king Clovis, and " afterwards corrected by the orders of " Childebert and Clotarius his children .-"In the year 798, Charlemaine made a " new digeft of it, in which he added " many new ordinances to it, &c." This writer farther afferts, ibid. 273. That the clause which enacts, " That the crown of " France shall not descend from the lance " to the diffaff," is really contained in the 62d article of the Salic laws.

But another opinion has been maintained, and feems to be supported by reasons of still greater force, in opposition to the foregoing, by an academician of equal judgment and knowledge (M. de Foncemagne) in his excellent memoir on this fubject, inferted in the collection of the memoirs of the Royal Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, anno 1727. p. 490, & feq. it is thereby proved, that there is no one article in all the Salic code, which excludes daughters from the fuccession to the crown; and that the 6th paragraph of the 62d title of this code, where it is faid, "That males " alone can enjoy the Salic lands; and that " females can have no share in the inheri-" tance," ought only to be extended to the lands and inheritances of private perfons; but that, belides this, there was a custom, existing from time immemorial, even amongst the Germans, that daughters could not fucceed to the crown; that Tacitus makes mention of this, &c .- M. de Foncemagne had before demonstrated, in another memoir (ibid. anno 1726, p. 464. furest furest foundation of the kingdom and of the regal power. To me it 1604. appears, from the reflections I have made on this subject, that the situation of France, and the other advantages the has received from nature, are of themselves sufficient causes for that preeminence she has over all the other states of Europe; and that the Salic law, so far from contributing to these advantages, has often hindered them from being improved by those which a well-directed policy might have added to them. It is certain, that if a foreign prince, by marrying an heiress of France, should become our king, the first kings of this race would be confidered either as Germans, Italians, Spaniards, or English; but as there is not the least reason to fear that he would transfer the seat of his empire from a city which every prince, if he had it in his power, would chuse to reside in, this first foreign prince, or king, would be foon a naturalized Frenchman; and his posterity, from the first generation, would be wholly French. The house of Austria, established in Spain, and that of Stuart, placed on the throne of England, are evidences of this truth. This first foreign prince, or king, would likewise unite to our crown his hereditary dominions, probably for ever. The Salic law, by forbidding (if I may use the expression) the kingdom of France from falling to the diftaff, has deprived it of one way of aggrandizing itself; and a way so much the less to be despised, as force having no share in in it, it affords no occasion nor pretence for war.

HENRY was much pleased with the answer I would have given to the Spanish constable; he assured me, that his sentiments were the same with mine, but that he had concealed them under fine words, that he might not give the Castilian any suspicion of his designs *.

& feq.) that the kingdom of France was hereditary, but in the male line only, during the first race of our kings.

The fentiments of their two writers, though opposite in themselves, become united against the principle laid down in this part of these Memoirs, which conveys to us an idea in every respect insupportable. Besides its direct tendency to destroy the preminence this nation enjoys, it would involve the whole kingdom in almost a perpetual series of civil and foreign wars, from the cabals it would occassion in the choice of a successor to the crown; it would create a consussion in the laws, for which foreign kings would not always observe a proper deference, and be productive of many other inconveniences, of which the author undoubtedly was not aware: I cannot therefore believe but the whole is only an imaginary feheme of the compilers, fince none of the duke of Sully's maxims are discoverable in it. On the actual existence of the Salic law, conful Venderlin, Eccard Baluze, &c. cited by the two academicians above named.

1604. THESE defigns might indeed fuffer some prejudice from what passed at London between England and Spain, yet it did not take away a probability of carrying them into execution; things were not yet fo far advanced as to attempt that immediately: in political affairs, time brings every thing about, if its operations are waited for with prudence. In cardinal Bufalo I found all that I had been fo long feeking for on the part of Rome; nor did I scruple to acquaint him with what might possibly happen hereafter, being persuaded that the kingdom of Naples, which I allotted for his holiness's share, was a bribe sufficient to secure his fecrecy, and even to make him folicitous for the fuccess of it. cardinal had always appeared to me to be a perfect politician: Spain. by feizing, as she had lately done, upon the fortresses of Porto-hercole; Orbitello, Talamone, Piombino, Final, and Monaco, had opened the Pope's eyes; and indeed, if the Romans had not confidered these frequent innovations as the forerunners of their approaching flavery; they must have been wholly void of reflexion. That Clement the eighth was of this opinion is fufficiently clear, from the steps he was feen to take; he was just such a Pope as Henry had occasion for, and this prince studied to oblige him on every occasion: he gave him a convincing proof of this disposition, by sending the prince of Condé to his court to be brought up, and inftructed in the roman-catholic religion.

> THE princes of Germany had equally favourable impressions of Henry. His majefly commanded me to treat the duke of Wirtemberg's ambaffador with great respect, that he might make a friend of his mafter; and though he had some reason to be distatisfied with the elector palatine, on account of the duke of Bouillon, yet he paid, without making any cavilling, certain fums that still remained due to this elector, for which his ministers folicited, Henry only requiring that he

The constable being surprifed, was going to put one knee to the ground, and prefent a napkin to him; but the king raifed him up and faid, " It is " not your business to do the honours of " this house, but to receive them, you are " of the blood royal:" and truly, the king is related to the house of Velasques, holding the office of conflable by hereditary right, and which is conferred by the kings of Spain on those they think proper to elevate to the next degree below them-

This ambaffador had already had the honour of paying his respects to the king, two years before, when he was going to Flanders. should recal his son from Sedan. With respect to the United-Provinces, though they were abandoned by England, yet as that crown did not turn her arms against them, this made no alteration in their affairs, the affistance they had received from the English having been very inconsiderable. After the loss of Ostend and Sluys, the States took a little repose; but it was weariness, and their exhausted condition, that made them submit to this respite, which was to continue but a short time. Thus the means of a diversion were secured, to be used whenever France should make attempts upon Spain.

I HAVE flightly touched upon a difference between Spain and the Grifons*, which made noise enough this year, to give occasion for many historical memoirs which were composed on this subject. This difference I am now going to explain.

THE Swifs Cantons have, for neighbours and allies, the three leagues of the Grifons, the thirteen corporations of the Upper and Lower Valais, confliting of fifty-four parifhes, of which the bifhop appointed by them is lord; Saint-Gal, Geneva, Neuf-chatel, Baden, and other cities, imperial and not imperial, which fubmitted to the Swifs, on condition that their privileges should be preferved: these cities are comprehended in nine balliwics.

The Grifons, of whom we fpeak at present, inhabit the Alps; and that which is called the Valteline, which is a valley or rather a kind of large ditch, lying between the foot of the Alps belonging to Italy, and those on the other side of it; for though its length be thirty leagues, or thereabouts, it is not more than one league broad, where its breadth is greatest, from the Tirol to the lake of Coma. All the ground of this valley is watered by the Adda, which runs quite through it, and being increased by the torrents it receives in its passage, is but little less than the Marne, when it discharges itself into the lake of Come; it contains about a hundred thousand inhabitants, and is very fruitful in grain, wines, fruit-trees, and passurage: it is bounded on the east by the earl-dom of Tirol, to which it is contiguous, but the passages are both narrow and difficult; on the south by Bresse and Bergame, dependencies on the republic of Venice; the chain of mountains which separates it from those two cities, are so steep, and the ground so hard, that it is wholly inaccessible on that side, except by two passages, from Tiron into Bressan, and from Morben into Bergamasque; a like chain of mountains, inhabited by the Grisons, bounds it on the north. The disposition of this place is such, that there are no passages to enter Italy from those countries which lye to the north of it, but those that lead into this valley, which at the west ends in a plain in the duchy of Milan, in which runs the lake of Coma, between the Milaneze and the Valteline. This is the place we are about to speak of.

About fix hundred paces from the lake of Coma, Spain had lately built a fort called the fort of Fuentes, from the name of him who was to command it, upon a rock two hundred feet in height, which commanded the whole extent of ground which feparates the Milaneze from the Valteline, and which is already but too difficult to pass from the bogs and miry fields. Upon the shore of the lake, which in this place is not above two or three hundred paces in breadth, another fort was built over against the first, but not near so large; and to close up this passed against the first, but not near so large; and to close up this passed fage completely, deep trenches were dug in the space between the bottom of these mountains and the lake. The fortifications of these two casses were very well contrived, being rendered pointed and angular, to suit the form of the rock; which has this farther advantage, that no cannon from any of the neighbouring places can take a direct aim at it.

It was not likely that the Grifons would not take umbrage at fuch an enterprife; for although the Spaniards appeared, or feigned, to have no thought of them in building this new work, and to fhew that they had no defign upon any part that did not belong to them, caufed fome trenches which had been carried too far to be filled up; yet it was but too apparent, that their view was to endeavour one day to join the states of Italy and Germany, by invading the Valteline; and till then, to put an obstacle in this place to the passage of those beyond the Alps into Italy, to cut off all communication between the Swifs and Grifons, and the French their allies, with the republic of Venice; in a word, to reduce the Grifons to capitulate with them, and acknowledge them for their masters.

Spain had already given the Grifons fome proofs of this last design. The protestant party had hitherto been most powerful in the three leagues, being established in the most considerable canton, and embraced by persons of the greatest riches and distinction among them; these were firmly attached to France, and were mortal enemies to Spain:

Spain: but the differences of religion had as yet given rife to no mifunderstanding among these people, because they were sensible their strength consisted in union: the Spaniards, however, found means to break this union, by sending their usual emissaries, the jesuits and capuchins, into those cantons. These fathers, by persuasions, promises, and bribes, easily succeeded in their design of setting the two parties at variance with each other; and gave the catholics as great a disgust to the form of government established by their countrymen, as aversion to the religion they professed.

THEIR hatred began first to shew itself in the result of the debates in the affembly of catholics, which was held at Baden, and which for the first time was directly contrary to that of the protestants, who held a separate one at Arau at the same time. Some demanded, that those persons who had embezzled the money of the republic should be prosecuted, and arrets iffued against them; others openly supported those persons: but the catholic party becoming at length the strongest, they proceeded to fuch extremities with the protestants, as to endeavour to banish them entirely into some little cantons, under pretence that they intended to deliver their country up to France. This is a thing which France hardly thought of; but she could not be indifferent to what passed there, any more than the republic of Venice, who took an equal interest in these people. The sieur Pascal had been long our ambassador to them; and the Grisons appeared so well satisfied with him, that they defired they might have just such another; and as while these good intentions continued, they had also requested that he might be one capable of teaching them the art of war, we fent them De Vic, with orders to him and Canaye, who refided at Venice in the fame quality, to act always in concert with each other.

The best and shortest method we could have taken, was to support the leagues, in hindering by force the building of the fort of Fuentes, or at least to have surnished them with the means of building one on their side, which would have rendered it useless. They had thought of this themselves; and it would not have been a new thing, if his majesty had given some money to these people: but indeed the Grisons had greatly cooled the zeal of their friends for their interests; they were so far from expressing any gratitude to his majesty for the pensions he distributed amongst them, that they made no other return but complaints of their being injudiciously bestowed, and that this distribution was not referred to their ministers.

The Venetians were alike discontented with them, upon other accounts, which Canaye communicated to De Vic; and it was highly probable, that the Swifs would serve them no more with their accusioned good-will. The latter had allowed themselves to be allured by the gracious reception their ambassador had met with at Milan; and no one, on the other hand, doubted but the five cantons of Lucern, Schwitz, Zug, Vri, and Underwalt, would renew their alliance with the Milanese.

In opposition to all this, the liberty of the Grifons appeared a fort of point, to every interested party, which ought not to be neglected; nor could the Spaniards hope as yet to complete their defign of hoodwinking the eyes of the Helvetic fenate, though they supposed it not greatly illuminated with true political principles. In a word, it was at the diet appointed to meet at Coire, June 12, that these great efforts were to make their appearance; and each respective party, who expected the developing of the whole affair in question, took care to depute a representative worthy to be trusted. Alphonso Cazal came thither in the behalf of count Fuentes: I, by the means of Montmartin, fent letters from his majesty to De Vic, which, however, never happened to be produced in public, because Canaye declared that the state of Venice, with regard to the Grisons, held sentiments very different from those of the king; and it was a principle inculcated into all our ambaffadors, to unite confiftently in the same demands. The French and Venetian ambaffadors contented themselves with carrying on their point behind the scene, nor did they hardly ever appear to act: their feeming inactivity gave great hopes to count Fuentes; vet all the intrigues and movements of Alphonso Cazal, in conjunction with him, could not support his party from miscarrying. The result of the diet was, that the * leagues would bear no mention of a treaty with Spain, except the fortress of Fuentes was previously razed, except communication and commerce were rendered free and open; in a word, except all things were reduced to their antient fituation. The alliance with France received at the fame diet a new confirmation; nevertheless, a great distance of space and time was required to pass from fuch resolutions to actual effects; and the Spaniards had many fubterfuges to recur to, by way of amufing the Grifons. Mont-martin returned not thence, till he had maturely confidered every point that administered matter in these debates, taking a draught at the same time, by my order, both of the fortress and the district round it. I have formed this article upon his representation and memoirs.

A DISPUTE of the same nature with this, but in which his maiesty was immediately concerned, arose this year, on account of the bridge of Avignon. This famous bridge was falling into decay for want of some repairs which had a long time been necessary. This delay was occafioned by the particular fituation of affairs in France, which left no time for the discussion of a question between the king of France and the Pope, without which these repairs could not be undertaken. The question was this; the Pope, in quality of proprietor of Avignon, claimed likewise the proprietorship of this bridge, of the toll and pasfage of the Rhone, between Avignon and Villeneuve, and confequently of all the privileges annexed to these passes *; therefore the repairing of this bridge was deferred till it was decided, to which of the two, his majesty or the Pope, it belonged to do it. The king being defirous that this question should be decided once for all, and falling entirely under my cognizance, it was referred to me, which affords me an opportunity of explaining it to the public.

The law received in France has, at no time, granted any claim upon the waters and course of the Rhone to its borderers, though sovereign princes; for of this rank some of them have been, as the prince Dauphin, the duke of Savoy, the count of Provence, and the prince of Orange. The question was reduced to this point, namely, whether the Popo, who is one of the borderers, has any right to be excepted from this general rule by any particular concession.

To decide this point, I caused the archives of the monarchy, the antient rights of inheritance, the registers of the sensechal jurisdiction of Nimes, and all the charters of the province to be consulted. I sent commissioners of probity and understanding to the place; and the result of these laborious inquiries was, that the regulations by which rivers are divided between the borderers have no relation to the king of France, and also that he enjoyed a double right with respect to the Rhone, possessing folely as sovereign its bed, the old and new channel, with all the rights annexed to them. Among the provinces through which this river runs, Languedoc has this claim most incontestably established,

1604. being an antient fief of the crown, which has never been separated from it, and the counts of Toulouse have always held it in this quality. In this it is different from Dauphiné and Provence, which are acquisitions to the crown: but neither this reason, nor another equally strong, the possibility that the provinces of Dauphine and Provence might be alienated for an appanage or a portion, could hinder them from being comprehended in the same law with the Rhone, by the right of regale, which our kings could not be deprived of. A great number of edicts which were iffued in the mean time in their favour, against the borderers of the Rhone, confirmed this right; and the treaty which was after the last war concluded with the duke of Savoy, established it upon a folid foundation. The doubt concerning the Pope's interest in Avignon arose from this:

> A FUND of four thousand livres was formerly set aside by the kings of France, for making repairs in this bridge. This fund was afterwards relinquished to an order of monks, who make a vow to affift all poor travellers, and called themselves the brothers which ferved the hospital at the bridge of Avignon, because that hospital joins to the bridge: they were likewise invested with the rights which were to come to the king, on their binding themselves to keep the bridge always in repair. These rectors of the bridge enjoyed a long time these revenues and rights, but took no care to perform the obligations they had entered into. At length this first fund was diffipated and lost, no one knew how; during which time the officers of his holiness made several different attempts to get possession of the bridge and its rights; and the best way to effect this, in their opinion, was to make a voluntary offer of being at all the expence of the necessary repairs: they several times attempted to begin the work; but although his majesty's council did not act with all the spirit they ought to have done upon this step of usurpation, the candidates, however, were always contradicted, and their demands rejected. From all these proofs, his majesty's claim was ascertained.

> I CAUSED a definitive arret to be iffued, which decided this difference. By this arret, the Rhone and its ifles, its ports, tolls, rights, and dependencies, particularly the bridge of Avignon, were declared to belong folely to the king, by the regal rights of the demesne, and the patrimony of the crown. In consequence of this arret, his majesty ordered the repairs of the bridge to be begun, and measures to be taken to recover the first

first funds, that had been misapplied and lost: and thus was this affair ended, in which the duke of Savoy was almost as much concerned as the Pope.

His majefty also made an acquisition of the earldom of Saint-Paul, one of the apanages of the count of Soisions. This prince being plunged in debts, determined to sell this earldom to satisfy his creditors, who were very pressing for payment: he thought, are doubt, that, after the birth of a son, which his wife had lately brought him, he ought not to live any longer in a dissipation of his fortunes: he received, with his usual affectation of gravity and stoicism, the compliments his majesty sent him upon the birth of his son; and afterwards sent Guillouaire to the king, with the offer of his earldom of Saint-Paul. Henry, in this acquisition, first considered his inclinations, and afterwards the inconvenience of doing homage for it, if it passed into the hands of any foreign prince; he therefore heard the count's proposal favourably, and till they could agree upon the price, advanced him a considerable sum of money to free him from the importunity of his creditors.

HIIs majesty, who had not yet mentioned this affair to me, wrote to the count of Soiffons, and defired him to apply to Caumartin and me, to whom he intended to entrust the management of this purchase; and wrote to me also, to know my opinion of it. I approved of it entirely, and used my utmost endeavours to serve the count of Soissons: but I found it necessary to give great attention to the form in which the purchase was to be made. The affair being protracted to some length, I fet out on my journey to Poitou: Henry, in the mean time, listening only to his impatience, and being perfuaded that there was no danger to be hazarded by bringing the affair to a fpeedy conclusion, referred it to messieurs de Bellievre, Villeroi, Sillery, and Maisse, who settled all matters with the count of Soiffons by a bargain of exchange. At my return the king acquainted me with what was done; and feeing me greatly aftonished at his precipitation, enquired the cause, reproaching me at the same time with the little inclination I discovered for making fo fine an acquifition to the crown, which had, from my ancestors, fallen into the possession of the count of Soissons: it was for this very reason that I knew more of the matter than any other person, and I excused myself in the following manner to his majesty.

should be held of the county of Boulogneor the county of Artois; that is to fay, of France or Spain. This dispute being of the number of those which it is not easy to decide, it was agreed to in the last treaties made by Francis I. and Henry II. with the kings of Spain, that till the question could be decided, the lords of Saint-Paul should be at liberty to hold it of either of those counties which they should prefer. The succeeding counts of Saint-Paul chofe to do homage for it to the county of Artois; and, by this preference, gave Spain a claim which might furnish a fufficient pretence for re-kindling the war, as foon as the king of France. the possession of this fief, should declare, that he would hold it for the future of the count of Boulogne, who was himfelf, for he could not without a kind of dishonour do otherwise. It would have been a melancholy thing, to fee the war re-kindled for a trifle of this nature: and shameful to avoid it, by submitting to do homage to a crown which owed it to France. The king was convinced by my arguments; and the remedy was, to break the first contract, and fign a second in the name of a third person, and his majesty was not to declare himself till he could do it without any injury to his dignity.

This affair was concluded at Fontainebleau, where the king made a long stay this year. He sent for the Dauphin and the rest of the children from Saint-Germain. It was his first design, that the Dauphin should not pass through Paris in this journey; but he altered it upon some representations which I made him. The children of France, with madam de Monglat their governness, passed through Paris in their way to Saint-Cloud, and came to Fontainebleau by Savigny.

One of his majefty's natural fons, who was called Alexander Monfieur, was received into the order of Malta, in compliance with the king's inclinations*. He gave orders, during his ftay at Fontainebleau, for his buildings to be begun. The expences of this year were not lefened but increased, by the addition of those fums laid out on the buildings deftined for the new manufactures. My part was to obey, and I did it in filence, but with deep regret. I remember only, that seeing at the same time a great number of religious orders + established

If our kings and our ministers of the greatest abilities have not followed this maxim, it was not owing to their not allowing the force of these reasons, but to their thinking it their duty to give religion the preference to politics; fince, if it be true, that monks are useless to the state, it is equally incontestable, that religion would fuffer by their fuppression. HE process carried on in the parliament, against the counts of Auvergne and Entragues, and the marchioness of Verneuil, terminated in an arret given the beginning of this year, by which the two counts were condemned to lofe their heads, and the marchioness to be shut up, during the rest of her life, in a cloister. I received the first news of it from the king, who sent for me to acquaint me with the fentence; and, afterwards drawing me aside to the balcony of the first gallery in the Louvre, asked me what impression I thought this treatment would make on the mind of his miftress. I asked his majesty, in my turn, whether in proposing this question, he wished that I should tell him my fentiments freely. "Yes, yes, re-" plied Henry, do not be apprehensive that I shall be offended; I have " been long accustomed to your freedoms." I then told him, that he himself could answer this question better than any other person; for if he gave the marchioness reason to believe that he was wholly cured of his passion, and animated with a just indignation against her, he would fee her have recourfe to fubmission, to prayers and tears to move him; but if, on the contrary, he fuffered her to fuspect that he had acted only under the impression of a mere love quarrel, the would not recede from her former infolence of behaviour.

I AFTER-

I AFTERWARDS frankly confessed to Henry, that which soever of 1605. these two parts should be taken by Madam de Verneuil, I was perfuaded the confequence would be still the fame, for many reasons, among which, his natural elemency and his confideration for the children he had by his mistress, did not seem to be the least. " I would have 46 you visit her, faid this prince to me; I want to know what she will " fay to you, and if the will not employ you as an interceffor for her " to me." I entreated his majefty, with the utmost earnestness, to dispense with me both from the visit and the intercession: I was truly weary of acting a part which had never produced any effect; and I was unwilling to lose entirely the good opinion of the queen, to whom, notwithstanding I had always supported her interest against her rival, I had been represented as an artful incendiary, and the venal spy and flatterer of Henry. I had proofs, that fuch infinuations had been given the queen more than a month fince; I told the king fo, and named three persons to him who had been the authors of them; and reprefented to him, that there wanted only this step, which he required me to take, to deprive me hereafter of all means of ferving him with this princefs, on occasions which he was fensible recurred but too frequently. Henry contested this point with me a long while, but I prevailed at length, and left to another those infallible means of making court to a prince, but for which I ever had the strongest dislike; and if I still took any part in the affair, it was only to prevent the conclusion of it from being as shameful for Henry, as I foresaw it was likely to be.

This prince did not want courtiers conformable to his taffe; the groß fervility of a court was fully difplayed. As foon as it was perceived there that Henry could neither difengage himfelf from his miftrefs, nor rule the queen, this crowd of voluntary flaves to the paffions of the fovereign accommodated their actions, words, and even the air of their countenances, to this disposition: no one dared to contradict either the queen or the marchioness, and only feigned to do fo, when the nature of their commission required it; they but half served his anger, that they might always have their justification ready for both sides. Sigogne had been sent to me, by his majesty, with a very severe order concerning the marchioness, conceived in the strongest terms: he did not feruple to suppress one half of it; and, what is indeed aftonishing, Henry discovered that he did so, told me of it, and yet continued to make use of him. If this prince carried weakness to an extravagant length, his courtiers pushed their flattery still farther; it

1605. was never better known to what degree of ingenuity, and at the fame time of fervility, meannefs, and wickednefs, it could attain.

No one was deceived as to the manner in which Henry treated the marchiones of Verneui; but it was matter of general surprize, to find that the lenity shewn her extended to the two other criminals, whom the public voice had already condemned to the same punishment which marechal Biron had suffered: the count d'Auvergne's sentence * was commuted into a perpetual imprisonment in the Bastile, where for once he had leisure to grow weary † of confinement: that of the lady's father, into a banishment to his own estates: and as for her, she had a full pardon ‡, and even dictated the conditions herself.

The affair between the king and his miftres could not be terminated in this manner, without creating new quarrels between this prince and the queen, to whom this late instance of tenderness and consideration in the king her husband for his faithless mistress afforded sufficient matter for rage and exclamation: it was absolutely necessary she should be appealed, and Henry was obliged to have recourse to me on this occasion. No labour, no fatigue was equal to this; every moment there were new expressions to explain, new actions to justify, new interests to conciliate; it was the business of the night as well as the day, to compose these differences: no sooner did a calm appear, than a storm

* " The king changed this punishment, " fays Baffompierre, to an imprisonment " for life, partly in confideration of Ma-" dam d'Angoulême, who most earnestly " begged it of him, but more for a rea-" fon he gives us, which is, that the late " king Henry III. his predecessor, had, on 66 his death bed, recommended only the " count of Auvergne, and M. Le Grand " to his favour; and he would therefore " not have it faid, that he had put a man 66 to death, who had been so affectionately " recommended to him, by the perfon " from whom he had received the king-"dom." Vol. I. p. 165. But neither M. de Sully, nor Henry IV. himfelf, when converting with his minister on this subject, makes the least mention of this motive.

† He came out of his prison in the next reign. He was seventy-one years of age, when, in 1644, he took for his second wife mademoifelle de Nargonne; and, as this lady did not die till 1713, aged ninety-two years, it made a kind of chronological paradox, that a daughter-in-law should die an hundred and forty years after her fatherin-law.

arose immediately after, which brought every thing back to its former state. At my return from the Limosin, at the end of the year, I found more unhappiness at Fontainebleau than there had ever been before: what could be done, in an evil so irremediable, than to deplore it in silence? and this was the method I pursued. I collected all the letters the king had written to me upon this subject, and suffered none to remain in the hands of my secretaries, from whom I concealed, for the suture, what the king imparted to me in confidence, whatever instances they might make me. One of these letters of most consequence I snatched from a secretary of mine, who had begun to read it in a little summer-house, where I sent him to search for some papers. I act upon the same plan at present with the public, to whom I do not communicate all these little quarrels, which they would find a needless repetition of disputes, reproaches, jealousies, and violent designs, of which the reader is, I believe, already sufficiently weary.

From the disposition the count of Auvergne was known to be of, it was believed he would not be very easy under his confinement in the Baftile, nor d'Entragues relish the inactive life he was compelled to in fpite of himfelf. It was discovered, fix months afterwards, that the count had concerted with his father-in-law, who apparently found the fecret of getting intelligence even in his prison, the means of escaping from the Bastile. A man named Le-Cordier gave information of this defign, and supported his evidence with so many proofs, that, upon his report, the grand prevot, fearching the wood of Malesherbes, found the cords, pullies, and other engines, with which the proiected escape was to be effected; for which d'Entragues was afterwards arrested, and obliged to go through an examination at his own house. He alledged, that he was not obliged to answer the grand prevot; there was a necessity therefore for forcing him to it by a special commission, which his majesty fent for that purpose, from the province where he then was.

In the mean time, d'Entragues composed a kind of case, written and signed by his own hand, to justify his proceedings, and expected that this would acquit him. This piece, for its artful turn, and the specious manner in which he glossed over his conduct, was well worthy of its author: yet, with all his subtilty of reasoning, he could not clear himself of the principal charge, nor explain to his advantage the meaning of the cords and machines found in the woods of Malesherbes. He defended himself much worse when, notwithstanding this paper, he

1604. found himself obliged to go through an examination: he maintained, with great obstinacy, that no bad intention could be proved against him, by the discovery of those cords and pullies. The grand prevot omitted no part of his duty upon this occasion; he took care to keep all the domestics of d'Entragues separate, that they might have no opportunity to confult either with their mafter, or with one another. But notwith flanding the rage Henry appeared to be in, yet, through the whole procedure against the criminal, something so favourable was perceived, that he had no great reason to be apprehensive, although Le-Cordier furnished all the proofs that were necessary to convict him, and heavily accused among others a man named Giez: yet they chose to believe the accused person, upon his bare word, that he was absolutely ignorant of every thing; and he was not fo much as imprifoned. I was at my government while this affair was in agitation, but fent orders from thence to my lieutenant in the Bastile, to confine the count of Auvergne more closely than ever; which was all that this plot produced.

I PROCEED now to the conclusion of another affair, which was begun and almost finished during the preceding year: this was the entire restoration of the jesuits. These fathers, whatever instances of kindness they received from the king, thought nothing was granted while the pillar*, raised upon the foundation of Chatel's house, still remained. His majesty, persecuted with prayers and entreaties upon * This pyramid, about twenty feet high, and tolerably well built, flood opposite to the palace, there being only the street betwixt them; over the pedestal, on each of its four fides, was a plate of black marble, having the arret of the parliament (before mentioned, in speaking of the process against John Chatel) engraven on them, with fome infcriptions, conceived in terms the most injurious to the jesuits. We do not think it necessary to recite these infcriptions, which are preferved in the memoirs of the league, vol. VI. D'Aubigné vol. III. b. iv. chap. 4. The royal MSS, vol. 9033. where the French translation of them made at that time may also be feen, as well as in divers other writings.

M. De Thou's works, and the Mercure François, which may also be consulted touching the demolition of this pyramid, anno 1605, agree with M. de Sully, that it became a kind of juffice, to deface these inscriptions, when the jesuits were reslored, the two arrets being contradictory to one another: but they also observe, that the destruction of it occasioned a violent outcry, it being thrown down at noonday, in the month of May, by the lieutenant-civil, fent for that purpose by the king, and a fountain was built in its place: "The order of it," says Matthieu, vol. II. b. iii. p. 683, "was directed to M. de Sully, as furveyor-general. The most valuable of the status belonging to it were carried to the grottos of Saint-Germain."

The encmies of the jefuits gratified their revenge, by publishing numberless pamphl. ts, both in verse and profe, containing the most virulent reflections on every thing that passed on this occasion, which the rea-this article, consented at last that it should be referred to his council.

I thought, and several others were of the same opinion, that the so-ciety had no reason to complain of ill treatment, if the council came to no other resolution about it, than to erase the inscription upon this pillar, which was indeed too severe: but they knew so well how to gain over the greatest part of those which composed the council to their side, that they obtained an arret such as they desired.

I CANNOT admit, that my conduct, on this occasion, could merit the whole weight of the jefuits indignation: however, my ruin appeared to these fathers, and to the three especially who played the greatest game at the court, to be of such consequence to religion, the common cause, and their own particular interests, that it was resolved to effect it if possible. With the three jesuits, a like number of the principal lords of the court affociated themselves, whom I shall name no more. All that was now necessary, was to recall to their minds the former notions of the league, of which the name indeed, but not the spirit nor the policy, was banished the court: they found no difficulty to increase their party considerably, in a very short time, with all the voluptuaries of the court, whose foft and effeminate lives it was owned I had cenfured with more imprudence than injustice. The jesuits, by making themselves useful to their associates, drew great advantages from them; fo that, in a little time, a great number of colleges were founded in many of the chief cities in the kingdom, and endowed with very confiderable revenues.

THEY did not, however, fucceed every where with equal facility: the people of Troyes, Rheims, and Langres, did not receive the offers they made them of their fervices very favourably. They were obliged therefore to have recourse to letters from his majefty: the fathers Cotton and Gauthier were employed to ask them of the king, in whom deroughtnot to expect to find here. Prompted by their malice, they laid a great firefs on a circumftance happening merely from chance, or perhaps having no foundation at all in truth, which was, that, in taking down the four figures, reprefenting the cardinal virtues, which flood on the four corners of the pyramid over the inferiptions, they began with that of juffice. The print of this pyramid, which till that time had been fold by John Le-Clerk, by the king's license, was afterwards sought after with Vol. II.

the utmost eagerness; but Henry IV. Sent for the plate, about three months only before he was aflassinated. Most of the inscriptions with which the pyramid was cecorated, and the destruction of which medieurs De Thou, De Serres, Mezerai, and some other historians have so much lamented, were composed by Joseph Scaliger, too good a protestant not to be an inveterate enemy to the jesuits fociety. 1605. fo many petitions, one after the other, fometimes occasioned a little reflection. He told them, that he was very willing to gratify all their defires, but that he feared they would, at last, endanger the royal authority: he brought Poitiers * for an example, where, notwithstanding the mandates they had obtained from him, yet they had laboured for two years ineffectually, to procure a fettlement in that city, though, at the fame time, it had folicited that a royal college might be founded there. Father Cotton replied, that nothing could be inferred from the behaviour of the inhabitants of Poitiers, which could affect the other cities, because they would not be so unfortunate as to be opposed by persons so powerful, so respected in the province, nor even so much favoured by his majesty, as their enemies of Poitiers were.

> THE king had not here any occasion for all that penetration on which he fometimes valued himfelf, which enabled him to discover by the gestures only, and the turn of the countenance, of those who spoke to him, all that passed in their hearts +. He answered the father, that he perfectly understood what he had else to say, but that it was a mere ca-

* What the author here fays of the difficulty the jefuits found to gain a reception in Poitiers, is the more furprifing, as the Septenary reckons this city by name, amongst the number of those who defired to have the jesuits with them. fol. 438, Matthieu counts twenty of thefe cities, and Poitiers as one of them; " because, fays "he, their colleges, and their manner of infructing their feholars, were better " than any others." Vol. 11. b. iii. p. 606 and 686. If I did not see that the bishop and treasurers of France were named here, I should conclude, that what M. de Sully calls the city, and the greatest part of the citizens, meant only the Calvinists, who perhaps in fact were the greatest part. The bishop of this city, who was particularly intimate with that minister, as appears from both their letters, mentioned in these Memoirs, as well as a great number of the inhabitants of it, even catholics, might, perhaps from motives of policy, oppose the establishment of the jesuits, being persuaded they should, by that means, make their court to the governor of the province, though he did not openly require it of them: on principles like thefe, men frequently act and form their conduct in life, to the diigrace and at the expence of the religion they profess. This notion, not entirely without foundation, may, in fome degree, point out to us what may be faid in defence, or at least in justification, of father Cotton, touching the difference between M. de Sully and him, which the author here begins to relate. It may also be applied to the complaints these Memoirs, a little lower, put into the mouth of the people at Poitiers, that the jesuits, having at last been admitted there, the college in that city, from being a good one, as it was before, immediately became good for nothing, and that the faccefs those fathers met with proceeded entirely from the difference they occasioned between the two parties. These two or three articles have a natural relation to each other; and one may also add to them, the opposition the city of Merz made against receiving the jefuits, which will also be mentioned below.

+ Matthieu has observed the same thing of Henry IV. " He could form a judg-" ment, fays he, of a man's actions and " words, from his look and manner." Vol. II. b. iv. p. 807.

lumny, for which he had no other foundation, than some reports which I had been made him; for that having spoke to me himself of this matter before, I was so far from discovering such intentions as were attributed to me, that I had affured him I would raise no obstacles to their attempts; and that I would give them my affistance. "Ah! sire, "replied the father, God keep me from offending in any manner those you love, and by whom you think yourself so faithfully served; I will love them and serve them mysself: but if your majesty has any inclination to be convinced of the truth by incontestible proofs, nothing is more easy than to produce such as shall leave no doubt of the certainty of what I have had the honour to tell you." The king asked, with still greater earnestness, if he was sure he could prove what he had advanced? The father again confirmed it. "Well," faid Henry, leaving him, "I will consider of this matter." And he fent for me that instant.

As foon as I came to the Tuilleries, Henry took me by the hand and led me into the orangerie, where, as we walked, he asked me, as if without any design, how the affair went on at Poitiers, about the Jesuits founding a college there. I replied, that I was wholly ignorant of their proceedings, having refolved not to concern myfelf with them, for those considerations I had mentioned to his majesty. " Think " well what you fay, replied this prince, for they would perfuade me "that it is you alone who prevent their establishment in that city." I assured him, with an oath, that I had never, directly nor indirectly, opposed their fettling there, nor even expressed the least dislike to it. Well, faid the king, fince it is fo, take no notice of this matter to " any one." On his entrance again into the Louvre, he took father Cotton afide: "Who has told you these idle tales of M. de Rosny? faid he, " they are absolutely false, as I indeed suspected they were." "They will not be found fo," replied the father; and for a proof of his affertion, told him, that I had written feveral to the bishop of Poitiers, the treasurers of France in that city, to Saint-Marthe, and others, with whom I could do any thing; expresly ordering them to oppose the settling of the Jesuits there. He added, that he had feen these letters himself; and that they were in the hands of a man of strict honour, who had allowed him to read them. " Can you " shew me these letters?" faid the king. "Yes, fire, replied the " Jefuit, whenever your majesty pleases." The king, who till now had suspended his belief, could not for this once hinder himself from being influenced to my prejudice. " I will talk to you to-morrow, Ddd 2 " faid

I CAME the next morning to the Tuilleries at eight o'clock, the king having fent me orders to attend him very early: he talked to me of the usual dispatches and the present affairs; then taking me again into the orangerie, I guessed immediately, by the very turn of his countenance, part of what he was going to say to me. "You know, said he, how much I love you, but you likewise know how much I love truth and hate all infincerity; you have used it with me; and although I never "conceal any of my secrets from you, you have dissembled with me, in the answer you gave me to the question I asked you concerning the Jesuits. I am not offended at your conduct in that affair; as they mere discovered any great friendship for you, it could not therefore be expected that you should become their advocate; but I am grieved to find that you are capable of dissimulation, you who profess to be a lover of truth and sincerity."

My aftonishment was so great that I listened to the king in a profound filence; at length, recovering myfelf, "Sire, faid I, this is one of the blackest impostures that ever was invented; the only favour "I implore is, that you will infift upon a free explanation of this " matter. If the Jesuits can prove their accusation to be true, inflict " what punishment you please upon me, I shall never complain; but " if it is found to be false, suffer me, fire, I most humbly implore you, to do myself a public justice, that I may prevent such designs from " being undertaken against me for the future; for if there is a neces-" fity for my being continually employed in defending my conduct, it " will be longer possible for me to attend to state affairs, the number and " weight of which are already more than I can well bear." "What! interrupted the king, have you not written any thing against the " Jesuits, and prevented their founding a college in Poitiers? think a " little, and refresh you memory, that you may not engage to main-" tain any thing of which the contrary may be proved against you." " No, fire, I replied, I fwear by my God and all my hopes of falvation, "that what I fay is true." "What malignant minds are thefe," purfued the king, moved with a just indignation, "which can never cease "to envy virtue, or be weary of their fruitless attempts to ruin those " who are faithful to my fervice; leave this affair to me, continued " he, I will fearch it to the bottom, and discover, if possible, both its " fource and its authors."

HE left me at these words to go and hear mass at the convent of 1605. the Capuchins, where he knew he should find father Cotton; and, calling him, renewed the discourse of the preceding days, and asked for the letters which he said he had seen. "Those letters, fire, " faid the father, are in the hands of a person of honour, and I will answer for the truth of what that person said, as well as that the " letters he shewed me are genuine." " It is enough, returned the " king, but go and bring them to me that I may fee them; I know " his hand-writing and his fignature as well as my own, having re-" ceived more than two thousand letters from him in my life." The father, perplexed by fo unfeafonable an order, endeavoured to elude it. by appealing to his majesty's knowledge of his veracity, and his averfion to all kinds of falshood. "I am willing to believe you, said this " prince to him; but I would also have others believe you, by shewing "them these letters; therefore do not fail, pursued he in a severe tone. " to bring them to me, for I am determined to fee them, that I may " convict of malice and fraud those who are really guilty. Go, and " return again immediately."

THERE was no reply to be made to an order fo positive; the father retired with a low reverence; but the king expected him in vain all the remainder of that day: he apologized for it the next morning, on account of the absence of the person who was possessed of these letters. But there was a necessity to find another excuse for returning without them, which would cost the father much more. He told the king, that this nobleman's valet de chambre had unfortunately thrown those letters into the fire with other papers. But for want of the letters, he brought a thousand new affurances of the truth of what he had advanced. The king, however, was not disposed to pay himself with that fort of coin: "How!" faid he, interrupting him, in a rage, " have they burned these letters? this is not to be believed." And perceiving that father Cotton, who was fenfible this affair would not rest as it was, equivocated in his answers, and seemed desirous that nothing more should be said of it, he quitted him in disgust. "Rosny," faid he, approaching and taking me afide, "your letters have been " burnt."

I CAME again to his majefty, to propose an expedient to him which I thought would entirely filence my accuser; this was, to prevail upon the king to write to the bishop of Poitiers, and the officers of that 1605. city, to produce all the letters they had received from me; and to write to them myself in the most open manner upon the subject. I carried with me all the originals of these letters, in which his majesty found nothing to take offence at: he ordered his fecretaries to write those letters, which were to be in his name, immediately; and fent them to Poitiers in the fame packet with mine, by a courier named Constant. Upon the receipt of these letters, the bishop and the magistrates of the city sent the sieur de La-Parisiere to give his majesty all the informations he defired. La-Parifiere, in the name of all his fellow-citizens, attested, with regard to me, that they had always confidered my letters as written with favourable intentions towards the Jesuits; and presented to the king all they had been able to collect.

Among a great number which related only to the affairs of the province, four were found in which the Jesuits were mentioned; three of these letters, directed to Saint-Marthe the lieutenant-general, and to his brother, separately, and the office of the finances, were copies of each other; and after other matters were discussed, concluded with these words: "With regard to the Jesuits college, I know not why " you make fo many difficulties about that, and perfift in your folici-"tations for the royal college, of which you have written to me, fince " you know, as La-Parisiere has often told you from me, that you " will never obtain of the king what is necessary for it, and that he " absolutely commands the other should be allowed; it is your part " therefore to act prudently, and do that with a good grace, which in " the end you will be obliged to do whether willing or not: be it " your care only, upon receiving them, to make fuch regulations as " may not leave it in their power to disturb the tranquillity of the city " or province; or make any alteration in that union at prefent main-" tained between the two religions, that the king may be ferved with " duty and affection by all."

THE fourth letter, addressed to the bishop of Poitiers, is yet stronger: after some business and some compliments, which made up the first part of it, the king read these words: "I always doubted, that the ' Jesuits would not find people as kind and charitable in actions as " in words: for my own part, if the province is willing they should " have a fettlement in it, and that they will refolve to live quietly there. " without embittering the minds of the people, or doing any thing to "diffurb that harmony which at present subsists between the two re-" ligions, I should be glad to see them in my government, and will do

"them all the fervice I can; but if they forment divisions there, or give rise to any jealousies and distructs, I had rather they were any

" where elfe."

The king's courier, as he passed through Paris, which his majesty had just quitted and set out for Fontainebleau, left for me a particular answer to the letter I had written to the bishop of Poitiers, of which these are the contents; That father Mously, the Jesuit, had brought him a letter from father Cotton, in which this father mentioned certain letters, supposed to be written by me to him, against the establishment and honour of the society, and the complaints which this father, believing them to be true, had made of me to his majesty. The bishop added, that after reading this letter, he had obliged father Mously to own, that his brother had been greatly to blame to believe a matter of such consequence so lightly; and acted still more imprudently to write it, and bring it to the ears of the king: that sather Mously had seen all the letters, and found nothing in them which could authorize such as accuration, and undertook to undeceive father Cotton, by acquainting him with what he had seen.

THE bishop of Poitiers, who really believed the existence of this imaginary letter of accusation against me, which father Cotton had told him in his had been fent from Poitiers, and who thought, probably, that it would do both me and him fervice to discover the author of it, fent me word, that he would use his utmost endeavours to find it out; and that he had been told, the preceding day, that it was figned Guillaume; but that no person knew better than father Cotton himselt; for although, as he was likewise informed, it was that father who had thrown this letter into the fire, yet he could not have forgot the subscription of it: the bishop's letter is dated March 23, 1605. I shewed it to Sillery, who set out for Panfou, from whence he went to Fontainebleau, to make his report to his majesty: but the king ordered me to bring this letter to him at Fontainebleau, together with the copies of those which had been sent me from Poitiers. I perceived that this new proof of my fincerity had increased his esteem for me.

The next day he fent for Richelieu and Pont-Courlay, and asked them if they knew who it was that had suggested to father Cotton the complaints he had made against me? and whether they had any share in it? They replied, that very far from engaging themselves in the affair, they had earneflly advised father Cotton never to mention to the king those letters, whether supposititious, or written by some impostor under a feigned name; because that if his majesty gave credit to my words in matters wherein my religion might render me suspected, he had much more reason to believe me, rather than those idle reports received to my prejudice. The king answered, that they must prevail upon me to use the same moderation in this business as they had advised father Cotton to, and prevent, said he, all occasions of misunderstanding between my fairhful fervants, as well in political as ecclessatical affairs. He permitted them, if they could not by any other means reconcile us to each other, to throw part of the blame upon himself.

I SUBMITTED with a good grace to this reconciliation: after the two agents had affured me father Cotton had no intention to injure me, they entreated me to allow the father to wait on me, and affure me of the truth himfelf. I confented, and they brought him the next day. This father told me, that it was true, he had complained of having a fecret enemy, who opposed the establishment of a college at Poitiers, but that he had no thought of me. However, his majestly had understood that he meant me, and made me believe so likewise: that although in this whole affair there was only a mistake, yet he was extremely afflicted that it had given me any disturbance, the remembrance of which he would endeavour to essay the most faithful services. In this manner was an affair concluded, which had given both parties a great deal of trouble.

It was probably in consequence of this reconciliation, that father Richeome of Bourdeaux presented me, at the close of this year, by father Cotton himself, a book of his writing, with a most flattering dedication to me: he takes notice in this dedication, that although this book could not be very agreeable to the prosession of my religion (for it treated of the pilgrimage to Loretto) yet he made no scruple to offer it me, and did not doubt of its being savourably received, on account of my attachment to the king (to whom indeed the highest elogiums were given in it;) to this motive he added a second, which was purely of his own invention, that he had been affured I selt in myself a strong disposition to embrace the roman catholic faith, a disposition which increased every day; and reminded me of a little present he had made me the the preceding year, which was a book, intituled, The Apologetic Remonstrance of the Jesuits to the King *. I told him, in my answer, that knowing myself to be capable of loving even my enemies, his fociety might from thence judge what were my fentiments concerning those who professed themselves my friends. I returned him compliments for compliments, wishes for wishes, and even book for book; for I fent him the Journey to Jerusalem, in return for that of Loretto.

IF any one doubts that these professions of esteem which were made me by the Jesuits were not sincere, let him suspend his judgment for a moment, and he will know what to afcribe them to; I will not omit any circumstances of the fact I am going to relate, as I do not imagine they will feem tedious to the reader, fince they concern perfons so distinguished at court as the duke d'Epernon, and Grillon +, colonel of a regiment of guards.

* This is the last of that father's works against Antony Arnaud: he wrote many books with great fuccess on behalf of his

+ Lewis Berto de Crillon or Grillon, a gentleman of Avignon, as remarkable on account of the peculiarities in his temper as his intrepidity, which had procured him the name of Dread nought. I find in the life of the duke of Epernon a flory very proper to be related along with what the duke of Sully tells us of this gentleman. "The duke of "Guife, to whom he had been fent after " the reduction of Marfeilles, having a " mind to try his courage, fays the hifto-" rian, agreed with fome gentlemen, to " give a fudden alarm before Grillon's " quarters, as if the enemy had been ma-" flers of the town; at the fame time "he ordered two horses to the door; " and going up into Grillon's room, told " him all was loft; that the enemy were " mafters of the port and town; that they 66 had forced the guards, and broke and " put to flight all that opposed them; that " finding it impossible to refist them' any " longer, he thought it was better for them " to retreat, than by fuffering themselves " to be taken, add to the enemy's victory; " that he had therefore ordered two horfes " to be brought, which were ready at the " door; and defired he would make hafte, 46 for fear they fhould give the enemy time VOL. II.

" to furprize them. Grillon was afleep " when the alarm was given, and was " hardly awake whilft the duke of Guife " was faying this to him. However, with-" out being at all disconcerted by so hot " an alarm, he called for his cloaths and " his arms, faying, They ought not, on " too flight grounds, to give credit to all " that was faid of the enemy; and, even " if the account should prove true, it was 44 more becoming men of honour to die " with their arms in their hands, than to " furvive the lofs of the place. The duke " of Guife, not being able to prevail on " him to change this refolution, followed " him out of the room; but when they were " got half way down stairs, not being able " to contain himfelf any longer, he burft " out a laughing; by which Grillon dif-" covered the trick that had been played " him. He thereupon affumed a look " much sterner than when he only thought " of going to fight, and fqueezing the " duke of Guise's hand, faid to him, " fwearing at the fame time (for he al-" ways began his discourse with the most " horrible oaths) Young man, never make " it a jest to try the courage of a man of " honour; for, by God! hadft thou made " me betray any weakness, I would have " plunged my dagger in thy heart: and "then left him, without faying a word " more." GRILLON

GRILLON had at first the same unfavourable sentiments for me with which almost all the courtiers were tainted; but after a little adventure which happened at the fiege of Charbonnieres, during the war with Savoy, his friendship for me became stronger than his hatred had ever been. Grillon, at that time, was quartered at Aiguebelle, a little town. at the bottom of a fort, where he commanded our foot, and often came to visit the quarter of the artillery, where I was; he happened one day to be with me in a meadow, from whence I was observing a ravelin which I wanted to have battered down; and myfelf, and those that accompanied me, were within reach of a battery, from whence the discharges began to be so frequent, that I resolved to defer doing the bufiness I was about till a fitter opportunity, when we needed not uselefly endanger our lives. " How! morbieu, my grand mafter," faid Grillon to me, with an air and tone of voice peculiar to him, " are " you afraid of guns in the company of Grillon? Arnidieu! fince I " am here they will not dare to come nigh us; let us go to those " trees I fee about two hundred paces from hence, we may reconnoitre " the ravelin there with less danger." " Let us go then, replied I, " fmiling, fince we are trying who shall shew himself most mad; but " fince you are the oldest, I would willingly allow you to be the wifest " also." Probably I should have done better to have paid no attention to what he faid. I took his hand, and led him fo far beyond the trees he had pointed to, that the bullets began to whiftle ftrongly in our ears. " Arnidieu! faid Grillon, these rogues have no regard " to the grand mafter's baton, or the crofs of the Holy Ghoft, and " may probably lame us; let us gain that range of trees and those " hedges, which may shelter us; for, par la-corbieu, you are an ho-" neft fellow, and worthy to be grand mafter: I will, during my whole life, be one of the most faithful of your servants; let us vow an inviolable friendship to each other; do you promise me yours?" I took his hand, which he held out to me in token of union, and from that moment he continued to love me with a greater affection than he had ever shewn to any other person whatever, not even, as it was faid, to the king himfelf; and this adventure, which had given rife to it. he talked of to every one.

By what means I regained the duke of Epernon's friendship has been already mentioned. About the beginning of the year, he came to me and defired that I would direct his appointments, as colonel of a regiment of guards, to be paid him in ready money. I represented to him, that he had been paid already all he could with reason demand upon that account; and that what he farther required, was but a possession without a claim, or rather an usurpation, which his favour with Henry the third had given him an opportunity of committing (for this was a discovery I had lately made) and that I was resolved to cut it off for the future, unless he brought me an order from the king, by which this supplement was granted him in the manner of a gratuity. D'Epernon, offended at this discourse, complained to the king, and endeavoured to persuade him that I was become his enemy. His majesty, to undeceive him, reminded him of the council held at Blois, wherein I opposed the advice given by the count de Soiffons, to arrest him with marechal Biron. This circumstance, which d'Epernon had never before been acquainted with, made a great impression upon his mind. " Do you assure me, " Sire, faid he to the king, that it was from M. de Rosny I received " this act of friendship." "Yes, I assure you of it, replied this prince. " for I am not used to lie, especially in things of consequence."

D'EPERNON left Fontainebleau the same day, and set out for Paris in a hired coach, having fent one of his own before to Essonne, where it was to wait for him; I had left Paris in the fame manner, his majesty having fent for me to Fontainebleau: d'Epernon and I met each other in a place over-against a chapel above Essonne; the duke ordered his coachman to stop, and called out to me, that he entreated I would give him an opportunity to fay one word to me: we both alighted. " have too long," faid he, approaching me, " been under a great obli-" gation to you, without paying you those acknowledgements you " merit from me." He then repeated what the king had just told him, and, in the transport of his gratitude, loaded me with praises, and affurances of the most inviolable friendship. I replied, with my usual fincerity, that he was under no obligation to me, on account of the circumstance he mentioned, fince it was the business of every honest man to take the part of innocence, exclusive of all interest and views of any kind, and that hereafter he would be still better convinced, that all my intentions, with respect to him, had been equitable, and more fo than he had fometimes believed. This affair produced fuch a perfect good intelligence between us, that, eight days after, being upon the point of fetting out for Guienne, d'Epernon made me a visit to request one of those little favours of me with which a man takes pleafure to oblige his friends.

The duke had been informed that fome perfons, who were enemies to him, earneftly folicited Grillon to refign his colonel's commiffion, in favour of another whom he had likewife as little reafon to love; and, knowing that Grillon was wholly governed by my advice, he entreated me to prevent his refigning this post till he returned from Guienne: and this I promised him. During d'Epernon's absence, his majesty was told some things to his disadvantage, which determined him to give the post to a man who was not so much devoted to the duke d'Epernon as Grillon: it was not with this view, that the affair was proposed to Grillon from the king, but because he, in reality, was not very diligent in the exercise of this employment, and was soon to take a journey to Provence, where his stay was likely to be very long. He was given to understand, that it was for these two reasons his majesty wished he would dispose of this employment, and promised to procure him a good price for it.

GRILLON, fingular and fantastic to the last degree, and already a little diftempered in his brain, only shook his head without answering the three first times that they mentioned the king's intentions to him. He afterwards fulpected, that it was I whom the king had in view to fucceed to his employment; and when he came to take leave of me, asked of me if it was not so, making me, at the same time, many offers of fervice: it was with great difficulty that I could put this notion out of his head, and was obliged to tell him, that I would not accept of this employment, although it should be given me for nothing. " How! returned Grillon immediately, fure you do not think an " employment which Grillon has possessed unworthy of you; Arni-" bleau, my grand mafter, you are very vain, for fince I have filled it, " it is worthy of the best of you." " I know, replied I, that one "Grillon is of more value than a thousand Rosnys; but I have other reasons which hinder me from thinking of it." " Oh, very well, " that is enough," faid he: and then, without my folicitation, engaged not to refign it till I should advise him to it, and then only to that perfon who should be agreeable to me: and from this time, he would not give a ferious answer to any of the proposals that were made him on this subject.

AT length the king was obliged to talk to him himfelf; he fent for him, and repeated the fame arguments which were used to him before, to prevail upon him to refign a post, the duties of which were incompatible patible with the long stay he proposed to make in his native country, adding a thousand kind and obliging things upon the valour and services of Grillon. "By what I can understand, Sire, replied Grillon, you "want me to quit your service, and that I should become absolutely papistical; for you know I am born a subject of the Pope." "Ah no, Grillon, replied his majesty, that is not my intention: "then adding new reasons drawn from the nature of his employment, "So then in good earnest, said Grillon to him again, you would have me resign my employment; and since it is your desire, I will not do it, "at least to the person for whom I hear it is designed."

This speech indeed was no great indication of a found mind; he withdrew in a rage, but the king, who knew his humour, only laughed at him: he even took a refolution to speak to him no more of the matter, fo little was this prince inclined to use any restraint to perfons who had ferved him faithfully. But happening to mention this little extravagance of Grillon before Roquelaure, Zamet, Piles, Fortia, and fome other captains of the regiment of guards, one of them faid, that there were but two ways to render Grillon tractable, which were, to employ d'Epernon in the affair, and to tell him that it was for me, and in my name, that he asked him for his post. The king replied, that he would never dispose of it, at the solicitation of the duke d'Epernon; neither did he desire that I should accept of it : but that he believed I would not refuse to entreat Grillon to yield it to the person he had in view. His majesty did not name this person, but only added, that he was worthy of it by his abilities, and rich enough to give Grillon a good recompence for it. Henry then ordered Piles, Fortia, and Zamet, to come to me and make this propofal, as of a thing that would be very agreeable to him, but without owning that they had his orders for mentioning it.

AT first I made no other answer to these gentlemen, than that I had private reasons for not meddling in the affair; but upon their pressing me to disclose these reasons, I informed them, with my usual fincerity, of the engagement I had entered into with the duke d'Epernon, which was, as I may say, the pledge of our reconciliation. When these words were related to the king, he was immediately seized with so violent a transport of rage against me, that, as he afterwards owned to me, he never remembered to have borne me so much ill-will before: doubtless the occasion of it would appear very slight, if I did not, at the same time, inform the reader that it was in this year, and at this very time, that my enemies had then actually given me the severest blow they had ever aimed against me, and brought me, in reality, within an inch of my ruin, or at least of my disnistion from my employments, to the last of which I think I should have readily submitted. Libels, letters, informations, malicious infinuations, atrocious calumnies, all that envy could suggest most injurious and most horrid, had been practised, and still continued to be practised every day against me, all which I shall particularise hereafter: for the present it is sufficient to say, that the possion had been so subtilly applied, that the king, although he had long been aware of the malice of my enemies, had not been able to avoid being tainted with it, and it had reached even to his heart.

I SHALL not here use the ordinary style of those who have suffered fuch trials, when they exclaim, with fo much vehemence, against the ingratitude and injustice they have met with from princes; I always fuspect that such outcries proceed either from great vanity, or great ignorance of the human heart. To make calumny against the absent succefsful, nothing more is requifite than to find the means of opening the mind to fuspicion, and to those, who, having every thing to govern and direct, have likewise every thing to foresee and to fear, innumerable arguments will occur to keep alive and justify this suspicion. How many appearances of fidelity, fo well difguifed that truth itself could hardly assume any other face, especially before kings, from whom one would imagine the delights to conceal herfelf? But are there not many ministers likewise, who, from being loyal and affectionate, have become traitors to their fovereigns? To all these considerations, Henry, on his fide, added a too curious and too active refearch into all possible contingencies, wherein, for the present or the future, any danger to the state might be apprehended; and I, on mine, too little solicitude to leffen his fuspicion, which was not so much the effect of indifference, as the mark of a conscience clear and irreproachable: it is not furprifing therefore, that the artifices of my enemies, had made fo deep an impression in the mind of Henry. However, I have always, after this, faid it down for a maxim, that any fovereign who imagines fuch a conduct necessary to support his interests and authority, takes the direct method to ruin both, by leffening himfelf that respect and deference which he ought to oblige his fubjects to shew to those to whom he has confided those interests, and by whom that honour is main-

WHEN the three men, whom the king had employed in the affair of Grillon, had acquainted him with what I had faid, which had occafioned those transports of rage against me, Villeroi, Sillery, La Varenne, and father Cotton, came very feafonably for him to discharge this heavy burthen upon. I had no reason to think, that this accidental meeting was a favourable effect of the influence of my ftars; for he repeated my words to them, and his own fentiments upon them, with the most violent emotions of rage. " How !" faid he to them, perceiving that they made him no answer, " you are filent, you say not a word; " but by heaven, purfued he, all this looks ill; for fince fire and wa-" ter mingle fo well together (it was d'Epernon and me whom he " meant) there must be higher defigns, at least on one side, than I " could ever have imagined; but I shall take care to prevent them." t was absolutely in the power of those four persons, to whom the king addressed this discourse, to prevent these suspicions from going so far; one word only would have sufficed: but they took care not to fay that word, but, on the contrary, upon the king's faying, that while I continued faithful in my allegiance, and the performance of my duty, I was the most useful servant he had, and that he should never cease to lament the lofs of me, they, to add fuel to fire, under a feigned folicitude to alleviate his majefty's disquiet, began to praise, with the utmost ardour, my great abilities in the management of affairs, the unwearied application I was capable of, and the active turn of my mind. From hence they inferred the great need which all the members of the state had of me, and the dependance which that necessarily introduced; they exaggerated the high credit I had acquired among foreigners, and with what ease I could put every thing in motion, without stirring out of my closet; praises which I neither merited in their good nor bad sense. Certainly envy can affume every difguife, fince it can oblige men, not only to praise those whom they most abhor, but in their praises outdo flattery itself.

The four confidants had reason to applaud themselves for this last stroke of policy, when they sound they had not allayed the king's anger against me, but only to mix with it the strongest emotions of jealously, distrust, and apprehension: that this was the state of his mind they were well assured, when he told them, that, if I resigned myself up to the ambitious desire of becoming head of a party, my credit was so great, and my friends so numerous, that I was able to do the state more harm, than admiral Coligny had ever been able to do. My enemies now thought thought there was nothing more necessary to be done, but to suffer those black suspicions to work in his mind, and wait the effect; accordingly they took leave of the prince, after having thus instilled the possion into his heart. Henry, in this state of mind, was no longer capable either of secresy or art; he spoke of me publicly as of a rebel, and the whole court was immediately filled with the noise of my disgrace, and the expectation of my approaching ruin.

I HAD likewise many friends there, who had, a long time before matters came to this point, informed me of all that was practifing against me by my enemies, and of what was said by the king. I am not fure, whether it would not have been more prudent to act upon this occasion as I had already done on many others of the same nature, in which Henry of himself returned from his suspicions and disgusts, to his usual manner of thinking with regard to me. It is a mortifying thing for innocence to be perpetually employed in supporting itself by proofs, and exaggerate its merit by praifes: a man who thinks he ought to owe his elevation to virtue alone, feels an honest shame at being obliged to fecure that elevation by methods lefs worthy; yet it is evident, on many occasions, that if virtue is not affisted by chance and industry, her own strength is not s fficient to protect her from the hatred, and even from the contempt of the public. So many repeated advices as I received, determined me at length to write a letter to the king. His majesty had not yet fixed, for any considerable time, in any of his palaces, but had confumed the months of January and February in journeys to Saint-Germain (where his children were) and Monceaux, staying but a short time at each place; and, on the 13th of March, the day on which my letter was dated, was at Chantilly. I shall not transcribe this letter here, as I have no crime to efface, nor no particular action to justify; it contained only general affurances of innocence, and arguments fimple indeed and unstudied, but which, on that very account, ought to have had the more weight.

I OBSERVED to his majefty, that, during twenty-two of the thirty-three years which I had been in his fervice, the favours I had received from him had been but very finall, although I had been at confiderable expences; yet fince that confideration, the lowness of my fortunes, and the prospect of a decent establishment elsewhere, which might have given some excuse for my abandoning him, could not prevail upon me to do so; it was not credible I should do so now, when I saw myself so generously rewarded, when my fortune could only encrease, and when

when so many favours, which I every year received from my king in a manner wholly obliging, attached me no less to his person, than my offices and employments. It was not probable therefore, I faid, that I should hazard the being deprived of one half of these advantages, by the hand which had heaped them on me, and of the rest by the reverses of fortune: that I defied all my enemies to charge me with the actual commission of any crimes of which I would not clear myself, in two words, whenever his majefty informed me of it; that all those accusations were no more than mere possibilities, upon which he was too wife and too just to condemn any person, under whatever colour of fupposition, probability, imputation, calumny, or even of praise, they might be prefented to him: but fetting all this aside, I entreated him not to conclude me guilty, but upon folid proofs: that I should wait without fear the efforts of my enemies, and submit, without repugnance, to all the rigour of the law, and all the effects of his anger, if the fmallest crime could be proved against me; being most certain that if, in the great number of employments with which I was invefted, he could charge me with the commission of any fault, it would not be where my honour or duty was concerned, but an effect of my ignorance or incapacity; in which case I was ready, at his least command, to refign all my offices into his hands, chufing rather the obscurity of a private life with his favour, than the splendor of the highest dignities with his hatred.

I was convinced, by the answer which his majesty sent me, that the informations I had received were not false; he addressed me in it with the title of cousin instead of friend: though short, it was not written with his own hand; a kind of circumspection and referve, which was not usual with him, ran through it, and not one word of consolation found a place: the king only observed to me coldly, and in few words, that it was my business to suffer the world to talk of me as it pleased, and continue to serve him well. I pretended, however, to be satisfied with this letter, and, after having done all that was necessary upon this occasion, conscious of my own innocence, I was persuaded that eagerness and precipitation did not become me; I therefore waited till his majesty was willing to enter into a discussion of the affair with me, and continued to act as usual.

The king, after flaying at Chantilly fix or feven days, quitted it to return to Paris, where his presence was necessary: he began to have a fondness for the former, from whence also he wrote to me, that he was Vol. II.

much better in health (as I should perceive by his countenance as soon as I saw him) that he eat and slept well there, never rising before seven o'clock, though he went to bed at ten or eleven. I expected, at least, that he would mention my letter to me when he returned to Paris, but I was mistaken; he took not the smallest notice of it, although he stayed there eight days, and four mornings successively conferred with me on many different affairs as we walked in the Tullieres: Villeroi and Sillery indeed were present. After giving us all the necessary orders, he set out for Fontainebleau, still keeping up the same reserve in all the letters he wrote me from thence, during the remainder of this month, as well upon general as private affairs.

IT was here, as I observed a little before, that they supplied all which was yet wanting to make his majesty resolve my ruin; and, as he staid there during the whole months of April and May, they had time fufficient to effect their purpose, and brought him to the point we have already feen. Calumny is like fire, which, the fiercer it burns, is extinguished the sooner, if no more fuel be added to it; and it is not so eafy to support it as some have imagined, especially with princes, who act on principle. If their imaginations be quick and lively, and their temper precipitate like Henry's, the passions once inslamed will, at first, carry them very far from their purpose, but never so far but that they may be brought back by reason: and from dispositions like these one will have violent fits of anger to fustain; but to make amends, there is neither obstinate prejudice, imperfect reconciliations, nor studied artifices to apprehend. It was this reason which induced me to wait, with more patience than I should otherways have done, for the issue of an affair so complicated and perplexed; and without altering my behaviour, either while I was at Paris, or in those short excursions I made from time to time to Fontainebleau, I appeared always the fame. My friends were not able to comprehend how I could enjoy a tranquillity which they were not capable of themselves, although so fully persuaded of my innocence, that all of them would have willingly become furcties for my conduct: they expressed great surprise at his majesty's behaviour to me, and could not keep filence at court, and probably in fecret taxed the prince with injustice. All the kind offices of fincere and affectionate relations I received from the family of Lorrain upon this occasion.

AT length my wishes and expectations were answered: the king finding that my enemies could bring no proofs of what they had advanced against me, he began to fear he had been a little too hasty: my 1605. past services rose to his remembrance; my present conduct, and the purport of my letter, dwelt upon his thoughts: he was ftruck with all this, and regreted that he had fuffered any expressions of anger to escape him, being convinced that nothing was more just and reasonable than the request I had made him, that he would not condemn me without proofs of my guilt. One day when I was at Fontainebleau, he fent La Varenne, D'Escures, and Beringhen, to me, on pretence of fome business, supposing I should tell them in confidence my difficulties and perplexity; however, I confined myself wholly to the business they came about, and avoided mentioning any other fubject. Villeroi and Sillery were fent to me afterwards for the fame purpose, which I was convinced of as foon as I found that they had nothing to fay to me, but on an affair of fo little consequence, that it was not worthy the trouble they gave themselves; this was about a dispatch from Ancel *. who managed the affairs of France at Vienna. I behaved to these gentlemen as I had done to the others: they had orders to advance, and draw from me, at any price whatever, a confession of my sentiments upon the treatment I received from his majesty. The reader will judge if they acquitted themselves faithfully of their commission, and like true mediators: they turned the conversation, from business, to the danger and difficulty of ferving princes, and the mortifications ministers are frequently exposed to, and the uneafiness which slander must give to a man of honour: they afterwards gave me to understand more plainly, that a minister was not defended from these inconveniences under the reigning king.

I saw clearly enough, that these two gentlemen, by talking in this manner, executed indeed the orders they had received, but with so much additional art on their side, as made it evident they were very solicitous to find some occasion of realising my supposed crime, when they made their report to his majesty. To adopt their sentiments had been insolence, and silence might have been construed into obstinacy and pride: I therefore replied, with great composure, that I did not doubt but that there were princes in the world such as they represented, but that his majesty was too just and too good, to treat, in that manner, such servants whose behaviour had been irreproachable, as for example I believed my own to be; that I was so well persuaded of this truth, that, although I should hear the contrary from his own mouth, 1605. yet I should still think his tongue but ill explained the meaning of his heart. These words were sufficient to disconcert these malicious commissioners; but they had recourse to other artifices to force from me fome expression of complaint or anger; and finding that they were not able to effect their purpose, they returned to tell his majesty not what I had faid, but that I had faid nothing at all, and that, contrary to my usual custom, I was so wrapt up in reserve, that I had not deigned to utter a fingle word. From hence it was easy to judge what these two gentlemen would have faid, if I had given them the least opportunity of entrapping me. During the remainder of this day, I faw only fuch meffengers as those; but was fully determined not to open myfelf, on this subject, to the king himself, unless he led to it first: and that he might see no alteration in my conduct, I prepared to set out the next morning for Paris, as the evening before I had told him I would.

> I WAITED on his majesty as usual, to receive his orders before I went away; I found him in his closet, surrounded by the courtiers who were come to his levee, and getting himfelf booted to go to the chace. At my entrance, he arose half up from his chair, one of his boots being already on, and pulling off his hat to me, bid me goodmorrow, ceremoniously calling me monsieur: all which discovered a mind either grieved or perplexed. His usual style to me was, My friend Rofny, or Grand master; but that confusion of mind he appeared to labour under, when, without feeming to know what he did, he struck the little ivory cylinders which he had in his hand one against the other. convinced me that I was not mistaken, when I concluded there was peither anger nor difgust in this behaviour. I had likewise made him a much more profound bow than usual; which, as he afterwards told me, moved him so much, that it was with difficulty he could restrain himself from throwing himself that instant upon my neck. He continued musing some moments longer, and then told Beringhen that it was not a good day for the chace, and that he would be unbooted. Beringhen, furprifed at this fudden change of his intentions, replied, a little imprudently, that it was a very fine day. ". It is not a fine day," replied Henry, with fome emotion, " I will not ride this morning, " take off my boots." That done, the king entered into a conversation, directing himself sometimes to one, sometimes to another, and chusing fuch subjects as he thought would afford me an opportunity of speaking: but observing I was still filent, he took Bellegarde by the hand; " M Le Grand, faid he, let us walk, I would talk with you a little, " that you may fet out to-day on your journey to Burgundy." They had had fome private business together, which related chiefly to some idle 1605. tales and quarrels of women.

WHEN they came to the door of the little stair-case which leads to the queen's garden, the king called L'Oferai, and, as he afterwards told me, bid him observe whether I followed him; and if I turned another way, not to fail to inform him immediately of it. I staid in the same place during the whole time that his majesty was talking to M. Le Grand, in the walk that leads to the garden of the Conciergerie; but I obferved that he often turned his eyes upon me. After Bellegarde had taken leave of the king, I advanced, and defired to know if his majefty had any orders for me. " And where are you going?" faid he. " To " Paris, fire, replied I, upon the bufiness you spoke to me of two days " fince." " Well, go then, replied the king, I still recommend to " you the care of my affairs, and defire that you should continue to " love me." I bowed low; he embraced me as usual, and I took the road to my own house; but scarce was I got to the distance of three hundred paces, when looking back I faw La-Varenne running after me, crying, Monsieur, the king would speak with you. His majesty, feeing me return, ftruck into the road which leads to the Kennel, and calling to me while I was yet at a distance, " Come hither, said he: " have you nothing to fay to me?" " No, fire, I replied, not at pre-" fent." " Well then, I have fomething to fay to you," answered he with precipitation; and taking my hand, led me into the grove of white mulberry-trees, and ordered two Swifs centinels, who did not understand French, to be placed at the entrance of the canals which surrounded the grove.

The king began by embracing me twice in a most affectionate manner, which the courtiers easily perceived, for we were within view, and they carefully watched all our gestures; then calling me friend, and refuming his former familiarity with me, he told me with a look and accent which went to my heart, that the coldness and reserve with which we had for a month past behaved towards each other, must needs be very painful to two persons who, for three and twenty years, had been accustomed to the most unlimited confidence, and that it was time to deprive those who were the cause of it of an occasion of triumph, which slattered too much their hatred of me, and the envy with which they beheld his and his kingdom's increasing prosperity. The heart of this good prince opening as he spoke to me, he added, that, earnestly desiring we should both forget what had happened, he thought it necessary to leave me ignorant of nothing that had passed on his fide, either with respect to the informations which had been given him againft me, the effects they had produced in his mind, and lastly, the words and actions by which he had made those unfavourable impressions public. He intreated, commanded, and made me promise to follow the example he was going to give me, to discover to him all the different emotions with which I had been agitated, and my sentiments both of the treatment I had received from him, and of the affair itself, with the same unreserved freedom he should use towards me; "That before we leave this place, said he, our minds may be wholly freed from doubts and suspicion, and both perfectly satisfied with each other; therefore as I shall open my whole heart freely to you, I must intreat you will not disguise yours from me." I gave him my word of honour that I would most faithfully obey this injunction.

THE king then began first, by naming all those persons who had endeavoured to injure me with him on that occasion, as well in effects as words, among which there were fome of all ranks and ages, and many who had ferved his majefty as long as myfelf; thefe I believe I may divide into feven classes; in the first I shall place the princes of the blood, and great officers of the crown; in the fecond, the king's mistresses, with their children, and such as either through the ties of blood or friendship supported their interests and served their passions. among these were Cœuvres, Fresnes, Forget, Puget, Placin, Vallon, and many more; the marchioness of Verneuil was at the head of all. The rage which animated these two classes against me was excited by my having retrenched their gratuities: the third was composed of the partisans of Spain, and the remains of the old leaguers, whose politics and principles of government could not agree with the king's or with mine; and this class was encreased by many members of the council, Villeroi. Sillery, Fresnes, Forget, and others, who acted in concert with the Iesuits: in the fourth I comprehend all the petit-maitres, court-favourites, and idle infignificant perfons, who load Paris with an ufeless weight; these were actuated by their resentment against me, for preventing his majesty from bestowing such favours on them as they expected, and for the opposition of my manner of living and conduct to theirs: the number of these is too great, and themselves too contemptible, to fully the paper with their names: the fifth was made up of the feditious and malecontents of France, whom the flourishing condition of the kingdom, the wife economy of Henry, and the preparations he was making, which rendered him too powerful, incited to confpire my ruin:

ruin: the financiers and other men of business made up the fixth, and 1605. they indeed had no reason to be much my friends.

THE seventh and last class was composed of another kind of courtflatterers, fomewhat inferior to those I have already mentioned; these were ever ready to give advice, and fought to make their court to the prince by continually furnishing him with new projects for raising money; men for the most part formerly in place, and to whom nothing more of their once shining fortune remained, than the detestable science of impoverishing the people; which for their own interest, and by an effect of a long habitude in guilt, they endeavoured to teach his majesty; but finding that this trade was become much less profitable to them, fince his majesty had confided to me the fole management of his finances, they practifed another art which discovered dispositions nearly the same; this was, to invent slanders, dress up detraction like truth, and be the venal instruments of those who either durst not or would not appear themselves in the satirical libels which filled the court; it was by them that these contemptible pieces were composed, spread abroad, and the truth of them maintained and propagated; the dangerous talent of raillery, and lively fallies of wit, opened them a way to the company and familiarity of Henry, who loved an eafy and fpirited conversation. Although he was perhaps upon his guard against their malignant strokes at me, yet he could not at length avoid being touched by them. Some of those whom at first he had despised or banished from his presence, found means afterwards to make themselves be heard. In this lift would be found none but names so obscure, that they do not deserve to be raked from the dust, such as Juvigny, Parafis, Le Maine, Beaufort, Berfot, Longuet, Chalange, Versenai, Santeny,&c. if Sancy, who merits the first place among them, had not completed his own dishonour by this vile trade, which helped to retard his ruin, when his folly and excess has left him no other resource. He was obliged to fell his jewels, and offered them to the king, who, because he was not willing they should go out of the kingdom, ordered me to purchase them *.

* M. de Sancy has had the misfortune to fee himfelf treated in the most cruel manner in all the writings of the Calvinists of that time, without having in any degree deserved it from them, otherwise than by having abjured their religion. Joseph Scaliger speaks of him as a fanatic, full of whimfies, &c. It would be doing him injustice, to read these accusations and injurious reflections, without having before one, at the same time, the apology of his conduct, written by himfelf; which may be seen in Villeroi's Memoirs, vol. III, pag. 127. He therein, among other things.

THE king, after recounting the names of the authors, gave me a detail of their artifices. All that the wit of man could devise, when animated by an eager defire to destroy, was practifed by them; whereever the king turned his steps, he faw nothing but informations, letters, libels, billets, and other papers of the fame kind, not to mention the political memorials with which they prefented him, under shew of zeal for the state, and affection for his person; these papers he found under his table, under the carpet of his chamber, and under his pillow; they caused them to be presented to him by persons unknown, they were given into his own hand in the form of petitions, and crammed into his fleeves and pockets. I was there painted in the most hateful colours, and the most injurious epithets were not spared, except when by the refinement of those treacherous praises which I have already mentioned, they exaggerated to his majesty my unwearied industry, my great abilities, the depth of my judgment, my manners, once rude and forbidding, now, as they faid, became gracious and obliging to all. Henry, with great fincerity, owned to me, that he was so imposed upon by these artifices, that he had almost entirely lost the good opinion he had once conceived of me; and that these wretches had contrived to fill him with fuch a defire of knowing all their inventions, that at the very time when he feemed fo weary of that infinite number of libels and informations, as to throw them afide without taking any notice of them; yet afterwards he could not refift the inclination he felt to collect them together, and cause them to be read to him.

It must necessarily be, that this prince was prejudiced in a strange manner, since he could not perceive that these writings were often no less injurious to himself than to me; as for example, when he read, that I made him mercenary and unjust to those that served him faithfully, to whom, under pretended compensation for old debts, he refused what they had a lawful claim to; they likewise imputed weakness and timidity to him, in writing to me on all these occasions, which certainly was not greatly to his honour, whether in him they made it an excuse for his avarice, or a mark of his dependance. It was by these infinuations they began at first; and while they went no farther, the king, who found only new occasions to praise my administration, was not prejudiced against me; but to put these critics to filence, he proves, in contradiction to what M. de Sully charges him with in this place, that by reaton of the expences he had been put to in the king's fervice, he was obliged to fell his jewels to the value of an hundred and fifty thousand crowns. only required fummaries of the state debts which I had discharged to shew them; and as for me, when I had an opportunity I severely reproved those persons for their too free censures, while, under a false pretence of being denied justice, they suffered expressions to escape them in their rage, with which his majesty had good reason to be offended. But they foon left these flight accusations for others of greater confequence.

HENRY, to excuse the credulity with which he had believed these flanders, would have me judge myfelf of the libels in which they were contained. But as it would have been a tedious task to read them all, he fixed upon one * which Juvigny had shewn him twelve days before, and which had been made public, because in this all the different calumnies which were scattered throughout many other libels had been collected, which made it as complete as a work of that kind could be: there was indeed fome little intricacy in it, but it was writ, however, with a fufficient force of style and judgment to perfuade his majesty that it proceeded from some other hand than Juvigny, whose powers it greatly exceeded. The king, taking this paper out of his pocket, told me, that by reading it I might possibly help him to find out the author, whose name he would be glad to know. I received it from his majefty's hands, and read it from beginning to end in his presence. The reader, if he pleases, may here see the substance of it. for it is not my intent to conceal any part of it.

THE author, whoever he was, began (and indeed no writing had ever more need of fuch a precaution) by endeavouring to clear himfelf of all fuspicion of envy or prejudice: the great qualities of Henry, the happiness which France enjoyed under his reign, the advantageous situation of his affairs, made a fecond preamble, very proper to captivate the good-will of this prince, and still more to lead naturally to the accusation he was to make against me, of having insolently boasted, that this happiness was my sole work; and from thence, with great art, introduced this reflection, that it was but too common for ministers of fuch abilities, and favourites with fo much power, to engage in de-

FROM thence the author proceeded, not to examine my actions. which alone could afford a just proof of his affertions, but to criticise my manners; and in the gracious reception I had lately given to all persons in general who came to my house, found an unanswerable proof of those pernicious designs; and added, that the number of persons, from the princes of the blood, down to the most inconsiderable of the people, which by this studied civility I had gained over to my interests, was almost incredible. He attempted to enumerate this crowd of partifans, which could not indeed but be very confiderable, fince all that this accusation was founded upon, was that complaisance and politeness of behaviour which in France it is the custom to treat every one with: the prince of Conti and the duke of Montpenfier were at the top of the lift, then the whole family of Lorrain; feveral French lords came next: my reconciliation with the duke of Epernon, because followed by a fincere and reciprocal friendship, was misreprefented under the name of an union formed by a boundless ambition. Messieurs de Montbazon, de Ventadour, de Fervaques, d'Ornano, de Saint-Geran, de Praslin, de Grammont, d' Aubeterre, de Montigny, de Schomberg, and others, were likewise mentioned as persons whom I attached to my interest by the distinction with which I treated them, the fervices I was perpetually doing them, and the distribution I made amongst them of part of his majesty's treasures, which I was so sparing of to all others.

ALL this not being fufficient to give probability to those views the author attributed to me, he added to it the correspondences I carried on without the kingdom. He mentioned an expression which sell from the king of England, and which might well be considered as a mere compliment, That the king of France was happy in having me, and made it an argument to prove, that I had violated the faith I owed to my prince; that not only his Britannic majesty, but likewise the statesgeneral of the United Provinces, the dukes of Wirtemberg and Deux-Ponts, the landgrave of Hesse, the prince of Anhalt, the marquisses of Anspach, Dourlach, and Baden, were ready to take my part blindly, and engage openly in my defence: the slightest service which any of them received frm me, was construed into a criminal intrigue. All the protessant bodies, whether French or foreigners, as well as the Helvetian senate, being gained by the regularity of their payments, and by largeffes from me, were faid to be absolutely devoted to my in- 1605.

AFTER having thus made the first essay with accusations which carried in them some little appearance of probability, the author became more hardy, and impudently hazarded others, the falfity of which appeared at the first view. According to him, I did not content myfelf any longer with my correspondences in foreign countries alone, but by fending his majesty's money into England, the Low Countries, Germany, and Swifferland, I was laying up for myself immense fums, in order to retire there one day, and, as opportunities offered, make levies of Swifs, German horfe, and Lanfquenets, to support the protestant religion, and, after the example of admiral Coligny, give up France to be preyed upon by these troops. The author, who doubtless was sensible that a minute detail of circumstances was generally confidered as a mark of truth and fincerity, particularized this event as if he was already a witness of it; he alledged, that by purchasing arms, iron, lead, brass, bullets, and other warlike stores, for his majesty's magazines, I had also private magazines of my own, in each of the strongest protestant cities, where I deposited those stores in my own name. Certainly these people would have had reason to congratulate themselves upon the success of these arts, if by this accusation they could have prevailed upon the king to discontinue his preparations. This admirable piece concluded with an exhortation to his majesty, to confide no longer to one person the management of his revenue, the use of his authority, and the administration of his affairs; but to affociate with me some persons who might keep a vigilant eye over my conduct.

While I was reading this memorial Henry observed me with great attention, but finding that I read it as I would have done any indifferent paper in which I was not the least concerned, without faying a single word, without betraying the least emotion, or even any change of colour; "Well, what do you think of it?" faid he. "What Is your opinion of it, sire? replied I, you that have read it more than once, and kept it so long in your hands; for my part, I am not somuch surfering production of foolish and wicked men, as to find that so great a king, possession of foolish and wicked men, as to find that so great who has known me for so many years, would have patience to read them himself, and hear me read them throughout in his presence,

" without at least shewing by his anger the violence he did himself in listening to such calumnies, and without ordering the authors to be fought for to punish them severely."

AFTER having thus spoken, I considered that the most effectual way to restore peace to the king's mind, and revive in him all his former fentiments of me, was to give a direct and particular answer to each of the accufations which my enemies brought against me; and this I had given him my word I would do. I confined myfelf therefore to Juvigny's libel, which I had still in my hands, that I might give a separate answer to each article. The rest of my enemies, who durst not attack me openly, for fear of being obliged to produce their proofs, merited only contempt: and it was with this observation that I began my answer. To the prefumptuous and injurious discourses of his majesty's government, which they attributed to me, I opposed those words I had so often in my mouth, in which I pointed out the king as a model for those princes who would be good and great to form themfelves by. The examples they produced of ministers who became traitors, and favourites ungrateful, could not affect the fidelity of a man who, like me, had laboured to perfect those great and amiable qualities he had derived from his illustrious ancestors. I defied them to produce a fingle person, whether a friend or kinsman, to whom I had given any gratuity without a fufficient reason, and a particular order from his majesty. Against the traiterous designs they imputed to me, of fomenting the civil wars, I appealed to Henry's knowledge of the affection I bore to my country, the attachment I ever had to his person, my solicitude for my own honour and reputation, and the opposition I had given on every occasion to the ill defigns of the protestants, which had drawn the whole weight of their refentment upon me.

Besides, what advantage could I promife myfelf from these chimerical schemes, which I did not at present possess in the greatest and most honourable station to which any subject could aspire? what could be my aim? To place the crown on my own head; my enemies themselves did not accuse me of such a frantic ambition; to carry it out of the royal family, altho' it were in my power to dispose of it, on whom could I fix my choice, but the prince to whom I had, during thirty years, confectated all my labours and my services, and for whose interests I had shed my blood, and devoted my life? Why, if I was the traitor they infinuated, did I still bend my whole cares to the increase of his glory, glory, by those noble designs which if I did not suggest, I was at least the fole confidant and promoter of? if I had views prejudicial to his crown, or dangerous to his person, why did I so earnestly seek to engage him in all those alliances with England, and the other powers of Europe? was not this acting directly against myself? is it by pursuing fuch measures as these, that ambitious and designing subjects have endeavoured to bring about revolutions, and to ruin the state? was it not rather by enervating the mind of their mafter, foothing his inclinations to luxury, indulging his paffions, prevailing on him to violate the laws, to neglect all order and government, and to throw every part of the state into confusion? whereas I was continually laying before his majesty the state of his affairs, informing him of the use and destination of his money, and carrying my folicitude for order and economy fo far, as to reproach him with even the smallest needless expence: I amassed him treasure, filled his magazines and arsenals, pointed out to him the means of rendering himself formidable to all Europe. It is not thus that rebellious subjects act, when they secretly undermine the foundations of their fovereign's power. The conduct of ministers is always equivocal in some part or other; however, I may truly say, that mine might stand the test of the strictest examination.

It was eafy for me to perceive that his majefty felt all the force of these arguments; I concluded them with imploring him, in the most fervent manner, to believe that I had neither concealed nor disguised from him any of the thoughts of my heart; I confirmed these affurances by the most facred oaths, which he knew I never uttered in vain; I addressed him by all those reverend and tender names which had, at all times, been the expressions of my zeal and attachment to his person. I would have embraced his knees, but he would not suffer it, lest those who beheld this posture might imagine I had recourse to it to obtain his pardon for a real crime: he told me, that he was fully convinced of my faith, that he sincerely repented of his credulity, and that he would never remember what was passed, but to impress upon his mind the obligation he was under to love me the better for it. This was the result of a conference which had been so necessary to restore quiet to us both.

Those who have any knowledge of a court, may eafily guess the emotions which agitated the hearts of the courtiers, during a conversation which lasted more than four hours, and with what attention our words and actions were observed; for though it was not possible for them to hear what we faid, yet they could not be ignorant of the fubject we were upon. The manner in which Henry had received me in the morning, his recalling me after I had left him, the precaution he had used at the beginning of our conversation, the papers he had taken with him, the earnest manner in which we seemed to discourse, was sufficient to inform them of the rest; each, according to his sears or hopes, expected the result of so important an explanation between us.

HENRY was willing to tell it them himself. After receiving the papers again from me, which he was refolved to throw into the fire, he went out of the grove of mulberry-trees holding me by the hand, and asked this crowd of courtiers who were got together, what it was o'clock; they answered it was one o'clock, and that he had been walking a long time. " I have fo," faid the prince, in an accent which spread a paleness on every cheek; " but there are some present who are more weary than I am: however, to confole them, I here de-" clare before you all, that Rofny is dearer to me than ever, and that " our friendship will continue till death; and you, my friend, pursued he, turning to me, " go home to dinner, and love me and ferve me, " for I am fully fatisfied with you." Many others in the fame fituation I was in, would have * made use of their returning favour and interest, to exact vengeance on those who had laboured thus to procure their differace; but I thank heaven that I have not the reproach to make myself, of having even entertained such a thought. I carefully concealed their names from my fecretaries, nor will I mention them here; I likewise suppress part of what the king said to me to their disadvantage: though they have acted in a quite contrary manner, yet it cannot alter my opinion, that this fort of revenge is unworthy of a generous mind.

THAT I might remove all cause of uneasiness from the king, concerning the affair which has led me into so particular an account of this great difference between us, I managed Grillon with such art, that he at length consented to take thirty thousand crowns of Crequy for his post, which, in respect to Lesdiguieres, his majety had permitted that nobleman to purchase +. This drew many acknowledgments to me guilty, condemned to death, and all his effects to be confifcated, but having made his efcape, he was hanged in effigy at Paris.

† Henry IV. though extremely diffatisfied with the duke of Epernon, who had from the father-in-law and the fon. Crequy came in person to make me these compliments, and added to them repeated affurances of gratitude and affection: Less diguieres wrote to me from Grenoble, and expersive himself in terms still stronger than Crequy had done. As we were before connected by alliances between our families, this last service they had received from me, made every one expect to see us for the future intimate friends; however, there was not any person by whom I was so easily abandoned, or received so many bad offices from, after the death of Henry, as from these two men: gratitude is not a virtue to be found amongst courtiers.

The heart of Henry being once tainted with sufficions to my prejudice, it was not impossible but that the wound might again be opened. It was this hope, that supported my enemies amidst the mortifications and grief they suffered from the adventure at Fontainebleau. It was not long before they again returned to the charge, and (it is with regret I say it) were almost as successful as before *: the affair, however, did not become as public as the former had been, because it was sooner followed by an explanation, and it is needless to repeat it here. If my enemies from time to time enjoyed the pleasure of believing that I should fink under their efforts, yet they were soon undeceived, and those ineffectual attempts but increased their shame and rage; and had I been of a disposition to enjoy such victories, this last, being not less complete than the other, would have afforded me sufficient matter for triumph: it was likewise at Fontainebleau, that the king and I came to an expla-

retired to Angoulême, and made great complaints of the injuffice he pretended the king had done him on this occasion, yet infitted that M. de Crequy should wait on him as his colonel, at the distance of a hundred leagues from Paris, to take the oaths before him, get his commission allowed by him, and receive his orders for being invested in his post. The duke of Epernon made him dance attendance after him for several days, and suffered him to wait a whole day at the door of his chamber. History of the duke of Epernon, p. 212.

manner, that he always referved a fufficient authority over him; and who

" him to the hatred of many, against whom " he was very able to protect him, in order " to keep him under apprehensions of what " might be the effects of his failing in his " duty." This passage in our Memoirs feems, at first fight, to offer something in favour of this conjecture: the opinion of those nevertheless, who think there was no artifice in the fuspicions Henry IV. conceived against the duke of Sully, appears to nie better founded; but whether his fufpicions were feigned or real, I also think, as many other persons of sense do, that they ought to be reckoned among that prince's defects. According to the first supposition, a low cunning unbecoming the character of fo great a king is apparent; and according to the fecond, a piece of injustice, for which the first movements of a hasty passion would be no excuse, there being a kind of nation nation of this fecond difference; and the morning afterwards the king fent for me very early. As foon as I entered his chamber he took my hand, and led me towards a cross-barred window which looked into the queen's garden, having somewhat to impart to me in private; but as we passed, he said aloud, in the presence of the whole court, "You cannot conceive, my friend, how easily and happily I have slept this "night, after having opened my heart to you, and had all my doubts cleared up." He then asked me, if I did not feel the same calm satisfaction; I replied that I did, and that he should always find in me the same fidelity and affection.

In the midst of a favour so often interrupted by little jealousses and heats, what convinced me that the heart of Henry always leaned towards me was, that however disflatisfied my enemies might sometimes by their infinuations make him with me, yet it never interrupted the course of those benefits with which it was his constant custom to load me and my family. I had proofs of his beneficence with respect to my eldest daughter, amidst those very storms I have mentioned *. I had engaged my word to Fervaques, to give her to the young Laval, whom his majesty, as I have formerly observed, ordered me to prefer to the duke of Rohan; and the affair was upon the point of being concluded. One day, about the beginning of this year, when I was walking with the king upon the terrace belonging to the Capuchins, he again introduced this subject, and told me his reasons for desiring me to reject the duke of Rohan, which were, that the marriage of this lord with my agreement between this prince and his minifter, that the first should overlook, in the character of the other, that firmness and inflexibility of temper, incapable of a base submission and statery, in consideration of a fidelity established on such numberless proofs. This is a sufficient evidence, that the performance of the most important services will not dispense a man from a flexibility to, and compliance with, the humour of princes, even the most perfect.

* Margaret de Bethune. This lady, to be revenged on her only daughter, who, against her will, had married Henry de Chabot, in the year 1645 set up a boy about fifteen years old, as being really her fon by the duke of Rohan who died seven years before. "Many persons of credit, " fays Amelot, who have feen Tancred (the name of this pretended heir to the house of Rohan) have assured me, that "he had the topping of the Rohan family, which is a small tust of hair on the forehead, and that the features of his face

"were remarkably like thofe of his fupposed father." To this anecdote we may add another, by which it is pretended that the duke of Rohan had a mind to purchase the kingdom of Cyprus of the Grand Seignor for this child: it was also faid, that his father and mother had kept him concealed only that they might marry their daughter to the count of Soissons, and afterwards to the duke of Weimar. See daughter had been proposed by the princess Catharine to the duchess of Rohan, and accepted by my wife, without acquainting him with it; and likewise because monsieur and madam de Fervaques had so earnestly folicited his interest in favour of Laval, that he had promised them to give him to me for a fon-in-law, rather than the duke of Rohan, who was not fo rich indeed, but had the honour to be fo nearly related to him. that, if he died without children, as the princess his fifter had done, the duke of Rohan would fucceed to his kingdom of Navarre, and the other estates of the families of Albert, Foix, and Armagnac: he then added, that, for other reasons which he would acquaint me with, he had again altered his opinion, and that it was his intention I should break with the family of Fervagues as decently as I could. Having already prepared them for this change of my refolution, he defired me to withdraw the contracts and articles which had been agreed upon between us, in fuch a manner, that the breaking off the match should appear entirely my own act, and that they might not have any room to fay they had refused an alliance with me. He added, that he would himself bring the duke of Rohan to pay his compliments, with the duchefs his mother, and expected that I would receive him as one who was to be my fon-in-law within three days, having already fettled every thing relating to the marriage himself; that he would have the contract drawn up in his presence, and would sign it as the kinsman of both parties.

I THANKED his majefly for the interest he took in my family, and the honour he conferred upon me. The affair was managed as he had directed; the king gave the bridegroom ten thousand crowns for the wedding cloaths and expences, and a like sum to my daughter. The year before, I had married mademoifelle Du-Marais, my wife's daughter by her first husband, to La-Boulaye, the son of him whom Henry had loved so much: she had no reason to expect any other gratuity from his majesty, than that which is generally given to all the queen's maids of honour, under the title of a present for the nuptial robe, and had been settled at two thousand crowns: the king raised it to five thousand in savour of my daughter-in-law; but that it might not be made a precedent for others, he ordered me to carry it to account.

It was usual with his majesty, after he had cleared the accounts of his expences in fortifications and buildings, to say to me, in the presence of the officers employed in those works, who attended to know his pleasure concerning farther improvements in them, "Well, you Vot. II.

Hhh

160c. " fee my fortifications and buildings are refolved upon, what have you of done to your houses?" To which, when I replied, as I seldom failed to do, that I could do nothing to them for want of money; he would answer, "Well, shew me your plans, that I may know what you " would do if you had money." And after examining them, and telling me what he thought it would be necessary to alter, he added, that he would give me twenty thousand livres to enable me to make those alterations he pointed out to me.

> However, I fometimes requested favours of him which he refused to grant, and I shall not have the vanity to conceal it: he would not give the post which had formerly been the baron de Lux's to my brother, or to La-Curée, for either of whom I requested it; telling me, that for Bethune, he defigned a post in Brittany which would suit him better; and that as for La-Curée, he did not think that employment compatible with the post of lieutenant of a company of light-horse, and the government of Chinon, which he already possessed. The truth was, he chose to give it to Ragny, who could do him greater service in the province. I asked two other favours of him in the same letter, the one for my nephew de Melun, and the other for La-Boulaye: he told me, that La-Boulaye had not yet, by his fervices, merited fuch an instance of his bounty, but he granted the other, which was, the abbey of Moreilles in Poitou, lately become vacant. I received another refusal from him, if it may be called so, in which my sonin-law the duke of Rohan was concerned: the occasion of it was this.

> THE duke of Rohan was governor of Saint-John d'Angely, of which place Des Ageaux was the king's lieutenant: it was not the governor, to whom in juffice it belonged, that named this lieutenant, but his maiefty, who thought it necessary, for the good of his service, to deprive the governor of this privilege, that the lieutenant, who, in troublesome times, had hitherto always played an important part in affairs, might in fome degree be independent of the governor, and in a condition to render his power ineffectual, if he should not use it to the king's satisfaction, and for the advantage of the state. The lieutenant therefore was, in reality, possessed of the whole authority, and the governor had only an empty title. The duke of Rohan, who earnestly wished to have this prerogative restored to the governor, entreated me to solicit the king for that purpole, a favourable opportunity offering itself by the fickness of Des Ageaux, who, it was thought, would never recover. What ever inclination I had to do my fon-in-law this fervice, I durft not 1605. make the proposal to the king directly, the request having too much conformity with that flate of dependence into which my enemies had infinuated I fought to place all the * protestant cities: nothing more would have been wanting to renew all his fuspicions. I resolved therefore to found him first upon the subject, which I did very artfully, taking occasion, upon the news of Des Ageaux's sickness, to ask his majesty whom he had thought of to supply his place if he died: it was by letters that I made this attempt; but I would go no further till I had received his majesty's answer. The king, in his answer, told me, that he did not intend to renounce his right of naming the lieutenant or Saint-John, because it would not always be the duke of Rohan, nor my fon-in-law, who would be governor of that place. I mentioned Poufou, the mayor of that city, to him, whom he continued in that office upon the character I gave of him. Des Ageaux recovering of his fickness, no farther steps were taken in the affair.

Before I quit this article of marriage, I shall take notice of what happened at court, with regard to mademoifelle de Melun thy niece, whom they thought likewise of marrying at that time, as her fortune was extremely large, the marchiones de Roubais my aunt having made her her sole heir. The family of D'Estrées cast their eyes on her for a wife to De Cœuvres +; they thought themselves sure of the king's interest; and the affair was proposed to him by M. de Vendome himself, to whom the king promised that he would speak to me of it before he lest Chantilly. He recollected the affair when he was at Louvreen-Parisis, where they went to dine, and wrote to me concerning it in terms which shewed how earnestly he desired the marriage might be concluded.

I WROTE to the young lady's relations, who were all Flemmings; but the answer they gave me being such as I neither ought nor could repeat to my sovereign, I sent him none at all; and when at his return he asked me the reason, I only told him, that mademoiselle de Melun's relations did not approve of the proposed alliance. The king of upposing that it was myself who answered for them, and that I had not wrote to them about the affair, I was obliged to shew him the letters I had received from the marchioness de Roubais, the prince and princess de Ligne, the princess d'Epinoy, the countess de Barlemont, and the counts de Fontenay, and de Buquoy, who had all written to me upon the same subject. Henry, in these letters, finding, what I would not tell him, that notwithstanding the honours he had conferred on the house of D'Estrées, they thought it beneath their alliance *, "I see," faid this prince with some resentment, "that fince we have to do with all these proud Flemmish sools, we must think no more of it." Accordingly the affair went no farther, his majesty being resolved not to meddle in it any more.

HE uneasiness I suffered from the king's relapse into doubts and suspicions of my conduct encroached upon part of that time I used to devote entirely to the administration of the finances; but it never lessened my attention to the duties of my several employments. I laboured this year to prove the alienations and ufurpations that had been made upon the crown lands, and to clear exactly all the pensions upon the tailles, gabelles, decimes, aides, and other parts of the revenue; as well as all the debts contracted either by the king, or by the cities, counties, and communities. Upon calculating these sums, I found that the alienations, pensions, and debts, from the time they were first settled and contracted to the present year, had cost the kingdom above an hundred and fifty millions *.

It is still more extraordinary, that all the money arising from those taxes with which the state was overburdened, and in appearance no advantages gained by them, had for the most part been either usurped by those persons who were at first employed in the verification of them. or divided, fold, and alienated by them to others. The king would not believe-this; but I made it plain, by means of two papers which fell into my hands; the first was, a list of those persons who had been concerned in the farm of the falt, during the leafe of Champigny and Noel de Here: the number amounted to twenty, from Paris, the court, and even the council, and each had from fifty thousand livres to one hundred and fifty thousand crowns a-piece, the whole amounting to nine millions feven hundred thirty-eight thousand livres : the other paper, dated October 27, 1585, is an agreement between the superintendant D'O and those who farmed the salt, for a fifth part: D'O prevailed upon Antony Faschon, a notary, to be security for that whole fum to the farmers before mentioned.

By the same practices his majesty was defrauded of almost all the revenue arising from the aids and parties casualles. Gondy had prevailed with Incarville, and the other members of the council with whom he shared, to have that money assigned to him, for the payment of some debts which he pretended were due to him from the king. Difficult as it was to find out these frauds and connivances, I made such strict enquiries, that I discovered three millions that were to come to the treafury. As it was merely with a view to relieve the people, that I thus from time to time stripped the usurpers of money that did not belong to them, in proportion to my discoveries, I made very considerable abatements in the king's name upon the taille, that perpetual source of abuses and vexations of all kinds, as well in the affessment as collection: it is greatly to be wished, though hardly to be hoped for, that one day or other the fund of this part of the king's revenue may be wholly changed *.

* These abuses and vexations are so flagrant and apparent, that our kings and their ministers have frequently attempted to find some remedy for them, by entirely changing the form of this branch of the revenue of France; but the difficulties the author speaks of have always intervened, and rendered their endeavours fruitles. However, one attempt has been made in our days, which feemed to promife a more happy fucces, though hitherto its progress has not been very rapid: I will take the liberty of explaining the nature of it here.

An unhappy prejudice prevails in this kingdom, and I believe in all monarchical governments, which we cannot be too folicitous to defiroy; for the minds of the people being thereby kept in a perpetual

I PLACE the gabelle after the taille. I never thought any thing 1605. more capricious and tyrannical, than to oblige a private man to buy up more falt than he is willing or able to use, and then hinder him to fell the overplus. I once expressed my fentiments of this practice state of distrust of every thing undertaken by their fovereign. From this diffidence alone great part of the fame mischievous effects arife, which an absolute disobedience could produce. The prejudice I mean is, that the good of the people is never the motive of the actions of kings; but that, on the contrary, no changes are made in their fituation, but fuch as tend to render them more miserable.

It is impossible but fo considerable a change as is proposed to be made in the taille, must, from its own nature, be subject to great difficulties. Now I apprehend it will not be fufficient that these difficulties have been overcome in the minds of the few who have formed and perfected this scheme, but they must also be cleared up to those whom it is necessary to employ in the execution of it; for the manner of executing a work of this nature is in no degree analogous to that in which a building may be erected: the latter being effected by the mere mechanical co-operation of the hands of the workmen with the defign of the architect; whereas to carry on and complete the former, it is absolutely necessary that the nature of it should be as clearly conceived by those who are to put it in execution, as by those who formed the plan. But two things fland in opposition to this, which it will become necessary to remove, the one by the means of information, the other by punishment; these are, the want of knowledge, and the want of diligence in the fubaltern officers; the latter making them difobey the orders of their superiors, and the former, though their intention be ever fo good, occasioning them to execute every thing wrong.

This reason alone would be sufficient to prove, that what relates to the general receipt of the taille proportionelle, ought not to be entrufted to the affellors and other officers of the intendants of the finances; I dare not fay, to the intendants themselves, and those acting in immediate subordination to them, who are generally taben by them at random, out of the offices of the police, or the revenue; and who having other bufiness of their own, cannot spare the time necessary for the other: but as artificers are fent for from the metropolis, when any . work is to be performed exceeding the capacity of common workmen; fo the council ought to chuse and appoint, for the management of the general receipts, commiffioners of integrity and capacity, fufficiently authorifed, and perfectly instructed in the nature of their bufiness, and who should be allowed all the time and expences that are requifite. If they are too much hurried, part of the remarks necessary for them to make on the different particulars of the business of the provinces will escape their observation; and if their falaries are ill paid, or not to be received by them without difficulties, necessity may induce them to betray their trust. This important work certainly demands all possible attention.

When one confiders how powerful an influence the bonds of parentage, friendfhip, fociety, or even mere neighbourhood, have on mankind; how strongly they are affected by different interests, as well perfonal as focial; the fear of displeasing, the defire of obliging, the ambition of being honoured and careffed by their countrymen, the dependance on a superior, who, according to his caprice, can make his dependant fensible of his superiority, by depriving him of his office, or by unjust reprimands; and the innumerable other motives which tie up a man's hands in the midft of his family and countrymen; a thousand reasons will appear against employing the ordinary officers in the business of the new taille. This affertion is confirmed by the tellunony of 1605.

freely to the king, who defired me to give him a circumstantial memoir upon it; as for example, the prime cost of the salt at the salt-pits, of the expences till it was fold, of its distribution into granaries, and other questions relating to it: his majesty did not tell me what use he intended to make of this memoir. I drew it up with the usmost expedition, and as near the truth as I was able; for, on account of the reasons I there gave, it was hardly possible to fix the true value of things. However, this memorial produced no consequences, every thing remained in the same state as before; which shews how difficult it is to reform abuses, which the ignorance, precipitancy, and short-sightedness of those antients who are proposed to us as infallible guides, have introduced into the first regulations, even when other imposts, far more reasonable, such as the tithes and entries, seem both to point out the way, and make it easy *.

feveral persons, who having with great application considered what were the designs of the council, in constituting this kind of operation, and afterwards kept a watchful eye on the manner in which it daily appears to be executed by the officers in their several districts, have with great concern found, that, out of fifty of these officers, there is perhaps not one whose manner of executing his business does not render the new method more adious than the old.

These motives and these difficulties, a perfect knowledge of M. de Vauban's plan, the fmall difficulty there was in establishing it when trial was made of it, the happiness those few parishes still continue to enjoy which have found the means of preferving it amongst them, the experience every day furnishes that the dixieme (which in its own nature is but a species of the dixme) has every possible advantage over the taille and other impositions; all these, I say, must convince every judicious man, that it will he found absolutely necessary to recur to the establishment of the royal dixme, as being of all methods the most simple, the least expensive, and the least burdensome to the people; and that when it was proposed by this able and virtuous patriot, it was not received with all the regard it merited. The maxim, that enabling the people to live at their eafe will endanger their revolting, is as false as it is cruel. It most certainly is also the interest of the people, if well understood, that the king should be perfectly acquainted with the true value of what they possess, and consequently the real strength of his kingdom; that, without regard to exemptions or any unjust privileges, all his majesty's subjects should be equally taxed; and that commerce and industry should meet with all possible encouragement. As to any further reflections which may be made on this matter, we will refer to that excellent work itself, composed by M. Vauban, and intituled, Dixme Royale, &c.

* It is well known what is the net produce to the king of the gabelle, or falt duty, after all expences paid; and it is not, confequently, difficult to discover, to what those expences amount on each minot of falt. Why should not the king at once take the price of each minot of falt on the first fale, and at the falt pits themselves? Why should not the same be done in the case of the aids? This question, simple as it is, has been asked long ago. The cardinal of Richelicu, in this respect, following the opinion of his predeceffor in the ministry, Test. Politique, part II. ch. ix. § 7. Perefixe, the author of the Essay on Commerce, ch. v. and many other able politicians after him, unanimously pronounce sentence against an impost like this, not only burdenfome from the manner in which it is

The debts contracted by the provinces, town-houses, and corporations, were not less troublesome to the king than his own: I was continually soliciting him to call on me to review and settle them, in the same manner as I had done the others; I prevailed at last, and his majesty less me the choice of what measures I thought most likely to attain this end. The commissioners I named for this purpose were selected from among those persons, whom I knew to be most faithful, and capable of the greatest application to business, in the sovereign courts, among the masters of requests, the treasurers of France, and other officers; but as this work could not go on see expeditionsly as the former, I shall defer giving an account of it till I come to relate the effects it produced.

And here a reflection occurs to me, not more common than just, which is, that regularity and economy must certainly have infinite refources; for notwithstanding the ordinary expences of the state, and the extraordinary ones his majefty was at in his kingdom; notwithstanding that three or four millions were sent every year out of the kingdon to be distributed in foreign countries; notwithstanding the ruinous and exhausted condition in which the king at his accession to the throne, found France, his finances, and his treasury, and many more difficulties almost insurmountable; yet the government had already an appearance of opulence and strength, which banished all remembrance of its former indigence. Could it be possible for any person to imagine ten years before, that in 1605, the king would find himfelf as rich as he really was; if they reflected, that the fums which were demanded of him when he was acknowledged peaceable poffesfor of the crown, and those that were owing from his exchequer, with all the interest and arrears, did not amount to less than three hundred and thirty millions; and that all which could be paid of this enormous fum, fuch as the mere debts, should really be done; and such measures taken with regard to the pensions and affignments, that they should be regu-levied, but becoming fill more unjuft, from the unequal manner in which it is affeffed. It is true, they perceive great difficulties in altering it; but this alteration being once made, one of the principal fources of the eafe, and at the fame time of the opulence, of the nation, would be opened thereby. The cardinal de Richlieu, who thus speaks of it, adds, that he had found, from the most knowing amongst the superintendants of the sinances, that the produce of the duty on falt, if levied at the pits, would be equal to what the king of Spain receives from the Indies. See also on this subject the Dixime Royale of M, de Vauban.

1605. larly paid, without exhausting the treasury, or incurring the least inconvenience? Yet all this was actually effected. And probably the reader has not yet found any thing in these Memoirs so interesting as the following account in gross, of the particular sums which made up the whole.

THERE was due to queen Elizabeth at the time of her demise, for ready money lent to Henry in his necessities, advanced by her to the German troops and the army fent into Bretany, as well as for all the other fums, to which the maintenance of those supplies that Henry was furnished with by the English, amounted; consisting of men, vessels, and provisions, for the siege of Dieppe, and that of Rouen, and during the war with the league; the fum of feven millions three hundred and feventy-eight thousand and eight hundred livres: To the Swifs Cantons, for their fervices and their pensions, comprehending the interest due upon them; thirty-five millions eight hundred twenty-three thousand four hundred and feventy-feven livres and fix fols: To the States-General, for money lent for pay, due to their troops, and for the furnishing vessels, powder, provision, ammunition, &c. during the league likewise; nine millions two hundred seventy-five thousand four hundred livres: To feveral French noblemen, colonels, and other officers, for fervice, pay, penfions, falaries, &c. during the civil wars; fix millions five hundred and forty-feven thousand livres: To the farmers of every part of the revenue; to princes, cities, coorporations, and private persons; comprehending the falaries, appointments, and penfions of the officers of the king's houshold, of the police, and the finances, and the civil magistrates, by fettled accounts, twenty-eight millions four hundred and fifty thoufand three hundred and fixty livres: To feveral private persons, according to their bills, referiptions, receipts of the treasury, warrants, acquittals, patents, &c. almost all in the reign of Henry III. twelve millions two hundred and thirty-fix thousand livres: Mortgages of the crown lands, compositions of pensions, where the principal being exorbitant was moderated by the creditors themselves, or deducted by his majesty: one hundred and fifty millions: Treaties made at the abolition of the league, which have been calculated already, thirty-three millions one hundred and fifty thousand nine hundred and twenty-four livres *.

as in the fum total; but this is of small moment.

* There is a miscomputation of about a million, in the Old Memoirs, as well in the account of the contracts of the league,

IT is certain, as I have already observed, that upon the examination 1605. of these different demands upon the exchequer, many that were found to be unjust were totally annulled; others were compounded for with the creditors, and others were got clear of by feveral expedients, fuch as those upon the taxes, and the crown lands; but it may be easily imagined, that there remained a very confiderable number of debts to be discharged: and here I must anticipate my story, for the sake of obferving that good examples are not always efficacious. After Henry's death, those that were placed at the head of affairs, began their administration by destroying part of that economy, and abolishing many of those regulations, which he had established: this conduct, while it wore an appearance, and only an appearance of lenity and compassion, gave me reason to apprehend, that under the new reign, the national debt would be increased rather than lessened. But to quit this subject for the present, I shall content myself with barely mentioning here, as an eternal monument of Henry's glory, the flourishing condition into which the wisdom of his government had already brought France; both foreign and domestic payments were regularly made, and no hardship was sustained by any of his subjects, either from those payments, or the expences of the current year, though the king still continued to lay out very large sums in rebuilding, furnishing, and adorning his palaces; repairing the old fortifications, and raifing new ones; erecting public buildings *; re-edifying churches, hospitals, and convents; in funds for repairing pavements, moles, and bridges; in building a great number of gallies upon the Mediterranean;

* Henry the Great caused the chapel of Fontainebleau to be painted and gilt, cut avenues through the forest, and in many other respects decorated this royal palace: he finished the Pontneuf, built the square and street Dauphin, repaired many streets in Paris, built wharfs, &c. Besides what is faid in these Memoirs, see the detail of all those buildings, in the Mercure François, anno 1610, p. 404, Le Grain's Decade, b. viii. Morizot. chap. 46, and others who have written descriptions, or the history, of the antiquities of Paris, &c. No one is ignorant that this great prince, through the representations of the duke of Sully, repaired the highways in almost every quarter of the kingdom; built many caufeways and bridges in places before impaffable, efpecially in Berry, which might vie, in point of beauty, with the works of the Romans ; but which, for want of being kept in order for a hundred and thirty years past, are at present in a very indifferent state: that, by his order, elms and other trees were planted along the fides of these roads, some of which are still growing in different places, where they are called Rosnys: there are many ordinances made by this king on this fubject, and fome others, by which the converting arable land into pasture is forbidden, and vineyards are ordered to be stubbed up. These buildings and works, and this application to render his kingdom flourishing, contributed, perhaps as much as his military exploits, to procure Henry IV. the title of Great, which was conferred on him in his lifetime, and, as it appears, about the year 1602.

in filling his magazines and arfenals; redeeming the jewels of the crown, and purchasing more; and after all this, there still remained, at the end of the year, a considerable sum to deposit in the Bassile*.

Bur what is still more valuable than all these treasures, Henry acquired them not only without increasing the people's poverty, but even dightened the weight of their former burthen, as has been shewn in these Memoirs. He always regretted that the present situation of affairs would not permit him to carry this tenderness for his subjects farther; if the enemies of his government will not confess this truth, if in their writings they have afferted the contrary, yet it is abfolutely certain, that plenty and affluence began now to be perceived over the whole kingdom; the nobility and foldiery were delivered from their tyrants in the revenue; the peafant fowed and reaped in full fecurity +; the artist enriched himself by his profession; the meanest tradesman rejoiced in his profits; and the nobleman himfelf improved his estates. Some examples of severity, which his majesty had been obliged to make, were so far from disturbing the tranquility of the kingdom, that it was never more fully established, nor never more sincerely enjoyed; the licentiousness which had been corrected in the army, procured the people a real advantage, without doing any prejudice to the officer and foldier, who were paid with the utmost exactness, rewarded in proportion to their fervices, and esteemed, honoured, and caressed, as their merits and valour deferved. The medals which I prefented as usual to his majesty, had a lilly shooting out a bud on each fide, pointing to two stars which represented the polar stars, with these words, Hi fines. It is by actions like thefe, that a king may afpire to the glory of having accomplished this motto.

I SHALL not repeat here what I have faid before, concerning the letters I received from Henry; I had so many this year, and on all forts of subjects, the finances, trade, policy, that I shall not attempt to produce

them:

* The fhare the duke of Sully had in all thefe things, gave him a juft claim to the following fingular elogium in the Mercure François, anno 1606, p. 101. "As he caccuted thefe offices and employments in a manner more for the benefit and emolument of the crown of France than and any of his predeceffors; all true Frenchmen readily acknowledged his merit in this refpect, as well in the lifetime of this majefly, as fince his death; and

&quot; of those who envied him, it must nevertheless be allowed, that he was the Jofeph both of our king and of France."

† The affection this good prince bore to his people, appears from this faying of his, which has been preferved as a kind of tradition, That he would make the poorest peasant in his dominions able to eat flesh all the week long, and to put a fowl in his pot besides on Sundays.

them: feveral of them contained orders for presents to different persons; 1605. thirty thousand livres to the queen for her new-year's gift; nine thoufand livres to the counters of Moret *; fifteen hundred livres to the queen's bed-chamber women; and a like fum to be distributed by madame de Montglat, among the nurses of the king's children upon different occasions; four thousand to the family of the commandeur de Chastes; twelve hundred livres to Praslin; a like sum to Merens; three thousand livres to the count de Saint-Aignan, to indenmify him for the money he had expended on his father-in-law Montigny's company; two thousand four hundred livres to several pensioners in Burgundy, paid them by Hector Le-Breton his commissioner in that province; a pension of four thousand livres, to + Lognac, a protestant captain, in reward for his fervices; forty thousand livres, which his majesty thought a just restitution to Villars, saying, that this family had loft above fix thousand livres of interest, fince this sum became due to them; five hundred livres to the duke of Ventadour, who had advanced them for small expences, to shew, faid Henry, that no one loses any thing by ferving me; the fieur de Canify received a like reimburfement; feventeen thousand one hundred and thirty eight livres to La-· Livre his apothecary: his majesty had been indebted to this man, ever fince the year 1592, and was partly the cause of his ruin; for his creditors arrested him, and threw him into prison, but the king indemnified him for all; nine thousand five hundred and forty-one livres to John Sellier, a merchant of the city of Troyes, who made his demand upon his majesty for a certain public building.

In this fummary of expences, I do not include the hundred and fifty thousand livres given to the count of Soissons, of the edict of Greffes, * Jacqueline Du-Beuil. The king, towards the end of the preceding year, had created her counters of Moret, the having revived the passion of love in his heart, which had, in a manner died with his marchioness: he had also married her to a gen-tleman called Chanvalon. In L'Etoil's journal there are fome anecdotes relating to this matter, but they are too licentious for us to repear, anno 1604. Mademoifelle Du-Beuil or De Beuil, is reprefented in the writings of that time, as a lady who was not on an equal footing with mademoifelle d'Entragues in point of beauty, but in recompence for this defect, her look expressed wit and penetration, her temper was extremely gay, and her conversation full of fprightliness, which qualifications Henry IV. greatly admired. The queen did not appear to take the same umbrage at this lady. or to have that aversion to her, as she shewed against the marchioness de Verneuil.

† This is not the person whom Henry III. employed to flab the duke of Guife, at the holding of the states at Blois. Having requested that prince to bestow a government on him as a recompence for the fervice he had done him, and his request being refused, he retired in discontent to Guienne, where very foon after he was piftolled by a gentleman in his neighbourhood, with whom he had a quarrel. and of another edict, creating a small tax upon salt in favour of the duke of Maïenne, nor of many other gratuities and just payments; Zamet obtained of his majesty, the two offices of receivers at Rouen for two thousand crowns each; Henry caused the forest of L'Aigle to be divided by law, between him and the constable; but to prevent any dispute, he purchased the other part, and settled himself the time for cutting down the trees; he referred to his council, the offer that had been made him of twelve hundred thousand livres for the grant of an edict concerning the four deniers; he sent Nargonne, with his company, to guard the tower of Bouc, which he thought a place of great importance: but the duke of Mercœur, to whom this fortress belonged, raised some difficulties, which determined his majesty to treat with him for it, either by way of exchange, or by purchasing it.

GREAT part of the letters I received from this prince, turned upon his buildings, those of his new filk manufactures * especially, which he still carried on with the same ardour; his green-house in the Tuileries, was the place he fet apart for breeding the filk worms, the eggs having been fent him from Spain, and he hastened the building of it for that purpose. I laid, by his order, the foundations of the new edifices for his tapestry weavers, in the horse-market, which, requiring a larger extent of ground than could be procured, without encroaching a little upon a garden belonging to Montmagny, who opposed it strongly, the king ordered that he should be paid the sum he demanded for his ground, representing to him, however, that when the public utility was in question, an individual ought, on such occasions, to wave the confideration of his own particular interest. His majesty fent for Comans and La Planche, from other countries, and gave them the care and superintendance of these manufactures: the new directors were not long before they made complaints, and disliked their situation, either because they did not find the profits equal to their hopes and expectations, or, that having advanced confiderable fums themselves, they faw no great probability of getting them in again. The king got rid of their importunity by referring them to me, commanding me to act in fuch a manner by them that they should suffer no loss, but likewise that their gains should not be too considerable.

glass plates, and exact imitations of pearls, and many other manufactures, which the celebrated M. Colbert has fince carried to to great perfection, were then set on soot.

* It appears also from the writings of that time, that a manufacturer of Provence called Serrani, attempted to make fluffs of the finest parts of the bark of mulberrytrees: that the making of glass, looking-

THE attention of this prince in conciliating the good will of the neighbouring powers who might possibly engage in his great designs, appeared likewise in his letters, as well as in his whole conduct. Whether we consider his extreme folicitude to fulfil all the laws of civility, and all the forms of ceremony, the obliging manner in which he treated their ambaffadors and envoys, the feafonable prefents he made them, or what is a benefit still more considerable, the care he took to reconcile them amongst themselves, by determining their differences; and thus beginning, with respect to them, to exercise the office of the arbitrator of Europe. His majesty sent me a letter of compliment unfealed, which he thought himself obliged to write to the duchess des Deux-Ponts, commanding me to fend it to her by one of my gentlemen, and with it a prefent of twelve or fifteen hundred crowns, at least: a favour which that princess acknowledged with great gratitude and respect, in the letter she wrote to him in return. The duke of Bar having confulted Henry about his defigned marriage with the princefs of Mantua, which had been kept fecret a long time, this prince took upon himself to give the duke of Mantua notice of it, and dispatched immediately a courier extraordinary to that court; though upon this article, he carried his economy fo far, as to reproach his ambaffador at Rome, for fending him couriers too frequently, and wrote to him to do so no more. The Venetian ambassador took leave of his majesty in November, and received from my hands a very confiderable prefent: I likewise gave another to his secretary; nor did Guinterot the duke of Holftein's ambassador return less satisfied to his master; I shewed him the arfenal, and all the king's magazines; and that he might have a token to remember them by, I gave him, by his majesty's orders, one of his finest coats of arms to prefent to his master.

1605, whom my brother dispatched to the king then at Chantilly, and by Jetters from the French cardinals whom Henry had fent to Rome the year before, and who were followed by cardinal Du-Perron, the end of the fame year.

> THERE having always been a great intimacy between this cardinal and myfelf, we corresponded by letters regularly, during the whole time that he continued on the other fide of the Alps: he gave me notice of his arrival at Rome, in a letter dated the 28th of December, 1604, and wrote me another the 6th of February following. If he is to be believed, I had gained the friendship of the whole roman consistory, who could not help praising my conduct towards the clergy, and in every thing that concerned the affairs of the church. In cardinal Buffalo particularly, ever fince the treaty we had managed together, I had a zealous panegyrist at Rome; after his departure from Paris, I had written him a long letter, which he shewed to every body, as valuing himself upon the sentiments he knew I entertained of him: I shall not repeat here those praises, too flattering to my vanity, with which this letter of Du-Perron's was filled; those I have mentioned were introduced with no other defign, but to fnew (what I thank heaven for) that I was never tainted with that bitter and furious zeal, which the difference of religion infpires. The change of mine was the subject offrequent conversations between the cardinals and Du-Perron, who all withed for it with equal ardour; cardinal Aldobrandin, often declared that he never faid mass without remembering me, the Pope expressed himself almost in the same terms to Du-Perron, when he was conducted to audience, by my brother: he had a long conversation with him concerning me, and particularly upon the means of working (what, in the language of Rome, was called) my conversion: it is indeed an extraordinary thing, that a minister cannot, from his own countrymen obtain the same justice, which foreigners, who surely have no less reason to hate him, are capable of rendering to the disinterestedness

Peter Matthieu peaks of him with the highest praise, vol. II. b. iii. p. 328, and book iii. p 696, as all the rest of our best writers also do, who find no fault with him, but for his being a little too much attached to his family. It was faid of him, Clement VIII. was a good man, a good prelate, and a good prince; in opposition to his three predeceffors, Pius V. Sixtus V. and Gregory XIII, the first of whom was faid to be only a good prelate, the fecond only a good prince, and the third a good prelate and a good prince. of his conduct, and the rectitude of his intentions. Du-Perron concluded his letter with telling me, that he, no less earnefly than the other cardinals, wished to see me completely united to persons who esteemed and loved me so much, since I had not (these are his words) " more "friends at Geneva, than at Rome."

My gratitude was equally engaged by the testimony he bore in favour of my brother, affuring me, that he had gained fo strongly upon the affections of the Italians, that no Frenchman had, for an hundred years past, acquired an equal reputation in Italy *: he acknowledged himself highly obliged to my brother, for his politeness, in coming with an honourable train of the French and Roman nobility, to meet him, nine leagues from Rome.

The king had, in an especial manner, recommended it to the French cardinals, to have strict attention to the interest of the nation, in the approaching election of a Pope †; and this injunction was again repeated to them, when he was informed by the arrival of another courier from Rome, on the 28th of March, that, according to all appearances, there would be high debates in the conclave, on account of the great number of candidates, each of whom was worthy indeed of the pontificate. However, these difficulties were so soon removed, that, on Friday the 1st of April, which was two days after the arrival of this courier, the holy see was filled by the cardinal de Médicis, otherwise called the cardinal of Florence, who took the name of Leo the eleventh. The choice falling upon a man related to the queen, and of the same name with her, was a certain testimony that his most christian majesty was well served by the Italian nation ‡.

The king, when the news came to Paris, gave public demonstrations of his joy, which he was desirous should be as general as it was sincere. He wrote to me not to spare his ordnance, and to send orders to my government, and to every other part of the kingdom, to follow the example I should set them in Paris. Messieurs the bishop, and governor of Paris, the prefident Belliévre, and the king's counfellors of parliament, the other bifhops, and all perfons in a public character, received orders to have Te Deum fung, and fireworks played off, in every place under their jurifdiction. It may be truly faid, that never had the advancement of any perfon to the papal dignity been celebrated with greater magnificence. However, this could not prolong a moment the duration of Leo XI's pontificate, who lived but a few days afterwards, and probably was dead at the very time when these honours were paying him in France *.

His majesty was in some degree comforted for the loss of this Pope, by the person whom the conclave chose for his successor; this was Paul V. formerly cardinal Borgefe: two things concurred to his election, which made it highly agreeable to his majesty, the favour the French nation shewed him by her cardinals, and his own personal merit, which rendered him worthy of that distinction, and which they hoped to fee rewarded by a happy pontificate. Two cardinals thus successively placed by his most Christian majesty on the papal throne, left Europe no room to doubt of the high efteem he was in with the Italians: the king was fenfible of it himfelf, and the extreme fatisfaction it gave him was fufficient feen by the orders he issued immediately after receiving the news of the new pontist's advancement (which was on the 25th of May) to celebrate it with the fame rejoycings as Leo the XI's had been, except only, that no fireworks were played off; the reason his majesty gave for this omission, to those who might possibly be offended at it, was, that this piece of respect had been paid to the cardinal of Florence as an ally of the royal family: as to the rest, all was performed with the same splendor, and the king himself was present at the Te Deum, which he ordered to be fung at Fontainebleau. I received on this occasion three letters from his majesty of the same date, which were merely ceremonial upon my different offices, and as a person in a public character: he likewife addressed to the chancellor, Sillery, and to me, a discourse, in which he gave a relation in form of what had just passed in the conclave.

Paul V. did not difappoint the hopes that were conceived of his pontificate: the Roman council feemed to pursue exactly the same

Pope's taking poffession of his dignity, and died the 27th.

measures they had done under Clement VIII. Nothing was prescribed to Barberini, who was sent into France in the quality of nuncio, beyond what had been done to cardinal Bussalo; and he was ordered by cardinal Aldobrandini, and by his holines likewise, to address himself only to me, in whatever affair he had to folicit. I know not what cardinal Bussalo (from whom this advice certainly came) could have said to my advantage, in preserence to so many other persons, who carried, even to service, their respect and attachment to the holy see. My brother, in a letter he wrote to me at that time, told me, I could not too highly acknowledge the obligations I was under to this cardinal, or repay with too much warmth of friendship, the regard and esteem he expressed

This letter of Bethune's is dated November 12th; for he was still at Rome, although he had depended upon returning to France immediately after the Pope's installation; but some new orders which he had received detained him, and he did not return till feveral days after the date of this letter. His holiness so much regretted his being recalled, that he would have wrote to the king, to entreat he would continue him his ambaffador at Rome, if my brother had not prevented him. He had entirely got rid of that appearance of timidity, referve, and perhaps coolness, which he had shewn at the beginning of his negotiation; and as soon as he was accustomed to the business transacted at the Roman court, had changed it into a wife and prudent confidence, from whence he drew all the fuccess he could hope for, in those affairs which were intrusted to him. The Pope continued to pay him the highest honours, and gave orders, that he should be received, and treated with the most distinguishing marks of respect, in all the cities of his dominions through which he passed. All this I advance with so much the more freedom and security, although upon the faith of cardinal Du-Perron my friend, who thought himself obliged to write to me upon my brother's departure. as this cardinal gave the fame account to the king, and reprefented to him that no one was better qualified than Bethune, for a place in the council for foreign affairs, in what regarded Italy; as he had a full and perfect knowledge of all which related to that country *.

* Cardinal D'Offat himfelf, though, according to all appearances, far from being fatisfied with M. de Sully's behaviour in regard to him, speaks in the most advantageous terms of that ambassidor, in his letter to the king, of the 10th December, 1601. in that to M. de Villeroi, of the 2d December, 1602. and some others.

In this letter Du-Perron thanked me, for having supported him with his majerly, against those who had endeavoured to frustrate his expectations of the post of great almoner, which had lately been promited to him; as also for some trifling services his brother had received from me: he added an article relating to La-Fin. This man, who has been mentioned in marechal Biron's process, had, by an effect of his natural levity of temper, lest France, and embraced the protestant religion. The king, who observed him, as he did all who had once given room for suspicion, caused him to be stopped in Italy, and imprisoned in the tower of Nonne. La-Fin applied to cardinal Du-Perron, who had formerly been his friend, to procure him the favour of being carried into France and tried there, if it appeared that there was any just grounds for complaint against him, or if not, that he should be set at liberty; and Du-Perron intreated my interest with the king, in favour of La-Fin's request.

THE letter which, of all that I received from the other fide of the Alps, deferves most notice, is that the Pope took the trouble to write to me, and of which, being very long, I shall only give the substance here. As in appearance the Pope wrote to me on the subject of my brother, he began with praising, in the highest terms, his conduct, his piety, and his behaviour, full of respect and deference for all the cardinals, and himself, before he was advanced to the pontificate. From this his holiness passed to the regret he felt, that the obstacles I raifed to my conversion, hindered him from refigning himself as openly as he would otherwise have done to the friendship he had for me. His piety and his zeal furnished him with a thousand motives to perfuade me to change my religion; he affured me, that if he was not with-held by the station he filled, he would, without hesitation, come into France, and labour himself to convert me: he proposed to my imitation the examples of the antient counts of Flanders, my ancestors, particularly that of Saint-Alpin de Bethune, for whom he had been told I had a great veneration: to these he added the examples of the first faints, and most illustrious kings of France; which naturally introduced the eulogium of the prefent king, and afterwards that of Clement VIII. on account of the fervices I had rendered this Pope, for which he thanked me with great warmth of affection, as well as for all the good offices which the apostolical legates and nuncios of his predecessors and his own had received from me. This brief, which was every where filled with pathetic exhortations to change my religion, concluded with the most ardent prayers for that event.

I ANSWERED this obliging letter with all the respect and deference it deferved, without faying any thing upon the article of my change of religion: I was fatisfied with praifing the virtues and great qualities of his holiness, with affuring him of my profound respect for his perfon, my readiness to serve him, and ardent defire to be useful to him: my whole letter was filled with the most grateful acknowledgements for the fentiments he professed for me, and the most earnest wishes for his prosperity; and, without affecting my religion, I forgot no instance of respect due to the character of a sovereign prince, and to that in particular which a whole church gives to the Pope; and therefore did not scruple to make use of the expression of kissing his feet; which doubtless would have displeased my brethren the protestants. Paul V. upon his receiving this letter, faid publicly, that it gave him more pleafure than any thing which had happened during his pontificate: he read it twice over successively, saying each time, that I had done him too much honour: he lavished many encomiums upon the ftyle and turn of expression, and said, that my praises of him had robbed him of some of those he had designed to give me. He was eager to thank me by a second brief, if Du-Perron himself had not oppoled an excels of kindnels which might have produced fome inconvenience to me. This cardinal was witness of the Pope's exclamations in favour of me; for my letter being written in French, he was fent for by his holiness to interpret it. Du-Perron still continued to residein Rome. which drew him into very confiderable expences; he observed to me, that, in the space of one year only, he had laid out above twenty thoufand crowns, in the expences of his journics, his entry, the conclave, furniture, and habits for himself and his houshold; all which had reduced him to fuch necessity, that he intreated me to oblige the farmers of his abbey of Lire to pay him, they having refused to make their usual remittances, under pretence of an arret of council relating to the claims he had upon certain woods.

ALL the rest of Italy began to entertain the same favourable dispositions for France as the holy see, except the duke of Savoy, who was still influenced by the Spanish policy, as may be conceived by the new intrigues, carried on this year for the duke's interest, by a man named Chevalier. With regard to Spain, France still continued upon its

> THE negotiations which had commenced between the Spanish court and the states of the United Provinces not succeeding, hostilities were renewed as foon as the feafon permitted them to take the field. The king of Spain fent to the Swifs Cantons, to demand a paffage through their territories for the troops he fent into Flanders, that they might avoid taking their rout by Pont de Grésin, which would have greatly retarded their march. To obtain the grant of this request, he told them, that his troops should pass through their states by twenty at a time, and that their number should not exceed two thousand. He added, however, another thousand afterwards. The king, when he received this advice from Caumartin, believing that Spinola, who was to command their troops, would take the fame rout, thought it would not be impossible for prince Maurice, at the head of a party of French scouts, to feize upon this general's person, "which, said Henry, will be worth " one victory." He wrote to me to communicate this hint to Aërsens. and through him to the prince of Orange; but I was informed, almost immediately afterwards, by a Spanish courier, who passed through Paris in his way to Flanders, that Spinola had altered his rout, and would arrive in Paris in three or four days: which produced fuch a change of measures, that his majesty thought himself obliged to render his passage as secure to him as if he had passed through the French territories. Spinola requesting the honour of an audience of his majesty, this prince believed that he had orders to make him fome new propofals. This, however was an inference not made by me; and when Henry mentioned it to me, I replied, that Spinola, thinking the road through Paris the shortest as well as the securest, he conceived it his duty at the same time to pay his respects to his majesty; and that I was perfuaded he would talk to him only of general things, though perhaps he wished to have it otherwise believed in Flanders: accordingly it fell out just as I had imagined.

Spinola divided his army into two bodies; he gave the command count of Bu- of one to count de Buquay, with orders to pass the Rhine with it between Cologne and Bonne, where he afterwards threw up intrenchments to hinder other troops from attempting this pass. Whatever was the defign of the Spaniards by this work, it ought to have roused the German princes from their lethargy. The other body Spinola led towards Friefland, where the allied army followed him a long time. The report report which was fpread in July of this general's death, was no better founded than that of his being beaten, which prevailed fome time afterwards. It was forefeen that he had a defign upon Linghen, altho' this was a very strong place; and accordingly he marched thither and invested it. By means of a mole which was cut by prince Maurice. Spinola was himself befieged in his quarters, and his trenches laid under water; fo that it was believed he would be obliged to abandon his enterprife; in which case it might be expected, that the prince would befiege and carry the fort Patience. Yet, notwithstanding this, Linghen furrendered in September, which was all that was done this campaign. Spinola was, on the 24th of September, still before the place he had taken, and had carried his views no farther than to put himfelf out of a condition to be attacked. The troops of both parties were greatly diminished; prince Maurice, on his side, threw supplies into Covoërden and Breton, which covered and fecured Friefland. Du-Terrail, in the mean time, at the head of fome fupplies fent him by Spinola, attacked and furprifed Bergen-op-zoom, but he was repulfed with fome lofs.

This man was a French officer, and one of the feditious cabal; he thought proper to retire to Antwerp, and offered his fervice to the archdukes. His majefly was not fo much offended with this procedure, although he had promifed him, in a letter he wrote exprelly for that purpole, that he would do nothing contrary to his duty, as he was for his having corrupted Dunnes, the younger Nangis, and Chef-boutonne, who it was reported were preparing to go thither with a whole company. A footman belonging to Du-Terrail was arrefted in Auvergne, whither he had brought fome packets, but all of little confequence. He endeavoured to prevail upon his wife to come to him in Antwerp, by highly extolling the friendthip and civility he received there. The fame example had been fet by Saint-Denis-Mailloe, and fome other gentlemen, who had offered their fervice to the arch-dukes; in which they certainly neither acted like good politicians, nor dutiful fubjects.

This was but one of the leaft causes of complaint which Henry had against Spain. The support which that crown gave to the French mutineers; the part she had in their meetings at Linnosin and Perigord; the enterprises which, in concert with them, she meditated upon the towns and coasts of Provence; were grievances of a higher nature: and, all well weighed together, his majesty was of opinion, that he ought to spare himself the trouble of making them useless reproaches, or of doing himself justice by such means as would have given the Spaniards reason 160 c. reason to reproach him in their turn : he was even more solicitous about the strict observation of the last agreements he had made with them on trade, than, after such a conduct, they could have expected. Captain Yvon Baudelonis brought a Spanish vessel into Rochelle, which the commander alledged was Dutch, and belonged to the prince of Orange: the Rochellers thought it their duty to acquaint the king with it, who, in his answer, praised their conduct, quoted to them the article of the treaty on that fubject, which was in express words, and caused the fame fatisfaction to be given to Spain which her ambaffadors could have demanded.

> THE council of Madrid, struggling between their natural haughtiness on one side, and a consciousness of their own weakness and the need they had of our affiftance on the other, knew not in what manner to behave to us: the fame spirit actuated them in all their proceedings, and made them, at one time, endeavour to difunite us from the States; at another, complain vehemently, that under pacific appearance, with respect to them, we acted as their real enemies. They afterwards affected a strict correspondence with England: but none of their artifices fucceeded. The king, fecure in the fecret knowledge of his own strength, despised their threats; and myself in particular was too well acquainted with the disposition of the king of England, to believe that he would ever do more for them than he could be prevailed upon to do for us.

> THEY were, besides; upon such ill terms with his Britannic majesty, that it was not possible for them long to fave these appearances; for as they never flaid a confiderable time in any country, without giving proofs of that spirit of cabal which they exercised throughout all Europe, James had notice of some of their secret practices in his dominions, which inflamed him with rage against them. Indeed there needed no less than fuch a discovery to recal this prince to his first engagements with me, which had fuffered fome injury during the following years, by that fatal prejudice in favour of pacific measures which I have already mentioned, or rather by a real timidity. Beaumont, whose embassy was at its close, was surprised to find James resume this subject himself, and talk to him in terms very different from those he commonly made use of. He gave him letters for Henry and for me, and likewife a verbal charge, that when he rendered an account of his negotiation to the king of France, he should infift particularly upon that article which regarded the fuccession to the Empire, which was what he dwelt upon most most in his letter to Henry: he exhorted him to join from that moment with him in endeavours to restore to the electors, before the death of the present Emperor, the freedom of election, with all their other rights; and effectually to exclude the son, brother, or most distant kinfman of his Imperial majesty, from a possibility of gaining the empire, by preventing any one of them from being named king of the Romans. And, lastly, to have it decreed, that the person, whoever he might be, that was to succeed the Emperor, should renounce all pretensions to the kingdom of Bohemia.

BEAUMONT, when at his return to Paris he executed the commiffion given him by his Britannic majesty, told the king that he had a letter from this prince for me, which, as I was then at Châtelleraut, his majesty opened. He was desirous of trying if this new policy would find any favourers at Court; and for that purpose he communicated this scheme of king James with regard to the Empire to two or three of his ministers, but with some reserve, and by way of consulting them upon it, taking care not to give them any hint of his great defigns. On this occasion Henry found no flatterers: there was not one of them who did not give a proof that he was capable of opposing a scheme which appeared to him unreasonable and unjust. Henry stopped there, and waited for my return, to examine it more closely with me. But as this conversation turned upon many particulars, which appeared of fuch confequence to his majefty, that he made me fwear not to discover it to any person whatever, that oath obliges me now to filence *.

* I do not know whether the uncertainty wherein this prince for fome time remained, was not at least a part of this secret: whether he ought not to get himfelf declared Emperor: he even thought it necessary to fubmit this defign to the examination of his three ministers, whom he called together to give their opinions on it; as appears from the 8474th vol. of the MSS, in the king's library, where their deliberations on this matter are related at large. It is remarkable, that those three, scarcely in any one instance, happened to be of the same sentiments: in the present case, one advised him to get himfelf elected Emperor; the fecond diffuaded him from it; and the third (more favourable to the house of Austria) would have perfuaded him to act in favour of the arch-duke Matthias. "The "king, adds the author, who had atten-"tively liftened to this laft, rose up, and " opening the window to let in the fresh " air, raifed his eyes and hands towards hea-" ven, and said aloud, May it please God " to form and create in my heart the re-" folves I ought to take on what you have " faid, and men shall execute them; A-"dieu, gentlemen, I must take a walk."

"Thus ended this conference." Though this project did not abfolutely clash with his grand defign, there is nevertheless a reasonable foundation for doubting whether he actually ever formed it: it is highly probable the whole was only a fcint, concerted be-

HENRY,

HENRY, when he gave me my letter from king James, read it to me himself: his Britannic majesty there informed me of the proposal which he had enjoined Beaumont to make to the king, and reprefented to me the interest I had in supporting it, in a manner which, tho' general, had nevertheless so direct a view to the reflections I had made to him on this fubject, that I could not doubt but he would. from time to time, be more convinced of the reasonableness and utility of that plan of policy I had sketched out to him. I shall not repeat the affurances of friendship and esteem with which this letter was filled. Beaumont was commissioned to make me many more in his name: neither was he forgot. King James bestowed so many praises upon his personal merit, and his skill in business, as raised him highly in Henry's esteem. If this prince had been still ignorant of the confidence his Britannic majesty placed in me, his letter was sufficient to convince him of it: he indeed appeared much pleafed with it, and commanded me to cultivate his friendship carefully; a command which I received with great chearfulness.

We have now feen the political state of almost all Europe except Germany; there are perhaps some observations still to be made upon the several Germanic cantons; but that little which is necessary to be known with respect to our affairs, will mix itself imperceptibly with what I have to say of the seditious cabal in France. This article will lead us into sufficient length, as it was the occasion of my journey into Poitou this year, and of his majesty's to Limosin; which took up four of the finest months of the season.

The reader has doubtless, e'er this, reflected upon the extravagance of an affociation, composed indifferently of roman catholics and protestants; the roman catholics, Spaniards, and the protestants, French. A party acting upon interests so opposite, that nothing but continual violence could conciliate them; a body of which the duke of Bouillon was the head, and Spain the soul. In this slight view it appears so singular and monstrous, that the reader cannot apprehend any dangerous consequences from a confederacy so ill forted. I indeed had always the same opinion of it; but as all factions which include repeated acts of disobedience against the sovereign cannot but be very prejudicial tween him and the duke of Sully, to put his council on a wrong fcent, in regard to the great armaments he was making: the count of Beaumont, his ambaffador at London, according to Siti, Ibid. 166. endeavoured to inspire him with this notion. to the state, even supposing that they are disappointed in their principal aim, yet it must be acknowledged, that good policy requires we should a make use of every method to hinder them from forming, or when formed to ruin them: the rebels were in this case; they had neither prudence in their resolutions, nor much appearance that they would ever produce any worthy to be seared. However, as it was not fit to suffer such attempts to be made with impunity, his majesty neglected none of the informations he received, and which this year were more numerous than ever. Murat, lieutenant-general of Riom, wrote to me the beginning of March, that he had very lately been informed of some important particulars; for the truth of which although he could not answer, yet he thought himself obliged to communicate them to me; and that I might be better able to judge of them, the same person from whom he received them was the bearer of his letter.

As foon as I began to examine this man, I perceived, from the first questions I asked him, that his deposition would involve so many perfons of the highest quality at court, that without going any farther, I judged it of consequence enough to require that his majesty should be present at his examination. The king was then at Saint-Germain; I wrote to him, and in cyphers which he only understood, marked the names of these persons. The king came to Paris immediately, to hear this informer himself, who assured him, that all those persons (and he named them) held correspondences in the chief cities on the coasts of Provence and Languedoc; all which he specified, namely, Toulon, Marseilles, Narbonne, Bayonne, Blaye, and some others; that the count of Auvergne was upon the point of making an attempt upon Saint-Flour when he was arrested; that all these secret practices were favoured by Spain, and the money distributed for that purpose, furnished by this crown. According to this man, the conspirators had already received feveral thousand pistoles from the Catholic king, expected still more, and even depended upon some supplies of troops; which however, he faid, would not be fent, until they had openly declared themselves enemies of the state, by the invasion of those places before mentioned, and of many other maritime forts.

The truth of these accusations appeared very doubtful, from a circumstance which it is apparent did not escape Murat; and this was, that the informer had been a domestic of Calvairae*, in whose house he might indeed have heard fome conversation on these subjects; but why 1605. advance as certain, what had been there proposed as merely possible? He had received some bad usage from his master, and doubtless the defire of revenge stimulated him to this proceeding: what cannot that motive do. joined to the hope of gain? which it was well known was fo much the greater, as the depositions which were made, appeared of more confequence to his majesty.

I CAN, with much more certainty, relate what paffed in the fynods and other particular affemblies, which were held by the protestants in Poitou, Saintonge, Angoumois, and the neighbouring provinces. In these assemblies, a spirit of revolt and mutiny always prevailed: among other very bold propofals, it passed by a plurality of voices, that his majesty's permission should be asked to call a general asfembly of the protestants, without explaining to him the motive of this request, or the subject to be treated in the assembly. The king, to whom their petition was really prefented, did not refuse to comply with it, but declared (as he had a right to do) that he would prescribe to them the place, the matter, and form of this affembly, and fend thither a perfon to represent himself: Châtelleraut was the place he appointed, of Du- and myself the person who was to appear there, with a commission, to take care of his majesty's interest. The protestants, those I mean who fomented the feditions in this body, would rather, I believe, have had their request denied, than granted upon such conditions; they alledged, that, if I joined the title of the king's representative to the quality of governor of the province in which this affembly was to be held, nothing could shield them against the authority I should not fail to arrogate to myself. It may be imagined that, at this time, my brethren expected less favour from me than the most abhorred papist.

> THE method which the rebels had recourse to, was to present another petition to his majesty, signed by two or three hundred persons at least; in which they declared, that, upon more mature deliberation, they found it necessary to entreat he would defer calling this affembly. As foon as Henry was informed of this disposition of the protestants, he had expected to receive another petition, from them, and, in a letter which he wrote to me from Fontainebleau, dated March the 30th, he defired I would advise him what to do upon this occasion: I had received the same informations as his majesty, and used my utmost endeavours to discover the true state of things; for which purpose, the journey I had taken the preceding year into Poitou.

was of great service to me: however, nothing appeared to me very positive, except that three or four of the most seditious amongst them had endeavoured to raise some disturbance, but with so little success, that the fires they had kindled evaporated in sinoke. I may venture to fay, that my letters and discourse to the least prejudiced persons in the party, with my folicitude in other respects, had greatly contributed to reduce matters to this point. This it was, upon which the advice and the answer the king demanded of me turned.

IT is certain at least that his majesty never heard more of this second petition which had made fo much noise, and by that he was able to guess the nature of all those other reports: but he still continued to receive, in the beginning of April, so many new informations, and those of such consequence, and in appearance so well founded, that he suffered himself to be driven along with the torrent. It was reported and that even by the first president of Toulouse, and many other persons in Guienne, that the protestants, both in that province and in Languedoc, had uttered many difrespectful speeches against his majesty: they added, that these people had refolved to fend a deputation, to prevail upon him to recall his grant for holding the affembly at Châtelleraut. In another letter dated April 7. Henry ordered me to come to him the day after Easter, to affift him in taking a refolution upon these new letters, and to be prefent at the reception of the protestant deputies; and lastly, to explain to them his intentions in fuch a manner, as became his majesty to use with fubjects who, in some measure, presumed to give laws to their fovereign. It is certain, that, although this prince had been willing to take the trouble of doing this himself, he was not in a condition; for, during this whole month, he was afflicted with frequent returns of the gout, which had obliged him to have recourse to a remedy that never failed: this was a proper regimen, which he observed with great strictness during part of the month of May. Of all his council, he had no one about his person but Sillery, and him his majesty did not think fit for such a commission.

All these circumstances I relate from Henry's letter, which he concluded with telling me, that he would permit me to return to Paris as soon as this affair was terminated. In my answer, which I wrote to this prince while I attended his orders for my departure, I represented to him two things, to which, in my opinion, no reply could be made; and these were, that if his majesty would not believe, what however was absolutely certain, that all those informations which were given him, 1605. either with great mystery or great noise, were nothing but the murmurs of some persons hired expressly for that purpose in the provinces, he was then much to blame to fuffer his peace to be thus disturbed, when it was in his own power to reduce these rebels to silence. It was upon these transactions, that my enemies suggested those suspicions of me to his majesty, which produced that disgust I have given an account of in the former book: and it may be easily imagined, that while that disgust continued, he had no inclination to chuse me either for his confidant or his agent with the protestants. My return to favour happened in the manner I have already related: he told me, that he could not give a more convincing proof of his being perfectly cured of all his fufpicions, than by confirming me in the employment he had at first deftined for me. I intreated this prince to fend any other person rather than me to Châtelleraut, invested with his authority, because I was apprehenfive of affording, without defigning it, fome new matter for calumny: but Henry reasoned in a quite different manner; he believed, that, after what had passed, he owed to himself, to me, and to my accusers. fuch an incontestable proof of his good opinion of me, as the shewing me to the public in a post, wherein the sacrifice he expected I should make him of my nearest interests, would set my innocence in the clearest point of view, and silence all malice and detraction; and added graciously, that my enemies themselves had just put him upon his guard against their infinuations, therefore I had nothing to fear. Then, after twice embracing me, with all his usual expressions of tenderness, he ordered me to return to Paris, to put all affairs in fuch order, that they might receive no prejudice from my absence; to draw up memorials of all those which related to my commission; and to compose myself the inftructions which I was to receive in writing from his hand, and with the confent of his council.

> THE king, in the mean time, went to pass part of June at Saint-Germain. In the beginning of this month, a defluxion of humours fell upon his foot *, which he hoped to disperse by the exercise of hunting, taking the precaution to have his boot cut open upon the part affected: while this fit lasted, he was not able to apply to any business, although,

of looking at it. We went together to the Bastile, and he shewed us what was doing there: I affure you, at that in-

as he wrote me word, the preservation of one half of his kingdom depended upon it. When his disorder was abated he returned to Paris, where he prepared for his journey to Monceaux, after giving all the necessary orders for my departure.

I put down on paper, all the questions I desired to be resolved, with regard to the several parts of my function as representative of the king; the answers to which were to make up the ground of the instructions upon which I had just agreed with his majesty. This paper I sent to Villeroi and Fresne, who returned it with answers to each question, adding, that if I sound them satisfactory, I might reduce them to such a form as I judged proper. I was resolved to have two of these papers, one more general, and the other in the form of a particular memorial, joined to the former: these two papers regulated the manner in which I was to speak and act with the protestants, as I am going to show.

Upon the first view, the occasion of the assembly at Châtelleraut, did not appear of fuch importance as it really was, either with respect to the king or the protestant body, being granted for no other purpose but to examine the deputies fent by this body to his majefty, the term of whose offices was expired, and to appoint others to fucceed them, an affair which did not require to folemn an affembly as this was likely to be. But, upon a closer examination, we shall find, that the real aim of some of the chief heads of the protestant party, was to take advantage of this affembly, to extend their rights, and to procure the grant of new favours and privileges; a design which his majesty could not better return, than by feizing likewife this opportunity to recall them, with more folemnity, to the observation of the old regulations, the wisdom and utility of which were sufficiently evinced by the effects they had produced; and, instead of suffering them to be infringed, to give them new force, and exact a more strict obedience to them; fo that after this, the protestant body in France, being persuaded of the rectitude of the king's intentions, and of his firm resolution to maintain his rights, might either resolve openly to despise his authority, or return with fincerity to their duty: this was the principal point of my commission.

To attain this end, I was enjoined to fix their view principally upon the edict of pacification iffued at Nantes, as a fundamental piece, which might ferve them equally for a rule to judge of their conduct towards the king, and of his towards them. I was to shew them, that this edict, which had fuffered fo many milinterpretations, being the basis of their liberty, the proof of their fidelity to their king, of their attachment to the public good, and of those sentiments which their religion itself ought to inspire them with; if they observed it exactly, they would neither fwerve on one fide or the other, any more than Henry had done, who had religiously fulfilled all the obligations it had laid upon him. The free exercise of their religion, the peaceable enjoyment of their estates and employments, the gentleness of the government, the tranquil but folid fituation of affairs, daily confirmed and strengthened the fecurity of those promises made by the prince, well known by a long train of effects; and lastly, by the satisfactory answers he had given to every thing of importance expressed in their memorials; all these were fo many pledges of faith in him, which the protestants ought to return by fuch inftances of submission and gratitude, as a good and indulgent prince has a right to exact from his subjects: their own interest likewife made it necessary for them to follow this plan of conduct, fince, if they justly considered the true state of things, it was they only who run any risques by an infraction.

The inference to be drawn from all these considerations, and which I was ordered to represent to the assembly, was, that they ought to shew themselves far from a design of demanding that any alteration should be made in the edict of Nantes; such as that of being empowered to chuse themselves a head, either within or without the kingdom, any other than the king himself, who merited that title from them on many accounts. As it could not be foreseen what other demands the protessants would bethink themselves of making, they left it to me to chuse proper arguments either for denying, or cluding them: I was only ordered to signify to them in plain terms, that for the future they must not expect such general assemblies would be permitted; and that this, which his majestly had consented should be held, to instruct them altogether in their duty, and to exhort them to fulfil it, should be in the place of that which they had resolved, in the last synod Gap, to entreat his majestly to grant them.

The reasons for this cessation of extraordinary assemblies were sufficiently plain; for they were convened, either on account of some affairs relating to the discipline of the church, some matters of law and police, or lastly for some favour they wanted to obtain of the king: for the first, the protestants have their provincial synods, which his ma-

jefty, by abolishing the extraordinary affemblies, made no encroachment upon. All he demanded with respect to them, and certainly nothing could be more just, was, that they should confine their deliberations to religious affairs; whereas, under this pretence, they often treated of such as related merely to the civil government. If the design be to settle something relating to the administration of justice and the police, there is no reason for excepting them from the general rule, by which all controverted matters of those two kinds, are referred to the tribunals of the judges, and the ordinary magistrates; and lastly, those which are matters of favour, and depend merely upon the king's indulgence, are to be treated by way of petition and supplication: nothing is more useless than those great expences and commotions, which an extraordinary assembly occasions, for an affair in itself of little importance.

THERE was another reason for suppressing these assemblies, which, although I cannot difguife, I may foften a little, by barely faying, that they often gave occasion for judgments not very favourable for the protestant party; for the public are willing enough to shut their eyes upon wife and prudent determinations, though not to the intrigues of the difaffected, who, in these tumultuous assemblies, remain confounded with persons more equitable, but whose proceedings are less taken notice of. If it happened that any of these articles, or others of the fame nature, should be contested at Châtelleraut, it was left to me to put an end to them in whatever manner I judged best; and I was even permitted to take those advantages which the profession of one common faith afforded me, to merit their confidence and engage their votes: it was only in cases of obstinacy or declared disobedience, that I was obliged to inform his majesty, and suspend all resolutions, till I had received his orders; as likewise not to suffer the assembly to break up without his leave.

WITH respect to the article of the deputies, it is necessary to inform the reader, that the protestants alwayskept two men of their party at court, one for the ecclesiastic order, the other for the secular; they were to treat with his majesty's ministers, or with the prince himself, upon all affairs necessary to be communicated to him, and to receive his orders concerning them. These deputies entered upon this office by election, which was renewed every three years, when others succeeded to their place. If we go back to the source of this institution, we shall not find that the protestants had any legal title to this pretended right of residence. If 1605. dence and nomination of the deputies, which they afferted fo strenuoully; it was not mentioned in the edicts, nor even in the writings that contained these private articles, which were sometimes separate from the treaties: it was only a custom merely tolerated, and first introduced on account of the refistance some sovereign courts made to regiftering the edict of Nantes, and only to be continued till that was. done. However, his majesty had no inclination to deprive the protefrants of this privilege: all he required, and this was one of the principal points of my commission, that, for the nomination of these deputies, they should adhere to one of those two methods prescribed by him to their own deputies, when they defired leave to hold the affembly, and if possible to the second, by which his majesty expected that the protestants should present to him the names of six persons chosen from their body, out of which he should name two who were most agreeable to him.

> IT might possibly happen, that the heads of the party would endeayour to clude those regulations which his majesty proposed to get received in the affembly, and for that purpose affect to confine themfelves to this fingle question; an artifice I was likewise to prevent. As to the affair of Orange, which it was certainly expected would be brought upon the carpet (as indeed it was) I had orders to represent to them, that Henry had laboured in vain to manage it fo as that this city, which he could not refuse to restore to the prince of Orange, might by him be left to the French protestants. All therefore that could be done upon this occasion, was to prevail upon Maurice, that in the room of Blaccons who commanded there, and who himself defired permission to leave it, he would place a protestant officer as his lieutenant, whom they might oblige to take the oath of obedience to his majesty. I shall resume this affair in the sequel. Such were my general instructions, dated July 3d 1605, and figned Henry and Forget.

> ALL the difference between these general instructions, and the particular memorial joined to them, confifted in this, that the latter made no mention of the declared subject of the affembly, but was confined to fome other questions which might probably be discussed there, and tended to prevent those designs from being effected, which it was sufpected the heads of the cabal would endeavour to get the multitude's approbation of. This detail, which was not inferted in the first writing, because there was a probability of its being needless, was however of great use to me; and it was upon that account, that I made a sepa- 1605. rate memorial of these instructions.

They imported, that I should not suffer the assembly, either in their debates or in writing, to advance any thing injurious to the Pope, or to stir up again that trifling doctrine of Antichrist, worthy of the synod of Gap, where it had taken birth; that no person should have a seat in the assembly in the quality of a deputy, from any individual whatever, not even from Lesdiguieres himself; that they should not, as they had done in that synod, receive letters from foreign princes, particularly from the duke of Bouillon. It seemed of importance to his majesty, that an ungrateful subject, such as Bouillon, should be publicly known to have rendered himself unworthy of any savour from his sovereign. The manner in which others, who might be ranked in this class, should behave in the assembly, was to regulate the treatment they were to receive from me.

If the quality of prefident of the affembly, which his majefty earneftly wished they would confer upon me, and which, on this occasion, he would not have been offended with me for accepting, should not be sufficient to give weight to what I said to them, I was to join to it the authority of governor of the province; and, as opportunities offered and the disposition of their minds required, I might give them to understand, that the king was not ignorant of the designs of the seditious protestants; provided that from thence they did not conclude, he was informed of the places where they were carried on.

There was fo much the more appearance that the article of the cautionary towns given to the protestants would be discussed, as the term, to which the possession of these places was prolonged by his majesty, was now near expired; and if this should happen, I was to hint, either to the assembly in general, or the deputies in particular, that, provided his majesty found in them that readines to comply with his measures as he required, he would willingly agree to a farther prolongation. I had orders not to give them any absolute assurances of this favour, but to mention it as what might be granted, and to promise I would obtain it of his majesty: although I had then in my possession the letter of grant for that prolongation, I only obliged myself to keep it secret, till I received the king's commands to make use of it.

funds destined by the king for their maintainance, they were to be declared for ever excluded from that advantage, as likewise from all hope of ever being paid the sum promised by the edict of Nantes for the support of the garrisons. This sum, at that time, amounted to five hundred seventy three thousand four hundred and thirty-two livres, of which ninety thousand livres had been already cut off. Nor were they to expect a new appropriation for those funds which had been afsigned them. I had already received some petitions upon these several suppressions; to which I always answered, that I thought this proceeding of his majesty absolutely just. Lastly, by this writing I obliged myself to do nothing without Henry's advice; with whom, from that moment, I began a regular intercourse of letters, most of them very long, and several in cyphers. This memorial is dated July 4. signed by his majesty, and countersigned by Villeroi. Two days afterwards I set out on my journey.

QUEEN Margaret's residence at the castle of Usson, gave her frequent opportunities of hearing news of the rebels; and as foon as the was informed that I was upon the road to Poitou, she thought herself obliged to acquaint me with all the particulars which had come to her knowlege: The had likewise some affairs of her own to impart to me, which I shall take notice of after I have related those which concerned my journey. For this purpose she came from Usson to Toury, from whence the wrote to his majesty, telling him the motive which had induced her to take this step, and the earnest desire she had to confer with me. I had left Paris, taking my rout through Rosny and Lavinville, two hours before the messenger who brought this letter for his majesty, and another for me, arrived. The king feeing by his own letter, and by mine, what this princess defired of him, sent La-Varenne after me on the oth of July, to deliver mealetter from him, in which he told me. that he should be glad if I would visit queen Margaret, although I should be obliged to leave the road to Châtelleraut, and go back as far as Orleans. La-Varenne gave me the letter queen Margaret had wrote, dated from Toury, July 7. by which I learned that this princefs waited for me between Paris and Orleans; and that I might not fail to meet her, she sent Rodelle her master of the horse, to desire I would come as far as Orleans, if I did not meet her before on the road: but she spared me the trouble of going fo far; for, upon my arrival at Cercote, I was informed that she was there likewise. My wife having accompanied me to Rosny and Lavinville, I brought her to Cercote with me, that she might take advantage of this opportunity to pay her respects to this princess. IT

IT was still so early in the morning when I arrived at Cercote, that queen Margaret was not up; however, the ordered me to be admitted into her chamber, where I had the honour to confer with her a full hour before the arofe. We refumed our convertation after the was dreffed, and spent the whole day in the same manner. I shall not repeat the polite and obliging things this princess said to me: but what I had been told in general by Murat, concerning the civil factions, was minutely particularifed to me by her and Rodelle. They named a great number of persons of the first quality in Provence and Languedoc, and even some of the relations of the duke de Montpensier and cardinal Joyeufe, who were engaged in the conspiracy; some of these persons had been in the fecret of marechal Biron's defigns, and had afterwards joined themselves to those whom they found determined to pursue them. The revenge of this marechal, was not one of their least motives; and they made use of the same methods he had done to excite a rebellion among the people. Befides those towns which, as we have feen, the conspirators endeavoured to surprise, they had views likewise upon Beziers, Narbonne, and Leucate. All these informations queen Margaret and Rodelle offered to support with evidences so clear, as would not, they faid, leave me the least room to doubt of their certainty. I gave his majesty an exact account of what I had heard, in a letter I wrote to him from Cercote, dated July 14. I likewise sent him a list of the conspirators names, as I had received it from queen Margaret and Rodelle, but I still persisted in my former opinion; nor, in all they had said to me, did I find occasion to alter it.

It is certain, however, that these informations were too circumfiantial and well supported not to merit some belief; for Rodelle had been himself of the cabal, and had left it, only through a retiexion upon the rashness of all their measures. He told me, that La-Chapelle-Biron, and above thirty gentlemen more of his acquaintance, had taken the same resolution to leave the cabal, and inform his majesty of all they knew, provided they could be sure of obtaining the pardon they would implore of him: that they had applied to him to take this step in their favour; and this he proved by the letters they had written to him for that purpose. He added, that they had violent sufficients that my journey to Poitou concealed a secret design of surprising them: that they had prevailed upon queen Margaret to declare their intentions to me, and the earnest desire they lad to efface the remembrance of their error, by their suture sidelity and services to his majesty.

All this was sufficiently clear, and I had no doubt of it remaining: but they endeavoured in vain to persuade me that the whole kingdom was in a slame, while I saw only an inconsiderable number of rash zealots, whom it was easy for his majesty to crush, whenever he would condescend to treat as a serious matter, a design which deserved only derision and contempt. For what remained, as often as I attempted to examine strictly into these informations, in appearance of such weight, and supported with such proofs, I always found that the false greatly exceeded the true.

In this, however, Henry was of an opinion contrary to mine: he thought the flightest disturbance within his kingdom merited all his attention, "because, said he, the French were ever fond of novelties, " and eagerly admit every change." He often complained, in his anfivers to my letters, that some of his other ministers had as slight a notion of the present evil as myself: he was more confirmed in his apprehenfions, when a memorial from Vivant fell into his hands, which exactly agreed with all that had been told me by queen Margaret and Rodelle. He dispatched orders immediately to Vivant, to fend him the person from whom he received those informations; and to me, to make, in concert with Vivant, as foon as I arrived at Châtelleraut, the strictest inquiries into every thing that concerned this cabal. Vivant being one of the protestant deputies to the assembly, this quality might possibly render me suspected by him: the king, however, had taken care to obviate this difficulty, by writing to him that he might place an entire confidence in me. The letter passed through my hands, with a precaution that Vivant should not be named in the affair, lest, by losing his credit with the protestants, he should not have it in his power to ferve his majesty effectually with them. As to Rodelle, and the other gentlemen before mentioned, Henry approved of the refolution I had taken with queen Margaret to fend them to him: he heard what they had to fay, gave them his orders, and fent them back to perform the promifes they made him, to labour there for his fervice. This prince never regretted any expence which thefe emissaries and informers put him to.

Some of them had intercepted the copy of a letter written to the duke of Bouillon, by one of his confidants, whom they suffected to be Saint-Germain-de-Clan, and brought it to the king: this perhaps was the cause of his increased vigilance. I shall give an account of this letter here, that the reader may be able to judge whether the inserences that were drawn from it at Monceaux were altogether just. It made part of the packet which Henry sent me from this place. Saint-Germain, or whoever this correspondent of Bouillon's was, by this letter endeavoured principally to persuade him, that it was necessary he should send fome person in his name to the affemby at Châtelleraut, who might support his interests there; or write at least a letter, which his friends might produce. The very considerable part the duke acted among the protestants, the necessary of proving his innocence, and the advantage to be acquired from shewing how much he suffered for the common cause, the general interest of the whole party, his own credit to be maintained with foreigners, the solemnity of this affembly, and the example of that of Gap, were so many motives which in the beginning of this letter were urged with the utmost earnestness to move him.

The rest was a confused mass of conjectures, inferences, and precautions, on the subject of this assembly; all intended to prove, that the protestant church had nothing to hope or expect but from his efforts alone. The author of this letter supposes, that Henry had totally forgot all his former promises; and that he openly sacrificed the protestants to their most cruel enemies: as proofs of which, he alledged the connection between the king's council and that of Rome, the immense sums which he said were expended to make a Pope, the rejoicings for his election, and the savour the Jesuits enjoyed, sufficiently shewn by the demolition of the pyramid. He afterwards confidered what, in the present circumstances, might be the result of the assembly; and presaged nothing but misfortunes, as well on account
of to obtain his ends.

Hrre I began to appear upon the scene, and it may be easily guessed what fort of figure I made. According to the author of this letter, I had proposals to make, which could not fail of removing all difficulties; among others, that of prolonging the time for the possession of the cautionary towns. Saint-Germain hoped contrary to his first hopes, or rather, to reassure Bouillon, depended upon my artifices with respect to the choice of the deputies all failing, and reasoning his own way upon the struggles he supposed I should have in my mind between my conscience, which could not yield to adopt the policy of the council, and my ambition, which would not suffer me to make the Pope and the papists my enemies, he sometimes saw no probability that I would take upon myself a commission which I could not execute to the king's fatisfaction, without betraying my religion; one ferve my religion, without expering myfelf to unavoidable differace. He likewise saw nothing but obstacles and difficulties in such a commission, which I should never be able to surmount. As he did not know that his majefty, befides leaving the general places of fecurity to the protestants, would consent also that the individuals of that body should keep those they were at present in possession of; and believing that this circumstance alone was fufficient to alienate their affections. he triumphed in my perplexity and confusion: he alledged, that the king had faid, the person whom he should fend in his name to the affembly, would have nothing to do but to declare his will there. Upon these words, he affirmed boldly, hat rather than go to any place in my government where the people would not pay me the honours I thought due to me, nor even allow me to be present at their consultations, I would find reasons to get myself dispensed with from taking that journey; or at the worst, if I should go, Saint-Germain engaged to the duke of Bouillon, that all my authority should not hinder the affembly from giving his letter a respectful reading, or his deputy an honourable reception.

THE misfortune was, that the weakness of this duke's partisans was a point fo generally known, that, notwithstanding all this shew of confidence, and oftentation of power, his friend was obliged to confefs, that the coldness of the provinces, and the neglect of the party, with respect to him, was very great. And having thus spared the duke's confusion by these softened expressions, he approved of the caution which Bouillon had been the first to advise should be used when he was mentioned, which was, not to make any demand for him in his name, which was the least liable to opposition; but confine themselves to remonstrances from the protestant body in general, upon the depriving him of his places, refusing him justice, his banishment, and the perfecution he was exposed to on account of his zeal for his religion. He confidered what danger might be apprehended from a letter written in this form to the affembly, and finding none, although they should even pay no regard to it, and, supposing the worst, sacrifice it to the king; he exhorted the duke of Bouillon to write fuch a one, giving it as his opinion, that it should not be made public at first; but, being read on a fudden to the affembly, derive fome advantage from those first emotions of compassion which it was likely to excite. He added, that the party would look upon it as a stroke of great confequence for the duke, if the letter, instead of being presented to the affembly affembly by one fingle person, should be brought thither by the deputies from the upper and lower Guyenne, where his fortresses were fituated; or that they should appear to have undertaken the commission of themselves, or, what was still better, by the orders of their provincials.

THIS was the letter which made fo much noise at court. To the packet his majesty sent me, Sillery thought proper to add a letter from himself upon this subject alone. Sillery was the person whom Henry kept near him, and who was then employed, as well in reconciling the prince of Conti and the count of Soissons, at that time at variance with each other, as in the affair of Orange, which, according to the advices his majesty received from Lesdiguieres and others, was taking an unfavourable turn. When I read the copy of this letter to the duke of Bouillon, I was convinced that the court would take a false alarm at it. I faw nothing in the contents which did not confirm me in my opinion that the feditious party was very inconfiderable, careless, unsteady, destitute of all resources, and far from any intention to undertake any enterprise of importance; and that Bouillon, who had more experience than the rest, would not engage in such extravagant fchemes as were proposed to him one after the other, schemes without order or connexion, and leading to no fixed end, fince there was nothing but confusion to be expected from them. In a word, amidst that false courage which is inspired by great presumption, and notwithstanding that affectation of fine policy, I thought I could plainly perceive difunion among the members of this body, and defpair in its I therefore perfifted in my former opinion, and declared my fentiments freely in the answer I fent to Monceaux; although probably, by doing fo, I rendered my fincerity a little doubtful: but I comforted myself by the reflection that those suspicions would last at most, but till the discovery of this mystery, which would be effected by the asfembly at Chatelleraut.

As for the other affertions in this letter, I can affure the reader, that I never felt those struggles and perturbations of mind, which the writer of it, and many other persons, attributed to me upon the choice I was to make, between serving my prince, and my religion; since in reality, in this affair, I saw no foundation for making such an alternative. A common prejudice prevails among all sects of religion; a man is never supposed to be a sincere professor of the one he has embraced, unless he supports it obstinately, even in such points where it is most Vol. II.

1605. visibly wrong. Upon this footing, I confess, the method I was determined to purfue might, by the author of that letter, and those who judged like him, draw upon me the epithets of false brother, deserter, and if they please, traitor: however, it was not the approbation of such as those, that I proposed to obtain, but of persons who, of whatever party or religion they were, would, in their judgment of my conduct, preserve the ballance of equity and difinterestedness. If ever religion admits of the affiftance of policy, it ought to be of a policy pure, fimple, and upright as itself; any other may indeed appear to serve it, But does not in reality, and tooner or later never fails to ruin it.

> HAVING determined to be guided by no other principle in my tranfactions with the affembly, I thought I could not too carefully avoid all appearances of affectation or disguise in my conduct; that those who were influenced by an imprudent zeal, or actuated by a spirit of cabal, might have no hopes of gaining or feducing me: therefore, from the beginning, I shewed myself solicitous to support, on this occasion, that character by which all France was to know how I would act on every other; that is, of a man as fincerely attached to the true principles of the protestant religion, as incapable of drawing the false consequences which many of the protestants did, or of approving their irregular proceedings. The speech I made at the opening of the assembly, which lasted half an hour, was wholly calculated to produce this effect, without troubling myfelf to confider whether it would give pleafure or offence to the greatest number.

> I BEGAN by representing to them, that, among so many persons blindly devoted to the will of the prince, his majesty would not have fixed upon a person to treat with them whose unshaken constancy to his religion was fo well known, if he was more folicitous to support or increase his rights, than to perfuade their judgments and gain their hearts: that this reason was sufficient to make them place an absolute confidence in all that I should say or do, since I certainly had not waited for this moment basely to betray my religion. But I declared to them, at the same time, that they must expect to see me as zealous for the interest of my prince, when it did not injure what I owed to my religion and the general good, fince it was incumbent upon me to justify, to his majesty himself, the choice he had made of me; and to support, in the view of the whole kingdom, the reputation of a prudent and upright minister; which I flattered myself I now enjoyed. I invited them to fliare this honour with me, observing, that here honour and and good policy were the same. This point indeed I found most diffi- 1605. culty to perfuade them of; and when they heard me affert, that their cautionary cities had no fence but their own good inclinations, they, instead of taking my words literally, looked upon them as a paradox, or a figure in oratory.

Nothing, however, was more certain: and to shew the protestants. that the first foundation of their policy was false, I entered upon the discussion of this principal point; that is, the keeping of their towns, in which they fancied their greatest strength consisted, and concerning which, as I was informed, they were incited to make very earnest and very bold reprefentations to his majesty. I shewed them, that the great number of little paltry places which they held under this title, was fo far from being advantageous to them, that they would haften their ruin, if ever they had an attempt made upon them by a king of France, the prefent king especially, to whom many of their officers were attached; because that not having any fortress so mean, or governor so inconfiderable, who would not pretend to the honour of making fome refistance, it must necessarily happen, that their tolerable cities, which were about ten or twelve in number, must suffer greatly from this useless dispersion of their soldiers and ammunition, and from time to time fall into the hands of their enemies; I did not even except Lefdiguieres *, their Achilles, provided that he waited for this extremity, to separate himself from them: in reality, without judging too rashly of this officer, it might be confidently afferted, that the only religion capable of fixing him, was that which could fecure him in the poffession of his riches, and the authority he had always exercised throughout his province. Some other proofs of his being but flightly attached to the doctrine of the protestant church, might be produced. I am obliged to discover in this manner the real principles of Lesdi-

* The Calvinist writers have treated the constable de Lesdiguieres in the same manner we fee them treat all those who abjure their religion. Le Vassor is the most cruel, and the duke of Sully one of the most moderate of his enemies; he is not the only one who believed that his defire to be made constable, was a small inducement to his conversion. " After the death of " the constable de Luynes, says Amelot 46 de La-Houflaye, Lewis XIII. fent the " fieur Claude de Bullon to the marechal " de Lesdiguieres, to acquaint him, that if 1605. guieres, because it was one part of my commission, to shew that the most secret dispositions of the party were not unknown.

The conduct of Du-Plessis was very different, but still more to be pitied: this man, in whom an ardent zeal for his party held the place of experience and military virtue, had taken it into his head to fortish his castle of Saumur, and did it in such a manner, that to defend it would require a garrison of eight thousand men, with ammunition in proportion. I defired to know where Du-Plessis would procure all this, should he be attacked unexpectedly; and added, that what I said to them was not by way of information, since I was not ignorant that they were condemned to know this truth, by the result of the deliberations in their provinces, as well as by their own losses; but only to shew them, that the king's council reasoned justly upon their situation: and that if, notwithsanding this knowledge, they were left in peace, that consideration ought to increase their gratitude and affection for the prince their benefactor.

I THEN proceeded to acquaint the deputies with his majefty's intentions, in a manner that would admit of no doubt or equivocation: that they were for the future not to receive in their fynods, or even in their houses, any deputies or letters from foreign princes, cities, communities, or French lords; namely, messieurs de Rohan, de Bouillon, de Lesdiguieres, de La-Force, de Châtillon, and Du-Plessis, because the king would not suffer any affairs of importance to be treated of in his kingdom, without his participation: that upon no pretence or reason whatever, they were ever more permitted to hold an affembly like those they had formerly held; but if they had any request to make to his majesty, they were to apply to the deputies, who were allowed to flay at court for this purpose, and that it should be expressed in the cabier of their province. I declared to them, that if they pretended, in this affembly, to take refolutions contrary to these orders, besides the other inconveniences to which they would expose themselves, they must expect to see me make use of all the power annexed to my commission, and all the authority granted to a governor in his province, to. bring them back to their duty. This was the substance of my speech to the affembly; leaving it to them to fettle at leifure the affairs of the deputies, and the cities of fecurity.

This speech, and particularly the declaration with which I concluded it, gave great offence to many deputies of the assembly; it occasioned several feveral warm disputes in their private consultations, and four or five deputations to me: those whose interest it was that the assembly should not proceed to more effential affairs, desired no better than to waste the time in this kind of preliminary questions and protracted them on purpose. But with a little industry, and some address, I put an end to this useless prelude. The king highly resented their not chusing me president of the affembly; though afterwards, altering his opinion on that head, he had advised me not to accept of it: he thought that, upon several considerations, I merited this honour from them; and said publicly with great resentment, that on this occasion the protestants had given an equal proof of their disregard to the public good, as jealousy of me; but it is certain, that I was the first, and even the only one, who made any objection to it *, and this for reafons which I wrote his majesty word I would tell him myself, and with which he would be fatisfied.

* The author of Du-Pleffis-Mornay's life, on the contray, maintains, that the duke of Sully endeavoured, by all the means he could, to get himself chosen president, but that he had only two votes for him. Book ii. p. 309.

BOOK XXII.

HE general assembly of the protestants at Châtelleraut was already opened, when the king received a letter from the duke of Bouillon, which was brought by a man named Russy. In this letter Bouillon acquainted his majesty, that a league was actually forming among the German princes against the house of Austria; and that these princes, being desirous of strengthening themselves with the power and affiliance of his majesty, had fixed upon him to be a mediator between the king and them. On their part, he promised a full security to the king and kingdom; and on his own, he offered, with an effusion of the noblest sentiments, to affist this design with his perfon and forces, expressing great joy at his having sound an opportunity so often hinted at by Montluet, when, in writing to him by the king's orders, he told him, that it was by real and effectual services, and not by words only, that for the suture he could persuade this prince of the purity of his intentions.

HENRY, at the receipt of this letter, was neither much moved in favour of the duke of Bouillon, nor greatly pleafed with the pretended feheme: far from accepting an offer in appearance fo favourable to his defigns, defigns, he was apprehensive of raising an unsurmountable obstacle to the execution of them by too great precipitation; besides, the snare u which Bouillon laid for him, was too thinly difguifed to produce the effect it was defigned for. Nothing could be more improbable, than that the German princes should chuse Bouillon to act the part of a mediator and reconciler, he who was himfelf confidered by the council of France as a criminal. Henry therefore contented himself with telling Ruffy, in answer to it, that the duke's informations were too indeterminate, and came too late. Bouillon would certainly have expected very little fucces from this artifice, if he had known that a letter, which he had written to the protestants assembled at Chatelleraut, fell at the fame time into his majesty's hands. This letter was a kind of answer to that which, as we have observed, had been lately fent to Bouillon by Saint-Germain-de-Clan, and it was well known was defigned for him; though, in one part of it, he mentions Saint-Germain as a third person. By the contents, it was plain, that the letter he wrote his majefty from Germany, was done with no other view but to induce the king to treat him more favourably in the affembly, and to hinder him from fuspecting the true motives of his conduct.

THE duke of Bouillon, in his letter to Saint-Germain, did not lose fight of his quality of chief of the party, fince it was written with an intention to regulate the proceedings of the affembly. The nomination of the deputies was the article first and principally considered in it: he gave his opinion of each of those persons who might pretend to this office, fuch as La-Nouë, Du-Pleffis, Bellujon, and Saint-Germain himfelf, in whose favour he gave his vote for continuing him in his employment, from which he was now discharged, and interested himself so much in it as to exhort the protestants to unite their endeavours to make the election fall upon him: he bestowed great praises upon La-Nouë, but recommended it to them to give the preference to Saint-Germain, the office which the first exercised at Geneva so utefully for the party, affording a plaufible pretence for excluding him from the deputation, without which it was probable he might be offended. He spoke of Du-Plessis, as of a man too obstinately attached to his own opinions, and able likewife to make himself be littened to and respected by Lefdiguieres; which to the duke feemed fo important a point, that he confidered the want of that power in Bellujon almost as a crime. Bellujon, he allowed, had understanding, prudence and address, and, next to Saint-Germain, had the best claim to the deputation. The perfect agreement between those two might indeed produce miracles;

1605. but Bellnjon's attachment to Lesdiguieres was, in the opinion of Bouillon, a stain in his character which could not be effaced: he would have done better to have owned freely, that he was jealous of the reputation Lesdiguieres had acquired in the party. Another fault which Bouillon attributed, equally and without exception, to all the candidates for the office of deputy, was that attention they discovered to their own interest, which however he considered as no objection, because of its being fo general.

> BOUILLON next proceeded to speak of himself; and here vanity dictated every word. He informed Saint-Germain, that it was reported in Germany, the king was defirous of being reconciled to him, and that Parabere or Montluet would be foon fent to him for that purpose; and, to remove all suspicions of the truth of this affertion, he fent him a letter which he faid Montluet had written to him, in which he defired him to apply to fome perfons who might be able to effect a reconciliation between Henry and him. From all this Bouillon drew a thoufand confequences, upon the confideration they had for him in Germany, the great advantages which the protestant party received from him, and the fears with which he inspired the king and his council: he was not willing to leave his brethren in doubt, that he would not hear all the propositions his majesty made to him, through an apprehension that they were only snares which were laid for him, to deprive him of the authority he had acquired among the people. He lightly passed over the article of sending some person in his name to the affembly, and spoke of it as a thing subject to difficulties; and upon which it was necessary to consult Lesdiguieres, Du-Plessis, and Saint-Germain.

Bur he dwelt with a peculiar fatisfaction upon the folemn affemblies which were held at his house, composed of all the most distinguished persons in Germany, afferting that the protestant religion must necessarily receive the highest benefit from them. By the resentment he here discovered against Lesdiguieres, it was judged that the latter had declared his fentiments of these so much boasted assemblies a little too freely; but the duke of Bouillon, to give a just idea of their extreme utility, affured his party, that the fole apprehension of what might be resolved upon there was sufficient to disturb Henry's repose, and make him ule every method to gain him. He added, that he had been often reproached by the persons who composed these affemblies, with not having made the court of France fufficiently fenfible of the advantages he poffeffed, possession, and had received offers from them to take this trouble upon themselves; but that he had opposed this effect of their zeal, by representing to them (with wonderful modesty) that the jealously which Henry entertained of him being the true cause of the difference between them, their intercession would have no other consequence but to augment that jealously, and prejudice themselves, without serving him. The only method by which Henry could be brought to reason (which he infinuated was the opinion of this whole assembly of friends, as well as his own) was to reduce him, through fear of what he might undertake, to a necessity of granting them all they desired.

ALL the notice this very fingular letter deferved (if it be granted that it deserved any) was to make use of it to prevent some demands which it was probable might be made in the affembly; for, as to the rest, whom could Bouillon expect to impose upon by his arrogant boasts? There is no necessity for feeking any other proof than what these ridiculous rodomantados afford, that the feditious party had made no preparations, either within or without the kingdom, for a revolt; that they did not yet understand each others schemes, or had come to any explanation concerning their common and general interest. With regard to this new pretended league in favour of the protestants; there was good reason for thinking of it as Lesdiguieres did: in one word, that it was the mere invention of Bouillon. Caumartin never mentioned it in his letters to the king, although he had a conference with the landgraye of Hesse concerning every thing that related to the duke of Bouillon; and all the landgrave defired to know of him was, if the king had really employed Monluet in the expresses his majesty had fent to Sedan. The reason which induced the landgrave of Hesse to ask this question, was a report which had been spread in Germany, that his most Christian majesty was endeavouring to get possession of Sedan by surprise, and to abolish the reformed religion there. It was plain that this report was raifed by Bouillon himfelf, who, taking occasion from that to gratify his hatred of the king, infinuated at the same time, that his city was fo strong, Henry could have no hopes of taking it but by a stratagem: this was, indeed, to possess the art of uniting together prefumption, malice, and falshood. All the duke of Bouillon's talents might be reduced to a great fertility of invention, and confummate dexterity in spreading reports disadvantageous to his enemies. Of the same kind was that which prevailed concerning the refolution taken by the Swiffes affembled at Baden, contrary to the interests of France, and proceeded from the same person: it occasioned, for a short time, some VOL. II. 000 appre-apprehensions in the kingdom, as the business mentioned in the former year, in which the leagues of the Grifons were employed, still remained unfinished; but when it was found that Caumartin, who would not have failed to have informed the king of it immediately if it had been true, was wholly filent concerning it, there was fufficient room to believe, that it was only an invention of those whose interest it was, that affairs should not go well in those cantons.

I could have wished, that his majesty had shewn the same contempt for the informations of those mercenary spies, whose numbers began to increase to such a degree, that they became chargeable to the government; and I freely own, that I regreted those large sums which were difburfed, to pay this kind of fervice, which, on account of the interest those from whom it was received were governed by, either with regard to themselves, to augment the garrisons of a city, or to procure a confiderable gratuity, was greatly suspected by me. A certain man gave information of an affembly which was to be held at Puy-laurens in the upper Languedoc; he gave in a memorial of what had paffed there, and likewife affured us, that he himfelf had been present. Another officer or foldier of Quercy prevailed upon Vivant to fend him to the king, because he said he had been solicited by a friend in Perigord. of his at Sarlat to feize Domme; and declared the names of those who had spoken to them both upon this subject: this determined Henry to fend Thémines thither to feize the persons accused. All these informations were afterwards found to be either false, or excessively exaggerated. It was not my opinion that all precaution should be neglected; on the contrary, I was the first to advise the king to fend some truffy persons to reside in Perigord and Quercy. The king, to whom I was not accustomed to speak in this manner, conceived great apprehenfions from it, and I was obliged to affure him I had received no bad news from either of these provinces.

But the method I would have preferred to all these little enquiries, as being both the shortest and most secure, was to give, from time to time, and as occasions offered, examples of severe punishment, such as the arret against the two Luquisses, Provincial gentlemen. It was refolved at the Arfenal, that, before I went away, an attempt should be made to feize them; for which purpose, the king made use of Ranchin, physician to the constable, who amused these mutineers so artfully, that the chevalier Montmorency feized nine or ten of the faction altogether, with their two leaders, and confined them in the prifon of Aiguesmortes: they were so indiscreet, that, amidst the consuson caused by their first surprize, they confessed themselves guilty of carrying on criminal correspondences with Spain. Henry, fully resolved to punish them, sent the chevalier de Montmorency and Ranchin, at their return from this expedition, to Chantilly, to tell the constable that he must come the next day and prepare matters for their trials. It was this plot which made his majesty renew his design of taking a journey this year towards Provence. The report of an armament of galleys being fitted out by the Spaniards at Naples, was a second inducement. However, I saw no greater reason for taking umbrage at this armament now, than before, the Spaniards making almost the same preparations every year, on account of their trade to the Levant.

THE king was likewise informed, that some of the leading men in the affembly, fought only to prolong the time in ufeless debates, to the end that I might quit it through wearinefs, or that affairs of another kind might fuffer by my absence; and to effect this, had resolved to make use of several pretences, such as sending the deputies directly to the king to propose their demands, or to bear their general thanks, as if the affembly was looked upon as ufelefs. Henry ordered Parabere, who was going to his government, to confer with me concerning this report, relying wholly upon my diligence to dispatch the bufiness of the affembly with speed, but at the same time completely. For which purpose, I resolved to take measures, so much the more likely to fucceed, as they flattered the vanity of the deputies. His majesty also commanded Parabere to assist me in my endeavours to discover the authors of these intrigues, but he would not venture to trust him with the fecrets of most consequence; and even when he fent him to me to act in concert upon a certain memorial, he thought it necessary to fend me this memorial by another hand, that I might have time to examine it, and take fuch measures as I thought proper, before the arrival of Parabere. Henry did not act in this manner thro' an apprehension of his failing in his duty, but Parabere had one fault, which is only fo with respect to politics, he could never believe ill of any one; and another, which is generally joined to the former, a readiness to contract friendships with all forts of men, whether ill or well affected to the government: he was never moved with any thing that was faid concerning the French faction; and as often as the king mentioned the duke of Bouillon in his presence, he never failed to justify his innocence, and attributed all the crimes that were alledged against him to the malice of his enemies. It was this prepoffession that made 1605. his majesty, though he discovered all his displeasure against the duke to Parabere, assign his former practices against him as the cause, without giving any hint to him of the more recent proofs he had of his disobedience; it was my part also, to regulate my conduct with Parabere upon this knowledge.

> But fetting aside all that was reported to the king, let us see what really passed in the assemby. The first meetings were as tumultuous and diforderly as I had expected they would be: the difaffected party affiduoufly applied themselves to imbitter the minds of others, and prepare them for fedition, because they thought it would be more difficult to inflame them afterwards, if they fuffered the affembly to take a peaceable turn. They therefore had recourse to their accustomed arts, and industriously confirmed the false reports they had raised, that the king was going to abolish their privileges, cancel their synods, to take advantage of the prefent affembly, to declare all the pensions he was accustomed to give to the ministers of the protestant religion struck off from the accounts of his revenues. Henry, when he complained of the aversion of the protestants for him, and for those whom he employed in affairs of state, used sometimes to say, that they deserved to be deprived of their penfions, offices, and governments. These words were reported to the affembly, as a fixed refolution and a positive declaration.

> As I was not ignorant from what fource those envenomed allegations proceeded, after having represented the falshood of them, I refolutely opposed their making any demands in this affembly, in the name, or on the part of Bouillon, Lefdiguieres, and Du-Pleffis; nor would I suffer any person to speak there, but those that had a claim to that privilege, by their quality of deputies from the provinces. I caused it to be privately intimated to Du-Plessis, that I left it to his choice, either to flay voluntarily from the affembly at Châtelleraut, or to come there as a mere spectator, and as a private man. This mortified him extremely; but he took the first part, either that, despairing of fuccess, he was willing to avoid the blame of any resolutions taken in his absence, although contrary to all his schemes, or that he promised himself some resource, or perhaps vengeance, by procuring an insurrection in the affembly in his favour. In effect, he fo fixed the deputies from Dauphiny in his interest, that they cried out, nothing could be done without him. But I took my measures fo well, that I made the prefence of Du-Pleffis as unnecessary as that of Bouillon. him him I expected no lefs than fuch an inftance of refentment; but that Lefdeguieres should debase himself so far, as to act, by his emissaries, the part of a clamourer, in favour of a man so justly in disgrace with his majesty; he who lately had received a distinguishing favour for Créquy, his son-in-law; this was an instance of meanness and ingratitude that I could with difficulty pardon in him. On all these occasions I saw the utility of having taken proper steps, long before the meeting of the affembly, to secure to myself the best part of the votes.

In proportion as I saw my party increase in strength, I exerted my authority; I cut short all triffing and subtil questions; I insisted upon their proceeding to business, and, above all things, to look upon every thing which related to the royal authority as facred: the violation of that was what Henry most apprehended, and indeed his fears were not wholly groundlefs. It will be an eternal stain upon the reputations of Bouillon, Du-Plessis, D'Aubigné, Constant, Saint-Germain, and some others, but more especially Lesdeguires, that they set their hands to a . paper, the certainty of which has been but too well proved, wherein they laid the foundation of a Calvinist republic, free and absolutely independent of the fovereign, in the heart of France. These terms, indeed, are not used in the writing, they seem to have industriously avoided them; but terms are of no confequence where the thing is plainly meant: and I ask those very persons, what was to be understood by the establishment of a body, the leaders of which were as closely connected with each other, as separated from every one else, and from the provincial councils, to which the fupreme general council gives laws? What was meant by the affiftance they there endeavoured to procure from foreign powers, the obligation they imposed upon all governors and men in public offices, to take certain oaths which were prescribed to them? and, lastly, by their excluding the Roman catholics, and officers particularly attached to the king, from any post, dignity, or employment in the new party? Du-Pleffis, who had apparently fome reason to be apprehensive of my declaring to his majesty the part he had in this writing, thought it necessary, when the result of the affembly rendered the scheme ineffectual, not to incur the danger of being filent upon it; therefore, when he fent an apology to the king for not being prefent at the affembly, he added a formal difavowal of every thing contained in that paper.

This scheme was among the number of those whose execution it is necessary to hinder with as much caution as possible; I was willing therefore therefore, to know whether a great part of the protestant body were made acquainted with it, and continued to adhere to it: I mentioned it to the deputies, but in general terms, under the title of an affociation, and complained of referve and diffruft, which however I made them fensible was not wholly free from blame. Their answer was, that if Henry could live for ever, the protestants, satisfied with his word, would, from that moment renounce all precaution, refign their cities of fecurity, refuse all offers of affistance from foreigners, and consider all particular regulations for the prefervation of their community as useless; but that their fears of finding very different sentiments in his fucceffors, obliged them to take measures for their own security. This bold confession gave me more pleasure than an artful answer would have done; for if the affembly had been concerned in the project, they would not have confined themselves to answer only the literal meaning of my words, but, struck with the secret reproach contained in them, would have endeavoured to justify themselves by repeated protestations, and an absolute denial.

I was convinced therefore, that hitherto the contagion of feditious discourse and wicked examples had spread no farther than those six or feven perfons whom I have named: but it was not fo easy to make Henry believe it, or to remove his apprehensions that the evil would foon become general; he suffered himself to be greatly affected with that blind facility with which the populace received every impression, given them by those whom they looked upon as their leaders and defenders, and the fatal confequence which might enfue from it, if, unfortunately for France, he should die while the Dauphin was yet a child: he fometimes told me, that, on this occasion, my particular interest was strongly connected with that of the public, as being one of the chief officers of the crown, and appointed lieutenant to the company of his fecond fon, if God should give him one, as it soon after happened. But all things confidered, what could Bouillon wandering and despifed, Du-Plessis with his pen, Constant and D'Aubigné with their tongues, be capable of doing against an authority so solidly fixed, as that which Henry was at present in a condition to leave to his son? The uncertainty of the royal fuccession had always been, in my opinion, almost the only danger he had to fear.

I MENTIONED this affair to the deputies of the affembly as opportunities offered, without postponing the principal one which I had brought first upon the carpet, which was, the nomination of the particular deputies. The protestants claimed a right to nominate these deputies themfelves, alledging that his majefty was not concerned in it: but I convinced them of their mistake, by representing to them, that his majesty, as king, ought to have the principal part in an affair which had so necessary an influence upon order and tranquillity, and was so closely connected with the civil government, that, upon the character of the deputies who were chosen, depended in great measure, the good or bad intelligence between the two religions; and this I supported by an example drawn from the thing itself, which was, the artful and disingenuous conduct of some of those who had formerly exercised this employment.

To decide this combat of different opinions, I proposed that the asfembly should determine upon a certain number of persons proper for this office, among whom the king should chuse two he best approved of; and, notwithstanding the repugnance I perceived they had still to this expedient, I did not despair of having it compled with, as I had very confiderable gratuities to dispose of to those who acted conformable to his majesty's intentions. But here Henry himself raised an obstacle, without attending to it: he had judged, by the unanimous opposition the affembly made to this point, that I should never be able to carry it. therefore he wro e to me to confent that the two deputies should be proposed, and chosen in concert by him and the protestants, a concession which only increased the obstinacy of the assembly: for whether his majefty declared publicly the contents of his letters, or that those to whom he confided them did not keep his fecret, all the intentions of this prince were as foon and as perfectly known in the affembly, as in the council itself. Villeroi fent me notice of it, but I knew it before; for this cause, I infisted that Sillery and he should always write to me with their own hands; a precaution which I observed myself, and was fometimes fo much fatigued by it, that I was obliged to refer them both to the letters I wrote to his majesty, which they took care afterwards to burn. However, I carried my point in the affembly; fix persons were to be proposed to his majesty, from among whom he was to chuse the two deputies: and I likewise managed it so as that in these six there should not be one who had given any public marks of disobedience or mutiny. Henry looked upon this fuccess as one of the most important fervices he could have received from me.

SOME of the deputies requested, that a third deputy should be created, and this deputy to be always one of the protestant ministers. It was faid, that Berault used his utmost endeavours to obtain this office, and intended.

intended to come to the affembly for that purpose, though he was not one of the provincial deputies: he had also, it was confidently afferted, many schemes to accomplish, especially in favour of the duke of Bouillon; and he was the person who prevailed upon the affembly at Maustan Prance had still, in all their proceedings, an eye to his person and interest. However, Berault, bold as he was, durst not shew himself upon this occasion, and the proposal was absolutely rejected; as was likewise another, which three or four persons ventured to offer that the protestant party should chuse deputies themselves, which were not to reside near the king, but in some parts of the chief provinces in the kingsom, and correspond immediately with the deputies-general at court. If this scheme had taken place, there would have been a necessity for redoubling our attention to the conduct of these subordinate

WITH respect to the quality of the deputies, his majesty never made any objection, provided they had the reputation of being men of probity and lovers of peace; and upon this, he carefully avoided every thing that had the appearance of constraint, as was evident when it was debated whether governors of fortrefles might be appointed deputies; the king yielded to the arguments urged by the affembly for the negative: and also on the subject of La-Nouë and Du-Coudrai, whom the protestants would not have placed in the list, alledging the absence of the first, and the employment of the second; however, they all afterwards agreed upon La-Nouë. As for me, I gave my vote for excluding Saint-Germain, notwithstanding the extreme desire they shewed to have him continued with Bellujon as his coadjutor. The king neither approved of the latter, nor even of Coudrai; but being willing to shew tome respect for Lesdiguieres, he was enclined to chuse the deputy from the province of Dauphine. Des-Bordes and Marabat were also proposed; his majesty had a long time wished to do something for Marabat, although I affured him he was one of Bouillon's creatures; but he altered his intention, when Marabat, by imprudently fending his two children to the duke of Bouillon, left him no room to doubt of the truth of my affertions; and this alone was fufficient to exclude him from the deputation. Of all that were proposed for this office, there was not one who fo much merited to have all the votes in his favour, as an advocate of Castres, named La-Devése: but the reputation he had justly acquired of virtue and impartiality, was alone fufficient to render him obnoxious to his brethren; he gained nothing but the honour of having merited merited the confidence of his king, who wrote him a letter which I delivered to him with the utmost secrety, lest it should entirely ruin him in the opinions of the protestants. When I became better acquainted with him, I looked upon him as a man, whose knowledge and abilities might be of great use to me. The remainder of July was spent in proposing, chusing, rejecting, or approving the different candidates.

THE choice of the deputies continued to be debated with the fame heat, during the first part of the following month. The affembly renewed their folicitations in favour of Saint-Germain and feveral others, to whom Henry would have even preferred Marabat; but as a detail of these disputes is not sufficiently interesting to deserve any longer time should be taken up with it, I shall conclude it at once, by faying, that La-Nouë having promifed his majefty by Roquelaure and me, that he would break with the duke of Bouillon, and recall his children from Sedan, the king chose him from among the three persons proposed for the nobility, and Du-Cros from those for the gown, who had Lesdiguieres to folicit for him. This choice, which was very agreeable to Henry, and highly praifed by his ministers themselves, was made very feafonably to stop the mouths of some slanderers, who reported that the king, after receiving a letter from me, appeared fo greatly enraged, that it was evident his defign did not fucceed well under my management. One trifling letter ferved them for a pretence to propagate this story. In my answer to Villeroi, who fent me a copy of it, I told him, that there were no perfons who gave fo little credit to this report as those who spread it.

As to the fuccess of this affair, the glory of which was attributed entirely to me, without affecting a misplaced modesty, I shall freely own that I accomplished my defigns, by convincing the greatest part of the protestant body, that they might safely rely upon Henry's intentions and fentiments with respect to them, for the preservation of their persons and interests; and that those few examples of severity, or rather justice, which they complained of, were greatly disproportionate to the injuries he had received from them. I would not have it imagined, that by speaking in this manner, I gave the protestants the least hint of those favourable designs for the party, with which the mind of Henry was then employed: to ferve a prince at the expence of his fecret was to betray him. I was even particularly cautious upon this article with his majesty's ministers; and I don't know that I ever mentioned it in any of those letters I wrote to Henry himself, except one, in Ppp VOL. II.

1605, which I made fome reflexions upon the embaffy to England, that were necessary to the subject I wrote upon: however, I earnestly intreated him to burn this letter, left the fame accident should happen to it as he knew had done to others.

> WHAT his majesty had most reason to complain of in the affair of the deputies, was, that his intention of appointing them himfelf, in the manner we have just seen, being signified to the assembly, seven protestant provinces met together, and sent to consult Du-Plessis upon this resolution, a fault which Henry with good reason attributed to Conthant and D'Aubigné. The last instance which was made by the protestants on this subject was, that the duration of the deputies service with his majesty should be regulated by them, and be expressed in the brevet of election by the king, or at least in the act of nomination : had this been granted, there would have been a necessity for renewing this ceremony every year, and for calling an affembly for that purpofe. These very motives induced the king to refuse it, for which I had already prepared them. At length they received the brevet in the form it was in, but not without returning many times to the charge.

THE affair of the cautionary towns came next under confideration: although the term of eight years, expressed in the brevet of August 1508, given in confequence of the edict of Nantes, wanted yet a year of being expired, yet it was necessary to bring it upon the carpet this year, if we would avoid giving the protestant party a pretence for holding an affembly the next. It is certain, however, that it would not have been proposed at Châtelleraut, on any other terms than to have this matter left entirely to the king, without requiring a promife for three or four years, or a new brevet from his majesty, but that the affembly should be informed in the same way I have just mentioned, not only that they might expect every thing from Henry, but also that I had actually at that time in my possession, a brevet from his majesty for three years, and another for four: and it was upon this account, that the king found himself obliged to grant them a prolongation for four years. It may be alledged, that a year more or less was a very inconfiderable matter; and indeed Henry had no other view in laying a stress upon it, than to accustom them not to obtain whatever they should take it into their heads to demand, and to be contented with those favours he voluntarily granted them: as for what remained, there was nothing more certain than what I had faid to them in the beginning of my speech to the assembly with regard to those those forts. Henry permitted me to inform the deputies, that it was 1605. at my folicitation he granted them this favour.

THE two questions of greatest importance being decided, the affembly might be looked on as at an end; but, as there were alterations to be made in the brevets, of which I was the bearer, his majefty would also have an article added, by which he declared, that the first eight years were to commence from the day on which the edict of Nantes was regiftered in the parliament. Some time therefore was taken up in composing these two brevets, and sending them to Châtelleraut.

During this time, the affair of Orange made noise enough to afford a fubject for public discourse. In order to restore this place to its lawful master the prince of Orange, it was necessary to withdraw Blaccons, Hestor de who held it for the protestants; and here the king made use of Lesdi-Blaccons. guieres, but fo unfeafonably, that I believe all the difficulties which were found in the management of this affair, owed their rife to this choice: any one but Lesdiguieres, whom Blaccons had reason to think his mortal enemy, might have eafily effected it. Blaccons, who had long expected orders to leave Orange, wrote to me, that nothing could prevail upon him to neglect obeying his majesty's commands immediately, but the mortification and difgrace of being obliged to yield his post to a man who would make that ceremony an occasion of triumph over him. In my answer to this officer, I thought I was entitled to give him hopes that his majesty would alleviate the bitterness of this command; and I flattered myself, that if I had been at court, the affair would have been terminated otherwise; but Henry did not write to me concerning it till he had fent Bullion and Bellujon with his commands to Lesdiguieres, which he informed me of in his letter, and defired I would fend the necessary orders for carrying cannon to Orange. I fuspected what had happened when I received this letter, and instantly acquainted the king with what I knew of Blaccons' fentiments. I advised, I even intreated him, to send only an exempt of his guards to Orange upon this occasion, without setting up Lesdiguieres against the man he hated.

My advice came too late; Lesdiguieres, making use of the power the king had given him, liftened to nothing but his hatred of Blaccons, and in an imperious manner fignified his majesty's orders to the governor and inhabitants, adding of himfelf, that if he did not obey them, he would give the king notice of it immediately. In the mean time, he wrote to his majefty, on the 24th of July, that he need not be under any apprehentions, because he knew how to reduce the governor of Orange without raising any commotions in the province. May it not be said, that Lessing any commotions in the province. May it not be said, that Lessing are afraid he should not find resistance enough? Blaccons, who did not expect such an insult, instantly dispatched two couriers, one after another, to the king, to affure him, that he was ready to resign the place to any person his majesty thought proper, although even he were a catholic. His views, by taking this step, were, to prevail upon the king to alter his resolution of sending Lessiguieres, by the advice of those whose interest with his majesty he relied upon, and to suspend Lessiguieres's march, who he did not doubt would be with him as soon as possible. Blaccons had more enemies at court than friends; they thought this procedure shewed a strong disposition to rebellion, and they inspired Henry with the same opinion, which was certainly very kind and disinterested on their side,

THE king, however, notwithstanding all the violent counsels that were fuggested to him, would not proceed suddenly to extremities with Blaccons: he answered him by fending an exempt of his guards to him, who was a protestant, and three or four archers of the guard, who fignified to him, that, till further orders, it was his majefty's pleafure he should put the place as a deposit into the hands of the exempt, and come himself to court, where he might depend upon receiving from his majesty the most honourable treatment, and all the satisfaction he could defire. Henry at the fame time ordered Bullion to tell Lefdiguieres, that if Blaccons submitted to this last order, he was to stay peaceably at Grenoble, and not to have recourse to force, but in case the governor should refuse to obey: for which purpose, he fent him commissions to raise ten companies, consisting of one hundred men each; to make use likewise of five companies of Du-Bourg's regiment, and to increase them from fixty to two hundred men, and cannon in proportion. All these preparations were made in consequence of the courtiers perfuading his majesty, that Blaccons would not submit to his propofal. Lefdiguieres, who had already fent the king word, that the cannon of his province of Dauphiny had no carriages, defired fome might be fent to him; or rather, because that would take up too much . time, that he should be furnished with cannon from the arsenal of Lyons, which might be eafily fent down the Rhone. It was apparent, that he had no inclination to disfurnish his own fortresses. Accordingly the king wrote to me to fend orders to the lieutenant-general of the artillery of Lyonnois and Dauphiny, conformable to the demands of Lefdiguieres. It must be confessed that the king, in his transfactions with the protestants, took such measures as might make it appear to them, that he was wholly guided by justice and moderation. But I could not approve of these extraordinary preparations, nor this needless expence; therefore, though I paid all the respect I ought to do to the orders his maiesty gave me, yet I thought it my duty to oppose the desires of Lesdigueres, especially in what related to the cannon of Lyons, which seemed to be much better in that city than in any one of Dauphiny.

IT appears strange to me, that Henry should be so long without perceiving that Lesdiguieres only fought to be authorised in pursuing, with the utmost rigour, a man whom he hated with inveteracy. He did many things of himfelf, as foon as he thought he had fome appearance of justice on his fide; fo that the state of affairs was quite altered before his majesty's couriers arrived. He was already at the head of a body of troops, within two leagues of Orange, from whence he haughtily fummoned Blaccons to receive him into the city. Bullion, when he returned from Dauphiny, endeavoured to justify Lefdiguieres for taking this precipitate step (to call it no worse) saying, that he did it with an intention to begin immediately making proper regulations in the caftle, to difband part of the garrifon, and fend away fome foldiers levied by the officers of the prince of Orange. It was not indeed furprifing, that Lefdiguieres should thus exceed his commission. Blaccons no longer viewing him in any other light, than as an enemy who profecuted his own particular quarrel with him, gave him fuch an anfwer as obliged him to retire in some disorder to Montelimart. Lefdiguieres, fired with refentment at the difgrace this retreaat brought upon him, observed no regard to truth in the letters he wrote to his majefty to inform him of all that had paffed, but accused Blaccons of every thing his rage could suggest. Blaccons likewise fent a courier to his majesty, with complaints against Lesdiguieres; he accused him with having for a long time fought to make himself master of Orange, by means of a correspondence he carried on with a minister named Maurice. The friends of Lesdiguieres retorted this crime upon Blaccons, which they faid they could prove by a letter he had written to his brother-in-law, at the very time that he was making proteftations of obedience to the king; and that while he fent a polite meffage to Lesdigueres, assuring him he was ready to receive him into the city, he was forming resolutions directly contrary. I would not answer for the truth of either of these accusations.

However that may be, the affembly of Châtelleraut was diffolved. while this dispute retarded the conclusion of the affair of Orange, the arrival of the two brevets, which his majesty had ordered Fresne to fend me, gave great fatisfaction to the affembly; they were dated August the 4th, 1605. it appeared there, that the king granted them to the protestants as a favour which ought to confirm them in the respect and fidelity they owed him. When I delivered them to the affembly, I declared that it was his majesty's pleasure they should break up, after first hearing from me the king's last intentions, that the people might be no longer kept in suspense in the provinces, where I was sensible the different reports concerning the refult of the affembly, gave occasion for commotions like those when two parties are ready to come to blows. I enjoined the deputies, when they returned to their provinces, to give a fincere and candid representation of the manner in which the king and his ministers had acted and treated with them; and to avoid carefully that arrogant behaviour, and that propenfity to flander, which they had shewn in the affembly of Gap I made a recapitulation of all the king's orders and demands, and justified each. I prevented their composing, before they separated, a new memorial of demands; and, in the king's name, exprelly forbad them to call any general affembly without permission: I told them, that his majesty would never refuse them that favour when the occasion required it; but I made them fensible, at the same time, that they must not expect them to be so frequent for the future as they had been. I forgot not to add, that Henry did not thereby intend to prejudice in any manner their right of holding their ordinary conferences and fynods, confined merely to affairs of religion; and concluded with repeating my prohibition to them, to hold any correspondence with persons suspected by his majesty. I was entirely fatisfied with the inclinations I perceived in them; and was not deceived in my conjecture, that the affembly would propose to send a deputation to his majesty, to thank him for the indulgence he had shewn them, and to affure him of their inviolable respect. They were defirous of first knowing, whether this step would be agreeable to his majesty; and the answer they received being such as they had hoped for, the deputies appointed for that purpose set out for Paris to execute their commission.

I LEFT Châtelleraut the same day that the assembly broke up, the king having ordered Sillery to acquaint me that I might do so; and often expressed his wishes for my return, and how necessary my presented his wishes for my return.

fence was to him in the affairs of his council. This prince would write to me once more, though it was only to praise and thank me for the fervice which he faid I had done him. But however folicitous he appeared for my return, yet he gave me permission to visit my estate of Berry, which I did not then think proper to do, because I would not accumulate more business than I was able to dispatch. Such was the iffue of the affembly, which had engroffed the attention of the whole kingdom. When I strictly examined my own fentiments concerning it, I found, that the despair into which my proceedings there had thrown fome of my brethren, did not interrupt the joy I felt for my success; because I was convinced, that I had more effectually served my religion and them by moderate and peaceable measures, than they could have done by their blind and impetuous zeal. Du-Pleffis might poffibly have felt the force of these reasonings in the letter I wrote to him: though my principal view by writing was to shew him his errors. He justified himself in a very studied letter, which he likewise sent to the king, along with mine, to shew that he had not left one of the heads of my accufation unanswered and uneffaced.

I went immediately to give an account of my conduct to the king. His majefly when he left Monceaux, where he had fome flight fits of the gout, had returned to Paris the latter end of July, and from thence went to Saint-Germain to pass the beginning of August; he was there afflicted with a defluxion which fell upon his cheek and teeth, but was eured immediately by having his gums lanced: this indisposition obliged him to drink the waters and observe an exact regimen, which was his most effectual remedy. I found him at Fontainebleau, whither he had come from Saint-Germain; he embraced me twice with great tenderness, and permitted my secretaries and all my retinue to pay their respects to him; and after once more folding me in his arms, he led me into the long gallery of the garden of pines, where we had a conversation which lasted two hours.

His majefty began it by informing me of all the interesting news he had received from foreign countries, and afterwards of every thing that had passed during my absence, either in the council, in the affairs of the snances, or in the court where his domestic quarrels, which were refumed with more violence than ever, made him often wish, he faid, that I had been with him. He questioned me, in my turn, upon several particulars of my journey, especially concerning the dispositions the protestant churches and some of the heads of the party whom he named 1605, to me were in, as I might now have a full knowledge of them. I gave him great joy by the proofs I brought him of a voluntary submission from those persons, which, in all the rest, secured to him an unavoidable obedience: I made it plain to him that Lesdiguieres, whose troops, forts, money, and capacity, were greatly exalted, who diffurbed the tranquillity of his mafter, through a fear that his equivocal conduct would terminate in open rebellion, was nevertheless so weak in every respect, that if his majesty, with an army only of fix thousand men, marched directly to him without stopping at any place, he would drive him immediately to his last intrenchment, where nothing could prevent his falling into his hands. At prefent it was not proper to proceed to fuch extremities with Lesdiguieres, as he had not yet given sufficient cause for it. I represented to the king, that it was now time and of the utmost consequence for the extinction of the rebellion, to undertake fomething against the duke of Bouillon, by using only the precaut on of not putting protestant lieutenants into his towns, in the room of those who were leaving them; I engaged my word, that there was not one of those places which would give us the trouble to batter it with our cannon.

THESE confiderations determined Henry, although still with a little difficulty, to defer no longer his progress into the fouthern provinces of France, which has already been mentioned. His two motives for this journey, and for taking his rout through Auvergne and Limofin, were to feize all the towns belonging to the duke of Bouillon, and make fuch fevere examples of those who were convicted of conspiring against the state, as should stifle, for the future, all seeds of rebellion. For the first, he fent commissions to the duke of Epernon for levying three thousand foot; he added a like number to his regiment of guards, and gave orders that a fquadron of eight or nine hundred disciplined companies of horse, as well gendarmes as light-horse, should be got ready to accompany him: for the fecond, he proposed to hold an extraordinary court, the arrets of which he defigned to have published, and executed by a chamber of justice which he carried along with him, that nothing might retard the course of his justice. These terrible preparations were indeed absolutely necessary in the provinces, where it seemed as if the contagious air of civil broils was concentred, when it was entirely diffipated every where elfe: this step likewise was necessary to bring the business of Orange to a conclusion; nor could it be made in a more favourable time, the affairs of Flanders and England affording him leifure this year, but which could not be of long duration.

I ob-

HOBSERVED to the king, that fince it was necessary this journey should be ended before the month of October was expired, it ought not to be delayed a moment longer. Henry still thought I pressed him too much: however, at length he resolved upon every thing. It was agreed between us, that his majesty should march along the Loire with his troops both horse and foet, while I, with a train of artillery consisting of two cannons, two culverins, and two demi-culverins, should march by Montrond, which is the direct road. Heft to Henry's directions every thing that related to the troops, and returned myself to Paris, to settle the affairs of the council with all possible expedition, and to name the members of the chamber Des grand jours, whom it An extraordinary sessions are cessary to send away first.

AT court, and in the council, it was supposed this journey would king's comterminate in the fame manner as that to Provence had done the year mission or letbefore. The orders which were given for fo fudden a departure, in a feafon still farther advanced, furnished the indolent and fenfual courtiers with a thousand new arguments against it; but when they saw that Henry was inflexible, they prepared to follow him, often curfing the man whom they supposed had given him the council: but it threw the duke of Bouillon's partifans into the utmost consternation, who had not, as may be eafily imagined, used any endeavours to divert the storm. La-Chapelle-Biron *, and Giverfac, who were most faithfully devoted to him, as having received the most Spanish gold, intreated the figur de Fouffac + to go to court, and affure his majefty that they were ready to give him any testimony of their obedience which he should require: it was the people of Turenne only who made any shew of refistance; Rignac f and Bassignac threw themselves into that place. provided it with ammunition, and lodged all the artillery in it upon the plat-forms. These advices were fent his majesty by Foussac and Baumeville, who dispatched the senechal de Brive with them; but all this was executed with fo much terror and difmay, that the king, who had given d'Epernon and Roiffy | orders to advance thither before him with their troops, did not think it necessary to strengthen them with the regiment of guards, as he had at first intended.

Foussac gave also some other informations, conformable to what had been faid by Rodelle, concerning the state of the revolt in the provinces of Limosin, Perigord, and Quercy; and by him it was discovered, that the true cause why a great many gentlemen did not come and throw themselves at his majesty's feet, as they had intended, was, that l'Aubagnac had been fent from Sedan, to diffuade them from taking that step ; and that many of them had also lately received confiderable sums of Spanish money which had been distributed among them by Guienne, The duke of Bouillon, in whose name this money was given, recommended it to them, at the same time, not to be discouraged or alarmed at the preparations which were making against them, since he engaged his word to make things take another turn before October; and that his friends (those were his terms) should fee him sooner than they hoped, and his enemies fooner than they defired : these founding words effectually imposed upon them. Fourfac, however, assured the king, that there had not come more than ten or twelve thousand crowns from Spain; but Bouillon always supplying the want of money with confidence, had given them to understand, that this small sum was sent to them to be distributed amongst their subaltern friends, and that others far more confiderable were referved for them: they were fimple enough to believe him, and after this no longer talked of foliciting for a pardon. The king ordered two hundred crowns to be given to Fouffac for the expences of his journey, and fent him back to continue on the fpot.

HE left Paris himself on the 15th or 16th of September *, escorted by the regiment of guards, and the squadron I have already mentioned, and began his march towards Orleans, while I took the rout before agreed on. He had not got farther than Hallier, before he saw the good effects of his journey: two gentlemen of Quercy named Causte and Brigantin, came to meet him at this place to implore a pardon for themselves, and a hundred and twenty other gentlemen; and that they might in some degree merit it, they offered to discover, in a court of justice, all that they knew of Bouillon's proceedings, and maintain the truth of their depositions at the points of their swords, and at the expence of their blood. These two deputies revealed likewise all the plots which had been carried on by Rignac and Bassignac, in the duke of Bouillon's favour; among others that of seizing Ville-neuve in Agenois, for which Bouillon had not the least plausible pretence. It being at this place that his majesty had first received notice of the attempts made by d'Entragues, to deliver the count of Auvergne from his confinement in the Bassile, as I have related in order; he desired me to meet him at Orleans, which he expected to reach the next day, being Saturday September the 24th, advising me to send the artillery in the mean time to Argenton, through which place he proposed to pass. These orders, however, were not executed, it being impossible for me to go to Orleans: his majesty approved of my reasons; and I gave him in writing the advice he demanded of me, which was conformable to those measures I had always solicited him to pursue with regard to d'Entragues.

HENRY arrived at Orleans on the appointed day, and left that city on Monday the 26th of September: he avoided the road through Berry and Sologne, on account of the scarcity of provisions in that barren country, and the diseases which he was told prevailed there; he therefore marched towards Blois, and from thence to Montrichard, again appointing a rendezvous with me at Loches, expressing an earnest defire to confer with me personally upon the present state of affairs. Hitherto he had not received any marks of submission from the duke of Bouillon; on the contrary, the refistance of Rignac and Bassignac in Turenne, and Sincerai was confirmed. From Metz he had advices, that Bouillon would have affiftance from another quarter; the elector palatine, it was faid, had, upon the report of the king's expedition, fent for his colonels and captains, and the governor of Luxemburg was making preparations and affembling forces. D'Epernon inceffantly preffed the king to advance, and demanded, with some kind of displeasure, officers and provisions for the recruits, which he said he had raifed with great difficulty. His majesty referred this business to me, defiring that I would give proper directions thereupon to D'Escures. or the other officers and inhabitants of those places: and with regard to Bouillon, he held himself prepared for renitance, although he saw no appearance of it hitherto.

In effect, this prince had scarce reached Blois, before he received a courier from the duke of Bouillon, who brought him a letter dated from Sedan, September the 20th, in which, after making his usual protestations of grief for having offended his majesty, and of his intentions to repair

1605. repair his fault at the price of his blood, he declared, that he had never entertained the least thought of disobeying his orders, or resisting his person; that he had given an absolute command to his lieutenants to receive him in all his cities and caftles, a needless order, he added, fince there was not one perion belonging to him who did not look upon his majesty as his fovereign master; that he defired nothing more ardently than to have brought him the keys himself, and, with the utmost humility, implore to be again received into his favour. The king appeared fatisfied with this procedure of Bouillon: however, he reprefented to him, that he ought to have fent Rignac and Baffignac, against whom such heavy crimes were alleged, to have justified their conduct personally. Blanchard was the man whom Henry was most desirous of feeing, as there was no person in the world who had a greater share of Bouillon's confidence, he being his steward, or was better acquainted with the steps of the whole party; but he did not appear: Henry therefore thought he ought not to discontinue his march, at least till he came to Limoges, that he might fee how far the duke of Bouillon's lieutenants would carry their obedience. However, Blanchard arrived at Blois before his majefty left that city; and what added to the king's fatisfaction, he came voluntarily, and with an intention to obtain his pardon by making a faithful confession of all he knew.

In effect Blanchard unfolded the whole mystery of the plot; he acknowledged, that, feconding with all his power the bad intentions of the duke his mafter, he had been always obliged to have recourse to the mean artifice of exaggerating facts, enlarging views, and making promifes a thousand times greater than he well knew could ever be performed: fo that the execution of their defigns had always been as remote, as they had affected to fay it was near. Blanchard's deposition appeared to his majesty to be of such consequence, that he ordered him to give it him in writing: and now he began to be convinced of the justness of my opinion, which he had so long opposed, namely, that the duke of Bouillon's party made all this noise, only because they could do nothing more. Notwithstanding this, Henry would neither stop nor lay down his arms, till his will was complied with without any restriction. He remembered to have heard it said among the protestants, that the places the duke of Bouillon possessed did not belong to him, but to the whole party, having been given as cautionary towns, and held as fuch by officers of the reformed religion: he feared therefore that he might make use of this pretence to keep them, and thought it the securest way not to disband his troops, till Villepion, whom he had appointed to take possession of Turenne in his name, had been received into that capital of Bouillon's. I had written to La2Caillaudiere that he might dishand the cavalry: his majesty made me revoke this order, and in the beginning of October, left Blois and proceeded to Tours, having again altered his design of marching through Montrichard and Loches.

THE conveniency of the river and castle of Plessis, determined the queen, who had attended his majesty to Blois, to go as far as Tours with him. The king, when he informed me of this alteration in his march, fent me word that, as foon as this princess had left him to return to Paris, he would continue his rout through La-Haye as far as Châtelleraut, where I had appointed to meet him. In proportion as his majesty advanced, all difficulties fell before him: Villepion was received without the least disturbance into Turenne; and before Henry reached Limoges, all the other towns depending on the duke of Bouillon, were yielded in the fame manner to the officers his majefty fent thither to represent his person. All this was conformable to the duke's example, who continued to declare loudly, that he had no hand in the commotions of the province, and that he had been accused through mere calumny. Baffignac diftinguished himself by his obstinacy; for, cutting his beard, and diiguifing himfelf, he fled through Geneva to Sedan.

Nothing more remaining to be done by arms, the chamber des grand jours began the exercise of its office: the king would not stay for the conclusion; he was weary of Limoges, after a stay of eight days there, and rode post to Paris. He lest me in this province, invested with his authority, as well in criminal matters as for disbanding the troops, which kept me ten days after him. We went back to the source of the rebellion, by endeavouring to discover the first authors of it; and so successful were our inquiries, and the effects of them, that all remained peaceable for the future. It was thought sufficient to behead ten or twelve of the most active of the rebels, among whom, those of greatest note, were the two Luquisses, gentlemen of Languedoc, who have been already mentioned; and * Meirargues, a kiniman of the ber; his body was quartered, and fixed over the principal gates of the city, and his head was carried to Marfeilles, where it was faftened on the head of a pike over the chief gate. The king ordered the Spanish

I have no reason to doubt. but, that after these examples of rigour, the hatred of the protestants against me was wound up to its utmost pitch. I cannot but complain of this unjust prejudice, which however did not extend to all: Theodore Beza was my friend, and his approbation alone was fufficient to comfort me for the causeless malice of a thousand others.

> This venerable old man, who exercised the function of a minister at Geneva, was seized with an illness towards the latter end of this year, in the eighty-feventh year of his age; his diftemper, which before the eclipse* of the fun, which has rendered this year memorable, was but very flight, grew fatal from that moment, and a few days after put a period to his life: he preserved, till the last moment, the full force and vigour of his mind, in a body weakened by infirmities and exhausted by age; he ordered his attendants to lift him out of his bed, and then, with the utmost fervour, he offered up his prayers to God, and in the most earnest and pathetic manner; exhorted all those who were present to a performance of the duties of religion and holiness; after which, he was again laid in bed, where he expired without pain, nature being quite worn out in him: he did not forget me in his last moments: and thinking that he owed me fome acknowlegment for the vifit I paid him at Geneva, and the fervice I did him, when I prefented him to his majefly at the head of the other deputies from his city, he defired Deodati to present a book to me in his name, intituled, The treasure of piety; this was the New Testament, translated by him, fecretary to be fet at liberty, without waiting for the determination of the question, at that time strongly debated, whether it is right to give up to the course of justice, an ambaffador, refident, or any other foreign minister, who violates the law of nations. + This eclipse happened on the 2d of October, according to M. de Thou, and on the 3d, according to the Mercure Franc. at one o'clock in the afternoon; it contimued two hours, and for half an hour it was as dark as possible: Le Grain says, that during an hour and an half, one could not, without difficulty, read or write without a candle. L'Etoile was freer than M. de Sully from the popular prejudices, in regard to eclipses: " Many strange maladies of 46 different kinde, fays he, raged in Paris "at that time; and, together with the " eclipse, which happened on the 2d of 66 this month, eclipfed many persons who " have never been feen fince : dyfenteries, " especially, were very dangerous and mor-" tal to those who happened to be attacked 66 by them, and more in other places than " at Paris; few of them escaping." Anno 1605. The same author says, that Beza died the day after the eclipfe. with with notes, which, together with the other versions, both antient and modern, formed a complete work: this he inscribed to me, and in the epistle dedicatory gave free scope to the savourable sentiments he entertained of me. Decodati punctually performed his last commands, and in the month of November sent me the book, with a letter, from whence these circumstances are taken.

I SHALL conclude my relation of his majesty's journey with that of a quarrel which happened between me and the count of Soiffons, followed by another with the duke d'Epernon. The count having taken offence at fomething which the king had done or faid to him when he left Paris, thought proper to revenge himself upon me. I had, as has been observed before, left my train of arttillery, to take the direct road to Limoges, that I might meet his majesty at Châtelleraut. The count of Soissons ordered his harbinger to go to the quarter-masters, who were then employed in marking out the king's lodgment, and ask them which was referved for me, and to take possession of it for him, in spite of all opposition. This was not so easy to be done as faid. A great number of gentlemen of the province, who knew the rights of a governor as well as myfelf, being prefent when the count's harbinger was preparing to execute his orders, they prevented him, without even acquainting me with what they had done. The count did not fail to complain to the king of this indignity, which he faid his honour was concerned to refent; and, as an aggravation, added, that I had caused his harbinger to be beaten.

The king, who knew his humour, gave him but little fatisfaction; but the count made so much noise, and afferted the fact so positively, that Henry sent D'Escures to me to know the truth. All I knew of the matter, which I told him, was, that upon receiving information of what was doing, I went to the place destined for my quarters, where I found above fifty Poitevin gentlemen, who all together exclaiming against the unjustifiable procedure of the count's harbinger, had made use of threats to prevent his going farther. The count of Soisson still institled, that it was a designed insult upon him, and demanded justice of the king. He found none to take his part; and Henry, by all the arguments he could think of, endeavoured to convince him that his complaint was groundles: he told him, that all governors have a right in their provinces to take place of every one but the king; and that I, as grand master, had the additional right of claiming the next quarters to the king, when he marched in the body of the army; therefore it could be no encroachment to have only part of those quarters, when the whole is at the disposal of the grand master; no one pretending any right, or fixing on any part of it for himself, without my permission; and for this reason the quarter-master had put to mine the accustomed mark which secures his to the king; these are the words, For the king: the count of Soisson's harbinger therefore ought to have abstained through respect.

None of these reasons having any weight with the count of Soissons, there was a necessity that Henry should think of some expedient to satisfy us both; and this expedient was, that when I came, as usual, to pay my respects to the king, I should make my compliments likewise to the count, and offer him, through mere politeness, my quarters; which the count, returning my civility, should refuse: this was accordingly done, but it was on my part only; for the count, making use of a mean artisce, from whence he afterwards derived a still meaner occasion for boast, suffered me to make all these advances, without any return on his side, and took possession of my quarters, because I could not decently unsay what I had said. But this joy, and the railleries which enhanced it, lasted no longer than till the next day.

As he was passing through the street where I lodged, followed only by two gentlemen (for he was going to hunt along with his majesty) he found the street filled with gentlemen, to the number of two hundred, who were waiting till I came out to mount my horse, and who, as foon as they faw him at a distance, crouded together, as if for diversion, so close, that they left no passage for the count; and his equerry, not being able to open him one, was obliged to cry out, Make way, gentlemen, make way for monfieur the count: but they, raifing their voices all together, talked fo loud, and fo confufedly, that the equerry could not make himfelf heard; fome of them muttering at the fame time, that it was never known that a governor of a province was dispossessed of his lodgings in a place where he represented the king's person. The count was obliged to wait a quarter of an hour before he could get room to pass. And for a farther aggravation of his misfortune, not one of these gentlemen saluted him. This was a new subject for complaint to the king. His majesty told him, he was forry for what had happened, but could do nothing for him, fince he must not expect that, in complaifance to him, he would make enquiries among four or five hundred gentlemen for the persons who offended him, when he could point out no particular man; they at the fame time supposing they had some right to take this revenge upon him, for an infult injurious to them all.

THE count of Soiffons found no one to take part in his refentment but the duke of Epernon, who was himfelf then violently enraged against me on the following occasion: the Rochellers hearing that his majesty would pass near their city in his march, sent a deputation to him of their chiefest citizens, as a mark of their gratitude and respect. was the person to whom they applied; therefore the king ordered me to conduct them to audience, which he gave them in the presence of the whole court: they told his majesty they were come to intreat he would honour them with his prefence in their city, fince he was so near it; affuring him, that although he was at the head of an army of catholics, he should not be received with less respect and submission, than when he came formerly at the head of the protestant troops; and that if their gates were not wide enough to admit him and his train, they would throw down three hundred fathoms of their wall, fince his repeated bounties enabled them to rebuild it. They then prefented the keys to him, with fuch fincere expressions of joy and affection, that the king was melted even to tears, embraced them thrice, and afterwards, entering into a familiar conversation with them on the times past, assured them, that in him they might always depend upon finding a protector of their liberty, and a zealous preferver of their privileges.

As I was going away at the conclusion of this ceremony, I met the duke of Epernon, who coming to wait upon the king, asked me what was doing? and I, without reflecting upon his question, answered it directly: but I was surprised to see, that at the recital I made him, his countenance was overspread with rage and disdain; and, a moment after, to hear him ask me, haughtily, whether I assumed any right in the government of Rochelle? and by what claim I took upon myself to present the deputies from that city to the king? I never thought it any meanness to give my friends satisfaction, in cases wherein my conduct might appear doubtful to them; I therefore told him, that it was in the quality of an antient friend of that city, and by his majesty's command, that I had presented the deputies to him. He replied, with the fame emotion as at first, that Rochelle being comprehended in his patent for governor, the king, the Rochellers, and I, had equally injured him. I could not help telling him, that the VOL. II. Rrr Rochellers 1605. Rochellers would look upon his pretensions as very fingular, but that it was from them, or rather from the king, that he was to defire an explanation and not from me, fince I had only acted by his majefty's orders, and without any intention to encroach upon the rights of other perions.

> SAYING this, I quitted him coolly, and he went to Henry to tell him the cause of his disgust: he returned more diffatisfied than he went, and all the resource he had was to mingle his grievances and complaints with those of the count. The malicious things they faid of me on this occasion, which I had convincing proofs of, was the cause that I afterwards took D'Ornano's part in a quarrel which happened between him and d'Epernon, during the king's flay at Limoges. This increased d'Epernon's rage, and a third difgust which he received from me completed it: he demanded affignments for the payment of the ammunition bread, furnished by the cities and large towns for the foldiers he had levied. I thought it my duty to acquaint the king before I complied with this request, who, knowing as well as myself that this money would remain in d'Epernon's purse, instead of being delivered to those to whom it belonged, gave me orders to refuse him. This was the rock upon which our reconciliation, our mutual promifes of friendship, and those connexions which had been capable of giving umbrage to the king, were all fplit and deftroyed.

AT my return from Limoges, I went to give his majesty an account of the use I had made of that authority he had confided in me : we had now a longer conversation together, than at my return from Châtellerant, and upon the very fame subject, policy and the quarrels at court. I found him this time also at Fontainebleau, whither he had come to pass the month of October and part of November; the queen was there also: the king and she met as they entered the court, she in her litter, and he on horseback, for he had rode post. He lost La-Riviere, his first physician there, whom he greatly regreted: he gave his post to Du-Laurens *, who was already first physician to the queen, and looked out for another for that princefs. I did not stay long at Fontainebleau; a thousand different affairs called me to Paris, where 1605. Henry had consideration enough to leave me a long time, without commanding my attendance on him.

Fontaine-

I have yet mentioned but fome part of those affairs queen Margaret had to communicate to me, in our interview at Cercote. As she proposed to quit her castle at Uson and reside in Paris, she was desirous of having my advice upon this occasion, and to know if she should be well received at court; whither it was necessary she should go, to prove that she did nothing without his majesty's consent. I assured her, that their majesties would receive her with the utmost respect; for I was well acquainted with their sentiments in regard to her. A bare affurance would not fatisfy her; she insisted upon my engaging my word as a security, which I did without any hestation; and she, on her fide, promised to be governed wholly by my advice. After these mutual engagements, we separated; I took the road to Châtelleraut, and Margaret that of the castle of Madrid, where she intended to lodge.

HENRY, befides the inclination he had to oblige this princefs, who well deserved that he should contribute to her satisfaction, had another reason for consenting that she should leave Usson*. He was extremely defirous of having this old caftle in his own possession, as its situation, in a very suspected country, might make it one day a convenient retreat for the rebels, as the castle of Carlat had been. The king proposed to throw down this castle if it should be judged not worth preferving; for this purpole, he ordered me to fend a faithful and intelligent commissary to the castle of Usion as soon as queen Margaret had left it, and to give him an exact information of the condition it was in at prefent, but that he should not discover with what intention he went. However, La-Varenne, coming foon after from queen Margaret, declared to Henry, that it would give her great trouble, if the castle of Uffon was demolished so soon after her departure; upon which the king wrote to me to defer fending the commissary thither till he had feen that princess. This fecond order would have come too late, if happily the person whom I had resolved to employ, and who was one marquis de Canillac carried her off from this caftle, and flut her up in the caftle of Ufflon, which place pleafed her fo much that the fixed her abode there, though flue was left at liberty to quit it whenever flue thought proper.

* She had lived there near twenty years. On her leaving Agen, from whence file made her ofcape diguifed in the habit of an ordinary citizen, riding behind Lignerac, the went to live at Carlat, a cassle belonging to a gentleman called Martas. The 1605. of the best engineers in the whole body of the artillery, had not been indisposed, which obliged him to put off his journey for some days.

> THE arrival of queen Margaret, and the kind reception Henry prepared to give her, occasioned some of those idle slanders which the foolish populace are so fond of propagating. The wifest way being to feem ignorant of them, the king made no alterations in those honours he was resolved to pay her. As soon as she came to Paris, he fent M. de Vendôme and Roquelaure, to pay his compliments to her, till he could vifit her in person, for he was then at Monceaux: the queen also sent Châteauvieux in her name to this princess. On the 26th of July, Henry went in person to visit her, to Bois de Boulogne *, where the then was, having only paffed through Paris. His majesty went

* From thence she went to live in the palace of Sens near the Ave-Mary; she afterwards hired a palace in the fuburb of Saint-Germain opposite to the Louvre, where the continued till her death. This princefs has been fo much abused in the libels of that time, that one might be induced to accuse MI. de Sully of partiality, in the praise he every where bestows on her in his memoirs, if his tellimony were not confirmed by our best historians. The author of L'Histoire de la mere & du fils, on their authority, speaks of her in the following manner. "Her degradation in point " of rank, was fo amply made up by her a goodness and the royal virtues she pos-" feffed, as to render her still greatly re-" foected. Like a true heirefs of the illustrious " house of Valois, she never bestowed a " gift on any one, without making an " apology for giving so little; the was the refuge of men of letters, loved to hear " them talk, her table was conflantly fur-" rounded with them, and fhe learned fo " much from converfing with them, that " fhe spoke better than any woman of her " time, and wrote more correctly than most " perfons of her fex are capable of doing. " In fhort, as charity is the queen of all virtues, this great princefs crowned hers 46 by giving alms, which fhe did with fo " liberal a hand to all who flood in need of them, that there was not a religious " house in Paris which did not feel the " effects of her bounty, nor one poor per-" fon who had recourfe to her that did not " meet with relief; therefore God out of " his mercy repaid her with ufury, for that " which she shewed to his people, giving " her grace to make a truly christian end." &c. vol. I. p. 326. This is furely fufficient to compensate for a small number of levities and human weaknesses, which are the utmost of what this princess could ever be charged with. If any one is defirous of feeing further what has been written for oragainst her on this head, let him read messieurs De Thou, Dupleix, Mezerai, father Daniel, father Hilarion de Coste's elogium of illustrious ladies, Bassompierre, M. Bayle's dictionary under the word Uffon, and an infinity of other writers. She died on the 27th of March 1615, at her palace in the Fauxbourg-Saint-Germain, which has fince been demolished: the was interred in the church of the reformed Augustins, fince called the Little Augustins, which had been founded by her. " She was greatly regreted," fays the Memoirs of the Regency of Mary de Medicis. " being a princess abounding in goodness " of heart, eagerly fond of the welfare " and repose of the state, who did no harm " to any one befides herfelf." Thefe few words, I apprehend, are sufficient to give us the perfect idea we ought to form of her character, and fufficiently agree with what M. de Sully fays of her.

at feven o'clock in the evening, and returned at ten. This interview paffed with equal fatisfaction on both fides. The king fpoke of the caffle of Ufion to this princefs: the confented to what he propofed; and, in that whole affair, he never did any thing without first knowing whether it would be agreeable to her. On the 28th of the same month she came to Paris, to pay her respects to the queen, who came to the Louvre to receive her: she afterwards, on the 4th of August, went to Saint-Germain to see the Dauphin, and staid there four or five days with their majesties. Henry had no greater pleasure than the company of his children, as his frequent journeys to Saint-Germain sufficiently proved. Queen Margaret returned to Bois de Boulogne on the 11th of the same month, greatly affected with their majesties obliging behaviour to her.

By the orders which she gave to her officers who remained at Ussion, Barenton, who was sent thither by his majesty, found no opposition, and was put in immediate possession of the castle. He drew up a memorial of the state in which he found it, and brought it to the king, who, persisting in his resolution of dissinantling this castle, ordered me to send an engineer or commission of attillery there as soon as possible for that purpose. I was commissioned to thank queen Margaret in his name, for the chearfulness with which she had made this surfice, and to pay her the full value of all the stores and ammunition which were sound at Ussion, which Margaret had destined for the payment of the garrison she maintained there; if that princess did not tather chuse to give her soldiers these stores and provisions themselves.

I SHALL conclude the memoirs of the prefent year with an article, which I am already certain will have the approbation of all just and fensible persons; and for which I am also as secure of their acknowledgments. In all the principal cities of the kingdom, especially those which have arsenals and academies, there are also for the young nobility schools, in which are taught all kinds of sports and exercises, as well military, as those designed merely to form a graceful carriage, and give strength and activity to the limbs: and these exercises are no where more carefully cultivated than at Paris, where the spacious courts of the arsenal, destined to this use, are full almost every hour in the day. I was always of the same opinion as Henry concerning these exercises: he often afferted, that they were the most folid soundation, not only of discipline and other military virtues, but also of those noble sentiments, and that elevation of mind, which give one nation the pre-eminence over every other. I used to be present at them myself, when I could steal a moment from business, as well through the taste I had for such amusements, as because I thought my presence would excite a laudable emulation amongst the youth.

One afternoon in carnival time, when these sports were most frequent, I left my closet to shew myself to this assembly of young men, and came very seasonably to prevent the consequences of two quarrels, which, from that mistaken notion of honour to which France has made herself a slave, were likely to have been very satal. These quarrels had taken their rise from a trisle, as it generally happens with the greatest part of those which have been followed by the most bloody catastrophes; but the king (I am grieved to say it) took so little care to enforce the observation of the edicts published by some of his predecessors, against that barbarous custom of duelling, that every day, and for the slightest occasions, some blood was shed.

I THOUGHT it my duty to endeavour to convince thefe young men who crouded about me, of the error they were in with regard to true valour; "It is, faid I to them, in fields of war, and in actions which "have the fervice of our country in view, that courage is permitted to be shown; that which arms us against our friends, or countrymen, in contempt of all laws, as well divine as human, is but a brutal fierce"nefs, madness and real pusillanimity." I perceived, that the moral I endeavoured to inculcate appeared very strange to these young men, who were carried away by the heat of blood and ardour of youth: one of them, who, it was apparent, sought to give himself consequence with his fellows, replied, that princes having at all times permitted, nay authorifed duels, they had passed into a custom, which holds the place of a law.

I CONTENTED myself for the present with making the youth sensible that he supported his argument upon salse and erroneous principles, and with preventing the challenge from proceeding any further; but as soon as I retired, I gave free course to my reflexions upon the singularity of an abuse, unknown to the most polished, and at the same time bravest people. These reflexions, when thrown upon paper, composed a kind of memorial, which I thought it my duty to present to the king.

Duels, it is true, are of long standing in France, and indeed in Europe, but in that part only that has been overwhelmed by barbarians, from whose time this hateful custom takes its date, and appears therefore to be derived from them; and if histories of times more remote, fuch as that of the emperor Otho the first, and that of the divorce of Lothario, gives fome inflances of fingle combat, they may be opposed by prohibitions of equal antiquity, iffued out by the power of the church, as that of the council of Valentia in 855, or by temporal authority. We have in France a very ancient edict, which forbids them in all civil causes, and in criminal causes limits them to five cases; high treason, rape, house-burning, murder, and nightly thefts. Saint Lewis * afterwards took away all restriction; and when Philip the IVth, his grandfon, feemed to restore them, 1303, in charges of state crimes, rapes, and house-burning, to which he reduced them, he was incited only by a motive at once deferving praise and censure; the hope of abolishing infensibly this custom of bloodshed, which had gathered strength in his time, by confining it to these rare cases set down in a positive law: to make this more evident, he forbad all manner of persons to allow them, by receiving what was called pledges of battle, and declared that right referved to himfelf alone.

To shew, by explaining the difference between the ancient duels and those of our time, what a number of nameless abuses have crept into a practice, which itself was from its first original a corruption, it will be sufficient to lay down the circumstances and formalities which were observed in those times.

In the first place, no body, however offended, might take vengence in his own right; and as it is now practifed in the first emotion of caprice and passion, and much less in mere bravado, which, in my opinion, is of all things the most contrary to the laws of society. They had their judges, before whom he that thought himself injured in hishonour, was to give an account of the wrong suffered, and demand permission to prove, in the way of arms, that he did not lay upon his

* On the subject of these edicts of Saint Lewis and Philip the fair, as also of the origin, manner, and whatever has relation to fingle combats, consult the writers who treat of it; such as Paul de Montboucher feur of la Rivaudiere, in his Treatise on the ceremonies and laws of challenges and fingle combats, &c. in 1608; John Savaron fieur of Villars, in his Treatife against duels, with the edict of Philip the fair, in 1610; Brantôme, in the tenth volume of his Memoirs, intitled Touching Duels; D'Audiguer, Du-Piex, Ruauld, Bafrage, &c. and many other Italian.

1605. enemy a false accusation. It was then considered as shameful to desire blood for blood. The judge, who was commonly the lord of the place, made the person accused, appear likewise before him; and never allowed the decision of battle, which was demanded by throwing a glove, or fome other pledge upon the ground, but when he could get no other proof either of guilt or innocence.

> THE pledges were received, and the judge deferred the decision of the quarrel to the end of two months, during the first of which the two enemies were delivered each of them to common friends, upon fecurity for their forthcoming: their friends endeavoured by all forts of means to difcover the person criminal, and to give him a sense of the iniustice of maintaining a falshood, from which he could expect nothing but the lofs of his reputation, of his life, and of his foul; for they were perfuaded, with the utmost degree of certainty, that heaven always gave the victory to the right cause; and therefore a duel, in their opinion. was an action of which the event could be determined by no human power. When the two months were expired, the two rivals were put into a close prison, and committed to the ecclesiastics, who employed every motive to make them change their defign. If, after all this, they still perfisted, a day was at last fixed to end their quarrel.

> WHEN the day was come, the two champions were brought fashing in the morning before the same judge, who obliged both of them to declare upon oath that they faid the truth, after which they suffered them to eat; they were then armed in his presence, the kind of arms being likewife fettled: four feconds, chosen with the same ceremonies, faw them undreffed, and anointed all over the body with oil, and faw their beards and hair cut close. They were then conducted into an inclosed ground, and guarded by armed men, having been made to repeat, for the last time, their affertions and accusations, to see if they perfifted in them without alterations. They were not even then fuffered to advance to the combat: that moment their feconds joined them at the two ends of the field for another ceremony, which of itself was enough to make their weapons drop from their hands, at least if there had been any friendship between them. Their seconds made them kneel down in this place facing each other; they made them join hands, with the fingers of one put between the fingers of the other; they demanded justice from one another, and were conjured on each side not to support a falfity; they folemnly promifed to act upon terms of honour, and not to aim at the victory by fraud and inchantment. The seconds examined examined their arms piece by piece, to fee that nothing was wanting, and then conducted them to the two ends of the lifts, where they made them fay their prayers and make their confession; then asking each of them whether he had any message to send to his adversary, they suffered them to fall to, which they did at the signal of the herald, who cried from without the lifts, Let the brave combatants go. After this, it is true, they sought without mercy, and the vanquished, dead or alive, incurred all the insamy of the crime and the punishment; he was dragged upon a hurdle in his shirt, and afterwards hanged or burnt, while the other returned honoured and triumphant, with a decrete that attested him to have gained his suit, and allotted him all manner of satisfaction.

There is throughout all this ceremony fomething wild and ridiculous, but, however, the voice of reason, authority, and prudence, is still heard, tho' its dictates are utterly mistaken; whereas there is nothing but monstrous unreasonableness in the practice of those smart youths, who withdraw slilly into a field to shed the blood of one another, with hands impelled by no better instinct than that which instigates a beast of prey. If men went to fight with the same coolness and deliberation as in former times, can it be imagined that there would be the hundredth part of the duels that now happen? But men have thought it necessary to dissins consideration from that action, which is serious above all others: some rush blindly into this danger, others please themselves with being born for the destruction of their fellow creatures; others revive the hateful trade of the gladiators, and are indeed more dreadful and contemptible than the men that bore that name were heretofore.

The forms of duels which were observed in Germany, differ not effentially from those of France, which I have described: they were likewise received in Spain and England; only he who yielded to his adversary upon a fingle wound was reputed infamous; he could not afterwards either cut his beard, bear any office, wear a weapon, or mount a horse. On the contrary, he who died in a couragious defence was buried honourably. Another singularity, which must have kept duels from being common in Germany, was, that there were only three places where they could be fought, Witzbourg in Franconia, Uspach, and Hall in Swabia.

I COULD not wait for his majesty's return to Paris, to communicate to him the memorial of which I have now mentioned the contents; to inform him of the accidents to which this practice gave occasion; and to defire him to put a stop to an evil which was every day spreading by his indulgence. I intreated him to attend to the counsel which I had prefumed to give him, to renew the edicts against duels, to aggravate the punishment considerably, and execute it severely; and to forbid all men to profecute any word of injury or offence otherwise than by course of law; but to manage so, that the justice obtained might be freedy and fatisfactory; to make the complainant easy, and the aggressor penitent; and lastly, to have this new order fixed up, at the beginning of every year, in the courts of the Louvre, the palace, the arfenal, and in other places that were most frequented *. It is certain, as I represented to his majesty, that a reputation for personal valour, fuch as this prince had established, was able to give to an edict concerning duels, twice the authority that it could derive from mere royal pleafure, but the pleafure of the master of kings, a power far superior, did not allow to the reign of Henry the Great, the extirpation of this abuse.

IT may be faid, without pretending to justify this prince, that his easness with respect to duels proceeded from a habit contracted by his long wars, by which he saw bloodshed without emotion; and that he was likewise not much less indifferent about his own blood. He had always some notion that the last moment was inevitably predetermined: this opinion he disguised to himself, under the christian notion of resignation to God. There was sent me from Rome, about that time, an account of a conspiracy against the state, and an attempt upon the life of the king, which I thought I ought to disclose to him, though it seemed to me worthy to be despised, as indeed he despised it. He told me, on that occasion, that he was convinced of its being best for his happiness to ply no manner of regard to intelligence like this +, and that otherwise his life would be worse than death; that the calculators

* If we attentively read what cardinal de Richelieu has faid on this fubject, in his Political Teffament, part I. chap, iii. § 2, the title whereon is, Of the means to prevent duch; we must own, that great minister feems to have drawn all his resections on this matter from this and other parts of

of nativities had threatened him, some, that he should die by the sword; and others by a coach: but that none of them had ever mentioned poifon, which seemed to him the easiest way to dispatch him, because he eat a great deal of fruit of all kinds that were offered him, without having them tasted; therefore, upon the whole, he gave himself up to the Lord of his life and of his death.

It was not possible but speaking in this manner, Henry reckoned a little, without perceiving it, upon the good fortune that had accompanied him as well in the dangers that particularly threatened his person *, as those which regarded his kingdom and happines. Of eight persons from whom he had most to sear in this latter respect, he remarked that some savourable planet had freed him from six of the most considerable; that one was dead in the hangman's hand, and two others of sickness; the fourth was actually in prison; the fitth was gone into voluntary banishment; the fixth was reduced to flatter him whom formerly he endeavoured to destroy. For the other fort of good fortune, we have seen examples throughout this history: but, alas! this good fortune was not complete; but an unhappy moment for France, as well as for the prince, has wholly blotted out that idea of prosperity.

* Henry IV. escaped one, on Monday the 19th of December; of which M. de Perefixe gives the following relation. "The search and any on which Mairargues was executed, an unfortunate madnam made an attempt on the facred person of the king, rushing on him with a poignard in his hand, as he returned from hunting one the Pont-neus. His majesty's footmen running up obliged him to quit his hold, and were going to beat his brains out on the spot, had not the king forbid them, and ordered him to be imprisoned in Fort-L'Eveque. His name was John De-Lisse, a native of Vineux

" near Senlis. He was immediately afterwards examined by the prefident Jeaninin, who could not get any rational anfwer from him; for he was entirely out of his fenfes: he fancied himfelf to be

HE king and queen being at Paris on the first day of this year. I went to the Louvre in the morning, to pay my respects to them, and offer the usual presents. I did not find the king in his own chamber; L'Oserai and Armagnac told me, that he was in bed with the queen, and that, probably, both were still asleep, because the queen's indisposition had kept them awake almost the whole night. I passed on to the queen's apartment, to enquire of La-Renouillere and Catherine Selvage the state of their majesties health; and knocked at the door as foftly as possible, that I might not wake them. I found that the courtiers were already admitted; for feveral voices, which I knew to be those of Roquelaure, Frontenac, and Beringhen, asked all at once, Who is there? and when I answered, I heard them say to the king, Sire, it is the Grand Master: " Come in, Rosny, said his majesty to me, you " will think me lazy, till you know what has kept us fo late in bed: " my wife, who believes she is in her eighth month, having had some " pains as she was going to bed, I was apprehensive that she would " have a dangerous labour; but towards the middle of the night they " proved to be only the effects of the cholic; and the growing eafy we " fell asleep, and neither of us waked till fix o'clock this morning; but " on her part, with groans, fighs, and tears, for which the has affigned " ima-

" imaginary causes: I will tell you what they are when some of these " people have left the room, for you will not fail to speak your fenti-" ments freely, and I believe your advice will not be unufeful on this occasion, any more than on many others of the same kind. But, in "the mean time, let us fee what you have brought us for our new-" year's-gifts, for I perceive you have three of your fecretaries with " you, each loaded with a velvet bag." "I remember, fire, replied I, " that when I last faw the queen and your majesty together, you were " both in very good humour, and believing that I should find you " still fo, and in expectation of another fon, I have brought you a " great many new-year's-gifts, which, from the pleasure they will be " received with by those persons among whom I shall distribute them " in your name, will afford you great fatisfaction; and I could wish this " might be done in the presence of your majesty and the queen." " Though the is filent, replied the king, and plays the dormoufe, as " usual, yet I know she is not asleep; but she is offended both with " you and I: we will talk of this when only you, Renouillere, Be-" ringhen, and Catherine are prefent, for they know fomething of the " matter---but let us fee your gifts." " These presents, said I to " his majefty, do not express the state of a grand master of the ord-" nance, nor are worthy of the treasurer of a rich and powerful mo-" narch; but, fmall as they are, they will nevertheless give more joy to those on whom they are bestowed, and will produce you more " acknowledgments, glory, and praifes, than the exceffive gifts you " lavish upon persons who I am well assured thank you only by com-" plaints full of ingratitude." " I understand you by half a word, replied Henry, as you fometimes shew you do me: but let us see-" your prefents, and talk no more of what you have heard."

I THEN ordered my three fecretaries to approach. "Sire, faid I, here is Arnaud the elder, who carries in this bag, which holds the papers of the council, three puries of gold medals." I showed them to the king, and explained the motto, which expressed the affection of the people for his majesty. "One of these puries, sine, continued I, is for yourself, the other for the queen, and the third for the dauphin; that is to say, for Mamanga *, if her majesty does not keep it herself, as she always does. In this bag likewise are eight purses and madam Elizabeth of France, to madam de Montglat, there is one from the young dauphin to his fifler, in which her tells her, be kiffes Mamanga's hands.

1606. " of filver medals, flruck in the same manner, two for your majesty, w two for the queen, and four for Renouillere, Catherine Selvage, " and fuch other ladies of the queen's chamber as you shall please to give them to. Arnaud the younger has in his bag five and twenty " purses of filver medals, to be distributed by the Dauphin, madam " de Montglat, madam de Drou, and mademoifelle de Piolant, among "the nurses, and other women attendants on your children, and " among the queen's maids. And in the third bag, which Le-"Gendre carries, there are thirty little bags, of a hundred crowns each, " in demy-franks, all new, and so large that they look like whole " ones; these are for presents to the queen's maids, and the women " of her chamber, and those belonging to the children of France, ac-" cording to your orders. I have left two large bags in my coach, to " the care of my fervants, full of douzains, all new likewife, and " each bag worth a hundred crowns, which make twelve thousand " fous; these are to be divided among the poor invalids who are upon " the keys of the river near the Louvre, which I am told are almost " full. I have fent thither twelve of the most charitable men in the " city to range them in order, and distribute the presents. You cannot " imagine how much these trifling new-year's-gifts, in little pieces " new coined, will please these poor men, and the queen's maids and women of her chamber: they all declare, that they do not regard " these gifts for the value, but as being instances of your regard for "them; especially the queen's maids, who say, that what is given "them to purchase cloaths they must lay out as directed, but these " hundred crowns they may lay out in what trifles they please, which " is more to their tafte." "But, Rosny, said his majesty to me, will " you give them their new-year's-gifts without making them kifs you " for them?" "Truly, fire, replied I, fince you once commanded " them to kifs me, I am under no necessity of using prayers and in-" treaties, they come very willingly; and madam de Drou, who is " fo devout, only laughs at it." " Ah! Rofny," continued Henry, with the same gaiety, " since it is so, pray tell me truly, who kisses " you most willingly? and which of them do you think the hand-" fomest?" " Faith, fire, returned I, I cannot tell you, I have no " leifure to think of gallanty, and I believe they take as little notice " of my beauty as I of theirs: I kis them as we do relics when we " present our offerings." The king could not help laughing aloud; and addressing himself to those who were present, "What do you think, said " he, of this prodigal financier, who makes fuch rich prefents out of " his master's pocket for a kiss?" After diverting himself a few moments ments with this thought, "Go to breakfast, said he to the courtiers, "and leave us to confer a little upon matters of more importance."

Every one retiring but Renouillere and Catherine, the king gently pushing the queen, "Awake, you dormouse, said he, give me a kiss, " and groan no more, for all our little quarrels are already forgot by " me; I am folicitous to keep your mind eafy, lest your health should " fuffer during your pregnancy: you imagine, purfued he, that Rofny 44 favours me in our little difputes; but you would be undeceived, if " you knew with what freedom he fometimes tells me truths: and tho " I often refent those liberties, yet I am not really offended with him of for them; on the contrary, I should believe he no longer loved me, " if he ceased to make me such remonstrances as he thought were ne-" ceffary for the honour of my person, the good of my kingdom, and " my people's happiness; for be affured, my dear, added he, there " are none so just and so upright, who would not wholly fall, if, when " they began to stumble, they were not supported by the good coun-" cils of prudent friends and faithful fervants: and to convince you " of the truth of what I fay, know that Rolly has been continually " telling me, for these fifteen days past, that you are in your eighth " month, and that I ought not to discompose you, for fear of hurting " your fon, for a fon he infifts upon it, it is "."

This good prince, affuming an air still more tender and obliging, intreated her to to tell him, before me, what was the cause of her waking sighing and in tears. The queen at last, turning to him, faid, that her grief was occasioned by a dream, which seemed to consisting what had been predicted to her a few days before, but that her mind had been relieved by weeping. She then, in her turn, intreated the king to spare her any farther uneasiness, at least while she was withchild, and to avoid giving vent to such expressions, "which, faid she, "make me, as well as others, believe, that you are happier in the "company of other persons than in mine, and those too, pursued she, "whom I well know are not only unfaithful to you, but hate you

* The aftrologers had foretold it, fays L'Etole's Journal, and that the queen's life would be in danger. She was happily brought to bed of a daughter on the 10th of February. Henry IV. in order to comfort the queen (for fhe paffionately defired to have a fon) faid to her, with his usual gaiety, that if this daughter fhould not happen to meet with a proper ellablidment, there would be many others in the fame condition; and that if her mother had not bore a daughter, the would not have been queen of France. 1606. "in their hearts; I know the reason also, and I appeal for the truth of this to M. de Rosny, whose word I will take."

I AVOIDED this explanation, by answering in a general manner, that it gave me great joy to fee their majesties open their minds thus frankly upon their little quarrels; that I found it would not be difficult to put a final end to them for the future, if they would ferioufly refolve to yield to fuch means as would be used for that purpose, by persons who chose rather to serve their true interest than sooth their resentment. This proposal was accepted immediately, and they defired me to propose those means; the queen faying, that she was resolved to make use of them, and the king, that they would be highly agreeable to him. I then declared to their majesties in plain terms (having first convinced them, that any other remedy would end only in talking and acting to no purpose, as had hitherto been the case) that there was only one way of gotting rid, at once, of all the occasions of these perplexities; that fince they had reason to distrust their own steadiness, in taking and keeping refolutions, they should make choice of some person for this bufiness, who during the determination, and afterwards, should take the whole upon himfelf, and act as if the king and queen were abfolutely without concern in it. I advised them to chuse a man steady enough not to let himself be shaken by any consideration, and capable of such pure and honest affections, as to serve them, when the case should require, by opposing their inclinations.

I discovered not the least inclination to be employed in this business, which indeed was not very agreeable; but I assured their majesties, that if it was upon me they cast their eyes, they must begin by being absolutely filent with respect to the means they saw me make use of; and that, to give me a security that my work should not be destroyed by any return of disgust, they should oblige themselves, in the most folemn manner, not to oppose any thing I should do, nor to preserve any resentment against me, although one of the parties, and perhaps both, must, by admitting the remedy I should make use of, do some violence to their inclinations. I believe they guessed what this remedy was *; and I may venture to affert, that if they had agreed to my proposal, no human consideration should have hindered me from tains, and the like number over the feas, as he expresses himself.

* M. de Sully has acquainted us with it before, in the advice he gave the king, to fend four or five persons over the mounpurshing it; but I had good reason to fear they would not suffer me to proceed thus far. However, the king replied, that he was ready to sign this engagement; but the queen, finding herself pressed, durst not venture to make any promise; she said she would consider of it; or otherwise, I must tell her what it was I intended to do. Yet she knew my intentions as well as the king, but was assaid of the consequences of a compromise. So we did nothing afterwards but talk of that matter to the wind; for such it is to discuss with a serious air the trisling projects of the court, which have been already so often exhausted and worn out. It was through complaisance for their majesties that I consented to engage in this business, they having earnestly pressed me to it. I withdrew upon the queen's calling for her shift, and the king for his cloatlis.

The king and queen made my wife and I very confiderable prefents, in return for my new-year's-gifts; we likewife received fome prefents from queen Margaret. All the time the king flaid in Paris was fpent in balls, mafquerades, and diversions of every kind. January the 10th De Thou. this prince came to the Arfenal, it being very fine weather, to see a Merc. Fr. course of running at the ring.

WHEN the entertainment was over, Henry led me into the great walk in the gardens, where leaning against the side of the balcony, I heard him with pleasure begin a serious conversation upon his political defigns; the motto of my medals, with which he was greatly pleafed, had turned his thoughts upon that fubject. I had before perceived for fome time, that Henry began to be more and more perfuaded of the necessity and importance of this political plan; and that he every day removed some obstacle to the execution of it: he used often to say to me that Philip III. had not profited by the wife councils of Philip II. his father, to look upon all those vain-glorious ideas of universal monarchy, with which his predeceffors heads had been intoxicated, as fo many idle chimera's: he added, that this prince, by all his proceedings, had made it evident he had not renounced them, and that there was not one among all the princes of Christendom, who would be exempted from the attacks of this proud and infolent monarchy, till it was made to feel its own impotence of power by that great blow, the defign of which I had first hinted to him, and to the king of England; and which, as he owned, had not made all the impression on his mind it ought to have done. I believe the proceedings of the chamber Des grand jours in the former year, contributed most to this firmness TOL. II. Ttt

I MAY venture to affirm also, that the conversation we had together upon this fubject had a great share in the resolution he had now taken; and indeed it was not possible for a prince, though he were ever fo inattentive to his own glory, to reflect upon all which an infatiable avarice and boundless ambition had in these later times induced the house of Austria to undertake, without being seized with indignation. That Raoul de Habsbourg, whose noblest exploits, when his election to the empire was declared to him, had been to lead fome foldiers into the neighbourhood of Basil, during the factions of the Etoiles and the Papequais, was never easy till he had divided Alface between himself and the city of Strasburg; and afterwards increased his little domaine with the dutchies of Austria, Stiria, Carinthia, and other hereditary lands which are still possessed by his family in Germany. From the beginning of the fourteenth century, when this happened, down to our own times, how many states, what an immense extent of country, has not this all-engroffing house devoured? the kingdoms of Spain, those of Naples and Sicily in Italy, the ifles of Sardinia, Majorca, and Minorca, Bohemia and Hungary in Germany, Burgundy, Flanders, and all the Low Countries; add to these, the acquisitions she has made in the eaftern ifles, and in the new world, equal almost in extent to all that is discovered of the three other parts of the earth. Can we still doubt then whether Charles V. who raifed her to fuch an exalted pitch of power, intoxicated with fuch fuccefs, did not feriously think of swal-

Is there a necessity to bring any other proofs of this vain scheme for univerfal monarchy than the destruction of the German protestants. the conquest of Tunis and Algiers, the invasion of France, so openly declared by the irruption made into Provence, and by the famous fiege of Metz; enterprifes formed at one time by that monarch? And if we have feen this project blafted, to what can we attribute it, except to different circumstances, and obstacles raised against himself by the precipitation of a mind which, in the intoxication of fuccess, thinks every thing poffible? Charles V. undertook too many things at once, and those greatly beyond his strength; he engaged in those enterprises without caution, and almost without any preparation; he braved earth, sea, the elements, and feafons. Soliman, who made head against bim in Europe, Europe, Asia, and Afric; Francis the first, Henry the eighth, the Pope, the kings of Navarre, Tunis, and Algiers, were enemies he despised, and whom he scarce took any notice of: he knew not how to manage the only resources which remained for him; his own subjects rebelled against him in Spain, Flanders, and Sicily: at length when he acknowledged his error he found no other remedy for it but an effort of despair, which made him abandon all, to confine himself to the gloom of a cloitler. I never drew this picture to Henry without adding, that Philip the second, as ambitious as his father, but a better politician, had refumed all his designs, and might possibly have succeeded in them, if his private views upon France, England, and Ireland, had not been crossed by the sucky chance that had brought together two such able heads, as those of Henry and Elizabeth*.

I HAD always been apprehensive of the effects of the courtiers suggestions, and the persuasions of the queen. This princess was continually representing to the king her husband, the advantages of a double alliance with Spain; the affirmed, that if France was united with Rome, and the two Austrian branches, it would be an effectual way to extinguish all factions in Europe, and that policy as well as religion dictated this method. Henry affured me that this fort of conversation, which had prevailed at court for fome time, no longer affected him; and if he sometimes heard and answered such discourse, like one who fought to convince himfelf by making folid objections, it was only to hinder those persons from penetrating into his designs, and to flatter them with the hope of gaining him over to theirs, till a proper time came for taking off the masque. We agreed that matters were not yet ripe enough for that; and this conversation concluded, as many others on the same subject had done, by agreeing that, till that moment arrived, it was Henry's part to continue his endeavours for drawing into this affociation, the princes of Germany and Italy, the dukes of Bavaria and Savoy, the former especially, by the prospect of gaining the imperial crown, and the latter by the hopes of acquiring Lombardy, and the regal dignity granted in favour of a marriage betwixt his eldest son and the eldest daughter of France.

1606. THE king could think of no other means to remove those obstacles which he had reason to expect the duke of Bouillon would raise, than to reduce him to reason, by seizing the city of Sedan. This expedient Henry's own mind fuggested to him; and he resolved upon it so much the more willingly, as he could undertake this expedition without creating any suspicion of his other designs. He ordered to prepare immediately a train of artillery, proportionable rather to the reputation of that place, than its real ftrength, which this prince did not know quite fo well as myfelf: he declared to me, that he was refolved to march thither in person, unless he was prevented from it by the gout or some other indisposition, in which case he would commit the conduct of this enterprise to me; and that I might join together the authority and dignity fuitable to the high employment I exercised, his majesty offered me that moment, and indeed commanded me to accept the rank of duke and peer, defiring me to tell him from which of my estates I would chuse to take my title, that he might order Villeroi to make out the patent immediately.

I HAD refused this dignity before when the king sent me ambassador to England; but, fince that time, the repeated bounties of this indulgent mafter had removed the obstacle which hindered me from taking advantage of his favourable intentions; and finding likewise that this prince wished me to be raised to this rank as much for his own interest as mine, I accepted this new favour with the highest acknowledgment. I named the lands of Sully for my title, and the patent for it was figned on the 12th of February, fealed a few days afterwards, and registered on the last of the same month*. All the lords of the court, and the greatest part of the grandees of the kingdom, were pleased to accompany me when I went to the parliament for the ceremony of my reception, which was ftill further honoured by the presence of all the princes of the blood, except the count of Soiffons; the great chamber, the hall, all the galleries, and the very courts themselves were so full, that there was scarce room to move. I carried fixty persons of the highest quality home with me to the Arsenal, where an entertainment of flesh and fish was prepared for them, and was most agreeably surprised to find his majesty, who went thither during the ceremony without giving me notice of his intention. "Grand mafter," cried the king, as foon as I entered, "I am come to the feast without being invited; shall I 1606. "have a bad dinner?" "It is possible you may, Sire, I replied, fince "I did not expect to be honoured with your presence." "I assure "you I shall not," returned the king, preventing my acknowledgments, "for while I waited your return, I visited your kitchens, "where I have seen the finest fish imaginable, and ragouts in my own taste; and because you staid too long, I have allayed my hunger with "some oysters, and drank some of your wine of Arbois, which I think is the best I ever tasted." The king's gaiety heightened the pleasure of the entertainment; and the rest of the day was passed to the entire satisfaction of the guests.

His majesty fent for me the next morning, and, in the presence of all the courtiers, asked me whether I had remembered to make a memorial of the train of artillery for the attack of Sedan which he had mentioned to me: it was already drawn up; and when I left my closet I put it into my pocket. I now prefented it to the king, who caused it to be read aloud, by which means the courtiers were acquainted with the king's defign; who afterwards humorously faid, that the duke of Bouilon, though a naturalifed German, had not probably forgot the French language, but that if it was fo, we might teach it him in a little time by this method. His majesty then seeming to expect my advice concerning this war, I told him that I did not think the duke of Bouillon had fo little judgment, as not to be sensible of the vast disproportion betwixt his majefty's forces and his own, or fo imprudent as to expose himself to the danger of knowing it by experience; that I had a long time foreseen his city would not hold out against the cannon; and knowing this better than any other; I was affured that, if he made any shew of refistance, it was only with a hope that, during that time, he might employ more successfully the arts of negotiation; yet that I took the liberty to advise his majesty to write once more to the duke of Bouillon, and let him know that, in the present conjuncture, he might come with full fecurity and throw himfelf at his feet, and be very certain that, upon this submission and more exactness in keeping his word for the future, his pardon would be granted and himfelf treated as formerly; but that if he refused this last favour, he must no longer expect to be received upon any terms of composition. After this I continued to give the king an account of the preparations I had made; the king approved of the hint I gave him, to fend away only the body of the artillery from Paris, and to take up the ammunition and other necessary provisions in places nearer Sedan, to fave the expences of carriage.

This affair was not pushed on as vigorously as I had expected it would, on account of the great opposition it met with at court, where the least preparation for war seemed to give as much alarm as it could do to the enemies themselves. Nothing was talked of but the difficulties to be encountered before a town, the fortification and fituation of which every one exaggerated to Henry, and of the inconveniencies which would attend a fiege as long as that must inevitably be: to hear them, one would have imagined that heaven and earth were interested in favour of Bouillon and his city. They contrived that a memorial on this subject, in the form of a letter, should fall into his majesty's hands. full not only of abfurdity but impertinence; the king thought the ftyle of it refembled that of the Duke of Bouillon, with some strokes of Du-Pleffis and Tilenus: it was not furprifing that the particular friends of Bouillon or the protestants should talk in this manner, such as Montluet, La-Nouë and the two Saint-Germains, who might think the whole protestant body concerned in this business; but it was strange that persons who had no connexion with the duke of Bouillon, and even others who understood fortification, as the engineer Erard for instance, should never mention this defign but to shew the impossibility of executing it: it would be very difficult for me to believe that these persons wished well to the undertaking.

THE king himself fell into an irresolution which was wholly incomprehenfible to me; I often represented to him, but in vain, that he would, by this procedure, give all the advantages of the cause to persons who, having neither arms, hearts, nor hands, depended upon this refource alone: and it is certain, that the duke of Bouillon would not have feen matters carried fo far as they were, but because he persuaded himself upon the report of his friends at court, who gave him intelligence of what passed there, that his majesty would never carry his defigns into execution. Another expedient which those persons made use of. was to tell the king that the duke had no intention to refift him, but that he could not refolve to appear weak and fearful before perfons, who, inflead of making him a faithful report of his majefty's intentions, feemed folicitous to widen their difference by threats and infults; that if, instead of those persons (and here I was certainly meant) his majesty would be pleafed to treat with him, by men proper to inspire him with a confidence in his promifes, he would be foon convinced of the truth of their affertions. Montluet * and La-Nouë, among others, boafted that they would, without any difficulty, bring him back to his duty; therefore the king thought the beft thing he could do was to depute them to him: they brought back nothing but words, and those general and ambiguous; yet this did not open Henry's eyes, because they likewise represented to him that Sedan, by the new fortifications which were raised there, was absolutely impregnable. I know not whether they really were carried away by this false opinion, or only affected to appear so: but Henry, instead of hastening his preparations after this answer from the Duke of Bouillon, discovered more plainly, that he thought the success of this attempt very doubtful.

I LIKEWISE reflected feriously upon the disposition in which I saw the king, and began to fear, that when by supporting him against the general outcry, and against his own apprehensions, I should have embarked him in the enterprise; upon some unforeseen difficulty which he might probably meet with, or by not having influence enough over his mind already strongly prepossessed, he might abandon it after great noise and expence, or possibly listen to proposals for an accommodation with the duke, upon conditions neither fuitable to his person or dignity; in which case it would be better either not to engage in the attempt, or to find, while it was yet time, some other way to save his majesty's honour. I was very sure, that the reproach of making useless armament, could not fall but upon me; that I should be accused of having done too much or too little, and that faults absolutely contradictory to each other would be imputed to me from the same persons: I concluded, that it was necessary Henry should of himself come to fome determination; and I was willing to fee what would be the refult of his own reflexions.

The Gan therefore to speak less frequently, and with more coolness than before of the enterprise of Sedan, and observed the same conduct in public: the king was one of the first who perceived this alteration; and as he did not endeavour to penetrate into my reasons for this behaviour, or thought that I had changed my opinion concerning the duke of Bouillon and Sedan, it came into his mind that, having myself restlected more deeply upon the advice I had given him, I now tacitly retracted, it, perceiving that the blow I was aiming against one of the heads of the protestants might fall upon the whole body, by opening a way to oppress, one after the other, all who supported them in France. From this thought, which was already firmly established, Henry easily passed to a belief that I had no great reliance upon his equity, or that my attachment to my religion carried me too far: he declared this fuficion to feveral perfons whom he knew to be my friends, and in order to have it cleared up by myfelf, he came to the Arfenal. I was then confined to my chamber, by the wound I had formerly received in my mouth and neck, from whence iffued a splinter of bone, some lint, lead, and some grains of gunpowder, still so fresh and so little altered, that they took fire when laid on some burning coals.

HENRY turning the discourse upon the duke of Bouillon, " I think, " faid he, you are not so solicitous about this affair of Sedan, as you " were some time ago, nor so firm and sleady in your resolves con-" cerning it as I have known you to be on other occasions, where far " greater difficulties were to be expected; what is the meaning of it? " tell me treely I entreat you, and do not conceal any thing from me." This prince, by an effect of the liveliness of his temper, did not give me time to reply, but proceeded to discover the notion he had entertained of my alarms and apprehensions with respect to the protestant body in France. He protested with great earnestness against the suspicion of his labouring to ruin the chief protestants one after the other; he appealed to the knowledge I had of his fentiments, and asked whether it was not true, that it was generally known that, in whatever concerned the fervice of his person and his table, he chose rather to trust himself in the hands of the protestants than the catholics; and he affured me also, that he had no personal hatred to the duke of Bouillon; that he would require nothing dishonourable of him; in a word, that he would make me judge of the manner in which he ought to be treated.

I was pleafed to hear the king speak thus, and affured him, that I was well convinced of his favourable sentiments for the protestants in general, and for me in particular; yet I owned, that the suspicion he had entertained of me with regard to the affair of Sedan had given me uneasiness: I declared to him the true cause of that coldness he taxed me with; and, having afterwards exhausted all the reflexions which the mind could suggest on this occasion, I disclosed one to him which had occurred to no one but myself; and this was, that the expences Bouillon had been at in fortifying Sedan having entiely exhausted his sunds, and probably involved him in great debts, this might be the real cause of his not yielding to his majesty's desires, fince, if he resigned Sedan to him, he would deprive himself of the only resource he had to retrieve his affairs; and this supposed, perhaps all that was necessary to bring the affair to a happy conclusion, was to offer the duke of Bouillon a fum sufficient to pay his debts. I repre- 1606. fented to the king, that if, by giving Bouillon two hundred thousand crowns, he might be prevailed upon to accept all the other conditions. his majesty would be still a gainer of fix hundred thousand, fince the expence of the armament he was preparing could not amount to lefs than eight hundred thousand crowns. A new motive for treating Bouillon with the utmost rigour of war, if he obliged the king to attack him, was to declare not only the principality of Sedan, but the vifcounty of Turenne likewise reunited to the crown; although he pretended to hold them both of France in the same manner, as they do the great fiefs of the crown: I added, that unless his majesty did this, he would have the mortification of having made advances, for which afterwards nothing could make amends. It should feem that it was a kind of forefight of what happened, which made me infift so earnestly upon this alternative, either to fliew an extreme indulgence before the enterprise was begun, or, when we had once taken up arms, an inflexible resolution.

The king replied, that to enter into a negociation with Bouillon, would be to confirm him in the opinion, it appeared by the letter already mentioned he entertained, that his majefly durft not attack him: he confented, however, to let me try this method in concert with the princes of Orange * who was then at Paris, and that we should send Du-Maurier † to the duke with dispatches, the purport and terms of which he left wholly to me. "But you must likewise promise me, added "Henry, that, if he should not accept the offers you make him, you will serve me impartially in this affair, and in the manner you have done before," pursued he, instancing the siege of Amiens, the campaign of Savoy, and other enterprises of the same kind. This I faithfully promised. "It is enough, said Henry, taking my hand, "I am satiffied, and will rely entirely upon your capacity and fidelity." Saying this he left me.

I WENT the next day to the princess of Orange, and concerted with her the manner in which we should both write to the duke of Bouillon. We settled the deputation of Du-Maurier, and the matter of the infructions which were to be given him. This is the subtance of the letter I wrote to the duke; I began by calling to his remembrance the power and personal abilities of the present king, both as well known to himself as to me; and I intreated him to reflect well upon the advantages they gave him, fince this was the furest way to avoid the dangers with which he was threatened, and to prevent being blinded by his own prejudices, or carried away by the violence of his paffions. This was not indeed to flatter, but, as I told him, it was to give him a clear notion of what he might expect, and to prevail upon him to follow the advice offered him by the princefs of Orange, and by a man who folicited him as a friend, not to reduce himself to the necessity of giving to force, what nothing but his own obstinacy would hinder him from granting to conditions dictated by the utmost gentleness. I did not enter into a detail of the proposals, but informed him, that Du-Maurier was commissioned to make them to him personally; besides which, we had reduced to writing all that he had to fay to him in our names. that nothing might be forgot or mistaken. I prevented the objections which I supposed he would make, that his majesty did not appear. to have any part in the propofals we made him, by giving him my word of honour, and even offering to become furety, if necessary, that his majesty would ratify whatever should be agreed on betwixt us; adding, that I was willing to be branded with the names of base, perfidious, and dishonourable, if every article was not performed. I concluded with earnestly intreating him not to suffer matters to come to an extremity. This letter, which exactly agreed with that written by the princels of Orange, was dated the 1st of March.

THE duke of Bouillon answered by a letter, dated the 4th of the lame month: he told me, that he had received a letter from me, as likewife one from the princes of Orange; that he had heard what Du-Maurier had to fay, and read his paper attentively, but that he had reason to complain he should be obliged to purchase the king's favour by a meanners which would render him unworthy of it; that what was promifed him was only by a writing, which could be known but to a small number of persons, while all France would be witness of his humiliation, and the little regard the king would afterwards have for him; that his friends whom he had confuted, and who were not fo inconfiderable for their number as has been reported, were all of his opinion; that his majesty was very far from having those favourable thoughts of him which he had been made to hope for, fince he diffrusted his fidelity so much as not to allow him to keep a place of to little ftrength as Sedan. And here he added, but with more confidence, and in contradiction to what he had just faid, that he was well informed informed there were persons who attempted to impose upon his maiesty, by promising to make him master of Sedan in less than a month, and without the loss of one fingle man. Bouillon, no doubt, congratulated himself here on the ingenious way he had found to give me the lye in speaking to myself. The whole letter was in this strain of complaints without foundation, and protestations of innocence, equally vague and uncertain. He took care to avoid making any confession or promife; and all that he faid to the purpose, after this idle preface, was, that if he had given the king any cause to be offended with him, rather than aggravate his fault by denying, he was ready to make a frank confession of it, and to submit to any reparation his majesty should require, provided it was not expected the return of his favour and confidence should cost him his poor inconsiderable city, which he was ready to declare, in an authentic manner, he held only from his goodness; but that if the king perfifted in his resolution to deprive him of it, he should be forced to believe, that though his words expressed kindness, vet his actions testified hatred.

Bouillon's letter to the princess of Orange was conceived almost in the fame terms; and what Du-Maurier related from himself having nothing more fatisfactory in it, the king began to confider the duke of Bouillon as wholly untractable. I thought it necessary, however, to answer his letter: I told him that his majesty was displeased at the manner in which he had refused the offers he had made him by me; that he had thought his letters full of diftrust, doubts, and expressions very difrespectful to him; belides his affectation of not answering precifely to what was proposed to him. I added, that I was truly grieved my advice would have no other effect but to imbitter his mind, as it had happened formerly, when I wrote to him upon the imprisonment of marechal Biron; but that the time would come, and perhaps it was already near, when he would be fensible that the counsel I had given him was in the present conjuncture the best that could be offered; and I warned him, for the last time, to think seriously of it, and earneftly entreated him to take fuch a refolution as would be most for his true interest, fince nothing (whatever he might think to the contrary) would give me more fatisfaction.

In the mean time I had found means to get a plan of Sedan drawn, both of the upright and the ground-plot. The king came to the Arfenal to look at it, and brought with him the count of Soiffons, the duke of Epernon, the marechals Briffac, Fervaques, Bellegarde, and Uuu 2 Roquelaure.

Roquelaure, Don John de Medicis, De-Vic, Montluet, La-Nouë, Boësse. Nerestan, D'Escures, Erard, and Châtillon, who had drawn the plan, but whom I had expressly ordered not to give his opinion before fo many witnesses. The fituation of the place, its strength, and the form of the attack, were subjects for endless debate among so many persons: Montluet, La-Nouë, and Erard, maintained with great obstinacy, that it was impregnable, and could only be reduced by famine. All this while I scarce made any answer, though they generally addreffed themselves to me, and often demanded my thoughts of those terrible fosses, all cut in the rock, for so they alledged they were.

> THE affembly separating without taking any resolution, I waited upon his majesty the next day; and after telling him my reason for keeping filence the day before, which was, that among fo many perfons fecrecy is but ill kept, I made him fenfible, that none of those diligent observers had attended to any of the defects in the fortification, among which were, the valley of the fountain, that of Ginmenés, the fosses, which in some places were not defended by the natural rock, but flanked with earth brought thither for the purpose; and the two approaches by the river fide, one above and the other below, fo spacious, that I affured his majesty I would lodge, and that with very little danger, all the troops within two hundred paces of the city, and even under the counterfcarp of the artificial ditches, because that the turning of the valleys would cover them from the discharge of the small arms, while the befieged would not be able to shew themselves upon their parapets, nor fcarcely in any other place, without being perceived from the eminences in the field, which so absolutely command the whole body of the fortification, that we might have a full view of the infide of the lodgments, from before, behind, and of each fide: and I gave his majesty my word, that within the eighth day after the batteries were raifed, I would put him in possession of Sedan.

> This once the king believed me, and in the joy that transported him he flew to impart it to messieurs de Medicis, de La-Force, De-Vic, de Nérestan, and Boësse, whose discretion he was well assured of, and who greatly praifed my caution. After this, Henry no longer hefitated whether he should attack Sedan, but prepared to set out as soon as posfible, at the head of a body of cavalry, and some companies of the regiment of guards; while I, in the mean time, affembled the rest of the troops in a body, and fent away the artillery before; taking care that the country people and citizens should receive no insult, or suffer the leaft inconvenience, by the quartering of 60 great a number of 1606. foldiers.

The defign of falling upon the duke of Bouillon could not fail to raife murmurs among the proteflants; and it is probable, that the duke depended upon a general infurrection in his favour. If this was the cafe, he was deceived in his expectations; to which, I confefs, I contributed. I took occasion, from a letter that Parabere wrote to me upon this subject, to give in my answer a kind of manifesto, which might justify to the proteflants the king's proceedings, and shew that the duke of Bullion suffered only through his own fault. It was for this reason that I took much more pains in the composition of this letter, and extended it to greater length, than I should have done if Parabere only had been to see it; for I suspected, and with reason, that it would be made public.

I BEGAN with enumerating the chief favours which Bouillon had received from his majesty, who had preferred him to the prince of Condé himself, made nim marechal of France, first gentleman of the bed-chamber, and raifed, before any other of the protestants, to all honours and dignities, rewarded with penfions and appointments much larger than what were given to the others, his penfions, falaries, &c. amounting to one hundred and twenty thousand livres a year; besides which, his majesty had married him as advantageously as he could have done his own fon or brother; favoured him in the fuccession of Limeuil, and, after the death of the duchefs his wife, supported him with all his power: this particular I was myself an ocular witness of, and I fpoke of it as such. To all these acts of kindness, and these repeated benefits, I opposed the ingratitude with which Bouillon had behaved to Henry; his fecret practices, his feditious conduct at the fiege of Amiens, his retiring from court when marechal Biron was arrested, and his leaving the kingdom, which was attended with circumstances more than fufficient to condemn him. I took Parabere to witness, that notwithstanding all this, himself, Constant, and I had been greatly inftrumental in foliciting those favours which his majesty had since been still willing to bestow upon him: I observed to him, that Bouillon had in some fort confessed himself guilty of high treason, by his requesting a full and general pardon; and when his majesty appeared ready to grant it, eluded all by a subterfuge which was in itself a crime; for he, tho' a fubject and domestic of the king, from whom alone he held the principality of Sedan, refused to hold it upon the same conditions of protection 1606. protection which the late duke of Bouillon had accepted from Francis II.

I AFTERWARDS enumerated all the conciliatory methods which fome of his chief friends had fent Du-Maurier to propose to him, with full affurance that his majesty would consent to them, namely, that it should be proposed to the king, that Sedan should be considered as one of the cautionary cities given to the protestants; that the duke should fell it to the king; or if not, that La-Nouë should be made governor of it, the fovereignty, and even property, remaining to the duke: but that while the king offered him more than he had reason to expect, he would listen to nothing, and, by his ill-timed obstinacy, obliged us to draw our fwords against each other, and to reduce the church of Sedan to the extremity it would be shortly in: that his majesty was so greatly affected at this misfortune, that he had refolved, and even faithfully promifed the deputies from the church, to make no change, or introduce any innovation in the religion of Sedan, although he should take it by ftorm. I concluded with earneftly intreating Parabere to do me justice in public, as to the purity of my intentions, and my grief at beholding one, who professed the same religion as myself, running so blindly upon his destruction.

HENRY thought it necessary to use the same precaution with the protestant party. Bouillon having made, by La-Nouë, some proposals not fit to be received, the king published and answered them by a writing which was distributed among the duke's friends, tho' at the hazard of confirming both him and them in their belief, that his majefty was defirous of ending this affair by gentle means; and they accordingly gave out, that the king now despaired more than ever of the fuccess of his enterprize; to which Bouillon added (as being reported to him by La-Viéville, D'Arfon, and Du-Maurier, who were deputed to him at different times) that it was I who thus rashly engaged his majefty, against his inclinations, in a war; and that I one day boasted to this prince, I would take Sedan in three months, by attacking it on the fide of Fer-a-Cheval. This last report indeed was true, and made the king begin to reflect upon the pretended fidelity of those he had admitted into his councils; for when those words escaped me there were none present but the king, Don John, and Erard. Bouillon accordingly confidered and treated me as one of his most dangeous enemies, who endeavoured to suppress every favourable thought which arose in the mind of his majesty for him. It was the king's part to answer this reproach, and he did it in the manner I wished; and as for those other reports, which were still more infolent, he resolved to force Bouillon soon to change his style.

His majefty left Fontainebleau the latter end of March, carrying with him the queen, who would go part of the journey *, notwithfanding the badness of the roads; and took his rout by Rheims, Rhetel, Mézieres, Doncheri, and Mouson. As I did not see his majesty again till the whole affair was concluded, I shall take the relation I give of it from the letters he wrote to me, and those which by his orders were continually sent me by Villeroi and La-Varenne.

Bouillon kept up his first arrogance as long as he could: he boasted to Du-Maurier, that as foon as he founded a trumpet he would drive the forces of France from his gates. The king, while he purfued Bouillon with arms, was defirous also that preparations should be made for his trial, which he commanded me to push on vigorously before I fet out to join him. The duke tampered fo successfully with four of his majeffy's gunners, that they suffered themselves to be prevailed on to defert to him, making use of the horses he sent them to La-Fére in Tarténois for that purpose; a crime which well deserved an exemplary punishment. Although the duchess of Bouillon did not leave Sedan, yet he managed with fuch art, that those whom his majefty employed to bring him an account of every thing that was doing there, reported that she had retired to Germany, to avoid the inconveniences the might be exposed to in a befieged city. He was heard to boast likewise, that by stamping his foot upon the ground, he would bring four thousand men into Sedan; and would have had it believed, that he had the absolute disposal of seventeen companies of horse, and fome regiments of foot, which were in Luxembourg; and that he should procure a powerful supply from the Swifs Cantons. The most circumstantial advices we received were, that before the 20th of April he expected to be reinforced by five or fix hundred foldiers, which he had caused to be levied in Gascony and in the neighbourhood of Limeuil, and ordered them to embark at Bourdeaux. A nephew of Rignac, and a man named Prépondié, raised them, under colour of 1606. being recruits for the war in Flanders: his majefty had received notice of this from Pucharnaut, while he was ftill at Paris.

These advices, upon a nearer examination, were found to have greatly exaggerated the truth: it was known that Germany did not offer to flir in the duke of Bouillon's cause; the king was well assured by Bongars, that the arch-dukes testified more sear of our armament for themselves, than inclination to declare against us; Spain thought the occasion too slight to break the peace with France; and England had not the smallest consideration for Bouillon: three or four hundred Swifs adventurers were all he could depend upon, and this number was likely to be lessend, fince our levies against him were carried on in those cantons without any opposition. Montglat had not yet seen the elector Palatine, but he wrote from Strasburg, that this prince shared in Bouillon's sears, and the Landgrave sent letters to France to notify his intentions to us.

As for the duke himself, every one knew that he had not more than twelve hundred foldiers in Sedan; and we were afterwards more particularly informed, that he had, in reality, but feven or eight hundred, citizens and adventurers together, part of whom also seemed to have an inclination to leave the place before the approach of the king's ar- . my. It was reported that Bouillon himfelf had retired into Germany, escorted for some leagues by his garrison, and had been seen in Bascogne by fome foldiers who knew him, and to whom he spoke. Some particulars, with regard to the orders he had given in Sedan for the castle and town, gave room to believe that he did not defign to return: but this news, which the governor of Ville-Franche came express to relate to the king, was found to be false; the duke of Nevers, who was better informed, wrote the king word, that the duke of Bouillon had indeed marched out of the town, at the head of three or four hundred men, but it was to meet a German prince, with whom he returned to Sedan the night after. Although the feveral informations given his majesty by his agents did not exactly agree in every circumstance, yet it was known from very good authority, that Bouillon was not far from his city. This German count, whom it was faid he had brought into Sedan to undergo a fiege there, was the third of the counts of Solme: the eldeft was grand mafter to the elector Palatine; we have feen the fecond with the fieur Du-Plesson: as for this, his knowledge and experience were not spoken of very advantageously.

THE king was indisposed at Nanteuil, with a cold which did not 1606. hinder him from hunting, as foon as he began to spit: he wrote me word from this place on the 27th of March, that he had miffed of his stag, but to make amends for that, he had taken two wolves, which he looked upon as a favourable augury; at Fresne he found four companies of the regiment of guards, already recruited with feven hundred men, whom he permitted to stay there, till the 1st of April, to raise all the recruits they wanted. It was eafy to perceive the heart of Henry expand itself, and a martial ardour appear in his countenance, at his refuming his first glorious occupation. He went two leagues from Fresne to dine, and from thence to attend the service called the tenébres at Rheims. Here he continued till the Wednesday following, when he was joined by the duke of Mercœur, and all the nobility of the country. There also he saw Du-Maurier, who came from Sedan, commissioned by the duke of Bouillon to tell him, that he confented to receive a person there, in the king's name, provided that he was invested with no authority, and that his garrison should remain there, commanded by his own officer; that he was ready likewife to receive his majesty into Sedan with what train he should think proper, and all whom he chose to depute to him, but that he persisted in his resolution to be fole mafter of his own city; and rather than refign it, he would be contented to lose his estates, his children, and his life: but in proportion as the danger came nearer, the duke's pride abated.

The king, without returning any answer to this proposal, sent the duke of Nevers * to Mousson, to assemble what cavalry was come thither, and hinder those supposed troops of the duke of Bouilon from entering Sedan: the whole number amounted but to three hundred men, Swiss and Germans included; and there was no appearance that any more supplies would be fent him, his majesty being then in a condition to prevent them. The king discovered great impatience to advance towards this city, but he had yet only his regiment of guards with him; the recruits of light-horse arrived in good order, but the remainder of the troops were not to join him till the fourth of April. The king did me the honour to write to me twice from Rheims, on the 24th and 26th of March, pressing me to come thither to him with my fon; he proposed to set out on the 27th for Rhetel, and to be at Mousson on the 30th, which was the day he prescribed for the rendezvous of the regiment of guards, although the roads were rendered almost impassable by the rains. His majesty wrote to me also to send him fome officers and horses, with a convoy of pick-axes, shovels, and mattocks, and some pieces of cannon of a moderate fize, to strengthen his lodgment.

NEVERTHELESS very little dependance was to be had upon all these appearances, as notwithstanding the preparations for war, so many perfons were labouring to conclude the affair by way of negociation; and in effect, the party that was for peace, in a short time prevailed. His majesty, however, was but ill satisfied with the last proposals which Du-Maurier had brought from Bouillon, and which, by the king's order, were communicated to the keeper of the great feal and to me. His majesty was yet more offended with the memorial, in which it seemed as if the duke wanted to treat with Henry as his equal. D'Arson, of his own accord, went to Bouillon after Du-Maurier had prefented this impertinent memorial to the king; but Bouillon, after this facrifice to his vanity, comprehended that it was at last time to change his language, which all of a fudden he foftened very much; in confequence of which, he deputed Nétancour * to intreat his majesty to send Villeroi to confer and treat with him; to which the king confented, on condition that the conference was held at Torcy, in the dominions of France. The last act of extravagance of this man, who certainly deserved worse than what actually befel him, was to fend back Aërsens, who, with Henry's leave, had been with him, and to declare by him, that he difclaimed Néntacour, and that he could do without Villeroi.

Henry must have had some powerful reasons, though unknown to me, which made him depute, as he did after all this, Villeroi and Dinteville †, in order to throw the whole blame of the miscarriage of the accommodation upon Bouillon. With them it appears that Bouillon shewed neither ill-humour, nor a disinclination to treat. Villeroi himfelf wrote me word what passed between them, and subjoined to his Jetter a long memorial, which he wrote the same evening, being the 30th of March, after he had returned to Donchery. If I was to believe Villeroi (for we shall immediately see the reasons I had to doubt his sincerity) he found Bouillon so dark and irresolute, that he could not answer for any thing till another interview, nay until Bouillon had not only concludeed and figned the treaty, but also begun to execute it:— now how shall we be able to reconcile this with what follows immediately after, where he says, that it seems as if the duke of Bouillon was coming to reason, but, by supposing that he could not help throwing out some dark hints of his knowledge of the treaty being much nearer a conclusion than he cared to tell me. He surfur a second conference was to be held the next morning at Donchery, which would oblige the king to spend another day in that place.

As a proof that Villeroi did not communicate to me the whole of this affair, La-Varenne, who wrote to me at the same time, informed me, that Bouillon had prefented himfelf at the conference with the air of a man who asked quarter; for which conduct, says he, he had very good reason, as after having made his utmost efforts, after having exhausted his fmall territory by levies on all fides, he could raife no more than fifteen hundred raw men, none of whom had ever feen an engagement, with a few French and German foot foldiers, and only twenty-five Swifs. all the rest of his troops being in a most wretched condition, except some Flemings from Frankendal and the neighbouring country. Therefore, if in this extremity the duchefs of Bouillon had not yet left Sedan, there was no reason to doubt but that her husband had resolved to accept of any conditions whatever, fo that the treaty might be looked upon as in a manner concluded, it being only to fave his character from the reproach of fo hafty a capitulation, that the duke had demanded, as a favour, a respite till the next morning.

ALL was accordingly concluded in this fecond conference. Villeror was in appearance, very eager to acquaint me with the news, fince he wrote to me immediately after, as he had done the day before: however he took care to conceal part of what had passed, as we shall soon see. In this second letter, however, he promised to fend me the treaty itself, as soon as it was fairly transcribed and signed, which was to be done the next morning: but in the mean time he specified the principal articles; the treaty was intitled Articles of the protestion of Sedam, and Rauceurt, and dated April the 2d, 1606, and to remain in force sour years. By this treaty, the duke of Bouillon consented that the king should place a governor-in the castle, with a company of fifty men; and that the inhabitants of Sedan should take the oath of sidelity to the king, which Bouillon also engaged to do himself. Villeroi filled up the rest of his letter with the praises which he said his majesty publicly bestowed

furely this was unnecessary, for all my endeavours and all my counsels produced nothing: therefore, I was not to be dazzled by Villeroi's flattery, nor could I alter my opinion, of his proceedings.

I HAD no reason to doubt, that his majesty sincerely defired to give me fome part in the conclusion of this affair, after the ailurances I had received from him, and the letters he wrote to me for no other purpose but to press me to come, that nothing might be done without me. I do not pretend to know Villeroi's reasons for thinking so differently from his majesty in this respect; perhaps he was afraid I should deprive him of the honour of this treaty, or probably, he thought Bouillon might by my interpolition, obtain terms more advantageous, in which case, our friendship would unite us against his policy, which was to keep the most considerable protestants at variance with each other. This, however, was certain, that he preffed the conclusion of the affair fo much the more eagerly, as his majefty appeared folicitous for my being prefent, and repeated his invitations to me to come; and to effect his purpose, did not scruple to make use of a little artifice. Henry having given him the letters before mentioned to be dispatched to me, he committed them to the care of a footman, whom he ordered to ride flowly to Amiens, Saint-Quintin, and Rheims, that I might not receive them till I had got another letter from his majesty, which he wrote to me eight days afterwards, and was brought to me by a courier fent expressly with it. My astonishment may be easily imagined, when by these last dispatches, I found that his majesty was under great uneafiness on my account, fearing that I was indisposed, fince he had received no answers to letters he had wrote to me eight days before, which was the cause that every thing had been concluded without me. In this letter, which was dated Saturday, April the 1st, Henry defired me to delay no longer, but to leave my heavy baggage at Chalons, and meet him on Monday following at Cazine, whither he went to fee the queen.

HAVING received these two letters both in one day, I saw I had not a moment to lofe, if I would meet his majefty at the place appointed. I found, by the reception he gave me, that, after a little reflexion, he would eafily pardon the fault Villeroi had committed with regard to me *. This prince treated me with more than usual kindness and respect, supposing perhaps, that I resented his not waiting for me. "You are welcome, said he to me aloud, I have provided a supper "and a bed for you; you shall have good accommodations." "Can "you guess," said he afterwards in a low voice, and leaning towards me, "why I have made such haste; it was because I knew that, as "foon as you arrived, you would be for viewing every thing, and throwing yourself into the most dangerous places, so that I was appearance of some accident happening to you; and I would rather "Sedan was never taken, than hazard such a misfortune, for I have "need of you for affairs of much more consequence."

AFTER this, any reflexions I should make upon this agreement, and the whole conduct of the affair, might possibly not be free from partia-

Bouillon. He would perfuade us, that Henry IV. having been convinced, during this journey, that M. de Sully perfecuted the marechal de Bouillon only from a perfonal enmity to him, he was glad to take the opportunity his absence afforded, to determine this affair by a treaty, because in reality his connexions with mefficurs de Biron and d'Auvergne, had not extended to any thing criminal. The evidence of the Merc. Franc. of almost all the historians, and of the author of the Apology for the duke of Bouillon himfelf, who, on the contrary, speaks more favourably on this occasion of the duke of Sully, than of the duke of Bouillon; and the other proofs interspersed through these Memoirs, incontestably evince, according to my judgment, the invalidity of what M. De Thou here afferts, of the opinion Henry IV. formed of the duke of Bouillon's fentiments and disposition. A quite different degree of credit is due to facts established on the evidence of original letters and difcourfes, as the greatest part of those produced in the duke of Sully's Memoirs, and the prefent in particular, are, than to fuch as are founded only on the testimony of public report: and, if I am not mistaken, it would not be difficult to convince M. De Thou, that he is inconfiftent with himfelf in what he fays on this subject.

It may be asked, what was it then that occasioned that precipitation in concluding the treaty, that appearance of favour which is manifest in it, that mystery which M. de Sully himfelf infinuates the king made of it with respect to him? I subscribe to the reasons Marsolier gives: first, that Henry IV. had no mind to ruin the duke of Bouillon, but only to make him fenfible of the weight of his power, to contain him within the bounds of his duty for the future; fecondly, that the duke of Bouillon feeing the instrument of his affociation with melfieurs de Biron and d'Auvergne in the hands of M. de Villeroi, thought it high time to make his fubmission to the king in earnest, in order to obtain his pardon, which his haughtiness prevented him from asking, for long as he could flatter himfelf his machinations were concealed: thirdly, that on due reflection, Henry IV. concluded the duke of Bouillon would be able to do him less mischief at Sedan than any where else; and that for this reason he was so far from driving him from thence, that he fent him back thither in a month's time afterwards. As to M. de Villeroi, whose behaviour on this occasion the author condemns, he certainly acted only in obedience to the king's orders, and in conformity to his intention; and he is therefore greatly commended on account of this pegociation, in the 8477th volume of the royal MSS. See the hittorians, and especially the Merc. Franc. anno 1606. No writer has given fo minute a relation of this fact, as is contained in thefe Memoirs.

lity; all I shall say therefore, is, that the duke of Bouillon had reason to think himself very happy that he got off at so easy a rate, after having obliged his majesty to set an army on foot, and bring a train of artillery of sifty pieces of cannon, within sifteen or twenty paces of Sedan, while he himself advanced almost to its very walls. All this Henry acknowledged, and sometimes he was greatly enraged at the duke's conduct; but his natural elemency prevailed. He made his entry into Sedan on the 2d of April, and left there sifty men, with Nétancourt at their head. Bouillon came afterwards to pay hornage to his majesty, who sent for me to be present at this ceremony, which was performed in the king's chamber so early in the morning, that the duke sound his majesty still in bed *.

I VISITED the town the next day, where, instead of those powerful fupplies which were to come from all parts of christendom to the duke's affiftance, three hundred miferable Lanfquenets, and twenty-five Swifs, were all the foreign troops I faw there; all the rest were in proportion, the cannons in very bad order, with four or five unfkilful gunners to attend them, no place likewise fit to receive them, no fascines, gabions, pick-axes, or planks; in a word, none of the ufual preparations for a fiege. It was not possible for me to restrain myself from expressing my aftonishment to the duke of Bouillon, who was present at the survey, and who, not being pleafed either with my observations, or the freedom of them, began a debate, which he supported with more heat than was necessary. But however ingenious his vanity might be, the inequality of the two parties were fo palpable, that he paffed among our neighbours, to have prevented his total ruin by an implicit submiffion. Cardinal Du-Perron, fent me a letter of congratulation from Rome, in which he fays, quoting an ancient author, wars ought to be carried on with vigour and rapidity, for by that means we fave both time and expence; those conquests which were made by the terror of arms, are more expeditious and extend farther, than those which are gained by arms themselves. The Pope spoke publicly of this expedition in very advantageous terms; and I was convinced, that, in all other countries, people thought of it in the fame manner as they did at Rome. This gave me fome confolation, that the reputation of our arms did not fuffer.

* Henry IV. obligingly answered him, that it was not so much his city of Sedan

I PROPOSED likewise to indemnify ourselves in some measure for the expences of this armament, by reducing to his majesty's subjection of the fortress of the earldom of Saint-Paul. And here it is necessary to remember what I have already said concerning the acquisition of this earldom in 1604, that when Gouillauire came from the count of Soissons to propose this bargain to the king, his majesty intrusted the management of this affair, in my absence, to messieurs Belleviere, Villeroi, Sillery, and Maisses; and that upon the difficulties which I represented to this prince, would arise in the affair, he caused a contract to be drawn up, in the name of a third person, until the king, by making himself master of those forts, they should be declared his by right of conquest.

WHEN Henry proposed to me to pay the troops and disband them; " How! fire, replied I, difband them, what then will become of your " contract for the earldom of Saint-Paul? Have you forgot the refo-" lution you made when it was past? Since you have been at the ex-" pence of raising an army, what now remains but to employ it that " way?" I represented to his majesty, that it would be the work of fifteen days only. The Spaniards had not the least expectation of fuch an attempt, and when it did happen, could have no just cause to complain, fince the king only made use of that power granted by treaties to the earls of Saint-Paul, to chuse between France and Spain, which should be declared to the council of Madrid at the same time that we fet forward. " I am convinced," faid Henry, after having heard me attentively, "that you are in the right, but it requires some delibera-"tion before we engage in this affair; and I should chuse to mention " it to the principal persons here with me, and to my ordinary coun-" cil." I know not with whom his majesty consulted, or what advice was given him, but two days afterwards this prince took me afide, and endeavoured to perfuade me, that at present it was best to let this affair fleep. I confess, when I quitted the king, I could not help faying, " Ab! de-par-Dieu!-I find we are going to put our fwords in the " scabbards: with so fine an army, and so favourable an opportunity " of employing it, we are preparing to difband our men." I was not able to alter the king's resolution; the troops were paid and disbanded, and I fent back the artillery to Paris.

"What

"What does the king mean, monfieur La-Varenne," cried I, furprised at the proposal, "we have not drawn our swords, nor fired one fingle " volley of cannon, and shall we play the victors? we who in two " respects are the vanquished, for we have bought with too great credulity, what the king ought only to hold by his own courage, and " afterwards have been afraid to publish our own acquisition. I was " always apprehensive that things would be managed thus; tell the " king that all the world thinks as I do on this occasion, and would " laugh at us if we fired the cannons." I probably carried my freedom a little too far, but the-grief I felt at what had happened was the cause of it. The king would not hear this answer without great emotion; he concealed it from no one but myself. Praslin, and afterwards Béthune, came back immediately, to tell me from him, with great gentleness, that there was nothing unreasonable in what he required of me. And I, in my turn, thought I was able to convince them of the contrary. Henry began now to be extremely enraged with me, gave my refistance very harsh names, and fent me an absolute command to obey him: which I did with fuch expedition, and with fo great a noise of the artillery, that he was appealed immediately, and fent for me to come and embrace him *. Bouillon was in the king's train when he made his entry; he would certainly have injured his majesty greatly to have feared from him any appearance of contempt. The king resumed his former familiarity with him; and if there was any change in his behaviour, it was only to greater kindness and respect.

About this time broke out the famous quarrel between pope Paul V. and the Venetians; the foundation of it had been laid long before, on occasion of some pretended ecclesiastical rights which the holy father undertook, at a very unseasonable time, to maintain against this repub-

* The Journal of Heary IV. makes no mention of this dispute, but, on the contrary, says, that M. de Rosin was at the king's fide, conversing with him, and shewing him some beautiful salies: that the marechal de Bouillon was very plainly dressed and mounted, and his look very forrowful. A letter wrote by the king to the princes of Orange on the surrender of Sedan, is set forthi in this Journal in these words: "Cousin, I may say as Cæsar did, "Foni, vidi vici: or as the long does." Three days my love will last, and in three lic; who, on their fide, opposed them by very firm decrees*. Freshé-Canage, our ambassador at Venice, had given me notice of it since the month of October. These decrees, joined to the imprisonment of the two ecclesiastics by an arret of the senate, the interdict fulminated by the Pope upon their resusal to revoke those decrees, and to do him justice with regard to their imprisonment; and lassly, the protestation lately made by the republic against this excommunication, had brought matters to extremity on both sides.

To speak candidly my fentiments of the affair, I thought the proceedings of both parties much the fame, equally violent and imprudent. I have ever had a real respect for Paul V. and have professed to honour him greatly; nor do I think what I am going to fay has any thing in it contrary to these sentiments. We live not now in those times when the popes exercifed that spiritual authority from which they thought, and with reason, their greatest advantages were derived, and exercifed it in fuch a manner, as gave them, in reality, a fovereign power over the princes and states in Christendom. At present, their usurpation of temporal authority is clearly known and diftinguished, and is frongly contested with them. I may almost venture to fay, that they are difabled with regard to their spiritual power; at least it is certain, that the protestants deprived them of two thirds of it at once; an example fo recent, and fo eafy to imitate, that it was certainly very injudicious in the Roman court, to expose the republic of Venice to fuch a temptation, furrounded as it is by provinces who have shook off the yoke of the apostolical see, and who would receive them with

* By one of the decrees, of the 10th of January, 1603, it is forbidden to build any church without leave from the government; and by a second, of the 26th March, 1605, ecclefiaftics, and perfons holding in mortmain, are reftrained from making any acquifition without special authority. I shall not enter into a discussion of these points of law, there being an infinity of treatifes wrote at that time on each fide of the queftion; the chief are those which came from the pen of cardinal Baronius, in favour of the Pope; and of friar Paul Sarpi, a monk of the order of the Servites, on behalf of the Venetians. All thefe may be feen in M. De Thou, the Merc. Franc. Matthieu, an. 1606. and other historians; and in particular in the writings on this famous dispute. The Jesuits, the capuchins, and a small number of other monks, were all that paid any obedience to the interdiction, and thereby got themselves drove out of the Venetian territories: the excommunication was treated with contempt by all the other orders in the republic, and divine fervice continued to be performed as before. It is reported, that the vicar general to the bishop of Padua, saying to the governor, that he would act on this occasion as the Holy Ghoft should inspire him; the governor made answer, That the Holy Ghost had already inspired the council of ten, to order all those to be hanged who should refuse to obey the order of the senate.

open arms as foon as they had done the like: these I speak of were the Lutherans, the protestants of Germany, Switzerland, Bohemia, Hungary, Austria, and Transilvania; to whom may be added, the schismatic Greeks and Turks. Rome ought to reflect upon the ravage made in her empire, by three or four monks only; and that this misfortune pened through the ill-timed pride of Leo X. and Clement VII. too like what Paul V. discovered in the present conjuncture.

> THE Venetians, it is probable, run greater risks than the Pope, by making him their enemy. All these discussions, which at first the contending parties pretended to regulate and guide by the judgment or award of conscience, terminate, sooner or later, in being supported by arms; when, as it always happens, arguments, far from being relished, give rife to proceedings more and more violent. And there was nothing which this republic ought fo carefully to avoid as war, fince the may be convinced, that if the Emperor and the king of Spain do not profecute their claims upon her dominions, which they scarce ever conceal, it is certainly because they have not pretences in readiness, or want opportunities. It is the part of the Venetian policy, therefore, to aim continually at maintaining the republic and all Italy in the state they are at prefent: for them no change can be advantageous, and any revolution fatal. I have often examined this matter in my converfations with the cardinals de Joyeuse and Du-Perron, and laboured with more candor than is generally shewn by a zealous Huguenot, to find out means to prevent the new religion from getting a footing either in Italy or Spain, provided that they, on their fide, would promife, that the Pope, who was the head of Italy, should spare himself the trouble of taking any interest in that part of Europe with which he had no connexion; for it has been always my opinion, that the true system of politics, that which may give and preferve tranquillity to Europe, depends upon fixing her in this equilibrium *.

Could they have thought in this manner at Rome and at Venice, every one there would have conspired to stifle the present quarrel in its birth; and for this a feafonable and mild discussion had been sufficient: those affairs in appearance the most intricate and perplexed, are still yond the bounds of truth. I shall not make any further observation on it, as I apprehend the reader must before this time be accustomed to it, and not affected by it.

* It is easy to distinguish in this discourse, as well as in all others where matters of religion come in question, how M. de Sully's belief induces him to speak with too much vehemence, and carries him be-capable of being happily tempered by proper management, and this more than many others: we ought to confider them without any regard to the confequences, with which it is wrong to alarm one's felf, for we ought never to be alarmed with what is merely possible; but they had defignedly increased the difficulties, by proposing things which always rendered the prudence of the ablest mediators inestectual. The malicious infinuations of those persons who sought to take advantage of this distunion, had also some share in heightening it. If there is a person in the world who, amidst the emotions of anger, is capable of listening to the voice of reason, I should advise him then to district the discourse of those persons who, when thus agitated, offer to affish this vengeance: it is on such an occasion, that hatred and envy lay their most dangerous snares.

France, it was fit for him to do, in the present posture of affairs, thought naye, lord of it necessary, for my better information, to fend me a long memorial of Fresny. the grievances complained of, and arguments used by both parties. I made no great use of this paper; for to examine their reasons, and pronounce upon each, would not have been ferving them effectually: I therefore told Canaye plainly in my answer, that, without having any regard to the foundation of the quarrel, the Venetians had no other part to take but to refer themselves to arbitrators, who might perform the office of a common friend to both, by pacifying their refentment, not judging with rigor. I named the king of France, as being, in my opinion, the only one who was likely to produce this effect; and recommended to them to make use of the nuncio Barberini, whose wisdom and integrity. I was well affured of, to make a report of all to his majesty. They followed my advice, but not till passion had afferted its usual rights. However, during the rest of the year, it was confined to writings, wherein invective was carried to great excefs; but happily, the of great almoner; both which were bestowed upon him by his majesty: he made his acknowledgments to me for this service, and intreated me to procure him, during his absence, the enjoyment of all the privileges of his office.

THE citizens of Metz received a fervice of still greater importance from me, on occasion of the dispute they had about that time with the Iefuits; these fathers had two years before made an attempt to procure a fettlement in Metz, the inhabitants of which avoided the blow by an application to his majesty, which I supported. The Jesuits returning to the charge, I again encouraged the people, fending them an account by Saint Germain and Des-Bordes, and afterwards by La-Nouë, of the king's opinion of the matter. But at the beginning of this year their fears were again awakened, by the Jesuits raising new batteries stronger than before, obliging the clergy, and all the catholic burghers, to unitewith them; they had likewife fecured the duke of Epernon's vote, who was governor of Metz, and arrived there on the 15th of April, to put the last hand to the work; at least this was what the people apprehended, and that the governor acted in this affair only by the king's order's. Alarmed at his arrival, they fent me a letter the next day, which was followed by another, dated April 25, and delivered to me by the fieur Braconnier, who was ftrictly charged to urge all the reasons that had induced me to undertake their defence, which they were afraid I should forget: they likewife deputed two of their countrymen, one after the other, to court, to attend this affair; not, faid those protestants, that they were apprehensive the Jesuits would turn them from their faith, but because they were persuaded the society, by its intrigues, would cause some revolution at Metz; the consequences of which, in a city so lately re-united to the crown, might be fatal.

It was by this motive, that I endeavored to gain over his majefty, who likewife knew the importance of this city to his great defigns. I filled the inhabitants with joy when I fent them word by their last deputy, that the king had granted their request, and would suffer no innovation to be made in their city; which I affured them of, in the king's name. They made me greater acknowledgments in a third letter, dated the 10th of July; but I could perceive they were not quite freed from their fears, their adversaries boasting, they said, that it was in their power to alter the king's determination.

In effect, the Jesuits received every day such striking proofs of the king's favour and protection, as might well authorize the fears of the people of Metz: this very year Henry made them a present of one hundred thousand crowns for their college of La-Fléche alone, and condescended to regulate the disposal of it himself, in the following manner: one hundred and fixty thousand livres for building the college, twentyone thousand for the purchase of the ground, seventy-five thousand in lieu of church lands, which were feized upon, in order to erect a perpetual revenue for this house; for as these lands were possessed by perfons who were not ecclefiaftics, it was allowable to compel them to fell, (and that step was here actually taken) a pecuniary equivalent being granted them; twelve thousand for a dwelling house for the fathers, three thousand to purchase books for them, as much for the decorations of their church, fix thousand for their sublistence for the present year (for Henry forgot nothing) and fifteen thousand, which had been lent them by Varenne after they come to La-Fléche, which this prince kept an account of. The paper was dated October 16, and figned by the king.

But here follows another much more extraordinary. A counfellor of parliament, named Gillot *, had in the year 1603 lent a book to father Cotton, which he could not get again, though he had feveral times asked the father for it; at length he fent a servant to demand it, with orders not to leave him till it was returned: the counsellor getting his book by these means, happened, in opening it, to find a sheet of paper between the leaves, which had apparently been forgot by the Jefuit, and was written all over, as he supposed, with his own hand: this paper feemed to him to be worth my notice; he brought it to me, and after obliging me to promife that I would not name him in the affair, he left the paper in my hands, to make what use of it I thought proper. After convincing myfelf that it was the hand-writing of father Cotton, which it was easy to do, with the affishance of some letters he knew I had received from him, we accordingly compared them, and found them exactly the fame: the following is a translation of it, for it was in Latin, and contained a long lift of questions which the Jesuit defigned to ask the devil, when he exorcised a certain person who was possessed, and who made much noise at that time +: the reader will ind questions of every kind in it, those merely of curiosity, some trifling, and even ridiculous, and others upon subjects which it is not fit for me to examine into: the writing begins thus.

"By the merits of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, apoftles; of Saint Prica, the virgin martyr; of Saint Mofes and Ammon, martyred foldiers; of Saint Antenogenus, martyr and theologian; of Saint Volusien, bishop of Tours; of Saint Leobard the monk, and of Saint Liberata the virgin."

AFTER this follow the questions which the exorcist designs to ask the demon; they are without method or connexion, the author having, no doubt, just thrown them on paper as they occurred to his mind; and some are expressed in such a manner, as makes it impossible to guess what he would be at.

"ALL that God permits me to know (observe that it is father Cotton that speaks) with regard to the king and queen; with regard to those who live at court; with regard to public and private admonitions; with regard to the news of life, and the right way; with regard to those who converse with princes; with regard to Laval, diwine service, the knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew tongues, vows, the ceremonies of confecration, and cases of conscience, the converse

The king, when he returned from Sedan, staid a few days at Paris, and towards the end of April went to Fontainebleau, from whence he wrote to me, that, by his physicians prescriptions, he was beginning a strict regimen, that was to continue for ten days at least; upon which account, he deferred for so long the ceremony of the feast of Whitsontide, and sent orders to his council not to attend him for fifteen days. He permitted me to pass this interval at Sully, provided I sometimes came to visit him. By this remedy, together with perspiration, his health was greatly mended.

THE affairs of greatest importance, in which his majesty was employed at Fontainebleau, were those which related to religion. The clergy of France assembling at Paris, renewed their solicitations for the publication of the council of Trent*; the public peace being con-

His majesty opposed them both with his arguments and authority, and treated the protestants in the same manner, who, in imitation of the clergy, feemed disposed to abuse their privileges. Some provinces wrote to the deputies-general at court, to folicit the grant of a petition they fent the king for holding a national fynod, while at the fame time in other provinces, they laboured to procure particular affemblies to be held, wherein it was the custom to appoint the deputies of the fynod, and to draw up instructions upon the affairs which were to be treated there. Henry had fent me orders by Villeroi on the 22d of March, to take proper measures on this occasion in conjunction with my fon, to whom he allowed me to give a share of almost all my business, and that I should afterwards confer with Servian the deputy from Dauphiné. He wrote to me himself from Fontainebleau, desiring that I would send for the deputies-general, and oblige them to declare what were the intentions of the protestant body, and to render their project ineffectual. I made him entirely easy on this head, by affuring him that, if I could not hinder the fynod from being convoked *, I would at least contrive to have fo many faithful fervants of his there, as thould render them master of all the debates. It appeared necessary likewise to use this precaution in the particular affembly of Dauphiné; and to fatisfy the president Parquet that he might not suffer his office, which he was desirous of refigning, to be filled by any of the factious party, I fent Bullion into Dauphine, and Esperian into Guyenne, with proper instructions how to act.

Des-Ageaux dying this year, his post of king's lieutenant of Saint-John-d'Angely, was immediately solicited for by several persons, and among others by Beaulieu and La-Roche-beaucourt; the former had had a brevet for it before Des-Ageaux, but the duke of Epernon, Parabere, and all the burghers of Saint-John, uniting in favour of La-Roche-beaucourt, his majesty ordered me to send for him, and to give him all the necessary instructions for the faithful execution of this office, which he had determined to entrust to him. I took care not to speak for the duke of Rohan, Soubise + and he at that time not stand-of the duke of Rohan, both of them for a of René duke of Rohan, and grandfons of John de Parthenay-Soubife. The duke of Soubife was one of the principal leaders of the calviniftical party in France, during the religious wars in the following reign.

Rohan applied to me to re-instate him in his majesty's favour, as soon as he should have returned to Paris, towards the close of the year. The king, to whom I wrote, had the goodness to give me hopes that he would pardon the duke, and even furnished me with the means of improving this pardon, by bringing the criminal to him after having first instructed him by my son, either at his own or some other house, in all that he was to do to render his sovereign favourable to him, provided that Rohan did not put off till then a public acknowledgment of his fault, and forrow for having committed it. As to the manner in which he should treat him, and how he should for the future expect him to act with the protestants, he deferred explaining himself till he came to Paris. With regard to Soubife, as he had demanded the king's permission before he went to Flanders, his majefty confented that he should wait for him at Paris, or come to him at Fontainebleau.

> AT La-Rochelle new quarrels arose between the protestants, and the roman catholic clergy of that city, upon the extent and exercise of those privileges, which the latter were to enjoy there. Both parties made reciprocal complaints of each other; the ecclefiaftics, that their adversaries often attempted to do themselves justice by force of arms, which was always forbidden; the protestants, that the clergy constantly suppressed the arrets of council, to authorife their encroachments; and both defired a decifive arret. The king, conceiving that an arret would increase their animofity, would have me undertake the office of mediator upon this occasion. I began by shewing them separately, what were their real interests; and, after I had affured myself of their obedience, dictated to them the following articles of accommodation, which will explain the causes of their disputes.

THAT the protestants should not prohibit the ecclesiastics from visiting the hospitals and prisons, or from hearing confessions, provided all this was done without any pomp, especially that of carrying the facrament to those places: that the clergy had no right to affift at burials and public ceremonies, to carry the cross there, or attend criminals to the place of punishment: that the ecclesiastics should receive no bad treatment either in word or deed, when they passed through the streets in the habit of their order: that the protestants should not make any opposition. opposition to the building of their church there; nor to the commissioners appointed by them to mark out the place, provided this place was neither inconvenient, nor suspected by the city, in either of which cases they should assign them another, or leave this point to be decided by the king and his council. I regulated likewise some other articles relating to the police: that the catholics should be contented with the share they had in the public posts and offices to which they should be raised by a plurality of votes, and the usual methods; but, with respect to mechanic trades and corporations, as there was no reason they should be excluded from them, the protestants, by driving away their youth from the shops of the catholics, had set an example of violence to those cities where the catholic party was the strongest.

In the mean time, at Paris, great preparations were making for the ceremony of the baptism of the Dauphin, and the two princesses of France *. The duchefs of Mantua, who was to have the principal part in this folemnity, fet out from Italy with a train of two hundred horse, and two hundred and fifty attendants. She arrived at Nancy on the beginning of June, and from thence her train and those belonging to the duke of Lorrain, fent to know of his majesty if, at the end of eight days, which she proposed to stay at Nancy, she might continue her journey. This requiring some consideration, Henry wrote to me, for I was then at Sully, to come to Paris on the fourth or fifth of June; adding, that he would come thither himself the latter end of May, and till I arrived make some short excursions to Saint-Germain to see his children, and likewise that he thought it necessary to fend some person to Nancy with his orders. A kind of debate arose upon the manner in which the duchess of Mantua should be received, which was at length decided in the queen's favour, who alleged, that this princess coming into France only to oblige the king, and do honour to an extraordinary ceremony, too great respect could not be paid her. Accordingly nothing was omitted; the had the precedence not only of all foreign princes, but also of the princes of the blood, at which the latter were so disgusted, that they refused to assist at any ceremony where the was prefent, alledging, that it was a very extraordinary thing for princes of the most august house in Europe, to be preceded by a duke of late date, descended from a citizen of Mantua, who, after killing Bonnacolfy his lord, procured the administration of Mantua to be confided to him, and afterwards usurped the sovereignty of it. But notwithstanding all that could be urged, the king would not make the fmallest concession on this point, considering only in the duchess of Mantua, the title of an ally to the royal family, and eldest fister of the queen.

THE duke of Bouillon fought to take fome advantage of this example, but he was not regarded; he had been appointed to carry the regalia in the ceremony, and would have taken place of the dukes, claiming this privilege as duke of Bouillon and prince of Sedan, and appealing to the examples of some of the princes of Sedan to whom he had fucceeded. He was told, in answer to these pretensions, that the difference between them and him was, that they were really descended from fovereign princes, a quality which in effect gave them the first rank, while he was only descended from a private gentleman *.

On the 20th of July, the duchess of Mantua arrived at Villers-Coterets, where the found the king, who waited for her. From thence they were to go by Monceaux to Paris, where I was employed in causing scaffolds to be built in the church of Notre-Dame in the palace, and in the fquare of the manufactures, and in making all the other preparations, when we were informed that a contageous difease had broke out in that vast city +; for which reason the king, after consulting the duchefs, refolved that the ceremony of the baptisms should be performed at Fontainebleau. The tournaments and all the shews and diversions, which were to have been exhibited at Paris, were set aside by this new plan, which took in only the usual expences for the baptism of the children of France, and the dreffes of his majesty and the royal family. The nuncio waited upon the king at Fontainebleau, as did also queen Margaret. ISTAID

I STAID longer this time at Sully than usual. The king, who was informed that I continued indisposed at Briecomte-robert, wrote to me on the 29th of August, and defired to know the state of my health. This prince made me captain-lieutenant of the company of gendarmes, which was formed in the queen's name, and, at my entreaty, granted a sull pardon to La-Saminiere. These favours alone gave him a right to require and expect every thing from me: he was much afflicted to find, that the marriage of the son of Noailles with the daughter of Roquelaure, instead of uniting those two families, proved only a source of discord between them. Henry so often and so carnestly pressed me to attempt to reconcile them, that I used my utmost endeavours for that purpose. It is the part of a good prince, to keep all who are about his person united; and of a wise one, to effect this union rather by the interposition of others than by his own.

I was likewife well rewarded for my labours in the finances; the contractors giving his majety an hundred and fifty thoufand livres, and the continuance of the leafe of the falt for fix years produced him likewife a gratification of fixty thoufand crowns. The king disposed of these two hundred and ten thousand livres in the following manner: eighty thousand livres were set apart for the purchase of Moret, and thirty-fix thousand for some occasions of his majety; the queen had twelve thousand, the duke of Nemours thirty, Versenai eighteen, and myself thirty thousand. I likewise received, during the course of the year, twice this sum in different gratuities.

To execute the edicts, the court of aids fent every year a deputation of counsellors into those distribution and regulation thereon; to lay fines upon those whom they found exercifing the trade of selling salt without licence. Nor was this the only reason for sending those commissioners; for the lieutenant-general of Blois sent me word, that two of the commissioners that were appointed to levy the excise upon salt and the other taxes for the distrerent officers of the district, were guilty of many crimes in the discharge of their employment. To which I answered, that he was in the wrong to make a complaint without specifying any particulars; but that, however, I had sent him a regulation with regard to those two points, in order for him to shew to the commissioners, which if they disobeyed, I promised to give him ample satisfaction.

The import of the regulation was, that the excise upon salt should not for the future be augmented merely upon the districts, but that the particular parishes should be specified in proportion to the number of chimnies, at the same time easing the poorer parishes of an equal sum. With regard to the contraband traders in falt, it was my opinion, that there was a distinction to be made between them; for as those who sold the contraband salt could not be punished too severely, so those who only purchased it from the unlicensed traders, merely because they got it cheaper than the other salt, deserved to be treated with more lenity, especially when they were not taken in the fact.

As to the tax upon the officers of the finances, there are two kinds of it, one upon all the officers in general, into which the king had thought proper to confent that enquiries should be commenced against them; and the other upon the elects in particular, founded upon the re-establishment of their rights, taxations, and exemptions, of several kinds. It was established by the regulation, that the first of these taxes should not be exacted for the future but by mutual consent; so that they who should declare before the officer that gave them notice of it, and afterwards before the judge or notary of the place, that they did not intend to take advantage of the king's abolition, should not be compelled to pay it; but in that case they were subject to a criminal profecution, if they were discovered to have failed in the execution of their trust. The fecond tax was the same; those elects who liked better to give up the privilege of their office, were discharged from it; but they were obliged to repay whatever they might have received under that title, contrary to the edicts and establishments of the king and the flates.

The commissioners sent to Rouen gave it as their opinion, that it was but reasonable to strike eleven thousand crowns off the account of the taxes of the province of Normandy, because the treasurers of France were to write to me upon this head, and had prepared to send deputies to the king, in order to obtain his approbation of this retrenchment. I answered them, that there was no need for their taking this step, for that I would undertake to persuade his majesty thereto, who was already sufficiently inclined of himself to give them much greater marks of his affection, if the state of his affairs, and the donations he was obliged to make to a number of insatiable courtiers, had permitted him. I further promised, that I would join with them, in order to ease the provinces provinces of a much greater fum than this, from which the poor could obtain but a very finall relief. I perceived the reasonableness of the promise I had made them, when I saw a sum of two hundred forty-fix thousand three hundred and eighty-one livres joined to the taille of Provence, though it had nothing to do with it.

THIS fum confifted of the following articles: Thirty-three thousand livres for the bridges and causeways of the whole province, which extended both to Rouen and Caïen: Thirty-seven thousand five hundred livres for the suppression of the edict on linen cloth in those two districts: Twenty-two thousand five hundred livres for the maintainance of the bridge of Rouen, raifed by an affeffment on those two districts; although on this account feveral fums were levied upon Paris and other cities: Fifteen thousand livres for the bridges of Mantes and Saint-Cloud: Thirty thousand livres for the canal of communication between the Seine and the Loire: And eight thousand three hundred and eightyone livres for the grand prevoft of the province. I repeat it again, that all these different collections were foreign to the taille. And it was not reasonable, that persons who received no advantage from the public repairs, should be obliged to furnish money for them. For fome years past they had considerably augmented these sums, which, in appearance, were defigned for that use; but which, in reality, remained in the purses of some individuals, without one penny being returned to the king.

I OBLIGED the receiver of Angoulême to be answerable for some money which he alleged was not now in his hands: had that been true, he was not the less liable to pay it, because it could not have been legally demanded of him without letters patents from the king. Although it might happen that fome things escaped me, yet Henry let nothing pass unnoticed; he had been informed that some powder had been embezzled, and he defired me to have those who were guilty of that misdemeanor profecuted for it. It being absolutely necessary for the fecurity of the stores in the magazines, that such practices should be punished, as being a matter of great consequence with respect to all the magazines in general. He knew that there was carrying on in my absence a commission for recovery of the sums omitted to be received, and of false seizures: he wrote immediately to the chancellor, that the affair should be superseded, because, as I must certainly have been acquainted with it before I went away, I should have taken some meafures measures about it, if I had thought it would have been brought into question.

His expences this year were as great as ufual, I don't mean in prefents of jewels fuitable to fo opulent a prince, for in these Henry did not shew himself prodigal; as, for example, designing to make a prefent of a jewel to an Italian lady, he was defirous that it should not be mean; but at the same time, that the price might not exceed a thousand or twelve hundred crowns; and he wrote to me to look out for a ring for him, with the diamond cut in the form of a heart; or in any other, rather than to be cut table-fashion, because the expence would be less and the shew greater; but his personal expences, and those at play especially, always made up a very considerable article. I often received meffages, like that of the 11th of December: Henry having loft all his money at play, fent me word in a billet, of which Lomenie's nephew was the bearer, that Morand must bring him that evening two thousand pistoles. I had excessive large accounts to settle with Parfait, for the extraordinary expences of his houshold. On the 4th of October he fent me orders to pay eighty-five thousand five hundred and four livres to mademoifelle Du-Beuil, for which that billet was to ferve for a receipt. He had remitted to Zamet, as payment of the remainder of an account he was indebted to him for the year 1602, the tax of two fols, fix deniers, upon three bushels of falt; but as this tax did not now subsist, I was obliged to pay Zamet, this year, thirty-seven thousand four hundred and ninety-two livres, to which that old account amounted; and to pay him befides, thirty-four thousand two hundred and twenty livres, which he had fince lent to his majefty, or disbursed for him. He made La-Varenne a present of a thousand crowns. Villeroi, by his orders, wrote to my fon, that I must pay a debt which this prince owed to Balbani, who was confined in Fortl' Evêque; and that I must endeavour to procure his release.

Among other expences, which did Henry more honour, I take in those for repairing the gates of Saint-Bernard, and the Temple, and the fountains before the seffions-house, and the cross du Tiroir. His majesty had written to the lord mayor of Paris, that he desired this work might be finished before Midsummer. The council, I know not for what reason, gave an arret afterwards which rendered this order ineffectual, by applying the money designed for these sountains to paving the streets of Paris, contrary to their first intentions, when, in the contract with the paviors, it was ordered, that the sum necessary for this Vol. II.

As a a a purpose should be levied upon the inhabitants of the city, according to the number of feet the pavement before each door confifted of; his majesty, however, insisted upon knowing why these works were delayed, and upon what account the council had committed this error.

> This prince had often defired me to give him general accounts. which should contain a detail of every thing relating to my three principal offices, of superintendant of the finances, grand master of the ordnance, and superintendant of the buildings and fortifications. I took an opportunity, when he was at the Louvre, and when I thought he had but little bufiness upon his hands, to carry him these papers : but although it was very early in the morning when I left the Arfenal, yet when I came to the Louvre I found that his majesty was already gone out; I therefore fent all my papers back to the Arfenal, except a very fhort abstract, which I intended to shew him, and went to madame de Guife, to wait his return, the having often intreated me to dine with her.

> I'T was to make a party for the chace, that Henry had rifen fo early that morning, and he was refolved to dine upon the partridges he should take in hawking: he used to say, that he never thought them so tender and good, as when they were taken in this manner; and especially when he could fnatch them himfelf from the hawks. Towards the middle of the day Henry returned, extremely well fatisfied with his morning's diversion, and in a gaicty of humour, which his good state of health, and the happy fituation of his affairs, contributed greatly to increase: he entered the great hall, holding his partridges in his hand, and cried aloud to Coquet (who waited there for his return, and was talking to Parfait at one end of the hall) "Coquet, Coquet, you must " not complain of Roquelanre, Thermes, Frontenac, Arambure, and " me, for want of a dinner, forwe have brought fomething to treat you " with; but go immediately and order them to be dreffed; let eight " be referved for my wife and I; Bonneval here shall carry them to " her from me, and shall tell her, that I am going to drink her health; " but take care and keep those birds that are least bit by the hawks " for me; there are three very fat, which I took from them myfelf, " and which they have scarce touched."

> As Henry was distributing his partridges, La-Clielle came in, and with him Parfait, bringing in a large bason, gilt with gold, and covered with a napkin: "Sire, cried he twice, embrace my knees, for I · · · baye

" have brought you a great many, and very fine ones." " See how " rejoiced Parfait is, faid the king, this will make him fatter by an -" inch upon the ribs; I find he has brought me fome good melons; "I am glad of it, for I am refolved to eat my fill of them to-day; "they never hurt me when they are good, and when I eat them " while I am very hungry, and before meat, as the phylicians direct. " I will give each of you a melon before you have your partridges, " when I have first chosen out some for my wife and myself, and for " another person to whom I have promised some." The king then going to his own apartment, gave a couple of melons to two boys who were at the door, whispering something in their ear at the same time : and as he came out of his long closet to go to his aviary, perceiving Fourcy, Beringhen, and La-Font, the latter bringing fomething covered up in his hand, " La-Font, faid Henry to him, are you bring-" ing me a ragout for my dinner?" "Yes, fire, replied Beringhen, " but these are raw meats, fit only to feast the eyes with." " That " is not what I want, replied his majesty, for I am excessively hun-" gry, and would rather have my dinner than any other thing: but, " La-Font, what is it you have wrapped up fo?" "Sire, faid Fourcy, " he has got patterns of feveral forts of stuffs, carpets, and tapestry, " which your best manufacturers have undertaken to make," " Oh! " replied Henry, they will afford us some amusement after dinner; I " will shew them to my wife, and to another person, whose opinion " and mine do not always agree, especially when we are talking of " what he calls baubles and trifles: I believe, Fourcy, added he, you " guess whom I mean; I should be glad to have him present with " my wife when you shew us these stuffs, it will bring something to " my remembrance which I want to communicate to them when they " are together, that I may have their opinions: he often tells me," purfued his majefty, still speaking of me, but without naming me, " that he never thinks any thing fine or good, that cofts double its " real value; and that I should think the same of all goods extremely " dear: I know his reasons for talking in this manner, although I " pretend to be ignorant of them; but we must suffer him to talk, for " he is not a man of few words. Fourcy, go for him immediately; " or that he may be here the fooner, fend one of my coaches for " him, or your own."

THE coachman meeting one of my footmen, whom I had fent to the Louvre to inquire if his majefty was returned, he came to the duchefs of Guise's, where I had just dined: I surprised his majesty when I came

"You have made " great haste," said this prince to me when I entered the room, where he was fill at table, "you could not possibly have come directly " from the Arfenal." When I told him where I had dined; " That " whole family being related to you, faid he, and loving you fo much " as they do, for which I am very glad, I am perfuaded that while they follow your counfels, as they fay they are determined to do, "they will never do any injury either to my person or state." "Sire, " returned I, your majesty says this in a manner so unreserved, that I "fee you are in a good humour, and better fatisfied with me than you have been these fisteen days." "What! you still remember that " then, interrupted Henry, I assure you I do not; you know that our " little refentments ought never to last more than a day: I am very " fure that yours would not hinder you from undertaking, the very next day, to do fomething for my advantage in my finances. I " have not," continued Henry, with great gaiety, " found myfelf fo " light and fo easy these three months as this day; I mounted my " horse without help; I have had great pleasure in the chace this " morning; my hawks have flown, and my greyhounds have run " fo well, that the former have taken a great number of young " partridges, and the latter three large hares; one of the best of my hawks, which I thought loft, has been found and brought back to " me: I have a very good appetite, have eat fome excellent melons, " and they have ferved me up fome quails, the fattest and tenderest I " have ever eat. By letters from Provence," continued the king, to thew me that every thing conspired to his happiness, "I am informed, " that the seditions in Marseilles are entirely quelled; and from several " other provinces I have news, that there never has been fo fruitful a " feafon, and that my people will grow rich, if I permit them to ex-" port corn. Saint-Antoine writes me word, that the prince of Wales " is always talking of me, and of the friendship which he promised " you he would ever preserve for me. From Italy I am informed, " that affairs there are in such a situation, that I shall have the ho-" nour of reconciling the Pope and the Venetians. Bongars writes " me word from Germany, that the new king of Sweden is upon " better terms with his subjects; and that the landgrave of Hesse " acquires every day new friends and allies. Buzenval has written " to Villeroi, that both the Spaniards and Flemings are brought fo " low, that they will foon be obliged to liften to propofals for a peace, " or a truce, of which I must necessarily be the mediator and pro-" tector: and thus begin to render myfelf the arbitrator of all the dif-" ferences "ferences among the princes of Christendom. And for an increase of fatisfaction, faid this prince gaily, behold me here at table, surround—for ed with all these persons you see" (for he had with him Du-Laurens, Du-Perron the younger, Gutron, Des-Yvetaux, Chaumont, and the fathers Cotton and Gonthier) "of whose affection for me I am well affured, and who, as you know, are capable of entertaining me with

" useful as well as agreeable conversation; which shall not, however, hinder me from talking of business as soon as I have dined, for then

" I will liften to every body, and will fatisfy all, if reason and justice can do it."

I FOUND, by fome other things his majefty faid, that the company had turned the conversation upon his person, and had alike praised him for his great qualities, and congratulated him upon his good fortune. It would be difficult, I faid, to find better judges than they were. " However, faid Henry, I did not fuffer all the faid to pass without " contradiction." And he confessed, that all their praises of him could not destroy his consciousness that he had many faults; and as to their compliments upon his good fortune, he told them, that if they had been with him from the time his father died, they would have been fenfible that part of those compliments might have been spared, for that his miserable moments had far surpassed his happy ones. This led Henry to a reflection he used often to make, that he had not yet suffered fo much by his declared enemies, as by the ingratitude and defertion of many, who; he faid, were either his friends, allies, or fubjects. The young Du-Perron, who in these last words found ample matter for his eloquence to display itself, began to treat this subject like a theologician. or preacher, and even a mystic: "You have delivered your fentiments," faid I when he concluded, "in fo lofty a style, that nothing can be " added to your discourse." I then maintained to him, as well as to all the company, agreeable to what his majesty had just faid, or rather to what I had myfelf been a witness of, that this prince had enjoyed. less tranquillity during the peace, than he did in all the troubles and alarms of war. "Rosny, said the king to me, if you will put a " few words upon this subject on paper, I will shew it to some in-" credulous persons." I replied, that it required some time to do that, and likewise might not be received favourably by every one. To this I added fome other plain truths upon religion and policy; and the mifery with which France was threatened if the should love her king; which I believe was still less pleasing to the courtiers, than what I had. faid before.

This conversation, which from being gay and lively had taken a very ferious turn, was interrupted by the queen, who had left her chamber, and was going to her closet. The king, rising from table, went to meet her, faying, "Well, my dear, were not the melons, partridges, " and quails I fent you very good? if your appetite has been as keen " as mine, you have dined extremely well; I never eat fo much as I " have done to-day, or was ever in a better humour; ask Rosny, he " will tell you the occasion of it, and will acquaint you with the news "I have received, and the conversation we have had." The queen. who was likewise more than usually chearful, replied, that to contribute, on her fide, to divert his majefty, she had been making preparations for a ballet and an interlude of her own invention; the ballet was to represent the felicity of the golden age; and the interlude, the amusements of the four feafons of the year. " I do not fay, added she, that " I have not had a little affiftance, for Duret and La-Clavelle have " been with me the whole morning, while you were at the chace." " How charmed am I to fee you in this humour, my dear, faid Henry " to her, I befeech you let us always live together in this manner." Fourey was then ordered to shew the patterns for the stuffs and tapestry. The king defired the queen to tell him her opinion of them; and turning to me, "I know what yours is already, faid he; but now let us " fee your abstracts of accounts?"

OF these there were three, the same number with the general accounts: this is a fimple sketch of this undertaking; in the first, which regarded the superintendancy of the buildings and fortifications, the king found what was contained in the general account; 1st, a memorial of all the fortifications made in the frontiers fince the direction was in my hands; 2d, of all the buildings and royal houses; 3d, of all the moveables, hangings, gold and filver plate, which I had collected for him. The fecond compendium, which related to the finances, was an index to the memoirs; 1st, of the changes and improvements which I had made in all the different parts of the king's finances and revenues; 2d, of all the gold and filver money actually in the treasury; 3d, of the improvements which I had got to make, and of the fums which I hoped to add to the former. The third compendium, which related to the office of the grand mafter, shewed the particulars of the general account; 1st, of pieces of fix different bores, reposited in my Arfenal, and of all that related to the cannons; .2d, of the number of bullets, with the means of keeping all the train of artillery, and and employing them in good order; 3d, of the quantity of three forts of gunpowder commonly used; 4th, of the quantity of arms, tools, and inftruments of the train of artillery; 5th, of the number of soldiers, as well gentlemen as volunteers, whom the king could set on foot, reckoned according to the division of the kingdom.

THAT the reader may the better understand what has been said a little higher, with respect to Spain and the United Provinces, it is neceffary to fee what paffed this year in Flanders *. The Spaniards, to whom the army destined for the expedition of Sedan had given great umbrage, finding that they had nothing to apprehend from that quarter. the marquis Spinola fet out from Genoa on the 6th of May, that he might arrive in Flanders on the 19th. The fiege of Rhinburg, which the Spaniards undertook this year, was the only confiderable action performed this campaign: at first the besieged defended themselves with their usual vigour, and made several sallies, by which two Spanish colonels loft their lives; the name of one of them was Thores, and the other commanded the new terfe +, which came from Savoy. This bold defence made the event of the fiege appear very doubtful, at best it was thought that it would be protracted a long time; Spinola was of this opinion, and the king supposed that Rhimberg would not furrender before the 20th of October: however, they capitulated the beginning of this month. If the courier was to be credited, who, the the next day after the reduction of this city, was fent by Spinola to carry the news to Madrid, and who passed through Paris in his way, the befieged had not more than fix tons of powder left; but, it must be confessed, that the Dutch did not, upon this occasion, exert the valour they had done in the preceding years; they were then indeed dispirited and weary of the war. The garrison, which was left by the senate to its own conduct, were fatisfied with obtaining, that they should be permitted to march out with all marks of honour, fuch as carrying away their cannon, &c. They threw all the blame of their furrender upon the prince of Orange, who they faid would neither fuccour the place, nor give any diffurbance to the Spanish army. This reproach was not wholly without cause; prince Maurice's reputation suffered greatly from the inaction he lived in during this fiege and the whole campaign.

INDEED the conduct of the United Provinces cannot be wondered at, if we confider that they were reduced to fuch extremities, that it was not possible for them to carry on the war much longer. - All the Brulard, lord letters from Buzenval and Berny confirmed this truth; and public report did not exaggerate things in this respect. It was no less certain, s that Spain was no longer in a condition to take advantage of their weakness. The fieges of Oftend and Sluys, had opened two wounds which they had never been able to close. In Flanders a peace was publicly talked of; and those who till then had shown themselves most against it, were, to their own astonishment, insensibly brought to ap-- prove of it. They now left off foliciting with ardour the affiftance of - France; or to have that reliance upon our promises as they had formerly. I am perfuaded, that the still recent remembrance of all the obligations they lay under to his majefty, was one of the chief causes of a delay of a peace or a truce, which, but for that confideration, would have been concluded this year. A mifunderstanding between the prince of Orange and Barnevelt, which divided the council of the States into two parties, contributed also to this delay; the former would not hear of a peace, and the latter cried out against a war. This opposition was the cause likewise that the council of France, could take no resolutions with respect to the affairs of Flanders, since it was not possi--ble to ferve one party without injuring the other.

> BUZENVAL returned to Paris the beginning of December, charged with a great number of propofals. His majesty not well knowing what to refolve upon, fent him to the Arfenal, where I was confined to my chamber, to confer with me upon them. I confess I was no less perplexed than the king; I saw plainly that, if there was any refolution to be taken, with respect to the peace between Spain and the United Provinces, this was the time for it: but in what manner should we act, or how fecond the defigns of a people without strength, without union amongst themselves, and so destitute of advice, that, as it was plain, not being able to agree upon the choice of the deputies to be fent to his majesty, our own agent to them was obliged to take this committion upon himfelf: shall we prevail upon these provinces to submit to the French domination, and fo make their quarrel our own? But is not this to engage rashly in a war with the whole house of Austria, the event of which would be fo much the more doubtful, as the countries necessary to be possessed were at the greater distance from our own; as we had yet no preparations made for entering the territories of our enemies, or veffels to invade them by fea, but those belonging to the States: shall we be contented with receiving a certain number of towns, either as a fecurity, or in perpetual possession, to indemnify us for what money and stores we had advanced, as Buzenval offered in their name? This proposal has all the inconveniencies of the first, without any of its advantages; we should besides have numerous garrisons to maintain. because these towns would be doubtless upon the frontiers, where the Flemmings would behold us with almost as bad an eye as the Spaniards themselves, of which we have a very recent example, in their behaviour to the English in the like circumstance. In whatever manner we disguise any resolution which necessarily leads to a war with Spain, it will as infallibly bring England upon us, as foon as we feem defirous of getting a footing, and making an establishment in the Low Countries; but that we might have nothing to fear either from the one or the other, it was necessary that our first attempt should be to make ourfelves, by one stroke, masters of the sea against the Spaniards, and in a case of absolute necessity, against the English likewise. I believe I could then have engaged my head, that having nothing more to attack or defend but on the fide of the Meuse, Spain would have entirely lost the Low Countries. But what great expences, and what prodigious efforts must necessarily be made, e'er this could be accomplished? I am still persuaded that we might, without giving umbrage to our neighbours, and without fuffering any greater inconvenience from Spain, than complaints and murmurs, have still continued secretly to favour the States, as we did at present: but besides that the sums we advanced for them, must be increased in proportion as their power and strength diminished, all the advantage we could hope for from it, would be merely to retard the peace for some years. In the present state of things, there was no other alternative, but an accommodation between Spain and the United Provinces, or a war between us and Spain: with respect to this accommodation, there were still two parts for us to take, either to fuffer it to be made without our interposition, or to appear to be the mediators of it; the fecond was the most reasonable, and this was in the end embraced: but at the time of which I am speaking, the king was very far from approving this stroke of policy; and, in one fense, it was that which met with most opposition.

These were almost all the reflections I made to theking, who defired to know my opinion of Buzenval's deputation. I put them in writing, because I was not able to wait upon his majesty: it was not my fault, if this paper was not entirely satisfactory. We left it to time to bring Vol. II. B b b b 1626. matters to a conclusion, but they continued in the same doubtful state till the following year. The United Provinces made some small prefents by Aërsens to the king and queen, for which his majesty sent them his thanks, and made a present, by the queen, to Aërsens' wife, of four hundred crowns in jewels. Aërsens, by his master's orders, prefented the king with a relation of a voyage which the Dutch had lately made to the East Indies.

> I HAVE nothing more to fay of Germany, than that the duke of Wirtemberg found the good effects of the king's protection: Montglat was his majesty's agent in that country; for as for Bongars, who was there also, and who had written a letter from Metz to me, which Henry read, because it was open, this prince would not permit him to flay in that city, nor in any other place, he faid, where he might preach his doctrine.

> ALL England was thrown into a consternation, by the discovery of a plot *, carried on by the jesuits Garnet and Oldecorne, with several

* A detail of this conspiracy would lead us into a relation of too great length, and has but little connexion with these Memoirs. According to De Thou and the Merc. Franç. it had its beginning in fome of the latter years of queen Elizabeth's reign; fee those historians, ann. 1605 and 1606. Ten or twelve English, and two jefuirs, Henry Garnet and Edward Oldecorne, loft their lives on that account : all the crime of the two last appears only to have been, their knowing of the conspiracy and not discovering it. "The king, fays "L'Etoile, thought proper to fay to fa-" ther Cotton, when he spoke to him of " it, I will not believe this of you Jefuits, " or cast any reflection on your order in " general; there is, however, one perfon at Rome with his holinefs, who I know " was not unacquainted with this wicked " plot and conspiracy." anno 1605.

Father Oldecorne folemnly declared before his death (on the 17th of April, 1606) that he never knew or approved of this gunpowder plot. Mezerai fays, that this father had maintained, that the attempt was good and commendable : but on what grounds he, who makes

Hall and Oldecorne two different persons, though these are only two names of the fame man, fays this, I know not. Father Garnet was executed the 3d of May. The judges took great pains to prevail on him to own, that he had come to the knowledge of it by other means than under the feal of confession, which they knew was inviolable amongst catholics. Father Garnet, according to the account of the catholics, had fo little concern in this plot, of which Larrey makes him the author and chief promoter, that he made use of all possible means, even almost the discovery of it, to prevent it, inceffantly exhorting the catholics to have patience. He had befides got father Parfons, and father Aquaviva, general of the Jesuits, to write, that the taking any violent refolution should, above all things, be avoided, the confequences of which must inevitably be fatal to religion. Memoirs for the general history of Europe, vol. I. p. 74. Matthicu, in like manner, exculpates father Garnet, vol. II. b. iii. p. 715. See alfo the book composed by father Daniel Bartoli, an Italian jefuit, intituled, Dell' Istoria della Compagnia di Giesù d'Inghilterra.

other Englishmen, against the king's person; the conspirators having resolved to blow up his majesty and the chief lords of the kingdom, when they were all assembled in the parliament-house, under which they had lodged barrels, and prepared trains of gunpowder.

This evidence is sufficient to consute those, who, like Bayle (Rep. des Lett. March, 1687.) have afferted, that, according to all historians, father Garnet and father Oldecorne were convicted of being parties in the plot. This father Parfons, or Robert Personio, was a jesuit of great merit and knowledge.
