After the arrival of the Hatfield party at San Jose and before it was demonstrated that Hatfield is not Dunham, Marshal McAfee of Texas submitted to an interview. He is quoted as saying "I feel that this Hatfield is a bad egg somewhere, and if he proves not to be Dunham, he must be wanted somewhere else on a serious charge." This is fine, truly. A man whom nobody knows anything about appears to have been grabbed up by this man-hunter upon a "feeling" that he is a "bad egg" and that he may be wanted "somewhere else" on a "serious charge." McAfee appears to be a sort of broker in criminals who initiates proceedings and takes possession of men upon the basis of his "feelings" and then hawks his wares about the country upon the prospect of finding a reward "somewhere." We have seen a good deal of this sort of criminal hunting in California lately. Our chief exponents of this system are Messrs. W. J. Burns and Francis J. Heney. The system calls first for the finding of the criminal and for the "development" of the testimony later on. It is a new rule in criminology, but there are those who seem pleased with it.

Seriously, this man McAfee, who has gained a few dirty dollars for himself through victimizing a poor Texas farmer and by working a cheap confidence game upon the governor of California, is a creature who combines criminality with contemptibility. Upon his own statement of the case he deserves to be tarred and feathered and whipped out of the country. A man holding a petty authority and who uses it so vilely has no claim upon anybody's respect or consideration, and there ought to be a way either under the law or independently of it to give him the punishment he deserves. Surely there must be some means by which Hatfield, taken from a peaceful and honest life upon no evidence of any kind, and dragged two thousand miles away from his home under circumstances of awful hardship and humiliation, can find redress. If McAfee is execution-proof, as no doubt he is, then the authority under which he acts ought to be responsible. Surely there must be some means by which so damnable an outrage may in some manner be condoned.

The Constitutional Amendments.

At next Tuesday's election the voters of California must render judgment upon thirteen proposals for change in the State constitution and three general "Acts" which have been considered by the legislature and passed up for popular determination. Legislative consideration, let it be remembered, does not imply legislative approval. It is a common practice with legislatures in California and elsewhere to shirk responsibility in matters of this sort by reference of a vexed or a politically dangerous question to the people, very much as a board of county supervisors oftentimes gets rid of a tramp by passing him on to the next county. The Argonaut has made an effort to get at the intent and meaning of these several proposals, and the result of its studies is presented below. Let us frankly disclaim any pretense of infallibility; we may be wrong, but we have at least tried to be right in the discussions herewith:

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 1 relates to State taxation and is the outcome of an effort inaugurated three years ago to reform the taxing system of California. This amendment has been drafted by a commission on revenue and taxation composed of the governor, State Senators J. B. Curtin of Sonora and M. L. Ward of San Diego, Assemblymen H. S. G. McCartney of Los Angeles and E. F. Treadwell of San Francisco, and Professor Carl C. Plehn of Berkeley. It represents an effort on the part of this commission to separate State from local taxation and to do away with the necessity for equalization between counties, which has tended everywhere to inequitable valuations. It is designed among other things to protect assessors against the temptation to under-assessments for the sake of relieving the several counties at the point of State taxes. Under the system proposed in the amendment it is hoped to provide a sufficient revenue for support of the State by taxation of corporations only. It is proposed to tax the corporations in a manner that will, with some degree of certainty, make them pay their fair share of public burden and at the same time relieve them of the necessity—or what they believe to be the necessity—of maintaining costly systems of protecting themselves against aggression. It is believed that if this amendment had gone into effect three years ago it would have increased the taxes of the great public-service corporations to the extent of $3,500,000. Since the suggestions of the commission were made public, the State board of equalization and the county assessors have increased the corporation taxes to the tune of $2,750,000. The average reduction in tax rates upon small land owners, mostly farmers, to be brought about by the adoption of this amendment is calculated to be 18 cents in each hundred dollars. It is claimed that this amendment will, in the first year of its adoption, yield enough revenue to support the State and therefore to make complete separation of State and county taxation. The Argonaut believes that this amendment has been studiously and wisely considered and that it represents an intelligent aim to give the State a more equitable system of assessment and taxation.

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 14—This is a proposal to increase the salaries of certain State officers—that of the governor from $6000 to $10,000; that of secretary of state, comptroller, treasurer, and surveyor-general from $3000 to $5000; that of the attorney-general from $3000 to $6000. It makes the salary of the lieutenant-governor $4000 per year. State salaries as at present arranged were fixed at a time when California was smaller in population and resources. Since that time many appointed officers have been commissioned at much higher salaries. In consideration of the enlarged resources of the State, of the increased work and responsibility resting upon State officials, and of the universal increase in the cost of living, it is claimed that salaries ought to be increased as proposed. It is further argued that with reasonable salaries as compared with low salaries the State will be able to command better talent and efficiency. These arguments seem reasonable. Many counties, recognizing the equities of public service, pay their officials more than our State officials are paid. The Argonaut believes that this amendment ought to be adopted.

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 16 and Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 32—These proposals need to be considered together, since they relate to the same subject. The former embodies the latter. It fixes the pay of members of the State legislature and limits the expense of legislative sessions. The second merely limits the expense of legislative sessions. At the present time a member of the legislature is paid $480 on a per diem basis. Under the proposed change each member will be paid $1000 for each session. The proposal goes further to curtail the heavy expense and to limit the scandal involved in a practically unlimited employment of legislative attachés. The Argonaut believes these proposals to be abundantly justified. The laborer in the State legislature is as much worthy of his hire as any other laborer. The present system of payment is not adequate, and, being inadequate, tends to corruption. For a salary of $1000 per session the State ought to have the service of better men than under the present low per diem system. The Argonaut believes that this change should be made.

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 26, relating to assessment of mortgages, etc.—This change proposes to remove that outworn remnant of the mortgage-tax law which remains upon the statute books. The purpose of the mortgage-tax law was to compel the lender to pay taxes on money loaned in spite of the fact that the borrower always and under all circumstances pays such tax. Practically the system has been tinkered to death, since there is now no legal way for enforcing the collection of taxes from the lender. The law as it stands is inoperative and serves no other purpose than as a scarecrow to confuse and alarm outside capital. The Argonaut believes the proposed change to be a wise and necessary one.

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 29, relating to state indebtedness—This amendment proposes to extend the period for which the State may issue bonds from twenty to seventy-five years. It is a simple business matter and all the arguments are one way. The proposal is a meritorious one. There is absolutely no reason of any kind against it.

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 31, relating to extension of the terms of existence of corporations—This amendment proposes a means by which private corporations, banking, etc., may extend the period of their legal existence without disturbance of their business. The measure is in no way connected with public-service corporations and has no relation to any other than purely private interests. This change is desired by companies whose legal period is about to expire and who wish to continue in business without the many forms of annoyance which would be involved in rewriting their corporation papers. The Argonaut sees a good reason for favoring this proposal, with no possible objection to it.

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 33, relating to the liability of stockholders of a corporation or joint stock association—This is a legitimate piece of special legislation designed to permit the organization of a world's-fair corporation with limited liability to its stockholders. Our present laws are very rigid in this connection and they stand in the way of raising funds for the projected 1913 exposition. Many would subscribe if they could do so upon the basis of a liability limited to the amount of their stock holdings. The proposal is a legitimate one and the amendment should be adopted.

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 34 relates to the so-called margin law, under which dealing in stocks on margins or part payment is penalized. The existing constitutional provision was framed to prevent a vicious system of stock gambling and before the day of legitimate trading in industrial stocks, bonds, etc. It serves the purpose of a dishonest trader by giving him the means of swindling his broker under the law. It serves no useful purpose—no other purpose, in fact, than to assist sharpers and scoundrels in evading legitimate obligations. Every broker of standing in San Francisco and the other cities of the State and all the leading banks favor this measure. The Argonaut believes that the proposed amendment should carry.

Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 3—This is the direct primary. Everybody, so far as we can make out, is for it excepting the Argonaut. We are opposed to it as an uncooked political novelty, containing more promise of mischief than of benefit. Assured that it will get a heavy vote, the Argonaut now wishes formally to reserve the right to say we told you so. On this amendment the Argonaut raises a loud, and, we fear, a solitary no.

Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 7—This amendment proposes a change in the general law that will permit the fee of jurors to be regulated by local conditions. The proposal seems an entirely proper one.

Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 8, relating to the appropriation of the State school fund. The purpose of the State school fund is to equalize the benefits of education, by compelling financially strong communities to assist weaker ones. The purpose of this amendment is directly the reverse. In effect it would take out of the State school fund a considerable amount of money each year and appropriate it to the support of special schools—night schools, kindergartens, and the like—in the three or four larger cities of the State. We believe this would be a mistake. We believe that if San Francisco, Los Angeles, Oakland, and Sacramento want special schools, they ought to support them by special taxation. We are opposed to robbing the poor schools of Alturas, Modoc, and Alpine Counties for the sake of helping three or four rich cities to sustain special systems of education.

Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 24—This amendment proposes to reorganize the State board of education—in other words, to politicalize it in the interest of the "system." The proposal, we think, is essentially wrong—bad from every point of view.

Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 28, relating to the approval and return of bills by the governor and the exercise of the veto power. This amendment gives the governor thirty days instead of ten after the adjournment of a legislative session in which to pass upon bills submitted to him. By all means this amendment should be carried. It is impossible in the brief period of ten days for the governor to gain any adequate knowledge of the proposals embodied in the multiplied bills which are heaped upon the executive table in the closing days of every legislative session.

An act to change the seat of government from the city of Sacramento to the town of Berkeley—This is a measure which originated with a group of hustling real-estate operators to give town-lot values to certain windswept pasture tracts which lie far to the north of Berkeley. In another view it is a proposal to corrupt and overslaugh the serene academic atmosphere of Berkeley with the atmosphere of politicalism. In still another view it is a proposal to abandon a large and beautiful State property at Sacramento and to involve the taxpayers of California for the next forty years in a heavy and continuous and wholly useless expense. In still another view it is a measure designed to put upon Sacramento a gross injustice and a gross insult. No man who is at once unprejudiced, just, and prudent will support this preposterous measure.

For the San Francisco sea-wall act—This is a proposal originating with the Mission boomers and designed to build up a new harbor at Islais Creek, three miles from the present centre of the water front, at the cost of water-front revenues. It is a thing not improper in itself, but inexpedient and mischievous. Those who have property in the Mission region and would like to see San Francisco abandon its present water-front system or weaken it in the interest of a new port near Hunter's Point, will naturally support this measure. Conservative and prudent people will vote against it.

For the India Basin act—This is another slice cut from the same cheese. It proposes to tax the harbor revenues of San Francisco, insufficient as they are for the purposes for which they are legitimately designed, to create a new harbor near Hunter's Point which would be useless now but might possibly serve the needs of some future generation. Most of us, we imagine, would rather leave it for our grandchildren to improve India Basin when they shall need it.

Japan and the Fleet.

Now that the American fleet has sailed from Japanese waters and the yellow-press headlines upon both sides of the Pacific have dwindled to their normal size, we may well take stock of the situation and ask ourselves, what next? Our ships have been received with extraordinary demonstrations of the holiday-making spirit. Their officers and their crews have been fêted, dined, and junketed to repletion. Dense crowds of sightseers have cheered themselves hoarse. Count Ito has outdone himself in the fervor of his suave oratory and Count Katsura has repeated a large selection of choice and resonant moral axioms. We, on our part, have taken note of all these things with complacent satisfaction, we have commented on the "honor" paid to the fleet and to the nation, and we have assumed in some ill-defined way that the clouds have all rolled by, that Japan has been reduced to a properly submissive condition, and that all threatening problems have been dissipated forever.

But this cheerful survey will hardly bear the test of critical examination. Heaven forbid that we should be guilty of forebodings or that we should throw cold water upon a newly awakened international amity, but for the life of us we can not see that the situation is materially changed. To draw any kind of conclusion from the fact that Japanese streets have been filled with shouting crowds or that our officers and men have been treated with exuberant hospitality would be simply too foolish for words. It was very certain that so long as Japan was not ready to be unfriendly she would take care that her "friendliness" should be of the most impressive kind, while the declaration of general holidays, the incitements of the press, and a splendid naval pageant would do all that was needed in the way of popular enthusiasm. Hardly less respectable is the argument that the Japanese government has been awed by the spectacle of the fleet. With the exception of the seagoing qualities of the ships—necessarily a matter of speculation—the Japanese government knew just as much about the fleet before it started as it does now; that is to say, everything that could be known by a foreign power of singular astuteness. Japan has a yellow press with a greater power than our own because it deals with more ignorant people who can be even more easily swayed. Whatever aggressive designs may be harbored by the Japanese government will find effective support in the yellow press, and the manufacture of enthusiasm with all its concomitants is therefore simply a matter of touching the right button.

Can it be seriously supposed that any one of the main lines of Japanese policy has been changed a hair's breadth by the visit of the fleet? Is it conceivable that Count Ito has revised his projects under the spell of hospitable oratory or from the glamor of fireworks? To believe that would be to show that we can believe anything. Indeed, the very intensity of the reception is evidence that it takes the place of something more substantial, upon the general ground that things Oriental are usually the reverse of what they seem.

We shall at least have a speedy opportunity to judge whether the Japanese government has experienced a change of heart. At this moment there are certain emissaries from China on their way to the United States. Their object is to bring pressure upon Japan to evacuate Manchuria in accordance with the express terms of the treaty of Portsmouth. Both Russia and Japan agreed to recognize Chinese sovereignty over Manchuria and to remove their forces as rapidly as might be. Russia has loyally fulfilled her obligations in spirit and in letter. Japan, on the contrary, not only refuses to evacuate the province, but is extending her military grip upon it to the exclusion of foreign capital and enterprise. Now, if there is any one point to which America is pledged, it is the integrity of China, her dominance over Manchuria, and the open door with equal trade opportunities for all nations. Secretary Root explicitly instructed our consuls in Manchuria to recognize no authority but that of China, but nevertheless Japanese encroachment has been steady and persistent, and Manchuria today is almost a part of the Japanese empire. Japan, in other words, is doing precisely what she went to war with Russia for doing, and in view of the definite nature of American policy we can only regard her offense as being against America quite as much as against China. Her latest declarations are to the effect that she will not evacuate Manchuria, that she will not observe the treaty of Portsmouth, that she will not permit the open door, that she will not countenance equal commercial privileges.

We may therefore be excused if we refrain from overmuch jubilation at the Japanese reception of the American fleet. We would rather have had fewer fireworks and more performance. As it is, we must regretfully recognize that in its broad outlines the practical situation is left unchanged.

Editorial Notes.

President Roosevelt doesn't deserve much sympathy in the scrap now in progress between himself and Mr. Samuel Gompers. If the President had not coddled Gompers, trafficked with him for the labor vote, and tried to make the Chicago convention make a trade with him, he would not now be embarrassed by Mr. Gompers's allusions to their former dealings. Having within so brief a period as four months been noisily on both sides of the question, the best thing Mr. Roosevelt can now do is to sit tight and say nothing. With all his faults, Gompers has the better of this argument.

Henry A. Butters, who died at Berkeley last Monday, belonged to the limited class of courageous and capable men who help forward every country in which they operate. Mr. Butters's activities were curiously wide, extending from South Africa to Australia and largely over the United States, and everywhere they were successful. Wherever he chanced to live at different periods of his life, Mr. Butters always remained a Californian. His latest enterprise, that of establishing local transportation throughout the Sacramento Valley, he has left only half done, but so far done that its success is an ultimate assurance. California, which knew him as a poor boy, which saw him a bold and successful operator the world around, which has known him later as an upbuilder of the State, and in whose bosom he sleeps at last, has every reason to feel kindly for the name and memory of Henry Butters.

CAMPAIGN TOPICS.

As the day of election draws nearer the voice of the forecasters becomes loud in the land. All the approved methods of political fortune-telling are pressed into service, and that the two parties read the stars each after its own fashion is no discouragement to their respective adherents. But the Democratic soothsayers are a little vague. They content themselves with generalizations and they prefer sweeping predictions of landslides and avalanches to the sober lessons conveyed by reliable reports and the examination of figures. We have yet to hear of any straw votes either initiated by Democrats or favorable to them, whereas there are plenty of these unofficial tests that point in the other direction.

The New York Times, reflecting the modest attitude of the metropolis, remarks that New York State is about to elect the next President of the United States. "To be sure," says the Times, "the forty-five other States in the Union will go through the form of choosing presidential electors on that day, but it is only New York that really counts." That, of course, is true enough in a way, although it might have been expressed more diffidently. New York seems to be the only State absolutely necessary either to Taft or Bryan. As the Times points out, the various mathematical sharps around the headquarters of the two leading parties are amusing themselves by figuring out combinations by which Taft or Bryan could be elected without considering New York, or without Indiana and Ohio. It is of course possible to make lists of States whose total electoral vote is more than 242 without including either of the three States mentioned, but it requires only the setting down of the names to show how utterly impossible they are of realization.

Bryan reckons, of course, upon what is called the "Solid South," although even here there are spots that seem to ring hollow under the foot. The "Solid South" is made up of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and Oklahoma. These fifteen States have a total electoral vote of 166. Therefore it will be necessary for Bryan to get seventy-six electoral votes in other States, and the question is how can this be done without New York.

Even then it must be remembered that the "Solid South" may be disappointing to Democratic hopes. Kentucky, Maryland, and Missouri have wavered in the past, and what they have done before they may do again. The feeling against Bryan is very strong in some of the other States, and while it would be imprudent to suppose it strong enough to break away from tradition, it would be equally unwise to leave it altogether out of calculation. Among these doubtful Southern States Maryland is the most doubtful of all. Omitting Maryland, we have 158 votes that are safe for Bryan. But he will certainly get three from Nevada and this raises his "sure" total to 161.

Now on the other side of the shield we have twenty-two States that are equally safe for Taft, so far as any calculation has any value. These are California, Delaware, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Dakota, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah, Vermont, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. These States are worth 207 votes. There are some wisecracks who put Kansas, Oregon, Utah, and Wisconsin in either the Bryan or the doubtful column, but these are the young men who see visions and dream dreams. The doubtful column may reliably be written down as Colorado, Connecticut, Indiana, Maryland, Montana, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, and West Virginia, and their votes amount to 115. This "doubtful" column errs, if at all, upon Mr. Bryan's side, and the best informed among the weatherwise would make it much shorter than it is. There certainly is no reason why New York should be doubtful and New Jersey safe, while in Connecticut and West Virginia the element of doubt is a very small one.

Now, taking Bryan's start with 161 sure votes and adding to them every doubtful State with the exception of New York and we find him with a total of 237 electoral votes, and this is five short of the necessary 242. It really seems, then, that New York State will elect the next President of the United States.

There is therefore a very good reason why both parties should concentrate their strength upon New York. During the final week Mr. Taft and Mr. Bryan will tour the State and will address mass meetings in Madison Square Garden. Mr. Hearst also promises a fusillade from his heaviest artillery, and no doubt more incriminating letters will be given to the public. Governor Hughes is doing yeoman service, and the list of his engagements looks like a railway schedule. In fact, there will be an outpouring of the spirit of unprecedented volume, and if any doubtful voters remain upon election day it will not be for the lack of precept.

By way of getting a better perspective, the opinions of the New York Herald and the New York World are not without interest. Both these newspapers have made exhaustive canvasses of the situation in the doubtful States, and their distribution is as follows:

	Herald	World
Republican (reasonably sure).....	204	205
Democratic (reasonably sure).....	161	178
Republican leanings	68	...
Democratic leanings	39	...
In the balance.....	11	100

The Herald says:

There are political conditions in the West indicating a landslide. There are signs in New York presaging political chaos. Obviously, if Mr. Bryan is to be swept into the presidency, it must be a landslide, or, rather, an avalanche. He can do nothing under conditions that are normal or near normal.

On the surface Mr. Taft is creeping nearer and nearer the goal of 242 electoral votes. According to the Herald's calculation, based on straw votes, polls, reports, opinions, wagers, and general evidence on which a newspaper must depend, Taft is sure today of 204 electoral votes. Bryan is sure of 161. A week ago Taft seemed sure of 188 and Bryan 166. Thus Mr. Taft in probability has made a gain in one week of sixteen electors, while Mr. Bryan has retrograded five electors.

Taft to win must get thirty-eight doubtful votes; Bryan to win must get eighty-one doubtful votes.

The World believes that Republican losses will be large and that everything will turn upon New York:

The results of the canvass reflect the earnest and impartial efforts of the leading newspapers in Maryland, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, Montana, Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Washington, Nevada, and California, and of the World through its correspondents in the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut.

Of the doubtful States, of which New York is the most important, Mr. Taft must carry New York to win by a margin of two votes. If he does so, his election is assured.

Mr. Bryan to win needs to carry New York, Ohio, and Maryland, or Nebraska or West Virginia, which will give him 248, or six votes more than is necessary to secure his election. If he carries New York, Indiana, West Virginia, and Nebraska or Maryland, and yet loses Ohio, he may still be elected by six votes in the Electoral College.

Among the more important States other than New York the World places Ohio, 23 electoral votes doubtful; New Jersey, 12 electoral votes sure for Taft; Illinois, 27 electoral votes sure for Taft; Indiana, 15 electoral votes doubtful; Nebraska, 8 electoral votes doubtful; West Virginia, 7 electoral votes doubtful.

The replies to the postal card canvass of the World in New York State show: For Bryan, 134,760; for Taft, 144,700; for Chanler, 291,500; for Hughes, 107,450. It places Bryan's probable plurality in the five boroughs of New York City at 133,360 and Chanler's at 288,400.

Speaking in East Liverpool, Ohio, Mr. Taft made clear his position on the labor issue. Referring to the statement that the labor unions throughout the country would follow the lead of Mr. Gompers, he said:

Mr. Gompers is one of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, and I got the impression that the whole Federation of Labor was delivered body and soul by Mr. Gompers to the Democratic party and to Mr. Bryan, but it seems there are some left out. Mr. Daniel Keefe, the head of the Longshoremen's Union, with whom perhaps a number of my audience are acquainted, does not think that I am a devil with horns.

He is going to support me for the presidency because he says he has always found in his dealings with me (we have had a good many) that I was just and fair to the interests that he represented as the head of the Longshoremen's Union and as one of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. Taft once more defined his attitude toward labor unionism and emphasized the fact that combinations of all kinds, whether of labor or of capital, were necessary and indispensable, but that the power involved must in each case be accompanied by a larger sense of responsibility:

I am strongly in favor of labor unions * * * and I think it would be a sorry day for this country if labor organizations were not encouraged. I am in favor of combination of labor, as I am in favor of combination of capital, because I think the combination of capital secures economy in production, reduces the cost of production for the benefit of the public and ought to be encouraged; but the permission to combine labor and the permission to combine capital puts most powerful instruments in the hands of a few men, and with that immense power they have a corresponding responsibility, and therefore they must be most careful to see that that power is not exercised across the lines of lawfulness.

Tammany has announced its intention to contribute $10,000 to the campaign fund of the Democratic National Committee. This is said to be the first time that Tammany has ever contributed to a national campaign fund, and so substantial a replenishment of the exhausted Democratic coffers is naturally the cause of congratulation.

Horace E. Bixby, eighty-two years of age, still at the wheel after sixty years as a Mississippi River pilot, enjoys the distinction of having taught Mark Twain the art of navigation on the "Father of Waters." He says Mark Twain became a good pilot, having but one fault—the excessive use of tobacco. Captain Bixby is still hale and hearty and enjoys telling of the various episodes of his eventful career upon the river.

DANIEL COIT GILMAN, EDUCATOR.

Early President of the University of California, Head of Johns Hopkins a Quarter of a Century.

Dr. Daniel Coit Gilman, president of the University of California in its early years, first president of Johns Hopkins University, and afterwards head of the Carnegie Institution in Washington, died suddenly at the home of his sisters in Norwich, Connecticut, October 13. Dr. Gilman had been in feeble health for several months. He returned from Europe a short time before his death, after having spent seven months in Italy and Switzerland. For a generation he had held a foremost place among the educators of America. The Outlook says of his work:

He was to be counted with President Eliot and Dr. Stanley Hall among the leaders of that renaissance of education which in the last thirty years has transformed the American college and university, enlarged their field of action, advanced their standards, modified or extended their methods, and brought them up to the standard of foreign institutions. There are now many fields of knowledge in which a young American can obtain as thorough a training at home as in England or in Germany.

The early years of Dr. Gilman's life were not eventful, but they were occupied with the training that in after years bore remarkable fruit:

Daniel Coit Gilman was born in Norwich, Connecticut, of New England ancestry, on July 6, 1831. He was graduated from Yale in 1852. After graduation he continued his studies at New Haven, and afterwards in Berlin, where he followed the lectures of Carl Ritter and Adolph Trendelenburg. He traveled much in Europe and studied the social, political, and educational conditions of the countries he visited, and also their physical structure. On his return in 1855 he was invited to become librarian of Yale and subsequently to be professor of physical and political geography there. He was for a short time superintendent of the public schools of New Haven and afterwards secretary of the Connecticut State board of education. From his post in Yale he was invited, in 1870, to become the first president of the University of California. He did not accept the offer, but two years later another call came. Dr. Gilman then went to California and remained at the head of the State university until 1875.

Of his service to the State university, the Outlook says:

He had an open field, a generous people, and a comparatively free hand; and he laid the foundations and defined the policies of an institution which at once took high rank and has had great influence of the best kind on educational life on the Pacific Coast. In this position Dr. Gilman's remarkable gifts and qualities were clearly revealed. He was not only a scholar in several departments of knowledge, but he had an expert's acquaintance with educational methods and university organization. He was probably the best-informed American of his time in all matters relating to the work and personnel of foreign universities. He knew the rising men even among the youngest members of the faculties abroad. He was a born administrator. He had the judicial temperament; the faculty of dealing easily and strongly with methods of classification, and administration seemed a kind of second nature to him; he was accessible and of a most agreeable personality, and he had command of a very clear and persuasive style of address. No man could have been better equipped for the organization of a university at the Golden Gate, and probably no man could have handled better than did Dr. Gilman.

Successful as he was at Berkeley, he fell a victim to the influence of Grangerism (so-called), then in political ascendancy. He was irritated by plans of regulation and investigation, with threats of legislative interference, and in his chagrin and resentment decided to accept an offer then made to him:

In 1873 Johns Hopkins, who had made in Baltimore, in the grocery business, a large fortune that he very much increased as a railroad man, gave $4,500,000 worth of property for a hospital, presented the city of Baltimore with a public park, and also gave $3,500,000 to found an institution devoted to the higher education of young men, the encouragement of research, and the publication of learned works. It was to embrace schools of law, medicine, science, and agriculture. Johns Hopkins University was first proposed by the donor in 1867. When the university was established a committee was appointed to select its first president. It consulted with the heads of the principal colleges of the country, and decided upon Daniel Coit Gilman, who was then president of the University of California. Johns Hopkins was opened in 1876.

When Dr. Gilman first took charge there was nothing like it in this country. It stood absolutely alone. Yale, Harvard, Princeton, and other educational institutions were at that time more colleges than universities. Since then Dr. Gilman's work has been duplicated in colleges all over the United States, but the prestige of Johns Hopkins as one of the greatest of the world's universities has been enlarged and spread. It was as head of Johns Hopkins University that Dr. Gilman gained the reputation of an educator of the first class.

In considering the several fields of Dr. Gilman's labor and the result of his efforts, the New York Evening Post observed in its editorial columns:

The young men who gathered at the Johns Hopkins in the early days under Gildersleeve, Rowland, Remsen, and Sylvester were filled with enthusiasm for exact and extensive learning. There is always, we grant, the danger that vast erudition will not become assimilated and humanized; that it will remain mere pedantry. This peril the graduates of Johns Hopkins incurred; and some of them did not wholly escape it. But in the seventies and eighties our education was less Germanized than now, and in an era of slipshod training, Johns Hopkins offered the kind of severe drill that was sorely needed. The graduates carried the gospel of a rigorous scholarship from one end of the country to the other, and made it more and more necessary for teachers, both in college and school, to be masters of their subject. This was perhaps Dr. Gilman's greatest contribution to the cause of education in America. How great it is we can not yet estimate; for the men whom he and his faculty prepared for teaching are yet with us, distinguished in their various callings, and we can not view their labors in proper perspective.

At the age of seventy, which Dr. Gilman reached in 1901, he retired from Johns Hopkins, and was succeeded by Dr. Ira Remsen. Almost immediately afterward he was elected first president of the Carnegie Institution, to further human knowledge by original research, for the establishment of which Andrew Carnegie had given $10,000,000. Dr. Gilman was appointed for five years; he tendered his resignation, however, at the end of three years, but not before he had laid the foundations for lasting work. He was then asked to edit the new International Encyclopedia and accepted. He went to New York and entered upon his labors with all the enthusiasm and ability which had characterized his career in Baltimore. He was then seventy years old; a man of fine physique, and one of the most alert, bright, active men of any age. For three or four years after his seventieth birthday he continued as active and energetic as a young man, but then he began to feel the feebleness of age. He died as he would have liked to have died.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Elopement.

That worthy citizen, Jacques Simbord—
Of Passy-le-Bois, the portly maire,
Silently counts his roses o'er,
And sippeth his purple ordinaire,
Under the shade of the arching vines,
In his elbow-chair, with its garb of brown.
While the light of the golden sun declines
Over the roofs of the drowsy town.

The maire's Lisette is down at the gate—
The old green gate—where the vines are high.
"Lisette is a child," he says, "hut wait!
We'll marry her, look you, hy and hie.
'Tis well young hearts should be early bound,
And notary Choux may wish to wed;
He's fifty—true; hut there can't be found
A richer man, or a hetter fed."

Ma foi! hut a father's eyes are hind;
Were you at the gate, most worthy maire,
Or down in the path, those vines behind,
You had seen a sight that had made you stare!
You had seen a gallant young mousquetaire
Kissing the lips of your child, Lisette;
And murmuring love with a sweeter air
Than ever did lover in Passy yet!

And so in the gray of the silent morn,
When the air is rife with the rose's hreath,
Lisette trips daintily down the lawn;
"We fly with the night, sweet love," he saith,
The wheels whirl round, and the dust-clouds sweep,
And away through the town a coach rolls out;
While the maire, in his chamber, is sound asleep,
And dreams of prisoning love, no doubt!

In the Commonwealth.

"Hush, hush! Why did you come tonight, mine own?
The Ironsides are mustering in the court;
Hark to the echo of the pious psalm,
And the hoarse roar of the ungainly sport.
See where my uncle, with his crafty smile,
Pours out the brown October, full and high;
He'd do the same for Rupert should he come,
And quote a text to justify the lie.

"The king?—Why, you are wounded, darling; see
How the blood oozes through the azure vest.
I've unguents here, and handages enow,
And spite of them all tonight I'll guard your rest.
I'll rouse old nurse from brooding by the fire,
Telling my grandsire's feats to twilight gloom.
I've played the ghost ere now at Hallow E'en;
No foot, tonight, shall tread the haunted room.

"There's only one I fear—my cousin there;
Him with the close-cropped curls and subtle smile,
Seeming to jest with yon grim corporal,
And watching closely for me all the while.
Last night he urged his suit—nay, never frown,
You might have heard, and welcome, all we said;
But, 'mid the oath crushed in his clinching teeth,
I heard your name—sweetheart, I am afraid!

"Keep back; the niche is deep and narrow, too,
But he can hear and see as if, in sooth,
Some evil spirit helps him. What, love? Fly,
And at some quiet chapel pledge our troth.
Set sail in La Belle Marie, dancing there,
Behind the headland, on the heaving main,
And in some hidden nook of sunny France,
Wait till our king comes to his own again!

"Dear, you'll be good to me? And it were well
To leave these weary wars and woes behind,
Ah, Richard is no longer in the court!
Danger is nigh us, so old Hubert signed—
Hubert who loved my mother. Hark, a tread
Comes ringing down the oaken corridor.
Pass 'neath the tapestry, darling. Who comes there?
Tonight I shall not quit my hower more."

The weak kar crashed before an angry foot,
The lover sprang the shrieking girl to guard,
But his strong arm hung helpless at his side—
Helpless the murderer's deadly thrust to ward;
As a long shriek rang to the vaulted roof,
Struck to the heart the gay, young soldier fell.
The coward's dagger reached it through her hand,
So the old legends of the tower tell.

Nor long she lived to mourn her cavalier,
But passed away in frenzy—happiest so;
And in a drunken revel died the man
Who slew his own hopes with his dastard blow.
But still they say, at the old casement niche,
A shadowy form at Hallow E'en will stand,
Watching, with wild blue eyes, the empty court,
In silence pointing with a heeding hand. —Anon.

The most astonishing walking-stick of recent times is one with which Mr. Haldane, the British Secretary for War, considerably startled the House of Commons. The occasion was a discussion concerning cordite, and Mr. Haldane, answering some arguments against the security of the explosive, claimed that it was, when properly manufactured, so absolutely safe that he had had a walking-stick made of it, which he had been in the habit of bringing to the House and leaving in the cloak-room. There was, he explained, nothing in its appearance to cause apprehension, but it needed to be closely watched. He meant that the cordite, not the stick, needed watching; but with the knowledge thus given to the House, members are unlikely to meddle with the walking-sticks of the War Secretary.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Kermit, second son of President Roosevelt, is registered as a freshman at Harvard. He went in a few days before the opening, along with several hundred more of his kind, and no one knew the difference.

Eddie Brown, a twelve-year-old boy of Indianapolis and for three years the favorite pupil of Professor Hubay of Budapest, is now pronounced a wonderful violinist, and is appearing in concerts in the European capitals.

Hollow Horn Bear, chief of all the Sioux, is the first living man to have his portrait on the national currency. He made a great speech in Congress in 1889, and as he is a good looking specimen of his race his picture was engraved on both the $5 and $20 bills.

Captain Archibald Willingham Butt, the new military aide at the White House, is a fine tennis player and has already become a member of President Roosevelt's "tennis cabinet." He played his first game as partner with his eminent chief, matched against the French ambassador, M. Jusserand, and Postmaster-General Meyer.

Joseph H. Choate, who is seventy-seven, has been moved to remark that he does not feel as old as the youngest of his associates on the commission to arrange for the celebration of New York's Lincoln centennial, who is only sixty-four. Mr. Choate is still generally regarded in the legal profession as one of our most promising young men.

King Charles of Rumania is one of the kings in the happy family of Balkan states and has been ruler for over forty years. He was placed in his present place in 1866, although he was then given the title of prince. No one expected that he would last so long, and Bismarck expressed with grim humor the belief that the job of governing Rumania would at least provide King Charles with some interesting reminiscences. Yet, since 1878, the kingdom has been the quietest in the Balkan community.

Dr. Henry Van Dyke is in Paris to deliver a course of lectures at the Sorbonne, the general title of which will be "The Spirit of America." These lectures are delivered in connection with the exchange of professorships which America and the Sorbonne have been engaged in for some years now. Doctor Van Dyke is the first Princeton professor to lecture in this series, and is the fourth man to be sent. His predecessors were all Harvard men—Barrett Wendell, Archibald Coolidge, and George P. Baker.

Kiamil Pasha, the leader of the Young Turks and the present grand vizier, is by birth a Jew, but became a Mohammedan when a boy through his father's conversion. Although about seventy-five years old, he is a man of very modern ideas, having served his country as governor of Syria, as ambassador at St. Petersburg, and also as grand vizier. He is a great traveler and a wonderful linguist, speaking English, Hebrew, Greek, German, French, and of course Arabic and Turkish. He is the most accomplished statesman in Turkey today.

Ambassador Whitelaw Reid unveiled a tablet in Bath, on October 22, in memory of Edmund Burke, the English statesman and orator. The tablet had been set upon the house where Burke lived in Bath. Subsequent to the unveiling ceremonies Mr. Reid made a long address in which he declared that the highest, the most courageous, and the most far-seeing service in Burke's whole illustrious career was his outspoken sympathy with the American colonists and his unflinching resistance to the measures which eventually brought about the American revolution.

Mr. and Mrs. Aaron Kneeland of Georgetown, Massachusetts, have just celebrated the diamond—seventy-fifth—anniversary of their wedding. The husband is ninety-seven years of age and his good wife ninety-two. They have had a dozen children, and after a long life of tireless industry they decided to give up their little home and deed it to the town, in return for which they were to be cared for for the remainder of their days. This involved going to the town farm, where they have been given two comfortable rooms where they do light housekeeping.

Colonel William F. Stewart has been retired from active service in the army. The report and findings of the retiring board of army officers as to the physical condition of Colonel Stewart were in line with the testimony brought out during the hearings. Secretary Wright, after giving his approval, sent them to the President, who also approved them, and the President's action is final. Colonel Stewart's case has attracted much attention. For some time he has been in "exile" at an ungarrisoned post in Arizona. He strongly objected to being retired, declaring that he was fully capable of active duty.

Mrs. T. P. O'Connor, wife of the Irish statesman-journalist, and now in America with her husband, was an American girl. One of her greatest passions is a desire to make children happy, and this enthusiasm once took the form of a fairy play for them which enjoyed an enthusiastic run during the holidays of 1907. She has also produced a successful drama, "The Lady from Texas," and has the manuscript for a second now in Mr. Belasco's hands. After the death of the late "John Oliver Hobbes" (Mrs. Craigie), and before the election of Mrs. Humphry Ward, Mrs. O'Connor served as president of the Club of Journalistic Women in London.

NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN CHIVALRY.

By Jerome A. Hart.

XXXVII.

Some months after the dispute in the Oriental dining-room, the Daily Herald one morning printed two items which to the citizens seemed significant. The first ran as follows:

"The Hon. Daniel Burke, United States senator, arrived in the city yesterday from the States via the Isthmus by the steamer City of Panama. He is stopping at the Golden Gate Hotel. The distinguished statesman is expected to address a meeting of his constituents at Platt's Hall this evening, and it is whispered that his speech will divulge the inside secrets of the recent quarrel between the President and the senator over the Federal patronage of this State."

The other item which seemed significant was this:

"The Hon. John Tower, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the State, sent his resignation to the governor yesterday, and without waiting for it to be acted on, left at once for the Bay."

Both of these items fell under Senator Burke's eye while he was glancing rapidly over the papers in the hotel office. He was the centre of a small circle of intimates, and his friends noticed that as he read a slight shade appeared on his saturnine visage. But he did not speak of the two harmless paragraphs. The conversation was running on political topics, and Burke was anxious to ascertain how his standing at the White House affected him at home.

The door opened. Two gentlemen appeared, looked around the room, and, seeing Burke surrounded by his friends, approached. They were the Hon. Benjamin Colquhoun and Colonel DeKay, close friends of Judge Tower. They saluted the party with punctilious courtesy.

"May we have the honor of a few minutes' conversation with you, senator?" said Colquhoun, addressing Burke.

"Certainly, sir," replied Burke, scrutinizing the imperturbable visage of Colquhoun. "Is the matter so private that these gentlemen may not hear it? They are all intimate friends of mine."

"Doubtless you will be able to judge whether they should know of it after you have heard my message, sir," responded Colquhoun gravely. "I would suggest that we go to a less public place, and if you will allow your friends to remain within call, probably you may wish to send for them."

At this remark the intimate friends pricked up their ears.

"Very well, sir," replied Burke. "If you two gentlemen will follow me, we can confer freely in my own apartments." And the three men disappeared.

Not many minutes had elapsed when a negro servant appeared and requested the group of friends to go at once to Senator Burke's apartments. They found him seated at a table, gazing at a letter. He looked up as they entered.

"Here, Fox," said he. "Read that."

Judge Fox took up the note, and slowly read it aloud. It ran:

"Hon. Daniel Burke, Sir—Some months since, at the public dining-table of the Oriental Hotel, I was informed that you made certain remarks concerning me which were offensive in their nature. At the same time I was informed by my friend, Judge Bondy, who heard these remarks, that you declared you would not entertain any call of a personal character until the expiration of the senatorial session, just concluded. I have therefore not been permitted to take any notice of those remarks until the expiration of the limit fixed by you. I now take the earliest opportunity to require of you the retraction of those remarks. This note will be handed to you by my friend, Benjamin Colquhoun, Esquire, who is acquainted with its contents and will receive your reply. Your obedient servant,
"John Tower."

The silence following the reading was broken by Burke, who remarked:

"I told Colquhoun an answer would be ready tomorrow. But he urges greater speed, for the sake of all concerned, and said he would wait at the Oriental Hotel for a reply."

This meant, of course, that an impending hostile meeting between two such prominent men would speedily become known throughout the community, and the authorities would endeavor to prevent it. In case the encounter was considered inevitable, such interference would merely result in postponement. Still it would cause embarrassment and annoyance, as both principals and seconds would be arrested. So all present decided that Colquhoun was right.

"You are a level-headed lawyer, judge," said Burke, turning to Fox. "What tone should I take in replying to Tower's cartel?"

"Pardon me, senator," interrupted McCarren, "but it is not a cartel. It is merely a letter of inquiry, and can not be considered as a challenge."

"Whether it is or is not a challenge," quickly interjected Fox, "it is threatening in its tone. I should, I think, ask Tower to specify what the language is to which he objects."

"Very good," agreed Burke. "Suppose then, judge, that you draw up a reply to that effect."

Fox seized a pen and in a few moments read this:

"Honorable John Tower, Sir—Your note of September 8 has reached me through the hands of Benjamin Colquhoun, Esquire. The remarks made by me in the conversation referred to may be subject to future misrepresentation. Therefore for obvious reasons I have to desire you to state what were the remarks that you designate in your note as offensive, and of which you require of me the retraction. I remain, etc.,

"Daniel Burke."

"What do you think of that, gentlemen?" asked Burke, looking interrogatively from Fox to the others. McCarren hesitated a moment. "Without reflecting on Judge Fox," he said, "it seems to me inexpedient to demand specifications of the language used. Tower will certainly reply that Senator Burke must himself know what he said, and that if he did not intend the language to be offensive it makes no difference what the words were. It is a question of intent, not of text."

"I agree with Judge McCarren in objecting to the form of the reply," said Holton, "although I object on different grounds. The phrase 'future misrepresentation' may in itself be construed as offensive, or additionally offensive. If a meeting should result from this misunderstanding, there is no reason for further offense. Let us make the correspondence as colorless as possible."

"I am sorry to be obliged to differ with these two gentlemen," remarked Fox, "but my habit of mind makes me insist on precision. Tower complains of certain language which he says was used by Senator Burke. Query—what is that language? Let Tower specify."

Burke listened attentively, and nodded his head several times.

"That settles it!" he exclaimed, "Fox is right. Send the reply as it was written."

So a fair copy was made, and Fox's draft was sent without change.

Burke requested his friends to take luncheon in his rooms, as a reply might be expected soon. He was right, for it came while they were still at the table just lighting their cigars. Burke received it in person in the outer room from Tower's friends, and, returning, read it aloud to his own. It was thus couched:

"Hon. Daniel Burke, Sir—In reply to your note of this day, I have to say that the offensive remarks to which I have alluded in my communication to you amount substantially to your saying that you had considered and spoken of me as 'the only honest man on the Supreme Court bench,' but that you now take it all back. Thus by implication you reflect on my personal and official integrity. This is the substance of your remarks as reported to me. The precise terms, however, in which such an implication was contained are not important to the question. You yourself can best remember the terms in which you spoke of me on the occasion referred to. What I require is the retraction of any words which were used, calculated to reflect on my character as on official and a gentleman. Your obedient servant,
"John Tower."

When he had finished reading, Burke addressed McCarren. "And how does that strike you?" he asked.

"It corroborates my belief that this misunderstanding by no means compels a hostile meeting, senator," rejoined McCarren. Turning to the others, he added: "You see, Tower does not insist on holding to the belief that Senator Burke deliberately used offensive language concerning him. Tower's note is courteous, and merely asks for information as to what the language was."

"Even then," added Corkle, "the matter of deciding whether the language used was or was not offensive is an open one; Tower may consider it inoffensive. In short, his note presents still another opportunity to Senator Burke to withdraw the so-called 'offensive language,' if he desires to do so."

"I agree with Colonel Corkle," went on McCarren. "As yet no issue is joined."

"True," assented Corkle, "and what is more, Judge Tower's remarks were leveled at Senator Burke's political party and not at Senator Burke himself, while the senator's aspersions had, strictly speaking, attacked certain unnamed members of the Supreme Court."

"While I can not take so optimistic a view of arranging this affair amicably as these two gentlemen," here interjected Holton, "I must admit that there is much force in their remarks. Likewise, it can not be denied that, both in his first and in his second note, Tower has carefully avoided closing the door toward a possible adjustment."

"Although in our reply to his first note," exclaimed McCarren quickly, "we went far toward closing the door ourselves."

"Scarcely that," interrupted Fox, looking up from the table where he was writing. "All we did was to ask what was the offensive language Tower objected to."

"But we asked it in a tone which was in itself offensive," retorted McCarren.

"Softly! softly! gentlemen!" here interposed Corkle, pacifically. "Let us not quarrel ourselves over what is not yet a quarrel."

"Not on our side—no!" cried Fox. "But Tower is trying to pick a quarrel with the senator here."

"I hardly think that is his desire," replied Corkle. "Tower has as yet made no demand for the retraction of any specific language. He has simply asked to know whether any language was used reflecting on his character; if so, he would then require its retraction. Whatever words were used by Senator Burke were uttered in private, so to speak; they were uttered in a moment of irritation; they reflected only by implication on Judge Tower; their withdrawal would remove all cause of offense on his part. Furthermore, such withdrawal could not reflect in any way on Senator Burke's character for honor and bravery."

McCarren shook his head. "Am I to understand, colonel," he asked, "that you advise an apology to Tower?"

"Or what is the same thing," added Fox, sneeringly, "a withdrawal of the language used by Senator Burke?"

"It would not be an apology, but an explanation," returned Corkle, warmly. "There is a great difference. As you gentleman all know, I have been on the field more than once, in various capacities, and I am not recommending the white feather. But this is a case where a hostile meeting is uncalled for. I will prove it by a couple of questions. Senator, do you believe Tower is dishonest?"

"No," replied Burke laconically.

"Do you believe he is corrupt?"

"No," again came the terse answer.

"There you have the matter in a nutshell, gentlemen," cried Corkle, triumphantly. "In all matters in dispute between men of honor, the way is simple and direct. Tower has been told that Senator Burke accused him of being dishonest and corrupt. You have just heard the senator say he believes Tower to be neither."

There was a long pause, during which Burke seemed plunged in thought. At last he spoke:

"No, I have never believed Tower to be corrupt," he said, slowly. "I really entertain no rancorous feelings toward Tower. I have no genuine quarrel with Tower. I have never had any quarrel with him. In fact, although we have been thrown little together, my feelings toward him have been semi-friendly. But as for his boss, Wyley, the leader of that gang of Southern Chivs, I hate him bitterly. I would give everything I have in the world to meet him tomorrow with pistols, with a fair field and nobody to stop us. I scarcely understand how it happens that I find myself about to fight Tower instead of Wyley. But so it seems." Suddenly Burke turned to Fox. "Why, here is a man who hates Tower as bitterly as I hate Wyley. Fox and Tower have been enemies for years, yet here I am about to fight Tower, with whom I have no quarrel."

Fox looked up uneasily, as if about to speak, but he was interrupted by Corkle.

"Senator, I am glad to hear you say so," exclaimed Corkle, earnestly. "You have no quarrel with him. You deny to us, your friends here, that you have charged Tower with being dishonest or corrupt. You say you do not believe it. Now if you do not believe that he is dishonest and corrupt, why not say so? That would end the matter."

Again there was silence for a time, and Burke turned to Holton:

"What do you think of Corkle's advice, general?" he asked.

"It is good advice in the abstract, senator," replied Holton, "and I would agree with him under other conditions. But there is more in this than appears on the surface. It seems to me that there is a disposition on the part of these Southern men to crowd us Northern Democrats too far." He grew warmer as he spoke, and turned toward the others: "We have stood more than we ought to already. Now they have picked our honored leader, Senator Burke here, as our champion, and selected their own. It is my belief that this contest has been forced upon Senator Burke, and if he does not meet it, that it will injure him personally and politically throughout the State."

"I agree with General Holton," interposed Fox speaking with so unusual a heat that the others stared at him. "Our leader, Senator Burke, is the undisputed leader of the Northern Democrats. Tower is a follower and henchman of Senator Wyley, the acknowledged chieftain of the Chivalry. Now for years we have been hearing that one Southern Democrat is as good as five Northerners. They are all the time calling us 'Northern mudsills' and 'cowards.' They are all the time sneering at our matchless leader here, Senator Burke, because he was a workingman and came from the ranks of the plain people. I believe this is a deliberately hatched plot to bring about a hostile meeting between the Northern and Southern champions. These Chivs believe that our man will show the white feather. They are mistaken. If any such attempt to avoid a meeting is made, as is advised by our friend Colonel Corkle—whose motives are high and honorable, I know—I am certain that it will be misconstrued and misunderstood by the public."

"What do you mean?" asked Burke, darkly.

"I mean," replied Fox, stoutly, "that all the Chiv will accuse you of cowardice, and perhaps some of you own followers may. There, senator, that's the truth and I'm a genuine friend for telling it to you."

There was an unpleasant pause. During the conference Burke had seemed a prey to indecision, but now he had evidently made up his mind.

"I am inclined to think that you and Holton are right, judge," he said. "If I were disposed to withdraw the language I used concerning Tower—and even in the intimacy of this friendly circle I do not admit that I am—I think that such withdrawal would be misconstrued. Therefore we may consider that the language used will not be disavowed, and we will reply to this note in such terms as on consultation we consider best."

Fox had a rough draft prepared, which at Burke's request he read. It ran:

"Hon. John Tower, Sir—Yours of this date has been received. The remarks made by me were occsioned by certain offensive allusions of yours concerning me made in a speech at Sacrosanto reported in the newspaper press. Upon the topic alluded to in your note my language, so far as my recollection serves me, was as follows:

"During Judge Tower's imprisonment by the Vigilance Committee I paid three hundred dollars a week to support a newspaper in his defense. I have also stated heretofore that I considered him, Judge Tower, the only honest man on the Supreme Bench. I take it all back."

"You are the best judge as to whether this language affords good ground of offense. Daniel Burke."

"At the risk of offending you, senator," said Corkle gravely, "let me urge you not to send this. The first note nearly shut the door to an amicable adjustment; this not only closes it irrevocably, but it gives further offense. It makes a meeting inevitable."

"That is it exactly," cried Holton impatiently. "The meeting is inevitable. We can't stop it, so why try any longer? A duel has been threatening for a long time between us and the Chivs. It has come—what better man could we have to represent us than our leader, Senator Burke?"

Burke nodded his head. "I think you are right, Holton," he said. "The meeting will surely take place. And you are right too, Corkle," he added with a smile, "in thinking that this note will bring it about. The next note from Tower will be a formal challenge, and I would like General Holton and Judge McCarren to meet Colquhoun and DeKay, and to act as my seconds in arranging the affair. If you two will remain with me, they may be expected very soon with a reply to this note."

The others rose to withdraw. Burke thanked them warmly for their solicitude in his behalf, and as he pressed Corkle's hand, he said:

"Your advice was good, colonel, I know, and such as any honorable man might accept. But I am going to fight for my party, and for the North against the South."

When the others had gone Burke and his seconds plunged into an earnest discussion of weapons and distances, each recalling what was known of Tower's skill. In the midst of this the seconds were summoned to meet Colquhoun and DeKay. From the interview they returned with thismissive. It was the formal cartel:

"Hon. Daniel Burke, Sir—Some months ago you used language concerning me offensive in its nature. I omitted the lapse of a period of time fixed by you before I asked reparation therefor at your hands. You replied asking specification of the language used which I considered offensive. In another letter I gave you the specification and reiterated my demand for retraction. To this last letter you now reply, acknowledging the use of the offensive language, and not making the retraction requested. This course on your part leaves me no other resource but to require the satisfaction usual among gentlemen, which I accordingly do. Mr. Colquhoun will make the necessary arrangements. Your obedient servant,
John Tower."

The correspondence had now reached a point where little deliberation was needed as to its wording. An answer was speedily prepared. It read as follows:

"Hon. John Tower, Sir—Your note has been received. In response to the same I will refer you to my friends General Holton and Judge McCarren, who will make the necessary arrangements. I am, etc., Daniel Burke."

The die was cast. Nothing now remained but to prepare for the meeting. The four gentlemen selected as seconds met, and at once there arose persistent but courteous discussions concerning the terms.

Hartford Bridge is a solid structure of granite, with nine span arches, and 1200 feet in length. It carries an eighty-foot highway, which is the great artery of Connecticut, connecting the two busy portions of the State, divided by the river which gives it its name. There has been a Hartford Bridge since 1808, and it has always been a busy bridge. It has had to be a stout one, for in the spring the usually mild Connecticut is a vicious stream, bringing down thousands of tons of broken ice and crashing it as if in rage against Hartford Bridge. Captain Isaac Damon of Northampton, Massachusetts, who was the boss bridge-builder of New England, built the original bridge, and he built it of hewn pine of a sort that is priceless today, pegged together in wonderful fashion. The river could never destroy his bridge. Fire did. But fire can never destroy the new Hartford Bridge.

It is estimated that the planting of between 15,000 and 20,000 acres to camphor trees in Ceylon would develop a production of 8,000,000 pounds, which, according to most authorities, is the quantity of camphor demanded annually at present. The camphor tree naturally grows to a height of forty feet, but in Ceylon it is being kept at the more convenient height of four to five feet.

There are at present on duty in the main thoroughfares of Paris twenty-one policemen who speak English, nine who speak German, and six who speak Spanish, and their usefulness has been so clearly demonstrated that the prefect of police has decided to add to their number as opportunity may arise.

A WOMAN'S JOURNEY.

Mrs. Hubbard Tells How She Completed Her Husband's Work in Unknown Labrador.

Among the records of women's achievements Mrs. Leonidas Hubbard's book, "A Woman's Way Through Unknown Labrador," will take a place deservedly high. It is not only the story of a remarkable achievement, an achievement of which a hardened explorer might well be proud, but it is based upon a fine sentiment that gives it a double claim upon our attention and interest. Mrs. Hubbard tells us that her book is the result of a determination to complete the unfinished work of her husband and to give to the world a plain statement not only of her own journey, but of his. She therefore includes the greater part of Mr. Hubbard's diary, with the account of George Elson, who was with her husband during the last few days.

It was in January, 1903, that Mr. Hubbard's trip to Labrador was decided upon. He was at that time the assistant editor of Outing, and it was in the interest of that periodical that the tour was undertaken. On June 20 he sailed from New York and in the following January came the short message that "Mr. Hubbard died October 18 in the interior of Labrador."

Mrs. Hubbard's introduction to her own labors is characteristically short:

It seemed to me fit that my husband's name should reap the fruits of service which had cost him so much, and in the summer of 1905 I myself undertook the conduct of the second Hubbard expedition, and, with the advantage of the information and experience obtained by the first, a larger crew and a three weeks' earlier start, successfully completed the work undertaken two years before.

My decision to undertake the completion of my husband's work was taken one day in January of 1905. That evening I began making my plans and preparations for the journey. Towards the end of May they were completed, and on the evening of the 16th of June I sailed from Halifax for Labrador, arriving at Northwest River Post, the real starting point of my journey, on Sunday morning, June 25.

Mrs. Hubbard was fortunate in her crew, and she tells us so at every opportunity. Her crew was four in number: George Elson, who accompanied Mr. Hubbard in 1903; Joseph Ischerhoff, a Russian halfbreed; Job Chapies, a pure-blood Cree Indian; and Gilbert Blake, a halfbreed Eskimo boy trapper. These men lived with one another in their chivalrous care of the woman who led them, and of this many instances are given us:

While the outfit was being brought up I walked along the shore watching the rapids. The men did not like to see me go near the river at all except when in the canoe, and warned me against going to the rapids. I promised to be careful, but not to keep away altogether, for they grew more and more fascinating. I wanted to be near them and watch them all the time. They were so strong, so irresistible. They rushed on so fast, and nothing could stop them. They would find a way over or around every obstacle that might be placed before them. It made one wish that it were possible to join them and share in their strength. About a mile above camp I stepped out on a great boulder close to where they were very heavy. The rock seemed large enough so that I could scarcely fall off if I tried; but when the men came up George said: "Mrs. Hubbard, you must not do that."

"Why?"

"You will get dizzy and fall in."

"But I do not get dizzy."

"Maybe you think you will not. It is all right when you are looking at the rapid, but it is when you turn that you will fall. It is very dangerous. If you are going to do that we will just turn round and go back to Northwest River."

That settled the matter.

The men were fertile in expedients to deter their employer from what they believed would be dangers, and Mrs. Hubbard found that so much attention was rather irksome:

Waiting in the lower wooded parts was not so pleasant. Once I announced my intention of setting up my fishing rod and going down the river to fish, while the rest of the outfit was being brought up. Sudden consternation overspread the faces of the men. In a tone of mingled alarm, disapproval, suspicion, George exclaimed: "Yes, that is just what I was afraid you would be doing. I think you had better sit right down there by the rifles. There are fresh bear tracks about here, and Job says they run down there by the river."

I could not help laughing at the alarm I had created, but obediently sat down on the pile of outfit by the rifles, strongly suspecting, however, that the bear tracks were invented, and that the real fear was on account of the river. It began to be somewhat irksome to be so well taken care of.

The prospect of meeting with the Nascaupsee Indians on the lakes of the upper George was not unattended with apprehension. The guides had their own reasons for caution, and they were reasons based upon knowledge:

The talk drifted to the stories of the Indians, tributary to Rupert's House, and the practical jokes perpetrated on them while camped about the post to which they brought each spring from the far interior their winter's catch of furs. There were stories of Hannah Bay massacre, and the retribution which followed swift and certain; and of their own trips inland, and the hospitality of the Indians. The talk ended with an anxious "If it were only the Hudson Bay Indians we were coming to, there would be no doubt about the welcome we should get."

Turning to me, George remarked, "You are giving that revolver a fine rubbing up tonight."

"Yes," I replied, laughing a little: "I am getting ready for the Nascaupes."

"They would not shoot you," he said gravely. "It would be us they would kill if they took the notion. Whatever their conjuror tells them to do, they will do."

"No," asserted Gilbert, who boasted some traditional knowledge of the Nascaupes, "they would not kill you, Mrs. Hubbard. It would be to keep you at their camp that they would kill us."

I had been laughing at George a little, but Gilbert's startling announcement induced a sudden sobriety. As I glanced from one to the other, the faces of the men were all unwontedly serious. There was a whirl of thoughts for a moment, and then I asked: "What do you think I shall be doing while they are killing you? You do not need to suppose that because I will not kill rabbits, or ptarmigan, or caribou, I should have any objection to killing a Nascaupsee Indian if it were necessary." Nevertheless the meeting with the Indians had for me assumed a new and more serious aspect, and, remembering their agony of fear lest some harm befall me ere we reached civilization again, I realized how the situation seemed to the men.

But the alarm was causeless. Apparently the conjuror was on his best behavior, for not only was there no incivility offered to the party, but a practical hospitality was the order of the day. Curiously enough, these people had no objection to being photographed. Indeed, they seemed familiar with the operation and even anxious thus to be handed down to pictorial immortality.

When the word went forth that we were about to leave, all gathered for the parting. Looking about for something which I might carry away as a souvenir of the visit, my eyes caught the beaded band which the chief's daughter wore on her hair, and stepping towards her, I touched it to indicate my wish. She drew sharply away and said something in tones that had a plainly resentful ring. It was, "That is mine." I determined not to be discouraged and made another try. Stretched on a frame to dry was a very pretty deerskin, and I had George ask if I might have that. That seemed to appeal to them as a not unreasonable request, and they suggested that I should take one ready dressed. The woman who had wanted my sweater went into the wigwam and brought out one. It was very pretty and beautifully soft and white on the inside. She again pleaded for the sweater, and as I could not grant her request I handed her back the skin; but she bade me keep it. They gave George a piece of deerskin dressed without the hair, "to line a pair of mits," they said.

The author tells us that while the farewells were being said the chief was engaged in a somewhat absent-minded, but none the less successful, examination of his daughter's head. Many others were similarly occupied and it seemed to be as much a matter of course as eating.

One final picture of the arrival at Ungava must suffice. Mr. Ford, the agent at the post, came to meet the party and to give them the welcome news that they were in time for the ship that would take them back to civilization.

At the foot of the hill below the house, Mrs. Ford stood waiting. Her eyes shone like stars as she took my hand and said, "You are very welcome, Mrs. Hubbard. Yours is the first white woman's face I have seen for two years." We went on up the hill to the house. I do not remember what we talked about, I only remember Mrs. Ford's eyes, which were very blue and very beautiful now in her excitement. And when we reached the little piazza and I turned to look back, there were the men sitting quietly in the canoes. The Eskimo had drawn canoes, men and outfit across the mud to where a little stream slipped down over a gravelly bed, which offered firmer footing, and were now coming in single file towards the post, each with a bag over his shoulder.

Why were the men sitting there? Why did they not come too?

Suddenly I realized that with our arrival at the post our positions were reversed. They were my charge now. They had completed their task and what a great thing they had done for me. They had brought me safely, triumphantly, on my long journey, and not a hair of my head had been harmed. They had done it, too, with an innate courtesy and gentleness that was beautiful, and I had left them without a word. With a dull feeling of helplessness and limitation I thought of how differently another would have done. No matter how I tried, I could never be so generous and self-forgetful as he. In the hour of disappointment and loneliness, even in the hour of death, he had taken thought so generously for his companions. I, in the hour of my triumph, had forgotten mine. We were like Light and Darkness, and with the light gone how deep was the darkness. Once I had thought I stood up beside him, but in what a school had I learned that I only reached to his feet. And now all my effort, though it might achieve that which he would be glad and proud of, could never bring him back.

Mrs. Hubbard sums up her achievement, and she does it with a modest brevity. The length of her journey was 576 miles from post to post (with 30 miles additional to Ungava Bay covered later in the post yacht Lily).

The time occupied was from June 27 to August 27. Forty-three days of actual traveling, eighteen days in camp.

The provisions consumed were 750 pounds to begin with, 392 pounds of which was flour. Surplus, including gifts to Nascaupsee Indians, 150 pounds, 105 pounds of which was flour, making the average amount consumed by each member of the party fifty-seven and a half pounds.

The results were the pioneer maps of the Nascaupsee and George Rivers, that of the Nascaupsee showing Seal Lake and Lake Michikamau to be in the same drainage basin and which geographers had supposed were two distinct rivers, the Northwest and the Nascaupsee, to be one and the same, the outlet of Lake Michikamau carrying its waters through Seal Lake and then to Lake Melville; with some notes by the way on the topography, geology, flora, and fauna of the country traversed.

It is a notable record, still more notable from the fact that it was achieved by a woman practically without training or experience. Never was a more remarkable monument raised to the memory of a pioneer than Mrs. Hubbard's monument to her husband.

The insurance companies have been hit hard by a decision handed down by the English court of appeals, which finds that the fire that swept the business portion of Kingston on January 14, 1907, was not caused by the earthquake, but preceded it. Several million dollars are involved and there is great rejoicing on the part of the Kingston policyholders, who will now have the necessary funds to start immediately in rebuilding the city.

A BAD CASE.

By a Distressed Wife.

My husband is at last convinced of the error of his ways, and has implored me to give his free and frank confession to the world. My husband is—or was—a very enthusiastic man, and imagines that he has a fine eye for the arts. Being a lawyer, he enjoys considerable leisure in the afternoons, and it is this that has proved his ruin. I shall never forget his first offense. It was very shortly after our marriage. I was wondering why he was so late for dinner, when suddenly a cab drove up to the door. For one moment I fancied that it must be his mother (wives have their mothers-in-law as well as husbands). Imagine my astonishment when out jumps my husband, with a guilty jauntiness of demeanor, presents the cabby with five shillings. I noted this extravagance myself from the window, and is followed by that functionary, staggering under an enormous burden, swathed in brown holland, up the steps. The usual loafer rushes forward and a fresh gratuity is distributed, to the horror of my economical mind. At last, the thing—apparently a miniature of the great pyramid—is deposited in our small hall with a resonant bang, and its bearers depart.

"What on earth makes you so very unpunctual, dear? The soup will be quite spoiled. And what, in heaven's name, is this?"

"I thought you'd like it, darling (this with a nervous flush). It's the most wonderful bargain, and it would have been really wicked to have let it slip. It's a genuine Elizabethan—but, there, see it for yourself."

The mummy-like bandages were at last removed, and what do you think I beheld? An enormous, rusty, musty, dusty, and hideous clock!

"Yes," he continued; "a real antique, Elizabethan, musical clock. It plays six tunes of the period; and, what's more, look at the initials graven on the face—'W. S.' I've very little doubt that it once belonged to Shakespeare himself, who was very fond of mechanical inventions. I shall have, of course, to have it repaired and done up, and then it will look splendid in the dining-room."

He quite took my breath away; I could only ejaculate, "Where on earth did you pick it up, and what did you pay for it?"

"At the sale of an old house. Every one said it was ridiculously cheap, and that they'd have given twice as much if only they had known. Just think, only a hundred dollars! Why, I could get two hundred for it any day."

White elephants were nothing to this disgusting "horologe," as I found it described in the catalogue. It cost twenty dollars to put right, and then it smashed twenty dollars' worth of things in being fixed up. It sometimes played its miserable so-called tunes so rapidly that you had to stuff your fingers in your ears; at others, it emitted a spasmodic and raven-like croak that was positively alarming. At last, thank heaven! it stopped—"never to go again"; and I firmly resolved that not one penny more should be spent in "doing it (and us) up." Add to this that I subsequently discovered a Geneva maker's name inside. I could wish that I had been more stern on this first occasion; but I was weak, like too many young wives, and was satisfied with a scolding. The result was that we gradually became deluged with the most miserable miscellany of rubbishy bric-à-brac, damaged furniture, dubious pictures, and, in a word, the refuse of the auction-room. To believe my husband, we were the proud possessors of Cromwell's hat, Byron's tooth-brush, one of Sheridan's I O U's, a curl of Marie Antoinette's, a Rubens, a Rembrandt, a George Morland (I believe this latter is the evil genius of the Picker-up), and a whole roomful of split and useless "Chippendale" and "Sheraton," etc. And all had been acquired at "sales which had a history," at an "absurd sacrifice," and to the admiration of the disappointed bystanders I saw that the fiendish habit was gradually growing upon him, like drink or gaming. I hope I know my duty: I resolved to protect myself and him; and, after an awful scene ensuing on his acquisition of an infected sedan-chair, I exacted from him a solemn pledge to give up this pernicious habit once and forever.

But I was inexperienced; I should have known the male mind better. Deterred from the open pursuit of his nefarious designs, he determined to smuggle his purchases in secret. I had observed him lingering somewhat suspiciously over the auction advertisements of the dailies, and I noticed also that his coat-pockets bulged out curiously on his nightly return. One day I had occasion to tidy (as a good wife should periodically do) the escritoire of his dressing-room. What do you think I found? The drawers, the pigeon-holes, the interstices even, were literally crammed with heaps of cracked and tarnished trifles—pounce boxes, enameled knife-handles, embossed watch-cases, pocket-revolvers, and the like. I was horrified. It was too true; deburred by the dread of discovery from "picking up" big things, he had resorted, under a miserable subterfuge, to small. But my presence of mind did not desert me. I have a strong will; and I vowed that our child's inheritance should not be thus squandered.

My husband kept a handsome volume in which he recorded minutely a description, the prices, and the dates of his purchase of this miscellaneous collection. My mind was made up. I numbered and ticketed every one of these horrible knickknacks with my own hands. I compiled their catalogue, and I headed it as follows:

"Messrs. Hammer & Tongs have the honor to announce that on Thursday next they will sell by auction, in their great rooms in Blank Street, the valuable collection of pictures, porcelain, furniture in the Sheraton, Adams, and Chippendale styles, arms, Limoges enamel, quaint watches and clocks, formed with consummate taste and at lavish expense by a gentleman who has no further need for them."

I myself arranged with the auctioneers, who, with some amplifications, adopted my catalogue, and a day was chosen when my husband was at last occupied (I believed remuneratively) in court.

Well, the time came. I was so excited that, although sorely tempted to be present, I did not dare to attend the "Rooms" of Messrs. Hammer & Tongs. The evening came, and with it my husband, in a frantic state of exhilaration.

"You've won the case!" I exclaimed, fondly and admiringly.

"Oh, never mind the case!" he rejoined, impetuously; "it was settled, and I got away quite early. Having made the money, I turned in—now don't be angry, darling—for a moment to Hammer & Tongs—most exciting sale of an eminent virtuoso's curios, and you'll admit that, after all, my judgment was not so bad; for it was an exact replica of my own—thing for thing and picture for picture, only that his Rembrandt and Rubens were poor copies and his George Morland evidently spurious. The whole lot were going for a perfect song, so I—"

"Good heavens!" I ejaculated; "you don't mean to say that you bought your own—?" But at this crisis a merciful film came over my eyes, and I swooned away.

My husband is completely cured, and we are gradually now trying to collect modern coins, which we pick up elsewhere than in sales-rooms.—St. James's Gazette.

William Gillette has made a great success in "Samson," the first American performance of Henri Bernstein's play. Gillette impersonates a man from low life who becomes wealthy by a lucky rise in copper and is married to a beautiful woman by her mother, against the daughter's wishes. While he is attending to his investments the wife finds an admirer, and the copper king soon finds it out. Instead of the usual methods of revenge, Maurice Brachard, impersonated by Gillette, lures the man to his room and has copper sold down till the admirer is ruined. The third act carries the climax. Brachard chokes the admirer, played by Arthur Byron, but lets him go, ruined.

The first day of the coming new year, Tommaso Salvini's eightieth birthday will be celebrated. Preparations are now being made to observe the event with ceremonies no less impressive than those which marked the celebration of Adelaide Ristori's eightieth birthday in Italy some few years ago. It has already been planned in Rome to have a great jubilee on this occasion, and arrangements will be made for fêtes, dramatic performances, and the like, while it is not improbable that Salvini will be asked to assume one of the notable rôles upon which his fame rests.

The celebrated grotto known as Arpaia at Portovenere, in the Gulf of Spezia, where Byron is said to have written a great portion of "The Corsair," has almost entirely collapsed owing to a landslide, and its entrance from the sea is now blocked up. The following inscription, put up some years ago, is now under water: "This grotto, which inspired Lord Byron to the sublime poem, 'The Corsair,' recalls the immortal poet who, a courageous swimmer, from Portovenere to Lerici challenged the waves of the Ligurian Sea."

If the records are correct, writes a New York Times observer, John Drew will be fifty-two years of age before Old Father Time tears off another leaf from the calendar. Rose Coghlan is less than a year his senior. Miss Lillian Russell is now just forty-seven. Billie Burke is twenty-two. There we have the record of conspicuous juvenility upon the New York stage today. For in the matter of youth, expressing itself in good humor and buoyant, refreshing spirit, the girl of twenty-two has none the better of the others in the list.

A couple of years ago an agitation was started in Paris against the unanimity of all French dramatists in swinging the chief action of a play around two men and a woman or two women and a man, as the case might offer. This scheme of play-building gradually is known to us by the term "French triangle." Sardou said he would abandon the triangle if his critics would change human nature. Whether we like it or not, says William Bullock, in the New York Press, we are coming to the adoption of the French system.

"A THUNDERSTORM IN PARIS."

A thunderstorm is bursting over the city. Ploc, ploc! Without warning the rain comes down in raging torrents. The water oozes from the walls, gushes from the roofs, the gargoyles sputter, and the gutters swallow in big gulps. Fric, frie! large drops break noisily on the asphalt and the fragments rise again to cut their capers and dance their merry rounds in the slippery street, a graceful ballet, dressed in a damp haze. Suddenly the umbrellas blossom forth, transforming the street into a mushroom bed. At the crossing, the very noise, wet, mellovs. The cabs splash sadly through the haze, dogs shake themselves, and the humans seek shelter.

Madame, returning from a fashionable store, is surprised by the rain. Loaded with boxes and parcels, and dressed in fresh satin with her summer hat, fancy slippers, and lace stockings, she suddenly sees the rain bar the way and madame is very angry.

How clever of her to forget her umbrella! and no cabs! The cochers, cross and already submerged in their raincoats, drive by at a breakneck speed and hear and see nothing. The autos cut through the storm tooting, struggling, skidding, and inapproachable. The omnibuses lumber heavily by, their welcome "complet" hoisted up high. Baste! It's nothing but a shower, of course, and rather than look like a muddy spaniel, or drop her bargains in a puddle, madame will wait for the rain to stop, yes, wait anywhere. Ah! voilà! under a porte cochère in the half-open vestibule of a large house a discreet, almost comfortable, refuge.

She bastens, hugging her treasures, and, like a bird whose plumage has been ruffled by the storm, she tricks herself out coquettishly, humoring her curls, filipping with a dainty finger the importunate rain-pearls from her bosom and shaking her skirts, which tremble around her in caressing waves.

But, no matter what the weather be, a pretty woman never passes unnoticed in Paris. No sooner had madame set her foot in her shelter than twenty persons followed her example. Gentlemen especially, old ones and young ones, timid ones and rakes, wags and idiots. All escaping the rain or scenting adventure. All staring at her open-mouthed or manoeuvring to get near her.

A dandy feigns to upset her parcels to create an occasion for gallant apologies. An old beau philosophizes on temperature to entice her into conversation, and even a little clerk, clean, ingénû, and silent, looks at her tenderly from a distance.

Ptit! pit! pit! At last the rain stops. The waterspouts dribble, the gutters tone down to B flat, through the clouds some azure smiles. Much annoyed by her obsequious surrounding, madame prepares to depart. The young dandy, the old beau, fire their last guns. Each ear is besieged by supplication and filled with a murmur of ambiguous remarks.

From her, not a word; with haughty brow and lips disdainful madame breaks through her court. Addressing the little clerk whose cheeks bloom forth like flaming peonies, "My friend," she says, with a gracious smile, "will you help me to carry my boxes to the corner?"

Too proud, too happy, the youngster would carry them to the end of the world. He straightens up, he rises on his toes to add to his height, and though the sky, fully extricated now, does not suggest as much as a drop, he covers the lovely woman with his umbrella, respectfully, as if he held the canopy over the Holy Sacrament. At the corner he is to be discharged with a few cents, but in Shylock's hreast Romeo's heart is beating. He rebels—he refuses—"Oh, no, madame! I am well paid as it is."

Then he takes to his heels, ashamed and delighted. And the pretty Parisian, more touched and flattered by this naive homage than by all the others, picks up her skirts and trots home, while from the terraces many a curly poet eyes her fine ankles, to put them, perhaps, into rhyme.—Translated for the Argonaut from the "Annales" of Henri Nicolle.

"Mr. Dooley" on Happiness.

"Well, sir, 'tis a tur-rible problem this here wan iv human unhappiness. If Tiddy Rosenfelt finds out th' causes iv it he'll be th' gr-reatest man since Moses. Some folks say th' on'y way to be happy is to wurruk. Maybe that accounts fr the onbappiness among th' farmers. Perhaps they wud be merrier if some employment cud be found fr thim, preferably in th' open air. Some say 'tis money; they're poor. Some say 'tis simple poverty; they're rich. Hogan says 'tis human society; which accounts fr th' happiness that prevails in all large cities. Some say selfishness will make ye happy. I've tried it. It didn't cure me. Other people say onselfishness; but that's no more thin to say that ye can on'y be happy be givin' up something that wud make ye happy. Th' nearest ye get to happiness is in wantin' something badly an' thinkin' ye have a chance to get it an' not gettin' it. If ye get it ye'll be onhappy. Whin ye have ivrything in th' wurruk that we want th' famly will do well to watch ye whin ye pick up a razor."—American Magazine.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

By Sidney G. P. Coryn.

Mr. Greenslet's "Life of Thomas Bailey Aldrich" gives us some fine glimpses of Aldrich in his critical mood. Writing of Lowell's letters, he says: "How good and how poor they are. Nearly all of them are too self-conscious. Emerson and Whittier are about the only men in that famous group who do not think about themselves the whole while." Henry James is handled kindly, but with the gloves off. Aldrich envies him the "easy grace with which he slips his pen through forty or fifty miles of aristocratic landscape." But Henry James is "not a natural storyteller." Aldrich held that characters in a novel should develop themselves by what they say and do—as in the drama. "It appears to be a mistake to devote one or two hundred pages to the analysis of characters which accomplishes nothing. The persons in James's hook affect me like a lot of admirably 'made up' actors in the green room waiting for their cue." Of Walt Whitman he says: "The greater bulk of his writing is neither prose nor verse, and certainly it is not an improvement on either."

The Diva's Ruby, by F. Marion Crawford. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; $1.50.

This is another of the stories that deal with Margarita da Cordova, otherwise Miss Margaret Donne, with Konstantin Logotheti, and with Mr. Van Torp. When we last saw the Primadonna she had dismissed her English lover and had engaged herself to Logotheti. We were sorry for her choice, as Logotheti seemed a good deal of an adventurer, but as it was evident that the lady had no heart worth speaking of, we were reconciled to a marriage of convenience.

But "The Diva's Ruby" shows us that the lady may once more change her mind. Mr. Van Torp is by no means despairing, doubtless under the conviction that while there is life there is hope. Apparently for the purpose of introducing an entirely new element, we have a description of a ruby mine in Central Asia known only to the men of the village and to one girl, Baraka, who falls in love with an explorer and of course tells him the secret of the mine. The resulting rubies play a large part in the story and both the explorer and the girl, who becomes miraculously civilized, impinge on the lines of the older established characters.

The story makes it clear enough that Margarita da Cordova does not marry Logotheti, because when we say farewell to that gentleman he is congenially married to the Asiatic girl. We assume that Margarita marries Mr. Van Torp. We leave them in a state of ecstatic engagement—that is to say, Mr. Van Torp is ecstatic—but in view of the lady's record we recognize that no hour is too eleventh for a change in her maiden choice. We are prepared to learn the worst in the next story.

"The Diva's Ruby" is, of course, fascinatingly interesting. The rapid reader will get a little bewildered at the theft of the rubies, but it really doesn't matter. He may resent the apparent reappearance of Lady Maud's husband, whom he remembers to have been killed, but that perplexity is cleared up quite nicely. With the exception of Lady Maud, Mr. Van Torp, multi-millionaire and lover, is about the only character for whom we can have even a dubious kind of respect, and when Logotheti marries Baraka we think he will have a much better time with her than as the husband of the Primadonna.

Parerga, by Canon Sheehan, D. D. Published by Longmans, Green & Co., New York; $1.60.

We can hardly give to these writings the name of essays. They are too short, too un-consecutive, and hear too clear a stamp of the whim of the moment. And the whim of the moment is usually concurrent with a cloudy sky and a despondent outlook upon men and things.

It is the author's pessimism that strikes us as the dominant note in his work. He looks abroad in a spirit of profound melancholy and his reflections are like the dripping of rain upon dead leaves. He is overburdened with mental conventions, and because the world is shaking off its conventions he can find little at which to smile. And his frown is always that of intolerance. He finds three great religions—Christian Theism, Spinosism, and Humanism. The first is the "logical issue of all reasonable thought," while the third is the "hypostasis of the most foolish pride that ever entered the mind of a created being." There, of course, speaks the priest—and may we say—the bigot. He contemplates the French revolution; he can "never think of Paris again as the centre of the world's civilization." But there is no hint of the horrors that produced the revolution and that were worse than the revolution. He laments the grossness of Shakespeare and can not take him up "without looking far before me," for fear of some hidden cloaca. If the world were becoming more refined Shakespeare would subside into the "decent retirement" of Marlowe, but, alas! the world is becoming more vulgar, and therefore "Shakespeare will not yet be dethroned." Swinburne has no message for mankind. He is erotic or revolutionary and hence anathema, but all the same he is the "supreme melodist" and "the master of alliteration." But what can we expect "when such amiable heings as Cromwell, Nero, Danton, Mirabeau, etc., are deified in history"? Imagine the state of mind that can bracket Cromwell and Nero!

Bias seems to be the key to Canon Sheehan's mind, theological bias, caste bias, the bias of conventions and of the old days. But he writes always as a scholar and brilliantly, and if, in the four divisions of his hook, he places "Autumn" and "Winter" first and "Spring" and "Summer" last, the arrangement is at least appropriate.

Lentala of the South Seas, by W. C. Morrow. Published by the Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York.

The note struck by the author is not exactly new, but it is a long way from being hackneyed, while his treatment is fresh and vigorous. He gives us a story of some two hundred men and women wrecked upon an uncharted South Pacific island. Received with apparent hospitality by the natives, they soon learn that the intention is to sacrifice them one by one as a propitiation to the god of earthquakes and volcanoes, from which the place suffers periodically, and also to keep secret the existence of the island and its great natural wealth. From this terrible predicament they are rescued by the strategy of Lentala, the old king's adopted daughter, who is first introduced to us as a splendid and harbaric princess and who gradually discloses herself as a white woman of a winning and fascinating disposition.

The author gives us a number of ingenious and novel situations, as well as some others that may have been suggested by Mr. Rider Haggard, for, instance, the passage through the mountain by the suhterranean river. But the character of Lentala is entirely new, while her expedient of adopting the disguise of a non-existent brother compels our interest. In stories of this kind it is of course necessary to subdue all unnecessary demands for the probable, but when these have been reduced to their right dimensions we shall find that "Lentala" is an original and charming romance, and we can only hope that the young American sailor who decided for certain definite reasons to remain upon the island has never had cause to regret his choice. To he with Lentala ought to be "paradise enow" for any average male.

The Pinafore Picture Book, by Sir W. S. Gilbert. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York.

The author has prepared this hook for young readers and he gives his reasons. Sometimes young people are not allowed to go to the theatre because of the late hours, and even if they go to a matinee their pleasure is sure to be spoiled by the gigantic hats that "ill-bred and selfish ladies clap upon their heads." Another reason is that the opera of "Pinafore" is, unhappily, not played in every town every night of the year, and although when we get a national theatre the opera "will, no doubt, be played once or twice in every fortnight forever," that happy day may be still a long way off. And so we have the story of the play, told, of course, imitatively, with extracts from the songs and the music and with fifteen colored and twelve line illustrations. It is a capital hook and must be a source of delight to its lucky recipients.

The Housekeeper's Week, by Marion Harland. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis.

The author gives us another domestic treasure. She divides her hook into the six days of the week and tells us exactly what our wives ought to do upon each day. Thus we have Monday: Wash Day! Starching and Bluing! Devices for Making Washing Easy! Woollens, Colored Cottons, and Linens! Silks, Black, Colored, and White, etc. And in case there should still be idle moments at the disposal of the devil, we have two concluding chapters on "Every Day in the Week" and "Any Day in the Week."

Living on a Little, by Caroline French Benton. Published by the Dana Estes Company, Boston; $1.25.

Although opinions may differ widely on the meaning of "a little," the author seems to have hit upon a happy medium and to have written successfully for the great middle-class mass whose incomes remain stationary and whose expenditures increase. The hook is in the form of a narrative, and it is so full of practical hints that it can hardly fail to give help to those who most need it.

Builders of United Italy, by Rupert Sargent Holland. Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York; $2.

The period of Italian emancipation is one of the most inspiring in history, although latter-day observers can hardly suppress a sense of disillusionment at the paucity of the results in human happiness that have followed so great a display of genius and such a sacrifice of human life. National independence is, after all, a means to an end, and not an end in itself, and Italy has not yet taken the lead that was hoped for her.

The "builders" selected by the author are eight in number—Alfieri, Manzoni, Gioherti, Manin, Mazzini, Cavour, Garibaldi, and Victor Emmanuel. He wisely attempts no profound study in analysis, but confines himself to biography, in which the essentials are happily grouped and classified. No better hook could be found for those who desire a comprehensive survey of the men who created Italian independence.

New Publications.

From the Oliver Ditson Company, Boston, comes a collection of "Songs from the Operas for Mezzo Sopranos," edited by H. E. Krehbiel. The selections are twenty-five in number.

Among gift hooks for small children is "Little Ned Happy and Flora," by Gertrude Smith, with colored illustrations by Henrietta A. Adams. It is published by Harper & Brothers, New York. Price, $1.30.

A remarkable psychological study is to be found in "The Right Man," by Brian Hooker, published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. It can be read in an hour or so and it ought not to be missed.

"The Daughter of Virginia Dare," by Mary Virginia Wall, is a bright and pleasing story of early days at Jamestown and of Pocahontas and Captain Smith. The author uses her material to good advantage. The hook comes from the Neale Publishing Company, New York and Washington.

Some new fables have been given to us by Maude Barrows Dutton under the title of "The Tortoise and the Geese, and Other Fables of Bidpai." It seems that Bidpai was a sage of India living about 300 years B. C. The hook is published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. Price, $1.

"Our Girls" is a collection of poems by various authors in praise of the American girl. The chief charm of the hook, however, is in the colored illustrations by Howard Chandler Christy, and of these there are eighteen. The volume is of a substantial size and the typography and decorations are admirable.

Professor Sophie Jewett gives us a successful rendering of the old middle English allegorical poem entitled "The Pearl." The poem is by the unknown author of "Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight," and in its present form it contains one hundred stanzas, each of twelve lines. As a curiosity it will be welcomed by students of mediaval literature. It is published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. Price, $1. Students' edition, 40 cents.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE CHAT.

The Valencia Theatre company is giving a particularly pleasing interpretation of Captain R. H. Marshall's comedy, "His Excellency, the Governor," this week. Willette Kershaw has a charming part in the play and acts it with irresistible gaiety and archness. The last performances will be on Saturday, afternoon and evening. Sunday afternoon a play entitled "A Navajo's Love," written by Sedley Brown, the stage director of the company, will have its first production in this city. It is not a Wild West play, as might be supposed from the title, but a drama of the "Strongheart" and "The Squaw Man" order. Its hero is an Indian, called Straight Oak by his tribesmen, who comes to the East for an education and wins it, and afterward a fortune. Robert Warwick will have this heroic rôle. He has played "Strongheart" successfully, and will come with assurance to this, a part of the same type. Willette Kershaw will be the heroine of the play, the daughter of a Wall-Street operator, and the other members of the company will be well placed.

Next Monday evening, at the Van Ness Theatre, Thomas Dixon's famous play, "The Clansman," will be presented for the first time in this city. The drama was made from the two novels, "The Leopard's Spots" and "The Clansman," by the author, and it tells a powerful story of the South in the Reconstruction period. The mysterious and dreaded Ku Klux Klan plays an important part in the unfolding of the plot, and prominent figures among the carpet-baggers and conservatives of the time are introduced. In Eastern cities the production of the play has often been the cause of excitement. The company, numbering seventy-five, under the direction of George H. Brennan, includes a number of well-known people, prominent among whom are Franklin Ritchie, Eugenie Hayden, Charles J. Wilson, Barry Maxwell, Maude Durand, M. J. Jordan, Ruth Hart, Claire Mersereau, Gage Bennett, Mortimer Ritchie, Earl Lee, and Edna Davis.

Kolb and Dill are meeting with the greatest success of their career in their engagement at the Princess Theatre. "Playing the Ponies" will be continued another week. Many have been unable to secure seats, and the rush seems likely to continue.

The Orpheum has a number of sterling attractions to add to the bill for the coming week, beginning Sunday afternoon. George Primrose and his dancing boys are the leading feature of these, and their part of the entertainment may be anticipated with pleasurable confidence. The Four Nightons, Olympian gymnasts, recent European vaudeville sensations, will present an act in which strength and gymnastic skill are displayed. Alfred Kely, an actor of original yet artistic methods, will appear in a sketch, entitled "In Trust," which tells of a gentleman whose pride is so great that he starves almost to death with a smiling face rather than beg assistance. Mr. Kely will have the support of Miss Mathilde Bothe. "Slivers," the great clown, will be seen in the pantomime, "The Ball Game," in which he plays solitaire. He runs after a grounder, quarrels with the umpire, makes faces at the boys in the bleachers, and concludes by "striking out." Artie Nelson, an acrobat and athlete, will be associated with him. Next week will be the last of Valadon, the magician; Lewis and Green, Black and Jones, and of that charming comedienne, Hope Booth, in her naive impersonation of "The Little Blonde Lady."

"Checkers," reviewed at length in another column, will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre for the last time Sunday evening.

The benefit in aid of the Woman's Auxiliary of the California Prison Commission to be given at the Valencia Theatre Monday evening, November 9, promises to be a gala event. "Glittering Gloria," with Robert Warwick and all of the favorites in the cast, will be produced, and in addition to that amusing farce a number of special features will be introduced.

Rose Stahl in her brilliant comedy success, "The Chorus Lady," will be the attraction to follow "The Clansman" at the Van Ness Theatre. This is considered one of the season's best attractions. The original New York supporting cast is coming here.

Arthur Cunningham, the favorite actor and baritone singer, will begin an engagement limited to two weeks at the Valencia Theatre Sunday afternoon, November 15, when he will present Joe Murphy's great Irish success, "Kerry Gow." Mr. Murphy, who has retired from the stage and is now visiting California, has consented to direct the rehearsals.

Nance O'Neil made a success in her new play, "Agnes," written by Mrs. Sydney Drew, at the Majestic Theatre in New York, and has signed a contract with the Shuerts to appear as a star in a Shakespearean repertoire under their management for five years.

Maude Adams promises to be a success in M. Barrie's new play, "What Every Woman Knows." The first American production of the piece was at Atlantic City, October 18, and in it Miss Adams was received with every token of admiration.

Musical critics in New York say that Reginald de Koven's score for the new comic opera, "The Golden Butterfly," is good measure in tunefulness and reaches toward the classic in form more than any effort in this field for years. Harry B. Smith, who has furnished the libretto for many of the De Koven pieces, has done especially well in this, as his satire is gentle yet broad. The story is based on the theft of an opera by a manager. Grace Van Studdiford has the leading rôle in the opera, which was produced at the Broadway Theatre on the evening of October 12.

LITERARY NOTES.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Arthur Sherburne Hardy's name has appeared but rarely of late among current contributors of fiction. Mr. Hardy has a story, "The Defence of Diane," in the November Harper's Magazine which many who recall the old "Passe-Rose" will rejoice to read.

O. Henry has written a play, "The World and the Door," in which a number of his short-story characters will be presented.

Early in November, A. C. McClurg & Co. will open an office in San Francisco for the representation of their publications on the Pacific Coast. This office will be in charge of Mr. S. L. Willard, who has long been connected with the house, for the last seven years in important capacities associated with the publishing department. This step is the outgrowth of the increasing business in Messrs. McClurg & Co.'s publications on the Coast. Mr. Willard has also for the past four years been the traveling representative for their publications in this territory, and has made many friends here.

François Coppée once met an English woman novelist who wanted to know whether the poet whom she admired so greatly knew English. "No, madame," said Coppée, "I am still busy studying French."

The London publishing house of George Allen announces the publication in November of a book by Andrew Carnegie. The volume is to be called "Problems of Today," and consists of a series of essays on wealth, labor, and Socialism.

An ambitious young Chicagoan recently called upon a publisher of novels in that city, to whom he imparted confidentially the information that he had decided to "write a hook," and that he would be pleased to afford the publisher the chance to bring it out. "May I venture to inquire as to the nature of the hook you purpose to write?" asked the publisher, very politely. "Oh," came in an off-hand way from the aspirant for fame, "I think of doing something on the line of 'Les Miserables,' only livelier, you know!"

Absurdities of the Fictionists.

Jack London, Stewart Edward White, Rex Beach, and Sir Gilbert Parker, not to mention Rudyard Kipling, Richard Harding Davis, and William de Morgan, are assailed as fakers by Arthur Stringer in a sensational article published in the latest number of Canada West, a handsome magazine issued from Winnipeg. The New York Times Saturday Review summarizes the points made by the critic. Mr. Stringer, himself a Canadian, declares that the Canada of fact is utterly different from the Canada of the professional writers about Canada—which is a land "where the most preposterous things may daily take place, where the laws of nature operate as nowhere else, and where men think and act as never before." Mr. London intrusts hundreds of pounds to a hircbark sled; makes the dog drivers use the command "Mush on," which really is never heard except on the west coast; chops through river ice and drops tainted gold into an open water-hole, with the thermometer 79 degrees below zero. Mr. Beach finds placer gold in a creek bottom and allows a ravishingly beautiful heroine to be mistaken for years for a Siwash half-breed. Sir Gilbert Parker depicts a character as lighly playing the flute out of doors in zero weather, makes General Wolfe eye his men (who are several hundred feet away) on a pitch dark night on the St. Lawrence, and lets him see the hivouacs at Cape Rouge, many miles higher up. Mr. White represents the Ojibways and the Chippewas as engaged in deadly strife with each other, though they are really the same people; lets his dog drivers cry out "Parka" where that word is not used; is ignorant of the fact that a man can travel without dogs faster than with dogs; insists that there is hut one solitary herd of caribou in the Barren Grounds, when in fact there are thousands of herds; dresses his Hudson Bay Company men in furs, when in fact they rarely use furs; lets his voyageurs smoke cigarettes, which they would scorn; believes that caribou hide shrinks when wet, whereas, in point of fact, it stretches; and, in "The Silent Places," writes a story "based on fal-lacy, . . . wrong in its important details, . . . and preposterous in execution," though otherwise, possibly, a good story. A lady writer, who shall be nameless, outdoes the feat of Joshua by making the Midnight Sun dip in the south. But Mr. Stringer's wrath is not directed so much at these minor inaccuracies as at the general spirit of the Canadian writers, who are determined that there shall be in the North nothing but blood and primal passion; only demigodlike absurdities enacted by a race of melodramatic hyperheoreans hounded and eternally harassed by the Never-Sleeping-Fear-of-the-Great-Forest, and contending amid "interminable" waste and "frowning" wilderness under the Frozen Twilight which eternally hangs over everything above the forty-ninth parallel—while in reality on a farm north of the sixty-second wheat and oats and barley and peas are happily growing and men are placidly picking raspberries and strawberries in the warm sunlight.

CURRENT VERSE.

Men Never Know.

Men mourn the lies that women tell—
The cunning, heartless lies—
Her Judas-lips that hide so well
The narrowing of her eyes.
A heart is hers: she seeks to slay it—
A soul is hers: she does not weigh it—
The game is called: how well she'll play it!
Her debt is there; she does not pay it . . .
Men mourn the lies that women tell—
The cunning, heartless lies.

Men do not know the lies they hear—
The brave, heartbroken lies—
Her smiling lips that hide, from fear,
The shadows in her eyes.
A heart is hers: for just a while—
A soul is hers: it hears defile—
The game is called: her wit on trial—
Her debt is there: dear God! her smile!
Men do not know the lies they hear—
The brave, heartbroken lies!

The Need of the World.

I know the need of the world, though it would not have me know;
It would hide its sorrow deep, where only God may go;
Yet its secret it can not keep;
It tells it awake or asleep;
It tells it to all who will heed,
And he who runs may read.
The need of the world I know.

I know the need of the world when it boasts of its wealth the loudest,
When it flaunts in all men's eyes, when its mien is the gayest and proudest,
Oh, ever it lies, it lies!
For the sound of its laughter dies
In a sob or a smothered groan,
And it weeps when it sits alone!
The need of the world I know.

I know the need of the world when it babbles of gold and fame;
It is only to lead us astray from the thing that it dare not name.
For that is the sad world's way—
Oh, poor, blind world grown gray,
With the lack of a thing so near,
With the want of a thing so dear!
The need of the world I know.

I know the need of the world when the earth shakes under the tread
Of men who march to the fight, when rivers with blood are red,
And there is no law but might,
And the wrong way seems the right;
When he who slaughters the most
Is all men's pride and boast.
The need of the world I know.

Oh, love is the need of the world! Down under its pride of power,
Down under its lust of greed, for the joys that last but an hour,
There lies forever its need.
For love is the law and the creed;
And love is the aim and the goal
Of life, from the man to the mole.
The need of the world is love.
—Ella Wheeler Wilcox in Century Magazine.

The Priceless Thought.

A penny for my thought? I'll tell you this:
To me that thought is worth the whole of bliss.
Ten thousand kings, set on ten thousand thrones,
Have not a millionth part in precious stones,
In silver, gold, and other treasures rare.
Of what is mine in that one thought so fair
That you would buy for copper. E'en the mint
Itself compared to it hath nothing in't.
The chests of Cræsus, Monte Cristo, and Tæ added wealth of all our lavish land,
I would not take for that one precious thought,
Yet since you ask, I'll give it you for naught.
'Tis this, Sweetheart, come hither and incline
Your ear that I may whisper—
"Thou art mine!"
—John Kendrick Bangs, in Ainslee's Magazine.

Summer's Close.

The melancholy of the woods and plains
When summer nears its close; the drowsy, dim,
Unfathomed sadness of the mists that swim
About the valleys after night-long rains;
The humming garden, with its tawny chains
Of gourds and blossoms, ripened to the brim;
And then at eve the low moon's quiet rim,
And the slow sunset, whose one cloud remains,
Fill me with peace that is akin to tears:
Unutterable peace, that moves as in a dream
'Mid fancies sweeter than it knows or tells:
That sees and hears with other eyes and ears,
And walks with Memory beside a stream
That flows through fields of fadeless asphodels.
—Madison Cawcain, in McClure's Magazine.

Florence Roberts will soon produce a new play entitled "The House of Bondage," written by Seymour Ohermer.

THE RACING GAME IN THE PLAY.

By George L. Shoals.

The hero or the heroine of the melodrama will continue to win a fortune in stage money at the races even after the time when betting on the game has been prevented by some marvelously ingenious plan. This may be asserted with warrant from present conditions, for notwithstanding the general impression that the bookmakers have the best of it, in the play it is the speculator whose last hope is staked on the race that invariably wins. So long as the exigencies of the drama require the chosen horse to come first under the wire, so long will it be impossible for any conspiring outsider, treacherous rider, or enthusiastic reformer to spoil the plan.

And the play with a racing interest entangled in its plot has been popular for a long time, and seems entitled to place as an established, ever-blooming variety in the garden of the melodramatic author. "Checkers" is brightened by a nosegay of its blossoms, and has come to be known as a "racing" play, though in only one act is the atmosphere of the track at all oppressive. That act—the third—is realistic, and nothing to be chosen from the legitimate effects of the playhouse could be added to strengthen its grip.

For several seasons this drama has maintained its place among favored touring companies, winning with certainty on its second and third visit as at its first presentation. At the Van Ness Theatre this week it is renewing the impression it made on a former occasion, and this with seeming ease. Its charm lingers, though it is difficult to analyze it. Perhaps it is in the air of rural simplicity, the fragrance of unaffected virtues, that seem to accompany Pert Barlow when she comes with her father to the Hot Springs hotel office, and from that on to the happy ending of her love story. Checkers, himself, the hero, would hardly appear the ideal mate for a heroine less unsophisticated, less unspoiled, less "logical."

In the personality of Hans Rohert, who has played the name-part of the drama for years, is undoubtedly the secret of much of the success which the piece has won. He is suited to the rôle in face and figure. His clear-cut features, with good eyes and strong jaw, his youthful slenderness and quick, nervous movement, are valuable assets in this place. His air of cool self-possession, his tones of hanter, sarcasm, command, and entreaty, are all the product of an art that is not easily mastered. And the more to be commended for his attainment, for the part is not heroic, with all the playwright's belated effort in the fourth act.

It is not an easy task to win sympathy for a "sport," a race-track follower, whose chief activity up to the time of his introduction to the audience has been in trying to choose winners from among the four-footed contestants in the open air and the hipeds in the hotel bar-rooms and offices. There is a doubly doubtful issue in the case of Checkers, for at the opening he is charged with leading astray a guileless but thirsty young man from the country, who is plunging into the delights of highballs and roulette with all the accustomed fervor of a fresh arrival at Hot Springs.

The promise to the rural beauty, who pleads for help, that he will send the hudding bucolic plunger home, and later his redeemed word and his employment as a clerk in the cross-roads store to make possible a continuance of proximity to the pleading young lady, go far toward proving the real manliness of this somewhat smirched hero. It is sad to observe, however, that he falls off his new pedestal with celerity and dexterity when temptation comes. He wagers the keepsake goldpiece on a "hundred-to-one-shot," and it is to shudder when the possible result of its loss is brought to mind. But he does not lose. He wins $5000, and with the money and a hit of tactics called bluff in the games he has now quit forever—forever, this time—he saves the hank of his prospective father-in-law from dire disaster, and—the curtain falls.

One of the intimate associates of "Checkers" is Push Miller, a race-track tout, very well played by Dave Braham, Jr. He is always primed with valuable information about the next race, and he is just as inevitably out of money and in immediate need. When he follows Checkers down into the country—not altogether through friendship, but because he is looking for financial assistance—he easily accomplishes the conquest of Cynthy, the maid-servant, with a twirl of his hat and a word. Cynthy looks upon him with instant adoration. "Aint he grand!" she says, with upturned eyes, and the audience gurgles with enjoyment. Yet the same audience sees no reason to smile at Pert's worship of Checkers, which seems merely an edition de luxe of the same work. Helen Ormsbee as Pert is as fresh and fragrant as a bouquet of sweet-pea blooms, and as trustful and unsuspecting as the daintiest helle of an Arkansas village could be. Lydia Dickson makes Cynthy a winning figure, in spite of her shapeless costume. Throughout, the long cast is entirely capable.

Odd enough is the fact that you come away from the playhouse with two peculiarly contrasting remembrances uppermost in your mind. One is the rush of excitement in the race-track scene, when the progress of the flying horses is reported by a megaphone voice, and the one name most eagerly listened for is not spoken until the end is almost at hand. The other is the picture of the aged, white-faced, bald, old general at the Hot Springs hotel, who, with his dead legs and his ghastly optimism, flaps his way across the stage and up the broad, double-curved stairway at the hack.

Best of all, beyond the merits noted, is the effect produced by the playwright in the contrast offered by the language of the characters. There is hut one, the tout, who clings tenaciously to the racing slang. The judge speaks Arkansaw, but the others use the plain Middle-West sort of American.

And this is one of the ways in which "Playing the Ponies" differs. "Playing the Ponies" is the title of the concoction in which Kolh and Dill at the Princess Theatre this week made their triumphant reappearance in San Francisco, the city of their greatest fame. It is written throughout in the speech of the race-track sport; in fact, some of its euphuisms are above the instant recognition of the average playgoer—but that does not matter, after all.

San Francisco in these later days comes out strong in receptions. David Warfield was welcomed with thundering acclaim the other day, when he came back to the deeply sympathetic yet somewhat tardily appreciative town of his nativity. They do the thing particularly well at the Princess Theatre. Edwin Stevens had a greeting, when he appeared in "Wang," that affected even that unemotional actor. Arthur Cunningham was cheered to the echo, and for minutes, when he strode to the footlights in "When Johnny Comes Marching Home." And Ferris Hartman, when he returned to the city from the green fields of the transhary region, was received with a roar of regard, an avalanche of appreciation, that rocked the dramatic temple on its firm foundations.

Yet all these were hut the sighing of the summer breeze compared with the tempest of enthusiasm let loose Monday night when Kolh and Dill made their first appearance at the Ellis-Street opera house. The theatre was crowded from the orchestra rail to the last row in the balcony, with hundreds massed in the foyer, and most of these, joined in the salvos of welcome. And something like eighteen months ago these same comedians were playing at a smaller theatre on McAllister Street, with seemingly adequate accommodations for the patronizing public.

But between that engagement and this a New York appearance with notable success intervened, and the San Francisco public sits up and takes notice. It often renders a positive and distinct verdict on new productions, but it revels in endorsements and receptions. And sometimes it is loyal to its new-found enthusiasms.

Kolh and Dill are promising young comedians, with agreeable qualities of expression, and they will one day find a better medium for their talent. "Playing the Ponies" has but one merit—it allows the comedians to appear simultaneously, and in the German dialect character so dear to the vaudeville stage. It gives them an opportunity, in the second act, to be genuinely amusing, and the comedians seize it firmly. Dill is especially happy when he has a momentary loss of sanity and completes the wreck of the dinner-set, the earlier disasters in which it has been involved being responsible for his condition.

Maude Lamhert, the vocal star of the company, is a handsome woman who sings with power and expression. She will make most of her songs popular with the whistling young men. Billy S. Clifford, a recent accession from vaudeville, has a good voice, a light touch, and plenty of assurance. His songs are individual and highly spiced. Albert E. Duncan, a plump, boyish, member of the organization, plays the jockey quite as well as the occasion demands.

The piece has a racing scene too, full of suspense and other things, and it finishes satisfactorily. But the episodes that gain unvarying favor are the songs with a chorus. Many of the Princess Theatre chorus are retained for the Kolh and Dill season, and they are, as ever, an attractive feature.

A black fox with a pelt worth $500, driven from the hills by the extreme cold, was killed on the streets of Nome a few days ago. The animal was chased by hundreds of Nome citizens and finally its rich pelt fell to a tender-foot prospector.

The De Gogorza Concerts.

Signor Emilio De Gogorza, the Spanish haritone, will be the next star to cross the musical firmament, and will be heard in three concerts at Christian Science Hall, commencing Sunday afternoon, November 8. This artist will give exceptionally interesting programmes, as he is equally at home in the German, French, Italian, English, and Spanish repertoire.

At his opening concert the programme will include works by Caldara, Haendel, Gluck, Massenet, Schumann, Grieg, Brahms, Alvarez, Sidney Homer, Brockway, and, by special request, Manager Greenbaum has added "Mother o' Mine," by Tours, a number with which De Gogorza created a sensation two years ago.

Mr. Henry C. Whittemore will act both as accompanist and solo pianist, playing numbers by Chopin and Liszt.

The second concert will be given Thursday night, November 12, and the farewell on Sunday afternoon, November 15. Seats will be ready next Wednesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s stores, where complete programmes may be secured.

On Friday afternoon, November 13, the artist will sing in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse, at half-past three, to accommodate teachers and students at the colleges and schools.

Following De Gogorza comes Adele Verne, pianiste.

Blanche Arral's Concert.

No singer that has visited this city has ever more completely won the hearts of the music lovers than Blanche Arral, whose singing at the Van Ness Theatre last Sunday caused people to rise and shout with enthusiasm. She will give a second concert this coming Sunday afternoon, November 1, again with a splendid orchestral setting, and sing an entirely new programme, including selections from "La Traviata," "Marriage of Jeanette," "Dinorah," and other brilliant works. Of course she will be compelled to repeat the "Waltz of the Birds," which was given as an encore last week.

The complete programme will be announced in the Sunday papers, but the public can rest assured that any programme offered by Blanche Arral will be well worth hearing.

Seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, and the box office of the theatre will be open from 10 a. m. Sunday.

Mail orders accompanied by check will be attended to if addressed to Manager Will Greenbaum, at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

Last summer for the second time the famous Mauvais Pas at Chamounix, in the Alps, which many thousands of tourists cross without a tremor every year, was the scene of a fatal accident, and on both occasions the victims were French women. This time the fall to the rocks below was due to the Parisienne's tripping over her long skirt. In 1902 the victim met a party coming in the opposite direction and, trying to pass them on the outside of the narrow path, rested her alpenstock upon nothing, and so fell. Since that disaster of 1902 there has been a grimness about Mark Twain's story of his own adventure on the Mauvais Pas, where the passenger going the other way was a large hog, which triumphantly caused twenty or thirty people to turn round and retreat.

Mrs. Fiske will open a new season November 16 in "Salvation Nell" at the Hackett Theatre, New York, a playhouse on West Forty-Second Street, in the heart of the theatrical district, which belongs to William B. Harris of the syndicate, but which has now been secured by David Belasco and Harrison Grey Fiske for a term of years through James K. Hackett, the original lessee.

The first concert of the sixteenth season of the Minetti String Quartet takes place Friday afternoon, November 6, at Century Hall, Sutter and Franklin Streets. The programme includes quartets by Haydn and Beethoven, and a Bach duo for two violins with piano.

Minstrels in Bloomsbury.

To Covent Garden people stream
To drink the music there;
We stand along the curb and dream
To melodies more rare:
Sing on, enchanted minstrel-girl,
Thou artless, young and fair!

The 'buses of Southampton Row,
The jingling hansoms here,
Bear London, heedless, to and fro
In search of evening cheer:
For us, thou art enough, dear voice
Forgetful—sweet and clear!

Our day-long toil but goes to win
Another toilsome day;
Play on, oblivious violin!

Soft harp, beseech thee, play!
And thou, pale girl with eyes aflame,
Sing on for us who stay!

—Arthur Upson, in The Bellman.

An article in the Century by Abby C. Baker draws our attention to an interesting collection of White House china that was begun by Mrs. Roosevelt and that is now a permanent establishment in the White House. It seems that the collection had its inception in a suggestion of General Bingham when the supervision of the White House came within his sphere of duty. Each succeeding lady of the White House orders her own china to make good such deficiencies as she may find and to keep the supply up to the needs of the house. She selects her own design, color, etc., and this china then becomes a sort of domestic relic of the administration. It occurred to General Bingham that a collection of this kind would have a distinct historical interest, and he hastened to make his idea known before the destructive hand of time and the housemaid should altogether wipe out the traces of the earlier days.

The suggestion appealed strongly to Mrs. Roosevelt, who has always shown herself susceptible to the claims of history. She saw at once that it was within her power to preserve specimens of all the ware from the earliest times, and she therefore designed two cabinets and had them placed in the lower east corridor of the White House, where they could be seen by every one. The result is eight shelves filled with china that was used during the administrations of Lincoln, Grant, Hayes, Arthur, Harrison, Cleveland, McKinley, and Roosevelt, a shelf being devoted to each administration.

The china selected by Mrs. Roosevelt is Wedgwood, decorated in gold with a simple colonial pattern, with the obverse of the great seal in colors upon each dish. There are over 1200 pieces in the set, and to accompany it she ordered 144 pieces of glassware. A dinner platter, dinner, breakfast, tea, and soup plates, with a tea cup and a coffee cup and the saucers, were selected from this set for the collection.

Neither Mrs. McKinley nor Mrs. Cleveland ordered much china for the Executive Mansion, but plates and cups and saucers of their selection were placed in the cabinets. The plates selected by Mrs. Cleveland were exquisite Wedgwood and Minturn patterns, and one of the odd, flag design hobnob dishes, used first at the Cleveland state dinners, was also included on the Cleveland shelf.

Mrs. Harrison was very artistic in her tastes, as well as patriotic, and she greatly desired to have the goldenrod adopted as the national flower. When she found that she would have to order some new china she designed the decoration for it, combining the goldenrod and leaf with the Indian corn and stalk. On each piece this design, with the coat of arms of the United States and a rim of golden stars, was emblazoned. In addition she selected many pieces of cut glass, and they also bear the coat of arms.

Through the public press it was made known that the collection had been started, and in order to preserve their cooperation wherever it was possible the descendants of the Presidents were corresponded with or seen personally, and a number of invaluable contributions were secured in that way. From the first Mrs. Roosevelt desired that the collection should be patriotic, and that the pieces for it should be either given or loaned rather than purchased. While this has sometimes added to the difficulty of obtaining the ware, it has made the collection of vastly more worth.

We do not know what authority there may be for the statement made by a foreign newspaper that American saleswomen are to be taught to smile and that the power to smile attractively will have its weight upon the payroll as well as in the engagement office. A smile is said to warm the atmosphere of the whole store and to be capable of charming the most odorous shopper into the most expensive purchases.

Speaking as a mere male, a smile is of course a potent weapon and much might be said of it. It is not a subject that can be dismissed in a few lines. There are smiles and smiles. A smile bestowed upon a male customer may be a very different thing to a similar performance directed toward a woman. Those who have been so unfortunate as to be entrusted with a female commission by wife or sister, and who suppose that they have equipped themselves with every possible specification and forestalled every conceivable question by the haughty damsel behind the counter, know well to what depths of humiliation they can be plunged by an unforeseen inquiry glibly fired at them and before which they are perfectly helpless. How welcome, then, would be a smile from the frozen stalac-tite who exults in the ignominy that she inflicts.

But the smile, whether to man or woman, must be a matter of scientific training. It must not be left to the whim of the moment. A friendly bearing is in every way desirable, but an exuberant good-will should not be carried so far as to address an unknown lady customer as "dearie," and there are ladies in San Francisco who can testify that this is sometimes done.

What we need is the happy medium, and there is nothing on earth more rare. At present we are far more familiar with the extremes. Upon the one hand is the salesman or the saleswoman who is so impressed with the lofty conception of human equality that nothing but a fine insolence can express it, and on the other hand is an oppressive familiarity. We want neither the smile of condescension nor of intimacy. We want nothing but a rigorously restrained good will.

There was once a great headmaster who explained to his colleagues that an irate parent could always be mollified or disarmed by shaking both his hands at once. When you have been thus effusively greeted it is simply impossible to produce a grievance as effectively as you intended, if, indeed, you can produce it at all. Nor can you resist a cordiality that thus literally takes you captive. But, all the same, the smile of the saleswoman should be engineered with discretion. It's a pity to overdo a good thing.

It seems that men have a use after all. The information comes in the nick of time and just as we were at the point of wondering why an inscrutable Providence allows us to remain alive and to cumber the ground. The young society woman of New York tells us not only that men can be worthily employed, but that they have never been so useful as at present.

It is the new costumes that have thus found a place for man in the scheme of things. The gowns that are now so much in favor button tightly up the side or back, the enormous hats require the anchorage of at least half a dozen pins, while the new sleeves button from shoulder to wrist. Some of these duties can, of course, be done by the maid in the seclusion of the bedroom, but the gloves and the hat are often removed and must be replaced during the day, and then comes man's opportunity to justify his existence and to prove that he has not lived wholly in vain. The lady said that she hardly knows a single man who can not book up a woman's collar, adjust a wandering puff with a pin that he picked up from the floor, or project a hatpin without listening to the fallacy that a woman's head is made of wood.

There seems to be an idea that men like to do these things. Perhaps they do. It is said that a profound gloom settled on male New York when the big sleeves went out and the duty of tucking them in around the shoulders became a thing of the past. That particular function would of course have its charms, come to think of it. But a merciful law of compensations works automatically. The gown must be buttoned all the way up, but then again, by the curious perversity that rules these things, you will not be called upon to button a woman's gown unless you at least are her husband or her brother, in which case you won't want to. It's curious the way these things work out. But you may button her sleeves, and here again we find a piece of really fine adjustment. Our friend in New York tells us that if the acquaintance between a man and a woman is slight she may ask him to fasten the sleeves at the wrist. Well, even that is something in the day of small things and by no means to be despised. As the acquaintance improves the privilege is extended to the elbow and slightly in advance of the announced engagement he may button the sleeve right away from the shoulder. Thus we can always tell how these affaires du cœur are progressing. Just watch the buttoning process and the gradual encroachment upon private property.

A New York contemporary asks "why do supposedly self-respecting, well-bred women so disfigure themselves, offend the artistic eye, and make nuisances of themselves in public places?" Really, we do not know, and we can only wonder at the guileless innocence that asks the question.

The immediate cause of the trouble is the new fall hat, which, we are told, has increased the pains and penalties of metropolitan life. The woman who wears one of these horrible things at the theatre may be condescending enough to remove it, but if she places it on her lap it will cover also the laps of the people on each side of her. There is no room for two of these hats side by side upon the sidewalk, and they are too wide for the doors of the street-cars. The new hat, like that of the Merry Widow persuasion, is one of those things that is gradually breaking down male chivalry through the intolerable irritation that it causes.

And talking about male chivalry, it may be noticed that women have to stand much more often than they used to in the San Francisco street-cars. In fact, no woman has much chance of a seat in a crowded car unless she is either old or is carrying a baby. The women themselves suppose that this is due to a feeling on the part of men that shoppers ought to avoid the rush hours, as of course they ought. But the men themselves give another reason. Their resentment at the ordinance forbidding smoking except on the rear platform is very deep. Rightly or wrongly, the objectionable ordinance is attributed to the wire-pulling and agitation of a number of women reformers who regard the smoker as a social pariah and who are not without hope that he may one day be consigned to the top of the car or underneath it. This is said to be the real cause of a widespread resolution never to offer a seat to a woman except under the special circumstances mentioned.

The story is likely enough to be true. Women can not keep their own special privileges inviolate while attacking the special privileges of others, and if women ask for legislation suppressive of the so-called vices of men, and do it moreover in subterranean ways, they must expect retaliation. That, of course, is no defense of the man who keeps his seat in a street-car while a woman is standing, but it is human nature, sinful and erring of course, but still human nature. The man argues that the street-car is divided into two halves and that considering the preponderance of male travelers he has a right to one of these compartments for his own use. He also argues that smoking is no more offensive nor reprehensible than a gigantic hat or an overflowing and vulgar perfume, and he objects to being hustled outside the car because he wishes to indulge in his own peculiar failing. It is all very sad, of course, but perhaps even a lack of chivalry may have its place in an ultimate order of things.

Coral, it seems, is to come once more into favor, and it would certainly be hard to find anything much more beautiful. The fashion comes from Paris and already the price of all kinds has gone up. Coral, by the way, varies very much in quality. Two strings of equal size, one dark and dull, and the other pink and translucent, are valued respectively at 50 cents and $500. Coral is used for personal decoration all over the world. In India they place rough and uncut pieces on the bodies of the dead before they are burned. Blood red heads of coral go to Africa, where they are much esteemed by the black hells. Coral hands with fingers extended are prized in Italy because of their efficacy against the evil eye. It ought to be more generally known, by the way, that white coral banishes evil spirits, while red coral attracts them. Or is it the other way about?

The Gentlewoman points out that in spite of the roughness of the country and the long days in the saddle, stag hunting is a sport which seems to have always held an especial fascination for women.

In Miss Strickland's "Life of Queen Elizabeth" we read that the virgin queen was so enthusiastic a stag hunter that when the French ambassador came to discuss the question of her union with Monsieur le Duc D'Alençon they were kept waiting three whole days, the queen having started "a large, swift stag on the morning previous to that appointed for their audience; she pursued it all the day and till the middle of the night, and was so greatly fatigued in consequence that she was compelled to keep her chamber all the next day."

The number of ladies who hunt with the Devon and Somerset staghounds during the three autumn months are as the sand on the seashore, innumerable, and every season we see more and more feminine converts to the cross saddle. Whatever the difficulties may be for most women in obtaining a good grip when jumping astride, there is certainly much to be said in favor of it on Exmoor, the majority of women seeming to find it less tiring than a side saddle when doing very long days, and those who let out hirelings welcoming the innovation as one likely to reduce the number of sore backs in their stables.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A zealous boor once remonstrated with a Brahmin. "You don't believe in the true God," he said. The Brahmin shrugged his shoulders. "Very likely," he answered; "but if my God couldn't make a better gentleman than your God has made, I would exchange him for a black dog."

After a scorching day's work old Ben Smith lighted his corn-cob pipe and sat down on the little wharf to rest. Near him lay an alligator, the visible result of his labors. A tourist from the north approached and loftily remarked: "Ah, I see you have an alligator." No answer. "It is amphibious, is it not?" The tone nettled the old man. "Amphibious, h—!" he growled. "He'd bite yer arm off before ye could say Jack Robinson!"

The boatman had been angered by the asinine behavior of a young fellow among the party which he had taken for a sail. When the boat sprang a leak far out from the shore the boatman somewhat allayed the alarm of the rest of the party by serving out life belts, but he gave no belt to the would-be wit. "Where's mine?" said the terrified youth. "Don't you worry, my lad," said the boatman, with a vindictive smile. "You don't need no life belt. You'll never be drowned. A feller with an 'ead as 'oller as your'n can't sink. Nature's given you a nat'ral lifebuoy."

Professor Barrett Wendell of Harvard was laughing the other day at the British censor's refusal to allow the "Edipus Rex" of Sophocles to be performed in London. "Censors," said the noted teacher and critic, "are always like that. Why, there was a censor once in Rome who licensed a play called 'Widows and Septuagenarians.' The second act of the play took place in a restaurant. It opened with the words: 'Waiter, a beefsteak.' Well, to this speech the censor appended the following marginal note: 'When the piece is performed during Lent the actor, instead of calling for a beefsteak, will order an omelet or fish.'"

A traveler in Texas says that he was riding along a cattle-trail near the New Mexico line, when he met a rather pompous looking native of the region, who introduced himself as Colonel Higgins of Devil's River. "Were you a colonel in the Confederate army?" the traveler asked. "No, sah." "On the Union side, then?" "No, sah; nevah was in no wah." "Belong to the Texas Rangers?" "No, sah; I do not." "Ah, I see; you command one of the State militia regiments." "No, sah; I don't. Don't know nothing about soldiering." "Where, then, did you get the rank of colonel?" "I was a kunnel by marriage, sah." "By marriage? How's that?" "I married the widow of a kunnel, sah—Kunnel Thompson, of Waco."

The death of James W. Paul, the Philadelphia banker, recalls this story which he told at a Philadelphia club long ago: "I was going home one night late and saw a man who had evidently looked too deep into the cup making frantic but unsuccessful efforts to open a door with a latch key. After looking at him a few minutes I decided to help the man, who was not so far gone as to have forgotten his politeness, for before entering the house through the door which I succeeded in opening he asked my name and thanked me. I proceeded on my way, but had gone only a few steps when I heard some one call, 'Mr. Paul! Mr. Paul!' I turned, and there was my friend of the latch key coming toward me with unsteady gait. When he reached me he put one hand affectionately on my shoulder, and, looking me in the face, said: 'Say, did you ever get an answer to that long letter you wrote to the Thessalonians?'"

One of Lord Carmarthen's future constituents once asked the youthful candidate his opinion upon some abstruse question of which he knew nothing. "Let him alone!" cried another, derisively; "don't you see he's nothing but a baby?" "What do you think?" reiterated his inquirer, heedless of the interruption and determined to have an answer. "I think," said Lord Carmarthen, with ready wit, "that it is high time for all babies to be in bed"; and so saying he gathered up his papers and disappeared from the platform. Again—and this last anecdote is so well known as to have become well-nigh historical—at a crowded meeting just before his election, he was interrupted by the question: "Does your mother know you're out?" "Yes, she does," was the instant retort, "and by Tuesday night she will know I'm in." His prophecy proved correct and he headed the poll by a large majority.

Sixty years ago, there were in the Long Room of the London custom-house twelve officers styled "cocket-writers"; they wrote certificates that goods had been duly entered and the duties paid. They were also known as patent officers, because appointed for life by letters-patent from the crown. Their salaries were nominal, sixty pounds sterling a year, but they were permitted to remunerate themselves by extorting fees from the merchants—fees which, in some cases, amounted to a thousand pounds a year. In 1831, the treasury determined to abolish patent offices, and called upon the twelve cocket-writers to furnish a statement of their emoluments. The officers, ignorant of the treasury's purpose, imagined that the government intended to impose an income-tax. Ten of the writers, therefore, returned a statement which understated their fees by several hundred pounds. The other two furnished an honest statement. In a few days, ten clerks were surprised and disgusted and two clerks were astonished but pleased. The treasury notified the cocket-writers that their offices would be abolished, and that they would be compensated by pensions rated according to the returns they had themselves furnished. There were gnashing of teeth and broad smiles in the Long Room. One of the two honest cocket-writers enjoyed his pension for fifty-two years, during which time the treasury paid him fifty-two thousand pounds.

Mme. Geoffrin, like most Frenchwomen, had the gift of making phrases. When Rulhière had read in her salon a work upon Russia, which she feared might involve him in difficulties, she offered him a sum of money to burn it. The author waxed wroth at the insinuation implied, and broke out into an eloquent assertion of his courage and independence. She listened patiently, and then, in a quiet tone of voice, said: "How much more do you want, M. Rulhière?" She married, at the age of fourteen, M. Geoffrin, a wealthy glass manufacturer and lieutenant-colonel of the National Guard. His duty as husband seems to have been to provide the funds for her social campaigns and to watch over the details of the ménage. It is related of him that some person gave him a history to read, and when he asked for the successive volumes, regularly palmed off upon him the first, as if it were new. At last he was heard to say that he thought the author "repeated himself a little." A book printed in double columns he read straight across the page, remarking that "it seemed to be very good, but was rather abstract." One day a visitor inquired after the silent, white-haired old gentleman who was in the habit of sitting at the head of the table. "Oh, he was my husband," replied Mme. Geoffrin, "before he died."

Fall Poem.

The scarlet sage appears in fall; the aster o'er the garden Queens;
The vine glows crimson on the wall—that is, in all the magazines.
The leaves turn red when it is fall, and ruddy tints supplant the greens;
The quail within the wheatfield call—at least, as per the magazines.
In autumn we must move withal, and for the coal bill drag our jeans,
But these are things, it doth befall, not mentioned in the magazines.
—Houston Chronicle.

The Summer Girl's Valedictory.

Good-by, dear Fred and Tom and Dick and Harry.
Farewell, Adolf, and all you other men!—
'Tis sad to part with those you're pledged to marry,
And whom you know you'll never meet again.

You've made my summer very nice and jolly,
I've loved you all—at once—and loved you true.
These good-bys always make me melancholy—
Ah, I have liked to be engaged to you!

The rings are here, done up in this small packet;
Twelve other girls must have them—I'll not fuss!
I free you all—boo-hoo!—O, where's my jacket?
For, like some hearse, you waits the hotel bus.

Next summer? Ah—that makes me very sober!
No, no—this way again I'll never roam;
For ere the calendar has reached October . . .
I shall be married to a man at home.
—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Grignoli, the son of a fisherman, a priest in a rich abbey in Florence, had a net spread every day on the table of his apartment to put him, as he said, in mind of his origin. The abbot dying, this dissembled humility procured Grignoli to be his successor, and the net was used no more. A friend who came to see him the day afterward, on entering his apartment, said: "Where is the net?" "There is no further occasion for the net," replied Grignoli, "when the fish is caught."

Dolls have been and are the natural heritage of the child of all ages and races. Not long ago a little English girl, carrying a doll, was taken into the Ceylon village at the Franco-British exhibition in London. She was immediately surrounded by a chattering crowd of small Cingalese girls and boys, all clamoring to have a look at her plaything. She gave it to one little girl, who immediately rushed all over the village, showing it to every one she met. A further discovery that the doll could shut its eyes made her almost delirious with joy, and a small boy, wild with envy, looked pathetically from the doll to the little giver of it, pointed to himself and said the only English word he knew, "Tomorrow?"

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy officers who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Brigadier-General Frederick K. Smith, U. S. A., formerly colonel of the Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., was promoted to his present rank on Saturday last. He will return this week from the Camp of Instruction, Atascadero, to his station at Fort McDowell, Angel Island.

Colonel William H. Corhusier, U. S. A., retired, and Mrs. Corhusier are spending several weeks in San Francisco.

Colonel Marion Maus, U. S. A., commanding officer of the Department of California, is expected to return today (Saturday) from the Camp of Instruction, Atascadero, where he has been in command during the military manoeuvres which are completed today.

Colonel George H. Torney, Medical Corps, U. S. A., has been granted fifteen days' leave of absence, to take effect upon the completion of special duty in Washington, D. C.

Lieutenant-Colonel William R. Ahercrombie, Twenty-Fifth Infantry, U. S. A., sailed from Manila on the transport Buford on October 15 for this port.

Major Harry C. Benson, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Camp Yosemite, Yosemite National Park, has been ordered relieved from duty in the Department of California and to proceed at the earliest practical date, reporting upon arrival to the Secretary of the Interior, for appointment as superintendent, Yellowstone National Park.

Captain Malcolm Young, Coast Artillery, Corps, U. S. A., Fort Miley, has been granted fourteen days' leave of absence.

Captain William M. Morrow, Twenty-First Infantry, U. S. A., has been detailed as major of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry and has been ordered to proceed without delay to San Juan, Porto Rico, and to report to the commanding officer, Porto Rico Regiment, for duty.

Captain Samuel P. Lyon, Twenty-Fifth Infantry, U. S. A., Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, has been granted leave of absence for three months on account of sickness.

Captain Moor N. Falls, quartermaster, U. S. A., having reported at headquarters, Department of California, has been assigned to duty, with station in this city until the sailing of the transport scheduled to leave November 5, when he will stand relieved and will proceed to Honolulu for duty as quartermaster at that place.

Captain Frank H. Lawton, commissary, U. S. A., having reported at headquarters, Department of California, has been assigned to duty with station in this city until the sailing of the transport scheduled to leave this port November 5, when he will stand relieved and proceed to the Philippine Islands.

Captain Frederick W. Stopford, commissary, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty as assistant to the purchasing commissary at San Francisco, to take effect November 10, and he will then report in person to the commanding officer, Presidio of San Francisco, for duty as commissary and in charge of the Training School for Bakers and Cooks at that post, relieving Captain Henry T. Ferguson, commissary, U. S. A., of those duties. Captain Ferguson will then report to the commanding general, Department of California, for duty as assistant to the chief commissary of that department.

Captain Wilson T. Davidson, Medical Corps, U. S. A., is en route to San Francisco on the transport Buford, which left the Philippines on October 15.

Lieutenant Robert S. A. Dougherty, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A., Camp of Instruction, Atascadero, has been ordered to proceed to Fort Mason, reporting upon arrival to the commanding officer for duty in connection with turning over the public property at that post.

Lieutenant Reginald H. Kelley, Fourth Infantry, U. S. A., sailed from Manila for San Francisco on October 15 on the transport Buford.

Lieutenant Ralph A. Jones, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., Camp of Instruction, Atascadero, has been ordered to proceed to Fort Mason, reporting to the commanding officer for duty in connection with taking over the public property at that post, relieving Lieutenant Oscar A. Russell, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who will return to his proper station, Presidio of San Francisco.

Lieutenant William E. Merritt, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., has had his resignation of his commission as an officer of the United States army accepted by the President, having taken effect October 11.

First Lieutenant Joseph Herring, Sixteenth Infantry, U. S. A., has been ordered to report to Major John Ruckman, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., president of an examining board at the Presidio of San Francisco, for examination to determine his fitness for promotion.

Lieutenant Ernest K. Johnstone, Medical Reserve Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered to accompany headquarters and staff of the Third Squadron and Troops I and M, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., on the march from Yosemite National Park to the Presidio of San Francisco.

Headquarters and Company A, First Battalion of Engineers, U. S. A., Fort Mason, will stand relieved from duty at that post on November 5 and will proceed on the transport sailing on that date from San Francisco to Honolulu for duty.

Company K, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., now at Camp of Instruction, Atascadero, has been ordered to proceed on or about November 4 to Fort Mason for temporary duty.

The Children's Hospital.

"Come into the game!" is the motto adopted by the committee on "Tag Day" to insure the cooperation of every large-minded man and woman on Saturday, November 7. On that date two hundred and fifty thousand official tags will be sold at the rate of 10 cents on the streets of San Francisco, in the most important hotels, at the ferry landings, on the Oakland, Key Route, and Sausalito boats, at the Third and Townsend Street depot, at the theatres, matinees and evenings, in the park, and in all the busy thoroughfares down and up town. Mrs. Helen Hecht has assumed the general chairmanship. Directly under her will serve six district captains, who will again supervise from thirty to forty captains, each with a little company of from ten to twenty young matrons and girls. Besides this large corps of society women, the cause has enlisted an army of 16,000 school children, who will remain in their own districts, and thus honeycomb the city from the water-front to Richmond, and from Telegraph Hill to the Potrero. The object of "Tag Day" is the establishment of a building fund towards the construction of a new Children's Hospital on the old site, and it is hoped that a large sum will be netted by this original and clever innovation. The committee comprises Mrs. Helen Hecht, Mrs. Henry Payot, Mrs. Bothin, Mrs. Isaac N. Walter, Mrs. Silas Palmer, Mrs. Rolla V. Watt, Mrs. W. W. Kerr, Mrs. Bertha G. Lilienthal, Miss Fannie Danforth. Mrs. L. L. Dunbar is president of the institution.

Miss Marion Terry, a sister of Ellen Terry and an actress of note herself in England, is on her way to Montreal, where she will create the leading rôle in Paul Bourget's drama, "Divorce," which is having a successful run in Paris. The play is to have its premier in Montreal on November 2. Miss Terry, who bears a striking resemblance to her sister, has never been in this country before. She is of medium height and about forty-five years old, with brown hair, hazel eyes, and a youthful figure. Miss Terry comes to this country under the management of Fred C. Whitney, and the American adaptation of Bourget's play has been made by Stanislaus Stange, who wrote "Dolly Varden."

"Hateful thing," she cried, in the midst of their little quarrel. "I was a silly goose when I married you." "Perhaps so," replied the great brute. "At any rate, you were no chicken."—Boston Troveller.

Maude—I'm a little uneasy in my mind. Ned asked me to marry him, and I told him I might, some day. Now, would you call that a promise? Morie—No, I should call it a threat.—The Tatler.

"Alas!" confessed the penitent man, "in a moment of weakness I stole a carload of brass fittings." "In a moment of weakness?" exclaimed the judge. "Goodness, man! what would you have taken if you had yielded in a moment when you felt strong?"—Boston Globe.

Miss Coopah—Why, mah lan', if dere aint Pete Booker! Whar be git dem cloe's? Miss Sinclair—S-s-s-s-h! O' course, dere ain' no tellin', but for de las' two weeks Pete's done bin de night watchman in a big gents' clothin' store.—Puck.

"When we are enjoying the fruits of victory," said the campaign solicitor, "you will be sorry you denied us a campaign contribution." "No, sir," answered Mr. Dustin Stax. "For men in my circumstances the fruits of victory too frequently prove to be lemons."—Washington Star.

The Abbé Pradt, a rushlight of Napoleon's time, was a most conceited man. The Duke of Wellington met him in Paris, at a dinner given in honor of himself. The abbé made a long oration, chiefly on the state of political affairs, and concluded with the words: "We owe the salvation of Europe to one man alone." "Before he gave me time to blush," said the duke, "he put his hand on his heart, and continued: 'To me!'"

Reasons and Facts

why

Judge Carroll Cook

(INCUMBENT)

SHOULD BE RE-ELECTED

When you cast your ballot for Superior Court Judges, be sure that JUDGE CARROLL COOK is one of the four judges for whom you vote.

Vote for a tried, honest, fair and courageous judge; such is JUDGE CARROLL COOK.

Twelve years' faithful service to all the people should be rewarded by reelection.

Always fearless and fair, is JUDGE CARROLL COOK.

JUDGE CARROLL COOK is controlled by no individual or corporation and is independent of newspaper dictation.

In the hundreds of criminal cases tried before him during his twelve years on the bench but five reversals can be found.

JUDGE CARROLL COOK, by his knowledge of law and experience and by his system of impaneling jurors—now adopted in many counties—has saved the taxpayers thousands of dollars.

Twenty-five years' practice as a lawyer enables JUDGE CARROLL COOK to expedite business so that great expense is saved to the taxpayer.

Hundreds of boys have been rescued by JUDGE CARROLL COOK from criminal careers.

By his policy of probation for youths in first offenses JUDGE CARROLL COOK has made men and good citizens of over 95 per cent of those on whom he exercised his judgment of character.

The decision rendered by JUDGE CARROLL COOK in sustaining the "Child Labor Law" should not be forgotten; it was the first on the subject and was sustained by the Supreme Court.

The reign of terror created by Siemen and Dabner—the gas-pipe thugs—was stopped by JUDGE CARROLL COOK.

Arson, the most dangerous of all crimes, ran rampant until by examples made by JUDGE CARROLL COOK it ceased.

The foregoing facts and reasons are presented to you on behalf of JUDGE CARROLL COOK by the Non-Partisan Club, organized in February, 1908. All of the members enrolled, numbering 3000, endorse the above.

The Election.

For a month past the election of Mr. Taft has been a foregone conclusion, therefore the actual event has not served greatly to stir enthusiasm. The reasons have all been declared in advance. The people of the United States have confidence in the purposes and tendencies of that system of politics professed and enforced by the Republican party. They have no confidence in those policies identified with the Democratic party. By the same token, the country respects the character and confides in the judgment of Mr. Taft; and while it is not lacking in respect for the private and personal qualities of Mr. Bryan, it does not regard him as a sound or safe man.

The largeness of Mr. Taft's vote is a matter of general surprise, and yet it is not easy to see why it should be so. What the country wants for its peace of mind and for its material prosperity is the carrying out of Republican policies by steady and quiet methods; and all along there has been that in the candidacy and character of Mr. Taft promising this desired effect. On the whole, and upon the basis of the event, there seems more reason for surprise that Bryan got so large a vote as he did than that the Taft wave rose so high.

The two questionable factors in the campaign have been the Hearst influence and the Gompers influence. So far as may be judged at this time—we write on Wednesday morning, when the returns are still far from complete—the Hearst movement, curiously and amusingly styled "Independence party," had no effect upon the result. Many—perhaps most—of the votes cast for the Hearst ticket would have gone to Bryan if there had been no Hearst ticket; nevertheless, the result would not anywhere have been different. Hearst's "party" has had no part in the defeat of Bryan, nor has Hearst done anything to establish himself in larger or more permanent political relations. His hopes of so building himself up by his activities in this campaign as to make himself the logical champion of a reorganized Democracy in 1912 find no justification in the event.

A more emphatic rebuke than that afforded by this election to the pretensions of Mr. Gompers could not be imagined. Gompers terrified various national Republican leaders, including Roosevelt, and then tried to hold up the Republican convention at Chicago and failed; he next tried the same tactics at Denver and succeeded. The Democratic convention ratified a bargain already arranged between Gompers and Bryan for the political support of labor union in its national organization. Since that bargain was made Gompers has gone up and down the country seeking to whip organized labor into support of Democracy and Bryanism. How completely he has failed may be read in the returns the country over, particularly those which report the results of Tuesday's voting in the great industrial States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. An overwhelming illustration of the impotency of Gompers is found in the congressional election in the Danville, Illinois, district, where Speaker Cannon, bitterly opposed by organized labor and a half-dozen other adverse forces, has won his reelection by an old-time majority of six thousand.

As it looks at this writing, the Republican majority in the House of Representatives will be slightly reduced, but amply large enough for all working purposes. When President Taft shall be inaugurated four months from now, the government will be Republican in all its branches. There will be no confusion on the score of divided responsibility. The way will be open for the performance of all the pledges and assurances under which the Republican party made its appeal to the country at the beginning of the campaign.

The result in California is entirely satisfactory from the Republican standpoint—indeed, from every standpoint, since many of those who supported Democratic candidates are quite as well pleased to see Republican policies successful. The legislature will be strongly Republican, assuring the choice of a Republican for the United States Senate—in all likelihood the reelection of Senator George C. Perkins. Judge Melvin has been confirmed by popular vote in the chair given him by executive appointment a few weeks ago. Republican policies and Republican agents are to continue to control the affairs of California.

San Francisco, in spite of labor unionism, of half-cooked "reform," and of confusions unnumbered, has given a substantial Republican majority. In only one respect has the city disappointed those who hoped for a complete reawakening of political intelligence and moral common sense, and that is in the reelection, which at this writing seems probable, of Judge Dunne. It was brought about unquestionably by systematic "plumping" on the part of his more intense partisans. San Francisco has endured this infliction before, and it can endure it again; none the less, it is to be regretted that we are not to have some intelligent and efficient man in the place of this compound of ignorance, low breeding, mendacity, and groveling subserviency. The success of men like Dunne when they have an active and devoted factional following will always be possible so long as our system permits of "plumping."

It is too early to know the result of the voting upon constitutional amendments. San Francisco and the other Bay cities, as was expected, have given a heavy majority for the capital removal folly. It is the general idea that the interior vote will be even more largely adverse, but it will take time and a complete count of the votes to tell. As yet nothing at all is known with respect to the other amendments.

On the whole, the election of 1908 has served the country at large, and California in particular, exceedingly well.

The Lines Are Drawn.

The most important incidental development of the campaign just ended is the definite line it has drawn between the two great parties with respect to what is called the labor question. Up to the time of the Republican convention at Chicago there had been no authoritative adjustment with respect to the demands of organized labor. Both parties had tried to cajole the labor vote, both had trafficked more or less with Gompers and the other leaders of organized labor. In short, both parties had hopes of belling the cat.

The President had been so worked upon in his political fears that he had come to believe that the future success of Republicanism depended upon "concessions" to labor. It is an open secret that he consulted Gompers and Mitchell from time to time with respect to legislative proposals affecting organized labor for a full year before the Chicago convention; and no attempt was made to keep secret the fact that he had practically agreed with Gompers that the national convention should concede laborite demands with respect to the injunction process and other matters. In other words, the President had bargained with Gompers for the laborite vote, and if he could have had his way he would have forced the party into alliance with unionism on the basis of the latter's demand for special privilege under guaranty of the laws. Probably the President, who never sees but one side of any question at any particular time, hardly realized what he was doing; today, no doubt, he is thanking his lucky star that his frenzied counsels were rejected. None the less, if the convention had listened to and heeded him, Republicanism would stand committed to an outrageous denial of that principle of equality before the law upon which our system is founded.

The Republicans at Chicago, in spite of Gompers's demands and in spite of the President's efforts to enforce them, declined to stultify the party by tendering a bribe to organized labor. The Democrats at Denver, urged by Bryan, took the other course. They gave to Gompers what he demanded, thinking by the alliance thus effected to gain control of the government. In the result of Tuesday's voting we may see how miscalculated and ineffective was the policy of concession; and, incidentally, how little the Republican party lost by standing against aggression and threats. In spite of its bargain with Gompers, in spite of its concessions, the Democratic party did not get the vote of organized labor. For all his pretensions, Mr. Gompers was not able to deliver the goods. In the end the Democratic party finds itself saddled with another disreputable record founded in an effort to exchange special privileges for partisan support.

The result of Tuesday's voting shows that organized labor in the United States is not a solidified political force, subject to direction, here, there, or somewhere else at the will or the whim of an agitator like Gompers. It shows that the purposes behind organization of labor, up to this time at least, are not political in the sense that Mr. Gompers would have it. It shows that the labor unionist does not abandon his privileges as a free and independent man and his duties as a patriotic citizen in affiliating himself with his fellow-workmen. It shows that no party may bargain successfully with a pretended magnate of labor for the votes of labor, because the votes of labor are not subject to this species of barter and sale.

convention may now be repeated with especial emphasis. The demands of Gompers and other labor exploiters are not for equity, but for special privilege. What they want is not justice, but selfish advantage. The demand is that labor union, which declines to make itself responsible under the law, shall find support in the law for its "normal activities." It is nothing less than for legal justification of the boycott and the ten thousand crimes which go with it. It is for legalization of the pretensions and excesses which accompany every general strike. This, to be sure, is denied in words; none the less it is attested by acts. Gompers wants one law for organized labor and another for unorganized labor, to the end that he may write the rules of industry, penalize those who reject his authority, and thus secure for his "system" complete monopoly and mastery of American industry. And back of this intent lies the sinister aim of Gompers and men of his kind to hold the country in subjection to this system of control in the fear of political resentment on the part of organized labor.

Republicanism, by its principles, by its history, by its very constitution, must stand against this scheme of selfish aggression. It must stand in opposition to it precisely as it stood against slavery and for similar reasons. To abandon the government of the country to labor unionism would be to throw over every principle for which our fathers contended, practically to abandon the whole system of political ideas and motives upon which our government is founded. Of course, Republicanism is bound to meet this aggression as it has met every other within the past fifty years. It has opposed and beaten it in the year 1908, and it will oppose and beat it whenever or in whatever form it may again present itself.

Labor-union aggression is as much in violation of Democratic tradition as of Republican tradition, but in its efforts to get itself into power Democracy has well nigh forgotten its moral obligations. It seems ready now, as it was half a century ago, to make any concession to any cause, however mistaken or infamous, that promises a helping hand toward regaining control of the government. The Democratic party may be reckoned upon, in spite of this year's defeat, to continue in alliance with the laborite scheme to monopolize the industry of the country. Either Mr. Gompers or others like him will formulate new plans, because in the business of formulating plans there is employment and profit. They will continue to plan and to plot, and they will find in the Democratic party a natural ally because in its weakness it is ready to grasp at any straw promising help towards regaining control of the government.

The events of the campaign, we repeat, have defined the standing of the two parties with respect to the labor issue. Democracy stands in alliance with the labor exploiters for any project, however extravagant, that may possibly win the support of organized labor. Republicanism stands for the principle of equal justice, of one law for all, and it will defend the country against the demands of labor or of anybody else proposing a scheme of selfish and aggressive interest. There you have the attitude of the two parties—an attitude bound to be of increasing importance as time goes on. For not yet are we done with the demands of Gompers and the other exploiters of labor. These demands are founded in a spirit as aggressive and determined as that which dominated the slave-holders of the South in earlier times. We shall bear from them again and still again. And since this is in prospect, it is most fortunate that the parties in whose hands the political fortunes of the country must rest have come to a fixed and definite adjustment upon this great issue.

The Creed of One "Politically Dissatisfied."

Times indeed are changed when a Massachusetts Yankee bearing the name and the tradition of the Adams family may at a time when political feeling is at high tide stand before a Southern audience—welcomed cordially, listened to attentively—and discuss the political affairs of the day. It may be considered a distinct mark of the growth of political tolerance, likewise a distinct mark of the development of a higher civilization, that Charles Francis Adams of Boston was called to Richmond, Virginia, on the 26th of last month to discuss political questions before an audience of the Virginian elite. Mr. Adams was for Taft for reasons which hardly need to be told; but this fact was less interesting than the exposition which his address afforded as to the attitude of himself and men of his type towards national policies as distinct from party figures and party purposes. The attitude of Mr. Adams towards political affairs in general was set forth with interesting frankness in that part of his address which preceded his discussion of immediate candidates and measures; and his remarks are well worth quoting as illustrating the position of the extreme Eastern conservatives of Republican, Whig, and Federal traditions. "I am," said Mr. Adams, "one of the politically dissatisfied. I see little that attracts, nothing to admire, in the recent conduct of affairs—the administration programme, so-called." Proceeding, Mr. Adams said:

I am an individualist—in that respect a disciple of Jefferson; but I everywhere see a tendency to collectivism. Constitutionally, I am a strict constructionist, especially since the Civil War; but I have seen the Constitution treated with ill-disguised contempt, and stretched by administrative and legislative construction until, like Falstaff's waist, it has got out of all reasonable compass. A free-trader, I have looked on at protection run mad. An economist in public expenditure, I have studied the records of billion-dollar congresses. A disbeliever in costly armaments, I have been confronted with the heaviest war budget in time of peace the world sees, or history records. A believer in minding one's own business, I have seen my country masquerading, as I consider it, in the absurd character of an imperialistic World Power. Somewhat of a student of economical and business developments, I have felt growth hampered and thwarted by spectacular performances known as trust-curling and "trust-busting." Like every other man engaged, or even interested, in considerable business enterprises, I have been denounced, abused, and despoiled. And, not unnaturally I think, I find myself neither an ardent Republican nor a devoted supporter of the present methods of administration. Tired of strenuousness, I, in fact, yearn for a period of rest.

Transcontinental Rates and Oriental Traffic.

Unless the transportation experts are at fault in their reasonings and conclusions, we are about to see the practical sweeping of the American flag from off the Pacific Ocean. This, say the experts, is bound to be the effect of revised rates on certain classes of transcontinental freight which were put into effect on the 2d instant in obedience to the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission. These rulings are to the effect (1) that transcontinental rates on goods to or from transpacific points shall not be lower than domestic rates. In other words, a ton of iron shipped from Pittsburg to Tokyo must pay the same rate from Pittsburg to San Francisco as a ton of iron shipped from Pittsburg to San Francisco as its final destination; (2) that all through rates shall be published in advance of going into effect, to the end that all shippers may have any rate that is allowed to any shipper.

To make these regulations clear in their essential relations, we must go briefly into the history of the American-Oriental traffic. Merchandise on the Atlantic side of the continent designed for Oriental markets has the choice of two routes, one all water by way of the Suez Canal; the other across the continent by rail, thence by sea from San Francisco, Portland, Seattle, or Vancouver. Both American and Oriental shippers have been in the habit of playing one route against the other, and the basis of their operations has been a shifting scale both of ocean and of rail rates. The division of the through rate, whatever it may be, by the transpacific and continental route has been one-third to the Pacific ships and two-thirds to the railroads. Agents of transportation at either end of the route have had general authority to make engagements upon this basis, and they have further been allowed a very considerable latitude of concession whenever it has been necessary to underbid the Suez route. Competition between the two routes, at all times close, is sometimes intense, and very commonly the situation calls for immediate action on the part of the agents of transportation. A very large proportion of freight going and coming between the Atlantic region and the Orient by way of the American transcontinental route has been carried on a variable and often a cut-rate basis. That is, the traffic has been conducted under the bargain system, and oftentimes at less rates for transcontinental transportation than the ordinary rates for domestic freights. The theory of the railroad men has been that they would better have the business at low rates than not to have it at all. The minimum rule has been a through rate one-third of which would yield some profit for ocean carrying.

Under the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission above noted the railroads can not carry freights for export or import at lower rates than those charged for domestic traffic over the same routes, and all rates must be duly published. This means that in bidding for Oriental freight against the Suez route the agents of the American route will be (1) checked by a high limit for the transcontinental part of the carriage, and (2) in view of the publication requirement, they are to have no chance at all for a kind of bargaining which is commonly necessary in Oriental dealings. A published rate is known to the agents of the Suez route as well as to agents of the American route; in other words, all the elements of the American side of the business are to be in the hands of the Suez rival.

Another complication lies in the fact that Japanese steamships crossing the Pacific Ocean operate under a subsidy amounting to about $25,000 per round trip, whereas American ships are dependent wholly upon their own earnings. The American ships, therefore, find themselves hard pressed at both ends of their business. They will not be permitted to have the coöperation of the railroads in making bargain through rates on the one hand, while on the other they must meet the competition of cheaper ships, operated by cheaper labor, and aided by subsidy.

All the experts say that the outcome must speedily be a general withdrawal of American ships from the Pacific Ocean. What has happened in relation to the Oceanic Steamship Company's line between San Francisco and Australia is now to happen to the Pacific Mail Company's, the Great Northern Railway Company's, and other transpacific steamship lines operating from United States ports. What will happen further north, between Oriental and British Columbia ports, remains to be seen. The railway situation there is not so restricted, since the Canadian road is at liberty to coöperate in making through rates. But Japanese competition there as well as here is a serious thing, and it is the general opinion that British steamers will have to be withdrawn from the Pacific unless they shall be even more heavily subsidized than now.

Of course, all this implies a heavy blow to Pacific Coast commercial interests. It will hurt all our ports more or less, San Francisco more than any other. Ultimately, however, good may come out of it, for it is bound to give the American people a concrete illustration of the folly of political as distinct from business regulation of matters purely commercial. Lessons thus learned are dearly learned, but perhaps they would better be dearly learned than not learned at all.

New Turn in the Hatfield Case.

The Hatfield case at San Jose has taken a new turn. At first nobody could see any resemblance to Dunham in the coarse-featured and phlegmatic Hatfield; and today, if the matter were open to proof, there are hundreds who stand ready to swear that Hatfield is not Dunham. But, curiously enough, in this as in other similar instances the world around, morbid excitement has produced an extraordinary effect. Certain prison officials at San Jose are "convinced," in spite of the difference pointed out by multitudes who knew Dunham, that after all Hatfield is really Dunham. Marshall McAfee, it is given out, has a list of eight persons who will swear positively that Hatfield is none other than Dunham himself. The prosecuting attorney is in a quandary, inclined one day to prosecute the suspect on the theory that he is Dunham and on the next to let him go. It is a safe prophecy that in the end Hatfield will be released, since no jury by any possibility will convict a man concerning whose identity multitudes of people differ, with vastly the greater number on the side of the defendant.

A sinister phase of the situation as it stands at San Jose is the attitude of Marshal McAfee, who arrested Hatfield originally because he "felt" him to be a "bad egg" and "believed" he would be wanted "somewhere." McAfee now is "assured" that Hatfield is Dunham, although he never saw Dunham and has no more right to an opinion in the matter than the man in the moon. But—and here we have the milk in this cocoanut—McAfee has reason for wishing his catch to be Dunham. At the time of the McGlincy murder, some twelve years ago, the authorities of Santa Clara County offered a reward of $1500 for Dunham, dead or alive. Coincidentally, on the basis of a private subscription, a further reward of $10,000 was offered. McAfee wants this money, and for the sake of getting it he would apparently be glad to have Hatfield officially identified as Dunham, whether in truth he be Dunham or not. Apparently he would be willing to push this poor suspect whom nobody knows and whom pretty much everybody believes not to be Dunham upon the gallows, to the end that he (McAfee) may gain the price which has been put upon Dunham's head.

Another sinister phase of this matter explains the procedure in Texas prior to Hatfield's coming to California. Sheriff Langford, be it remembered, first went to Texas, where he pronounced Hatfield not to be the man wanted. McAfee, who had Hatfield in custody professed to believe this a mere ruse designed to trick him out of the reward. His theory was that if Hatfield were to be released as the wrong man, Langford would cause his rearrest, bring him to California, and claim the reward. This was the basis of the extraordinary procedure which preceded the bringing of Hatfield to California.

That the suspect is really the man wanted is, of course, a possibility, but a very remote one. That he can be convicted in the face of the certainty that he is not Dunham on the part of scores of persons who knew the latter well is, of course, an impossibility. The prosecuting attorney ought to dismiss the matter and restore to freedom a man who has probably been grossly misused.

Converting the Heathen.

The missionary incentive is evidently not confined to religious propaganda. A woman, Mrs. Katherine Lent Stevenson, has just sailed from this city with the avowed intention of preaching to the people of Asia the special doctrine of temperance promulgated by the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Stevenson is a representative of the "World Department" of the organization, and as such it is her duty to carry her glad tidings into all lands, spreading her gospel of total abstinence among all sorts and conditions of men, seeking to convert them to full realization of the Solomonian aphorism that wine is a mocker and that strong drink is raging.

Mrs. Stevenson will probably find Asia a rather barren field in which to sow the seed of her dogma. Drunkenness is very rare among the Oriental nations; wine-bibbing is occasional rather than habitual; and while the rule of abstemiousness and extreme moderation is very generally observed, there is also a settled belief in the minds of those with whom Mrs. Stevenson will come in contact that every man is a law unto himself in this matter, and that any advice concerning his habits of drinking is as superfluous as similar advice concerning his habit of eating or sleeping. Even the Mohammedan, whose Koran expressly prohibits the use of wine as a tippie, will resent Mrs. Stevenson's effort to reinforce with a Christian propaganda what has been sufficiently inculcated by a prophet inspired of Allah. The millions of followers of Buddha and Confucius, both of whom were temperance advocates when the ancestors of the W. C. T. U. were consistent worshippers at the shrine of Bacchus, will be sure to urge this fact in debate with Mrs. Stevenson, with the intention of convincing her, if possible, that the really fruitful field for her endeavor is in her own country, where the drink habit is more prevalent, more disastrous to the person over-indulging, and more amenable to drastic remedy than it is in countries where the principles underlying the personal liberty of the individual are better understood.

The Christian religious missionary has been laboring in his neighbor's vineyard many years, and with little result compared with the effort he has put forth. Centuries of time and millions of money have been expended by these missionaries in the endeavor to convince the Oriental nations that their religions and philosophies are fallacious; that their civilization is a hollow mockery; and that their only salvation is in the acceptance of a doctrine whose operative plan is not retroactive and can not include in its scheme the ancestors of the generation to whom it is offered. Moreover, it is very apparent to those whom the missionaries would proselyte to the Christian cult that the Christians themselves are not wholly agreed upon the basic ideas of their religion. Yet these missionaries would break up the vast religions of Asia and scatter the fragments among the two-and-seventy jarring sects of Christianity. The proposition is seemingly absurd in the view of a cultured Japanese, a philosophical Chinese, a bigoted Mohammedan, or an intellectual Hindu of the Brahman caste.

As a result, the only appreciable gain in the Christian missionary field of Asia is among the ignorant, poverty-stricken coolie class. These people, in China, are called "rice Christians," because the majority of the Chinese believe that they are "converts" in response to the demands of their stomachs rather than by conviction of the truth of what they are taught by the missionaries. In Japan the missionaries are tolerated because they do not interfere in the slightest degree with the State religion of Shintoism and are making no material inroad upon the popular religion of Buddhism.

That the Chinese, especially, are wedded to their idols, as the missionaries insist upon designating the symbolical formulæ of non-Christian folk, is demonstrated in the long resistance they have made against very powerful and frequently violent influences seeking to "civilize" them by the methods commonly adopted by nations civilized under the various codes of Christian jurisprudence. In spite of wars that have wrested vast territories from the Chinese empire; in defiance of the palpable fact that the God of the Christians permits these aggressions and robberies; notwithstanding the constant iteration by the missionaries that these Christian invaders and land grabbers are all believers in the Christian theory of peace on earth and good will to men, and potentially guided in all their actions by the precepts of the Golden Rule; in the face of all this power and prestige, the Chinese persist in their close adherence to the teachings of Confucius, the religion of Buddha, and the radical materialism of Lao-tsze. Evidently these doctrines fit the mental and spiritual requirements of the Chinese, and it is also equally evident that nothing else appeals to the Chinese understanding. He is not "stiff-necked"; he is merely convinced that he knows what is best for himself. And the same opinion prevails among all the peoples of Asia.

We fear that Mrs. Katherine Lent Stevenson has unwittingly undertaken a contract of magnitude, not only because those whom she proposes to "convert" are in no condition to respond to her philanthropic intention; but also because they imagine that they understand their own needs, bodily and spiritually, better than she does.

The Hetch Hetchy Project.

Not even with the passing of the presidential and local political campaigns are we free from the burden and the agitation involved in elections; for, be it remembered, on the 12th instant—next Thursday—San Francisco is to vote at a special election upon a bonding proposal connected with the Hetch Hetchy water project. Our reform administration, the same administration that is treating the public so handsomely in the matter of the Sutter-and-Market-Street contention, wants the little sum of $600,000 to inaugurate the Hetch Hetchy project by buying up certain land and water rights in the Hetch Hetchy region. This demand for $600,000 is, of course, only a beginning. Mr. Phelan's experts estimate that the ultimate cost will be $40,000,000, which is only another way of saying that the ultimate demand will be in the neighborhood of $80,000,000 or upwards. The money now wanted is for the purpose of acquiring rights, of clinching the bargain so to speak, and of committing the city to a colossal scheme for the benefit of the next generation.

The Argonaut has not been able to sift to its own satisfaction all the considerations involved in this stupendous project. It does not know whether the experts hired by Mr. Phelan and his associates, and who have declared that there is abundant water available in the Tuolumne, are intelligent and candid or not. It does not know whether those other experts hired by other interests, who have declared that there is not water enough in the Tuolumne, are intelligent and candid or not. The mind of the Argonaut is disturbed and confused amid the conflict of testimonies, and the one clear idea that it brings out of the mess is that experts can commonly be had for or against any engineering project if one will only pay the price. We have no doubt that for a round fee any desired opinion concerning Hetch Hetchy can be obtained upon the basis of names of high repute in the engineering world. All of which is to say that engineers, like other men, are likely to be affected by motives of self-interest, partisanship, etc.

But this we do know—presuming the supply of water available under the Hetch Hetchy scheme to be adequate, and assuming that there are no prior claims on the part of the Modesto farmers, and assuming that Mr. James D. Phelan has no private interest to be served, and assuming that the lowest estimates of Mr. Phelan's experts are adequate—that it will take at least $40,000,000 in money and at least fifteen years' time to give San Francisco water from Hetch Hetchy. We know further that San Francisco suffered only two years and a half ago the most terrible disaster ever sustained by any community since Sodom and Gomorrah—or possibly Pompeii. We do know that a tremendous sum must be expended before the work of rehabilitation, public and private, shall be complete. We do know that however carefully we may manage our finances, property in San Francisco must pay a very stiff tax for many years to come. We do know that San Francisco has gotten on very well this fifty years past with its present water supply and that the same supply can be had on reasonable terms indefinitely. We do know that it would be the height of stupidity and folly for San Francisco at this time to mortgage itself for the lifetime of a generation in acceptance of a scheme doubtful at many points and certain only in the amazing vastness of its cost.

Furthermore, the Argonaut knows that in the view of many citizens competent at the points of character and discretion the Hetch Hetchy project stands discredited by the men behind it. It does not seek to probe to its bottom the story that Mr. Phelan has somewhere in this matter a large private interest; it finds it only too easy to believe that Mr. Phelan's motives are interested and secret, because that is Mr. Phelan's way in all things. We find it easy to believe that Mr. Phelan seeks to make money out of this project, and easier still to believe that by it he hopes to satisfy his political ambitions or his private resentments and hatreds, or all together.

On the whole, we believe that the best thing to do at this special election is to vote against the bond proposal. We can provide ourselves with water either by an easy working arrangement with the Spring Valley Company or by purchase of its system upon our own terms. Let us proceed upon this basis for a while, reserving our credit for more immediate necessities and making ourselves sure that we are right before going ahead. By all means, vote No on the bonding proposal.

Editorial Notes.

The main trouble in the pending Ruef trial—if it may be called a trial—is that neither side wants to be fair, neither proceeds legitimately or honestly. The aim of the law is trial by a jury of disinterested and unbiased citizens. In this case the aim both on the part of prosecution and defense is by hook or by crook to get a prejudiced and partisan jury. If there were fair spirit on both sides, if there were willingness to submit the case to an unprejudiced body of citizens, the jury box would be filled in a day. In the meantime Abraham Ruef, the culprit, freely walks the streets of San Francisco and enjoys his grossly acquired wealth, while ten citizens who have been "caught" as jurymen remain in the custody of the sheriff, practically imprisoned. From being a weariness, the case has become a reproach and a scandal.

The country is waiting with a good deal of interest for explanations of the up-set given to Tom Johnson's municipal street railway schemes in the Cleveland election of October 25. Johnson's schemes were embodied in a proposal styled the "Security Traction Franchise," which was described during the campaign by the mayor himself as vital to the success of his plans. His prediction was that this proposal would be accepted by a majority of not less than 9000, whereas in fact the vote went 605 the other way. In the absence of more explicit statements covering this slump, we may accept tentatively the telegraphed report that the result is due to dissatisfaction with the service rendered by the Municipal Traction Company. Whatever ultimate explanations may be, this result will be taken the country over as suggestive of a "black eye" for the municipalized street-car idea. It has been tried at Cleveland under circumstances of special advantage, and manifestly it has failed to satisfy the people.

FALL LITERARY NUMBER.

The next issue of the Argonaut will be a special Publishers' Announcement Number. It will be largely devoted to announcements of forthcoming books, reviews of the books of the season, portraits of authors, half-tanes of unique book-covers, and other illustrative matter. It will also contain a number of special articles, literary letters from London and Paris, and general correspondence from New York and the East. In addition it will contain the usual departments and miscellany. The number will be printed on heavy toned paper and will consist of 32 pages. Price, ten cents. Newsdealers will do well to send their orders in advance.

Professor Metchnikoff, who has been invited to Russia by the official medical board of St. Petersburg to help fight the cholera epidemic, is assistant director of the Pasteur Institute in Paris, and has been probably the most distinguished scientist of that city since the death of Pasteur in 1895. He is a Russian. Five years ago he published a book, "The Nature of Man," which attracted wide attention. He holds that civilized man should live to be 130 or more years old. Professor Metchnikoff says cholera can be avoided.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

No one ever supposed that the Crown Prince of Serbia was capable of a patriotic sentiment or that there was wit enough in his simian mind to put such a sentiment into resonant phrases. Moreover, any one who would have predicted a year ago that Prince George would be enthusiastically acclaimed by cheering crowds in the streets of Belgrade would have been properly regarded as mentally deficient. But these things have actually happened. Speaking to a concourse of demonstrators outside the royal palace, the crown prince made an impassioned speech and he concluded by saying, "May he die who wishes to live, and may he live who wishes to die. Long live the nation." Whether impromptu or not, it was fine, and the young man's sins, which were many, seemed to drop from him like a mantle of shame.

And yet a few months ago Prince George of Serbia appeared to be an incarnation of human infamy. The stories of his malignant and impish wickedness almost pass belief. His father, "Black" Peter Karageorgewitch, himself by no means a saint, yet dreaded the day when his son must take his place, and would have confined him in an asylum had he dared to face the disclosures that would have been the inevitable reprisal. It was Prince George who passed many an idle hour by burying cats up to their necks in the ground and then crushing their beads with his bootheel. It was Prince George who compelled a sentry to eat a living mouse, who filled the palace with the most sodden of the demi monde, and who took a fiendish delight in shooting at country people from the palace windows with an air gun. Incessantly drunk, the noise of his brutal carnivals filled the palace day and night, and even the hardened soldiery shrank in terror from his frenzied insults and his brutal assaults. Upon one occasion, boasting that he could shoot the cigarette from the mouth of a sentry, he blew the man's jaw away, and there was, in fact, no frightful excess and no unnatural debauchery that was not among the daily relaxations of this boy monster with his pale face and aristocratic poise. But a lofty sentiment at a psychological moment carries it all down to oblivion, and the war-crazed people of Belgrade acclaim him as though he were one of the fabled heroes of deliverance. And under the same blind impulse they would have stoned the prophets.

We may well wonder if King Peter sees the hand of doom first in the frightful scourge of his son and now in the war clouds gathering upon his frontiers, or whether the ghost of the murdered Alexander stands more visibly than usual by his bedside. The royal palace of Belgrade must veritably smell of blood. It is said that King Peter descends nightly into a perfect bell of terror as his dreams are haunted by the crime that crowned him. No one says openly that King Peter of Serbia instigated the murder of Alexander and of Draga, but he at least profited by it. He already had his foot upon the lower step of the throne, and before the outraged bodies of the king and queen were cold he was seated and proclaimed. It is an ill deed to profit by crime, and by such a crime as that. Even though he had no hand in the plot, the hideous picture must be before him all the time, the vision of the king and queen mercilessly butchered in their night attire and thrown from the palace windows to lie till morning upon the flagstones of the courtyard. When the hacked and disfigured bodies were roughly thrown into coffins, that of the king was found to be too short and an officer stamped upon the corpse with his heavy boots so that the lid might be crushed into its place. The people of Serbia have forgotten that, but if the hour of disaster shall arrive, if Serbia shall throw herself helplessly against the iron circle of her foes, there will not be wanting those who will see in her overthrow the unstaying, unbending judgments of God.

The late Alphonse Allais had an admirable scheme for the settlement of the vexed questions of the Balkans and of the passage of the Dardanelles. He had found, he said, by careful calculation that the Balkans were of just the same size as the Dardanelles. Why not, then, take the Balkans and drop them into the Dardanelles, where there would be enough water to peacefully submerge them, while the navigation of the Dardanelles would then cease to be a practical question. But the proposal never met with the attention it deserved.

That labor troubles in England have reached a phase even more acute than here is shown by the ultimatum issued by Sir Christopher Furness as head of the great shipbuilding yards of Barrow in Furness. Sir Christopher announces that either the strikes must cease or the yards.

There is certainly justification for such a decision. The company finds that it is useless to make contracts involving either time or price. No reliance can be placed upon agreements, and there is therefore no basis upon which estimates can be found. Strikes have been nearly continuous in spite of every effort to meet the demands of the union, and the situation has now become so impossible that the business must come to an end.

But Sir Christopher makes a proposition, and its nature is so interesting that his own words may well be quoted. He says:

Firstly, the trade unions being the capable, organized, powerful bodies I have described, why should they not go into the business on their own account? They have got the capital, they have got the organizing capacity—why not? We hear much to the effect that the day of the capitalist is over, that there is now no need for capitalist-employers, that the hour has arrived for substantial experiments in labor co-partnership in its extreme form—that is to say, in direct production by labor, without the intervention or participation of people who are not directly representative of labor. Well, why not try their hands here? I offer to your unions, either singly or in combination, to hand over to them our shipyards at this port as going concerns for such sum or sums as may be determined by a recognized firm of assessors, appointed by joint nomination. My company would not be exacting while you were in the preliminary stages—for part of the purchase money we would allow you ample time in which to turn round, and myself and my representatives would readily convey to you all the information at our command and such suggestions as might prove of service.

The offer was made in all seriousness and to representatives of the unions specially convened to hear it, and it need hardly be said that it was rejected almost without consideration. The labor union without a grievance and without the prospective luxury of a strike would be like a fish out of water.

But Sir Christopher went even further. If the unions were unprepared thus to divert their energies from destructive to constructive channels, he offered an alternative proposal, as follows:

I invite you to become limited co-partners in these shipbuilding yards. The initial condition is that the employee partners should prove their good faith by becoming holders of special shares, to be called employee's shares, in the capital of the shipbuilding company owning the Middleton shipbuilding yard at Hartlepool and the harbor dock-yard at West Hartlepool, under my chairmanship, paying for such shares by agreeing to a deduction of 5 per cent from their earnings until the total amount of their shares is covered. For the 5 per cent deduction so invested in the special shares I have named, you would receive—whether the company divided any surplus profit or not—1 per cent per annum as fixed interest. Such an arrangement would not interfere in the slightest degree with a workman's freedom of action, while a workman leaving the service of the company would be able to sell his shares to one or more of his fellow-employees at an assessed, or it may be, an arbitrated value, based on the market price of the day.

This second proposition is still under discussion, but if it should fail it is very certain that the company will adhere to its resolution, disperse its plant, and withdraw from a struggle that has become hopeless.

The historic mystery as to the communication that actually passed between the Governor of North Carolina and the Governor of South Carolina bids fair for a moment to be surpassed in public interest by the speech delivered to the House of Commons by that dauntless woman, Mrs. Travers Symons. This is presumably the first occasion when that august assembly has been withered under the spell of female oratory, and for a time the excitement was so great that the actual terms of the speech were in danger of being lost. But Mrs. Symons has come to the rescue of the reporter, as greater speakers than she have done. She tells us precisely what she said during the all too brief opportunity afforded her by a male tyranny momentarily masquerading as a policeman. She said: "Leave off talking about the children; attend to the bearers of the children." And now she complains that she herself was attended to with a promptness and dispatch that left no chance for further eloquence.

We are almost sorry that Mrs. Symons has thus immortalized her utterance. Addressed as it was to some six hundred gentlemen, many of them unmarried, it seems a little indelicate. If this is the kind of speech that the suffragette intends to make when she secures legitimate admission to Parliament, the morals of that chaste assembly will need some legislative guardianship. Male virtue will have to be protected against such clamorous demands for attention on the part of lady members, and we can hardly expect the wives of legislators to sit quietly at home, as has been their wont, while their lords are thus importunately assailed upon the very floor of the House.

But, seriously, the incident is disappointing. The suffragettes had announced that they would make a descent upon Parliament, and 50,000 people were there to see that they did it, while 5000 policemen were there to see that they did not do it. Now the suffragettes complain that Parliament, composed wholly of hase men, spend their time in deliberating male affairs, and are wholly oblivious of those more tender and more sacred subjects to which women would give a sorely needed attention. Now, at the very moment when Mrs. Symonds made her triumphal entry, the House of Commons was engaged with a bill to prevent children from smoking cigarettes. From the suffragette point of view, the House was immersed in the very odor of sanctity. It was intent upon the peculiarly feminine panacea for all human ills, that is to say, it was passing a law to forbid some one from doing something. But its piety availed it not at all. It had fallen short by a jot or a tittle and it was therefore guilty of the whole. It should have been talking about women. Instead of discussing children, it should have gone to the fountain head and discussed women, for if there were no women how could there be any children?

Readers of "The Golden Butterfly" will remember how the American millionaire, Gilead P. Beck, routed the English suffragette. That aggressive lady demanded that women should be accorded the rights that alone would enable her to evolve. "Why," she asked, "have women never produced a Shakespeare, a Milton, or a Homer." And then Mr. Beck immortalized himself by the grave and crushing reply: "They have, madame. They have produced all our greatest men."

Hans Knudsen, a Danish electrical engineer, at the Hotel Cecil in London recently gave proof of his power to make a typewriter work by means of wireless telegraphy from an office situated any distance away from it. Not only can a typewriter be operated, but a linotype composing machine; and although the machines demonstrated with are in a more or less experimental stage, they work with sufficient accuracy to justify the vista of almost magic writing opened up by the Danish inventor's claims. The office clerk of the future will perhaps have his typewriter under a glass case, and from time to time the tap-tap of the machine will be heard, actuated by invisible means and producing typewritten letters dictated by another office hundreds of miles away.

Not only did lottery selling furnish the means for early road-building, but for church building as well, and for the establishment of schools and endowment of colleges; indeed, even State debts were paid in that manner. In the little State of Rhode Island alone, in the year 1826, the sale of lottery tickets exceeded the sum of one million six hundred thousand dollars.

FEMINISM IN POLITICS.

Assaults upon the exclusive right to what man is believed to consider his highest privilege—the right to vote—continue all along the line. In England the assaults are not confined to words, though demands, assertions, and arguments are increasingly plentiful. The suffragettes are determined in their cause and have won many partisans from the ranks of their oppressors. One of these, W. M. Lightbody, in a recent issue of the Westminster Review, writes entertainingly if not convincingly upon the woman's suffrage idea. Some of his periods seem rather in detraction of men than the glorification of women, but they are not without foundation, and to be considered with tolerance at least in the light of recent events in this country. Education, in man, and naturally in women, it is observed, does not fit its possessor for civic duties:

At the outset we are impressed with the difficulty of assigning any great force to education. Today, we have a large number of intelligent young men educated at Oxford who see in tariff reform the only salvation for their country, and almost as large a number of intelligent young men educated at Oxford who believe tariff reform to be a quick and infallible road to destruction. Education enables men to expound and defend their views with greater cogency, but appears to have little effect in determining what those principles are; and it is interesting to note that during the political struggles of the nineteenth century in England the educated classes were generally to be found on the wrong side, not, certainly, because they were educated, but because they belonged to the comfortable classes who found the existing state of affairs quite tolerable. In this case education wholly failed to overcome the influence of individual or class interests. Some day, perhaps, a historian will undertake to write a political history of Oxford and Cambridge, and show the very ignoble part played in our history by these centres of learning.

Having proved, by an elaboration of this view, that the power to reason is of no ethical value in politics, the writer does not shrink from the conclusion that is unavoidable:

If, then, feminism means the introduction into politics of wholly new forces, that would substitute feeling for conviction, enthusiasm for argument, we need not dread any revolution; no other state of affairs has ever existed. We may make a show of logic, entrench ourselves deep in statistics and jurisprudence, like Mr. Gradgrind, we may don the bard and glittering panoply of "facts," but reason plays a small part in shaping our conduct, either as individuals or as members of a State. To vary the metaphor, we are but flabby molluscs of sentiment, shaped and painted to look like brittle crustaceans wrapped in the shell of reason.

The revolution will not be directly in political methods, but in women themselves. The widening of their mental horizon, the sense of civic responsibility, can not but raise the moral level of women; and this change again must in time be reflected in the general tone of civic life. We do not realize the influence that the degradation of women exerts on the moral progress of a nation. It is from women that we acquire our first conceptions of life, of its aims, its meaning, and they can not reach what they have never learned. From ignorant and narrow-minded mothers we must not look for children imbued with wide sympathies or high notions of what they owe to the state. The family should be the seminary of the social affections, of duty, and the spirit of sacrifice; too often it serves but to generate egoism, or that domestic narrowness that is distinctly anti-social. From the lower type of mother the son learns to value comfort, to check his generous impulses; he learns that the most important thing in life is "to get on," that material prosperity is the first condition of well-being. For women, though prone to superstition and pietism, are at the same time strongly materialistic in practice.

And, again, to complete his circle, Mr. Lightbody seems to desire suffrage for woman as an educating, uplifting influence. The topic has its difficulties, even for the serious and profound contributors to the reviews.

The mulberry, "wisest of trees," as Pliny termed it, really "likes London," and fruits profusely even in the grounds of the Charterhouse, at murky Smithfield. London mulberry trees are mainly derived from a fad of James I, who wanted to found a silk-growing industry. With the proverbial folly of a pedant, the British Solomon introduced the black mulberry, disliked by silkworms, instead of the white variety, which forms their food. The black mulberry had been planted by Cardinal Pole at Lambeth in 1555, and there were still older specimens in the garden of Syon House. According to a pretty Greek legend, all mulberries were originally white; but a mulberry-tree was growing beside "Ninny's tomb" when Pyramus and Thisbe died there, and the blood of the lovers turned the fruit to its present color.

There are five rare metals in the so-called platinum group—rhodium, osmium, palladium, iridium, and ruthenium. Rhodium resists the action of chemicals remarkably, acids that dissolve gold and platinum having no effect upon it. It is used for crucibles. Osmium is the heaviest of the metals, one-sixth heavier than gold. Iridium is one of the hardest of metals and is extensively used in the making of points for gold pens. All these rare and costly metals are obtained merely as by-products in the refining of platinum, and the world-supply is controlled by one firm in London.

The ancient Greeks already recommended the use of sterilized water. Rufus of Ephesus in the first century of this era taught that "all water from rivers and ponds is bad, except that from the Nile. Water from rivers which flow through unhealthy soil, stagnant water, and that which flows near public bathing places is harmful. The best water is that which has been boiled in baked earthenware vessels, cooled and then heated a second time before drinking."

In the mountain regions of Cuba there are many ridges and valleys of extremely fertile land, nearly all untouched, and existing practically as they did before the time of the Spaniards.

MME. CHAMINADE AT THE PIANO.

First Appearance in America of the Famous French Composer, Who Happens to Be a Woman.

French music and French composers are well set in the foreground at present. It is not so long since we had the venerable Saint-Saëns, directing his own work. Charpentier's "Louise" and Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande" are still fresh in memory, with prospects of renewed acquaintance, in the opera season at hand. Last and not least in interest is the visit of Mme. Cécile Chaminade, the woman of all others living who is known as a great composer. Two or three times in the ten years past it has been announced that the famous Frenchwoman was about to make the acquaintance of some of her many admirers in this country, but something has always occurred to disturb her plans until the present time. Mme. Chaminade is here, and last Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall she was introduced to an audience that filled the big concert-room completely. To say that her piano playing is wonderful or that her artistic interpretation achieved a triumph would be more than extravagant, yet her reception was notable for its spontaneous quality and its warmth, and the applause that succeeded her every effort was enthusiastic and prolonged.

There was nothing in the programme but Chaminade compositions—piano solos and songs for mezzo-soprano and baritone—and this, of itself, induced an effect of unvarying charm. It was a feast of confectionery, a draught of lemonade in which the sugar was more noticeable than the citric acid. But the young ladies who dote on Ethelbert Nevin's piano songs, and have discovered a similarity in some of the best-known of the Chaminade works, were simply carried away on a flood of sentimental appreciation. Incipient and mildly ambitious concert singers were no less charmed with the offerings, quite suited to their understanding, and they eagerly embraced the opportunity to manifest their joy. Should each of the fourteen concerts to follow be marked by such fervor of approval, Mme. Chaminade will return to France well established in the belief that her music is commandingly in vogue here and that she is herself especially beloved in America. And there is little doubt that all this will come to pass, and much to our credit. We are as wealthy in approbation as in commercial tokens, and probably as discriminating in the outlay of one as of the other. We are not all musical critics, fortunately, and we know what we like. It is related that one interested young person recently asked, with serious solicitude, to be told the exact difference between a Chaminade and a serenade. Which illustrates the sad difficulty with some personal names when the attempt is made to attach them to achievements. We can say, a Titian, or a Millet, but there are probabilities of misapprehension when we speak of a Bach, or even of a De Koven.

In appearance Mme. Chaminade is what one might expect. She is slight and not tall, with a softly rounded face, big, expressive brown eyes, and curling dark hair, worn short and parted at the side. At the piano she gives one the impression of poetic, picturesque art, with no suggestion of force or even restrained power. Her music is always delicate and charming, fanciful without broad effects, yet thorough in technic and finish. There is no reason to question her claim to first place among woman composers. The list is not a long one. But Mme. Chaminade does not even pretend to be a great performer. Undoubtedly there are many who could bring out more vividly the color that is in all her compositions. Of her selections, the "Pastorale" and the "Valse Romantique" seemed particularly suited to her easy, graceful manner.

Two English singers assisted Mme. Chaminade. They were Edward Groom, who has a pleasing baritone organ, not distinctive, and Mlle. de St. Andre, a mezzo-soprano of capability, expression, and good taste, and, in addition, of rare personal beauty. The songs were well chosen, regarding the composer's popularity here, and were given in a manner which, if not eminently notable, went far toward justifying the applause of the audience. Mme. Chaminade played the accompaniments, and in this was remarkably effective.

It seems a little odd that the composer herself should have been satisfied with the specimen productions. She has written orchestral suites and symphonic poems which display a comprehensive grasp of her art, and her partisans are not inclined to accept gratefully the somewhat condescending notices that most of the critics have given her concert. They are eager to invite comparison of Mme. Chaminade's published compositions with those of Augusta Holmes, Liza Lehmann, and Mrs. Beach, who have certainly done well in the slighter forms of music. But it is as well, perhaps, as it is. Our fair visitor may have builded better than she knows. Her songs, "L'Anneau d'Argent" and "Mon Cœur Chante," are likely to continue the especial favorites of the greater part of her audiences here, and to serve to place their maker permanently among the immortals. It is certainly an accomplishment that has not been equaled, for a woman to write music of international interest and accepted value, and to find her welcome and appreciation in another land due less to the fact of her femininity than to the superior merit of her compositions.

Fifteen appearances are scheduled for the American tour of the composer. She will be heard in the Eastern cities and in the Middle West, but will not go farther toward the setting sun than St. Louis this time. When at home, Mme. Chaminade studies and writes in her retreat at Vesinet, near Paris, or in her house at Tamaris, near Toulon. That she is forty-seven years old and a widow, is to be discovered easily from the reference books. Her husband was M. Carbonnel, a music publisher in Marseilles, who died two years ago. Since his death the composer has chosen to use her family name in place of the more imposing Mme. Cécile Louise Stéphanie Chaminade-Carbonnel to which she is entitled. Her visit here will no doubt increase wonderfully the number of her admirers and the sale of her compositions.

The Guerdon.

Soothed by the fountain's drowsy murmuring—
Or was it by the west wind's indolent wing?—
The grim court-poet fell asleep one day
In the lord's chamber, when chance brought that way
The Princess Margaret with a merry train
Of damozels and ladies—flippant, vain
Court-butterflies—midst whom fair Margaret Swayed like a rathe and slender lily set
In rustling leaves, for all her drapery
Was green and gold, and lovely as could he.
Midway in hall the fountain rose and fell,
Filling a listless Naiad's outstretched shell,
And weaving rainbows in the shifting light.
Was pictured Pan asleep beside his reed.
In this place all things seemed asleep, indeed—
The hook-billed parrot on his pendant ring,
Sitting high-shouldered, half forgot to swing;
The wind scarce stirred the hangings at the door,
And from the silken arras evermore
Yawned drowsy dwarfs with satyr's face and hoof.
A forest of gold pillars propped the roof,
And, like one slim gold pillar overthrown,
The sunlight through a great stained window shone
And lay across the body of Alain.
You would have thought, perchance, the man was slain;
As if the checkered column in its fall
Had caught and crushed him, he lay dead to all.
The parrot's gray head eye as good as said,
Unclosing viciously, "The clown is dead."
A dragon-fly in narrowing circles neared,
And lit, secure, upon the dead man's head,
Then spread its iris vans in quick dismay,
And into the blue summer sped away!
Little was his of outward grace to win
The eyes of maids, but white the soul within.
Misshaped, and hideous to look upon
Was this man, dreaming in the noontide sun.
With sunken eyes and winter-whitened hair,
And sallow cheeks deep seamed with thought and care,
And so the laughing ladies of the court,
Coming upon him suddenly, stopped short,
And shrunk together with a nameless dread;
Some, hut fear held them, would have turned and fled,
Seeing the uncouth figure lying there.
But Princess Margaret, with her heavy hair
From out its diamond fillet rippling down,
Slipped from the group, and plucking back her gown
With white left hand, stole softly to his side—
The fair court gossip tittering, curious-eyed,
Half mockingly, "A little while she stood,
Finger on lip; then, with the agile blood
Climbing her cheek, and silken lashes wet—
She scarce knew what vague pity or regret
Wet them—she stooped, and for a moment's space
Her golden tresses touched the sleeper's face.
Then she stood straight, as lily on its stem;
But hearing her ladies titter, turned on them
Her great queen's eyes, grown black with scornful frown—
Great eyes that looked the shallow women down.
"Nay, not for love"—one rosy palm she laid Softly against her bosom—"as I'm a maid!
Full well I know what cruel things you say
Of this and that, but hold your peace today.
I pray you think no evil thing of this.
Nay, not for love's sake did I give the kiss,
Not for his beauty who's not fair nor young,
But for the songs which those mute lips have sung!"
That was a right brave princess; one, I hold,
Worthy to wear a crown of beaten gold.—T. B. Aldrich.

Joachimstahl, near Carlsbad, where radium baths are to be established next year, is already historic as the birthplace of the original dollar. An authority in the London Chronicle says this was the silver gulden-groschen, coined in 1519 by order of Count Schlick from the metal of a recently opened mine, and it became known as the Joachimstahler, or "thaler" alone for short. Before 1600 the nimble English language had already made "dollar" of this. Thereafter this name was loosely used of all manner of coins varying in value from three to five shillings, and belonging to all manner of countries, from Sweden to Japan. It was from the prevalence of the Spanish "dollar" in the British American colonies at the time of their revolt that the modern almighty dollar was derived, while in England very modern slang has given the name to the crown piece.

Jasper W. Thompson has at his home in Danville, Indiana, what he says is the only cultivated pawpaw orchard in the United States. The trees were planted by Judge John V. Hadley, now on the State supreme bench, fifteen years ago, when he lived in the house occupied by Mr. Thompson. The judge was a great lover of the fruit and conceived the idea of raising his own pawpaws or Indiana bananas, instead of scouring the woods for them. He planted seeds from choice fruit and kept the little trees protected from the sun for three years by putting barrels over them. They have now been bearing for several years, and not only is the product of an exceptional size, but the quality is finer than that which grows wild in the woods.

Rudyard Kipling recently attracted attention by eulogizing the medical profession in an address. He said that physicians made up a "permanently mobilized army, which always is in action, always is under fire against death."

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Victorien Sardou last summer caught a severe cold and it is this which has developed into bronchitis that now threatens his life. Sardou is at his country seat near Marly, and has been constantly under the care of the physicians, who had hoped to be able to have him taken to Biarritz shortly.

David Jayne Hill, American ambassador to Germany, is receiving special social courtesies from Emperor William, Prince Henry, and others of court circles, apart from his diplomatic relations. At the wedding of Prince August William and Princess Alexandra and at the opera Dr. Hill was given signal attention.

Professor Schiaparelli, the head of the Italian expedition in Egypt, is making headway in his investigations of the necropolis of Azini. Some two hundred Egyptians are at work and a great number of funeral objects are being constantly brought to light, besides many inscriptions which are of great interest in connection with the early Egyptian history. In each burying place the explorers have found an effigy of the defunct carved in wood.

Charlemagne Tower, who was succeeded by Dr. David Jayne Hill as ambassador to Germany, has arrived from Europe with his wife and two daughters, Helen and Gertrude, declaring that he had had his share of diplomatic service and that he intended to go back to Philadelphia and enter actively into a business that he has been nominally connected with during the last eleven years. All the talk about it being necessary to be a multimillionaire and a lavish entertainer to be welcomed in the diplomatic circles of Berlin, Mr. Tower said, was nonsense.

Lady Wilfrid Laurier, wife of the premier of Canada, reported in a recent speech to club women that quite a number of women had recently gained recognition in the higher institutions of learning in Canada. Among the women lecturers who were giving special satisfaction by their college work she mentioned one woman lecturer of McGill University and several in the Royal Victoria College for Women. Also, she said that Canada had social reason to be proud of her women farmers. During the last year more than 15,000 women made a success as farmers in the Dominion.

Wilbur Wright, the American flying-machine inventor who has been successful in France, has received a check for $50,000, which represents the first installment of the award promised in his contract with M. Weiller. When M. Weiller informed him that he was entitled to the $100,000, Mr. Wright simply said "Thanks," and started to whistle, as usual. Mr. Wright's laconic habits have become famous at Le Mans. It is quite possible that within the near future Mr. Wright will receive the cross of the Legion of Honor. A Paris paper, in proposing the matter, says that the government, by conferring this distinction on Mr. Wright, will meet with the approval of the entire country.

Princess Rostopschine, one of the best-known women of European aristocracy, is coming to America to deliver a series of lectures on historical subjects in which members of her own family have been more or less directly connected. One of the lectures will be on the burning of Moscow, which was executed under the commands of Governor Rostopschine, of whom the princess is a direct descendant. The interest of her lectures and of her personality is, however, not entirely due to her historical research, for Princess Rostopschine is familiar with the present court of Russia and also with the other courts of Europe. Her sister is the Countess Hornielli, whose husband was, until his recent death, Italian ambassador in Paris.

M. Gaston Thomson, the French minister of marine, has resigned as a result of a vote in the Chamber of Deputies deploring the negligence in his department as indicated by the Iena disaster. M. Thomson was appointed minister of marine January 23, 1905. During the past two years there have been a large number of serious accidents to French warships, the most terrible of which was the blowing up of the battleship Iena on March 12, 1907, at Toulon, more than a hundred officers and men being killed. Since the beginning of 1907 the disasters and accidents number at least thirty. Recent dispatches from Paris indicate a strong feeling, as expressed in the French newspapers, that something drastic must be done to put an end to these accidents, which since April, 1906, have cost the lives of 130 men through explosions alone.

Gutzon Borglum, the sculptor, is not enthusiastic about American art. Though born in Idaho, he has been called a worshiper of foreign art idols. Perhaps it was a misfortune for him to have a thorough cosmopolitan artistic training. He has dealt specifically with American types of character and incident in his arts, sculpture and painting. But he has presumed to see through the hole in the millstone of art in America. He is more concerned over the conditions of art in America than in the production of American art. He finds us lacking in "reverence, sincerity, and individuality"; too much devoted to the machine-made in sculpture and architecture, too much given to slavish imitation of European models. In calling Saint Gaudens a man without imagination and then praising in another section the "Farragut," it may be said, however, that Mr. Borglum is not exactly logical.

THE SHORT WORD.

By Jerome A. Hart.

XXXVIII.

Lest the officers of the law might interfere, no time was lost by the seconds in arranging the details of the duel. Colquhoun and DeKay represented Tower, while Holton and McCarren acted for Burke. The four envoys met in a private room of the Oriental to discuss the preliminaries.

"Now, gentlemen," began Holton briskly, "I presume that any attempt to call off this meeting would be merely a waste of time."

"I am regretfully forced to say, general," replied Colquhoun suavely, "that you are right."

"None the less, it is our duty to make the attempt," said McCarren.

"Very true, and our principal left the way open to an adjustment, but the door has been shut by Senator Burke's side even more closely than it was before," remarked DeKay. "Are we to understand that you consider all attempts at a settlement absolutely without hope of success?"

"Absolutely so, colonel," replied Holton. "My principal has nothing to withdraw, and has so stated."

"Then, gentlemen," said McCarren with a resigned air, "we may as well assume that everything done is in accordance with courtesy, with a due regard for the best sentiment of the community, and according to the code of honor."

There was a perceptible sense of relief apparent about all four of the seconds as they dismissed this annoying ethical question of whether two men should pistol one another for a word. Remained to settle, how they should pistol one another. Drawing up to the table, the seconds commenced the discussion of this more practical matter.

"Now, gentlemen," began Holton, "as Senator Burke is the challenged party and therefore entitled to choice of weapons, place, and time, I shall read you a memorandum covering those matters, trusting that it may accord with your views. If not, we shall discuss it—without prejudice, however, to my principal's rights. Paragraph One reads thus:

"Principals to be attended by two seconds and a surgeon each. A person to load the weapons is permitted to attend each principal. The drivers of vehicles not excluded. If other parties intrude upon the meeting, time and place may be changed at the instance of either party."

Holton paused a moment, then said: "How say you, gentlemen? Is the first article acceptable?"

"I see no objection," responded Colquhoun. "Of course the provision concerning the attendance of a person to load the weapons permits them to be loaded by the seconds if they desire?"

"Naturally," replied Holton. "The matter is purely optional. It has of late been customary at hostile meeting in this State to have a professional armorer in attendance, but the seconds may use their own discretion. We will therefore consider that Paragraph One is agreeable to both parties. I will read Paragraph Two:

"The meeting to take place on the Laguna Merced farm. About a mile from the Lake Haus, turning to the left, the road leads to a farm-house on the upper end of the lake, occupied by William Biggins, a dairy farmer. The precise spot to be determined on the morning of the meeting."

Again Holton paused. "Is this paragraph agreeable to you, gentlemen?" he asked.

"Quite so," replied Colquhoun, and DeKay also signified his assent.

"The third paragraph," continued Holton, "reads simply, 'weapons, dueling pistols.' I presume that this is not open to discussion, as it has been understood that rifles should not be used."

"Although we will not discuss the question," observed Colquhoun, "it is notorious that your principal, Senator Burke, is an expert with the pistol, is noted for accuracy and quickness, is a practiced duelist, and a dead shot. Now, our man never had a dueling pistol in his hand; Judge Tower never fought but one duel, and that with a rifle. However, we are quite well aware that your principal will not consent to meet ours with the rifle, and you are also probably aware that our principal will meet yours with the pistol rather than not at all. Therefore, discussion is useless, and we will pass Paragraph Three."

There had been some slight bristling as Colquhoun began, but as he closed, all present nodded their heads without further comment, and Holton went on:

"The fourth paragraph reads as follows:

"Distance, ten paces; parties facing each other; pistols to be held with the muzzles vertically downward."

"Is there any objection to this paragraph, gentlemen?" he asked.

"None," replied DeKay.

"Ten paces is not a very long pistol-shot," commented Colquhoun grimly, "but as our principal once offered to fight at five, we have no objection."

"With your permission, gentlemen," resumed Holton, "I will read the next four paragraphs rapidly—as they are all according to the usual routine—pausing after each one. I scarcely imagine there will be much discussion concerning them:

"Paragraph Five: The weapons to be loaded an the ground by or in the presence of the seconds of each party.

"Paragraph Six: Choice of position and the giving of the word to be determined by the throwing of a coin as usual.

"Paragraph Seven: Choice of the two weapons to be determined by chance as in number six.

"Paragraph Eight: Choice of the respective weapons of parties to be determined on the ground by throwing up a coin as usual; that is, each party to bring their own dueling pistols and the choice to be determined by chance as in number seven.

"Paragraph Nine: Time, Monday at half-past five o'clock a. m."

"Is there any objection to these five articles?" asked McCarren, as Holton stopped for breath.

After a moment's whispered conference with DeKay, his colleague, Colquhoun, replied, "We have no objection."

As Holton prepared to read the next paragraph he exchanged glances with McCarren. It was evident from their demeanor that they expected some objection. He began:

"The final article of the memorandum, gentlemen, concerns the giving of the word. I will read:

"Paragraph Ten: The word to be given as follows, to-wit: Inquiry shall first be made of the principals, 'GENTLEMEN, ARE YOU READY?' Upon each gentleman replying 'READY,' the word 'FIRE' shall be given, to be followed by the words 'ONE—TWO.' Neither party to be permitted to raise his pistol before the word 'FIRE,' nor to discharge it after the word 'TWO.' The interval between the words 'FIRE—ONE—TWO' shall be set forth orally by a second of the party calling the word as nearly as may be."

McCarren was watchfully regarding Tower's seconds as they closely followed Holton's words. "What say you, gentlemen," he asked, when Holton paused, "is Paragraph Ten agreeable to you?"

"Without consulting my colleague," Colquhoun quickly exclaimed, "it is my opinion that the word as set forth in Paragraph Ten is unusual and unwarrantable, and I do not approve of it."

"And I, also on my own initiative," added DeKay, "am impelled to state that to give the word in this extraordinary manner, stopping short of the usual 'Three' is not only unusual and unwarrantable, but that it is unfair."

"In what way can it be considered unfair?" asked McCarren. "It is the same for both."

"For this reason," retorted DeKay. "It is notorious that Senator Burke is one of the most expert pistol-shots in this State, if not the most expert. He is renowned for the quickness with which he can fire, either from the shoulder, or from the hip, or wheeling. Our principal, on the contrary, is utterly unused to the dueling pistol. Therefore he is entitled to fully as much time for firing at the word as is required by duelists familiar with the dueling pistol."

"I fully agree with my colleague, Colonel DeKay," concurred Colquhoun. "And I wish to supplement what he has said by declaring that if this extraordinary and unusual form of the word is insisted on, I shall consider it my duty as a loyal friend, and as one not unused to the requirements of the code, to urge my principal to refuse a meeting on such terms."

Holton conferred briefly for a few moments with McCarren. At last the latter said: "We are of the opinion, gentlemen, that there is nothing unwarrantable in the fixing of the word as we have indicated it. We fail utterly to see how it gives the advantage to either principal."

"Do I understand that you insist upon this condition?" queried Colquhoun.

Again Holton and McCarren conferred in whispers. At the close of their consultation Holton spoke:

"Before replying," said he, "we would prefer that you put your question in full, and covering exactly the points to which you object or to which you desire an answer."

A conference followed between DeKay and Colquhoun, who made some notes. Looking at his memorandum, Colquhoun read:

"We object to Paragraph Ten because the word 'Three' is not to be called as the word after which neither is to fire. We therefore demand to know whether that condition is essential to this meeting, and request a categorical answer in writing."

This, as before, was followed by a conference between Holton and McCarren. When it was ended Holton, also looking at his notes, spoke:

"After consultation with my colleague, this is our reply: As seconds of Senator Burke, we have asked nothing to which our principal is not entitled. As the terms in Paragraph Ten do not subject his adversary to any disadvantage, the request for a categorical answer in writing is deemed improper."

"I may add," remarked McCarren, "that it is now quite open to the seconds of Judge Tower to accept or decline the terms proposed."

There was an air of subdued triumph about Burke's seconds, as their opponents withdrew to the opposite end of the room and engaged in earnest discussion. And there was, correspondingly, a certain air of discomfiture on the faces of DeKay and Colquhoun.

"I'm afraid, colonel," said the latter, in a subdued tone, "that they have caught us napping."

"Yes," assented DeKay, "we've either got to accept the short word or decline the meeting."

"And Tower would never stand that."

"No," admitted DeKay.

"Well, we might as well take our medicine," said Colquhoun ruefully. And the two defeated diplomats rejoined their adversaries.

"Gentlemen," began Colquhoun, "my colleague and myself object most vigorously to the paragraph numbered ten. But we are so sure that our principal is bent on this meeting that it is useless for us to attempt to set it aside. Rather than fail in meeting your principal, he will accept the terms."

"Yes," concurred DeKay. "Besides, we four have agreed upon every paragraph except this one, and we are convinced you will not recede from your standpoint regarding it. As we are certain our principal will accept it rather than be disappointed in this meeting, we are obliged to accept it, but only under protest."

"And we must have our protest on the record," interrupted Colquhoun. "We must exact that copies in writing of these conditions be exchanged with us. Thus we shall hope to stand absolved in the eyes of the community of any neglect of our principal's rights."

It was agreed that the written transcript should be exchanged, and the four envoys parted, not to meet again until they placed their principals in position with their pistols at ten paces apart.

The Song of the Miner.

Thus the drill to the breast of ore
In the depths of the fissure vein:

"Tho' I pierce to your bosom's core (tap-tap) Tho' my four sharp teeth bite deep,
Life and action I bring—I end your age-long sleep.
The world and its cities I sing, the stars and the wide seas sweep."

Thus the ore to the Burleigh drill
In the tunnels under the hill:

"E'er the cities you sing had birth,
I rushed from the depths of the earth;
While the hot lands heaved in twain, from the nether fires I poured,
I rolled in white-hot pain, but I guarded my golden hoard."

Thus the giant before the blast,
While the sputtering fuse burned fast:

"The strength of the weak am I,
(Brrroom!) with a terrible voice I cry;
I rend, I crush, and I rive. From your rock-walled vein go forth!
At man's command I strive. To the mill to prove your worth!"

Thus the mill to the broken ore,
As it drops from the crowded bins:

"Now yield of thy golden store
To the uttermost shining grain.
Hear my batteries roar! They must not grind in vain—
Over and over and o'er they sing their Song of Gain!"

Thus the man to the golden spoil,
The fruit of his thought and toil;

"Alone of all earth's gold
This yellow bar I hold
Is free from the stain of guilt—for you no lies were told,
For you no blood was spilt, for you come to me, clean, from the mold."

Samuel Armistead, a negro and former slave, who was secretary of state of Louisiana for sixty days with a white man, John Wharton, as his assistant, is dead at Shreveport, Louisiana, at the age of 104 years. He was born in West Virginia, in slavery, and was the property of Dr. William Ball. He went to Louisiana with his master in 1858. In 1872, when reconstruction was making slow headway in Louisiana and there were fifteen parties and factions in the field, Armistead was nominated secretary of state to represent the negro Democrats and the liberal Republican negro element. John McEnery of Ouachita Parish led the ticket as the candidate for governor. After exciting incidents, the fusion ticket was fairly elected by a large majority, but the opposition administration refused to surrender the reins of government and both parties were in office two months. The McEnery government was finally counted out by the "midnight order" of the famous Durell. Of late years Armistead won a reputation as the "marrying parson," having united 600 negro couples in the bonds of wedlock.

The Hedjaz Railway, among other things, will contain a carriage fitted up as a mosque, where pilgrims will be able to perform their devotions during the journey to the sacred cities. Externally the praying carriage is only distinguishable from the other carriages by a minaret six feet high. The interior is luxuriously fitted. The floor is covered with the richest of Persian carpets, while around the sides are verses from the Koran appropriate to the pilgrimage and in letters of gold. A chart indicates the direction of Mecca at one end, and at the other are placed four vessels for holding water for the ritual ablutions. Most of the carriages are of foreign make, but the "wagon mosque" was built in Constantinople.

Arthur Jermy Mountney Jephson, the last survivor of the leaders in the Emin Pasha relief expedition under Henry M. Stanley in 1887-90, died in London October 22. Jephson, who was a lieutenant in the Royal Irish Rifles, came back from the relief expedition with credit to himself, but some of the officers were charged with great cruelty. His health was broken down by African fever and he came to California to recuperate. In 1895 he was appointed a queen's messenger, and retained the position under King Edward.

AN EASY-GOING CHRONICLE.

E. V. Lucas Writes a Distinctive Novel With a Literary Man as Hero.

In no mere conventional sense it may be said that the author has written an exquisite book, a novel that deserves to be read and to be applauded by the culture of the English-speaking world. "Over Bemerton's" is a noteworthy book because it is a chapter from the life of an intellectual man into whose character love comes not as the foundation, but as the capping-stone. We are not merely told that Mr. Kent Falconer is a man of culture, as is the way with the modern writer, who feels that the mental graces ought not to be entirely excluded from fiction, but who dreads the dangerous waters of their depiction. We are allowed to live his life with him for a time, to rejoice in his literary finds, to lounge with him through London, to read over his shoulder, and to exult with him in the embarrassment of intellectual riches only to be enjoyed to the full by those acquainted with the grief of deprivation. Mr. Lucas reminds us of Oliver Wendell Holmes, and the nearest parallel to Mr. Falconer is The Autocrat.

We do not make the hero's acquaintance before he is at the point of middle age, but he is so delightfully human that we discern no incongruity when he falls in love with Naomi, who is only twenty-nine. That there is indeed no incongruity we are convinced, if we needed to be convinced, by that delightful old lady, Miss Gold, who has secretly endowed a newspaper and done many other admirable things. Miss Gold tells the self-depreciating lover that Naomi doesn't love him "because of anything." She merely loves him, and that is enough. "She doesn't care whether you are handsome or ugly, or old or young, or cruel or kind, or strong or weak, . . . or have nothing in the bank—those things are beside the mark, because she loves."

Kent Falconer has spent the first part of his life in South America. He returns to London intent upon a life of studious retirement and ready to find his highest joys in a leisure intellectually employed. With the help of Naomi, he finds rooms "Over Bemerton's," the immediate proximity of that famous second-hand book store being a powerful ally to the obvious comforts of the accommodation offered overhead by Mrs. Duckie.

And so we are gradually introduced first to the narrow circle of relatives, and then to the casual acquaintances involved in a residence over Bemerton's, but somehow Naomi is always in the background unobtrusively helpful and then indispensable. Mr. Dabney is perhaps the most striking of the acquaintances. He is the editor of The Balance, and he has views and individuality, and inasmuch as The Balance carries no advertisements and is endowed, he is able to express them.

Mr. Dabney says that in London plain living and high thinking are discredited and high living and low thinking have it all to themselves:

"But to what," I asked him, "do you attribute this effect?" "To too long a period of prosperity; to peace; and"—he almost spat the words from him—"to the modern press. The new journalism may not have produced it, but it has fostered it. Since you left England there has sprung up a totally new press—a press that does not dictate, but flatters; that finds out what the mob wants and gives it them. A press without any mind—nothing but an infernal instinct for success. A press in the hands of young men in a hurry, without knowledge, experience, or conviction. Opportunists, improvisers, cynics."

"But surely there are good papers too?" "One or two. But it is those others that have the public ear. They are the true organs of the democracy."

"And yet," I said, "at the last general election did not these popular papers lose almost every seat?"

"Ah!" he said, "that is so. But that is not, I fear, any proof of their want of influence generally. Political changes are deeper than that. The mob is moved politically never by opinions, but always by personality. We don't in England vote for Liberals or Conservatives: we vote for men. Sentiment controls us. We vote for one man because we are sorry for him; for another, because we once met him somewhere and he was very pleasant; for another, because his father's horse won the Derby; for another, because his opponent is So-and-so, whom we detest. In England we never accept any one as a simple fellow-creature: we must always fix not only an adjective upon him, but some personal feeling. That is why papers lose their influence when elections are on. But at other times they can be steadily operative for good or bad; they can vulgarize all they touch or dignify it. The new press vulgarizes. Its gods are false. It knows no shame. When found out, it slanders. When chastised, it says, How charmingly you use the whip."

Mr. Dabney believes that nothing can save the country but war. No matter should the country go under—"then we should begin again in a new spirit." It would be a dreadful form of cure, but "a nation fighting for its life makes for me a finer spectacle than a nation overeating at a banquet." Mr. Dabney is in every way a remarkable character, and we are glad to know him. As a journalist he is perhaps a little too intense, for we are told that when he was introduced to the twins he inspected them "with a most admirable how of interest, although at any moment I felt he might remark that one or the other was too long and would be better with twenty lines cut off."

Then there is Trist, the cynic and the dilettante, but of a sympathetic kindness beyond praise. Trist does nothing, he is never in a hurry, he is never late, and his cigarette case is always full. Here is Trist's philosophy of life, or at least some of it:

"The art of life," says Trist, "is the pigeon-holing of women." True enough of Englishmen, at any rate, who want women only when they want them (and then they must have); but no Frenchman would say it.

"The art of life," says Trist, "is to say the same things to everybody. To differentiate one's treatment of people may be interesting, but it leads to complications."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is to assume that no one else has any feelings."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is the use and not abuse of alcohol. A wise apéritif can make a bad dinner almost good, and a bad partner almost negligible."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is to be so well known at a good restaurant that you can pay by cheque."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is to make your tailor come to you."

"The art of life," says Trist, who hates gossip, "is never to see two unrelated people together; but if you must,—and it can't be helped very easily,—never to mention it again. Three-quarters of the ills of life proceed from the report that So-and-so has been seen with So-and-so. There is too much talk. A wise autocrat would cut out the tongue of every baby. A silent society would probably be a happy one; because it would be largely without scandal." That seemed to me, I said, too drastic, and I recommended instead the example (from my Chinese book) of Hsin Shao, of the second and third century A. D., "who is now chiefly remembered in connection with his practice of devoting the first day of every month to criticism of his neighbors and their conduct."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is never to be out of small change."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is to keep down acquaintances. One's friends one can manage, but one's acquaintances can be the devil."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is to show your hand. There is no diplomacy like candor. You may lose by it now and then, but it will be a loss well gained if you do. Nothing is so boring as having to keep up a deception."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is to live near a postoffice, but never to go there one's self."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is never to think you know what other people are feeling about you. You are sure to be wrong."

"The art of life," says Trist, "is to be thought odd. Everything will then be permitted to you. The best way to be thought odd is to return a cheque now and then on a conscientious scruple. There is no such investment."

Trist, too, is a man to be numbered henceforth among our friends.

Mrs. Duckie has a son and a daughter—also a husband. The daughter is dresser to that celebrated actress, Miss Azure Verity, and being thus connected indirectly with the stage, she prefers to be known as Miss Lestrangle. Mrs. Duckie's son also is on the stage, and has made a great hit with his new song with the following striking chorus:

Mr. Right! Mr. Right!
He may not have knocked just yet;
But cheer up, girls, he's putting on his boots,
And he'll soon be here, you bet.

Mr. Duckie is known to the music hall world as Alf Pinto, which is considered to be a felicitous cognomen, as indeed it is when we consider its resemblance to "alf pint-o." Mr. Falconer makes Mr. Pinto's acquaintance upon one occasion when that gentleman is visiting his mother and some instructive conversation ensues:

I told him that I had heard him at the Frivoli, and he seemed to be as gratified as any other kind of artist would be. "But I've got a better song than any of those," he assured me, and forthwith sang it. I suppose that to be as assured as that is half-way towards the conquest of the world; but for my part I could as easily undress in a crowded drawing-room as sing an unaccompanied song. He fixed me with his bold, roguish eye throughout three long coarse verses and three inane choruses. And without any shame, too; but indeed how could he have shame, for there was none over: I had it all. I had no notion where to look until he had done.

"That's a clinker, isn't it?" he said, and his words once more convinced me how needlessly we can suffer for others, for they proved him utterly oblivious to any confusion or want of appreciation on my part.

I temporized. "With proper costume and a full band it ought to go very well," I said; and I suppose it would, for the thing was as ugly and tawdry as the people want. Another exposure of marriage. The awakening after the raptures of courtship to the disenchantment of wedded life: the horror of crying twins and a bad-tempered wife and all the rest of it. The cruelty, the hateful ugliness, of this tireless delight in the ruin of the happiest of all human hopes!

"Why," I said, "do you always sing this kind of thing? Why is there no song about a happy marriage with some love and trust in it?"

"Where's the joke?" he asked.

"But surely," I said, "it could be made humorous or amusing enough. Surely there are families that have cheerfulness and gaiety as well as quarrels and poverty and drink. Look at your own father and mother."

"Not worth singing about," he said. "No fun in it."

Mr. Pinto sometimes receives a dozen songs a day, "none of them any good at all." Music-hall singing, it seems, is not so easy as it looks. It is not easy, but it is essential to get "movement all the time." It is not enough to have a voice, "but you've got to drive every word home too, and also keep it going."

Kent Falconer soon gets into the good graces of Mr. Bemerton, who gives him the freedom of his shop. Upon one occasion he is even allowed to take care of the establishment for a whole forenoon when both Mr. Bremerton and his niece, Miss Wagstaff, are unavoidably absent. Then he finds that the care of a bookshop is not wholly the studious occupation that he had supposed. Miss Wagstaff initiates him into his duties:

"The prices," she said, "are marked just inside. They are all net, but if any one bought several books you might knock something off. Don't ever knock anything off a cheap book."

"Be very careful," she said, "with people who look at the illustrations. Sometimes they pinch the plates."

"Whatever you do," she said, "don't buy any books."

"Keep an eye," she said, "on the outside shelves."

"Don't let any one slip one book into their pocket while they buy another," she said.

"Watch them," she said, "to see that they don't rub out our price and put in another themselves."

That, I think, was her very last counsel. I sank down in a chair in a kind of stupor. I had not been prepared for such revelations of perfidy. I had thought of a second-hand bookshop as being of the main stream of human frailty and temptation; and behold it was the resort of the most abandoned! Is there no natural honesty? I wished that Mr. Bemerton would return and liberate me to walk upstairs out of life again and get on with my make-believe.

The ordeal was safely survived, and by the time Mr. Falconer had summoned up courage enough to inform an inquirer that "we never bought last year's Whittaker's Almanack," he felt himself equal to anything.

Among Mr. Falconer's relatives, Miss Drusilla Wynne is perhaps the most interesting. Drusilla is a suffragette and many other curious things. She has pronounced ideas upon most of the subjects of the day and she expresses them with a certain lofty condescension peculiar to the young woman who is just beginning to feel her mental feet. But the path of reform is not always strewn with roses, and poor Drusilla discovers this to her cost. Mr. Falconer receives a frenzied pencil note from Naomi which says, "Do come at once. Drusilla has been arrested." And sure enough Drusilla is in durance vile with several others for obtruding their ideas with unnecessary persistence upon a reluctant prime minister. Mr. Falconer flies to the rescue and ineffectually tries to persuade Drusilla's brother to be a brother and to hurry to the police court:

I did, however, add, "Instead of ranting about your own reputation as a cricketer, you ought to be hurrying as fast as you can to the police court, to bail her out—if she will let you, which I doubt—and be rather proud to think that you have so determined and plucky a sister. I will come with you if you like."

Lionel, I regret to say, replied briefly that he would be damned if he did anything of the kind, and so I went alone, as Naomi could not leave her mother.

What nice people the police are! To the well-to-do and law-abiding they have a quiet, gentle, paternal way that soothes and reassures. They write things in books like recording angels. They hold out hope.

"Miss Drusilla Wynne? Oh, yes," said the officer in charge. "Taken into custody for creating a disturbance in Downing Street with other females. The magistrate will hear the case in about half an hour. A special sitting."

Yes, he added, I might see her; but they were all very excited, and had been singing their war-song.

A policeman led me to Drusilla's cell and told me the story on the way. It seemed that the prime minister had made an announcement unpalatable to the sisterhood, whose knife, the officer added, had been in him for some time, and certain picked heroines among them had paid him a call of protest.

"No harm in that," said A-27, "but they wouldn't go away when told, and created a disturbance, so we had to bring them to the station. Very violent they were, too, some of them; but not your young lady, I hope. Let me see, what did you say her name was?"

I told him.

"Oh, yes, Wynne," he said (and my thoughts flew instantly to poor Wragg in Arnold's preface), "Wynne. No, she was all right—went like a lamb. In point of fact, I apprehended her myself. A pretty little piece in green and terra-cotta. Seemed to me she was doing what she was told, more than what she wanted to."

Poor Drusilla—if she could have heard that! Nothing so enraging as truth.

I was allowed to talk to her in the presence of the constable, who, with his helmet off, had quite the air of a man and a brother—a far more sympathetic brother than Lionel, indeed.

"I'm very sorry," she said, "but I can't pay the fine. None of the others will, and I'm not going to desert them."

"Does that mean Holloway?" I asked the policeman.

"That's right," he said, "Holloway."

"In Black Maria?" I asked.

"That's right: Black Maria," he said.

"How long do you think it will be?" I asked.

"A week or ten days for the first offenders," he said; "a fortnight for the old parliamentary hands."

I told Drusilla about her mother; but it did not move her. "It is mother's battle we are fighting as well as our own," she replied. "Women should hang together."

"Not hang," I said: "it's not as bad as that."

A-27 laughed, and Drusilla turned on him furiously. "Why should policemen be men?" she cried. "That's another injustice. If women have to be arrested, they ought to be arrested by their own sex."

"I quite agree with you, miss," said the constable. "And so would all my mates, very heartily. Yes, and all our missuses too. It's no bean-feast taking a woman to the station, I can tell you. The police have their feelings as well as any one else, and they never feel so little like men as they do when they're apprehending a female offender. Now you, miss, as I was telling this gentleman here, came along quiet and peaceable; but do you think I was proud of having my hand on you? Not a bit of it. I could have sunk into the earth for shame. Votes for women I don't believe in, and never shall; but police-women for women I would plump for."

This perhaps is the first time that we have heard the view of a long-suffering police force and of that force's "missuses" on the arrest of suffragettes. It contains suggestions worthy of some attention.

To give an idea of all the good things in "Over Bemerton's" would be to reproduce the book, because it is all good and so full of a gentle, wise, and humorous philosophy that its perpetual place on the book shelf should be within arm's reach of the easy chair. A book so sane, so balanced, and so refreshing marks a literary epoch.

On the west coast of India is found a species of oyster, Placuna placenta, whose shell consists of a pair of roughly circular plates about six inches in diameter, thin and white. At present these oysters are collected for the pearls which they often contain, although few are fit for the use of the jeweler. But in the early days of English rule in India the shells were employed for window panes. Cut into little squares, they produced a very pretty effect, admitting light like frosted glass. When the Bombay Cathedral was built, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, its windows were paned with these oyster shells. In Goa they are still thus employed.

Next year an American exhibition is to be held in the heart of London, on the Earl's Court site, the scene of numerous successful exhibitions. Sir Alfred Bateman, Sir Percy Sanderson, and the lord mayor of London are important names on the committee, which also includes many representatives of American manufacturing firms.

Sir William Richmond, who is recognized as one of England's greatest artists, has aroused widespread comment by declaring that the cardinal defect of the English schools is failure to teach aesthetics or the elements of good taste. Sir William says: "It is the ineptitude of imagination that is at fault in every great period."

FOR YELLOW GOLD.

By Frank Bailey Millard.

When the stage "went light" they ran out the small buckboard; but when there were more than four passengers the big mud-wagon was "put on." This was a buckboard day, for there was not a single passenger. What was more to the point, as the Gold Butte Mining Company regarded it, was that under the driver's seat was a box with ten thousand dollars in the newest of new tens and twenties in it.

The driver had looked very blue when he drove his four mustangs from the postoffice—where he took on a very flat leather bag, which spoke loudly of the incapacity or disinclination of the Thimble Spring people for letter-writing—over to the railroad station, where he was to take on the box. Things were going all wrong at home. That was why his brown face looked so haggard; that was why he held so loosely to the "lines"; that was why he chewed so hard on the bit of "plug" in his mouth.

"Such hard scratchin' I never seed afore," was what he had said as he had listlessly thrown the mail-bag into the wagon; "can't git no decent job nowadays. Nothin' ter heh by prospectin'—tried that time an' agin; ef I git anything it peters out inside of a week. I might make a strike over ter Sand Gulch, but it's a derned long way off, an' me 'n' Sue an' the kids hez moved so often 'at we can't raise nothin' ter move on now. Why in Sam Hill did Sue hev ter git that rheumatiz jes now, when we's so hard up, an' afore she weaned the baby? It's a darned shame. Why can't Bill git somethin' ter do?—great, big, lunk-headed cuss. Ef I hed a brother, poorer'n a crow, d'ye think I'd go an' live on him, till thar warn't nuthin' ter eat in the house? Sho, Zach Springer, you're a blamed fool. Bill hain't done that. He ain't ter blame fer gettin' his leg broke that time. Bill's all right, but he's onlucky. Been tryin' fur a month ter git a job, an' can't git in nowhere. He's willin' ter work. He'd stan' crotch-deep in the creek all day long washin' out tainin's, ef he could make his salt at it. Tried it fer six weeks, an' didn't git enough to buy a pair o' gum-boots. Whoa, Buckskin! Damn that one-eyed crow-hait! he'd jam right inter the station platform ef yer didn't saw his teeth out."

And then the box was taken on, and the express agent had something to say. That "something" was not to Zach Springer's liking. He chewed harder than ever on the bit of plug, and saved the hard mouths of the mustangs by an unnecessary yanking of the reins. It was a positive relief to be able at last to whack his lash down upon the sides of the nervous brutes and turn them loose for the forty-mile run to Gold Butte. Why had he needed a lecture from a hiring of the express company, and why should that smooth-jowled agent have looked at him with such dark suspicion?

"They think 'cos I got stood up down ter Black Rocks las' time I had a big load o' gold that I need to be preached to every time I go out now with a full box. Darned stoop-shouldered, desk-settin' hounds! I'd like ter see one on 'em handlin' the ribbons when thar's a Winchester lookin' at 'em with an eye as big as a bar'l-head. Can't tell me they wouldn't give in! The sweet-scented, calfskin booted young ladies! Thar aint a man among 'em."

Zach Springer's indignation was now in more complete possession of him than had been his feeling of blueness a little earlier. What he had delivered himself of just now was not what he would have said had he voiced his true sentiments with reference to the express agent's lecture. In between the words ran the thought, that "they" had suspected him of having a hand in the Black Rocks robbery. It had come to him before in what he called a "left-handed" way, and he had had other outbursts of righteous indignation, but none in which the upheaval was so great as that of the present. Had that been the reason the stage company had cut down his pay to "sixty" a month? The chances were that it was. It was too blamed mean for a lot of swine, like these people, to come it so high-handedly over a poor man who only wanted his own. Wouldn't it serve them just right, if—

The white dust of the desert rolled up from the mustangs' hoofs in little puffs and sprays of it, powdery fine, followed the turn of the wheels half-way up, there to be caught by the breeze and drifted behind in a long cloud that followed the buckboard like a haunting spirit. Sometimes, as the light breeze shifted, it came back upon the buckboard and its driver like heavy thoughts on the conscience of a guilty man.

It would serve them just right! Besides that, only think—ten thousand! What would the people down in Mexico or Guatemala, where he would fly, know or care if somebody up in far-off Nevada had dumped a box off his buckboard and gone back and got it after a few days—maybe a week? It would have to be a dark night, wouldn't it? You couldn't go and get a box like that in the day-time and take it anywhere, for the whole country would be out looking for the man who had. Maybe a month. That would be better. It would all blow over by that time. Let's sec. would it? Ten thousand was a good deal. Those stage-stoppers were always striking the box on the wrong day. They never got so much as that at one haul. In two months, then—perhaps two months. But it would have to be well-hidden.

And the thought stuck to him, despite all attempts to keep it off, though by the time he had driven the mustangs into Red Canyon, his indignation at having been suspected by the company had died down. The box at his feet had taken on a new meaning for him. It meant smart gowns for the wife. It meant a good schooling for the children. Those five little ones had had a hard "rustle" of it to get what few scraps of learning they had thus far managed to clutch; and, as for clothes, they were dressed like juvenile scarecrows. Yes, all the hard scratching would be over if he dared to do what many another hard-pushed man had done. Resolving the whole matter down to a plain, clear-cut proposition, it was, after all, simply a question of "nerve."

Here was the place to do it. Right here, where the high, scraggly rocks, with the patches of sage-brush atop, came so near to the buckboard. It could be thrown over there—anywhere—into the sage-brush. It would be as well-concealed as though hurried in six feet of earth. The buckboard had reached the top of a long down-grade. Zach put on the brake and twisted the reins about the brake-handle. As if about to take a plunge into ice-cold water, he reached down for the box. But wait a bit. He took off his big sombrero and hung it on a projecting rock. Then flashing out his six-shooter, he sent a bullet through the brim of the hat, which he then replaced on his head. Though it had been hot enough when he started out from Thimble Spring, there seemed to be a chill in the air just now. Would they believe the story that he would have to concoct, even though he showed them the hole in the hat-brim? What would he care whether they did or not? They already suspected him. If he had the name, he might as well have the game. He looked at a spot, where the sage-brush clustered thickest, and made a mental throw or two in a tentative way, in order to "get the distance."

Then he laid two nervous hands on the box. He gave a little tug. Lord, how heavy it was! Could it be tossed over there, after all? It might have to be carried. He lifted it upon the seat. "Via Thimble Spring Stage Line." What was the sense in putting on such a direction as that? It was the only way it could go. The only way. And that way was now closed, for he was about to—

"God, kaint they trust you—you, Zach Springer. Kaint they trust Old Zach?" he burst out, hoarsely. "Yes, but why don't they do as any other decent minin' comp'ny does—turn their stuff into the bank at 'Frisco arter it's minted? What in hell do they want on it up thar?"

Well, after all, that was their business. But he couldn't he trusted. What would Bill say? Bill was an honest man. He would blush with shame every time his brother's name was mentioned after that—for, of course, he would know. Sue would never suspect. Any kind of a story would bamboozle her. Bill was smart. He could put two and two together as quickly as any man in the country. And yet Bill himself was a little reckless sometimes. He had been acting very queer of late, and had been over to Johnson's a good deal, drinking and playing cards with the boys. That would not do. Bill must be looked after. He was only a young fellow—a mere boy, even if he had been trying to raise a mustache lately. Yes, Bill was a good deal younger than he. Why, he remembered well the day he was born, when they took him in to show him his new baby brother. He used to carry Bill all around, and he was the first one to stand him on his legs and try to make him walk. He remembered how it used to hurt his own head when Bill got a knock by falling out of his high-chair. Bill was just as much to him now as ever, and those knocks which fate and the weaknesses of his nature were giving him now hurt him just as badly—worse, perhaps, than they did Brother Bill. What would Bill say?

He laid his hands upon the box again. It would be safe enough behind the rocks there under the sage-brush—as safe as if—

"Git up thar, damn ye! Git, Buckskin! Git, old Gage! Ye lazy critters. G'lang!" And down came the long lash upon the dust-covered backs of the mustangs, and off down the long grade they ran, making the dust fly in the cañon as it never flew before. For Zach had grasped the reins in a grip of iron, and both his big cowhide boots were planted firmly on the box.

"This 'ere is what I call goin' helly-ty split!" he said, ten minutes later, as they were still flying down the grade. "But I lost some time with a blamed-fool notion that I orter a ben licked for ever thinkin' on a minit. Wal, the mustangs got a good rest. Makin' up fer it now, though. They'll soon be in a lather. I'll git to the half-way house in quarter of an hour, and then I'll take a good horn. I feel kinder nervous yit. Thet 'ere box is a derned heavy load on a man's mind. I s'pose the sup'intendent up to Gold Butte is worryin' about it, too. Never mind, ol' feller, you'll see that stuff stowed away in yer safe afore sundown.

"What's this? A hold-up, sure as shootin'!"

Out from behind a tall rock, a man, with a piece of dark calico over his face and a very large Winchester in his hand, had suddenly sprung, and the muzzle of the rifle looked right into Zach's big, round eyes. The brake scraped the wheels and made the sparks fly. The mustangs came to a sudden stand. There was no getting by that Winchester.

"I reckon you've got ther drop on me, stranger," the driver coolly made remark. "Stick up my hands? In course I will, ef you insist on it; but I tell yer these 'ere mustangs is mighty skittish, an' it's on ther down-grade. So yer needn't shoot ef they start up, fur it'll be yer own fault. I s'pose yer arter this 'ere box. Throw it out? It's too hamed heavy ter that. Ye'll hev ter give us a lift."

The man with the gun had said nothing; but the subtleties of the holding-up process were not so fine but that Zach understood every wave of the stranger's hand and every shrug of his shoulders, when the waves and shrugs meant anything. Zach had been held up before. He of the calico mask did not step forward at once. In this suggestion that he should assist in taking off the box he seemed to suspect some trick. But one of Zach's hands was held aloft and the other, with the four reins in it, was on the level of his shoulder. The man edged up to the buckboard, exchanging the weapon which he presented at Zach's head for a six-shot revolver.

"Thanks, stranger," said Zach, with forced merriment. "I never like to hev one o' them air long-barreled things p'inted at me. They shoot too durn straight. Now, here ye are."

With his foot he shoved the box along until it was near the edge of the wagon.

"Thar it is, help yourself; but ye'll find it a blamed heavy load ter pack, ef yer goin' far—over forty pound."

The robber's fingers grasped the box nervously.

"A green un at the biz," thought Zach; "mebbe thar'll be an openin' here yit."

The robber pulled and hauled at the box, but it would not budge, for it was caught on a nail-head in the bottom of the wagon. In his feverish anxiety to secure the gold, he lowered the revolver a little and grasped the box with both hands. Swiftly Zach's right hand fell to his hip and out he whipped his bright-barreled pistol.

"Got the dead drop, stranger! It's no go!" he shouted. "Put that weepin' down, you fool!"—for the man was raising his pistol. "You won't? Then take that."

A flash, a report, and back fell the robber without a moan. His fingers clawed the dust for a moment, as if he were grasping for a hold on life. But the hold was not to be had, and he gave it up, and lay there quietly in the dust.

The driver shoved his pistol into his holster, and wiped the sweat from his brow. It had been a close shave for the box and a closer shave for him.

"Takes a purty keen un ter git erway with Ol' Zach, arter all," he chuckled, springing lightly from the buckboard, while a broad smile lit up his brown face. "This 'ere means a big raise from ther stage comp'ny an' a hundred er two from the Gold Butte folks. I guess they'll think the ol' man's 'bout right arter this. Hooray fur hooray! My stock's riz! It's way up ter a hundred an' fifty. Whoop-e-e! Haw-haw-haw!"

He stooped down over the dead man and lifted the bit of cloth from his face.

"Almighty God! It's Bill!"

If few people like caviare, those who like it at all like it very much indeed. Bismarck was probably its most famous devotee. One gathers from Busch that the Iron Chancellor was prepared to talk caviare to any extent if the subject came up, treating of its varieties and merits with minute knowledge. And twice it comes out that one of his principal grievances against "fat Borek, the holder of the king's private purse," was concerning caviare. Bismarck had sent forty pounds of a choice variety to King William as a present, and was astonished to get no present nor even a thank-you in return. But some friend, dropping into Borek's room, saw a barrel of caviare there with a spoon standing in it, and told Bismarck. The chancellor could not forget or forgive Borek's interception of his gift to the king.

The Vanderbilt Cup was this year, for the first time, won by a car designed and built in America by an American and of American materials. Moreover the driver is an American. The winning car is a 120-horsepower Locomobile, and the driver is George Robertson. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., who was one of the first Americans to become interested in automobiling and who himself drove cars in several of the big European road races, offered the now world-famous trophy in January, 1904. The cup was deeded to the American Automobile Association. It has always been won by French cars in the preceding events.

A little more than seventy years ago there was no such thing as a brass band in existence. The very first band entirely of brass dates, in fact, no further back than 1835. Prior to that time even our military music was produced almost entirely from instruments of wood, and as recently as 1873 a full regimental band consisted of two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Glad Day.

I have not thought of sorrow
The whole day long, nor now.
I wandered out, and, oh, what winds
Laid kisses on my brow!

And all the world was kind to me,
Each spear of grass was gay;
The brown brooks had a mind to me
And sang me on my way.

I conquered many a climbing road,
And always at the crest
The winds of all the world abode,
And shadows stopped to rest.

The hills like lazing gods of old
With sleepy shoulders lay,
And all the soaring vault upheld
Of all the high blue day.

Far, far below the village spire
Pricked sharply to the sky.
"Strong pagan hills of my desire!
Frail house of God!" thought I.

Far, far below the river erept;
The willow leaves made stir
Of blowing silver, touched and swept
By wind, wild lute-player.

(The river wind a minstrel is
A minstrel deft and blind:
The willows know his finger's kiss
'As strings the player's mind.)

The sweet shorn fields, the fairy fern,
The roadside's gypsy bloom,
Young goldenrod—oh, every turn
Was blithe with green and gloom!

I did not meet a single face
That would not smile at me.
Perhaps the sun's vast golden grace
Set love and laughter free.

The gravestones by the poplar tree
Full carelessly I passed.
I thought that Death himself must see
How sweet was Life, at last.

And I came home at evening time,
And still my heart doth sing,—
So have I wrought this wavering rhyme
For my remembering.

I have not thought of sorrow
The whole day long, nor now.
Good night, fair world! and oh, what stars
Weave splendor round my brow!

The Old Gate Made of Pickets.

There was moonlight in the garden and the chirp and chirp of crickets;
There was scent of pink and peony and deep syringa thickets,
When a-down the pathway whitely,
Where the firefly glimmered brightly,
She came stepping, oh, so lightly!
To the old gate made of pickets.

There were dew and musk and murmur, and a voice that hummed low snatches
Of a song, while there she hurried, through the moonlight's silvery patches,
To the rose-grown gate, above her
And her softly-singing lover,
With its blossom-tangled cover
And its weight and wooden latches.

Whom she met there, whom she kissed there, 'mid the moonlight and the roses,
With his arms who there enclosed her, as a tiger
lily closes
Some white moth that frailly settles
On its gold and crimson petals,
Where the garden runs to nettles—
No one knows now or supposes.

Years have passed since that last meeting; loves have come and loves departed.
Still the garden blooms unchanging, there is nothing broken-hearted
In its beauty, where the hours
Lounge with sun and moon and showers,
'Mid the perfume and the flowers,
As in days when these two parted.

Yet the garden and the flowers and the cheerily chirring crickets
And the moonlight and the fragrance, and the wind that waves the thickets—
They remember what was spoken,
And the rose that was a token,
And the gentle heart there broken
By the old gate made of pickets.

The Sea Hate.

Soft it sings in shining ripples, glad beneath the golden day,
With a laugh among the dune grass, as it flings its jewel spray;
But I hate its smiles and whispers, for beneath the white, curled crests Lies the great black heart of terror and the wrath that never rests.

Hidden from the blessed daylight, in its caves it heaves and throbs,
With a dreadful choking gurgle and a sound of dying sob:
And the long dark trailing seaweed, lifted on its ebb and flow,
Is like hair of drowned women whelmed within the undertow.

Through the pale green dusks of twilight, from the rolling mystic line,
Comes a chant of fear and beauty, calling sweet to me and mine.
But I flee the siren music of the cruel luring flood,
For 'tis doom is in its message and the answer in my blood.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

By Sidney G. P. Coryn.

Mr. John Erskine's letter to the New York Evening Post on "Literature in Colleges" has aroused an interesting discussion. He summarizes his contention by saying: "The average young person today seems to have no recourse to that selected and stored-up wisdom of the race which, until our day, has been a chief means and effect of culture." How far this may be due to the colleges and how far to a general environment unsympathetic with humanism, remains to be discovered if any one cares enough to discover it. That the condition exists can be proved by five minutes' conversation with the average college "young person," who is not only ignorant but insolently ignorant and vulgarly scornful of those who are not ignorant.

It is easy to blame the college, but the college is only a reflection of the home, and culture, from the point of view of the home, is no longer an essential acquisition. The guiding principle of the home is all too often the devotion of every duty that can be devolved with the general understanding that "success" in its lowest meaning is to be the object in view. Devolving everything else we also devolve blame, and so the college, the daily newspaper, and a dozen other agencies are visited with a censure that should be placed elsewhere.

The Book of the Pearl, by George Frederick Kunz, A. M., Ph. D., and Charles Hugh Stevenson, LL. M., D. C. L. Published by the Century Company, New York; $12.50.

A cursory examination of this sumptuous book leaves us in doubt whether we should the more admire the art of the bookmaker or the minute care with which this unique mass of information has been collected. The authors tell us that they have been engaged upon their task for many years. They have consulted every available manuscript and rare volume and have ransacked the records of the past for whatever would aid them in their work. But not the least useful factor in their success is their own expert knowledge of their subject.

The result is an impressive volume of over five hundred large pages. It is divided into seventeen sections, and an enumeration of these will best show its scope. They are: "Pearls Among the Ancients," "Medieval and Modern History of Pearls," "Origin of Pearls," "Structure and Forms of Pearls," "Sources of Pearls," "The Pearl Fisheries of the Persian Gulf," "East African Pearl Fisheries," "Pearl Fisheries of the British Isles," "Pearl Fisheries of the South Sea Islands," "Pearl Fisheries of Venezuela," "Pearl Culture and Pearl Farming," "Mystical and Medicinal Properties of Pearls," "Values and Commerce of Pearls," "Treatment and Care of Pearls," "Pearls as Used in Ornament and Decoration," "Famous Pearls and Collections," "The Aboriginal Use of Pearls, and Their Discovery in Mounds and Graves." An introduction, a bibliography, and an index complete the volume.

No point of possible interest seems to have been omitted. Beginning with the earliest known use of the pearl, we see the gradual changes and development in fashions, its decorative value at all ages, together with theories and facts of origin, growth, and structure. We are told the proper care and treatment of the pearl and the history and methods of the various fisheries throughout the world. It is preëminently a book for those who own pearls and for those who love pearls and for those who want to know anything that can be known about pearls. There are one hundred full-page plates—three photogravures, seventeen pages in full color, and eighty in tint and black—all showing some rare and rich or unusual phase of pearl life or romance. Among the portraits of famous women wearing pearl ornaments is that of the Empress of Russia, the Queen of England, the Dowager Queen of Italy, Señora Diaz, and Mrs. George J. Gould. The book itself has embossed blue and gold, pearl-studded covers, and heavy broad-margined pages. As a Christmas present "The Book of the Pearl" could hardly be surpassed.

Health and Happiness, by the Rt. Rev. Samuel Fallows, D. D., LL. D. Published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago; $1.50.

This is an explanation of the philosophy of healing adopted at St. Paul's Church, Chicago. It is stated broadly and tolerantly and the evidences that it advances are indisputable.

It would seem that mental healing, having enough vitality to survive ridicule and persecution from both religion and science, is about to be adopted by both of them. The part of average common sense is to recognize that thought and imagination are natural forces equally capable of killing or curing and of a potency in no way affected by religious formulas, creeds, or incantations. However great may be the physical benefits resulting from a change of thought-habit, they are just as much at the disposal of the Buddhist or the Shintoist as of the follower of any other faith. But if there are some who find that the use of a natural force is unacceptable to them until it shall have been first blessed and labeled by a religious creed with which it has no more special relation than with electricity, it is fortunate that this piece of venerable knowledge now called mental healing should be available under almost any form that may be selected. But it is precisely the same under them all. While fully conceding that "wonderful results have already been accomplished through prayer," etc., we may well wish for a more speedy recognition that the one essential is a change of thought and therefore of life and that this is within reach of the unaided human will.

Romance of Roman Villas, by Elizabeth W. Champney. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

It is not strange that the villas of ancient Rome should whisper strange stories to discerning ears, and perhaps the present volume could have been ten times larger without exhausting a storehouse of comedy, tragedy, and romance. The work already done by the author encourages us to hope for yet other good things in the future. Her "Romance of Italian Villas" was a pure delight, as was also the "Romance of the Feudal Château." Now we have another volume in which historical fact is so gently touched by imagination as to be unimpaired.

The task of selecting, not the villas, but the stories, must indeed have been a hard one where so many romances compete for the place of honor. Hardly one of these ancient houses is without its many-layered atmosphere of gentle and terrible deeds, without its records of sentiment and achievement worthy of rescue from the pages of unappreciative and unimaginative history. There is Madama, and Aldobrandini, and d'Este, and Borghese, and Mondragone, and many others that we hope have a place in the author's intentions. Our gratitude for what she has given us takes the form of a confident hopefulness that she will not yet weary in well doing.

There are nine stories in the present volume. They are told of the Villas Belvedere, Farnesina, Madama, Aldobrandini, d'Este, Borghese, Mondragone, Medici, Hadrian, Albani, the Colonna Palace, and the Castle of Palliano. They are all marked by complete knowledge, a delicate touch, and the sympathy that brings wisdom and comprehension. Over fifty illustrations, many of them in photogravure, add a charm of their own to a delightful book, the sixth, but not, let us hope, the last that has come from a gifted pen.

The Island Pharisees, by John Galsworthy. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

The author would have been better advised to preach his rather dreary sermon through the medium of the essay rather than through that of the novel. His somewhat inanimate hero is John Shelton, rich, a pet of fortune, and engaged to a beautiful and not wholly unintelligent girl. Shelton discovers that he is living in a world of humbug, a world wherein a vast majority are in a state of stolid and conservative complacency, recognizing no other god, no other morality than things as they are, and owning no allegiance except to the conventional. The minority are the rebels, the unconventional, those upon whom society frowns as undesirable and innovators. As a result he drifts into a state of perplexed pessimism and breaks his engagement with the fair Antonia on discovering that she, too, is a part of the social landscape.

The story would be better if it were less of a twentieth century "Pilgrim's Progress" and if Shelton's successive discoveries of the hollowness of things were arranged in a sequence less carefully planned. Indeed, he seems a little invertebrate. In his case we should have tried the effect of continuous and good-humored badinage upon his very conventional circle. We should also try some well advertised liver remedy and we should have married Antonia and tried to instill a little sense into her pretty head. But instead of that "he let his forehead drop lower and lower to the table," which is a thing no man should ever do.

Miss Esperance and Mr. Wycherly, by L. Allen Harker. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

This is a story of two exquisite old people, Miss Esperance and her scholarly lodger, Mr. Wycherly. To them come Miss Esperance's two orphaned nephews, and we read with delight of the welcome that they get and how the invasion brings a lovely revolution into the staid and quiet home. Never before has Mr. Wycherly's ignorance been so brought home to him as when he realizes that he can not make a rabbit out of a handkerchief, an educational omission that is rectified by the aid of the Presbyterian minister. The author has written a story showing the beauties of human life, and that is something of an achievement nowadays.

On the Open Road, by Ralph Waldo Trine. Published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York; 50 cents.

Those who know Mr. Trine will be prepared to welcome this little volume of sane and wholesome philosophy for daily life. Mr. Trine's keynote is that the better pays and that it will exact obedience.

New Publications.

The name of John Kendrick Bangs is a sufficient indication of the sort of humor to be found upon every page of "The Genial Idiot," published by Harper & Brothers, New York, $1.25.

Children, as well as self-respecting grown people, will rejoice in "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," by Lewis Carroll, just published by Duffield & Co., New York. The type is large and clear, while the colored illustrations by Millicent Sowerley are of special excellence. Price, $1.25.

The 1908 volume of "Chatterbox" is fully the equal of its predecessors. It contains 416 large pages, with over 250 illustrations, besides six colored plates. We are inclined to agree with the publishers, Dana Estes & Co., Boston, when they say that it is "the best and most popular book for children in the world." Price, $1.25.

"The Wide Awake Girls," by Katharine Ruth Ellis, is the first of a series that should be popular among young people if the standard of excellence be maintained. For girls of twelve to sixteen or seventeen years nothing could be better. It is published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston. Price, $1.50.

Joseph Conrad is hardly at his best in "The Point of Honor," published by the McClure Company, New York. It is the story of two officers of Napoleon's army who quarrel over an absurd point of etiquette and maintain the feud until the restoration. There are plenty of duels, a smattering of good, wholesome sentiment, and a general air of vigor, but the chief characters are somewhat forced.

A good gift book for children, and especially for Pacific Coast children, is "Old Man Coyote," by Clara Kern Bayliss. These legends are a part of genuine Indian tradition and they remind us somewhat of our old friend Br'er Rabbit. The coyote is by no means without his humorous virtues when you come to know him. The publishers are Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. Price, $1.

LITERARY NOTES.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

In regard to Colonel Harvey's "Women, Etc.," which the Harpers publish, it is said one woman asked another what was meant by "Etc.," and the other replied: "I suppose he meant Men."

In a recent issue of the New York Times Saturday Review, the editor says of R. H. Newell (Orpheus C. Kerr), now almost forgotten: ". . . one of the best of all the American humorists, a man whose inventiveness fell little short of genius, and who lacked only the qualities of industry and perseverance, and some share of the much-abused but very necessary commercial spirit to make for himself a larger reputation in American letters." In this connection it would be interesting to know how many readers of this day have ever seen Newell's novel, "Avery Glibun," which was the precursor of the many present-day works with punning names for their characters.

Walter M. Chandler has written "The Trial of Jesus from a Lawyer's Standpoint." It will be in two volumes, the first dealing with the Hebrew trial before the Sanhedrin, the second, with the Roman trials before Pontius Pilate and Herod.

Thomas Bailey Aldrich's little romance, "Marjorie Daw," which is just published in a splendid holiday edition by the Houghton-Mifflin Company, has had an interesting history. It was written in the winter of 1872-73, at Elmwood, the Cambridge home of James Russell Lowell, which Aldrich had leased during the absence of its owner in Europe. There is a legend of doubtful authenticity that the letters from the different characters were written in different rooms, on different paper, and in different colored inks. Whatever the truth of this legend, the fact stands that in "Marjorie Daw" Aldrich created what is practically a new type of short story, dealing with characters that have lived in readers' memories for a third of a century, with an airy yet vivid life. The story first appeared in the Atlantic Monthly for April, 1873. Its success was immediate and widespread. It was translated into several foreign tongues and was even republished in the Revue des Deux Mondes. In the fall of 1873, it was issued in book form, with a group of other stories, as "Marjorie Daw, and Other People," and its author, hitherto chiefly known as an exquisite lyric poet, took rank at once as an international humorist.

R. A. Peddie librarian of the St. Bride Foundation, in London, has begun to publish, in the Library World, what will undoubtedly prove to be a valuable tool for the student of ancient and mediæval literature as well as for the student and collector of early typography, namely a short title author index to fifteenth-century books. He gives for each work a chronological list of editions (preceded by those without date), and for each edition references to bibliographies containing full descriptions, and also to facsimile reproductions.

The November number of Scribner's Magazine presents, among other attractions, five of the finest specimens of drawings printed in colors that have been shown in the periodical press. The pictures illustrate the leading article, entitled "On the Old Boston Post Road," written by Stanley M. Arthurs, and were drawn by the author. Also to be mentioned with praise is the concluding paper on Richard Mansfield, by Paul Wilstach, which is intimate yet discriminating in its appreciation. It is accompanied with portraits from photographs.

Mrs. John Maxwell, famous throughout the English-speaking world as M. E. Braddon, celebrated her seventy-first birthday a few days ago at Lichfield House, Kingston-on-Thames. The years have passed lightly by her, though nearly half a century has gone since "Lady Audley's Secret" was written in hot haste and went straight to the hearts of thousands of mid-Victorian ladies who reveled in its respectable sensationalism and in its now old-fashioned sentiment. Those thousands of readers were multiplied into millions, and though the magazine in which it first appeared—Robin Goodfellow—has long been forgotten, the story itself is still being sold on the book-stalls. For nearly half a century novels flowed unceasingly from Mrs. Maxwell's pen.

The loss of an English scholar of rare critical ability, an educator of varied and honorable achievement, a lecturer of power and of charm, and a promoter in general of what is sound and wholesome in the world of letters, is that of Professor J. Churton Collins, who was found dead in the fens of East Anglia. Well read and of pronounced opinions in his chosen department of English literature, he did not confine his activities within its bounds. Among his later activities may be noted his establishment of a school of journalism for graduates in arts and science. So diligent was he in every work to which he put his hand that it is thought he undermined his health by excessive industry. Rarely did he take more than six hours of sleep out of the twenty-four, and often less.

Personally he was of great courtesy in his hearing, and he left many friends.

In "The Ladies' Pageant," published by the Macmillan Company, E. V. Lucas marches out nearly all the female characters of English literature, and in the original garb given them by their creators, the poets and novelists. The fair creatures are classified; under the head of "The Tyrants" Lady Holland finds her place, which Thomas Creevey assigns to her in the following manner:

I met Lady Holland again on Thursday at Lord Sefton's. She began by complaining of the slipperiness of the courtyard, and of the danger of her horses falling; to which Sefton replied that it should be graveled the next time she did him the honor of dining there. She then began to sniff, and, turning her eyes to various pots filled with beautiful roses and all kinds of flowers, she said: "Lord Sefton, I must beg of you to have those flowers taken out of the room, they are so much too powerful for me." Sefton and his valet Paoli actually carried the table and all its contents out of the room. Then poor dear little Ly Sefton, who has always a posy as large as life at her breast when she is dressed, took it out in the humblest manner and said: "Perhaps, Lady Holland, this nosegay is too much for you." But the other was pleased to allow her to keep it, tho' by no means in a very gracious manner. Then when candles were lighted at the close of dinner, she would have three of them put out, as being too much or too near her. Was there ever?

Charles Eliot Norton.

Charles Eliot Norton died at his home in Cambridge, Massachusetts, on October 21. Mr. Norton had long been associated with Harvard University, as he was professor there of the history of art from 1875 to 1898, but his influence as a teacher, critic, and moralist was not confined within the walls of a college or even to the country of his birth. The Boston Transcript says of his life:

The passing of Charles Eliot Norton removes from the world of Harvard University and Cambridge one who was, after President Eliot, its dominant figure for a third of a century. It was a life with many striking and some unique features. Not many men of literary distinction begin their after-graduation careers by engaging in commerce. Few men whose greatest fame is found in the classroom essay a professorship for the first time at the age of forty-seven. Few professors have the liberty of such a wide range of topics in their lectures. But in whatever field he engaged, he left the impress of a cultivated mind, a gracious personality, and a kind heart. Like many others of his years and environment, the course of this nation in the past decade fretted him, but despite his drastic utterances there was in all he said a most patriotic intent and there glowed a deep love for his country. Cambridge and Harvard can not again be the same place. He was the last of his literary line and a new order will now engage the youth and in them mould leaders.

Charles Eliot Norton was born in Cambridge November 16, 1827. He entered Harvard at the age of fifteen and was graduated four years later. He went into a commercial house in Boston at first, but found his literary bent too decided and left business to make tours of Europe and to write as well as study. He met Ruskin on one of those journeys abroad and their friendship continued. He wrote two books in those earlier years, "Historical Studies of Church Buildings in the Middle Ages" and "Notes of Travel and Study in Italy." In 1862 he was married and in the same year undertook the editorship of the North American Review. Six years afterward he gave up this position and he was about this time largely instrumental in the founding of the Nation. The success of the latter publication was often credited to his efforts in its behalf and he was proud of his connection with the paper. The New York Evening Post says:

His literary friendships were among the most notable in the history of letters. With Emerson and Lowell, with Carlyle and Ruskin, his relations were marked by an intimacy which did not prevent him from editing their correspondence with rare skill and the detachment of perfect taste. It was frequently said that he was steeped in pessimism. This only meant that he would not call foul fair, nor gloze over the socially hideous or the morally repulsive. At bottom, he ever clutched the unconquerable hope. Truth and justice he expected to prevail upon the earth. In one of his letters to Mr. Godkin, he spoke of "the good old cause of civilization—the cause which is always defeated, but always after defeat taking more advanced position than before." No misnomer could be more glaring than to call the author of that sentiment a pessimist.

Last year at Cambridge the eightieth anniversary of the venerable teacher was celebrated, and at that time the published recognition of his work and public services was gathered and noted. He knew that his labors were appreciated. He leaves a widow, three daughters, and three sons.

Puccini, in giving an account of his forthcoming opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," says that the libretto differs only from Belasco's play where it is necessary to intensify the dramatic effect. "I am not going to write an unnecessary note of music," said the composer. "There will be no overture, no prelude. We start right away on the opera and the story is one of sufficient grip to hold the attention throughout the three acts. I have only just finished the first act and I don't anticipate completion of the work until early next year. No composer, if he wants to do his best, can be hurried. Music is not machinery."

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE CHAT.

Runs of two weeks and more are becoming quite the thing at a majority of the city theatres. In the announcements for the coming week continuing attractions are noted at the Van Ness and the Princess. Neither limited in numbers nor sparing in appreciation is the latter-day amusement-seeking public.

Sedley Brown's picturesque society melodrama, "A Navajo's Love," will round out a successful week at the Valencia Theatre Saturday afternoon and evening, and on Sunday afternoon the farcical comedy, "Glittering Gloria," will be presented. The play has its opening scene in a great Bond-Street jewelry house, and there on display is a diamond necklace which furnishes the motive that is followed through the succeeding scenes. There are a number of amusing characterizations in the piece, and the complications are rapidly developed, twisted, and untwisted. Robert Warwick will have a comedy part in Jack James, a young married man who buys the necklace as a present for a comic-opera star, and will display his versatility in the rôle. Willette Kershaw will be Glittering Gloria, and in this dashing winning part will make her farewell appearances here. Others of the company, who have proved their capability, will be appropriately placed. The scenic possibilities of the drama will be fully lived up to by the management, as usual, and the new orchestra leader, Herman Heller, will continue to add materially to the enjoyment of the audiences with artistic selections well played. The critical competitions, which have aroused numerous writers, will be continued on Sunday afternoons.

Kohl and Dill are said to be breaking all records at the Princess Theatre, as they are drawing large houses regularly. "Playing the Ponies" is certain to have a long and prosperous run, as no announcement is made of its successor. Orders from the country for seats come in by mail, and the management no less than the comedians have reason to congratulate themselves on the success of the production. Maud Lambert and Billy Clifford continue to hold their place in the popular favor that they won on the opening night.

At the Van Ness Theatre this week "The Clansman" (reviewed at length on another page) has drawn with the power anticipated. It will be continued all next week. Impressive situations and a big cast are important features of this striking melodrama.

The Orpheum never fails to have novel and entertaining features to announce for its weekly change of bill. Beginning at the matinee performance Sunday afternoon, the Millman Trio of artists on the wire will be prominent. Bird Millman, of this company, is said to be an especially clever, daring, and graceful performer. Henry Horton, lately the star of "Ehen Holden," will, with the assistance of Louise Hardenburgh, an attractive actress, present a one-act play entitled "Uncle Lem's Dilemma," which the Eastern critics have called "The Old Homestead" of vaudeville. May and Flora Hengler, two handsome girls, well known here as in the East, will be a feature of the coming programme. Mr. and Mrs. Allison, styled "The Swede Girl and the Fellow Who Sings," will appear in a skit founded on "What Happened to Jones," which affords Mrs. Allison opportunity to display her ability as a Swedish dialect comedian and gives Mr. Allison a chance as a singer. Next week will be the last of Alfred Keley, who will be seen in a new one-act play, entitled "Uncle Phineas," also of the Four Nightons, and the famous Barnum and Bailey clown, "Slivers," in his baseball travesty. George Primrose and his Dancing Boys will say farewell in "Dancers of the Past and Present."

The next attraction at the Van Ness Theatre will be Rose Stahl in James Forbes's comedy, "The Chorus Lady." The character assumed by Miss Stahl in this notable success is that of Patricia O'Brien, a member of the chorus who speaks slang with amazing fluency. The chorus girl type, as portrayed by Miss Stahl, is one of the most original characterizations that has ever been attempted by an American actress, and the star is credited with having scored a most emphatic success. The entire New York production comes to the Van Ness.

Arthur Cunningham, for years well known as a favorite singer and actor, will begin his starring season at the Valencia Theatre Sunday afternoon, November 15, in a revival of Joseph Murphy's success, "Kerry Gow," which will be staged under the personal direction of Mr. Murphy. Cunningham, as Dan O'Hara, will have a most versatile time making love, making horseshoes, shoeing a horse, and thrashing a villain. His engagement is limited to two weeks. Among the many Irish songs he will sing in "Kerry Gow" will be "Nora Acushla," "An Irishman's Toast," "Molly Bawn," and "The Minstrel Boy."

E. H. Sothern is announced as one of the early attractions at the Van Ness Theatre.

BLACK AND RED DRAMAS.

By Josephine Hart Phelps.

"The Clansman" is a curious combination of sleep-inducing talkiness and melodramatic strength. It is full of crude fervor, but, after all, it is not a play, but rather what Alan Dale calls a diatribe. The point upon which the diatribe is hung is, as every one knows, the impossibility of political and social equality between the whites and the negroes.

The action of the play is supposed to transpire in the late sixties, when the hapless South was struggling in the throes of the reconstruction period. None but resident Southerners know or knew the justifiable bitterness that then prevailed, and if any one feels a passing curiosity they will find, in Judge Turgée's once widely read "Bricks Without Straw," and other books by the same author, a graphic picture of the state of things then prevailing. And in Southern novels of the present day one occasionally runs across one containing an interesting reminiscence of that troublous period. It is unquestionably a good dramatic subject, since a historical background of tragic truth lends weight and dignity to any theme.

Unfortunately, Thomas Dixon, Jr., is not a writer of sufficient polish and power to wonderfully enhance the sombre strength of his subject. There is much that is puerile in the play, which is cast in melodramatic form, and the diction of which contains bolts and bolts of fustian. In order to hammer in his political points, the author dulls many scenes. A tedious collection of unintelligible stage negroes confuse and distract by the ultra profusion of the darkey dialect, and a collection of weedy girl actresses with feeble, untrained voices make one feel that histrionic art is at a discount in the production.

Yet, in spite of all this, when the white child is killed, and the Ku Klux Klan, mounted on white horses and strangely costumed in disguising white draperies, rushes across the shadowy background of the stage in pursuit of the murderer, one feels the thrills down one's spine that record a mark to the author's credit.

The thrill is even more successfully produced in a later scene, the principal one of the play, in which is represented the midnight meeting of the Klan in a secret cave, for purposes of vengeance. They have their significant rites and ceremonial, and a strange and not wholly comprehensible scene is enacted in which the negro murderer is compelled through the influence of mesmeric power to rehearse his crime.

One dimly realizes, while witnessing this scene, the secret horrors of magic and voodoo that sometimes underlie the outward seeming of the lives of these happy, irresponsible beings, whose ignorance and but partially tamed animalism made them peculiarly the prey of secret license and guilefully fanned superstition, and induced them to meddle dangerously with the darker mysteries of the mind and the will.

What frightful scenes, what appalling tragedies, have been enacted in those flowery lands where dwell two antipathetic races in ever-growing aversion! We shall never hear the half of those tales told, but sometimes faint echoes reach us from the pages of some novel written by a Southerner whose relatives have related to him all the peculiar chronicles of a community of which we in California know practically nothing.

The South has been, and still is, the romance of our intensely practical nation. The old slave days, as a theme for fiction or drama, are practically an exhausted subject. A newer, darker theme has risen, and troublous times may yet result in the settlement of the racial problems of the South. But we have had our romance, and the negro has no cause to blush for more than one of the types of simple-hearted fidelity that was evolved in the days of slavery.

Mr. Dixon exhibits two of the faithful in the person of Nelse, and of Eve, his shrewish wife. This old black mammy was manifestly the heroine of the piece, since no one cared a twopenny for either the charms or the sorrows of Elsie, the sweetheart of the Clansman, and the audience rather delighted in Maude Durand's portrait of Eve in her rôle of husband-tamer.

The Clansman himself was played in good, hearty, melodramatic style by Franklin Ritchie, who did not make the mistake of trying repression in a rôle that called for melodramatic vehemence. Charles J. Wilson was well placed in the rôle of the designing mulatto who was lieutenant-governor, and George M. De Vere made a good traditional darkey in the rôle of the sheriff.

Indian characters seem to be rather crowding the drama lately. With Strongheart and Nat-U-Ritch fresh in our memory, and with one or two novels containing Indian heroes rising to the mind, it begins to look as if the college-educated Indian, with his inevitable demands upon his American mates for social and intellectual equality, would be a distinct factor in our future fiction and drama.

"A Navajo's Love," the attraction for the week at the Valencia Theatre, rather boulevardizes one's ideas of the educated Indian up to date. We have become familiarized with the idea of his being an athlete and a wooer of white women. The latter result, of course, is inevitable. Love is a plant of nature's growth, and that reckless, irresponsible beladame never pays the slightest attention to social or racial fitness when she is assiduously engaged in fertilizing the growth of the tender passion.

So the handsome, sombre young Indian in picturesque language of symbolical phraseology woos a New York belle, and we further discover, to our amazement, that he is a Wall-Street plunger, is worth a mint of money, is an able and shrewd financier, able to control the market, and, in fact, is a big catch in the matrimonial scramble.

This slightly takes away one's breath, but as there are several cheerful improbabilities in the play, one finally banishes all thoughts of realism, and settles down to enjoying a good, melodramatic feast.

The old romantic idea of an Indian's vindictiveness toward an enemy and gratitude toward a benefactor is brought into play, and serves as the motive of the principal scene in the play, in which the Indian financier, suddenly discovering that the rival he is ruining is the unknown friend who had saved his life in boyhood, foregoes his revenge, and renounces his love.

The scene, although interesting and interestingly acted, was marred by the improbabilities consequent on the loquacity of the crushed enemy of the Navajo, who relates a particularly long and circuitous dream to an unsympathetic and heartily hating listener, and then tops that off by unreeling a long yarn, which, though it had to be told to precipitate the dénouement, was an action not made entirely plausible, since a man facing suicide is scarcely likely to pause for the purpose of relating irrelevant even if interesting incidents.

I should judge that Mr. Sedley Brown, the author of the piece, is a cheerful man, who loves his little joke. So he brightens up the sombreness of the Navajo's love tale with a side-show love-story concerning a determined doctor-woman who flutters around a proposal (from herself to the loved male) for four acts, and finally, to the satisfaction of a deeply sympathetic audience, does the deed and nabs her man.

Everybody is much relieved when she succeeds, for we like the medico (very neatly acted by Arleen Hackett), and her man as well, who, by the way, was played with a good deal of quiet humor by Charles Dow Clark.

Mr. Warwick put much impressive dignity into the character of Julian Navajo, and he actually represented a firewater jag (inspired by the hase enemy) without making him really lose his dignity. The concentric curves described by the actor's legs during this process were really masterly, and yet we didn't laugh at him. We really took the thing seriously, and wanted badly to have the Indian come out of his stupor and get the best of his manœuvring rival.

They have, by the way, in Herman Heller an enthusiastic orchestra leader at the Valencia, who has a very pretty taste in music, and gives particularly acceptable music programmes. He can play his bow right daintily, and is playing this week the ever beautiful berceuse from "Jocelyn" with delicacy and the dreamy quality requisite to the sentiment of the music.

There were worse errors than the matinee hat for the man who sat behind a lady in the seventeenth century theatre, as recalled by the London Chronicle. At least, we may suppose so from Mr. Peppy's experience on January 28, 1861, when he saw "The Lost Lady" for the second time. Nine days earlier that play had not pleased him much—partly, perhaps, because he was "troubled to be seen by four of our office clerks, which sat in the half-crown box, and I in the 1s 6d." But on the second occasion the play did "please me better than before; and here, I sitting behind in a dark place, a lady spit backward upon me by a mistake not seeing me." However, it was all right; for, "after seeing her to be a very pretty lady, I was not troubled at it at all."

The Valencia Theatre is greatly in demand by fraternal, society, and other organizations, for the month of November. On Monday evening the Woman's Auxiliary of the California Prison Commission will have a benefit at the new playhouse; on Saturday night the final performance of "Glittering Gloria" will be given with the students of the University of California in attendance after the football game.

Gottschalk and His Gypsying.

Gottschalk is not a name one is likely to see on the programme of a piano recital today, yet in his day the American, Louis Moreau Gottschalk, was one of the most popular players and composers. Much interesting information regarding his romantic life and his works is contained in the October number of the Musician. Most artists have bohemian proclivities, but few ever knew how to go a-gypsying as Gottschalk did. In his "Notes of a Pianist," he wrote, concerning his sojourn in the West Indies:

Six years madly squandered, scattered to the winds, as if life were infinite and youth eternal. Six years in the space of which I have wandered at random beneath the blue skies of the tropics, yielding myself up indolently to the caprice of fortune, giving a concert wherever I happened to find a piano, sleeping wherever night overtook me—on the green grass of the savannah, or under the palm-leaved roof of the vaquero, who shared with me his corn-tortilla, coffee, and bananas. When at last I became weary of the same horizon, I crossed an arm of the sea and landed on some neighboring isle or on the Spanish main. Thus in succession I have visited all the Antilles, the Guianas, and the coasts of Para. At times, having become the idol of some obscure pueblo, I would pitch my tent for five, six, eight months, deferring my departure from day to day until finally I began seriously to entertain the idea of remaining there forevermore. Abandoning myself to such influences, I lived without care, oblivious of the past, reckless of the future, and sowed both my heart and my purse with the ardor of a husbandman. The result of my prodigality was that one fine morning I found myself bankrupt at heart, with my purse at ebb tide. Suddenly disgusted with the world and myself, weary, discouraged, mistrusting men (aye, and women, too), I fled to a desert on the extinct volcano of M., where for several months I lived the life of a cenobite, with no companion but a poor lunatic who had attached himself to me. It was at this period that Strakosch wrote to me offering an engagement for a tour of concerts throughout the United States. I hesitated an instant, one sad look was cast upon banished days, I breathed a regret, and sighed. The dream was over. I was saved.

It is told of Gottschalk that in Boston he chose to interchange on his programme a bagatelle by Beethoven and a thing of his own, with the sad result that a prominent musical critic fell into the trap and appreciated the Beethoven while not liking the Gottschalk. Naturally, when he found out his mistake he was not pleased.

Ada Rehan, who has been abroad several months for her health, recently returned from Europe. She said she felt much better than before she left New York, but she was not in perfect health. "I may perhaps look better than I feel," said Miss Rehan, "but because of the uncertainty of my health I shall never act again. It is now about five years since I appeared on the stage. I shall divide my time between London and New York, spending six months in each place every year. The methods of acting now are changed and the plays are much different from the time when I began my stage career. There has been a great public demand for plays of a new sort in recent years, and it has brought about a creation of ephemeral plays that I hardly think will last. I believe the plays of Pinero and Sardou will last, regardless of the change of taste."

Heretofore the official address of the naval station has been "Guam, Ladron Islands." It is now, by official order, "Guam, Marianne Islands." "Ladron" is Spanish for robber, and the inhabitants naturally felt that such a suggestive name did them an injustice. Several months ago, when the special service squadron, consisting of the battleships Maine and Alabama, visited Guam the sentiments of the islanders were made known to Captain Giles B. Harber, commanding the squadron, and he recommended that the Navy Department change the official title. Several years ago the National Board of Geographic Names, which is the final court, decided that the proper name for the islands was Marianne Islands.

On November 10 Professor Charles Mills Gayley will begin a series of five lectures on "Days in Italy," in the Gymnasium Hall of the Hamilton School. The first lecture, at 3:30 p. m., will be devoted to "Dante and His Italy," and this will be followed on successive Tuesday afternoons by "In the Footsteps of Savonarola," "Michael Angelo and His Florence," "The Brownings in Italy," and "Poetic Glimpses in Italian Towns." Tickets for the course, $3.00. Single tickets, 75 cents.

Creston Clarke is to play the part of Manson in the new company to present "The Servant in the House" on tour. Clay Clement will have the rôle of the Drain Man, in which Tyrone Power gives such a notable display of force and finesse. Winona Shannon will play the part of the daughter.

VANITY FAIR.

Mrs. Cornwallis West, better known as Lady Randolph Churchill, is quick to enter the lists in defense of society from the attack of Mrs. Astor. She has nothing startlingly new to say. She dismisses "smart sets" from all consideration on the ground that they do not belong to society and she asks us not to judge a caste or a class from the antics of a few people who would like to belong to it, but who do not actually find themselves within the charmed circle. Society, the true society, is made up of very exclusive and very cultured people, who detest seeing their names in print and frown severely upon whatever smacks of publicity.

But Mrs. Cornwallis West has something to say in the way of gentle stricture. She does not like the various social "sets," each one being a law unto itself and looking down upon all others as inferior. Then, again, she thinks that American society women should take an interest in politics and serious occupations of that kind.

It is said that exclusiveness is peculiarly necessary to American society if it is not to be quite overrun by the parvenu, and to this Mrs. Cornwallis West says:

Perhaps if they opened their doors a little wider their influence, not to say example, might be felt. In England society is easier of access than in any other place in the world, being built on broader and more solid foundations, and a long-established order of things has made people less apprehensive of having their privileges encroached upon or their position shaken, and they can afford to receive whom they please.

English society being less exclusive, "individual merit is more appreciated than rank or fortune," and "beauty and charm in a woman and brains and good-fellowship in a man take them where dull duchesses and rich bores seek in vain to enter."

A comment by the Philadelphia Ledger on a social indiscretion imputed to Ambassador White calls forth an amusing letter from a correspondent on "Manners at Court," from which some amusing extracts may be taken:

Conkling said that Grant sent one man to Paris "not to expose his French, but to conceal his English." One of our ambassadors not only drew up a chair, uninvited, and sat down, at a private audience, but turned his back also to the "concentrated majesty" of a realm, by leading the way into dinner. Another ambassador, whose environment in the United States roll their "r's" and say "yep" for yes, intimated clearly that Americans are good enough for "soup kitchens," but that he himself preferred the society of the nobility.

It is well known that one of our ministers, speaking at a public dinner, "soberly" advised his fair compatriots not to marry the money-hunting, disreputable men of the nation to which he was accredited; that another took advantage of a drawing room to hand round his card, saying at the time, "This saves me the trouble of calling"; that a third, in answer to an invitation to dinner from the British minister, sent the following gem: "Old Fel. Can't come. Mrs. sick. Doc. says 'tisn't catching. Yours, etc.;" that the wife of a fourth remained seated in the presence of royalty and condescendingly remarked to her majesty, "How's your husband?"

Are the American people to be put in the predicament of Frederick II, who, having sent, in spite, a remarkably stupid man as ambassador to England, said to Sir Hugh Elliott: "And what do the English think of Baron —?" "Sire," replied Sir Hugh, "that he is a most fitting representative of your majesty."

The men and the women of New York are quarreling about their respective hats and exchanging epithets the reverse of complimentary. The charge against the feminine headgear is simply that it is a public nuisance and incompatible with overcrowded civilization. To this the women reply—a little weakly, it must be confessed—that men who wear green hats are not entitled to express, or even to possess, any opinion upon any subject under the sun. Although why the simple fact that some men's hats are of an undesirable color should disqualify in this way is not very clear. Only a small number of men are wearing the green hats, and even a green hat is of no different size or shape to one that is black or brown. Whereas the hats of the women tend to make street locomotion impossible, they are an intolerable discomfort in public conveyances, they are actually dangerous when they are made of a stiff material, and they are hideous to the last degree. Now a green hat may be hideous—it probably is—but this charge does not come gracefully from women, who, in matters of costume, seem to have no sense of beauty whatever, nor a desire for it.

There are some women who would like to rebel if they could. Just as it is impossible to indict a nation, so also is it impossible to indict a sex, because there are always some who have not bowed the knee to Baal. Witness, for example, the agonized woman who writes to the New York Times under the imposing pseudonym of "A Woman Who Will Not Be Made a Freak." She points out that the so-called "Directoire" hat was first introduced at a time when the average woman did not wear a hat at all and the few who adopted the broad-brimmed headgear wore it only in their coaches. She then continues:

And can not you say a word to the dealers? I spent an hour in one of the best millinery parlors of the city last week, tried on every specimen presented to me, and came home hatless and disgusted. It was not price that interfered with a purchase. I told the saleswoman that I could not afford to go to and from my daily business in a cab; I must use the public conveyances, and, as I pay only one fare, I could not take up so much room as her hats would require. She looked amazed and, I have no doubt, thought me something less than idiotic. I was told that unless I took one I would not be "modishly" attired. My business and surroundings require that I dress well. Can you see my dilemma? When I gave an order to have one specially made I was greeted with a smile of pity for my ignorance. Help us out; keep at it, if it takes all winter. Some of us are sensible.

We are saddened, but not surprised, by learning that a well-known woman's tailor in New York has committed suicide. It is easy to believe that an unknown hereafter could hold no such terrors as the realities by which this wretched man must have been surrounded. There is, indeed, no greater mystery in life than the strange force that impels some men to be women's tailors when they might occupy the dignified position of waiter in a cheap restaurant or hotel tout at a railway station. But some things are past finding out.

This unfortunate tailor was hurried to his rash act by the vexations of his business. He could have endured twins with equanimity and he would have smiled at the rigors of a financial panic, but the vagaries of his customers were more than flesh and blood could stand. Death itself was a welcome alternative.

With this tragedy before us there is an irresistible temptation to philosophize upon the trials incidental to the life of the ladies' tailor. Why, we may ask, was not this poor unfortunate content to minister to his own sex? Even then he would have been but the ninth part of a man. By what system of arithmetical depreciation shall we assess the value in manhood of the poor worm who grovels under the caprice of woman when woman is, of all other times, the most capricious, who is willing even for the wealth of Midas to reconcile the prevailing mode with bodily forms that were intended to be divine, but that now are scarcely human? Compared with such an one, the man's tailor assumes a godlike dignity and an imposing self-respect.

The duty of the man's tailor is not difficult. When the cloth and the general style have been selected—a matter of a few minutes at most—the question of fit is left to the tailor. If he is satisfied, so is the customer. Very few men will ever dispute such a matter as this. The trying-on process is for the guidance of the tailor, and as a rule the purchaser has nothing to say. He has put himself in the hands of an expert, and would no more think of challenging his opinion than he would that of the chemist who compounded a prescription for him.

But this is not the case with the woman. Alterations are indispensable parts of the programme, and, however perfect the fit, no woman would be satisfied to omit a delightful preliminary to acceptance. That is one reason why women's costumes cost so much more than men's. The price must allow for their being made over two or three times, inasmuch as the majority of women would rather have a change for the worse than no change at all.

A rather foolish story has been telegraphed from Scotland to the effect that King Edward has put a public slight upon the people of Edinburgh because he was hissed on the streets of that historic city forty years ago. The story goes that the provost and corporation waited at the station to greet the king on his way to Balmoral and that when he was informed of this fact he sent word to say that he could not see them. He himself could be seen through the saloon car window smoking a cigar and reading a newspaper, but as for the provost and the corporation they might just as well have never existed.

It is perfectly true that forty years ago the king, then the Prince of Wales, received a hostile demonstration in Edinburgh. It was at the conclusion of the Mordaunt divorce suit. The prince was a witness, and it was the general opinion that he "lied like a gentleman." Such a spectacle was too much for the unco guid of the Scotch capital—where illegitimate births, it is said, are extraordinarily numerous—and a strict crowd tried to emphasize its own virtue by an insult to the prince.

All that may be true enough, but that the king cherishes a resentment against a new generation is grotesquely absurd. He is not that kind of a man at all. A lack of dignity or of ceremonial courtesy is not among his failings, nor has he ever sought to be revenged on those who rebuked the follies of his early life. Such a rebuke was once administered by Mr. Gladstone, who in a public essay took occasion to lament an apparent tendency on the part of the prince to follow in the footsteps of King George of unsavory memory. Queen Victoria was said to be very much incensed at this public reproof, and her annoyance was intensified when the veteran statesman subsequently included this very essay in a presentation of his own works to his sovereign. But the prince himself showed no annoyance whatever. On the contrary, he took an early opportunity to pay a friendly visit to Mr. Gladstone and to emphasize the cordiality that he felt toward him. It was commonly believed that the counsel of Mr. Gladstone was not only received but actually invoked by the younger man, and that his influence was not without its effect in the formation of a character from which, however, a courteous dignity was never lacking. That the king should now show a pettish ill humor at the memory of an incident forty years old is therefore not only improbable on its face, but in direct contradiction to precedent.

A New York diner-out complains of the inordinate size of the restaurant bill of fare. He felt that it was a personal affront to offer him a pasteboard placard measuring 11 inches by 8 inches and containing the names of 277 dishes. Not having the whole evening at his disposal, he was disinclined to spend an hour or so in a perusal of the menu, and he suggests that if 200 of these dishes were chopped off there would still be sufficient variety for the most exacting, while the money that would be saved by a greater simplicity might well be applied to an improvement in quality.

He finds, too, that the prices are curiously inconsistent. Why should he pay 50 cents for a "good cut of roast beef, bread and butter and polite attention," and then be asked for 40 cents additional because he fancies a little soup; or 30 cents additional for a little plate of rice pudding? He naturally asks "why such prices on the minor and incidental dishes?"

The day of the pet toy dog, an authority on feminine modes asserts, is over. The reason is not far to seek.

The toy dog, the æsthetic mind gravely explains, is out of harmony with the long, graceful lines of the Directoire gowns. When his mistress wore a skirt of walking length Fido was no inconvenience, as she could then bestow all her care on him. But now the long sweeping tight skirt demands all her attention, so the little dog is a pleasure with which she must dispense.

What is worse, the tiny dog is completely out of the picture with a large umbrella hat. What fancy will take the place of the toy dog seems unsettled, but in Hyde Park there are just now more bulldogs than any other breed to be seen abroad in charge of smart women.

The rage for gambling at White's and Almack's clubs in London in other days led to most outrageous betting, as to which Walpole tells what he calls a good tale: A man dropped down in a fit before the door and was carried inside; the club instantly made bets as to whether he would die or not, and when a doctor was called in to attend him his ministrations were interfered with by the members, because, they said, these would affect the fairness of the bets.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A widower who was married recently for the third time, and whose bride had been married once before herself, wrote across the bottom of the wedding invitations: "Be sure and come; this is no amateur performance."

The British artilleryman, as he swelled his chest with pride and pointed to a small bronze cannon, remarked: "And this, sir, is a gun we captured at Bunker 'll." "Yes," blandly replied the American tourist, "you got the gun and we got the hill."

Thomas Riley, a former attorney of Boston, was famous for his wit and powers of repartee. Once in trying a case, he found himself opposed by a lawyer named Lowe. Matters had not gone far before Riley became impatient, and, turning to the jury, said: "Gentlemen, I have heard of Lo, the poor Indian, but who ever heard of Lowe, the poor lawyer?"

One day, an old gentleman who found the Java village at the World's Fair very absorbing, at length confided in a young man standing near. "It's powerful nice to watch," he said, "but I may say I should be better on't if I was a trifle better posted. My jography's a leetle rusty, and it's truth and fact that I don't jestly know where Java is. Now where is it?" "Oh," said the young man, with the assured quiet of one who knows, "just a little way from Mocha!"

Lord Lyveden is an ardent peerage reformer, and tells an anecdote in this connection for whose authenticity he pledges himself. This narrates how a famous statesman of the nineteenth century was called upon to visit his son in prison. He bitterly reproached him, remarking: "Here am I, having worked my way up from a middle-class home to a great position, and when I die you will be the greatest blackguard in the peerage." The son listened quietly, and then replied with terrible irony, "Yes—when you die."

Mr. Lowry is a man with a moderate income and one child, a boy of eleven or twelve years, whom he is already sending to a French master, who is accustomed to be paid every Monday. Recently Mr. Lowry sent Henry to his lesson without the usual bank-note. That evening the father did as he always does—looked over the boy's exercise, and this is what he found Henry doing his best to put into Parisian French: "I have no money. The week is up. Have you no money? Has your father no money? I need money. What is the day of the week? The day of the week is Monday. Does your father know the day of the week?"

Fanny Kemble once spent the summer at a small country town in Massachusetts. While there she engaged a neighbor, a plain farmer, to drive her around. The farmer, desiring to entertain his guest, expatiated freely upon the state of the crops and the neighborhood gossip, until Miss Kemble remarked somewhat testily: "Sir, I engaged you to drive for me, not to talk to me." The farmer said no more. When Miss Kemble was ready to leave town she sent for the man and asked for her bill. One of the items therein she could not understand and asked for an explanation. "That?" said the farmer; "oh, that's 'Sass, $5.' I don't very often take it, but when I do I charge."

Colonel Gilbert Pierce, the late minister to Portugal, once picked up in his arms a young lady who stood hesitating at the corner of a street in an Indiana village, unable to cross it, because a shower had filled it with a rushing torrent of water. The young lady submitted without protest while the colonel strode gallantly through the torrent until he deposited his fair charge on the opposite sidewalk, with dry feet. "Sir!" she then said, indignantly, "are you aware that you have insulted me?" "I was not aware of it," replied the colonel; "but seeing that you are right, I beg to make amends." So saying, he picked up the protesting damsel and restored her to the point where he had first made her acquaintance.

At the time of the fabulous success of Lamartine's "History of the Girondins," M. Buloz, editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, begged the poet to contribute something in prose for his periodical. Lamartine consented, making a condition, however, of an advance payment of four thousand francs. On receiving the money, he handed the publisher a copy of verses, saying that he could print them if he liked as an earnest of his promised articles. Then came the revolution of 1848. One day Lamartine, then minister of foreign affairs, received a call from Buloz, now his bitter enemy. "I have come," said the editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, "to ask you to pay me the four thousand francs I lent you." "Certainly, with pleasure," answered Lamartine, taking four crisp thousand-franc notes out of a drawer of his writing-table. Buloz, quite unprepared for this prompt way of transacting business, faltered, "But, then, I owe you something for those verses." "Oh, that is of no consequence; do not mention that," said Lamartine, carelessly. "Excuse me, M. le Ministre, but the Revue des Deux Mondes prefers not to be under obligation," said the editor, very stiffly. "Ah! then the matter is very easily adjusted; let us call it four thousand francs," and Lamartine replaced the notes in his drawer, locking it up carefully.

Mrs. Pierre Lorillard Ronalds, at a luncheon in New York, narrated her impressions of the great city that she had not seen for twenty years. "New York has now taken her place among the world's capitals," she said. "New York is no longer young and unsophisticated. She has now all the weariness and vice of Paris, London, and Rome. They who still speak of New York as young, childish, innocent, speak very foolishly. They remind me of Lord Exe of the Carlton. Lord Exe at seventy tried to lead the life of a youth of twenty-five. He dyed his hair, wore a corset, and frequented the music halls, Piccadilly Circus, and the Burlington Arcade. One afternoon, as he drove from the Carlton in his brougham, a member said, smiling: 'There goes Exe. He told me over a whisky and soda just now that he felt as fresh as a two-year-old.' Another member sneered: 'He probably meant a two-year-old egg,' he murmured."

A Royal Revenge.

There was once a king of the Cannibal Isles Acquired the typewriter habit. Though far from the centre of fashions and styles, Without any access to newspaper files, 'Twas a caution the way he would stab it, A-knocking out messages wordy and long, On every conceivable subject and wrong: "The Rights of Humanity," "How to Get Strong," "And 'What Can We Learn from the Rabbit?'" "Here, take this!" he'd cry to his runners—"Skiddoo!" And read it to every one down in 'Who's Who!'"

The runners set out with their burdens, perforce, For fear they'd be roasted and branded: They'd stop everybody they happened across Who seemed anybody, and read what the boss Had written, advised and commanded: "Be good and you'll prosper." "Look out and not in,"

"No man can be happy who's living in sin," "Be sure that you're right, then determine to win"—

And other receipts second-handed— For a while the inhabitants listened in quiet, Then suddenly made him a part of their diet.

I speak of the king whom they cooked to your taste Apportioning then with a sabre: "In this way," they argued, "we're saving the waste.

We swallow direct and with praiseworthy haste The whole of our late royal neighbor: No more need we labor, interpret and strive To understand all that he meant while alive, His wisdom we now will digest at one dive, "And save him the typewriting labor!" Alas! he continued to disagree still, As e'er with his subjects, and made them all ill. —William Wallace Whitelock, in New York Sun.

Returning from his visit to the East the Kansas City man related with much complacency this story: "A man from this town, having large financial interests in New York, declined a dinner while there from a New York financier, on the ground that he was going to hear the 'Meistersinger' that evening. 'Meistersinger?' asked the New York innumerable. 'What's that?' The man from this Western 'Prairie Dog City' looked at him a moment and then said: 'You're a barbarian.'"

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

Never in the social annals of San Francisco has there been more gaiety thus early in the season and all indications point to a continuance of the charming entertaining which goes on so merrily day after day. Nearly all of the pretty, dainty little debutantes, that being the type that prevails this winter, will be presented within a fortnight, and any number of affairs are planned in their honor.

The engagement is announced of Miss Mercedes Huffman, daughter of Mrs. C. H. Huffman, to Lieutenant George E. Nelson, Third Cavalry, U. S. A. The wedding will take place late in December.

The wedding of Miss Constance de Young, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young, to Mr. Joseph Oliver Tobin will take place on November 18 at high noon at St. Mary's Cathedral.

The wedding of Miss Gertrude Hyde-Smith, daughter of Mrs. Eleanor Hyde-Smith, to Mr. Baldwin Wood took place on Monday last at the home of the bride's mother on Fillmore Street near Pacific Avenue. The ceremony was celebrated at five o'clock by the Rev. Charles Ramm of St. Mary's Cathedral. Miss Helen Dean was the maid of honor and Mr. Thomas Eastland was the best man. Only relatives and intimate friends were present. After their wedding journey Mr. and Mrs. Wood will occupy Mrs. Hyde-Smith's home for the winter.

The wedding of Miss Mary Eldred Hamlin to Lieutenant Hensley Lacy, U. S. N., took place on Thursday of last week in Christ Church, Coronado. The ceremony was celebrated at noon by Bishop Johnson, assisted by the Rev. Charles Spalding. Miss Josephine Smith, the bride's cousin, was maid of honor and Lieutenant Potet, U. S. N., was the best man. The ushers were Lieutenant-Commander Lorimer, U. S. N., Lieutenant Jensen, U. S. N., Lieutenant Holmes, U. S. N., Lieutenant Lamson, U. S. N., Lieutenant Gatewood, U. S. N., and Surgeon Field, U. S. N. Lieutenant and Mrs. Lacy will spend a month in California and will then leave for New York.

The wedding of Miss Maude Welch, daughter of Mrs. James Miller Welch of Stockton, to Mr. Frank Cushing Dutton took place on Thursday, October 22, at the bride's home in Stockton.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward W. Hopkins entertained at a ball on November 24 at the Fairmont Hotel in honor of their debutante daughter, Miss Florence Hopkins.

Mrs. John McMullin will entertain at a tea on Saturday, November 21, at the Fairmont Hotel in honor of her debutante granddaughter, Miss Anna Weller.

Miss Mary Keeney was the hostess at a luncheon on Wednesday of last week in honor of her cousin, Miss Innes Keeney. The guests were Miss Elizabeth Woods, Miss Maud Wilson, Miss Jeanne Gallois, Miss Florence Hopkins, Miss Virginia Newhall, Miss Clara Allen, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Harriett Alexander, and Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick.

Mrs. Hall McAllister will be the hostess at a tea on Thursday next in honor of her debutante daughter, Miss Ethel McAllister.

Mr. and Mrs. Edgar M. Wilson will entertain at a tea on Tuesday next at their home on Pacific Avenue in honor of their debutante daughter, Miss Maud Lane Wilson.

Miss Alyce Sullivan will entertain at a tea on Thursday next in honor of Miss Asleigh Turner.

Miss Florence Breckinridge will be the hostess at a luncheon on Wednesday next at the Fairmont Hotel in honor of Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick and Miss Clara Allen.

"Come Into the Game."

On Saturday, November 7, the much discussed event "Tag Day," benefit of Children's Hospital, will take place; in case of very bad weather, Tag Day will be postponed until the following Saturday. It is the desire of the committee that the general public have a chance to help the good cause in its own modest way; just through the small but willingly given sum of ten cents per tag, those classes whose children occupy the free beds at the hospital are enabled to give material and moral support to the work of the institution. General headquarters for Tag Day are at Hotel St. Francis. The committee will be there on Friday, the 6th, from nine a. m. until five p. m., for the purpose of distribution; and on Saturday, the 7th, and Monday, the 9th, for collection. All participants are requested to turn in their receipts at the earliest possible date. The committee comprises Mrs. Helen Hecht, general chairman; Mesdames Henry Payot, J. E. Botkin, Bertha G. Lilienthal, Isaac N. Walter, R. V. Watt, and Kerr. A special committee will visit all the grammar schools and personally instruct the 16,000 enlisted school children as to their duties.

The De Gogorza Concerts.

Emilio de Gogorza, the famous baritone, gives the first of a series of three concerts here next Sunday afternoon at 2:30, November 8, at Christian Science Hall. His programme is a varied and interesting one, with no less than fifteen numbers for himself alone, including selections from Handel, Gluck, Schumann, Grieg, Brahms, Caldara, Alvarez, Sidney Homer, H. Tours, Howard Brockway, and Horatio Parker. Signor Gogorza will be assisted by Henry C. Whittemore, the pianist, who will play as solos selections from Chopin, Mendelssohn-Liszt, and Forgnes.

The same programme will be given at Ye Liberty Playhouse in Oakland Friday afternoon, November 13.

Signor Gogorza's second concert here will be Thursday evening next, November 12, and at his farewell appearance, Sunday afternoon, November 15, a special request programme will be given.

Seats may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s for the concerts in this city, and for Oakland the tickets will be on sale Monday at the box office of Ye Liberty Playhouse.

The New York Grand Opera Season.

Oscar Hammerstein announces the repertoire of the opening week of the Manhattan Opera House. The third season begins on Monday evening, November 9. "Tosca" will be the introductory opera, arrangements having been made whereby Mr. Hammerstein shall hereafter have the right to produce this and all other operas by Puccini. The first night of the season will be the occasion of the American debut of the Contessa Maria Labia. The French baritone, Maurice Renaud, will be the Baron Scarpia of the cast. Signor Zenatello, Mr. Hammerstein's principal Italian tenor, will be heard as Cavaradossi.

The Metropolitan Opera will open its Greater New York season in Brooklyn with "Faust," November 14. Caruso and Farrar are to sing the chief rôles. The regular season is to begin at the Metropolitan, November 16, with "Aida," Destinn and Caruso as the stars.

The president and secretary announce that the annual meeting of the California branch, American National Red Cross, will be held in Century Hall, southwest corner of Franklin and Sutter Streets, on Monday, November 9, 1908, at 2 p. m. An appropriate programme has been arranged and those interested are cordially invited to be present.

At last, Puccini's opera, "La Bobème," is to be sung at the Royal Opera in Berlin, after all the rest of the world has heard it many times. The emperor, it seems, disliked the moral tone of the text and of Murger's book, whence it came. Now he has withdrawn his paternal objection and "La Bohème" will have a place in the repertory beside the innocent "Salomé," for example.

PRIVATE INSTRUCTION AND BOARD—ENGLISH, German, French and Music—for one or two young girls, in private home near city. Best educational and references. Reply to Box F, Argonaut.

Strauss's "Elektra"

Richard Strauss's new opera, "Elektra," which is nearing completion, is already arousing a great deal of comment. Strange to say, the Italian papers seem to know more about it than the German. In dramatic power, in polyphonic boldness, in originality of instrumental combinations which reveal the highest inspiration, "Elektra" is said to far outdistance "Salomé." Now and then there are bizarre effects, but the work produces new and sensational impressions, and contains psychological moments of wonderful power, and it grips the listener in a way that compels and convinces him. The entire opera is condensed into the part of Elektra. The other persons, not excepting Orestes, have small rôles only. Strauss and his friends are somewhat concerned about the difficulties with which the artists who sing the part of Elektra will have to contend. How many will succeed in it? Surely very few. The rôle of Elektra is far more taxing than that of Salomé. Aside from ordinary difficulties, the whole scheme of the part makes it doubly difficult. Strauss ignores traditions and often forgets even the natural limitations of the human voice. The rôle of Orestes is written in the bass clef, and is to be sung by a baritone with a dark-colored voice. This part, too, is exceedingly difficult, but it is short, and the others are shorter still. The opera is in only one act and will last an hour and forty-five minutes. The première of "Elektra" will occur at the Dresden Royal Opera February 1, while the second performance will be in Berlin February 15. Both the performances will be given under the personal direction of the composer. The publisher of "Elektra" has received requests from all countries for the rights of performance. The Italian theatres are especially zealous in their demands. The Costanzi Theatre, at Rome, offered 18,500 lire for the first Italian performance, but La Scala outbid Rome with 20,000 lire, so the Italian première will take place at Milan.

After asking why it is that Mrs. Kendal no longer occupies her old dominant position on the London stage, a writer in the London World replies to his own question by saying: "I think the reason lies partly in the broad meaning of her style, which began when she toured the United States 'with phenomenal success in 1889 and following years. I remember seeing her after she came back, and noticing how the huge American theatres and the American love of emphasis had coarsened the delicate texture of her art. Unfortunately, it has never quite recovered. Seeing that she has spent her time chiefly in playing indifferent parts for long periods before provincial audiences, it was hardly to be expected that it should recover." The American theatres have nothing to do with it, says the Boston Transcript, in comment. Mrs. Kendal, now sixty years old, has lost much of her youthful zeal and inspiration, and has been acting, moreover, for many years, in one groove, to a particular audience. Long ago she began to contract mannerisms, which her admirers accepted as fresh beauties, and these have been growing upon her until her acting has become labored and artificial.

The Webster homestead is still standing at New Haven, and the window where Noah Webster sat for upward of forty years while he compiled and rewrote his dictionary overlooks part of Yale College. Diagonally across the street from the window is the old Grove-Street Cemetery, where he was buried. He was born October 16, 1758. In his youth he had money troubles, like many another author. He brought up a family of eight on the proceeds of his spelling book. In later years he never tired of telling how his father started him out in the world to make his fortune with $8 of Continental money in his pocket, amounting in reality to barely $4 in currency.

An ingenious New Yorker makes a bobby of writing missives to actresses, criticising their gowns. The ladies of the stage reply with really delightful rancor. The critic assumes no eminence by this procedure, and the autograph letters have no great intrinsic value. In order to market them among the magazines, he would have to change them over into testimonials to cosmetics.

Mrs. Leslie Carter is to begin her season in her new John Luther Long play in Washington during the first week of December.

The famous surgeon, Velpeau, was visited one day at his house during the consultation hour by a marquis renowned for his closeness. Velpeau informed the marquis that an operation was urgent, and that the fee would amount to four thousand francs. At this the marquis made a wry face and left. A fortnight later Dr. Velpeau, while making his rounds in the Hospital de la Charité, had his attention attracted by a face that seemed familiar to him. In answer to his inquiry, it was stated that the patient was a footman of a nobleman in the Faubourg Saint Germain. The surgeon found that his case resembled in every particular the somewhat unusual one for which the marquis had consulted him a fortnight previously. He refrained, however, from making any comments. Three weeks after the operation, when the patient was about to be discharged, Dr. Velpeau called him aside and exclaimed: "Monsieur, I am extremely flattered and pleased to have been able to cure you. There is, however, a small formality with which you will have to comply before I can sign your excuse; that is, you will have to sign a check for ten thousand francs in behalf of the public charity bureau of your metropolitan district." The patient's face became livid. "You can do what you like about it," continued the doctor; "but if you refuse all Paris will know tomorrow that the Marquis de D— adopted the disguise of a footman in order to secure free treatment at this hospital and to usurp the place which belongs by right to a pauper." Of course the marquis paid.

Once a denizen of the up-State regions, where whiskers grow in plenty and umbrellas bulge at will, decided to visit New York. But he decided to visit the bewildering metropolis quite as a man of the world—not to be taken in by the wicked men, who, as he understood, made a business of deceiving the guileless up-stater. Hence he arrived at the Grand Central looking very, very wise, and proceeded, first of all, to visit the collection of wax figures at the Eden Musee. He was engaged in looking critically at one of the most life-like groups on exhibition there, when a policeman suddenly plucked him by the sleeve. The up-stater turned. "You mustn't smoke in here," said the policeman, severely. A look of wisdom beyond the power of words to describe came over that up-stater's face. Continuing brazenly to smoke, he remarked: "Tut, tut. Go away. Don't you think I know that you're made of wax?"

Mr. Bryan and the Democratic Party.

It is safe to assume that Mr. Bryan's career as a presidential aspirant has reached its climax. Even if he could find the temerity—and temerity, be it remembered, is one of his many specialties—again to pose as a candidate, it is unthinkable that his party should again try to win under his leadership. None the less Mr. Bryan is likely to remain an important figure in the national Democratic councils. His personal acquaintance is wider than that of any other man in the party; he has winning personal virtues and a most impressive dignity and geniality. He is a fine organizer and an incomparable speaker. On top of all he has relative youth and unimpaired energy. He likes the political game and he now has a special and personal motive for desiring party influence in his resentment against Mr. Hearst. Unquestionably we shall keep on hearing from Mr. Bryan for a long time to come; unquestionably he will have something to say as to the general policies of his party and as to the men who are to be its champions.

The American people know Mr. Bryan well, and in many ways like him. He has those personal qualities which unfailingly command popular good-will. Wherein Mr. Bryan has failed is not at the point of personal respect, but at the point of public confidence. While everybody likes and in a way admires him, nobody regards him as a consistent or safe counselor or as a judicious leader. He is believed to be lacking in those qualities of judgment and consistency essential in a wise administrator. He is one whom his fellow-countrymen are more willing to hear than to heed—one whose powers are those of agitation rather than authority.

Just what is to be the future of the Democratic party it is not easy to foretell. It was beaten twelve years ago in its protest against the policies enforced in its name by President Cleveland. It was beaten again eight years ago in its alliance with Populism. It was beaten still again when, four years ago, it swung back to a relative conservatism. Now it has been overwhelmingly beaten under a policy directly at odds to that implied in the candidacy of Judge Parker in 1904. It is easy enough now to see what might have been—to see that a skillful use of the Rooseveltian policies, combined with a moderate tariff reform scheme and with appeal to the spirit of old-time conservatism, might have carried the party to success. But while Democracy dallied with opportunities, studiously sought the line of expediency, and forgot principles, Republicanism captured its battle cries and bereft it of its opportunity. Today the Republican party has made its own all those potentialities of moral appeal which might have belonged to the Democratic party if it had had the wisdom to seize upon them when time and tide served. The underlying weakness of the Democratic party is three-fold: First, it has been so long a mere party of opposition, so long a protestor against the policies of its rival, as to have lost the guidance of fixed and definite principles. Second, it has been so long associated with the idea of defeat, of failure, of incompetence, of internal dissension, that it has lost the confidence of the country. Third, it has been so long out of power that it is weak on the score of personality. It has had no opportunity, outside of the South, to train up a new generation of leaders and prophets; and since in the present posture of our affairs Southern leadership is out of the question, it has nobody fit to command political forces. Bryan has been accepted as a leader and he may continue to serve as a leader because there is no other man within the party qualified by acquaintance or standing to command respect or attention.

One demonstration of the campaign just ended is this, namely, that Democracy can not win before the American people in its present alliance with that system of political notions and purposes which, for want of a more definite name, the country has come to call Bryanism. Before Democracy can come again into power it must find a new and better creed, based upon principles, and competent by its powers of appeal to command the respect of the country. The American people will not turn over the responsibilities of government to a party of shifting ideas and policies, lacking the assurance afforded by fixed principles and habits, and whose success would be nothing less than a menace to the business prospects of the country.

In the late campaign Democracy picked up a false issue and a vicious affiliation. The bargain made at Denver with the leaders of organized labor is simply one more burden which the Democratic party must carry if it can not find the resolution to thrust it aside. Republicanism is now definitely pledged in support of the principles which lie back of industrial freedom; Democracy, if not pledged to the schemes of the labor leaders, has at least been smirched in its reputation by association with laborism in its most objectionable phases. A danger which now threatens the Democratic party is that it will not find the courage to cast away the false issues of Gompersism and to establish itself upon those unyielding principles of justice and equity which must ultimately prevail if we are to sustain the heritage which came to us from our fathers.

The character and course of political parties is more the result of temperament, tendencies, and unforeseen occurrences than of studied calculation. The future of Democracy must grow out of a compound of history, character, tendencies, and opportunities. The hope of Democratic success is not promising or immediate. True wisdom should aim rather to build up the party character than to win victories, leaving the future to take care of itself. If the Democratic party will do this; if it will stand upon definite principles, eliminate that body of false issues which has been engrafted upon it, cut itself off from evil associations, decline concession to a mere opportunism, cultivate and promote its men of character and talent, time will do for it that which it has not been able to do for itself. The Republican party, unchecked by a strong opposition, rent as it is bound to be by the tariff complication, bound to suffer through the jealousies of its leaders—the Republican party, successful, but face to face with difficulties, is bound at some points some time to go wrong. And when it does go wrong, then will be the opportunity of reorganized Democracy if Democracy shall have so commended itself as to stand in public respect and confidence.

National Affairs.

The termination of the presidential campaign with its assurance of the continuation of Republican policies in national affairs has been signalized by a somewhat spectacular boom in industrial and financial quarters. The prices of securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange have gone a-soaring, and the week has witnessed an almost universal movement towards industrial revival. Much of this, no doubt, is due to the spirit of exhilaration, but something of it is based upon logical and work-a-day causes. Times have been steadily getting better this past half-year; money has been easier and the spirit of enterprise has been revived. But there has been a season of waiting to see how the presidential campaign would turn out. Much of the activity in the industrial world noted from day to day has been overdue for weeks past in the natural order of things. There is every reason to believe that the business affairs of the country are returning to the prosperous level where they stood before the panic of last year.

Mr. Taft's one utterance of importance since his election has been a wholesome stimulant to business activity. "Every business man who is obeying the law," said the President-elect to the Cincinnati Commercial Club last week, "may go ahead with all the energy in his possession. Every enterprise which is within the statutes may proceed without fear of interference from the administration when acting legally. All interests within the jurisdiction of the Federal government may expect a rigid enforcement of the laws against dishonest methods." This has been taken by the country to mean that while there will be no cessation in the work of prosecuting illegitimate agencies and methods, there will be none of that shouting from the housetops—and from without the canebrakes—that has so served during the past two years to infect the country with uncertainty and alarm.

The new administration stands pledged to revision of the tariff, and for this purpose it is universally believed that a special session of Congress will be called immediately after Mr. Taft's inauguration. This is the only uncertainty which now clouds the business horizon. Everybody excepting the extreme stand-pat element recognizes the necessity for revision of the tariff, and yet nobody proposes any easy means by which it may be done. How to do it, and at the same time how not to blight the business of the country—here is a problem for which nobody offers a solution, a problem which may well serve to keep Mr. Taft awake o' nights between now and next March.

Tariff revision in any adequate and effective shape is going to be made difficult by that powerful element in the Republican party which is affiliated with protected interests and which openly and bitterly resents any and every proposal for change. This element will have powerful support alike in the Senate and in the House. Probably it will be strong enough in conjunction with other influences to reestablish Mr. Cannon in the speakership, and thus to present a serious bar to reformatory action. There is bound to be a strenuous, a bitter, and probably a protracted struggle which will try both the powers and the patience of the new President and which will surely have a profound influence upon the future politics of the country.

The Argonaut believes that not only the interests of equity, but the integrity and fortunes of the Republican party rest upon this issue. We believe those who are preparing to resist revision to be regardless not only of equity and justice, but false to the political interest with which they stand affiliated. The Republican party stands pledged to a substantial and thorough-going revision, and if the party shall fail to find within itself the virtue to keep its pledges, it may not fairly complain if four years from now the country shall seek another political agency to forward its fixed purpose. Today the Republican party stands at the very height of a successful career; but we believe that the tariff issue has within it the possibilities of a colossal party upheaval. It is, we believe, the duty of every man who respects and values the Republican party as an agency in the political life of the country, as well as the duty of every citizen who respects equity and justice, to support the President-elect in the struggle which lies before him.

The newspapers are full of Cabinet gossip, most of which undoubtedly is developed through journalistic imagination or by fourth-rate politicians between the fourth and subsequent cocktails. It is hardly possible that Mr. Taft has thus early come to any conclusion with respect to the organization of his official family. The Argonaut will be glad to see Mr. Taft return to the old practice of putting into the various Cabinet posts not merely his personal friends, private secretaries, and representatives of historic names, but men of established national standing. In recent years this rule has been more regarded in the breach than in the observance, and we think that the practice has tended to diminish the dignities associated with government. We should like to see President Taft's Cabinet made up of men of real distinction, men whose fitness for high responsibilities have been illustrated by high public careers. We are tired of the spectacle of a Cabinet made up of two or three leading figures and pieced out with an array of personal favorites, clerical subordinates, and representatives of historical names. To be entirely plain about it, we would like to see the Cortelyous, the Garfields, and the Bonapartes give place to men of higher qualities and larger calibre, reflective not so much of the associations and vanities of the President as of the responsible political judgment and confidence of the country. A principle in the selection of Cabinet ministers which was good enough for Washington and Lincoln is worth preservation.

The Latest Outbreak at Stanford.

The Argonaut is grieved to note the revival at Stanford University of the troubles between the student body and the faculty which made so painful a scandal last spring. It appears that the spirit of insubordination which was thought to have been exorcised still dominates many of the students. Evidences of it have been manifested locally from time to time, and on one notable occasion President Jordan was publicly treated by a considerable body of students with marked disrespect.

Within the week disgruntled students have illustrated their spleen in connection with the annual plug-ugly farce. A poster gotten out in advertisement of this entertainment has given offense by the vulgar liberty it has taken with certain members of the faculty; and it is furthermore regarded as a violation of pledges made by certain students at the time when last spring's troubles were nominally settled. Seven students associated with the offensive publication have been suspended by authority of that faculty committee which sits in judgment upon student affairs, and President Jordan, sustaining the action of the committee, has declared that no open and offensive ridiculing of members of the faculty will be tolerated. All this has made a great hubbub among the boisterous elements of the student body, which have found a mouthpiece in the Palo Alto, a semi-official college paper edited by a group of students, three of whose names appear in the list of suspensions. The Palo Alto's comments are studiously guarded, but their animus is none the less very plain. It believes, says its leading editorial, that for all the trouble at Stanford the blame is more with the administration of the university than with the students. "There is," it says, "something the matter with Stanford internally."

There is, indeed, something the matter with Stanford internally. Something has been the matter a long time, and it has grown out of an unwise policy designed to give students a species of training through initiative and responsibility. From its beginning the policy of Stanford has been liberal, in that it has allowed students an unusual measure of authority in relation to affairs which in older universities are commonly regulated by the faculty. It appears that the innovation has not worked well; that the youths who go to Stanford lack the knowledge, poise, and self-control essential to the measure of authority which has been allowed them. Conditions grew steadily worse until last spring there broke out a species of hoodlumism more in keeping with the traditions and standards of the Barbary Coast of San Francisco than of a seat of scholarship and culture. It is not necessary to go over the scandalous and tragic story. The facts are sufficiently well remembered and they abundantly justified the repressive measures which were enforced by the president of the university, backed by its board of trustees. It was hoped that the lesson of last spring's dismissals and suspensions would sink deep enough to prevent recurrence of that gross hoodlumism which styles itself the "Stanford spirit." But not so; there still abides in the student body a deep sense of resentment and hatred, an unwillingness to accept in good part the adjustment to which all parties acceded in the settlement which followed the original disturbance.

It seems to be the idea of the lads at Stanford—and of some of the girls as well—that the student body is the whole thing at the university and that its ideas and judgments should make the law of the institution. They take the high tone that without their presence the university would be a nullity and that they are, therefore, entitled to make and declare their own rules within the university, and to conduct themselves with absolute license outside of its jurisdiction. They resent regulations made by the faculty designed to sustain social order and to carry forward the purposes for which the university was established. They seem wholly regardless of the seniority of the faculty as compared with the student body and wholly without that sort of respect which everywhere except at Stanford is accorded as a matter of course to the directors and teachers of youth. In brief, the spirit of the Stanford student body is that of the licensed smart-alec, and the public and private manners which it has fostered are in entire conformity with smart-alec standards.

Stanford University was founded for the nurture and culture of the youth of California. Its great endowment rests in the hands of a board of trustees who are absolutely responsible under general terms set forth by the late Senator Stanford. To abandon the administration of the university to the student body would be a shameful abdication of a sacred trust. It would furthermore be to turn the beneficent intent of Mr. Stanford to mockery and contempt. In the founding of Stanford there was no purpose to provide a training school or an asylum for ruffianism and hoodlumism, no matter under what high names these degeneracies may masquerade.

The youths who imagine that they have the fortunes of the university in their hands would do well to pause and consider this fact, namely, that nobody would be hurt if every mother's son of them were to pack his valise and abandon Stanford forever. No young man of university age who has not learned and is unwilling to learn the common precepts of respect for teachers and elders is of the slightest use to any institution of learning. The best thing that could happen to Stanford University would be the elimination of every youth who resents the discipline which the faculty and trustees in their experience and wisdom have devised. The greater the number of protestors and recalcitrants to go, the better. Stanford would better have a hundred or fifty or even ten serious-minded students in harmony with the discipline of the institution, and reflecting the spirit of its foundation, than five thousand bad-tempered and ill-mannered youths clamoring for "rights" which do not belong to them and shaming the name and cause of higher education by their inanity and their delinquencies.

It would be a fine thing for Stanford University if its authorities should seize upon the present trouble as an opportunity for purging the institution of the whole system of false notions and false practice that has grown up within it. It would be a fine thing if they would throw out every boy and every girl who declines decently and in good spirit to accept the rules made for the maintenance of social propriety and the promotion of scholarship. Those who are left will represent all that is worthy in the student body, and in the end they will reflect more credit upon the institution and be of greater use to the world than a larger but contaminated group. Incidentally it may be added that the decimation of the student body now at Palo Alto would eliminate some of the financial problems of the institution. It would give money for the creation of buildings and for other essential purposes. It would be a benefit all round, and if it is found necessary in the interest of discipline to dismiss the whole group of recalcitrants and their sympathizers, there ought not to be a moment's hesitation on the part of the authorities.

Parents of the wiser and better sort have no sympathy with the "spirit" which has so demoralized Stanford. Nothing so commends a university in those quarters where friendship and good-will have value as the strict enforcement of a legitimate and proper discipline. Let the authorities of Stanford enforce the rules which they have defined, no matter what the immediate cost at the point of reduction in the number of students may be, and in the end they will find themselves more than justified not only in the higher tone, but in the enlarged prosperity of the institution. They will find, as did Ann Arbor twenty or more years ago, that for every hoodlum dismissed there will come an earnest and devoted student. The larger fortunes of Ann Arbor were made by standing fast to principle and by sustaining discipline in a crisis precisely similar to that which now exists at Stanford.

Religious Opinion and Political Life.

President Roosevelt's letter to a citizen of Ohio with respect to Mr. Taft's religious opinions adds nothing to a discussion which began before he was born and will persist after he is dead. Mr. President merely repeats commonplaces familiar to all who take any interest in religious discussions, spicing them with a few of those phrases which unflinchingly mark the Rooseveltian literary style. It is really too bad that Mr. Roosevelt can not discuss any question with anybody without calling his protagonist either a liar or a slanderer. In matters of this kind heat and epithets serve only to mar the dignity of discussion and to render it futile, if not, indeed, something very much worse.

In spite of all the talk heard from time to time about religion and politics, there is very little discrimination or none at all in this country on the score of religious opinion. A man's religious ideas have now hardly a more important bearing upon his political life than the color of his hair. Witness the fact that everywhere in American public life there are Christians of various sects, "non-professors," Jews, Catholics, and what not. How many citizens of California know or care anything about the religious opinions of Governor Gillett? Who cares that one congressman is a Methodist, another a Jew, and another a "True Lifer"—whatever that may be. The truth is that in this country we have so far gotten away from old superstitions and bigotries as to care nothing at all, as indeed scarcely to inquire into the religious ideas of candidates for public office. When the times and the man coördinate, religion practically cuts no figure.

If the President were a man of nicer sensibilities he would have left Mr. Taft to speak for himself with respect to his religious opinions. He surely ought to know that by his letter to Mr. Martin he tends to emphasize a criticism which in many minds is not to Mr. Taft's credit and which does not lighten the burdens of his position. A keener and surer sense of propriety would have prompted the President to a policy of reserve. There will be times in plenty when he may air his ideas about church and state and other matters without appearing to do it as the guide, philosopher, and special keeper of the President-elect.

"What Organized Labor Wants."

It is a curious fact that among those who assume to speak for organized labor not one has ever in a straightforward, judicial, and truthful way presented in concrete form the precise things which organized labor wants. Whenever there is pretense of discussing the matter, the "appeal of labor" is so involved in misstatement, half-statement, half-truth, and no-truth, as to command neither comprehension nor respect.

For example, in McClure's Magazine for November Mr. Samuel Gompers, employing the handy device of a formal "interview," undertakes to define "what organized labor wants"; but before he gets through his opening phrases he falls into manifest and stupid falsehood. He declares as fundamental the "rights of association," of "free speech," to "work for whom you please," to "stop work when you please for any reason you please or for no reason." Mr. Gompers knows as well as anybody that this is not the creed of organized labor and he knows that he is pettifogging and lying when he so declares. When, let us ask, has organized labor ever stood for the right "to work for whom you please"? The Argonaut could cite a thousand instances where the representatives of organized labor have stood aggressively and violently for the very reverse of this principle.

We have had some experience with the practical operations of organized labor in San Francisco—in the teamsters' strike of six or eight years ago, when the champions of organized labor broke the arms, smashed in the skulls, gouged out the eyes, and murdered in cold blood certain citizens who chose to work for whom they pleased. The case is by no means an isolated one. In every instance of a general strike in San Francisco the agents of organized labor have denied absolutely and violently the primary right of the citizen to work for whom he pleases. Only a little more than a year ago no less than twenty men were cruelly murdered in the streets of San Francisco for working for whom they pleased in a business so useful and innocent as that of operating a street-car. And the record in San Francisco has been duplicated over and over again in every American community. In the face of these facts, how dares this insolent liar to pretend that organized labor stands for a principle which universal experience proves that it does not stand for—a principle which it violently opposes in every industrial crisis?

What organized labor does stand for is the demand that it be allowed absolute monopoly of labor. It stands for the presumption that labor of any and every kind "belongs" to organized labor. It would enforce a rule that would starve to death every workman who does not choose to enlist in the ranks of organized labor and submit to its dictation. Furthermore, in demanding for itself absolute monopoly of labor it declines to make itself even in the slightest degree responsible under the law. It would set up within the social body a selfish class authority apart from and above the law, with power to write the rules of industry and of life in general, to impose taxes, to lay penalties, to penalize, and to execute—and all without any sort of regulation or restraint and free from any sort of responsibility.

Further on in Mr. Gompers's article we have a suggestion of the political morality of this precious alien. "I have been compelled," he says, "to make our demands for recognition on the national political parties; the Republican convention repulsed us; the Democrats made us liberal concessions." "In the coming election," he proceeds, "I believe the organized workmen will remember their friends and their enemies when they come to vote." Here we have an unblushing statement of the policy under which organized labor, in so far as it may be controlled by its leaders, is seeking to sell its vote to the highest bidder. It will, Mr. Gompers thinks, "remember its friends and its enemies." In other words, it will, if Mr. Gompers can control it, put to one side the proprieties, moralities, and decencies implied in the political franchise and pay with support at the polls for such "concessions" as have been made to it.

There is accumulative evidence to the effect that the rank and file of organized labor have a higher conception of political privilege and responsibility than Mr. Gompers supposes. But the virtue is with the rank and file and not with Mr. Gompers. He confesses himself not merely a class partisan, but one willing and eager to lead the workmen of the United States into such practice of political corruption as could have but one end, namely, that of disrupting our system, of undoing the work of our fathers, and of creating a situation which would unfailingly be an invitation to some man on horseback.

Editorial Notes.

If Mrs. Taft really said what she is said to have said about women and politics at Hot Springs, Virginia, last week, she has less reserve than might be desired in a President's wife. The idea that women should have the privilege of voting without the responsibilities which go along with voting is only a little less naïve than that women should have the right to vote without the privilege of declaring their opinions and tendering their persuasions to others—of electioneering, in other words. Mrs. Taft's notion of woman in politics appears to be a sort of compound of the voting privilege with "ladylike" standards of social deportment. All of which simply goes to demonstrate that Mrs. Taft has no comprehension of the subject, therefore no right to any opinions about it, and yet is without the prudence to avoid discussing it. The wife of a President of the United States holds a very important relationship to the social life of the country, not by any official right, but by universal courtesy. She may make herself greatly admired, as Mrs. Roosevelt has done, for example, or she may make herself a popular joke, as in some other instances which it would be ungracious to specify. Public discussions of social and political questions would better be avoided by the mistress of the White House, since to violate this rule is likely to involve not only the lady herself, but her husband, in perpetual hot water. The best way for Mr. Taft to endear himself to the American people is to maintain a strict reserve and above all things to keep out of the newspapers.

The retirement of Dr. Eliot from the presidency of Harvard College is in the order of nature and, therefore, a thing to be accepted without serious regret. President Eliot has had a long career and has done a magnificent work, and it is well that he should give over the activities of his great position before the heaviness of age has left its mark upon his mind. The great work of President Eliot at Harvard has been to separate that institution from its theological and clerical traditions without a jar to its internal mechanism and without sacrifice of its unique prestige. It was a work calling for clear vision, a noble self-confidence, and a firm hand, and it has been achieved with a completeness which even Dr. Eliot himself, we imagine, could hardly have conceived to be possible. In doing what he has done for Harvard, Dr. Eliot has had an influence upon the American educational system not second in its importance to that of any one man in the history of the country. The wisdom which enabled Dr. Eliot to see what Harvard needed forty years ago now enables him to see the necessity for further reform in educational practice. He sees plainly the tendencies which are turning our schools of higher culture into seminaries of fashionable observance and of a coarse athleticism. He has sounded the alarm and he has withdrawn Harvard from certain aggressive forms of "sport." But he lacks the youth and the vitality to lead the new movement which is essential to the preservation of the higher culture in its integrity, and passes it on to younger men. Dr. Eliot has honorably earned the period of repose, and let us hope that he may have length of years to enjoy it.

It will not be easy for the trustees of Harvard College to find a successor to President Eliot. Scholars there are and wise men and administrators and men of light and leading; but where is the man neither too young nor too old with the combination of knowledge, culture, practical insight, intellectual and spiritual power, administrative discretion, combined with gifts of expression, to sit in the chair which Dr. Eliot vacates? The times, with all their aids to personal development, produce few such men. It will not be sufficient for the man who is to succeed Dr. Eliot merely to carry on the work which Dr. Eliot has begun. The future president of Harvard must be to the times which are before us what Dr. Eliot has been to the times which are behind us. He must deal with our times in a spirit as large and with a wisdom as profound as Dr. Eliot dealt with his times. The problems are not the same, but they are as great as those which Dr. Eliot encountered when he entered upon his high duties forty years ago. The requirement is great, very great indeed.

Mr. James J. Hill of St. Paul is quoted as mildly discrediting the post-election industrial boom by the remark that "Politics don't make business." This remark is rather more striking than profound, be it said with all due respect to Mr. Hill. Good politics does, indeed, "make business" by supplying the elements of stability and confidence upon which commercial and industrial activity is based. And, by the same token, bad politics has a definite relation to business by creating distrust and alarm, discouraging enterprise, and limiting those operations which are carried on upon the basis of confidence and credit.

It is a maxim of law, we believe, that he who pleads equity must come into court with clean hands. It should be a maxim of politics that they who ask for the defeat of an unworthy man on moral grounds should present as an alternative candidate a man of clean character. This is one of the many lessons of our late election.

THE CRITIC'S DUTY AND DIFFICULTY.

In the November number of Putnam's and the Reader is a readable paper by Eugene Wendell Harter, entitled "A Plea for Critics." It is not certain that critics as a class especially desire to have their profession defended, but few will resent the use of the arguments and illustrations used in this instance. Mr. Harter is apparently fair in stating his case:

A man who has a passionate love for literature, one who has been vouchsafed many talents but who has somehow missed the last supreme gift, that of creative genius, is to be pitied when he has put forth his every endeavor—and has failed. The very keenness of his appreciation of his own failure should increase his ability as a critic, enabling him often to do full justice to the point of view of a writer. No one who has that final spark, the ability to create, to produce the highest kind of literature, would doom himself to play perpetually the part of major-domo in the world of letters.

This is a suggestive paragraph on the qualifications and usefulness of the much-abused yet indispensable guide:

The critic is born, then made. He must by birth and heritage be endowed with the gift of keen observation and appreciation. We have heard a pupil of Leschetizky say that it was torture for her to listen to music as a rule because of her too exquisite appreciation of the inadequacy of the usual interpretation. It is something of this sensibility which a critic must possess. Then the education of the critic must be the broadest. Henry James declares that a novelist must know everything. How much more essential is this in the case of an adequate critic. Some would go so far as to declare that no one can attempt an appreciation of Dickens unless he is an authority on the picaresque novelists, or venture to criticize George Ade or Mr. Dooley with authority unless he is conversant with the wit of Aristophanes and can compare modern essays in-slang with the argot of the Athenian of the age of Pericles. The doctrine of "the continuity of ancient and modern literature" is receiving a new impetus in England at present. One prominent English journal says: "To instance one or two famous efforts of literary imagination—who can fully appreciate More's Utopia or Gulliver's Travels without reference to Plato or Lucian? Who could omit Greek philosophy from the influences that color Wordsworth or Shelley, or Homer, Virgil, and Theocritus from a classical appreciation of Tennyson?"

Concerning the difficulties of the critic there is much to be said. Something more than universal knowledge and unflinching appreciation are required to make him thoroughly and always satisfactory:

The list of qualities which we demand of a critic is certainly a comprehensive one. With a keen, penetrating intellect he must remain as impressionable as a child. He must feel the perfect joy that the juste mot gives and be ready to do full justice to any Sentimental Tommy who is willing to forfeit the prize if he but find it at last. He must be ready to say with de Senancour, "Pour moi, je ne pretends pas vivre, mais seulement regarder la vie." In his bird's-eye view of the world's literature, present and past, he must be quick to detect similarities and to announce anything which has about it anything unique or even novel. He must widen the view of his audience and show them that because mutton is good, a dinner should not consist entirely of courses of mutton variously served. With all his breadth of view, he must not fail in definiteness or in incisiveness. He must delight in the whimsical mood of a Lewis Carroll, and not miss a point of the preciosity of a Browning.

Thankless as is the critic's task, he will continue his application, and it is well, for without him there would be no literature. In the last analysis there is little of the printed word worthy of preservation that is not a criticism of life or of manners.

CAMPAIGN ECHOES.

The comments of the New York press on the national election bear no marks of the midnight oil nor of the feverish haste with which editorial reference to anxiously awaited news is sometimes prepared. Upon the contrary, there is every evidence of leisure, as though the solons of the newspaper world had written in advance about a foregone conclusion and had awaited only the definite announcement from the polls to empty the editorial pigeonholes and to give their contents to the world.

The Springfield Republican indulges in historical philosophizing and asks in some perplexity what these things mean. Within less than ten years after Lee's surrender the Democrats carried the national House in spite of the record of the Southern wing in waging Civil War. But in this year of grace, with no memories of treason actually alive, they can carry practically nothing:

It seems preposterous to rank in gravity the free-silver movement of the Democracy of 1894-1896, with the Civil War record of that party; yet the party has had greater difficulty in regaining public confidence after its free-silver campaign than it had after being cut to pieces by secession and the prolonged, desperate effort to destroy the Union.

Is the inference to be drawn that the American people today resent more bitterly a presumed menace to their business prosperity—that is to say, their facility in making money—than they did an actual assault with gunfire upon the national territorial integrity, which cost a million lives?

Such facts can be satisfactorily explained, perhaps, only on the assumption that the Democratic party is about to die.

The disposition of the labor vote is the subject of general comment. Editorial references are usually brief and terse, as though prepared at the last moment, and we may infer that Mr. Gompers's ability to swing the labor organization was regarded with some uncertainty, if not apprehension. The New York Sun says:

Perhaps it would be wrong to assume that Mr. Taft got the entire labor vote, much as it looks that way; but it is evidently proper to pay to labor the deserved compliment of saying that it has vindicated itself from the charge that it could be "delivered" by Mr. Gompers or by any other demagogue. The result speaks volumes for labor's independence and good sense, and justifies the belief that the Sun has so often expressed that in politics no one can lead it by the nose.

The New York Globe is rather more bitter. Gompers would have played the rôle of a political Moses, but unluckily for him there was no host to follow him. Bryan alone was deluded:

Not even Bryan is so completely discredited as Samuel Gompers. Only his utter failure saves a remnant. Had his frantic effort to drag "labor" into politics not ended in fiasco the American Federation would have had cause for deep resentment against the man who misled them. Fortunately for its members, and for him, the common sense and self-respect of its members saved the organization from disaster and left him a victim merely to ridicule.

The American workman has shown once more that he can form his own opinions and exercise his own reasoning faculties. If the Federation is to extend its utility it must be under new leadership, while Gompers "retires to complete his functions as an elusive glimmer in the land of will-o'-wisp's."

The Outlook considers that four elements have contributed to win the election, and of these the third is:

The frank discussion of the so-called labor question before so-called labor audiences. The last man in America to want special favors is the workingman. The last men to respond to special appeals are the really industrious classes. That Mr. Taft has carried Greater New York, that he has an exceptionally heavy vote in other great labor centres, all confirm the truth of this statement.

The New York Post says that the frustration of the hopes that Bryan pinned to the labor vote was "not the least gratifying of the features" of the election. People express surprise that the labor vote was not delivered by Gompers, "but when was it ever delivered?"

The uniform history of attempts to make or break candidates at the word of command by labor leaders shows that the thing can not be done. Rival leaders always jealously spring up to contest the right to speak for the organization; the members suspect personal motives or pecuniary corruption; divisions and recriminations ensue, and the whole affair breaks down. Gompers ought to know, for he has tried the same thing before, against Mr. Littlefield and other congressmen, and abjectly failed. His pitch of arrogance this year was only preliminary to the deepest humiliation he has yet experienced. He led Mr. Bryan to think that 80 per cent of the labor vote would go to the Democratic candidate. No precise figures can be had, but judging by this city, 10 per cent went to Bryan. All of his groveling before organized labor profited him nothing. Judge Taft's manly stand was both better morals and better politics.

The Springfield Republican says that the failure of the political labor movement was so complete that we have probably seen the end of labor as a political power for some time to come:

There is but one explanation of Mr. Gompers's fizzle in trying to elect a President. His million of followers refused to follow; that is to say, it was impossible to consolidate them in the ranks of one party, and this proves that labor in America has reached no such condition of solidarity as is necessary to make it a truly formidable force in political affairs. There was never a more vivid illustration of the old taunt that the "labor vote" was always seen to be a myth when the votes were counted.

There is plenty of plain speaking upon the general issue. The New York World reminds its readers with some unnecessaryunction that on the morning after Mr. Taft's nomination it declared without reservation that "Bryan's nomination means Taft's election." But a willful party had its way. Bryan received the nomination, and a party more united than it has been since 1892 loyally supported him. But even a united party "could not overcome the handicap of Bryan's political record." It was not so much the party that was weak as its leader:

Mr. Bryan's overwhelming defeat is made the more significant by reason of Mr. Taft's vulnerability. The Republican candidate had to bear the burden of general hard times; of a million men out of employment; of business interests complaining and dissatisfied; of a steadily increased cost of living; of an unparalleled disaffection of labor leaders; of an unparalleled disaffection of the negro vote; of Republican factional fights in the great pivotal States of New York, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; of a reactionary platform which he was obliged to modify in his speech of acceptance; of an insidious use of religious prejudice and bigotry against Mr. Taft's liberal and advanced belief; of a popular resentment against Mr. Roosevelt's determination to name his successor and a proxy.

The World believes that the country is tired of "cowboy administration." It wants the presidency restored to the dignity of the fathers, it wants no proxy in the executive and no more personal government, and herein "lies Mr. Taft's greatest opportunity of service to his fellow-countrymen."

The New York Sun points out that everything was in favor of Bryan except Bryan himself. There was influence upon his side and there was money:

Under these helpful conditions he has signally failed to receive the approval of his fellow-citizens, although he has put forth almost superhuman efforts in his own behalf, neglecting no expedient or subterfuge to turn the tide of public opinion in his favor. His appeal has been made to all classes; he has sounded every depth of sentiment; he has cultivated every prejudice; he has led a forlorn hope with undeniable adroitness; and again he stands condemned as an unsafe guide, as a man unfit to be President.

But the Sun feels with equal bitterness toward Mr. Roosevelt. The nation, indeed, can never be the same again. Mr. Roosevelt has risen to great heights, but it has been at the expense of the people who trusted him:

At the same time we must admit that if Mr. Roosevelt had conformed to our ideas of the duties and the opportunities of his great office he would today be much less of a figure in the world than he is. He has risen to great heights, he has filled the eyes of the young, not alone of his own country, but of the world; and he has had reason, indeed, to exult over the extent and the variety of his achievement. If the nation had any part or share in it, it would be another thing; but it has been all effected at great cost to the American people. We shall never be quite the same again. A people never retrieves its false steps. Great events, convulsive changes, may obliterate them; and even efface the memory of them; but the old surface can not be restored.

The Sun sees nothing but good before Mr. Taft "if he will use his power to enforce our laws instead of to dispense them, inculcate the spirit of unity and good-will and cultivate the sense of national solidarity and equality among all the people."

The New York Times sees nothing for Bryan but annihilation, and "the crushing defeat of ambition evokes not one spark of pity." The people have pinned their faith to a statesman proved to be "capable, just, firm, fair, courageous, and wise":

Under the conditions of a popular ballot this decision is the record of some seven million individual judgments. Men vote alone, they do not think alone. The majority millions who yesterday elected Mr. Taft President of the United States were moved by a just sense, common to them all, of the public weal, by a common desire, a common purpose to put into safe and competent hands the executive control of the nation's affairs. Their judgment was unerring, their decision was given with an emphasis that reflects the soundness of their understanding, and the firm convictions of their minds. In a sense it is astonishing, but we expect the American people, when their enlightenment is appealed to, to behave in just that way. No finer triumph of Republican institutions and of the Republican theory of government was ever recorded.

The New York Post sees dangers ahead for Mr. Taft, and the danger must indeed be a very small one to escape the eagle and prophetic eye of the Post. Mr. Taft has carried a good deal of driftwood along with him to victory. Cannon and Dalzell, Payne and Gardner are liable to think that his triumph is one for reaction in general and that they have carte blanche to break all party pledges and to eat, drink, and be merry. But the Post will throw upon these delinquents the cold shadow of its watchful disapproval:

Nothing is more certain than that President-elect Taft will have his ears filled with the cry that the tariff must not be touched. If prosperity rapidly returns, it will be said that any attempt at tariff revision will throw everything into uncertainty again. If, on the other hand, recovery lags, it will be alleged that the country is waiting till the terrible portent of tariff reduction is out of its path. Judge Taft will need all his firmness and every particle of his courage to keep his word on this subject, and to insist that his party also stand to its pledged faith. The question of stanchness and consistency in this matter of the solemn promises of the Republican party to reduce the tariff immediately after the fourth of March, will be the very article of a standing or falling presidency. This Mr. Taft must well know; but he may not yet be aware of the combined and formidable efforts that will be put forth in order to make him swerve.

The New York Globe holds that the Republican victory means the triumph of middle courses. We are not likely to see so much impatience of legal and traditional restraint, nor such intemperate language, and there will be a greater heedfulness of facts and consequences and less reliance upon emotional sympathies:

The victory of Taft is to be interpreted as the victory of intelligent, discriminating progressiveness. As such it is a triumph neither for the reactionaries who consider all change a crime nor for the lusty-lunged who believe in government by shouting. It is not the extreme Tory right that has won nor the extreme revolutionary left, but the middle. The mandate is to go ahead, but to go ahead cautiously, remembering at all times that there is a State to preserve as well as to regenerate. Davy Crockett's aphorism still expresses the prevailing mood of the American people.

The Outlook says that the presidential issue was primarily between three men, Debs, Bryan, Taft:

Mr. Debs, the agitator, a man who feels the wrongs of his class, but can formulate no plan to cure them; Mr. Bryan, the popular orator, too fragmentary in his thinking to be called a statesman; Mr. Taft, the administrator, more interested in the maintenance of justice than in plans for the reconstruction of society. The American people have listened with curiosity to the agitator and with applause to the orator, but they have elected the administrator.

Among the side issues may be classed the momentary extinction of Mr. Hearst, and here the New York Post allows itself positively to chortle in its glee:

Mr. Hearst is now definitely deprived of his martyr's crown, for which he has substituted a fool's cap. He can not even claim to have defeated Bryan and Chanler; for the little fringe of votes which his personally conducted independence party cast was absolutely negligible in the large result. This is a terrible blow not only to an impudent charlatan, but to all his boasting about the irresistible political power of his newspapers. He and his hirelings have talked as if, when the Journal spoke, 5,000,000 readers said amen, and 1,000,000 voters rushed to record their approval at the polls. That humbug is now exploded. When even the most blatant journalism sets itself against the popular stream, it is swept away with other rotten vegetables. The true comment on Hearst's further political pretensions can best be conveyed to him in language of the kind he uses, and which has been heard within the past few weeks from hundreds of his former followers: "Hearst? Aw, be's a dead one."

The reflection of Hughes to the governorship of New York and of Cannon to the Sixty-First Congress also receive wide editorial mention. With regard to Hughes, there is hardly a difference of opinion and the congratulatory chorus is nearly unbroken. And even the Speaker has his friends quite outside the ranks of those who naturally sympathize with a man who is made the special target of sectional arrows. The New York Sun says that Cannon's triumph in his home district, assuring his continued usefulness in the exalted office he now holds, "is one of the results of the voting yesterday that gratifies us most." The Sun recognizes that Cannon is a tyrant, but the peculiarity of his tyranny is that "Ego is not in it." Well, well, well!

Foreign comment is unanimous as far as it goes. The London bankers express themselves as gratified. The London Evening Standard says that America owes her international position largely to Taft. The Westminster Gazette believes that the "safe, sbrewd, and resourceful" candidate has been chosen, and continues:

Bryan never recovered in the popular esteem from sowing his wild oats on the silver question. We have yet to see what would happen in the United States if a really powerful man were to appeal boldly to the radical instincts of the masses against the domination of the wealthy men in the Eastern States. Mr. Hearst reserves that rôle to himself.

Curiously enough, the London Globe takes the same view, and expresses the opinion that Bryan's defeat has cleared the way for Hearst, who doubtless holds the same belief and will be gratified to find that he is thus in a minority of three instead of one, as he might reasonably have supposed. The Globe believes that Hearst may obtain the nomination in 1912, either from the Democrats or "some more extreme and more powerful organization springing from the ruins of the Democracy." Reports from Rome speak of a "general satisfaction." The result of the election is "popular" in St. Petersburg, the Parisians anticipate a "new era of prosperity" for America, while from Japan comes an assurance that the news was received with the "liveliest interest."

Photographs taken from airships or balloons have long been considered a practical method of learning the whereabouts of an enemy's forces or fortifications in time of war, but snapshots by a camera attached to a pigeon are an altogether new idea. This minute photographic apparatus is the invention of a German, Dr. Neubronner, and has just been patented. The officials at the German Patent Office were disposed to ridicule the invention at first, but their opinions changed after proofs of its practicability had been furnished. The German War Office recognized its strategic value, and they believe that photographing pigeons can render much assistance to a besieging army. The miniature camera weighs only two and one-half ounces, and that is considered the maximum weight which a homing pigeon could carry in a flight of not more than one hundred miles. As many as thirty snapshots may be taken automatically, and the instant of exposure can be so timed that the desired views will be obtained. By this means objects may be photographed from no greater height than 150 to 300 feet, an impossible feat for an airship or balloon.

Dr. Helen Bouchier, an English suffragette who has served a short term in prison, throws some light on the psychology of the released convict. Sometimes a convict, after a long term of confinement, comes to prefer the cell to the clash of the outside world, to which all his faculties have become strangers. Many ex-convicts never regain their ability to cope with life. "I found," says Dr. Bouchier, "even that short term of imprisonment in some subtle way affecting my mind. The trivial incidents of the prison life, that at first I had known and found to be absolutely unimportant, began to loom larger and larger before my mental vision, and I found myself losing all sense of proportion. . . . But the fact which showed me most startlingly the effect produced on my mind by the unnatural conditions of seclusion, silence, and monotony which prevailed in Holloway was the growth of a strange feeling of apprehension, of shrinking from the outside world."

There was almost a score of candidates at the first election held to choose a governor under the new constitution of Massachusetts in 1780. James Bowdoin and John Hancock, both eminent Bostonians, were the two men most in the public eye and estimation for the position. Altogether the total poll was about or less than 13,000. Hancock received more than 11,000. Bowdoin something over 1000 and the remaining ballots were distributed among fifteen or sixteen other candidates.

The remarkable dearth of marriageable young women in some of the most populous industrial districts of Alsace-Lorraine is causing the authorities some anxiety. Throughout these provinces there are, on an average, three men to every woman, and in the small town of Kneuttingen 1500 single women have 5000 men from whom to choose their husbands.

THE LATE MRS. WILLIAM ASTOR.

New York Has Lost a Society Leader and a Woman of Broad Mental Capacity.

By the death of Mrs. William Astor New York loses a chief whose reign has been undisputed for over thirty years and whose influence was never lacking on the side of a broad enlightenment and the encouragement of intellectual and moral values. Mrs. Astor was among those who saw visions and dreamed dreams, she belonged to the few who knew the traditions of polite life, and if she was unable wholly to enforce her will for the creation of an aristocracy depending upon culture rather than upon wealth and pedigree, her influence was none the less a restraint both upon the ultra exclusiveness of the few who would preserve and upon the vulgarity of the many who would encroach.

Mrs. Astor attained her social supremacy over three decades ago, when she gave the first great ball that was to become at once an institution. Upon one side of her hospitable door was the great outside world whose blood was of any and every color except blue. Upon the other side were the elect, those who were "in society," who were to be recognized as belonging to American aristocracy. There was no other possible passport into the light of the social world than an invitation from Mrs. Astor, and Mrs. Astor dispensed her favors according to her own sense of the fitness of things, and none dared to make her afraid. Such ascendancy as this is not to be accounted for upon fortuitous grounds. It bespeaks a force of character, a power to formulate standards and ideals, and a faculty for government that are just as rare in the social world as in the more effective realms of politics and world affairs. Mrs. Astor was of course wealthy, but not extraordinarily so as judged by later standards. Her birth was unquestionable, but not more unquestionable than that of some others. She had none of the characteristics that are usually supposed to govern that much abused word "success." The determined enemy of the climber, she held herself far removed from every kind of social intrigue. So far was she from self-assertion that she was modest and unassuming. There is no explanation of the easy dominance that she exercised except by that subtle force of character that so easily compels obedience and that is independent of the devices of those who have no other weapon than device in the armory of their social weapons.

Mrs. Astor was born on September 22, 1830. She was therefore seventy-eight years of age at her death. Her father was Abraham Schermerhorn, a lawyer of New York, who was descended from Jacob Jansse Schermerhorn, who came to New Netherland in 1636, amassed wealth somewhat rapidly, got himself into trouble with Governor Stuyvesant upon a charge of selling powder to the turbulent Indians, and subsequently lost most of his property. In the family line of his descendants we find many of the old Dutch names, such as Van der Bogart, Beekman, Ten Eyck, and Buren. Mrs. Astor's mother was Helen White, belonging to the Yonkers branch of the Van Cortlandts. In 1853 Mrs. Astor married William Astor, whose grandfather was the first John Jacob Astor. Her husband, who was the same age as herself, died in 1892, leaving four children, and of these four children three survive their mother—Mrs. George Ogilvy Haig, Mrs. M. Orme Wilson, and Colonel John Jacob Astor. Mrs. Wilson was with Mrs. Astor at the moment of her death, but Colonel Astor had gone to his own house for rest, after a long vigil.

Mrs. Astor practically withdrew from society life some four years ago. Her last ball was given in 1904, and even the quarterly dinner parties were discontinued at about the same time. For over a year she has received no visitors except her daughter. Even her son was not admitted to her immediate apartments. She has, in fact, lived as a recluse, and the dread of publicity that was always a characteristic of the deceased lady became almost morbid. She would not even approach the windows, for fear of being seen by some of the inquisitive tourists who came on a kind of pilgrimage to worship the exterior of a house containing the great society leader, and for many years she never left her doors without a little parasol designed to check the ardor of the impertinent photographer. It was the same desire to avoid publicity that created a sort of dread of bright light. She hated to be recognized and to be stared at. At the opera she always carried a veil arranged upon a frame, and this she interposed between her face and the gaze of the curious, and she even had her box disconnected from the general electric current, so that its occupants might sit in semi-obscurity. All these things were described as eccentricities by a generation that could never get close enough to the searchlight for its own satisfaction. Perhaps in later years they did become eccentricities, but their basis was the natural refinement and reticence of a lady.

Mrs. Astor was always liberal in the social distinction that she was able to confer. She was an autocrat, but her rule was suave and benevolent. Presumably, we shall never get a glimpse at the contents of her mail bag or at the begging, pleading letters from social aspirants that reached her day by day. Their cry was always the same—"Let me in. Let me in," and while their publication would have a sort of interest for the cynic, it would certainly not elevate our views of human nature. Many years ago there were only four hundred names in the list of the exclusive society of New York, and we almost began to believe that the number had been fixed by Providence, and that, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, it could never change. But it was suddenly discovered that Mrs. Astor was issuing as many as six hundred invitations, and the walls of New York society forthwith expanded. In later years they had to expand again to accommodate eight hundred, and even a thousand. Mrs. Astor set the old credentials upon one side with an inflexible hand. She had her own standards and to a certain extent she enforced them. Her home life was always of the simplest description. Breakfast was never later than eight, and her day was mapped out with business-like precision and with a proper heed to the domestic duties which sometimes and elsewhere are more honored in the breach than in the observance. By the death of Mrs. Astor New York has lost not only a society leader, but a woman of broad and liberal type and of a large-minded capacity.

Solomon and Balkis.

Solomon, King of the Jews, and the Queen of Sheba, Balkis, Talk on the ivory throne, and we well may conjecture their talk is Solely of things sublime: why else has she sought Mount Zion, Climbed the six golden steps, and sat betwixt lion and lion?

She proves him with hard questions: before she has reached the middle

He smiling supplies the end, straight solves them riddle by riddle;

Until, dead-heaten at last, there is left no spirit in her, And thus would she close the game whereof she was first beginner:

"O wisest thou of the wise, world's marvel and well-nigh monster,

One crabb'd question more to construe or vulgo conster! Who are those, of all mankind, a monarch of perfect wisdom Should open to, when they knock at spheteron do—that's, his dome?"

The King makes tart reply: "Whom else hut the wise his equals

Should he welcome with heart and voice?—since, king though he be, such weak walls

Of circumstance—power and pomp—divide souls each from other

That whose proves kingly in craft I needs must acknowledge my brother.

"Come poet, come painter, come sculptor, come huilder—whate'er his condition,

Is he prime in his art? We are peers! My insight has pierced the partition

And halls—for the poem, the picture, the statue, the building—my fellow!

Gold's gold though dim in the dust: court-polish soon turns it yellow.

"But tell me in turn, O thou to thy weakling sex superior, That for knowledge hast traveled so far yet seemest no whit the wearier—

Who are those, of all mankind, a queen like thyself, consummate

In wisdom, should call to her side with an affable 'Up hither, come, mate'?"

"The Good are my mates—how else? Why doubt it?" the Queen upriddled:

"Sure even above the Wise—or in travel my eyes have idled—I see the Good stand plain: he they rich, poor, shrewd, or simple,

If Good they only are. . . . Permit me to drop my wimple!"

And, in that hashful jerk of her body, she—peace, thou scoffer!

Jostled the King's right hand stretched courteously help to proffer,

And so disclosed a portent: all unaware the Prince eyed The Ring which bore the Name—turned outside from inside!

The truth-compelling Name—and at once, "I greet the Wise—oh,

Certainly welcome such to my court—with this proviso: The building must be my temple, my person stand forth the statue,

The picture my portrait prove, and the poem my praise—you cat, you!"

But Solomon nonplused? Nay! "Be truthful in turn!" so had he:

"See the Name, obey its hest!" And at once subjoins the lady—

"Provided the Good are the young, men strong and tall and proper,

Such servants I straightway enlist—which means" . . . But the hushes stop her.

"Ah, Soul," the Monarch sighed, "that would'st soar, yet ever crawl'st,

How comes it thou canst discern the greatest, yet choose the smallest,

Unless because heaven is far, where wings find fit expansion, While creeping on all-fours suits, suffices the earthly mansion?"

"Aspire to the Best! But which? There are Bests and Bests so many,

With a habitat each for each, earth's Best as much Best as any!

On Lebanon roots the cedar—soil lofty, yet stony and sandy—While hyssop, of worth in its way, on the wall grows low but handy.

"Above may the Soul spread wing, spurn body and sense beneath her;

Below she must condescend to plodding unbuoyed by ether. In heaven I yearn for knowledge, account all else inanity;

On earth I confess an itch for the praise of fools—that's Vanity.

"It is naught, it will go, it can never presume above to trouble me;

But here—why, it toys and tickles and teases, how'er I redouble me

In a doggedest of endeavors to play the indifferent. Therefore,

Suppose we resume discourse? Thou hast traveled thus far; hut wherefore?"

"Solely for Solomon's sake, to see whom the earth styles Sagest?"

Through her blushes laughed the Queen: "For the sake of a Sage? The gay jest!

On high, he communion with Mind—there, Body concerns not Balkis:

Down here—do I make too hold? Sage Solomon—one fool's small kiss!"—Robert Browning.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

General Lord Methuen recently announced at Durban that he had received a mandate from Mr. Haldane to withdraw every British soldier from South Africa.

M. Alfred Picard has been appointed French minister of marine in succession to M. Thomson. He is sixty-four years of age, and was the organizer of the Paris Exposition of 1900.

Princesse Helene d'Orleans, Duchesse d'Aosta, the second daughter of the Comtesse de Paris, and sister of the Duc d'Orleans, has returned from her trip to Uganda, whither she went on a hunting and camping trip after her sister's wedding, last November, greatly benefited in health by her experience.

The Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, the author and playwright and pastor of Old Trinity Episcopal Church, in Toledo, Ohio, recently created surprise when he announced from the pulpit that because the Toledo church was not under the canon laws he would be forced to resign, and that he had decided to accept the call of the St. George Episcopal Church at Kansas City.

Professor Shailer Matthews, dean of the University of Chicago and editor of the magazine The World Today, is giving a lecture course at Brown University. Of routine educators Mr. Matthews recently said: "The trouble with teachers is that they become accustomed to dealing with untrained minds, and do not grow. They get a sort of professional attitude toward the world which is suicidal so far as their individual life is concerned."

Nicholas Tchaykovsky, under arrest in Russia on charges based on acts alleged to have been committed thirty years ago, has been in prison without trial for nearly a year. It is doubtful if he could survive another winter of confinement, for he is an old man. The Russian government has announced its willingness to release him on bail and has fixed the bail at $25,000. Half of this amount has already been raised in England. It is proposed to raise the balance in this country.

Gifford Pinchot graduated from Yale in 1889. He studied forestry in France, Germany, Switzerland, and Austria. He began the first systematic forest work in the United States at Biltmore, North Carolina, in January, 1892. He is a member of the National Forest Commission and chief of the Forest Service, in the United States Department of Agriculture. He is a member of the Commission on the Organization of Government Scientific Work. In 1903 he was appointed commissioner of public lands.

Prince Henry of Prussia recently spent several hours in the air as the guest of Count Zeppelin, who made an ascension in his remodeled airship. Not only did the prince thoroughly enjoy his experience, but he sat at the steering wheel for many miles of the flight, guiding the movements of the craft and making it execute all kinds of complicated manoeuvres. Prince Henry's satisfaction was unbounded and prompted him to send this telegram to the emperor: "Under Zeppelin's guidance I felt just as safe as on my own flagship."

Captain Anzalono, the inventor of a new system of wireless telephony by which it is rumored that Genoa has succeeded in speaking to Buenos Ayres, is an officer in the Italian army. He has been carrying on experiments for a long time, but refuses to reveal his methods beyond saying that the system consists in confining microphone currents, which themselves are very weak, to the care of massive electric waves, which gather them up and speed them along for indefinite distances. His system has been successfully tested across the Straits of Messina and is now being tried on the transatlantic cables to the United States and South America.

Lord Curzon and his children are receiving $68,000 a year from the Levi Z. Leiter estate, besides the income from $1,700,000 placed in trust. Joseph Leiter receives $4500 a month from the estate. When he dropped $9,000,000 in the wheat pit his father came to his rescue and assumed $7,000,000 of the burden. The father, however, at his death, charged each one of the children up with the money they had received from him. Therefore, Joseph has to pay interest on $2,000,000 that he lost in the wheat pit. Lady Suffolk, who was Miss Daisy Leiter, receives an income of $125,000 a year, as does her sister, Mrs. Colin Campbell, formerly Miss Nancy Leiter.

Goldwin Smith, the scholar, historian, critic, and publicist, was educated at Eton and Oxford, and he acted for some time as tutor in University College, of which he was elected a Fellow in 1847. In 1858 he was appointed regius professor of modern history at Oxford, and his tenure of that chair, which terminated in 1866, was distinguished by the delivery of lectures which attracted the widest attention. On the opening of Cornell University, in 1868, having accepted the invitation tendered to him, he settled in the United States as professor of English and constitutional history in that institution. In 1871 he exchanged his post for that of a non-resident professorship. Among his works are "Irish History and Irish Character," "Lectures on Modern History," "Three English Statesmen—Cromwell, Pitt, and Pym," and "The United Kingdom"—a political history of England down to 18—

THE TRICK OF THE TRIGGER.

By Jerome A. Hart.

XXXIX.

Monday's dawn saw a raw and misty morning. Out near the Laguna Merced, where the breakers boomed on the narrow strip of sand between ocean and lake, some surprised farmers noted numbers of men, mounted or in vehicles, restlessly patrolling sand-dunes and beach. Further back, where the shifting dunes had become fixed and were clad with a scanty growth of grass, other groups of investigators roamed over the cow-pastures. And the spot around which they seemed continually to circle was Biggins's dairy-farm.

By five o'clock some four-score men had drawn up on the roadside overlooking Biggins's cow-yard. Like flakes in a pool or motes in a sunbeam, these human atoms attracted each other over the hummocks and through the salty fog. No man seemed certain of the place of meeting, but soon all were assembled by Biggins's. The morning milking was in progress—not conducted by pink-and-white milkmaids, but by unkempt men in grimy garments and cowhide boots, smoking matinal pipes. In the centre of the cow-yard was a large tin funnel, from which a pipe ran to the dairy, or "milk-house"; into this funnel the milkmen emptied their unskimmed pails, and the dingy fluid poured through the pipe into the dairy.

The on-lookers gazed listlessly at the early workers, but their thoughts were elsewhere. The talk ran only on the coming duel. It was rumored that during Saturday night and all of Sunday there had been attempts to bring about a peaceful settlement. Friends of both principals had attempted to intervene. But it was generally believed in this early roadside gathering that Burke's seconds and his intimate friends refused to listen to talk of peace.

These rumors led Major Stevens to confidential condemnation of the Burke seconds to his friend Colonel Ruffe, another old Southerner.

"Those Burke men seem bent on killing their man," said the major. "They think he is so good a pistol-shot that he is certain sure to bring down Tower. Ah, but they forget that a dueling ground isn't a pistol-gallery. When you're in a pistol-gallery you're shooting at a mark. When you're in a duel you're shooting at another fellow who's shooting back at you."

"I reckon you're right, major," replied Ruffe. "And even if Tower isn't so expert a pistol-shot as Burke, they seem to forget that the judge is a man of iron nerves. Did I ever tell you about that affair he had up in Tuolumne some years ago? No? Well, it never came off, but it was this-a-way. He had a dispute in court with a fellow named Welton. Tower slapped Welton's face and Welton challenged him. What do you think Tower did? He knew Welton wouldn't fight with rifles, so he chose pistols at five paces. Good Gad, Major! Two big men, both over six feet, holding out two-foot dueling pistols at each other at five paces! Why, the muzzles would almost touch! When Welton's seconds told their principal, he got an acute attack of cold feet, and refused to fight."

"How did Tower ever come to exact such extraordinary terms?"

"He told me at the time that Welton was an excellent pistol-shot, and he himself was not. 'But,' says Tower, 'if I can't hit Welton at fifteen paces, I know I can at five. Welton can hit me at fifteen paces, but he can't at five. He can't hold his pistol steady when it's so close.' That's the kind of a man Judge Tower is."

"And that's the way it'll be today, colonel—Tower's hand'll be steady, and Burke's won't."

"Then if the Burke men are gambling on Tower's not being able to shoot straight, I reckon they're mistaken. He may not be able to shoot as quick as Burke, but he shoots awful steady and awful straight. Burke had better get in his quick-trigger business mighty quick, or the judge will bore him," closed Ruffe.

Quickness on the trigger was the principal topic in both groups—for already the gathering had begun to divide, with occasional stragglers like Eugene Yarrow floating from one to the other. Colonel Ruffe left the "Chivalry" group and sallied forth to learn what he could on the outskirts of a Burke circle. There the conversation showed that a possible peaceable settlement had been discussed and rejected; it was not believed that the seconds could succeed in compromising the matter. In the senatorial circle the most absorbing topic was Burke's quickness on the trigger. His achievements in the pistol-galleries were well known, and his friends were confident that his expertness with the hair-trigger dueling pistol could lead to but one outcome.

Much comfort was given to the Burke faction by a remark made by the senator the day before to his intimate friend Fox, which was thus reported: "Don't you worry, judge—I can shoot twice to Tower's once. I will kill him before he pulls his trigger."

And when Colonel Corkle heard this, he said with much deliberation:

"Gentlemen, I tried my best to arrange this misunderstanding without a hostile meeting. But it wasn't any use. The fight had got to come, and this is the time for it. Senator Burke never had a better chance, and he is not going to get hurt. He can hit a spot the size of a ten-cent piece nine times out of ten. These Chivs have been bullying us Northern Democrats long enough. It's got to stop. They've found a man they can't back down."

Colonel Ruffe discovered that overweening confidence was the general tone of the Burke followers. Returning with his hook-handled cane hanging across his arm, he related his discoveries to Major Stevens. He told the major what he had just heard concerning the confidence of the Burke crowd in the quickness of their leader's trigger-finger.

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the major. "To hear them talk they must think Tower is scared. His seconds advised him not to accept the terms of Burke's seconds, as they demanded a short word to suit Burke's quick trigger. But Tower said he would meet him on any terms."

"I reckon he would, too," responded Ruffe confidently. "And the Burke side mustn't forget what we were talking about just now—that this morning it isn't so much a question of quickness as of nerve. A few minutes ago I met a man just from McCarren's house, where Burke spent the night; he tells me Burke couldn't sleep, and is very shaky. I don't mean that he's flunking for he's no coward. But he is engaged in a hot political campaign, and suffers from a chronic malady. I reckon his nerves are all of a frazzle."

"That's not the way for a man to come on the dueling ground, colonel—particularly when the other man has nerves of steel."

"Right you are, suh! But look. Here comes Tower's party."

As he spoke there appeared two carriages, from one of which descended Tower, accompanied by his seconds, Colquhoun and DeKay; from the other, Tower's surgeon, Dr. Porter, accompanied by his intimate friend, Dr. Hamlin. Almost at the same moment, as if they had been waiting, there drove over a ridge, on the ocean side of the little valley, two other carriages, containing Burke and his seconds, Holton and McCarren, his surgeon, Dr. Lehrter, and an armorer known as Lagarde. Dr. Lehrter was editor of a German newspaper, and a heated supporter of Burke. His schläger-scarred countenance bore witness that he had figured in many student duels.

"Rather a queer choice for a surgeon," murmured Colonel Quirk, a Wyley man, to Milton, an enemy of Burke.

"Rather. He always was more of a politician than a physician."

"Yes, and he has been writing Burke editorials for so many years that he seems scarcely suited for delicate surgical operations—if they are needed," added Quirk, significantly.

The murmur and buzz of talk died away as the four seconds advanced and met in the centre of the little glade. They lifted their hats, bowed formally, and after conferring for a few minutes in low tones, one tossed a coin. As they stooped and scrutinized the coin half buried in the sand, the spectators heard the remark, "Tower wins."

"Aha! That means the judge has won the choice of weapons," said Colonel Ruffe to his friend the major. "He has got the pistols Dan Hallet owns—the ones that killed Vic Douglas in that duel on the island."

"I've heard that one of them is a little lighter on the trigger than the other," replied the major.

"According to his friends' boasts, Burke is said to be very quick on the trigger," commented the colonel, with a slight sneer. "The quick-trigger pistol ought to suit him exactly."

But the talking ceased—the seconds were tossing again. Again they stooped over the coin; this time the crowd heard "Burke wins." It meant that Burke had won the choice of ground and the giving of the word. The sun was just rising, and it was evident that Burke's seconds would place him with his back to the east. This they showed their intention of doing by taking their ground at the eastern end of the glade, so that the sun would shine in their adversary's eyes.

The two principals were standing some distance apart, and had not yet taken their stations at the points indicated by their seconds. Tower, who was closely scanning Burke, scarcely took from his opponent his cold, steel-gray eyes. Burke looked but once at Tower, and then averted his glance.

The two surgeons who had accompanied Tower took no part while the ground was being selected and the seconds were measuring it off; they bowed to the members of the other party, and then each cast his short cloak on the ground, and reclined upon it in a position where they could see everything and yet be out of sight. Burke's surgeon persisted in walking up and down and talking to his principal. Probably the least agreeable companion to a man about to fight a duel is a surgeon. However that may be, the accessories which Dr. Lehrter bore were not calculated to inspire cheer in the mind of a man going into mortal combat. Hanging from the surgeon's arm was a green bag full of instruments; these clanked as he walked, and out of the bag's mouth protruded a saw. It was difficult for some of Burke's friends among the spectators to refrain from bidding the German surgeon make himself less conspicuous. Burke's seconds were too busy to notice this occurrence.

When the seconds had paced off the ground, they invited the principals to take their stations. The sun had just risen over the hills. Burke's seconds placed him at the head of the glade with his back to the sun. Tower was necessarily placed facing the sun. Both men took off their overcoats; they were similarly clad, completely in black, with frock coats buttoned across the breast, concealing the white shirts; without shirt collars; with no white showing at the wrists; and with soft black felt hats. Again the seconds met in the centre of the ground and conferred for a moment; the spectators could see that Colquhoun was apparently explaining something and running his hand over his breast. After all had seemingly acquiesced, Colquhoun walked toward Burke, while McCarren went toward Tower.

"The seconds are going to feel of their coats," muttered Colonel Ruffe to his friend.

"What for? They surely don't think that either of them wears chain armor, do they?"

"Oh no, of course not. But don't you remember when Burke fought his duel with Baldy Williams that the watch in his waistcoat pocket stopped a bullet? It saved his life. It's happened lots of times—there are various things that can stop a bullet—even your pocket Bible might do it, major," he added with a chuckle.

The colonel was right. The two seconds advanced, each toward his principal's adversary. McCarren stopped in front of Tower, bowed, spoke to him in a low tone, and moved his fingers over Tower's tightly buttoned coat in a formal and perfunctory way. Again he spoke to Tower, who beckoned, and his second DeKay came at once to his side. Tower handed DeKay his watch, and a handful of gold and silver from his pocket. DeKay put Tower's watch in his own pocket, and with a dramatic gesture cast the gold and silver from him on the ground.

McCarren bowed formally, and fell back.

Colquhoun was neither so respectful nor so perfunctory. He was very deliberate; he carefully inspected Burke's pockets, ran his hand over the front of Burke's coat, and generally displayed so much keenness and pertinacity in his quest for some hidden defense that Burke bit his lip and showed signs of vexation, while a murmur of resentment came from the Burke group. When he had finished Colquhoun bowed, wheeled, and walked back in a straight line directly to his principal, to whom he whispered something, holding his hand to Tower's ear. A grim smile appeared on Tower's face, and he nodded.

"Did you notice how Colquhoun dug his heel in the sand as he went along?" said Colonel Corkle to Eugene Yarrow, who stood beside him.

"Yes. What was it for?"

"Why, to give Tower a chance to make a good line shot, don't you see?" replied Corkle.

"I don't see," murmured Colonel Ruffe to the major. "I reckon it's just as easy for Burke to make a line shot on the heel-marks as it is for Tower."

Again the faces of the spectators became set as they saw the seconds bring the pistols to their principals. Burke's pistol had been loaded by the armourer, Lagarde. Tower's pistol had been loaded by DeKay. The men were placed and their pistols given them, with instructions as to how the weapons should be held and lifted. When they had taken their positions it was noticed that Burke seemed to experience some difficulty in adjusting the pistol-butt to his hand. Several times he spanned it with his hand, fitted his fingers to it, examined it, and held it pointing down. He seemed dissatisfied with the way the weapon fitted his hand. But in reply to a whispered question from his second, he at last nodded his head, but hesitatingly. When Tower was given his pistol he grasped it firmly, looked at it, and then rested it across the hollow of his left arm until he took position.

"What did I tell you, major?" asked Ruffe, triumphantly. "Didn't I tell you Burke's nerves were all askew? Look at him! And then look at Tower—he stands like a rock!"

When ordered by the seconds to take position, Tower at once placed himself. His soft black hat was pushed back on his head, revealing his eyes plainly. He stood erect, and firmly planted on his feet; his body was adjusted with accuracy, sidewise to his opponent; his right arm hung naturally and easily by his side; his pistol was exactly vertical. He looked the embodiment of strength, courage, and determination.

When Burke's seconds directed him to take position, his manner was exactly the reverse. His face was pale, and there were deep shadows under his eyes, betokening a sleepless night. His black slouch hat was already well forward, and as he took position he pulled it further forward over his eyes. The nervous strain under which he was laboring was evidenced by the stiffness of his movements and the tenseness of his muscles.

When the seconds asked each man if he was ready, Tower quickly answered in a firm voice, "I am ready." For some moments Burke did not reply, and when he did, he uttered the word "yes," following it a moment later with a nod.

The moment Burke spoke, Colquhoun started forward crying: "Stop!" When asked the reason he volubly replied, pointing out that Burke was not holding his pistol vertically, as the terms required, but that it was pointing outward at an obtuse angle. This could not be controverted. Burke's seconds hastened to his side in order to remedy this unconscious infringement. So great was the tension of Burke's muscles that it was only with an effort that he could force his pistol-hand into the proper position, and permit the pistol to point downward. In doing so his muscles were so tense that he wrenched his body a little out of the perpendicular, and threw his left side slightly forward; thus his chest presented a larger mark to Tower's pistol. His seconds did not notice this departure from the position in which they had so carefully placed him. Nor did he—he was smarting under the conduct of Colquhoun.

As Burke's side had won the word, Holton was the one chosen to give it. Before doing so, he proceeded to exemplify the word and the time between its syllables, as set forth in the agreement, in order that the principals might clearly understand it. This he did deliberately and with exceeding care. As the brief interval between the syllables "Fire—one—two" was noted, little undulations ran through the spectators, as they kept time with their bodies.

"Good God! That's awful short firing time," said Corkle doubtfully. "Or so it seems to me. How does it strike you, Yarrow?"

"It means pretty quick firing," admitted Yarrow. "But I suppose it's long enough. It sounds to me like the striking of a cathedral clock."

When Holton was sure that both principals thoroughly understood the way he gave the word, the seconds took their places. The spectators could no longer restrain themselves—a kind of hoarse murmur arose from the two groups of excited men. Colquhoun warningly waved his hand to them to be quiet.

"Gentlemen, are you ready?" asked Holton.

"Ready," instantly replied Tower.

"Yes," slowly answered Burke.

Pausing, and looking first to one and then to the other, Holton said, slowly and deliberately:

"Fire—one—two."

As the word "One" fell from Holton's lips, Burke fired. It would be more exact to say that his pistol went off. He had partly elevated his weapon, but it was discharged before it reached a level line. His bullet entered the ground some nine feet from where he stood, making a line shot.

Just before the word "Two," the crack of Tower's pistol came. Exactly as Tower fired a patch of dust spattered out near the left lapel of Burke's black coat.

As Tower's pistol sounded, Burke's right arm, which was still extended, was flung up in the air almost perpendicularly. In his right hand he still grasped the pistol. A shuddering began in the chest, running out to his extremities; the fingers relaxed, the hand trembled, the pistol dropped to the ground. The shuddering grew heavier—through the tall stalwart frame there ran what now seemed convulsions. His head drooped; his left knee gave way first, and then both knees doubled under him; his body sank slowly; he strove to prop himself up with his left arm, but he had not the strength, and in a moment his limp body was lying on the ground. His seconds rushed to his side, and beckoned to his surgeon, Dr. Lehrter. But it was soon evident that the situation was too much for him, and he was obliged to call for assistance from the surgeons on the other side.

Tower remained standing in his place with folded arms, his pistol-barrel resting across his left elbow. When his seconds came to him he remarked:

"I suppose we had better remain until we learn whether a second shot will be demanded by the other side."

Colquhoun shook his head. "Burke will never fire another shot, judge," he said. "His wound is mortal."

"I do not think so," replied Tower. "I hit him too far out for a mortal wound. I think the ball only crashed through the ribs. It is not a dangerous wound."

But news soon came from the other side, through DeKay, who had been there to make inquiries. He informed Tower that Burke had been shot through the lungs.

"There is no hope for him," he said. "The three surgeons are unanimously of the opinion that his death is near at hand."

"If that be so," rejoined Colquhoun gravely, "let us make haste. In view of possible trouble if the adherents of Burke should attempt to assault our friend, let us leave the ground immediately."

There was no opposition and as the party moved toward their carriages, DeKay added:

"Yes, and we would be wise to get a boat and leave the peninsula without passing through the city. The courts are run by Burke's political followers, and it would be dangerous for our friend here to fall into the hands of the Burke judges."

Burke's seconds and a circle of intimate friends were gathered around him as he lay upon the ground. His utterance was difficult, for the blood was welling up in his throat. But as they stooped over him they heard him mutter faintly:

"Slaveholders' plot..... kill me..... because I opposed slavery..... make this a slave State."

Biggins, the dairy farmer, had arrived on the ground just as Holton was giving the word, and was a silent and wondering witness. As he heard Burke's last words, and saw the Tower party about to enter their carriages, he shouted loudly:

"By God, this is murder!"

Up to this time everything had been conducted in an ordinary tone. This was the first loud speech. The spectators stared at him.

"This is murder, I say!" he shouted again. "I'll arrest that man if it's the last act of my life!" And he started after Tower.

"Hold on, you fool!" cried Keller roughly.

But Biggins did not heed him. With a curse Keller struck him over the head with a loaded cane. Biggins fell forward on his face and lay unconscious on the ground.

"Sorry I had to do it," explained Keller to the crowd, "but every man here is armed. That well-meaning fanatic in ten seconds more would have started a bloody battle between the friends of Burke and the friends of Tower."

THE FRENCH NOVEL.

"St. Martin" Asks for a Measure of Justice and for a Deliverance from Cant.

The French novel carries with it a significance not wholly enviable, and although many early prejudices have worn thin, it still has the reputation for a candor undesirable from Anglo-Saxon standpoints. We need not ask how much of the existing prejudice is a matter of mere hypocrisy. Certainly a good deal, if we may judge from the wide circulation enjoyed by recent American novels that leave nothing to be desired, or rather to be dreaded, in the way of free speech. But comparisons are odious, and certainly they will not help my plea for a better appreciation of the excellencies of the French products.

So much depends upon the point of view, and nothing is so hard as to admire an approach to an ideal that does not happen to be ours. Putting upon one side a French proneness to speak plainly and even pictorially of the things at which we only hint, the fact remains that the French conception of a good novel differs fundamentally from ours. The search for novelty is no part of the stock in trade of the French writer. He regards it as neither desirable nor artistic, whereas if we may judge from the published demands of American publishers it is novelty that constitutes their main demand. Their readers want to be introduced to new worlds, to be plunged into activities of which they now know little or nothing, to be confronted with problems outside the range of their ordinary experience. The dweller in New York asks for vivid descriptions of the California gold mines, or of the Chicago stock yards, while the dweller by the Pacific yearns for the untasted fever of Wall Street or the mysterious life of the metropolitan detective. And both East and West are captivated by stories of how the wealth of Midas has been acquired by audacity or by mental subtlety. There must be novelty, more novelty, and always novelty.

Now to all of this, or to most of this, the French novel is diametrically opposed. Its dissimilarity to our own is not a matter of capacity, but of taste. When the American writer has found his plot, his task is more than half done, and originality of scene covers a multitude of structural sins. But the French writer is never embarrassed for a plot, because novelty is not a desideratum. For him the plot is but a loose framework, necessary indeed as a support, but of which the shape and form do not greatly matter, seeing that they will be wholly hidden by a superstructure of pathos, of sentiment, and of romantic analysis. It is upon this that his skill is concentrated, and the more simple and the more domestic his theme, the greater is his opportunity to triumph. He will delight in artistic detail and in the construction of a sentimental mosaic of feeling, of emotion, and of passion in which the perfect harmonies of color and of light will be preserved. Events, which are supreme in the modern American novel, are used by the French writer as mere accessories to a psychological or sentimental analysis.

Take, for instance, the new novel, "Ciel Rouge," by Claude Ferval. The distinguished author, already crowned by the French Academy, would no doubt listen complacently to a charge of being commonplace or of having selected a plot that is almost indistinguishable from that of a hundred other novels. The heroine, Laurence, has been given in marriage to a man who is as conventional and as stupid as she is original and spirituelle. The inevitable happens when the right man, in this case a poet, appears upon the scene. We know all about the story at once. We can find its parallel, so far as plot is concerned, upon every book-stall in France, and, for the matter of that, throughout the world. But no sympathizer with the French novel will condemn it upon that account. The author was not looking for a new plot, but for a new and more intense handling of the passion to be found in an old one. Here, he seems to say, is a story as old as the hills. Now see with what new force I will tell it to you. Here is a landscape upon which every human eye has rested. Now see with what new suggestiveness I can paint it for you. Is it not from the commonplace that the true artist obtains his best inspirations?

Perhaps the passion for events has been overdone in American fiction. Certainly the concentration upon events carries no immortality with it. The stories of Chicago stock yards and of Wall Street, however much they may fever our blood now, can be no more than museum curiosities in days to come unless they depict in some new way the passions that do not grow old. As a more or less dramatic presentation of events they will have their little day and cease to be. But "Camille Frison," by André Vernières, will live not because it is original and pyrotechnic—for it is neither—but because it champions the cause of the working girls of France and marvelously portrays the pathos, the heroism, and the moral triumph of their lives. Other novels of this type are "Florise Bonheur," by Adolphe Brisson, and "L'Apprentie," by Gustave Geffroy. They introduce us not to the new, but to the old. Their invitation is not to wander upon untrodden paths, but rather upon the paths most familiar to the greatest number, the home paths that are full of the commonplaces of life and of their undeveloped and unsuspected beauties. Herein lies the great appeal of the French novel and its claim to immortality. It will live because it tells of the things that time can not touch.

Let us above all else clear our minds of cant—the supreme crime of the Anglo-Saxon mind—when dealing with the French novel. Let us realize that an undue insistence upon illicit passion is by no means the most mischievous trait that a novel may possess. How easy it would be to find a score of popular novels in America and England wholly free from the sex taint and yet possessing no single character worthy of an hour's remembrance, no touch of pathos or of pity, no single throb of honest human sentiment. Let us remember how often we are asked to admire a hero whose character is that of a shark, or of a heroine so trivial and so heartless as to shame her sex. Let us remember how often our novelists have summoned us to worship a rapacious and conscienceless "success" that knows no law of God or man, no restraint but opportunity, no limitations but those of appetite and capacity. And then let us ask whether even the typical French novel, which as a rule would scorn the money motive, can compare with it in an insidious destructiveness or in an inevitable deterioration of national character. We have no warrant to rearrange the Ten Commandments in a new order of precedence or to place the seventh in a supremacy that does not belong to it. So long as our novels raise altars to competition in its most cruel and corroding form, so long as they ask us, and especially the young among us, to worship a ruthless success, so long we can hardly afford to throw stones at the French novel for an ungloried handling of human transgressions deplorable and inexorable, but primitive and elemental. We can at least try to understand why our claim to a superior fiction is not granted by the more thoughtful among French critics, who maintain that their own is not only the higher art, but more conducive to moral sanity and to the development of a salutary sentiment.

PARIS, October 27, 1908.

ST. MARTIN.

Lord Herries, father of the present Duchess of Norfolk, who died last month, belonged to one of the historic Roman Catholic families of Scotland. There are many ancestral treasures at Everingham Park, his stately Yorkshire residence; but it is said that the most prized of all is an old-world, faded lady's cloak with an extraordinary history. William, fifth Earl of Nithsdale, one of the earl's ancestors, joined the Stuarts in the famous rebellion of 1715, was taken prisoner at Preston, lodged in the Tower and sentenced to death. On the day before that fixed for the earl's execution, his devoted wife gained access to him in the Tower, and, disguising him as a servant-maid with cloak and hood and painted cheeks, enabled him to accompany her and pass the sentries unchallenged. The cloak, preserved to this day, is that which covered the Jacobite earl as he passed forth in humble disguise.

The tenth annual chrysanthemum show is now in progress at the New York Central Park greenhouses, where the more than 6500 plants exhibited comprise the choicest specimens of 250 varieties of the chrysanthemum. The smallest chrysanthemum shown was the "Golden Chain," less than half an inch in diameter. From this there were blossoms of every size and color up to the brilliant yellow "Rider Haggards" and the dark pink "Reginal Vallis." The exhibition of pure white "William Jennings Bryans" was the finest in the collection. It is the largest white chrysanthemum grown and is perfect in color.

Slot machine typewriters are to be placed in the rooms of the leading hotels so that guests can attend to their own correspondence without being compelled to submit to the semi-publicity of the hotel stenographers. The machines are the result of a new invention by which a ten-cent piece dropped into a slot allows the machine to be used for half an hour. The money falls into a small aluminum box attached to the machine, and loosens a lever which unlocks the machine, and at the same time starts a clock which is in the box.

New York is usually thought of as being directly west from London. It is, however, despite its far more rigorous climate, 900 miles nearer the equator than is the British capital. The bleak coast of Labrador is directly west of London. The same line passes the southern part of Hudson Bay and Lake Winnipeg. On the other side of the continent it touches the southern extremity of Alaska and continues through the centre of the Isthmus of Kamchatka and Siberia and Russia to Homburg.

The yellow desert stretching eastward from Lüderitz Bay in German Southwest Africa has become a great attraction, though a few months ago its monotonous sand dunes were hateful and depressing. Diamonds have been found there and a new mining fever is raging. Men are thronging where till now wild beasts have held undisputed sway.

The Spanish Main meant the circular bank of islands forming the northern and eastern boundaries of the Caribbean Sea, beginning from Mosquito, near the Isthmus, and including Jamaica, St. Domingo, the Leeward Islands, and the Windward Islands, to the coast of Venezuela, in South America.

Nelson's flagship Victory, almost the last relic of the great naval wars, is to be rigged, repainted, and as nearly as possible restored to the condition in which she gloriously led the port column of the British fleet into battle at Trafalgar.

A FASCINATING AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

Lady Randolph Churchill's Reminiscences Give a Glimpse of Political and Society Life Throughout Europe.

Mrs. Cornwallis-West, better known as Lady Randolph Churchill, begins her reminiscences at the beginning. She tells us that Italy colored her first impressions, her father, Leonard Jerome, being American consul at Trieste, although she was born in Brooklyn. Of the Civil War she remembers nothing, except that every little Southern girl at the dancing class was a "wicked rebel," to be pinched and persecuted accordingly. In 1867 Mrs. Jerome went with her daughter to Paris in search of special medical treatment, little supposing that she would remain in Europe for ten years and that she would return married. Her reminiscences proper begin with her arrival as a young girl in Paris, and they are not only among the most vivacious and fascinating that have ever been given to the world, but their value from the social and historical points of view is of a high order. The empire was at its height. The Empress Eugénie was still the handsomest woman in Europe, while the Princess Metternich, Mme. de Canes, and the Duchesse de Mouchy were among the familiar figures of the French capital. Of the Franco-Prussian war we are told a good deal and we are even introduced to some favorable opinions of the emperor. Combatting the somewhat cruel letter of General de Palikao, who wrote, "La mort de l'Empereur à Sedan sauvait et la France et son fils, la capitulation a tout perdu," we are reminded of the more weighty opinion of General Changarnier, who said, "And he has been called 'coward'! When I remember that this man, tortured by a horrible disease, remained on horseback at Sedan an entire day, watching disappear the prestige of France, his throne, his dynasty, and all the glory reaped at Sebastopol and in Lombardy, I can not control myself."

The siege of Paris preventing a return to that city, Mrs. Jerome and her daughter migrated to London in October, 1870. Visiting Cowes, they were introduced to the present king and queen, received a visit from the French emperor, then living at Chislehurst, and made the acquaintance of Lord Randolph Churchill.

We have a great many stories of society life as it then existed in England. The masked ball, the author tells us, was ill suited to the English temperament—in fact, the English are too dull witted:

Generally speaking, there is no doubt that English people are dull-witted at a masked ball, and do not understand or enter into the spirit of intrigue which is all important on such occasions. One reason may be that both sexes are masked in England—whereas abroad this is not the practice, nor would it be understood. The license a man might take if his identity were to remain unknown would never be tolerated. Besides, it stands to reason that unless one of the two remains unmasked there can not be much mystifying. Some women refuse to say anything but "yes" and "no" in a falsetto voice, and think they have had a glorious time as long as their identity is not discovered. "You don't know me. You don't know me," was the parrot cry of one lady. "And I don't want to," said Lord Charles Beresford, fleeing from her, "if you've nothing else to say."

Thought-reading at that time was a fashionable amusement, and we have an amusing story of the literal way in which Lord Randolph obeyed the injunction to follow faithfully the impulse of the moment:

Thought-reading was the fashionable amusement of the moment, and one evening Lady de Clifford, a very pretty and attractive woman, insisted on making Randolph, who was reading peacefully in a corner, join in the game. Having duly blindfolded him, she led him into the middle of the room and made various passes with her hands, saying, "Don't resist any thought which comes into your head; do exactly what you feel like doing. I am willing you." Without a moment's hesitation, Randolph threw his arms around the lady, and embraced her before the whole company. To her cries and indignant remonstrances he merely replied, "You told me to do what I felt like doing—so I did."

A plunge into English politics followed, of course, upon Miss Jerome's marriage. The Duke of Marlborough had opposed the match until his son was in Parliament, where his abilities quickly carried him into prominence. Lord Beaconsfield, then Mr. Disraeli, often dined with them:

On one occasion Randolph and I were discussing the evening, after our guests had departed, and he commented on Mr. Disraeli's flowery and exaggerated language, saying, "When I offered him more wine, he replied, 'My dear Randolph, I have sipped your excellent champagne, I have drunk your good claret, I have tasted your delicious port, I will have no more.'" This I found amusing, as having sat next to him at dinner I had particularly noticed that he drank nothing but a little weak brandy and water.

But Mr. Disraeli had small patience with folly. At an evening party a lady whose antics were often a source of amusement ambled up to him and tapping him archly with her fan made some foolish remark. Turning a stony stare on her, he said in an audible voice to his neighbor, "Who is that little ape?" Here, too, are some good stories of Sir Alexander Cockburn, lord chief justice:

A delightful man who came to stay at Blenheim was Sir Alexander Cockburn, Lord Chief Justice of England. But he was dangerous! One day out shooting, while I was walking with him from one covert to another, he let his gun off by accident. Luckily the shot went over my head. "I must be careful," he said placidly. I fed. I remember asking him what had been the most amusing experience of his legal career. In reply he told me the story of a young barrister who came into court late, having evidently, from his appearance, dined well but not wisely, the night before. Sir Alexander reprimanded him, asking what excuse he could offer. "None," retorted the culprit, "unless it is that I had the honor of dining with your lordship last night, and bad wine tells on an empty stomach." This anecdote may not be original, but Sir Alexander Cockburn told it to me as such.

When one night the snipe, which abound at Blenheim, ran short, the lord chief justice, to his annoyance, was given only half of one. On leaving, he wrote in the Visitors' Book some lines to the effect that he would share almost everything in life, even his wife (he not having one), but not a snipe!

Stories of the great statesmen of the day are so numerous that selections must be made almost at random. Antagonism between members of the rival parties was confined to the arena and was seldom allowed to curtail social amenities. We are told that Sir William Harcourt, Sir Charles Dilke, and Mr. Chamberlain, all of them pronounced radicals, jocularly begged Lady Randolph to paint their portraits. "Where," they asked, "can you find more attractive or noble models?" But the artist was inexorable. "Impossible. I should fail; I could never paint you black enough":

Of all the statesmen I have met, I think the late Lord Salisbury and Mr. Gladstone were the pleasantest companions at dinner. Both had the happy knack of seeming vastly interested in one's conversation, whatever the subject, or however frivolous. There was no condescension or "tempering of the wind to the shorn lamb" about it. At the same time, I must own that any feeling of elation for having had, as one considered, a success was speedily destroyed; for the next woman, whoever she might be, who had the privilege of sitting beside either of these great men, would receive exactly the same courteous attention. As for Mr. Gladstone, having once started him on his subject, an intelligent "yes" or "no" was all that was required. But if you ventured a remark (to which he listened in grave silence), he had a disconcerting way of turning sharply round, his piercing eye fixed inquiringly upon you, and his hand to his ear, with the gesture so well known in the House of Commons. His old-world manner was very attractive, and his urbanity outside the House remarkable. On one occasion I had been at the House hearing Randolph make a fiery attack on him, which he answered with equal heat and indignation. The hour was late, and Randolph and I had just time to rush home and dress to dine at Spencer House with Lord and Lady Spencer. The first person I met as I went in was Mr. Gladstone, who at once came up and said: "I hope Lord Randolph is not too tired after his magnificent effort." What an object lesson to those foreign politicians who would look upon it as an insult to be asked to meet in the same house!

We have a few good stories of the queen. Lady Randolph was told that she could have the Order of the Crown of India if her husband would give the necessary recommendation, but Lord Randolph refused to do this in favor of his wife. But a few months later the coveted decoration was offered by the queen:

The queen, with one of the princesses and a lady-in-waiting, received me in a small room. She stood with her back to the window, wearing a long white veil which made an aureole round her against the light. Addressing a few kind words to me, to which in my embarrassment I made some inaudible answer, she proceeded to pin the order on my left shoulder. I remember that my black velvet dress was thickly embroidered with jet, so much so that the pin could find no hold, and unwittingly the queen stuck it straight into me. Although like the Spartan boy, I tried to hide what I felt, I suppose I gave a start, and the queen, realizing what she had done, was much concerned. Eventually the pin was put right and I courtesied myself out of the royal presence. As I reached the door, her majesty suddenly stepped forward, saying with a smile, "Oh! you have forgotten the case," holding it out to me at the same time. This little touch of nature relieved an otherwise somewhat formal ceremony. Remarking afterward to the lady-in-waiting that I was afraid I had been awkward, and nervous, "You need not be troubled," she answered: "I know the queen felt more shy than you did."

Lord Randolph's political downfall was a matter of chagrin to his wife, who missed not only the glory attendant upon the position of cabinet minister, but also the salary, as the young statesman was by no means wealthy. But Lord Randolph would do nothing to avoid the blow. "Politics and money do not go together," he would say, "so put the thought away."

Visits to the Continent were productive of many interesting interviews. Bismarck made a deep impression upon Lady Randolph, and the man of blood and iron seems even to have attempted a compliment:

Speaking of the country and the long walks he took daily, Bismarck said he loved nature, but the amount of life he saw awed him, and that it took a great deal of faith to believe that an "all-seeing eye" could notice every living atom when one realized what that meant. "Have you ever sat on the grass and examined it closely? There is enough life in one square yard to appal you," he said. When we were about to leave, his great dog fixed his fierce eyes on mine in so persistent a manner that I became alarmed and thought he was going to spring upon me; but the prince reassured me, saying, "He is looking at your eyes, because he has not seen any like them." This was said in a grave voice and without a smile, leaving it doubtful if he intended to pay me a compliment.

Lady Randolph has made many appearances on the musical stage, and she tells us much of the great musical geniuses whom she has met. Here is a remarkable experience that befell her in London:

On another occasion I was brought to confusion, but this time not through my own fault. It was at a concert in the city given at the Mansion House before a large audience. Mile. _____ and I were to play a Polonaise of Chopin on two pianos. As our turn came mademoiselle, who was a professional of some experience and execution, said hurriedly to me, "At the eleventh bar on the sixth page, when I make you a sign stop, as I mean to put in a little cadenza of my own." Before I could remonstrate or point out that it would be an unnecessary addition to one of Chopin's masterpieces, the lady had seated herself at the piano, and perforce I had to follow suit. When she arrived at the eleventh bar of the sixth page, she nodded violently to me, and then proceeded to dazzle the company with arpeggios, runs, and trills, until I began to wonder if I should ever find the propitious moment to reënter. I finally did, and had the pleasure of hearing from the occupants of the front row as I went out, "Poor Lady Randolph, what a pity she lost her place for so long!"

We have further interesting chapters on the tour round the world, with special references to California and Japan. We are told a great deal about Lord and Lady Curzon, Lord Rosebery, Mrs. Craigie, Lord Morley, Lord Salisbury, Cecil Rhodes, Bernard Shaw, Lord Roberts and the South African war. There is, indeed, hardly a notable person or event untouched by this brilliant author, whose high position and ingratiating personality were passports to every one worth knowing and to everything worth seeing. She has, indeed, given to us a book without its peer as a witty and discriminating view of her day, a day that is not yet on the wane, but that has been extraordinarily full of great events in the history of Europe. Mrs. Cornwallis West has lost none of her charm, nor of her popularity. She is still a figure in the political life of England and likely to leave her mark upon the questions of the day that are yet pending. After reading her book it is easy to understand an influence that has been both real and wholesome and that is likely to be permanent.

"The Reminiscences of Lady Randolph Churchill," by Mrs. George Cornwallis-West. With seventy illustrations. Published by the Century Company, New York.

The German fire-eaters are said to have been somewhat dashed by a bulletin issued by the general staff, on the authority of General Wilhelm von Blume, as to the cost of a modern European war. Germany, according to General von Blume, would be able to put 4,750,000 troops in the field; and to maintain this army in a contest with any European power would require $1,500,000,000 a year. This reckoning does not include the results of financial depression and the paralysis of industry. General von Blume believes that the loss of life would be heavier than in the war between Russia and Japan, in which 20 per cent of the Japanese armies in the field were killed or wounded. If this proportion were to hold, Germany would lose, say, at least 900,000 in killed and wounded in the same length of time. These are staggering figures, but the course of recent wars makes them highly probable. For the German militarists and the English jingoes, who are constantly talking as if a clash between the two countries is unavoidable, the estimates of General von Blume would afford food for sober thought, were these bellicose gentry capable of such exercise.

"We passed many icebergs coming home from Europe," said a Philadelphian, "and on one of them a garden bloomed. It was a beautiful sight. The great berg shone like an enormous emerald in the sun, and in one level recess, fenced in by pale green peaks, a yellow garden gleamed. The captain said that iceberg gardens are not uncommon. Moss, it seems, is brought on to the bergs by animals' feet. The moss grows, it decays, it forms a soil for the pollen of buttercups and dandelions that is blown through the air during the brief arctic summer. Soon the incredible spectacle presents itself of a great, cold berg adrift in the salt sea with yellow flowers springing from the hard, cold ice."

When the city fathers of some of the towns in Ceylon caused trees to be planted in the streets to shelter perspiring humanity from the pitiless rays of the Indian sun they did not know that in attempting to lessen one discomfort they would actually create another. So it turned out, however. The trees grew up and afforded grateful shelter from the sun, but they also became the home of a certain green caterpillar which besides destroying the foliage acquired the habit of dropping down upon passers-by and darting into them a proboscis as penetrating as the point of a needle and almost as venomous as the sting of a wasp.

A paper entirely for the benefit of rheumatic sufferers is published in Germany, and in it rheumatic patients discuss their symptoms and tell of anything that has proved a relief to their pains, while medical men contribute articles to it on the different phases symptoms, and species of the disease and the progress which the cure of rheumatism is making.

BY THE FRIEND OF ACTORS.

William Winter's Book of Recollections of Stars of the Stage.

Only one of the great actors pictured with appreciation, knowledge, sympathy, and delicacy in William Winter's volume, "Other Days," is still alive, but there are unnumbered playgoers who cherish memories of nearly all in his list. Mr. Winter is better qualified to write of the stage and its impressive figures than any other American. He acquired an enthusiasm for the theatre at an early age and has retained it through a long career of opportunity and achievement. He has known intimately most of those who have been conspicuous in the dramatic field, he has seen nearly every theatrical production of value during the past half-century, and he has recorded, while his impressions were fresh, critical descriptions of plays and players of the day for readers whose intelligence and fairness he held in high regard. That he has been the dramatic critic on the staff of a great New York daily paper for many years, and is widely known as the dean of his profession, might be stated as evidence conclusive of his ability to write understandingly and entertainingly, but there are differing sorts of critics. Mr. Winter would rather discover excellence than demerit, and when he points out a fault that might be repaired he tempers his reproof with kindness. He is never facetious at the expense of his subject. He respects his vocation and its interests.

Biography is as alluring to the writer as to the reader, yet it presents many difficulties. Mr. Winter well says: "Observation, intuition, and sympathy, while perhaps discerning much, can not discern all, and therefore the testimony of the biographer remains imperfect." In the life stories of actors, whose thoughts and activities are almost inseparably connected with a world of illusions, there are many things that test the historian's judgment. The public can not be admitted behind the scenes of a theatre without great danger to entertainers and entertained. To preserve the pleasing portrait that may not be the true one must be the effort of the artist who is loyal to the reputation of the admired artist. Mr. Winter had no greater difficulty than the fact that he was the companion and friend of nearly every one of those whose names and fame fill the bulk of his work. That difficulty he has overcome with seeming ease. This is from the author's preface:

Some of them have been comrades of mine; intimate friends; daily associates; accustomed to tell me of their joys and sorrows, and to ask and to follow my counsel in the conduct of their professional lives. Their rivalries and the contests of their coteries have surged around me; their triumphs have engaged my pen; their defects have elicited my sympathy; and—as it is a happiness to remember—their finer achievements have, in many instances, been recorded and celebrated, in such a way as to gratify, cheer, and help them, by my literary zeal and industry. I have observed them closely and I have found them exceedingly interesting; sometimes humorous; sometimes pathetic; always sensitive; often sweet and gentle; still more frequently unconventional, hopeful, and gay, and therefore charming companions.

Fitting, as a real introduction to the individual histories, is Mr. Winter's opening chapter, headed "A Royal Line." It takes a rapid survey of the stage from the beginning of the nineteenth century, and briefly places John Philip Kemble, Mrs. Siddons, Thomas Cooper, Macready, Forrest, and the elder Booth. Then comes a delightful chapter on the greatest of American comedians, and the best loved if not the most eminent of our actors:

Jefferson came of a stage lineage, was born to be an actor, and possessed extraordinary natural advantages. His figure was slender; his features were regular; he had dark hair, gray-blue eyes, and magnificent eyebrows. His voice was clear and sympathetic, and its winning tones were equally expressive of tenderness and genial mirth. His acting was marked by the delightful quality of repose, and its art was so absolutely veiled that it seemed not acting, but living, and so created a perfect illusion. Therein consisted his supremacy. He was not a declaimer; he was an impersonator. His performance of Rip Van Winkle appeared to be completely spontaneous; it was universally recognized and designated as "natural"; yet, in fact, it was—and rightly so—the product of scrupulous art; the result of an intellectual, premeditated, steadily supervised design, formed with laborious thought, and executed, as to even the most minutest detail, in accordance with a definite artistic purpose. It seemed as carelessly fluent as the loveliest poetic cadence of Herrick or Darley; as lawless as a drifting cloud; as free and fleeting as the idle, wayward wind that whispers in the fragrant pine or sports with the whitecaps of the sea; it was, in reality, an elaborately constructed mosaic of beauties, born of imagination, made with consummate ingenuity, but illumined with such a glow of genius as fused all its fibres of mechanism into one golden stream of light, and turned all its art to nature.

So recent is the removal of Joseph Jefferson from the stage that even the younger generation of playgoers are not entirely dependent upon the words of others for testimony as to his powers. Mr. Winter strives to show that they were beyond the realm of the descriptive phrase:

Discovery of the charm of Jefferson's acting was not difficult to those who saw him act. Designation of it was never easy. Few of his auditors ever tried to put it into words. It can not be stated in an epigram. Examination of the characters of Rip and Acres—in which two parts he fully revealed himself—with analysis of his interpretation and expression of them, would arrive at the result, disclosing and defining an exceptionally rich and various nature, combined with great felicity of dramatic art. Those parts he, literally, created; for Rip, as Jefferson displayed him, never existed until he made him manifest; and the Acres that he embodied was a higher and finer type of man than the Acres drawn by Sheridan, a far more exquisite fabric of whimsical humor; and in remarking that character the comedian refashioned and improved the comedy for practical purposes.

It is almost thirty-five years since the greatest of American tragediennes left the boards. Only the veterans among devotees of the theatre can remember her in character. Mr. Winter knew her well:

Charlotte Cushman, like Henry Irving, grandly illustrated the truth of Shakespeare's saying, "In the reproof of chance lies the true proof of men"; for she left nothing to chance, and she made impotent the caprice of all observers. You might resent her dominance, and shrink from it, calling it "masculine"; you could not doubt her massive reality or escape the spell of her imperial power. She was a tall woman, of large person and of commanding aspect, and in her demeanor, when she was thoroughly aroused, there was an innate grandeur of authority that no sensitive soul could resist.

A meeting of two commanding personalities, yet of widely varying quality and outlook, is thus described by Mr. Winter. It gives incidentally the opinion of a great editor of that time on the interests of the stage:

Mr. Greeley arrived early, and seated himself on a sofa, confronting a throng of admirers. Miss Cushman presently came, and, after the ripples of greeting had subsided, she occupied a chair opposite to the philosopher. The lions viewed each other with curiosity, and both were affable. They had lived in Rome, and, of course, they did not lack for themes of conversation. Little was said about the stage, though I remember that there was mention of the celestial privilege enjoyed by an actor, when occupied in the interpretation of the Immortal Bard. To me that encounter was not without its droll side, for I knew that the sage was comparatively ignorant of the theatre, and practically indifferent to it. Early in 1865, when I was employed to write about the stage for his paper, the New York Tribune, Horace Greeley said to me: "I don't care for the the-ay-ter" (so he pronounced it); "I sometimes go into Wallack's the-ay-ter, but I don't see much in it"; and I remember that once, on a busy night in the newspaper, when I presented an article about a play, his self-illuminative answer was: "Oh, that'll do any time." He was "a self-made man"; and one peculiarity of men so constructed is that they look with a kind of bland toleration upon the arts. But Horace Greeley was a man of brains; he could appreciate a splendid character; and he appreciated Charlotte Cushman.

Here are specimens of the comparatively few references to living actors in the critic's volume:

The contemporary American stage is fortunate, as to actresses, in the romantic loveliness of Miss Julia Marlowe, the intellectual force and striking originality of Mrs. Fiske, the gentle beauty and profound devotion of Miss Viola Allen, the abundant passion and exquisite vocalism of Mrs. Carter, and the wild, dashing, picturesque abandonment of Miss Blanche Bates; but no woman in the theatre of this period shows the inspirational fire, the opulent intellect, the dominant character, and the abounding genius—rising to great heights and satisfying the utmost demand of great occasions—that were victorious and imperial in Charlotte Cushman.

The elder Sothern, a famous character actor of his day, is described with thorough acquaintance and fidelity in one of the most entertaining chapters:

He was the most whimsical of actors; but beneath his whimsicality there was a fine intelligence. He possessed a keen perception of character, a quick sense of humor, and a potent faculty of imitation, combined with ample knowledge of human nature and of the social world. His natural qualifications for the vocation of acting were of exceptional and decisive authenticity; a fine figure, a symmetrical head, which, somewhat early in his life, was crowned with gleaming silvery hair; a handsome face—the features regular, the complexion fair and fresh; the eyes large and of a positive, brilliant, grayish blue; a distinguished manner; a loud, clear, expressive voice; an alert mind, and much sensibility of temperament. He was an attentive observer of manners and a careful student of dramatic art, and he had developed his powers, and become expert and proficient, through a long ordeal of professional experience. He made the character of Lord Dunderbary, and with that character, a fabric of humorous eccentricity, he acquired fame and fortune. Superficial observers might have supposed that he was a mere farcical buffoon. The eye of experience discerned that he was far from being a trifler.

Many a reader of this volume will find his emotion stirred by the tribute Mr. Winter pays to John McCullough, "the noblest Roman of them all":

I knew him for many years. I saw him under many and various circumstances. I remember him as a man of essentially noble nature; and, in reviewing his career, I perceive him as a remarkable example of potential character, lofty ambition, gentle patience, integrity of purpose, and beneficent achievement. He was a tragic actor of fine natural talents, thoughtfully, carefully, and thoroughly cultivated. He was a man of liberal mind, tender heart, sensitive temperament, generous disposition, natural dignity, and simple manners. His service to the stage, and therefore to society, consisted in the steadfast maintenance of the highest standard of art. He exemplified, in acting, the attribute of puissance—an attribute of which, in the American theatre, Edwin Forrest had been the leading representative; but he exalted and beautified that attribute by adding to it an intellectual refinement and grace such as Forrest never displayed. He was on the stage for twenty-seven years. His customary repertory included thirty characters. His artistic success was extraordinary. Poor, unknown, and without social advantages, he rose by intrinsic merit, to splendid renown. His personal success was the acquisition of that love which is more than fame. No one of our actors was ever more affectionately prized by the members of the dramatic profession. With the bluntest as with the highest, to think of John McCullough was to think of the comrade and the friend, and the public thought of him was genial with a kindred feeling. He did not possess an electrical, fiery genius, like that of Edwin Booth. "I will always gladly be second to Edwin," he once said to me, with the fervor of heart-felt admiration. He did not, as Jefferson did, carry the talisman of serio-comic humor. But he possessed elemental dramatic power and rare personal charm. He met the world upon the broad and general field of human sympathy; he shone with a benignant lustre; he suggested Shakespeare's "great sea-mark, standing every flaw"; he was magnanimity incarnate; he was the embodiment of manly tenderness; he was the vital, sympathetic symbol of sincerity, goodness, and truth: and as such he conquered.

A new setting-up of old standards is noted in this extract from the chapter on McCullough. It is explicit in showing where the tragedian and the critic planted them:

"They have been telling me," he said, "that Walt Whitman is a poet, and they have been reading some of the spavined stuff that he has written. It is a profanation to talk of such a writer as a poet." Then, blazing with emotion, he launched into a panegyric of poetry and a description of the poetic province—the ministry of beauty; the interpretation of nature; the alluring revelation of high ideals; the exaltation of the human soul. "A catalogue is not a poem," he said: "there is no such thing as poetry in mere animal life. The name of Poet is the grandest name that can be applied to any human being. Shakespeare was a poet. Shelley was a poet." He rose as he spoke, and he repeated, with amazing fluency and delicious modulation, many passages of Shelley's "Epsychidion." Art could do no more. "That is poetry," he said; and all that he thus said is true.

The fads that hurt their little day; but, sooner or later, the world comes back to the right standard—to beauty, purity, simplicity, truth. In McCullough's day there was no thought of devoting the theatre to the exposition of physical disease or to the analysis of morbid emotion and degenerate physical propensities. His breezy laugh would have blown the Ibsen hubble from the stage. He would have set the heel of amused contempt on all such sickly humbugs as Maeterlinck, Sudermann, and Shaw. His acting was of the heroic strain, and was best in parts that are emblematic of noble manhood and lofty and tender feeling; parts that implicate splendid deeds, fidelity to duty, self-sacrifice for love or honor; parts that move in the realm of the affections.

This must suffice to show the quality of Mr. Winter's biographic notes. In addition to the subjects referred to, there are chapters devoted to John Brougham, Dion Bouicault, Mary Anderson, Lawrence Barrett, Adelaide Neilson, and in the notes appended there is much of permanent value in references to Mrs. Marshall, Edwin Booth, and Henry Irving. Comprehensive, as the studies are, they may well serve as a history of the stage to carry on the theme from the times treated in the earlier works of William Dunlap, William B. Wood, F. C. Wemys, and Joseph N. Ireland.

Concerning the present outlook, Mr. Winter is plain-spoken in condemnation of some influences now potent in dramatic affairs, and yet he is not altogether hopeless:

With the stage, as with everything else, the tide rises and the tide falls. History shows that the movements of nations have been like the movements of the waves. There are thinkers, in this epoch, who believe that the great republic of America is repeating, more or less exactly, the experience of the great republic of Rome. It is certain that, in the development of the arts and the adjustment of them to society, there have been alternate periods of rise and fall. In some of those arts—namely, sculpture, architecture, branches of painting, and English dramatic poetry—the supreme height of achievement was reached long ago; and now, although the tide continues to rise and to fall, it never rises as high as it once did. The English dramatic poetry of the time of Elizabeth and James I, which is the best dramatic poetry ever written, has never been equaled. There is also some reason to think that, in the art of acting, the tide reached its highest flood in the better days of Edwin Booth and Henry Irving, and that it will not again reach so high a mark. This, however, is not said in the spirit of the rueful veteran who can see no good in the present day. The immediate point is that the present day happens to be a day of theatrical decline. There has not been a time in the history of the American stage when the theatre received so much attention as it receives now, from the public and the press, and there has not been a time when the quality of its average presentations so little deserved the respect of intellect and judicious taste. That condition is due to many causes, but the actor is not to blame for it; and it ought to be declared with emphasis that condemnation of the actor for the defects of the contemporary theatre is unjust.

It has passed from the hands that ought to control it—the hands either of actors who love and honor their art or of men endowed with the temperament of the actor and acquainted with his art and its needs—and, almost entirely, it has fallen into the clutches of sordid, money-grubbing tradesmen, who have degraded it into a bazaar. Throughout the length and breadth of the United States speculators have captured the industry that they call "the amusement business" and have made "a corner in theatricals." A "department store" administration of the theatre, dispensing dramatic performances precisely as vendors dispense vegetables, must, necessarily, vulgarize the vocation of the actor, dispelling its glamour of romance and making it mechanical and common.

To explain the omission of Richard Mansfield from the list of stars presented, Mr. Winter says that he is now preparing a life of that actor which will later be given to the public.

The present volume should be on the bookshelf of every lover of the drama. It is indispensable to one who would have an introduction to the best that may be said of our theatres. Its four hundred pages hold nothing that is not worthy of presentation. Sixteen fine portraits are among its embellishments and a complete index is an admirable adjunct.

THE COURAGE OF JOSE BORGAS.

By Walter Adolf Roberts.

In sleepy Hermosillo the sunlight fell softly. It was early spring and therefore the most delicious season of all the year in the Happy Valley of Sonora. At the doorway of his adobe house sat José Borgas, the half-breed Papago Indian, and across the street was Maria Gloria, than whom José thought no sweeter maid had ever drawn breath in Mexico. She was straight and tall, with soft brown skin and flashing eyes. Her every movement surely it was like a note of music; and pursuing up his lips José whistled a few bars. Could he not picture her, as he had seen her often, swaying to each lilt of the gay bolero tune! They would soon be married and have a little home of their own, but before that there was much to be done. He must work. Times were bad and he had not had employment for close on three months. How could a man take a wife when he did not even have the means to feed himself!

José half closed his eyes and drowsily watched Maria Gloria. She was busy making tortillos, but she could nevertheless spare the time to coquette with her lover. Many was the flash from under the long eyelashes that reached him, and many a shrug of the shoulders or turn of the plump arms that made his pulses tingle with joy. But the afternoon was languid and the scent of the orange blossoms a heavy perfume, and it happened that his head sunk on to his breast and he went to sleep.

There was nothing stirring down the street, except in the distance the figure of a man that the dust blurred. Presently, however, he emerged and came swinging along towards the dwelling of José Borgas. He was an American, hot and tired, and withal aggressively out of place in the quiet mañana land of Hermosillo. His hair was red and his clean-shaven face tried to be red and beefy also through the coat of dust that lay upon it. His nose was pug-shaped and his rather hard mouth was that of a hustler. He glanced contemptuously to right and left and then his eyes fell upon José. "Say!" he shouted stridently. "Want to work?"

José awoke with a start and as the question was repeated, he smiled amiably and shook his head. "No comprendo," he said.

"Oh, you no sabe Ingles!" cried the American. "I said, wantee trabajo? Sabe, work for Ferro-Carril. I, man catcher. You go to Nogales with me, plenty trabajo."

Like many another gringo invader of the land of Montezuma, the labor agent thought that a little pidgin English and a stray Spanish word made any sentence perfectly intelligible to a Mexican. José understood two words of his jargon—"trabajo" and "Nogales." Of course he wanted to work. So he sat up and nodded his head vigorously. "Si, si!" he exclaimed.

"That means 'yes,' doesn't it? Well, all right. But you want to know how much you will get, don't you? Sabe, dinero, dos pesos, cincuenta centavos. Two dollars, four bits a day." And the labor agent held up two fingers and then four. "Easy trabajo. Dobe house to live in. Free fare on Ferro-Carril."

José Borgas stared blankly and endeavored to make sense out of what had been said to him. This American was offering him work and he had spoken of two pesos and a half. That must be the daily wage. He had never before earned more than one peso a day and was overwhelmed by the liberality of the offer. But Nogales, that was very far away. Would he have to leave his father's house and Maria Gloria and go to the cold bare hills near the border! He was slow in replying and the labor agent lost his temper.

"Well, you Greasers make me tired!" he shouted. "Isn't that good pay? Think of it! Dos pesos, cincuenta centavos. Workee for Ferro-Carril, so Ferro-Carril will take you there free. One, two months you save up mucho dinero."

His vehemence startled José. He did not understand a quarter of what had been said, but he feared that the gringo was angry and would refuse to give him the job. So he jumped briskly to his feet. "Esta bueno," he said.

"Ah, sto bueno! Well you have sense. You go Nogales tomorrow. Sabe, depot, Ferro-Carril, moñono, seis horas." He spoke the Spanish words slowly and counted them off on the fingers of his left hand. In this way he thought the Mexican could not fail to catch his meaning. As José happened to understand and nodded his head gravely, the labor agent turned away.

After a few moments, however, he came back. "Say!" he cried, "Have you got a woman? Tiene mujer?"

"Mujer?" repeated José.

"Sure, mujer with you at Nogales. Like to have 'em. When you greasers have mujer, she cook for you and you no quit job."

The first part of the sentence was clear to José and suddenly a wild vision of happiness flashed across his mind. Two pesos and a half; that was quite enough to support a wife. If Maria Gloria would only consent they could be married that very evening and go together to Nogales. He would work then, ah! he would work so hard for months and months until he had saved up enough money to return and make a home for her in Hermosillo!

He made no reply to the labor agent, but darted across the street. He would ask Maria Gloria. What happiness if he could get her now instead of having to wait the weary months that had seemed the only way a few hours ago!

It was not long before he returned and his face was wreathed in smiles. "Esta bueno," he said. Then he pointed proudly with his thumb to the house of Maria Gloria. "Mi mujer!"

At six o'clock the following morning José Borgas was at the depot and he was not alone. At his side stood Maria Gloria, now his wife, his own. They were going to the north, to Nogales on the American frontier, to seek their fortunes and they started with brave hearts. To José it did not seem possible that failure could attend them now that he had gained his heart's desire.

The train carried them through a desolate region, for, with the exception of the Hermosillo Valley, Sonora is a barren state. Maria Gloria drew close to her husband and thought a little wistfully of the beautiful land they had left behind. Hermosillo with its orange trees and countless flowers was surely to be regretted when one looked upon the flat sand plains sprinkled with cacti, and the hills and mesas rich only in minerals and unpleasing to the eye.

José Borgas was one of forty laborers whom the labor agent had rounded up in Hermosillo. They had been herded together into a third-class coach. Those who had women folk had brought them, while in a corner their belongings were piled in an irregular heap. No baggage-master would undertake to check those wondrously dirty bed rolls, so in they had gone along with their owners.

As guardian and leader of this motley troop stood the labor agent, armed with a pass which called for the free transportation of a given number of Mexicans. After he and the conductor, however, had counted heads he considered himself free to seek the luxury of the first-class coach. At mid-day he made no provision for the feeding of his men, and those who had not brought food went hungry. It is the way in Mexico. If the peon does not look out for himself he will certainly find no one to do it for him, and all that is expected of a labor agent is that he shall get his men to their destination without losing any on the way.

This the red-headed hustler did successfully. The train arrived at Nogales late in the evening, but he bundled them at once into waiting wagons and started them out to the railroad camp ten miles away. They arrived faint with hunger, but as they had not worked they could not be fed. It was not until noon the following day, when they had half a day's time to their credit, that they were given supplies from the commissary. For that also is what the Mexican peon has to expect, and José learned early that a wage of two pesos and a half goes most of it back into the pockets of the railroad company when one has two to support.

The grading camp was not a very enticing place. It straggled over about two acres of ground in a hollow of the bare hills. It was a little village of tents and the inhabitants were a community unto themselves. Laborers came and went, it is true, but there were at least fifty or sixty families who had kept together for months. They had moved with the camp a dozen times, following the grade in the manner of all true railroaders. After the sleepy ways of Hermosillo, José and Maria Gloria were not happy at first. They were assigned to a tent which no less than four other families shared and both had to play a strenuous part in the daily life of the camp.

José was roused at five o'clock every morning by the clanging of the bell, and at half-past five had to be on the grade. For ten long hours he worked under the eye of a restless Irish foreman whose sole idea in life was cubic yards of excavation. He knew how to keep the Mexicans to the point and he did it. For at headquarters a record was kept and a foreman who showed the best results was likely to be remembered when promotion time came round.

In camp Maria Gloria was not less busy. She cooked and washed all day, not only for her husband but for a certain number of those laborers who had no women folk. For her services to outsiders the white bosses saw to it that she was paid, but she got very little more than what the food actually cost in the company's store.

So the days slipped by, and after a while José Borgas and his bride found the life not unpleasant. They almost froze to death at night and in the cold, clear mornings, it is true, and they saved no money. However, they had plenty to eat and on Sunday they had a whole day to themselves. But there was a storm brewing and at last it broke, swiftly and suddenly.

Late one night a rifle cracked in the hills and an American foreman, who was sitting in front of his tent, toppled over with a bullet in his brain. Instantly the camp was a scene of wild excitement. Americans and Mexicans produced an almost unbelievable number of weapons and fired aimlessly into the dark. They probably missed their enemy, and as no answering shots came back, they soon ceased and contented themselves with posting several watchmen for the remainder of that night.

Early the next morning a troop of Mexican ruroles arrived, summoned by the camp foreman. As enforcers of the law they could not be called imposing. Their uniform consisted of a ragged shirt, blue overalls, and a straw hat with a cone-shaped crown. But at their head rode the celebrated Coscolitzky, a Polish adventurer who had formerly been in the United States army and who had made his name feared in Sonora.

He addressed the foreman in excellent English. "Have you reason to suspect any one of the killing?" The other scratched his head. "Why, no. Red McGregor was a sober man and he had no quarrel with no one, as I knows of."

Coscolitzky thought long and deeply. "It must have been the Yaquis," he said at length. "We must get them all out of the State, or more murders will occur. By the way, have you any Yaquis working for you? You know the law of Mexico. A Yaqui Indian is an outlaw and must be arrested on sight. We make a round-up of Yaquis this week and will send them all to Yucatan. My men will search the camp. Perhaps in that way we will catch the murderer."

The foreman bit his lip. He well knew what that decision meant. Every Indian would be taken and the camp demoralized, for they were his best workers. "Go ahead!" he said.

No man in camp had done the shooting, but in the greasers' own country what advantage was to be gained from arguing with an officer.

From his tent José Borgas watched the ruroles at work. They pounced on men, women, and children, taking a Yaqui here and there, but for the most part seizing poor peons who had no connection with the outlaw tribe. If they were a little darker than the average and if their hair was straight and coarse, it was sufficient. Coscolitzky ordered them made prisoners with a nod of his head.

In the course of a couple of hours fifteen families had been arrested and in impotent rage the foreman saw the pick of the camp marshaled for the march to the bull-pen in Nogales. It would have been better, he thought, if he had not reported the shooting.

"Have you got enough?" he asked bitterly.

"Why, yes," said the Pole, and then as he glanced round him his eyes fell on José.

"That man!" he cried sharply in Spanish. "He is a Yaqui."

A rurole darted forward and seized José by the arm, but the next moment he lay on his back, while Borgas stood with flashing eyes before Coscolitzky.

"A Yaqui!" he shouted; "I am a Mexican. Does the captain seek to insult me?"

"You are an Indian."

"My mother was a Papago, but does that make me a Yaqui?"

Coscolitzky laughed softly and signaled to the discomfited soldier, who had risen and covered José with his rifle.

"Do not shoot him," he said. "He is strong and will work well in the mines of Yucatan. He is an Indian, and as this is not the Papago country, he must be a Yaqui. Arrest him, search his tent, and take his woman also."

José struggled wildly in the grasp of three or four men, who proceeded to bind his arms behind his back. He was thinking no longer of himself, but of Maria Gloria. Must she, too, suffer the tortures of imprisonment and in the end rot in Yucatan. But he was one against many and there was no one to help him.

Coscolitzky sat his horse and smiled grimly. Perhaps he thought of the Russian tyrants who sent his own people to living death in Siberia. But he did not relent. Every man and woman arrested whom he could call a Yaqui aided his own record for vigilance, and this case was no worse than many he had witnessed.

When later the rurales rode out of camp there walked, closely guarded, a double line of prisoners. Among them were José Borgas and his bride. In the prison that night they slept with their companions on the hard ground and the sleepy valley of Hermosillo seemed very far away.

"Heart of my heart!" said José on the third night of horror, "shall we die? Would it not be better? They can not force us to eat."

Overhearing this, the Mexican sentry stopped at the grating and looked in. "Eat or not as you please," he said brutally. "The other Yaqui swine will be glad to get what you leave. And if you die, why we will bury you."

The blood surged in José's head. The Papagos are proud; they have furnished some of the best men in Mexico; and the pride of his mother's race made the insult bitter to bear. Stooping down, he seized the nearest object, a bone at which some prisoner had gnawed, and hurled it at the sentry. The latter's face was pressed to the grating and the bone struck his cheek and wounded it.

"Caramba!" he yelled, and reaching through the bars he attempted to take revenge.

José retreated out of reach and jeered. He knew he would not be shot at, for that would endanger the lives of the other prisoners. Then the sentry lost his temper completely and did a foolish thing. He threw back the bolt, opened the door, and with a long pole tried to fell his troublesome prisoner. José dodged the blows nimbly, leaping from side to side and taking refuge behind his companions. With a curse the sentry dropped the pole and fingered the trigger of his rifle. He would have loved dearly to shoot, but did not dare to do so. Suddenly, however, an idea occurred to him.

"Well, swine, how do you like that?" he said, and he struck Maria Gloria, who was cowering near by, a heavy blow in the face.

A scream went up and almost instantly José Borgas was at the sentry's throat. The rifle exploded and another soldier came running; but he had barely reached the door before a man brushed by him and darted away into the night. It was José. He had thrown the first sentry to the ground and struck him three or four times in savage fury. Then he had seen the open door and instinctively had made a rush for it. The two soldiers were able to prevent the escape of the other prisoners, but José was free. The prison was on the outskirts of the town and, although shot after shot was sent after him in the dark, there was no one to stop his flight, and he soon gained the safety of the hills.

Free! José found it difficult to grasp the fact. That was well, but the struggle was not over yet. If he could not rescue Maria Gloria, of what value was freedom to him! At first he thought that this would be easy to accomplish. He would reveal himself to the people of Nogales and surely it would not be hard to find many volunteers to aid him in taking the prison by storm. But, alas for the confidence of the simple peon! It was not long before he discovered that two-thirds of the population were eagerly on the lookout for him. Coscolitzky and his rurales were certainly unpopular, but the presidente of the town thought it worth his while to announce a reward for José's capture and that was sufficient to raise up against him a hundred eager foes.

The following night José Borgas crouched in a hiding place in the hills overlooking the town. His heart was numb with despair. He pictured to himself the filthy prison with the sentry at the door, the sentry who had struck Maria Gloria and was only too likely to injure her still further now that he had escaped. His uneducated mind worked slowly and it was long before the situation was fully clear to him.

Why had he escaped? he asked himself. Had he not been a coward to go, when that meant leaving his bride behind? And now that he was free, was there any hope that he could save her also? There was none. Had he not watched the rurales searching the hills for him all day long? The prison was strong and there was no one to help him. He could not rescue her single-handed. At this point a great sob shook his body and he fell over on to his face.

Half an hour later the sentry heard approaching footsteps. His rifle went to his shoulder, but he might have spared himself the trouble. José Borgas walked quietly into the radius of lantern light and stood before him. "I have come back," he said, "to go to Yucatan."

The other stared at him in blank amazement. "But—you had escaped."

"She is in there still," and José pointed to the door of the prison. "Life is nothing to me without her."

The sentry's joy at the recapture was lost in his astonishment. Taking José by the arm he pushed him towards the door. "Go in, fool, and rot with the rest!" he said. Then he stopped abruptly and saluted.

A man had approached from behind the building and it was Coscolitzky. "What are you going to do with him?" asked the captain.

"Caballero, he is the prisoner who escaped last night, but he has returned. He gives himself up in order that he may go to Yucatan with his woman."

"Yes, I know, I heard what he said just now." In the flickering light the Pole's face wore a strange smile. He mused for a few moments and then, shrugging his shoulders, he turned to José.

"Don't you know," he asked, "what this means? An Indian in Yucatan does not live very long."

José drew himself up proudly. "Señor," he answered, "you would have sent Maria Gloria, my own, to die, even though I should not have returned—and I love her. We will die together."

"You love her," repeated Coscolitzky. "You are a brave man. I like a brave man; and love, well, perhaps you are wise." His voice had grown soft, but swiftly he straightened up and turned to the sentry. "This man is a Papago," he said sharply. "We made a mistake. He and his woman can go. But remember, we recaptured the prisoner who escaped. I, the captain, order that you release tonight two Papago Indians. See that you do not forget that in talking to your friends. Adios."

LITERARY ENGLAND.

There Are No New Stars, but Some of the Old Ones Are Still Bright.

Most of the old familiar names are still to the front in English literature. Very few, perhaps none at all, are supremely great. It is only national crises that startle us out of mediocrity. At all other times we must be content with lesser lights, on the literary as well as on the political stage.

But the old familiar names are good. We are not at all tired of them. W. W. Jacobs can make us laugh as heartily as ever. Essentially a short-story writer, he has a happy facility for cementing together a number of short stories without spoiling the effect. He has done this in "Salthaven," a delightful and deft performance with all the savor of the sea and a full measure of real fun.

Then there is Conan Doyle. He is still at the old stand with an apparently inexhaustible fund of ingenious plot and a direct frankness in its unfolding that adds to our perplexity. "Round the Fire Stories" is his latest volume, and it should not be read by very young people immediately before bed. Charles Marriott is not yet so well known as he should be and as he certainly will be if he maintains the standard of "The Happy Medium," a collection of fourteen unusually clever stories. Rhoda Broughton, too, must not be overlooked. We have known her for forty years, but her literary hand has lost none of its cunning, as witness "Mamma." Miss Broughton's heart is still at sweet eighteen, and we may be sure now that it will never grow older. Sure of an audience, too, is Mrs. Mary Mann's book, "The Heart Smiter," although Mrs. Mann has done somewhat better in times past.

Upon no account to be overlooked is Clement Shorter's book about Charlotte Brontë. He says that her life was the "saddest in literature." In her home clear by the authors in their fascinating book, opening up, as it does, an historical episode that has been somewhat neglected.

Mr. Swinburne has given us more than one proof during the last year of his abiding vitality, but none more conclusive than "The Age of Shakespeare." Perhaps it is misnamed, because it leads us to expect a complete review of a period, whereas we have but nine essays, devoted respectively to Marlowe, Webster, Dekker, Heywood, Rowley, Middleton, Chapman, Tourneur, and Marston. There seems no reason for this particular selection, but then we must not be critical of the gifts of the gods.

Sometimes Mr. Swinburne reminds us of Dr. Johnson by the ease with which he translates a commonplace into the thunders of Jupiter. The temptation to quote one passage—no matter where from—is irresistible. He says:

Charity would suggest that it must have been written against time in a debtor's prison, under the influence of such liquor as Catherina Bountinall or Doll Tearsheet would have flung at the tapster's head with an accompaniment of such language as those eloquent and high-spirited ladies, under less offensive provocation, were wont to lavish on the officials of an oppressive law.

And elsewhere he tells us that "no poet is great as a poet whom no one could ever pretend to recognize as sublime." The versifiers of today, and their name is legion, might well have this dictum printed upon a large card and placed conspicuously upon their desks or wherever they sit when the divine afflatus, or more properly the cacathes scribendi, is upon them.

Ouida's novel "Helianthus" has, of course, attracted the attention usually bestowed upon genius dead and denied to genius alive. A few carping voices have been raised in protest against an uncompleted novel, but even they have the grace to see that there was only one alternative to publication, and no vandal has yet arisen to suggest that "Helianthus" should have been destroyed. Think, too, with what ingenuity we was the "narrowest poverty" and her school life was a "prolonged tragedy." Many of Charlotte Brontë's letters, now given to us by Mr. Shorter, have never been published before. We wisely refrain from comment except to say that they reveal their author as of "an entirely good and honorable nature."

Some notable contributions have been made to history during the last few months. Allan Lea, in "The Flight of the King," tells with a graphic minuteness of the events immediately following the battle of Worcester and of the loyalty, resource, and purpose that combined to save the life of Charles II. It is an old story, but told with new detail and a surprising amount of it.

Perhaps the most fascinating of recent historical works is B. C. Hardy's "Princesse de Lamballe." Of her, indeed, we can never hear too much. Perhaps more tears have been shed for the Princesse de Lamballe than for all other victims of the French Revolution put together. Hers was the supreme tragedy of that holocaust, and the figure of the "little lady dressed in white" who stood watching the carnage of La Force before she herself was hacked and stabbed and mutilated is one that will not soon fade from popular imagination. Mr. Hardy has done his work exceedingly well. He leaves nothing unsaid and his book is an important acquisition to the student of the revolution.

But Mr. Hardy is not the only English recorder of French events. His story has a sentimental value peculiarly its own, but it is equaled in general importance by "Dumouriez and the Defense of England Against Napoleon," from the pens of J. Holland Rose and A. M. Broadley. It is generally known that when Dumouriez was exiled from France he came to England, but it is not so widely known that the English government enlisted his aid in its preparation for the French invasion under Napoleon. However much we may condemn this as an act of treachery toward France, we may remember that France had behaved with extraordinary ingratitude toward her greatest general and that an unconcealed malevolence existed between him and Napoleon. All this is made very can complete the novel for ourselves and finish it in laughter or in tears, as the mood of the moment may be. Ouida, it is to be feared, intended the story to end unhappily, a crime to the novelist, although unhappy endings do sometimes happen to stories in real life.

Even the most cursory notice of the literature of today should not omit mention of two books about Rousseau, one from an English pen and the other a translation from the French. "Rousseau and the Women He Loved," by Francis Gribble, is not exactly an important work, but it is undeniably interesting, in spite of the fact that Rousseau never loved any one nor was he ever able to persuade any woman to love him. But there were relations between Rousseau and a good many women, and it is of these that Mr. Gribble tells us, and it may be said that he steers his way with considerable skill. It is strange that the man who is said to have given to the world a new way to make love should himself have been so infelicitous in his affaires du cœur. Perhaps it was not entirely his own fault that he could never distinguish between intrigue and romance. It may be due, as M. Lemaître says, to the "natural immodesty" of his mind, but the fact remains that his one enduring liaison was with a servant girl who could neither read nor write and who was presently to forsake him in favor of a groom.

So far as the lesser fiction of the day is concerned, we can hardly congratulate ourselves upon an improvement. The sex problem obtrudes itself as much as ever, and it seems to assume uglier forms day by day as though it would sicken us into attention. One might suppose that there was no other problem before the human race than this eternal one of the relations between the sexes, and we harp upon it as though it were a discovery of yesterday rather than the exclusive theme of a thousand years. Perhaps when the renaissance comes and the novelist of the new age looks abroad for fresh air to breathe, he will signalize his advent by relegating sex to its rightful position and so emancipate our fiction from a thralldom both exhausting and degrading.

PICCADILLY.

JOAN OF GARIOCH.

Albert Kinross's new novel is a distinct departure in fiction, inasmuch as it is saturated with the personality of a heroine who never appears at all upon the stage. We neither see Joan nor do we hear her voice, but she has all the reality of veritable flesh and blood. It is a distinct departure because it combines almost continuous incident and sensation with a character sketch of unusual skill. When we first make the acquaintance of Jim, and for some time thereafter, we judge him to be a somewhat commonplace example of the ardent lover who is prepared to venture everything for the girl he has lost. But Jim grows steadily from the commonplace into the heroic, and before we leave him to his heart's content we are glad to know and to remember a most gallant, fearless gentleman.

Returning from the South African war, Jim finds that his betrothed, Joan of Garioch, has been married to the Count de Jarnac, a Russian nobleman of whom no one knows much, except that he was willing to rescue Sir Alison from a financial disaster and to pay three hundred thousand pounds for the hand of his daughter. In Sir Alison's own words, "I have sold her—for three hundred thousand pounds. I have broken my word with you." De Jarnac and Joan have disappeared and have left no trace behind, but that Joan is faithful and will wait in confidence for the future is made plain by the letter that she leaves behind her.

Jim searches Europe for his lost love and at last finds himself in Russia on the eve of the revolution. On his second night in St. Petersburg he is visited by a police officer, who demands from him the passport that he has already surrendered in due form to the hotel clerk for transmission. The hotel clerk denies all knowledge of it, and although the plot to expel him from Russia is obvious enough, he has no choice but to submit:

The officer pulled out his watch.
"It is now eighteen minutes after six," he returned. "You will be free till half-past nine. You will be kept under observation, but you can go and come as you please. At ten o'clock a train leaves the Warsaw station for the frontier. You will be escorted to that train. You will either go quietly or offer resistance; that again is exactly as you please. I myself will be ready for you at nine-thirty. There will be a carriage and two men waiting for us. They will be armed. Without a passport one is not allowed to remain in Russia."

And so our hero is expelled for the obvious reason that in Russia he is too close to Joan.

But he comes back, and this time as the special correspondent of an English newspaper. Taken prisoner by a party of revolutionists, he is "rescued" by Cosacks, positively identified as the Nihilist Maxime, and sent forward for execution:

The general came towards me and looked me up and down.
"Is this a joke?" he asked.
"I obey Colonel Palkin's orders, your excellency," replied young Firks.
"This is not Maxime—no slightest resemblance," said the general; and addressing me, "Who are you?"
"I handed him my card."
"You will have an excellent story for your journal," said he.
"I could not have had a better," was my reply.

And then we have the most extraordinary story ever told of the Russian revolution, and it is told by one who knows. To invent such a situation would be impossible. We see the government playing with the revolution as a cat plays with a mouse, waiting until the discords within the uprising have done each other the maximum of injury, and then with relentless, inflexible cruelty extending the area of pacification by extermination. We see members of the imperial family seated at the table of the conspirators, and the conspirators, ablaze with decorations, in the ball-rooms of the aristocracy. We see the dreary march of the proscribed out to the sand hills of Riga and to the ready-made graves into which they fall after the fourth or fifth volley. It is a tremendous picture that the author draws, all the more tremendous for its half-cynical condensation.

But Jim's reappearance in Russia is the signal for the combined attack of his enemies, who are determined to remove him from Joan's vicinity at all costs. And his enemies are high officials who have the whole machinery of iniquity at their disposal. Count Bobroff tries first to bribe him with money and with women, and, failing, he resorts to threats:

"In that case it would be easier and simpler were you to disappear—you know how one disappears in Riga?"
"Perfectly," said I; "the whole town since your excellency's arrival is a model instance of the system."
"I have only to touch this bell," said he, "and you will never be seen again alive outside the castle."
"Your excellency must have a holy terror of death, and evidently credits me with the same superstition."

Bobroff invites him to supper, arrests him, and orders that he be thrown into the river that night, but he escapes by the aid of a revolutionary leader. But he will not leave Russia. His newspaper alone controls his movements, and the whole landscape of danger is obscured and blotted out by a point of duty.

Escaping once more from a plot of Bobroff's, he yet once more seeks an interview with him and deliberately puts his head into the lion's mouth:

"You believe, then, that in the end you will find your way to Miss Garioch?"
"Only in moments of despondency have I ever doubted it."
"Just now you are a prey to no such moment?"
"Rarely have I been more optimistic," I answered.
"He looked me over curiously. I was, no doubt, a new type, foreign to his experience and difficult to deal with or explain."

"You are very much like a Japanese," he said at last.
"They won their war," was my reply.
"You will run no risk of winning yours."

A final extract may be used to show the mettle of this newspaper correspondent who relies upon a performance of duty to bring him to his lady love. In the interests of his newspaper he interviews Prince Patiomkin, whom he knows to be his arch enemy standing behind Bobroff:

He greeted me very affably.
"So you have come here to take a look at Livonia and interview Orloff," he began; "yours must be a very enterprising newspaper."
I glanced about me. He had been reading a copy of Country Life, just like an English gentleman. . . . He was dressed by an English tailor.
"You have never been in this part of the world before," he pursued; "but the best time to visit us is in the summer."

"I looked deep into the eyes of this man. He was as good an actor as any I ever met; and I have met a few.
"I am hardly here for pleasure," was my reply, "or at my own convenience, and your highness surprises me by intimating that I may plan so far ahead."
"Bobroff is a bungler," he answered genially; "he did not even inform me that you were coming here."

Patiomkin finally dismisses him graciously, provides him with an escort, and secretly instructs the escort to blow a hole in Cremon Lake and throw him in. But once more he escapes.

The reader must resort to the obvious method to discover the end of this remarkable story. He will make the acquaintance of Arbusoff, prince of revolutionists, who, if he could but multiply himself by a hundred, would drive the Romanoffs into the sea. He will read of that terribly dramatic duel when Arbusoff's bullet, aimed at the heart of a traitor, is deflected by the metal frame of Joan's picture. And he will learn for himself the identity of Joan's husband and of how the sun pierced the clouds, as the sun always does.

"Joan of Garioch" is one of the great novels of the day, a strong and wholesome story, one of the few stories that become permanent mental possessions.

The Damascus and Mecca Railway, which is under construction by the Turkish government, has been completed to Medina, and its extension to Mecca is said to be assured. These are the two "holy cities" of the Mohammedans and have been visited by very few Christians, owing to the jealousy and opposition of the former, who regard all such visits as profanation.

TWO POETS.

Stephen Phillips, in his little volume of "New Poems" (published by the John Lane Company), gives us twenty-seven selections, including the one-act tragedy of "Iole," wherein the scene is laid at Corinth, at that time hotly besieged by the Spartans. Of the longer selections, "Endymion" claims attention for its poetic value and the mystical idea that confers at the same time inspiration and sorrow. Selene visits Endymion and gives him immortality by a kiss. How, he asks, can he ever live again in earthly fields, having tasted of Imagination's Heaven:

"So he it then. Dream on, Endymion,"
She answered, "and at deep of midnight I
Will lean and kiss thee: thou shalt feel my kiss
In deepest dream; and I shall bear thy lips
Distinct into the quiet say my name,
And yet, sweet boy, think not that in this dream
Thou shalt not suffer, for thy trance shall be More quivering intense than waking hour.
Cities shall be in it, and like to clouds
White dynasties subsiding and rebuilt
In blue eternity: though closed thine eyes,
Never had mortal such deep sight as thine.
Though deaf thine ear, thunder shall be in it,
Trumpets, and sound of snow, and note of birds,
Lashed caverns and the earliest lip of habes;
Thou shalt with all rejoice and weep and die
Forever; though the dream hold on its course."

And so the poet sleeps on, "thrilled with all the arrows of mankind," and the goddess departs to her own throne and place:

And so she keeps her light and he his dream.

Another notable poem is "Midnight—The 31st of December, 1900." The poet is shown the things that shall be and the ultimate triumph of knowledge:

"Yet remember the ancient things, the things that have been,
And meekly inherit the earth
And or ever those days be ended, the veil shall be rent—
The veil upon nature's face.
The dead whom ye loved, ye shall walk with, and speak with the lost.
The delusion of death shall pass:
The delusion of wounded earth, the apparent withdrawal.
The snare of sightlessness fade.
Ye shall shed your bodies, and upward shall flutter to freedom,
For a moment consent to the ground.
Lo, I am the burster of bonds and the breaker of barriers—
I am be that shall free," saith the Lord.

"For the lingering battle, the contest of ages is ending,
And victory followeth Me.
They set them in order of battle, they ranged them against me—

Chaos and Anguish and Time
And Madness and Hunger and Sorrow and Night and the Grave—

But victory followeth Me.
Lo, I come, I hasten, I set my procession in order,
In order of triumph I come;
At the wheels of my chariot pacing, like alien captives,
Anguish and Time and Death,
To a multitude out of the uttermost spheres assembled,
With a shout of delivered stars."

Another and not a dissimilar volume of verse comes to us from Grace Denio Litchfield, who has already proved her possession of an enviable measure of poetic grace. Her volume, "Narcissus and Other Poems," published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, contains fifteen productions, all of them short except "Narcissus," a poem that deserves to be read and remembered for its fine conception and well-nigh faultless composition. There are plenty of passages that bear reproduction, all of them tense with nature passion and the joy of living:

Near and more near now came soft-stepping night
O'er neighboring hills of dusky malachite,
As dying day undid the eastern bars,
Her flying tresses braided with gold stars,
The rustle of her garment, loosely flowing,
Making a murmured music of her going,
Her languorous lids half closed, her slackening hand
Dropping down dreams, slow passed she o'er the land,
A perfume faint, miraculously sweet—
The breath of blossoms bruised beneath her feet—
Trailing like brume of incense after her;
And place and time became one wide deep blur.

As a good illustration of the author's shorter poems a stanza may be quoted from "Like a Garden of Marvelous Midsummer Blooms," which is distinctly striking in spite of a faulty concluding line:

Like a garden of marvelous midsummer blooms
In a tangle of twilights and sunfloods and glooms—
A riot of raptures in scarlet and blue
With blisses of purple and gold breaking through—
A temple to passion, with mossbanks for stairs,
And colors for anthems, and perfumes for prayers,
Where all longings, all dreams, all desires that be Exhale in the breath of each blossoming tree,—
Such, O Love, is my heart's love—my heart's love for thee.

The little poem "Ennuui" is in a rather different vein and one that we feel to be not so desirable:

A wide bare field, neath 'blinding skies,
Where no tree grows, no shadow lies,
Where no wind stirs, where no bee flies.

A roadway, even, blank and white,
That swerves not left, that swerves not right,
That stretches, changeless, out of sight.

Footprints midway adown its dust;
Two lagging, leaden feet that just Trail on and on, because they must.

Small volumes of verse are better than large, and especially when they show conscientious and unshaking work.

The first tunnel under a river ever constructed in France has just been completed in Paris. It runs under the Seine from the Place de la Concorde to the Chamber of Deputies, and it is part of the new Metropolitan Subway line, which will be opened probably by spring. This line will run from Montmartre to the Porte de Versailles.

A DEFENSE OF CHRISTIANITY.

Mr. Chesterton Appears as a Champion of the Church and Unfurls the Banner of Orthodoxy.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton advances, like a modern Paladin, to the defense of orthodox Christianity. We could have wished that he had been a little more explicit as to the precise nature of orthodoxy, but perhaps he steers intentionally from the perilous rocks of definition. It may, however, be gathered that his orthodox Christianity is among the most unorthodox of the divisions into which a distracted theology has been led. There is room under Mr. Chesterton's ample cloak of orthodoxy for all the deviations of the historic church and for all the recognized remnants of those deviations as they exist today. Mr. Chesterton is, in fact, broadly tolerant, and what can be more heterodox than toleration.

We need not follow this remarkable writer through his pilgrim's progress amid the "Paradoxes of Christianity." Where other men deduce weakness he deduces strength, and where other men argue against, he argues for. He was converted to Christianity by Huxley, Spencer, and Bradlaugh, and when he had finished Ingersoll he said, "Almost thou persuadest me to be Christian." That Christianity should be attacked for its pessimism as well as for its optimism, that it should be all things to all men, that it should inflame the blood of the soldier and chill the heart of the hermit, that it should be attacked for its "pairs of opposites" all down the line—all these things suggested to him a central stability worth the labor of discovery and a hold upon the human heart that must owe its tenacity to truth. And the truth of Christianity is in its duality, in the collision of stimulated extremes, in the mutual destructiveness of exaggerations.

What, we are asked, do we mean by making things better, a phrase coming glibly to the lips, but without, it would seem, much meaning. What is our standard and our ideal? Do you get it from nature? But there is no equality in nature, nor is there inequality, because nature has no standards. "Nature does not say that cats are more valuable than mice; nature makes no remark on the subject." We must get it from our own vision, but when we try to express it we are usually foolish.

And the huge blunder of our age is in not knowing how to use our vision of the ideal. Recognizing the lack of conformity between the world and the vision, we do not try to alter the world, but rather to change our vision:

Progress does mean (just now) that we are always changing the vision. It should mean that we are slow but sure in bringing justice and mercy among men; it does mean that we are very swift in doubting the desirability of justice and mercy: a wild page from any Prussian sophist makes men doubt it. Progress should mean that we are always walking toward the New Jerusalem. It does mean that the New Jerusalem is always walking away from us. We are not altering the real to suit the ideal. We are altering the ideal: it is easier.

We hear a great deal about the era for conservation and repose. This is indeed such an era, "because it is an age of complete unbelief." If we wish institutions to remain the same, then let beliefs change and pass away like the winds. New religions, fluctuating faiths, mean the stability of the old. Keep men mentally worried, fill their minds with theories, "illuminations," novelties, universal panaceas, and they will do nothing:

But the man we see every day—the worker in Mr. Gradgrind's factory, the little clerk in Mr. Gradgrind's office—he is too mentally worried to believe in freedom. He is kept quiet with revolutionary literature. He is calmed and kept in his place by a succession of wild philosophies. He is a Marxian one day, a Nietzscheite the next day, a Superman (probably) the next day; and a slave every day. The only thing that remains after all the philosophies is the factory. The only man who gains by all the philosophies is Gradgrind. It would be worth his while to keep his commercial helotry supplied with skeptical literature. And, now I come to think of it, of course, Gradgrind is famous for giving libraries. He shows his sense. All modern books are on his side. As long as the vision of heaven is always changing, the vision of earth will be exactly the same. No ideal will remain long enough to be realized, or even partly realized. The modern young man will never change his environment; for he will always change his mind.

Evidently our ideal must be fixed. The artist who asks his customer for twenty sittings will not produce much of a portrait if a new person sits every day. We must have a permanent ideal. "There must be something eternal if there is to be anything sudden":

It is necessary whether we wish the king's orders to be promptly executed or whether we only wish the king to be promptly executed. The favorite revolutionary argument finds its best answer in the axe. The evolutionist says, "Where do you draw the line?" The revolutionist answers, "I draw it here: exactly between your head and body." There must at any given moment be an abstract right and wrong if any blow is to be struck.

It is only orthodoxy that can revolt. Revolutions come only from a comparison between the present and some unchanging ideal. Christianity is that unchanging ideal. Man does not evolve. He simply looks his ideal straight in the face from time to time and resolves to be like that ideal. It is the eternal inner vision. The modern humanitarians say, for instance, that man is growing more and more humane, that he is evolving toward mercy and justice:

I am here following only the outlines of their argument, which consists in maintaining that man has been progressively more lenient, first to citizens, then to slaves, then to animals, and then (presumably) to plants. I think it wrong to sit on a man. Soon I shall think it wrong to sit on a horse. Eventually (I suppose) I shall think it wrong to sit on a chair. That is the drive of the argument. . . . This drift may be really evolutionary, because it is stupid.

Progress must be fixed and it must be composite. Christianity claims that it has truly a fixed ideal and that it is literally a picture, "for I know who painted it." Now there is a third necessity; we must be watchful, lest we fall from Eden. Conservatism is not what is wanted, because the ideal of conservatism is that if you leave things alone you leave them as they are. But if you leave things alone you subject them to a torrent of change. If you want a white post to remain white you must paint it again and again; "that is, you must be always having a revolution," or, in Mr. Chesterton's words, "if you want the old white post, you must have a new white post."

When a system becomes popular it is at the point of becoming most oppressive. England went mad with joy at the liberty given by Queen Elizabeth, and a few years later it had to cut off King Charles's head. We have hardly ceased to cheer for the liberty of the press when we find the press itself reclining in the iniquitous seat of the tyrant. Christianity tells us that we may talk as much as we like about progress. It is "original sin" that torments us, that makes us backslide; in other words—the Fall.

The author has listened to Socialists and Democrats "with a hideous fascination":

If these happy democrats could prove their case, they would strike democracy dead. If the poor are thus utterly demoralized, it may or may not be practical to raise them. But it is certainly quite practical to disfranchise them. If a man with a bad bedroom can not give a good vote, then the first and swiftest deduction is that he shall give no vote. The governing class may not unreasonably say: "It may take us some time to reform his bedroom. But if he is the brute you say, it will take him very little time to ruin our country. Therefore we will take your hint and not give him the chance." It fills me with horrible amusement to observe the way in which the earnest Socialist industriously lays the foundation of all aristocracy, expatiating blandly upon the evident unfitness of the poor to rule. It is like listening to some one at an evening party apologizing for entering without evening dress, and explaining that he had recently been intoxicated, had a personal habit of taking off his clothes in the street, and bad, moreover, only just changed from prison uniform. At any moment, one feels, the host might say that really, if it was as bad as that, he need not come in at all. So it is when the ordinary Socialist, with a beaming face, proves that the poor, after their smashing experiences, can not be really trustworthy. At any moment the rich may say, "Very well, then, we won't trust them," and bang the door in his face.

Christianity alone is the remedy, the old historic Christianity, the "orthodox Christianity" and not the evolved or "higher" product. The minimum of the church would be a deadly ultimatum to the world:

For the whole modern world is absolutely based on the assumption, not that the rich are necessary (which is tenable), but that the rich are trustworthy, which (for a Christian) is not tenable. You will hear everlastingly, in all discussions about newspapers, companies, aristocracies, or party politics, this argument, that the rich man can not be bribed. The fact is, of course, that the rich man is bribed: he has been bribed already. That is why he is a rich man. The whole case for Christianity is that a man who is dependent upon the luxuries of this life is a corrupt man, spiritually corrupt, politically corrupt, financially corrupt. There is one thing that Christ and all the Christian saints have said with a sort of savage monotony. They have said simply that to be rich is to be in peculiar danger of moral wreck. It is not demonstrably un-Christian to kill the rich as violators of definable justice. It is not demonstrably un-Christian to crown the rich as convenient rulers of society. It is not certainly un-Christian to rebel against the rich or to submit to the rich. But it is quite certainly un-Christian to trust the rich, to regard the rich as more safe than the poor.

Christianity, we are reminded, is the one force in the world which, if it has not put the rich man in the right place, has at least shown where that right place is. Look, for instance, at the castes of India, where aristocracy carries with it the aroma of spirituality. But no Christianity has ever suggested that a baronet is spiritually better than a butcher. No Christianity has ever suggested "that a duke would not be damned." In Christian society the gentleman is "a sort of joke," while "we in Europe never really and at the root of our souls took aristocracy seriously." And this is due to Christianity, but what, in the name of Heaven, does Mr. Chesterton mean by orthodox?

Mr. Chesterton denounces the foolish habit of regarding orthodoxy as "something heavy, humdrum, and safe." Never was there anything so perilous or so exciting. The church has swerved to left and right to avoid enormous obstacles. Arianism on the one hand, Orientalism on the other, have threatened to check her and to engulf her, but she has evaded the conflict and has pursued her path:

It is always easy to be a modernist; as it is easy to be a snob. To have fallen into any of those open traps of error and exaggeration which fashion after fashion and sect after sect set along the historic path of Christendom—that would indeed have been simple. It is always simple to fall; there are an infinity of angles at which one falls, only one at which one stands. To have fallen into any one of the fads from Gnosticism to Christian Science would indeed have been obvious and tame. But to have avoided them all has been one whirling adventure; and in my vision the heavenly chariot flies thundering through the ages, the dull beresies sprawling and prostrate, the wild truth reeling but erect.

These are strange sayings and of a most unorthodox orthodox. What will the churches have to say to them? Will they welcome this wonderful new champion who would thrust the torch and the red flag into their hands, will they applaud this crusader who would crown them with the chaplet of revolution, will they accept the rôle that Mr. Chesterton would assign to them in history, and will they play the part that he presses upon them with such friendly hands? In other words, are the churches orthodox?

"Orthodoxy," by Gilbert K. Chesterton. Published by the John Lane Company, New York; $1.50.

The list of awards this year by the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission is national in its scope, covering a territory from Maine to the Pacific Coast. Forty-eight heroes were rewarded for deeds of exceptional bravery, and in some cases the medals of honor were supplemented by gifts of cash. A hero in Georgia, whose exploit is not described, received $1000 along with his medal to remove a burden of debt which weighed heavily upon him. Another man who had risked his life for the cause of humanity was awarded $1000 to help him pay for a home. An act of heroism which the commission recognized as worthy of a cash prize of $250 was that of a man in Cassville, New Jersey, who worked several hours in a well, in constant peril of death by asphyxiation from poisonous gases, to save the life of a well-digger who had been imprisoned by falling debris.

The selection of Augustus Thomas as president of the Society of American Dramatists is an evidence of wise discretion and due appreciation on the part of that, in the past, sometimes rather maligned organization. Two score years ago the very phrase "American dramatist" was wont to call forth a condescending smile on the lips of the listener. The American drama, speaking in general terms, had no existence, or, if it did, only as the timid offspring of a French or English parent. Sydney Smith's sneering imputation with regard to our native literature had been only partly refuted. American books, indeed, were read, but significant American plays faithfully representative of the spirit of our soil and the character of its people existed chiefly as a rosy dream on the part of most unflinching patriots.

The Rev. Joseph Leicester Lyne, popularly known as "Father Ignatius, the monk of Llanthony," who died in London a few days ago, had a long and remarkable career, and for nearly fifty years carried on a crusade in defense of the Holy Scriptures and orthodox Christianity against the opponents of orthodoxy within the Church of England. He was so remarkably orthodox that he was opposed to the attempts to convert Jews to Christianity, because, as he held, that would destroy the whole idea of Revelation, "through the medium of which God has declared that the Jews are to remain a separate people."

The army and navy regulations require their men to uncover and stand at attention when "The Star-Spangled Banner" is played, which answers the question as to which is considered the "national anthem."

WORK OF THE NOVELISTS.

Reviews by Sidney G. P. Coryn.

Annabel Channice, by Anne Douglas Sedgwick. Published by the Century Company, New York; $1.50.

This charmingly written story strikes us with a sense of unreality. Lady Channice, married to a man older than herself, succumbs to the fascination of a young artist and lives with him for a week before disillusion comes. Moved by her husband's forgiveness and his supposed magnanimity in accepting a child that can not be his, she lives a life of secluded expiation, devoting herself absolutely to the care of her son and worshiping the chivalry of a husband who protects her name by periodical visits. Then comes the second disillusion, when she finds that her husband has but made a virtue of necessity and that by his behavior toward herself he has cloaked his own misdemeanors, long continued and far more serious. The fine nobility of the boy and his devotion to his mother are exquisitely described, but it is not easy to appreciate the willing and life-long self-abasement of Lady Channice for a fault that might have been met by a lesser expiation.

Holy Orders, by Marie Corelli. Published by the Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York; $1.50.

In a special preface to American readers Miss Corelli asks to be taken seriously, but we do not understand why such a request should be necessary. She seems to suppose that her American audience relies wholly upon "London Correspondence" for its opinions, but it would perhaps be well if she looked within her own work for whatever adverse judgment has been rendered.

"Holy Orders" has all the literary virtues of intense sincerity. It is a burning arraignment of the drink traffic in rural England, a pitiable picture of mental and moral degradation of a kind wholly unknown in the village life of America. Even without personal experience we have no difficulty in believing the picture to be a true one. Civilization furnishes no parallel to the sodden squalor of the English village.

We need not examine at length the specimens furnished by the author. Chief among them is Dan Kiernan, a drunken rascal who practically beats his wife to death, and falls victim to Jacynth Miller, a wicked and beautiful village girl, who, in her turn, elopes with a vagabond artist. Kiernan shoots the parson's wife, against whom he has a grudge, and eventually meets a miserable death, as do Jacynth and her artist lover. It is a sordid and hideous tragedy told with alternate pathos and indignation, and back of it all is the sinister figure of Minchin the brewer, who behind a rampart of law and precedent debauches a country side with his poisonous liquors.

But artistically the story falls short at more than one point. If we are to have a bird's-eye view of the struggle between virtue and alcoholic debauchery in the English village, the representative of virtue should at least have a common-sense virility that would command our respect. With the best of intentions the Rev. Richard Everton is a singularly inadequate figure, indeed a ridiculous figure, saturated with the spirit of caste superiority and foolish dogmatism and only saved from a priestly insolence by a natural benevolence. His wife is not only arrogant and contemptuous, but selfish and silly, a Dora Copperfield invested with social authority. Mr. and Mrs. Everton drink French wines at the vicarage and are amazed that the villagers should drink beer at the saloon, while as for the practice of a helpful and humble comradeship as a weapon of reform, and the only weapon, they simply have no conception of it. Miss Corelli's book does indeed suggest the suspicion that rural England will never be saved from the drink demon by a law-established church, and that both intemperance and subservience to "pastors and masters" are twin evils, for which some common cause may be sought. If the author had put a real man and a real woman in the place of Everton and his wife, her appeal would have gained immeasurably.

But in spite of this, in spite of an undue wordiness and excessive length, Miss Corelli has written a noteworthy book, a book whose sincerity of purpose is transparent and refreshing.

Thou Fool, by J. J. Bell. Published by the Baker & Taylor Company, New York; $1.50.

The story is presumably intended to show the futility of wealth acquired by a loss of the moral nature, and the lesson is conveyed unobtrusively and without preaching. We are introduced to Robert Barker as the assistant in a country grocery. Taking advantage of private information as to railroad intentions, we see him open a store of his own, ruin his old employer, and create a network of establishments by the usual ruthless methods of competition. And then gradually the chickens come home to roost. Barker is slowly ostracized by his former friends, while the girl with whom he is frantically in love, the niece of his first employer, will have nothing to do with him. The prophecy of old Duncan Glen comes true, "A' the riches in creation . . . neither wife, nor weans, nor a freside o' yer ain." "Thou Fool" is a good story and artistically told.

The Man Without a Head, by Tyler de Saix. Published by Moffat, Yard & Co., New York; $1.50.

We have here another piece of evidence that the detective novel is on the up-grade. In this story we have plenty of crime and of a bad kind, but the unpleasant impression is mitigated by some charming sentiment and the softer human touches. A greater condensation would have improved the story.

Japanese fairy stories are distinctly popular, and now we have an enticing collection from the pen of William Elliot Griffis, with illustrations in color. It is entitled "The Fire-Fly's Lovers," and it is published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. Price, $1.

WORK OF THE NOVELISTS.

The Duke's Motto, by Justin Huntly McCarthy. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York.

Mr. McCarthy takes an easy first among the historical romancers of the day. Nothing could be better than his work as an antidote to the unwholesome but more popular fiction that enjoys a greater currency. No other writer of his kind can surpass him in vigor of style, in directness of narrative, or in general accuracy of delineation.

"The Duke's Motto" is a story of Lagardère and of the days of Louis XIII freed at last from the paternal tyranny of Richelieu. There were three Louis—Louis the king, and Louis, Duke of Nevers, and Louis of Mantua, Prince of Gonzague. Louis de Gonzague loves the daughter of the wealthy Caylus and discovers all too late that she is already the wife of de Nevers and the mother of his child. Therefore he hires nine bravos to waylay de Nevers and to murder him.

Lagardère also has a quarrel with de Nevers, and while seeking to meet him he encounters the nine desperadoes and, moved by chivalry, decides to defend his enemy against assassination and to save his child, who, through a misunderstanding, has been placed in his arms. In the fierce fight that ensues de Nevers is treacherously stabbed by de Gonzague and dies, but Lagardère makes his escape with the child and protects her for seventeen years against the unceasing machinations of de Gonzague, who has married de Nevers's widow, but who can not inherit the estate so long as the child is not known to be dead. Lagardère eventually returns to France, appeals to the king on behalf of Gabrielle de Nevers, denounces de Gonzague and proves his crime, receiving the fitting reward of his gallant chivalry and devotion.

The picture of Lagardère is as impressive

as that of d'Artagnan. His splendid championship of de Nevers, his self-effacement in the protection of Gabrielle, his courage, his skill as a swordsman, and his wit combine to make a character not soon to be forgotten, a veritable chevalier sans peur et sans reproche. The last page of "The Duke's Motto" leaves Lagardère alive and triumphant, and we shall expect to hear more about him.

The Silver Butterfly, by Mrs. Wilson Woodrow. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis; $1.50.

The author is not at her best in this story. We miss the rugged and unconventional humanity that she knows so well how to depict and instead we find ourselves in a society and in the midst of events to which we could hardly find a parallel in real life.

Robert Hayden returns from South America the sole possessor of the secret of a lost mine. The mine has been worked, and apparently by a considerable force, immediately before the story opens, but plague has carried away most of the population, an earthquake has altered the lay of the land, and the whereabouts of the mine seem to be hopelessly lost. Then Hayden stumbles upon it by chance and returns to America to hargain with the heirs, if he can find them, for they also have disappeared. Then comes his introduction to Marcia Oldham under circumstances hardly consistent with maidenly behavior, and we prepare ourselves at once for the inevitable discovery that Marcia is the lost owner of the lost Mariposa mine. The idea is a good one, but why bury it in a jungle of unrealities? Marcia, for example, although without visible means of support, seems to live like a princess, and we are asked to believe that she provides the wherewithal by secretly making little articles of silver jewelry and selling them to her friends. The story would have been so much better if told simply, on a lower social plane, and without the introduction of society fortune tellers, costly dinners, electric automobiles, and silver butterflies. It needed directness and a hearty human nature, and it has very little of either.

Colonel Greoheart, by H. C. Bailey. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis.

This is a story of the Civil War in England, and all the great historic characters—Cromwell, Ireton, Fairfax, Essex, Harrison, etc.—are effectively introduced. Colonel Stow and Colonel Royston, sworn comrades through the continental wars, find themselves in England at the beginning of the trouble between king and Parliament, and knowing little, perhaps caring less, of the rights of the quarrel, they offer their swords to the king. The woman in the case is the fair Lucinda Weston, who was Jerry Stow's boyhood flame, but who is now grown to woman's estate and whose vain fickleness leads to a rupture between the friends, so that Colonel Royston presently finds himself in the opposite camp and lending the weight of his reputation and the edge of his sword to the Parliament. It is a good story, full of stirring incident, while as a picture of the times it is full of accurate and instructive detail.

Amédée's Son, by Harry James Smith. Published by the Houghton-Mifflin Company, Boston and New York; $1.50.

This first novel by a popular short-story writer will be welcomed not only as a humorous piece of work, but as a successful portrayal of life among the French inhabitants of Cape Breton. The author knows his subject intimately and his story of the orphan boy who grows up under the care of his grandfather is not only marked by much psychological insight, but makes strong appeal to sentiment and sympathy.

The Long Arm of Mannister, by E. Phillips Oppenheim. Published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

This is a story of the personal revenge exacted by Mannister on eight of his companions, who, for some unexplained reason, conspire to ruin him through the downfall of his wife. Returning to London, he ruthlessly pursues the plotters, and one by one accomplishes their overthrow with a resourceful ingenuity that reminds us of the Count of Monte Cristo. But the author is artist enough to redeem his book from the undiluted atmosphere of revenge. One of his enemies is a woman, and he gives her good for evil, and he pardons his wife. But if a man is to be judged by the company he keeps, we need hardly waste much sympathy upon Mannister, for a more unsavory crew it would be hard to imagine.

The Mills of the Gods, by Elizabeth Robins. Published by Moffat, Yard & Co., New York.

An unwholesome story of a woman who revenged herself upon her inconstant lover of former days by allowing him to marry her daughter without a warning that she was semi-idiotic. It is not easy to understand why such a repulsive story should be written.

MRS. ATHERTON'S NEW NOVEL.

The Gorgeous Isle, by Gertrude Atherton. Published by Doubleday, Page & Co., New York; 90 cents.

The intelligent reader will finish Mrs. Atherton's new story with a sense of bewilderment and with a wish to deliberate at leisure over an ethical problem that has never been presented before, at least in so terse and vivid a form. It can be read in two hours, and it will not be laid down before the last page is reached.

There are only two characters, with the necessary background of nonentities, such as the scheming mammas and their daughters of pink and white wax, who made up society in the early Victorian years. The scene is in the West Indies during the vacation between two London seasons, and Anne Percy and her chaperon aunt are at the Bath Hotel preparatory to the young lady's presentation at court and her immersion in English society. Upon the same island lives Byam Warner, the most inspired poet of his day, but who has sunk to such a depth of alcoholic degradation as to be impossible from every viewpoint of social decency. With him genius and intoxication go always hand in hand—god and devil in hateful but inseparable combination.

Now Anne Percy has worshiped the poet from afar, just as many admirable young women had worshiped Byron. The stories of his dehauchery, becomingly filtered for feminine consumption, had but enhanced her maidenly interest, as such stories usually do in like cases, and when the good people at the hotel enter into a kindly conspiracy to rehabilitate the poet and so to cleanse him that he may once more shine in society, Anne wel-

Mr. Platt's Addresses.

Commenting on "The Addresses of Horace G. Platt," recently published by the Argonaut Publishing Company, San Francisco, the Globe and Commercial Advertiser, New York, says:

In every considerable city in the Union there is constant demand for the man who can make "a few remarks," and in each, among many speakers who rarely pass muster, are to be found a chosen few who are listened to with delight and prove that the art of public speaking is cultivated among us as successfully as it ever was in less material ages. Unfortunately, what they say is usually lost to all but the comparatively small number of their immediate auditors. Our newspapers have never adopted the old-country practice of reporting speeches at length, contenting themselves with brief and often misleading summaries, and not many have been preserved in permanent form. It is of more than common interest, therefore, to find from the press of the Argonaut Publishing Company of San Francisco a volume, just issued, under the title "John Marshall, and Other Addresses," containing a few of the speeches made by Mr. Horace G. Platt, a member of the California bar, whose fame on the public platform and as post-prandial speaker is by no means confined to the Pacific Coast.

Covering a wide range of topics, grave and gay, this collection affords an admirable illustration of the versatility and readiness of our best public speakers, qualities which we have grown so accustomed to expect in them that we rarely consider how unreasonable are our demands. In an age of specialists, when intelligent generalization is more and more difficult, and anything short of precise and accurate information on every subject raised is certain to bring upon the offender's head humiliating criticism, we are inclined to call upon any man possessed of the gift of gab to discourse eloquently, at a moment's notice, on any and every theme within the ever-broadening field of human knowledge, taking for granted that a flexible tongue is the hallmark of the universal genius.

comes the proposal with zest, as a delightful combination of inclination with benevolence. Warner, clothed and in his right mind, responds to the overtures and naturally falls as deeply in love with Anne as Anne is already in love with him.

To the horror of her aunt, the young people are married, and Warner resolves to banish both poetry and handys, as that ill-assorted couple refuse to be parted. He will write prose only, and prose of the non-creative variety. But a terrible problem arises almost before the wane of the honeymoon. Poetry refuses to be banished, and with the undesired conception of a great idea comes the emergent demand for its birth, a demand that will not be denied, and that clamors so loudly for emission as to reduce the unwilling poet to the last point of mental and physical collapse. But only alcohol can roll back the doors, and what will happen if the poetic congestion is unrelieved?

What does happen must be disclosed by the story itself, and the reader will close the book with exclamations of approval or of impatient contempt, according to his or her conception of things. Mrs. Atherton confronts us with a real ethical problem, and while we have firm ideas as to its proper solution, it is only fair to leave the reader unembarassed to the exercise of a similar right. But we are grateful to the author for a remarkable story that does no violence to the psychology of genius and that is probably founded upon fact.

"Art and Economy in Home Decoration," by Mahel Tuke Priestman, should be a valuable aid to the home-builder with its terse and common-sense advice and artistic perceptions. Its text is William Morris's dictum, "Have nothing in your houses that you do not know to be useful or believe to be beautiful." It is published by the John Lane Company, New York; $1.50.

or sounding the note of patriotism in a Fourth of July oration. Through all his speeches, however casual, runs the appeal to manhood and for justice, for lofty aspirations and right thinking.

CONTEMPORARY IRELAND

L. PAUL - DUBOIS. 160 pages; net, $2.50; postage 20 cents extra.

Edited by T. M. KETTLE, M. P.

Mr. Paul Dubois, nephew of Taine, the historian, is the author of several important works on history and sociology. The present book is an important study of the Irish question, starting with an historical survey. Then the author deals with his subject in three parts: the social and political condition of Ireland at the present day, her material decline, and her possibilities of future intellectual and material regeneration.

"A thorough piece of work, such as only a trained historian with broad sympathies could accomplish."—Tribune.

LITERATURE AND PHILOSOPHY.

The Cambridge History of English Literature, edited by A. W. Ward, Litt. D., and A. R. Waller, M. A. Volume II. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; $2.50.

The second volume of this fine work fully sustains the judgment passed upon the first. While hesitating to acclaim a finality in matters literary, it is hard to see how there can be an advance upon the Cambridge History or one that will combine a fuller scholarship with more exacting editorial care.

The second volume brings us to the end of the Middle Ages. It contains eighteen chapters, each assigned to writers whose special knowledge is preëminent. Professor Saintsbury takes the chapters on "Chaucer" and "The English Chaucerians." "The Scottish Chaucerians" and "The Middle Scots Anthologies" fall to the lot of Mr. G. Gregory Smith, M. A. To Alice D. Greenwood are allotted the chapter on "The Beginnings of English Prose" and the two chapters on "English Prose in the Fifteenth Century." Other chapters are on "Religious Movements in the Fourteenth Century," by Rev. J. P. Whitney, B. D.; "Piers the Plowman," by Professor John Matthews Manly; "The Introduction of Printing into England and the Early Work of the Press," by Mr. E. Gordon Duff, M. A., and "English and Scotch Education to the Time of Colet," by the Rev. T. A. Walker, M. A., LL. D. The subject of "Ballads" is handled by Professor Francis B. Gummere, Ph. D., while A. R. Waller, M. A., writes a concluding chapter on "Political and Religious Verse to the Close of the Fifteenth Century." Bibliographies, Tables of Principal Dates, and a good index complete the volume.

The third volume, "Renaissance and Reformation," is now in the press and should see the light during the present year. It will deal with Erasmus and More, Barclay and Skelton, Lindsay and Knox, with the poetry (other than dramatic) as well as the prose of the earlier Tudor age, and with changes in language and prosody to the days of Elizabeth.

First and Last Things, by H. G. Wells. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

It would be a very wholesome experiment for most of us to imitate Mr. Wells and to write down the things that we really believe, always provided we could do it with the self-searching honesty apparent upon every page of the book and therefore excluding all those things that we merely wish other people to believe that we believe. We should probably find, as Mr. Wells seems to have found, that as intelligence increases so the things that we believe become fewer and greater, and we should recognize also the relative nature of even the most clearly seen truths.

Mr. Wells writes with the peculiar charm that comes from a careful sincerity. There are some sixty-five sections in his book—they can hardly be called chapters, and they seem to cover the whole mental gamut of an intelligent man. He tells us what he really believes on metaphysics, on the various aspects of religion, on general conduct, including the problems of war, of democracy, of justice, of sex, and of marriage, and he concludes with a section on "Some Personal Things," such as love, and life, and death, and failure. He says himself that he had no idea of making a book, and there is indeed no trace of an appeal to the gallery, nor of posing for applause or sensation. All the way through we find the same grave and measured consideration, the same careful and benevolent judgment of fact and motive. Mr. Wells has given us an intensely human book and one that prompts to intelligent self-examination.

The Law of the Rhythmic Breath, by Ella Adelia Fletcher. Published by R. F. Fenno & Co., New York; $1.

This seems to be an amplification of Mr. Rama Prasad's work, "Nature's Finer Forces," which in turn is a translation of a Hindu Tantric work on the rhythmic play of elemental forces through the universe and man. The work will doubtless be of value to those who need aid in the practical application and extension of the basic laws with which Mr. Prasad professed to deal. But the present author seriously discounts the popularity of her book by the undue use of Sanskrit terms, which are sown thickly upon every page, necessitating incessant reference to the glossary. In the great majority of these terms there is an available English equivalent that should be used.

Principles of Physiology and Hygiene, by George Wells Fitz, M. D. Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York.

This book is intended for the use of high schools, but it may well find a useful place in the home. Nothing could be better designed to convey a general idea of the relation between the human body and its environment and of the safeguards furnished by a common-sense hygiene. The chapters on stimulants and on first aid to the injured can hardly be too highly commended, while the simplicity of language and the absence of technical terms commend it to general use.

THREE YEARS BEHIND THE GUNS

HERE is a book which every one on the Pacific Coast will want. It is a true story of a San Francisco boy who ran away to sea, shipped on the Olympia, and was with Dewey in the battle of Manila Bay. It is universally considered "the most intimate record yet penned of life aboard an American man-of-war." Boys, big and little, will find it a stirring story of sea life and adventure.

Beautifully illustrated by Jorgensen and Varian and from photographs. $1.50

A LETTER FROM ADMIRAL DEWEY

"Many of my friends and I have read it with the greatest interest. I can vouch for many of the facts; and the description of the Battle of Manila Bay is one of the best I have ever seen published. The type and active life of our American seamen of today is well and interestingly portrayed, and the book is worth the attention of both young and old."

WITH POETS AND ESSAYISTS.

Quatros of Christ, by George Creel. Published by Paul Elder & Co., San Francisco; 75 cents.

This is an attempt to state the orthodox Christian creed in verses modeled after Omar Khayyam. As poetry the work has distinct merit. The metre is smooth and correct, the rhyme almost free from fault, and the sentiment is lofty and with an unmistakable ring of sincerity.

The preface is by Julius Hawthorne, but we can not think that it adds to the value of the book. Intemperate praise recoils and reacts, and unnecessary comparisons irritate. Mr. Creel's poem is quite able to stand upon its own merits, and it is an ill service, if not an absurdity, to range it by the side of Omar to the disadvantage of the latter. If Mr. Hawthorne thinks that Omar has discouraged "whatever remains of virility" in contemporary religious thought, he is, of course, welcome to his opinion, but there are some who will wish Mr. Hawthorne a better understanding of his Rubaiyat. Mr. Creel's poem will be enjoyed by those of kindred thought, and, indeed, by all who appreciate sincere and tuneful verse, but he will owe none of that appreciation to the eulogies of Mr. Hawthorne.

Historic Ghosts and Ghost Hunters, by H. Addington Bruce. Published by Moffat, Yard & Co., New York; $1.25.

This is little more than a collection of old ghost stories retold. The recitals have no original value and they have been told many times before, and usually better.

The author's "explanations" in the light of what he calls psychopathology have an air of lofty omniscience ill consonant with their subject. With an equipment of some half-dozen words such as subliminal, telepathic, and hypnotic, he airily disposes of phenomena that may be wholly subjective and illusionary, but that, if objective and real, are among the most complex of human problems. It does not seem to occur to him that the terms thus used so glibly are nothing more than words applied to groups of phenomena of which we know practically nothing or that there is any difference between giving a name to a fact and explaining it. The earnest student will find nothing in this book but a collection of interesting and historic ghost stories indifferently told, and he will be irritated by a trivial and pretentious use of nearly meaningless terms.

The Evolution of Modern Orchestration, by Louis Adolphe Coerne, Ph. D. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; $3.

The object of this work is to trace the evolution of the orchestra and of orchestration in connection with the history of music proper. The author divides his subject into five great stages of evolution—"The Cradle of Instrumental Music," "The Dawn of Independent Instrumentation," "The Beginnings of Orchestration," "The Classic Era," and "The Romantic Movement." An inclusive survey of the orchestral music of the world leads the author to a conclusion that the ideal mission of music is to reflect the loftiest sentiments of the composer's soul and to awaken similar experiences in the mind of the auditor so as to inspire and uplift him. The musical illustrations, occupying about ninety pages, are a valuable part of the work. They include quotations from Monteverde, Scarlatti, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Wagner, Saint-Saëns, Tschaiikowsky, Dvorák, and Strauss.

Charles Battell Loomis's A HOLIDAY TOUCH. The New York Times Review said that the author's delightful "Cheerful Americans" (already in its ninth printing) is "worthy of Frank Stockton." That authority—and a severe one on humor—the New York Sun, says the new book is "really amusing." Illustrated by Fogarty, Gruger, Newell, Loomis, "Hy" Mayer, H. G. Williamson and T. W. Adams. ($1.25.)

Ramsay Benson's A LORD OF LANDS "does for the poor man what 'The Fat of the Land' did for the well-to-do," says the Boston Transcript. The Independent says, "It is an adventure in living more thrilling than an African jungle story." It tells how a man with $50 a month wages and five children, in a big city, made his poverty spell comfort. ($1.50.)

Edgar Wallace's ANGEL ESQUIRE. Mr. Wallace's dapper, cheerful detective is rapidly winning friends. The New York Tribune finds this "a detective story of inspiring originality," while the Outlook says "it will entertain with its comedy side, rare in this class of fiction. The plot is so novel as to be startling." ($1.50.)

S. P. Hyatt's LITTLE BROWN BROTHER. "For sheer graphic force and rare ability to make one see it has a kinship with the earlier Kipling of Plain Tales and Soldiers Three. A brave love story bravely told," is the extraordinary tribute that Philip Tillinghast pays this tale in the Forum, while the New York Times Review says, "The first worthy romance with scenes laid in our Eastern islands. The love story is the real thing." ($1.50.)

William De Morgan's SOMEHOW GOOD is, perhaps, his strongest novel. It is told, in a hope-inspiring fashion, of a woman's brave fight for happiness, and is melled by humor. The Notion calls it, "A novel as sound, as sweet, as wholesome, as wise as any in the range of fiction." ($1.75.) A 24pp. illustrated leaflet about Mr. De Morgan, with a complete review of each novel, on request.

C. W. Colby's CANADIAN TYPES OF THE OLD REGIME "is not only interesting reading, but gives perhaps as clear a notion of what the old Regime in Canada was at its best as may be found anywhere in a single volume."—Literary Digest. (Ill'd from old prints. $2.75 net.)*

V. L. Kellogg's INSECT STORIES. By the Professor of Entomology in Stanford University. In the American Nature Series. SOME SERIOUS STUDIES.

Science and Immortality, by Sir Oliver Lodge, F. R. S. Published by Moffat, Yard & Co., New York; $2.

Sir Oliver Lodge has become the spokesman of that advanced scientific thought that has completely broken away from the paralyzing web of materialism and has dared to push the frontier of conjecture into a realm hitherto labeled superstition.

Cover Design from Baker & Taylor Company recognize the bearing upon religion of the nebulous theories regarding telepathy, the subconscious self, clairvoyance, prevision, inspiration, etc., that are scoffed at by the fool and cautiously examined by the wise man.

The author divides his work into four heads: "Science and Faith," "Corporate Worship and Service," "The Immortality of the Soul," and "Science and Christianity."

likely to fall into error by the assertion of our mental limitations than by their denial. The section on "The Immortality of the Soul" is particularly illuminating, based, as it is, upon the conception that the soul is not a vague human possession, but the man himself.

"If a man is shut up in a house, the transparency of the windows is an essential condition of his seeing the sky. But it would not be prudent to infer that, if he walked out of the house, he could not see the sky because there was no longer any glass through which he might see it."

Dr. Lodge is a pioneer in the realm of an unorthodox psychology, and some obloquy has therefore fallen to his share, but his latest work will not be overlooked by those who are unembarrassed with a conservative scientific dogmatism.

The World I Live In, by Helen Keller. Published by the Century Company, New York; $1.20.

It is hard to approach this book without a feeling akin to awe, as though we were witnessing some soul power never manifested in the world before. Whereas the normal man or woman looks out upon the world through the dimmed windows of the senses, it would seem that this wonderful girl is independent of windows at all and that her sight is even more clear for the utter darkening of the avenues upon which the rest of humanity wholly depends.

and inclusive insight, but with a delicate choice of words that fully equipped experience might well envy.

In this little book Miss Kellar tells us of the world in which she lives. She need not envy us our world, because her own is a greater one and more sorrow-free.

Cloudless skies are ever fair, Night can never enter there.

She tries to show us something of the amazing developments of touch and smell, of the awakening from the state in which she had neither "will nor intellect," and of the slow unfolding of powers that she attempts with a gentle and skilled patience to explain.

Racial Contrasts, by Albert Gehring. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

The task set for himself by the author is as novel as it is important. From a consideration of the differences between the arts of the Græco-Latin and the Germanic races he proceeds to a deduction of the essential differences in the mental natures of the peoples in question.

Cover Design from Little, Brown & Co.

almost a reductio ad absurdum, but it serves all the more vividly to illuminate the problem.

The inquiry is carried out with great care. We have chapters on music, literature, painting, architecture, sculpture, customs and institutions, beauty and morality, etc., all of them with the object of identifying mental differences and reducing those differences to their fewest classifications.

success, the reader must judge for himself. He has at least given us an example of patient research and ingenious argument.

By RANDALL PARRISH THE LAST VOYAGE OF THE DONNA ISABEL

The publishers believe that this sea story is the best novel they have yet brought out by Randall Parrish. It is no exaggeration to say that it is worthy of a place on the same shelf with the sea romances of Clark Russell and Stevenson—so absorbing is the plot and so vivid are the pictures of wild adventure on Antarctic seas.

By ARTHUR JEROME EDDY GANTON & CO.

"Ganton & Co." is a big story and a clean story—of sensational interest, but of an entirely legitimate sort. It is concerned with matters familiar in Chicago business, industrial, and social life, in which its author has himself taken an active part, and hence knows whereof he writes.

By H. ESCOTT-INMAN WULNOTH THE WANDERER

A tale of viking days which depicts the beginnings of modern England in a manner more real and vivid than is permitted to the usual historian. The volume is issued in the decorative style that distinguished "The Thrall of Leif the Lucky," "For the White Christ," etc., and as the story has a twofold appeal, to young readers as well as adults, it should prove a popular gift-book.

By the RT. REV. SAMUEL FALLOWS, D. D., LL. D. HEALTH AND HAPPINESS

Or, Religious Therapeutics and Right Living Bishop Fallows's new book deals with the whole subject of the harmonization of religion and medicine, the wonderful results of the work at St. Paul's Church in Chicago being brought to bear on the discussion itself, and the entire work going far to illustrate the intimate connection between the work of the clergyman and that of the physician in combating disease.

By MAX PEMBERTON THE AMATEUR MOTORIST

This work by the motoring editor of the London Sphere is practically free from technical terms, and presents such descriptions of machinery and appliances as are necessary to the owner of an automobile. Amusingly written, yet with solid instructions and advice on every page, it covers thoroughly the field, not only in respect of self-propelled carriages, but of autoboats and auto-cycles as well.

By LEONARD WILLIAMS THE ARTS AND CRAFTS OF OLDER SPAIN

The following is a list of the subjects exhaustively dealt with: Furniture, Leather-work, Wood-carving, Iron-work, Bronze-work, Arms, Pottery and Porcelain, Textile Fabrics, Architecture, Glass, Gold, Silver, and Ivory-work.

By ROSA BELLE HOLT RUGS: Oriental and Occidental, Antique and Modern

This new edition of what is now accredited the standard rug book will be very welcome. The text is simple and concise in style, and is intended to be informative rather than technical. The illustrations are generally admitted to be the finest examples of color printing brought out in many years.

By GEORGE P. UPTON MUSICAL MEMORIES

My Recollections of Famous Celebrities, 1850-1900 Mr. Upton has heard all of the great singers, and with many of them he enjoyed an intimate personal acquaintance. In these recollections he has drawn almost entirely on his own notes, and has made very little use of history and biography; as a result, there is a delightful personal flavor about these reminiscences, a quality of kindness, that makes a rare and genial volume in every sense, and a book of great value for reference.

By GEORGE P. UPTON THE STANDARD CONCERT GUIDE

A Handbook of the Standard Symphonies, Oratorios, Cantatas, and Symphonic Poems for the Concert Goer. Mr. Upton's three books, covering the standard oratorios, cantatas, and symphonies, are now available in one volume, uniform in size and appearance with the new edition of "The Standard Operas."

By VERNON LEE STUDIES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY IN ITALY

The studies are in part literary, treating of the work of writers like Goldoni and Carlo Gozzi; in part musical, discussing Leonardo Leo, Pergolesi, Piccini, and Tomelli.

By ESTHER SINGLETON HANDBOOK TO THE STANDARD GALLERIES OF HOLLAND

"The Standard Galleries of Europe" Series. This is a series of practical handbooks on the famous galleries of Europe. Altogether Miss Singleton has succeeded in formulating a handbook which presents an amazing amount of information.

Edited by CYRIL DAVENPORT LITTLE BOOKS ON ART

By POMPEO MOLMENTI MOLMENTI'S "VENICE"—Concluding Section

Part III—The Decadence of Venice. Translated from the Italian by Horatio F. Brown. This completes the set of six volumes in this great work, of which the other sections are: Part I, "Venice in the Middle Ages," and Part II, "Venice in the Golden Age," already published.

By EDITH OGDEN HARRISON THE FLAMING SWORD

Mrs. Harrison takes as the basis of several of these tales some of the prettiest of the Bible stories, to which she gives reverent, though very original interpretations. Uniform with Mrs. Harrison's previous successes, "Prince Silverwings," etc. With 4 illustrations in color and other decorations by Lucy Fitch Perkins.

By MARGARET BOUVET CLOTILDE

With the old charm of her previous books, Miss Bouvet tells her story of a little French girl in the splendid capital of the old Louisiana province. With 8 illustrations by Maginel Wright Enright.

Attractive Small Books

For several years we have made a point of bringing out a number of small gift-books, notably attractive in appearance and inexpensive in price.

THE WASHINGTON YEAR-BOOK. The Best Thoughts of the Father of His Country, arranged one for every day in the year. Compiled by Wallace Rice. Printed in two colors, with marginal drawings.

CATCHWORDS OF PATRIOTISM. The Greatest Utterances of Great Americans, arranged one for every day in the year. Decorated and printed in two colors. Novelty binding.

CATCHWORDS OF FRIENDSHIP. A Collection of Two Hundred Sentiments in Verse and Prose. With frontispiece and decorations. Flexible boards.

THE DUTY OF BEING BEAUTIFUL. By Sarah A. Hubbard. Daintily printed, with decorations in color.

DAME CURTSEY'S BOOK OF GUESSING CONTESTS. By Ellye Howell Glover. Uniform with "Dame Curtsey's Book of Holidays." Second Edition.

NEW AND OLD OFFERINGS,

Shakespeareana.

Eight attractive volumes in the Old Spelling Shakespeare have been published by Duffield & Co., New York—"The Merry Wives of Windsor," "Much Ado About Nothing," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "The Taming of the Shrew," "Twelfth Night; or, What You Will," "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," "Comedie of Errors," and "Love's Labors Lost." These volumes are edited according to the orthography and arrangement of the more authentic quarto and folio versions, that is to say, they are in such a form as would have harmonized with Shakespeare's own orthography. F. J. Furnwall, M. A., D. Litt., has been engaged upon this work for more than a quarter of a century in obedience to his conviction that scholars should have Shakespeare's text before them as nearly as possible in the exact original form. The entire series will occupy about forty volumes, and those already issued are a guarantee of careful scholarship in the text, the footnotes, and the introductions. The series will be a valuable addition to Shakespeareana, interesting to the average reader and indispensable to the serious student. We shall watch its completion with interest. The volumes are printed on fine paper, the page measuring 6 1/2 by 8 3/4 inches. Price per volume, $1, with a special library edition, for the luxuriously inclined.

Another important series for which we are indebted to Duffield & Co. is "The Shakespeare Classics," under the general editorship of Professor L. Gollancz. The object is to present us with a comprehensive series of the romances, histories, plays, and poems used by Shakespeare as the originals or direct sources of his plays. Three volumes have been issued: Brooke's "Romeus and Juliet," being the original of Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet," newly edited by J. J. Munro; Lodge's "Rosalynde," being the original of Shakespeare's "As You Like It," edited by W. W. Greg, M. A.; and Greene's "Pandosto; or, Dorastus and Fawnia," being the original of Shakespeare's "Winter's Tale," edited by P.

Captain A. T. Mahan, Author of "Naval Administration and Warfare." Little, Brown & Co.

G. Thomas. The series will consist of from twelve to twenty volumes, the text in modern spelling and each play competently edited, with frontispieces of reproductions of original titles in photogravure. The price is $1 per volume, with more expensive library or specially bound editions.

Still another series, now in progress by Duffield & Co., is the Lamb Shakespeare for the Young, with the insertion of scenes and passages from the play that every child should know. We do not like this dilution of the classics, but those who do like it will welcome the three plays now ready: "The Tempest," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and "As You Like It." The price is 80 cents per volume; or in limp lambskin, $1.

For Children.

Those who are searching for children's books should give a heedful eye to "Every Child's Library," published by E. P. Dutton & Co., New York. Four attractive little volumes with colored pictorial covers and frontispieces have now been issued, and nothing more wholesomely stimulating of their kind could be found. They are: "Sigurd, the Dragon-Slayer," "One for Wod and One for Lok; or, Asgard, Midgard and Utgard," "The Old, Old Myths of Greece and Rome," and "The Seven Champions of Christendom." They are all written by Thos. Cartwright, who certainly knows how to tell the fine old stories in a way acceptable to children. The plain and colored illustrations are good and the price is 50 cents per volume.

An Art Series.

A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago, are to be congratulated on their "Little Books on Art" series. Tastefully bound in bright blue with gilt lettering, they will be an adornment to the reference shelf of the library. Four volumes are to hand: "Enamels," by Mrs. Nelson Dawson, with 33 illustrations; "Miniatures," by Cyril Davenport, with 42 illustrations; "Jewelry," by Cyril Davenport, with 42 illustrations; and "Bookplates," by Edward Almack, with 42 illustrations. The information seems to be complete, historically and otherwise, within the compass of a handbook, while the authors show every sign of competence and enthusiasm.

"THE IRRESISTIBLE CURRENT."

Mrs. Lowenberg's Book Is a Telling Plea for Religious Toleration.

The charmed circle of San Francisco authors, past and present, will have no hesitation in admitting Mrs. Lowenberg to full membership. Her book, "The Irresistible Current," lately issued by the Broadway Publishing Company, New York, shows that she knows how to enlist the skill of the novelist in support of a high moral purpose and to support her plea for religious toleration by the weapons of pathos and humor, tragedy and comedy.

Religious toleration is, after all, one of those human rights that have been granted the most grudgingly, and granted theoretically rather than practically. We no longer burn each other at the stake for differences of opinion on the Thirty-Nine Articles or the Westminster Confession, but we feel nevertheless that heterodoxy—which is your doxy as opposed to mine—is a mark of spiritual degeneracy which ought to be followed by such pains and penalties as we can ingeniously inflict without a vulgar shedding of blood. There is probably no community throughout civilization that is free from religious intolerance, and how real this is, how tragic it is, how socially disintegrating it is, Mrs. Lowenberg helps us to understand.

"The Irresistible Current" introduces us to two Jewish families from Germany. Joseph Rheinberg is already in New York, and he is eager that his aged parents and his sister Ruth shall come likewise to the land "where labor is king" and where "every one has yet a chance to be rich." But the old people can not draw their roots from the home soil, and so Ruth waits until they die and then she too crosses the Atlantic and becomes a citizen of the free republic.

Their story is that of countless thousands of others. Ruth marries, as her brother has done, and the two families go to Missouri to one of the newer communities that are more or less insulated against the broader because more careless life of the great city. Then we see the extent to which religious differences insidiously interfere with the amalgam of races from which national greatness can alone come. Ruth's daughter, Grace, refuses to marry the man she loves because he will not become a Jew, and when Bernard Arnold lectures on Polar exploration the size of his audience is jeopardized by the fact of his Jewish faith. Creed has drawn subtly impalpable but impassable lines of demarcation between those of identical interests and of indistinguishable ethics, and we see the result in broken hearts and in humiliated lives.

It is well that such a book as this should be written. It is well that its characters should be every-day people in order that every-day people may the better realize the sin against the nation and against humanity that is implied when creed is allowed to raise a barrier between man and man. Mrs. Lowenberg's plea can not fail of success in its real and abiding sense, because it is in tune with "the irresistible current" of human enlightenment and because the evolutionary forces of human nature are behind the philosophy that it preaches. Dr. Montmartre's ideal of "a uniform belief in God and the immortality of the soul in conjunction with the precepts of Moses, Jesus, and other great teachers, so that all may dwell together in concord and so that no difference in creeds will exist to intervene and destroy human happiness," may seem a far-off vision, but "in future generations it will sweep all before it." It is "The Irresistible Current."

"Resurgam," by John Elliot, is a fine poem of optimism, full of deep feeling and of faultless expression. Its tone may be judged from the concluding stanza:

Peace to the earth, and all is well;
 For the heart knows all that the birds would sing;

For Love has broken the bonds of Hell,
 And—over the meadows walks the Spring.

The volume is published by the John Lane Company, New York; $1.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE CHAT.

Rose Stahl appeared at the Orpheum three or four years ago in a little sketch of theatrical life called "The Chorus Lady." Even in that field the actress and the sketch as well spelled distinction. James Forhes took the sketch and expanded it into a comedy of the usual length, and Miss Stahl, still as the central figure, not only retained the favor she had won in a twenty-minute effort, but, with added opportunities, made certain the judgment that she was especially gifted for such a characterization. And the Chorus Lady is a winning character. She speaks the breeziest sort of American, and she has little regard for conventionalities, but her wit is keen, her kindness is sincere, her courage is dauntless. The play is now in its third successful year and comes for the first time to San Francisco next Monday, opening at the Van Ness Theatre for a two weeks' engagement. Miss Stahl is supported by an excellent company, including such well-known people as Alice Leigh, Giles Shine, Eva Dennison, Annie Ives, Amy Lesser, Amy Lee, Margaret Wheeler, and Jean French. There is little doubt that the qualities which induced runs of a solid year in New York and four months in Chicago will be fully recognized by the playgoers here.

At the Valencia Theatre the stock company is giving a particularly pleasing production of the sparkling comedy, "Glittering Gloria." Its last performances will be on Saturday afternoon and evening of this week, and they also will be the farewell appearances of Willette Kershaw. Large audiences have deservedly rewarded this attractive farce.

Next Sunday afternoon Arthur Cunningham makes his first appearance in this city as a star in straight dramatic work, making his bow in Joseph Murphy's Irish play, "Kerry Gow." Mr. Cunningham is not merely well known to San Francisco theatre-goers, he is warmly admired as a singer and a comic-opera comedian. He may safely trust to an appreciative public for his welcome. His songs will be a feature of the play. Arleen Hackett, sister of James K. Hackett, will be the leading woman in the support of Mr. Cunningham, and in addition to the strength of the Valencia Theatre stock company, a group of graceful dancers, including Clara Coyne, Frances Doherty, Dan Cotter, and John P. Kelleher, will appear in Irish jigs and reels. Mr. Cunningham's engagement is for two weeks.

Kohl and Dill at the Princess Theatre have renewed their old popularity, won before the fire at Fischer's Theatre, and for nearly three weeks have been packing the Ellis-Street opera house to its capacity with their well-pleased admirers. "Playing the Ponies" seems to be just the thing for the dialect comedians, as well as for their patrons, and it will be continued another week. Maud Lamhart and Billy Clifford are able assistants in the entertainment, and the chorus continues to hold its place.

The programme at the Orpheum next week will introduce a number of novel acts. The head-line attraction will be the Musical Blacksmiths, with Cass William and Eva Staley. After making xylophonic music out of all the different articles in a blacksmith shop, a quick change presents the couple in a well-appointed drawing-room in full evening dress. Welch, Mealy and Montrose will present a comedy act which introduces the humorous side of the strife between the New York "Giants" and the Chicago "Cubs." Lew Hawkins, who has won the title of the Chesterfield of Minstrelsy, will amuse with a new lot of songs and stories. William Morrow, Verda Schellberg, and their company will appear in a little play of frontier life, entitled "Happy's Millions," which contains original humor and several very catchy songs. Next week will be the last of Henry Horton and company, the Hengler Sisters, and Mr. and Mrs. Allison, "the Swede girl and the fellow who sings." The Millman Trio, of which Bird Millman is a feature, will also conclude their engagement with this programme.

The final performance of "The Clansman" will be given at the Van Ness Theatre Sunday night.

The De Gogorza Farewell Concert.

The farewell concert of Emilio de Gogorza, the Spanish haritone, will be given this Sunday afternoon at Christian Science Hall, and the programme is one that should attract every lover of song, especially as Señor de Gogorza is unquestionably one of the greatest interpreters of "lieder" the world has ever known.

His offerings will be "Plaisir d'Amour," Martini; "Where e'er You Walk," Handel; "De Noirs Presentiments," Gluck; "Lockruf," Ruckhauf; "Cecilia," Richard Strauss; aria, "Vision Fugitive" from "Herodiade," Massenet; "Au Claire de la Lune," Lulli; "Le Mariage des Roses," Casar Franck; "Malgre Moi," Pfeiffer; "Canto del Presidario" and "El Calesa," Alvarez; and a group of English songs, including "The Pretty Creature," by Strace; "The Complacent Lover," Horatio Parker, and by special request "Mother o' Mine," "A Dream," and "Sing Me a Song," the three that roused the audience to such enthusiasm last Sunday. Manager Greenbaum promises that he will also repeat the aria from "Roi de Lahore," for which there have been many requests.

Seats may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s until Saturday afternoon at five, and after 10 a. m. Sunday at the hall.

Blanche Arral's Farewell Concert.

At the request of many music-lovers who could not attend the matinee concerts, Manager Will Greenbaum announces a farewell evening concert by Blanche Arral, to be given next Thursday night, November 19, at Christian Science Hall, on which occasion she will again be accompanied by Paul Steindorff's splendid orchestra.

The programme will be one of the greatest ever offered by a singer and will include such great arias as those from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," Massenet's "Manon" (Au Cour la Reine), Maillart's "Le Dragon de Villars," and the "Jewel Song" from "Faust." By special request the artist will sing the "Micaela Air" from "Carmen" and repeat the "Polacca" from "Mignon," with which she electrified her audience at the first concert. Another special feature will be the rarely heard "Polonaise" from Verdi's "Jerusalem." In addition Mme. Arral will sing a group of English and Russian songs with piano accompaniment.

Seats will be ready Monday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s stores.

A DE GOGORZA APPRECIATION.

By Josephine Hart Phelps.

Everybody who was present, some years ago, on the occasion of Emilio de Gogorza's first appearance before a San Francisco public as a concert singer, will have no difficulty recalling the attitude of the audience that as there assembled. Emma Eames, regally beautiful, as always, was in her most glacial mood, and sang with an icy brilliancy that left us all frozen stiff with admiration. Then Emilio de Gogorza came on the scene, and a pronounced spring thaw immediately ensued. The mercury in the emotional thermometer shot up a number of degrees, the immobile statues of ice in front became human again, and the Spanish baritone, through the charm of his temperament and the beauty of his art, won from the audience a warmth of acknowledgment that for the time being sent into the shade the magnificent soprano who reigns as one of the queens of the operatic stage.

On last Sunday afternoon Señor de Gogorza again confronted a San Francisco audience. During the interval he has won fresh laurels and no longer comes merely as a subsidiary interest to a greater star. He himself is now a star of great magnitude and one whose coming has been eagerly anticipated. People have not forgotten. They never do forget when the chords of the more grateful emotions have vibrated to a touch so unerring and so true.

It has been said of Señor de Gogorza that he feels no call to the operatic stage, because, to him, every number he sings is an opera in itself. And so it seems as one listens to a song. Operas have their dull passages, in which the inspiration of the composer has faded and paled. But there are no dull ones in Señor de Gogorza's programme. The Spanish baritone has a sure instinct for beautiful and appealing music, and a warmth, a passion, a tenderness, and a variety of expression that compels an irresistible response to every mood and sentiment which he seeks to interpret.

It would be a most difficult task to select from Sunday's programme those numbers which afforded the keenest pleasure. The programme was absolutely perfect, and so was the charm of the singer.

Señor de Gogorza's art has ripened since we heard him, and his power of expression, as is natural with a singer who never ceases studying to interpret most exquisitely that which is profoundly felt, has deepened and intensified. He now makes a broader, a more universal appeal to that fountain of feeling within us which responds with a gush of grateful joy to the call to experience profound and healing emotions.

His voice is most beautiful; round-toned, velvet-smooth, of virile fascination, and warmly colored with the glow of that marvellous temperament which makes of the simplest ballad he sings a message which finds its way to the inmost heart and soul of us.

And with all this, the singer is a fine linguist. He sang in French, English, Italian, German, and Spanish. The French listeners loved his French songs, and the Germans were profoundly appreciative of the delicacy of treatment with which he interpreted the group of Schumann, Grieg, and Brahms. When he sang in Italian it was difficult to believe that he was not singing in his native tongue. The Spanish number he gave, of course, con amore, glad to feel himself on his native path, and when he sang in English, no thought came to us that it was a foreigner, but a member of a Latin race at that, who was softening our hearts with the filial tenderness of "O Mother o' Mine," or reaching these wider spaces of untranslatable emotion with the calm, noble solemnity of "Requiem."

Both of these songs moved the audience to unusual demonstrations; many wept those who sang, refreshing, grateful tears which relieve the heart when some compelling influence has temporarily removed from us all the weight of our jaded, insistent, unescapable cares, and, for a little time, has steeped us in a luxury of self-forgetfulness.

It sounds like hyperbole, but all this magic was accomplished by this singer of songs because, aside from the beauty of his voice and the perfection of his method, he unites to an immense capacity for emotional feeling absolute sincerity and a marvelous facility in expressing it.

This singer has such versatility that he has no marked specialty. I thought, when I first heard him, before his art had deepened and broadened to its present compelling power, that he particularly excelled in the expression of graceful and tender love sentiment, as, indeed, he does. No one can easily forget his rendering of the yearning tenderness of Grieg's "Ich liebe dich," and the splendour of passion in Massenet's arioso from "Roi de Lahore" was as magnificently and tropically beautiful as Schumann's "Mondnacht" was delicately calm and pure.

In Handel's "Where'er you walk," the sentiment seemed Anglo-Saxon; deep, refined, sweet, and tender. One divined, while listening, with what felicitous charm the singer would express to us the tender longing of the lover in "Drink to me only with thine eyes."

The Spanish numbers had the fascinating Spanish rhythm, and Señor de Gogorza gave "Los ojos negros" with the effect of the irresistible gallantry of a gay Spanish cavalier.

With all these varieties of compositions, the singer demonstrated continually his perfect musicianship. In "Iphigénie en Tauride" and "Roi de Lahore" his voice soared to tenor-like heights, still retaining its pure and beautiful tone. In "The lark now leaves its wat'ry nest," flexible little runs were given perfectly, with a delicacy surprising in a voice of such volume, while his phrasing is at all times done with the perfect art that conceals art. The arias were models of superb technique and dramatic abandon, and at the close of the programme Figaro's song from "The Barber of Seville" was rendered with such a lightness and brilliancy, and such lightning-swift cascades of sunny Italian, as one would have sworn that only a native of Italy was capable of.

The popular recognition of De Gogorza's unusual gift for vocal expression will probably have a tendency to exalt the baritone voice to a higher rank than is ordinarily awarded it. One recalls Bispham's concerts here, and the intense pleasure he afforded us. The two renowned baritone singers are alike in their recognition of the immense resources of vocal expression that are yielded to the student. Culture tells. The results gained from the purely temperamental fervor of the ordinary singer are slight compared with those won by these two delvers, who search in a song for the last and least shade of meaning to be conveyed. The Spaniard, however, with his wonderful gift of temperament, touches the higher point, and almost wins one to the belief that a baritone should voice the deepest, the richest, and the most exalted emotions.

Mr. Henry C. Whittemore gave the piano accompaniments required on the programme with technical excellence, and in several numbers with brilliancy, but without any particular evidences of the glow and inspiration appropriate in accompanying such a singer, and which, in fact, were rather markedly absent from his solo numbers. He played Moszkowski's "Caprice Espagnol" particularly well, but the well-known Chopin nocturne (op. 37, No. 2) did not seem to be in his line. Perhaps he was thrown off his base by the demerits of a rather hard-toned piano, but the tone of dreamy speculation in the beautiful nocturne was conspicuously lacking, and the two voices which one loves to fancy are dreamily discussing, in a Beethoven-haunted twilight, problems of life and the soul, did not seem to unite as felicitously as usual in the periodic concords of sweet harmony.

Mr. Greenbaum's season of music has begun most auspiciously. Mme. Arral's success—for the Belgian songstress captured her audiences by the lyric charm of her brilliant soprano—and Emilio de Gogorza's remarkable sway over the hearts of his listeners, assure us that the San Franciscans are consistent in their devotion to music. They love Sunday concerts, as was evidenced by a typical audience of well-groomed, well-dressed, and well-moneyed people—if one may judge by outward evidences—who turned out on both occasions, and enjoyed the music both with enthusiasm and discrimination.

VANITY FAIR.

A Social Culture Club has been started by the teachers and pupils of Vashon College, Washington, with the object of improving the table manners of the young people. Here are some of the fines imposed on members who broke what are called the "ordinary rules of good behavior":

Using toothpick in public, 2 cents; hand in pocket at table, 2 cents; scuffling under table, 2 cents; not sitting erect at table, 1 cent; tilting chair back, 2 cents; talking with mouth full, 2 cents; uncomplimentary remarks about food, 2 cents; placing another dish on plate, 2 cents; knife or fork misplaced, 1 cent; spoon left in cup, 1 cent; incorrect holding of knife or fork, 1 cent; arms or elbows on table, 2 cents; overreaching, 1 cent; eating from knife, 2 cents; buttering bread on tablecloth, 1 cent; talking across from table to table, 2 cents; spearing bread with fork, 2 cents.

It is a pity that this laudable movement should be confined to young people, seeing that their elders need it quite as much. Think of the princely revenue that might be derived from those who grasp the fork as though it were a shovel and who seem incapable of bringing both knife and fork into continuous and synchronous play. While as for the toothpick horror, surely nothing but a financial penalty will ever correct that.

English society is rejoicing in the absence of restraint that now marks the royal dinner parties. It was not ever so. The dinner party with Queen Victoria at the head of the table was not exactly a festive occasion, while the effort to preserve the artificial proprieties was not conducive to an enjoyment of the viands. The queen had her own opinion about people who took more than one or two glasses of wine, while guests who spoke without being addressed were her peculiar abhorrence. Persons of real distinction, whose conversational powers or intellectual brilliance were the cause of their invitation, were of course given a freer rein, but they were expected to scintillate all the time and to be on continuous tap.

The queen never forgot the occasion when Thomas Carlyle was her guest. Venturing to express a royal opinion upon one of the topics of the day, she was overwhelmed by a torrent of scornful condemnation as the sage of Chelsea poured forth his own vigorous and adverse opinion in a sublime forgetfulness of his surroundings. Certainly the queen had never before been so flatly and entirely contradicted, as she had never before encountered such a demonstration of intellectual tyranny. But she enjoyed it to the utmost and was accustomed to relate it with gusto. But she had a strong objection to the conversational methods of Mr. Gladstone when the national business was under discussion. She said that he talked to her as though she were a mass meeting.

But the dinner parties given by the king are a very different affair. Having selected his guests, there is no further social interference. Every one talks as he wishes, or keeps silent as he wishes, and no one is expected to sparkle or to be unnatural. In fact, the royal dinner parties nowadays are just about the same as dinner parties elsewhere. But no one knows better than the king how to punish an infringement. A wealthy tailor once remarked to the king that he did not intend to be present at a certain house party, as "the company was so mixed." The king's reply was prompt and effective: "Damn it, man, what would you have? We can't all be tailors."

A New York critic declares that women's objection to the green hat now favored by so many men is due to a fear lest the sterner sex shall enter into a competition of colors, and in such a case woman's supremacy of attractiveness would, of course, be gone. So long as man dresses himself in sober and colorless hues, fair femininity is without a rival, but what will become of her if man should imitate the example of other departments of the animal creation, if he should endeavor by art to add to the beauties with which nature has already so richly endowed him? Already we see a prospect of the extensions to which the green hat may lead. Why should we not have skin foods for male use, with the whole paraphernalia of cosmetics of which woman is now the sole patron. And if the male hat is to be colored, why not the male coat and trousers? Why should we not revert to the fashions of cavalier days, when the extreme of valor was compatible with scented love locks, lace ruffles, and gaudy velvet costumes liberally slashed with colored silks? Why not, indeed? Man already has the advantage in natural beauty. For this statement we have the warrant of some of the artists who were commissioned to select the many hundreds of actors who were needed for the great open-air historical pageants. Handsome men, well qualified to grace any rôle assigned to them, were to be found without difficulty. The trouble was to find handsome women, and, like the plums in mother's cake, they were very few and far between. It may, of course, seem ungallant that men should try to accutuate their natural superiority by a recourse to art, and this is, indeed, the only argument that can be urged against the green hat or the coming and colored resplendence of coat and trousers. But women will not stave off the evil day by ridicule. An appeal to sentiment and to chivalry would be more effective.

The owner of a block of flats in Paris has hit upon an idea which is popular with his tenants. On the door of every apartment a number, and on the first of each month the landlord draws a number by lottery, and the occupant of the flat bearing the winning number pays no rent.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The young lady of the family had just returned from Paris, where she had studied under Marchesi, and Uncle Wash, who had served her folks "sence hefoh de wah," was invited into the parlor to hear her sing. When she concluded her first aria he remarked: "Miss Lucy, yo' sho equalizes a martingale."

Scientific knowledge is sometimes negligible. "My hoy," said the kindly English rector to the hohhledehoy of a youth who was picking mushrooms in the rectory fields, "heware of picking a toadstool instead of a mushroom; they are easy to confuse." "That he all roight, sur, that he," said the urchin, "us hain't a-goin' to eat 'em ourselves; they're goin' to market to he sold."

Dr. Walter C. Smith, the popular Scotch poet-preacher, on one occasion tried to explain to an old lady the meaning of the scriptural expression, "Take up thy hed and walk," by saying that the hed was simply a mat or rug easily taken up and carried away. "No, no," replied the lady. "I canna believe that. The bed was a regular four-poster. There would he no miracle in walking away wi' a hit o' mat or rug on your hack."

An old lady was accosted in a London street by a well-dressed and refined-looking stranger, who effusively claimed her as a friend. "I really don't believe you remember me!" she exclaimed, reproachfully, and the old lady, never doubting that her memory was at fault, confessed that she could not quite recall the name. "Ah! hut I have changed it since you knew me," said her interlocutor, gayly, and after a few more lively speeches she passed on, having possessed herself meanwhile of the old lady's purse.

When Charles Dudley Warner was the editor of the Hartford, Connecticut, Press, back in the sixties, arousing the patriotism of the State by his vigorous appeals, one of the type-setters came in from the composing-room, and planting himself before the editor, said: "Well, Mr. Warner, I've decided to enlist in the army." With mingled sensations of pride and responsibility, Mr. Warner replied encouragingly that he was glad to see that the man felt the call of duty. "Oh, it isn't that," said the truthful compositor; "hut I'd rather he shot than try to set any more of your copy."

Once a thrifty Scotch physician was called to a case where a woman had dislocated her jaw. He very soon put her right. The woman asked how much was to pay. The doctor named his fee. The patient thought it too much. He, however, would not take less, and as the woman refused to give him the fee, he began to yawn. Yawning, as every one knows, is infectious. The young woman, in turn, yawned. Her jaw again went out of joint, and the doctor triumphantly said: "Now, until you hand me over my fee, your jaw can remain as it is." Needless to say the money was promptly paid.

Patti was to sing on a certain date at Bucharest, hut at the last moment she declined to leave Vienna. It was too cold; snow everywhere; she would not risk catching her death of cold. M. Schürmann, the impresario, was in despair, until a brilliant inspiration came to him. Quickly he telegraphed to the advance agent in the Roumanian capital: "At whatever cost, Patti must receive an ovation at Bucharest Station from the Italian aristocracy. Send me by return the following wire: 'The members of the Italian and Roumanian nobility are preparing to give Mme. Patti a magnificent reception. The ministry will he represented. Processions, torches, and hands. Telegraph the hour of arrival.'" The advance agent carried out this instruction, and, when the telegram dictated to him over the wires arrived in Vienna, it was handed to Patti with the desired effect. "How charming!" she murmured; "what time do we start?"

Professor and Mrs. Hadley were on a train bound for New York, where Yale's president was to speak before a national convention. He made use of the hour and twenty minutes he spent in the train by rehearsing his speech in a low voice, using his hands to emphasize certain passages. A kindly matron who was sitting directly behind Mr. and Mrs. Hadley, and who had been watching and listening, leaned forward, and, tapping Mrs. Hadley on the shoulder, said feelingly, "You have my sincere sympathy, my poor woman; I have one just like him at home."

A large touring automobile containing a man and his wife met a load of hay in a very narrow road. The woman declared that the farmer must hack out, hut her husband contended that she was unreasonable. "But you can't hack the automobile so far," she said, "and I don't intend to move for anybody. Besides, he should have seen us." The husband pointed out that this was impossible, owing to an abrupt turn in the road. "I don't care," she insisted. "I won't move if I have to stay here all night." Her husband was starting to argue the matter, when the farmer, who had been sitting quietly on the hay, interrupted: "Never mind, sir!" he exclaimed, with a sigh, "I'll try to hack out. I've got one just like her at home."

The refusal of the House of Commons to adjourn over Derby Day recalls a story related of one of the Roman Catholic peers who took their seats some four or five years before the passage of the first Reform Bill, after an exclusion of a century and a half. He gave notice that on a certain day he would make a certain motion, whereupon there arose from his noble colleagues a general cry of "Derby!" The astonished novice named another day, only to be greeted with an equally unanimous expostulation of "Oaks!" At this, he explained that he would have to ask the forgiveness of their lordships, hut, having been educated abroad, he was forced to acknowledge that he was not familiar with the list of saints' days in the Anglican calendar.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

"The gayest season San Francisco has known for years" is the universal decision in regard to this winter, and there are no signs of a cessation of the brilliant and enjoyable events that fill the days of both young and old. Nearly all the debutantes have been presented and there have been many large and elaborate teas, but few dances thus far. From now until Lent, however, the debutantes will have their fill of balls, and there are dinners, teas, receptions, luncheons, both announced and unannounced, in prospect.

The wedding of Miss Pauline Duncan and Mr. Richard Girvin will take place at the home of the bride in Illinois on December 15.

The wedding of Miss Helen de Young, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young, to Mr. George Toland Cameron, will take place on December 2, at the home of the bride on California Street.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Donohoe will entertain at a ball on Monday evening next at the Fairmont in honor of their debutante daughter, Miss Katharine Donohoe.

Mr. and Mrs. George Kelham will entertain at an informal musicale on Thursday evening next at the Fairmont Hotel.

Mrs. John McMullin will entertain at a tea on Saturday afternoon next at the Fairmont Hotel in honor of her debutante granddaughters, Miss Anna Weller and Miss Eliza McMullin.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Simpson will entertain at a tea on Saturday afternoon next at their home on Duboce Avenue in honor of their daughter, Miss Fernanda Pratt.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Francis Davis will entertain at a tea on November 25 in honor of Miss Elizabeth Murison.

Mrs. Andrew Welch will be the hostess at two luncheons, the first on Tuesday next and the second on the following Tuesday.

Miss Jeanne Galois will entertain at a luncheon on Monday next.

Mrs. James King Steele will entertain at a luncheon on Thursday of next week at the Fairmont in honor of Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick.

Mr. and Mrs. John C. Kirkpatrick entertained at a dinner on Friday evening of last week at the Fairmont, their guests afterwards attending the Greenway ball. Those present were Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, Miss Clara Allen, Miss Harriett Alexander, Miss Maud Wilson, Miss Lolita Burling, Mr. Haskett Derby, Mr. Frank Kennedy, Mr. John M. Young, Mr. Bradley Wallace, and Mr. Horace Clifton.

Mr. and Mrs. Edgar M. Wilson entertained at a tea on Tuesday afternoon last at their home on Pacific Avenue in honor of their debutante daughter, Miss Maud Lane Wilson. Assisting in receiving were Mrs. James Wilkins, Mrs. Edgar Neame, Mrs. John W. Mailliard, Mrs. Horace Hellman, Mrs. Edwin Newhall, Mrs. Edward L. Eyre, Miss Lucille Wilkins, Miss Frances Newhall, Miss Virginia Newhall, Miss Jeanne Galois, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Innes Keeney, Miss Harriett Alexander, Miss Ethel McAllister, Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, Miss Dorothy Chapman, Miss Vera de Sahla, Miss Anna Weller, Miss Helen Jones, Miss Dorothy Boericke, and Miss Ruth Boericke.

Mr. and Mrs. James M. Allen and Mr. and Mrs. John C. Kirkpatrick entertained at a large tea on Thursday of last week at the Allen home on Washington Street, in honor of their debutante daughters, Miss Clara Allen and Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick. Assisting in receiving were Mrs. Frederick Sharon, Mrs. Otis Burrage, Mrs. Lucius Allen, Mrs.

Harry Allen, Mrs. Bryant Grimwood, Mrs. Franklin Harwood, Miss Jessie Wright, Miss Florence Breckinridge, Miss Claire Nichols, Miss Marian Huntington, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Virginia Newhall, Miss Frances Newhall, Miss Helen Jones, Miss Harriett Alexander, Miss Ethel McAllister, Miss Maud Wilson, Miss Elizabeth Woods, Miss Vera de Sahla, Miss Emily Du Bois, Miss Hanna Du Bois, Miss Marian Miller, Miss Innes Keeney, Miss Grace Wilson, Miss Joy Wilson, and Miss Olive Craig.

Mrs. M. Hall McAllister entertained at a tea on Thursday last at her home on Jackson Street, in honor of her debutante daughter, Miss Ethel McAllister. Assisting in receiving were Mrs. James Otis, Sr., Mrs. James Otis, Jr., Mrs. William Peyton, Mrs. Perry Eyre, Mrs. Elliott McAllister, Mrs. Percy Moore, Mrs. William B. Tubbs, Mrs. William Denman, Mrs. Willis Polk, Mrs. Harry Benson, Miss Sallie Maynard, Miss Dolly MacGavin, Miss Augusta Foute, the Misses Pennell, Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, Miss Maud Wilson, Miss Harriett Alexander, Miss Helen Jones, Miss Joy Wilson, Miss Clara Allen, Miss Anna Weller, and Miss Innes Keeney.

Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Jones entertained at a tea on Saturday of last week in honor of their debutante daughter, Miss Helen Jones, at their home on Buchanan Street. Assisting in receiving were Mrs. Edward Jones, Mrs. Laura Roe, Mrs. Wyatt Allen, Mrs. Lawrence Draper, Mrs. Howard Holmes, Mrs. John Drum, Miss Ysabel Brewer, Miss Elena Miller, Miss Claire Nichols, Miss Marian Miller, Miss Ethel McAllister, Miss Clara Allen, Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, Miss Harriett Alexander, Miss Maud Wilson, and Miss Innes Keeney.

Mrs. H. M. A. Miller was the hostess at a bridge party on Saturday afternoon last.

Mrs. William Hinckley Taylor was the hostess at an informal luncheon and bridge party on Wednesday of last week at the Francisco Club.

Miss Lou Foster entertained at a luncheon on Friday of last week at her home in San Rafael in honor of Miss Frances and Miss Virginia Newhall.

Miss Vera de Sahla was the hostess at a luncheon on Wednesday of last week at the Fairmont Hotel.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a résumé of movements to and from this city and Coast and the whereabouts of absent Californians:

Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott have returned from a stay of several weeks in New York.

Mrs. Russell J. Wilson has returned to Paris, after a stay of several weeks at Aix-les-Bains.

Mr. and Mrs. George A. Pope have arrived in New York from Europe and will remain in the East for a month before returning to San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Blanding have taken apartments at the Fairmont for the winter and came over last week from their Belvedere home.

Mr. and Mrs. William Nichols have arrived from their home in Montana and are the guests of Mr. Nichols's parents, Bishop and Mrs. Nichols, at the Episcopal residence on Webster Street.

Mrs. Theodore Payne, Mr. Clarence Payne, and Mr. Arthur Payne have taken apartments at the Fairmont for the winter.

Miss Julia Langhorne has returned to town, after a brief visit to the Misses Amie and Nora Brewer at their home in San Mateo.

Mrs. George Boardman and Miss Dora Winn, who have been in the East for several weeks, are now visiting in Virginia.

Miss Rebecca Kruttschnitt will arrive in the near future from her home in Chicago for a visit to friends and relatives.

Miss Helen Wheeler has been visiting at St. Helena as the guest of Miss Ida Bourn.

Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels have returned from a stay of several weeks in New York.

Miss Gladys Brigham has come up from her home in Los Gatos and is spending several weeks here as the guest of her aunt, Mrs. Charles O. Alexander.

Mrs. Simeon Wenban and her daughter, Mrs. Mills, have taken an apartment on Pine Street near Leavenworth for the winter.

Miss Aubrey Tallant has returned, after a sojourn of some months in New York.

Mr. Joseph L. Eastland has returned from a stay of some months in Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton have returned, after a stay of some months in Europe, and are at the Fairmont for the winter season.

Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Gregg, Miss Enid Gregg, and Miss Ethel Gregg have returned from Europe, where they spent the summer months, and are at the Fairmont for the winter.

Dr. and Mrs. David Cohn and Miss Edith Cohn, who have been in Europe the past year, are sailing from Cherbourg on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and will arrive in San Francisco about December 1.

Mrs. Alfred Hunter Voorhies left last week for the East, where she will visit relatives for several months, and may go abroad before her return to San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. Russell Bogue (formerly Miss Maud Payne) have returned from their wedding journey to Southern California and are at present the guests of Mr. and Mrs. J. Eugene Freeman on Pacific Avenue.

Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Davis have taken apartments at the Granada for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. John P. Wallace, after an absence of nearly two years, spent in travel abroad, left New York on Sunday, the 8th, via New Orleans, for California.

The Adele Verne Concerts.

Adele Verne, the brilliant young English pianiste, who made such a deep impression last season, will return, after duplicating her San Francisco success in the big cities of the East. She will give three concerts at Christian Science Hall, the first being Sunday afternoon, November 22. The second concert will be given Thursday evening, November 26, and the farewell concert will be Saturday afternoon, November 28, and will be the first matinee on a Saturday for many months. The sale of seats opens next Wednesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where the complete programmes may be obtained.

On Friday afternoon, November 27, Miss Verne will play in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse.

Mail orders will be carefully attended to if addressed to Will L. Greenbaum, care of Sherman, Clay & Co.

An Art Exhibit.

There will be a loan collection of paintings on exhibition at the Studio Building, 147 Presidio Avenue, open daily between ten and four, from Saturday, November 14, to Saturday, November 21. The pictures shown will include works by John S. Sargent, Claude Monet, Narcisse Diaz, Isabey, Copler, Gilbert Stuart, Carrière and others. The admission will be 25 cents and the proceeds will form the nucleus of a hospital fund for artists.

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Colonel Marion P. Maus, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., was placed on duty at headquarters, Department of California, with station in San Francisco, from November 2, for the purpose of closing out all business connected with the manœuvres and the rendition of his final report as commanding officer, Camp of Instruction, Atascadero. Upon the completion of this duty, Colonel Maus will proceed to his station, Presidio of Monterey.

Lieutenant-Colonel Henry B. Moon, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted leave of absence for four months, to take effect on December 1.

Major Harry S. Benson, U. S. A., has been transferred from the Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., to the Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A. He has been assigned to the Second Squadron of that regiment, with station at Yellowstone Park.

Major H. S. Bishop is ordered transferred from the Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A., to the Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A.

Major S. W. Dunning, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., returned on Tuesday last on the liner Manchuria to his station at Fort Shafter, Honolulu. He has been on duty as adjutant-general of the Camp of Instruction at Atascadero for several weeks.

Major Beecher Ray, paymaster, U. S. A., left on the Manchuria on Tuesday last for Manila to return to his station, after leave of absence spent in the United States.

Major George McK. Williamson, quartermaster, U. S. A., in addition to his other duties, has been ordered to assume charge under the instructions of the quartermaster-general of the army of the special repairs to the cantonment, the construction of Signal Corps stables and other repairs of a special character at the Presidio of San Francisco, relieving Captain Samuel V. Ham, Infantry, U. S. A. (major, Philippine Scouts).

Captain Rush S. Wells, Fourteenth Cavalry, Fort Yosemite, has been granted leave of absence for one month, to take effect about December 1.

Captain Edwin Bell, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., and Captain William H. H. Chapman, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., have been ordered to report to Brigadier-General Frederick A. Smith, U. S. A., president of an army retiring board at San Francisco, at such time as he may designate for examination by the board.

Captain Campbell E. Bahcock, quartermaster, U. S. A., reported for duty to the general superintendent, Army Transport Service, at San Francisco, for duty as quartermaster of the U. S. A. transport Sheridan, with station at San Francisco, relieving Captain Frederick L. Dengler, U. S. A., of that duty. Captain Dengler, when relieved, reported in person to the general superintendent, Army Transport Service, for duty as his assistant.

Captain Thomas L. Rhoads, Medical Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered to report in person to Major William D. Crosby, Medical Corps, U. S. A., president of an examining board, at the Army Medical Museum Building, Washington, D. C., at such time as he may be required by the board, for examination to determine his fitness for promotion.

Lieutenant Herman Kobhe, First Cavalry, U. S. A., has reported at headquarters, Department of California, for temporary duty, until the sailing of the army transport on December 5, when he will sail for Manila, reporting for duty to the commanding general, Philippine Division.

Lieutenant Guy B. G. Hanna, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been relieved from assignment to the Ninety-Ninth Company, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., and is placed on the unassigned list.

Lieutenant Stephen O. Fuqua, Twenty-Third Infantry, U. S. A., sailed on the transport leaving this port on November 5 for Manila and will rejoin his regiment in the Philippines.

Lieutenant Howard McC. Snyder, Medical Corps, U. S. A., has been granted fifteen days' leave of absence, to take effect upon his arrival at Fort Yellowstone, Wyoming.

Contract Surgeon William O. Montgomery, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty at Fort Mason, and will report to the chief surgeon, Department of California, for annulment of contract.

Colonel Walter S. Schuyler, Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A., Major S. W. Dunning, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Major Fred W. Foster, Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A., Captain Charles C. Walcutt, Jr., Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A., Captain Joseph C. Castner, quartermaster, U. S. A., Captain Moor N. Falls, quartermaster, U. S. A., and Captain Sanford H. Wadhams, Medical Corps, U. S. A., are appointed on a board to meet in the Hawaiian Islands at the call of the senior member of the board present in Hawaii, for the purpose of looking over the ground and making recommendations as to locating the buildings of a permanent garrison on the military reservation situated about twenty miles northwest of Honolulu on the Island of Oahu. The members of the board not stationed in Hawaii will proceed by the first available transport to Honolulu for duty, except Colonel Schuyler, who will assume his duties as a member of the board on his arrival in Hawaii with the headquarters and troops of the Fifth Cavalry.

An important change of time took effect in the Santa Fé local train service November 8. The Bakersfield local, heretofore leaving at 8:45 a. m., now leaves at 8 a. m. A new train for Stockton, Riverbank, and Sierra Railway points leaves at 9:45 a. m.; returning, arrives at 2:50 p. m.

CITY OF PARIS

THE last demand of Fashion decrees and necessitates an entire modification of Ladies' Underwear.

To be in accord with the new dainty, soft and light weight textiles which outline so gracefully the female figure, heavy fabrics, formerly made into undergarments, are entirely out of the question, but should be replaced by supple and elastic material, as soft as the dainty "Liberty Satin" now so fashionable.

The "Culotte Jersey" (our own creation), made of silk or lisle thread, will be found the most practical, agreeable and graceful underwear, to be worn with the present reproduction of the "Directoire" type in Ladies' Suits and Gowns.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Customer (who has ordered a steak)—Well done, waiter! Frenchman (not to be outdone)—Bravo, garçon!—The Bystander.

Ashtitt—Do you believe in the theory of heredity? Noitt—Sure thing. My barber is the father of three little shavers.—Chicago News.

"A man learns to do by doing," remarked the moralizer. "Yes," rejoined the demoralizer, "and also by being done."—Chicago Daily News.

Customer—What is the price of the duck? Little Girl—Please, mum, it's three shillings. But mother says, if you grumble, it's two-and-six!—Punch.

Scott—Wherever does Easty get the idea that his jokes are funny? Mott—Oh, he tells them to young women with pretty teeth.—Boston Transcript.

Office Boy—Say, the boss oughtn't to put a window in there? Carpenter—Why not? Office Boy—'Cause, now you can see he's in when he aint in.—Life.

The Inquirer—But what is it you men have struck for? The Striker—Well, I'm hiest if I know, gov'ner, but we aint goin' hack till we've got it.—The Sketch.

She—I'm going to give you back our engagement ring—I love another. He—Give me his name and address. She—Do you want to kill him? He—No, I want to sell him the ring.—Pick-Me-Up.

Reporter—Now, what was the worst money panic you ever saw? Great Financier—Last week, when a ten-cent piece rolled to the floor of a street-car and five women claimed it!—The X Ray.

Tired Traveler (to barber)—Spending the night in a sleeping-car doesn't improve one's beauty, does it? Barber—I don't know what you looked like when you started, but I guess you're right.—Harper's Bazar.

"Did your friend make a hit at the literary club?" "I guess he did. He pronounced 'Les Miserables' in a brand-new way, and then alluded to it as Victor Herbert's masterpiece."—Washington Herald.

"Sim, the town council is a little worried about this Salomé act you've hooked for the op'ry house." "Oh, I've cut out the objectionable features." "That's just it. We wuz afeard you would."—Kansas City Journal.

Daughter—This piano is really my very own, isn't it, pa? Pa—Yes, my dear. Daughter—And when I marry I can take it with me, can I? Pa—Certainly, my child. But don't tell any one; it might spoil your chances.—Penny Pictorial.

"So you are a great admirer of Shakespeare?" "Yes," answered Mr. Stormington Barnes. "The man had more than genius.

It was prescience. Think of his being able, without having seen me act, to write parts that would fit me so admirably."—Washington Star.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Lady and the Chameleon.

How to do it—how to grow Thin and slim and slender—oh, That's the question, that's the rui! Will she stint herself in grub? Will she hant and will she take Exercise for Fashion's sake? Will she run and ride and row, Wring and wrestle, rake and hoe? Will she lace herself and pinch In each curvilinear inch? How will she, the fair, the fat, Make herself into a slat?

This I know not. But I vow She will do the trick somehow. She has changed her shape before, She can do it e'en once more. —New York Sun.

An Ultimatum.

You have treated me badly, though madly I've loved you for nearly a year; You've been turning me down with your ugliest frown, And I'm growing discouraged, I fear. You may think it amusing, refusing The offers I've made of my hand. I've been patient and meek, but at last I must speak— It is more than a fellow can stand.

It is hard to be doing this wooing So long when you never respond When the chance is so small you'll be in when I call—

It is hard to be faithful and fond; When you yawn through my visit, now is it A thing that a fellow would like? You must make up your mind pretty soon to be kind Or, I give you fair warning, I'll strike.

It's a strain on affection; rejection And snubbing's not easy to hear. When with others you flirt my hest feelings are hurt,

It seems almost a hopeless affair. It has spoiled my good humor, this rumor, I can't say that I like it a bit. If it's true you're engaged I shall be so enraged That I really believe I shall quit. —Chicago News.

Random Shots.

I shot an arrow into the air, it fell in the distance. I knew not where, till a neighbor said that it killed his calf, and I had to pay him six and a half ($6.50). I bought some poison to slay some rats, and a neighbor swore that it killed his cats; and, rather than argue across the fence, I paid him four dollars and fifty cents ($4.50). One night I set sailing a toy balloon, and hoped it would soar till it reached the moon; but the candle fell out on a farmer's straw, and he said I must settle or go to law. And that is the way with the random shot; it never hits in the proper spot; and the joke you spring, that you think so smart, may leave a wound in some fellow's heart.—Emporia Gazette.

A Mission Street "Snap"

Only $550 per foot

MISSION STREET NEAR 6TH

We are authorized to sell 20 feet on Mission not far from 6th Street for $11,000. This is only $550 per foot. It was easily worth $1,000 per foot before the fire, and will be worth that much in the near future. A two-story building can be constructed on this lot for $10,000 and leased for 10 years at a rental which will pay 8% net on the investment. The Emporium, realizing the importance of Mission Street, has recently constructed an approach from that street leading into this magnificent department-store. As a speculation or an investment this little buy on Mission Street can not be surpassed. Mortgage of $6,000 can remain. Only $5,000 cash required.

The President-Elect and the Pacific Coast.

The Pacific Coast States have special cause for self-congratulation in Mr. Taft's curiously thorough acquaintance with Pacific Ocean conditions and interests. His service in the Philippine Islands, his personal relations with Japan and China, his frequent crossings of the Pacific—these have given to Mr. Taft a knowledge which no other President has had, the lack of which, in fact, has been unpleasantly manifest in more than one instance.

The immediate fortunes of the Pacific Coast States, and particularly of our greater ports, rest largely upon national policy in the rising world of the Pacific. Both political and commercial common sense demand that we shall dominate Pacific waters in the sense of maintaining therein an effective naval establishment and insisting upon conditions at least fair to our merchants and carriers. It is a case where, despite the dictum of Mr. James J. Hill of St. Paul, politics may make business by maintaining the conditions essential to the welfare of business. The President-elect understands the situation thoroughly, more intimately and better perhaps than any other American, and his utterances on past occasions have given sufficient indication of his sympathies.

We know, for example, that he is devotedly attached to the Isthmian Canal project, and will consent to no halting or paltering in that great work. We know that he stands for policies in the Philippine Islands tending to productive and commercial development and to a closer business and social connection with the United States. We know that he stands for the open door in Oriental regions and for such principles in our dealings with the countries which border upon the Pacific as will sustain and increase American connections therewith. We know, furthermore, that he is acquainted with the great carrying problems of the Pacific Ocean, and that his sympathies and interest are assured for any and every project calculated to sustain American enterprise in the carrying trade.

Mr. Taft is by no means likely to leave the Pacific States out of his account when it shall come to making up his Cabinet. He has been again and again over every Pacific State, and his individual acquaintance with our public men is large. Quite accidentally some two years ago the editor of the Argonaut discovered that Mr. Taft's interest in Pacific Coast affairs and in Pacific Coast men was not only casual and timely, but historical. It was found that he has what is very rare in Eastern men—the same kind of detailed interest in Pacific Coast affairs and Pacific Coast men that intelligent men of the Pacific Coast have in Eastern affairs. For example, in the course of a somewhat extended conversation he introduced the names of pretty much every man of distinction in the Pacific States since the Civil War, having a definite and curiously intelligent estimate of the intellectual, political, and historical status of each.

From this kind of knowledge and judgment we may well cherish confident hopes. Mr. Taft will find a place in his Cabinet for a Pacific Coast man, and he will probably choose wisely. The newspapers up and down the Coast are already submitting a multitude of names to him. Among those mentioned we hear those of George Knight and General Otis of California prominently mentioned. The names of Judge Ballinger and ex-Senator John L. Wilson of Washington are more or less discussed. In Oregon Senator Fulton and Harvey W. Scott, the editor of the Oregonian, are regarded as possibilities. A Californian who in a legal sense has become a citizen of Massachusetts, John Hays Hammond, is among those regarded by the Eastern press as likely to find a place in the new Cabinet.

In the course of the famous "Dear Maria" letters President Roosevelt remarked that he didn't know of anybody on the Pacific Coast competent for a Cabinet position. He changed his mind later on, to be sure, but even this fact did not soothe the wounds of those who fancied themselves firmly established in Mr. Roosevelt's estimation. Mr. Taft, who knows the Pacific States much better than Mr. Roosevelt, will easily find abundance of Cabinet timber.

The Chinese Throne.

The death of the Emperor of China means no more than the disappearance of an imbecile hypochondriac, but that the empress also should die within a few hours is an event that may easily have the gravest results. China is honeycombed with disaffection toward the Manchu dynasty, and has been on the brink of revolution for many years. An outbreak was almost hopeless so long as this grim and terrible woman held the sceptre, but if the regent Chun, who also is a Manchu, should show the least lack of firmness or of ability to hold his own against fierce and resolute enemies, his regency will be a short one and both he and the young Emperor Pu Yi will walk the tragic and well-trodden road of those who fail. China without a successful ruler means a welter of stupid and cruel savagery, and this in turn means a hardly more desirable intervention, with its attendant awakening of jealousies and rivalries. We have every reason to hope that Prince Chun will be equal to the occasion.

The late Empress Tzu-hsi was one of the most remarkable women that ever lived. For nearly sixty years she has ruled China with a rod of iron and without any kind of legal warranty. Originally a slave girl, she was selected as a secondary wife by the Emperor I-tchou, and she was already in full ascendancy when the French and English captured Peking in 1860. Indeed, she was the only one who kept her head upon that occasion, and when the emperor showed a disposition to assert himself he conveniently and rather mysteriously died, as have a great many others who dared to thwart this inflexible woman. The new emperor, Tsaitchaou, was a baby whose mother, Tsi An, should have been the regent, but Tzu-Hsi herself attended to the matter of the regency, and when the baby emperor presently died it was generally supposed that his demise had been aided by the ferocious old woman, who was well versed in the mysteries of Chinese poisons. This was in 1875, and almost before the news was known the dowager had placed her three-year-old nephew upon the throne and continued tranquilly in her position of actual ruler of China. The Emperor Kwang-hsu, who died last week, probably owed his immunity from poison to his weak mind, which prevented him from contesting the sovereignty with his aunt. Indeed, in 1900 she announced that in view of his weak health she would herself administer the affairs of China in her own name, and this she continued to do until her death.

The regent Chun has everything in his favor except the fact that he belongs to the Manchu dynasty. The danger comes from irreconcilable enemies of that dynasty. It would be rash to predict anything about the future of China, but in the course of a few weeks, as the news of the double death percolates through the country, we shall probably get some indications of what to expect. But the situation is not without its elements of serious danger.

Assault Upon Francis J. Heney.

A little past four o'clock on the afternoon of the 13th instant, a man entered Judge Lawlor's courtroom, where the trial of Abraham Ruef for bribery was pending, and, pushing his way inside the bar to a point within less than four feet of Special Prosecutor Francis J. Heney, discharged a pistol full into his side face. Though painfully wounded, Heney was not killed or even rendered insensible. The ball entered his face immediately in front of the ear, but was deflected downward by the cheek bones and lodged in the muscles at the base of the jaw. At this writing, five days after the shooting, Mr. Heney is happily out of danger. Already his wound is healing, and recovery is likely to be rapid—so rapid, indeed, that his physicians say that he will be able to appear in the streets within a fortnight or less time. The wonder is that he was not killed outright. The assailant was almost directly beside his victim, his weapon was a deadly one, he wished to kill, and he shot to kill. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred a shot so delivered would have coursed through the brain, causing instant death; in this instance the fact that the assailant was standing, while his victim was sitting down, caused the missile to enter at a slight angle, with the result as above set forth.

The would-be assassin was overwhelmed by courtroom attendants, and later at the county prison he gave his name as Morris Haas and his occupation as that of a liquor merchant out of business. He was forty-eight years old, had a wife and four children, and lived in a rented house on McAllister Street. He talked freely, although incoherently at times, and attempted no reserve when Chief of Police Biggy, Detective W. J. Burns of the special prosecutor's staff, and others put him through a drastic course of questioning. He said that he wanted to kill Heney because he (Heney) had ruined him in his business, disgraced and impoverished his family, and had compelled him (Haas) to hide away in shame from the sight of his fellow-men. He wished to destroy Heney, he said, and had been planning to do it for weeks. Questioned sharply to the end of finding out if others were associated with him in his crime, he denied that anybody had prompted him to it or had any share in it. One or two persons, he said, knowing of the incidents hack of his resentment against Heney, remarked to him that they would kill a man who should so use them. No other circumstance was developed by the probing process, nothing to contradict Haas's own repeated assertions that in attempting to kill Heney he acted from his own motives and purposes and upon his own initiative. On Saturday, the day after the assault, Haas was visited in jail by his wife, but the conference between them, if it can be so called, was futile, since both were too overwhelmed with grief and tears to say anything. Saturday evening at about eight o'clock—some twenty-eight hours after the assault in the court-room—guards who stood outside of Haas's cell heard the report of a pistol, and a moment later the man was found dead or dying on the prison floor. He had, it appears, concealed a small pistol in his shoe, doubtless with suicidal intent, and although officers of police, including Detective Burns, had searched him, it had escaped their scrutiny.

Haas's story is a pitiful one. In 1887, while employed as a drummer for a San Francisco cigar house, he was charged with embezzling $275. He fled to Philadelphia, but was detected and brought back to California. Brought to trial, he pleaded guilty, and in May, 1888, he was sentenced to two years in San Quentin. In January, 1890, Haas was pardoned by Governor Waterman, and because of a good record as a prisoner he was restored to citizenship.

After his release from San Quentin Haas set up as the proprietor of a saloon and restaurant in San Francisco. He prospered moderately, married, and lived uneventfully with his family until the disaster of 1906. A few months after the fire he opened a wine store under the name of the Metropolitan Wine Company at 1816 Post Street. He was doing business in this new connection and was living with his family (wife, two boys aged fourteen and five, and two girls aged thirteen and ten), on McAllister Street when last April he was impeached as a juror in the second Ruef trial, known as the Parkside case.

Haas's name was drawn in Judge Lawlor's court on April 20. He asked the court to excuse him from jury service, but the request was denied, and he was taken in hand by Heney for the prosecution and Ach for the defense, and after a whole morning's examination he was passed by both attorneys and took his seat as the tenth juror. Four days later, and before the jury was complete, Heney challenged Haas in open court as an ex-convict and demanded that he be dismissed from the jury box. He exhibited a prison photograph of a man in stripes and "in an impressive and dramatic manner" forced Haas to acknowledge it as his own and to admit that his real name was not Haas, but Henley. Haas pleaded for a chance to explain and protested his innocence of the crime for which he was convicted twenty years ago. He declared that he had asked the court to be excused from jury service and pleaded with Heney for a chance to set himself right. After some further questioning, Heney's motion that Haas be dismissed from the jury box was sustained by the court. The incident naturally made a great stir and the daily papers of the next morning were full of it, reproducing the picture of Haas in prison garb, and making the utmost sensational use of its dramatically painful phases.

The later chapters in Haas's story are detailed in his own statement to Chief of Police Biggy and Detective Burns immediately after his assault upon Heney. His family, he said, was humiliated by the exposure of his record as an ex-convict. His business, he said, fell off to nothing, for people would have nothing to do with him. His children were jeered at by other children on account of their father's shame. He hid himself away from the sight of the people he had known, frequenting "nickelodeons" because it was dark there and people could not see him. It is a long drawn out and painful story of a man of infirm mental and moral make-up, tortured by shame, brooding over his sufferings, and throughout all developing the spirit of revenge, hatred, and murderous intent.

The effect of these shocking events upon the people of San Francisco is that which inevitably follows upon such incidents. Differences of opinion with respect to Mr. Heney's career in San Francisco, intense and bitter as they are, have not served to limit the feeling of sympathy due to one assailed without warning by a murderous hand. Pity there is and must be for a poor creature driven by the torments of a mind diseased and goaded by suffering to murder and self-destruction, but justification or thought of justification there is none and can be none.

Not unnaturally, the attempt upon Heney's life tends to make support for his cause. A certain atmosphere of heroics easily associates itself with Heney's work under the conditions which now exist, and it will tend beyond a doubt to give to the immediate work of the prosecution popular sympathy and backing. Hopes of Ruef's conviction, which had well nigh failed under a tedious and acrimonious procedure in a case beginning so far back as last August, have been revived and are higher today than at any time this year or more.

Three lawyers of high capability and distinction, Messrs. Johnson, Sullivan, and Dwyer, came forward within an hour of the tragic event of last Friday and tendered their services in the Ruef case in behalf of the prosecution. All are familiar with the case in its history and hearings. Their entrance into it will give it the vitality of new blood and fresh energy, and at the same time relieve it from difficulties and embarrassments which have grown out of the personal contentions of the past two years.

Those away from San Francisco who may be inclined to charge up this shocking incident against the morality and civilization of our city should remember that Haas's crime is one which might have happened anywhere. San Francisco, it should be borne in mind, has no monopoly of degeneracy. Resentment, hatred, malice, and criminal intent—the whole brood of malignant passions—alas, have their habitat the universe over. They belong rather to the world of moral malignancy than to any particular locality, and are as likely to break out in one place as another.

It is to be regretted that a certain reckless emotionalism, proceeding upon the basis of no fact or reason, has conceived the idea that back of the assault upon Mr. Heney there was some sort of conspiracy. It is further to be regretted that a yellow press and a blind partisanship for the prosecution have accepted and are exploiting this theory. Fortunately for the good name and fame of San Francisco, it finds no leg of fact or circumstance to stand upon. All the evidence goes to sustain the dictum of Chief of Police Biggy and his assistants that Haas's act was what in police parlance is called a one-man crime. It was the work of a man of infirm nature, goaded out of self-control and beyond moral restraint by his own distempered fancies. Some suggestion, indeed, this poor creature may have imbibed from passionate discussions in and out of court during the past few months. There has been, let the truth be declared, far too many threats of violence, far too many exhibitions of anger and spleen. Men of sense and poise have known how to estimate these things, but a poor creature haunted by harrowing memories, tortured by shame and the sufferings of his family, all operating upon a weak and disordered mind, may easily have been less competent.

Leaders and Followers.

Some observation of the phenomena of social agitation, likewise some acquaintance with the thing called human nature, is essential to comprehension of recent events as they relate to the aims, purposes, and tendencies of organized labor in its subjection to the leadership of Samuel Gompers and others of his type and sort. We have seen the complete failure of an attempt on the part of Mr. Gompers to sell out the votes of labor union in a presidential campaign. Gompers haggard first with certain national Republican leaders, including the President, for concessions in the shape of special privilege for organized labor, but failed in the effort to secure ratification of the deal by the national party convention. He then made a trade with Mr. Bryan upon pretty much the same lines, and with Bryan's aid got the Democratic National Convention to accept it. Then he went up and down the country seeking to drive the membership of the labor unions into support at the polls of the Democratic candidate. In brief, he sold out the vote of labor unionism in so far as he could and made such efforts as he could duly to deliver it on the 3d of November.

The result of the voting illustrates the political attitude of unionism as a body as contrasted with that of the leaders of unionism. Nowhere in appreciable numbers were the votes of unionists cast in obedience to the suggestions and pleadings of Mr. Gompers. Labor unionists, like other citizens, voted according to their own preferences and judgments, giving no heed to the engagements made by Gompers with Mr. Bryan. In the State of Indiana, where unionism is especially strong and where its local leaders took up the Gompers programme and attempted to enforce it upon the rank and file, the Republican party got almost its usual majority. In the Danville district of Illinois, where a tremendous effort was made by Gompers against the Hon. Joseph Cannon, the old veteran came out of the polls with his usual handsome majority. In brief, Mr. Gompers's political scheme came to a complete and ridiculous failure. If he succeeded in turning any considerable votes anywhere away from Taft and to Bryan, the election returns afford no evidence of it.

And yet at the annual meet of the labor unionists of the country held at Denver last week the same Samuel Gompers was the lion of the hour. His report, which, by the way, gave no account of his political failure, but was full of the spirit of future political designs, was received with high approval and Gompers himself was reelected as the official head of organized labor in the United States. While this convention was in session the President of the United States issued invitations to a conference at the White House for the discussion of labor questions between labor leaders on the one hand and a group of Federal judges on the other. All the conspicuous leaders of organized labor were invited with one exception. The name of Samuel Gompers alone did not appear in the list, this being the President's way of showing his resentment against Gompers for the part he had played in the presidential campaign. To be sure, the President's course was not very consistent, in view of his own relations to Gompers, but consistency is not the characteristic virtue of rulers, particularly of him who now sits in the presidential chair. The slight to Gompers, plain and intentional as it was, was as plainly and intentionally resented by his associates in the higher rank of labor leadership. John Mitchell and other conspicuous leaders who received the presidential favor considered among themselves and, acting in concert, declined to accept Mr. Roosevelt's invitation to dinner or to join in his conference. To make sure that there should be no misunderstanding about it, they gave out to the newspapers a careful statement of motives and reasons, making it plain that their declinations were due to the fact that Gompers had not been invited.

The general inconsistency involved in these various and seemingly contradictory occurrences is easily explained when we take into account two principles, namely (1) that of social agitation, the other (2) the characteristics of human nature. In social agitation the radicals, extremists, the self-seekers, and the blather-skites always come to the front. Your plain, quiet man of moderation and wisdom, purged of self, is no match in a popular meeting or conference with your noisy, dogmatic, radical, and uncompromising hothead. The type of man last named almost invariably takes the offices, holds the center of the stage, makes the reports, and represents before the public the movement to which he is attached. This is why organized labor, which has so much that is commendable in its aims, is commonly so intemperate in its proposals and efforts. Leaders like P. H. McCarthy in San Francisco, who win their way to the head of organized labor by sheer force of presumption and push, make its policies, even though they do not fairly represent the judgment and the aim of the rational and level-headed majority. They carry the banners of organized labor even though they may not command the individual approval of the masses in whose name they presume to act.

As the labor convention stood assembled at Denver, it was made up chiefly if not wholly of those radicals in unionism whom agitation always brings to the front as distinct from the sober rank and file whose claims as representative men are always overlooked. It is natural enough that a convention so organized should stand by Gompers in spite of his popular defeat; it is natural that the atmosphere of such a meeting should have prompted Mitchell and the other national leaders present to resent the slight imposed upon Gompers by the President of the United States.

In spite of the determination of the rank and file of labor unionism to keep out of politics, in the face of the popular rebuke given to politico-unionism at the polls, the leaders of organized labor will persist in the effort to ally unionism with partisan politics. Gompers gave the cue to his fellow-agitators when he declared at Denver that the defeat of his plans in the campaign of 1908 was "merely a lost battle," that there would be no let-up in his plans and purposes, and that the movement to put unionism in politics should go steadily forward. There can be no doubt of Mr. Gompers's purposes; likewise, there can be no doubt that he will have the support of the leaders of unionism the country over. The rank and file of unionism, to be sure, has no stomach for politicalism, but when it comes to agitation the rank and file must ever give way to those who know how to maintain themselves in the offices of leadership.

We are going to have now for some years to come a persistent and uncompromising effort on the part of the leaders of unionism to force the mass of labor unionists into the political game, precisely as Ruef and Schmitz played the game in San Francisco and as Gompers tried to play it nationally. Unionism regarded as a body is not yet in politics, as the result of the late election shows; but unionism, regarded as a social agitation, is in politics and will stay in politics.

Those upon whom the responsibilities of political order and of public policy rest will do well to heed this fact.

A Man Who Missed His Chance.

There is naturally much speculation as to the cause of Mr. Metcalf's retirement from the Cabinet, but nobody apparently knows anything about it. Possibly Mr. Metcalf grew weary of a position which yielded him little ease and much vexation, and yet if this were the moving cause it is rather surprising that he did not wait and go out of office with the administration. Probably there has been some friction between the President and the Secretary. From time to time there have been rumors to this effect, and it has long been the opinion of those who know Mr. Metcalf well that his place has not been an entirely agreeable one.

Mr. Metcalf is the third man to represent the Pacific States in the Cabinet. The first was Hon. George H. Williams of Oregon, who served as Attorney-General with President Grant from 1872 to 1875. Judge Williams still lives in extreme age and in high personal credit at Portland. The next Cabinet member from the Pacific Coast was Hon. Joseph McKenna, now a member of the Supreme Court at Washington, who served as Secretary of the Interior for a brief time with President McKinley. Mr. Metcalf was originally appointed Secretary of Commerce and Labor three years ago, and something more than a year ago he was transferred to the Secretaryship of the Navy.

It can not be said that Mr. Metcalf has added largely to his personal prestige by service in the Cabinet. For the most part his work has been inconspicuous, and the one really large opportunity which came to him he permitted to pass unimproved. It will be remembered that Mr. Metcalf came out to the Coast late in 1906, commissioned by the President to examine into and report upon the conditions of Japanese life in California. This was within the period of the crisis brought on by Mr. Roosevelt's amazingly indiscreet message with respect to Japanese in the California public schools. If Mr. Metcalf had been just the man he ought to have been he would have dealt with the subject in an independent and bold way, leaving the result, including his own standing with the President, to take care of itself. He did nothing of the kind; he made a perfunctory and "soothing" report calculated, and no doubt designed, to let the President down easy from an embarrassing and impossible situation. He made himself, so to speak, a stalking-horse to save the face and the credit of the President, who had put a very awkward foot into a very nasty situation, and who was eager to find a way out.

A man who once serves as a doormat for another man, whatever the circumstances, rarely has the respect of that other man. There have been evidences that since Mr. Metcalf did for Mr. Roosevelt this questionable turn he has never stood quite so high in the estimation of his chief. And it is certain that he has not stood so high in the estimation of his fellow-citizens of California.

It is interesting to consider what might have followed if Mr. Metcalf had held a bold rather than a subservient course in the matter of his Japanese report. The President, no doubt, would have gritted his teeth, got red in the face, and said no end of unpleasant things, but Mr. Metcalf, being in the right, would have found it easy to sustain himself in the judgment of the country and, above all, in the opinion of California. At a stroke he would have become the most conspicuous and the most admired public figure in the region west of the Rocky Mountains, and he would inevitably have stood in line for any honors which the Pacific Coast States may have to bestow. But he chose to serve his chief in his embarrassment rather than his State in her humiliation. And in less than two years he finds himself at outs with his chief, and—well, let us say, not so highly esteemed in California as he might be.

The Oregon Situation.

The Argonaut has in previous writings set forth the extraordinary situation in Oregon. A rock-ribbed Republican State, which has given 24,000 majority for Taft (equivalent to 400,000 Republican majority in New York), stands pledged through its legislature under the direct primary system to elect Governor Chamberlain, a Democrat, to the Senate next January. The legislature thus committed contains five Republicans to one Democrat; and the anomaly of this situation rests upon the fact that many or most of the Republican legislators, prior to their election, subscribed to a promise to be guided by "the will of the people." The form in which "the will of the people" was declared was a plurality vote for Chamberlain as against the Republican candidate whom Mr. Heney's activities succeeded in substituting for Senator Fulton.

The "pledge" on the part of the legislature to elect Chamberlain is regular enough, if anything may be said to be regular under the extraordinary system which prevails in Oregon. At the same time, the Argonaut does not believe and has never believed that Chamberlain will be elected. We believe that through one expedient or another many members of the legislature who stand pledged to Chamberlain will find ways, shabby or otherwise, to evade their commitments. We do not justify this upon any ground: we believe that a man of honor should and would keep his word, however indiscreetly it may have been given. But it is not in human nature—certainly it is not in political nature—for a legislature overwhelmingly Republican, representing a State overwhelmingly Republican in sentiment, to send to the Senate a man whose political principles and purposes are at odds with the aims and wishes of the State.

We note within the week the inauguration of a popular movement against the election of Chamberlain by the legislature soon to meet. The plan is to circulate for signature by the electors throughout the State documents absolving the legislators who signed the Chamberlain pledge from adhering to their promises. This, let it be remarked, even though it may prove successful, is not a very nice way of getting out of an engagement voluntarily and solemnly assumed. Men of high sensibilities would hardly be willing to accept the self-stultification involved in this plan. But, be it remembered, we are not dealing with men of very high sensibilities. We are dealing with men fools enough to bind themselves by a ridiculous and unmanly pledge. Creatures thus morally defective may be expected to yield to the tremendous pressure which is now being brought to bear upon them by a community which finds itself duped, injured, ashamed, and chagrined, and which grasps at any possibility of deliverance from an impossible situation.

Editorial Notes.

The unwisdom of hanging without inquiry finds interesting exemplification in the sensationally famous case of Edna Clark. Out of the fact that a very commonplace young girl, wearying of the restraints of home, had gone off to another city, where she had found the means of earning her living, our great and wise daily newspapers had built a mountain, or a whole group of mountains, of criminality. Incidentally, they had in a moral sense drawn and quartered in the public view one Edward Payson Young, whom we will not style "reverend" because he has no claims upon that designation, albeit he is something of a compromise between a rector and a priest and nominally the spiritual head of a church which stands somewhere midway between Catholicism and Episcopacy without having just the right moral connections with either. Mr. Young does not appear to have gotten anything that he does not deserve on general principles, but manifestly he is not guilty of kidnaping and murder in the case of Edna Clark. Summary conviction and execution is perhaps the easiest way of easing the public mind, but it is not the way of law or equity. It is better to try men, to examine into the facts, before hanging them.

The Stanford youths who are rebelling against the discipline of the university and who are displaying their "manhood" by acting like a pack of silly and irresponsible children, assert that they "have a right to liberty." Nobody has a right to a "liberty" which he lacks the discretion and moral self-control to use discreetly. A "liberty" used in contempt of one's own welfare and the welfare of others is no liberty at all, but a wild and vicious license. A "liberty" which prompts and permits rowdyism, drunkenness, debauchery, and vulgarity has no sanction in a school of culture and should have none. The sooner Stanford shall be quit of its outfit of hoodlums who do not know the difference between liberty and license, the better it will be for the school.

With the national election out of the way, and with Governor Hughes safely reinstalled for another executive term, New York and Washington are now actively discussing the question of who is to succeed Senator Platt upon the expiration of his term next March. The President at one time thought of entering the Senate, and it is possible that he would have accepted the place if he could have had assurances of election without any kind of scramble or the making of any arrangements. But he has planned to do other things, and his name is not now considered. The candidates are legion, including Timothy Woodruff, Barnes of Albany, ex-Governor Black, and many others, but the name most favorably considered is that of Elihu Root. If Mr. Root wants the senatorship he can have it, and it seems likely that he will ultimately accept. New York is tired of commonplace and ineffective representation in the Senate. The feeling is universal that the great Empire State ought in the Senate to enjoy something of her old distinction, as in the days of Roscoe Conkling and William M. Evarts. Root will be urged to accept as a means of giving to New York the character in the Senate which her commercial and social leadership of the country really merits. Mr. Root was born February, 1845, and will, therefore, be sixty-four years of age upon the going out of the Roosevelt administration. He is a little past the Osler standard, but there is still a vast amount of work in him, and we can think of no way in which he could put it in to better effect than in senatorial service.

The sale of Hunters Point drydock by the local syndicate which hereto has owned it to Mr. Charles M. Schwab is, we hope, a good thing. It indicates at least that Mr. Schwab, who may be regarded as a type of the Eastern capitalist, is hopeful about the future of San Francisco, and it is almost a demonstration of his intention to sustain and enlarge the scope of the Union Iron Works, of which he is the chief owner. A system of drydocks is as necessary to a commercial port as ship channels. The Hunters Point docks were created originally less in the spirit of investment than with the intention of providing a necessary and essential commercial facility. Locally owned, they have served their purpose well, and we trust they will be administered in future in a spirit as liberal and as commercially helpful as in the past. It has been the way of San Francisco to own her own facilities, to be her own proprietary, so to speak. In many respects it has been a good policy, and yet as times change methods of business must change, and perhaps we should not cling too fondly to old ideas and propensities.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

FLORENCE, October 30, 1908.

TO THE EDITOR: In your issue of October 10 you state that the so-called house of the Capulets, at Verona, was destroyed by fire lately. I saw a dispatch from Rome, dated September 19, published in a San Francisco daily paper, which made the same statement, and which was probably your authority also.

As a matter of fact, the home of the Capulets has not been destroyed by fire. I was at Verona on the 6th of October and saw the house on the Via Cappello, just where it has always been, with a marble tablet bearing an inscription which tells us that it was the home of the Capulets.

Of course, there is little reason to believe that Juliet lived in that particular house, but it is the one which has always been show to tourists as her home.

SARITA D. HENDERSON.

GRAND HOTEL MADRID, SEVILLE, October 27, 1908.

TO THE EDITOR: My surprise, on reaching this hotel night before last and finding in its reading-room a copy of the Argonaut dated October 10, was only equaled by my delight. As an old subscriber and warm admirer of your paper, sui generis. I was glad to read its agreeable and thoughtful summaries and comments, and as a sincere friend and well wisher of Spain I was pleased to observe this indication of her "up-to-date-ness." I thought you might welcome this testimony of "how far a good word can travel in this naughty world," and in this thought I trust to obtain your forgiveness for my intrusion upon your valuable editorial time. You have the address of my home in New York, for which I expect to sail from Gibraltar early next week.

Yours very truly,

CASPAR F. GOODRICH,

Rear-Admiral, United States Navy.

Letters like the above are received by the Argonaut almost daily. From a multitude of sources it comes to us that the American traveling in Europe "finds the Argonaut everywhere." No other American publication has a wider circulation throughout the world, and no other journal published on the Pacific Coast—nor all of them together—have one-tenth part of the Argonaut's circulation in Europe.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The prominence recently accorded to Unitarianism in certain quasi-political circles gives relevance to a communication from the Rev. John Howland Lathrop of Berkeley on the religious attitude of the modern Unitarian church. In his letter to the Argonaut Mr. Lathrop says:

Although the name "Unitarian" is comparatively modern, the point of view which it represents is not as novel as is commonly believed. From the beginning of Christian history some form of Unitarianism has existed alongside of the generally accepted Christianity. As the Christian gospel became domesticated in the world of Greek culture, the author of that gospel came to be identified with the Divine Principle that was regarded by the Greek mind as the source of all light and truth; and by the year 325 Jesus the Christ was pronounced "Light of Lights," "very God of very God." In opposition to the tendency which came to completion in the Nicene Council there were followers of Jesus who maintained conceptions of their master more in keeping with the Jewish idea of what the Messiah would be—conceptions that gave him rank inferior to Deity. These heretics (so branded) were of various sorts and of various opinions, but always in some fashion Unitarians. Their like continued after official Christianity had formulated the doctrine of the Trinity, and in Hungary, for example, we find a large body of Christians in the sixteenth century definitely calling themselves Unitarian under the inspiration of Servetus.

But the Unitarianism that we know in America owes very little to the older forms of Unitarianism that run thus back to the beginning. Theological conditions in America were sufficient to call it forth. Among the congregational churches which the Pilgrims and the Puritans developed in New England two distinct tendencies were clearly developed by the end of the eighteenth century. The one under the leadership of Jonathan Edwards was toward the revival of a strict Calvinism and was potent in the Congregational churches of Connecticut and western Massachusetts. The other, under the influence of Harvard University, was in the direction of a broad humanism and was manifested in the churches along the New England coast. The Calvinistic tendency exalted the being of the absolute God, and correspondingly emphasized the doctrine of the depravity of man. The humanists, with Dr. Channing at their head, championed in opposition the rights and abilities of man, declaring that human nature itself refuted the Calvinistic doctrine. It is plain to be seen what these two tendencies would result in with regard to Christology. The one created an impassable gulf between the perfect life of Jesus and the life of the rest of mankind, while the other lifted mankind to a divinity that would enable it to include among its own even a perfection that was complete. The dividing question was the question of the nature of man, but because certain Christological results followed, the one party designated the other according to these results and gave it what was considered the opprobrious title of "Unitarian." Recognizing the difference of theological position between the parties in the Congregational body, Dr. Channing and his associates hoped that no rupture in the body need follow. He reminded his opponents that the Congregational church was an organization growing out of the spirit that had brought men to this country "to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences," and that should, therefore, have the freedom that would allow men of differing opinions to affiliate with one another in spite of their differences. But the Calvinistic party was strenuous for what it conceived to be the truth, and felt that fellowship could exist only where there was theological agreement. Consequently they refused longer to associate with the liberals and withdrew. The division was mostly geographical, but wherever among the coast churches a small portion of the congregation sympathized with the Calvinistic party they withdrew from the churches and put up their own meeting house, as was the case with the Pilgrim fathers' church in Plymouth. The Unitarian Congregationalists, once forced to be by themselves, made it a fundamental principle of their fellowship that they should carry out the religious freedom intended by the fathers, and thus the rock upon which the body has ever since stood has been "freedom"—fellowship without creedal requirements.

An inquiry into the theology of the earliest New England Unitarians shows it to be what would be considered today extremely conservative. In the Baltimore address in which Channing defends his Unitarian Christianity, he says: "Whatever doctrines seem to us to be clearly taught in the Scriptures, we receive without reserve or exception." It was contended that the doctrine of the Trinity was not taught in Scripture and modern Biblical criticism has verified this contention. Jesus, though regarded as a being inferior to God, was still held to be a divine messenger sent by God, in whom was invested power "to raise the dead, judge the world, and confer the everlasting rewards promised to the faithful." The hope of immortality was founded by Channing upon the resurrection of Jesus.

Scriptural Christians in every sense of the term is what the first American Unitarians were, and the interpretations of Scripture given by them have been in large measure justified by modern study. But the principle of freedom which was at the heart of the movement made it ready for any and all new theological truth, and so the research that destroyed the old notion of the authority of the Bible did not fail of a welcome. The Unitarians, instead of being dismayed by the destruction of their old basis for theological certainty, recognized at once that their duty was to set about to find what basis there might be with the old one gone. The new hypotheses of science were welcome as a possible way to a natural revelation of God. Evolution seemed to point to a divine purpose in life, and religious interpreters of evolution arose. The study of the history of religions suggested a world-wide revelation of God to mankind, and such indications were eagerly welcomed. Also the transcendental philosophy arising with Emerson and the later generally accepted idealistic monism seemed to assure to reason a satisfactory foundation for religion.

As the settlers from New England carried their institutions into the West, Unitarian Congregationalism as well as Trinitarian Congregationalism found a foothold, and as is the case in other matters than religion, the West was temperamentally radical. Western Unitarianism had a tendency to break with Christianity as a whole, feeling that Christianity was so identified with the old system of doctrine that the radical point of view was hardly justified in claiming to be Christian. Even to require a profession of theism on the part of members seemed to the Western church to be a limitation of religious freedom, and a resolve was made to the effect that the Western Conference "conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all who wish to join it to help establish truth, righteousness, and love in the world." After a desirable liberalizing effect upon the Eastern churches, differences were adjusted and the body as a whole came more and more to recognize that the reality of religion lies in the conduct of life, and not in any beliefs whatsoever.

Today the Unitarian movement in Christianity (and Unitarianism has always conceived of itself as a movement and not as a sect) conceives its mission to be the religious interpretation of life. It aims to point out the religious implications of ethical action and the essential religiousness of all that works to build up the higher life of Christianity. In other words, its position is that of the modern man who is willing to confess himself agnostic as to many of the unsolved and insoluble problems of life, but who yet feels a religious obligation to serve the right and true as he may see it and to love his neighbor as himself. Bound to freedom, it is also bound to change, and while it reverses the traditions of the past as the record of the steps by which we have come to our present attainments, it looks more interestedly toward the future, believing that more satisfactory solutions of the religious problems of practical life are ahead of us than any that have yet been discovered. The name "Unitarian," given the body by its opponents, is emptied of its dogmatic significance by most adherents and interpreted to signify the unity of a harmonious spiritual life, both individual and social.

What effect has oratory upon a presidential election? The New York World says that it has none at all and quotes in confirmation from its pamphlet, "The Map of Bryanism," published on February 1, 1908:

You may not be able to understand, Mr. Bryan, why a candidate as popular as you are, as magnetic as you are and as eloquent as you are should be foredoomed to defeat. But from the beginning of American history nobody has ever talked himself into the presidency. However great the applause that the orator could command from the rostrum, the prize of the presidency has frequently been awarded in preference to the Great Unknown.

Jefferson, you will remember, made no speeches. Neither Madison nor Monroe nor John Quincy Adams had a popular following. William Henry Harrison won the Whig nomination from Clay in 1840 and at the polls beat Van Buren.

James K. Polk had been Speaker of the House of Representatives, but he was from Tennessee at a time when that State was on the frontier; yet in convention he defeated Martiu Van Buren, Lewis Cass, James Buchanan, and John C. Calhoun, and at the polls he triumphed over Henry Clay, the greatest talker of his time.

In 1848 the Democrats nominated Cass, an orator and leader of men, but they were defeated by Zachary Taylor, who did not talk and who was known only as a soldier.

In 1852 the Democrats nominated Franklin Pierce of New Hampshire, a very small man from a very small State, against General Winfield Scott, the most popular figure of the Mexican War, and won the election by the largest majority ever cast up to that date. Pierce was comparatively obscure and of mediocre ability. . . . The old Whig party had become in many respects the personal property of Clay and Webster. It lived, but it did not thrive upon their oratory. It was said of Clay that as a presidential candidate he could stir up more enthusiasm and get fewer votes than any other living man.

Things came to such a pass that the Whigs could manifest no great enthusiasm for anybody except Clay, and the party died. A truthful epitaph would describe that organization as a one-man party which perished because the one man perished.

Abraham Lincoln was nominated for President by the Republicans because William H. Seward of New York, the logical candidate, was too well known. When General Grant was nominated and elected in 1868 his political views were a mystery even to himself. He had been a pro-slavery Democrat before the war, and is believed to have voted for Breckinridge in 1860, but from that time on his political record was a blank. He wrote nothing and he said nothing, but the party managers and the people preferred him to a host of great Republicans whose names were household words.

Rutherford B. Hayes was hardly a name to the great majority of American voters when the Republicans nominated him in 1876, but he defeated Samuel J. Tilden. Garfield had a reputation as an orator and debater, but he was one of the secondary figures in the Republican party. Conkling was a more brilliant orator than Garfield, an able lawyer, a greater man, and a genuine leader, but the presidency was as far from Conkling as if he were constitutionally disqualified for that great office.

Blaine met the same fate that has overtaken so many other orators. He was beaten by the uneloquent Grover Cleveland, who four years before was unknown outside of Buffalo. In 1888 the Republican convention thrust all the great party leaders aside to nominate Benjamin Harrison, who had to be introduced as the grandson of his grandfather, and Harrison was elected.

Even in your own case, Mr. Bryan, you owed your nomination to the fact that you were unknown. Had you been conspicuously identified in the public mind with the Democratic party's ancient feuds and controversies the Chicago convention, in spite of your crown of thorns and cross of gold speech, would have passed you by as it passed Bland and Boies.

The moral is obvious. The situation demands a substantial man of good character and respectable talents who has no record to defend and is identified with none of the bitter animosities of former factional strife. If the Democratic party needed a new-blood candidate in 1884, when Cleveland was nominated; if it needed a new-blood candidate in 1896, when you were nominated, it is doubly in need of a new-blood candidate now, when the very life of the Democracy is in jeopardy.

The Democratic press—what there is of it—is finding its breath after the débauché.

The Lynchburg (Va.) News draws consolation from the fact that virtue is not always in a majority:

So long as men love personal liberty and cherish free institutions the Democratic party will live and be a potential factor in American politics. The party has often suffered defeat—sometimes overwhelming defeats that would have crushed any party possessing less vitality, but it rises from every defeat vigorous, hopeful, ready for another contest.

The Austin (Texas) Statesman admits the "frightful mistake" of the party:

Even in New York it is plain to be seen that but for the loyal, uncompromising, and persistent fight made by the State Democrats for the Bryan ticket the State Democracy would have triumphed. Bryan, though, proved too much for them to carry.

The Jackson (Miss.) Clarion-Ledger comments on the report that Bryan will never again be a candidate for the presidency and says:

The Clarion-Ledger, which has been the friend and supporter of Bryan for many years, thinks he has made the right decision. No man has had more nominations than Bryan, three in twelve years, and it would be folly to talk of nominating him again, for three defeats should satisfy both himself and partisan friends that he can not be elected.

The Montgomery Advertiser refuses to admit that the party is dead. It has been killed many times before, "but 'Resurgam' has ever been its motto":

The Know Nothings thought they had killed it; the Abolitionists thought it was twice dead, and at one time the Populists thought they were making a finish of it. Now the Republicans flatter themselves that our party is dead beyond the hope of political resurrection, but it isn't, not by a long way.

The use of the metric system of weights and measures will be compulsory in the Philippines after the first of next year.

JAPANESE TREATMENT OF FOREIGNERS.

A governmental direction of national manners is unknown in the Western world, but that it may have its advantages is shown by the following proclamation issued by the governor of the Kanagawa Prefecture. The proclamation was preparatory to the arrival of the American fleet, and it points out what must be avoided in the treatment of foreigners. The notice reads:

AS REGARDS FOREIGNERS IN GENERAL.

That people shall not crowd round foreigners in the streets or in front of shops.

That shopkeepers shall not charge an excessive price to foreigners for goods sold.

That when any accident or mishap happens to a foreigner at the railway station, in the train, on the ship, or in the street, advice shall be given to him that the matter be immediately notified to the police or officials.

That another dog shall not be set on, or sticks or stones thrown at, dogs accompanying foreigners.

That courtesy and cordiality be observed in the treatment of foreigners, especially at any governmental office a seat shall be given to him.

That due recognition must be given to the fact that it is the custom with foreigners that a gentleman does not take off his hat in an office, a lady does not take off her bonnet even when giving greeting to others, and a married couple walk hand in hand.

That as foreigners are very anxious about the avoidance of cruelty to animals, care shall be taken to treat animals kindly.

That no comments and ridicule or mean words shall be given in regard to the dress, hearing, and words of foreigners.

That in the street, park, or at any places such words as keto (hairy man), akahige (red whiskers), and ijin (stranger) shall not be uttered.

That when entering the premises or rooms of a foreigner permission shall be obtained beforehand from the porter or servant.

That when sitting on the same seat with a foreign lady in the train, tram-car, or waiting-room, trunks shall be put down so that any part of the seat shall not be left unoccupied.

That staring shall not be made at foreigners except when necessary.

That care shall be taken not to put on dirty shoes when entering any foreign house.

That it shall be borne in mind that the foreign missionary, like the Japanese Shinto and Buddhist priest, deserves respect.

That impediment shall not be given to the foreigners at play or on bicycle by throwing fragments of tile, stone or stick, or by arraying many children in the street.

That no disrespect shall be displayed toward foreign religions or words to the same effect shall not be written on the sign boards of shows.

That it shall be borne in mind that foreigners are disgusted with the habit of spitting anywhere and of scattering about the skin of fruits and cigarette ends in the train or on ship.

That the finger shall not be pointed at the foreigner.

That tobacco shall not be smoked in the presence of the foreign lady or in any place where decency demands the avoidance of smoking.

That when a foreign lady enters a room the gentleman shall take his seat after the lady has been seated.

That those who are learning foreign languages shall not try unnecessary talk with foreigners for the mere purpose of practicing their tongues.

That punctuality shall be observed when discharging any engagement.

That the talk with the foreigner shall be limited to necessary matters and shall be done in as little time as possible.

That when visiting a foreigner such a time as is most convenient to him shall be chosen.

That the word oi (say!! you there) shall not be used when calling a foreigner.

That the age of a foreigner shall not be asked unless some special necessity demands it.

That when clearing the teeth or the nostrils in the presence of a foreigner handkerchief shall be used.

That whether within or outside the room, legs and thighs shall not be exposed in the presence of a foreigner, and at the same time care shall be taken not to look at the nude body of a foreigner when he takes a bath or changes his dress.

That the sprinkling of water on the street shall be practiced to such a degree as to obviate the rise of sand and dust.

That when meeting with a funeral procession, due respect shall be paid to it and any despising words shall not be uttered.

That the notion shall be destroyed that a foreigner pays as much as demanded.

That at the shop where products peculiar to the district are sold a price list in some European language shall be prepared.

That at such places where foreigners swarm and pleasure resorts a notice in some European language telling of the neighboring places noted for views or historic interest shall be posted.

That when accosted by a foreigner silence shall be avoided, even if the accosted man can not understand the language spoken, and such an answer as he thinks is proper shall be given in Japanese.

That in the street man, carriages, and horses shall take their own course.

That the collars, cuffs, gloves, and shoes shall be kept clean.

That when walking with a foreigner the pace shall be kept with him.

That it shall be understood that when a foreigner looks at his watch he suggests that he has some urgent engagement.

AS REGARDS THE CHINESE IN PARTICULAR.

That no ridiculous words shall be uttered on looking at the dress of the Chinese.

That any picture presenting some humiliating attitude of Chinese soldiers in the Chino-Japanese war shall not be sold.

That no ridiculous words shall be given to the homage paid by the Chinese to the temple or grave.

That the hair of the Chinese shall not be touched.

That no such words as chan-chan, nan-kin, and "pig" shall be uttered to the Chinese.

That as the rikisha-man, coachman, and coolie are apt to despise the Chinese, care shall be taken in the matter.

The defeat of William P. Hepburn of Iowa, one of the veteran debaters of the House of Representatives, deprives that body of the most conspicuous opponent that Mr. Cannon has ever had, and so reduces materially the chances of dislodging the present Speaker. Should the Democrats "get together" and agree upon a Republican they can elect him Speaker, voting in conjunction with the Republicans who have smarted under the Cannon rule. In the light of recent events in Congress, it can safely be predicted that the Democrats will not do this, and another term of Speaker Cannon is practically assured.

SARDOU'S SUCCESSFUL STRUGGLE.

By Jerome A. Hart.

Copyright 1908.

It would be impossible in the limits of a newspaper article to give an adequate sketch of Victorien Sardou. He was seventy-seven when he died, and his career as a dramatist extended over fifty-eight years. Nor would it be possible to discuss his plays, for they number over three score. Even a complete list of them—which is here given—fills much space:

- "Les Amis Imaginaires" (never played) (1848).
- "La Reine Ulfra" (never played).
- "Bernard Palissy" (never played).
- "Fleur de Liane" (never played).
- "La Taverne des Etudiants" (hissed from the stage) (1854).
- "Candide" (never played).
- "Avant la Gloire" (never played).
- "Le Bossu" (Sardou's drama never played) (Feval's played 1862).
- "Les Premières Armes de Figaro" (1859).
- "Paris à l'Envers" (never played).
- "Les Gens Nerveux" (1859).
- "Monsieur Garat" (1860).
- "Les Pattes de Mouche" (1860).
- "Les Femmes Fortes" (1860).
- "L'Ecureuil" (1861).
- "L'Homme aux Pigeons" (1861).
- "Nos Intimes" (1861).
- "Onze Jours de Siège" (1861).
- "La Papillonne" (1862).
- "La Perle Noire" (1862).
- "Les Prés St.-Gervais" (comedy) (1862).
- "Les Ganaches" (1862).
- "Bataille d'Amour" (1863).
- "Les Diables Noirs" (1863).
- "Le Dégel" (1863).
- "Don Quichotte" (1864).
- "Les Pommes du Voisin" (1864).
- "Le Capitaine Henriot" (1864).
- "Les Vieux Garçons" (1865).
- "La Famille Benoiton" (1865).
- "Nos Bons Villageois" (1866).
- "Maison Neuve" (1866).
- "Séraphine" (1868).
- "Patrie" (1869).
- "Fernande" (1870).
- "Le Roi Carotte" (1872).
- "Rabagas" (1872).
- "Les Vieilles Filles" (1872).
- "Les Merveilleuses" (1873).
- "Andréa" (1873).
- "L'Oncle Sam" (1873).
- "Le Magot" (1874).
- "Les Prés St.-Gervais" (opera-bouffe) (1874).
- "La Haine" (1874).
- "Ferréol" (1875).
- "Piccolino" (1876) (comic opera).
- "L'Hôtel Godolot" (1876).
- "Dora" (1877) (in English version called "Diplomacy").
- "Les Exilés" (1877).
- "Les Bourgeois de Pontarcy" (1878).
- "Daniel Rochat" (1880).
- "Divorçons" (1880).
- "Odette" (1881).
- "Fédora" (1882).
- "Théodora" (1884).
- "Georgette" (1885).
- "Le Crocodile" (1886).
- "La Tosca" (1887).
- "Marquise" (1889).
- "Belle-Maman" (1889).
- "Cléopâtre" (1890).
- "Thermidor" (1891).
- "Les Américaines à l'étranger" (1892).
- "Mme. Sans-Gêne" (1893).
- "Gismonda" (1894).
- "Marcelle" (1895).
- "Spiritisme" (1897).
- "Paméla" (1898).
- "Robespierre" (1899).
- "La Tosca" (opera) (1900).
- "La Fille de Taharin" (1901).
- "Les Barbares" (1901).
- "Dante" (1903).
- "La Sorcière" (1903).
- "Fiorella" (1905).
- "La Piste" (1906).
- "L'Espionne" (1906) (formerly entitled "Dora").
- "L'Affaire des Poisons" (1907).

The last time I was in Paris plays by Sardou were running at four of the leading theatres. At the same time he had two new pieces under way, and last year he staged and rehearsed "L'Affaire des Poisons" himself, although then seventy-six years old.

It would be interesting to discuss Sardou's early failures; his years of fruitless pursuit of managers; the useful rôle that actresses played in furthering his fortunes; his first and second marriages; his quarrels, his polemics, his brilliant successes; his methods of constructing plays—but there is not room. Here there is only space to touch briefly on his humble beginnings and his latter-day luxury.

Victorien Sardou was born at Paris in September, 1831. When he came into the world his father had an educational institution, which prospered up to the Battle Year 1848, when he was forced to close his doors. The elder Sardou fled to Nice, where he began life over again, struggling valiantly to pay his debts.

Victorien remained alone in the great city; he was a medical student, utterly without means, deprived even of the bed and board which he had always found in the paternal home. He installed himself in a garret on the Quay Napoléon. When he died he still had in his study a painting of which he said: "This picture represents the old bridge of Notre Dame with the tall and narrow houses clinging to its sides. It was contemporaneous with Louis XVI. When I was living on the Quay Napoléon these buildings had nearly all disappeared, but vestiges of them were visible from my garret windows. Every morning I descended to the street and purchased some boiled potatoes from the peripatetic vendor on the corner, and while devouring them I joined the anglers who were casting their lines along the Quay. One I remember well, a red-haired fellow who had played a leading rôle in the massacres of the Reign of Terror. His stories sometimes made me think of incorporating them in a play for the stage. It was at this time that I abandoned medicine and acquired a taste for playwriting."

Sardou set to work at this task. He composed melodramas, comedies, tragedies. Two pieces flowed from his pen in these his salad days—"Les Amis Imaginaires," a two-act piece in the style of Picard, and "Queen Ulfra," a drama in which the princes spoke in alexandrines and the people in octosyllabic verse. Sardou never doubted the final success of this production, but he had to pay his rent and he had to buy clothes, were it only to be sufficiently well clad to call on the managers when those gentlemen deigned to send for him. In order to meet these wants he accepted everything that presented itself in the way of employment. He was a copyist, a book-seller's clerk, and a professor of languages. He taught what he knew and even what he has since forgotten. When he succeeded in getting the educational charge of a young Turkish gentleman—three lessons a week at five francs a lesson—he thought that fortune had knocked at his door.

While living in this garret Sardou was stricken down with a dangerous illness, through which he was nursed by a young actress, Mlle. de Brécourt, who occupied a neighboring attic. When he recovered he married her.

Thus in 1857 Sardou was starving in a garret. Yet only three years later "Les Pattes de Mouche" made him famous. In another year "Nos Intimes" began his fortune. A couple of years later "La Famille Benoiton" made him rich. Out of these plays in the early sixties he made the money with which he acquired his beautiful domain at Marly-le-Roy.

The place where his villa at Marly stands was once the site of a feudal castle occupied by the cadets of Montmorency. Louis XIV bought the property, pulled down the fortress, filled up the moats, and built a handsome house there for the governor of Marly. This house, somewhat remodeled, is now the villa of the Sardou family. When his first success as a playwright came, Sardou was once spending the summer season at Louveciennes, near Marly, and had occasion to go to the little town daily to do his marketing. One day, while jogging along the country road on the back of a donkey, wrapped in deep thought over the plot of a new play, his beast of burden suddenly stopped at the gateway of the ruined country house. Aroused from his reverie, Sardou looked up, and was so charmed by the venerable ruin that he yearned to possess it. He asked a passing peasant what it was called and was told "The Chateau de Marly." He later learned that it was for sale, and that the price was 110,000 francs. Through his notary, Sardou offered 105,000 francs, one-half cash, the remainder in a year. Note the terms. At that time his entire fortune did not exceed 50,000 francs. But the play which he was composing when the donkey interrupted him brought him the other 50,000, and when the year was over Sardou owned his villa in fee simple.

It must not be supposed, however, that the wise donkey thus paid all that the property was to cost him. Like most country places, the purchase price of Marly was the least item in its cost. Sardou put more than one fortune into improving and beautifying his property. It is one of the sights of the neighborhood, which, by the way, is not destitute of beautiful villas. Some years later, Alexander Dumas fils also occupied a handsome country place near that of Sardou. This, by the way, Dumas did not purchase—it was bequeathed to him by an admirer.

The Villa of Marly is approached by a fine avenue lined by sphynxes in rose granite. These are the same gorgeous sphynxes that excited so much admiration at the Paris Exposition of 1867. The avenue leads up from a magnificent grilled gateway. The country houses of France are famous for their beautiful grill work, much of which is in the elaborate wrought-iron fittings fashioned by the artificers of the middle ages or in modern replicas. Sardou's gateway is chaste and beautiful. The house to which the avenue leads is a vast mansion in the Louis XIV style, the central part one story in height and the wings or pavilions two stories high. It is situated in the centre of grounds which combine gardens, groves, and young forests. The treatment is a combination of the artificial style of French landscape gardening and the more unconventional parks of English country places.

The interior of the villa is filled with beautiful and unique objects. Even the antechambers and vestibules are crowded with curiosities. Among them you see a sleigh of the time of Louis XV, ancient sedan-chairs, arquebuses, matchlocks, and all sorts of mediæval weapons. The clock which stood in Louis XVI's room, an ivory statue of Voltaire, which came from his home in Ferney, and many other bibelots. The main drawing-room is furnished in eighteenth century style, and is hung with rare tapestries from Beauvais; pictures and drawings of great value are on the walls; these are not only of artistic, but of antiquarian value, for Sardou purchased all manner of "documents" to aid him in his study of the epoch when he was writing those plays based on the French revolutionary time. He accumulated a vast store of wood, steel, and copper engravings, lithographs, and colored xylographic prints illustrative of the epoch. Many of these hang upon the walls of the living-rooms, but most of them are in the library. There also are found many priceless manuscripts. One of these is the famous report on Danton of Camille Desmoulins, with annotations in Robespierre's handwriting.

The library at Marly consists of twelve rooms, in which there are over 20,000 volumes. This does not by any means represent all of the books Sardou possessed, for he had a working library in Paris, while at Nice he had still more books—an entire library concerning the eighteenth century, with a vast store of accompanying pictures, prints, and manuscripts. He had, by the way, two estates near Nice—"Guardamido," a picturesque farm-house; another is a more pretentious country-place, a villa on a rock overlooking the Mediterranean, which he dubbed, "Villa Théodora." It is but a few miles from Le Cannet, a small village near Cannes; from this village came the family of Sardou.

Sardou's early life was a long, hard climb. The young playwright, half a century ago, starving and sickening in a garret, nearly paid the debt of nature then. But he lived, thanks to a woman's devotion. The obscure rhymester lived to be full of years and honors; the starveling in a garret lived to be master of many houses and lands. And he died mourned by a great nation, and followed to his grave at Marly by his brother academicians, and attended by the military escort, the reversed arms, and the muffled drums which honor all dead Frenchmen who in life wore the cross of the Legion of Honor.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Nicholas Longworth was reelected to Congress, though the Democrats elected their candidate in one of the Cincinnati districts.

Vice-President-elect Sherman has filed a statement showing that his expenses in the campaign just closed amounted to $2800.

Governor Cummins of Iowa defeated Lacey, his competitor, in the popular vote for the United States senatorship in Iowa by nearly 25,000.

Judson Harmon, chosen governor of Ohio by a plurality of 25,000, was the only Democrat on the State ticket who was successful. The big vote for Taft in the cities carried through all the other Republican candidates.

Charles F. Murphy, leader of Tammany Hall, is blamed for the falling off of the Democratic vote in New York and may be deposed. It is declared that should his leadership continue a Republican mayor for the city next year is assured.

The next Congress will contain at least two new Democratic senators who will succeed Republicans—Charles J. Hughes, a Denver lawyer, from Colorado; John W. Kern of Indiana, who has previously suffered numerous defeats for high place.

Representative W. P. Hepburn of Iowa, who has been in Congress almost since the Republican party was founded, was defeated in the late election. Mr. Hepburn for several sessions has been chairman of the committee on interstate and foreign commerce.

Ex-Congressman James T. McCleary of Minnesota, who resigned the position of second assistant postmaster-general to engage in a campaign to reclaim his old seat as representative in Congress, was unsuccessful, his Democratic opponent, W. S. Hammond, being reelected.

The most remarkable upset in the congressional situation since reconstruction days has occurred in North Carolina, where in a State whose Democratic majority musters approximately 40,000, three out of the ten members of Congress sent to Washington will be Republicans.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberals were fully sustained at the recent elections in Canada. British Columbia, however, which was formerly represented by seven Liberals, showed its disapproval of the government's Oriental immigration policy by electing four Opposition candidates.

Joseph L. Bristow, the Kansas editor who was fourth assistant postmaster-general in the late 'nineties, and who was in charge of the investigation of the Cuban postal frauds and the reorganization of the Cuban postal service before he retired from national prominence six years ago, will be the next United States senator from the Sunflower State.

At the beginning of the campaign Thomas R. Marshall, governor-elect of Indiana, made the statement that he would accept no contributions in financing his political contest. In spite of this, letters containing money were frequently received, the total being about $3000. Mr. Marshall has accepted none of this money, but has returned the contributions.

W. J. Bryan, defeated in three campaigns for the presidency, may not be senator from Nebraska either, points out the Springfield Republican. The Nebraska legislature became Republican after his second defeat eight years ago; he could not be chosen senator then. Now that the legislature has unexpectedly become Democratic, no senatorial vacancy will occur until two years hence, when a new legislature will be in control.

No one has the temerity to question the prediction that Mr. Roosevelt will enter the fight for the seat of Senator Depew, when that statesman's term ends in 1911, says a Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger. By that time Mr. Roosevelt will have gratified his desire to retire temporarily from public life and rest. After his hunt he will have a prestige as great as when he returned from the Spanish-American war as colonel of the Rough Riders. There was no question of his success in the race for Governor of New York then, and there would be little question of his success in the struggle for Senator Depew's seat.

A BLAZING INDISCRETION.

The German Emperor Tries to Conciliate England and Throws Oil Upon the Flames.

Those who have credited the German emperor with a Machiavellian statecraft that marches irresistibly toward its end must revise their estimates in the light of his latest escapade. We do not know what was the emperor's aim, but it is evident enough that it has failed. If his object was to antagonize France and England, he has tightened the bonds that he meant to loosen. If he wished to mitigate English animosity, he has but intensified a hatred that was already dangerous. If he intended to modify the rancor of his own people, he has but included himself within its scope. He may have meant well, but the most charitable can hardly acquit him of a blundering clumsiness.

The publication of the emperor's protest against English malevolence appeared in the Daily Telegraph. It was the work of a "representative Englishman," evidently of strong pro-German tendencies and of an equally well-marked stupidity. It professed to be the substance of certain conversations with the emperor wherein "his majesty spoke with impulsive and unusual frankness." Before publication, it was submitted to the emperor, who gave it his approval after sending it to the Foreign Office for examination, but that it was not seen by the chancellor himself is evidenced by Von Bülow's spirited disclaimer. Its appearance in England had therefore a peculiar weight, inasmuch as practically it came from the emperor himself.

Is it surprising that such a document should create a storm of resentment or that its tone of alternate abuse and patronage should touch the quick? The emperor first admits that the prevailing tone in Germany is hostile to England—a fact that he has repeatedly denied by implication—and then he proceeds to show that his own attitude has been one of offensive and meddling benevolence. When the Boer envoys were on their triumphal progress through Europe they were received everywhere as heroes, crowned with flowers, and fêted as national preservers, except in Germany, where the official face was set sternly against them and where they were denied both countenance and hospitality. "Was that," the emperor asks, "the action of a secret enemy?"

Then he goes on to divulge international secrets, and we must suppose either that he wishes to sow animosity between France and England or that he is wholly careless of results. Speaking of the Boer War, he says:

Again, when the struggle was at its height, the German government was invited by France and Russia to join them in calling upon England to end the war. The moment had come, they said, not only to save the Boer republics, but also to humiliate England to the dust. What was my reply? I said so far from Germany joining in any concerted European action to bring pressure against England and bring about her downfall, Germany would always keep aloof from politics that could bring her into complications with a sea power like England.

The incident may be true; probably it is true, but it is not wise to remind an enemy that he once existed upon sufferance or that he was saved from humiliation by magnanimity. Such things rankle and are better left unsaid.

But there is worse to come. England, it seems, owes a debt of gratitude to the emperor not only for his inaction, but for his action and for a military interposition at a time of crisis. He says:

During your black week in December, 1899, when disasters followed one another in rapid succession, I received a letter from Queen Victoria, my revered grandmother, written in sorrow and affliction and bearing manifest traces of the anxieties which were preying upon her mind and health. I at once returned a sympathetic reply. I did more. I bade one of my officers to procure as exact an account as he could obtain of the number of combatants on both sides and the actual positions of the opposing forces.

With the figures before me I worked out what I considered the best plan of campaign in the circumstances and submitted it to my general staff for criticism. Then I dispatched it to England. That document likewise is among the state papers at Windsor awaiting the serenely impartial verdict of history.

Now this again may be true. Who can say what communications were received by "my revered grandmother"? but it is unquestionably true that if such a letter actually reached Windsor it remained there, and that the English military authorities and Lord Roberts never had an opportunity to profit by the concentrated strategic wisdom of a man who has never yet heard a shot fired in anger or witnessed a military manoeuvre that was not of the decorative and ornamental variety. It was usually supposed that Queen Victoria had her own opinions about the impertinences of her grandson, and although the grandson can hardly be expected to appreciate the scruples of the grandmother, it is hardly likely that the queen would have insulted her own generals by showing them the unsolicited military advice from the carpet knight, who had lately aroused English passion by his message to President Kruger. And yet the emperor asks England to be grateful to him for a wounding intrusion into her own affairs, and he adds a further irritation by a comment that sounds like a sneer when he says that by a "curious coincidence" the plan which he had formulated ran very much on the same lines as that actually adopted by General Roberts and carried by him into successful operation. In other words, Lord Roberts, who was on the spot and who has been fighting more or less continuously for some forty years, owed his ultimate success to advice from a man thousands of miles away, who knew nothing of the country nor of its people, and whose acquaintance with war was wholly theoretical.

The net results of this amazing piece of folly are not yet fully evident, but some of the effects are visible enough. The English who were to be conciliated are foaming at the mouth; France and Russia are irritated by ill-timed and irrelevant disclosures of past animosities; the German people are furious at the emperor's attempt to placate a nation that they hate; and Japan is interested—to use a mild word—at the emperor's explanation of German naval increase on the ground that the ships are intended to solve the problem of "the future of the Pacific."

Prince von Bülow's part will be a difficult one. He ought to have seen this amazing manifesto, and therefore, from the public point of view, he did see it. It was sent to the Foreign Office, and through some misunderstanding it received the Foreign Office imprimatur without being brought to the attention of the chancellor. It would seem as though some malign fate had removed every obstacle to its publication, and whatever misunderstandings may exist between the English and the German peoples, they can at least unite in derision and in reprobation of one of the most fatuous and maladroitness documents ever given to a contentious and quarrelsome world. PICCADILLY.

OLD FAVORITES.

Jeannette and Jeannot.

You are going far away,
Far away from poor Jeannette.
There is no one left to love me now,
And you too may forget;
But my heart will be with you,
Wherever you may go.
Can you look me in the face
And say the same, Jeannot?
When you wear the jacket red,
And the beautiful cockade,
Oh! I fear you will forget
All the promises you've made:
With your gun upon your shoulder,
And your bayonet by your side,
You'll be taking some proud lady,
And he making her your bride:
You'll be taking some proud lady
And he making her your bride.

Or when glory leads the way,
You'll be madly rushing on,
Never thinking if they kill you that
My happiness is gone;
If you win the day, perhaps,
A general you'll be.
Tho' I'm proud to think of that,
What will become of me?
Oh! if I were Queen of France,
Or still better, Pope of Rome,
I would have no fighting men abroad,
No weeping maids at home,
All the world should be at peace,
Or if kings must show their might,
Why let them who make the quarrels
Be the only men to fight;
Yes, let them who make the quarrels
Be the only men to fight.—Charles Jefferies.

Jubal and Tubal Cain

Jubal sang of the wrath of God
And the curse of thistle and thorn—
But Tubal got him a pointed rod
And scrambled the earth for corn,
Old—old as that earthly mold,
Young as the sprouting grain—
Yearly green is the strife between Jubal and Tubal Cain.

Jubal sang of the new-found sea,
And the souls its waves divide—
But Tubal hollowed a fallen tree
And passed to the farther side.
Black—black as the hurricane wrack,
Salt as the under-main—
Bitter and cold is that hate they hold—
Jubal and Tubal Cain!

Jubal sang of the golden years
When wars and wounds shall cease—
But Tubal fashioned the hand-lung spears
And showed his neighbors peace.
New—new as the Nine Point Two,
Older than Lamech's slain—
Roaring and loud is the feud avowed
Twix' Jubal and Tubal Cain.

Jubal sang of the cliffs that bar
And the peaks that none may crown—
But Tubal clambered by jut and scar,
And there he builded a town,
High—high as the Passes lie,
Low as the culverts drain—
Wherever they he they can never agree—
Jubal and Tubal Cain! —Rudyard Kipling.

In Parting With Friends.

If thou dost bid thy friend farewell,
But for one night though that farewell may be,
Press thou his hand in thine,
How canst thou tell how far from thee
Fate or caprice may lead his steps ere that tomorrow comes?
Men have been known to lightly turn the corner of a street,
And days have grown to months, and months to lagging years
Ere they have looked in loving eyes again.
Parting at best is underlaid with tears and pain;
Therefore, lest sudden death should come between,
Or time, or distance, clasp with pressure firm
The hand of him who goeth forth.
Unseen, Fate goeth, too,
Yea, find thou always time to say some earnest word
Between the idle talk,
Lest with thee, henceforth, night and day,
Regret should walk. —Coventry Patmore.

Sir H. H. Cozens-Hardy, master of the rolls in England, recently said that in his belief classical teaching did more to cultivate true gentlemanly manners and to improve the whole condition of the man than any other branch of study.

The French have nearly completed a telephone system which covers their great possessions in Africa.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Prince Joachim Murat recently fought a duel near Paris with pistols with M. Lacaze. Two shots were exchanged without injury.

Premier Asquith has surrendered to the British barmaid and his new licensing bill will contain no paragraph eliminating her from the liquor traffic of the empire.

Count Johann Heinrich von Bernstorff has been selected by the emperor to succeed the late Baron Speck von Sternburg as German ambassador to the United States. Count von Bernstorff recently represented the German government in Egypt. Countess von Bernstorff is a daughter of Edward Luckemeyer of New York.

Major-General Edward Ritter von Schweitzer, a Jew, has received the appointment of field marshal, the highest military rank in the Austro-Hungarian empire. Anti-Semites express themselves bitterly, while the more liberal-minded are loud in their praises of Emperor Francis Joseph for this latest manifestation of his freedom from religious bias.

J. Pierpont Morgan and Waldorf Astor are on the advisory committee of the Golden West, an American industries exhibition which is to be held in Earlscourt, London, next May, for which extensive preparations have already been made. Associated with them on the committee are about every one of note in Burke's Peerage and other distinguished gentlemen, not forgetting Alfred Austin.

William, Crown Prince of Germany and Prussia, has invented and patented a new style of cuff links. They have been registered in the imperial patent office. The invention is described as double cuff links with two looped buttons. Enterprising manufacturers are endeavoring to purchase the patent rights, anticipating a great sale among the dandies of all countries. The Kaiser recently invented a new brake for automobiles.

Misses Ethel A. and Florence M. Colford, twin sisters, who are lawyers at the national capital, were recently admitted to practice before the United States Supreme Court. The young ladies are both able and attractive, and they resemble each other so closely that only their friends can distinguish them apart. They are natives of Nova Scotia, but have lived most of their lives—they are now in the early twenties—in Washington.

Lady Auckland, wife of the fifth baron of England, and one of the leaders of English society, is visiting in America. Lady Auckland says she disagrees entirely with recent expressions credited to Mrs. Cornwallis West, to the effect that American society women in England behave freakishly. Her visit to this country is primarily to investigate technical schools, as she intends to send her second son, Frederick George Eden, to this country to take a course in electrical engineering.

The Sultan's youngest son is Prince Mehmed Abid Effendi. He is three years old, having been born in Constantinople in 1905. As the succession now stands he is nineteenth in order from the throne. He is the Sultan's thirteenth surviving child. The legal heir is the Sultan's brother, Mohammed Bechad Effendi, who was born in 1844. He expects to rule as Mehmed V. Next after him comes the Sultan's first cousin, Yousouf Izze-din Effendi. The succession seldom or never passes from father to son; it tends to hark backward. Tracing the line is a complicated operation. The Sultan's eldest son is only seventh in line of inheritance.

It seems to most theatre-goers to be but a few years since Mary Anderson, now Mme. de Navarro, in all her fresh youth and beauty, was one of the most prominent figures on the stage. But recently she celebrated her fiftieth birthday. She is now living on a pretty farm in Worcestershire, England. Before leaving the stage she had wearied of it, and no inducements have since availed to cause her to return to it. She has had many flattering offers from managers of public entertainments, but all have been rejected. Even so late as four years ago she declined an offer of $200,000 to come to the United States and give a course of readings from the poets. For a time she was disposed to accept this proposition and to devote her earnings from the readings to charity, but her profound dislike for renewed publicity made her refuse it.

The retirement of Sir Frank Lascelles from the English embassy at Berlin marks the close of a distinguished career. The retiring ambassador was, perhaps, more often placed in positions of considerable difficulty than fell to the lot of his contemporaries in the service. He entered the diplomatic service forty-seven years ago. He was first attached to what was then the legation at Madrid. In 1864 he was transferred to Paris, and was promoted to the rank of a secretary in the following year. After diplomatic service in Denmark, Italy, the United States, and Greece, he acted as consul-general in Egypt at different periods in 1878 and 1879, and towards the end of the latter year filled the same office in Bulgaria. In 1886 he was made a minister plenipotentiary, and in that capacity was accredited first to the King of Roumania, and subsequently, in 1891, to the court of Persia. Three years afterwards he became ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at the court of St. Petersburg. In 1899 he was appointed to the corresponding office at Berlin in succession to Sir Edward Malet, and during the last eventful thirteen years he has represented England at the court of the Kaiser.

A DEAD DUELIST'S GOODS AND GEAR.

By Jerome A. Hart.

XL.

"Then you think, colonel, that it would be just as effective for me to go up to our mines as for you to go?"

It was Eugene Yarrow who was speaking, and he was seated in the law office of Colonel Brewer.

"More effective, my dear boy," replied Brewer. "The miners up there look with much suspicion on the arrival of any lawyer from 'down at the Bay,' as they say. I could do no more than you, and you can do much more than I."

"Then nothing in the legal line can be done, I suppose?" queried Yarrow, somewhat impatiently.

"Nothing—or next to nothing. Law up there is a vague and fleeting thing. Usually it is in the next mining camp—until you get there."

"Then what do you think is best for us to do, colonel?"

"Simply to hold down your claims by actual possession. Hire gun-fighters to hold them for you until your plant is ready."

"But suppose our hired gun-fighters should claim our claims?"

Brewer laughed sardonically. "In that case," said he, "I suppose you'd have to hire another gang to fight the first fighters. Last jumper, best title."

"Let me see, colonel," remarked Yarrow musingly, "were you not on the Squatters' side in that Sacrosanto trouble, some years ago?"

"Oh, yes," replied Brewer, blandly. "But that was pure politics, you know. For a time it looked like squatter sovereignty, and I thought I might get to the senate on the squatter wave. But the riots squelched them, and I dropped squatter sovereignty as a political asset."

Yarrow stared at him with such frank surprise that Brewer added, a little uncomfortably: "You need not worry about me—that was three years ago, and three years is a long time in title litigation. Most of the money now is on the side of those in possession, and you may imagine where all the lawyers are." Looking at his watch, he added: "By the way, Holton and Hamlin have an appointment with me here in five minutes. But don't go, Eugene—they merely have some papers to sign."

"Holton and Hamlin—a Burke man and a Tower man—rather a queer combination."

"Yes—but Holton is administrator of Burke's estate, and I am the attorney. Hamlin has some government business with Holton, owing to Federal property abutting on that of the estate."

"I hear that Burke's estate was smaller than everybody expected."

"It amounted to nearly four hundred thousand dollars, principally in city lots. It was in very bad shape; all the land was mortgaged, and there were many other debts, secured and unsecured. He left no family and he left no will."

"How, then, does it happen that Holton is administrator?"

"He was a large creditor, and applied for letters of administration. The public administrator also applied, and is fighting Holton yet."

"No will and no heirs—to whom will the residue go?"

"Don't know—there may be no residue when the lawyers are through. Already a will has been discovered in New York, two aunts in Washington, a nephew in Boston, and several assorted relatives in Australia. But here comes Holton," Brewer interrupted himself to say, "and right behind him is Dr. Hamlin. Walk in, gentlemen—you both of you know Mr. Yarrow. As it's merely a question of signing papers, probably you won't ask him to vacate."

The new arrivals, if agreed in nothing else, were a unit in distrusting the foreign claimants to Burke's estate. Both believed that "his money ought to stay where he made it."

"At least," Holton added parenthetically, "what little here will be left of it."

"Is it true, general, that the Burke estate is so much diminished?" asked Hamlin. "He was reputed to be very wealthy."

"He was, but he left many debts," said Holton.

"Why, what kind of debts did he contract?" asked Hamlin in surprise. "He was a man of abstemious habits, had little to do with women, and did not drink or gamble."

"Politics," said Brewer, laconically.

"That's it," added Holton. "His senatorial fight cost him a hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, cold coin. When it was over he owed money to nearly every friend he had. He owed me money."

"Then there was the Vigilante business," suggested Brewer.

"Yes," went on Holton, "Burke paid out over fifty thousand dollars during the Vigilante trouble subsidizing newspapers, hiring fire companies, and supporting his destitute henchmen, who were in hiding or in banishment."

"I remember," said Hamlin. "One of the stinging things in the unfortunate controversy between Burke and Tower was that Burke claimed he had paid newspapers to defend Tower when the Vigilantes were seeking his life."

"It was an unfortunate controversy," admitted Holton. "But Tower began it."

"I don't see how," returned Hamlin. "The first offensive language was used by Burke at the hotel table."

"Not at all," replied Holton. "Tower was the first to give offense. In his Sacrosanto speech he accused Burke's party of 'sailing under false colors,' and the party, he said, belonged 'heart and soul to Burke, and yet were ashamed to acknowledge their master.'"

"But these words do not attack Burke personally," returned Hamlin. "They attack his party. Besides, he did not ask for their retraction."

"All the same, Tower's friends gave a very strained interpretation to Burke's words to twist them into an imputation on Tower's judicial integrity," remarked Holton.

"Yet Tower in his letter gave Burke the opportunity to repudiate any offensive meaning, and Burke declined to accept it," said Hamlin. "Nor did Burke ask Tower to withdraw or explain any offensive remarks in his speech. Tower undoubtedly would have done so had Burke withdrawn his offensive remarks made at the hotel table."

"I never heard of any such offer from Tower to withdraw or explain his language," retorted Holton.

"He assured me personally that he would, if asked," returned Hamlin, earnestly. "Of course he could not volunteer to do so. He told me that if Burke would say he intended his remarks to apply to Tower officially only, the challenge would be withdrawn, as it was immaterial to Tower what Burke thought of him as a private citizen. I have been told that Burke was inclined to accept this explanation, but was persuaded by friends to fight, they assuring him he would certainly kill Tower."

"Other friends may have so assured him, but not his seconds," remarked Holton.

"I have heard it said that Judge Fox was one of the friends who urged Burke to fight on that ground," interrupted Brewer, with a significant look.

"Fox and other injudicious friends practically killed Burke," remarked Hamlin. "Up to the morning of the encounter, Tower had determined not to fire at a vital point. He said he had no mortal quarrel with Burke. But that morning on the field he told me that he had heard so much boasting from the friends of Burke, in and out of the newspapers, concerning their man's deadly intentions, that he changed his mind. He told me he believed Burke intended to kill him, and that he himself had determined to shoot to kill."

"From his careful aim and deliberate fire," responded Holton, "it was very evident that Tower shot to kill."

"His shooting seemed deliberate because Burke's was hasty," retorted Hamlin.

"Burke shot quickly because his trigger was quick," exclaimed Holton.

Brewer was growing uneasy as the two disputants grew warmer, and he hailed with inward joy a messenger from the custom house urging the immediate presence of Collector Hamlin on important business. When the two parted with distant salutations, Brewer tactfully detained Holton until the other should at least have got down stairs.

"A close call, that!" he cried when they were gone. "Why will men quarrel over these dead issues? It looked for some moments as if there might be another duel over the old one. What's the use of wrangling about such things—eh, Eugene?"

"Yes—particularly as there is no way of settling them. The opponents differ so widely. Take the key of the whole controversy, for example—many of Burke's friends maintain that Tower had no just ground for challenging him."

Brewer stared at him. "Of course they do. So do I. Don't you?"

"No—I think Burke reflected on Tower's honor and honesty by his remarks at a public table."

"But how about Tower's public speech?"

"That's another matter, colonel. That's politics."

"And I suppose the way the Tower men rushed the preliminaries was another matter—eh, Yarrow? All through the negotiations Tower's seconds went at breakneck speed. They seemed bent on harrying and harassing Burke."

"Haste, colonel, is usual in affairs of honor. In this case it was very necessary, as both principals were hiding from arrest and were in danger of being bound over to keep the peace."

"Don't you think the Tower men were trying to aggravate the extraordinary strain Burke had undergone during the campaign?" asked Brewer. "It had so much impaired his health that physically he was unfit for the duel."

"But what had Tower to do with Burke's physical condition?"

"He might at least have urged his seconds to be less bullying. The conduct of the Tower party on the field was fierce and aggressive throughout."

"Well, it was courteous, if determined. What did you expect? A duel is not a pink tea."

"I did at least expect good manners, Mr. Yarrow. When McCarren examined Tower he did it in a courteous and deferential way, while Colquhoun went through Burke as if he were searching him for stolen goods."

"Don't forget that Burke once saved his life in a duel by carrying something in his waistcoat pocket," said Yarrow heatedly.

"Nothing could have saved his life that morning," retorted Brewer, meaningly. "They had it all fixed for him."

"Fixed—how? What do you mean?"

"I mean that Burke's friends believe there was something wrong about the pistols. The armorer Lagarde testified at the inquest that the pistol given to Burke was lighter on the trigger than the other. When he loaded the weapon he asked Burke's seconds why they did not force the other side to accept his pistols. The Burke men say his judgment should have been taken, as he was mutually agreed on as armorer by both parties."

"It is easy to answer that, colonel. Lagarde was not mutually agreed on. The articles of agreement allowed each of the parties to bring an armorer if desired. But his services were not made obligatory. Neither the armorer nor any other outsider would have been permitted by the seconds to interfere."

"None the less, there was something queer about the pistols," persisted Brewer.

"The pistols were borrowed by Colquhoun. Tower never owned them. He never handled them before. Besides their choice was the result of chance."

"But you will not deny that the pistol Burke used is admitted to have been too light on the trigger?"

"Again I maintain that this was a matter of chance," cried Yarrow impatiently. "The choice of the weapons, the choice of each particular pistol—all was chance. How could Tower make all these hazards come his way?"

"It looks very suspicious," persisted Brewer. "How could an expert pistol-shot like Burke send his bullet into the ground a yard away if it wasn't for some trick of the trigger?"

"That was it exactly," retorted Yarrow. "It was the trick of the trigger. Burke's seconds boasted openly of his expertness with a hair-trigger pistol, and declared that he would kill Tower before his opponent got his pistol lifted. But Burke's nerves were out of order, and he pulled the trigger too quick."

The two men paused. They had grown nearly as heated as the two who had just gone out. After a moment of embarrassment both broke into laughter.

"Really, Yarrow, it is absurd that we should quarrel over this," began Brewer. "But I thought you were a Northern man, and agreed with us about this duel, or I should never have begun discussing it. It is a subject I avoid unless with those who agree with me."

"I am a Northern man, colonel. I was well acquainted with Burke, and liked him. I am slightly acquainted with Tower—he is a cold, surly man, and I dislike him. I saw the duel, and my sympathies were on Burke's side. But I am honest enough to say that I do not believe any of the stories current about treachery and trick triggers. I believe the duel was absolutely fair."

"Well, Eugene," said Brewer, pacifically, "most of the Burke men will differ, but all of the Tower men will agree with you. As for the two men, there can be no doubt which is the better off. Burke is now a martyr; he has been canonized. In the campaign professions you see his words painted on political banners: 'They have killed me because I oppose the extension of slavery.' 'I die for a principle.' And so on. In short, politically speaking, Burke dead is more potent than Tower living."

"True—already there is a monument erected to him."

"Yes, and what must Tower think as he sees it? Tower is shunned; he is a marked man; all but his intimates avoid him. His name no longer appears in political conventions; his party fears its bad effect. Politically, Tower spells defeat and disaster."

"Probably Burke is better off," said Yarrow, musingly, "but Tower is alive."

"You are right," agreed Brewer. "And I think his enemies will have reason to find that he is very much alive."

An article in the current number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, by M. Rene Pichon, brings into prominence the fact that the best writers in French literature have belonged to the middle or bourgeois class. Moliere, Boileau, Racine, La Fontaine, Voltaire, De Musset, Sainte-Beuve, all these "were not only bourgeois by birth, but by turn of mind." English literature, however, illustrates this fact quite as emphatically. Shakespeare was the son of a glover, Milton of a scrivener, Samuel Johnson of a bookseller, Richardson of a joiner, Collins of a hatter, Gay of a silk mercer, Pope of a linen-draper, Keats of a livery stable-keeper; Cowley and Moore were sons of butchers. It is noteworthy that the trades have done far more for literature than the professions. Besides those already named, innkeepers, vintners, painters, and glaziers, barbers, weavers, printers, tailors, shoemakers, jewelers, basket-makers, bricklayers, have furnished brilliant recruits to the ranks of authorship. The peasantry, too, can boast of such sons of the soil as Robbie Burns, John Clare, John Leyden, James Hogg, William Carleton, Robert Bloomfield, and many others. The church, law, and medicine make but a poor show by comparison, though they were wont to claim a monopoly of learning.

In Laconia, Greece, where excavations are being carried on vigorously by English archaeologists, the latest finds confirm many assertions by ancient authors concerning the Spartans. It becomes definitely known that Lacedaemonia was formed by the union of five villages; that only priestesses and citizens fallen in battle were buried; that children were birched in public, etc. But the most fortunate discovery is that of the most ancient Doric temple known. It dates from 500 B. C. It is built partly of wood and partly of sun-baked bricks.

THE ARTIST AND THE PUBLIC.

Much has been said, and more has been written, of the absence of "atmosphere" in San Francisco. This remark must never be interpreted as a slighting reference to the climate—it has a profounder significance. It is used, in tones varying from contempt to bitterness, to express despair for the want of comprehension, for the lack of appreciation, that distinguishes us en masse, as well as for the dearth of opportunity to see beautiful things. In most cases the grumbler is an artist, forced back upon himself for inspiration. There is a certain justice in his complaint. The musician has, at least, the constant stimulation of good music; he may hear the masters of his art, the great virtuosos of the piano, the violin, or of that most marvelous of all instruments—the human voice; he may enjoy orchestral music and even occasional opportunities for grand opera.

What has San Francisco to offer the sculptor or painter? The beauty of natural scenery is his, for the asking, on every hand; in the smooth brown hills, incomparably suave and noble, in a coast classic in outline, and seas and skies superbly blue. The variety is as infinite as it is inaccessible. There is no more vital landscape in existence; but, having rendered it to the best of his ability, does the responsibility of the painter end?

It has long been the conviction of the artist that local conditions are hopeless and that the blame, somehow, lies entirely with the public; but the public, as a rule, follows instinctively in the line of least resistance, like a flock of sheep. Musical conditions have shown a constant and steady improvement. Does the artist emulate the musician in presenting his work in a manner calculated to impress this much-abused public with its dignity?

The love for any art, in a community, is a very rare and delicate plant, slow of growth, and needing endless care and encouragement. We may be still, and undoubtedly are, both young and crude, but, at a concert, note the silence and the attention which the performer exacts as a mere matter of course or of courtesy. Here we err only through excess of enthusiasm; we find it difficult to control our tendency to applaud at the wrong moment, and it still remains for us to discover that an accompaniment is an integral part of the song. It is not, however, considered necessary at a concert, even with a high charge for admission, to serve tea and biscuits or claret punch, or to have moving pictures or any other attraction. The newspapers also have discovered that it is advisable for a musical critic to be distantly acquainted with musical terms, and their criticisms have at least a bowing acquaintance with the matter under discussion.

Now for the great sister arts! A sculptor may not finish his own work in stone without joining the labor unions, but illogically he is not permitted to join the labor unions because he is himself an employer of labor. This is true at least of all work intended for the embellishment of buildings; the stone mason must be left to do his best—or his worst.

Has the painter a similar grievance? There have been any number of picture exhibitions during the past month, crowded, on the opening day, to the doors. In these social functions, however, combining music with tea, the pictures have seemed of the least importance and have attracted only the most perfunctory and divided attention. For many years Mr. Vickery has set an example artists might well emulate. The small shows in his gallery, with pictures well chosen, well framed, and well hung—in a quiet light against an unobtrusive background—have needed no other attractions to recommend them to the public. They have acquired an authority and produced an effect more pretentious exhibitions have entirely failed to equal. The reason is not far to seek—too little respect for himself or for his work is exacted by the artist. His profession has lost in seriousness partly through the carelessness and indifference of his own attitude, but even more through the lack of support given to him by the press. With the exception of a few instances, where marked intelligence and discrimination have been displayed, it is only too evident that the reporter, turned art critic, has approached his work either with humorous assurance, secretly delighted at his own "bluff" or in a spirit of abject fear. Suddenly confronted by the necessity of writing about a subject of which he is blankly ignorant, he is forced, often apologetically and against his will, into a drive of indiscriminate superlatives.

Compare the amount of attention given weekly to purely social functions—the teas, the luncheons, the dinners, the balls—to that devoted to matters artistic! In older countries, with higher standards, the very reverse is the case; no court function, presided over by king or queen, occupies the space freely given to the exhibitions of the Royal Academy or the salons. Their comparative importance is tacitly acknowledged.

It is perhaps difficult to overestimate the influence wielded by these sober and authoritative articles. The great majority must accept their opinions at second hand. These powerful and most careful criticisms represent the very best and most advanced thought of the day. Have the artists in San Francisco ever made a serious attempt to direct this influence into proper channels?

At the present exhibition in the Studio Building on Presidio Avenue the attempt has been made to present pictures simply as pictures. The loan collection on view in the large gallery contains no local work (unless the five very beautiful canvases by the late Arthur Atkins could be so described), but there are shown three oils and two water-colors by John S. Sargent, a Claude Monet, two Carrières, two Isaheys, one Israels, a Diaz, some fine old portraits, and other works of interest and importance. In London or Paris the exhibition would be worthy of serious consideration; in San Francisco, so recently and cruelly despoiled, it should mark an era of advancement and progress. Yet the enthusiasts who have found their way to the gallery have been comparatively few. Of these few it is pleasant to note that the greater number have come from far afield—from San Jose, from Palo Alto (Stanford University), from Oakland, or Berkeley. We have been living through absorbing and troublous times, but the football game has never suffered from a striking diminution in its attendance. The truth is that we have inclination and leisure only for our amusements; that we have not, as a community, arrived at the stage where pictures, apart from the accompaniment of social blandishments, offer a real relaxation—make any strong appeal. A really discriminating enjoyment of any of the fine arts is rare, but it is well to remember that it may be cultivated, and we have certainly here at the present moment an excellent opportunity to begin.

The example shown of the work of Claude Monet (loaned by Mrs. A. Stern) is one of the "London" series that for some years has absorbed the veteran impressionist. Here we have the very quintessence of time and place, rendered poetically, fluently, with brush work hardly visible, in the attempt to reproduce the actual surfaces of light. At this hour all is vague, unreal; the bridge a phantom, the tall chimneys "like campaniles." There is no sun, but the golden gleams in sky and water break what might otherwise be a monotony of luminous color. In this murky atmosphere of rose and violet and gray every incident throws off the light, increases the effect of tempered radiance.

Another canvas, a portrait (loaned by Mrs. Isobel Strong) painted by John Sargent in his student days, already shows the grip of character, the extraordinary penetration, that distinguishes his later work. It is not often that an opportunity is given to see the sketches of a great painter, and to the student these three heads should be a revelation of the force and directness of his methods. Every brush stroke may be followed as easily as in a Franz Hals. The two water colors seem to have been done by a magician with a brush tipped in fire and sunlight. It is amusing to note the contrast between these rapid and vigorous sketches and those by Meissonier (loaned by Mrs. Timothy Hopkins)—five small panels of unusual boldness most freely done by this great master of minute details, but nevertheless so close, so clean, so emphatically exact. Here we see plainly enough the effect of work accomplished by near-sighted eyes, unable to judge from a distance. The water-colors, positively exuberant in their apparent carelessness—with a line and a blot for a figure, or a sweep of color for hills and sea—yet give us Italy in the clear, brilliant atmosphere of the sunwashed air, or in the warm richness of the little wine-shop interior.

The Carrières, unequal in workmanship; the sketch by Diaz, rich as a small Rubens; the very noble St. Cloud, by Arthur Atkins; the extremely well-painted "Romantic Still Life," by Mrs. L. Carrigan of New York; a little Wyant (once the great rival of Inness), with a melancholy but delicate charm; the fine example of the work of the late John Twachtman, with two less important sketches by the same deeply-regretted and distinguished painter; the small still-life by Emil Carlsen, a miracle of cleanness and refinement; all these representative works illuminate, if they do not explain, what Beaudelaire called "the fatality of genius."

It has taken courage to accept the responsibility for these pictures; it has taken even more disinterested courage for their owners to lend them, to consent to run the undeniable risk of loss by accident or fire. As the exhibition does not close till Monday, November 23, it still remains to be seen whether their generosity will be as fully appreciated as it deserves. J. H. H.

Lord Brassey, in the course of a school prize distribution, made the interesting announcement that he was beginning to learn German. He has not reached the age when Cato learned Greek, for he is only seventy-two, and, as he thought it never too late to mend, he started learning German a fortnight ago, and was now reading "Prince Hohenlohe's Memoirs" in the original. He said that when he did not know a word he put a number against it in the margin, and then looked the word up in the dictionary. When he began the book he had to look up twenty-five words to the page. Now he is down to nine on the page and is sanguine in a month that the total will be reduced to five on the page.

Bellini's Best Opera.

The occasion of the seventy-third anniversary of the death of Bellini has led to a good deal being written about him in the Sicilian newspapers, for he was born in Sicily. He died at Puteaux, near Paris, under somewhat strange circumstances, in 1835. Baron Aymé d'Aquino wrote to a friend: "I rode out to call on him, but, as usual, the gardener of his house refused to let me in. Later on in the day there was a heavy storm, and at about five o'clock I once again tried to see him. As no one answered the bell, I pushed against the gate and it gave way, so I got into the house. I found Bellini on a bed, abandoned by all. At first I thought that he was asleep. When I touched his hand it was quite cold, for he was dead."

A curious letter is published, written by him when his "Norma" was hissed at the first representation: "I have just returned from the Scala. Would you believe it? 'Norma' was hissed. I no longer recognized the friendly Milanese, who received with enthusiasm and delight the 'Il Pirata,' 'La Straniera,' 'La Sonnambula.' I have deceived myself. I have made a great mistake. All my progenitors have been wrong. All my expectations have been illusions. But, I assure you from my heart, there are morsels in it that I shall be proud if I can ever excel. Did not the Romans hiss 'L'Olympiade' of the divine Pergolesi? In all theatrical productions the public is the supreme judge. The public will reverse its judgment. It will recognize that 'Norma' is the best of my operas."

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

By Sidney G. P. Coryn.

Lynch's Daughter, by Leonard Merrick. Published by the McClure Company, New York; $1.50.

Stories of moral purpose require unusual care in character delineation, and we feel here that the character of Keith might have received a better elaboration. He marries the daughter of Jordan B. Lynch on the understanding that he will support his wife on his own meagre earnings as an artist and without part or lot in the money of her multi-millionaire father, which has been wrung from the usual widows and orphans. Now, Keith is a very good sort of fellow and there is little to be said against him, but the general impression of his character is not consonant with so high an act of self-denial. We feel, indeed, that it is due to a whim and not to a consistent conviction. The beautiful Betty consents to the arrangement simply because she has no conception of what poverty means, and when the wolf is at the door and the baby in need of expert surgical aid she cables to her father for money with Keith's acquiescence. The door having once been opened to parental supplies, poor Betty naturally wants to keep it open and to open it wider, and then the rift in the lute appears and temporarily wrecks the whole domestic harmony. We can not help feeling that Keith is a bit of a bigot, for if the tainted money may be used to buy the most costly medical aid for the child, why may it not also be used to supply the child with comforts hardly less necessary? And when Lynch père ultimately dies, as even millionaires must do, we can only look with consternation on Betty's plan to dissipate his fortune of two hundred million dollars through the agency of a government committee who will select such charities as seem to them to be deserving. It is also to be feared that $250,000 each would entirely dehauch the few poor people specially selected by Betty for such munificent legacies, while the balance of the two hundred million dollars is almost enough to dehauch a nation. Clever as the story is, we can hardly regard it as the solution of an ethical problem, while the narrative itself seems sometimes to be unduly abrupt in the effort to reach a desired situation. But it is well worth reading.

The Great Miss Driver, by Anthony Hope. Published by the McClure Company, New York; $1.50.

Mr. Hope has achieved a marked success in the creation of a striking character, and he has done it without the aid of sensation. Jenny Driver, on the death of her father, finds herself in possession of an immense English estate and with almost unlimited wealth at her disposal. Old Nicholas Driver had taken an eccentric dislike to his daughter and since her childhood had kept her at various second-rate boarding-schools and lodging-houses. Barely a woman, accustomed only to the ways of a straitened existence, she now finds herself at the head of a great establishment, expected to take her place in country society, and without friends or advisers except her father's old attorney and his private secretary.

The charm of the hook is not so much sentimental as psychological. We begin to see something of Jenny's calibre when she discharges the private secretary for protesting against the renewal of a questionable school acquaintance, and when she takes him back again on the understanding that he is to be "neither servant nor master, but friend," and on the further condition that he shall never say "I told you so" when she gets into scrapes, we begin to see that Jenny is both masterful and lovable. The ultimate triumph of this wayward young woman over local and aristocratic prejudice, her unconquerable determination to have her own way, and the diplomacy of her moves after her worst indiscretions, are admirably described, and although we somewhat resent the introduction of Margaret Octon and the way in which that somewhat colorless young woman takes the centre of the stage, we feel that Jenny has perhaps chosen the part of wisdom in delegating to another the place that we expected her to fill for herself. The author's remarkable power of dialogue is well sustained and as felicitous as ever.

The Palace of Danger, by Mahel Wagnalls. Published by the Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York; $1.50.

The author gives us a successful story of the court of Louis XV, a story in which the Marquise de Pompadour plays the leading rôle, as was that lady's custom when upon earth. The minor characters are Comte de Vrie and little Destine, the orphan of the Convent of St. Cyr. De Vrie falls under the royal displeasure and is exiled, but, being in love with the marquise, he tricks his majesty and remains in Paris pour faire ses adieux, is surprised by the king, who believes him dead, in the Pompadour's chamber, and makes his perilous escape in the guise of a ghost. The reader must learn for himself how De Vrie transfers his loyalty from the Pompadour to the little convent maiden and how he secures his pardon from the king.

The author is happy in her treatment of the Pompadour, to whom she renders some measure of justice as a stateswoman of an energy and resource sometimes beneficent. Equally fortunate is she in her delineation of the king and of the vacillating moods and peevish tyranny that were the fruitful soil of the coming revolution. "The Palace of Danger" is a notable story and it should be a popular one.

I and My True Love, by H. A. Mitchell Keays. Published by Small, Maynard & Co., Boston.

Iliel Sargent separates from his wife because the lady has fallen hopelessly in love with Dick Warder. A divorce follows and Mrs. Sargent becomes Mrs. Warder, her baby girl Christina remaining with the father. Twenty years later, when the matrimonial troubles of the second generation are coming to the front, Sargent writes to Mrs. Warder, now a widow, to ask for her help in advising and directing their daughter. As a result, Christina visits her mother, and it is easy to guess that a reconciliation between the parents is to be found upon the last page.

The story has its psychological value, but it might have been told very much better. We are probably expected to like Christina, but we don't, thinking her, on the contrary, to be a pert and unpleasant girl. We may forgive her for smoking cigarettes and for being impudent to her mother under the circumstances, but when a young woman of twenty discusses her future maternity and expresses a wish for a variety of husbands, but that her fiancé alone should be the father of her children, we feel that even modernity may trespass upon a desirable propriety.

Every Man for Himself, by Norman Duncan. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; $1.50.

The author uses a nearly continuous dialogue to tell his story of the Newfoundland fisherman, and perhaps no better way could he find to illustrate a distinctive type. We may feel sometimes that his characters are hardly representative, but they are none the less admirably and holdly drawn. There is Botch, for instance, whose seafaring life has conduced to metaphysical thought and who confronts a comrade with a "plain question":

"You is, isn't you? Well, then, you must have been was. Now, then, Tumm, where was you?"
 "'Afore I was born?"
 "'Ay,—afore you was is."
 "'God knows,' says I. 'I 'low I don't. An' look you, Botch!' says I, 'this talk ain't right. You isn't a infidel, is you?'
 "'Oh, no!' says he.
 "'Then,' says I, for I was mad, 'where in hell did you think up all this ghostly tomfoolery?'
 "'On the grounds,' says he."

If it is a case of every man for himself on the Newfoundland banks, there is no exclusion of a fine and unselfish courage.

The Man Who Ended War, by Hollis Godfrey. Published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

This is a highly ingenious story of a scientist who ended war by the simple expedient of destroying one of the world's great hattleships upon a number of previously announced dates. He uses one of the lesser known natural forces that have lately come into prominence, and his detection is due to a fine piece of scientific work by which both the laboratory and the man are found. The skill and verisimilitude with which the scientific part of the story is worked out reminds us of Jules Verne, which is of course high, but deserved, praise.

The story contains a love incident which is not so much a necessary part of the fabric as a sacrifice to the modern convenances of fiction. It is in no way incongruous, but the author would have shown greater self-reliance had he omitted it. Jules Verne rarely resorted to this prop.

Over Against Green Peak, by Zephine Humphrey. Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York; $1.25.

The delights of a country life have never been better told nor more humorously. It was the young woman herself who first began to build castles in the country air, and Aunt Susan sympathized with a kindling eye and a foreboding "hut." Nevertheless, the deed was done, and then we have a little hook of experiences, including the automobile, and the orchard, and the community, heast neighbors, and housekeeping experiments, and all the delightful successes and failures that make up the unaccustomed country life. These things are apt to be very dull when they are prosaic. We need humor to make them palatable, but here the humor is so plentiful and the young woman herself so delightful that they are not only palatable but delicious.

Judith of the Cumberlandds, by Alice MacGowan. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

The author has given us a successful story of the illicit distillers of the southern Appalachians and of the constant struggle between them and the revenue authorities. That she knows whereof she writes is made clear enough by her story. The source of her knowledge she explains in an interesting preface.

Her characters are well drawn. At first we feel that we shall not like Judith Barrier as we watch her selecting a gaudy hat and hesitating between a dollar and a dollar and a quarter. But we like Bonbright right away, the plucky young lawyer with his ideals of law and justice for the mountain folk. Judith falls in love with Bonbright at first sight, and under the stimulus of her lover's danger from his suspicious neighbors her fine womanhood comes to the front, and her untutored vanities become an ornament. The distillers will soon belong wholly to the past, and it is well that their lives should be thus attractively placed upon record.

New Publications.

Paul Elder & Co., San Francisco, have published a series of six colored prints tastefully mounted and described as "Doggerel Dodgers, Designed for Den Decoration," by Albertine Randall Wheelan.

"Catchwords of Friendship" is a tastefully executed collection of two hundred sentiments in verse and prose well designed for a simple Christmas remembrance. It is published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.

"The Song of Songs, a Poetic Idyl," arranged in sequence by Julia Ellsworth Ford, with illustrations by Simeon Solomon, has been published by Frederic Fairchild Sherman, New York. Price, $1.50.

An interesting and well illustrated little hook is "How the World Is Clothed," by Frank George Carpenter. Published by the American Book Company, New York, Cincinnati, and Chicago. Price, 60 cents.

The American Book Company, New York, Cincinnati, and Chicago, have published a music course, by Walter H. Aiken, containing a large number of one, two, three, and four-part songs suitable for singers of any age. Price, 50 cents.

From the H. M. Caldwell Company, Boston, comes a little volume entitled "The Dearest Spot on Earth," by the Rev. Jay T. Stocking. It is a collection of appreciative essays on the home, simply and well expressed and with a preference for Biblical illustration.

"Minnesota" has been added to the American Commonwealths Series issued by the Houghton-Mifflin Company, Boston. The series already contains nineteen volumes, including "California," and is devoted to "such States of the Union as have a striking political, social, or economic history." They are soberly written histories with no trace of the "promoter," and the series when completed will be an attractive history of the nation. Price per volume, $1.25. The set of nineteen volumes, $23.75.

The Houghton-Mifflin Company, Boston and New York, have published "Cupid's Almanac and Guide to Hearticulture for This Year and Next," by John Cecil Clay and Oliver Herford. The little hook is harmless, while the illustrations are ingenious.

"Echoes from Oak Street," by Ruthella Benjamin, is supposed to be a description of a series of prayer-meetings conducted along startlingly unconventional lines, but of a rigid orthodoxy. It is published by M. A. Donohue & Co., Chicago, and the price is 50 cents.

"Rover, the Farm Dog," by Lily F. Wesselhoeft, already well known as a writer for the young, is a story of two country children whose life on their father's farm and devotion to the dog world are well told. It is published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston. Price, $1.25.

The Houghton-Mifflin Company, Boston and New York, have published a choice edition of "Poems of New England," edited by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. The volume is bound in limp leather, lettered in gold, admirably printed and of convenient pocket size. Price, $1.25.

Douhleday, Page & Co., New York, have issued a little volume by John Kendrick Bangs, entitled "Potted Fiction." Its nature is explained by the sub-title, which describes the hook as "A Series of Extracts from the World's Best Sellers, Put Up in Thin Slices for Hurried Consumers." Mr. Bangs should have a permanent commission in relief of an over-reading public.

"Glimpses of the Heavenly Life," by J. R. Miller, D. D., is a devotional volume, well and sincerely written, but with that strange materialism that distinguishes the old from the new theology. Heaven, we are told, is a place. "Our friends are there, living, loving, remembering us still." At the moment of arrival "you will be met by those who have gone before you," etc. It might be thought that a remembrance of friends upon earth and therefore of their frailties and unkindnesses would be hardly compatible with the perfect bliss elsewhere described, but perhaps it would be ungracious to dwell upon inconsistencies necessarily numerous and necessarily unexplained. The hook is published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. Price, 50 cents.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE CHAT.

Arthur Cunningham has begun his career as a star in straight dramatic work with good judgment in his choice of plays, with appreciation of his rôle and sympathy for its work, and with auspicious surroundings. The handsome and comfort-assuring Valencia Theatre, with its big and always well-set stage, was the place of beginning for the new star, and last Sunday the time. At both afternoon and evening performances there were large and enthusiastic audiences present, as was to have been expected, and their tokens of admiration and friendship were numerous and well-chosen.

As the romantic hero of Joseph Murphy's well-known Irish play, "The Kerry Gow," Mr. Cunningham was in his element. It is true that there were reminiscences of moments, when suggestions of old-time favorite comic-opera parts came naturally. Here is Mr. Cunningham's greatest difficulty. There is nothing serious in comic opera, either in situation or expression, and the habit of carrying off everything lightly becomes fixed with comic-opera actors. In the Irish comedies Mr. Cunningham has taken up he has opportunities for unaffected tenderness, for real passion. Their use and value will impress him more as time separates him from earlier illusions. As it is, he does well, best of course in his carefree badinage. His support is more than fair, Miss Hackett is a winning if not a forceful Nora. Mr. Homans, Mr. Cashman, and other members of the cast in small yet firmly outlined parts, left nothing to be desired.

After a week of "The Kerry Gow," ending Saturday night, next Sunday will see the production of "Shaun Rhue," another play by the same author, which is as attractive in every way. Mr. Cunningham will have another capital rôle, and in it will sing, as he does in the present offering, several ballads in his own inimitable way. There will be a special matinee performance on Thanksgiving Day.

Kolb and Dill and their company at the Princess Theatre are finishing the fourth week of a remarkably prosperous run of "Playing the Ponies." The house has been crowded at every performance, nine times a week. Next Monday night the musical comedy of race-track flavor will be replaced with a new play by the same author. It is called "Weiner and Schnitzel, or We Won't Go Home Till Morning," and is planned especially to favor the peculiarities of the German dialect comedians. It shows the farcical predicaments in which two brewers are thrown through the infelicities of hasty and ill-assorted marriage. Several additions have been made to the company, including Sarah Edwards and Harry Cashman, both former favorites at this playhouse; Marie Howe and Sydney de Grey. The popular leading woman and singer, Maud Lambert, will continue, of course, as she is next to the stars in general favor, and Billy S. Clifford, the singing comedian, hardly less eminent, will continue to please. Carlton Chase and Albert Duncan, who have made good in the present bill, have good parts in the new play. The chorus will, as usual, be a feature.

At the Van Ness Theatre for the coming week Rose Stahl will continue her successful presentation of "The Chorus Lady." It is one of the best things in the comedy line that San Francisco has seen for many months, and it is received with the favor that it deserves. The play, the star, and the company are reviewed at length in another column.

The Orpheum offers a genuine novelty at the head of its bill for the coming week, beginning Sunday afternoon. George W. Leslie and his company will present a comic opera condensed to the vaudeville time limit. The musical offering is called "The Naked Truth," and it is said to be very bright and amusing, as well as filled with good music. Principals and chorus are capable, and this feature should be a taking one. Much interest is taken in the announcement of the appearance in this programme of Hall McAllister, a native San Franciscan, who has won a high place as an actor in the East during his absence. Mr. McAllister is popular here, and his entrance in his comedy skit, "The Girl of the Times," written by Fred Niblo, will be greeted warmly. Raymond and Caverly, the popular German comedians, who are prominent in their particular line of vaudeville, will render songs and parodies of their own composition. Their excruciatingly funny dialogue is still a feature with them. The Four Orans will make their first appearance in an acrobatic novelty called "On the Sea Shore," which promises to be something different. Next week will be the last of Welch, Mealy, and Montrose; Lew Hawkins; Morrow and Schellberg; and Staley and Birbeck in their quick-change act, including "The Musical Blacksmiths."

Miss Blanche Stoddard will be the new leading lady at the Valencia Theatre. Her many successes have been achieved in the principal cities of this country and she has started with many notables. With the Frohman companies she always achieved a distinct success; with Nazimova she played a season in Ibsen rôles; at the Castle Square Theatre, in Boston, she starred, and in San Francisco, where she is a social favorite, she was leading lady during a notably successful season at the Grand Opera House. With Margaret Anglin and Henry Miller and many others Miss Stoddard has done excellent work.

CURRENT VERSE.

With a Handful of Roses.

Everything my heart would say
Valiant roses shall declare,
Since my lips, less bold than they,
Dread her frown, and do not dare.
They shall nestle on her breast,
They shall whisper, soft and low,
"He loves truly, he loves best,
Who's afraid to tell you so."

Everything my heart would say
These brave roses know full well,
And they mean, in their sweet way,
More than any words could tell.
They shall be her bosom's guest;
They shall whisper, soft and low,
"He loves truly, he loves best,
Who's afraid to tell you so."
—William Winter, in New York Tribune.

The Pathfinders.

Over the hills fly the schoolboys' kites:
The windmills signal to cloud and storm;
Keen are the blasts on the outer heights,
But the heart of the earth is warm.

Down in the valleys the grandsires doze
Round their logwood hearths; each graybeard knows
That his barns are filled and the day's work done;
In the vaults is hoarded his gold hard-won;
The roads are dug that his sons may ride,
And the grime of the struggle put aside.
"We planned our towns," we "Fostered trade,"
The elders tell. "We journeys made
By charless plains and seas, and brought Earth's trophies home," "We toiled and fought
That Law might stand." "We took the weak
To shelter, taught the wronged to speak."
And one peers out where o'er the hills
The star its evening rite fulfills.
"And we," he murmurs, "kept alight
The lamps of faith, of love, of right;
Through every valley that we go
They greet us in the casement's glow:
At dawn, at sunset's touch of fire,
They speak from chimney, roof, and spire."

The schoolboys tug at their broken kites:
The windmills groan in the grip of the storm;
Keen are the blasts on the outer heights,
But the heart of the earth is warm.
—Thomas Walsh, in Ace Maria.

The Crossroads.

In here sits a woman in a lonely place,
Where All-Souls' twilight ever bends and broods;
With hungry hope and fear upon her face,
She gazes down those dreary solitudes.
There at the crossroads, peering to and fro,
Straining her glance athwart the shadows gray,
Lest any little traveler she might know
Come by that way.

For long, so long, she has waited; now and then
A tiny figure looms along the road,
—Oh, scarce-awakened from the world of men,
Seeking uncertainly its new abode,
And eagerly she stoops, she scans its eyes,
Asking some look, some tender answering sign,
And still she lets it go again, and sighs,
"Not mine—O God—not mine!"

But some day, surely, in a golden hour,
The sweet familiar shape shall be descried,
Delaying here and there for berry or flower,
But drawing ever nearer to her side.
No need of greeting between child and mother,
When heart on heart is folded close and fast
In that one clasp, each blended in the other.
That pays for all the past!
—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Voice of Ocean.

A cry went through the darkness; and the moon,
Hurrying through storm, gazed with a ghastly face,
Then cloaked herself in seud; the merman race
Of surges ceased; and then th' æolian croon
Of the wild siren, Wind, within the shrouds
Sunk to a sigh. The ocean in that place
Seemed listening; haunted, for a moment's space,
By something dread that cried against the clouds.
Mystery and night; and with them fog and rain:
And then that cry again—as if the deep
Uttered its loneliness in one dark word:
Her horror of herself; her titan pain;
Her monsters; and the dead that she must keep,
Has kept, alone, for centuries, unheard.
—Madison Cawein, in The Forum.

The Adela Verne Concerts.

The first concert by the brilliant young pianiste, Adela Verne, will be given at Christian Science Hall Sunday afternoon, November 22, when an exceptionally interesting programme will be given, including Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Glück-Sgambati, Brahms, Scarlatti, Borodin, and Liszt selections, and ten favorite Schumann descriptive scenes. The same programme will be repeated in Oakland next Tuesday afternoon, November 24, at half-past three, the date having been changed from Friday. The second concert will be Thursday, November 26, and the farewell recital Saturday afternoon, November 28. Complete programmes may be obtained at the box offices at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s stores. Miss Verne has met with great success in Boston and New York, and has been re-engaged at both of these places for later in the season.

The Fruit and Flower Mission.

Next Thursday is Thanksgiving. As in former years, some will have surfeit of good things, some a sufficiency, some—the poor and the sick—will lack not only the appetizing dainties, but even plain, substantial provisions. For many years it has been the Argonaut's privilege and pleasure to bespeak the bounty of our readers for the Mission of Fruit and Flowers. Every Thanksgiving the mission gives to the needy as many Thanksgiving dinners as its friends, in their generosity, provide. It asks of them all sorts of meats, turkeys, chickens, vegetables, wines, and liquors (for medicinal purposes), raisins, figs, jellies, fruits, cakes, pies, bread, flowers—in short, anything good to eat. And since money will buy everything, it asks (especially of affluent bachelors) as much of the coin of the realm as they can well spare. Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday are the best days to send these gifts. Your grocer will find the address, and the butcher, the baker, the wine dealer. Two minutes at the 'phone will do the business. If you live in the country, Wells-Fargo will transport anything you send free of charge. Address the San Francisco Fruit and Flower Mission, 1372 Jackson Street.

Arthur Hartmann—a Master Violinist.

The first of the great violinists to visit this city this season will be the brilliant young Hungarian virtuoso and composer, Arthur Hartmann, who while possessed of a marvelous and brilliant technique is at the same time a player of the big, broad, Ysaye-Kreisler type. Mr. Hartmann was the first soloist of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra this year and made a tremendous success with the Saint-Saëns concerto. With Mr. Hartmann comes Alfred Calzin, a young American pianist who recently met with big success in Berlin. There will be three concerts given in this city, the first being Sunday afternoon, November 29. Seats will be on sale next Wednesday morning, at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where complete programmes may be obtained. Hartmann will play in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse Friday afternoon, December 4. Miss Katherine C. Harley, of the Fall River Golf Club, won the national golf championship at the Chevy Chase tournament in Washington by defeating Mrs. T. H. Polhemus of the Richmond County Club, of Brooklyn, New York, by a score of 6 up and 5 to play.

THE MOST IMPORTANT BIOGRAPHY OF

The Life of James McNeill Whistler

By ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL and JOSEPH PENNELL

The litigation over this book has established the fact that it is the Life authorized and planned by Whistler himself, and that it is based on material furnished by himself and by his family. Mr. and Mrs. Pennell's intimate friendship with Mr. Whistler gave them that opportunity of personal knowledge which no biographer, who had only documents to work from, could possibly possess. They speak with authority of Whistler as a man, as well as with full appreciation of him as an artist, and it is not too much to claim that this book has artistic and human interest such as few other biographies could have.

ROSE STAHL'S "CHORUS LADY."

By Josephine Hart Phelps.

"The Chorus Lady," like "The Squaw Man," is watered stock. In its original form, as a one-act vaudeville playlet, it was solid, concentrated merit. In its present form it is slow in the first act—until Rose Stahl makes her appearance; perfect, of its kind, in the second; melodramatic and stereotyped in the third; sleepy and machine-made in the fourth. In fact, the first and last acts were, to quote Patricia O'Brien, "a couple of morgues."

However, that does not particularly matter. It is Rose Stahl, and not the play, that is the thing. For Rose Stahl, as the chorus girl, is something that absolutely must not be missed. There are many species of chorus girl, if we may believe the press agent, who sometimes is empowered to announce that Miss So and So, daughter of a retired general, or an active millionaire, or a liberal-minded bishop, has become a chorus girl because she does not care for society, or heeds the call to "Art." For, as Patricia O'Brien sapiently observes, "They throw out a lot of junk about its being love for their art."

I should judge that this chorus girl of James Forbes's original creating, and upon whom Rose Stahl has placed the final stamp of ownership, is a chorus girl because she is "so temperamental"; a chorus girl that is born, not made. She is born for the greenroom, for the footlights, for the community life, for the excitement.

In the present amplified play, Patricia has a family circle of devoted relations to return to, and a large domestic responsibility in the shape of a young and pretty sister, who follows emulously in the path of her elder sister's career.

In a four-act play something must happen, so a gilded youth is manufactured for the purpose of ensnaring the pretty sister. This means Patricia to the rescue when the plot becomes ripe, and Patricia as a sister-rescuer is something to reckon with. For Patricia is "wise," as she tells her parents and future husband, when justifying herself for taking up a career that she considers should be barred to her weaker sister.

Patricia is "wise" and foolish, and a cheerful babbler. She hands out quantities of the latest and most approved slang, every phrase of it piquant, and characteristic, and expressive, and richly humorous.

She deals out greenroom repartee of a sort that sounds like the real thing. She exhibits, with naive satisfaction, her hargain-counter purchases, her "two-sixty-five" coat, her "one-ninety-five" false front, or some other capillary headpiece of a mysterious nature.

For Patricia is "straight," and it is an unqualified joy when she lands her humble two-dollar hargain ruthlessly into the five-hundred-dollar lap of the translated show girl, and asks her her opinion with artful artlessness.

Patricia is so sound and wholesome and "straight" that she creates the much-needed sunshine and the invigorating breeze in the otherwise somewhat fetid atmosphere of the chorus-room of Longacre Theatre. We have always been told that the jealousies engendered by stage rivalries are not conducive to amity and loving kindness between stage associates, and James Forbes's chorus girls prove no exception to the rule.

They are jealous, snappy, envious. They are unsparing of each other's weaknesses and vanities. They possess a bitter dexterity in the art of taunting repartee. But they are so real, so exact a reflection of what we conceive that their kind of life would make of them, and the leaven of humor in the author's portraits of these showy blossoms of the metropolitan parterre are so truly American and so thoroughly acceptable that this act of the play rushes by on wings.

A feature of the chorus-room act is the display of costumes worn by the show girls, who dress themselves, and make up, and lace each other's corsages, smoking the while, making bets, or peacocking sweepingly around the room, exhibiting their sheath gowns and their shapes, looking the while disparagingly over the lesser or greater charms of their beautiful rivals in the favor of the great and beauty-loving public.

As cleverly acted by Amy Lee, there is a very good portrait of a wardrobe woman, once a footlight favorite, now a beer-drinker with variegated hair and a picturesque vocabulary, who informs her opponent, during a chorus-room scrap, that "if she weren't a lady she'd land her a slam on her map."

The whole act is a lively, realistic, cynical, yet good-humored, exhibition of one of the many and varied phases of human nature, and through it all the naive yet shrewd, stage-calloused yet soft-hearted Patricia dominates the scene, and captures the liking and the sympathy of the spectator.

Rose Stahl seems horn for the centre of the stage. She takes it easily, and holds us with her compelling magnetism as well as with her spontaneously exercised art. She has the most individual and captivating bow of acknowledgment, seeming, with engaging little side movements of head and hands, to wish to kiss and embrace the appreciative and applauding public in front.

When melodrama steps in and Patricia becomes emotional over the transgressions of the gilded youth, who, as she says in one of her characteristic digs, "has nothing on his mind but his hair," Rose Stahl showed that she had full command of the technique of emotional expression. But it is as the original Patricia that we most delight to acclaim her—the chorus girl who has a Bowery accent, tenement-house English, and Broadway slang of the latest and most varied description at her tongue's end.

The first act is going a little slowly, in spite of the pretty sister, the potential young man villain, and the rich, mellifluous Irishness of Patricia's parents, as played by Alice Leigh and Giles Shine.

Then enter Patricia, and languor is fled. Patricia conquers you immediately. In her faded shirt-waist and her be-ribboned and violent pompadour, with her sudden assumptions of a serpentine, straight-front walk, with her rich and racy individuality, her careless, matter-of-course loyalty and warm-heartedness, and her tumbling flood of up-to-date slang, she is, distinctly, a creature to appeal most warmly to the approval of the confirmed theatre-goer, who looks eagerly for an occasional escape from the banal and conventional figures of every-day drama.

Emilio de Gogorza's audiences, during his just ended season of song recitals, steadily grew. At the closing concert, last Sunday afternoon, the size of the audience was an indication as to the size of the furor of which the Spanish baritone had been the inspiration.

Although not in such good form as at the two preceding concerts, Señor de Gogorza had no difficulty in transforming many of the most self-contained of his hearers into vessels of emotion.

The request programme—counting in the encores—included almost all of the numbers that had proved most popular at the preceding concerts. "De Nous Presentiments" from Glück, and "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade," two strikingly dramatic selections, were on a par with "Roi de Lahore" in the general admiration and appreciation they evoked. "Au Clair de la Lune," in spite of the commonplace character of the music, pleased mightily, because of the vivacity and charm with which the singer interpreted the sentiment of this little French folk-song, to which Du Maurier gave such loving prominence in his description of the wonderful Tribby concert.

Three commonplace songs made sterile spots to some in the long and otherwise delightful programme. They were "Dull Care"—although it must be admitted that this cheerful ballad found much favor—"The Complacent Lover," and "The Pretty Creature." The repetition in the refrain of the latter song, lively and spirited though it sounded to many ears, interfered with the singer's perfect intonation, and one listened in vain for those notes of haunting sweetness and tenderness that recurred so beautifully in numbers of such varying sentiment that he could almost make one weep with the famous Pagliacci prologue.

The Gogorza season is over, but it has left as an aftermath a big musical hunger, which it will be the task and pleasure of later comers to gratify. Mme. Blanche Arral, having already made a profound impression in the musical susceptibilities of San Franciscans, will probably fall heir to the groundswell of the Gogorza furor, as her next Thursday evening concert promises to be an event.

Mr. Hansen's Pictures.

Mr. H. W. Hansen, who exhibited during the last few weeks in Chicago and Milwaukee with the greatest success, has sold his painting, "A Stampede of Horses by Horse-thieves," and it will have a place of honor between a Rosa Bonheur and a Schreyer at the Auditorium Hotel in Chicago. Every one of his important pictures has found a home in some residence either in Chicago or in Milwaukee, and Mr. Frederic Junior, who conducted the exhibitions, is to be congratulated upon his success.

An exhibition of the Jesurum collection of modern Venetian lace was opened by the Italian ambassador at Waring's Galleries in London recently.

VANITY FAIR.

The Queen of Spain has been finding herself in hot water pretty often lately, and her predicaments are usually the result of her failure to understand that even queens have to obey and that the tyranny of etiquette is of the most exacting kind. When Queen Victoria is in trouble she usually asks advice from her uncle, King Edward, and this is always forthcoming in a few terse and vigorous precepts. The queen was annoyed recently to find that Spanish court precedent forbade her to entertain any guests not of royal blood, and as she particularly desired to do this, she gave way to a fit of petulance which culminated in a letter of complaint to King Edward. Her uncle's reply was worthy of Machiavelli. He wrote, "Do not make enemies, and respect other people's stupidity—when necessary. In time, if you are wise, you will get everything your own way."

The advice seems to be good, but what a tremendous price to pay for getting your own way. The injunction to be wise has an admirable seeming of simplicity, and there is, no doubt, nothing but a lack of wisdom standing between most of us and our pet desires. An admonition to become wise is one of the colloquial commonplaces of today, but on analysis it seems very much on a par with a recommendation to add six inches to our height or to cultivate a Roman nose or blue eyes. The gods who live forever have attended to these matters for us, and they have distributed wisdom in homeopathic doses, and not without a suspicion of favoritism.

Queen Alexandria has issued a public statement to the effect that she does not wear aigrets, and this, of course, is intended as a rebuke to a cruel and horrible practice. The official statement means something more even than that. It means that no lady can venture into the queen's presence with these feathers upon her head, and it means that the aigret is stamped as unfashionable throughout every rank in society. Royalty has its undoubted disadvantages, but something may be written also upon the other side of the slate. The power to make cruelty unfashionable is one to be envied, and every country would be the better for an influence that is no less real because it has no coercive laws to back it.

The Springfield Republican comments on the sadness of social obligations and deprecates the pass to which we have come "when the guests are glad to say 'good-bye' and the hosts delighted to hear it":

It is a curious thing, but about this time of year there is nearly always a wail rising on the folly and discomforts contingent on a visit to a country house. Thank heaven, none of the woes under which the wealthy and the social climbers groan affect those in moderate means. Such as visit their friends, knowing that at the most not more than two servants are kept, go with a free heart, for it is the rarest thing in the world that visitors are obliged to tip the domestics in such houses. It is the large establishments where there are servants galore, that compel the paying of tips from the hutler to the groom. The man or woman who spends a week's end at such a house finds these tips a distinct drain on the purse, and when the guest is only of moderate fortune, a severe one. There are the young things, too, that visit. The girl asks her older and more experienced friends how much she ought to give the hutler, how much the maids. She is in doubt, too, whether her hostess will ape the British fashions and not appear at all in the morning—and in that case what is she, the visitor, to do with herself? "Ought she to spend the morning in her own room, or in the library or music room—or ought she to keep out of sight in the grounds?" There are the host and hostess, they have their woes also; they hate the whole thing. At least it is said house parties are voted a bore, but they pay off their social debts that way. They can't or won't give entertainments during the winter, and some repayment must be made to those who asked them to musicals the last winter. They are all sore tested—as far as known, unhappy and harassed—then why do it? What a pity when the guests are glad to say "good-bye" and the hosts delighted to hear it!

In the older countries the perfection of country house hospitality is to leave the guests entirely alone except for a few well-understood obligations, such as punctuality at dinner. Every facility is provided for a variety of amusements, such as shooting, fishing, golf, or tennis, and the guest may avail himself of them or not just as he pleases and without the annoyance of special invitations. The number of obligations with which the visitor is expected to comply is reduced to the extreme minimum, and this seems to be the best way to make him feel at home, always provided that his enjoyment is really a matter of consideration to host and hostess.

The ear has been unaccountably neglected in the reconstruction of the female form divine, but this omission is to be rectified if we may trust current reports from Paris. Of what avail is it to model all other parts of the body if an unsightly ear is allowed to deface the proportions of the main structure.

There are two ways of rectifying the mistakes of clumsy nature in the matter of the ear. We can boldly attack the offending organ itself or we can produce the desired effect by modifying its environment. The woman with a long ear, for instance, can do wonders by a judicious arrangement of the hair so as to hide its upper exuberance. But such mild measures seem to lack the courage that distinguishes the modern toilet.

The coloring of the ear should be attended to at once. Nature has made a sad mess here, and we have red, white, and yellow ears at every turn. They don't match the complexion, and as we know exactly where the complexion comes from, we may have resource to the same aids. But remember always that the lobes should be of a bright pink and the shell of the ear should fade away into a faint rose. It is surprising what a touch of pink on the lobe will do in the way of rejuvenation. But be careful! Paint may be cheap, but it should not be wasted.

Do it in this way: First pinch the lobe firmly and even painfully. Then rub in some cold cream and wait until the agony has abated. Now apply the rouge and note how it brings out the color of the face. The color of the face should, of course, be previously determined upon.

Sometimes the ears protrude, and nothing can be more unsightly. In this case a night-cap should be worn with small pads so arranged as to press the ears firmly against the head while sleeping. A few weeks will suffice.

Earrings, if worn at all, should be made the subject of prayerful attention. The suspended ring should be avoided by women with long ears, who will find that those screwed on the lobe are much more becoming. Avoid diamonds, because they compete with the eyes. Mme. Bernhardt says: "Wear pearls and sapphires, but the diamond never. The woman who wears a diamond in her ears will take the lustre out of her eyes." If the ears are ugly—and a brother or even a husband may be trusted for a frank opinion—do not wear rings at all or anything else that will make the ear conspicuous. Rubies give an appearance of size, turquoises produce a blue or thin appearance, but pearls were obviously created by nature for the adornment of the female ear. Women with classic features—and once more the brother or the husband may be invoked for a verdict—can safely wear large and even barbaric ear rings, but such jewels when misplaced are far worse than no jewels at all. Ears, like noses, that are too red are very difficult to treat. Diet will do a great deal—in fact, all that can be done.

When the beautiful ear has been obtained it should be taken care of and protected alike from sun and wind. Veils should be red or brown.

It may be, and of course it is, a perfectly proper sentiment that Miss Elkins would be better advised to marry an American, although if that young lady has set her mind upon marrying the Duke of the Abruzzi it is fairly certain that she will do so. But to speak of the duke as an improvident and idle young nobleman is merely absurd and shows an ignorance of the facts. He is only thirty-five, but he has already made a record of industry of which most men would be proud. He is a captain in the Italian navy, which by itself implies a somewhat strenuous life, while it would be hardly an exaggeration to say that he is the most successful explorer of the present day. At eighteen he traveled around the world. He was the first to ascend Mount Elias in Alaska, in 1897. Two years later he made his great voyage to the Arctic in the Stella Polare and reached a point twenty miles nearer to the Pole than Nansen had done, while two years ago he accompanied an expedition to Africa, visiting Leganda and ascending Rumenzori, the chief mountain of a range in equatorial Africa, between Lakes Albert Edward and Albert Nyanza. It would seem that a demand that the prince "go to work" is a little superfluous, unless working is considered to be inseparable from money-making. And with money the duke seems to be very well supplied as things go nowadays in Italy.

The curious legal point has just been made in one of the London county courts that a wife's dresses are not necessarily her own absolute property, but that they may only be given to her by her husband for her lifetime. The question came up in an action arising out of a seizure under an execution of dresses supplied to a Chelsea woman by a firm of dressmakers. The husband contended that the seizure was illegal, as he gave his wife the money to buy the dresses, and they were accordingly his property. The judge said that it had been laid down by the late Lord St. Helier when he was Sir Francis Jeune, president of the divorce court, that if a man presented his wife with articles of jewelry or clothing for use only during his lifetime and only to be used as what was legally termed "paraphernalia," such articles did not become the wife's absolute property.

It seems that the legal position is this: the term paraphernalia includes all wearing apparel and ornaments suitable to the wife's station in life which are given to her only to be worn as ornaments of the person only, but the term does not include family jewels or gifts from strangers. A wife can not dispose of paraphernalia in the lifetime of her husband, nor can she dispose of them by will. The husband, even during his wife's lifetime, may sell or give her paraphernalia to strangers, and paraphernalia are also liable for the husband's debts. It would be distinctly annoying to a wife to have her dresses seized at the instance of, say, the husband's cigar merchant, but that is how the English law stands today. The case recalls another decision given not long ago, that money saved by a wife out of her housekeeping allowance becomes the property of the husband, he having given it to her for a specific purpose and that purpose not having been fully carried out.

It was the Empress Josephine, says the Springfield Republican, who introduced the lace handkerchief because her teeth were not what they would have been had she lived in this generation of dentists. Whenever she laughed she would put her handkerchief to her lips and so set the style. In the present day the handkerchief is as little in evidence as possible, and even a small corner of it is not allowed to protrude beyond the edge of the jacket pocket.

There are few decorations for women in Europe, the most ancient order coming from the Austrian throne. It is the decoration of the Star and Crucifix, and is given to women of high rank. Another is the Luise, founded in memory of the beautiful Queen of Prussia, whom Napoleon insulted. This order is given to all classes of women who commit any great self-sacrifice.

Jennie—She puts lots of feeling in her singing, doesn't she? James—Yes, but it must be awful to feel that way.—The Tailor.

STORYETTES.
 Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Gaston burst like a whirlwind in upon his friend Alphonse. "Will you be my witness?" he cried. "Going to fight?" "No; going to get married." Alphonse after a pause inquired, "Can't you apologize?"

One day when Nicholas Longworth was leaving Washington for Cincinnati, Joe Cannon said to him: "Well, good-bye. I suppose the citizens will be out in force to meet you?" "I'm—I'm afraid they will," replied Nick, tremblingly.

It was an awfully old joke, but the American thought it might cause his English friend to generate a smile. "Just before I sailed for Liverpool," said the American, "I dreamed that I was dead, and the heat woke me up." "So?" rejoined the Englishman, seriously. "The weather must be beastly hot in America."

Rube Waddell, the baseball star, at a banquet in his honor in St. Louis, said of pitching: "The secret of winning pitching is trickery. I once knew a Nicetown drummer named Horton who would have made a fine pitcher. I found Horton one day writing in a red book. 'A diary' said I. 'I didn't know you kept a diary, Horton.' 'It is only a fake one,' he replied. 'I make out in it that I lead the life of a saint. Then I leave it lying around for my wife to read.'"

Uncle Wash, an aged colored man who is given to seeing visions, was recently regaling a group of brethren and sisters in the church with a dream of heaven that he had had the night before. As he was graphically describing its gold-paved streets, its gates of pearl, and the hosts of white-robed, fair-haired angels playing upon jeweled harps, an old woman interrupted with the query: "See any niggahs dah?" "Huh," he snorted indignantly, "does you 'spose I went 'round to de kitchen?"

Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, at a dinner in Cincinnati, told a quaint story about a precocious boy. "They are very precocious, indeed," she said, "those little chaps from Eton or Rugby, with their round, sober faces and their quiet air. A very pretty American girl was talking one evening in London to one of these urchins. 'And have you got a sweetheart yet, Tommy?' she said, playfully. 'No,' said Tommy; 'still, I'm game enough for a bit of spooning, if that's what you're after.'"

John D. Rockefeller, conversing amiably with a reporter, drove home a remark on inefficiency with a golf story. "There was a man," he said, "who had no success at golf at all. The more he played, it seemed, the poorer he became. One day his work was particularly bad. 'Dear, dear,' he said to his caddy, as he looked ruefully at a deep hole in the turf that he had just made with his iron; 'dear, dear, there can't be worse players than myself.' 'Well,' said the caddy, reflectively, 'maybe there's worse players, but they don't play.'"

George W. Coleman, sociologist, discussed, during the recent sociological conference at Sagamore Beach, tips and tipping. "I have a friend," Mr. Coleman said, "who belongs to an anti-tipping association. My friend, in obeying the rules of his society has many quaint experiences. He went traveling in the West in the spring. He dined one night in a fashionable Western restaurant, and after paying his bill he gathered up the change that had been brought upon a silver plate and dropped it into his waistcoat pocket. As he rose to depart the waiter said in a low, appealing voice: 'Surely, you won't forget me, sir?' 'No, no,' said my friend; 'I'll write to you.'"

James T. Powers tells of a musical comedy fighting its way through bad business on tour during the financial crisis last fall. Things were so bad that the company, said Mr. Powers, left each town without paying the company's hotel bill, and from each town took with them the landlord—induced to follow the company's fortunes in the hope that prosperity would bring payment of the money due. To make matters as pleasant as possible, the manager put all the landlords in the chorus, but one day, at the end of a month or two, when he discovered that they were all basses, he sent a telegram to his advance manager: "Please arrange for us to stop at a tenor hotel next town."

An erratic Memphis editor was a great admirer of John Sharp Williams, though he had never seen him. This editor, in blind faith, printed column after column in praise of the "gentleman from Yazoo." There was not an edition that didn't have something exalting Williams, and one day "John Sharp," on his way home from Washington, dropped off at Memphis to get something to eat in the railroad restaurant. It was early in the morning, and the editor was eating at the same place, after a night of work. The proprietor called the congressman's attention to the editor. "John," said the restaurant manager, "that fellow over there has been saying some pretty nice things about you." "I'd like to meet him," said Williams. So the editor was brought over and introduced. He rubbed his hand across his face wearily several times, and said: "Williams? Williams? What? The congressman?" "Yes," modestly assented that gentleman, "the same." "You're not John Sharp Williams?" "There's no question about my identity," hroke in the somewhat exasperated Williams, rather testily. "Well, all I can say is," muttered the editor, as he shook hands with the statesman, "you're a dam sight brighter than you look."

At a recent dinner a Washington lady happened to be taken in by Thomas Nelson Page, and remarked to him effusively, "Oh, Mr. Page, I am reading one of your delightful books and was so interested in it this afternoon that my maid had to call me three times to remind me that it was time to dress for dinner." "Indeed," replied Mr. Page affably, "which one of my books was it?" "Well, er—really it is very stupid of me, but I can't recall the title," responded the lady. "Perhaps," suggested the man of letters, smiling, "it was 'Henry Esmond.'" The lady puckered her brow in the effort to recollect, then observed sweetly, "It may have been that one, Mr. Page, although the name you mention doesn't sound exactly like it."

The late Bishop Selwyn of New Zealand and Melanesia was well known during his university days as a devotee of the noble art of self-defense. He incurred a great deal of animosity from a certain section of New Zealand owing to his sympathy with the Maoris during the war. One day he was asked by a rough, in one of the back streets of Auckland, if he was the "bishop who backed up the Maoris." Receiving a reply in the affirmative, the rough, with a "Take that, then," struck his lordship in the face. "My friend," said the bishop, "my Bible teaches me that if a man smite thee on one cheek, turn him the other," and he turned his head slightly the other way. His assailant, slightly bewildered, struck him again. "Now," said his lordship, "having done my duty to God, I will do my duty to man," and, taking off his coat and hat, he gave the anti-Maori champion a most scientific thrashing.

Alliterative Absurdities.
 If you caught a captious curate killing kippers for the cook
 In the cloisters with a club yeapt a cleek,
 Would you say he was as wily

 If you beheld a battleboat bombarding Biscay Bay
 While the big guns bellowed bold from brazen throat,
 Would you say it was as funny
 As a bouncing blue-backed hunny
 Blowing bubbles with a bobby in a boat?
 If you saw a driveling dreamer drowning ducklings in a ditch,
 And deducting data dry as dust to see,
 Would you say that this death dealer
 Was of ducks and drakes a stealer,
 Or of Darwin's dead ideas a devotee?

Senator Charles A. Culberson is undoubtedly one of the most silent Texans that the State ever produced. A fellow-Texan, in speaking of the senator's career, admitted that this, however, was nothing against him. "He's just conservative," he added, "like his old daddy. During the war Culberson, Sr., was colonel of a regiment. He was a practical old gentleman, and took his command into the canebrake in northern Louisiana, and somehow kept it there. Nobody seemed to be able to dislodge him. He stayed there, too, until the war was over, and the regiment that went out at the beginning of hostilities, 900 strong, Colonel Culberson brought home 1600 strong. 'Think I was going to take my boys out where they would get butchered?' said he to his townsmen. 'Four of them wandered away to New Orleans and actually got shot!'"

PERSONAL.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The past fortnight has been marked by the number of luncheon parties given both for debutantes and for the older maids and matrons. The debutantes are verifying the prophecy made early in the season that they would be more extensively entertained than any group of buds for many seasons past, and they are now endeavoring to solve the problem of how to live without time to rest, without wholesome food, with only half the required amount of sleep, and facing the necessity of looking cheerful and well-groomed and talking nonsense all the time.

The engagement is announced of Miss Olga Herman, daughter of Mr. Rudolph Herman, to Captain Clarence Connor, U. S. A. Their wedding will take place in the near future, and after their honeymoon Captain Connor and his bride will sail for Manila.

Invitations have been sent out for the wedding of Miss Helen Margaret de Young, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young, to Mr. George Toland Cameron, which will take place on Monday, November 30, at high noon, at the home of the bride, 1919 California Street, Archbishop Riordan officiating. Mrs. Joseph Oliver Tobin (Miss Constance de Young) will be the matron of honor, and the bridesmaids will be Miss Alice Hager, Miss Kathleen de Young, Miss Edith Simpson, and Miss Lucie King. Miss Phyllis de Young and Miss Dorothy Deane will be the flower girls. Mr. Wellington Gregg, Jr., will be the best man, and the ushers, Mr. James Cameron, Mr. Charles de Young, Mr. Cyril Tobin, and Mr. Joseph Oliver Tobin. Only the more intimate friends will be present.

The wedding of Miss Constance Marie de Young, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young, to Mr. Joseph Oliver Tobin took place on Wednesday last at St. Mary's Cathedral. The ceremony was celebrated at noon by Archbishop Riordan. Miss Helen de Young was the maid of honor and the bridesmaids were Miss Kathleen de Young, Miss Frances Stewart, Miss Genevieve Harvey, and Miss Rebecca Kruttschnitt. Mr. Cyril Tobin was the best man, and the ushers were Mr. Charles de Young, Mr. Edward Tohin, Mr. Harry Simpkins, Mr. George Cameron, Mr. Baldwin Wood, and Mr. Patrick Rice. Several hundred guests were present at the ceremony, but only the more intimate friends were at the breakfast which followed at the home of the bride's parents on California Street.

The wedding of Miss Louise Stone, daughter of Mr. George Stone, to Mr. Lathrop McDowell Ellinwood took place on Monday evening of last week at the home of the bride on Cherry Street, the Rev. Frederick Clampett being the officiating clergyman. There were no attendants of either bride or groom, and only the members of the two families and a few intimate friends were present.

The wedding of Miss Alice Genevieve Sallee, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Martin Sallee of White House, Shasta County, to Mr. Veranus Ellinwood took place on Tuesday evening of last week at the St. Francis Hotel, the Rev. Frederick Clampett being the officiating clergyman. Mrs. Robert Greer (formerly Miss Charlotte Ellinwood) was the matron of honor and Mr. Harry Sallee was the best man. Mr. and Mrs. Ellinwood have left for a honeymoon trip of several months' duration in Europe.

Miss Augusta Gibbs Foute will be the hostess at an informal dance on Tuesday evening, December 1, at the Hillcrest, in honor of Miss Innes Keeney.

Mr. and Mrs. W. Mayo Newhall will entertain at a dinner on Tuesday evening next before the Hopkins ball.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Sylvester Simpson will entertain at a tea today (Saturday) at their home on Duboce Avenue in honor of their daughter, Miss Fernanda Pratt. Assisting in receiving will be Mrs. George B. Sperry, Mrs. Henry Payot, Mrs. Russell Cool, Mrs. C. W. Hornick, Miss Laura McKistry, Miss Mary Ashe Miller, Miss Grace Hammond, Miss Florence Hammond, Miss Christine Pomeroy, Miss Edith Slack, Miss Marcia Fee, and Miss Elizabeth Mills.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Martin will entertain at a dinner at the Martin home on Broadway on Monday evening next.

Mrs. William L. Ashe will entertain at a luncheon on Saturday of next week in honor of Miss Anna Weller.

Miss Mabel Gregory will entertain at a luncheon on Tuesday next at the Fairmont in honor of Miss Margaret Stow of Santa Barbara.

Miss Edna Davis and Miss Sydney Davis will entertain at a bridge party on Wednesday next at their home on Pacific Avenue.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"They say that Cholly has lost his mind." "Is that so? Does he know it?"—Boston Courier.

Madge—What is the object of hazing in college? Marjorie—I guess it's to teach the boys brutality for use in the football games.—Puck.

Smith—I'd invite you home to dinner with me, but we have no cook. Kjones—And I'd invite you home with me, but we have one.—Cleveland Leader.

"He's an old newspaper man." "About how old?" "Well, he can remember when they only issued extras when something happened."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Green—I hear your wife is an authoress. Does she write for money? Breen—I never receive a letter from her that she writes for anything else.—Taan Topics.

"Yes, this room is dark, damp, and positively uninhabitable. It is supplied for your wife's mother, if she has one." "She has. I'll take the flat."—Boston Traveler.

Mrs. Smythe—I wonder why the judge deferred the sentence until tomorrow? Mrs. Whyte—Oh, I suppose he wanted to talk the case over with his wife.—Brooklyn Life.

"Why is the Hon. Thomas Rott so pessimistic of late?" "He has a hone felon on his index finger, and it is very painful for him to point with pride."—Puck.

Tom—Belle is a strange girl. She doesn't know the names of some of her best friends. Maud—That's nothing. Why, I don't even know what my own will be a year from now.—Boston Transcript.

Employer—Why were you discharged from your last place? Applicant—For good behavior. Employer—What do you mean by that? Applicant—They took three months off my sentence.—Cleveland Leader.

"Man will eventually go by rail from the Atlantic to the Pacific in two days." "I once did it in five hours and then kicked about the slow time." "Where, pray, did this happen?" "In Panama."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"We find the prisoner not guilty by reason of insanity." "But the plea was not that of insanity," remarked the court. "That's just the point we made," rejoined the foreman. "We decided that any man who didn't have sense enough to know that an insanity plea was the proper caper must be crazy."—Philadelphia Ledger.

He (at the opera)—Just going out for a little fresh air, my dear. She—A slight draught, you mean, I suppose.—Punch.

Earnest Female—Professor, I hear you are a great ornithologist. Professor—I am an ornithologist, madam. Earnest Female—Then could you kindly tell me the botanical name for a whale?—Boston Transcript.

"On what ground," asked the lawyer, "does your wife want a divorce? Incompatibility?" "Something of that sort, I reckon," answered the man. "My income isn't compatible with her ideas of comfort."—Chicago Tribune.

"Yes," said Mr. Dustin Stax, "I have succeeded in life, and by the hardest kind of work." "You don't look as if you had much personal experience with hard work." "Of course not. I hired it done."—Washington Star.

Rampus—Yes. I'm willing to admit that football is a good game for those who play, but most of the students take no part in it. Campns—Well, we've got to have somebody to root for us, haven't we?—Philadelphia Ledger.

Hardup—I'll never go to that restaurant again. The last time I was there a man got my overcoat, and left his in its place. Welloff—But the proprietor wasn't to blame, was he? Hardup—No; but I might meet the other man!—Stray Stories.

Sam Sparks—Oh, yo' aint de only seed in de sunflowah. Der's lots oh uddeh gals dat hah called me "Sugah" hefo' Ah eheh heahd oh yo'. Belinda Sparks—Well, man, if dey call yo' "Sugah" dey sholy must hah meant loaf sugah.—Chicago News.

"I notice that a leading actress telephoned that her automobile was broken down and she couldn't attend a meeting of her creditors." "Wasn't that sweet of her! Going to all that trouble for a lot of fussy old creditors."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"George," spoke his better half, "you are interested in the temperance movements, are you not?" "Why, certainly I am," he answered. "Well, suppose you go out and make a few of them with the pump handle. I am in need of a pail of water right away."—Bohemian.

The New Congress.

Regarded superficially, the Sixty-First Congress, which will come into responsible existence on the 4th of March next, will be a duplication of the Sixtieth Congress. The membership in both branches will largely be identical, and it seems an assurance that there will be no change in the Speakership of the House. But under close scrutiny many changes may be discovered. The presiding officer of the Senate, the new Vice-President, is a man of very different character and type from Vice-President Fairbanks. Mr. Sherman is a "mixer," an organizer, and a parliamentarian of both experience and talent. He has long been one of the most highly effective members of the House, especially noted for his capability at all points of legislative practice. He is a natural legislator and a born partisan. That he will be satisfied merely to sit as a neutral spectator of senatorial doings is hardly thinkable. He will make a good presiding officer beyond a doubt and, likewise beyond a doubt, he will have an influence in senatorial councils not common to Vice-Presidents. Among other things Mr. Sherman is a worker, and he is credited with marvelous skill in getting work out of others; and it is freely predicted that in the presiding chair of the Senate he will be, to an extent almost unprecedented, a masterful and directing force. It is suggested that he may even be able to cure the Senate of its inveterate dilatoriness, its unwillingness to take its duties seriously, its bad habits of neglect and postponement of important work.

The personal changes in the Senate are not unimportant. Mr. Allison is to be succeeded by Governor Cummins, this being the most notable change. Allison has for years been the most expert legislator in the Senate, and although Cummins, viewed broadly, is a very much abler man, it will be impossible for him to fall into the unique position held by his predecessor. The retirement of Mr. Allison leaves Senator Hale of Maine in the place of greatest prominence on the score of long service combined with personal industry. He is slated for the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations, which has long been the vantage ground from which Senator Allison has carried forward his manifold legislative activities. The retirement of Senator Fulton of Oregon is a distinct loss to the Senate in its working powers, due to the fact that Fulton is a very capable and ready lawyer and at the same time familiar with legislative practice. Ever since the retirement of Senator Edmunds in 1891 the Senate has been weak in this respect. Mr. Spooner held rank for several years as the foremost lawyer of the Senate, and Senator Fulton, since the retirement of Mr. Spooner, has been tip-toeing up to this position with the prospect of soon attaining it by general recognition and universal consent. Fulton has not been identified with any particular department of legislation, but he has grown into a vastly useful man partly through his legal attainments, partly through his willingness to work, and largely through his personal character.

None of the other changes in the Senate are regarded as very significant. Joseph L. Bristow of Kansas, who replaces Senator Long, is, perhaps, next to Cummins of Iowa, the most important among the new men. Like Cummins, he is an aggressive progressionist, and it is prophesied that these new, able, and enthusiastic senators will probably "flock together" in a general campaign looking to the revitalizing of the Senate at many points. Certain it is that with Sherman in the chair and with Cummins and Bristow on the floor of the Senate, there will be in the period to come new and striking factors in the senatorial organization.

General conditions as related to the House of Representatives point to the reelection of Speaker Cannon, but at the same time to a marked curtailment of his autocratic powers. Cannon has ruled with the support of a Committee on Rules appointed by himself and made up of men both competent and willing to sustain him in the fullest measure of his purposes. The changes of the year have carried out of the House not only a goodly number, but the most effective of his supporters. At the same time they have somewhat reduced the Republican majority. Some indication of the revolt in prospect against the Speaker is afforded by the fact that it is proposed to relieve him from membership of the Rules Committee and by increasing the membership of that committee from five to seven, nine, or even fifteen, to be designated by election on the part of the House itself. Another plan is to so increase the membership of the Committee on Rules as to afford representation for every State and Territory.

In the new Congress the Speaker, while strong enough for reelection, will be relatively lacking at the point of personal support. Representative Sherman of New York, the Speaker's chief aid and prop, will go over to the other wing of the Capitol as Vice-President on March 4. Mr. Watson of Indiana, another firm supporter of the Speaker, declined renomination to run for the governorship of his State, only to be beaten. Representative Overstreet, also of Indiana and a strong supporter of Mr. Cannon, failed of reelection. Another important man lost in the Indiana disaster was Mr. Landis, who, though not of the inner circle of Mr. Cannon's friendship, always lined up with him in every crisis. Another loss is that of Representative Jenkins of Wisconsin, who was defeated for reelection; and a still greater loss is that of Hepburn of Iowa, who likewise went down to defeat.

In view of these many changes, Mr. Cannon will come into the speakership next March shorn of many elements of his power. He will lack friends and agents for some of the greater chairmanships and he will be without that defensive organization which has stood him in such good stead time and time again within the past five years. The situation is one in which a few hostile Republicans, by joining with the minority, might subject the Speaker to infinite embarrassments. Mr. Cannon will be compelled in common discretion to modify his tone, for he will not have the power to wield the rod of iron with which, if the truth be told, he has been somewhat too ready and too severe in recent years.

How these various changes, actual and possible, in the two houses of Congress may affect Mr. Taft's tariff proposals, remains to be seen. Every argument of political expediency calls for prompt action. A protracted discussion with any suggestions of wrangling over the tariff questions will plunge the country into dull times and give the new administration a bad start. Mr. Taft knows this, Mr. Roosevelt knows it, likewise the Republican members of Congress know it. In a quiet way plans are making for an expeditious handling of the tariff proposals.

Representative Dalzell of Pennsylvania, who ought to know as much about this matter as any one man, declared last week, after a visit to the White House, that a tariff bill would pass the House of Representatives within ten days after the reorganization, that is, by March 14. How long it will take the Senate to act, nobody has yet ventured to guess.

Divine Right Pegs Out.

The Emperor of Germany has been forced to admit that there are human limitations to those divine powers which have long supported the Hohenzollern throne. Divine right, for all its high and mighty pretensions, has been forced to knock under at the behest of the popular will. The incident, while apparently a simple one, is very far from being unimportant, since it comes practically as the climax of a conflict which began in the thirteenth century. Today, if we eliminate the Turk and other unspeakables who have no share in civilization as the Western races understand it, there is nobody left to sustain the outworn and rejected theory of divine right. William of Hohenzollern was the last to assert it, and in the face of recent events it would be ridiculous for him further to assert it. One who must apologize, recant, and promise to moderate his ways, is hardly so placed as to sustain a theory of divine right.

The surrender on the part of William of Hohenzollern comes as an effect of his own extravagances and indiscretions. The faults of his character have been the allies of those who have denied his pretensions; they have fought the fight of freedom in Germany more effectually than have the friends of freedom themselves. For, if William were a prudent man, if his course were consistently controlled by a sense of responsibility and propriety, there would have come no crisis, there would have been no occasion for the complete backdown into which his own follies have forced him. It is by no means the first time in history that the props and agents of privilege have unwittingly made themselves the instruments needed for the destruction of their own hopes and plans.

It was high time for the Hohenzollerns to abandon the fiction, at once stupid and arrogant, of divine right. It was high time that the theory of government in Germany should conform to the theory of government in other parts of the world. Everybody, from the emperor down to the humblest citizen of common intelligence, has known that government among men—in Germany as elsewhere—in the last analysis can have but one sanction. Everybody has known the theory of divine right to be a mere arrogant tradition, a pretense, and a humbug, cherished in the spirit of fraud and to no practical or worthy purpose. And since it has long been in the category of illogical, outworn, and discredited things, it was time for it to go by the board.

Henceforth William of Hohenzollern will rule not as one divinely authorized, one whose powers, drawn direct from God, are subject to no limitation, but as a constitutional sovereign. His powers will nominally rest where they have really rested all along, namely, upon the political necessities and upon the consent of the German peoples. The system will be no weaker for being washed of a mediæval tradition; on the other hand, it will be stronger for resting upon a basis of common sense and honesty and in conformity with modern standards as recognized and approved among civilized men.

Mr. Bryan's Plans.

The single crumb of comfort for Mr. Bryan in the result of the national election is in the political attitude of the State of Nebraska. Nebraska not only gave Mr. Bryan her electoral vote, but the general circumstances of the election were such as to assure him unquestioned mastery of the political affairs of the State. Nor is the situation an empty one, for even this early Mr. Bryan has made up his mind as to what he wants to do. He will ask the Nebraska legislature to enact a primary law patterned after the Oregon law and he will then do what Governor Chamberlain has done in Oregon. He will get himself declared the "people's choice" for the senatorship and will force the Legislature, whether it be Democratic or Republican, to make him a Senator.

Mr. Bryan would undoubtedly add distinction to the United States Senate, but it is hardly conceivable that he will do that body any other service. In his brief congressional service he did not exhibit large legislative powers. In truth, the only thing he did in Congress important enough to be remembered was to utter his famous "cross of gold" figure, which, repeated later at Chicago, gave him a presidential nomination. He has never in his life done anything in the way of consecutive or constructive work. As a senatorial committeeman it is inconceivable that he would be painstaking or diligent; as an expounder of principles it is too much to expect that he would be sound and persistent.

The truth about Mr. Bryan is just this, namely, he is a speech-maker, an agitator, and nothing else. He has brilliant and showy qualities, but he has nothing of that individual power which marks the strong man in public life or out of it. For his own welfare he would better stick to the one trade in which his success is assured. Under political responsibilities, in the Senate, or in any other relationship calling for sound and steady policies, he is certain to fail.

Let This "Issue" Rest.

In the report from Washington that the President has gotten "new light" upon the labor question we have a disingenuous confession that the "light" which he had last June when he told the convention at Chicago what it should do was not quite what it might have been. In one respect the President's newest position resembles that of a half-year back, namely, he is cocksure now as he was cocksure then. This is one of the advantages of mental and moral infallibility.

We are told that the President, having gotten and completely digested his "new understanding" with respect to the labor problem over a White House dinner, is now formulating a "policy" for the Republican party and will set it forth in the form of a special message to Congress shortly after the session begins. He will, it is said, define the course which should be adopted towards organized labor and urge it upon Congress with his "usual energy." From this we infer that he will propose a set of radical innovations upon the Constitution and laws and denounce every man in and out of Congress who refuses to approve and support them as a malefactor, an undesirable citizen, a miscreant, a coward, a slanderer, and a perjurer, or possibly by a shorter and uglier name.

We hope the President will think better of it and leave the labor question to Mr. Taft. In spite of the President's efforts last June to force upon his party Mr. Gompers's programme of special privilege to organized labor, the labor question—if indeed there now be such a question—has gotten itself into very good shape. The Republican party stands committed against the demands of organized labor for such a system of special privilege as would give it the monopoly of all labor. This much has been achieved through the brave stand taken by the delegates to the Chicago convention. The position in which the party stands today is the true one, logically and morally. It measures up squarely with the principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence, with our National Constitution, and with the statutory laws of the land. It is in harmony with universal equity and with common sense. Furthermore, it has shown its strength as an "issue" before the people, as the election of Mr. Taft, Speaker Cannon, and others abundantly and conspicuously proves.

The President will do himself credit by allowing this particular sleeping dog to lie. The only possible effect of meddling on his part at this time will surely be to stir up new trouble, to stimulate the sinister activities of those professional agitators who lead or assume to lead labor, to make trouble for his party, for his successor, and for the country. Let us hope that the President may find some other means of blowing off steam during the few months he is to remain in office, that he will leave the "labor question" in the excellent shape in which it now rests, thanks to the firm stand of a Republican convention for those principles which have come down to us from our fathers. Thanks, also, to the common sense and independent character of the individual American workman.

Elihu Root and the Senatorship.

It seems a practical certainty that Secretary Root will succeed to the New York senatorship vice Mr. Platt, who retires on the 4th of March. Curiously enough, this consummation comes in spite of the disinclination of Mr. Root to undertake the work of the Senate; likewise in spite of the fact that Mr. Root is not a popular favorite in New York State. If he could have his own way Mr. Root would rather do other things than go to the Senate, and if the people of New York were to consult their own likes and preferences there are perhaps a dozen men they would rather favor than Mr. Root.

But New York has been viciously or ineffectively represented in the Senate for a long course of years. In spite of her social and commercial preminence in the sisterhood of States, New York has been without weight in the Senate. The little State of Maine, the far Western State of Iowa, even the little State of Connecticut—any of these has had during the past dozen or more years infinitely more power in the Senate than New York. New York has failed to hold her proper rank for the simple and manifest reason that she has failed to send to the Senate men of ability or respect. This fact is thoroughly understood in New York, and it is universally regarded not only as an injury, but as a reproach.

Mr. Root, although not a popular figure, is universally esteemed a man of high character and of preeminent talent. Even those who think least of him in a personal way are ready to admit the fact that for sheer ability in the line of public affairs he outranks all others in New York. By friends and critics alike it is admitted that with Mr. Root in the Senate New York will enjoy a prestige and an influence in the legislative councils of the government in some reasonable conformity with her general standing among the States.

Mr. Root's familiarity with affairs at Washington has impressed him with the importance of better representation for New York. He knows even better than anybody else that in the Senate he could do for his State what no other man could possibly do. He is willing, therefore, as a citizen of New York and under a sense of duty to the State, to abandon plans of life previously formed and to give himself up to the laborious duties of senatorial service. The sacrifice on Mr. Root's part is considerable. He is not young and he is not rich. His earning powers as a lawyer are now very great. He could go home to New York after his Cabinet duties are done and within a brief time greatly expand his personal fortunes. He has had to choose between a selfish interest and a public interest, and he has chosen the latter.

The Senate is, and has been for some years, the weakest factor in our government, due chiefly to the conditions and motives under which it has been recruited. It has been filled up with old men selected for experience and success in other fields of achievement, or by young men as the result of political intrigue. To a very considerable extent the common reproach is true, namely, that men have been sent to the Senate because of their complacency of character and their willingness to serve private or corporate interests. These practices have given us a Senate by no means representative of the character, talent, and political purpose of the country. Nor has it given us a Senate competent in working ability. One-half of the members of the Senate hardly work at all. They are at Washington rather to enjoy the privileges and dissipations of official life than to do the work of the Senate.

Some day here in California we will come to the mental attitude illustrated in the tender of the New York senatorship to Mr. Root. We will come to the point where we shall demand the service of the best equipped and best qualified men in the State without reference to whimsical motives of personal liking and preference. Speed the day!

Tom Johnson on Himself.

Following close upon the practical break-down of Tom Johnson's scheme of municipally managed street railroads in the city of Cleveland, comes the announcement that Mr. Johnson's own fortune, which has been presumed to be very large, has been dissipated and lost. It is explained that this result has come about partly through Johnson's neglect of his own interests, but chiefly through sacrifices made by him in behalf of a brother who left an estate involved in traction enterprises.

Johnson's character—and we may well believe the cause of his failures—is curiously betrayed in his own announcement of his financial reverses. The story as he tells it is a long one, evidently reported for the Associated Press in the friendliest spirit, and is touched in every paragraph by the spirit of heroics. The low music is continuous from start to finish. Once, "and only once," when he told modestly of coming to the support of "dear brother Al's children," did his "lip quiver." He told how he and his family would move out of the big house on Euclid Avenue and into a "simple cottage," how he would sell his automobiles and "ride to work in the street cars." He said that he had been poor before and would not find it hard to be poor again, that "love and faith and hope" and all the rest of it "still survived." He did not, he said, ever intend to work again for "mere wealth"; he should stay right in Cleveland and continue to "fight privilege and special interest," incidentally doing what he could for "dear Al's children" at long range.

His enemies, he goes on to say, are planning to bring further financial trouble upon him. He has been expecting it; one should expect nothing else, he said, from special privilege. However, let them take what they may, let them reduce Tom Johnson to the direst poverty, and still they will find "a thousand fights" left in him. "I will," he said, "never give up. I am well and strong and confident and they will always find me at the front. If I had been a coward, if I had run away from this fight for the people of Cleveland, I could have saved my fortune and built it up. But I had chosen my course; I had no mind to alter it and I have no mind to alter it now."

Then follows a more or less philosophical discourse upon the folly of money making, with incidental reference to past exploits in Wall Street. "I bought and sold with E. H. Harriman and I suppose I could go and do it again." Mr. Johnson proceeds to declare that he hasn't been laboring for the people in the hope of reward or gratitude, but just for the pleasure of doing a work that he likes and of "keeping in the fight." Then the story concludes with the statement that Mr. Johnson will again be a candidate for mayor, etc., etc., etc.

Self-consciousness, a colossal vanity, personal self-complacency, inordinate ambition—these qualities mark and characterize the statement from beginning to end. Mr. Johnson appears much like a "mourner" at a religious revival; he enjoys talking about his own misfortunes and losses just as the sensationally converted sinner loves to tell about his past wickednesses. Affecting humility and unselfishness, he nevertheless boasts of his dealings with the distinguished and the great of the financial world and to compliment himself upon his ability to do it again. He is not only ready, but anxious, to turn the whole incident to political account, to continue in spite of his personal and public failures to pose as a leader and guide of the people. In brief, Mr. Tom Johnson in the hour of his failure furnishes indisputable proof that he is nothing better than a cheap egotist, a bag of wind, a vulgar demagogue. That is what all wise men have suspected him of being all along.

The truly great men of the world are not of this sort. The men who do great things rarely have time to cherish the mood for self-complacent boasting. Their energies are concentrated not upon self, but the work under their hand. To be, as Cromwell aptly put it, "purged of self"—this is the first essential of intellectual and moral greatness.

Sober Second Thought.

The ten days or more which have elapsed since the assault upon Francis J. Heney in Judge Lawlor's court room have not been favorable in their general conditions to calm and just counsels. Neither the public mind nor the minds of those who may be styled participants in or close observers of the contentions connected with the graft cases have been disposed to reason or to judgment. It has been a period when emotion, passion, prepossession, suspicion, with all the other senses which are stirred to abnormal activity by tragic events, have ruled. The Argonaut, habited as it is to judicial methods of observation and judgment, can not feel assured that itself has wholly escaped the contagion of the hour, that it has seen comprehensively and fairly, that it has been able to dispose incidents in their just relations—in brief, that it has seen things precisely as they are. But at least the Argonaut has tried to look upon the procession of events with a judicial eye, to estimate the significance of things fairly, and to judge the conduct of individuals dispassionately and in that spirit of charity in which it would itself be judged.

The most patent fact in the situation as it presents itself ten days after the event is this, namely, that the assault upon Heney has been widely and mischievously misinterpreted. Abroad and even at home large numbers of people have been led to believe that Heney's assailant was the hired agent of a revengeful conspiracy; that Heney was the victim of attempted assassination at the hands of persons against whom he has proceeded criminally and of whom Morris Haas was a mere tool. There is no evidence, not even the suggestion of evidence, to support this theory. Every circumstance connected with the assault goes to demonstrate that Haas was a creature of infirm mental and moral make-up, unbalanced as a consequence of broodings upon the basis of real or imagined injury at the hands of Heney. Whatever in other respects may be the guilt or the misdoings of those against whom Mr. Heney and his associates have been proceeding in the graft cases, plainly they are not connected with the crime of Morris Haas.

If Mr. Heney's associates had been imbued with the spirit of fairness, of moralized large-mindedness, so to speak, they would not have been willing that an incident which plainly grew out of Mr. Heney's own dealings with a rejected juror should have been misinterpreted and misreported, to be made the basis of wide misconception. They should not have consented, even for the sake of winning support for their cause, to proceed upon the basis of a theory essentially and absolutely misleading; furthermore, a theory most discreditable in its reflections upon San Francisco. Detective Burns, partisan though he is and disposed though he is to suspicion through the tendencies of his trade, can not have been deceived to the extent of believing that the act of Haas was the outcome of a conspiracy or that it made Heney a martyr to the vengeance of the protagonists of the graft prosecution. Nor can Mr. Phelan or Mr. Spreckels have been deceived as to the causes and motives of this assault. It is not to their credit, therefore, that they have allowed the conspiracy theory to go uncontradicted, by their consent and silence, to have participated in a widespread scheme of public deception.

When Morris Haas, immediately after his assault upon Heney, was taken into custody he was searched by two officers of police and by Detective Burns. Official responsibility for the fact that a pistol secreted upon his person was overlooked in the search rests, of course, upon the officer of police in charge of that procedure, but in a moral sense Mr. Burns is as much responsible as anybody. Captain Duke ought to have found Haas's pistol; likewise Mr. Burns ought to have found it. The attempt to connect Chief Biggy with this incident to his discredit is simply a piece of presumptuous dishonesty. It proceeds from a spirit of resentment due to the fact that Biggy has not joined with Burns in misinterpreting Haas's crime as that of a hired assassin acting for an organized conspiracy. Biggy having the fullest information, having kept his head, having from the beginning seen the whole incident in its true and plain significance, spoke his mind about it. Burns, seeking to turn the incident to the advantage of the prosecution, would have had Biggy second his own unwarranted theory; and now he aims, through such influences as he may set in motion, to dismiss Biggy from his place as a matter of private revenge.

The Argonaut is no admirer of Biggy. It has criticised him at various times during the past two years for his subserviency to the graft prosecution. It has regarded him as lacking not in personal honesty, but in character and resolution. It censured his appointment as chief of police and has resented his complaisance in permitting men nominally under his authority to be used as spies and agents of the prosecutors. But whatever censure of Mr. Biggy may be legitimate on the score of other things, he most surely is not to be blamed for not yielding to the suggestions of Mr. Burns and joining in a cooked-up theory of the Heney assault for the sake of helping Burns to deceive the public and thereby enlist the forces of popular moral resentment in behalf of Burns's employers.

We hear suggestions that the mayor, acting upon the advice of the graft prosecutors, may dismiss Biggy from his place as chief of police by way of punishment for his failure to "stand in" with Burns. Now the Argonaut cares nothing about Biggy; by his subserviency to the prosecution in times past he has lost standing and respect; he deserves no sympathy. At the same time we hope that the mayor will not permit himself to be made the instrument of private vengeance—this for his own sake and for the credit of a government which, though often stupidly mistaken, is at bottom, we think, entirely honest.

Public sentiment, to have real value, must be genuine in its quality and founded upon the truth. How little this principle is understood in certain quarters is illustrated by the circumstances under which a series of public meetings have been held in San Francisco and elsewhere during the past ten days with reference to the Heney-Haas incident. Uniformly at these meetings it has been represented that Haas's assault upon Heney was a direct consequence of Heney's activities against certain persons accused of crime. In not one instance, so far as we can learn, has there been a fair and honest statement of the facts. The speeches made and the resolutions adopted have all been founded in prejudice and misinformation. The meetings, in truth, have largely been promoted upon calculations of partisan advantage for the graft prosecution. To what lengths the scheme of promotion and direction has proceeded may be inferred from an incident reported from San Jose. After the San Jose meeting had assembled there was handed to its chairman a telegraphic message from Mr. Spreckels to a friend in San Jose, directing that Congressman Hayes was not to be permitted to have part in the proceedings. Any comment upon this incident would be superfluous. But, if this was the method at San Jose, if it was for Mr. Spreckels to say who should and who should not have part, this question suggests itself, namely, how much value have the "resolutions" of these meetings, regarded as expressions of public opinion?

As the Heney-Haas incident falls into perspective, as it is seen that Heney's injuries were in truth relatively slight, as the public mind grows calmer and as returning judgment asserts itself, it is discovered that no vital change in the situation has been wrought by the tragic event of ten days ago. What was right before is right now; what was wrong before is wrong now; white has not been turned to black, nor has black been turned to white. Nor has there been any change in the motives or purposes of anybody vitally connected with the matters at issue. Practically the situation stands where it stood on the morning of the 13th instant. Judgment must ultimately be rendered not upon the basis of a mood of excitement and horror, but upon the basis of facts and law.

In a sense the prosecution is the gainer for the assault upon Heney because public sympathy was instantly crystallized in behalf of a man presumed to have been struck down by the hand of malice in the exercise of a public duty. Whether justified or mistaken, the sentiment which turned toward the prosecution was a moral sentiment, prompted by moral presumptions and given by people of moral ideas and aspirations. Whether Mr. Heney and his associates are to retain this support will depend wholly upon themselves. We have seen already in the progress of the graft movement how moral support falls away from those who fail at the point of moral courses. The graft prosecution would never have lost the support of public opinion as it did if it had continuously deserved to be well thought of. The restored standing which it has gained through a tragic incident will not last if the agents of the prosecution shall fail to carry themselves in a straightforward and honest line. No more now than before will the public give its support to questionable measures and procedures. Already criticism may be heard on the part of discerning persons of the course of Detective Burns and Mr. Phelan in seeking to enforce the theory of a conspiracy in connection with the assault upon Heney. Likewise criticism is heard of Mr. Spreckels for attempting to dictate the procedure of meetings called for the expression of public sentiment relative to the assault upon Heney. Multitudes, jealous of the moral repute of San Francisco abroad, are censuring the prosecutors for insisting upon the plainly mistaken theory that the would-be murderer of Heney acted not upon his own disordered initiative, but as the agent of a group of plotting assassins. Something will be excused on the score of excitement and partisan spirit, but this plea will not sustain the prosecutors in a persistent course of misinterpretation of plain events and of defamation of San Francisco.

Much will depend upon Mr. Heney. He is now practically recovered; indeed, his physicians have declared that he might have left the hospital if he so desired within five days after the assault. He is sufficiently restored to health to be able to receive visitors, to talk freely about his business affairs, and with his own hand to write messages to those who have given him sympathy. If, upon his complete restoration, Mr. Heney shall pursue a straightforward, moderate, and restrained course, he may retain some measure, at least, of the revived good will which his recent experience has brought him. But if he shall return to the methods of the past two years, with repetition of the courses which before lost him the support of the public, the new support and new strength will fall from him as did the old.

As for the work immediately in hand, Mr. Heney would far better leave it to those who have taken it up. Messrs. Johnson, Sullivan, and Dwyer will probably succeed in convicting Abraham Ruef. Whatever discredit, legally and otherwise, there was in the making of the immunity contract and later in the breaking of it does not attach to them. Putting aside all questions of legal capability, their position with reference to this case is more fortunate and more favorable than that of Mr. Heney, and they would better be allowed to carry the case to its end.

The admission of strangers to the House of Commons has always been regarded in modern times as a sort of English popular right, and the Suffragists have effected as yet nothing so important as their exclusion. It is, up to date, the chief fruit of their agitation. The liberty of outside attendance at debates of the House of Commons was very slowly achieved. No strangers listened to debates during the seventeenth century, and the only record of the great Civil War discussions was made by a member of Parliament, Sir Simon D'Ewes, who sat with a little board slung to his neck, and on the board an ink-pot and pieces of paper. Those precious pieces of paper, thickly annotated, are still preserved in the British Museum. During the early eighteenth century the House of Commons was more than ever hidden from the nation, and it was behind that veil of secrecy that there grew up the vast system of corruption controlled by Sir Robert Walpole. The House of Commons, as Macaulay remarks, had escaped from the control of the king and not yet fallen under the control of the public.

The Earl of Rosebery, who is a descendant of the Viscountess Primrose, has presented to the City of Edinburgh the ancient, historic, and quaintly built Lady Stair's House, to be used for a municipal museum. When Lady Primrose became a widow, Lord Stair forced her to marry him by the same bold strategy that made him a field marshal. Slipping into her house, he showed himself in déshabille at her bedroom windows. All Edinburgh rang with the scandal, and to end it Lady Primrose became the Countess of Stair. The house is situated in the Lawnmarket, once very fashionable, but now corresponding to our East Broadway. It has been completely restored by Lord Rosebery, and its curious inner stairway and oddly shaped rooms are intact.

SOME POLITICAL ECHOES.

Mr. Root occupies the enviable position of a man who is seriously needed in more than one of the departments of our public life. As a rule it is the man that demands the place rather than the place that demands the man, but in this instance we find something like a competition in pursuit of a statesman whose abilities have raised him shoulders high above the crowd.

Shall Mr. Root continue as Secretary of State or shall he be chosen as the senator from New York in place of Mr. Platt? Mr. Root's personal predilections do not enter into the matter at all, as he has already proved their subordination to the public interest. But which way does the public interest lie? This is the point that is now being discussed with some vigor.

Mr. Root's success in the Department of State has been very marked. The foreign relations of the country have never before been handled with such insight, nor has our diplomatic status abroad ever been higher. But it is pointed out with some plausibility that it will no longer be so imperative that a man of unique capacity should occupy the chair of the Secretary of State. Mr. Taft will himself be able to keep a watchful and experienced eye upon foreign affairs, whereas Mr. Root in the Senate would find no parallel in that body for intellect or grasp of public affairs.

The New York World says that New York politicians are perfectly willing to accept Mr. Root as successor to Senator Platt if it can be so arranged as to obliterate all traces of coercion and influence on the part of President Roosevelt. Ex-Lieutenant Governor Woodruff holds the key to the situation. He has a devoted following and a stubborn candidacy would provoke a contest destructive to party harmony. If he steps aside, there will be no other aspirant than Root. Writing on November 11, the World said:

These propositions today constituted the basis on which the election of Secretary Root as senator were considered piecemeal. Different phraseology was utilized in submitting them in turn to each of the interested parties who visited President Roosevelt under the guise of social guests. There was no conference en masse. Each man, when his time came, was taken off in a corner and the words of wisdom whispered in his ear by the President, Secretary Loch, or National Committeeman Ward.

It is President Roosevelt's conviction that if he can get Woodruff out of the way the New York legislature will accept Root and the whole matter can be settled without a contest.

It was impressed upon Woodruff that if he will not get out of the senatorial race there will be a wild scramble, which may dash the fine opportunities the Republican organization is supposed to have of gaining control of Greater New York at the next municipal election.

Woodruff would admit nothing, but one of his friends, one of those before-mentioned, said that he is a very reasonable man and is inclined to give due weight to the representation that unless he gets out of the way for Secretary Root there will be trouble, not for him, of course, but for the party.

The diplomacy at Washington is of course of the devious kind that denies facts en bloc. If we may accept the official assurances, we must believe that the question of the New York senatorship has not been mentioned at the White House and that the guests from New York who visited the President confined their deliberations to the weather and foothall.

The Springfield Republican, while admitting Mr. Root's abilities, seems to think that it would be better to leave well enough alone:

But Mr. Root is being pushed for the Senate. That body, it is urged, needs another Republican constitutional lawyer of the first rank, now that Mr. Spooner is gone and Mr. Foraker is soon to retire. In the capacity of consulting counsel for the Senate, Mr. Root would possess eminent qualifications, yet it is almost too much to expect that, beginning at the age of 64, he could hope to win a great reputation as a senator. Even great constitutional lawyers have to enter that body ordinarily somewhat younger than Mr. Root would to gain real eminence there. The late William M. Everts of New York entered the Senate, in 1885, at the age of 67. He was the leader of the American bar and had served a term, like Mr. Root, as Secretary of State. Mr. Everts's term in the Senate added almost nothing to his permanent fame. He was never quite at home there, and his influence upon legislation proved much less than had been anticipated. If Mr. Root were to consult the Everts precedent, he would see that a distinguished constitutional lawyer and an experienced foreign minister may enter the Senate late in life to little real purpose.

We are, of course, hearing the old story that Mr. Root's corporation associations render him undesirable as a senator. It is indeed strange that those who advance such an argument can do so with a straight face. Even the warmest advocate of senatorial purity need hardly fear that the immaculate whiteness of that august assembly would be soiled by the presence of Mr. Root as a successor to Mr. Platt.

Public opinion is already being aroused by the sittings of the House committee on tariff revision. Editorial views are still somewhat scanty, but we are hearing a good deal from trade organs and from districts whose special interests are, or may be, affected. Among those who argue along broad lines, the Wall Street Journal says that some truths are "self-evident":

1. A majority of the people of the United States desire a revision of the tariff. The platforms of both of the great parties contained pledges of tariff revision, and fully 14,000,000 citizens voted in support of these pledges.
2. A majority of the people are in favor of a revision of the tariff by the friends of the protective policy. The success of the Republican party is proof of this.
3. A majority of the people want tariff revision conducted along conservative lines and with as little disturbance to business as possible. The defeat of Bryan and the election of Taft are proof of this.
4. But the people want a revision the object of which shall be to remove useless and burdensome duties, and so far as possible, without damage to any legitimate industry, to reduce the cost of living.

A "revision upward" would therefore be a monstrosity.

The Springfield Republican is terse and caustic:

"There will be no hop, skip and jump revision of the tariff," insists Senator Beveridge. On the contrary, it will be something exceedingly conservative and sedate. We all know it.

The Tribune remarks that we have now an opportunity to take the tariff out of sectional politics:

A new tariff will have to be framed with a view not only to readjusting the protection given to home industry, but also to enlarging the scope of our foreign trade and equipping this country to meet the discriminations and enjoy the concessions now so conspicuous a feature in international exchanges. In a word, the new tariff must be scientifically drawn, and with a view to subserving national rather than local and sectional interests. * * * There is a better chance now than ever to take the tariff out of politics—certainly out of sectional politics.

The New York World is skeptical. It may be that the millennium is ahead of us and that we may hope to keep within our incomes, but "there are shoals and quicksands in the way":

To take the tariff out of sectional politics and to take sectional politics out of the tariff would be a great achievement. We hope to see it accomplished. But those who have seen other tariffs made or marred may be pardoned for incredulity as to that result, when the "non-sectional" tariff is to be framed by Cannon, Payne, and Dalzell and vised by Aldrich, Hale, and Burrows; when the President-elect himself has said that the pottery impost of 25 and 55 per cent is probably too low; when the Oxnard cohorts are gathered in Washington to prove that 1 cent and 2 cents a pound on more than four thousand million pounds of imported sugar, costing the consumer somewhere near $80,000,000 a year, is not sufficient; and when the "stand-pat" idea of maximum and minimum rates is to take the Dingley rates for the minimum and soar aloft for the maximum.

Perhaps the tariff millennium is ahead, and with it some hope of cheaper living; but there are shoals and quicksands in the way.

The New York Commercial believes that many material reductions are demanded by the people, and especially of those duties that allow the manufacturer to sell his goods at a lower price abroad than he gets at home. It cites the illustrating fact that American watches costing $75 at home can be bought in other parts of the world for about $42:

A leading line of inquiry prior to actual legislation will of necessity be directed at those conditions which enable American manufacturers in certain lines to maintain prices in the domestic markets here in the United States higher than they ask of foreign buyers—the very rankest kind of discrimination against the home consumer.

The New York Journal of Commerce is not hopeful of tariff revision so long as the "old stand-pat crowd" are upon deck:

That there will be a revision of the tariff that is a real reform and will materially moderate the policy of protection, can not be expected from the continued control of legislation by the party of high protection under the virtual domination of the old "stand-pat crowd." It is one of the unfortunate results of the Bryan candidacy and its overwhelming defeat that the Republican party is strengthened in its position, and the wholesome influence of a vital and vigorous opposition will be lacking. The only good that we can look for from the promised tariff revision of 1909 is a discussion that may be more enlightening and stimulating than any that we have had in the past, when the protected interests have practically shaped the schedules to suit themselves and paid for the privilege. That may give a new direction to agitation and lead to reform later on.

Mr. Hitchcock's card index added considerably to the gaiety of nations during the campaign, but there are some who are finding out that the card index is not quite such a joke as it seemed. Mr. Hitchcock is said to know to the last damning detail who didn't play fair with Mr. Taft and who did. The Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Post says that "already some of those who kept the soft pedal on when shouting for Taft during the campaign have come to town with boasts of their prowess and to discover whether they can claim something not already nailed down. They will probably be severely shocked when they make application to Mr. Taft for a share of the patronage to discover that they are catalogued among others whose claim to a share of the fruits of victory are to be disregarded." Continuing, the Post says:

The statesmen who wrote letters to President Roosevelt about Mr. Hitchcock's incompetence, or who went to Oyster Bay hearing tales of impending disaster, now have reason to shiver in their hoots. They are on the list. Some of them wanted money, and others place and power, and when they were refused they tore away to Oyster Bay with the tale of their troubles. It seems reasonable to suppose that Mr. Hitchcock will have a large share in assisting Mr. Taft in determining who shall be rewarded among the party workers, and whose claims for services rendered shall be disallowed. It does not seem within the bounds of the probable that men who hampered Mr. Hitchcock, or, while pretending to carry out his programme, secretly worked against him, will be given much consideration.

Among those who are not upon the blacklist is John Hays Hammond, and a good many of his Washington friends think that he would make an ideal Secretary of Commerce and Labor. The Post says it seems queer that none of the prophets and soothsayers have put him on the list of probabilities. But some of them have.

Azerbaijan, into which Britain and Russia are prepared, if necessary, to carry the sword of peace, is the home of the descendants of the Ghebers, the ancient fire-worshippers of Persia. The whole countryside is admirably adapted to the propagation of a fire-worshipping creed, for earthquakes and caverns vomiting fumes from subterranean conflagrations abound in the neighborhood of Tabriz. One of the most remarkable caverns in the world is that of Secunderah, whose character resembles the Grotto del Cane of Naples. It gives off noxious fumes, which at certain times are certain death to man and beast. But the most astonishing place in Azerbaijan is the ruined city of Takht-i-Suleimann, or Solomon's Temple. The city stands on a hill 150 feet high, with a wall of thirty feet embracing the crumbling remains of temple and shrine. In the midst is a lake. Although most of the buildings are of the Mohammedan period, there is one striking mass which has been identified as the temple of the fire-worshippers.

The expression, "Painting the town red," has been traced to "The Divine Comedy." Dante, led by Virgil, comes to the cavernous depths of the place swept by a mighty wind where those are confined who have been the prey of their passions. Two faces arise from the mist—the faces of Francesca and Paolo. "Who are ye?" cries Dante in alarm; and Francesca replies sadly, "We are those who have painted the world red with our sins."

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Only one President of the United States has ever entered the White House without the electoral vote of his own State. That was James K. Polk.

Governor Hughes reported expenditures amounting to $369 during the recent campaign, and observers economically inclined, who have studied the election returns, believe he might have saved the money.

John W. Kern is opposed in his candidacy for the Indiana senatorship by Thomas Taggart, of former Democratic campaigns notoriety. The Indiana legislature is Democratic by twelve majority in joint ballot.

Early returns of the election in Georgia showed that John Temple Graves, a favorite son of the State, had received eighty-five votes for the vice-presidency on the Hisgen ticket. A prophet is not without honor save in his own country.

In a letter received by Chief Justice Kent, President Roosevelt writes that he will urge in his message to Congress separate statehood for Arizona and New Mexico and will assist Governor Kibbey in preparing and urging the enabling act.

National Chairman Frank Hitchcock says of the Republican campaign fund that it was smaller in its aggregate than any similar fund since the record of such funds has been kept, and that it was collected from every State in the Union.

J. N. Larned, the librarian and historian, criticises his home city of Buffalo, N. Y., as follows: "A city that can vote down a governor of the quality and the record of Charles E. Hughes by 5500 majority is in terrible need of more effective moral and political education than it seems to have got hitherto."

George S. Terry has been appointed Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York City, as successor to Hamilton Fish, resigned. Throughout the presidential campaign Mr. Terry acted as assistant to Treasurer George R. Sheldon at the Republican national headquarters and had almost complete control of the business side of the fight.

S. N. D. North, director of the federal census, congratulated Mr. Sherman, his old friend, in a dispatch containing these phrases: "What a joy it is that the next Vice-President of the United States will be the best parliamentarian who has sat in the presiding officer's chair of the Senate since the days of Colfax; that he is a son of old Hamilton, and that is you."

The Rev. French E. Oliver, a Kansas revivalist of more than local fame, has issued an open letter to W. J. Bryan urging the Nebraskan to become an evangelist, and predicting that Mr. Bryan would become the equal of the Apostle Paul. Mr. Oliver writes: "I am firmly convinced that one ambassador of Christ of your calibre is worth more to this nation than ten thousand Presidents."

Major Edward A. Meerns of the army medical corps, stationed at Fort Totten, N. Y., who will accompany President Roosevelt on his African hunting trip, recently was before an examining board at Washington for promotion, but failed. In consequence he will be retired in January with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. This will leave him free to go with the President.

Chauncey Depew is not altogether silent concerning the choosing of a successor to his colleague, Senator Platt. "Several gentlemen," he said, "seem to be spending most of their time telling the President who are to be the ambassadors accredited to New York without consulting the present Senators or the man who will be the next Senator. If they are not telling the President they are down at Hot Springs telling the President-elect, when he is not playing golf. I do not need to name these gentlemen. You know who they are. They seem to forget that we have a legislature of 201 men who can't be driven, hoodwinked, or bulldozed."

The temporary roll call of the House of Representatives for the Sixty-first Congress has been completed and published. It presents a complete list of members of the new House as shown by unofficial returns, and gives the politics of all of them. According to this publication, the next House will consist of 219 Republicans and 172 Democrats, a total of 391, as against a total of 389 in the House during the last session, of whom 223 were Republicans and 166 Democrats. The result is a net loss of four from the Republican side and a net gain of six on the Democratic side, the discrepancy being due to present vacancies. All told, the Democrats gain 17 districts and the Republicans 12.

Senator Foraker has made public a letter written to him at his request by Virgil P. Kline of Cleveland, who employed him to look after the interests of the Standard Oil Company in connection with suits brought against that company by the State of Ohio. The truth of Mr. Kline's statements is vouched for by H. F. Elliott of the Standard Oil Company, who was familiar with all the circumstances attending Mr. Foraker's employment. Not for seven years, says Mr. Kline, has Mr. Foraker been employed by the Standard Oil Company in any capacity. Mr. Kline's statement, together with Mr. Foraker's emphatic denial that his relations with the oil company conflicted in the slightest with the performance of his public duties, may go far toward rehabilitating his political fortunes, but it seems unlikely that he will succeed himself as Senator.

MANHATTAN'S OPERATIC RIVALRY.

Opening of the Metropolitan Opera House Season with "Aida"—Hammerstein a Week Earlier with "Tosca."

The Metropolitan Opera House reopened its doors last evening for the beginning of the twenty-fourth season of opera—the twenty-sixth year since the house was built and dedicated to the uses of the lyric drama. There was great enthusiasm, and the performance was of exceptional splendor. The opera chosen for the opening of the new season under the new directors, Messrs. Gatti-Casazza and Dippel, was "Aida," performed under the direction of the new conductor, Arturo Toscanini. He, as well as several of the new singers of the company, made their first appearance before a New York audience, headed by Mme. Emmy Destinn.

As to the performance, it does not much matter what it is, the first night. It is taken as a whole and not analyzed to death. It is the grand ensemble that takes immediate effect on the audience, and nothing more gorgeous in the way of scenic effect, of choral massing, grouping, processions of color schemes and contrasts, nothing more voluminous in the way of vocal outpourings and of stage music, has been seen. The new management strained every nerve and put forward all its resources, apparently, to outdo all that had ever been done before. This prevailing spirit seemed to influence every member of the cast. Caruso, who reappeared in the part of Rhadames, sang with more power, with more insistent dwelling on the highest tones, with more prodigal expenditure of resources, than ever before. Even Mme. Homer put forth her rich, luscious tones to the limit of their capacity.

Mme. Destinn, the new dramatic soprano from Berlin, and who is to have so large a part in the responsibilities of the season, was the Aida. She has a voice of great power and beauty, flexible and wholly subservient to her intentions. She, too, was fired with the same spirit and let the audience hear the utmost sonorities of which she was capable. It was a magnificent performance and had a thrilling effect upon the audience, keyed up, as it was, in anticipation. There was a special greeting for Mr. Toscanini and an outburst of applause for Mr. Gatti-Casazza and Mr. Dippel when they appeared with the others.

The audience was brilliant, but with scarcely a vivid note of color to be seen. Nearly all the gowns were white or in pale shades; some blacks, but no glaring things. The gowns were unusually handsome, but the display of jewels was not as great as at former premieres. Very few tiaras were seen, especially among the younger women. Among the tiara wearers were Mrs. Ogden Mills, Mrs. William D. Sloane, Mrs. Robert Golet, Mrs. Reginald Vanderbilt, Mrs. George Gould, and Mrs. Perry Belmont. Last winter, for the first time in many years, the presence of Mrs. Astor, whose entrance just a little after the close of the first act had been one of the events of the evening, was wanting, and the fact of her recent death was accentuated. The Wilsons were absent, and Mrs. Vanderbilt being abroad and Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt being in mourning, made considerable change in the famous "golden horseshoe." But there were no vacant boxes. Captain Philip and Mrs. Lydig have taken the Astor box for Monday nights. With them last night were Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Mackay. Mr. and Mrs. George Gould had with them in their box Mr. James B. Clews and his fiancée, Mrs. Oscar Livingston, who are to be married within a few days, and their débutante daughter, Miss Marjorie Gould.

It would be impossible to describe many of the gowns. All were superb. Mrs. Clarence Mackay wore cloth of silver, with corsage and flowing sleeves of silver lace; her gems were pearls and diamonds. Mrs. Lydig was sumptuous in an empire robe of black velvet with top of corsage and sleeves of Venetian point, and a plastron of diamonds. Mrs. Reginald Vanderbilt, white satin veiled in silver tulle, diamonds and pearls. Mrs. George Gould, pale blue satin princess, the bodice composed largely of point lace. She wore her famous pearls and diamond shoulder straps. Miss Marjorie Gould wore a simple Grecian gown of white crêpe bordered with dull silver. Mrs. Nicholas Longworth wore mauve satin, heavily embroidered in gold.

NEW YORK, November 17, 1908.

From an earlier letter, by the Argonaut's regular correspondent, the following paragraphs are taken. The Manhattan Opera House opened its grand-opera season Monday evening, November 9, a week before the Metropolitan's first offering was presented:

Mr. Hammerstein's third season is on, and it began with a blaze of theatrical and society display. Puccini's "Tosca" was the opera chosen for the occasion, and with it came the début of Maria Labia, a new singer for the name-part. Maria Labia is a handsome, though rather massive, young woman with a good voice and considerable art, though it must be admitted that she does not eclipse Cavalieri in the passionate yet tender rôle of Sardou's heroine, transported to the operatic stage. She was greatly admired in this part in Berlin, according to all accounts, and even though she created no furor at the Manhattan, she fully justified the astute manager's choice of operas and star for the opening performance. Maurice Renaud was the Scarpia, and he succeeded admirably in a new rôle for him here. He is one of the baritones who is secure in his artistic rank, and it is a high one. Zanatello, the Cavaradossi, is also new to the Manhattan. Campanini conducted, with an augmented orchestra which performed very well.

There was little evidence that a rival opera house, and that for years the shrine of society devotion, was soon to offer no less attractive a company and accessories. The boxes were filled. Indeed, every seat had been sold days before, and the subscription this year is greater than ever known.

The Tower of Belus.

I am the tower of Belus—the tower of Belus, I!
Under the rifling lines of the gloaming's tremulous sky.
Under the shiting signs of the ages circling by,
I stand in the might of the mighty—the tower of Belus, I!
Who are these at my feet, like pigmies scorched in the sun?
Who hute the petty hordes of a race that has just begun?
It matters little to me whether prince or Bedouin stand,
Or the lizard creep at my feet, or the jackal, up from the sand;

What does the time-hound traveler know of the dim hy-gone?
What can he tell of the glory that died with the world's bright dawn

More than the son of the desert? the slim, green, creeping things?
The night owl fast in his crevice? the hat with his ghostly wings?

Each in his own way imagines the past and the yet-to-be;
I am the tower of Belus: ages unnumbered are mine;
Mightier I than the gods who dreamed themselves divine!

Is this the grandest of rivers, that rolled like a king to the sea,
Crying, "I am the great Euphrates! Bring all your tithes unto me!"

How the ships with their treasured freight went down to their rocky head!
Are there phouls, insatiate still, with grinning mouths to be fed.

That you hurst your strong emhankments, ravaging meadows and fen,
Making drearier drear desolation, in scorn for the arts of men?

Ah, Babylonia, where—ah, where is thy fruitful plain?
Spreading, sea-like, into the ocean its hilly fields of grain?
Where now is the mighty city, secure with its brazen gates,
And walls on whose towering fastness the Assyrian warrior waits.

His milk-white steeds in war gear, his hlazoned flags unfurled,
Hurling, in grim defiance, his challenge out to the world?
Where are the teeming millions who wrought with their cunning skill

Sweet dreams of a fair ideal in forms that were fairer still?
Oh, Babylon's looms are silent; in silence dead are the plains;
And dead is the city and soldier; the tower alone remains.

I am the tower of Belus: I stand in the grasp of fate!
I and the Semitic princess: together we watch and wait—
She for her lover's coming, I for oblivion's knell—
Which with the greater longing, the heavens alone can tell.

Is there any joy in existence void of hopes or of fears,
In painless, slow dissolution through thousands of weary years?

Or rest for the ghost of the maiden, who alike in life and in death,
While years into centuries ripen, and centuries wane, keeps faith?

She counts not night nor morning, but each new moon to greet
She cometh with shadowy garments, whose subtle perfume sweet

From halms forever forgotten floats over the secret hed
Where her lover, impatient, is sleeping the sleep of the restless dead.

For had he not said: "Beloved, come at the mystical hour
When the young moon lightens with silver the shade of the mighty tower?"

Had he not sworn: "Though I perish! though Belus lie in the dust!"

And the trust of a loving woman is blind and unending trust.

Three hands were joined at their parting; three voices
Breathing love's breath:

The voice of the third was ghostly; its hand was the hand of death;
And the white stone goddess had shivered, while the glow of the sunset dyes

Had deepened in one broad blood-streak, and hlazed in the western skies;
But the maiden, unheeding the omen, hears only her lover's last oath,

Nor dreams that her life has been purchased with this—as he dieth for both.

The grave that is reeking with vengeance no tale of its mystery brings,
Gods! he was a Tyrian soldier: she, the daughter of kings!
And what hut death can he reckoned as price of unequal love?
And what hut the vow recorded by direful fates above
Could save the life of the maiden?—the vow that never again,
While the tower of mighty Belus o'er shadows the haunts of men

With its ancient and storied grandeur—ay, more! that never the while

One upright stone shall be standing alight with the young moon's smile.

Shall hody or ghost of the soldier under its shadows wait.
But death is longer than lifetime, and love is stronger than fate!

There were hope e'en yet for the tower, standing stark and alone.
Had the flames of an altar-fire e'er hurned in its heart of stone;
Had the depths of its adamant hosom e'er thrilled with a love or a hate

Stern destiny's grip must have slackened—slackened sooner or late.

I am the tower of Belus! Can the story be written "I was"?

Shall the tide of an ended existence flow back to the primal cause

Which sent it first into being, and records of ages sublime
In utter nothingness vanish, under the finger of Time?

Hist! a jar in the ragged brick-work! It totters, and now is still:

I can feel the sand slow trickling with a cold unearthly thrill:
Perchance hut a stone is falling—perchance it is death's last throe—

Aye! under the young moon's glitter I catch the roseate glow
Of the maiden's royal mantle; the clang of a mailed tread
Tells that the Past has canceled its debt which held the dead.
He cometh with step triumphant! He readeth the fateful sign!

The last grim arch is shattered which linked their fate with mine.

Ah, Fate! to the last relentless; thy vassal allegiance owns—
Go back to your cities, O stranger; write: "Belus, a heap of stones."

INDIVIDUALITIES.

J. Pierpont Morgan belongs to thirty-five clubs, and his membership dues figure over $7000 annually. August Belmont is a member of thirty-four, and Chauncey M. Depew belongs to thirty-two.

The Marquis of Stafford, who is in his twentieth year, is heir to the most extensive domain, if not the largest rent roll, enjoyed by any subject of King Edward. More than 1,000,000 acres in England and Scotland are under the lordship of his father.

Professor Frances Squire Potter, whose paper read before the Buffalo Convention for Equal Suffrage attracted much attention, is the mother of four children. Besides her work as professor of English at the University of Minnesota she finds time to do considerable writing. She has just completed her second novel, has written a successful play, and is frequently called upon to lecture on economic subjects.

The Maharajah of Kapurthala is in Paris with his wife, whom he first met in Madrid as a dancing girl. Anita Delgado was graceful and beautiful, and the maharajah lost no time in winning her regard. He took her to Paris to be trained for the position she was to occupy, and she developed into a handsome woman of dignity and presence. Later he carried her to his home in India and last winter made her his wife with Oriental ceremony.

Miss "Councillor" Dove has been chosen by a large majority to be lady mayor of the borough of High Wycombe, England, under the parliamentary act of 1907, which made the election of women councillors, aldermen, and mayors possible. She is the first woman mayor in the United Kingdom. Miss Dove is a college-bred woman, now teaching school, who has long taken an interest in the educational and political affairs of her native borough.

William Bayard Hale is the New York newspaper man who secured a personal interview with Emperor William at Berlin and sold the frank expressions of the monarch to the Century Magazine. The storm of criticism and acrimonious discussion aroused by an earlier statement from the Kaiser published in a London paper caused a hasty intervention to postpone the Hale interview. The New York papers, however, have given out what are said to be correct summaries of the interdicted report.

Miss Florence Haywood of Indianapolis has installed herself as a guide to the Louvre in Paris. She conducts through the galleries and museum parties which vary in number from sixteen to sixty, and which usually are made up of her compatriots. She is original, animated, learned, and critical, and lectures on the Louvre's artistic treasures to her patrons. She has written a book describing and explaining the pictures in the Louvre and dedicated it to Miss Flora Wilson, daughter of the American Secretary of Agriculture, who is studying singing in the French capital.

Miss Violet Oakley is the only woman mural decorator of consequence and designer of pageants in America. Miss Oakley did the mural paintings of the new Pennsylvania State capitol at Harrisburg, one of the features of that work that met with absolute approval. More recently she designed the splendid pageant which was held in Philadelphia in October in celebration of the two hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of Philadelphia. Nothing like this pageant has ever been held in this country before, and that it was such an entire artistic success is largely due to Miss Oakley.

Herbert Putnam, librarian of Congress, is mentioned as a possible successor to President Eliot of Harvard University. Mr. Putnam is a graduate of the Harvard class of '83. For four years, from 1902 to 1906, he was a member of the board of overseers of the university. He was graduated from the Harvard Law School and studied law also at Columbia. He practiced in Minnesota and later in Boston. He was librarian of the Minneapolis Athenæum from 1884 to 1887; of the Minneapolis Public Library from 1887 to 1891, and of the Boston Public Library from 1895 to 1899. He was president of the American Library Association in 1898 and 1904. He has published many articles on educational and bibliographical subjects.

Louis N. Parker, the enterprising literary American who was placed in charge of the recent lord mayor's show in London, turned what had come to be regarded as a sort of circus procession into an interesting pageant. Sir George Truscott was installed as the city's chief magistrate in succession to Sir Charles Bell, and in the parade to the Guildhall poets and musicians from Chaucer to Milton, and many of the most notable figures of those times, appeared costumed with historical accuracy. Shakespeare was accompanied by a picturesque entourage of characters from his plays. Chaucer was followed by a band of personages of his creating, and Spenser and Marlowe were attended in like manner. A striking feature was William Caxton on a float with a group of printers working an ancient printing press. These historical pageants will be continued progressively in future shows. The prime minister, Herbert H. Asquith, was the principal speaker at the Guildhall banquet which marked the inauguration of a new lord mayor, and brought to a close the celebration of the king's sixty-seventh birthday.

A SPURIOUS DIVORCE.

By Jerome A. Hart.

XLI.

The sudden announcement of a suit for divorce, brought by Sophia Lucretia against General Salem, was the sensation of the city. The lady's pronounced belledom and the prominence of both parties fairly took "society's" breath away. Besides, no one had ever heard of any wedding. "Society" had long babbled of an intrigue believed to exist between the lady and her aged lover, but it had not been kind enough to suspect that they were married. And then the secrecy—why a secret marriage? This query baffled "society," for they were both of age, the general decidedly so. But this suit proved that a secret marriage had existed. Altogether these surprising announcements furnished food for gossip for many days to the ladies at the Oriental, the International, and the Golden Gate. All of them had known and most of them had disliked Sophia Lucretia.

The circle of male gossips no longer held forth at the Bank Exchange Saloon. In the course of years it had been transferred to the clubs. While the mention of women's names was as a rule tabooed there, it was generally admitted that such a divorce suit lifted the ban. Therefore conversation raged freely in the clubs upon the mooted topic, now that the court proceedings had begun. In the cocktail window, Yarrow and Brewer were discussing the case, about which the colonel professed to be fully informed.

"In the complaint," said he, "she declares there has been a secret marriage for several years. She also asserts that she possesses a certain marriage contract proving her to be his wife—that is, under our curious State rulings."

"Has she no other proof beside this alleged document?"

"Yes, she has many letters extending over a period of years addressed 'my dear wife.' These are annexed as exhibits to the complaint."

"The case is creating much excitement, colonel. The wealth of General Salem, her beauty, and her career as a belle have set people's tongues to wagging furiously."

"She is going to try and separate old Salem from some of his wealth," laughed Brewer. "She has brought suit for an absolute divorce on the ground of infidelity, and has asked for half of his fortune as community property."

"If she wins she will be a rich woman—people rate Salem at about fifteen millions. Wouldn't it be odd if she were to marry Tower if she gets a divorce? He has been devoted to her for years."

"Yes, and Burke was one of her slaves too for a time. But Tower settled him."

"And all the time these two men were her slaves she was secretly married to old Salem. Faugh!" cried Yarrow in disgust.

"She did play rather a lively string, for a fact. However, many people will be surprised to know that she was actually the wife of Salem."

"But what made her commit the false step—why did she marry him?"

Brewer laughed cynically. "You are severe on the old man," said he. "And on her too. But you're right—it's six of one and half a dozen of the other. By the way, the divorce case is on today—come with me, if you like, and I will get you into the court-room as a member of the bar."

Yarrow accepted with alacrity, and the two left the club for the court-house. As they made their way with difficulty into the court-room through the dense crowd, among the attorneys returning after the noon recess, Brewer, pointing to one, said:

"There's your friend Alden."

"So I see," returned Yarrow, without comment.

Brewer looked at him in some surprise. He did not know that while there was no quarrel between the two young men, they were not so intimate as they had been. Their glances met, and they bowed coolly.

"Alden has been retained as one of the junior counsel in this Salem suit," went on Brewer. "I wonder if he has heard of the counter-suit?"

"What is the counter-suit?"

"Salem has just brought suit in the Federal Court to have the marriage contract and the 'dear wife' letters brought into court, declared forgeries, and destroyed," said Brewer with much relish. He greatly enjoyed the effect which delay and dramatic utterance give to a bit of toothsome news.

"What effect will that have on the suit in the State court?"

"No direct effect. Salem is a citizen of another State, which is probably the ostensible reason alleged for bringing the new suit in the Federal Court. But the divorce suit, having been brought in the State court, will have to be pushed to a termination there."

"And will no conflict of jurisdiction arise between the two tribunals, colonel?"

"Not at once, although such questions will probably arise before matters are all threshed out."

"But how about Alden? If the matter gets into the Federal courts, can he continue to appear in the case while his uncle is on the bench of the highest Federal court in the district?"

"He could not with propriety remain connected with the case if the divorce suit gets into the Federal courts; but he can continue to act as counsel so long as it remains in a State tribunal with which his uncle has no connection."

"Then you do not think, colonel, that the divorce suit will get into the Federal court?"

"I do not see how it can directly do so, but the issues will be dragged there in some way."

"Then it will probably be tried before Fox, which will shut out Alden?"

The colonel paused impressively. It was evident to Yarrow that some further bit of news was about to be sprung.

"If the case gets before Fox," he said, "the matter of young Alden will be trivial compared to other complications. Have you heard whom Sophia Lucretia has retained for her chief counsel?"

"Verrill, is it not?"

"No—it is John Tower," replied Brewer, laconically.

Yarrow looked at him in surprise. "Tower!" he cried, "why, with Fox on the bench—" and he paused.

"With Fox on the bench, and with Tower as chief counsel for the respondent, there is bound to be trouble. Those two men hate each other like poison. They have been bitter haters for years. Mark my words, Yarrow, if this case gets into the Federal court somebody is going to get hurt."

The judge had not yet taken his seat on the bench, and around the crowded court room ran a buzz of gossiping tongues. The various phases of the celebrated case were breathlessly discussed. The most experienced gossips were puzzled by the curious veil of secrecy which had been cast over the relations of Sophia Lucretia and General Salem. Why had they kept their marriage secret? The general was certainly old enough to know his own mind. He was not a bachelor, young and tender, but an old and seasoned widower. If he wanted to marry Sophia Lucretia, there was no apparent reason why he should not do so. Neither was there any obvious reason why he should conceal the fact that they were married. Why, then, moaned the gossips, why all this mystery? Why, oh, why did they conceal their marriage? Yet to these inductive questions there came no answer to the gossips, even from "society's" most expert searchers of the human mind and heart. General Salem was absolutely invisible to all men, while Sophia Lucretia was surrounded ever by vigilant counsel who would not permit her to talk. Even the newspaper reporters could get no interviews, either in or out of court, and were forced to resort to their imaginations to fill their space.

Thus baffled—prevented from anything but speculation concerning the heart of the mystery—the gossips turned to other phases of the case. Would Sophia Lucretia get a divorce? If so, would she receive half of the general's enormous fortune as community property? If so, what figure would the Federal suit cut? If the State court issued a writ awarding her alimony, would the Federal court issue a writ setting aside the orders of the State court? And if so, how would the attorneys of Sophia Lucretia get out of this legal snarl?

Thus furiously wagged the tongues of the élite, with whom the court-room was crowded. And under their batteries of eyes, well up in front, surrounded by her galaxy of counsel, sat Sophia Lucretia. On the other side the defendant was conspicuously absent, but he was also represented by numerous prominent lawyers, for there were many legal stars on both sides. Her chief counsel was, as Brewer had said, Judge Tower. To offset Tower, the Salem side had engaged General Bell, a lawyer noted for his oratory, with something of a fire-eating reputation, as having been on the field of honor. In addition to these legal lights, both sides had a number of lesser attorneys for functions of a lesser order. The Salem side had, as a legal jackal for their dirty work, one McAdoo. To cope with him, the plaintiff's attorney had hired a brawling pettifogger of similar kidney, one Verrill. During the preliminaries of the encounter, these lesser lawyers kept up a continual snapping and yelping, while their superiors interrupted them every now and then with a deep-mouthed bay.

At his seat in the attorneys' precinct within the railing, Yarrow had an excellent place from which to see and hear. It was by special favor, for most of the attorneys knew he was not of them; but Yarrow was always favored. Within this favored precinct, too, he was in a position to hear choice morsels of legal gossip, differing from the scraps of scandal which were passed from lip to lip outside. Brewer, who had been conferring with a confère in an undertone, turned to Yarrow, and said:

"It is rumored that General Bell is going to spring a surprise on Tower's side this morning."

"What is it?"

"I am told that Bell has dug up a secret contract between Verrill, of Sophia Lucretia's counsel, and the handwriting expert, Gimble," whispered Brewer. "By the terms of this contract, Gimble, for a large sum of money, is going to swear to the genuineness of the alleged marriage contract."

"That seems an incredible procedure for so shrewd a shyster as Verrill."

"If you were a lawyer you wouldn't be surprised at anything any of 'em may do. When the required devilry is a little too raw—such as poisoning, or the panel-game—then big-wigs like Bell or Tower hire thugs like McAdoo and Verrill to do it for them. But it gets done, all the same. Ah, here's the judge—court is about to open."

Almost from the moment that the case of Sophia Lucretia Salem vs. Elisha Salem was called on the calendar, the gossips sat up with delighted looks. The packed audience followed with avidity the strange and at times revolting testimony. At once it became apparent that when Sophia Lucretia found her millionaire admirer weakening in his loyalty, she had resorted to all sorts of queer practices to retain his love. Fortune-tellers, hypnotists, soothsayers, seeresses, crystal-gazers, palmists—such was the queer procession that filed one after another into the witness box.

Attending Sophia Lucretia was Mammy, her tried and confidential servant, and Mammy had a suite of aged negroes in her train. These ebony cronies had been called as witnesses by the Salem side, and their testimony showed how strongly a belief in African voodooism was imbedded in the mind even of a woman of education like Sophia Lucretia. According to the testimony, she had been a party to an elaborate system of espionage, by which all sorts of charms and love philtres had been administered to the millionaire without his knowledge. He had been ceaselessly shadowed; voodoo hags had been secreted in his apartments; Mephitic witches had doctored his sideboard; his decanters had been charged with love philtres; gross negro eyes had spied upon him in the most intimate recesses of his life. All of these unspeakable things were laid bare before the gloating crowd in the court-room. No wonder that poor old Salem stayed away. Were he to have heard the things that he had taken unconsciously in his drink he surely would have taken to his bed. Not all the ministrants of Mammy were black—some of them were whitey-brown, yellow, tan-colored, or white. Up from the under world crawled curious creatures into the witness-box—loathsome, blinking things like the beetles that scuttle from under a stone turned over in a field by the foot of a passer-by.

While the defense was still putting on the stand its endless stream of witnesses, Yarrow noticed that Alden had been called out of the court-room by a messenger. In a few minutes he returned, and whispering to his chieftain, General Bell, handed him a packet. This the senior counsel seized eagerly, and after a hasty glance, conferred in whispers with his associates. As the next witness was leaving the stand, Bell arose:

"There's something up!" whispered Brewer to Yarrow. "What did I tell you? I'll bet Bell's got a bomb ready, and that he's going to set it off."

Evidently something was up. There was an air of subdued triumph about the eminent attorney, as he addressed the bench in his most oratorical manner:

"If the court please," began the general in resonant tones, "I have serious charges to make against an officer of this court—against an attorney pleading before this bar. It is with great pain that I make these charges. Still, utterly aside from my functions as attorney for the defense, it is my duty as a member of the bar. I hold in my hand a document to which I wish to call the attention of the court."

And with a dramatic air he advanced, and laid before the judge a paper. After a few minutes for the judge to examine the document, and for the audience to be duly impressed, the general went on:

"This document, your honor, is a contract between George Verrill, counsel for plaintiff, and the notorious handwriting expert, Gimble. By the terms of this document, as your honor will see, Gimble agrees to swear to the genuineness of the signature of Elisha Salem on the alleged marriage contract, to receive therefor the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars. An anonymous letter warned me of the existence of this document. I could scarcely believe in such infamy, your honor, but my duty as counsel forced me to investigate the matter. I therefore approached Verrill's chief clerk, Lally. At first I found him very cautious, but, after some bargaining, Lally admitted the existence of the document, and agreed to obtain it for the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars. I laid the matter before my associates, your honor, and they agreed with me that it was our duty to impound this document and bring it into court at whatever cost. Therefore I prepared the twenty-five thousand dollars, which it had been stipulated should be paid only in gold certificates. By arrangement I met Lally at night, paid him the stipulated price, and received the document. For security I put it in a safe-deposit vault, but now I place it in the keeping of this court. And I feel that in so doing I have acted as a conscientious attorney and an honorable practitioner."

With an air of conscious rectitude General Bell paused, cleared his throat, and went on:

"Now, if the court please, I call for the exemplary punishment due to such a shameless act. Attorney Verrill is a sworn officer of this court. By the law he is vested with certain functions, but likewise there are imposed upon him weighty responsibilities. Any act of his not in accordance with the rigid code of morality inherent in the workings of a court of justice should bring him before the bar for punishment. And therefore I urge upon your honor that you summon this discredited and dishonest attorney before your bar, and impose upon him the punishment which is his due."

His fine voice ringing with a lofty melancholy, yet tinged with justifiable indignation, General Bell sat down. The deep silence which had pervaded the crowded room while he was speaking gave way to a feverish hum, and every eye was turned on Verrill. Brewer leaned over and whispered to Yarrow:

"The general seemed to overlook the fact that he himself engaged in a very curious proceeding when he entered into these midnight negotiations with Verrill's clerk."

"Very curious indeed," returned Yarrow. "But there is Verrill getting up to reply."

As the bailiff roared for silence, the accused attorney rose. Curiously enough, he did not seem at all alarmed, or even embarrassed.

"If the court please," he began, "it is a maxim of the law that he who seeks equity should do equity; that he who seeks justice should come into court with clean hands. Yet the counsel on the other side openly admits that he has corrupted my clerk and aided and abetted him in the stealing of a valuable document. Your honor, in the course of my long experience at the bar, I have never heard an avowal quite so shameless as that of Attorney Bell. Without any further evidence than his own statement he can be disbarred. I will not, your honor, take up the time of this court with oratory. I will content myself with calling a single witness. Carl Gimble, take the stand."

The celebrated handwriting expert took the witness chair. After the usual preliminary questions, Verrill asked:

"There is a signature on that contract purporting to be yours. Is it genuine?"

"No," replied Gimble.

"Is it anything like your signature?"

"No, not at all. In fact, the signature purporting to be mine is apparently in the same handwriting as the body of the document."

"And how about the signature, George Verrill? Is it mine?"

"That also seems to be in the same handwriting as the body of the document. It is not at all like your signature."

"I now ask, to be sworn, your honor," said Verrill. Taking his place on the stand, he testified thus:

"Some days ago my clerk Lally came to me and informed me that General Bell, the attorney for the other side, said he knew of the existence of this alleged contract between me and Gimble. Although Lally parleyed with Bell, he was loyal to me—he reported the matter to me immediately. I told him that an attorney who would descend to such infamy as to corrupt the clerk of an opposing attorney deserved to be punished. If Bell was crooked enough and fool enough to pay largely for a worthless piece of paper, I told Lally he could sell it to him, so far as I was concerned. So Lally wrote this document himself, and did it so carelessly that he wrote it all in practically the same handwriting. He wrote Gimble's and my signatures also without any attempt at imitating our handwriting. He did not even take the trouble to get Gimble's initials right. When Lally had completed this precious document he showed it to Bell, and reported to me that Bell grew so much excited that he offered to pay twenty-five thousand dollars for it."

"What did you do then?" inquired the judge. "Did you advise him to sell it to Bell?"

"Oh, no, your honor," replied Verrill with a twinkle in his eye. "I told him that it would be very wrong to sell it to Bell, but that I could not prevent him from doing so."

"I am glad to hear that you were not a party to this matter, Mr. Verrill," said the judge severely. "Had you been mixed up in it I would be obliged to take judicial notice of it."

"No, indeed, your honor," replied Verrill, with the same provoking smile at Bell. "I am too old and experienced an attorney to be mixed up in any such questionable proceedings. I have never corrupted a clerk to induce him to sell a worthless document to counsel opposing me. And I may add that I have never tried to corrupt the clerks of the other side to induce them to sell me private papers."

"Then how do you know the inside of this transaction?" asked the judge.

"Entirely from General Bell's narrative, your honor," replied Verrill, with the same smug air. "I did not know the upshot until I heard it from him. I had carefully refrained from having anything to do with the matter. I did not prepare the document nor receive any of the money. When Lally asked my advice about it, I warned him that he would become criminally liable if he engaged in any such affair. I supposed he had dropped it. But now General Bell tells us the sequel, by which we learn that he himself has been guilty of corruptly hiring an attorney's clerk to steal a paper from his employer's law office and paid him twenty-five thousand dollars therefor."

"Where is your clerk, Lally, Mr. Verrill?" demanded the judge, sternly. "I shall at once issue a bench warrant for his arrest."

"Not my clerk, if your honor please, but my former clerk," rejoined Verrill smoothly. "I have just learned, accidentally, that he sailed for China this morning on the City of Peking."

As Verrill, with a triumphant sneer, sat down, the rage and discomfiture of the Salem side was something which words could not describe. They had lost twenty-five thousand dollars of their good money; they had received for it a worthless piece of paper; they had been made the laughing-stock of the town. They were certain that they had been hoodwinked by the sharpshyster Verrill, that he had mailed the anonymous letter, that he had been a party to Lally's flight, and that the rogue who was a-ship had divided the swag with the rogue who was ashore. But they were also certain that none of these things could they prove.

Charles Dana Gihson is going to work in black and white again, in spite of his formal renunciation of it. He has not only entirely abandoned his hope of achieving distinction in oils, but he has dropped the old field of society subjects. He will make his home with his wife and children in New York and do work for the magazines.

HENRY IRVING'S ACHIEVEMENTS.

Austin Brereton's Life of the Great Actor an Authentic Record of a Glorious Career.

Twenty-five years ago Austin Brereton, a London journalist and dramatic critic, wrote, with the approval of his subject, a biographical sketch of Henry Irving, even then the greatest figure on the British stage. The friendship and intimacy of the actor and the writer continued through Irving's life, and now Mr. Brereton presents the complete record of a career which has not been equaled in the annals of the theatre. It is written from the standpoint of a fair-minded critic, who is more anxious to make the account clear, exact, and full, than to give evidence of his literary ability, foresight, and analytical powers. From beginning to end it is prepared with painstaking care, and no public effort, disappointing or successful, is slighted. It will remain the one authentic record of the achievements of a genius in stagecraft, whose aims and influence were of the greatest value to the English-speaking stage.

Henry Irving came of yeoman stock. His father, Samuel Brodribb, was a small shopkeeper in Keinton Mandeville, a village near Bristol, and his mother came from a Cornish family. At an early age Henry went to live with a maternal aunt in Cornwall, and a little later was sent to school in London. At the age of thirteen the boy found employment in a lawyer's office, and seemed started on a career far removed from the theatrical world. But his earliest individual inclinations were toward the field for which his talents were supremely fitted. He joined an elocution class in his early teens, and began a self-imposed apprenticeship in the profession to which he was irresistibly drawn:

Many years afterward, in July, 1884, the Irving Amateur Dramatic Club entertained their president, after whom their club had been named, at supper in the Freemasons' Tavern, where he spoke of this, his first performance in a regular theatre: "Amateur acting is a very different thing to what it was when I was a young man—and I am not like that horrible old playgoer who sits upon everything and calls it bad. I believe that you act under many advantages that were not enjoyed by amateurs in the past—certainly as far as my experience goes. I was once a member of what was called an elocution class, and we suffered under one disadvantage—we had not the pleasure of enjoying the society of amiable and accomplished ladies. We chose pieces in which the ladies had not very prominent parts, and, wherever the parts were, they were cut down. Sometimes, the chambermaid was transformed into some hobbledehoy young man, and the entertainments, I dare say, were not very interesting. But I remember that I once did take part in an amateur performance, the only occasion in my life when my ambition was satisfied, where there was a real stage, and real scenery, real footlights, real dresses, real everything. We had the Soho Theatre, and they had a rather peculiar method there. The amateurs who wanted to furnish parts paid different prices. The prices seemed to vary according to the vice or virtue of the characters—two guineas for Iago, three guineas for Romeo. I had three guineas' worth, and it was rather a memorable occasion for me—and to those, I should think, who saw me! Rehearsals were out of the question altogether, and the supporters were principally a lot of superannuated actors. Of course, the cast was conducted by any confiding amateur; they were glad to get the money, and, if not, they were happy to have emergency men. I had a costume; it was a sort of red cotton-velvet shirt on a pair of white cotton legs, a very tall black hat, and two white feathers, very large black shoes and blue rosettes. What I remember particularly was—I certainly will take credit to myself—I got lost once or twice in the scenery. Being at the time a young man, I thought it necessary to wear a wig, and during one part of the performance I lost that too; and also my dagger. However, I got through to the entire satisfaction of some ten or twelve friends of mine—young clerks in the city—and I can not tell you whether the event was recorded in any of the theatrical papers of the time, but at any rate there was not much Italian romance about the business, though certainly I went to work like a man and a Briton, that I will say."

Irving was in his nineteenth year when he resolutely put aside the employments of his youth and seriously set about the life-work he had chosen. He had secured an engagement in a provincial theatre, at Sunderland, and with that beginning he adopted the name which he made famous.

In three years Irving slowly crept upward in his profession, winning the regard of his associates and the favor of the public in Sunderland, and in a longer and more encouraging engagement in Edinburgh, and then set out for London, where his growing fame had secured him a place at the Princess's Theatre. His first entry into London, however, was a disappointment:

Much to his amazement and discomfiture, he found that he had only half a dozen lines to speak at the commencement of the four-act drama. Very wisely, and with that grim determination which was so conspicuous a part of his character, he insisted on being released from the engagement. In vain did the manager endeavor to make him change his mind. The young actor gained the day, he was released from his three years' contract, and he resolved not to accept another engagement in London until he could see his way to doing himself justice. . . . His personal friends in London had been somewhat mortified by the treatment meted out to him at the Princess's. He therefore gave two readings at Crosby Hall, by way of showing that he was justified in his ambition as an actor and in proof of the benefit of his experience at Edinburgh. On 19th December he read "The Lady of Lyons," and on 8th February, 1860, "Virgilius."

Ten years later he came again to London, the intervening period having been passed in the stock companies of Edinburgh, Manchester, and in appearances in Dublin, Liverpool, and other cities. A striking statement of the hard work he had done in those earlier years is made in this paragraph:

Exactly ten years passed before he succeeded, thanks to his foresight in making the stipulation with Boucicault in regard to the production of "The Two Lives of Mary Leigh," ere he got a foothold in London. During that strenuous period he had accomplished an amount of work which even to those who knew his enormous capacity in this connection is stupendous. During his first two and a half years on the stage he acted—as was first recorded in my "biographical sketch" of 1883—the amazing number of four hundred and twenty-eight parts.

Between 5th March, 1860, and 30th July, 1866, he added one hundred and sixty characters to his credit. In London he played eighty-three parts, including thirteen Shakespearian ones. The total number of characters which he impersonated is six hundred and seventy-one. So that, when he came to London, he had a fine record for industry and a reputation as an ambitious actor. He had been in the best schools of acting—the stock companies of Edinburgh and Manchester—and he had supported some of the foremost players of the day, including Helen Faucit, Charlotte Cushman, John Vandenhoff, Frederick Robson, Edwin Booth, E. A. Sothern, G. V. Brooke, and Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Florence.

Following his engagement at the St. James Theatre, where he was stage manager as well as actor, came a change to the Queen's Theatre, where, in December, 1867, he first acted with Ellen Terry, in "Katherine and Petruchio," Garrick's condensation of "The Taming of the Shrew." Miss Terry retired from the stage after this engagement, and it was eleven years before she again acted with Irving.

It was in 1869, after a provincial tour, that Irving returned to London and appeared in an unsuccessful production. At this time his marriage took place, and of this event the biographer writes as follows:

And, within three days of the production of "All for Money," Henry Irving had married a young and pretty Irish girl, tall and fair-haired, Miss Florence O'Callaghan, the daughter of Surgeon-General O'Callaghan, a man for whom he had great friendship and admiration. The ceremony took place on 15th July, 1869, at the parish church of St. Marylebone, the wedding reception being held at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matthews, Linden Grove, Bayswater. The father of the bride was a distinguished man—Daniel James O'Callaghan, whose eldest brother, John Cornelius, was one of the celebrated literary men of Ireland of the last century—the author of "The Green Book, or Gleanings from the Desk of a Literary Agitator."

Unfortunate as this union must have been, it resulted in representatives to sustain the fame of the tragedian:

There were two children of the marriage of Henry Irving to Miss Florence O'Callaghan—Henry Brodribb, born on 5th August, 1870, and Laurence Sidney Brodribb, born on 21st December, 1871.

In three months after that the parents were parted, the husband leaving his domicile—for reasons which do not concern the public, and need not be entered upon—and taking up his abode with the Bateman family, first of all at Kensington Gore and then at Rutland Gate. He subsequently lived, for a little while, in chambers in Bruton-street, Bond-street; he then took chambers in Grafton-street, Bond-street, which he occupied for many years, until 1899, when he was advised by his doctors to remove to sunnier quarters in Stratton-street, Piccadilly. It was not until 1879, when a deed of separation was entered into between actor and his wife, that the final parting came. Lady Irving, who survives her husband, had the care of the children until they went to college, and they lived with her until they married.

In 1871 Irving first went to the Lyceum Theatre, so long to be associated with his name and fame. The playhouse, after a checkered career, had been opened by Colonel Bateman, an American manager, whose daughters, Kate and Isabella, were successful actresses. Irving supported them in a subordinate rank, but soon found or made his opportunity. He succeeded in winning the approval of Manager Bateman for a production of "The Bells," which, in a slightly different arrangement, was being prepared at a rival theatre. The actor saw plainly the possibilities of the piece, so suited to his powers, which even then he had tested and had full faith in. The result was a victory for his confidence:

The company thought that Irving was bereft of his senses, but he worked assiduously at rehearsals, and the scenery and properties were hastily prepared. In the meantime, the spirits of all concerned—save only those of the future Mathias—were lowered to their utmost limit by the complete failure of the rival version on its production at the Alfred Theatre on Monday, 13th November. This failure only added to the determination of the actor to succeed in his cherished idea. "The Bells" was produced on Saturday, 25th November, 1871. Irving's performance of Mathias electrified the audience. The spectators on this auspicious occasion were few and they had come in a spirit of boredom. Henry Irving beat down their coldness and reserve, the theatre reechoed with such applause as had not been heard within its walls for many years, and, by the Monday morning, all play-going London was aware that a great personality and a great actor had come into his hard-won kingdom. He had fought for over fifteen years with London as the goal of his ambition, and the struggle, long, anxious, and absolutely unparalleled in the history of the stage, had been won.

From that time on, Irving's career is well known. It was not invariably successful. There were dismal failures, as well as glorious successes, but there was steady advance in power, in recognition, and in reward. Irving's efforts for the best in stage management, as well as in acting, for the encouragement of actors and for the dignity and respect of the profession, were able, forceful, and unremitting, and their effects continue even in these commercial times.

Mr. Brereton has omitted nothing of value in the public record of Irving's appearances as star, and as manager, even the financial results of his various undertakings often being set down in impressive figures. Several pages are given to Irving's visit to San Francisco, where his fourth American tour began, in 1893. It is recorded that $59,535 was paid in at the Grand Opera box-office during his two weeks' stay, Irving's share amounting to $2850 each night. The entertainment given by the Bohemian Club in honor of the tragedian is described with appreciation.

Mr. Brereton's monumental work is in two volumes of nearly 400 pages each, illustrated with numerous fine engravings of the actor, in real life and in character. They are furnished with a complete list of the parts which Irving played during the thirty-nine years of his career, a bibliography covering twenty-two publications of permanent value concerning the actor, and an index compiled with care.

CHUMMING WITH AN APACHE.

By Frank Bailey Millard.

Never go chumming with an Apache. You smile at such strange advice? Well, I might have smiled at it once myself. But we are all creatures of circumstance, and I was a tenderfoot then, anyway. This is how I chummed it with my little Indian:

I was swinging my red-and-blue cluhs under the pepper-tree at the back of the railroad station. This I did because I had a theory that exercise was good for a man living on a desert. The lazy Mexicans, and most of the Americans thereabouts, had no ruddy glow on their faces. They were all sallow. What I wanted was a ruddy glow.

My red-and-blue cluhs circled about very prettily that day, and the ruddy glow came; also a dripping epidermis and a big desire to sit down in the shade of the pepper-tree and hlow tobacco smoke. The tree was a small one. When the station tank ran over, which was not often, its roots received a little moisture. So it grew, slowly.

As soon as I dropped my cluhs a squeal of disgust went up from somewhere, and, as I turned about, I saw a small, brown head dart behind a cactus-lined rock.

I said nothing, but leaned back on my seat, pulled my sombrero down over my face, and shammed sleep, with one half-closed eye on the rock and the big cactus-shrubs. No use. You can not get an Apache out of his hole that way.

Next day, with my beautiful exercise theory still bristling in my brain, I turned quickly, while in the midst of my club-swinging, and saw the wide-open eyes and gaping mouth of the cunningest little savage I had ever beheld. He sprang about and fled behind the rock, but not too quickly for me to read "XXX Family Flour" in large red letters on his back. His one short garment was a cotton sack, with holes cut through it for his head and arms.

"Come, Tads," I cried, christening him in that fleeting second with a name that stuck to him all his life, "out of that!" And I jumped behind the rock, swinging an open hand that did not grasp the flour-sack, as I had intended it should.

Where was the wee savage?

Like a lizard, he had darted from sight somewhere in that little patch of rocks and cactus, though there did not appear to be cover enough there to conceal a jack-rabbit.

"The spines must scratch him," I thought, as I looked at the prickly cactus; but I did not know then how Apaches put up with small irritations. Not wanting to give the hoynecessary torture, I went back to my clubs. Throwing my eyes about again, I caught another fleeting glimpse of the brown head as it dodged behind the rock.

Tads must have been disappointed next day, for there was no club-swinging under the pepper-tree. The duties of telegraph agent lay too heavily upon me and the sun lay too heavily upon the desert. I saw Tads steal away from his lair about two hours after my usual exercise time and walk down the sand-drifts with a dejected air, his one garment flapping in the hot wind.

A wild nature like his was proof against such snares as the toothsome confection, the golden orange, or the mealy peanut. I found that out by trial in the course of the next week. But an old jack-knife won him over. That was something his Apache mind could grasp. It was a greater delight to him than the red-and-blue cluhs. Sworn friends from that day were Tads and I. His talk was a ridiculous mixture of English, Spanish, and Apache, and his voice was very throaty. But I understood him. Indian-like, he said little. It was, therefore, easy to get along with him. He would sit for hours on a high stool, listening to the "tunk-tunk-tunk" of my sounder. The telegraph was an awful mystery to him at first, and it squelched his imagination; but he solved the problem at last. A man away off over the mountains spoke with his finger to me and I spoke back to him. That was his idea of it, and it was not such a had one, either. The hummings of the wires overhead were the voices of people with ponderous fingers, but they were not of this world.

How the cowboys laughed when they saw Tads and me in the station.

"That tenderfoot's a queer one," they said of me.

The despised Apache could not crawl into their hearts—no, not even if he were a six-year-old.

"He'll steal everything the tenderfoot's got," they pleasantly averred. But he did not.

When Tads left the station on an evening, his little brown feet pattered straight over the roads to the wickiups, a half-mile away. In time he wore a narrow trail over to the huts.

"Pitty vell," was what Tads would grunt to me every day when he came shyly into the office and I greeted him with a friendly "How-de-do?" Then he would shrug his shoulders in a way that wrinkled the three X's into such bewildering folds that you could not have read them unless you had known what they were beforehand.

One day while he was meandering about the place, grunting quietly to himself, he upset one of my battery jars.

"Tads," I cried, angrily, for the desert's death was hot upon me and was irritating enough, let alone spilled vitriol, "you're a little heast! Skip out of here, or I'll take a stick to you!"

Then arose a great howl from Tads, and he kept on howling until an Apache woman came over the sands from the wickiups and gathered him up in her arms. She was his mother. She eyed me suspiciously and walked away with her highly demonstrative hurden.

Of course I regretted my hot language and wanted the little heggar back again. It was so lonely there on the desert. The wires wailed so heart-brokenly, while the sun heat down so fiercely in the daytime and the coyotes yelled so dolefully at night. How he had crept into my heart, to be sure!

It was several days before we were on satisfactory terms again. Tads wanted to be a white man. He wanted to make "talk marks" on "pupper" with a feather—I sometimes used a quill pen, he remarked—and he wanted to speak with his finger. Well, I did manage to teach him a few letters from a railroad poster, and he learned to draw out "T-a-d-s" in a droll way. With perseverance that was really startling, I afterward took him in an uncertain way through a page or two of "Can you see the fat ox," and so on, wherefore his heart was glad.

"I'll be w'ite mans, heap sure," he declared in his hufflog voice, after he had accomplished this wonderful feat.

Great distress racked Tads's soul on the fatal day when the wickiups were taken down and the tribe mounted its mustangs to go over the hills. The Apaches had to search all over the station to find Tads. At last, they hauled him forth from under my hunk, screaming like mad. Of no avail were his screams, of no avail was his cry: "Me yanter stay wid him! Me yanter he w'ite mans!"

Apache papas are unheeding and Apache mammas are inexorable. Away they whisked Tads, leaving behind him a tenderfoot with a queer feeling in his throat.

"Well, the boy has the instincts of a white man," I said, for I was proud of what I fancied I had made of him, "and he'll be a shining light among those devilish people of his. If we had a few more like him to put among them, the Apache question would settle itself, and we could set our soldiers to hoeing corn."

Then I took up the restless life of a city man, and a big and busy railroad office claimed a good share of my attention for the next ten years. Yes, it was fully that long before I again set foot upon the desert. Our train stopped at the old station. How the pepper-tree had grown, to be sure. In its shade sat a cavalry sergeant with a half-dozen of his men about him, and in their midst were three Indian prisoners, who were being taken to the fort to be shot.

They were fierce-looking fellows, those three savages. There was one, the youngest, who was a perfect demon, the soldiers said.

"Killed three women and two babies down at Mustang Wash last Tuesday," said the sergeant to me; "just after one of them had given him his breakfast, too. He's a young one, not more than seventeen, I should say; but he's the worst red devil I ever saw."

Gazing at the boy captive, a strange feeling stole over me. The stolid face was oddly familiar.

"His name? Blessed if I know," said the sergeant; "what do you call yourself, young one?" he asked, giving him a not too delicate poke with the toe of his boot.

"Me? Why, my name's Tads!" grunted the boy.

"Talks pretty good English for a wild devil who has been over the Mexican border so long, doesn't he?" asked the sergeant, turning to me.

But I said nothing.

The centenary of the birth of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Francis Smith, author of the patriotic hymn, "America," was celebrated October 21 in Boston, where he was born, and in Newton, where he made his home for more than fifty years. In Newton flags were at half-staff, and in all the public schools memorial exercises were held. At the First Baptist Church, in Newton Centre, of which he was pastor for twelve years, the chimes which were given to the church as a memorial of Dr. Smith played "America." In Boston the principal celebration was in the playing of the national hymn at noon by cornetists standing in the heltry of the Park Street Church, in which edifice "America" was publicly sung for the first time on July 4, 1832. Men stood with bare heads and the great throng listened in silence as the little band of cornetists played "America" four times, once for each stanza. At the beginning of the fourth repetition the assemblage took up the hymn, singing the words in spontaneous chorus.

Bismarck's utterances regarding music are compiled in a book by Keudell: "Fürst und Fürstin Bismarck, Erinnerungen aus den Jahren, 1846-1872." Keudell once saw the man of blood and iron shed tears during a performance of Beethoven's Sonata appassionata. His favorite composers were Beethoven and Schubert: the only thing he did not like in their works was the variations; these, he said, "do not speak to the heart." Concerning the sonata just referred to, he remarked: "This is like the singing and sobbing of a whole human life. If I heard this music often I should always be brave."

TOMMY'S PRETTY MANICURE.

How Mlle. Louise Inspired a Back-Action Joke.

Once upon a time, there was a big manicure establishment, of which Miss Pray was the commander-in-chief; and among the ablest of her lieutenants was a very pretty girl, called Mlle. Louise. And all the young men and young women who used to go there to get their hands done were glad if Mlle. Louise attended them, because she was deit and gentle, and a pleasing person to look at.

Among the young men who used to have Mlle. Louise do their hands were Tommy Busted and William Barton. These twain were old friends, and used to joke each other about the pretty manicure-girl. Tommy was married and William was not, so Tommy always said he was pretty safe from any designs she might have; but he urged William to mind his eye and to lay low, with such other friendly counsel as occurred to him. Meantime, Mlle. Louise was as business-like as a lamp-post, and paid as little heed to her clients, except as regarded their hands.

One day, while William the Bachelor was getting himself manicured, he was smitten with a sudden idea. He would play a joke upon his friend, Tommy the Husband. He would write a letter to him and sign Mlle. Louise's name to it, and the letter should say that unless Tommy sent her one hundred dollars straightway, she would tell Tommy's wife how he had tried to kiss her, the aforesaid Mlle. Louise, when last she performed the tender office of paring his nails. Of course, Tommy had no more thought at any time in his life of trying to kiss the pretty manicure-girl than he had thought of writing to Miss Pray to elope with him; but therein lay the joke, as William considered it.

So William went home and wrote the note to Tommy in his best feminine angular hand, which he learned by diligent study of some of his own correspondents' handwriting. And he laid Mlle. Louise's damages at five hundred dollars instead of one hundred dollars, on second thought, and signed her name to it and sent it off, and grinned very much all the while.

The next morning, while Tommy and his wife were at the breakfast-table, the letter was given to him. He read it with surprise, which turned to amused disgust, and tossed it over to his wife, saying: "What do you think of that for a modest request?" And then, the more he thought about it, he became somewhat disquieted at the idea that this young woman was such a shark, and proceeded to hurry down to warn his friend William against her.

He found William still at home, and said to him: "I say, you want to look out for this manicure-girl, Mlle. Louise. She's a black-mailer—sent down to me for five hundred dollars, and said if I didn't give it to her, she'd tell my wife I insulted her. Great idea, isn't it? And we always thought she was such a nice little girl. But I'll tell you what—I'm going to have her up for blackmail—I won't stand it."

"Oh, I wouldn't do that," said William, suddenly sitting up straight and looking a little scared; "she doesn't mean it, I guess. Maybe it's a joke, or, anyhow, I think she'd be able to explain it."

"Explain it!" said Tommy, in great wrath; "explain her blooming toe-nails! Well—I don't know—I'll see what I decide"; and off he went, leaving William partially paralyzed with dismay at the thought of what his brilliant joke might possibly come to.

Off went Tommy, and becoming more exasperated the more he thought it over, he clambered into a cab and went straight up to Miss Pray's and asked to see Mlle. Louise. Somewhat amazed by so strenuous a call, that young person appeared, and was utterly dumfounded when Tommy charged her with writing him the blackmailing letter. First, she protested; then she wept; then, being French and excitable, she swore fluently.

They would have had the whole house about their ears presently had not Mlle. Louise suddenly hethought herself of her interest in keeping her place, and proceeded to show Tommy, by writing a totally different hand, and incidentally spelling blackmail "blackmale," that in all human probability he had had a practical joke played upon him. When this dawned upon Tommy, he was sure that nobody but William had conceived such a scheme. So he soothed Mlle. Louise with apologies and shekels, and departed hungry for his revenge.

That afternoon he was driving in the park, when he saw William strolling with a big chrysanthemum in his lapel, looking sweet and innocent as a new baby-wagon. Tommy brought his big horse up with a short turn alongside the foot-path, and, leaning down, said:

"Oh, I got a detective and just nabbed our fair young blackmailier."

"What!" gasped William.

"Why, yes," said Tommy, carelessly, playing with his long whip-lash in the grass; "I just went up there and told Miss Pray the circumstances. Of course she discharged her instantly, and then my detective was ready to clasp the steels on her young wrists and lug her off. I'm sorry to say that she didn't go peacefully. She squalled a good deal, and scandalized Miss Pray; but the man got her safely into a cab—regret there was no chaperon handy—and lugged her off down-town. She's in the Tomhs now, and I've got to go down there tomorrow to appear against her. Sorry, for she was a nice little girl—Louise—I always thought; but then, a blackmailier, you know—can't let those people go on—duty to society, you know—man's got to think of his family, and all that."

William stared as if he were seeing a ghost. "Great heavens!" he groaned; "say, lend me your carriage, will you. It's all a mistake—oh, what a fool I am!"

Tommy assumed an air of great concern. "What's the matter with you?" he said; "you're not eating any opium now, are you? Want my carriage—what for? You'll kill the horse!"

"No, I won't!" yelled William, clamoring up; "let me have it—that's a good fellow. I'll tell you all about it tonight, but hurry up, will you? It's the worst business I ever got into."

So Tommy handed William the reins and got down, and feigned profound regret and amazement as William slammed away out of the park, barely escaping arrest for reckless driving. When he was well out of sight, Tommy went and sat down on a bench and laughed till he was lame in the back.

That night, after dinner, a messenger-hoy brought a note to Tommy. "Well," said he to Mrs. Tommy, "wonder if this is as valuable as the one I got this morning? Hello, it's from William. Do you want to hear it?"

"Yes, of course," said his consort.

"Well," said Tommy, "the first few lines contain language which you wouldn't care to hear. But he says"—glancing through the note—"that he went to the Tomhs first, and then up to Miss Pray's, and between the remarks of the policemen down there upon the subject of crazy dudes and the fine idiomatic language employed by Mlle. Louise, he feels as if he had been around the world since three o'clock. And he says he thinks he has lamed my horse, and is rude enough to hope to the Lord he has. Now, that's rude in William. But then, maybe he doesn't know I went up to see Louise first."

"I think men are very remarkable persons," said Mrs. Tommy.—Evening Sun.

CURRENT VERSE.

A Portrait.

In a broad stone-flagged passage, once I saw
A woman lift a platter of white wood,
Whereon jugs, loaves, knives, high-piled dishes stood;
Her eyes, far-seeing counsellors, did draw
Age-old blue wisdom from the skies, while law
Implicit on her forehead seemed to brood;
Her lips were heralds, ever proclaiming good,
For riches, in her hair shone red-gold, raw.

She smiled, with some fair city's welcoming grace
Before whose gleaming turrets night has flown;
Whose loftier parts are Heaven's resting-place,
Whose very fabric is Earth-beauty's own;
Earth's plenty teems within her wide embrace,
About her walls Spring's icy airs are blown.

Rosemary.

Bitter as tears and sweet as love thou art,
Thou silver herb, embalming all the space
Around thee like sweet memories in the heart.
As the dear thought of one beloved face
Breathes through my life, so thy most fragrant breath
Spreads perfume all about my garden waste.
O sweet as love, O hither-sweet as death,
How dagger-sharp thy soft leaf is to taste!

Dear memory of a face I shall not see,
Dear voice that I shall never hear again;
O hither parting, O beloved pain!
O rosemary, O gray green rosemary!
—Agnes Blundell, in Westminster Gazette.

To Shakespeare's Mother.

Did he, madonna, on thy bosom turning,
Look in thy woman-eyes and see soft fires
Glowing and melting, passioning and yearning,
Lit with the mother-light of far desires?
Oh, did he fix his still regard upon them,
Learning their meanings manifold and strange,
Climbing with wonder up to count and con them
Ere they should vanish and the moment change?

The visions that thy soul revealed him then,
Though thou hadst died, madonna, may never die;
They dwell eternal in pure Imogen,
Cordelia's truth and Desdemona's sigh,
Rosalind's Arden, Miranda's island wave,
Girlish Ophelia's love, and Juliet's grave.

Today and Tomorrow.

[FROM THE VEDAS.]

There was no Night; the Great Gods walked on earth
That knew hut changeless Day when man had birth.

The first of men was Yama, and his hride
Was Yami, first of women. Yama died;

And Yami mourned; the Gods could not allay
The woe of her that wailed, "He died today!"

"Not thus," the Great Ones said, "her grief may cease;
Let Night he made; the Dawn shall bring her peace."

So Night was made. The Morrow tarried not
But dawned in gold—and Yama was forgot.

Whence came the word: "Today is not Tomorrow;
And Days and Nights make all forget their sorrow."

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

By Sidney G. P. Coryn.

As Others See Us, by John Graham Brooks. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; $1.75.

That America should be the subject of endless misunderstandings by the old world is hardly surprising after the author has reminded us that two such nations as England and France, living in close proximity and with a mutual acquaintance of centuries, should yet regard each other until recent years with contempt and ridicule.

The extent to which misconceptions of American life and ideals have grown in the early years and have dwindled in modern ones has been made the subject of an extensive and good-humored discussion. There is hardly a foreign opinion worthy of mention without its place in this volume. The book itself is dedicated to Mr. Bryce, and we are reminded of the criticisms of Mrs. Trollope, Captain Marryat, Sir Charles Lyell, Charles Dickens, Alexis de Tocqueville, W. G. Wells, Max O'Rell, and a host of smaller fry who have been good enough at one time or another to tell us what they think of us. Special chapters are devoted to "Our Talent for Bragging," "American Sensitiveness," "The Mother Country as Critic," "Our Monopoly of Wit," and "Higher Criticism," while a bibliography and a carefully prepared index are valuable additions.

The author is to be commended for the breezy impartiality that pervades his book. He is never stirred to resentment, and he listens even to the most spiteful comment with a sincere effort to appreciate whatever narrow basis of truth it may possess. He has a pleasant way of counteracting an adverse judgment by a favorable one. When we are told that the American reporter is incredibly ignorant, incompetent, and ill-mannered, we are reminded of William Archer's testimony that the American reporter always "treated me with courtesy, sometimes with comprehension," and of Dean Hole's testimony that "I was universally pleased by their courtesy and instructed by their information." Altogether the author has given us a delightful book and one that must in no small measure conduce to international appreciation and good-fellowship.

The Distributors, by Anthony Partridge. Published by the McClure Company, New York; $1.50.

The element of probability in a novel has become irrelevant to its discussion and it may therefore be said that "The Distributors" is capital reading, the sensationalism is good, and the plot ingenious. We have a group of English society men and women, blasé and utterly weary of life, and needing a new excitement with all the feverish intensity of the drug-drinker. They find it in criminality. Great jewel robberies are easy to men and women who are at home in all the best houses and present at the great society functions. The proceeds are given anonymously to deserving charities, and so we have a maximum of novel sensation with a minimum of immorality. As the Duchess explains to Pamela, the new recruit, "When we come across a person whom we consider overburdened with this world's goods, and who shows no desire or design of doing anything else except spending his money upon himself, and for his own gratification, we use our courage and our brains to make him pay a very legitimate fine."

Disaster comes inevitably after a series of cleverly executed "fines," but the disaster falls only upon the least likeable of the group. Most of the others discover that there is, after all, an innocent and untried sensation awaiting them.

The Interpretation of Life, by Gerhardt C. C. Mars, B. D., Ph. D. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; $3.

It is impossible to withhold admiration of a book showing so much scholarly thought and so careful an analysis of scientific and philosophic conjecture upon the nature of life. But it is unfortunate that the breadth of view distinguishing the first half of a lucid and remarkable volume should give place to a one-pointed eulogy of Christian Science and to a defense of its founder as the promulgator of a new gospel. We feel as though we had embarked upon a firm and promising road, only to find it narrowing into an impassable lane, with no alternative but to retrace our steps. Beginning with an able examination of Hegel, Kant, Fichte, Spinoza, Leibnitz, and Spencer, we suddenly find ourselves asked gravely to consider the "rationality" of Mrs. Eddy and "the plane on which she moves." We can't do it.

It is indeed strange that a writer of such wide acquaintance with philosophy can not apply to Christian Science the same standards of criticism that he uses so ably in other ways. He must surely be aware that whatever is tolerable in Christian Science, whatever remains after the puerilities and inanities have been eliminated, is to be found in the oldest systems of the world. Nor are we mollified by a perpetual statement of world-old truisms with Mrs. Eddy's name pretentiously attached thereto, as, for example, that "Mrs. Eddy sees the gradual unfolding of human consciousness by the discipline of suffering or the enlightenment of science," or that Mrs. Eddy says that "to understand God is the work of eternity." We might add that two and two make four—Mrs. Eddy says so, or that according to Mrs. Eddy the whole is greater than its part, or that Mrs. Eddy announces that three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles. To placidly adopt the axiomatic knowledge of the world and re-deliver it as parts of Christian Science may satisfy those whose philosophic equipment is feeble, but it will seem like a disappointing hothos to those whose anticipations had been unduly raised by a preliminary discussion of much weight and value.

The Altar Stairs, by G. B. Lancaster. Published by Doubleday, Page & Co., New York; $1.50.

This fine story gives a picture of life in Noumea not to be found elsewhere, and it is, by the way, strange that fiction has made so sparse a use of material so rich. The author with a few skillful touches shows us the various classes of people that compose the population of the islands, the French officials, the residents, the missionaries, the traders, the natives, and the convicts. It is unlike anything else, a world in itself, shot with vivid tropical color and palpitating with that kind of incident that only the Pacific can furnish.

The hero is Rod Maclean, sailor and trader, full of desperate and reckless courage and not over-scrupulous withal until love for little Joie touches his heart with a new-found grace. We see Maclean on his trading expeditions, which seem somewhat like highway robbery and piracy combined, with their attendant horrors of raids upon the natives and a matter-of-course violence that sometimes deviates into murder upon both sides. And when Rod returns he finds that Joie has been nominally married for a long time, but the particular way in which it all comes out right in the end must be left to the reader to discover for himself from the packed pages of a vigorous and delightful novel.

9009, by James Hopper and Fred R. Becholdt. Published by the McClure Company, New York.

This is the story of a prisoner in an American prison, a story calculated to arouse indignation both at the horrors themselves and at the impotence of our indignation to modify them. The authors say in their preface that "everything that happens to 9009 within the prison is something which has happened to some convict in some prison (American prison) sometime. And much worse things could have happened to 9009. By which we mean that much worse things have happened to some convicts in some prisons sometimes—and we know of these things." The book is not pleasant reading. It hears marks of restraint rather than of exaggeration, and it constitutes an indictment of a cruel and monstrous system that is the outcome not of justice, but of terror.

Three Girls and a Hermit, by Dorothea Conyers. Published by E. P. Dutton & Co.; $1.50.

The author's knowledge of Ireland, like Sam Weller's knowledge of London, is "extensive and peculiar." Indeed, we are sometimes reminded of Charles Lever while reading this racy story of three country-bred Irish girls who plunge into the great sea of society life as found at Balydare, determined to conquer it, and to live in the meantime by buying and selling racing horses that they innocently believe to be thoroughbreds. But the Hermit is the central figure of the romance. It is the Hermit who mourns over the waywardness of the delightful Misses Considine and who comes to the rescue in the inevitable hour of need. The story is refreshing and spontaneous and one to be enjoyed by those who are tired of an ugly modernity in fiction.

A Lord of Lands, by Ramsey Benson. Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York; $1.50.

This can hardly be called a novel, although a very pleasant bit of romance brings the book to a conclusion. "A Lord of Lands" describes how a mechanic wearies of city life on a meagre wage and determines to found an agricultural colony. Gathering a number of the like minded among his associates, he and his wife make the venture, and their successes and failures in a wholly unfamiliar occupation are readably and convincingly set forth. The story is indeed exceptionally interesting in its shrewd common sense and humorous philosophy. It is to be hoped that the book may fall into the hands of many who might thereby be persuaded to exchange a semi-starvation in the city for an independence upon the land.

The Coming Harvest, by René Bazin. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.25.

Without sensation, complicated plot, or straining after novelty, the author shows us a picture of country life in France as it exists under the congregations law and the dominance of labor unionism. We see the remains of the feudal aristocracy as represented by Comte Michel de Meximieu, and on the other hand are the workmen slowly estranged alike from tradition and duty and led to their ruin by agitators who play upon their greed and ignorance. "The Coming Harvest" is a drama of humble lives, but one singularly rich in pathos, fortitude, and heroism. From the artistic point of view, it leaves little to be desired, while as a sociological study it is more illuminating than a shelf of government reports.

The Wider Life, by J. R. Miller. Published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York; 65 cents.

The author is well known for his devotional books, already numbering about thirty. "The Wider Life" is a survey of religious possibilities from the devotional standpoint, and although it is sometimes marked by a crude dogmatism, it is written with obvious sincerity and with a certain pleasing persuasiveness.

A Bible Series.

There are now eleven volumes in this series, the latest being "Hebrews," by Professor E. J. Goodspeed, the whole series being under the general editorship of Professor Shailer Mathews. The object is to place the results of the best modern biblical scholarship at the disposal of the general reader, presupposing and using the assured results of historical investigation and criticism wherever such results throw light upon the text. Valuable features are the running analysis in text and comment, the explanatory notes, and the thorough introductions. The little volumes are well arranged and printed and should commend themselves to Sunday-school teachers and those who wish to read and to use the Bible intelligently. The publishers are the Macmillan Company, New York, and the price per volume is 50 cents.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE CHAT.

Eugene Walter's great play, "Paid in Full," under the management of Wagenhals & Kemper, will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre next Monday night, and for one week only, including Wednesday and Saturday matinee performances. The piece is the "great dramatic find" which at once established Walter's reputation as a playwright, and which has already made him rich and added immensely to the fortunes of the managers who wisely accepted the work of a practically unknown author. It has been running uninterruptedly for a year in New York, through all the seasons, making a new record for straight dramatic productions in the metropolis. Chicago has had it for a stretch of five months, and several companies are no less successful with the play in smaller cities. All the companies are, of course, under the direction of the original management. There is little doubt that San Francisco will appreciate the strength of Mr. Walter's work. It is a homely drama, with little of the glamor of romance about it, but it attracts and holds the attention of all classes of playgoers. A capable company is promised, including such well-known players as Sara Perry, Clarence Handyside, Albert Brown, Rose Snyder, William L. Gihson, Pauline Darling, and Allen Atwell.

Arthur Cunningham is completing his two weeks' engagement at the Valencia Theatre with continued success. "Shaun Rhuc" is no less attractive than "The Kerry Gow," and with lengthened acquaintance Mr. Cunningham carries the vigorous part of the hero in a captivating spirit. His singing is especially pleasing to the audiences. The last appearances of the now fully accredited and popularly endorsed star will be Saturday afternoon and evening.

The Valencia Theatre stock company will open the regular winter season next Sunday evening, November 29, with an elaborate production of Bronson Howard's drama, "Aristocracy." Robert Warwick returns to take his place at the head of the company, and Miss Blanche Stoddard, the new leading woman, will make her first appearance. Miss Stoddard was here with Margaret Anglin, and before that was at the Grand Opera House for a long time in leading rôles. Her welcome is assured. Other new members of the company are Miss Helen Lackaye, sister of Wilton Lackaye; Miss Beatrice Nichols, formerly ingénue at the Bush Temple in Chicago; Guy Darrell Standing, a clever English actor; Gerald Harcourt, a light comedian, and Thomas MacLarnie, who comes from the Bush Temple, Chicago. The entire company will appear in "Aristocracy," and the new members have parts which will afford them the best of opportunities to show their worth.

Kolb and Dill and the Princess Theatre management were obliged to change their plan and continue "Playing the Ponies" another—the fifth—week. The public seem unwilling to have the racetrack farce withdrawn. Many have seen it several times and still return for another laughing festival. Next week, however, "Wiener & Schnitzel," another musical farce by the same authors, will surely be put on, and with every prospect of its scoring another success. It promises to give unlimited opportunity for the peculiar antics of the German dialect stars, and at the same time to allow the other fun-makers of the company to appear in character. The cast will include Billy Clifford, Maud Lambert, and the entire Kolb and Dill company, which will be further strengthened by the addition of Sarah Edwards, Marie Howe, Sydney De Gray, and Harry Cashman.

The Orpheum has much that is novel and pleasing to offer in the new bill which goes on Sunday afternoon. Among the new acts will be Castellane and Brother, a couple of daring cyclists and acrobats. Their greatest achievement is a double somersault in mid-air which is the most spectacular performance ever achieved on a bicycle. Miss Felice Morris, daughter of the late Felix Morris, the great stage artist, will appear in a one-act comedy by Francis Wilson, entitled "The Old, Old Story." Miss Morris is an instance that in some cases genius is hereditary, for she is a remarkably graceful and winning actress. She will be supported by Charles C. Silk and Russell Bassett. Harry Linton and Anita Laurence will appear in a comedy skit, named "Married Now," which enables Mr. Linton to display his talent as a vocalist and Miss Laurence her ability as a danseuse. Happy Jack Gardner, a remarkably clever burnt-cork monologist and singing comedian, will introduce a brand-new assortment of jokes and witticisms. Next week will be the last of Hall McAllister in "The Girl of the Times," Raymond and Caverly, the Four Orans, and of the comic opera, "The Naked Truth," of which George W. Leslie is the bright, particular star.

Nordica's Concerts.

There is already great demand for seats for the Nordica concerts, to be given at the Van Ness Theatre on Sunday afternoons, December 13 and 20. Manager Greenbaum has determined to open a mail-order sale in advance. Seats will be $2.50, $2, $1.50, and $1, and orders may now be addressed to him at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s enclosing check or money order to insure immediate attention.

Nordica's only evening concert in this city has been secured by the St. Francis Musical Art Society.

The date of the singer's appearance in Oakland will be announced next week. It will either be a Tuesday evening or Friday afternoon. With Nordica will come Frederick Hastings, the eminent baritone.

LITERARY NOTES.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

It is remarked that it will take a pretty good sized edition of Mr. Carnegie's new book to supply the Carnegie libraries alone.

President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University visited the University of Copenhagen last season and delivered there a series of lectures which attracted much attention. These lectures are shortly to be published by the Macmillan Company under the title "The American as He Is." Among the special topics with which President Butler deals are "The American as a Political Type," "The American Apart from His Government," and "The American and the Intellectual Life."

A recent volume by the Rev. Lyman P. Powell, entitled "The Art of Natural Sleep," gives a brief account of the theories of sleep and the causes of insomnia, shows the special dangers in the use of drugs for its relief, explains the various methods of relaxation and rhythmic breathing, and describes in detail the drugless method of the Emmanuel Movement.

In England the demand for the new popular edition of John Morley's "Life of Gladstone" is said to be remarkable—so remarkable that it has been impossible fully to meet it. It took Morley three years to write the book, which appeared in 1903, in a first edition of 20,000 copies, three large volumes at two guineas net. The new edition is published at five shillings.

The autobiography of the late Li Hung Chang is to be published in China in one hundred volumes, one volume per year, and sold by subscription on the installment plan.

In Hall Caine's "My Story" he says: "Collins said that after the publication of 'The Woman in White' a lady came to him and said: 'The great failure of your book is your villain. Excuse me if I say you do not really know a villain. Your Count Fosco is a very poor one, and when next you want a character of that description I trust that you will not disdain to come to me. I know a villain; the man is alive and constantly under my gaze. In fact, he is my own husband.' The lady was the wife of Edward Bulwer Lytton."

New Publications.

"The Methods of Mr. Ames" is a readable story of social life in France and England. It is published by Mitchell Kennerley. New York. Price, $1.50.

"Vigorous Daunt Billionaire," by Ambrose Pratt, is a story as full of sensation and adventure as the most exacting could desire. It is also well told. The publishers are R. F. Fenno & Co., New York.

From E. P. Dutton & Co., New York, comes a little volume of "Stories by Ernst Theodor Wilhelm Hoffmann." An introductory essay of some value is followed by "The Cremona Violin" and "Mlle. de Scudéry." The price is 40 cents.

The World's Story Tellers Series, edited by Arthur Ransome, and published by E. P. Dutton & Co., New York, has been enriched by a little volume of "Stories by Théophile Gautier," translated by Lafcadio Hearn. Price, 40 cents net.

"Books and Reading," compiled by Roscoe Crosby Gaige and Alfred Harcourt, is a collection of what literary men have said about literature. There are eighty-five selections, well classified and arranged. The publishers are the Baker & Taylor Company, New York.

Harper & Brothers, New York, have added an illustrated volume of "Adventures at Sea" to their Young People Series. The stories are of whale hunts, wrecks, fires, storms, castaways, and rescues. Most of them are founded upon fact, and all of them are essentially true. The price is 60 cents.

Adela Verne's Farewell Concert.

Adela Verne, the brilliant young pianist, will give her farewell concert this (Saturday) afternoon at Christian Science Hall, presenting an exceptionally fine and interesting programme. By special request the artist will play Chopin's Sonata op. 35, the one with the wonderful funeral march. Other important numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," and "Andante et Rondo Capriccioso"; two Hungarian Dances by Brahms; a "Staccato Etude" by Alice Bréd-Verne, a sister of the performer; three Liszt works, and an "Elegie" by the young Californian composer, Albert Elkus.

Seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s until one o'clock, after which they will be at the box-office of the hall, corner of Sacramento and Scott Streets.

Arthur Hartmann, the Violinist.

Next Sunday afternoon, November 29, at Christian Science Hall, the brilliant young violinist and composer, Arthur Hartmann, will make his début before a San Francisco audience. Hartmann is one of the greatest violinists now before the public, and is also gaining fame as a writer on musical subjects as well as a composer of music for his favorite instrument. He is not only a virtuoso, but a scholarly interpreter of the classics, and one of those artists who while possessed of a marvelous technique uses it simply as a means to an end.

His offerings at this first concert include the great Concerto in G minor by Max Bruch; a "Prelude and Fugue" for violin alone by Bach; MacDowell's "Cradle Song," transcribed by himself; Arthur Nevin's "Unie Pensée" and original "Rhapsodie"; and the brilliant "Faust Fantasie" by Wieniawski.

Alfred Calzin, a piano virtuoso, will assist Mr. Hartmann, and will play Chopin and Liszt numbers in addition to other selections.

At the Thursday evening concert Mr. Hartmann will play the Mendelssohn Concerto, "Grand Fugue in A," by Bach, Wieniawski's "Russian Airs," numbers of Huhay and Zarzyski, and a Paganini-Hartmann "Allegro de Concerto."

The farewell concert will be given Sunday afternoon, December 6. Complete programmes may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where the sale of seats is now in progress.

Hartmann plays in Oakland Friday afternoon, December 4, at Ye Liberty Playhouse. Seats will be ready Monday at the theatre box-office.

BLANCHE ARRAL'S CONCERT.

By Josephine Hart Phelps.

Music once more was soothing San Francisco breasts, savage and otherwise, on the occasion of Mme. Blanche Arral's second concert, although not to the same degree as when Gogorza exercised his potent sway.

Mme. Arral is curiously deficient in those very qualities of temperament that so attracted to the Spanish baritone the sympathetic rapprochement of his hearers. The little Belgian is undoubtedly a brilliant and attractive singer, but that something in countenance and expression which indicates the absence of the emotional, the true artist soul, made one think of that trite expression, "her countenance does not belie her."

Mme. Arral has a beautiful soprano voice of fine volume and considerable brilliancy. She can give you all the colorature you want. She can sing with coquetry, dash, gaiety: she can keep on singing the entire evening, and wonderfully maintain her vocal balance. Not a note went astray, not a tarnish of fatigue showed in the clear and glittering tones. The singer is trained in all the technic of operatic gesture and facial expression. She handles her heart, tilts her smiling, her ever smiling, face at the correct angle of passion, but neither passion nor tenderness are there. She is incapable of expressing them.

A French cosmopolite told me that Arral has no particular standing in Europe and contended that she is no singer. I could not agree with him, but knew why he thought so. The Belgian songstress can not express in song those emotions the fervid Latin races feel most strongly, therefore she could never with them fill the position of a favorite singer.

She sang the "L'Africaine" aria colorlessly, exciting admiration only by the beauty of her tone, not by what it conveyed. She gave a long scene from the garden act of "Faust," and I noticed how practical her Marguerite was. You remember that Marguerite, when first under the spell of love's young ecstasy, says, "Leave my heart to its dreaming." How beautiful those little interludes in "The King of Thule" are, when spellbound Gretchen, dutifully trying to stifle the novel emotions springing into existence in her heart, forgets the song and wanders off into dreamy speculation as to the identity of the attractive stranger. But Mme. Arral did not dream at all. She was clean-cut and exact, singing the music with clear and beautiful tone, but with a temperamental inability to enter into more than a superficial sympathy with the musings of romantic and visionary maidenhood.

The "Hahañera" was sung with that rich fullness and brilliancy of tone appropriate to a Carmen voice, and the "Mignon" polonaise, too, excited enthusiasm. The singer is never daunted by technical difficulties. She has a voice upon which she can absolutely rely. That is, when she eschews the note of tenderness or passion. Her lack in this respect was made manifest when the singer, in response to an encore, seated herself at the piano, à la Sembrich, and, not à la Sembrich, strummed some very indifferent accompaniment while she sang "Home, Sweet Home," "Way Down Upon the Swanee River," and "Good-bye, Sweet Summer." In the first two songs we discovered at once that singing piano, and attempting to convey the sad and tender sentiment of these familiar numbers utterly deprived Mme. Arral's voice of its brilliancy and beauty. These two numbers were a dead letter, so far as musical enjoyment was concerned. In the third, however, the beautiful roundness and fullness of her voice were agreeably displayed.

She captivated the house completely, however, with a most fascinating number granted as an encore. I did not recognize it, and felt revived an old aggrieved sense. I maintain that a non-linguistic audience should always be helped out on the programme with a sentence or two to put them au fait with the sentiment of songs in foreign languages. And I do not think it right that people should be left guessing when an encore is granted. There should either be a verbal or a written announcement made in order to banish the element of uncertainty, and permit people to stop guessing, lean back, and abandon themselves to undisturbed enjoyment.

But at any rate the number in question was given with a dash, a gaiety, and an effect of gaminerie which mightily tickled the audience, and brought them to such a mood of appreciation as made the singer very happy.

This is a short, holiday week, when an each-going to press cuts off the possibility of reviewing local attractions, but I have been to Oakland, and I have come to the conclusion that they had better cut out in future the time-worn jokes about going to Oakland, which have so often wrung the withers of supersensitive Oaklanders. Last Saturday afternoon I saw a greater throng sauntering along Broadway in the relaxation of the after-matinée mood than we in San Francisco are able to display at our widely divided theatre centres. I felt quite bipped, and experienced a vague disapproval of Oakland, which has so profited by our misfortune. I was forgetting, and the passing show thus bodily transferred reminded me once more of our great calamity.

However, I was a little cheered by the reflection that the tide of San Franciscans returning here from Oakland and Berkeley has begun in earnest. Some people declare that 50 per cent of the houses in Berkeley, bastily built directly after the earthquake to avoid paying the prevailing high rents, are now for sale.

Oakland, they say, is speckled with vacant houses. But so is San Francisco. They say we are over-building here. Perhaps we are. But I have a dark suspicion that our surplus of houses will eventually accommodate the returning tide, which has begun in earnest. Some people we will never get back. But metropolitan life gets into the blood, and thousands who fled when the city was laid waste, now that our magnificent and loftily upreared business palaces speak of a restored down-town section, are feeling the old pull of attachment to our restored city.

But it is truly an ill wind that blows nobody any good, and all the bay cities and towns will eventually profit by the whirl of events that scattered the units of our population like leaves in the wind.

The Oaklanders congratulate themselves that they now see all the important theatrical attractions in their own town. They have a local stock company, similar, I suppose, to the organizations at the Valencia and the New Alcazar Theatre, but decidedly inferior to the latter one, at least, sad to say. I felt somewhat soothed by the reflection that I was witnessing a mortally poor show. It was "The Christian," which play in itself is infuriating, on account of its hypocrisy, its frequent and shameless gallery play, and the generally banal character of the sentiment of the piece.

How funny—no, not funny, how boresome—life would be if people talked the dreary, stilted balderdash which makes up the dialogue of "The Christian"! Oh, what fustian, and why in the world do the people applaud it?

"If that is the way an English gentleman does, then God help England!" "You have struck me with a woman's band!" "Stop! you forget you are talking to a priest!" Etc., etc., ad nauseam.

And yet, what a sickly vitality the piece has. They are perpetually reviving it in the theatres, and it seems to appeal to that mass of false sentiment which some people carry around with them like a goitre or a tumor.

I was quite tickled, though, at one moment in the piece, by a little burst of human nature. Gloria was in the vestry tearfully pouring out quarts of her heart history, in the most ordered stereotype, to a clergyman whom she had never met, and who was most unsympathetic. As she wiped her weeping eyes, a woman in front of me, leaned forward and said to her friend in a thrilling whisper, "I don't like that dress!"

Alas, poor bistrions, with their ineffectual stage tears, bow thorny are the crowns of popularity they wear!

I thought Landers Stevens utterly unsuited to the rôle of John Storm, and I am convinced that he would cordially agree with me. There was absolutely nothing reverend about him in manner or mien, and a secret, cynical smile seemed perpetually bovering around the corners of his lips when he was engaged in rolling off John Storm's pious and godly periods.

Isabelle Fletcher naturally acted a stereotyped rôle in stereotype, and the rest of the company peacefully and comfortably followed her example.

What a caddish thing, by the way, is the exit of Lord Robert, when, with a taunting laugh, he leaves Gloria's house openly casting aspersions upon her fair fame. It is just the sort of thing that the hardest and toughest Lord Robert, a man who was presumably born and reared an aristocrat, would never have done. It certainly looks as if Hall Caine is not up in the ways of men of the world.

I always find the most cheerful and enjoyable thing in "The Christian" is the mob. It speaks, but it can not utter heavy, Hall-Caine periods, and it does so enjoy itself when it is being held back from smashing things, and the women are so unaffectedly conscious of the comedy effects in their Cbeapside costumes.

Recent theatrical gossip concerns the first vaudeville appearance in Boston of Virginia Harned, the popular actress, in a sketch written by herself. This is Miss Harned's first attempt at authorship and she has been wonderfully successful, judging by the comment.

VANITY FAIR.

James L. Ford in Appleton's Magazine for November tells us that all public characters create a distinct and characteristic personal following that can be depended upon at all times for loyal and hearty support. That, of course, is a truism, and we need not stay to consider whether the power to create a personal following of this kind is due to a natural human inclination to be led, to a general disposition toward hero worship, or to a sort of animal magnetism that radiates from strong personalities. Human society is divided between leaders and those that are led, and it is probably impossible for two individuals to come into contact without the dominance of one and the subjection of the other.

But Mr. Ford does not philosophize; he states facts, and he illustrates them by citing the case of Ethel Barrymore. He went to see her play in New York, and he says that the play was so inane that he could only wonder at the author's courage in offering it for sale. When the curtain rose the house was fairly well filled, save for the proscenium boxes and ten whole rows of orchestra chairs stretching clear across from wall to wall:

Toward the middle of the first act the audience was startled from its apathy by a noise like that of advancing hosts, and I turned in my seat just as all the doors burst open at once and a vast human tide came swarming in through the lobby; canes rattling, tongues chattering, silks rustling, and throats laughing. Separating into three streams, the tide quickly found its way down the aisles, an usher with a fist full of coupons scurrying ahead of each stream like a frightened partridge. Noisily the flood surged and eddied about me, climbing over me, talking across me, looking through me, and finally subsiding into a sea of white necks, black broadcloth, showy shirt fronts, chiffons, and flowers.

It was somewhat after this fashion that the waters came down at Lodore.

As the waves went down I looked over their crests and saw that the boxes and the ten rows of orchestra chairs were now completely filled with wealth, fashion, and beauty, and that I had been swallowed up by and absorbed into an audience of the sort described by inexperienced as well as the most hardened reporters as "one of rare brilliancy and critical acumen."

"There's your Barrymore following," said some one just behind me.

"She always draws the highest theatre parties in the business," said some one else. "There must be fully four hundred in that bunch."

But the four hundred were fully satisfied with their functions as a following, and were in no mood to constitute themselves an audience. From whatever scene of chattering frivolity they had emerged, there was to be no cessation of noise and frolic because they happened to be in a theatre or because a number of people on the stage, including their own heroine, was supposed to be catering to their amusement:

"Isn't Ethel looking sweet tonight?" said a young woman of rare brilliancy and critical acumen who sat three seats in front of me.

"I never saw her as handsome!" cried another young thing from the other side of the house, lowering her opera glasses as she spoke.

"Why, there's young Dicky Duddleplate!" exclaimed a handsome matron in the second row as she turned in her seat and waved her hand merrily at a young gentleman in whom critical acumen and rare brilliancy were happily blended with a retreating chin, and who was smiling upon his friends from an upper box.

"How d'ye do!" shouted Dicky, grinning amiably and vacantly and waving the silver-headed cane with which he had been tapping his front teeth. "Ethel's looking awfully stout, don't you think?"

"Do tell me what it's all about!" said a fretful, high-pitched voice in a lower box; "and for heaven's sake find out what Ethel is doing in that dress. I don't like her in it one little bit."

Then a great silence fell upon the house, for the actress was in the midst of her strongest scene, and her admirers were interested in studying her gown and wondering why she wore her hair so low upon her forehead. Having indulged in these solemn speculations for fully two minutes, their interest began to flag, and it was at this moment that Charlie Clutterbuck, who was the centre of a delightful group in a lower box, and who is himself one of the brightest lads in New York society, began a series of merry pranks which convulsed the others with laughter. Taking a programme he cut out a number of words and pinned them together in a row, so that they read, "You are a goat." This he handed to one of the most brilliant women in society, who sat next to him, and her shrill screams of laughter completely drowned all the conversation in the house. It was the funniest hit of the evening, not excepting the hull's-eye made by clever Charlie when he threw a large paper pellet at little Freddie Fritters in the opposite box.

Mr. Ford remembers that he had once seen Miss Barrymore in a play worthy of her abilities. The "following" was conspicuous by its absence, for the star was playing the part of a charwoman, horn to poverty and uncomplaining toil, illiterate, tied to a brutal husband; but for all that a real woman, with a woman's capacity for suffering and loving—patient, willing, and able to endure blows as well as kisses. Miss Barrymore was showing what she could do, and "my long tried faith in the genuineness and greatness of her talents rested, at last, on a solid foundation":

"Well, by God, she's proved that she's got it in her, but they'll not let her do it again!" said an actor in the lobby.

"Who won't let her do it again—her managers?" I asked.

"Her managers? No. You can sometimes convince a manager! But she's got a following that will never stand for that old dress. Why, the people behind me are kicking because she isn't playing a lady. They don't seem to know that she's doing a great deal more than that. She's playing a woman. And she'll do it again, too, if they'll only let her! Damn 'em!"

I went back to my seat wondering if it would be possible to induce the great Barrymore following to give their star a chance to do something worthy of her. The curtain rose and I soon became absorbed in the play. Then a querulous feminine voice behind me exclaimed, "Oh, dear! Isn't she going to wear anything nicer than that?" And I knew that some of the following had arrived—late as usual.

"Very likely she'll improve as she goes along, and come out in the last act looking perfectly beautiful," said another voice, apparently that of the host, for it was conciliatory, apologetic, and expressive of his regret at having taken tickets for such a low entertainment when he might have entertained his guests with Anna Held or Eddie Foy.

"I don't see what she wants to play such an ugly character as that for, anyway," said the first voice, and I noticed that it had lost nothing of its acidity. "Ethel can really do quite nicely sometimes when she plays a lady, and it's not every actress that that can be said of. I take a lady to play a lady. I said that when I saw her in that lovely play she had a few winters ago. I've forgotten the name of it, but she wore a perfectly stunning picture hat in the last act. Of course, we don't expect Ethel to do any great acting, but she might at least wear some good clothes when her friends come to see her."

That Miss Barrymore's "following" should be a serious menace to her career is relatively unimportant, but that the bandar log of society, the monkey people of frivolity, should actually have a power over the drama as a whole, that they should be able to discredit a play because the star wears no fine clothing, is a very serious matter, but unfortunately there is nothing to be done except to hope that nature will in some way express her abhorrence of the mental vacuum now prevailing in the "followings" of dramatic favorites.

The operations for the reconstruction of the nose now being carried out by certain New York physicians have created a ripple of excitement among those who have not been favored by nature in this respect. The operation is said to be simplicity itself. First decide what kind of a nose you want. Get a sketch of it or a photograph, so that the operator may know exactly what is required of him. There is no need to be diffident in the matter, because it is just as easy to secure the full Roman or Grecian variety as a mere modification of the pattern originally furnished by nature. A hypodermic syringe of large dimensions is filled with melted paraffin wax. The point is inserted under the skin covering the bones of the nose and the warm paraffin is injected. The pain is that of a mere pin prick, and nothing more is needed than a quick modeling with the fingers into the new shape. There are, of course, some disadvantages. The wax, when hard, will naturally retain any new shape that is given to it. Do not roll over in bed or your latter state may be worse than the beginning. Do not give any one cause to pull your nose, or the resulting elongation will require skilled attention. Pugilism of all kinds must be avoided, while any undue amount of heat may have disastrous consequences.

These operations that are now being performed in the service of vanity had their rise from a more justifiable cause. Where the nose has been entirely destroyed as the result of disease or accident, it has been found possible to create a new one by taking a finger from the hand and transplanting it to the face. The finger is covered with a strip of skin drawn down from the forehead and the proper shape has been obtained from paraffin wax. A very presentable feature was the result, by no means perfect, of course, but a vast improvement upon the previous disfigurement. The possibilities of wax having thus been shown, its use has been extended to a modification of existing shapes, and there is no reason why moderately satisfactory results should not ensue.

The breakfast recently given by the lord chancellor of England to about three hundred guests in the House of Lords reminds us of a social function that has fallen into disuse. No one now issues invitations to breakfast except in obedience to ancient custom, as in the present instance. For the most part we are too had tempered at the breakfast hours to extend or to receive the amenities of hospitality. The library of the House of Lords was assigned to the judges and the smoking-room and dining-room to king's counsel and other legal luminaries. A great array of every kind of sandwich loaded the table, but the dish most in evidence was chicken and ham. Champagne, hock, and claret cups were available, though it was noted that the beverage most favored by the legal world was iced coffee. The lord chancellor's breakfast, which is eaten standing, is an institution which goes back to the days of the versatile Brougham. For the last forty years it has been held in the House of Lords, but at an earlier date it was given in the lord chancellor's residence. It is a relic of the times when breakfast was a great social function. In the early years of the nineteenth century the breakfasts of the poet Rogers were famous as the rendezvous of wits and literary personalities.

Many other great men of that period had what may be termed the breakfast habit. Thus Mr. Gladstone was a regular giver of breakfasts and a constant attendant at them when given by others. Of recent years, however, the breakfast has fallen into desuetude as a social function, except at the universities, where young men are still found who are capable of consuming three or four courses and the while maintaining a genial flow of elegant conversation. Recently an attempt has been made to revive the breakfast. Thus the king in 1907 at Newmarket issued several invitations to breakfast parties. To our ancestors the meal was a solid one, of many dishes of meat, qualified by sack possets or small beer, the ancient equivalent of soda water. Tea was not invented and coffee was only to be found in the mediæval analogue of the modern museum.

Jewelry is to play a large part in the season's decorations, and pearls are to come into greater popular favor than ever. The newest necklaces are single string of the little pearls supporting amethyst, topaz, or turquoise—matrix pendants hung at wide intervals. Variations on this simplest form are shown in models that have a little loop of the pearls from the main string to hold the pendant, also in those that have three or more main strings with the pendants attached to gold links that pass about the strings. Gold or silver ornaments elaborately set with variegated semi-precious stones are quite as much seen as the drops of plain stone.

Rope necklaces in seed pearls revive an old fashion. Some come very long, with tasseled ends, and tie in front at the throat or at the bust. Rope necklaces come in many degrees of thickness. Some have only three or four strings in the rope, others a dozen or more. Seed pearl earrings come in elaborate forms with long pendants. The rosette hooches will send many women to their hoxes of old out-of-date jewelry. They are identical with the old-time hooches, which are no longer out of date at all. Another revival is the vogue for garnets. Garnet jewelry comes in all the forms now in demand in other kinds of jewelry. Enameled birds with outstretched wings promise to be among the most liked veil and lace pins. Gulls and swallows four inches from wing tip to wing tip are favorite models.

The London Chronicle says that the American lecturer who tried to persuade the women in his audience the other day that their own hair was a prettier, not to say less obstructive, sight than their spacious hats, ignored the warnings of history. No matinée hat of today is so high as the lofty head-dresses worn by Marie Antoinette, which were the despair of poor simple-minded Louis XVI. But when deprived of all possibility of being able to see a performance at the opera he presented his wife with an aigrette of diamonds, in the hope that it might supplant a head-dress forty-five inches in height, the queen promptly had the diamonds incorporated in a new head-dress which was taller than all its predecessors.

LIQUEUR Pères Chartreux GREEN AND YELLOW

This famous cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, for centuries distilled by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) at the Monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. The above cut represents the bottle and label employed in the putting up of the article since the Monks' expulsion from France, and it is now known as Liqueur Pères Chartreux (the Monks, however, still retain the right to use the old bottle and label as well), distilled by the same order of Monks, who have securely guarded the secret of its manufacture for hundreds of years, taking it with them at the time they left the Monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, and who, therefore, alone possess a knowledge of the elements of this delicious nectar. No Liqueur associated with the name of the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) and made since their expulsion from France is genuine except that made by them at Tarragona, Spain.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

It is related that when Stevenson was told of the death of Matthew Arnold he paused; then said, dubiously, "He won't like God!"

They passed, in the course of an hour, two dead cows and more than fifty dead chickens. A strong smell of gasoline pervaded the atmosphere, and there were wheel tracks in the dust. Sherlock Holmes became greatly interested. "Watson," exclaimed he, after deep thought, "there has been an automobile along here!"

Lord Palmerston was interrupted at a public meeting. "Will you support such and such a reform, if returned?" demanded a voice from the hall. "Palm" considered a moment, then replied, "I will"—at which there were thunders of applause—"not"—he continued, amid vociferous counter cheering—"tell you"—then there was general laughter.

A beggar rang a suburban doorbell. The mistress of the house appeared, frowned at the man, and said: "Go away, please, I haven't got any cold victuals, or old clothes, or old hoots, or old overcoats, or—" "Excuse me, ma'am," the beggar humbly interrupted. "I didn't want nothin' to eat or wear. I just called to see, ma'am, if you had an old automobile to give away."

J. Barton King, the Philadelphia cricketer, described the manner and customs of the English lodging-house. In lodgings, it seems, the landlady gouges one frightfully. A friend told how he once reuked his landlady. She came to him with his spirit case. "Whisky all gone, sir," she said. "Shall I get you another hottle?" "Yes, I wish you would," said he. "It's your turn."

General Fred Grant shows in a little story how a willing but prejudiced witness may confound himself. "Any complaints, corporal?" said the colonel, making one morning a personal inspection. "Yes, sir. Taste that, sir," said the corporal promptly. The colonel put the liquid to his lips. "Why," he said, "that's the best soup I ever tasted!" "Yes, sir," said the corporal, "and the cook wants to call it coffee."

A young hoy got a job with a Scottish farmer once. "Ye'll sleep in the barn," the farmer said, "and I'll expect ye out in the field ilka morn at four o'clock." "Very well, sir," said the hoy. But the first morning he overslept a little, and it was half-past four when he reached the field. The farmer, leaning on his hoe, gave him a black look. "Where have ye been all the forenoon?" he growled.

A pretty girl, in a hammock slung in an apple orchard, awoke suddenly and frowned at the young man who stood before her. "You stole a kiss while I was asleep!" she exclaimed. "Well," stammered the young man, "you were sleeping so soundly—you looked so pretty, so tempting, I—yes, I admit I did take one little one." The girl smiled scornfully. "One!" said she. "Humph! I counted seven before I woke up."

An Irish soldier on sentry duty had orders to allow no one to smoke near his post. An officer with a lighted cigar approached, whereupon Pat holdly challenged him and ordered him to put it out at once. The officer, with a gesture of disgust, threw away his cigar, but no sooner was his hack turned than Pat picked it up and quietly retired to the sentry box. The officer, happening to look around, observed a beautiful cloud of smoke issuing from the box. He at once challenged Pat for smoking on duty. "Smoking, is it, sorr? Bedad, and I'm only keeping it lit to show to the corporal when he comes, as evidence agin you."

A New Yorker died and went to his "eternal home." This man walked around growling, as most New Yorkers do, finding fault with everything, and saying that he couldn't see that heaven was much better than New York. "Why, say," he observed to a shade who happened to be near, "this is all undermined with dynamite, just like New York, and when you're not being blown up you are being ground to death in some sulphurous subway or other. I don't see the use of coming to heaven, anyway." "Excuse me, my dear hoy," said the shade to whom he was talking, "you have made a slight mistake. This is not heaven."

You could tell from his hair that he was a musician, or something of the sort. "Yes," he said to the company at large, "the greatest tenor in the land once paid me the highest compliment I could wish. 'Oh?' remarked some one, interrogatively. "It was like this: I sang without accompaniment—I always have trouble with accompanists; they're so unsympathetic, you know—and at the end of the song he said to me: 'Do you know, when you began without an accompanist, I was surprised; when I heard you, I was astonished; and when you sat down I was delighted!' " And the sun shone down and lit up the youth's heatific smile of satisfaction.

There was something about the face of the stranger who sat opposite to her in the tram-car that was familiar to the stern lady. "Pardon me," she said. "If I am not mistaken, you are one of the poor, underpaid working girls whom our Emancipation Society tried to benefit—or, at least you were a year ago." "That is so," said the stranger. "Then our society has evidently not been without influence, for you look prosperous now." "I have everything I want, and never was so happy in my life." "That's splendid. You must have solved the woman problem." "I have." "Glorious! Do tell me all about it!" "I've married!"

Artemus Ward called on a friend the night before one of his panorama lectures. There were some three or four large roaches scurrying about the room, and they attracted his attention. "I am very fond of roaches," he said. "Once, in my own home, I found a roach struggling in a howl of water. I took a half walnut shell and put him in it; it made a good boat; I gave him a couple of toothpicks for oars. Next morning I saw that he had fastened a hair to one of the toothpicks, and had evidently been fishing. Then, overcome with exhaustion, he had fallen asleep. The sight moved me. I took him out, washed him, gave him a spoonful of hoiled egg, and let him go. That roach never forgot my kindness, and now my home is full of roaches."

L'Envoi. I thought we had 'em beaten To a frazzle, so I did; But I found I was mistaken When the landslide slid.

I figured we would beat 'em Every turning of the road, But I missed my computation When the landslide slode.

My multiplication table Must have put me to the had, For I was humped a plenty When the landslide slad.

When I awoke a Wednesday And all the wreckage viewed, What I saw was a plenty When the landslide slewed.

Serenade. O come with me and be my cook, And you may have my pocketbook! For you the parlor door's ajar, And you may use my motor car.

My wife has gems that you may wear, And you may use her Sunday hair. And if these things enticing look, Then come with me and be my cook. —Puck.

Lay of an Ancient Anecdote. An ancient anecdote I he! Three thousand years ago Egyptian jokesmiths fashioned me to fit their Pharaoh. The old Chaldeans, sportive men, amusement would evince To see me harnessed now and then to potentate or prince.

The Middle Ages knew me well; I was considered good. I helped make famous William Tell, and also Robin Hood. The Grub-Street wits I did delight; I earned for them some pence; And when the New World came to light I emigrated thence.

An ancient anecdote I be! I have been coupled with The foremost men of history and half their kin and kith. I've toiled since Humor had its dawn to feed the scribbling craft; And now I s'pose they'll tack me on to William Howard Taft! —Success.

When Mr. Volney Streamer was visiting Mark Twain at his Redding home, a short time ago, he remarked on the picturesque appearance of a windmill in the distant landscape. It was not a windmill, however, hut the tower of the Congregational Church at Redding Centre. When the clergyman of that church came to see Mr. Clemens, the latter told him that one of his guests had called his church a windmill, adding, "I think that was going a little too far!"

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

This winter will remain prominent in the annals of San Francisco on account of the very beautiful and enjoyable private halls given, which have been in several instances very large and formal affairs, as the event of last week at which Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Donohoe presented their debutante daughter, Miss Katharine, and which was notable for the number of the older set of people, prominent in society a decade or two since, who were present as well as the younger dancing men and girls: the hall given by Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Hopkins this week for their daughter, Miss Florence Hopkins, one of the most popular of the debutantes; and Mr. Greenway's birthday dance. Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott's hall promises to be one of the most elaborate and exclusive halls ever given in San Francisco.

The engagement is announced of Miss Lucille Wilkins, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Wilkins of San Rafael, to Mr. Taliaferro Milton. The wedding will be an event of next year.

The wedding of Miss Pansy Perkins, daughter of Senator and Mrs. George C. Perkins, to Mr. Cleveland Baker, took place on Wednesday evening of last week at the home of the bride's parents, "Palm Knoll," Vernon Heights, Oakland. The ceremony took place at nine o'clock, the Rev. J. K. McLean being the officiating clergyman. Miss Alma Perkins, the bride's cousin, was the maid of honor and Mr. Charles de Young the best man. After their honeymoon trip to Southern California, Mr. and Mrs. Baker will live in Tonopah.

On Wednesday, the 18th of November, at half-past three o'clock p. m., Miss May Harvey Foulkes was married to Mr. William Thomas Renison, the Rev. Mr. Renison, Sr., father of the groom, reading the service, which took place at the home of the bride's mother, 420 Spruce Street. Mrs. Foulkes being an invalid, only near relatives and a very few intimate friends were asked. Among those present were Mrs. Henry Williams, Mrs. James McKenzie, Mrs. J. Mora Moss, Mrs. George Hellman, Mrs. Musser, Miss Ethel Moore, Miss Florence Durden, Miss Margaret Roney, Mr. William Wallace Shaw, Mr. Musser, Dr. J. Mora Moss, and Dr. Bruce Foulkes.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott will entertain at a hall at the St. Francis on Friday evening, December 4.

Invitations have been issued for the Colonial Dances, which will take place at the St. Francis on Friday evening, January 15, and Tuesday evening, February 23. The patronesses are Mrs. Charles O. Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy officers who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Major-General John F. Weston, U. S. A., has been ordered relieved of the command of the Philippine Division and will leave for San Francisco on the transport sailing from Manila on December 15, to assume command of the Department of California, relieving General Frederick A. Smith, U. S. A., temporarily in command.

Colonel Edward A. Godwin, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., was retired from active service on November 15, at his own request, after more than forty-three years of service.

Colonel George H. Torney, Medical Corps, U. S. A., recently appointed to succeed to the office of surgeon-general of the army in January, has been ordered relieved from his duties here as chief surgeon of the Department of California and commanding officer of the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, and will proceed to Washington, D. C., and report to the surgeon-general of the army for duty.

Lieutenant-Colonel David L. Brainard, deputy commissary-general, U. S. A., chief commissary of the Department of California, has been granted two months' leave of absence, to take effect on December 10.

Major James M. Kennedy, Medical Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered to report to the commanding general, Department of California, for assignment to command of the General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, on December 1.

Captain Merch B. Stewart, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., Presidio of Monterey, having been appointed adjutant of his regiment, has been ordered to proceed to Fort McDowell, Angel Island, reporting upon arrival to the commanding officer for duty.

Captain Carroll F. Armistead, Twenty-First Infantry, U. S. A., is relieved from treatment at the Army and Navy General Hospital, Hot Springs, Arkansas, and ordered to return to his proper station.

Captain Harry S. Purnell, Medical Corps, U. S. A., now on leave, is relieved from duty at Fort Mackenzie, Wyoming, and is ordered to proceed at the proper time to San Francisco and report in person to the superintendent of the Army Transport Service for duty as surgeon of the transport Thomas on its next voyage to the Philippines, relieving Lieutenant Matthew Reasoner, Medical Corps, U. S. A. Captain Purnell will stand relieved upon his arrival in Manila and will report to the commanding general of the Philippines Division for duty.

Lieutenant Edward H. Andres, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., having been transferred to Company H, Eighth Infantry, has been ordered upon expiration of his leave to proceed to the Presidio of Monterey, reporting upon his arrival to his commanding officer for duty.

Lieutenant John J. Moller, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., Presidio of Monterey, has been granted three months' leave of absence, which took effect on November 19.

Lieutenant Frank H. Kalde, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., is relieved from duty at the Presidio of Monterey and ordered to proceed to Fort McDowell, reporting upon arrival to the commanding officer for duty as adjutant, Third Battalion, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A.

Lieutenant Harold W. Jones, Medical Corps, U. S. A., is relieved from duty as surgeon of the transport Buford, to take effect on or about January 15, after the arrival of that transport in Manila, and will then proceed to the United States. On the expiration of his leave of absence he will report by telegraph to the adjutant-general of the army for further orders.

Lieutenant Joseph A. Worthington, Medical Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered relieved from duty at the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, at such time as will enable him to comply with this order, and will report in person to the superintendent of the Army Transport Service at San Francisco, for duty as surgeon on the transport Crook, with station at San Francisco, relieving Lieutenant Omar W. Pinkston, Medical Corps, U. S. A., who upon being thus relieved will report by telegraph to the adjutant-general of the army for further orders.

Lieutenant Howard McC. Snyder, Medical Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered to report to the commanding officer, Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, for temporary duty pending the departure of the transport for Manila on December 5.

The Fruit and Flower Mission.

The Argonaut received on Monday, through the mail, a fifty-dollar note, the annual Thanksgiving donation of "M. R.-M. F." to the Fruit and Flower Mission. It was accompanied by the following note:

SAN FRANCISCO, November 23, 1908.

TO THE EDITOR—Dear Sir: To help along its usual Thanksgiving Day work, you are kindly asked to send to the San Francisco Fruit and Flower Mission the enclosed fifty dollars.

With the donation go the best wishes of

Yours respectfully,
M. R.-M. F.

The gift was forward to the Fruit and Flower Mission by the Argonaut, which is in ignorance of the identity of the generous donors, and the following reply has been received from the treasurer of the society:

SAN FRANCISCO, November 24, 1908.

EDITOR ARGONAUT—Dear Sir: The San Francisco Fruit and Flower Mission acknowledges with many thanks the receipt, through you, of the sum of fifty dollars; the offering of its unknown, but highly appreciated friends, "M. R.-M. F."

The mission receives, in support of its efforts, the cooperation of a very large portion of the community; but none among its contributors has been more faithful or more generous than "M. R.-M. F."—whose wanderings through many climes have never, during these many years, caused them to forget the work which the mission does at this season.

We must again rely upon your good offices to convey to them the hearty appreciation of the members of our society, speaking not only on their own behalf, but on behalf of the many needy persons to whom we are, through contributions like this, enabled to provide an occasional glad hour.

Very truly yours,

GUSSIE MANDEBAUM,

Treasurer San Francisco Fruit and Flower Mission.

Next March, as Mme. Eames told the reporters when she landed in New York a few days ago, will bring the twentieth anniversary of her first appearance on the stage—in 1889 at the Opéra in Paris as Juliet, in Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet." This season she will undertake no new parts at the Metropolitan, and in February she will leave the company for a concert tour of her own.

Fond Mother—Bobby, dear, you've forgotten your toothbrush. Bobby—But I thought I was going on a vacation.—Circle.

"Have you read any of the recent fiction?" "I have read it all." "Where?" "In Dumas, forty years ago."—Boston Traveler.

Elizabeth—Are you fond of motoring? Mory—Oh, yes, indeed, and the constant occupation doesn't bother me a bit.—The Club-Fellow.

Editor—It may, of course, happen to any one, young man, that he has no ideas, but that's no reason why he should write a hook!—Fliegende Blätter.

Ostend—Pa, what is the "Suhurban Handicap?" Pa—The lawn mower in the summer and the snow shovel in the winter, my son.—Chicago Daily News.

She (sleepily, in rear seat of auto)—How rough the road is tonight. Chauffeur—I should say so! Every man we hit is extra big.—The Bellman.

Miss Wooboy—So Mr. Smart really said he considered me very witty—eh? Miss Knox—Not exactly; he said he had to laugh every time he met you.—Tit-Bits.

"I want another box of pills like I got for mother yesterday." "Did your mother say they were good?" "No—huh they just fit my air-gun."—Fliegende Blätter.

"Kitty," said her mother, rehooking, "you must sit still when you are at the table." "I can't, mamma," protested the little girl, "I'm a fidgetarian."—Chicago Tribune.

"Did he ever castigate his son for playing truant?" "No, he never fooled with them new-fangled ways o' doin'. He jest give him a sound lickin'."—Baltimore American.

"I wish to purchase a hat for myself," she whispered softly. "Merry Widow?" asked the cheery salesman? "No, doleful wife," was the pathetic rejoinder.—Brooklyn Life.

Fastboy—Really, dear, you shouldn't wait supper for me this way when I'm detained at the office. Mrs. Fastboy—Supper, you idiot! The maid just laid the table for breakfast.—Puck.

"If you don't marry me," he said, desperately, "I shall kill myself." "And write a note telling all about it?" queried the maid. "Yes." "And hold my photograph in your other hand?" "I had thought about it."

"Well, just wait a minute," she said, "and I'll horrow pa's pistol for you. My! hut won't it be romantic?"—Stray Stories.

He—Nothing could ever come between us, could it, dear? She—I can't think of a single thing, unless I should happen to become engaged to some other man before we get married.—Stray Stories.

"So Algernon is going to devote himself to poetry?" "Yes, hut only after a season in the hank. I don't want the poor hoy to die without even knowing what money feels like."—Life.

"I wonder what the President would have done at Pompeii when it rained hot ashes and molten lava." "Seized the occasion, in all probability, to go for a nice walk."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"What did Howard do when he found they were going to arrest the owners of motors, and not the chauffeurs, in all cases of exceeding the speed limit?" "He put every car he owns in his wife's name."—Brooklyn Life.

A New Deal in the Pacific.

Reports from Washington within the week suggest a climax of, even though they do not clear up the mystery which has filled the Pacific-Oriental atmosphere during the past year. There has, so it is said by that famous old gossip "a reliable authority," been negotiated between Japan and the United States a treaty covering the policies of the two countries in the Pacific world. The agreement, it is declared, is based on the idea of encouraging and defending free and peaceful commercial development in the Pacific. It contains a mutual guaranty of respect each for the other's territorial possessions and defines the attitude of the two countries toward China, binding each to defend by peaceful means China's independence and integrity and to give equal commercial opportunity in the Chinese empire to all countries.

More important still, so the report goes, the agreement binds the United States and Japan to consult one another with the idea of acting together in the case of any general complication. In brief, the treaty is an agreement between the United States and Japan tantamount to a general alliance for the preservation of peace not only between the countries themselves, but in the Pacific Ocean, with the privileges of the commercial open door in China and inferentially throughout the whole Pacific region.

While as yet this talk has no definite or authoritative basis, circumstances indicate that it is in reality well founded. Something clearly has happened between Washington and Tokio, and for diplomatic purposes it is being disclosed in the shape of gossip and speculation. Possibly the story is given out tentatively by way of testing the public mind—as a species of "trial balloon," if we may borrow a French term for this sort of experimentation with public sentiment.

If this theory be correct, the method has entirely justified itself, for the report, which has been singularly accredited not only at home, but abroad, has met with universal approval. Our own people, who we think have been unduly nervous over the suggestion of Japanese trouble, are eminently satisfied with an arrangement which promises peace between this country and Japan. Europe, naturally, is pleased with an arrangement which yields her the open door in China and which pledges the United States and Japan to its maintenance. Accepted and commented upon everywhere, there is no word of adverse criticism from any source.

An extraordinary atmosphere of apprehension and mystery as related to Japan and the United States has existed and persisted during the past year. No positive unfriendly act or suggestion on the part of Japan can be cited, and yet it has been in the American mind—and in the European mind as well—that something serious was brewing on the far side of the Pacific Ocean. The dispatch of the American battleship fleet into Pacific waters has been the only tangible fact in this connection, and this has been so fully explained in other ways as to have relieved the popular mind of serious notions as to its significance. In the light of the week's development it is easy to believe that the coming of the fleet to the Pacific had not only a general, but a specific and definite motive; that it was meant not merely as a sentimental and dramatic declaration of American purpose and power in the Pacific, but, as well, a deliberate and calculated exhibition of material force—a show of teeth, so to speak.

Long observation of the Oriental character at fairly close range has not tended to inspire the Argonaut with a high regard for Oriental diplomacy. We have come to believe that the Oriental is straightforward and honest when it suits his purpose, but that he finds it just as easy to pursue a course of indirection and deception and is just as well pleased to do it. A treaty—no matter what it contains—between the United States and Japan is hardly to be regarded as a serious matter; but the fact that Japan has entered into it may serve a good purpose as a basis for judgment and action in future relationships and operations. It may at least be taken as evidence that Japan has no immediate purposes hostile to this country. At the same time a friendly engagement ought not to be taken so seriously by the American government as to cause it to leave the Pacific unprepared for defense or even for offense.

In the modern world conflicts between nations are less likely to be warlike than industrial and commercial. Possession of the Pacific Ocean in the broadest and truest sense is to be for that country which dominates the commerce of that ocean. That is to say, the Pacific may be an American lake—if we may borrow a phrase—if the American nation shall have the enterprise to take possession of it commercially, to cover it with the American flag, and to take the leading place in its general affairs. And by the same token it will become a Japanese lake if Japan shall take the leading commercial position in it. The battle is not necessarily to the strong nor the race to the swift; while America is stronger and may easily be swifter than Japan, she will not possess herself of the Pacific on the basis of mere potentiality. If she would dominate the Pacific, she must literally and definitely, commercially and in a military sense, possess herself of it.

American policy in the Pacific has been stupid enough in recent years. In spite of many motives tending to inspire American ambition, we have allowed every other country with any maritime or commercial pretensions to get ahead of us. Recently by a course of sheer insular stupidity we have established rules tending to drive every American ship out of the transpacific trade. Where private enterprise, as in the case of James J. Hill's line of monster steamships, has sought to extend the sphere of American commerce, national policy—or shall we say national impolicy—has stepped in to thwart it. Mr. Hill's ships have been driven out of commission. Likewise the Spreckels transpacific line has been abandoned; and the next step in the effacement of the American flag is, if we are to believe current reports, to be the elimination of the Pacific Mail line. Apparently and for the moment we are to give up all plans tending to extend the sphere of the American influence in the Pacific.

But the Argonaut has faith that all this will be only temporary. The President-elect knows the Pacific Ocean as well or better than any other American. We believe that he will be able to see the situation in its real meaning, to know what is needed for the promotion of American interests in the Pacific, and that he will find ways to correct the mischief which has been done. Opportunity will come for consideration of this phase of our responsibility, and at the same time to educate public sentiment, when the treaty above referred to shall come before the Senate for ratification.

Death of William J. Biggy.

One startling incident follows another in connection with the dramatis personae of our never-ending municipal conflict. The latest in a series of tragic events is the death of Chief of Police William J. Biggy under circumstances characterizing it as a sequel to the assault upon Francis J. Heney by Morris Haas two weeks ago, and the subsequent suicide of Haas on the day following his desperate act. On Monday night of this week Biggy crossed the bay to Belvedere in the police patrol boat accompanied by only one man, who both operated the engine and steered the little craft. After a conference with Police Commissioner Keil at his Belvedere home, Biggy started on the return trip to the city, and some time during the passage either fell from the boat or plunged from it into the waters of the bay. He had previously retired to the tiny cabin of the launch and he was not missed by the boatman until the San Francisco shore was nearly reached. Up to this writing—Wednesday morning—no trace of the body has been discovered. Whether Mr. Biggy lost his balance and fell into the water or committed suicide can not positively be known, and an element of positive uncertainty must always be associated with the case. It is conceivable that he might have lost his footing and so have fallen from the boat, and this theory finds suggestion if not support in the fact that he was subject to seasickness, and at one stage of the passage was seen by the boatman leaning over the rail.

But there are many circumstances which point to the possibility of deliberate self-destruction. Mr. Biggy had fallen into a desperate quarrel with his late friends and sponsors of the graft prosecution, who had turned against him because he would not support Detective Burns in the theory that Heney's assailant, Haas, was a hired assassin and that his crime was done at the instigation of the defendants in the graft cases. Burns had filed charges against Biggy and was proceeding with the manifest intention of thrusting him from his official position through such influences as he (Burns) is presumed to hold with the municipal administration.

It will be remembered that Biggy was the special elisor selected, with the approval of Burns et al., as the official custodian of Abraham Ruef during the parlarboarder phase of the latter's "detention" before and after conviction under the secret immunity contract entered into by Heney and Spreckels. Still later Biggy was made chief of police through influences exerted by his friends of the graft prosecution. He continued in this position, apparently in entire amity with Burns et al., until the assault upon Heney by Haas on the 13th of November.

For reasons which do not require exploitation, Mr. Burns sought to interpret the assault upon Heney as the deed not of an injured and desperate madman, but of an agent of the so-called "higher-ups." Biggy would not join him in this theory, but agreed with the detectives of the police department that the crime was that of a man without backers or confederates. A day later, when Haas had committed suicide in his cell with a pistol which had escaped the scrutiny of two police detectives and of Burns, all of whom had searched him, Burns conceived the notion that the pistol had never been concealed upon Haas's person, but had been passed to him either by his wife or through some other source. He made this incident the subject of grave reflections upon Biggy, who in turn had declined to support this new theory. Concurrently Burns filed charges against Biggy, as above set forth.

Ever since these happenings some two weeks ago, the special newspaper organs of the prosecution have found nothing too ill to say about Biggy, his failure to cooperate with Burns, and his administration of the police department. Day after day he has been scored by these papers to the full measure of their denunciatory capabilities. It is not impossible, indeed it is not improbable, that in the situation in which he found himself, poor Biggy, never at his best a resolute or strong man, should have found life not worth the living. He has exhibited many signs of distress during the past two weeks. He was desperately grieved that his former associates and friends of the graft prosecution had turned from him and loaded him with reproaches for an official course in line with his conviction and sense of duty. On top of all, his domestic life was an unhappy one. Nor should it pass unnoted that Biggy's going in the patrol boat without police escort is a thing unprecedented, and that the customary escort was dispensed with by his own order.

The story of Mr. Biggy's talk with Commissioner Keil just before his disappearance has not, as yet, been reported fully; but Mr. Keil has said enough to indicate his fear that the case is one of suicide. Biggy was suffering from distress of mind over the fact that his late friends—those whom he had served to his own discredit—had turned against him, and he was particularly aggrieved at the rabid and persistent assaults of the prosecution newspapers, the Call and Bulletin. In his desperation he tendered Keil his resignation as chief of police, but it was not accepted, and after a prolonged talk in which Mr. Keil endeavored to compose the mind of his guest, the latter started for home after declining a pressing invitation to remain over night. Biggy was in a fairly calm state of mind when he left Keil's house, but the latter was, none the less, seriously apprehensive, and later, when informed of what had happened, expressed himself as not greatly surprised. We shall, no doubt, have the full story of Biggy's talk with Keil, and it is certain to shed some light upon the subsequent event.

In the absence of positive assurance it would be going far to declare Biggy's disappearance from the patrol boat as an act of willful self-destruction. None the less, taking all the circumstances together, the Argonaut can but feel this to be the most logical judgment in the case.

The American Forum.

The slating of Mr. Elihu Root for the senatorship, proceeding as it does upon the basis of a state-wide determination that New York shall have a better representation in the Senate, ought to be taken as a suggestion the country over. The Senate is and has been for years decadent. Less and less consideration has been given to the make-up of its membership, with the result that it has fallen distinctly from its once high estate. The Senate, regarded as one of the great factors in the government, is a thing of the highest importance and it ought to be preserved in its integrity. But if the system of selection which has prevailed in recent years shall continue, if attorneys of private interests, corruptionists, and rich nobodies are to crowd the Senate, then that body will in course of time lose its power as it has already lost its traditional respect. Political systems are always in a state of evolution; and the government of the United States is no exception to this general law. When any department of the government ceases to be worthy, when it wholly loses public respect, it must in the nature of things go to the wall.

The importance of the Senate in its relation to the life of the country does not rest wholly or even chiefly upon the function of legislation. The best service which the Senate renders or can render is in its character as a public forum. What is spoken on the floor of the Senate is multiplied in ten million forms and is read in the uttermost parts of the country. One who speaks in the Senate in truth addresses the whole country, and this being the fact, the Senate ought to be filled with men who through the propensities of knowledge and of intellectual leadership should give tone to the political thought of the country. It is no mere figure of speech that a senator should be the voice of his State, giving to the country at large the feeling and sentiment of his immediate constituency, and giving in turn to that constituency reflections of views from the standpoint of senatorial opportunity and responsibility.

Today a senator of the United States is more than likely to be a man who has schemed himself into position, or, worse still, one whose "connections" have put him there. He is quite as likely to be commended by the subservience of his character as by personal force. It has been so with New York these many years past. Since the beginning of the war that State has been represented in the Senate by thirteen men, and in the whole number only three have been men worthy of the senatorial dignity. At last New York feels herself shamed and injured by the inadequacy of her representation, and she now proposes to set a new mark by sending to Washington a man of strictly first-class reputation and powers. Let other States take heed of this example and profit by it.

The Speaker of the House.

It is easily conceivable that the President-elect would prefer somebody other than Mr. Cannon in the Speakership of the House of Representatives. Mr. Cannon's attitude as a "stand-patter" is reason enough why Mr. Taft should object to him, but this is only one of many considerations. The truth is that Mr. Cannon is a very disagreeable old party, due partly to the narrowness of his character and partly to the general cantankerousness of his disposition. He is a man who has become obsessed by personal ambition late in life, and ambition, like love, goes hard with him who is infected with it untimely. Cannon as a political figure dates back to the days of Lincoln, and this fact has been made to do grand service for him in many a hard-fought round. He was known in Congress for thirty years as a narrow-minded, tight-fisted, hard-mouthed type of political reactionary with no outlook upon newer and broader things, no capacity for anything outside of routine. His potency as a congressional figure has come with recent years—and thereby hangs a tale.

The Speakership of the House was originally little more than it assumes to be, namely, a mere chairmanship. But with growth in the membership of the House, with increase in the subjects of legislation, with the added pressure of the newer times, the Speakership became a position of tremendous power. In the hands of a strong man like the late Thomas Reed it came, indeed, fairly to rival the presidency as a position of political vantage. The work of legislation is done through committees; the membership of the committees is made up by the Speaker; as presiding officer no man may obtain the floor excepting by consent of the Speaker. A man in the Speaker's chair with the resolution and the personal force to use the powers in his hands may do pretty much as he pleases with legislation. He may, indeed, be a veritable czar. And at the same time, if he be not too rough in his czarship, he may command the positive support of the House because of the facilities which the Speakership affords him for doing individual favors.

Under "Czar" Reed the Speakership took on a character which disturbed other branches of the government to the degree of alarm. There were those highly placed who were not ill pleased with the retirement of Mr. Reed in 1899; and when it came to filling his place there was care to select a man without those qualities which had raised Mr. Reed to a position so high in the government. Speaker David B. Henderson of Iowa, who came after Reed in 1899 and who presided over the Fifty-Sixth and Fifty-Seventh Congresses, was quite another sort of man. He was slow, amiable, respectable, and commonplace to the last degree. He was strictly a non-combatant. He did what the leading men of the House and of the party wanted him to do; he did nothing that they didn't want him to do. He was a furniture-picture pure and simple; in four years of service he identified himself with nothing, made for himself no reputation, gained neither friends nor foes. His memory as a Speaker will not last as many days as the late Speaker Reed's will last years.

In the selection of Mr. Henderson's successor there was the same wish to get a neutral personality, but time had stilled the spirit of alarm and the task was not gone about with quite the same care and discretion. Mr. Cannon was selected because he was a strict party man, past the age, it was thought, of personal ambition, and unlikely to develop czarlike qualities. The result has not fairly matched the hope. Without gaining in outlook, in breadth of motive, or in liberality of mind, Mr. Cannon has amazingly developed at the points of self-esteem and self-assertiveness. In the Speakership the whimsies and vanities of his character have become matters of vital importance. He has the arbitrary spirit, the overwrought sense of personal importance, which frequently develop in a small and narrow man who through some chance finds himself possessed of extraordinary powers. Mr. Cannon is as much a dictator as ever Mr. Reed was without the latter's broad-mindedness, largeness of purpose, and all-healing gift of humor. Mr. Cannon is making the Speakership as a factor in the government everything that Reed made it, besides using its extraordinary powers in a more personal and more irritating spirit. Whatever is displeasing to Mr. Cannon does not go in the House of Representatives these days; and yet the Speaker has so allied himself with the potential members of the House that his reelection to the Speakership next March is a practical assurance, even though the President-elect may wish to see some other man in that place.

It is now manifest that the Speakership of the House of Representatives is a vastly greater office than it was planned to be or in earlier days thought to be. In relation to most things, the Speaker, if he be a man of resolution and assertion, is practically the House. And as time goes on the importance of the Speakership is likely to increase rather than decline. We think it not outside the cards that in the future shaping of things, the Speakership of the House will grow and grow until it shall dwarf every other place and function in the government, not excepting the presidency itself. In other constitutional countries the tendencies in government all go towards the enlargement of the man or men with whom rest the powers of legislation, and there are many reasons to believe that time will witness the same process of evolution in this country.

The Crisis of Democracy.

The future of the Democratic party is naturally a matter of concern not only to Democrats, but to all who appreciate the fact that American political health calls for the existence of two strong and fairly balanced parties. With one party so persistently successful and powerful that its control of affairs is an assurance, and with another so weak and ineffective that its failure is a thing foredoomed—this is a condition of serious political hazard. The meaning of it is that the political life of the country is certain to be cursed by two opposite but grievous evils, namely, the evil of an excessive strength and the evil of a supine weakness. Of the two, perhaps the vices of strength are to be preferred, but either is bad in itself, and together they form a combination so mischievous that it may be doubted if our system or any system designed to sustain social and individual freedom could permanently subsist under it.

The evil of excessive party strength may easily be traced in the recent history of the Republican party. The strength of this organization—its persistent authority in the nation and in the more progressive States—has attracted to it and brought into alliance with it a vast group of demoralizing elements. Those who seek special privilege, whether in the form of advantage under the tariff, of executive interpretation of the laws, or of what-not, have naturally put themselves and their interests into alliance with the Republican party. Not all the great trusts, to be sure—notably Standard Oil, the greatest of all—are affiliated with Republicanism, but most of them are, and their influence makes a problem which confronts the Taft administration at the very beginning of its responsibility. The Republican party stands pledged by its national convention and by the promises of its leading men, including the President-elect, to reform the tariff, and by reform is meant to cut out of the schedules those provisions which afford a shelter for certain combinations of capital great and small which are exploiting the public.

But it is found that there are powerful forces in the government opposed to any genuine and thorough modification of the tariff. Mr. Cannon of Illinois, whose reelection to the Speakership is assured, is notoriously an opponent of thoroughgoing changes. His plan is to make a pretense of reform by a few piddling modifications that will leave the law practically what it is at present. Mr. Cannon, as Speaker of the House of Representatives, is in a position to control the House Committee on Ways and Means, by which the changes in the tariff law must primarily be formulated. On the floor of the House of Representatives there are likewise several men of high rank and commanding ability who, as the representatives of districts which profit vastly by extreme protection, are opposed to change. In the Senate the situation, regarded from the standpoint of tariff reform, is equally serious. Mr. Aldrich of Rhode Island, Mr. Knox of Pennsylvania—these and others highly placed and effective for their abilities, are dead-set against anything like a radical reform of the tariff in the spirit of the party promises. It is doubtful if in the face of these forces of opposition the party pledge for reform can be carried through. By its strength the party has attracted to itself forces of selfish and sinister interest which have put its own integrity in peril.

And in the recent history of the Democratic party we may as easily trace effects directly the product of party weakness. In recent years the whole tone and spirit of Democracy has not been that of a party inspired by responsibility, but of one seeking by hook or crook to get into power. To say that the Democratic party has become a party of negation is trite enough, but it is precisely the fact. Its policies do not take hold of the responsibilities and purposes of government, but rather are shaped to stand in opposition to the policies of its successful rival. Democracy complains and protests, but it does not propose to lead, and it may fairly be said to have lost the instinct of leadership. If by any chance it plucks up courage to proceed upon any new line, it is certain to be one founded not in principle, but in some cheap calculation of advantage. For example, recall the attitude of Democracy during the recent national campaign on the labor question. A demand for special privilege on the part of organized labor, rejected by the Republican convention, was eagerly espoused by the Democrats at Denver in the face of the fact that what it proposed was in violation of every principle, every tradition, and every precept of Democracy.

It is not to be presumed for a moment that those who make up the membership of the Democratic party are more willing than the rank and file of Republicanism to concede to organized labor a system of special privilege. Democracy is and has always been the foe of special privilege. But in its eagerness to get votes, in the desperation of its weakness, the party was willing to yield principle, tradition, precept, sentiment. Like Shakespeare's lean apothecary, its poverty—its need of votes—rather than its will prompted the concession to Gompers. It is ever thus with political weakness. It yields and yields until resolution, integrity, and self-respect are lost.

These considerations give special significance and interest to certain proposals now being widely discussed with respect to the future of the Democratic party. Its immediate situation is that of a complete and pitiful wreck. It was beaten twelve years ago on a financial issue. It was beaten eight years ago on a combination of anti-progressive issues, among which anti-imperialism was the chief count. Four years ago it took the back track and under the leadership of its so-called conservative element it was badly beaten. This year it veered again to radicalism, and under the leadership of Mr. Bryan went down under a crushing defeat. Manifestly something is radically wrong with a party which, turn where it may, can find no prospect or hope of success.

What to do with the party, how to save it, how to give vitality to its traditional principles and hope to those who cherish them—this is the problem which faces those thoughtful men to whom Democracy as a political tradition and affiliation is still dear. The problem is indeed serious, because the party itself is so divided, so hopelessly at odds in temperament and in objects of attachment. The East will not follow Mr.

Bryan. The West will not accept the conservative aims of the Eastern faction of the party nor follow Eastern leadership. As between the factions there is a fixed and uncompromising dead-lock; and in this situation there is danger that the fundamental principles upon which Democracy rests must lose anything like effective and persistent championship; likewise that there shall be lost that balance of parties so essential to integrity and poise in government.

One thing is certain, namely, that Mr. Bryan, however his history and personality may appeal to the West, can no longer be of service as a party leader. His day is past; henceforth he can only be a disturber in his party unless he can find the resolution to surrender the power which he holds to others or to another, who may use it more discreetly and effectively. The one service that Mr. Bryan can now render to Democracy is to abandon all pretense and hope of leadership, to take a place in the ranks and to aid in so far as he may whoever may assume the championship of the old Democratic principles.

Mr. Bryan ought to summon to a party council a limited number of men representative of the Democratic party in all parts of the country. He ought to say to them that he will not be an obstacle to reorganization of the party on new lines and with new leadership in support of the old causes. He ought to lay down every pretense and claim to authority in the party or to a place of leadership in it, and declare himself a follower of whoever may assume the responsibilities of reorganization and revitalization.

There is room and work for the Democratic party. Its traditional principles do not, indeed, serve the immediate hour, but in process of time they will surely answer the need of the country as they have answered it in times past. What is imperative now is new organization and new blood. Without these the Democratic party must continue to flounder about as a mass of broken and useless wreckage, a thing calculated to prejudice rather than to promote the principles of its foundation.

Foraker, Burton, and "Brother Charlie."

Mr. Foraker exhibits his usual courage in standing for the Ohio senatorship in the face of almost certain defeat. This has ever been his way in public life. He has never been one to cringe, to yield, to make hypocritical pretense. Whether right or wrong, he has always been open and above board, and by this course he has won the favor and good will even of those whose notions of things have been different from his own. In Ohio he is going up against almost inevitable defeat, but he is doing it like a man, and if he shall indeed be beaten he will have not only his own respect, but that of all who admire fortitude and consistency and who like courage in defeat better than a cringing cowardice in success.

If Mr. Foraker is to be turned down, his natural successor is Hon. Theodore E. Burton of Cleveland. He, too, is a man of independent ways and of open political methods, which do not include the spending of money. Burton has long been at the head of the Rivers and Harbors Committee in the House of Representatives, and has stood a prominent figure in that limited group of highly responsible and effective men who control the policies of the House of Representatives. He enjoys unbounded respect in his own State, both for character and ability, but he has not been highly regarded by politicians, due to his practice of playing a lone hand in political matters. He is criticised as a politician because he is shy at the point of coöperative political practice. In other words, he is not what is known as a machine man, and in Ohio the machine system has long been the rule in politics. Burton's senatorial candidacy is backed by the solid Cleveland delegation, but it is not likely to prove effective without the approval and coöperation of the President-elect. Not unnaturally, the Ohio legislature will wish to please Mr. Taft in the matter of a successor to Mr. Foraker.

The common opinion among Ohio politicians is that the senatorial election will go not for Foraker nor for Burton, but for Charles P. Taft—"Brother Charley," in the Ohio phrase. He is a Republican of the "regular" type, but for a long time he has been out of politics. In the recent campaign he took upon himself the entire financial responsibility of his brother's candidacy, both in the country at large and in the State of Ohio. Politicians think well of "Brother Charley," and on the whole would be glad to see him get the senatorship, in spite of the fact that he has no particular fitness for the place, being notably less qualified than either Foraker or Burton. The circumstance likely to prevent Mr. Taft's election is the possibility—rather let us say the probability—that the President-elect may think that it would be bad politics and bad taste to put his influence behind his brother. The President-elect, however, is personally very fond of "Brother Charley," and the common opinion among Ohio politicians is that anything the latter wants the former will be glad to yield.

Editorial Notes.

The experiment involved in the proposal of the British government for setting up a permanent court of arbitration in trades disputes will be followed with intense interest in this country. The government's plan, embodied in a memorandum by Mr. Winston Churchill, a member of the Cabinet, declares that government intervention at the request of disputants has been repeatedly successful, so much so as to justify the hope that a permanent arbitration court may vastly help in the maintenance of industrial peace. The plan calls for (1) a neutral chairman; (2) one or two employers' representatives; (3) one or two men's representatives; (4) an expert assessor without a vote. The first panel of chairmen—that is, the first group of citizens from whom chairmen must be drawn—includes the Duke of Devonshire; Viscount Selby, better known as William Court Gully, P. C.; Viscount St. Aldwyn, formerly Sir Michael Hicks-Beach; Lord Balfour of Burleigh, K. T.; Lord James of Hereford, former solicitor and attorney-general. Panel drawn from employers: Lord Pirrie, head of Harland & Wolff, shipbuilders; the Lord Glantawe, was Sir John J. Jenkins, commercial magnate of South Wales; Sir William T. Lewis, baronet, engineer, managed the Cardiff Railroad and Bute Docks Company for nearly thirty years; Sir Christopher Furness, M. P., shipowner, shipbuilder, and chairman of Furness, Withy & Co., and member of Parliament for Hartlepool. One of the striking social and political differences between this country and England is illustrated in the fact that these high names tend to win for the proposed system commendation and approval on the part of the English workingmen. In this country the feeling would be directly the reverse. If it were proposed to select a chairman in a labor controversy from among a list of men politically, commercially, and socially distinguished, there would be instant outcry on the part of the industrial element. Our people have somehow been trained to the stupid and mischievous notion that nobody is so little to be trusted as the man who has shown himself capable in the affairs of life and who stands committed by his individual circumstances to consideration for the legal and regular order of things. In some respects trade unionism has gone further in England than with us, but it has not reached such lengths as to classify every man of achievement and distinction as an enemy to the welfare of the people.

President-elect Taft is reported to have made a start in the construction of his Cabinet by tendering the postmaster-generalship to Mr. Frank H. Hitchcock, the chairman of the Republican National Committee. This is in the line of precedent and of universal expectation. None the less, the Argonaut questions its propriety. Mr. Hitchcock was recently a clerk in the Postoffice Department and came into political notice as the "organizer" of the Southern postmasters in connection with the choosing of Southern delegations to the national convention. Nationally, Mr. Hitchcock stands for nothing and represents nobody. His achievements, such as they are, have been connected wholly with a rather questionable form of political management. The Argonaut would have been better pleased if Mr. Taft could have found some better way of paying a political debt than by making one who is merely an adroit campaign manager a member of the highest executive council in the government.

The horror expressed in certain quarters at the proposal of Dr. Wallace A. Briggs, an eminent physician of Sacramento, to use convicts in the State prisons as subjects for medical experiment, seems without reasonable basis. Dr. Briggs does not propose that any convict shall be treated without his own consent. He merely argues the necessity of subjects for certain experimental tests essential to the progress of medical science, and suggests that the pardoning power of the governor may properly be evoked as a means of securing volunteers. Certainly the plan suggested by Dr. Briggs is far less subject to criticism, far less horrible in any point of view, than that employed some two or three months ago before a congress of physicians at Washington, D. C. It will be remembered that Washington physicians brought before the convention of physicians a group of little children from local charity establishments and inoculated them with tuberculosis as a means of illustrating methods of contagion and of demonstrating the efficiency of certain methods of treatment. If this sort of thing is thinkable or possible, then surely there should be no criticism of the plan suggested by Dr. Briggs. Speaking for itself, the Argonaut has not been able to understand why anybody need be inoculated with tuberculosis; for surely in a country where this disease is so prevalent, cases in every stage of development ought easily to be available to every legitimate experimenter. But if choice must be made between orphaned and helpless children, abandoned to the charity of society, on the one hand, and State prison convicts on the other, then the Argonaut will have no difficulty in making up its mind as to where the experiment should be made.

Certain small and narrow minds have sneered at a remark of the New York Evening Post, uttered with reference to the assault upon Mr. Heney, that the incident "will be regarded as another evidence of the lawless spirit engendered in San Francisco through the dominance of the labor element." In truth, this view is singularly penetrating and sound. In differences and conflicts over incidental matters, small and great, there is danger that the cause and foundation of all our social troubles may be lost sight of. The Post is eminently just in its conclusion. Our troubles, including the infamous régime of Ruef and Schmitz and the intolerable abuses of the so-called graft prosecution, have all grown out of that system of labor politics established here something like eight years ago. If we had had no labor politics, if our political life had followed in conventional and normal grooves, we should have escaped the things which have corrupted and demoralized San Francisco and made her name a synonym for everything unworthy and vile in municipal administration. American municipal politics in any form which has yet presented itself is hardly an edifying spectacle, but municipal politics under "laborite," "independent," "reform," or other irregular guises, most assuredly has not proved itself better than municipal politics under the old party system. Verily, the party system is not ideal, but it is better than any of the systems which have been tried in its stead.

There are indications that the "suffragette" movement in England has hurt rather than helped the woman's suffrage cause in that country. The various spectacles in the streets, in court-rooms, in Parliament, and elsewhere made by protesting suffragettes has not tended to dignify or commend their cause. Militant femininity has rarely charmed the world, and it is not calculated to win concessions from men; and it is from and through men, be it remembered, that reform is to come, if it shall come at all. Discussion of the woman's suffrage question tends to raise in every masculine mind questions which the advocates of suffrage do not find it easy to answer. The truth is that the demand for suffrage is a mere item in the appeal for a larger share in the responsibilities of life. And it is suspected by thoughtful men that those who make this appeal are little conscious of its full significance and scope.

On the whole, we think it would be just as becoming if Mr. Andrew Carnegie were to keep his hands off the tariff controversy. And since the point is under consideration, we think it would be just as well if Mr. Carnegie would keep his hands off a lot of things. A man who has grown inordinately rich through tariff scheming, through reckless waste of the resources of the country, through cajoleries and deceptions of men in authority, through rebates, and through an organized system of self-promotion—such a man is hardly in a position to give advice tinged with moral philosophy. If his moral propensities are so deep-rooted, if some sort of "expression" is necessary to him, then let Mr. Carnegie join Mr. Rockefeller in Sunday-school promotion.

On July 1, 1908, there were fifty-five periodicals published in Esperanto. The postmaster-general of the United Kingdom has admitted Esperanto on the same footing as modern European languages for use in telegraphing. The committee of the Jubilee Exhibition at Prague issues its circulars in Esperanto, as in other languages, and Count Hayashi, the Japanese minister of foreign affairs, recently accepted the presidency of the Japanese Esperanto Association and has advised his countrymen in a public letter to master the language.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The New York Evening Post has made an effort to ascertain the purport of Democratic reflections upon the presidential election. To this end it has addressed four questions to leading Democrats within reach, and it devotes some six columns to a reproduction of their replies. These four questions are as follows:

- (1) Should an effort at once be made to put the organization of the party in abler hands? If there is delay in reorganizing will not the present managers scheme to maintain themselves in control?
- (2) With the whole question of tariff revision certain to come up in Congress not later than March, should not special zeal be shown in uniting the Democratic minority for a vigorous fight in defense of the low tariff views of the party? Could there be a better way of preparing for the congressional elections of 1910?
- (3) In what way can the election of Democratic governors in Ohio, Indiana, and Minnesota be utilized to infuse new spirit into the party, and show it how to win popular support?
- (4) What other suggestions can be made, as both true lessons of the defeat and hints for a constructive plan that shall compel success?

The replies are of a varied nature, in some cases so lengthy as almost to amount to political treatises and in other cases short and terse. But they are in general agreement as to the need of a new leadership and in their concentration upon the tariff as the vulnerable point for Democratic assault.

Roger A. Pryor, ex-justice of the supreme court, is so unkind as to refer to Mr. Bryan as the Jonah of the party and to advise that he be thrown overboard, let us hope with benefit of clergy. Mr. Bryan was the "all-sufficient cause" of Democratic defeat. As to the tariff, it is Mr. Pryor's conviction that there must be a return to the old slogan of "A Tariff for Revenue with Incidental Protection."

Mr. John D. Crimmins throws his small pebble at Mr. Bryan when he says that the policy of the party "must not be dictated by one individual." A modus vivendi must be found between East and West; the tariff should be attacked with vigor; capital must be conciliated, and reciprocity advocated where trade can be developed. The fact that Ohio, Indiana, and Minnesota chose Democratic governors while giving their electoral vote to Mr. Taft shows the discernment of the people, and should be read aright by the party. On the whole, Mr. Crimmins seems disposed toward a cautious and conservative policy based upon conciliation and the lessons of the past. No doubt he is Democratically orthodox on the subject of the tariff, but he does at least conceal his enthusiasm.

Peter B. Olney summarizes the logical position for the party under five heads—(1) State's rights, (2) a "government of law and not a government of men," (3) economy, (4) sound money, and (5) a tariff for revenue as against protection. He advocates a resolute devotion to traditional principles, an unwavering opposition to Republican measures, and he finds encouragement in the action of the Middle West in electing Democratic governors. But the tariff comes first. For the first time "the Republican party has openly proclaimed that one of the objects of the protective tariff should be to insure a reasonable profit to the manufacturer; that is, to make money for a part of the public." This doctrine, enunciated by Mr. Taft, is, in Mr. Olney's opinion, "Socialism, pure and simple," and Mr. Olney does not like Socialism. He thinks that such a tariff doctrine is "wholly pernicious," and he summons his party to steadfast resistance.

Lewis Nixon is a little dubious about the leadership, which should "reflect ideals of genuine strength and practical value." Mr. Nixon's proposition is at least unassailable, but he has a mind above personalities. He is also a little misty about the tariff. He says that "any revision must safeguard the wages and standard of living of the wage-earners of the country, for while we shall gradually work toward a tariff for revenue, the principle of protection is as much a part of this nation's policy as the Monroe Doctrine." Mr. Nixon might, perhaps, have chosen a better comparison, but we know what he means. That certain States chose Democratic governors shows that the party "still has a foundation upon which to build," and the confidence thus manifested can be extended to national affairs by showing that no menace to national prosperity is involved.

Charles A. Towne finds some mournful satisfaction in the fact that a party out of office is not subject to those assaults upon its purity to which the party in possession is always liable. He distrusts attempts to "put the organization into abler hands," believing that the right men will be evolved by the right party policies, as is shown by "the wise action by the Democratic legislatures and governors we have just elected in several of the States." Upon the tariff the full light of publicity should be concentrated, but the supreme fact is that "a subtle but real and radical change is being produced by the Republican party in the fundamental and characteristic principles of American institutions." Mr. Towne draws attention to the "inconceivably enhanced power of the presidency," the recognition and approval of a "virtual Roosevelt dynasty," the growth of bureaucratic administration, the colonial system, and the alliance between the Republican party and its beneficiaries as legitimate grounds for Democratic attack.

David Leventritt, ex-justice of the supreme court, thinks that there must be reorganization and a new leadership. The governorship successes show that the heart of the people is right and that they need only definite guidance. The tariff question is an "all-important one," but beset with difficulties.

Edward B. Whitney is down-hearted. There can be no general enthusiasm until great party questions shall be developed in the next Congress. The tariff debate will bring the real leaders to the top, and while Democratic governors are distinctly cheering, they are a poor substitute for definite and clear-cut issues. Mr. Whitney fears that his views may not be considered as orthodox, "coming from one who has just voted the Republican national ticket, although for the first time since 1880."

Everett P. Wheeler is non-committal as to leadership, but he thinks the time is opportune for an assault upon the tariff, the violation of individual rights, and the naval increase, but the tariff should have the place of honor.

Paul Fuller feels that this is the time for organization, but among the men fitted to undertake the task he does not include the name of Mr. Bryan. He waxes sarcastic about the tariff and quotes the testimony of the "man from Missouri," who wants a tax on barytes that will benefit 10,000 or 15,000 workmen and that will increase the price of paint to 65,000,000 of "the rest of us." All manufacturers want more protection, and they are careful to tell us how many of their workmen would be benefited.

William McAdoo favors a reorganization "on principle," with a definite and constructive policy. The party must issue fairly and squarely upon the tariff and it must accept no favors from its opponents. Congress has been prostituted into a "wretched machine where there is neither deliberation nor debate, nor as much freedom of expression as in the Russian Duma."

John Brooks Leavitt makes a plea for unity among Democrats. Aspersions lead to no good. The Cleveland men must let Bryan alone, and the Bryan men must let Cleveland alone. Let the tariff question be pressed to the front "as the one issue on which the party can be united."

Calvin Tomkins strongly favors a revision of leadership, but he mentions no names. There should be a concentration upon the tariff as the one means by which the trusts can be controlled.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Protest.

LOS ANGELES, November 29, 1908.

TO THE EDITOR: The causes immediately leading to the recent attack upon Mr. Heney suggest a modification of legal practice that must shortly receive some much-needed attention. We have already given a dangerous measure of acquiescence to a procedure that makes the jury box a place of terror to good citizens. Must we also give our approval to a system that threatens irretrievable ruin to those who have not been good citizens in the past and whose only hope of rehabilitation lies in public forgetfulness?

The case of the man Haas furnishes a pertinent example of what I mean. Twenty years ago this man committed a crime, which he expiated in San Quentin, and expiated to the full and forever. Whatever further retribution he may have had cause to expect from a public whose self-righteousness is always liable to deviate into persecution, it is very certain that the law ought to have been peculiarly his protector and that from this source, at least, he ought to have been secure from any possible penalties other than those specifically implied in his sentence. And yet within a court of law, from a legal official of the city, and twenty years after his offense, he is overwhelmed by a pitiless exposure that may well have seemed to be more crushing and more irretrievable than his original punishment. As a layman, I should like to know if this is a proper function of law or is it an abuse of practice? It is at least repugnant to modern sentiment.

Look, for instance, at these questions and then realize what they must have meant to the feeble-minded wretch whose hope of twenty years was for a merciful oblivion:

Mr. Heney—Before adjournment I would like to ask Mr. Haas one question, your honor.

Mr. Heney—Are you acquainted with that man? (exhibiting card to juror.)

Q.—You have been convicted of a felony, have you not?

A.—You need not—

Q.—Have you been? A.—I know all about it.

Q.—Answer the question: Have you been convicted of a felony? A.—What do you mean—before a jury?

Q.—You know what that question means, don't you? A.—I will tell you. I was taken to the county jail, and I was—

Q.—Answer the question. A.—Let me tell you from the beginning.

Q.—We are not here for the purpose of trying you, Mr. Haas. Is Haas your true name? A.—That is my name.

Q.—Haas is not your true name? A.—My name I used in the West.

Q.—Your name in the West? A.—Yes, sir.

Q.—What was your name before you came West? A.—Max Henley.

Q.—You were convicted under that name of a felony? A.—Under Max Henley.

Q.—And served a term in San Quentin? A.—Yes, sir.

Mr. Heney—We challenge the juror. A.—If you knew the particulars about that you wouldn't be so harsh.

Q.—I am not harsh about it. A.—And I asked the court to excuse me and he wouldn't.

That these pitiless questions aroused a painful feeling in the court-room is shown by the protest of Mr. Murphy, counsel for the defense. If he could he would have prevented "this man from being disgraced in this court-room." Mr. Murphy continued: "If Mr. Heney had told me that this man or any other man who had been summoned upon this jury, or who had been sworn to try this case, had been convicted of a felony, and had mentioned it to me, I would have been very glad to have saved this man, or any other man, the disgrace which this has brought out here and which will be published in the newspapers."

The character of Haas, the fact that he was abject and criminally disposed, have nothing to do with the case. He was entitled to absolute immunity from all further consequences of the crime that he had already expiated, and it was not the duty of an officer of the law to throw him back into hell, to gibbet him before the public, or to slam in his face the door to rehabilitation that was opened for him by his release from prison and by Governor Waterman's pardon. What happened to Haas in Judge Lawlor's court may easily happen to others who have substantial claims to our mercy and forbearance, and it would be well to look heedfully to such things lest legal license becomes even more oppressive than it is.

THE HARVARD-YALE FOOTBALL GAME.

Fifteen Thousand New York Enthusiasts See the Crimson Flags Wave Victory.

New Haven is a Manhattan suburb at least once annually. When Yale entertains Harvard on the football field the occasion is one of the greatest, and even the metropolis takes notice. Last Saturday was the date of the event this year, and the rush eastward began Friday afternoon. To enjoy all the features of the contest, preliminary, coexistent, and suffixed, the spectator must be on the ground early, and the procession of motor cars through the Sound shore villages along the old Boston Post Road was at least twenty-four hours passing a given point, ending only when the game had actually begun. But the automobile crowd was a small part of the joyous excursion. Grand Central station, from nine to eleven, Saturday morning, was flooded with a bright-hued stream of eager, irrepressibly gay enthusiasts, and fourteen trains of ten cars each were filled as rapidly as they could be placed on the tracks and the outgoing excursionists could sort themselves for the private cars, parlor cars, and day cars furnished for their use. At ten-minute intervals the trains moved out, and it seemed that the game at New Haven was the objective point of all travelers. There were others in the station, but they were negligible in numbers and in holiday appearance. It could hardly be that the ten thousand more or less who exhibited the crimson of Harvard or the blue of Yale were all doing honor to the colleges on individual account, but old-time college boys, now portly and gray, as well as undergraduates of the present, were easily marked in the gathering, and important fathers, proud mothers, and partisan sisters and sweethearts, swelled the throng. It was a good day in which to be young again, and the middle-aged grew youthful from minute to minute in the waiting, and on the journey.

In the city of elms the incoming thousands were early in evidence. The night had been frosty but clear, the day was bright but bracingly cool. Through the streets, during the morning hours, the crowds moved leisurely; restaurants and stores were quickly filled to capacity, yet each favored stopping-place made the merest eddy in the current. Meadow and Church Streets never saw such a tide of humanity before, and nowhere was ever a gayer scene of intermingling colors and bubbling good humor. An hour before the time set for the game the benches were nearly filled. The great banked stands on the north, south, and east, were blue with banners, ribbons, and flowers of azure, and the west stand was a glow of crimson in every imaginable symbol. Two bands alternated with bursts of harmony from the centre of the sections given up to the accredited hordes who led in the cheering for the Harvard men or the sons of Eli Yale. Packed around the field were fifteen hundred motor cars—there was room for no more.

College men, of course, were definitely intent on the outcome and the score. Since 1894, when the present scoring plan was adopted, there had been fourteen games between the university elevens. Yale had won ten, Harvard two, and two games had ended without a point having been scored. For six years Yale had laid up a substantial victory without an intervening loss. In 1901, Harvard's last victory was marked with a score of 23 to 0, and in 1902 the figures were exactly reversed. Last year Yale won by 12 to 0. This year Yale had an eleven of fine players and much was expected of them. Coy, their great full-back, had distinguished himself more than once, and thousands were ready to yell till their faces were purple when his opportunity came. Harvard was admittedly inferior in the individual selections for its eleven, but the result proved that team-work is the thing, especially with a coach whose judgment and quick decision are remarkable. Ver Wiebe, the great full-back, was in the Coy class, but he had no such following as the Yale favorite.

W. S. Langford of Trinity was the referee; W. H. Edwards of Princeton, the umpire; E. K. Hall of Dartmouth, the field judge. Harvard won the toss and gave the kick-off to Yale. The field was dry and hard, and there was little advantage in the choice of positions. From the beginning Yale played a rapid, vigorous game, but Harvard was able to hold its advance. For Harvard the great Ver Wiebe made sullen, steady advances, and with perfect assistance carried the ball to Yale's 15-yard line for Crimson's third down. Then came the sensational play of the day. Coach Houghton for Harvard retired the gallant, indomitable Ver Wiebe, and replaced him with Kennard, who bravely seized his opportunity. With a skillful drop kick he sent the ball cleanly between Yale's goal posts, and Harvard had scored, 4 to 0. The amazement and discontent of the Crimson partisans changed in a flash to approval and exultation. It had been a dangerous move by Coach Houghton, but fortune had favored his courageous hazard. The game was won, for although the first half was not then completed, the Yale men were never able to score. Exactly on time the contest finished, with the Blue still pluckily but unsuccessfully battling for advantage.

For years the game will be fought over again about club tables and in student quarters, but Kennard's cool, dextrous foot-lift, following Coach Houghton's inspiration, will remain the great thing of the day. It will be argued that the result, if not the identical score, was inevitable. Critics will point out that Harvard gained 185 yards in 35 rushes in the first half, while Yale gained but 58 yards in 18 rushes. Strategists will show that Kennard might have been put in in place of Crowley or some other player, and that Ver Wiebe need not have been retired. And the Crimson rejoicing was tumultuous and many-thundered. The applauding thousands on the victorious side swarmed into the field and carried off the players on high shoulders; then they returned and danced in zigzagging lines across the grid-iron. But scenes of sport enthusiasm are not restricted to New Haven. That part of the exhibition has been equaled elsewhere.

Still flushed with victory or defiant in defeat the excursionists crowded the special trains that pushed their way homeward to the Park Avenue tunnel and the station which they left early in the day. Other excursion trains sped eastward and northward from New Haven, for Manhattan furnished less than half the transient railroad traffic of the occasion. Motor cars were put under way with seemingly more leisure, but rural constables found it useless to attempt to check the speed of the drivers homeward bound. And New Haven was as quiet and peaceable on Sunday as if football games were unknown. FLANEUR.

Sand-Songs.

I.

Sing of sand!—not such as gloweth
Hot upon the path of the tiger and the snake:
Rather such sand as, when the loud winds wake,
Each ocean wave knoweth.

Like a Wraith with pinions burning,
Travels the red sand of the desert abroad
While the soft sea-sand glisteneth smooth and untrod
As eve is returning.

Here no caravan or camel:
Here the weary mariner alone finds a grave,
Lightly mourned by the moon, that now on yon grave
Sheds a silver enamel.

II.

Weapon like, this ever-wounding wind
Striketh sharp upon the sandful shore;
So fierce Thought assaults a troubled mind,
Ever, ever, evermore.

Darkly unto past and coming years,
Man's deep heart is linked by mystic bands;
Marvel not, then, if his dreams and fears
Be a myriad like the sands.

III.

'Twere worth much love to understand
Thy nature well, thou ghastly sand,
Who wreckest all that seek the sea,
Yet savest them that cling to thee.

The wild-gull banquets on thy charms,
The fish dies in thy barren arms;
Bare, yellow, flowerless, there thou art,
With vaults of treasure in thy heart!

I met a wanderer, too, this morn,
Who eyed thee with such sullen scorn:
Yet I, when with thee, feel my soul
Flow over, like a too-full bowl.

IV.

Gulls are flying, one, two, three,
Silently and heavily.
Heavily as winged lead,
Through the sultry air over my languid head.

Whence they come, or whither they flee,
They, nor I, can tell; I see
On the bright brown sand I tread
Only the black shadows of their wings outspread.
Ha! a feather flutteringly
Falls down at my feet for me!
It shall serve my turn, instead
Of an eagle's quill, till all my songs be read.
—Ferdinand Freiligrath.

Departure of the Swallows.

The rain-drops plash, and the dead leaves fall,
On spire and cornice and mold;
The swallows gather, and twitter and call,
"We must follow the Summer, come one, come all,
For the winter is now so cold."

Just listen a while to the wordy war,
As to whither the way shall tend.
Says one, "I know the skies are fair
And myriad insects float in air
Where the ruins of Athens stand.

"And every year when the brown leaves fall,
In a niche of the Parthenon
I build my nest on the corniced wall,
In the trough of a devastating ball
From the Turk's besieging gun."

Says another, "My cosy home I fit
On a Smyrna grande café,
Where over the threshold Hadji sit,
And smoke their pipes and their coffee sip,
Dreaming the hours away."

Another says, "I prefer the nave
Of a temple in Baalbec;
There my little ones lie when the palm-trees wave,
And, perching near on the architrave,
I fill each open beam."

"Ah!" says the last, "I build my nest
Far up the Nile's green shore,
Where Memnon raise his stony crest,
And turns to the sun as he leaves his rest,
But greets him with song no more.

"In his ample neck is a niche so wide,
And withal so deep and free,
A thousand swallows their nests can hide,
And a thousand little ones rear beside—
Then come to the Nile with me.

They go, they go to the river and plain,
To ruined city and town,
They leave me alone with the cold again,
Beside the tomb where my joys have lain,
With hope like the swallows flown.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Lord Desart, K. C. B., was appointed the British delegate to the International Naval Conference which met in London on December 1. The conference, which will remain in session until the end of February, will settle the establishment of a permanent international prize court at The Hague, and various reforms in naval usage in time of war.

Sir William Wallace, the resident-general of Northern Nigeria, has reported to the home government, on his return to Great Britain after a tour of the protectorate, that cannibal tribes owning hundreds of thousands of horses in Nigeria are being subdued by peaceful means, and that their country contains perhaps the richest tin, and copper fields in the world.

Mrs. Isaac L. Rice, the anti-noise crusader, is the wife of the president of the Holland Submarine Torpedo-boat Company. She sold her beautiful home on Riverside Drive, New York, and moved to the St. Regis Hotel, because the tugboat captains, against whom she began her anti-noise war, took special delight in tooting their whistles at all hours of the night whenever they passed her house.

Two more Americans have been made knights by the Pope—Knights Commanders of the Order of St. Gregory. These are Morgan J. O'Brien, formerly justice of the New York Supreme Court, and Eugene A. Philbin, formerly district attorney in New York. This is a simple recognition of service done to the church, and the knights are not asked for fees. In fact, they have always been liberal benefactors.

Mr. Lemieux, the Canadian postmaster-general, heads a movement which recently culminated in a meeting that urged the government to buy out the existing cable companies and establish an imperial penny-a-word rate, with one shilling minimum for the message. If the cable companies object, it is proposed to attain the object desired by extending the land systems and that of Marconi, who is said to favor the scheme.

Augustus Thomas, long a successful playwright and now author of the novel, "The Witching Hour," comes from Missouri. The University of Missouri has notified Mr. Thomas that at the next commencement the university will confer upon him the degree of LL. D., the degree which it recently gave to Mark Twain. The president of the university, in presenting him for the honor, referred to Mr. Thomas as the most distinguished living son that Missouri has with the exception of Mark Twain.

President Roosevelt will in December award medals for two years' continuous service on the Panama Canal. The medal, of bronze, will bear on the obverse a new portrait of the President, modeled by Victor Brenner, the medalist, and on the reverse is a so-called bird's-eye view of the canal, over whose mountain barriers is incised the inscription, "The land divided, the world united." On the rim appears the words, "Presented by the President of the United States," and the shield of Panama will have wrought beneath it the name of the man it is given to.

The Emperor of Japan rejoices in the notable increase of his navy. On the 18th of November the fighting fleet of Japan, comprising 110 vessels, exclusive of submarines, passed in review before the emperor, who, on his way to the Kobe harbor front, drove through streets crowded with people and gorgeously decorated in his honor. Embarking on the battleship Asama, the emperor was welcomed by Admiral Togo and the other admirals of the fleet. As dozens of guns volleyed their salute the Asama, with Admiral Togo on the bridge, steamed slowly between the lines of warships and auxiliaries, with every band playing the national anthem.

Mr. Lewis Harcourt, recently admitted to the British cabinet as chief commissioner of works, is one of the comparatively few speakers who can count upon a well-filled and deeply interested House whenever he makes a speech. He is an extremely tall, very thin, and exquisitely dressed man with a rather weary look in his eyes. He is groomed to a degree not seen in the House since Mr. Robert Spencer left it for a seat in the House of Lords. His high, upright collars, his tie, correct to fastidiousness, his well-cut frock coat, are all part of a popular personality. Stalwart radical and aristocrat at the same time, he by his personal gifts has endeared himself to every section of the House.

President Charles W. Eliot of Harvard University, who has resigned and will leave next May the position he has filled for forty years, will be seventy-five years old next March. Professor Eliot's name will always be associated with the elective system which, since he introduced it at Harvard in place of the compulsory curriculum, has been adopted to a greater or less extent in the more progressive institutions of learning throughout the country. The influence of Mr. Eliot in the academic councils, not merely of Harvard, but of the nation, as is pointed out by more than one critic, is in large measure ascribable to his extraordinary gifts as a writer of dignified and beautiful English, and a speaker of eloquence which never "tore a passion to tatters," or exaggerated for the sake of the immediate impression or sought the enhancement of the reputation of the speaker. He found Harvard poor and ill equipped, and leaves it with an endowment of $20,000,000 in funds and probably nearly as much in the value of the plant.

A JUDGE IN CONTEMPT.

By Jerome A. Hart.

XLII.

On the day set by the Federal tribunal for the decision in the Salem case, the court-room was crowded. Not as before with men and women of fashion—"Society" had long since lost all interest in the affair. This time the room was crowded with lawyers. "Society" had lost interest for two reasons—first, because all the scandal had been at once disclosed; second, because the case had become such a legal labyrinth that even the judges could with difficulty understand it. But just as actors spend their off-nights at the theatre, so do lawyers haunt the court-rooms. And on this field-day in the Salem case the judges had a crowded and attentive gathering of listeners learned in the law.

Arthur Alden was no longer of counsel in the case, but naturally he desired to be in at the death. He found himself seated next to Brewer, and while waiting for the judges to enter he interrogated the colonel about conditions at Gold Gulch, where some clients of his owned mining lands which they did not seem to be able to enjoy.

"You have been up to Gold Gulch recently, I believe, colonel," he began. "How are things up there?"

"Bad for the mine-owners, but good for the miners. I was up there some time ago, representing the Yarrow, father and son, who have large interests at the Gulch. But I began to get letters from 'Six Hundred and One.' I was told so threateningly that the miners had no use for lawyers from the Bay that I got out, and I got out quick, too, you'd better believe."

"My clients have had their claims jumped by the miners, and they want me to go up and straighten things out."

"Take my advice and don't go! Let your clients go instead. That's what I'm advising Eugene Yarrow to do."

"Don't you think it would be as dangerous for him as for you?" inquired Alden, in surprise.

"Oh, no! I'm not dodging the job for that reason. But the miners have a wild and unreasonable prejudice against lawyers, particularly lawyers from down here. So the actual owners themselves can make much better terms with the claim-jumpers than the lawyers can. Changing the subject, you were of counsel in this case, were you not?"

"Yes, but only in the State courts."

"It is a very mixed-up affair. What is the exact condition of the suit since the death of Salem?"

"Well, Sophia Lucretia got a decree of divorce in the State court. The judge decided that the so-called marriage contract was genuine, and he gave her half of old Salem's property, twenty-five hundred dollars a month alimony, and sixty thousand for counsel fees. Thereupon old Salem took to his bed and died."

"Sincerely mourned by his widow, I suppose?"

"It is generally so believed," rejoined Alden dryly. "However that may be, such a decree of divorce, granting alimony against a dead man, is not of much use when his heirs are full of fight. And so they turned out to be. The case was at once appealed to the State Supreme Court. But prior to this old Salem had brought suit in the Federal court, he being a citizen of another State, petitioning that court to declare the marriage contract and the 'dear wife' letters to be forgeries. With that suit I have had nothing to do. I was retained in the suit in the State court, and have not appeared in the Federal court, as my uncle is on the bench there."

"Then your connection with the case has terminated?"

"I think so, for I do not believe the appeal to the State Supreme Court will ever be pushed, as the proceedings in the Federal court will settle the case effectually. Probably the appeal to the State Supreme Court will eventually be stricken from the calendar."

"When was it that Tower married Sophia Lucretia?"

"Almost immediately after the death of old Salem," replied Alden. "As her counsel their relations had for a long time been very confidential, and as soon as Salem died they married, and Tower became her counsel for life."

"In what shape did the State's affirmation of the marriage contract come before the Federal tribunal?"

"When the case came up, the Federal court ordered Sophia Lucretia to appear with her marriage contract and her letters. She refused. The court then ordered her to be sent to jail for contempt. Before this order was carried into effect, her husband, Tower, consented to show these documents to the court, but refused to let them pass out of his possession. They were examined in court by experts, and declared to be forgeries. So the court ordered them to be destroyed. In the meantime Sophia Lucretia had succeeded in escaping from the court-room with the papers, and refused to obey the order. She remained in hiding for a time. Finally, when the United States marshal was hot on her trail, her husband made affidavit that the papers had been destroyed when his residence was burned some days before."

"Did the court accept this explanation as truthful?"

"Well, as the sole evidence of the so-called marriage had been passed upon by the court and decided to be fraudulent, its destruction by fire cut no figure. The court therefore heard arguments, and set a day for handing down its decision. Today is the date set. Although no longer of counsel, I naturally want to hear the decision. It will be interesting, and possibly the happenings may be exciting."

"Yes, there may be some sensational doings today," agreed Brewer. "But the United States marshal knows Sophia Lucretia well, and he will be on his guard."

Alden looked around the room for Sophia Lucretia. Still pushing through the dense mass of humanity were some late comers. The court-room was packed with lawyers, among them all the lights of the local bar. The seated ones rose respectfully as the old crier's voice rang through the room:

"Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons having business with the honorable the United States Circuit Court, now draw near, give your attention, and you will be h-c-o-r-d!"

The door leading into the justices' chambers opened, and the three judges in their robes filed in and seated themselves. In the centre sat Justice Fox; on his right Justice Masters; on his left Justice Wilde.

Still seeking, Alden saw, some little distance away, the respondent, Sophia Lucretia, and her husband and attorney, Tower. Around the same table were Verrill and the other attorneys for the respondent. Alden gazed at her intently. During the long legal struggle Sophia Lucretia had greatly changed. A few years before she was a young and comely woman; now she was a hard-featured, elderly one. Her thin lips were firm set and pinched; her white eyelashes shaded shrewish eyes; there were wrinkles in her cheeks and bags under her lower eyelids. She was highly nervous and excitable; she tapped incessantly with her feet and fidgeted with her fingers. Continually she whispered in the ear of her gigantic husband. He was, as ever, calm, immovable, saturnine.

When some unimportant routine business had been transacted, the case of Elisha Salem vs. Sophia Lucretia Tower was called, and Judge Fox at once began reading his decision. It was long. In it he gave the history of Salem's complicated litigation in both State and Federal tribunals, together with the suit for a revivor in equity by the heirs and executors of Salem after his death. The judge's reading in his slow monotonous voice, and the legal maze he was discussing, did not seem absorbing. But his hearers in the court-room followed him with keen interest. Most of them were lawyers, and to them his long and involved sentences, his disquisitions on prior and concurrent jurisdiction, were as vivid as a romance.

Not so with Sophia Lucretia. She soon grew weary of trying to understand him. From his face, which at first she had intently scrutinized, her eyes wandered over the objects around the room. Nervously and fitfully she played with the catches of a satchel on the table before her. Only occasionally, when her name or that of Salem was uttered, did she look up. As the judge droned on, she did not even heed this remark from the bench:

"The genuineness of the alleged marriage contract rests upon her testimony, and it is proved that it is a forged paper, which throws discredit upon her whole testimony."

To the legal audience assembled this was ominous of what was to come. But she did not notice it, or it conveyed no meaning to her. Still reading in the same monotonous mumble, the judge went on:

"The judgment of this court is that the demurrers in both cases be overruled; that in the first case the original suit of Elisha Salem vs. Sophia Lucretia Leigh (now Sophia Lucretia Tower), and the proceedings and final decree therein, stand revived in the name of the executor of said Salem and against Sophia Lucretia Tower and John Tower, her husband—the said executor being substituted as plaintiff in the place of Elisha Salem, deceased, and the said John Tower being joined as defendant with his wife, so as to give to the said plaintiff-executor or his assigns the full benefit, rights, and protection of said final decree."

Even this did not seem clear to the puzzled woman. But the stir among the audience warned her of something momentous. She leaned over, and whispered in her husband's ear. He replied briefly, with no change in his set features. Her own were not so impassive—her face flamed with anger; losing all control of herself, she suddenly stood up and shouted:

"Judge Fox, you've been paid for this decision!"

Looking at her, the judge said icily, "Be silent, madame."

She interrupted him again. "How much did the Salem executors pay you for this?" she cried defiantly.

"Madame," replied Judge Fox, looking at her reprovingly, "you must take your seat, or you will be forced to leave the court-room."

"You are paid, you old rogue!" she screamed. "You are hired to do this dirty work! You know you are!"

Looking toward the marshal, Judge Fox said, "Mr. Marshal, remove that woman from the court-room."

"You can't do it," she shrieked, wild with anger. "You don't dare take me from the court-room!"

The marshal stepped forward to execute the order. He was obliged to step in front of Tower as he did so. The moment he neared her, Sophia Lucretia sprang at him, striking him in the face with both hands, and crying:

"You dirty hound, you shan't remove me! Don't you dare lay a hand on me!"

The marshal made as if to seize her, when Tower threw back his coat-lapel, and thrusting his hand toward an inner pocket, said defiantly and threateningly:

"Stand back! No man shall touch my wife!"

Again the marshal put out his hand toward Mrs. Tower. As he did so Tower struck him a heavy blow in the mouth with his right fist, and again reached his hand in under his coat for a weapon. At a signal from the marshal, four deputies closed in on Tower, caught him by the arms, and pulled him down into his chair. He struggled violently, but even his giant's strength could not prevail against four cool-headed, powerful men.

While Tower was thus pinioned, the marshal, assisted by other deputies, succeeded in carrying Sophia Lucretia out of the court-room, but with great difficulty. All the way she was scratching, striking, kicking, and using the most violent threats. When the marshal had placed her in his office under guard of two deputies, she demanded her satchel so loudly that he went back after it; but on examining it he found in it a loaded revolver. This weapon he impounded, and turned it over to the custody of the court-room clerk.

During the marshal's absence from the court-room he found that Tower had partially freed himself, had drawn his bowie-knife, and was just about to use it on Hawke, one of the deputies. But the others again threw themselves upon him, bound his arms behind his back, and Hawke twisted his wrist until he dropped the knife. This weapon was also taken possession of by the marshal.

Tower's violent struggle had convinced him of the folly of fighting any longer. "Mr. Marshal," he panted, "if you will permit me to go my wife, I will promise to make no further resistance."

"Search the prisoner," ordered the marshal. "If he is carrying no weapons, take him to the room where his wife is imprisoned."

Tower was searched, and as no other weapons were found on him, he was allowed to be placed in the marshal's office with his wife.

Within the crowded court-room the throng of lawyers listened to the sounds of the struggle with mingled feelings. The doors had been closed and barred; deputies stood guard, refusing permission to pass either from court to corridor or from corridor to court. In front of the bench, at the attorneys' table, the audience saw the powerful form of Tower doubled down into a chair, writhing convulsively in his desperate fight with the deputies. From the corridor they could hear shouts, oaths, screams, and the trampling of hurried feet. With bated breath they listened, fearing to hear the crack of pistol-shots. But soon there was heard the slamming of a distant door—the marshal's office had been reached with his prisoner.

During all of this scandalous scuffle, Judge Fox continued to read his opinion in the same monotonous tone. His face was white as paper, but still he read on. To right and to left sat the two district judges, listening apparently with close attention; each man remained exactly as he had been seated, neither having changed his position since the affray began.

When the reading of the opinion was finished the circuit justice conferred for a few minutes with his colleagues, and then declared the court adjourned for fifteen minutes. The spectators in the court-room rose, and the justices withdrew to their chambers.

When the justices returned to the court-room the marshal was directed to bring before the bar John Tower and Sophia Lucretia Tower, his wife. They were brought in together, the husband manacled, the wife's arms held fast by two deputies.

Reciting the incidents of their flagrantly contemptuous conduct, Judge Fox read an order by which they were adjudged guilty of contempt, and sentenced to imprisonment in jail, Tower for six months, and his wife for thirty days. They were at once remanded to the custody of the marshal, with orders to see that their imprisonment was carried out.

Again sounded through the court-room the mournful call of the old crier:

"Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons having had business with the honorable the United States Circuit Court will now depart, for this honorable court stands adjourned until tomorrow n-o-r-n-i-n-g!"

Two of the persons having had business with the honorable court that day departed thence with bitterness in their hearts, and one with irons on his wrists.

The packed court-room was slowly emptying, and the astounded attorneys were pouring out, talking over the spectacle they had just witnessed. Even those who boasted of unusual experiences in this abnormal land were forced to admit that the scene was without a parallel.

As Alden and Brewer paused to piece out together their recollections of this picture in a temple of justice, Brewer shook his head.

"I am afraid that the trouble over the Salem divorce case will not end with the decision of Judge Fox," he remarked.

"Why not?" inquired Alden anxiously.

"As Tower was turning away after the sentence he passed close by me and I heard him growl to his wife, 'When I get out of jail I will kill Fox. The corth is not big enough for both of us to live on it.'"

"I am glad you told me," said Alden soberly. "I must warn my uncle of his danger."

"I think it would be wise for you to do so, for Tower is a desperado if there ever was one, and this woman has made him worse even than he was before."

A BIOGRAPHY OF WHISTLER.

Two Fine Volumes Tell the Life Story of a Great Artist and a Brilliant Man.

No artist of this age has attracted so much attention as James Abbott McNeil Whistler. It may be added that no artist so much needs a biography as a permanent record of the capacity and brilliance that remain unexpressed by brush and canvas.

The authors of "The Life of James McNeil Whistler" have done something more than to produce a splendid biographical work. Approaching their task with a fine equipment of intimate knowledge and with a warm and generous sympathy, they have constructed a figure with the undeniable accuracy of a portrait and that is a fine corrective to a popular imagination that has seized too exclusively upon the weird and the bizarre. Indeed, they present us with a picture that is sometimes surprising by its novelty and always fascinating by its vigor and sustained force, a figure gracious and winsome by its loyalty and kindness and admirable for its wit and intellect.

Whistler, although he himself seems to have been unaware of the fact, was born at Lowell, Massachusetts, on July 10, 1834. In the witness box during the Ruskin suit he said that he was born in St. Petersburg, although on entering West Point he had given Massachusetts as his place of birth. Later on he specifically denied the Lowell story to an American who introduced himself to the artist on the ground that he also was born at Lowell and at very much the same time. "There is only the difference of a year—you are sixty-seven and I am sixty-eight." Whistler's reply was characteristic. "Very charming! And so you are sixty-eight and were born at Lowell, Massachusetts! Most interesting, no doubt, and as you please! But I shall be born when and where I want, and I do not choose to be born at Lowell, and I refuse to be sixty-seven."

Whistler's life in Russia and at West Point was characteristic of the days that were to come. He seems to have had a sort of subconscious knowledge of his destiny and this gave him an utter indifference to everything not consonant with it. At West Point he was a failure. A direct statement in a class recitation that "silicon is a gas" discouraged his chemical instructors and was one of the final blows to his military career. As he says himself, if silicon had only been a gas he might have become a major-general. But the fates were against it.

Of Whistler's life in the art studios in Paris we have as full a description as the records permit. It was the rollicking, care-free, irresponsible existence so strikingly depicted in "Tribly." Here at last was the beginning of the career in which the young artist was to be supreme. He does not seem to have worked very hard in Paris nor to have stinted himself, except from lack of funds, in the peculiar pleasures that the French capital furnishes to those who know how to seek them:

Though frequently hard up, Whistler had an income which seemed princely to students who lived on nothing at all. If Whistler had money in his pockets, Mr. Ionides says, he spent it royally on others. If his pockets were empty, he managed to refill them in a way that still amazes M. Oulevey, who, in proof of it, told us of the night when, after the café where they had squandered their last sous on kirsch had closed, he and Lambert and Whistler adjourned to the Halles for supper, ordered the best and ate it. Then he and Lambert stayed in the restaurants as hostages, while Whistler, at dawn, went off to find money to pay. He was back when they awoke, with three or four hundred francs in his pocket. He had been to see an American friend, he said, a painter: "And do you know, he had the had manners to abuse the situation—he insisted on my looking at his pictures."

But the idleness in Paris found its compensation in the industry of the life in London. One of his friends says "he worked tremendously," studying his subjects with energy and slowly compelling the public attention that he deserved. Whistler's picture of his mother attracted wide attention, and in connection with this portrait Mr. Harper Pennington writes to the authors that upon one occasion he complimented the artist warmly upon the excellence of his work. "It was perhaps two minutes before he spoke. 'Yes,' very slowly and very softly—'Yes—one does like to make one's mummy just as nice as possible.'"

Whistler himself relates how he came to paint the portrait of Carlyle. It was through the mediation of Mme. Venturi, who had set her heart upon the project:

I used to go often to Mme. Venturi's—I met Mazzini there, and Mazzini was most charming—and Mme. Venturi often visited me, and one day she brought Carlyle. The Mother was there, and Carlyle saw it, and seemed to feel in it a certain fitness of things, as Mme. Venturi meant he should—he liked the simplicity of it, the old lady sitting with her hands folded on her lap—and he said he would be painted. And he came one morning soon after that, and he sat down, and I had the canvas ready, and the brushes and palette, and Carlyle, looking on, said presently: "And now, mon, fire away." I was taken aback—that wasn't my idea of how work should be done. Carlyle realized it, for he added: "If ye're fighting battles or painting pictures, the only thing to do is to fire away." One day he told me of others who had painted his portrait. "There was Mr. Watts, a mon of note. And I went to his studio, and there was much meestification, and screens were drawn round the easel, and curtains were drawn, and I was not allowed to see anything. And then, at last, the screens were put aside and there I was. And I looked. And Mr. Watts, a great mon, he said to me, 'How do ye like it?' And then I turned to Mr. Watts, and I said, 'Mon, I would have ye know I am in the hobit of worin' clean lunen.'"

But Carlyle did not take kindly to sittings that were more numerous than he had supposed. He said that Whistler was "the most absurd creature on the face of the earth," although he had every reason to be pleased with the resulting portrait. Upon one occasion

Carlyle, on leaving Whistler's studio, happened to meet Miss Alexander, a little girl who also was having her portrait painted. "Who is that?" he asked the maid. He was told and Carlyle shook his head sadly. "Puir lassie! Puir lassie!" and without another word he went out.

But the days of poverty were by no means over, and hard work was as much a matter of necessity as of inclination. He took no holidays. Hunting and fishing had no pleasures for him. Of one of his attempts to shoot he says: "I rather fancied I had shot part of a hare, for I thought I saw the fluff of its fur flying. I knew I hit a dog, for I saw the keeper taking out the shots."

But he gave breakfasts and dinners. Mr. Luke Ionides remembers calling one early afternoon when Jimmy was busy putting things straight—he asked me if I had any money. I told him I had twelve shillings. He said that was enough. We went out together, and he bought three chairs at two and sixpence each, and three bottles of claret at eightpence each, and three sticks of sealing wax of different colors at twopence each. On our return he sealed the top of each bottle with a different colored wax. He then told me he expected a possible buyer to dinner, and two other friends. When we had taken our seats at the table, he very solemnly told the maid to go down and bring up a bottle of wine, one of those with the red seal. The maid could hardly suppress a grin, but I alone saw it. Then, after the meat, he told her to fetch a bottle with the blue seal; and with dessert the one with the yellow seal was brought, and all were drunk in perfect innocence and delight. He sold his picture, and he said he was sure the sealing wax had done it.

Whistler dominated every one at these festivities, and indeed wherever he went. Although short and small, his was the most commanding presence in the room. He had a delightful way of waiting himself upon his guests, going round the table with wine, talking all the time and emphasizing every point with a dramatic pause just before or after filling a glass. Upon one of these occasions he explained his method of hanging the pictures at the Liverpool Exhibition of 1891:

You know, the Academy baby by the dozen had been sent in, and I got them all in my gallery—and in the centre, at one end, I placed the birth of the baby—splendid—and opposite the baby with the mustard pot, and opposite that the baby with the puppy—and in the centre, on one side, the baby ill, doctor holding its pulse, mother weeping. On the other, by the door, the baby dead—the baby's funeral—baby from the cradle to the grave—dead in heaven—babies of all kinds and shapes all along the line, not crowded, you know, hung with proper respect for the baby. And on varnishing day, in came the artists—each making for his own baby—amazing, his baby on the line—nothing could be better. And they all shook my hand, and thanked me—and went to look—at the other men's babies—and then they saw babies in front of them, babies behind them, babies to right of them, babies to left of them. And then—you know—their faces fell—they didn't seem to like it—and—well—ha! ha! They never asked me to hang the pictures again at Liverpool.

We have an adequate account of the libel action brought by Whistler against Ruskin. It was rather a hateful episode, by no means glorious for Whistler and distinctly discreditable to Ruskin. The jury returned a verdict for Whistler with damages assessed at one farthing, but the costs to the artist amounted to nearly $2000. Whistler, writing to W. M. Rosetti suggested that it would be appropriate that his admirers and supporters should pay these costs, adding "in the event of a subscription, I would willingly contribute my own mite."

In 1888 Whistler married Mrs. Beatrix Godwin, widow of E. W. Godwin, the architect of the White House. The courtship was unconventional, like everything else in the artist's career. Mr. Henry Labouchere holds himself responsible for a marriage that was particularly appropriate and happy in its results. Mr. Labouchere says he was dining with them one evening at Earl's Court. There was an obvious mutual attraction, and in a vague sort of way they thought of marrying. "Jemmy," said Mr. Labouchere, "will you marry Mrs. Godwin?" "Certainly," was the reply. "Mrs. Godwin, will you marry Jemmy?" "Certainly," she replied. "When?" asked Mr. Labouchere. "Oh, some day," said Whistler. "That won't do. We must have a date," was the reply of the matchmaker, who finally took all details into his own hands. An early date was arranged and the marriage duly followed. The banquet was in the studio. There were no chairs, so every one sat on packing cases, and when Mr. Labouchere left the happy couple were still undecided whether they would go to Paris for the honeymoon or stay at the studio. The day before the wedding the bride had been met on her way to purchase the "trousseau," which consisted of a new toothbrush and a new sponge, "as one ought to have new ones when one marries":

Whistler was devoted to his wife, who henceforth occupied a far more prominent position in his life than his friends could have anticipated. Indeed, the course of his life was entirely changed by his marriage. He saw little of his former friends in London, and less even of society. For months he was a wanderer, and these months were barren of important work. Not that Mrs. Whistler was indifferent to his art or stood in his way. She was sympathetic, helpful, interested, and intelligent. He liked to have her in the studio with him; when she could not come, he brought the pictures he was painting home for her to see. He worked conscientiously with her critical eye upon him. He consulted her in his difficulties, he looked to her to rejoice with him in his triumphs, and she shared only too willingly the disappointment inevitable in the career of the creative artist. But it can not be denied that for him the period of great schemes and their successful completion came to an end with his marriage.

We have an entertaining glimpse of Whistler's subsequent life in Paris and of the art studio that he established there. For various reasons it was not a marked success, and it gradually dwindled to disappearance:

Most of the students, elementary or advanced, in the Académie Carmen thought that Whistler was going to teach them how, by some short cut, they could arrive at distinction, better and quicker than elsewhere. When they found that, though the system was different, they had to go through drudgery as in any other art school, they were dissatisfied and left. Moreover, the strict discipline and the separation of the sexes were unpopular. Nor could they understand Whistler. Many of his sayings recorded by them explain their bewilderment.

One day Whistler, going into the class, encountered three new pupils. To one of these, an American, he said:

"Where have you studied?"
"With Chase."
"You couldn't have done better."
"And where have you studied?"
"With Bonnat."
"Couldn't have done better."
"Where have you studied?"
"I have never studied anywhere, Mr. Whistler."
"You could not have done better."

To the young lady who told him one day that she was painting what she saw, his answer was, "The shock will come when you see what you paint." To the man in the early days who was smoking, he said, "Really you had better stop painting, or, otherwise, you might get interested in your work, and your pipe would go out."

Of a superior amateur he inquired: "Have you been through college? I suppose you shoot—fish, of course?—go in for football, no doubt?—Yes? Well, then, I can let you off painting."

Whistler's death had been foreseen for some time before it occurred. An increasing weakness of the heart, a general lowering of the vital forces, warned his innumerable friends that the end was drawing inflexibly nearer. An influenza cold dragged him down, and he lived in constant fear of infection from others, if any one even sneezed in his presence. "I can't risk any more microbes—I've had about enough of my own":

Reports of his feebleness came to us from others. M. Duret, the friend of so many years, was in London, and was deeply moved by the condition in which he found Whistler, who, he thought, wanted to say things when alone in the studio with him, but who could not that day utter a word.

On the 14th E. called again, and again he was dressed and in the studio, and there were pictures on the easels. He seemed better, though his face was as sunken and in his eyes was that terrible vagueness. Now he talked, and a touch of gallantry was in his greeting, "I wish I felt as well as you look." He asked about Henley, the news of whose death had come but a day or two before. He watched the little mother cat as she ran about the studio. There was a sudden return of vigor in his voice when Miss Birnie Philip brought him a cup of chicken broth and he cried, "Take the damned thing away," and all his old charm was in the apology that followed, but, he said, if he ate every half hour or so as the doctor wanted, how could he be expected to have an appetite for dinner? He dozed a little, only to wake up quickly with a show of interest in everything, and when, on the arrival of Mr. Lavery, E. got up to go, fearing that more than one visitor would tire him, he asked, "But why do you go so soon?" And these were the last words he ever spoke to her.

The mechanical work upon these two fine volumes is worthy of high praise. The table of contents and index are elaborate, while the illustrations, nearly one hundred and seventy in number, are worthy of the subject.

The spaniel was so called because the original breed of this type came from Spain. The Blenheim spaniel got his name from Blenheim Palace, where this dog first gained popularity in the time of the great Duke of Marlborough. In the same way the King Charles spaniel owes its name to the merry monarch. Fox terriers did not gain their name from a likeness to the fox, but from the fact that formerly they were used in hunting foxes. Many years ago they were sent by their masters down the fox's burrow to draw and kill their quarry. It was in those days a saying that a good fox terrier never came out of a burrow without the fox. He either brought out his prey dead or never came out alive himself. The bulldog used to drive cattle, and was trained to meet the rushes of his enormous charges by gripping them in their most vulnerable spot—the nose. Thus in time he became known as the bulldog. The dachshund is a German dog, and, as his name indicates when translated, was used for hunting badgers. Hence his name—badger dog. Among hunters in the fatherland this breed is still popular, although as a rule they are now too delicate to face such a ferocious fighter as the badger. Spitz dogs are so named owing to their sharp noses. This is also a German name, spitz meaning sharp-pointed. Another name for this breed is Dalmatian dog, because his native home was in Dalmatia.

President Edmund J. James of the University of Illinois recently issued an address to the students on hazing, in which he declared that hazing would not be tolerated, and that any student found guilty of it would be dismissed from the university. President James said: "Hazing is a violation of good manner and of the right of individual liberty. It is provocative of public disorder. In its milder forms it is a nonsensical and almost idiotic form of amusement unworthy of the support or favor of any sensible university student. In its coarser forms hazing is a vulgar, brutal, always demoralizing, and sometimes dangerous form of sport which the university can not countenance or tolerate."

Lucas Jacobsz, known to the world as Lucas Van Leyden, painter and engraver, when he had barely reached his ninth year, made some engravings after his own designs; at twelve painted his well-known "St. Hubert," and at fourteen gave out an engraving representing the killing of the monk Sergius by Mahomet. At thirty-nine he was dead with a remarkable record of achievement behind him, a life unfortunately wherein the promise of his youth was by no means fulfilled.

A HUSBAND'S MISTAKE.

How His Little Device to Save His Honor Worked Too Well.

Mme. la Baronne de Givone was a reproduction of that famous type of classic beauty, the Greek goddess, examples of which are so rare now and growing more and more so in this fin-de-siècle epoch. A woman born for the Olympian cothurne and the simple drapery clasped upon the shoulder, neither pretty, nor witty, nor marvelous in any way, but Greek, plain Greek from brow to instep—upon the word of her estimable husband, the shrewd, far-sighted, and successful financier, M. le Baron and banker, Alonzo de Givone.

The baron, moreover, was not wrong; madame his wife reflected the universal admiration as a polished reflector throws back the light; they always chose her to preside over those functions that required traditionally statuesque patronesses; men bowed before her as before an armed sentinel, and women never thought of such a thing as heaving jealous of her.

The age of this beautiful Greek, however, announced by herself, was of a very vague character, like the age of a statue as given on the hill of sale, "somewhere between nine-and-twenty and nine-and-forty-years."

As for the baron's age, it was that of all husbands when they are loyal spouses—fifty years. Very rich and childless, every evening saw them in the social swim, but leading there, as elsewhere, the solemn, ceremonious, well-regulated, dignified life of the old clock in the salon of their stately old mansion in the outskirts of the Bois de Boulogne.

But—alas, that it should be so!—transcendent virtues are always subject to thunder-clap relapses. One day, at the house of a diplomatic personage—a careless parvenu, who opened his doors to all sorts of arts and artistes through an affected democracy—Mme. de Givone made the fatal encounter. She trembled—she the proud, distinguished Baronne de Givone, trembled before a comic singer, the vulgar star of a café concert hall.

He had come there, poor devil, to earn a louis and his supper, without a thought of reanimating goddesses of the Parthenon, and was chiefly concerned, while chirping out his "inimitable imitations," by a suddenly discovered slit that striped with white the sooty black of his coat under the arm, and the necessity for keeping his hand clasped over his heart to hide the fiery stroke of an unpaid laundress's iron, which spread itself out in brownish tint upon an otherwise snowy shirt-front.

The physique of this singer of comic ditties perfectly corresponded with his employment—calf-eyed, thick-lipped, nose like a duck's bill, awkward in gait, and with only the knowledge of making a stage-how fairly well—an ungainliness, all the same, that mattered little; Mme. de Givone was caught by the epidemic that at times seizes all too-perfect women of vaguely defined years.

She believed that she loved César Ihes, and fell upon him, like a bolt from a clear sky, with all the notes, flowers, invitations, et cetera, that women of the great world employ in such cases as harometers, so to speak, of the condition of their affections. César did not, however, return this love, though touched a little, of course, like all amiable animals to whom, through an impulse of pity, one speaks carelessly as one passes. He did not love her; and when she called him the "ray of sunlight in the autumn of her life," instead of telling him, as she might have done, of his "inimitable tones," a dull dislike rose up in his heart against her.

César Ihes was not rich, either; Herminie bankrupted him in cahs engaged by the hour, and actually dared to offer him on his birthday a cigar-case embroidered by her slim Greek fingers, when he would have infinitely preferred to the work of the needle a diamond scarf-pin, or even a good imitation diamond, provided the mounting was not too sham.

Still one can taste a little of love and not become a drunkard. César, not knowing what else to do, permitted himself to go on being loved and being ruined by cah hire, in obedience to the will of the goddess, who made of this prosaic and useful vehicle their regular and not too compromising trysting-place.

It went on thus—well, really, it does not matter how long—when, one morning at the breakfast-table, M. de Givone, with frowning brow, announced a sudden departure, possibly a week's absence, and a call to Lyons on a serious hanking errand.

Herminie saw him set out with the joy of an emancipated school-girl, and promptly dispatched a note to her "dear friend" to call upon her that coming evening, closing with directions as to finding the servants' stairway. "My husband deceives me," she declared; "I am sure that he deceives me, because he has grown so cold to me of late. This voyage is but a pretext to join some—some creature. I scorn him, and I wish to see you—to see you here, in my own house. Come!"

* * * * *
The evening came, and the clocks of the quarter were still striking ten as Herminie de Givone, the "deceived" wife, all glittering with diamonds and rustling with laces, as she had come from the concert where Ihes, all the fashion at the moment, had been the lion of the occasion, stepped from her carriage, dismissed the waiting-maid, and ten minutes later, by the servants' stairway, was ushering the young comedian to the sacred precincts of her private houldoir.

A strange awkwardness, however, seemed to settle upon the two culprits as they crossed the threshold of that severely Greek nest, with its Olympian memories; Herminie slowly and silently unclasped her diamond necklace and turned to lay it upon a table near by, and César, with equal slowness, fumbled nervously with the buttons of his concert-hall paletot.

Then, just as the diamonds fell into the bronze tray waiting to receive them—fell with the light spattering sound of falling tears—the door opened again and M. de Givone appeared.

Herminie uttered a cry and fell prone to the floor, and César began mechanically to rebutton his paletot, his pale face convulsed with terror. The hanker was pale, too, but ominously calm.

"Sir," said he, quietly drawing a revolver from his pocket, "you are poor, you are a coward, and I know why you are here. You came to steal my wife. Happily, I had taken my precautions. I have placed on guard at each side of the servants' stairway of my house two police officers charged to arrest and to search you. They will find"—pointing to the baronne's jewels glittering in the tray beside them—"that diamond necklace concealed between your shirt and waistcoat; they will take you to the police station, and there you will admit the theft; there, also, you will declare that you were here to see the baronne's maid, and this vulgar comedy will end by a just application of the law—that is to say, a certain number of months in prison. In consideration of recovering the diamonds, however, I agree to do what I can to soften the rigor of the richly deserved sentence."

And smiling blandly, M. de Givone placed his finger upon the revolver's trigger. "But—hut, monsieur," stammered the comedian, entering the tragic rôle in spite of himself, "you would compel me to sacrifice my honor."
"And my honor, sir," responded the hanker, drawing nearer, "what of that, sir? Appearances give me the right to hlow out your brains here and now, sir; hut I do not love scandal. Take your choice, then. Carry off the diamonds or—I kill you!"

Briefly, nothing was more cleverly arranged. César Ihes was poor, a nobody, riddled with debt, of a physique to please only chambermaids, and Herminie de Givone as flawless before the world as the statue she resembled. With moist hrow and chattering teeth, César made hut a step to the table where flamed the resplendent necklace.

"To call out is useless," he grumbled, essaying to smile. "If I told the truth, even, they'd take me for a fool, I suppose!"
"No one would believe you, sir."

Givone raised his arm again, and César saw the gleaming harrel of the revolver almost against his hrow. It was an invincible argument. César yielded.

"Well, if I must, I must," said he; "better a prison than death, you know." And the necklace vanished into the hiding-place designated by M. de Givone, who followed him to the threshold, pointed the way he should go, and dropped behind him the portière.

César found himself alone in the corridor. To the left, in the distance, twinkled the lamp of the vestibule, lighting the servants' stairway; to the right, shining in the moonlight, gleamed the long, sparkling panes of the corridor window. Beyond that window was the garden, beyond the garden the Bois de Boulogne, the fields, security, and freedom!

"Bah! why not?" thought César brusquely, dazzled and blinded by that which he had suddenly conceived; "I've time enough to throw myself into a train; eight hours lands me at Havre, and once in England—the devil himself couldn't catch me. Houp-la! my hoy, and that"—snapping his thumb lightly in the direction of the banker's closed door—"that for all the enraged husbands in Paris!"

He threw up the sash, flung a leg over the window-ledge, and—the diamonds with him—was lost in the night.

Six months have gone since then; the worthy financier is still deploring the mistake he made in persuading César to steal against his will, and Mme. la Baronne Givone more than ever resembles a well-groomed statue.—Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Rachilde by E. C. Waggener.

Captain Frank Dickson Sweetser, who died a few days ago at the home of his sister, in Lynn, was born in Salem on June 4, 1833, and as a hoy ran away and shipped to California. He first took up mining and later went into the oyster trade in California, in which he was the pioneer in this State. In 1861, when the Civil War broke out, he sailed around the Horn on his return to the East, and in New York he enlisted in the New York Seventy-First Regiment. He served in the Army of the Potomac. He afterwards returned to California and had business offices in San Francisco up to a year ago, when he went East.

CURRENT VERSE.

Bondage.

I am the slave of day
And underneath the sun
I play my part with stuhhorn heart
Until the day is done;
I do the petty task,
I earn the grudging pay,
And none can guess I wear a mask,
Indentured to the day.

But when the sun has set
And labor ends again,
How easy to forget
The walks and ways of men!
Deep in my heart I seek
The lilac and the rue,
The white rose and the rose of red:
The memory of you.

What though the miles divide,
What though the years are past?
Across the night I dream aright,
And am myself at last;
A handsman of the day,
While day is on its throne,
The secret stars all know I am
Your slave, and yours alone!
—Reginald W'right Kaufman, in Smart Set.

The Victor.

The live man victorious
Rode spurring from the fight;
In a glad voice and glorious
He sang of his delight,
And dead men three, foot-loose and free,
Came after in the night.

And one laid hand on his bridle-rein—
Swift as the steed he sped—
"Oh, ride you fast, yet at the last,
Hate faster rides," he said.
"My sons shall know their father's foe
One day when blades are red."

And one laid hand on his stirrup-bar
Like touch o' driven mist,
"For joy you slew ere joy I knew
For one girl's mouth un-kissed,
At your board's head, at mass, at bed,
My pale ghost shall persist."

And one laid hand on his own two hands,
"Oh, brother o' mine," quoth he,
"What can I give to you who live
Like gift you gave to me,
Since now from strife and ache o' life
Your sword-stroke makes me free?"

The live man victorious
Rode spurring from the fight;
In a glad voice and glorious
He sang of his delight,
And dead men three, foot-loose and free,
Came after in the night.
—Theodosia Garrison, in Scribner's Magazine.

The Hill o' Dreams.

My grief! for the days by an' done,
When I was a young girl straight an' tall
Coming alone at set o' sun
Up the high hill-road from Cushendall.
I thought the miles no hardship then,
Nor the long road weary to my feet—
For the thrushes sang in the cool deep glen
An' the evenin' air was cool an' sweet.

My head with many a thought was throng
An' many a dream as I never told;
My heart would lift at a wee bird's song,
Or at seein' a whin-bush crowned with gold.
An' always I'd look back at the say
"Or the turn of the road shut out the sight
Of the long waves curlin' into the bay,
An' breakin' in foam where the sands is white.

I was married young on a decent man,
As many would call a prudent choice,
But he never could hear how the river ran Singin' a song in a changin' voice,
Nor thought to see on the hay's blue wather
A ship with yellow sails unfurled,
Bearin' away a king's young daughter
Over the brim of the heavin' world.

The hills seem weary now to my feet,
The miles he's many, and dreams he's few.
The evenin' air's not near so sweet,
The birds don't sing as they used to do.
An' I'm that tired at the top of the hill
That I haven't the heart to turn at all,
To watch the curlin' breakers fill
The wee round bay at Cushendall.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

By Sidney G. P. Coryn.

The manuscripts lent by J. Pierpont Morgan to Columbia University Library include some verses written by Abraham Lincoln, a letter from Oliver Cromwell to his wife, and many other treasures of like nature.

Lincoln's verses are as follows:
A wild bear chase didst never see?
Then hast thou lived in vain;
Thy richest bump of glorious glee
Lies desert in thy brain.

When first my father settled here,
'Twas then the frontier line;
The panther's scream filled night with fear,
And bears preyed on the swine.

A case at the entrance contains Milton's original manuscript of the first book of "Paradise Lost"; some poems and letters of Tasso; the original warrant under which John Bunyan was arrested, and Robert Southey's manuscript copy of his "Life of Bunyan."

Gilbert Neal, by Will N. Harben. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; $1.50.

The author has told an interesting story, but we can hardly take the view of some of his characters that he evidently wishes us to take. Gilbert himself compels our unstinted admiration, and we can hardly count it unto him for weakness when he surrenders to the pressure of his mother and beautiful sister and for the third time impoverishes himself to save his rascal brother from gaol. But for the sister, Lucille, we have small sympathy. She does not at all measure up to the standard of confiding innocence. When she allows herself to fall in love with the clergyman Tidwell she does so knowing that he is married, and her conduct when she finally elopes with him is not much mitigated by the fact that she locks the hotel door between their communicating rooms. Lucille, in spite of her beauty, is by no means a good little girl and does not deserve the fine husband that she gets.

There are other miscarriages of justice that hurt our feelings and that ought to be confined to real life. Dave Neal, a rascal by instinct, is so far appreciative of his brother's generosity that he determines to confine his rascality to legal limits. That, of course, pays him much better than common larceny, and so we leave him wealthy and with a beautiful wife, while Gilbert is surpassingly content with the village store that Dave buys for him. Gilbert's is, of course, the better part, but we should have been better pleased had Dave encountered some form of retribution more obvious than a beautiful wife and had Tidwell been disposed of more lingeringly, so to speak, than by a fall from his horse. But the story is powerfully told and is not one to be left half read.

A Child's Guide to Mythology, by Helen Archibald Clarke. Published by the Baker & Taylor Company, New York; $1.25.

Such books as this are a cheering indication of a new and better order of literature for children. It would be hard to find a more wholesome mental food for the young than an introduction to the imaginative and poetic wealth of mythology with its stimulation to the deeper study that must certainly come with advancing years.

We feel a little inclined to disagree with the author when she says that "the chief thing to be remembered about myths is that they are not true, though they may contain some elements of truth." It is surely better to teach children that myths are true, but that they must be translated into the language of natural phenomena. The Egyptian myth of the hull Apis, for example, becomes true when we understand its reference to equinoctial movements. Nor can we admit that "myths gradually grew to have philosophical or metaphysical meanings." Surely the metaphysical ideas came first and they were gradually translated into such simple forms as the people could understand.

But these are small points. The author has given us an admirable book, in which animals, trees, the sun, moon and stars, the sky and air all play their parts in a way acceptable to the child. Twelve well chosen illustrations add to the value of the book.

Lisbon and Cinara, by A. C. Inchbold. Illustrated by Stanley Inchbold. Published by Duffield & Co., New York; $3.50.

Portugal is not usually included in the itinerary of the modern tourist, and that the omission is to his loss is made clear enough by this fine book. We are reminded that Light—Sunshine—Beauty are conveyed in every name that has been given to Lisbon from remote ages and that Portugal, of all countries in Europe, is the one to which English-speaking people should most naturally gravitate.

So far as we are aware, no other book of more intimate and artistic knowledge of its subject has been published. The author traveled understandingly and with an eye as keenly sensitive to historic as to artistic charm. Through fifteen chapters we are invited to admire whatever is admirable, and the author's taste is never at fault. That so much that is valuable and beautiful should lie so near the beaten track and yet not quite upon it may be something of a revelation to the tourist who has been over-faithful to the traditions of travel. Thirty full-page colored illustrations of marked charm help us to realize the valid claims of Portugal to a more general attention.

The Master Influence, by Thomas McKeen. Published by the J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia; $1.50.

The apparent object of the author is to show how love enters into a woman's life and becomes the coping-stone of her development. In this case the woman is Helen Mainwaring, who drifts somewhat aimlessly through the usual round of society and philanthropy and meets her fate just as we had begun to despair of her. She nearly falls in love with Lionel Carrington, who is a Jekyll-and-Hyde young man, a tin saint inside his charity hospital, and a rousé and opium fiend outside of it. Then she is attracted elsewhere, and finally falls captive to a young man whom we do not know long enough to appreciate.

The author knows how to tell a story, but he does not know what story to tell. The heroine is deadly dull, and it is hard to understand why any one should wish to marry her. The only human woman in the book is Rose Barstow, who becomes Lionel's mistress when he is close to the end of the road and threatened by the Black Hand fraternity that he has offended. We can only wonder that a writer with so much skill should select so many dull people to write about from a world so full of incident and drama.

Peter, by F. Hopkinson Smith. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.50.

We must disagree with the author when he says that Peter is not the hero of his novel. He is the hero, and he is also a hero, which is quite a different thing. The book is full of charming characters, and some that are powerfully contemptible. There is also plenty of stirring incident, but Peter himself is easily dominant, and we hurry through the chapters in which he does not appear in order that we may the more speedily renew our acquaintance with him.

Peter is the elderly cashier in a New York bank, a man full of fine old-fashioned chivalry and high ideals of kindly courtesy. We feel that he has been doing all his life just such things as he does in this story, and that somewhere or other he is still befriending young men, encouraging them to be brave and unselfish, and generally setting an example of the high-minded culture that makes him delightful and memorable. "Peter" will be called an old-fashioned story, but this may be taken as a compliment while the new fashions run so much to an ugly finance and to still uglier character aberrations.

The War in the Air, by H. G. Wells. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; $1.50.

The coming of the airship is used by Mr. Wells in the construction of a vigorous forecast of aerial navigation in warfare. We see a mighty fleet of German airships, built in profound secrecy and suddenly launched across the Atlantic to attack America.

A naval battle is already in progress and the issue of this is settled by the aerial monsters overhead. After a succession of frightful encounters between the airships of the nations, Occidental and Oriental, the struggle comes to an end through sheer exhaustion, and because nothing much is left upon earth to destroy. Mr. Wells tells his story without a love incident, unless the little affair between Bert, the young machinist, and Edna, the London shop girl, can be so considered. Mr. Wells uses his powers of prophetic description to good purpose, but the book gives us the impression that it was written in a hurry.

Principles of Psychic Philosophy, by Charles B. Newcomb. Published by the Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company, Boston.

Mr. Newcomb is well known as a writer along New Thought lines, and although his present book does not contain the close reasoning that distinguished his earlier works, it is none the less sincere and suggestive. Mr. Newcomb proceeds on the theory of a spiritual consciousness in man usually unmanifested in the intellect, but capable of development by certain processes of meditation and action. The awakening of the spiritual consciousness is, he says, the discovery of the true self following upon the recognition of universal law and the sequence of cause and effect in the moral and mental worlds as well as in the material. Mr. Newcomb writes positively and with freedom both from dogmatism and from the rather sordid theorizing which we sometimes find in books of this category.

A Short History of Engraving and Etching, by A. M. Hind. Published by the Houghton-Mifflin Company, Boston and New York; $5.

Ostensibly written for the use of collectors and students, this comprehensive volume has much to interest the ordinary reader who is attracted to a branch of art so important to public education. It is a descriptive survey of the history of engraving upon metal throughout the various centuries and schools, special attention being given to the more important engravers, the names of lesser account being cited in so far as they contribute toward a connected view of the whole development and a balanced estimate of relative artistic values. The early historical portions of the work are specially interesting, while the one hundred and ten illustrations help us to appreciate the progress of the art and the many developments that have attended its progress. The author is attached to the department of prints and drawings in the British Museum, and he writes not only lucidly, but with an exhaustive knowledge of his subject.

Daniel Boone, Backwoodsman, by Frank McKernan. Published by the J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia.

The author has given us another fine book for boys and one that combines an accurate history of a stirring epoch with a maximum of incident and wholesome sensation. We do not know of any other book that so well depicts the character of Boone, or that goes further to sustain him in his place as a national hero. It is a book that every boy ought to read, and it will not be only the boy who will be fascinated by it.

The Green Domino, by Anthony Dyllington. Published by the John Lane Company, New York; $1.50.

This delightful story relates how two young men, bent upon charity and frolic, disguise themselves as itinerant musicians and betake themselves to Waterways, where they earn much money for the children's hospital. They also make the acquaintance of the young and fascinating Lady Hawke, and we are gradually led to a finish through a series of clever situations and a dialogue that reminds us sometimes of Mr. Anthony Hope. The author knows how to tell a story without a single jar or misstep.

"I Never Dine Without It."

I find it gives an appetizing relish to an otherwise insipid dish. I like it on Soups, Stews and Hashes. It greatly improves Steaks, Roast Meats and Chops.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE CHAT.

"Aristocracy" is more than doubly attractive at the Valencia Theatre this week because of the return of Robert Warwick, the handsome and virile leading man, and the introduction of Blanche Stoddard, who resumes a former and mutually pleasing acquaintance with San Francisco theatre-goers. The play was well chosen to give all the prominent members of the excellent Valencia company an opportunity for distinction, and with scarcely an exception the parts are taken with good effect. Mr. Warwick is well suited in the rôle of Jefferson Stockton, originally played by Wilton Lackaye. Miss Stoddard, who will have the leading woman parts from this time on, displays emotional power and natural graces as Diana Stockton. Thomas McLarnie, another new member of the company, is to be commended for a forceful characterization of the unattractive prince. Darrell Standing, Arleen Hackett, Helen Lackaye, and Charles Dow Clarke are not to be passed by without consideration. The play will run up to and including the Sunday performances.

Monday night next the Valencia Theatre management will produce "Zira," the powerful drama made from Wilkie Collins's story, "The New Magdalen." In this play Margaret Anglin achieved a great success, and Blanche Stoddard was second to her in the same company. Next week Miss Stoddard will have the part which Miss Anglin played, and will give evidence of her ability to move her hearers in the most exacting of rôles. Mr. Warwick will be no less fortunately fitted, and the complete cast is well balanced. The week should promise most alluringly to all lovers of the drama.

Louis James in Ibsen's "Peer Gynt" will be the attraction at the Van Ness Theatre next week, including Wednesday and Saturday matinees. Richard Mansfield produced this spectacular comedy during the last season of his career, and for a time it seemed unlikely that it would be revived, but Mr. James decided upon the undertaking, which is important in magnitude, in artistic values, and in its demands upon the ability of the actor. The rôle in which the veteran player appears is wonderful in its scope, for it traces the footsteps of a vagrant irresponsible through years of adventure to a happy home-coming at last. It is one of Ibsen's greatest and most poetic creations, and it appeals to many who have found the subtlety of the dramatist uncheering in other plays. Mr. James has given to this character study much time and thought, and his production is lavish in detail and appointment. It has been seen and favorably noticed during a long tour which has at length included San Francisco.

Kolb and Dill have another characteristically absurd farce with musical interludes in "Wiener and Schnitzel," first seen on any stage at the Princess Theatre last Monday evening, and now evidently settled for a long and prosperous run. The first act of the new offering is particularly lively and fetching. There is nothing to be added to former descriptions of the work of the comedians. They add the antics of bibulous exhilaration to their exploits in this piece, but otherwise are the same twin embodiments of phlegmatic good nature. The company in support does its full share in furnishing entertainment, Maud Lambert, Billy Clifford, and the chorus being especially effective. If hilarious cheer and unstinted applause may be accepted as conclusive evidence, the Princess audiences are now getting just what they most enjoy and plenty of it.

Gus Edwards's Blonde Typewriters, with Arthur Conrad, are the headline attraction in the bill which opens at the Orpheum Sunday afternoon. They give a tabloid musical comedy and beauty show, in which the eccentric comedian and dancer is the central feature. Harry Tate's London Company will present "Motoring," a comedy of life on the road in a motor car. The Italian Trio, from Naples, will sing operatic selections of course, and that they are artists worthy of the Orpheum Circuit is recommendation enough. The Majestic Trio is a team of colored singers and dancers that promises much diversion. Next week will be the last of Felice Morris and company, Linton and Laurence, Happy Jack Gardner, and also of Castellane and Brother in their marvelous and sensational bicycle act. A new series of Orpheum motion pictures will conclude the performance.

The final performance of "Paid in Full" will be given at the Van Ness Theatre on Sunday night.

Arthur Hartmann's Farewell Violin Recital.

Arthur Hartmann, one of the greatest violinists that have ever visited this city, and who will be welcome should he ever return, will give his last concert at Christian Science Hall Sunday afternoon, December 6, at half-past two.

One of the features of the Hartmann concerts is the accompaniments of Albert Calzin, who in a very few years will be heard from as a piano virtuoso.

The programme will include Vicuxtemp's "Concerto in D minor," the Bach "Chaconne," Hartmann's transcriptions of Mac-

Dowell's "To a Wild Rose" and Claude De Bussy's "Je pleur dans mon cœur," "Farfalla," by Emil Sauret, and a fantasy on Southern melodies by Mr. Hartmann. Calzin will play interesting numbers by MacDowell, Liszt, Moriz Rosenthal, and Alberto Jonas.

Seats may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s and on Sunday, after 10 a. m., at the hall, corner of Sacramento and Steiner Streets.

LITERARY NOTES.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

The only remaining unpublished novel by the late Henry Harland is to be brought out soon. It will be entitled "The Royal End."

William Sumner Harwood, an author and magazine writer of character and some distinction, died last month at his home in Los Gatos. Mr. Harwood's best-known book is "New Creations in Plant Life, or Life and Works of Luther Burbank."

Three of the important books on the fall list of the Macmillan Company are by college presidents: "The Seeming Unreality of the Spiritual Life," by President King of Oberlin; "The American as He Is," by President Butler of Columbia, and "The Educational Ideal in the Ministry," recently brought out by President Faunce of Brown University.

Brian Hooker, the author of the recently published novel "The Right Man," is a Yale man of '02 and the writer of the Yale battle hymn, "Mother of Men," which won a $300 prize last year.

One of the best stories of the late Duke of Devonshire in Lady Randolph Churchill's "Reminiscences" concerns the author's visit to one of the duke's places. When the writer told Lord Hartington that she had been "over" Chatsworth with her husband and his chief lieutenant the virtual owner cut short her expressions of admiration of the glories of the place with "Did you break anything?"

Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox has prepared a new book, which is virtually an autobiography of this industrious author. The volume is called "New Thoughts, Common Sense, and What Life Means to Me."

For many years the famous "Memoirs of the Dukes of Urbino," by James Dennistoun, has been out of print. It has just been brought out, carefully edited and annotated by Edward Hutton. The court of Urbino was perhaps the most splendid and cultured in Italy, and Duke Federigo one of the greatest soldiers of his time. Mr. Hutton has left the text substantially the same as the original, but he has added a large number of new notes, comments, and references. It was from this book that Joseph Henry Shorthouse obtained many ideas and incidents for his "John Inglesant."

New Publications.

"The City of Encounters," by Horace Hazelton, is a story as full of sensations as the most hardened of us can desire. It is published by Mitchell Kennerley, New York. Price, $1.50.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, have published a collection of short stories by Charles Belmont Davis. Those who are familiar with this writer's work as it has appeared in various magazines will be pleased to have these stories in more permanent form.

Julia Dalrymple has already shown us in "Little Me-Too" that she knows how to write an imaginative story for children. She now gives us "The Make-Believe Boys," full of real child expression and showing sympathy and comprehension. It is published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston. Price, $1.

The Neale Publishing Company, New York and Washington, have published "The Battle of Franklin," by Colonel R. W. Banks. The battle is described as "the bloodiest engagement of the war between the States," and the account is detailed and concise. It is a useful bit of history. The price is $1.25.

The wisdom of diluting the classics for the supposed benefit of children is much open to question. The boy or girl of twelve years of age ought to enjoy a direct translation of Homer or Virgil, but for those who must have their wine diluted the Rev. Alfred J. Church's "The Æneid for Boys and Girls" may be safely recommended. Mr. Church has handled in similar fashion the Iliad and the Odyssey. The present volume contains twelve colored illustrations. It is published by the Macmillan Company, New York, and its price is $1.50.

"PAID IN FULL."

By Josephine Hart Phelps.

The character of the wife in "Paid in Full," like that of the husband, is also rather too extreme. In this age of literary realism, one rather expects to see, in the character of a woman who is considered sufficiently attractive to be the heroine of a play, a little leaven of lightness, or a dash of espièglerie. But Emma is almost too bright and good for human nature's daily food. I really think that such unending patience and sweetness tends to the cultivation of the opposite qualities in a natural cad and domestic hully like Joe Brooks.

Nevertheless, one can not quarrel with idealism. It is already too rare in this age of stifling materialism.

It is apparent that Eugene Walter is an idealist. No wonder that he did not turn to the world of the socially elect for inspiration. The study of the inhabitants of that glorified realism is not conducive to the cultivation of ideals, so we were spared the spectacle of an author, uninformed of the ways of those in the social swim, trying to lug upon the hoards a lot of dummies of whose ways and life and manner of speech and trend of thought he knew, presumably, nothing, since we are told that the author of "Paid in Full" narrowly escaped starvation before he could persuade a manager to put money in his purse by accepting his play.

As it now stands, the play is throbbing with life. The two men, Jimsie and the Captain, who love Emma Brooks in their different kinds of ways, are, however, the really virile creations in the play. They are so real, so natural, so untheatrical, and their ways, their speech, their attitudes, movements, gestures, tones, and inflections are so admirably reflected from life instead of the stage that the actors who so superbly impersonated them performed the feat of giving us an almost continual sense of illusion.

It is hard to know to which of the two to award the palm, but I conclude that, although Clarence Handyside had the more dramatic rôle of the two, in that of the big, hurly captain, with his very evident potentialities for evil, yet Albert Brown's Jimsie was so perfectly played, and the actor gave so many delicate, restrained, yet thoroughly recognized and appreciated shades of feeling to the character of the good fellow, who, we comfortably assume, is destined eventually to win the severed flower, that one places these two splendid players on an even plane of merit.

William L. Gibson gave a contrasting portrait of the husband which contained much merit. He, also, is an excellent actor, but he played the rôle with too unbridled a spirit. The intensely disagreeable aspect of the character was too violently expressed, and at times the raised accents were all but unintelligible.

What was particularly good in the delineation, however, was the picture presented of a man who has suffered the deterioration, the frightful abasement, of manhood that follows upon a deliberate embarking upon a course of speculation. The pallor, the nervous irritability, the furtive eye, the sudden, tense stillnesses, the uneasy watchfulness, the constant suspicion, all were there, trenchant warnings to an honest man to guard his honor as the immediate jewel of his soul.

Sara Perry, who played the rôle of the wife, is a pretty woman with a somewhat too measured and deliberate style of speech, and rather an over-suggestion of sweetness in the manner and attitude of Emma Brooks toward life and her fellow-beings. I am not sure, on the whole, but that a being so overpoweringly and persistently sweet and good would not be prone to awaken unregenerate impulses of a non-ethical nature in the less perfect humans around her. So we approved of Emma all the more warmly when she finally lost patience, and although still with almost unimpeachable sweetness, gently insinuated a few vigorous adjectives like "contemptible" into her discourse to her husband, whom the captain so aptly termed a skunk.

Miss Perry, while not exactly an emotional actress, rather rose to the situation when things began to grow tense, and gave quite a graphic representation of gentle womanliness turning at bay, when driven to the wall.

I have been rather wondering, by the way, whether the author was concerned with any particular moral, when writing his play, or merely wished to paint one of the commonest incidents of contemporary life. Embezzlers grow on every hush, and broken-up homes are almost commoner than gooseberries.

But one may deduce several morals, if one wishes. Honesty is the best policy. So we gather from Joe Brooks's sordid tragedy. The captain, after triumphantly surmounting an ugly temptation, discovers with surprise that "it feels d—d good to be decent."

And Jimsie, model of chivalrous, gentlemanly, woman-idealizing, woman-shielding manhood, Jimsie, sound, sweet, and wholesome to the core, does not furnish any particularly concrete moral save that which we draw from a recognition of the pleasure we feel in viewing the life-like portrait of a man who is at once lovable and estimable.

Recital of Lawrence Strauss, Tenor.

Lawrence H. Strauss, the young tenor who has just returned from three years' work abroad, and who in addition to his talents as a vocalist is an exceptionally clever pianist and musician, will give his first concert next Tuesday night, December 8, at Century Hall. Mr. Strauss will be assisted by Dorothy Pasmore, the talented violoncellist, and Miss Therese Ehrmann, accompanist. The programme will include German songs by Richard Strauss, Hugo Wolf, Brahms, and Ruckauf, French numbers by Massenet, Faure, and some charming numbers from the old chansons of the eighteenth century, and English works by Haendel, Marian Bauer, Frederick Clay, and Stevens.

Tickets will be $1, and may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

America's Grandest

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

"Paid in Full" is being played at the Van Ness Theatre by an excellent company, which, nevertheless, includes the names of no stars or notables. True to itself, San Francisco, which adores big, widely heralded names and reputations, showed a comparatively moderate interest on the opening night. The green curtain, unflinching barometer, was down. La farjam de la bonne société, or at least of the innermost innermost, was not in the air. Perhaps if the play, which, by the way, is a purely American product, had been devoted to the exploiting of the loves, the follies, the sins, or the prodigalities of the New York or Newport four hundred, the numerical equivalent of San Francisco's pampered worldlings would have hastened to the show.

But Eugene Walter has shown a correct instinct in appealing to the interest and sympathy of a far wider following. The great middle class, the class which, if not the hone and sinew, is, at any rate, the moral pith and fibre of the nation, is here represented.

It is the class which, during industrial disturbances, is crushed between the upper and nether millstone of labor and capital; the class which, feeling the helpless dependence of the rich on the service of labor, without the means to overpay for it, is the first to suffer during strikes. It is the class which labor uses as a huffer against capital, and which capital uses as a huffer against labor. For its sympathy and suffrage are most important to the winning side during the ever-increasing wars between labor and capital.

So to us of the middle class who sat in front on Monday night it was quite a natural situation to see a married couple established in a cozy flat the comfort of which hinted of paid domestic service, yet doing their own work. The husband, inducted into a gingham apron, swept, and wiped dishes, and grumbled and growled, and would have savagely kicked the cat had there been one present.

That part of the spectacle, it must be parenthesized, was not wholly familiar, for anything more angelic than the helpfulness and good will which the dish-wiping type of husband displays in his chivalrous sharing of his wife's burdens it would be difficult to find.

And there he manly men, too; the kind who go duck-hunting, smoke a good cigar that pleasantly perfumes one's parlor with the odor of fine tobacco, talk intelligently of the affairs of the day from a wholly masculine point of view, and never fail to follow with a quick glance of appreciation the passing show of a pretty and prettily gowned woman.

But no such angel had fallen to the lot of Emma Brooks, heroine of "Paid in Full." She was married to a constitutional kicker, a sort of Snarleyow, a man who passed his life in one long, delirious grouch.

And she believed she loved him. Force of habit, you know.

The disagreeable features in the character of Joe Brooks are, however, drawn almost too strongly. In fact, come to think, it contains nothing but disagreeable features. The man's vile temper is almost too impossible for respectability; the fact is, he would cause the gorge even of a patient Griselda to rise.

And come to think, again, he was married to a patient Griselda, and, fortunately for the high-spirited contingent in the audience, her gorge did rise, and we enjoyed the soothing spectacle of seeing much-tried and long-crucified patience suddenly come to a dignified and honorable conclusion, and sweep its possessor away to the freedom she had so hardily earned.

I have often been struck by the cowardly conventionality of novelists and dramatists, in the matter of separating husband and wife. In spite of the culpability and laxity of motive governing many and probably most of the divorces obtained in this country, we can not but recognize that if there were no such thing as the dissolution of marriage, life would be to many much what it means to two prisoners chained in unwelcome and agonizing companionship.

Robert Grant raised a vigorous note of common sense on this subject in his novel advocating divorce for those who have, through long and undeserved suffering, earned the way to escape. And nowadays they do not always insist that the curtain fall upon a reunited husband and wife who will infallibly disunite and hate each other heartily before a week has fled.

VANITY FAIR.

The New York Sun, in its well-known solicitude for feminine beauty, prints an article on the chin. It seems that the Directoire gown gives a special importance to this charming feature, and the Directoire gown must be supplemented by the Directoire pose. It is not enough to construct the dress upon given architectural lines unless the figure is persuaded into conformity.

There are two ways in which the attention of a woman may be riveted upon a theory. The first is upon the score of beauty, but this often fails because women do not particularly wish to look beautiful. Considerations of beauty go down like a house of cards before the breath of fashion, and it may indeed be doubted if the average has any sense of the beautiful. But all women wish to look young, and so we are assured that the woman who keeps her chin high will pass as being much younger than she really is. Pitiless time places its mark upon the forehead and temples, but, for some inscrutable reason, it leaves the chin until the last. Now, no one will look at the forehead who has a chance to look at the chin. Therefore, keep the chin well forward.

But while the chin is an attractive feature, it is quite possible to have too much of it. In fact, one chin is enough and superfluity is deformity. The double chin is the result of carrying the head forward and of failing to keep the skin of the neck tight. Even after the double chin has begun to show itself, it can be remedied by a reform of the carriage. The neck muscles need exercise; they must be kept taut or they will take advantage of neglect and accumulate fat. There is no reason except indolence and mental flabbiness why old age should bring a double chin.

Mrs. Howard Gould has been persuaded by the law to tell us exactly what it costs her to dress. There is no need to enter into the marital infelicities that have produced this disclosure. Already they are sufficiently the talk of the town, and our only concern is the light that is now thrown upon the extravagances of a typical lady of fashion.

It costs Mrs. Gould one thousand dollars a month for her outer garments, six hundred and fifty dollars a month for her underwear, stationery, dentistry, and toilet accessories, and one thousand dollars a month for two automobiles that she regards as indispensable. To summarize the position, she simply can not get along with less than $70,000 a year, and the $25,000 a year offered by her husband is, therefore, pitifully inadequate. And this from a woman who was once an actress, and not a particularly good actress at that.

It is just as well to know these things, because they have a bearing upon social problems that some people find it hard to understand. We need not ask economic questions as to where all this money actually comes from. That way madness lies. But what effect does such a disclosure have upon those who do not earn in the course of a year as many cents as Mrs. Gould spends dollars upon dress, fripperies, and automobiles? Brooklyn Life asks the question tersely and pertinently:

As throwing a sidelight upon the extravagances of such people, who at any trade or profession could not earn more than from nothing to $10,000 a year, this statement wrung from Mrs. Gould by the machinery of the law is strikingly effective. Can it be at all wondered at that the workers of the nation, many of whom, long unemployed, can not feed or clothe their children, are showering bitter imprecations upon those who, as "people of fashion," are ostentatiously squandering upon themselves millions which, in most instances, belong to them only in a legal sense? Is it not the logical result that the Socialists cast nearly one million votes at the last election and that their ranks are continually being swollen by recruits who think they can discern relief from misery in their mistaken theories? No, the wonder is that the American people have shown themselves so patient and so sane under their unjust burdens.

Truly the wonder is not that the great masses of the people are so had, but rather that they are so good.

England's newly created Territorial force, which takes the place of the old volunteers, is to be instructed in the etiquette of the soldier. A neat little volume has been published telling the young soldier how he must behave upon social occasions, and some of the advice may be taken to heart by those who are not soldiers. Some of the notes on conduct are:

When calling, try to avoid starting the conversation on such "shoppy" matters as drill, details of dress, or interior economy.

On "guest nights" the president and vice-president pass the wine, which is never touched until after the king's health has been proposed. When the decanters have been returned to them, the president and—except in regiments where it is the custom to drink the king's health sitting down—all the officers rise. The president then says, "Mr. Vice, the king!" The vice-president says, "Gentlemen, the king," and the health is drunk, the band, if present, at the same time playing the national anthem. It should be remembered that the king's health may be drunk in water.

A void mentioning a lady's name at mess. In many regiments this entails a fine.

No smoking is permitted in the ante or mess rooms between first mess huddle and the time at which the king's health is drunk.

Officers when returning the salute "should remove the pipe or cigarette."

When marching through the streets with any party of men, officers while marching at attention with swords drawn must pass their lady friends by without noticing them. On the order "march at ease" being given, swords should be returned, and then officers may salute any lady friends they meet, but, of course, must not stop and speak to them.

The New York Sun says that the fashionable dinner this season is shorter and merrier than ever and more extravagant. The preferred number of guests is twelve at a private house or in a private dining room at a hotel, and at the most eight when the dinner takes place in a public restaurant. Anybody short of royalty may now be entertained in public with propriety.

"How about dinner giving?" a young married woman, almost a stranger in New York, asked of a veteran New Yorker, and this is the advice she received:

"First of all don't attempt the heavy act, even to please your husband or any great gun he may want you to honor. So sure as you do your dinner will fall flat and your invitations will not be scrambled for.

"Yes, I know, every now and then some high-browed woman—it is nearly always a woman—complains about the inanities of the New York fashionable dinner table and deplors the fact that intellectual discussions are taboo and that persons who venture on anything of the sort are voted bores. The truth is that even intellectual heavyweights crave relaxation, and, wisely or not, they show a weakness for dinners which furnish entertainment and relaxation.

"At nearly every smart dinner now given there are women perfectly well informed as to what is going on in religious, political, financial, and industrial circles, but they are clever enough not to air this knowledge for the benefit of the big men present. Often it takes more brains to be merely diverting than to appear learned."

With all due respect to the writer of the above, it may be suggested that the intellectual brilliance that might enliven a dinner party does not proceed from the mere possession of information, but upon the mental power to handle that information. We are, of course, bored by intellectual discussions carried on by those who have information and nothing more, but we are not bored by the conversation of brilliant people to whom information is simply a working basis. The acquisition of information, of facts, is simply a matter of good memory, but the acceptable use of the facts is a gift of the gods. The average high-school miss is quite a compendium of information and facts, but we never recognize that she knows anything in particular, because she has no mind that can use her knowledge. Latin and Euclid, for instance, do not intrude into ordinary social conversation, but the man of real brilliance who knows Latin and Euclid will show all the more brightly for that knowledge. The "high-browed woman" who complains of the inanities of the modern dinner table will never mitigate those vanities, no matter how hard she may try, because her stock in trade is information and not intellect, and information without the power of thought, without intellect, is an unprofitable servant.

Here is a description of a dinner which was certainly not spoiled by an overweight of intellect:

At a dinner given in a restaurant recently the hostess planned the menu as carefully as if at home. The decorations of the table were thought out by her.

There was a low mound of orchids in the centre of the table. Across each plate lay an American Beauty rose of regulation size and length of stem, but made of satin and silk. On each leaf in gold letters was printed one course of the menu. At the back of the rose was a cotton filled recess which just before the guests sat down was sprinkled with rose extract, so that even in odor the American Beauty was natural.

That was surprise number one. Surprise number two came when what was apparently a croquette was put before each guest. In reality it was made of some sort of composition and opened in the middle, showing a folded, very narrow, long strip of white paper on which was written: "Bryan is in the soup, not in the croquette." As it was just two nights before election this was timely and not displeasing to the guests, who were all Republicans.

Another surprise was the serving of dinner rolls in each of which was a chunk of lead, giving unexpected weight to the roll. It was the jolliest of dinners and yet the four men present were all men of affairs past their first youth a good bit. Counting the relishes and a vegetable entrée, there were just six courses, and the guests sat down at eight and finished their coffee at ten.

Imagine the innocent fun of the chunk of lead in the dinner rolls. But why were the guests spared the time-honored joke of the teaspoons of specially prepared amalgam that melts when placed in hot coffee or tea? The four men guests were "past their first youth a good bit." So we should suppose. They could not have been so very far from their second.

A prominent philanthropic worker in Chicago who was invited to address the students of Northwestern University took the opportunity to speak to his audience with some frankness and to impress upon his hearers the perhaps novel fact that a college education was not necessarily a prelude to "success in life." He said that during the last few years he had been working in the Water-Street Mission of New York. He had learned that one-third of the men who come there ragged and dirty and begging for food were college bred.

I have found them on the Bowery making up beds or waiting on table, and I have even met them in the street-cleaning brigades. During February of last year more than 400 of them stood in the "bread line" at our mission. Seventy-five per cent of the prisoners at Sing Sing are college bred men.

"Wine, women, and song" in college life are responsible for this condition.

That a college education with its accompaniment of "wine, women, and song" conduces to success in life is one of the most curious superstitions of the day. It persists in spite of the obvious fact that the great men of the world have usually been self-educated and wholly deprived of the "chance" that a college education is supposed to give. But perhaps the "wine, women, and song" are not the greatest of college dangers. Was it not Martin Luther who said

Who loves not women, wine, and song
He is a fool all his life long?

Caste ideals, a mental self-sufficiency, and a hatred of discipline are more serious characteristics than an overindulgence in pleasures, noxious enough, in all conscience, but elemental and incidental to youth.

Managers of London theatres are not unfamiliar with men who are so desirous of comfort that they book an extra stall on which to rest their hat and coat. At the Duke of York's Theatre, however, a man at a recent matinée paid for three stalls for his sole use. He explained that his comfort required that no one should share the arms of the chair he occupied, and for that reason he paid for a seat on each side. On one of them he placed his coat and hat, on the other a bag of biscuits, which he ate during the performance. A lady who wanted to move into one of the three seats because it was in a better position than her own inquired, when the situation was explained to her, if it would not be possible to provide the man with a sofa.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

An earnest young preacher in a remote country village concluded a long and comprehensive supplication by saying: "And now let us pray for those who are dwelling in the uninhabited portions of the earth."

Little Charley Maloney, a six-year-old boy, heard a man practicing on the calliope preparatory to playing it in the circus parade. Rushing to his father, he said: "Listen, papa." "What is it?" asked his father. "It's de elephant singing," said Charley.

The hurly prisoner stood unabashed before the judge. "Prisoner at the bar," asked the clerk of the arraigns, "do you wish to challenge any of the jury?" The prisoner looked them over carefully. "Well," he replied, "I'm not exactly wot you'd call in training, but I wouldn't mind a round or two with that there fat old jossler in the corner."

An old Kansas citizen, who had been henpecked all his life, was about to die. His wife felt it her duty to offer him such consolation as she might, and said: "John, you are about to go, but I will follow you." "I suppose so, Manda," said the old man weakly, "but so far as I am concerned you don't need to be in any blamed hurry about it."

A dear old country gentleman and his wife paid a visit to the seaside. While the simple pair were walking on the beach one evening they suddenly noticed the revolving light of a lighthouse. The old lady gazed at it with open eyes for some minutes, then she turned to her husband with a puzzled look. "Well," she exclaimed, "if the man in that ship hasn't lit that light this forty times, and it has gone out every time!"

Hans came in from his ranch, two miles from Olney, to buy a horse. "I've got the very thing you want," said Ike Bergman; "it's a fine road horse, five years old, sound as a quail, $175 cash down, and he goes ten miles without stopping." Hans threw up his hands skyward. "Not for me," he said—"not for me. I wouldn't gif you five cents for him. I live eight miles from Astoria, and I'd haf to walk back two miles."

Andreas Pellisarti, who said he lived somewhere in Mulberry Street, was arraigned in the children's court charged with playing ball on the street, says the New York World. "Don't you know it's wrong?" asked Magistrate Olmsted. "Yes, sir," sobbed Andreas. "Don't you know that you are likely to hurt somebody? The streets don't belong to you. Now tell me, son, to whom do the streets belong?" "De automobiles," answered the culprit. "Discharged," said the judge.

A very matter-of-fact person called to see a neighbor, an elderly woman, who had been ailing for some time. "And how do you find yourself today, Janet?" was the greeting. "Ah, Martha, I'm very bad. This cold, damp weather'll be the end of me. I'll be a dead woman before very long." "Hoots, toots, woman. You've been saying that any time these last twenty years. I've no patience with you. I'll tell you what it is. You want firmness of mind. Fix a day for your dying—and stick to it."

It is of Dr. Isaac Barrow that the story is told of a playful match at mock courtesy with the Earl of Rochester, who, meeting Dr. Barrow near the king's chamber howled low, saying, "I am yours, doctor, to the knee-strings." Barrow (bowing low): "I am yours, my lord, to the shoe tie." Rochester: "Yours, doctor, down to the ground." Barrow: "Yours, my lord, to the centre of the earth." Rochester (not to be outdone): "Yours, doctor, to the lowest pit of hell." Barrow: "There, my lord, I must leave you."

Mark Twain's absentmindedness has been equalled by the college professor who made a visit and then suddenly remarked at the dinner table: "Oh, by the way, Mrs. Chopsticks, have you seen your little boy, Willie, lately?" Mrs. Chopsticks: "No, professor, I haven't seen him since ten o'clock and I can't imagine what has become of him. In fact, I am very much worried about him." Professor: "Well, seeing Martha pour me out that glass of water just now reminds me of something that I had on my mind to tell you some time ago, but which unfortunately escaped my memory. It was just about eleven o'clock, I think, that I saw little Willie fall down the well."

A doctor came up to a patient in an insane asylum, slapped him on the back, and said: "Well, old man, you're all right. You can run along and write your folks that you'll be back home in two weeks as good as new." The patient went off gaily to write his letter. He had it finished and sealed, but when he was licking the stamp it slipped through his fingers to the floor, lighted on the back of a cockroach that was passing, and stuck. The patient hadn't seen the cockroach—what he did see was his escaped postage stamp zig-zagging aimlessly across the floor to the baseboard, wavering up over the baseboard, and following a crooked track up the wall and across the ceiling. In depressed silence he tore up the letter that he had just written and dropped the pieces on the floor. "Two weeks! Hell!" he said. "I won't be out of here in three years."

They had been friends at school. But the ways parted, and the one succeeded while the other failed. A. slept on the park benches, and B. reposed in Fifth Avenue. One day A. presented himself at the door in Fifth Avenue and sent up his name. To the surprise of the footman, he was admitted. "My dear old friend," said B., the millionaire, "why this raggedness?" A. told the story—how this and that and the other had gone against him—all tears dropped from the eyes of the millionaire (B.). A minute's silence while B. leaned his head on his hands. Then, "Will you kindly ring the bell?" A. rang it, and with streaming eyes the millionaire said to the footman: "Show this gentleman out; he's breaking my heart!"

It was a former Archbishop of York—Dr. Thomson—who appeared once in the rôle of coachman. He had attended an evening party, and, on leaving the house, discovered that his coachman was drunk. There appeared nothing for it but to drive home himself, and the archbishop, after placing the smiling but unconscious coachman inside the carriage, mounted the box and took the reins. The monotony of the homeward journey was broken by a wheel of the carriage coming into violent collision with a stone just outside the entrance to Bishopsthorpe. The lodge-keeper, unable to recognize the approaching figure in the darkness, called out cheerily: "Hallo, Bill, drunk again!—and howled if you aint got the old cock's hat on!" "It's the old cock himself," gravely responded his grace.

It's either this or else it's that, He lays the law down plump and flat. There's nothing of the diplomat, It's pretty sure, about him. He hardly credits you with sense; To differ shows you're very dense, He thinks it quite a great offense If you should seem to doubt him.

No sort of reason will he deign To give, that he may make it plain. He can not help your lack of brain, So don't you get him nettled. His declaration short and gruff You may imagine is a bluff, But still he says it. That's enough, The matter should be settled.

I've done all that a woman can Since first our married life began To soothe and please the lordly man And bow to his dominion. I would not wish to be unkind, But, oh, I'd love to take and hind And gag him and then free my mind By giving my opinion.

Private John Allen of Mississippi tells good and timely stories. His latest one has to do with politics and tells of the experiences of a certain Major Blank of Mississippi. Major Blank tried for years to secure a Democratic nomination to Congress, but signally failed each time. Finally he turned Republican and was given the Republican nomination. He made a "whirlwind tour" of his district and felt confident of the result. When the returns were counted it was found that Major Blank had received just two votes. And the next day he was arrested on the charge of "repeating."

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The coming week promises to be one of the gayest of the brilliant season, and any number of delightful events are planned. From present indications there will be no cessation of entertainments until the winter is brought to a close by the Lenten season.

The engagement is announced of Miss Helen Wolcott-Thomas, daughter of Mrs. Lillian Wolcott-Thomas, to Mr. Joseph B. Sifton of San Diego. Their wedding will be an event of the spring.

The engagement is announced of Miss Marie Ellis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George B. Ellis of Los Angeles, to Ensign Clyde Stanley McDowell, U. S. N., U. S. S. Georgia. No date has been arranged for the wedding.

The wedding of Miss Anita Davis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Winfield Scott Davis, to Mr. Kenneth McDonald, Jr., will take place on Wednesday, December 9, at the First Presbyterian Church on Washington Street.

The wedding of Miss Irene Moore, daughter of Mrs. Elizabeth Stauffer Moore of Greensburg, Pennsylvania, to Captain Llewellyn Wigmore, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A., formerly of Los Angeles, will take place today (Saturday) at the First Presbyterian Church at Greensburg. Captain Wigmore and his bride will be at home after January 1 at 230 Riverside Drive, New York.

The first Greenway dance of the season will take place on Friday evening next at the Fairmont.

Mr. and Mrs. George Almer Newhall will entertain at a dinner on Friday evening next in honor of Miss Elizabeth Woods.

The Nordica Concerts.

Mme. Lillian Nordica, the famous prima donna, and her excellent company, which includes Frederick Hastings, haritone, Emma Showers, pianiste, and Andre Benoist, accompanist, will give two concerts in this city at the Van Ness Theatre, on Sunday afternoon, December 13 and 20. On the evening of December 16 Mme. Nordica will inaugurate the concert season of the St. Francis Musical Art Society with a special programme.

The offerings of Mme. Nordica are rare specimens of art in programme making, and while the great prima donna gives her assisting artists splendid opportunities, she still gives her public a great feast of song. Not less than twelve to fourteen important numbers, in addition to a great aria, are her contributions on each programme.

At her opening concert she will sing the great "Narrative and Curse" from "Tristan und Isolde"; "Seligkeit," by Van Der Stucken; "Mein Liebe ist Gruen," Brahms; "In Mitte des Balles," Tschaiikowsky; "Cacellie," Richard Strauss; "Vielle Chanson," Bizet; "Nocturne," Chopin (transcribed for Mme. Nordica); "Neil," Faure; "Mattinata," Leoncavallo; "Twilight," Walter Rummel; "Kashmiri Song," Amy Woodforde-Finden; "A Theme," Andre Benoist; "Spring Song," Hammond; and Schubert's "Der Erlkonig."

Mr. Hastings will sing numbers by Mozart, Hatten, Strauss, and Elgar, and Miss Showers will play compositions of Liszt, Chopin, and Grieg.

Programmes for both concerts may be obtained at the box-office, which opens next Wednesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

Tuesday night, December 15, Manager Bishop of Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, has consented to lay off his entire stock company in order to afford the music lovers of Alameda County an opportunity of hearing this great artist, of whom America is so proud. A special programme will be given, and seats will be ready next Thursday at the theatre box-office.

Colonel James B. Hickey, Cavalry, U. S. A., promoted to his present rank on November 15, has been assigned to the Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A.

Major William C. Davis, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered to proceed from Fort Hamilton, New York, to West Point, at such time as his present duties will permit, for the purpose of conferring with the superintendent of the United States Military Academy on the subject of the location of a searchlight at West Point. On the completion of that duty Major Davis will return to his proper station.

Captain N. E. Niles, U. S. N., is detached from command of the Hancock and ordered to duty as governor of the Naval Home, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Captain W. L. Jolly, U. S. M. C., has been ordered to proceed immediately from San Francisco to Washington, D. C., and to report in person to the major-general, commandant.

Captain Charles C. Pulis, Second Field Artillery, U. S. A., has been granted four months' leave of absence.

Captain Arthur T. Balentine, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has had his resignation of his commission as an officer of the army accepted by the President, the resignation taking effect December 4.

Captain Frank D. Wehster, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., has had the leave of absence granted him on October 14 extended twelve days.

Captain Robert L. Mosely, Philippine Scouts, U. S. A., has been ordered relieved from treatment at the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, and will proceed to join his company by the first available transport leaving San Francisco for Manila.

Naval Constructor L. S. Adams, U. S. N., has been detached from duty on board the Connecticut on the fleet staff of the commander-in-chief of the Atlantic Fleet and ordered to duty in the department of construction and repair, Naval Station, Cavite and Olongapo, P. I.

Lieutenant-Commander C. B. Morgan, U. S. N., is detached from the Milwaukee and ordered to duty as inspector in charge of the Eleventh Lighthouse District, Detroit, Michigan.

Lieutenant-Commander H. H. Caldwell, U. S. N., has been ordered to additional temporary duty as executive officer of the Milwaukee.

Medical Inspector F. Anderson, U. S. N., is detached from the Navy Yard, Mare Island, and ordered to command the Naval Hospital, Annapolis, Maryland.

Surgeon C. H. T. Lowndes, U. S. N., is ordered to the Navy Yard, Mare Island, and to additional duty in command of the Naval Medical Supply Depot at that place.

Passed Assistant Surgeon F. M. Munson, U. S. N., has been detached from the first torpedo flotilla on board the Decatur and ordered to treatment at the Naval Hospital, Canacao, P. I.

Passed Assistant Surgeon P. T. Dessez, U. S. N., has had his orders to the Pacific Fleet modified and has been ordered to temporary duty at the Naval Hospital, Mare Island.

Lieutenant F. B. Garrett, U. S. M. C., has been ordered to the Marine Barracks, Mare Island, for duty.

First Lieutenant John H. Howard, U. S. A., formerly Ninth Cavalry, who was promoted to his present rank on August 2, has been assigned to the Eighth Cavalry, U. S. A., and has been granted two months' leave of absence.

Lieutenant Henry F. Lincoln, Medical Reserve Corps, U. S. A., has had his orders amended and will sail from San Francisco on the transport leaving San Francisco on January 5, instead of December 5, for the Philippines. Upon his arrival in San Francisco, Lieutenant Lincoln will report in person to the commanding general of the Department of California for duty, pending the departure of the transport.

Ensign B. J. Green was detached from the Pensacola on December 3 and sailed today (Saturday) on the transport leaving San Francisco for the Orient, having been assigned to duty on the Charleston.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Soandso—Barker knows his own business. Humphreys—Yes; but he doesn't mind a little thing like that.—Puck.

"Why on earth did you ever marry me?" "Oh, don't be so bromidic! That's what everybody asks."—Cleveland Leader.

"Mamma, can I ever be President?" "Alas, no, my child. You were born before papa and mamma came to Ohio."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Mrs. Hicks—My husband has been just lovely to me all day. Mrs. Wicks—H'm! What was it you caught him doing?—Boston Transcript.

Mrs. Dyer—Have you had any experience in taking care of children? Applicant—No, ma'am. Heretofore I've only worked for the best families.—Puck.

"Was his auto going so very fast?" "Your honor, it was going so fast that the bulldog on the seat beside him looked like a dachshund."—Houston Post.

"Speakin' of de law of compensation," said Uncle Eben, "an automobile goes faster dan a mule, but at de same time it hits harder and balks longer."—Washington Star.

"Men worry more than women." "Yes; they not only have everything to worry about that women have, but they also have the women to worry about, too."—Smart Set.

Pa—You know, Willie, this thrashing is going to hurt me more than you. Willie (sympathetically)—Well, don't be too rough on yourself, dad. 'Taint worth it.—Chicago Daily News.

Mrs. Shellpod—Hiram, some o' them there hoboes hev stole ther wash often the line agin! Farmer Shellpod—Haow dew you know they wuz hoboes? Mrs. Shellpod—Becuz they tuk everything but th' towels.—Chicago News.

"I'm troubled a great deal with headaches in the morning," said Luschman. "Perhaps it's my eyes; do you think I need stronger glasses?" "No," replied Dr. Wise, meaningly, "what you need is not stronger glasses, but fewer."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Officer (investigating old-age pension claims)—Well, Mrs. Brady, and how old might you be? Mrs. Brady—Sorra wan of me knows, indeed, sor. Officer—Think, now. Don't you know the date of your birth? Mrs. Brady—

The date of my birth, is it? Sure, there was no such things as dates when I was born!—Punch.

First Comedian—What's the difference between a beautiful young girl and a codfish? Second Comedian—Give it up. First Comedian—One has a chance to become a fall bride and the other to become a ball fried.—Brooklyn Eagle.

"Morning, morning!" said paterfamilias genially as he entered the breakfast room. "I've had a splendid night. Slept like a top!" His wife agreed with him. "You did," she responded grimly—"like a humming top!"—Philippines Gossip.

"I never knew until I attended the horse show what an absurd term 'horse laugh' was." "What impressed you?" "Why, there's no such thing as a horse laugh. The horses looked right at the ladies' hats and didn't even smile."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"Yes," said the modest young man, thoughtfully, "I have broken off my engagement. I have been thinking it over for a long time, and I have come to the conclusion that a girl who can love an ass like me must be wanting in both taste and intelligence."—Tit-Bits.

"I doubt ye are growing remiss, John," said a Scotch parish minister. "I have not seen you in the kirk these three Sabbaths." John was not duly abashed. "Na," said he, "it's not that I'm growing remiss. I'm just tinkerin' awa wi' ma soul masel."—London News.

Passenger—I suppose you've had some hair-breadth escapes during your seafaring career. Mate—Yes, indeed! I was nearly drowned once. Passenger—You don't say! How did it occur? Mate—I went to sleep in the bath and forgot to turn off the water.—Boston Traveler.

Mrs. Gaswell—Who is that man who looked at you as if he knew you? Mrs. Highsome—He is a man who has done some professional work for me once or twice. He's a chiropodist. Mrs. Gaswell—Chiropodist? Oh, yes; I've heard of them. They don't believe in foreordination, do they?—Chicago Tribune.

Cobble—You certainly have a good cook. By the way, where do you get your servants? Stone—From our neighbors. When we hear of a good one among them, we offer her more money to come with us. Cobble—But, my dear fellow, is that honorable? Stone—Why not? Can you develop a sense of honor with a poor digestion?—Life.

Congress.

The Sixtieth Congress, which met at Washington on Monday of this week in its second session, will last only until the 4th of March. It will hardly get settled down before the holiday adjournment, which means that the working days of the session will not begin until early in January.

The usual disposition of Congress in the brief weeks which precede a change in the national administration is to do as little as possible. Every member is busy with his own diplomacies, looking to the new adjustment of things, and is unwilling commonly to do anything that will divert his attention from these objects, or by any chance create personal antagonisms. And even if there were the disposition to get down to active work, there is not time enough to put any serious legislation through the routine which all things must run.

The one possibility of dramatic interest in the coming weeks lies in the chance that those members of Congress who are bitterly hostile to President Roosevelt—and there are many such—will seek occasion to even up old scores by assuming an openly hostile attitude. Under similar circumstances this sort of thing has happened before, and it has always made a lively session. There is in Congress, especially in the Senate, an intense feeling of dislike for Mr. Roosevelt. And it would not be very surprising if among those who, like Senator Foraker, are retiring from congressional life, somebody may be found willing to break a lance with the President just for the sake of relieving the chagrin of long self-repression. Senator Foraker, it is understood, is definitely minded to do something of this kind, and it is quite within the cards that before the session is through with he will give the country in the form of a speech in the Senate the benefit of such opinions as he holds of the man in the White House.

It is safe to prophesy that the session will see little or nothing in the way of general legislation. The regular appropriation bills which provide for the normal and necessary operations of government will, of course, be carried through. But there will be no new legislation involving large appropriations. Possibly we should name the rivers and harbors bill as an exception to this last statement. This bill is almost certain to pass, but it can hardly be classed as new legislation.

Two matters of very considerable interest, passed up to the new session by the session which ended last summer, will come up for consideration at once. The Postal Savings measure, to which the President and the dominant party are committed, is to be voted upon in the House on Monday next, the 14th instant. Two days later, on the 16th, the Senate is to take up the deferred Brownsville business; and it is expected that in this connection Senator Foraker will take the opportunity to disgorge himself of his views about the President as suggested above.

Nothing else of striking interest is likely to mark the course of the session. The President's message, which comes just as the Argonaut goes to press, is rather a personal communication to the American people than a message to Congress. It will be read and placed on file, but it will have no practical effect upon legislation during the present session.

New Times and Old Grooves.

The disaster which overwhelmed San Francisco in April, 1906, was in its physical effects purely a local affair. It reduced the city—or the most important part of it—to a desolation of ashes and wreckage, but it altered no external condition. The things out of which San Francisco had grown and which had served to sustain and expand her life were left untouched. The loss was that of local machinery for doing business; and by local machinery we mean the whole list of commercial essentials—buildings, stocks of merchandise, and to a considerable extent the individual capital and credit implied in the existence of these things. The trade, domestic and foreign, upon which San Francisco had lived and prospered was shaken out of its routine, but it was not destroyed. Outside conditions governing business after the fire were everything they had been before. The immediate country was as productive and populous as ever; the facilities for transportation were all that they had ever been; the relationship of San Francisco to the various countries beyond the Pacific was not changed. But San Francisco was not at once able to transact business on the old scale. Our men of affairs did, indeed, manifest a marvelous courage and enterprise; they did what they could and they did much, all things considered, but it was not within the limits of possibility that they should immediately go forward in the old ways.

Commerce and trade, thwarted and forced back from its accustomed channels, naturally found new connections. Something of San Francisco's jobbing business was diverted to other and in a sense rival cities. Los Angeles, Seattle, Portland, Ogden, Salt Lake, and Sacramento found themselves more or less immediate gainers at the cost of San Francisco. Similarly, much of San Francisco's retail trade was lost to the cities roundabout, to Oakland, to San Jose, to Sacramento, and other local centres. This loss came about not indeed through the diversion of purely local San Francisco trade, but through the circumstance that interior and suburban shoppers, long accustomed to making certain kinds of purchases in San Francisco, turned to their immediate markets. Even after the leading retail firms had reestablished themselves temporarily on Van Ness Avenue they failed to regain immediately for San Francisco the full volume of trade that had been lost. For all the brave efforts and the surprising success of our retail merchants, San Francisco was not an attractive place for shoppers as of old. For a time there were no hotels worthy of the name; then there were street-car strikes, while moving about the city was hindered by dust and general discomfort. Local merchants in the transbay cities and elsewhere, under the stimulus of increased volumes of trade, were prompt to answer the new demands upon them; and thus the stores of Oakland, San Jose, Sacramento, and other local points took on a character far above their former and ordinary standards.

With progress of time, with the rehabilitation of our hotels and with the restoration of the street-car system, conditions have steadily grown better for the retail trade of San Francisco. None the less, it has not been what it was in the old days, and the prophecy has been general that it will not be until the retail business shall be reestablished in permanent quarters in its old haunts. Let us say frankly that there has been much anxious speculation about the immediate future of our retail trade even when it shall be reestablished in down-town quarters. It has been understood that rehabilitation is not wholly a matter of familiar names, stone walls, mahogany appointments, and plate-glass windows. All these things are meaningless without the patronage which they are designed to serve. It has been recognized that our merchants have the problem not merely of rebuilding and restocking their establishments, but of reattracting their scattered customers. It has been seen clearly enough that many out-of-town shoppers have fallen into new habits, and it has of course been recognized that in buying dress goods, ribbons, and gloves, as well as in other things, habit is among the most profound motives in human life.

All these considerations have given special interest to the venture of the Emporium, a store which appeals to a vastly wide range of buyers, in reestablishing itself in its beautifully restored down-town quarters a full half-year before the general down-town movement. As a rule mercantile establishments are loath to isolate themselves from their neighbors; for retail shopping is commonly done in a fixed district. The removal of the Emporium from Van Ness Avenue was therefore regarded by everybody who takes an interest in such matters as a courageous and somewhat hazardous experiment. It may be remembered that when the move was made the Argonaut in offering its compliments and good wishes to the Emporium people speculated somewhat as to the wisdom of their venture.

The results of something more than two months' experience have an interest far beyond that which, under ordinary circumstances, the public would feel in a private business enterprise. This interest rests upon the fact that the fortunes of the Emporium in its new location may be taken as illustrating conditions and tendencies in local business connected vitally with the future of San Francisco as a centre of retail trade. It is highly significant that the business of the Emporium during the past two months and a half in its Market-Street location should be largely in excess of its previous record on Van Ness Avenue. That it should in its volume be ahead of the corresponding months precedent to the disaster would indicate that there has come to the Emporium in its reestablished home an immense volume of business from the enlarged Mission district, a business of which it knew almost nothing at all in the Van Ness Avenue establishment, and which probably went to Fillmore Street. It is likewise significant that the transbay business of the Emporium is described as "full three hundred per cent" greater than before the removal; and it is still further significant that in the Emporium's record of merchandise deliveries only one district—that immediately adjacent to the old Van Ness establishment—shows a decline as compared with the times preceding the removal.

In brief, the Emporium's venture has been a marked success, abundantly justifying the calculations upon which it was made and illustrating certain tendencies in the retail life of San Francisco which the Argonaut considers important enough thus to be exploited for the encouragement of our business community. Manifestly the retail trade of San Francisco, when it shall be restored to its traditional and beautifully restored quarter, is destined to be everything that it was before the disaster. The suburban communities will return to their old habits of shopping in the metropolis when the general condition shall approximate that of other times. Habits of dependence upon the city, disturbed as they have been by the disaster, have not been broken.

Speaking for itself, the Argonaut has never doubted that we are to have in the rehabilitated San Francisco not only everything we had before, but vastly more. In the months during which San Francisco has been centring her energies upon restoration the outside country has been growing, and growing very rapidly. There is no district anywhere about San Francisco which has not expanded in population, production, and volume of trade. Transportation facilities likewise have grown in every direction, as witness the construction of the Western Pacific, the construction of the Northern Electric system in the upper Sacramento Valley, the development of the Ocean Shore line down the coast towards Santa Cruz, bringing a long isolated but productive territory into immediate connection with the city. Other projected movements, including the building of the extension of the North Coast line to Humboldt Bay, the projected electric system into Sonoma, Napa, and Yolo counties, the promised large development in the transbay suburban systems—all these promise much not only for the general progress of the country, but for facilitating and cheapening access on the part of shoppers to San Francisco.

In the judgment of the Argonaut the measure of San Francisco's development as a retail mart is to be the general growth of the country. The relationship of the city to the country has not been changed by what has happened, nor is it likely to be changed by anything destined to happen. It is for this reason that the Argonaut takes small interest in municipal boosting schemes. It thinks we would better give our energies to promoting orchard development, the sugar-beet industry, potato growing, manufacturing, large and small, throughout the interior, rather than to "Million Clubs" and such like projects. San Francisco will have its million when the general activities of the State call for a million workers in its metropolitan city. Until that time we shall have no use for a million people and would be infinitely worse off with than without them. San Francisco's ambition for growth and population, let us repeat, should look less to immediate access of population than to the organization and promotion of those industries throughout the State which give employment to industrious hands.

The House of Lords.

A dispatch from London reports that a parliamentary committee named to define a plan of reorganization for the House of Lords has made a report suggesting radical changes. It is thought by the committee undesirable that the possession of a peerage should of itself give the right to sit and vote in the House of Lords. All hereditary peers, according to the plan proposed, shall constitute an electoral body for the selection of two hundred of their own number to sit and vote as the "Lords of Parliament," not for life, but for a single Parliament. The plan would reduce the number of lords spiritual to ten, to be selected by the bishops. It would give Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa representatives in the House of Lords. The number of peers qualified to sit without election would by this plan be reduced to 130, and this number should include such as have held cabinet-ministerhips, viceroyships, governor-generalships, high naval and military rank, or had twenty years' service in the House of Commons. This plan would reduce the reformed House of Lords to about 250 persons.

All this, it hardly needs to be said, is mere patchwork and pottering. The charge against the House of Lords is that it represents nothing but tradition and privilege. This criticism will not be answered by cutting down the numbers of the House of Lords or by any other system which leaves the vital and objectionable principle untouched. Progressive and liberal England wants and will insist upon such reorganization of the parliamentary scheme as will eliminate from legislation any authority lacking the direct sanction of representative election.

Fortunately the English spirit in these matters is not peremptory; much is yielded to tradition; changes are not made for the sake of change. But modern England, like the rest of the modern world, rejects and resents the principle of mere privilege, unauthorized and unapproved, in the affairs of government. Something, indeed very much, may be said for the system in its social and political influences; none the less the thing is illogical, outworn, cumbersome. It is surely destined to go the way of other unnecessary, ineffective, and burdensome institutions.

Schemes for reforming the House of Lords all have the same ultimate significance; they mean nothing less than putting an end to the system of privilege in legislation. The thing is destined to come about as surely as time rolls on, but it will not come quickly, since the British mind is not hospitable to radical innovation. Regarding the "ending of the lords" as an ultimate certainty, there is much to be said in regret with respect to it. Every nation needs in close relationship to its legislative and administrative life a group of experienced and wise counsellors. If the lords had been entirely faithful to tradition and opportunity, they would have occupied this place in the British system. But they have not as a body for many years past stood for wisdom and disinterested judgment; they have not reflected the purposes of the nation. They are losing their mandate because they have ceased to hold the kind of respect which in modern times is essential to authority, whether founded in tradition or in popular choice.

Disaffection in India.

The proclamation of King Edward to the princes and people of India deserves special attention at a time when every mail brings reports of unrest and agitation throughout the eastern empire. Fifty years ago Queen Victoria issued a somewhat similar proclamation upon the suppression of the Mutiny, outlining the intentions of the government toward India, assuring the people of that country of a fraternal participation in the prosperity of the whole empire, and promising an orderly progress toward the ideal of self-government. King Edward points to the gradual fulfillment of the guarantees then given, offers new assurances of the extension of the representative principle, and reasserts the resolution of the government to advance the interests of the native population and to eliminate such distinctions of caste and color as may still survive. It is an important document, not alone for its contents, but for the social conditions that accompany it if they did not actually call it forth.

The condition of India during the last year or two has been a perplexing one, and it is safe to assume that those who offer glib explanations or who pretend to condense the problem into an axiom do so either without a full equipment of knowledge or with a too full equipment of prejudice. Agitation for a fuller measure of self-government has certainly assumed a pronounced and aggressive form over certain limited areas in India. This has been accompanied by an outbreak of violent crime and by assaults upon officials, while a general air of insolence on the part of the native classes suggests alarming possibilities in the direction of a concerted and revolutionary movement. What do these things portend? Do they mean that India is about to turn to a new chapter in her history or merely that she has been touched by the cycle of unrest that will pass away as other such cycles have passed away? Do they mean that England has failed in her Indian mission or only that she is confronted by the forces of independence and self-reliance that have been unchained by example and education?

Such questions can not be answered unless time and events shall answer them for us, as they doubtless will. The problem is too complicated and the nature of the Hindu is too subtle to permit of generalizations, which, indeed, are attempted only by the uninformed. There are three hundred millions of people in India, or nearly one-third of the entire human race. They vary in evolution from the highest culture and the broadest intelligence to the most hopeless ignorance and the lowest savagery. They are composed of races as wide apart as the poles, separated not only ethnologically, but by the deepest sentiments of religion and tradition. They are mutually antagonized by theological hatreds, by the memory of ancient persecutions, by the rancors of recurrent dispossession, and by enmities that appeal as sacred and inviolable duties. This strange medley of races and creeds has been governed by England for half a century. For fifty years the Mohammedan lion has lain down by the side of the Hindu lamb, and Hindus, Sikhs, Jains, Buddhists, Parsees, and Mohammedans have been compelled to silence their differences in the presence of a common law, a jus omnium gentium, and to preserve at least an outward semblance of amity toward one another. It has been an ethical education foreign to their fierce and warlike nature. It has been a triumph of civilization over the thinly veneered barbarisms of antiquity.

Now, the Argonaut holds no brief for the British government in India, nor can it be doubted that abuses, and some of them grave ones, have crept into an administration of three hundred millions of people by a government thousands of miles away and through the machinery of a civil service. It would indeed be strange if there were no points open to the attack of the critical, if there were no administrative mistakes deserving of censure. But the fact speaks for itself, that for fifty years the volcanic hatreds of India have been stilled and her teeming populations have been at an unprecedented peace. Can we imagine that peace would continue for many weeks if these explosive elements, with the traditions of war in their blood, were thrown upon their own resources or allowed to scramble for predominance?

Although there can be no general or inclusive explanation of the present turbulence, we can at least identify many of the contributory causes without adopting a general accusation of misgovernment or entertaining the extravagant idea that India wishes to throw off British control. Indeed, we see the same discontent in every part of the world. A sort of social idealism, ill-governed, misdirected, and vague, has assailed in turn every country in civilization and has been cultivated industriously by disorderly forces, such as socialism and anarchy, to their own advantage. There is no reason why India should be exempt. When we realize that nearly 278,000,000 of her people can neither read nor write, we can only wonder that the material has not proved more inflammable than it has. Let us suppose Europe or America similarly illiterate and then exposed to the glamoring incendiaryism of a Debs or the fanatical precepts of a Tolstoy. Need we ask for a moment what the result would be? India has partially awakened from the sloth of centuries. In his efforts to educate the whole, the white man has succeeded in partially teaching a small fringe of the higher and more ambitious castes. They have been given a key with which to unlock the doors of western literature, and naturally they have devoured all the irresponsible things that have been written on human freedom, the rights of man, and the divinity of the ballot-box. That self-government is the crown of self-restraint they have no conception, nor that administration requires other faculties than a college education and a glib tongue. With this equipment they have easily become leaders of the dense masses under them, and they have found no difficulty in persuading the Hindu that he is a much abused person and that his ultimate bliss depends upon his power to vote. And when the Hindu is thus persuaded his discontent takes the form of insolence and crime.

The trouble has been inflamed by European agitators who ought to know better, but who seem to have no conception of the appalling explosion that they invite.

Mr. Keir Hardie, for example, a Socialist member of the English Parliament, recently went to India, and by a course of such harangues as he is accustomed to deliver to English labor unions so inflamed the natives that they reached a point where he himself became terrified at the frightful possibilities that were so clearly in sight. Mr. Keir Hardie has since been in America, and we know something of his quality and the mischief that he can do even when speaking to educated white men. The effect of his eloquence upon the Bengalese can easily be imagined, coming as it did from a white man and a member of the House of Commons.

It seems very clear that the Hindu agitator has no clear conception of what he wants, although he has the clearest appreciation of the delights of a sort of tinsel leadership. His sense of political disability is of the vaguest kind. He has read a little of Rousseau, a little of Voltaire, and that he can understand portions of Mr. Spencer's materialistic philosophy has given him a boundless conceit and an inexhaustible self-complacency. We have seen some examples of the babu political missionary in this country, where they have been much admired for their classical features and much adulated by the sort of women who find it inconvenient to live with their husbands. But they have not impressed us as being qualified to organize a representative government of three hundred millions of heterogeneous and illiterate people, nor indeed to supervise a well-stocked chicken yard. Yet we may suppose that they are among the best of their kind.

When we turn to the really representative men of India we hear a very different story. Speaking recently before the All India Moslem League, Mr. Seyd Ameer Ali, after explaining that he represented some seventy millions of Indian people, used the following words:

While they desired to work in harmony with the rest of the loyal elements in India in advancement of the general interests of the country, their position was perfectly distinct. They believed that the continuous development of their country was dependent upon the permanence of British rule in India and on the loyal coöperation of the people of India with the servants of the British crown.

So much for the Mahomedans. Now we find the Maharajah of Benares, one of the most responsible and dignified of the native rulers of India, writing to the London Times in indignation at the vague talk about self-government. "We in India," he says, "were almost accustomed to hear such unmeaning and hollow cries and would scarcely have troubled our head about them had it not been for their echo, which is now and then ominously reflected from the white cliffs across the English Channel." The maharajah points out that there are already 689 self-governing States in India whose independence is clearly defined by treaty:

What is this new self-government meant to be? Is it meant to be the 690th State coördinate with those already existing, making each State free to make peace or wage war with each other and thus bringing India once again on the verge of the internecine warfare from which it was luckily saved by the timely advent of the British power? . . . The British public should know that the native chiefs of India will not brook such nonsense talk.

It would be possible to quote very many such opinions from enlightened natives, but these will suffice to suggest that charges of general maladministration are unfounded. They would also seem to show how illusory are the expectations that representative government, beneficent to more politically advanced nations, could mean other than anarchy and civil war to three hundred millions of uneducated Indians who have never before even heard of such a thing as self-government.

But the English government must take warning, and the terms of the king's proclamation in which he promises that the principle of self-government shall be extended show that it has done so. Perhaps the English people have failed to realize that there can be no finality about any arrangement under which a small minority governs a vast majority, and that so far as the governing class does its duty by the governed, so far it advances the day when self-government becomes inevitable. But the test of administrative ability is self-control and social order. Where these are lacking there can be no advance. If the natives of India allow themselves to be persuaded into violence, they will do no more than show conclusively that they are unfitted for the privileges that they demand. Fortunately, there is no reason to believe that the present movement has any intelligent leadership or any other basis than an unreasoning and incoherent irritation. Otherwise the murderous element would not have selected Sir Andrew Fraser for assault. Sir Andrew Fraser is the lieutenant-governor of Bengal and is said to be of a peculiarly kindly and sympathetic nature. Indeed, he has been subject to criticism for his constant and sometimes ill-judged attempts to conciliate Indian prejudice. But the attempt to assassinate him that was recently reported is the fourth within recent years. Agitation by assassination has never yet been successful and it can find no palliation in a country like India, where men of all colors stand upon absolute equality before the law and where all considerations of race and creed are kept at arm's length. India has been disturbed by agitators, by the unsuccessful revolution in Turkey and in Persia, and by the fortune that has followed Asiatic arms in China. But if she wishes to accelerate her pace she must do it in the accepted way, by moderation and by an orderly self-restraint.

A Foreign Entanglement.

The announcement that the Elkins-Abruzzi marriage will not take place and that all negotiations have been terminated should put an end to a stream of unpleasant personalities, although we shall, no doubt, be favored with the usual diatribes upon international weddings in general. The duke is said to be satisfied that the difficulties in his way are too great, and by this we may take it that he means that the Queen Dowager Margherita, who is practically at the head of social life in Italy, will not yield her assent. The king himself was warmly in favor of the project, hoping that a brilliant and beautiful American woman would compensate for the social dullness of his wife, who finds that her maternal claims exclude everything else. Queen Elena is all that a mother should be, and nothing that a queen should be, and Margherita, as a result, represents the social side of Italian royalty. Margherita would have been willing enough to see a morganatic marriage, but she set her face firmly against the introduction of a commoner to the full status of the court and crown. It does not seem that the insult of a morganatic marriage—that abomination of some European courts—was actually offered, but it was certainly discussed. No doubt it would be abhorrent to the duke himself, who has not only acted irreproachably all the way through, but who has a record of industry and honorable usefulness. On the whole, it is easy to believe that events have turned out in the best interests of the parties concerned. The bride would not have been happy in the face of social antagonism, which would certainly react to the disadvantage of the duke, while Senator Elkins was simply expressing the fine Americanism to be expected of him in deprecating a marriage ill-consonant with his traditions and involving such distasteful formulas as a change of religion.

The case is rather a peculiar one because it involves royalty. If the Duke of the Abruzzi had not been royal, with a possible crown in front of him, there would have been no difficulties in his way. The Italian aristocracy has few of the exclusive traditions to be found elsewhere, and is usually so impoverished as to welcome a marriage that brings money. As a matter of fact, very few American women have married Italians, but there is no traditional prejudice against such matches. So far as the Italian people have expressed an opinion in this particular instance, it has been antagonistic to the marriage, but solely on the ground of the royal principle involved, and this in spite of the fact that the father of the Duke of the Abruzzi, when he was King of Spain, himself married a commoner. It remains to be seen what other European courts would say to such a contingency. A marriage between an English princess and a commoner has never been seriously suggested, although the Princess Louise, fourth daughter of Queen Victoria, married the Marquis of Lorne, who, while not a commoner, was certainly not royal. There is no reason to suppose that there would be any insuperable obstacle to a marriage between an English princess and an American of unquestionable family, and except at the point of nationality the case of the Marquis of Lorne might be said to be almost a precedent. There have been innumerable marriages between American women and the English nobility, and despite common assumption most of them have been happy. The wife has taken her husband's rank and has not only been warmly received, but in many instances has become a social and political force. Among these may be mentioned the late Lady Curzon, Mrs. Joseph Chamberlain, Mrs. Cornwallis West, who was formerly Lady Randolph Churchill, Lady Lowther, Lady Goschen, and Lady Waterloo. No question has ever been raised in England as to the wisdom of such marriages, and the brides have been received exactly as though they were English and have shared their husband's rank in every respect. King Edward, in fact, has taken every opportunity to show his appreciation of the American women who have come to England as wives, and there is no reason to suppose that he would disapprove of a closer and family relationship.

It is in France—a sister republic—that American wives find their greatest difficulties. This is due not alone to the rigid exclusiveness of the French aristocracy, but to the fact that the unit of French society is the family, and not the individual. The woman who marries a Frenchman marries also the Frenchman's family and must be acceptable to every member of that family. The French family is more closely knit and preserves more intimate relations than in any other part of the world. It is almost like a domestic club where every member feels at liberty to veto a new admission on the ground of personal incompatibility. A marriage is an affair for the whole family to consider, an affair in which the status of the husband is hardly greater than that of the cousin or the aunt, and where the most conservative opinion usually carries the day. Where American women have married Frenchmen it is usually because there has been some consideration—monetary or otherwise—heavy enough to outweigh the inevitable family objections, and then, of course, the wife is made to feel that she is an intruder. In the matter of marriage imperial Germany is far more democratic than republican France. American wives have been received with the highest consideration, and while German sentiment does not sanction the interference of women in public affairs, there has never been the faintest suggestion of incongruity in the marriage of American women of family with titled Germans. The Countess Waldsee, for example, is an American, and the persisting and tender sentiment between herself and the count was one of the romances of Europe. The Baroness von Sternburg is an American, and so is Princess Hatzfeld. In fact, the number of American wives in Germany is considerable, and no scandal of note has ever been associated with these marriages. What would be said if royalty should become involved remains to be seen, but it is doubtful if there would be any serious obstacles. Monarchies may be just as democratic as republics, and common sense is not a monopoly of either of them.

The Oregon Situation.

The embarrassing situation in Oregon with respect to the coming senatorial election will not be cleared up even by so pointed a hint as that given by President Roosevelt in his greeting to Governor Chamberlain as "senator-to-be."

Hail to thee, Thane of Glamis!

—hail to thee, Thane of Cawdor!

All hail, Macbeth! that shalt be king hereafter.

All this did not save the doomed Macbeth against the precipitate and fatal laying on of MacDuff. Nor is the President's greeting to Governor Chamberlain likely to be more effective. Everybody in Oregon admits the validity of the pledge under which a majority of the State legislature rests; all see the embarrassment of the situation. None the less, all the authoritative forces of the Republican party are urging the Republican legislative majority on one pretext or another to disregard the promise of "Statement No. 1" and to be guided solely by the national law governing the election of United States senators. The Oregonian, a tremendously potent force in the political life of Oregon, is preaching rebellion against the rule of "Statement No. 1" in a thousand ways, both direct and subtle. All the practical politicians and most of the leading Republicans of the State are urging the legislators to disregard a pledge which is now characterized as a "bunko game." Even the Hon. George H. Williams, ex-supreme judge, ex-United States senator, ex-Attorney-General in President Grant's Cabinet, ex-mayor of Portland, easily the largest, the most venerable, the most venerated, and intellectually the ablest figure in Oregon, has been able to find law and morals, at least to his own satisfaction, for repudiation of the engagements involved in "Statement No. 1."

On top of all, those Republican members of the legislature who made asses of themselves by acceding to "Statement No. 1" are chagrined at their own stupidity and folly. There is not one man among the number who would not make very considerable sacrifice to get out of the hole in which he finds himself. Every shame-faced figure in the group wants to cast his vote not for the Democrat Chamberlain, but for some Republican, and would be more than glad to find a salve for his own conscience and self-respect in doing it.

When affairs are in this posture it does not take any very close acquaintance with human nature or a very profound gift of prophecy to foretell what is going to happen—or at least what is not going to happen. Mr. Chamberlain, we think, will not get all the votes pledged to him under the scheme of "Statement No. 1"; nor will he get enough Republican votes in combination with the few members of his own party to elect him. Under one pretext, one device or another, a sufficient number of those committed to "Statement No. 1" will sneak out of their pledges to defeat Mr. Chamberlain. And in the end the election will go to some Republican, possibly to Senator Fulton, whose defeat was brought about through a dishonest and shameless trick played boldly and at the psychological moment.

Nevertheless, in the opinion of the Argonaut President Roosevelt is right in the assumption that the men who pledged themselves formally and publicly and under the attest of solemn oath to vote for the man to be "chosen by the people" are bound in honor to vote for Mr. Chamberlain, who was so chosen. We can see but one even fairly decent way of evading this pledge, and that is for every man who made it and who now wishes to avoid it, to resign and go before the people for reëlection upon a revised statement of his intentions. No way has ever yet been found for a man solemnly to promise one thing and then deliberately to do another without making himself a liar; and this is a thing which men of sensibility take care to avoid.

Private Control of Public Powers.

The tragic climax of the career of William J. Biggy ought to serve as a fresh reminder of the evils of a principle in public affairs which has long cursed the life of San Francisco and will continue to curse it as long as it is persisted in. The prime ill, the thing which lies at the base of all our troubles, is the practice of choosing public officials not for their character, their strength, their resource, their self-sufficiency, but rather for their subserviency. Biggy's case illustrates this principle. Biggy was made State senator not because he had any qualification for the work of a senator, but because he was a weak and subservient man and could be depended upon to do what he was told to do. He was made an elisor of the court and put in charge of the person of Abraham Ruef not for the purpose of keeping Ruef safely, since he could have been kept far more safely at the county jail, but because he could be depended upon to "carry the responsibility" while yielding to Detective Burns such privilege as he desired of "sweating" the man in custody and of working upon him for such "testimony" as it was desired to get at his hands. In other words, Biggy was made elisor because it was known that he would be subservient to Mr. Burns—that he would allow Burns to do whatever he wanted to do with the man in custody, without himself incurring any kind of responsibility. Again, Biggy was made chief of police not because he had the experience, the personal decision and resolution, the fixed character, or the bold initiative desired in that position, but because he was counted upon to be submissive at all times and in all ways.

The principle embodied in Biggy's public services is precisely that which made our city government so gross a stench under the bossship of Abraham Ruef. For years there was a situation in San Francisco in which the vital and effective powers of the city government rested in the hands of a man wholly detached from official responsibility. The mechanism of his vile trade was the organization of the city government in hands subject to his control while at the same time he bore no sort of responsibility. Ruef governed the city through a subservient mayor, a subservient board of supervisors, a subservient department of police, and a subservient department of public works. He "protected" his agents and his "clients" through a subservient public prosecutor—at least until such time as somebody else outbid him for the favors of this particular officer.

So fixed have we become in this bad habit that we permit it to be carried forward under the name of reform and with the approval of many elements which esteem themselves highly moral. Who, for example, does not know that behind certain departments of our city government there are personal forces strong enough completely to overshadow and overshadow the men nominally in office? Who does not see that the authority and powers of the prosecuting office are exercised by one who has literally bought his way into authority?

We shall not have decency and efficiency in our municipal life until we heed the sound rule of combining responsibility and authority in the same hands. As long as we permit the powers of office to be wielded by men who keep under cover and who avoid all responsibility we shall have just such exhibitions as those which have injured and discredited us in recent years.

Tariff and Finance.

Already it is plainly to be seen that the tariff issue, in relation to which the Republican party and the President-elect stand so firmly committed, is going to be very difficult in the matter of practical adjustment. Half a dozen distinct plans of tariff treatment are proposed by men not likely to yield easily—for example by the President-elect, by the Vice-President-elect, by Speaker Cannon, by Senator Aldrich and those whom he represents, etc. All speak blandly and plausibly in assumed support of the party pledge, but none the less there are various keen knives deep down in various bootlegs. The hope of the situation lies first in the manifest sincerity of the President-elect, and second that the political necessities of the situation may enable a measure of real tariff reform to triumph promptly over the manifold obstacles which lie in its path. This is the hope of the situation, and we wish it were possible to add to it the promise of the situation as well. But it is impossible not to fear that the fight is to be an intense and bitter one, possibly a prolonged one.

The money laws of the country, which are so fruitful a source of legislative difficulty, are happily in better shape. We have it from a close and wise observer, familiar with the immediate situation in Congress, that no radical currency proposals are likely to be made within the next two or three years at least. The alarm which filled the country last year, and which formed the motive of the hurried and none too carefully considered legislation of the last congressional session, has given place to a mood of optimism, with the probable result of an extended period of congressional inaction. And in these matters congressional inaction commonly means the advantages inherent in repose.

The country is now fairly well past the alarms created by last year's panic. Conditions have toned up the country over, and if we are still below the general high levels of 1906 and the early months of 1907, the kite is still well up in the air—perhaps as high as it ought to go wholesomely and safely. Even in the teeth of a presidential election, and with the certainty of a tariff discussion ahead, the values of securities, great and small, have steadily advanced to levels reasonably high. The bankers of the country have adjusted themselves to the new law and are prepared to do business under it upon a liberal basis. The industries of the country are rapidly renewing their activity, satisfied with the outlook as it stands.

And since the situation is what it is, since it would be almost criminal to disturb conditions tending so positively to general prosperity, the financial commission will be justified, or something more, in taking all the time it wants for the investigation authorized by Congress. The members of the commission are said to be highly gratified with the opportunity thus afforded them to examine minutely not only those domestic conditions which deserve attention at their hands, but the systems enforced in foreign countries. Their work has been in progress now for nearly a year, but the date of report to Congress is probably as remote as 1910 or possibly 1911. The commission will report progress in a general way and ask for such allowances of time as the magnitude of the work requires and as domestic conditions abundantly justify.

With all its defects, the measure adopted last year does provide the means of checking panie tendencies. The machinery is provided by which a total of $500,000,000 may at any time be added to the currency of the country. For this special currency bankers will have to pay at the rate of 5 per cent per annum for the first month, the interest rate increasing each month until a maximum of 10 per cent is reached. These rates are not excessive for panie times, and they are absolutely necessary for the prompt curtailment of panic circulation. It is certain that the substantial banking interests of the country will much prefer to work under a system of fairly high interest for special panic circulation duly authorized than to proceed as they did last year upon the basis of unauthorized issues, without legal tender quality, resting solely upon the faith of clearing-house organizations. The system has the merit of giving to little country banks, provided they have the right securities in their vaults, the same rights and privileges with respect to panic circulation as the greater banks at the financial centres.

A development tending to affect the volume of circulation, and therefore vitally related to the finances of the country, is likely to grow out of the movement for a system of postal savings banks. In spite of the opposition of various private and State institutions, who naturally fear the rivalry of the projected postal banks, the plan seems destined to be carried out. And by it, it is the belief of capable financiers that large amounts of money ordinarily held by small savers will be poured into the common circulation. Hoards, so it is declared, will come out of old stockings, ginger jars, and wash boilers and from secure burial under the roots of friendly trees. And in order to make the money thus entrusted to it earn the interest which it is proposed to pay, the government must of necessity invest it. The natural resource of the government will be the national banks, and the meaning of this is that these banks must have the handling of vast sums which are now withheld practically from circulation.

There are those prominent in the financial world who believe that the system provided last year in conjunction with the postal savings bank scheme will give everything that is needed for the financial welfare of the country, at least for the time being; and it is suggested that the congressional commission may be able to serve the country best by not bringing in new proposals of financial legislation, but by recommending that good enough be let alone. In the financial world, as in other spheres, better is often the deadly foe of good enough.

A Prospective White Man's Burden.

Just what the latest revolution in Hayti signifies, politically or morally, is among the things which, in Lord Dundreary's phrase, no fellow can find out. It appears to be just another turn of the wheel which has been turning with a monotonous regularity this past century or more. Along with unnumbered revolutions which have gone before, it confirms the long fixed opinion of the more progressive and capable of mankind that the negro, left to his own devices, is incapable or at least unprepared for self-government.

There is perpetual conflict in Hayti between the two classes of its population, one numbering perhaps 10 per cent of the whole formed of mulattoes or mixed bloods, who monopolize pretty much all there is in the country of intelligence and property, the other forming 90 per cent of the population practically of unmixed African descent and ignorant and debased almost to that degree in which their barbarous ancestors lived in their original home. The conflict between these rivals for domination of the so-called Black Republic is perpetual, and it will continue, no doubt, until some nation of higher political instinct and larger powers shall step in to quell the tumult and enforce order something after the manner of the United States in Cuba ten years or more ago.

The actual condition of Hayti is not much of an advance upon savagery. The veneer of civilization left in the island by the French is worn thin, leaving little except an outside glimmer of tinsel and pretension upon a basis of savage instincts and propensities. The civilization of Hayti, indeed, is hardly civilization at all, and even the terms and pretensions of it would quickly be lost but for those influences suggested by the presence of diplomatic representatives from the outside world and supported by the operation of a none too secure or prosperous commerce.

Nord Alexis, the so-called president who has just been driven out by force of arms, was a dictator of a red-handed type whose powers rested wholly upon force and had for some time been maintained by force. Reports of his bloodthirsty deeds and of his savage revels have more reflected the spirit of sheer barbarism than that of even a pretended civilization. His departure has ridded Hayti of a remorseless tyrant, and time only can tell whether the newest usurper is a better man or worse. The situation is one from which nothing may reasonably be expected excepting a continuation of the political and military convulsions which have long marked the history of this distempered land.

It would be a bold guesser who should prophesy where the ultimate fate of Hayti is to lie. Pacification and civilization of the country must come, if it is ever to come, through foreign intervention. France, from her traditional association with island affairs and from the dominance of French ideas among the more intelligent of the Haytians, might, without very great presumption, assume a position of political domination. But at the threshold she would surely be met by a reassertion of the Monroe Doctrine on the part of the United States. Indeed, it is not easy to see how any European power could take a hand in Haytian affairs without facing remonstrance in positive form from this country, which has already asserted its right to police the little world of the Antilles. And this being the situation, it would seem to impose upon this country a definite responsibility for the social order of the island, with such maintenance of productive and commercial conditions as the interest of the world has the right to insist upon. The case of Cuba furnishes an implied if not a direct precedent which must ultimately cause the United States to do in Hayti what she has already done for her western neighbor.

That the day may be long postponed will be the devout wish of all Americans of conservative mind. Already we have on our hands non-assimilables, unassimilables, and unspeakables more than enough in Cuba, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands, not to mention our domestic problems in the shape of black and copper-skinned races. We would like to see the country have time to take stock of its responsibilities and get a new endowment of second-wind before proceeding to fresh ventures under the classification of the white man's burden.

Editorial Notes.

The woman suffragists who are so loudly venting their disappointment and resentment against the President because he is not an eager supporter of suffrage proposals are not doing their cause any good. If woman suffrage be an issue at all, it is a practical issue. The arguments for and against it, in so far as they have weight, are practical arguments; and nobody cares anything about fine-spun theories which have no foundation in practical considerations. The question is: Would or would not woman suffrage increase the political and social welfare of the country? The President, while sentimentally a suffragist as he declares, is unable to see that any practical good could come from extending the franchise to women. Secretary Root, a far abler and more judicious man, holds practically the same view. They have a right to their opinions and to their decent expression without suffering any penalty in the form of loud and frenzied personal abuse. Loud and frenzied personal abuse, indeed, is offensive from any source, and it is doubly so when it comes from women who assume to be engaged in a social issue of high moral claims and pretensions. If woman suffrage is ever to be won—and it may be won in time if it shall be able to show that it can serve the interests of society—it will be through reason and courteous persuasion, and not through strident reproaches of persons in public office or out of it who have decided opinions with the candor and the courage to declare them.

Ex-Secretary Metcalf is right undoubtedly in the prediction that aerial navigation, even in its present state of development, is in the way of having a profound effect upon the methods of warfare. The Wright machine can remain in the air for four hours with a flight radius of two hundred miles. The Zeppelin machine is capable of still more sustained efforts. This means that in future conflicts the work of scouting will be done accurately from the region of the clouds, and possibly that offensive assaults may be made from the same region. It is easily conceivable that tremendous havoc might be wrought by discharges of high explosives from an airship passing far overhead. Mr. Metcalf expresses the hope that the powers will do away with mines and torpedoes. This is good so far as it goes; but pray why, when the powers shall come to friendly agreement respecting this matter, may they not go further and do away with the whole barbarous business of international warfare?

The retirement of Secretary Metcalf, with the advancement of Mr. Newberry to the secretaryship, gives to the Naval Department its sixth official head since Mr. Roosevelt came into office seven years ago.

Within that period the secretaryship has been held by John D. Long of Massachusetts, William Henry Moody of Massachusetts, Paul Morton of Nebraska, Charles Bonaparte of Maryland, and Victor H. Metcalf of California. Not one of these had any individual preparation for the work of the Navy Department, and no one of them has had time, even if he had the disposition or the talents, to make an impression upon the department. The real work of the department has been done by subordinates who have regarded, and with entire justice, the Secretary to be a mere figure-head, a more or less ornamental fifth wheel to a coach so adjusted as to run alone, at least after a fashion. Mr. Newberry has really better qualifications than any of his immediate predecessors. He served in the Michigan naval militia and as a lieutenant on board the U. S. S. Yosemite through the Spanish-American war. He is a rotund little man with a bald head who is vastly liked for his amiability.

There are indications that the senatorial mix-up in Ohio between Congressman Burton and Brother Charles Taft, with Mr. Foraker somewhere behind the distance flag, will be solved through a friendly arrangement. Burton has been down to Hot Springs by invitation to see the President-elect, and gossip has it that he was tendered and is disposed to accept the Secretaryship of the Treasury, for which he is entirely fitted. This would leave the coast practically clear for Brother Charles, who, gossip further declares, is anxious for the senatorship whether his candidacy be regarded in good taste or not. It is noted, by the way, that Brother Charles's senatorial candidacy is a subject of wide although entirely amiable criticism. The view of conservatism and good taste is thus fairly set forth by the Springfield Republican:

Brother Charles's $110,000 for the expenses of Mr. Taft's campaign does not include his expenditure in the preliminary canvass, whose object was to secure the Republican nomination. Mr. Hitchcock's expenses prior to the Chicago convention were believed to be very large, so that the total sum invested by the Cincinnati millionaire must have been considerably in excess of $200,000. No one will criticize such a display of fraternal affection and regard. What one of us, worth millions, would hesitate a moment to pay the legitimate campaign expenses of a worthy and able brother, who was without a fortune, on his way to so exalted an office as the presidency? Mere family pride, if nothing else, would move one to untie the purse-strings. Yet a sensitive man would be content with such reward as the consciousness of having been useful and generous would afford him. He would not make political capital out of his fraternal service as financial promoter and promptly seek a place in the United States Senate.

A straw which may fairly be taken to indicate the lay of the wind in Oregon with respect to the coming senatorial election is to be found in the choice of the Multnomah (Portland) County members of the legislature of an anti-"Statement No. 1" man as delegation chairman. The Statement No. 1 men were in the majority, and if they had acted together they might have chosen one of their own number for the chairmanship. But when it came to voting, six of the Statement-Number-Oners broke away from leading strings and assisted in making an unpledged man the official head of the delegation. This is characterized by local politicians as "the entering wedge," and is taken to indicate that the six men who broke away from their colleagues will not abide by the pledge under which they stand to vote for Governor Chamberlain. Plainly things are taking shape for a grand mix-up when the Oregon legislature shall meet next month. This will be strictly in the line of precedent, for when did anybody ever hear of an Oregon legislature which met and got through with its work without making a new record in the line of scandalous performance.

The California Weekly is the name of a journalistic venture which has just made its appearance in San Francisco. The paper is owned by a group of stockholders, something like two hundred all told, and is under the general editorship of Mr. A. J. Pillsbury, a writer of exceptional character and merit. Mr. Pillsbury was associated with the Pardee State administration as secretary of the board of examiners, later becoming an editorial writer on the Sacramento Union, where he won attention as an ardent supporter of the Lincoln-Roosevelt political movement. Associated with Mr. Pillsbury in editorial authority is Mr. Chester H. Rowell, editor of the Fresno Republican, a man of exceptional writing talent and lately active as an organizer and promoter of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. Mr. A. J. Waterhouse, the well-known writer of light philosophies and of humorous verse, is also actively associated with the new publication. The Weekly declares itself to be independent of political or other domination. It will stand presumably for those social and political aims with which its editors have been identified. The paper is beautifully printed, and it is the manifest aim of its promoters to claim for it a place in the sphere of higher journalism. There are none too many journals of this class in California or elsewhere, and the Argonaut gives the new venture its cordial wishes for success and usefulness.

There is great interest among automobilists in a motor-car to be put upon the market next year by Charles F. Herreshoff, whose name has hitherto been identified with yacht construction. Herreshoff's car will be light in its weight and its purposes, and is intended to occupy a field "bearing the same relation to the big and expensive touring car as the light station wagon and high-bred horses bear to the heavy carriage pair and phaeton." Herreshoff hopes to make a car which will have merits quite its own and be characterized by the thoroughness and finish which invariably mark Herreshoff products. By no means the last word has been said in the matter of motor-cars, and probably it will not be until the cost of a light and serviceable machine shall be reduced to the point of rivalry with the cost of a horse and runabout. Edison, be it remembered, is still working with the idea of producing an electric machine at once lighter, cheaper, and better than anything now on the market.

The new arrangement with Japan under close scrutiny is found really to say nothing, to bind neither country to anything. At the same time it is not without value as a formal declaration of good-will between the two nations and as an assertion, by universal consent, of the right and purposes of Japan and the United States in the Pacific world. It is a fair implication of this treaty that domination of the Pacific is to be in the commercial rather than in the military sphere. If the United States shall have the wisdom to make proper arrangements, she may make the Pacific Ocean her own. But if she neglects her opportunity, the commercial master of the Pacific will be Japan. This is the whole situation in a nutshell.

The selection of Edward J. Stellwegen to manage the forthcoming inauguration is remarked as another evidence of the political liberality which has characterized Mr. Hitchcock's management of the Republican campaign. Mr. Stellwegen has always been rated as a Democrat, and in at least one of his campaigns as a supporter of Bryan. He is a business leader of the District of Columbia, however, and a man of great personal charm, who can be trusted to perform this great work creditably. Mr. Hitchcock himself served as secretary of the committee four years ago, thereby filling in the interim between the termination of the campaign and his assumption of the duties of First Assistant Postmaster-General. For the federal district the inauguration amounts to a quadriennial world's fair, evoking a surprising amount of local interest.

Rear-Admiral Capps, chief of construction in the navy, spoke at a banquet in Chicago a few days ago, tendered to Western alumni of the United States Naval Academy. He alluded briefly to the development of battleships and declared that the vessels of this country were fully abreast of the times. Six rear-admirals sat at the banquet board, and letters scathing recent critics and praising the navy were read from Admiral Dewey, Rear-Admiral Schley, and Rear-Admiral Evans.

Field Marshal Earl Roberts made a speech in the British House of Lords recently in the debate on the danger of the invasion of Great Britain which has been seriously discussed in Germany, but without comment of a disturbing nature. Berlin newspaper editorials treat the matter as an indication of Great Britain's irreconcilable hostility to Germany and as symptomatic of the prevailing gloominess of the international situation.

Winston Churchill, author of "Richard Carvel" and "Mr. Crewe's Career," is said to be favorably regarded by Mr. Taft as a possible minister to Spain or to Italy. Because Mr. Churchill is a graduate of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, the uninformed have taken it for granted that his ambition is towards the Navy Department. There is no good ground for this supposition. Mr. Churchill quit the navy when he left the academy.

Dr. Virgil C. Reynolds, American consul at Ceiba, Honduras, has resigned his position. His announcement was in the form of a cablegram which said, "I will not serve in a country governed by bandits. You have my resignation." Dr. Reynolds declares that an almost indescribable state of anarchy and misrule exists in Honduras.

SIX HUNDRED AND ONE.

By Jerome A. Hart.

XLIII.

When Arthur Alden descended from the stage-coach in front of the Palace Hotel at Gold Gulch, he looked around that squalid burg with an expression of distaste. It was the typical decaying mining camp. Here the original prospectors had found a rich gulch on the very edge of the desert. Out of alkali plains, low sand-dunes, and limestone cliffs rose the foothills which gradually grew into an ugly mountain range. The foot-hills were forbidding, the mountains were grim. On the limestone hills grew no trees, no grass; there was no undergrowth or brush to mask the harshness of their outlines. On the mountains was a scanty growth of greasewood, scrub, and chaparral. Under the pitiless sun the dull reds and browns and buff of the mineralized mountains made them seem to Alden unlike the mountains of other lands, with their myriad shades of green; these seemed to him like a scene-painter's nightmare. The talus at the base of the bald limestone cliffs lay in crumbling, dirty-white heaps, looking like gigantic cones of ashes. Running along the perpendicular faces of the mountains were horizontal lines extending for scores of miles as far as he could see, as he turned and looked from north to south. These were old water-lines—ancient beach-marks, showing the shore line when the desert on the edge of which he stood was once the bottom of an inland sea.

This forbidding country was fissured with deep ravines running up through the foothills till they melted into the mountains. These natural fissures were cross-seamed by the artificial gashes made by the miners. Here and there the neutral tints of the slopes suddenly turned into the raw red of the miner's cuttings or the duller red of the tailings washed out from their sluices. It had been a "dry diggings," and the skeleton line of a long flume ran thread-like along the mountains, at times spanning some deep ravine with a straddling walk like that of a spider or a "daddy long-legs."

Along the gulch or fissure running up from the desert into the foothills there stretched a line of shambling shacks. Into the bald, treeless landscape they fitted exactly. Many of them appeared to be bar-rooms, although most of them claimed the dignity of "hotels." They were all alike in point of architecture. Each had what some would call a veranda with a gallery above it and what others would call a "two-story porch." On the lower story of each porch were to be seen numerous loungers, all in chairs tilted backwards with their feet braced on the pillars supporting the upper story. Any guest desiring to walk along the porch was thus obliged to ramble in and out around the extended legs of the loungers. These gentry conversed in fitful flashes, their talk punctuated by long stretches of silence with languid exhortation interjected. Through the open doors of the bar-rooms nude pictures were plainly visible, at which passing children stared from the streets in goggle-eyed wonder. In the main street there was little sign of life except when the "pony express" flashed through, or a slight bustle betokened the arrival or departure of the valley stage.

As the coach drove up to the hotel, Alden expected to see the usual stage crowd awaiting their mild diurnal excitement. But the accustomed loungers were not there. Where they were was shown by the presence of a crowd further up the street. Sounds of feminine wailing came from the centre of the crowd, accompanied by roars of masculine laughter. In a few minutes the head of the procession appeared. It was a drabbed and weeping trollop who was being "chivareed" out of town. With noisy beating on pots, pans, and kettles, her cohorts accompanied her along her forlorn way. Bursts of burlesque sympathy came from the bystanders on the weed-grown plank sidewalks. The lady's loud lamentations would have moved Alden more had he not detected by her alcoholic intonations that she was intoxicated. A chorus of jeers came like an obligato from the loungers on the bar-room porches as the Magdalene made her melancholy way out of the town. It puzzled Alden to think what she could have done to affront the morals of Coarse Gold Gulch.

But that was no longer the town's title. This was emphatically in the post-placer days. The camp used to be called "Coarse Gold Gulch," but the first portion of the name had become so uncomfortably sarcastic that the denizens had dropped it; it was now occasionally called "Gold Gulch," but usually "The Gulch." There was very little gold dug there now. It was a "played-out camp." The great heaps of "tailings" left by the first miners were now being carefully washed over again by the patient Chinese. It is true a livelihood might thus be earned, but it was condemned by the porch loungers as beneath the dignity of the whites, as it meant only "grub wages." So sternly, in fact, did they look upon this derogation to white dignity that they had driven out of the camp some "Portygees" who had dared to undertake working over the tailings as the Chinese were doing. Incidentally, much innocent amusement had been derived in the performance of this high moral duty, by carrying ropes to the Portuguese camp and threatening them with hanging if they dared to return.

Some of these facts about the town were communicated to Alden by the hotel clerk, an affable individual who proposed to "shake him" for the drinks, and grew so much offended when Alden offered to treat instead of leaving it to the hazard of the dice that the newcomer was obliged to apologize. As Alden placed his name on the register he noted with a start that a line or two above appeared in a firm round hand the name of Eugene Yarrow.

"Is that gentleman still here?" he asked.

"Y-a-a-s," replied the clerk, stretching and yawning. "He's gone to look at a mine he claims he owns up the mountain a ways. Said he'd be back tonight." "A mine he claims!" exclaimed Arthur. "If he owns it, I should think there would be no doubt about the matter."

"There's a heap of doubt about mines and titles and claims up hyar, mister. There's so many lawyers and other fellers comin' up here lately lookin' at old locations that the boys hyar are gettin' some suspicious. They've begun to do a little locatin' themselves lately." "But most of these men from the Bay have bought and paid for the mines from the miners themselves."

"Can't help it, mister! It seems like they might have to buy some of 'em over again."

This did not augur well for the success of Alden's mission—nor Yarrow's either, for he knew that Yarrow's father owned, or thought he owned, valuable mineral lands up here. It was odd that they should happen to be in this little mining town together—odd also that in a few months their feelings should have so changed that each was indifferent to the other's presence there. While they had not quarreled, the two young men had come to feel that they were rivals for the affections of Diana Wayne, and their friendship had cooled. There was no open break, but they avoided each other when they met. Arthur now hoped that they would not meet, as such a meeting would only be embarrassing.

"To think," he mused, "that had we met in this little place a few months ago we would probably have been together all the time. Now if he sees my name on the register he will avoid me, as I shall him. If we meet, it will be with a distant nod. But we probably shall not meet at all." And with a sigh, he turned his thoughts from his former friend to the business he had come for.

Alden's business was the ejection of a band of miners who had "jumped" lands belonging to his clients, a mining company of Sacrosanto. His clients had purchased a number of worked-out claims, and held a valid title to the same. They had even purchased from miners who held no title, for to stop work on a placer claim constituted abandonment. His clients acquired the government title where the land nominally was government land, and had purchased from every claimant, whether claiming only a miner's right or to own the land in fee. Thus they had apparently acquired a clear title to the land, under which they believed there lay quantities of ore, rich but refractory, and capable of being worked only with elaborate mining and milling plants and at great expense. But when it came to be known in Gold Gulch that a rich mining company had been buying up some of the old placer claims, a rush ensued on the part of the miners. They immediately took up claims under the old placer mining laws, seized all the land in the suspected quarter, and began working in a sporadic way just enough to constitute "holding a claim" under the mining laws.

Alden asked the clerk which way lay the claims he had come to examine. That worthy told him, and added:

"Perhaps you've come to take up some of the old mining claims, mister?"

Alden replied indifferently that he had, and left the hotel. As he did so, he noticed the clerk making some mark or memorandum on the register.

He needed no guide—the town was small, and back of the single row of shanties on each side of the solitary street the sides of the gulch rose up steeply. He had a diagram of the land, but the contour of the country was so simple that the diagram was not needed to find the land. There was but one street in Gold Gulch, but one way into the town, but one way out, and when you were in the town you were out again before you knew it, the place was so small. Along the single street he walked, lined with its rough board shanties, with an occasional "Fashion Saloon" made of undressed planks, out of which raddled hurdy-gurdy girls stared at him, with their reserves at the back in the shape of Mexican musicians with harps, guitars, and fiddles. It was broad, garish daylight—it was not yet noon; and these painted women of the night looked inexpressibly out of place. But what could they do? Where could they go? The desert on one side, the bald mountains on the other. There was absolutely no place at Gold Gulch for them to go in their off hours, so they stayed at the saloon in the daytime, waiting for the night and the revelers to come.

When Alden reached the confines of the town he saw that another mining company had already got to work. They had a small plant up, and work was going on briskly. A tunnel was bored into the hill, and the rattle and roar of rock was heard at the end of the tunnel track as it slid down the dump to the little stamp-mill and the ore-house below. An ominous circumstance that he noted was the presence of armed guards lounging around with magazine rifles and belts full of cartridges. One of these stopped him, but the superintendent at once gave him the freedom of the place when he learned that Alden represented a company like his own. It was evident that the man craved for moral support, and that the environment was hostile.

"No wonder these miners around here are worked up over other men finding such rich ore deposits," said he, "but what do they expect? Why didn't they find the ore themselves? They've been here long enough."

Alden agreed with the superintendent. But he did not like the looks of the many miners he saw "holding down" claims on lands which belonged to his clients, and making a transparent pretense of working them. He made a cursory inspection of the ground, saw how shameless was the attempt to steal his clients' land under false pretenses, and returned to the town. There in the course of a few hours he had prepared and filed the necessary affidavits and other papers preliminary to ejecting the claim-jumpers.

That night, after he had gone to bed, Alden heard a loud rap on his door. He arose and opened it, but there was no one there. Lying on the threshold, however, he saw an envelope, which contained a folded sheet of paper. At its head was printed a triangle containing a human eye, with the legend "Vigilance." Beneath were the words:

"A. Alden, Attorney, etc.—

You are hereby ordered to leave Gold Gulch at once. If you are found here twenty-four hours after receipt of this notice, you will be arrested and tried by this tribunal. By order of 601."

"Six Hundred and One"—Alden remembered to have been told that this was the strange name appended by the Mountain Vigilantes to their sinister notices. At first he was inclined to smile, but it occurred to him that he had heard the Mountain Vigilantes were generally held in abject fear. Unlike those at the Bay, he had been told the character of the Vigilantes in the mining camps was open to suspicion; there were many gamblers, thieves, and thugs among them; the proportion of decent men was much lower than in the cities. He had been told that the Mountain Vigilance Committees were frequently used to accomplish private ends, such as individual ruin or revenge. Still he did not see how he could abandon his business because of an anonymous threat.

On the following day Alden made another inspection of the land his clients claimed. Evidently his steps toward legal possession had inspired dormant claimants, for the ground was now completely covered with miners, all of them engaged in ostentatious if useless labor. The activity of the claim-jumpers contrasted strongly with the lethargy of the court officials, whom Alden had vainly endeavored to incite to action. Gazing with annoyance on the busy scene, he turned, intending to make another attempt at accelerating the officers of the law.

He had gone not many rods when he was stealthily approached from behind, jerked to the ground with a lasso, and in a moment bound, blindfolded, and gagged. He was convinced that twenty or thirty miners must have witnessed the attack, but not a word was uttered. In this helpless condition he was carried some distance by several men, and when the gag and blindfold were removed, he found himself in a fairly large room furnished with plain chairs and tables, at which were seated some half-score of men.

"Prisoner," said the one who seemed to be the chief, "you have been brought before the bar of this court to answer to the charge of murdering Ezekiel Stewart, in the town of Treasure Hill, this county, on the night of the 22d of February of this year. What do you plead—are you guilty or not guilty?"

Alden looked up in surprise. "But I never was in Treasure Hill," he exclaimed, "and I never knew any man named Ezekiel Stewart."

"We have heard the testimony of a competent witness," went on the judge, "who swears that you had a quarrel with Stewart at the time and place mentioned; that you drew a pistol; that Stewart, being unarmed, turned to run; that you shot him in the back, killing him instantly; that you escaped, although the Vigilance Committee of Treasure Hill offered a reward of one thousand dollars for your apprehension. What say you, James Burdew?"

Alden stared at him with increasing wonder. "My name is not James Burdew, and I never was in Treasure Hill in my life. Besides, on the night of February 22d I was—well, I was elsewhere. My name is not Burdew, but Alden—Arthur Vernon Alden."

"If you are an honest man, it should be easy for you to prove where you were on the 22d of February, and what your true name is."

"I will show you papers which will prove my identity," said Alden eagerly. But he found that his pockets had been rifled during the scuffle.

"Is there no one here who can identify you as Alden, if that is your true name?"

The prisoner hesitated. "I know no one in this place," he said at last. Then, after a pause, he went on, reluctantly: "I believe there is one man here who knows me. I have not met him here, but his name is on the hotel register."

"What is his name?"

"Eugene Yarrow."

"Does he know you well enough to swear to your identity?"

"Yes," admitted Alden hesitatingly, "but I do not know whether he would come here in answer to a summons from me."

"He will come if we summon him," remarked the judge laconically, and turning to one of his aids he said: "Go and hunt up Eugene Yarrow—I think you'll find him at the new mining company's mill. Tell him to come here at once. If he is slow about it, tell him he's wanted by Six Hundred and One." And as the messenger hastened away the judge added: "That will bring him pretty quick."

Alden was still lost in wonder at the strange and terrible accusation made against him.

"Who is the witness that swears I committed this murder at a place I never saw?" he demanded.

"Call Strang," replied the judge by way of answer. In a moment there entered the room the man on whom his fate depended.

Alden looked at him closely. The witness was a hard-looking man with a tallowy, yellow face, and cold, cunning eyes. There was something faintly familiar about his face, but Alden could not remember where he had seen him. He ransacked his memory, but no clue came.

"Witness, do you identify this man?" inquired the judge.

"Yes," promptly replied Strang, "in Treasure Hill he was known as Jim Burdew. But lots of fellers there said he was an ex-convict, so he may have other names."

"And you identify him as the murderer of Ezekiel Stewart?"

"I saw the scrap begin. I saw him fire the shot and run. I saw Stewart fall, and helped pick him up."

"Then you are positive that this man is the murderer?"

"Certain sure," replied Strang, earnestly, "just as sure, judge, as that you're a-settin' there."

Alden gazed at the witness with a feeling of wonder mixed with anger. At first he thought the man might be honestly mistaken. But his speech and his manner were those of a man who was deliberately lying. Alden concluded that Strang had already been hired by the miners to entangle him in this mesh to get rid of him. But what did the Vigilantes mean to do? To hang him? His heart stopped beating for a second at the thought. Not on such flimsy testimony surely—it was incredible. To frighten him, perhaps—to drive him away, so that his attempt to gain possession of his clients' mines might be balked?—that seemed more probable.

Again he gazed at the man who was trying to swear his life away. Where had he seen that face? He could not recall. But stay—could he not remember Strang's hands?—those crooked, claw-like hands, the bony wrists, the gnarled and clutching fingers, the square spatulated thumbs? Where had he seen those hands? Was he the Vigilante who had led the flogging at the pier?

Alden gazed intently at the judge. He looked like a decent man. Could he and his fellow-Vigilantes be in league with this cold-blooded scoundrel, who was murdering an innocent man for hire? Could they be the creatures of the claim-jumping miners? Or were they deceived? Either supposition was difficult of belief. But if the latter was true, why should Strang's testimony outweigh that of Yarrow? That is, if Yarrow would testify. Alden felt a slight twinge of shame at even doubting whether Yarrow would testify. Still, he reflected, all that Yarrow could testify to would be Alden's identity, and not his whereabouts, while Strang would swear explicitly on both issues.

Yarrow, meanwhile, had been found at once by the messenger, and ordered to report before "Six Hundred and One." Lest he should be unduly alarmed, the messenger kindly informed him that he was summoned merely for purposes of identification.

"Who is to be identified?" Yarrow asked.

"Feller named Jim Burdew. He killed Zeke Stewart at Treasure Hill. Now he says his name's Arthur Alden, and that you kin identify him."

Alden arrestel, and before the Vigilantes! Yarrow heard this with mingled feelings. Surprise, alarm, indignation—and then a horrible thought entered his mind. Suppose he did not testify? or testified in a doubtful manner? He knew how merciless were these Mountain Vigilantes. He knew how speedy were their trials, how brief the time between the sentence and the rope. Suppose he denied definite knowledge of Alden's identity. How could he know his name was really Arthur Alden? They were merely casual acquaintances. How could he swear to a knowledge when it was merely a belief—a faint presumption? Suppose he swore that he thought the accused man was Arthur Alden, but that he did not know. Was not that the truth? And if he swore to the truth, and if the remorseless decrees of fate should remove from his path a rival, was it his fault? Was it not the fault of fate?

"Here we are!" said his guide, rapping at a door.

The sound seemed to waken Yarrow as from a hideous dream. With a shudder he dismissed the evil thoughts that obsessed him, and turned his attention to what was before him.

His salutation to Alden was grave and undemonstrative—both men seemed to think that this was not a time to make apparent either reconciliation or hostility.

He was sworn, and without further preamble, the judge began: "Do you know this man?" he asked of Yarrow.

"Yes, he is Arthur Alden, an attorney, well known down at the Bay and all through the valley."

"But we have a witness here who swears that this man's name is Burdew and that he murdered Zeke Stewart at Treasure Hill. The prisoner Burdew here claims to be named Alden, but he has no papers about him to prove what he says. Can you prove that he is Alden?"

"I can swear that his name is Alden—or at least that is what he is called by every one who knows him."

"Did you know him before he came to the Coast?"

Yarrow hesitated. "No," he was forced to admit.

"Well, then, how can you swear that his name is Alden, or that he was never called Burdew?"

Yarrow was forced to admit that he could not swear that the prisoner had always been called Alden.

"Well, if you've lived very long around here, you ought to know that men often change their names," said the judge to Yarrow. Turning to Alden, he added: "Your witness is not making much of a showing as to your identity. He only swears that he has known you a short time, during which you have called yourself Alden. Now, as to your whereabouts. Can he swear where you were on the night when Stewart was murdered at Treasure Hill?"

Alden shook his head. "We were not together," he said briefly. "He can not swear where I was."

"You see," said the judge, turning to his associate Vigilantes, "Strang swears that the prisoner is Burdew, and that he saw him shoot Stewart at Treasure Hill on the night of February 22d. This other man, Yarrow, only swears that he thinks the prisoner is named Alden, and he doesn't know where Alden was on that night." The other members of the Vigilante tribunal nodded significantly.

The eyes of Alden and Yarrow met. Like a flash there shot through Yarrow's mind the thought that he was doing the very thing which had thrust itself upon him and which he had dismissed with loathing—by his luke-warmness he was condemning Alden to a shameful death. But no—it was not his fault! What could he do? He determined to make an appeal for time.

"Gentlemen," he said earnestly to the Vigilante tribunal, "I am convinced in my soul that this man is really named Arthur Alden, that he was not in Treasure Hill on that date, and that he is innocent of this murder. I believe that I can prove all these things. Give me a little time. If you are honorable men, as I hope and believe, you surely would not send an innocent man to a shameful death without a little time in which to prepare his defense. Give me a few days—give me time enough at least to get word to the Bay, and I am confident I can clear him of this dreadful charge."

The judge conferred for some minutes with the other members of the tribunal. They seemed to waver. At last he spoke:

"The action of this court is usually sharp and quick. But there seems to be some uncertainty in the minds of my associates. Hence we have agreed to postpone final action in this case. We will give you two days' reprieve. But we warn you that the prisoner must either have proved that this is a case of mistaken identity or else have established an alibi by sunrise of the second day."

"That is to say, the day after tomorrow?" queried Yarrow anxiously.

"Exactly—that is Friday morning at sunrise. If by that time the prisoner has not clearly established his innocence, the judgment of this court will be duly carried out. In the meantime we will assume that you are counsel for the prisoner and will allow you access to him at all reasonable hours during the rest of his—during the next two days." With some parting directions to the Vigilante officers, the judge and his associates withdrew.

When Yarrow found himself locked up alone with Alden he made haste to learn all he could from the condemned man. There was no time to lose. The Vigilante judge was a higher type of man than he had expected to find, and seemed inclined to be fair; but his colleagues on the tribunal had low and brutal faces. No—if he was to save Alden, no time must be lost. So he made haste to learn all he could, and questioned the prisoner closely.

"If you can only prove where you were on February 22d, on the night of the murder," cried Yarrow, "that settles everything. Where were you?"

Alden hesitated, and was silent.

"Surely you can remember where you were on that day," persisted Yarrow; "it is easily identified because it is a holiday."

"I can not say," replied Alden.

"But certainly you were at Plancha Grande or thereabouts. You must remember that I left you there a little before. Were you at the Hacienda?"

"No."

"Then you were not at Plancha Grande," went on Yarrow musingly. And then, half to himself: "His silence is incomprehensible. He had been ill—I wonder if he could have had a relapse of the fever for a few days?"

Alden was silent.

"Could Captain Belmont swear to where you were?"

"No."

"Or Mrs. Lydon?"

"No."

Yarrow paused; then with an effort he said: "How about Miss Wayne?"

"I would not care to drag her into this," replied Alden doggedly. But despite his effort to maintain his self-control, it was evident to the eyes of Yarrow, made additionally keen by jealousy, that it was something more than Alden's love for Diana which so strongly moved him. From Alden's demeanor Yarrow became convinced that there was some secret between him and Diana; that Diana alone could tell where he was on the fatal night; and that for some reason Alden would not ask her to speak.

What was that reason? What could the secret be between these two that the man was unwilling to let the woman reveal where they were on a certain night? The hateful thought pierced Eugene's heart like an arrow, and when he strove to stifle it, the attempt felt like turning the barbed point in the wound.

Again the other suggestion lifted its snaky head. "How can I do anything for this man?" Yarrow asked himself. "He obstinately refuses to let me help him. He will tell me nothing of his movements on the day of the murder. He will not give me any clue as to any other person who could do so. Evidently one person—a woman—knows where he was. He will not admit this. He will not permit me to ask her. Why should I try to save him if he will make no effort? This is suicide—if he is bent on suicide, why should I save him? If I do what he is forcing me to do—that is, nothing at all—these Mountain Vigilantes will surely hang him. And when he is dead, then perhaps Diana—"

But the thought of her again made him stifle what was unworthy. He sighed, and said to himself, "I must get word to her. She is brave. If she loves him, she will save him at any risk—even the risk of her fair fame. But I shall not tell Alden what I am going to do."

Yarrow shook hands with Alden, and bade him be of good cheer.

"I will go to the telegraph office," were his parting words, "and set in motion all the wires I can. I will try to exercise all the influence possessed by your uncle, my father, their friends, and my own. Don't be discouraged. It will come out all right. Good-bye. I shall be back soon." And he hastened away.

But he soon found that it would not be easy to get news through by the telegraph, as he had hoped. The phlegmatic operator told him that the wires were down, and to Yarrow's question when the line would be working he replied: "Well, to tell you the truth, the wires are down more often than they're up. The Ute Indians around here think that the noises the wires make are 'bad medicine,' and they're all the time breaking the line."

"My God!" cried Yarrow startled, "is there no way then by which I can get word quickly down to the Bay, or at least to Sacrosanto? It is a matter of life and death!"

"Why don't you try the pony express?" said the operator startled out of his drawl by Yarrow's earnestness.

"When is the rider due?"

"At the postoffice half an hour from now."

Before the words had left the operator's lips Yarrow was on his way out.

At the postoffice he was told that this was only a horse-changing station—that few way-letters were taken at any stations, but none at all here; as the rate was five dollars an ounce, the correspondence from Gold Gulch would scarcely have paid for opening the bag and stopping the rider.

"Then how can I get the rider to take a letter so it will reach a person near Sacrosanto?"

"Fasten the letter to the saddle of his fresh pony," replied the postmaster, "put it inside of another envelope, addressed to the last rider on the Sacrosanto end, then put inside of the envelope whatever you like for the rider. He'll see that it's delivered."

"Would fifty dollars do?" asked Yarrow anxiously.

"Fifty dollars! Great snakes, yes! The riders only get that much a week for riding over the mountains and deserts, and past hostile Indians. So it's enough to deliver a letter. Have you the letter ready?"

"No."

"Better get to work quick. The westbound rider will be here in a very few minutes, and he doesn't stop long, I tell you!"

Yarrow hurriedly prepared a brief note to Diana, telling her of Alden's peril, his strange silence, and the hope that her testimony might establish an alibi. There was no time for phrase-making—he sealed this, and enclosed it in another envelope directed as the postmaster had advised.

"Are you ready?" he shouted. "Here they come!"

"They? Are there two?"

"East and west-bound riders," replied the postmaster briefly; "they meet here. See—here are the two fresh ponies waiting for them. Look off there."

Yarrow looked where he pointed. To the west, out on the desert, there was a little dust-cloud. To the east, dashing down a rough trail, he saw the rider who was to bear his missive.

"Shall I have a chance to say anything to him?"

"Hell, no—not here," replied the postmaster. "Where they change riders, yes—but not here. Here they only change ponies. The stations are about twenty-five miles apart, and the men are relieved at every three stations. But here they don't have much chance to pass the time of day."

As he spoke the two riders dashed in at either end of the long, rambling street. Like a flash they dismounted and vaulted into the saddles of the waiting ponies. The animals did not wait for whip or spur, but each was away before the rider had his foot in the off stirrup. They were come, they were gone, almost before Yarrow could say he saw them. And the only evidence of the relay was the sight of the two perspiring ponies, with drooping heads and heaving flanks, being led away to the stables.

"And you are sure my letter will get there all right?" queried Yarrow anxiously of the postmaster.

"Sure," he responded, "it will get there if the rider does. It might even get there if he didn't. For sometimes the ponies come in with an empty saddle covered with blood. And sometimes they come in with a dead rider clapping the pony's neck, as he stooped to dodge the arrows. But the letters nearly always get there, and I think yours will. You see we're only on the western edge of the Indian country."

"I hope to God it may!" fervently prayed Yarrow, as he turned away, "and that it may find Diana, for it carries a man's life."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

WILLIAM KEITH, ARTIST.

William Keith, acknowledged as one of the leaders among the best artists of Western America, was seventy years old on November the twenty-first, and in recognition of this and as an appropriate celebration, the members of the San Francisco Art Association arranged the special exhibit of his paintings which lasted a fortnight and which proved to be one of the most notable events of the year in local art circles.

Seventy pictures were shown—the number coinciding by chance with the years of the artist—of which about fifty were new and were exhibited for the first time.

General regret was expressed that among the other canvases might be found nothing of Keith's earlier work, for although they dated—according to the inevitable dividing line in San Francisco history—from "before the fire," none were painted more than ten years ago.

Hundreds of people visited the exhibit during the two weeks, for Keith's fame does not depend alone upon the praises of the cultured and discerning critics. He is beloved no more by the artist who can estimate to a fraction the value of every bold or delicate line, every touch of light or shade, than by the wayfaring man who knows nothing of art and can only respond to the touch laid upon his soul by the painter's skill.

Despite the success of the exhibit, however, there were certain features in connection with it which detracted in greater or less degree from the pictures. Insufficient wall space made it necessary to hang them in double lines both in the main exhibition room and the glass gallery of the Art Institute, and the result was a congestion—an embarrassment of riches which made it difficult to appreciate the individual values. Keith himself realized and regretted this, saying that there should have been only a single line. The lighting was bad also—cross lights and reflections proving disastrous in several instances in the exhibition room, while the strong southern glare coming through the windows of the glass gallery shone on the pictures there with such merciless intensity that one felt as though one sat among the footlights.

Save for two portraits, all of the seventy canvases were landscapes, and in almost every instance trees in an infinite variety.

George Wharton James has said: "Fra Lippo Lippi painted 'saints and saints' until he was sick to death of them. Keith paints trees and trees and then more trees, until every human being who sees them learns unconsciously, if not voluntarily, to love trees more than he ever did before."

Of the pictures in this exhibit, none brought forth more admiring comment than the five loaned by Dr. Harry L. Tevis—"The Woodland Pasture," "A Country Road," "When Storm Clouds Gather," "The Grazing Flock," and "The Forest Pool." These are somewhat similar in type, being of unusually dark, rich coloring with marvelous tints of skies and clouds. Keith, who considers this group among his most notable achievements, calls them the "gong pictures," and the tale he tells of their inspiration makes them doubly interesting.

Japanese and Chinese gongs are his delight and in his home in Berkeley he has a collection of them. Pausing before a beautiful antique bronze bowl about three feet high, placed on a pedestal, he said, "This gong was given me by Dr. Tevis and from the sound I painted those pictures for him. Listen now and you will hear the pictures." Striking the edge of the gong gently at first until all the air was filled with a murmuring sound, as though bees hummed on a summer day, he increased the force of the blows until the bowl gave out a barbaric clamor like the battle call of savage nations.

"Hear the pictures," he said in the midst of the tumult of sound. "There are dozens of pictures there—hundreds of them—wonderful pictures." This theory of Keith's that sound may be reproduced in color was explained by him a few years since to Professor Oswald of the University of Berlin, who received the idea with enthusiasm and has since written a book upon the subject.

Two other paintings in the exhibit which Keith says are among the best he has ever done were "The Enchanted Pool" and "The Portal of the Woods." Unfortunately, the first of these was hung in such a light that it was impossible to gain any idea of its beauty, the impression being merely of excrescences of queerly colored paint, but the other is a bit of exquisite woodland.

"Sunset in the Hayfield," a golden-tinted scene in which a group of children is playing; is another of the artist's favorites, as is also "Autumn Afternoon, Lagunitas," loaned by Mrs. Fisher Ames—a picture filled with a warmth of light and languorous feeling and by many artists pronounced one of the best shown.

Some one has said that there is no sign in Rudyard Kipling's writings that he has learned from his critics or made any concessions to his public's demands: that we must take things as they come from him, knowing protests are vain; that it is his mood, not yours, that he is interpreting in his writings.

And the same, only more mildly and more courteously, may be said of William Keith's paintings. He will tell you quite frankly that he paints to enjoy himself and that he paints what pleases him best when he works from an inspiration arising from within. His pictures he divides into objective and subjective work, and it is only the latter that he values.

"My subjective pictures," he said, "are the ones that come from the inside. I feel some emotion and I immediately paint a picture which expresses it. The sentiment is the only thing of real value in my pictures, and only a few people understand that. Suppose I want to paint something suggesting meditation or repose. If people do not feel that sensation when my work is completed, they do not appreciate nor realize the picture. The fact that they like it means nothing. Any one who can use paint and brushes can paint a true scene of nature—that is an objective picture. The artist must not depend on extraneous things. There is no reality in his art if he must depend on outside influences—it must come from within. I have really in a way a very limited clientele because so few people grasp this feeling of mine in regard to my pictures." Proof of his if you had that picture around all the time and saw it every day, you would grow to like it—you couldn't help it." This was a picture that he considers subjective.

"The Golden Hour" is a canvas in softer yellow tints which pleases alike the artist himself and the public. A flock of sheep are nibbling beneath brown-leaved oaks; in the background are distant hills, topped with creamy clouds, and over all is the rich golden light of the sunset hour.

Oaks are Keith's especial delight, and he rejoices in the fact that when he began to paint them more than thirty years ago, he was the pioneer and demonstrated their possibilities to the artists who have followed in his footsteps in depicting these trees.

Probably two of the best of his pictures of oaks exhibited were "The Quiet Woods," loaned by Mr. A. Chesebrough, and "Woodland Scene," loaned by Mr. William F. Herrin. In the first the trees are in the green shade of the deep woods, but the other shows a pleasing contrast of shadow and brilliant sunshine. But few mountain scenes were in the exhibit, but the first sale made was a large canvas, wrongly entitled in the catalogue "Streamside," the correct name being "In the Mountains of California." This shows a stretch of lofty mountains, partly covered with snow, and is a bit of scenery near the headwaters of the Merced.

Some views of the Hetch Hetchy which have been very recently completed met with little favor from critics or public, although the beauties of the valley were readily realized. The general criticism was that the coloring was too brilliant and a trifle crude, but it must be borne in mind that these pictures were unsuitably framed and were hung in the direct glare of the sunlight in the glass gallery. Keith is particularly fond of the Hetch Hetchy Valley and his indignation is great at the scheme to dam it and form a reservoir.

"It's nothing short of a crime to do such a thing," he declares, "and it's all nonsense to say the artificial lake will be as beautiful as the valley is now. God knows best, and if He had wanted a lake there He would have put it there Himself." The portraits were a quaintly graceful picture of Mrs. Reginald Knight Smith, loaned by her, and another, loaned by the Rev. Joseph Worcester, of an elderly woman looking up from her knitting with an air of shy dignity that is very lovable.

Keith but seldom turns his attention to portraits, but he has been working for some time on one of E. H. Harriman which is said by those who have seen it to be a wonderfully characteristic picture of the financier.

For ten days last summer the artist was entertained at the Harriman country place at Pelican Bay, and then made the studies for the portrait, as well as a number of sketches of the surrounding country to be developed for Mrs. Harriman. None of these were exhibited.

Nature has always been Keith's best teacher, he declares, and what he has achieved he considers has come largely from the inspiration gained by diligent study and hard work out of doors—among the trees and in the mountains.

Keith was born in Old Meldrum, Scotland, and came to America when he was about twelve years old. He was apprenticed to a wood engraver in New York and worked for some time on Harper's Weekly and Monthly. In 1859 he came to California, and when a few years later work as an engraver was difficult to secure, owing to the introduction of the photo-engraving process, he "went out of doors and tried to paint," to quote his own words. First he worked in black and white, then in water colors, selling his sketches readily and thereby earning a livelihood and saving enough to go abroad in 1869.

For a year and a half he studied in Dusseldorf and gained from the routine of the art schools the exact training, the lack of which had so hampered the expression of his genius.

Keith has given up water-colors entirely now and says he paints only in oils because he thus gets so much more satisfaction.

After Germany he went to Boston for a time, returning to California in the early '70s. Since then he has been to Europe twelve or thirteen times. Spain, France, Germany, Italy, and England—all of these lands have been visited and the work of the painters of each studied, but it is to California that he comes back always for his inspiration—that motive power within which produces his best pictures. Weeks and even months at a time he has spent in the high Sierras, feeling Keith gave later in discussing two pictures hung in the exhibit.

William Keith.

One of the largest canvases shown was loaned by Mr. F. W. Zeile and was a source of keenest pleasure to most of those visiting the exhibit. "There is a typical Keith. How fine it is," was the remark heard not once, but many times. "After the Storm" it is entitled, and it would seem that it is wonderfully presented. It is in deepest, richest greens—a "juicy" picture, as Keith is fond of saying—a forest scene of splendid oaks with heavy wet grass in the foreground and a bit of muddy, deeply rutted road. The sky is filled with piled-up masses of clouds from pearly white to darkest gray, with glimpses between of stormy, deep blue sky. The popular admiration for the picture was received by the artist, however, with something amounting almost to contempt.

"That's a good picture, yes," he said, "but it's objective—entirely objective. Most any one could paint it as well as I did if he knew anything about how to work. It's good, but there's no inspiration in it."

The other was "The Sun Worshipers," three vaguely outlined figures in the heart of a wood, facing the setting sun in attitudes of adoration—the whole done in the deep brownish orange tints that seem to please Keith of late years and which are to be found in so many of his paintings.

Not all of his admirers, even the most ardent ones, share his enjoyment of this peculiar coloring, but he demonstrates persistently that, like Kipling, he is portraying his own moods and not yours.

"You don't like that picture?" he asked. "Well, I don't care, it's good anyway—it's a 'crackjack.' You say it's irritating, and that proves it is good because it made an impression. If it didn't arouse any feeling in you at all, it would be worthless. And I'll tell you, studying their beauties in minutest detail. Now he knows the meadows; the mountains, green or snow-clad; the trees; the rocks, even the atmosphere, so thoroughly that he can sit in his studio in the heart of the city and paint a picture that will make your heart and mind after one little glimpse fly in mad revolt away from reinforced concrete, sheath gowns, electrical appliances, and all the other things that seem for the moment the abominations of civilization.

John Muir, whose wonderful word paintings of the California mountains have done no less to bring them before one than Keith's pictures, is an intimate friend of the artist, and together they have explored the wildernesses for many years. Keith, in speaking of their trips, said: "Muir is a delightful companion to go off with—agreeable, appreciating beauty thoroughly and all that, but I must say he is a mighty poor provider. Doesn't think much about it, you know, and goes off forgetting half the things he ought to take. Sometimes when I've been away with him for three weeks without any sugar the whole time, I feel that I'll never go on another trip with him—but I generally do, just the same."

Despite his seventy years, Keith gives no impression of great age. In appearance he seems ten years less, at least, and his work and conversation convince you that he is in the prime of life. In manner he is so modest and unassuming and so simply direct that one feels that his genius is great enough to lift him above the petty things of life. Strangely enough, he uses no technical terms in speaking of his pictures—there are no painters' phrases to confuse the layman's mind. In fact, he will tell you, "I can't talk about my pictures; I just paint them, that's all. I don't know much about colors. I just fool along and enjoy myself."

He paints indefatigably and declares it is solely because he finds pleasure in it. "I'm just having fun," he will tell you. "I've been at it so long it isn't hard any more. I used to fumble around, trying to do things, but now I know how and I must do them. It keeps me busy and happy." He is at the present time doing almost two days' work in every one. Each morning he comes to his San Francisco studio and paints for three hours, returning to his Berkeley home in time for luncheon. Afterwards he works there for two or three hours more, going out whenever the weather permits for a walk about four o'clock, accompanied by his two devoted dogs, who are like twin shadows. He works with wonderful rapidity and his studios are both crowded with canvases, either partially or entirely completed.

When asked how long it took him to paint a certain picture, he answered with the quaint whimsicality of manner he sometimes shows: "Oh, about forty years. That is, I put it on canvas in a pretty short time, but it is, as a finished picture, the result of about forty years' work." And that may be said to be typical of his ideas. He regards his pictures as a faithful priest might his parishioners. The externals of flesh and blood and mannerism or of canvas and paint are but outward and necessary adjuncts, and the real interest centres in the "inward grace" of soul or inspiration.

As if to supply a want before it exists, Paris is already supplied with a roof station for aeroplanes in the very centre of the city. The house is situated at the corner of the Boulevard Bonne Nouvelle and belongs to a wealthy architect, M. Morin, who has taken time by the forelock. No flying machines are, of course, in the habit of landing on the top of this six-story house as yet, but the tenants are warned beforehand by a clause in their lease that they will not be entitled to any compensation, if, in the near future, the roof is used as a station or garage for "aerial vehicles." Meanwhile the tenants are entitled to the use of the "terrace" as a roof garden.

The retirement of President Eliot of Harvard has given the trustees of the Carnegie foundation for aged college workers an opportunity to emphasize that its pensioners are not the recipients of charity. Dr. Eliot has been promptly voted the highest annuity possible under the rules, and in this action Dr. Eliot promptly acquiesced, although the compensation he has received during his long service has lifted him above the risk of indigence in his old age. It is probable that one of the motives influencing Dr. Eliot in becoming a pensioner was a desire to set an example that might release other pensioners of all thought of shame.

A TEXT FROM MENCIOUS.

By Edwin H. Clough.

Four years at Yale in law, civil government, and a smattering of political economy had sufficiently venerated the Oriental understanding of Tuan Peng Tsun with "Western learning" to make him a very capable secretary under his very indulgent uncle, the viceroy of the Kiang Nan provinces. I say that the uncle of Tuan Peng Tsun was "indulgent" because, recognizing the peculiar abilities of his nephew, he had taken the precaution to provide the young man with a superior secretary, instead of inducting him immediately into an office that commanded personal observation from the powers at Peking. Such scrutiny might be favorable, but unless it was favorable it was certain to be permanently fatal, and the uncle of Tuan was not so sure of the stability of the "reform" movement at the court of the emperor that he would risk jeopardizing the future of his brother's son by bringing him too prominently into view of the dowager. A first secretary, therefore, served as a temporary buffer between the intrigue of the Yellow Palace and a relative of a high official whose position had been originally acquired by bribery and could only be maintained by judicious distribution of the provincial "squeeze" among those who bought the favor of the eunuch Li, high chamberlain of her imperial majesty.

Moreover, the wise old politician could not be sure that his nephew was himself stable enough after the Chinese fashion to breast the eddies and currents of Chinese politics. It was not with entire satisfaction that the viceroy had heard of Tuan's button-bedecked mortar board at the American institution of learning; nor did he wholly approve of Yale "colors" as an additional adornment upon his official costume on state occasions. The old gentleman, punctiliously conservative, saw no necessity for ostentatiously announcing to unappreciative barbarians that the wearer of the button was a third rank mandarin; nor could he reconcile himself absolutely to the equally ostentatious display of insignia that could convey no meaning to Chinese eyes unless its purpose was explained to be allegiance to something entirely foreign to Chinese ideas. The button and the ribbons seemed to smack of a dangerous vanity, however innocent, intrinsically, it might be. The old viceroy had known heads to fall on slighter pretext than the color of a button or the hue of a silken ribbon.

Tuan was, apparently, indifferent to all opinion except that which he might himself utter. At twenty-six a Chinese of good family who could inscribe "Chuang Yuan" or "Senior Wrangler" over the door of his hall in proof that he had successively gained the degrees of hsiu-ts'ai, ling-sheng, and kung-sheng, is, perhaps, justified in arrogating to himself the right to disregard the opinion of other people not so familiar with the Four Books, the Five Classics, and the Sacred Edicts of the Emperor Yung Cheng. When a young Chinese can write an essay in the "eight-legged examination character," it is not for less learned mortals to guide him in the way he should go. But on top of all this learning, painfully or deftly acquired, Tuan had won a foreign degree that entitled him to look down from a still higher altitude upon the struggling scholars of the triennial examinations, some of whom were old enough to grandfather him twice over.

In truth the only person that really counted with this Admirable Crichton of two widely differing schools was Harry Gardner, second assistant to the commissioner of imperial customs at Nanking. Tuan had known Gardner in New Haven in the latter's junior year, and the blasé Chinese "special student" had liked the volatile, uncertain, restless youngster. It was on the advice of Tuan that Gardner "took up" the study of the Manchu dialect, and when he had somewhat mastered the "four tones" it was Tuan, again, who advised the young fellow to forsake his alma mater as an undergraduate and accompany him "on a trip" to China. It was with little regret that Gardner left behind him the possibility of a bachelor's degree, and it was with positive joy that he listened to the golden-tongued Tuan depicting the probabilities of a career in the Far East. Of course Tuan would help him; and that would be no mean advantage from the nephew of a viceroy ruling three provinces and with a strong pull at court. So it happened that these two were together in the ancient city of the Mings, the one wearing a peacock feather in safe service at the yamen of a cautious old fox who happened to be his uncle, and the other by the grace of Sir Robert Hart a member of the "indoor staff" of the "maritime." Tuan was unquestionably sincere in his determination to use his influence in the advancement of his friend from the customs to the diplomatic service, and Gardner had full faith in the intention and ability of the second secretary. But before he had been in China six months he had learned many queer things, among which was the fact that unless a Chinese politician is rich enough to buy what he wants, or shrewd enough to pay for what he wants out of the pockets of other men, he is as the tablets in the temple of his ancestors—something to be revered and something to be smothered with incense, but otherwise harmless for good or ill. Everything, it was clear, depended on the viceroy's "pull" at Peking; and this pull in turn depended on the old gentleman's ability to meet the demand for the official "squeeze." It might happen, Harry thought, that the demand would become too insistent or too voluminous and that the uncle of Tuan would finally (or at any moment) be compelled to "let go." Bereft of that uncle, what would be the fortune of the nephew? Harry's gift of prophecy was not far-seeing enough to guess what would happen to his own patron if the source of the patron's "influence" were suddenly cut off.

So matters stood when Mary Griffin came down the great Yang River from the Methodist mission at Hankow. The Rev. Hiram Griffin and his wife had been Methodist missionaries in China fifteen years. Mary was only three years old when her parents elected to toil in this corner of the vineyard, and she had never known an environment other than that in which she had been reared since she was brought to China. Old-fashioned folk were Dr. Griffin and his wife; earnest in their faith, sincere in their endeavor, devoted to their cult and their vocation. They had brought their daughter up in the old-fashioned way of her old-fashioned forbears, and hitherto pretty blue-eyed, golden-haired Mary Griffin had honored her father and mother in accordance with the precept of her religion. As for her destiny marriage-wise, that had been decided irrevocably in family council, behind the parental curtains, long since—Mary should be the wife of some congenial Methodist young man, some eligible missionary of suitable age and good prospects, preferably, of course, a sinologue mastering the roots and radicals of the Chinese language for the greater glory of the mission service generally and the doctrines of the immortal Wesley particularly. And until the Griffins came to Nanking all had gone as had been ordained. Apparently an obedient daughter awaited the choice of loving and judicious parents, heart-free to accept at parental valuation any husband so winnowed from the tares and wheat of the vineyard. Twice had Mary voyaged from Hankow to Shanghai, and once she had crossed the Yellow Sea to Japan, meeting on these excursions many young men, some of them fully eligible from the strictest missionary standpoint and some of them secular and rather inclined to scoff at missionaries and therefore not at all eligible in the view of Dr. Griffin and his wife. But never, at consulate, informal tiffin, afternoon tea, or within the cloisteral purlieus of the mission houses, had Mary Griffin shown other than the demurest interest in young men, Methodist or otherwise, abounding with grace or of the world worldly.

"Rather a nice girl," remarked Harry Gardner to the second secretary over the after-tiffin pipe in Harry's bungalow. The comment was somewhat irrelevant, although they had been reviewing the events of the previous evening at the consulate reception to Dr. Griffin, and had decided that the addition of Miss Mary Griffin to the Nanking colony would be an acceptable acquisition in the way of women, a social adjunct somewhat lacking since the departure of the American consul's two lively daughters on their annual hegira to the lower coast and the flight of the commissioner's family to the cooler climate of the Japanese watering-places.

"I have always believed in what you foreign devils call 'love at sight,'" Tuan answered, poking the tobacco in his briar and looking at his companion out of the lower corner of his eye. "A very nice girl, Harry, but I wouldn't encourage that sort of thing if I were you. The commissioner wouldn't mind letting you off for a month or so at this season—you haven't had a vacation for eight or nine months and there's nothing much doing just now. I'd advise you to go up the river to the Gorges; I hear the pheasants are flying near Ichang."

"Stop chaffing, Tuan," Harry retorted. "I'm not in love with the little Puritan; and besides, when she hears what the conventicle thinks of me, she'd as soon kowtow to old Bud as return my bow on the maloo."

"Maskee the lady," Tuan returned gravely. "Woman is a negligible quantity when she is in love with a man—it isn't the girl that will object, Harry; it's the patriarch of the Griffins who will say 'get thee behind.'"

"You're a wise lama, Tuan," said Harry with a laugh; "tell me how I may reach the beard of the patriarch."

"Follow the precept of Mencius."

"Which one, oh learned scholar?"

"That which the most eminent disciple of the Sage of Lu propounded for the edification of King Hwuy of Leang. Listen. I translate from memory of the First Book as arranged by Chau K'e, that perfect mirror of commentators: 'Your majesty greatly desires to enlarge your territories, to have Ts'in and Ts'oo coming to your court to rule the Middle States, and to attract to you the barbarous tribes that surround them. But to do what you do (give heed, you unlearned Western barbarian)—to do what you do in order to seek for what you desire is like climbing a tree to seek for fish.'"

Gardner arose, drew himself to his height, placed his heels together with audible emphasis, and in mock deference to incomparable wisdom, gave the Chinese obeisance thrice. Having performed this rite he clapped his hands and to the "boy" who responded gave the order:

"Whisky and soda; plenty ice; chop chop." Then he sat down and softly whistled the chorus bars of "A Man There Was in Our Town." No word was spoken until the liquor had been brought and drank. Then Tuan resumed:

"I had intended," he said, "that you should some day attain to the lucrative if somewhat ticklish post of foreign adviser to my honorable uncle; and in due course I should have made it possible for you to achieve distinction by a matrimonial alliance with the noble family of Ching, late ambassador to France, now a very harmless member of the Wai Wu Pu; who as you know is the sire of two exceedingly handsome daughters, born and reared in Paris, educated in France and themselves half French. But now I wish my hands of you in that matter and devote myself to you as a mere friend. Proceed with your conquest of the little missionary and I will answer for her father's consent in spite of your disfavor at the mission on account of your heresies, your agnosticism, your rank infidelity, your atheism and your ribald jesting at missionaries in and out of season, to their faces and behind their backs."

"But, my dear Tuan," Harry protested, "I am not in love with the girl and have no intention of courting her."

"I hear you, my friend," answered the secretary in an indifferent tone; "therefore I repeat that you shall win the girl with my help. I propose to climb the tree while you seek your fish, and I promise that in the words of the Sage uttered for the guidance of King Hwuy, you shall have no subsequent calamity. Good-bye, Harry; I hear my official duties calling from my reverend uncle's yamen. I must go. Remember, my friend, what I have said—you shall do what you do according to the gospel of Mencius; and the fish can not escape." Saying which the secretary went away and Harry Gardner strolled over to the German consulate to play tennis with the Frau Gierstacher and Miss Campbell, the first assistant commissioner's old maid niece.

No brand of the burning could have been offered for more eager plucking than was vouchsafed when Secretary Tuan of the viceregal yamen announced to Dr. Griffin after a long expository disquisition in the Kiang Nan dialect, delivered as a prelude to the regular Sunday morning service in the mission chapel, that he would like to "go deeper" into the "metaphysical, or spiritual exegesis of the subject."

"I know your theology fairly well," Tuan continued. "Perhaps you know that I was four years at Yale and necessarily more or less in contact with the Congregational denomination of the Protestant Christian Church. I am passingly familiar with the philosophy of your religion; and if I am not too intrusive I would ask you to instruct me in the more intimate faith of your propaganda."

Tuan's ironical pedantry imposed on the simplicity of good old Dr. Griffin. He had been too busy sowing his gospel seed in barren places to observe minutely the ways of other men in that vast field, rank with the weeds of pagan philosophy and overgrown with tendrils and creepers to tangle the feet of those who attempted to thread the vague and tortuous paths of that ancient wilderness. There was only joy in the old man's heart that the opportunity had come at last for the realization of a lifelong dream—a belated glimmer of hope that he might procure for his sect a convert from the Chinese nobility who would carry the glad tidings of Christianity to the literati and the conservative classes of the Chinese aristocracy. For years he had sweated and toiled to gather the coolie to the fold of Methodism, forced to endure the scarcely veiled contempt and the courteous contumely of the intellectual masses annually vomited from the examination halls of the Middle Kingdom. Gladly, therefore, he received this representative of the literary and political force that governs the empire, convinced at once of the novitiate's sincerity by the circumstance that he had studied in the Western schools and was, therefore, conversant with the fundamental truths of Christian teachings.

The conversion of the secretary kept pace with the wooing of his co-conspirator. As Tuan had predicted, opposition to the suit of Harry Gardner was wholly from the parents of Mary Griffin—the girl was finally as eager as her ardent and insistent lover to bring their affair to an issue. But both were aware of the utter futility of an appeal to Dr. and Mrs. Griffin. As they had expected, the very first onslaught upon the parental citadel had been repulsed with slaughter; Harry's second visit to the mission had been rebuffed with a polite intimation that until he could convince Dr. Griffin that he was no longer what he had been—a scoffer, a jester upon things sacred, an unbeliever openly antagonistic to the God of his fathers—he could not be received on terms of social or friendly intimacy at the mission. Perhaps it would have been easy to deceive the missionaries, but Harry revolted at such duplicity and his adviser, Tuan, counseled him to a more honest course.

"I will climb the tree," he declared; "you catch the fish. It's Mencius versus Wesley, and I think it will be a nonsuit for Wesley."

All the world loves a lover and all the consulates, all the official residences, of Nanking afforded havens of clandestine refuge for these lovers. All the foreign colony of the city except the "missionary set" knew what was occurring, and all approved "the match."

Six months went by and Tuan, having served a satisfactory "probation," was about to be received into the church over which Dr. Griffin sat. The time had arrived when the final test of strength should be applied in the struggle between Mencius and Wesley. On the day preceding the one appointed by Tuan for bringing the plot to a dramatic climax, the secretary told Harry that all was favorable to a successful issue of their plans.

"Provided, only, that Miss Griffin will do as I say without question," he admonished. "It is not essential that you should know what I intend to do; and it will be only necessary for Miss Griffin to speak three words that I will dictate to her." Harry demurred somewhat to this programme, but he was compelled to yield when Tuan told him that he could battle for the prize in his own way if he wished; but, deprived of the secretary's aid he must know that the only alternative to a complete surrender of his "liberty of conscience" would be an elopement with his sweetheart—a dilemma horned with disaster both ways.

On the following day Harry Gardner sat on the veranda of his bungalow trying to overcome his nervous impatience by nibbling at his tiffin. Tuan had informed him that about this time he would be sent absorbed in a far-away contemplation of an intricate tapestry on the opposite wall. Dr. Griffin waited impatiently. He was stern but obviously much discomposed.

"Dr. Griffin," Harry began, "that I love your daughter I will not deny; and that I have told her so is also true. It is as you have heard concerning our meetings; but I was not permitted to call on her at her home, and if we met at the houses of other persons it was chiefly because we could not meet in the house of her parents."

"You know why we refused to receive you," Dr. Gardner answered. "You are not only not a Christian, but you are directly in opposition to the teachings of Christianity."

"I think, Dr. Griffin," Harry expostulated, "that you have misconstrued my attitude towards the Christian religion. It is true that I have uttered my disbelief in some of the doctrines and dogma of professing Christians—to be candid with you, I may on occasion have ridiculed those tenets; but I assure you that I have never disputed the basic truths of your religion, and I think that I could, in argument, convince you that I have as deep respect, if not as profound reverence, for the truths of the Christian religion as you have yourself."

Dr. Griffin turned suddenly to his daughter. "Mary," he said; "you desire to receive the attentions of this young man as a suitor for your hand in marriage?"

"I do," murmured the girl, bending her head still lower.

"Well, mother," he continued, addressing his wife; "I see no other way. Shall it be as they wish?"

"I only desire that Mary shall be happy," was the mother's answer; and instantly the daughter was sobbing on her mother's breast.

Turning once more to Harry, Dr. Griffin extended his hand. "Mr. Gardner," he said, "let us try to be friends. Mary has made her choice and I am sure she will abide by it. Mrs. Griffin expresses my own thought in the desire for the happiness of our daughter. As for yourself, I may have been misled or mistaken concerning your real attitude towards our religious belief and the purpose and profit of our missionary labors. I hope I have been. We shall see. You may call on Mary hereafter at her home. The future will determine its own result. Mr. Tuan—"

He turned to the place where the secretary had been seated, but that uncertain young man had disappeared in the confusion of the swift reconciliation, having, with characteristic precaution, posted himself close to one of the half-open French windows, through which access to the porch overlooking the compound was easy.

With some embarrassment, but happy beyond all words, Harry soon after took his leave and sought the subtle Tuan where he knew he would be.

Over a tiffin of unusual variety and almost sumptuous quality Tuan recited the story of his "campaign in the country of dragons" as he called it.

"I climbed the tree as advised by Mencius," he said; "and from that height I looked down on the situation. I found Dr. Griffin more than willing to receive me, and after many intricate discussions which you would not take the trouble to understand, but which amused me immensely, I finally compelled him to an explicit agreement that I, a Chinaman, was, if also a Christian, in every respect the equal of a Griffin or any of his race-mixed and race-mixing lineage. At first, of course, he tried to get away from me by putting my soul on an equality with the soul of the Saxon white man, but I was too wily for that sophistry, and gradually brought him to an acknowledgment that if my soul was white the color of my face didn't matter. I learned that sort of logic at Yale, where there is no prejudice against my people. Having firmly entrenched myself on that basis of personal and racial equality, the rest was easy and natural. On my part, after I had fully mastered all the requirements of the Methodist faith I would immediately take up the work of spreading the Methodist propaganda among the literati and the members of my social order. Then, when the mine was laid, the match lighted, and the time appointed, I set her off. I put it to him point-blank: If I was worthy to be saved by the Christian missionaries, and if my white soul redeemed the taint of my yellow skin, I was worthy to aspire to the hand of a daughter of the missionary who had taught me these for in haste. He was waiting for the messenger, wondering, worrying and dipping desperately but without appetite into a dish of curry, constantly tempted to reach for the brandy and soda, but sternly resisting in obedience to the express and oft-repeated commands of Tuan, who had adjured him as he hoped for success in his love quest to "keep his breath free of the mocker's fumes and his lips unsullied by the kiss of the adder."

The tingchai came at last. "Two piece man two piece woman say you come my side Joss house chop chop," was the message, and Harry was down the front steps and out into the road almost before the coolie had ceased speaking. Arrived at the mission residence of Dr. Griffin, he was ushered into the presence of the pastor, his wife, his daughter, and Tuan. Dr. Griffin lost no time in announcing the purpose of this sudden call:

"Mr. Gardner," he said, his voice trembling with suppressed emotion; "Mrs. Griffin and myself have been for some time aware that you have been paying court to our daughter. Only recently, however, within the hour, in truth, have we learned that you have been meeting her in various places away from her home, and that everybody in Nanking, except ourselves, is cognizant of this fact. We have called you to our presence to hear what you have to say in defense of such conduct."

Harry looked round on the company. His first glance was at Mary Griffin; her eyes were downcast and her face flushed. He looked at Mrs. Griffin and that lady returned his gaze steadily, inquiringly, and not unkindly. Then he looked at Tuan. That subtle diplomat was apparently unconscious of his surroundings, things and honestly lifted me to his own plane of being. I could see that the old gentleman was stumped, but he had to come to the scratch or let Satan mock him unrebuked. I must say that he was game. He recovered from the shock like the grand old warrior that he is, and tacitly accepted me as a prospective son-in-law on condition that his daughter should be of the same mind. I can forgive him the small hypocrisy of that subterfuge, Harry—because you were my rival for the hand of the daughter. You understand me, of course; if he had been genuine in his belief that a yellow man is as good as a white man, he would have tried to argue his daughter into his own belief; as it was he was not quite genuine, so he left the decision to the daughter—quite Mencian, you will say, in the matter of indirection. Well, I consented, somewhat reluctantly, to be sure, for I had imbibed a fool idea from our arguments and discussions on Christian duties, that children should be absolutely obedient to their parents—as they are in pagan China. However, all went well in your interest, for, with your consent, I had coached the girl, and when she was asked in full family council if she would take me, a Chinese convert to the religion of her parents, as a suitor to be her husband according to the most binding Christian rites, she sobbed out, 'If I can't have Harry I'll take anybody—one's as good as another, and, next to Harry, Tuan is the best I know.' I had to get that in, Harry, to save my own face—you'll forgive me, I know. Then we had to make a clean breast of it all; how you had been courting the girl for months behind the lattice of consulates and in all the tennis courts of Nanking. It was a double cross on the missionaries and it was irresistible. 'It was better than a play, Harry—and our Chinese comedy is full of just such situations; really, my friend, you ought to pay more attention to our drama; it's not only amusing when it's not stupid, but it's instructive. And you ought to take up a long course in Mencius—I fear that you will need a lot of that very practical philosophy after you are married to the little girl I hooked for you from the branches of my tree of knowledge.'

The Mirage.

As an Arah journeyeth
Through a sand of Ayaman,
Lean Thirst, lolling its cracked tongue,
Lagging by his side along:
And a rusty-winged Death
Grating its low flight before,
Casting ribbed shadows o'er
The blank desert, blank and tan:
He lifts his hap toward where the morning's roots are His weary stare—
Sees, although they plashless mutes are,
Set in a silver air
Fountains of gelid shoots are,
Making the daylight fairest fair;
Sees the palm and tamarind
Tangle the tresses of a phantom wind—
A sight like innocence when one has sinned!
A green and maiden freshness smiling there,
While with unblinking glare
The tawny-hided desert crouches watching her.

The Closing Year.

Faster than petals fall on windy days
From ruined roses,
Hope after hope falls fluttering, and decays
Ere the year closes.

For little hopes, that open hut to die,
And little pleasures
Divide the long sad year that labors by
Into short measures.

Yet, let them go! our day-lived hopes are not
The life we cherish;
Love lives, till disappointments are forgot,
And sorrows perish.

On withered boughs, where still the old leaf clings,
New leaves come never;
And in the heart, where hope hangs faded, springs
No new endeavor.

To My Ring.

So go, fair emerald; my loving message take
To her who has my heart, and rest thou well content
That henceforth thou art hers to whom I have thee sent;
Thy purity her hand will only purer make.
Be with her if she sleep; he with her if she wake;
She'll ask thee oft of me and what thy message meant.
Be thou like other gems; within thy brightness pent,
Keep what thou seest hid, for her and my sweet sake.
And if it come to pass that she, in thoughts half lost,
Should press her lips to thee, then save the kisses for me
Until the evening come. Unless the zephyrs see
The imprint of her kiss, and, enviously crossed,
Demand to bring it me, ere I to claim it go,
Then send it me by them, and let no mortal know.

It was reported a short time ago, in a press dispatch, that a passenger had been killed in a train accident on the Missouri, Kansas, and Texas Railway. The management of the "Katy" immediately denied the correctness of the report, and stated that there never had been a passenger killed on its lines. This statement was true. During the forty years that this road has been in operation no traveler has met death upon one of its trains through a train accident.

The Austrian government is spending for improvements on a stretch of the Danube 180 miles long, between Vienna and Passau, the sum of $40,000,000. That stretch is some fifty miles less than the distance between St. Paul and Dubuque. Yet the sum appropriated is twenty times as great as that voted by Congress some two years ago for the improvement of the whole 500-mile stretch of the Upper Mississippi—$500,000 a year for four years.

THE JOY OF THE FOX HUNT.

"Piccadilly" Shows How Rural England Makes the Best of the Only Sporting Animal Left.

Fox hunting is a sport almost exclusively British, and the American is sometimes a little puzzled to understand the charm of amusement that differs somewhat from his ideas of hunting and that carries with it no risk beyond the chance of a fall. We all remember the story of the fox-hunting squire who tried to explain to the puzzled American girl the delights of his favorite amusement. "But do I understand," she asked, after a voluble description, "that you chase the poor animal round and round the island?" at the same time describing a circle with her finger upon the tablecloth. Equally delightful was the exploit of the inimitable Brigadier Gerard, who tells us how he joined in the fox-hunt between the hostile lines of the British and French armies in Spain, finally succeeding in overtaking the fox and cutting off his head with one blow of that terrible sabre. Brigadier Gerard returned to his own side followed, as he supposed, by the admiring cheers of the hunters that were actually shouts of execration at an act of vandalism. The Frenchman can not understand the fox-hunt; in fact, no one can understand it except those who are born into its heritage of delight.

It seems to be an expensive amusement, if we may

This sum is about $175 for the season, basing the estimate on figures actually drawn from a personal experience. "Being on leave from India," he says, "I bought three Irish horses. For one I paid $375, for the other two $200 apiece. I hunted them hard for a season in a first-rate provincial country. One horse, the most costly, was lamed for a time by an injury and slightly blemished. In March, on the expiration of my leave, I sold the horses, which had cost:

Paid for three horses.....	$775.00
Railway fares	50.00
Veterinary and sale expenses.....	25.00
	$850.00
Less proceeds of sale at Tattersall's.....	325.00
	$525.00

or $175 loss on each horse, and I think, looking back over many seasons, that this is a fair estimate of the cost in horseflesh of mounting one's self if economy is to be studied. Thus the total keep of the horse comes roughly to $150 for the season, and we shall pay $175 for the use of the horse in the hunting field, making a total of $325 for the five months."

Now we come to the contribution to the hunt. Some years ago it might have been said that a man who keeps one horse would have discharged his obligation to the hunt by sending five guineas to the secretary. But the cost of hunting a country has almost doubled judge from the fact that it costs $2000 to catch each fox. But a writer in the London Daily Mail assures us that it is by no means so costly as it seems.

The subscribers to foxhounds are in a great majority men of very moderate means indeed. Any one can test the truth of this by examining the balance-sheet of a hunt. Except in a few favored or fashionable hunts, the great majority are those who pay $50 or even less to the funds of the hunt.

First and foremost, there is the keep of the horse. A resident in the country, with a stable and paddock to his house, can keep a horse for a comparatively small sum. The cost of feeding and grooming one horse for a period of five months of four weeks each is about as follows:

Best old oats.....	$35.00
Ton of old hay.....	22.50
Bedding straw or peat.....	7.50
Bran and sundries.....	12.00
Shoeing.....	5.00
Wages of lad or proportion of groom- gardener's wages	60.00
	$144.00

Thus we may say that $150 will keep the horse for the season, provided the master keeps a careful eye on everything. If he is not prepared to do this at least $35 must be added to the wages. However, in practice, if a lad or groom-gardener is fairly intelligent he can easily be taught everything that need be known.

The next point to be considered, so we are told by the writer in the Daily Mail, is the cost of buying the horse. No one can lay down rules for this. So much depends on the purchaser, his powers of horsemanship, his weight, the country in which he hunts. But although no one can tell a man what he must give for a hunter, yet it is possible to calculate the sum which the hunting man will be out of pocket on the purchase and sale of his horses, one season with another.

in the last quarter of a century. Writing in 1888, "Stonehenge" put the cost of hunting a country at $3000 per annum for each day in the week hounds went out; now the expenditure is much more nearly $5000 per annum for each hunting day. Fifty dollars is the least the one-horse man ought to give, although customs vary. He will like to give the huntsman and whipper-in some acknowledgment at Christmas; for he will be very unlucky if he has not had an immense amount of civility and kindness from them. This will come to ten dollars at least. Then there are the "caps" for charitable purposes, which will take another five dollars. A man who has done this may hunt with a clear conscience, knowing that he has paid his share of the sport, and he may be permitted to feel that if every one did likewise in proportion to his means the finance of hunting would present no problems to the careworn secretary and harassed master.

And, after all, he will find that he has enjoyed the sport for less than $200 for the season out-of-pocket expenses.

Lastly, how much hunting will he get? On an average in a season of twenty-five weeks he will, if lucky, have eighteen to twenty days' hunting out of his one horse. Say he will have paid $20 for each day's amusement. Supposing he has $2500 a year, he will have spent one-fifth of his income for five months' pleasure. "But then the enjoyment of hunting is so much greater than any other—at least to the man who is bitten by the sport—that he will gladly make any reasonable sacrifices rather than miss the music of the pack."

Fox-hunting will never become popular in countries where big game is to be found, but Great Britain offers nothing more dangerous than wily reynard, who generally succeeds in getting away and furnishes a vast amount of fun in the process.

PICCADILLY

GENTLEMEN OF THE GUTTER.

By Harry Davids.

Greece had fallen before Turkey. The dapper little soldiers, so brave in the cafés of Athens, had fled helter skelter through sunlit Greek villages, and at their heels had swung the Turkish army, singing, vainglorious. The news flashed to the four corners of the earth, even unto the domains of Swaziland, which is an insignificant little spot athwart the gateways of Northwestern India. There it was welcomed with great rejoicing.

"Behold," said the mullah, the priest of the tribe, "even in his own land has the accursed feringhee fallen before the sword of the True Believer. Is it meet, my brothers, that we here in the midst of our own crops should lie content like outcast dogs with the heel of the English upon our necks? Allah ilallah, ilalaha, bish-millah."

He spoke on, and the tribesmen, tall, hairy, hook-nosed demons, grunted within their sheepskin coats. Then they departed in silence over the slopes of their mountain lands, happy in the thought of what was to follow. There was but one God and Mohammed was his chosen prophet, the gates of paradise were thrown open to those who fell in the holy war—and, besides, three years of prosperity and peace had left them spoiling for a fight. Truly, God was great! Whereupon there went the whisper for rifles—rifles such as would be of worth against the new Lee-Metfords and the dumfries of the English soldier men.

The whisper traveled down the line along the unofficial underground trail. A Cabulese horseman brought it down from the mountain tops. A fakir, ash smeared and naked, jingled his tongs as he repeated it to an opium-eating Eurasian, formerly a clerk in government employ, and from thence it was passed through the dust and press of the Grand Trunk road until it reached the ears of Mackrodt, the lean German, sweating and fuming in the heat of Lucknow.

Mackrodt lifted his feet from his desk and ruminated and, as he planned, a scar, chopped across his face, stood out vivid and red. He was always so in moments of excitement. Years before, in the long ago which he did not care to remember, had he received the mark. But Bonn and dueling bouts were in the far away. He planned till late at night, and swore softly in German as the magnitude of the game took root in his mind. He sat thinking till the stinking kerosene lamp flickered and went out, and then he pulled himself together to set the machinery in motion.

Larry Doyle, Irish gentleman-at-large, who was vowing eternal love to a doubtful Neapolitan countess at Port Said, received one telegram. He forgot his love and disappeared. Fay, a cashiered captain of an English Lancer regiment, posing as an invalid at Colombo, received another. He became healed and silently departed. They met at Mackrodt's bungalow in Lucknow two weeks later and gave heed to his words.

"Everything is ready," said Mackrodt. "You vass after big game—or small game—and vass just shooting. You must go north und den south—so as to seem dot you vass coming from der north. Der skins, der deer heads, und der odder tings, dey are ready. You vass only hunters. Hein!"

"And to whom do we deliver the rifles?" asked Doyle. "Joost to der mullah. The tamm fool is preaching holy war. Der money he will to me send und den—und den—Mebbe, Larry, you goes lovin' mit some odder girl. Dot's wot."

The three men put their heads together over a map and spoke softly. It was as Mackrodt had said. North they would go as hunters, and under their piles of skins, purchased for the purpose, would lie some of the rifles. Others would be hidden as best possible. Then, at the opportune moment, they would swoop down south to Swaziland, innocent hunters, fresh from Europe.

"Ontil you reach der border line all iss right," said Mackrodt. "Den it iss in your hands to push dem across. Und look! Dere you will meet dot tamm Briggs. He iss in charge of der nigger police und dere. Look out for heem. He knows mebbe one or two tings."

That night Doyle and Fay left Lucknow, and ten days later were breasting the cool, scented breezes of the mountains. Behind them followed a train of bearers, coolies and shikaris, heavily loaded with skins, camp equipment, and patent cooking pots. They halted seldom and hunted not—except when they ran across some lone white man. Sometimes when an ibex offered a good shot or when the trail of mountain sheep appeared a trifle more than enticing, Doyle, the younger man, longed to take his chances; but Fay held him on. They plunged down the mountain slopes, through vast shadows and great silences, picking their trail over hummock crest and through pine copse. To their ears came the talk of the snows of the north—the gurgling, musical whisper of the eternal snows. Through the leafy branches of the deadens ran the nonsensical love songs of the mountain winds. It whispered of hope and faith and purity—primarily purity. Nature, speaking, spoke of cleanliness, of the soul free from sin, of the heart free from strife; and Larry, with all the imagination, dreams, and ambitions of the Irish, gave heed.

"My God!" he half sobbed, "my God!"

Fay, as befitted a cashiered officer of the Queen's Lancers, frowned and, to hide the emotion tugging at his heartstrings, gave unruly answer.

"Brace up, old man," he said. "It's tough—but it is th' game."

"I'm—I'm—game," said Larry.

In silence they marched—Larry with his head bowed down on his breast and Fay erect, upright, as if defying the world. And from the north came the winds, mocking them and their futile endeavors. The scent of the clean hillside struck their nostrils and the memories which would not be stifled surged within their breasts. In County Monaghan a mother mourned her handsome, laughing boy. In Kent a stern-faced father awaited the kindly curtains of night to weep over the downfall of a reckless son. And the two, marching through the shadows, touched each other's hands, simply, quietly, as behooved gentlemen of the gutter, two black sheep who had gone astray. The reaction came. Larry that night sobbed out his heart, unashamed and unafraid, before the camp fire, and Fay tugged at his mustaches.

"It's a tough game," said he, putting a kindly hand on the boy's shoulder. Larry shook him off.

The spell passed, just as others of a similar kind in various parts of the world, under various circumstances, had passed, and they became again very practical men, seeking for that which they could loot.

"We'll have to trick 'em," said Fay. "Briggs has the border line too well patrolled to allow us any chance of rushing the stuff over. How d'ye think?"

"I'm not thinking until it is time to," said Larry. "We will have to wait until we reach Kotgar and take a lay of the land."

Kotgar was a small village near the border line. There lived Briggs, district superintendent of police, who, with the aid of half a hundred native troopers, saw to it that no salt or rifles were smuggled across the line—more particularly rifles, for the administration had discovered to their great cost that a Swazi with a rifle was not open to arguments except through the medium of mountain batteries.

Briggs heard of the arrival of the two white men and beamed, for whites were scarce in the land and he was hungry for the talk of his kin. "The one," said the orderly who imparted the news to him, "is a young sahib, pleasant of face and laughing. The other is like unto a trooper, walking as one accustomed to a saddle. He does not laugh." Briggs rode to the village to offer the hospitality of his bungalow.

"There's no need for you to camp," said he to them. "Come over to my place and—"

"Thanks awfully," said Fay dryly. "Couldn't possibly think of troubling you." Briggs controlled himself and rode away. "Damn 'em," he muttered, "blasted idiots can't understand that England is not India." His surmise was that the two were newly arrived English of the intense kind—which was exactly Fay's idea.

Larry laughed. "Personally," he said, "I don't like to break bread with a man and do him up afterwards."

They sat down behind a woodcutter's hut, wherein the rifles had been deposited, and talked in undertones. "What now?" said Fay. Larry shrugged his shoulder and gazed up the long white road leading to Swaziland. The road cut through a mountain pass guarded by native police. The lumbering, squeaking bullock carts were there halted and examined. Beyond it, in a gut, lay the burning ghat of the villagers where the corpses were burned. "We'll have to take that road," said Larry.

At the end of the village street a collection of children gathered and burst into a droning song. Larry looked and smiled, for he liked children. Fay did not smile.

"Larry," he said quietly, "do you know what those kiddies are playing?" He looked at the Irishman squarely. "They are playing," he continued calmly, "the game—the game of 'haija'—the cholera."

Larry stiffened and his face paled, for he understood the significance.

"That means—" he said.

"It means," said Fay rising briskly, "that there is cholera in the village and it is going to be deuced unpleasant for us."

They gazed at the children in silence. "Haija, haija," came the childish voices. Fay beckoned to a villager. "Who's dead?" he asked in the vernacular. "A camel driver, sahib," was the response. "He came from the plains but a day ago and mayhap brought it with him." The man walked on. Then Larry laughed, and Fay looked up in inquiry.

"Don't you see?" said the Irishman. "Faith, don't you see? This thing will put the trumps right in our hands." He leaned over and whispered and Fay nodded. Long they discussed it.

They burned the camel driver that day, the body being taken up the white road, through the mountain pass to the burning ghat. The bearers went at a jog trot and the police patrol at the line drew back, knowing well the danger. An hour later another funeral party swung up the trail and four more followed. The bodies were placed on charpoys—native bedsteads—reverently covered with a cloth, a handful of flowers scattered on top.

Briggs swore and telegraphed for medical aid; but it would be a week before that could arrive, and in the meantime the villagers were dying like flies. The processions to the burning ghat he could see from his barrack office.

"It will have to wear itself out," he growled. "Nothing can be done." A week later he thought of the two whites who were encamped near the village and wondered if they knew their danger.

He spoke to an orderly and the man departed to find out. "I'll not go near them again," said he to himself. The orderly returned perturbed.

"They have gone, sahib," said he, "and—" he hesitated.

"Well," asked Briggs.

"And there is a strangeness which one may not understand. The woodcutter, who was formerly poor, has much money. Four men who were body carriers have also gone. And when I questioned about the sahibs the woodcutter's daughter—a comely maiden—threw curses at me. She now mourns for the smile of him who was of pleasant face and laughing."

"Huh!" said Briggs. "Where did the woodcutter get the money and where have the sahibs gone?"

"That none can tell."

"Bring the woodcutter to me!"

The woodcutter trembled and vowed he was a poor man. Briggs picked up a horsewhip. "I like not mysteries, O son of a pig," said he. "Tell what thou knowest. What have you done with the sahibs. You who were poor are now rich and two sahib log, who perchance had money, have disappeared."

The man saw his position and fell before Briggs, cringing and crying. "Sahib, I know not—I know not"—Briggs raised the whip—"except—"

"Ha!"

"Sahib, I vowed I would not tell, but I am a poor man, and lower thou the whip. I will tell all. The money they gave me, though my daughter, who is a fool, would not take any for herself. It was in payment for the use of my hut for the storing of rifles—"

Briggs jumped from his seat. "It is straight talk," said the woodcutter. "I was a poor man and they paid me. What harm was there in letting them use my hut for their merchandise? That, I know, is not against the law. Sahib, did I do wrong? Ai! Ai! How was I to know—"

Briggs sighed and then spurred himself to action. "And then, blockhead?"

"More I know not—sahib—sahib—strike not—my daughter—"

She was brought in by an orderly, and on her entrance threw back her head and laughed. "Know?" she said. "By my mother's breasts, I know full well. He—they—have gone. Fool," she flung out her hand toward Briggs. "On the biers did we pack the rifles—and I helped, because he, the lord of my soul, said I was the light of his eye. As corpses we passed them through, and now—now—they have gone—and—and he has gone." She ended with a half sob.

Briggs did his best, but he was not given the time to close the stable door. Swaziland poured itself from village and mountain tops, each man fighting with a rifle of a modern kind. Then, as Briggs sent his telegrams which would bring joy to a few thousand soldiers pining on the plains and made known his own failure he muttered:

"And they were white men," he said. "Good God! I never thought—I never thought—"

Addressing the members of the Royal Geographical Society recently on "Unknown Western Asia," Mr. David George Hogarth, the geographer and explorer, said that in Western Asia there were vast areas on which no European foot is known to have trod, nor even any European eye to have looked. The greatest unseem area lies in Arabia. Almost all the southern half of Arabia was occupied, according to native report, by a vast wilderness called generally Ruba el-Khali, i. e., "Dwelling of the Void." No European has ever entered this immense tract, which embraces some 600,000 square miles. It would take a bold man to venture out for the passage of either 850 miles west to east or 650 north to south in the isothermal zone of the world's greatest heat, with no better information than is now possessed. Perhaps some air-pilot in the far future will be the first to try.

The old seventeenth-century house near Kensington Garden, built in Tudor style of architecture and inhabited in turn by Cromwell, Pitt, William Penn, and Macaulay, has had its history over and over again related. Men of literary and political eminence from time to time gathered in its library with Henry Fox, Lord Holland, as their host and the witty and brilliant Lady Holland as his supporter. The guests who there assembled from 1799 to 1840 included almost every politician, scientist, or author of eminence. Perhaps Holland House was the last scene of an English literary salon, for the ruling spirit was always Lady Holland and those of her own sex who shared her tastes. In the library might be seen Greville and Sydney Smith, Macaulay and Brougham, with the lesser lights of poetry and fiction, Moore and Rogers, and their contemporaries.

During the presidential campaign sixty-four years ago certain Whig newspapers published an absurd statement derogatory to the Democratic candidate for President, James K. Polk, under the caption: "Baron Roorback's Tour Through the Western and Southern States." The statement was easily disproved and probably did little or no harm to the man it attacked. Ever since then, in American political parlance, the "roorback" has been the campaign lie, particularly the one uttered so soon before election as to make its answer a matter of difficulty.

In 1585 the potato was introduced into Europe by the Spaniards, who found it in Chile. At almost the same date it was introduced into England by the English, who had found it cultivated by the Indians in North America.

CHRISTMAS SORROWS.

By Harry Davids and Tom Springer.

Illustrated by A. L. Scherzer

Mistletoe and holly,
Gay the Christmas tree,
Lord forgive our folly
For we could not see.

For the long trail stretched before us, for we heard the call,
Left the hearthstone and the homeland, felt the rover's thrall;

Wandered to the far horizon, sought the joy of life—
Now the wanderlust is waning, heimweh now is rife.

Mistletoe and holly,
Shining eyes of old;
Lord forgive our folly
These we could not hold.

Now we mock the joy of strangers in a foreign land,
We, the world wide, careless rangers, clasp no friendly hand,

For we left our hearts behind us—God, we did not know
That their echoed beats would find us wheresoe'er we'd go.

Mistletoe and holly,
Thorns among the leaves;
Lord forgive our folly,
Balm the heart that grieves.

We, the flotsam of the ocean, driftwood cast aside,
Hide our aching hearts with laughter, 'neath the cynic's pride;

Now the mask is dropped unheeded, now the smile has fled,
Now the heartstrings tug for homeland, wanderlust is dead.

Mistletoe and holly,
Loves we had and lost,
Lord forgive our folly,
We have paid the cost.

We have paid in lonely mourning, we have paid in tears,
Left the home-nest spite of warning, gathered wasted years;

Gathered dead sea fruit for holly, scorned the mistletoe,
Now we hear the jeer of folly, now false kisses know.

Mistletoe and holly,
Oh! for English snow,
But our sheaves of folly
On the hot sands show.

From the desert, from the jungle, from the heaving seas,
Comes the mutter of our sorrows, come the broken pleas,
Comes the whisper of the lost ones, gentlemen astray,
Burning skies are stretching o'er us, mocking Christmas Day.

Mistletoe and holly,
Ties we have forgot;
Lord forgive our folly,
Bitter is our lot.

Over every stretch of ocean, recklessly we roam,
Yet the lodestone of devotion draws our heart thought home;

For the girl we left behind us at the Christmas tide
Is the tie that still will bind us and the miles deride.

Mistletoe and holly,
Log of English yew,
Lord forgive our folly,
For our hearts are true.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

By Sidney G. P. Coryn.

Alaska, the Great Country, by Ella Higginson. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; $2.50.

There have been other books written about Alaska, but none that arrests the attention so much as this. Its charm is mainly due to the fact that it is written by a woman, and is therefore free from the excess of commercialism that often disfigures the description of a new country. Mrs. Higginson looks at Alaska with the eye of an artist, and also, it may be said, of a humanitarian. She is interested in people and she knows how to make her interest contagious. She has also a sense of humor, and the value of humor in a book of travel is not to be lightly estimated.

Mrs. Higginson is enthusiastic about Alaska, not in any one pointed way, but because she herself was charmed with what she saw. By a simple narration of events she easily awakes an enthusiasm in her readers by a demonstration of the infinite possibilities that lie dormant in the far northland and the infinite charm of scenery and people that we are apt to overlook in more sordid pursuits. For the first time we realize to the full that Alaska is not only a country in which to amass wealth, but a country that can easily offer happy homes to a vast population, and that it is no unworthy link in the great Pacific chain that will one day mark the centre of the world's activities. It will indeed be strange if Mrs. Higginson's book should fail to arrest the attention of the tourist and the artist, the modern pioneers of commerce and population. She writes with the perfection of conversational fluency, she observes whatever is worth observation, and she relates her experiences in a warm-blooded way that gives to her book the interest of a novel. Fifty well chosen illustrations, including a colored map, complete a book that ought to be a landmark in Alaskan development.

The Little Flowers of St. Francis of Assisi, translated from the Italian by T. W. Arnold, M. A. Published by Duffield & Co., New York; $3.

There is an unalloyed delight about the stories of St. Francis of Assisi. Laying aside the skepticism of an age that sees some mysterious virtue in believing only the things that are not true, we positively revel in the account of how St. Francis made Brother Masseo "turn round and round several times"; of how he preached unto the birds, which was easy, and made the swallows hold their peace, which was difficult; of how he converted the fierce wolf of Agobio, and tamed the wild turtle doves; of how he healed the leper and converted the thieves, and knew in spirit that Brother Elias was damned, and of how at length through fervor of meditation he developed the holy stigmata that were seen and touched by Jerome and many others. We disbelieved in these stigmata for a long time—even Jerome disbelieved once—but it seems that some eminent modern scientists are graciously pleased to admit that stigmata may have occurred then and since, so that in this instance faith no longer merges into credulity.

Every one ought to know St. Francis of Assisi. He is outside the boundaries of creed, he belongs to the religious life of the world. This fine book with its exquisite frontispiece will help to popularize the story of a saint whose beautiful humanity should be the admiration of the world and whose record is a great piece of literature.

A Damaged Reputation, by Harold Bindloss. Published by R. F. Fenno & Co., New York; $1.50.

This is a story of mining in the Canadian Rockies, and while it is full of the strenuous life it has a psychological vein of some wealth. Brooke, an English tenderfoot, has been heguled into the purchase of a worthless tract of land for a ranch. Determined to recover his $6000 from Devine, he enters into a sort of alliance with the unscrupulous speculator Saxton, only to discover that the lady of his dreams, whose acquaintance he made casually upon his ranch, belongs to Devine's household. Then we have a picture of a fine struggle between his obligations to Saxton, who tries to jump Devine's claims, and his conscience, newly awakened under the impetus of love. None the less, he makes an effort to steal Devine's claim drawings, and when this comes to the lady's attention she naturally gives him his congé. But penitence reinstates him, for which we are glad, as he is really a fine fellow, but we are not sure how much conscience owes to the external stimuli of a beautiful girl and the inheritance of a fortune that makes the $6000 dwindle in importance. But that, after all, is no mar to a stirring story.

Counsels by the Way, by Henry Van Dyke. Published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York.

No books of their kind are so thought productive as those by Dr. Van Dyke, nor could any be better designed to call a halt to the rudderless steering of modern individual life. Dr. Van Dyke writes with the perspective that comes from a realization of the eternity of conscious existence, and he invites us persuasively to step into that same perspective and to regulate conduct in its light. He divides his book into four sections: "Ships and Havens," "The Poetry of the Psalms," "Joy and Power," "The Battle of Life," and "The Good Old Way," and while he never deviates into dogmatism, he yet succeeds in showing us the beauty of a religion that depends for its vitality upon a calm and reasonable philosophy.

Leonore Stubbs, by L. B. Walford. Published by Longmans, Green & Co., New York; $1.50.

The story is a clever one, but we are not sure that we are allowed to get a clear view of the character of the heroine. Poor little Leo is left a widow while she is still a girl, and she has to return to her detestable old father and her unsympathetic sisters for a home. Worst of all, she married a rich man who was ruined immediately before his death, and for some dubious reason, based upon her father's cringing pride, she has to pose as a rich widow seeking conventional shelter with her family. She flirts a good deal in an hysterical sort of way, and then falls in love with her sister's fiancé, who, by the way, is a little too pious to be popular. Some tender and irregular passages between the two are overseen, a breach between the sister and her lover follows, and so at last Leo finds her path to renewed happiness is open for her. We wish to believe that Leo and her very religious husband live happily ever afterward, and, indeed, we know nothing to the contrary, but we don't quite see how they do it.

Barry Gordon, by William Farquhar Payson. Published by The McClure Company, New York; $1.50.

This is a fine story of a real man—a welcome relief from the money grubbing or emasculated heroes of modern romance. Barry Gordon has inherited a weakness for drink from a long line of otherwise splendid Southern ancestors. Full of the traditional chivalry of his race, hot-headed, brave and honorable, he runs away from school after a fight in defense of his father's good name, falls in love with his guardian's daughter, disgraces himself by getting drunk in her presence, and then, in desperation, throws himself upon the world. After seven years of adventurous wandering he comes home and finds that Muriel has unwillingly engaged herself to his brother Tom, who, however, goes off on an engineering expedition to Morocco and is supposed to be murdered by the Moors. The most dramatic incident of the story is Barry's discovery that his brother is still alive and a prisoner, and his heroic rescue by the old method of substitution. Everything comes right in the end, but our admiration for a hold and straightforward plot is almost eclipsed by the tense and vigorous character picture of Barry, a picture that will not readily fade from the mind of the reader.

Vera the Medium, by Richard Harding Davis. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

This attractive little story shows considerable psychological insight. Vera is a girl of naturally fine impulses who, through the perversities of fate, is thrown into the society of mediums and fortune-tellers, who make her their bright and particular star. But she preserves a romantic adoration for the district attorney who once befriended her when she had fallen within the meshes of the law, and when the district attorney intervenes at the seance cleverly arranged to hegule old Stephen Hallowell out of his money Vera allows herself to be persuaded into recititude. The author knows how to leave something to the imagination, and this is one of the marks of the true story-teller.

The Revolt of Anne Royle, by Helen R. Martin. Published by The Century Company, New York; $1.50.

It is to be feared that the parents who really study their children are few and far between. Still more rare is the fine discrimination between repression and license.

Anne Royle is a repressed child. Why she was repressed, the domestic scandal involved in her birth must be left to the reader to discover. But in depicting what repression meant to Anne Royle and how she gradually evolved the force to emerge, the author shows first an extraordinarily sympathetic knowledge of childhood and secondly a striking power to express herself in a winning romance.

Solthaven, by W. W. Jacobs. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.50.

Mr. Jacobs's vein seems inexhaustible. The rare humor of his characterizations renders plot almost unnecessary, but, nevertheless, the plot is a good one. Robert Vyner, son of the rich ship owner, falls in love with the daughter of his father's clerk. The old man threatens to disinherit him and to discharge his faithful old clerk unless he can effectually remove his daughter from the danger zone. Joan is sent to London, but, having ingeniously spread the report that she has married an ancient mariner named Tremblett—said Tremblett being about to depart upon a voyage and therefore beyond the temptation of nautical veracity—she is allowed to return to Solthaven, where the original courtship proceeds apace and unsuspected. Every character in the story, and there are a great many of them, has its own particular brand of fun. Mr. Jacobs does careful work and remains unspoiled by success.

The Gentle Grafter, by O. Henry. Published by the McClure Company, New York.

That a fool and his money are soon parted is a well-known fact, but the actual processes of separation have seldom been more humorously told than in this little volume of short stories. The gentle occupation of the grafter is painted for us under a variety of aspects, while we are grateful for an introduction to the female grafter. But, as Jeff Peters says, women are not to be trusted as partners even in the most innocent line of graft and must be looked upon as too honest for any serious use. And, indeed, why should they not be honest, seeing that "they've got the other sex either grafting or working overtime for 'em."

The Boy Forty-Niners, by Everett McNeil. Published by the McClure Company, New York.

This belongs to the best type of stories for boys, and shows how good a story can be without recourse to the deeds of the imaginary desperado. Here we have an account of crossing the plains in forty-nine full of the most wholesome sensation and incident, but without deviation from the facts as they he-fell hundreds. No hoy could read it without healthy excitement or without imbibing some of the spirit that made the West what it is today.

The Adopting of Rose Marie, by Carroll Watson Rankin. Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York; $1.50.

Children who play doll with real babies should take care that the mothers from whom they borrow said babies will not decamp. Little Mahel, who is one of a charming quartet of children, borrows a baby from a half-breed woman and then finds that her maternal responsibilities are of a permanent nature. "The Adopting of Rose Marie" is a sequel to "Dandelion Cottage," and quite as worthy the attention of girls.

Uncle Tom Andy Bill, by Charles Major. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; $1.50.

Uncle Tom Andy Bill, surrounded by a circle of little folk, tells a series of fascinating adventures that befell him in his youth. Indians, bears, wolves, and beautiful girls figure largely in a story of adventure that will rank high with any of its class.

SOME CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

Christmas books of all kinds compete for the attention of the generously disposed. They are not necessarily books about Christmas—we need a new genius to say anything original here—but they are books peculiarly appropriate to Christmas gifts, books for all sorts and conditions of men and women, books for children, books for wise people and for foolish, for the rich and for the poor. After all, why not give a book at Christmas? Where else can we find such catholicity of quality, where else can we find such absolute correspondence between gift and recipient? Here are some of the books, unsorted and unclassified—just as they come to hand.

BOOKS ABOUT FAIRIES.

Fairy books will continue so long as children continue, and while the old ones maintain the hold that they have won by their excellence, there is always room for new ones, especially when they are told as well as those by Holme Lee. The whole title, which indicates a hidden and insidious moral, is as follows: "Legends from Fairy Land, Narrating the History of Prince Glee and Princess Trill, the Cruel Persecutions and Condemned Punishment of Aunt Spite, the Adventures of the Great Tufflongo, and the Story of the Blackcap in the Giant's Well." The stories are good and the illustrations artistic. The book is published by the J. B. Lippincott Company, New York.

Another fine book from the same publishers is "Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales," with 180 illustrations by Helen Stratton. Hans Andersen is as popular as ever and those who want him in his best form can find it here. The price is $1.50.

ABOUT IRELAND.

Lovers of Ireland are like the sands of the seashore for multitude, and for such there could be no better gift than "Shamrock-Land," by Plummer F. Jones. The author is an American without Irish affiliations. He spent a summer in Ireland, as thousands of others have done, and this handsome book is the result. Not only did he see everything worth seeing, but he was wise enough to make the personal acquaintance of the people and to lay up a store of direct and sensible impressions on current conditions, mingled with folklore, tradition, and sentiment. Its deep penetration into realities, its freedom from convention and prejudice, its colloquial humor and pathos, and its fine illustrations make it one of the best of modern books about the Green Isle. It is published by Moffat, Yard & Co., New York, and its price is $1.50.

A GLIMPSE AT SPAIN.

Another handsome book of travel is "Sun and Shadow in Spain," by Maud Howe. Miss Howe has already proved that she can describe a journey, and now she succeeds in making a prospective trip to Spain still more fascinating than it was before. She traveled by easy stages through the country and she has a pleasant facility for recording impressions by means of dialogue. She shows that she is well qualified to appreciate art and natural beauty, and she writes with an ease that reminds us of Howells. The illustrations, some of them colored, give an added value to the book, which is published by Little, Brown & Co. Price, $3.

A BOOK ABOUT EGYPT.

Going still further afield, we have a sumptuous book about "Egypt and Its Monuments," by Robert Hichens, with gorgeous illustrations, colored and plain, by Jules Guerin. We are thankful to the author for sparing us learned historical disquisitions about the antiquity of Egypt. We have some of these, but not too much, and none at all of the theories that are so valuable to the owner, and to no one else. Mr. Hichens is content to share with us the impressions of an intelligent and cultured man who knows how to admire the present as well as the past, and who can discriminate between the reeds of the savant and those of the educated tourist. He has given us a delightful book, while the illustrations are a temptation to their surreptitious removal. "Egypt and Its Monuments" is published by the Century Company, New York.

ABOUT FAR JAPAN.

From the Macmillan Company, New York, comes a beautiful book by Florence Du Cane on "The Flowers and Gardens of Japan," with fifty exquisite colored illustrations by Ella Du Cane. This is purely a flower and garden book. Less interesting mortals hardly appear at all, and as for disquisitions upon treaties, disputes, and such unimportant matters, we are allowed to forget them thankfully.

The author is a flower lover rather than a botanist. No doubt she is a botanist also, but she writes with an untechnical enthusiasm that brings her within easy reach of all and sundry. She does not claim that her book is exhaustive. So far as the flowers are concerned, she writes only of the most beautiful and profuse, such as chrysanthemum, lotus, maple, bamboo, azalea, cherry, peach, and plum. That she had to condense the section on landscape gardening is unfortunate, as it is particularly interesting by its comprehension and historical touches, but perhaps she will write some more on a topic that she handles so well. The book is fortunate in its illustrations that are works of art. The atmosphere is apparent even in the reproductions, and there are few among them unworthy of preservation in a frame. The gardens of Japan are certainly fortunate in having attracted so much literary and artistic ability to their description. The book is handsomely and appropriately bound, and its price is $6.

SOME GREAT SCOTCH WOMEN.

Harry Graham, the author of "A Group of Scottish Women," published by Duffield & Co., New York, tells us that when the Scottish National Portrait Gallery was built, some twenty years ago, a number of Edinburgh ladies raised a subscription to erect a statue of a famous and typical Scotswoman in one of the niches in front of the building. But when the final choice came to be made, it was found impossible to decide upon the name of any woman of pure Scottish birth and breeding who was worthy, in the opinion of the subscribers, of such an honor.

The author disclaims any intention to solve such a problem, but he none the less gives us a series of biographical portraits of some of the women from whom such a selection might have been made. He does it so well that at least twenty niches will be needed in any future building of the kind.

Among the characters that the author selects for delineation are Lady Grissell Baillie, Miss "Nicky" Murray, Mrs. Elison Cockburn, Elspeth Buchan, Duchess of Gordon, Lady Anne Barnard, Mrs. Grant of Laggan, Lady Louisa Stuart, and Miss Clementina Sterling Graham. Some of these seem worthy of more extended treatment, but the condensation is well done, and in every instance we have a clear-cut delineation and a portrait. There are fifteen well executed illustrations. The price is $3.50.

THE CHIMES.

The Baker & Taylor Company, New York, have published a fine edition of "The Chimes," by Charles Dickens, with illustrations in color and line by George Alfred Williams. The binding is decorative and the letter-press clear and bold.

A POPULAR POET.

The works of James Whitcomb Riley are always appropriate to every rank and condition in life. "Home Again With Me" has just been published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis, and we miss none of the poet's homely charm, and we miss none of the poet's homely charm, and we miss none of the poet's philosophy. The illustrations upon every page are by Howard Chandler Christy, and are purely and delicately drawn, while the decorations by Franklin Booth help to make up a beautiful volume.

ABOUT CHAUCER.

A book of delight to old and young is "The Chaucer Story Book," by Eva March Tappan, published by the Houghton-Mifflin Company, Boston, handsomely bound and with quaint illustrations. Such a translation of marvelous stories into simple language fills a need and will be welcome. Price, $1.50.

CHRISTMAS ESSAYS.

Another book from the same publishers is by one of the foremost of American essayists, Dr. Samuel M. Crothers. He writes on "Christmas and the Literature of Disillusion," "On Being a Doctrinaire," "Christmas and the Spirit of Democracy," "The Ignominy of Being Grown Up," and "The Bayonet Poker." The essays have a real charm and take rank among Christmas literature. Price, $1.25.

SANTA CLAUS.

E. Boyd Smith, already favorably known as a writer for children, is now responsible for "Santa Claus and All About Him." The book has sixteen full-page illustrations in colors and twenty-nine in black and white by the author. It is published by the Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York.

A STORY BY HOWELLS.

The author's name is a guaranty of excellence. "Christmas Every Day" is along the best lines of children's literature. The letter-press is set in the middle of artistic full-page illustrations and the binding is a blaze of color. The book is published by Harper & Brothers, New York, and the price is $1.75.

ABOUT HOLLAND.

A new touch to the child's book in verse is given by Estelle M. Kerr in her "Little Sam on Volendam." It is all about Holland, with plain and colored illustrations of Dutch life and children. Moffat, Yard & Co., New York, are publishers.

ROMANCE OF TRAVEL RESTORED.

Edith Wharton's Delightful Record of Motor-Car Journeys in France.

It is hardly necessary now to find terms of praise for the distinction which marks all that comes from the pen of Edith Wharton. Whether in story, in essay, or in more familiar chat of every-day experiences, the same graces of literary art, the same allurements of insight, fancy, and research, are displayed. Her latest book, the record of motor-car journeys in France, perhaps the lightest, least studied of her works, is charming in every way. From the introduction, in the paragraph that follows, to the very end, the story is never dull, but always vibrant with life, warm with harmonies of color:

The motor car has restored the romance of travel. Freeing us from all the compulsions and contacts of the railway, the bondage to fixed hours and the beaten track, the approach to each town through the area of ugliness and desolation created by the railway itself, it has given us back the wonder, the adventure, and the novelty which enlivened the way of our posting grandparents. Above all these recovered pleasures must be ranked the delight of taking a town unawares, stealing on it by back ways and unchronicled paths, and surprising in it some intimate aspect of past time, some silhouette hidden for half a century or more by the ugly mask of railway embankments and the iron bulk of a huge station. Then the villages that we missed and yearned for from the windows of the train—the unseen villages have been given back to us—and nowhere could the importance of the recovery have been more delightfully exemplified than on a May afternoon in the Pas-de-Calais, as we climbed the long ascent beyond Boulogne on the road to Arras.

It is a delightful country, broken into wide waves of hill and valley, with hedge-rows high and leafy enough to bear comparison with the Kentish hedges among which our motor had left us a day or two before; and the villages, the frequent, smiling, happily placed villages, will also meet successfully the more serious challenge of their English rivals—meet it on other grounds and in other ways, with paved market-places and clipped char-milles instead of gorse-fringed commons, with soaring heifries instead of square church towers, with less of verdure, but more, perhaps, of outline—certainly of line.

Stages of acquaintance that are so much more likely to be interesting in towns than in people; but the deprivation is partly atoned for by the sense of adventure with which, next morning, one casts one's self upon the unknown. There is no conjunctural first impression to be modified, perhaps got rid of; one's mind presents a blank page for the town to write its name on.

Here is a characteristically fanciful discussion of salient features in the monument of the two Cardinals of Amboise in the Lady Chapel of Rouen:

A magnificent monument—and to my mind the finest thing about it is the Cardinal Uncle's nose. The whole man is fine in his sober dignity, humbly conscious of the altar toward which he faces, arrogantly aware of the purple on his shoulders; and the nose is the epitome of the man. We live in the day of little noses: that once stately feature, intrinsically feudal and aristocratic in character—the maschio naso extolled of Dante—has sunk to democratic insignificance, like many another fine expression of individualism. And so one must look to the old painters and sculptors to see what a nose was meant to be—the prow of the face; the evidence of its owner's standing, of his relation to the world, and his inheritance from the past. Even in the profile of the Cardinal Nephew, kneeling a little way behind his uncle, the gallant feature is seen to have suffered a slight diminution: its spring, still bold, is less commanding; it seems, as it were, to have thrust itself against a less yielding element. And so the deterioration has gone on from generation to generation, till the nose has worn itself blunt against the increasing resistances of a democratic atmosphere, and stunted, atrophied, and amorphous, serves only, now, to let us know when we have the influenza.

Such bits as this gem every chapter, and the reader goes back to catch a new and more entrancing gleam by a second reading:

The Seine, two days later, by the sweetest curves, drew us on from Rouen to Les Andelys, past such bright gardens terraced above its banks, such moist, poplar-fringed islands, such low green pruntories deflecting its silver flow, that we continually checked the flight of the motor, pausing here, and here, and here again, to note how France understands and enjoys and lives with her rivers.

Modern improvements, induced by the visits of motorists, are noted everywhere, even in the most out-of-the-way villages:

Dourdan, too, has the crowning charm of an old inn facing its château-fort—such an inn as Manon and des Grioux dined in on the way to Paris—where, in a large courtyard shaded by trees, one may feast on strawberries and cheese at a table enclosed in clipped shrubs, with dogs and pigeons amicably prowling for crumbs, and the host and hostess, their maid-servants, ostlers, and marmions, breakfasting at another long table, just across the hedge. Now that the demands of the motorist are introducing modern plumbing and maple furniture into the uttermost parts of France, these romantic old inns, where it is charming to breakfast, if precarious to sleep, are becoming as rare as the medieval keeps with which they are, in a way, contemporaneous; and Dourdan is fortunate in still having two such perfect specimens to attract the attention of the archaeologist.

Following the windings of the Loire, Mrs. Wharton came to the Berry, the land of George Sand, and there her motor-flight found a rest. Approaching the memory-haunted house, every view and every incident inspired the tourist:

... it was undeniably disappointing, as we reached its outskirts, to find Châteauroux—aside from its fine, old châteaux on the Indre—so exactly like other dull French towns, so provokingly unconscious of being one of the capital cities of literature. And it seems, in fact, literally as well as figuratively, unaware of its distinction. Fame throws its circles so wide that it makes not a ripple near home; and even the alert landlady of the Hotel Sainte Catherine wrinkled her brows perplexedly at our question: "Is one permitted to visit the house of George Sand?"

After reflection the answer came, and it was reassuring though far from enthusiastic:

Yet here was the northern gate of the Sand country—it was here that, for years, the leaders of the most sedentary profession of a sedentary race—the hommes de lettres of France—descended from the Paris express, and took a diligence on their pilgrimage to the oracle. When one considers the fatigue of the long day's railway journey, and the French dread of déplacements, the continual stream of greatness that Paris poured out upon Nohant gives the measure of what Nohant had to offer in return.

As we sat at breakfast in the inn dining-room we irreverently pictured some of these great personages—Liszt, Sainte-Beuve, Gautier, Dumas fils, Flaubert—illustrious figures in the queer disshabille of travel, unwinding strange cache-nez, solicitous for embroidered carpet-bags, seated in that very room over their coffee and omelette, or climbing to the coupé of the diligence outside. And then we set out on the same road.

Near a small, lonely village—Vicq—the roof of a plain-faced fawn-colored house came into view:

No other house is in sight: only, from behind the trees, peep two or three humble tiled cottages, dependencies of the larger pile. There is nothing to tell us the name of the house—nothing to signalize it, to take it out of the common. It stands there, large, placid, familiarly related to the high-road and the

From "A Motor Trip Through France," by Edith Wharton. Charles Scribner's Sons.

There is philosophy and matter for reflection in most of the paragraphs, speaking not merely the artistic eye, but the keenest observation, the ever-present inclination to weigh differing values:

This part of France, with its wide expanse of agricultural landscape, disciplined and cultivated to the last point of finish, shows how nature may be utilized to the utmost clod without losing its freshness and naturalness. In some regions of this supremely "administered" country, where space is more restricted, or the fortunate accidents of water and varying levels are lacking, the minute excessive culture, the endless ranges of potager wall, and the long lines of fruit-trees bordering straight, interminable roads, may produce in the American traveler a reaction toward the unkempt, a momentary feeling that ragged roadsides and weedy fields have their artistic value. But here in northern France, where agriculture has mated with poetry instead of banishing it, one understands the bigger beauty of land developed, humanized, brought into relation to life and history, as compared with the raw material with which the greater part of our own hemisphere is still clothed. In France everything speaks of long familiar intercourse between the earth and its inhabitants; every field has a name, a history, a distinct place of its own in the village polity; every blade of grass is there by an old feudal right which has long since dispossessed the worthless aboriginal weed.

There is philosophy and matter for reflection in most of the paragraphs, speaking not merely the artistic eye, but the keenest observation, the ever-present inclination to weigh differing values:

The motor-car and its occupants arrived at Amiens at nightfall, and this brought out a new and consoling thought:

It is always a loss to arrive in a strange town after dark, and miss those preliminary farm, like one side of the extraordinary woman it sheltered; and perhaps that fact helps to suggest its name, to render almost superfluous our breathless question to the pretty goose-girl knitting under the hedge.

"Mais oui, madame—c'est Nohant."
The goose-girl—pink as a hawthorn bud, a "kerchief" tied about her curls—might really, in the classic phrase of sentimental travel, have "stepped out" of one of the novels written yonder, under the high roof to which she pointed: she had the honest savour of the terroir, yet with that superadded grace that the author of the novels has been criticised for bestowing on her peasants. She formed, at any rate, a charming link between our imagination and the famous house; and we presently found that the miracle which had preserved her in all her 1830 grace had been extended to the whole privileged spot, which seemed, under a clear glass bell of oblivion, to have been kept intact, unchanged, like some wonderful "exhibit" illustrative of the extraordinary history lived within it.

This, of the church and graveyard, is an etching, not a pastel:

Farm-yard and court both face on a small grassy place—what, in England, would pass for a diminutive common—in the centre of which, under an ancient walnut-tree, stands a much more ancient church—a church so tiny, black, and shrunken, that it somehow suggests a blind old peasant woman mumbling and dozing in the shade. This is the parish church of Nohant; and a few yards from it, adjoining the court of the château, lies the little walled graveyard which figures so often in the "Histoire de Ma Vie," and where she who described it now rests with her kin. The graveyard is defended from intrusion by a high wall and a locked gate; and after all her spirit is not there, but in the house and the garden—above all, in the little cluster of humble old cottages enclosing the shady place about the church, and constituting, apparently, the whole village of Nohant. Like the goose-girl, these little houses are surprisingly picturesque and sentimental; and their mossy roofs, their clipped yews, the old white-capped women who sit spinning on their doorsteps, supply almost too ideal an answer to one's hopes.

Mrs. Wharton found a "sombre Brontë background" suggested by the pictures the French novelist had drawn of this place, and calls up a vision of the past:

When one recalls the throng of motley characters who streamed in and out of that

Cover Design from T. Y. Crowell & Co.

quiet house—the illegitimate children of both sides, living in harmony with one another and with the child of wedlock, the too-intimate servants, the peasant playmates, the drunken boon companions—when one turns to the Hogarthian pictures of midnight carouses presided over by the uproarious Hippolyte and the sombrelly tippling Dudevant, while their wives sat disgusted, but apparently tolerant, above stairs, one feels one's self in the sinister gloom of Wildfell Hall rather than in the light temperate air of a French province. And somehow, unreasonably of course, one expects the house to hear, even outwardly, some mark of that dark, disordered period—or, if not, then of the cheerful but equally incoherent and inconceivable existence led there when the timid Mme. Dudevant was turning into the great George Sand, and the strange procession which continued to stream through the house was composed no longer of drunken gentlemen farmers and left-handed peasant relations, but of an almost equally fantastic and ill-assorted company of ex-priests, naturalists, journalists, Saint-Simonians, riders of every conceivable religious, political, and literary hobby, among whom the successive tutors of the adored Maurice—forming in themselves a line as long as the kings in "Macheth!"— perhaps take the palm for oddness of origin and adaptability of manners.

A second visit to Nohant in the spring following resulted in another view of that quiet, melancholy place of rest:

A gate leads from the garden into the corner of the graveyard where George Sand and her children lie under an ancient yew. Feudal even in burial, they are walled off from the village dead, and the tombstone of Maurice Sand, as well as the monstrous stone chest over his mother's grave, bears the name of Dudevant and asserts a claim to the harmony. Strange consequence of human desires, that the woman who had made her pseudonym illustrious enough to have it assumed by her whole family should cling in death to the obscure name of a repudiated husband; more inconsequent still that the descendant of kings, and the priestess of democracy and Fourierism, should insist on a right to the petty title which was never hers, since it was never Dudevant's to give! On the whole, the gravestones at Nohant are disillusionizing; except indeed that of the wretched Solange, with its four tragic words: "La mère de Jeanne."

Among the many beautiful word-pictures in the volume that tempt the reviewer to their removal from their frames, this is one of broadest view and brightest colors:

The stretch of coast from Toulon to Saint Tropez, so much less familiar to northern eyes than the more eastern portion of the Riviera, has a peculiar nobility, a Virgilian breadth of composition, in marked contrast to the red-rocked precipitous landscape beyond. Looking out on it from the pine-woods of Costehelle, above Hyères, one is beset by classic allusions, analogies of the golden age—so divinely does the green plain open to the sea, between mountain lines of such Attic purity.

After packed weeks of historic and archaeological sensation this surrender to the spell of the landscape tempts one to indefinite idling. It is the season when, through the winter verdure of the Riviera, spring breaks with a hundred tender tints—pale green of crops, white snow of fruit-blossoms, and fire of scarlet tulips under the gray smoke of olive groves. From heights among the cork-trees the little towns huddled about their feudal keeps blink across the pine-forests at the dazzling blue-and-purple indentations of the coast. And between the heights mild valleys widen down—valleys with fields of roses, acres of budding vine, meadows sown with narcissus, and cold streams rushing from the chestnut forests below the bald gray peaks. Among the peaks are lonely hermitages, ruined remains of old monastic settlements, Carthusian and Benedictine; but no great names are attached to these fallen shrines, and the little towns below have no connection with the main lines of history. It is all a tranquil backwater, thick with local tradition, little floating fragments of association and legend; but art and history seem to have held back from it, as from some charmed Elysian region, too calm, too complete, to be rudely touched to great issues.

Another of the great women of France is recalled to memory by the description of the high-perched castle where the lieutenant-governor of Provence, Mme. de Sévigné's son-in-law, ruled. Of its ruin and the cause Mrs. Wharton writes with brevity but forceful application:

This princely edifice remained in unaltered splendor for sixty years after the house of Adhémar, in the person of Mme. de Sévigné's grandson, had died out, ruined and diminished, in 1732. But when the Revolution broke, old memories of the Comte de Grignan's dealings with his people—of unpaid debts, extorted loans, obscure lives devoured by the greedy splendor on the rock—all these recollections, of which one may read the record in various family memoirs, no doubt increased the fury of the onslaught which left the palace of the Adhémar a blackened ruin. If there are few spots in France where one more deeply resents the senseless havoc of the Revolution, there are few where, on second thoughts, one so distinctly understands what turned the cannon on the castle.

The son-in-law of Mme. de Sévigné was the most exorbitant as he was the most distinguished of his race; and it was in him that the splendor and disaster of the family culminated. But probably no visions of future retribution disturbed the charming woman who spent—a victim to her maternal passion—her last somewhat melancholy years in the semi-regal isolation of Grignan. No one but La Bruyère seems, in that day, to have noticed the "swarthy livid animal, crouched over the soil, which he digs and turns with invincible obstinacy, but who, when he rises to his feet, shows a human countenance."

Handsomely printed, illustrated with nearly fifty fine reproductions of photographs, the volume is in every way worthy of its subject, its author, and its publishers. With this book in hand there are many who will decline to envy those who may take such a journey in reality.

South Dakota has voted overwhelmingly to end the famous divorce mill, and it will no longer be possible for discontented wives and husbands to live in South Dakota six months and obtain divorce in secret. The new law provides that the plaintiff in an action for divorce must have been an actual resident of the State in good faith for one year and of the county in which action is begun for three months preceding the suit.

LITERARY NOTES.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Professor Brander Matthews is delivering a series of lectures on Molière before the Lowell Institute, Boston. There are good reports of his story of Molière the dramatist, outlining the steps by which he advanced from the writing of brisk farces to the composition of true comedies, rich in social satire and peopled with characters alive and veracious.

A new book by Mr. Lang on Joan of Arc will appear soon under the title of "The Maid of France: Being the Story of the Life and Death of Jeanne d'Arc." Mr. Lang hopes that he has been able to throw new light on certain obscure parts of the history, and conceives that he has refuted many old and new imputations against the intelligence and greatness of the martyr. The "visions" and "voices" and the discussions of other difficult matters are relegated to appendices.

The first serial began in the London Post in 1719, and was none other than "Robinson Crusoe." Of course, in a sense the serial is much older than that. Boccaccio's "Decameron," for instance, was issued at intervals, and seeing there is some connecting thread running through it, might claim to be the first serial.

William J. Locke, author of "The Beloved Vagabond," "The Morals of Marcus," and "Simple Septimus," is very tall, slender, middle-aged, with the face almost of a scholar behind gold-rimmed eyeglasses, his brows often concentrated in a frown of earnest attention, serious, though kindly, reserved, self-possessed. His yellow hair brushed back from his forehead gives his face a curious alertness.

It has been said of Edward FitzGerald, the translator of Omar Khayyam, that he ran away from his wife because he objected to being compelled to wear a dress suit. There are writers still who object to the conventional in dress, particularly in the matter of collars, but most of them have found it easier to follow than to resist conventions. Even Bernard Shaw has renounced his red tie for evening wear and has succumbed to the inevitable.

Professor Vernon L. Kellogg, writing from Florence of his "life," in response to a request of those interested in his "nature books," says: "Born in Emporia, Kansas, where William Allen White was. I began cbumming with him in the cradle and have kept it up always. Went to University of Kansas (still with White), and there we added Frederick Funston to our crowd of two, and we have kept it a crowd of three ever since. We were fraternity mates and roommates. Liked birds and butterflies from the beginning and have kept liking them." Then follows a detailed account of his travels, his work at Leland Stanford University, and his writings. In conclusion he says: "Married 1908 in Florence to Charlotte Hoffman of California—and am still married and still in Florence." The Funston referred to is General Funston, the captor of Aguinaldo.

All quoters at second hand justify every plagiarism that ever was committed by their current falsifications of Molière; and the able biographers of Whistler have joined in the habitual error (remarks the London Chronicle). Molière never said, "I take my goods where I find them." There is all the difference between a plagiarist by him (which he never was guilty of) and plagiarist of his work by others (which was exceedingly frequent). He came on the track of the pilferers, and reclaimed his property. Unfortunately, all those who copy each other in attributing to him the phrase that was not his are apt to add: "Of course he took whatever he wanted; geniuses always do."

The lecture delivered by Professor Barrett Wendell on "The Privileged Classes" in Chicago last fall will form a portion of a volume to be issued at once by Charles Scribner's Sons. The lecture will lead the volume, and it will be followed by a chapter containing and developing some of the ideas therein set forth, and a paper on "Education," published three or four years ago in the North American Review.

New Publications.

"Dream Blocks," by Aileen Cleveland Higgins, is a book of pleasant verses for little children with excellent colored illustrations by Jessie Wilcox Smith. It is published by Duffield & Co., New York.

The Frederick A. Stokes Company have published "The Child's Rip Van Winkle," adapted from Washington Irving, with twelve illustrations in color by M. L. Kirk. The fine old story is well told and the illustrations are vigorous.

Henry Holt & Co., New York, have published a convenient little volume of "A Hundred Great Poems," selected and arranged by Richard James Cross. The choice is a discriminating one, and the little volume should be a useful library companion.

"Toast and Maxims," published by R. F. Feno & Co., New York, is described as "a book of humor to pass the time, collected from various sources." The numerous illustrations are by Meissonier, Calderon, W. L. Wylie, Glendon, Phil May, P. Jerome Campbell, Frank Reynolds, Edmund Dulac, Lawson Wood, etc. The price is $1.50.

"The Card Club Record," published by Brewer, Barse & Co., Chicago, contains the rules of the best-known card games, with complete record blanks for the games played. It is a useful book for Christmas parties.

"The Henry Hutt Picture Book," published by the Century Company, New York, contains about seventy-five large full-page reproductions of Mr. Hutt's pictures, colored and plain, together with a short biography of the artist. The workmanship is admirable.

Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York, have issued a revised edition of "American Charities," by Amos G. Warner, Ph. D. This work when it first appeared became at once the vade mecum of American philanthropy, and by this new issue, revised, enlarged, and reset, it will certainly maintain the position that it then won. Price, $2.

A delightful book for little children is "The Spring Cleaning," by Frances Hodgson Burnett, published by the Century Company, New York. The story is supposed to be told by Queen Crosspatch, and it gives us one more illustration of the astonishing range of Mrs. Burnett's literary gamut. The colored illustrations are by Harrison Cady.

"The Mascot of Sweet Briar Gulch" is a delightful story of a persecuted waif child who is rescued by Jim Felton and taken by him to his claim in Sweet Briar Gulch. The description of the boy's gratitude and the practical way in which he shows it is a finely pathetic piece of artistic work. The book is published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis.

The American Unitarian Association, Boston, has published the story of "Captain Thomas A. Scott." Captain Scott was a master diver, and he is described as "one who was not afraid and who spoke the truth." Some of his adventures are unique and all of them are worth remembering. The volume appears in the True American Types Series. Price, 60 cents per volume.

"The Suspicions of Mrs. Allonby," by Maxwell Gray, is an amusing story of a woman who, in a fit of pique, undertakes a solitary vacation journey to the south of Europe, only to discover after endless vicissitudes that she has been watched over by her husband and guarded at every turn. The book is rather longer than it need be, but description and dialogue are bright and real. It is published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; $1.50.

"The God of Clay," by H. C. Bailey, is a story of the concluding days of the French Revolution and the dawn of the Napoleonic power. The author deserves credit for an attempt to understand Napoleon and to depict him in fiction. Perhaps he fails to understand the emperor's position in the designed scheme of human advance, but he has at least given us a bold and original portrait as well as a satisfactory if somewhat loosely knit romance. It is published by Brentano's, New York.

A well illustrated story of "How Canada Was Won" has been written by Captain F. S. Brereton and published by the K. M. Caldwell Company, New York and Boston. There is no need to draw upon the imagination for adventures while such thrilling records can be drawn from the pages of history. The hero is a young trapper appointed captain of a band of scouts by Washington. He is at the defense of Fort William Henry, is made prisoner and taken to Quebec, where he is just in time to join the British force in the attack upon Louisbourg and subsequently in the capture of Quebec.

James Whitcomb Riley is certainly doing his share for children this Christmas. The "Orphant Annie Book," illustrated by Ethel Franklin Betts, is for small people, but the adult who can read it without delight ought to be placed under restraint. It is inscribed To all the little children:—The happy ones, and sad ones; The sober and the silent ones; the courteous and glad ones; The good ones—yes, the good ones, too; and all the lovely bad ones.

"The Orphant Annie Book" is published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis.

AN AMERICAN HUSBAND.

And How He Was Hated by the Father of His Mexican Wife.

Don Juan Nepomuceno Mata was giving, as he did every year, a novena of posadas. They had now reached the last celebration of the nine—the 24th of December. To a Northern eye, this would seem a strange eve of Christmas. In the great court-yard of Don Juan Nepomuceno's house a cocoa-palm was rustling; banana-trees drooped their long, silky leaves, with edges whipped to ribbon-fringes; the intense tropical moon-rays brought out, almost as sharply as would electric illumination, the vivid scarlet great whorls of bracts of tall poinsettias, the "Flower of the Nativity"; pink crêpe myrtles made little clouds of pallor against the darker herbage; a clarin—the "hugle-bird" of tropical Mexico—from his cage, hung on a column of the long-arched corridor, was pealing his jubilant call, clear as a trumpet-blast, sweet and tender as the tones of a nightingale.

In the splendid salon of Don Juan Nepomuceno were assembled many persons; most of an extensive parentesco—his kindred—had come, besides numerous friends. They sat, in decorous stiff rows, on the sofas and chairs ranged around the wall, after the fashion of the country. Without leaving their seats, each talked softly to his neighbor.

At the farther end of the long sala was constructed the Nacimiento, desired at this season by every householder, whether high or low, of the faithful. Don Juan Nepomuceno, conservative in all things, was a most consistent churchman.

In this house it was a luxurious display, this objective allegory of the birth of the Saviour of mankind. Here was an artificial hillock, a terraced mound covered with moss, with twigs and branches that stand for trees, banked on a firm foundation against the wall; there were the figures of the three kings, the magi, the shepherds, with their flocks and herds; there, in the little grotto at the apex, were the Virgin Mary and the reverent, reverend Joseph; as yet the Niño, the image of the sweet Babe Divine, was not visible—it would be added on this, the last night of the pasadas. In this Nacimiento of opulent Don Juan Nepomuceno, the trees and moss were not powdered with flour, but with glittering, flashing diamond-dust; for bits of crystal, embedded in the moss, to imitate lakes and pools, here were flakes of rich plate mirror; instead of lighted shreds of wick, floating in clay pannikins of rank oil and shining through colored water in coarse glass bottles, the lights here were scented tapers, shaded by softly-tinted globes; the figurines of angels and men, and all the lower creatures come to the Adoration, were not of cheap, common clay or wood, but of costly wax and porcelain; the canopy of the vault overhead was of rich azure silk, and the stars, sparkling among its veiling clouds of sheer, fine tulle, were all of precious gems. Yet, rich as it was, beautiful as it was, costly as it was, only in cost and finish did this shrine of Don Nepomuceno differ from the Nacimientos built in thousands of homes of the abjectly poor, where the porters, hucksters, washerwomen, water-carriers, aye, heggars themselves! sought by direct appeal to the responsive eye of the flesh to revive and deepen in their hearts the impression of the Divine Passion. And, remembering the humble origin and lowly surroundings of Him whose birth they thus commemorate, who shall say that the poorer showing is not the nearer to His likeness?

"But how the Señor Mata must lavish money!" said Pablo Melendez, one of the guests, to another, José Quintana. "It is easy to see that he has no children for whom to save. Yet—stay—do I mistake? I seem to remember—is it not so that he has a daughter?"

"Hombre! man! pray speak not of that!" cried Señor Quintana, who was a resident of the seaport town, knowing all about their host, whereas Melendez was from the plateau up near Durango; "it is easy, amigo mio, to see that you are a stranger here, and know not whereof you speak. Valgame Dios! if Juan Nepomuceno had heard you! Why, this subject of his daughter is the sorest of all topics. Even his confessor dares not mention her to him!"

"Virgen Santissima! what an escape!" ejaculated Melendez; and, indeed, such a breach of social tact is a very serious matter among the Mexican aristocracy. "But, my dear friend—it is a natural curiosity—we will speak very low—what, then, of the daughter? Is it a question of dishonor?"

"Of disgrace black enough in the eyes of Juan Nepomuceno—yes!" gurgled fat Quintana; "of dishonor, no! Dishonor runs not in the blood of the Matas. The thing is that Elenita married a gringo."

"Married an Americano! But how, then! I fain would marry to one my own Rosita—they make excellent husbands for our maidens. Was this one ill-bred—a pauper? or mala gente—a bad lot?"

"No! no! Nothing of that! He is ingeniero—a civil engineer—you know how well that profession succeeds in Mexico in these days. And he has money of his own, moreover. But Juan Nepomuceno hates all Americans. His father and brothers fell in the War of '46—he himself fought against the stormers of Chapultepec—he had just been entered as a cadet there. He will not see that it was the fortune of war—he makes it a personal wrong—Juan 'Cheno always was terco—pig-headed! Well, when this young Meestair Leencone—a partido all of the most desirable—asked for Elenita, her father raged like a renegran, a black jaguar of the jungle, and covered the young man with insults. But Elenita has of her father's resolution; she invoked the law of appeal for lovers, and had herself given in care of General Valle's family, pending investigation of the character of her pretendiente, which proved beyond suspicion. So, in spite of her father's prejudice, they were married. Since then—it is six years—Juan Nepomuceno will hear no mention of Elenita or of the Americans."

Pablo Melendez wagged his head: "Qué lástima! what a pity!"

"Yes," went on Quintana, "and a pity for the town, too. This new company to put in good and cheap, but they would spend much money and employ some thousand peons—think of that, in these hard times! But our State laws require for this the consent of the Jefe Politico, and Juan 'Cheno will not give it, for the empresarias are American. And he has only just been reelected"—this with naive regret; "but we must be silent; the procession begins."

Most of the guests had formed in double file, and, bearing lighted candles, they marched through the rooms and corridors, singing chants, intoning the Litany, and now and then pausing to ask for posada (lodgings), in imitation of the movements and halts of the Holy Family, seeking shelter in Bethlehem of Judea. The uncomfortably stout among the matrons remained seated, to represent the pasaderos. Presently the cura gave his blessing, that the march might not be prolonged to fatigue, and so interfere with the subsequent dancing.

As the chosen one started to lay the babe's image in the manger, there was a stir, whispering, and tittering among the servants hanging about the court-yard for peeps through the doors. Then came the clip-clap of light but decided little steps, and a child entered the sala. She looked about five years old. She carried herself with confidence. She was dressed prettily and simply. Her face was very fair, and her long hair was light, but her eyes—"Son ojos del país" ("They are the eyes of the country"), said they who looked upon her.

As if by instinct, she went straight to Don Juan Nepomuceno.

"Señor," she said, very plainly and clearly, "I knocked, and your partero wished not to let me come in, but I would! And the people in the patio—I made them let me pass to the sala—they were but servants, and I knew their master would let me rest here—is it not so, señor—until Mamacita and Papacito come to find me. I came out of the hotel to see the toy-sellers, and I lost me, and I am very tired and sleepy."

"The precious child!" "A little seraph!" "And she has come to seek pasada, like the Santa Niño!" cried the ladies, moved fairly to tears by the little stranger. Child-like, she swerved aside, to the waxen image, and touched it gently.

"It is not—I thought it was a real baby, but—oh! I know! it is the Holy Child! Why! why! he was tired, too, and there was no house for him. But"—she turned back to Don Juan Nepomuceno with sweetest confidence—"you will take care of me, for my Mamacita—no, señor?"

"Of a truth, then, I will, mi alma—my soul!" said the old caballero; by this only he in the room had not seen that the artless face of the child was a lovable replica of his own stern features; "but to find thy parents—tell me thy name!"

"Oh, they will find me! But my name is Juana Nepomucena Lincoln y Mata"—she added her mother's to her father's surname in real Spanish fashion.

Don Juan Nepomuceno gasped. "I knew not there was a child," he said to himself, "and they have given her my name!"

The iron-mailed hand on the great street-door clanged on the buckler that was its knocker. A moment later a voice spoke in the patio, in excellent Spanish, but with strong foreign accent:

"Oh, Señor Arriaga! I am glad you chance to be in the court—you will kindly bear my message, and spare my entering to intrude on Señor Mata? The gendarme on the corner told me he saw my little daughter wander in here. We came to the port again to take ship tomorrow and the child slipped away from the hotel—we have twenty men out searching—my wife is frantic with distress and dread. Will you kindly bring the little one out to me?"

Don Juan Nepomuceno strode to the sala's door: "Carlos Lincoln, you took my child from me, and yours has brought her back again. Go quick and fetch your wife. Your little girl!—the old man looked down fondly at the child nestled in his arms—"has found her posado—her true and rightful lodging!"

LYDIA THOMPSON'S CAREER.

Memories of the Famous Burlesque Actress Stirred by Her Death.

Lydia Thompson, the best-known burlesque actress of her day, died suddenly at her home, Westminster Mansions, near Westminster Abbey, London, England, on Tuesday, November 17. The news of her death was cabled to her daughter, Zeffie Tilbury, the actress, whose husband, L. F. Woodthorpe, is stage manager for Nat C. Goodwin. The following brief and authoritative summary of her achievements is from the New York Clipper:

Miss Thompson was born in London, England, February 19, 1841, and made her first appearance on the stage as a principal dancer in the ballet at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, England, in 1852. On December 26 of the following year she began her dramatic career as Little Silver Hair, in the pantomime at the Haymarket Theatre, London, in which she created a great impression by her original and natural acting and dancing. The following season she made a great success in "Little Bo-Peep," and her next engagement was at the Drury Lane, London, where she remained for three months, during the performance of the German Opera Company.

She then went to the St. James, then under the management of Mrs. Seymour, where she created a sensation by her imitation of the celebrated Spanish dancer, Perea Nena. Fol-

After three years in America Miss Thompson went back to England to get new costumes. She brought with her on her return to America Rose Coghlan and Eliza Weathersby, the latter afterward the wife of Nat C. Goodwin. The successful burlesques were continued. A tour to the Pacific Coast at that time spread Miss Thompson's popularity. Her personal success may be indicated by the fact that even the hoothlacks in Cincinnati are said to have subscribed their dimes when money was being raised to present Lydia Thompson with a silver wreath.

In all Miss Thompson made four visits to America, appearing in "Oxygen" and other old burlesques. Her last visit was cut short by the death of her husband in England. The American tours are said to have brought her $500,000, the greater part of which was lost.

Lydia Thompson made her last stage appearance with Mrs. Patrick Campbell, in "A Queen's Romance," at the Imperial Theatre, London, England, in 1895. She had lived in retirement in London for many years, making rare visits to her daughter in this country. In 1899 she was the recipient of a memorable complimentary benefit in the Lyceum Theatre, London.

In the New York Dramatic Review there is a column of editorial comment, from which these paragraphs are taken:

The graybeards, who may enjoy the theatre of today yet cherish surpassing memories, will mourn at once their youth and the passing of Lydia Thompson. This was the woman who introduced to this country the "British Blondes" and a type of burlesque that had a legitimacy lacking in the modern style of entertainment which passes under that description. It was more or less witty—though possibly also more or less heavy, considered by modern standards—dealing with such characters, real and mythical, as Christopher Columbus and Ali Baha, the clever person associated with the Forty Thieves, Little Bo-Peep, and others. Such men as Burnand, long the editor of Punch, and H. J. Byron wrote these pieces, and they were the pleasing stage sensations of their period.

Lydia Thompson, too, was the introducer here of the feminine form in tights, but was not that a logical part of her scheme of beautiful women? She used to say, too, that there was nothing wrong in tights when tights were properly worn, and brought forward certain apparitions of Shakespeare's heroines in proof of her contention.

And why should she have objected, indeed? She adorned tights, as tights were an adornment to her and her companions. And there were fine women in her company, intellectually as well as physically. Several of them won distinction in after years on the dramatic stage and others ornamented domestic life. One of them, Pauline Markham, won classic compliments from Richard Grant White, that exemplar in diction, who called her voice "vocal velvet," and declared that she possessed the missing arms of the Venus de Milo.

Lydia Thompson, like so many of her company, won a clearer dramatic distinction in later life than when she was more definitely an object of exceptional sightliness. The memories she left are in the main admirable, though she will be remembered best by the grandfathers.

lowing her St. James engagement she played the continent, her first appearance being in Berlin. Later she went to Russia, and Hungary was also visited, her last engagement during that tour being in Moscow.

Returning to England, she reappeared at the St. James October 1, 1859, in a new piece called "Magic Toys." This engagement was followed by appearances at the Lyceum, Drury Lane, Prince of Wales and, at the Strand, in Brough's burlesque, "The Field of the Cloth of Gold," in which her remarkable versatility was shown to great advantage.

On August 12, 1868, Miss Thompson sailed for the first time for America, bringing with her Ada Harland, a charming little lady, later the wife of Brander Matthews; Liza Weber, Pauline Markham, Michael Connolly, musical director, and Harry Beckett. Not any of these players had been to America before that time. Alexander Henderson, their manager, whom Miss Thompson afterwards married, was with them, Mr. Colville having preceded them.

The company, which later came to be known as the British Blondes, first appeared in America at Wood's Museum, now Daly's Theatre, September 28, 1868. The burlesque was Burnand's "Ixion," and the cast, with the exception of Venus (Pauline Markham), Mercury (Liza Weber), Jupiter (Ada Harland), Minerva (Harry Beckett), and Ixion (Lydia Thompson), was composed of American actors and actresses. In Wood's regular company which supported them were Mary Wells, Alice and Kate Logan, Aggie Wood, Sol Smith, Jr., M. C. Daly, Lewis Mestayer, and others.

A VICOMTE'S VAGARY.

How Gaston de Banville Mingled Amateur Mendacity and Love.

The little Vicomte de Banville in his younger days made no small pretensions to being a "sad dog." He particularly enjoyed flirtations, which is not to be wondered at; but he preferred them complicated, which, to my mind, is a mistake. In love, as in cookery, the simplest is the best, and, moreover, does not pall so quickly.

He was forever dreaming of intrigues, disguises, and mysteries. If he had had the task of reconstructing the old legends, he would have made Romeo scale Juliet's balcony as a telegraph-line repairer.

One day after a luncheon—which would have been a dinner if the sun had not still been up, so much champagne had been consumed at it—Gaston de Banville laid a wager that before six o'clock that evening—it was then nearly four—he would return with at least three francs collected by singing in the streets.

Twenty minutes later, an unkempt, tattered, and generally suspicious-looking individual emerged from the famous restaurant where the party had been dining, and stopped at a large house in an adjacent street. It was Gaston, who lacked nothing for his rôle of street-singer. An hour later, his companions beheld him reënter the room where they were awaiting him with the best patience in the world.

"There you are," he announced, tossing on the table a louis and a voluminous package. "I have won my bet, and stand a fair chance of winning a very pretty little woman."

"In so short a time!" they cried. "But what is the trophy?—the husband's head?"

"No," said Gaston, "only his trousers. But I can say no more, the tale involves the honor of a lady of high degree."

In vain did his friends endeavor to extract anything more from him. Topsy as he was, the hero of the afternoon's adventure was dumb as an oyster. Less discreet than he, I shall recount his adventures.

When De Banville entered the court of No. 75, Rue Duphot, the Baronne de Pompinet was leaning out of a window, watching the movements of her pet fox-terrier, which was playing in the court. Evidently the dog had no ear for music, for no sooner did the pretended heggar open his mouth to sing—at the same time, from force of habit, directing an admiring glance at the fair lady before him—than Punch trotted up to him, and, on a hostile demonstration from the singer, flew at the latter and planted his teeth in an undefended portion of his anatomy.

The haroness uttered a shriek, and Gaston, foreseeing his inability to collect the stipulated sum, and his consequent loss of the bet, was departing, furious, to repair his wardrobe, when a trim little maid came running after him.

"Here," she said, slipping a franc into his hand; "here is something the baroness sends you. Is it enough?"

"Enough!" cried De Banville, with a disgust that was not all simulated, "why, my pants is all tore, to say nothing of my wounds!"

"Well, you can come and settle the matter with my mistress. It would be better than going to the police."

Miss Annette could have added that her mistress had already been defendant in a dozen suits for assaults of this kind committed by Punch, and had lost every one of them.

Half an hour later, Gaston took leave of the baroness, hearing away, beside his twenty francs, a collection of delicious smiles, a worn pair of the haron's trousers in place of his own, which had suffered heavy losses in the encounter with the dog, and even a letter of credit on the druggist at the corner. But the pretended heggar had no need of liniments and salves, for Punch, for once in his life, had leaped too short and Gaston's hide was whole.

As he was going down the servants' stairway, the pretended invalid gallantly saluted Mlle. Annette on her blooming cheek. The girl did not get angry, for the viscount was not so badly grimed that he was not still a good-looking young fellow.

"What do you mean, sir?" she cried; "are you crazy?"

"Yes," replied Punch's victim; "your dog has given me hydrophobia, and that's the way I bite."

But De Banville was revolving in his brain a machiavellian scheme directed against the peace of the haroness, who pleased him prodigiously. That very evening he sent her anonymously a handsome houquet. The next day he appeared beneath her window again, wearing the haron's trousers, a particularly delicate attention. Mme. de Pompinet appeared again, and hestowed on him a franc and a smile, on which latter he set a very high valuation. The following day, another smile and another piece of money, but in an envelope this time, and with a note. The affair was becoming interesting. Scarcely had Gaston got out into the street, when he tore the note open.

"At about four o'clock [it ran], go to No. 82, Rue du Cirque, and sing an air from 'The Huguenots.' You will be repaid for your trouble."

"Well, well," thought the viscount, "if I please her in these atrocious togs, what will she say when she sees me in all the splendor of my own apparel? What extraordinary creatures these blasé women of society are! But why does she send me to the Rue du Cirque? She will be there, doubtless, concealed behind some friend's curtains. Well, we shall see."

Promptly at four, Gaston was at the appointed place, singing:

"Piu hianca del velo."

But he saw nothing unusual and went away at last with two sous given him by a little girl.

The following day the haroness again sent him to the Rue du Cirque; but this time it was "Faust" that he must sing. You should have seen the feeling with which De Banville sang:

"Salve dimora casta et pura."

But again nothing untoward happened. Still, instead of his lover-like impatience, his pride as an artist was satisfied. He hore away with him a collection of fourteen sous.

It was now time to take a decisive step. That evening, in his offering of flowers—the fourth—the haroness found the following note, unsigned and in an unknown hand:

"It is an admirable trait to love music, but the artists themselves deserve encouragement. Do you not think that the duo from 'Faust' is worthy of being sung in some more private place than a court?"

As she read these lines, the poor Baroness de Pompinet almost fainted.

"Great heavens!" she cried, "some one knows my secret. I am lost!"

She did not close her eyes that entire night.

While the haroness was rumpling the lace of her pillow under her uneasy little blonde head, Gaston, in the smoking-room of his club, had just ended the recital of the events narrated, keeping to himself, of course, the names of streets and persons.

"And what are you going to do now?" he was asked; "for you surely do not intend to keep up your present rôle forever?"

"What am I going to do? Tomorrow the street-singer will give way to the man of the world. You can imagine the stupefaction of the lady when I say to her: 'I still come to heg of you. But I am not a mercenary heggar, and I prefer the gift of your smiles.' Eh, hoys, what a tableau that will make!"

"What new joke is Gaston telling you?" asked the Marquis de Plessin, who entered the room just then.

"Oh, nothing much," said Gaston, nonchalantly, "just a little adventure of mine. I was amusing them with the tricks of a woman."

"Faith, in the matter of tricks, men need not try to rival women. Just listen to this: A charming friend of mine has a most dependable husband, you can never tell whether he is going to go out or to stay at home. Now, can you guess what she has devised to keep me posted on the programme of the day? Why, she hires a poor heggar of a street-singer to come and sing before my house. We have a code agreed upon beforehand. Each opera has a special significance. 'The Huguenots' means 'I am waiting for you.' 'Faust' is 'Not today.' 'William Tell' is 'I shall be in the Bois.' And so on. It is a great scheme."

The shout of laughter that greeted this recital could be heard four squares away. Gaston alone did not join in it.—Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Léon de Tinseau.

THOMAS HILL, ARTIST.

The recent death of Thomas Hill, the landscape painter, was one of the closing events, it is felt by Californian artists, of an important epoch in the development of things artistic in this State. He was one of the first to make the world at large realize, forty or fifty years ago, that on this western coast—generally regarded as a region, somewhat beyond the bounds of civilization, where comfortable fortunes were uncomfortably made—there were men who painted pictures that were worth considering. Hill was, in fact, one of the "pathfinders" for those artists who have since won fame for themselves by sending out pictures exploiting the beauties of California.

"Tom" Hill, as he was universally known, did more to create an artistic "atmosphere" in San Francisco, probably, than any other one man. Cheery, genial, and jovial, he was an acknowledged leader among the artists here during the early seventies, when he was at the height of his fame and was doing his best work.

In addition to this, he was making his influence felt among the younger men who have succeeded his generation of painters. He and his intimate friend and associate, Virgil Williams, were among those most interested in forming the San Francisco Art Association, and a few years later he aided Williams in founding the School of Design. Hill was also one of the founders of the Bohemian Club.

It has been said of him that he was temperamentally a painter rather than an artist in that he was possessed of a well-balanced mind and had few of the peculiarities and vagaries that are usually considered attributes of men of genius. To this, too, may be ascribed much of his personal popularity.

Liberal to an extreme, although "red hot after money," to quote an old-time friend and companion, he insisted upon being the host on all occasions. To quote again, "He must always pay for everything—his friends must all smoke his cigars." He loved company, and could always paint his best pictures when a half-dozen friends were wandering in and out of his studio, gossiping, smoking, and criticising his work.

Another proof of his type of disposition lies in the fact that he had no "fads" in his work, but painted nature in all its phases with equal ability and understanding. Landscape artists are prone to develop their talents in some particular line—one will devote himself to moonlight scenes, another to sand dunes, another to oaks, heeches, or Monterey cypresses, but Hill painted anything, from babbling brooks to mountain ranges.

It was through his Yosemite pictures that he won his greatest fame, although he did many other Western scenes. Huge canvases he painted—5x7 feet and even larger, giving wonderful glimpses of the valley, its cliffs, its peaks, its waterfalls and streams—and these he sold readily both in this country and Europe. Apart from the artistic worth of these pictures, they had the charm of novelty. The Yosemite Valley was comparatively unknown then. It was difficult of access, was visited by none save the most enthusiastic, and pictorially it was altogether an unknown quantity.

Hill's work there was reciprocal in a measure, for, as he won fame through his presentations of the views in the Yosemite, he in turn did more than any one else to bring the first recognition and appreciation of its marvels.

One of the largest of his pictures is a view of the valley which hangs in the Crocker gallery in Sacramento, and which is pronounced by artists to be probably the best he ever painted.

Many of the newly made millionaires of California and the Middle West were among Hill's best patrons, and from them he received many thousands of dollars for his pictures.

Hill, like many other artists of note, began his career in an humble way. Born in England in 1829, he came with his parents to America in 1840 and made his home in Massachusetts for some years. Before he was fifteen years old he discovered, through working with a carriage painter in the little town where his father had settled, that in paints lay his delight, and he determined to be an artist. Going to Boston, he began work with a decorator, earning his first money and taking the initial step in his artistic life by making pictorial and floral designs for window shades.

While very young he began painting pictures, but achieved nothing worthy of recognition until he was nearly twenty-five, when he went to Philadelphia and studied in a life class of which Rothermel was the president. In 1858 he won the first medal for a picture he exhibited at the Maryland Institute in Baltimore. A few years later his health began to fail and he decided to try the climate of California.

Portrait painting was occupying his attention at that time, and when he came here in 1861 he opened a studio and painted the portraits of a number of prominent San Franciscans. The whereabouts of practically none of these portraits is known at the present time, and the few which hung in the Bohemian Club rooms were destroyed by the fire of 1906.

At this time Hill did some figure work as well, his most notable picture of that period being the trial scene from "The Merchant of Venice," which won the first prize in the San Francisco Art Union in 1865. This is now the property of his son, Robert Hill, and hangs in the latter's home in this city now.

Even at this introductory stage of his career Hill found his art remunerative, and in 1866 went abroad to study, leaving his family in San Francisco. His stay of a year in Europe seems to have been singularly rich, both in artistic development and personal experiences. He studied in Paris during most of the year under Paul Meyerheim, by whose advice he gave up portrait and figure painting and devoted his talents altogether to landscape work. While there Hill was thrown in contact, in an informal and, in fact, intimate way with many of the most interesting people both in and out of the artistic circle, and he never wearied of relating tales of men and women who were then or subsequently became famous.

When he returned to America he decided to remain in the East, and sent for his wife and children to join him in Boston. In his studio in that city he began to paint his Yosemite views, and did a number of scenes in New England as well. Several of the latter were purchased by Prang and were reproduced as chromos.

Three or four years later Hill's health began to fail and he came to San Francisco again. Then began the most brilliant period of his life. Popular and talented, he was surrounded by an admiring throng of friends and followers and achieved his greatest successes. Some of his best pictures were "Yosemite Valley" and "Donner Lake," which were purchased by Senator Stanford, after having been awarded the first medal at the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia.

Other notable paintings of the Californian mountains which he made about that time and which he sold for small fortunes were "The Heart of the Sierras" and "The Grand Cañon of the Sierras."

Owing to ill health, Hill spent the last twenty-five years of his life among his beloved Sierras, living most of the time at Wawona and having a home near Raymond as well.

Because of his illness, Hill painted little of value for several years before his death, although he left a number of small paintings and sketches in his Wawona studio. A curious bit of his later work is a panel owned by his son, Robert Hill. It shows a giant redwood tree, with a glimpse of road and other smaller trees, painted on a smoothly planed redwood board. The trunk of the big tree is unpainted, however, the bark being represented by the redwood panel itself.

When Hill died, at the end of last June, he left an estate which is valued approximately at $45,000 and consisting almost entirely of his paintings. His son, Robert Hill, and his son-in-law, John S. Washburn of Wawona, are the executors, and they expect to arrange for the sale of these pictures a little later, although nothing has been decided as yet as to the details of their disposition. There are but few of Hill's larger canvases left to sell, and among these are the famous picture, "The Driving of the Last Spike," painted in commemoration of the connection of the East and West by the joining of the Central Pacific and Union Pacific railroads; "Grand Cañon of the Colorado," "Muir Glacier," and "The Grand Cañon of the Yellowstone," all of which are in the Golden Gate Park Museum; a "Yosemite Valley" hangs at Del Monte, and another view of the valley is in Los Angeles; at Wawona are "Waverly Oaks," and "Salmon Festival, Alaska."

Millet.

"Twas truth he sought, and men's hearts, not their praise,
Nor glory, wealth, or idle tinkling word.
Rich Nature's gifts his noble mind preferred
To those of men; and in a thousand ways
She was revealed unto his raptured gaze.
He loved the charm found in the changing sky,
Or from it bid in forest gloom to lie;
Or watch the light upon the slopes where graze
The bleating herds. So loving Nature be
The crowded streets and shining halls did shun
To seek the woods and open fields; where none
There dwelt, but toiling, sweating men; by toil
And sweat thus gaining life. Calm majesty
He found in these bent laborers of the soil.
—T. C. Cole, in The Craftsman.

In the Passage.

"Mark you his look," they said,
"How rapt, how fond! Fair on him, still at sea, Foregleams the haven where he longs to be."
Yet tho aright they read
His dying eyes, 't was be alone that saw
The wind-swept curtains down a silent flaw
Slant toward the candle's bead.

And when his lips grown chill
Half-shaped a whisper strange, they said, "He greets
Celestial escorts now, and welcome meets
This side the shining Hill";
And he the while, far off along the lane
Of dreams, went whistling home the cows again
By meadows dusk and still.

They thought in that husbed room
Almost they heard the heavenly voices call
As at the last he listened toward the wall;
But outside, in the hloom
Of passing summer, in his passing ear
The cricket-choir sang vespers quaint and clear,
And early piped him home.
—William Hervey Woods, in Scribner's Magazine.

Melancholy in the Garden.

"Nature bath spent at last her shining store,
And I have lived my day," the painter said
Who felt the arrowy throe, the dizzied bead,
And laid his palette down for evermore.
Well had he learned the melancholy lore
That trains the rose, without a murmur made,
To create the clusters of her royal red,
And strew her beauty on the windy shore.
Some warning, surely, 'rust I read tonight,
In flower, tree, in flying light and cloud;
It is the voice of Death, not near, nor loud,
But whispering from some cypress out of sight,
That bids me hearken for the feathery flight,
And drawing robes across my shoulders hewed.
—Edmund Gosse, in "The Autumn Garden."

On a Portrait of Servetus.

Thou grim and baggard wanderer who dost look
With haunting eyes forth from the narrow page—
I know what fires consumed with inward rage Thy broken frame, what tempests billed and shook!
Ab, could not thy remorseless foeman brook
Time's sure devoutment, but must needs assuage
His anger in thy blood, and blot the age
With that dark crime which virtue's semblance took!
Servetus! that which slew thee lives today,
Though in new forms it taints our modern air;
Still in heaven's name the deeds of hell are done;
Still on the high road, 'neath the noonday sun,
The fires of hate are lit for them who dare
Follow their Lord along the untrodden way.
—Richard Watson Gilder.

Prices at the Kaiser's royal opera house have again been put up, parquet and first balcony seats now selling from $2 to $2.50. Two or three years ago the same seats sold for $1.50; later they were raised to $2, and now have gone up again. The people of Berlin declare that it is unjust to treat German opera-goers on a transatlantic basis, because in comparison with the United States, England, and France the fatherland is a poor country. The Kaiser is accustomed to meet the annual deficit at the royal opera out of his own pocket, and it is possible that he cherishes the not abnormal desire partially to recoup his losses in these days of universal retrenchment. The increasing expense of seats at the royal opera has induced the managers of several local theatres to convert their establishments into opera houses, where the best seats are obtainable at prices the royal management demands for places immediately under the roof of the royal.

The news that the Duchess de Chaulnes (who was Miss Theodora Shonts of New York) was the mother of a son, a posthumous child, came recently by cable. The posthumous boy is heir to his father's ancient title, he inherits the chateau Dampierre and, in the natural course will inherit the fortune his mother will receive from her parents. The duchess is the mother of a duke, and so is as closely related as before to half the aristocratic families in France. Had the baby been a girl the De Chaulnes title would have passed to the family of the Duke de Luyne. Besides giving her the happiness of motherhood, the boy preserves her social position.

Some one has discovered a new design for the hrooch, which may not unreservedly commend itself to all who read. This is to have the State of the Union in which one was horn "done" in enamel with a jewel to mark the place of hirth, preferably, no doubt, the hirthstone. Jewelers might have a hard time keeping up with the demand if the fad once got fairly started.

MASSENET'S "JONGLEUR."

First Production of the Opera in New York, at the Manhattan Opera House.

At the Manhattan Opera House in New York on November 27, Mr. Hammerstein gave the first American production of Massenet's "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame." Of the opera and the occasion, the critic of the New York Evening Post says:

Jules Emile Frédéric Massenet is a most prolific composer. In thirty-six years he has written seventeen operas, and a considerable proportion of them have held their own, which means that he, who once made his living by playing the kettledrums at $13 a month, is now a man of wealth, who need not write operas unless the spirit moves him to do so. Oscar Comettant relates how Massenet, when he was a pupil in the Paris Conservatoire, was dismissed from Bazin's harmony class as a dunce, and shortly afterwards was advised to leave Reber's class because he learned too rapidly. However it may have been about his learning, he certainly composes too rapidly for one who would like to have his works survive him. But perhaps Massenet doesn't care. Few things survive in the modern flood of productions, and probably he is content if he can agreeably entertain his contemporaries with a new opera every year or two.

With the aid of Mary Garden and Renaud, Oscar Hammerstein has already made one diæval miracle play—one of those legends of monks and marvels which used to be so popular that they had to be enacted in cemeteries and market places because the churches would not hold all who were eager to hear them. Jean, a young juggler, poorly attired and hungry, joins a fourteenth-century crowd of peasants, monks, clerks, knights, and their wives and daughters, in front of the Abbey of Cluny. He mentions diverse tricks of his trade wherewith he offers to entertain them, but they will have none of these old things. Finally they consent to listen to a drinking song. While he is singing it the door of the abbey opens violently, and the prior appears. All escape except Jean. The prior reprimands and tries to persuade him to abandon his wicked profession, and turn monk. Jean is disinclined to give up his freedom, but when Boniface, the cook, appears with a donkey laden with vegetables, sausages, poultry, and other things good to eat, not to speak of flasks of wine, his hunger becomes the prior's ally, and he succumbs.

In the second act we find Jean an inmate of the monastery. He has grown rotund, and indolent. Four other monks, each intent on his work as painter, musician, sculptor, or poet, get into a dispute as to the superiority of their art, each one advising Jean to adopt his one. The prior ends the dispute and takes them to the chapel. Jean is left alone with Boniface, the cook; he laments that he alone, knowing no Latin and no fine art, has nothing to offer the virgin; but Boniface tells one breathes the very air of mediæval legend in listening to it; and the same is true of the "Jongleur de Notre Dame," which is equally mediæval and monastic.

Massenet has not Wagner's faculty of creating original themes, of developing and combining them polyphonically, and clothing them in an orchestral garb of unearthly heauty and novelty; yet he is a real melodist in his own way—one of the few now existing—and there is a peculiar Gallic charm in his orchestral coloring, which is delicate, varied, and appropriate. From this point of view the "Jongleur" is commendable, and it is needless to say that Mr. Campanini allowed none of the charms of the score to remain hidden.

From "The Fire-Fly's Lovers," by William E. Griffis. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.

of the neglected Massenet operas—"Thais"—popular here. Last night he produced another one at the Manhattan, with the same artists. "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame" took six years to reach New York; it had its first hearing in 1892 at Monte Carlo, and on June 14, 1906, it was given in London. In a number of German cities it has also been produced successfully.

It is a work of singular aspect. Wagner's "Siegfried" is an opera in which men have to do most of the singing and acting. Nevertheless, there are feminine episodes—the charming song of the forest bird and the thrilling warning of Erda, while the last half-hour is a duo in which Brünnhilde's voice and soul are gloriously revealed. In "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame" all the rôles are for men—a juggler, a cook, and five monks. Would such an opera—without the Ewig Wehliche in the guise, or, rather, the disguise, of a prima donna to attract the public—appeal to New Yorkers? Oscar Hammerstein had his doubts; so Massenet was prevailed upon to alter the rôle of the juggler sufficiently to make it possible for Mary Garden to assume it in male garb; and with this change it was heard last night.

As compared with "Tiefland," "Thais," "I Pagliacci," "Tosca," and most other modern operas, "The Juggler of Notre Dame" shows what an ideal, peaceful abode this planet is in the absence of woman. The libretto (by Maurice Lena) is based on one of the stories in Anatole France's "Etui deacre," which in turn harks back to a me-him a legend about Mary and the infant Jesus, whose life was saved by a humble flower, which convinces Jean that the Virgin is not proud and that in her eyes the juggler is as good as a king.

He makes up his mind to do homage in his own way, and in the third act he carries out this plan, going through his various juggler's tricks in front of the image of the Virgin. He is seen by one of the monks and the prior is hastily summoned. Scandalized by the sacrilege, the prior shouts "Anathema!" while Boniface pleads for pardon. The juggler has sunk exhausted on the steps of the altar, and the monks, furious, are about to throw themselves on him, when Boniface stops them with a gesture toward the statue of the Virgin, which has come to life, and with a loving look and gesture of the hands blesses Jean. "Miracle!" cry the monks; the voices of angels are heard, a bright light envelops the Virgin, the monks fall on their knees, and Jean, exclaiming, "At last I understand Latin!" expires.

Massenet has much in common with Gounod. Like the composer of "Faust," he loved two themes above all others—frail femininity and religious ecstasy. In "Thais" the two are combined; in the "Jongleur" we have only the mystic ecstasies of the monastery, and those the composer expresses musically with a delightful art of creating atmosphere. Atmosphere is what modern audiences crave above all things; to Debussy's skill in creating it the success of his "Pelléas et Melisande" is owing. "Parsifal" is intensely atmospheric—

UNDRAMATIC "PEER GYNT."

By Josephine Hart Phelps.

Richard Mansfield, during the later years of his career, was the king of the American stage, and the king could do no wrong. The time came that all notable actors dread, when he needed a new play, and there was no new play forthcoming. So he looked over the field of dramatic literature, selected the undramatic "Peer Gynt" laid in a supply of fine scenery, and lo! because he was Richard Mansfield, all his following turned out, and his faithful admirers studiedly or unstudiedly—according to temperament—overlooked the fact that "Peer Gynt" is essentially undramatic, utterly lacks continuity of action, and is intrinsically unsuited to stage representation.

Louis James, being likewise in need of a new play, cannily brought out the Mansfield fixings, and is trying to make "Peer Gynt" a go. But it is only as an Ibsen curio that it will draw. It is really almost as unsuited for the stage as the second part of "Faust," which, by the way, it is apt to bring to the mind, on account of certain resemblances.

The philosophy of life, as outlined by Ibsen, leads, after all, to the same summing up as in Goethe's stupendous work. The redemption of the erring soul of man, in both cases, is brought about by the union of constancy, purity, and love in the soul of the Ever Womanly. For Solveig's place in the destiny of Peer Gynt forms a parallel to that of the purified and hallowed Marguerite, who, at the close of Faust's long, restless, earthly pilgrimage, guides him to his high place among the angelic hosts.

There are also excursions made by Peer Gynt into the realms where magic is practiced; which, by the way, affords opportunity for the most effective spectacular scene in the whole play.

The assembling of the Trolls in the hall of the Dovre King, the aspect of the elfish, malicious ruler over his snarling gnomes, the weird noises emitted by the hand, and their strange hoppings and crouchings, faintly seen in the mysterious shadows of the rocky glen, formed a scene and picture that would thrill an imaginative youngster with ecstasy, and that interested and entertained the grown-up contingent more than anything else in the play, more particularly as there was an extremely unique and clever representation of the Dovre King made by J. Arthur Young, whose work received from a somewhat puzzled and stunned audience something of the appreciation it deserved.

Louis James, in acting the rôle of Peer Gynt, foreswore exaggeration and over-comic uncton, and acted with simplicity and sincerity. This was particularly felt in the scene in which Asa, mother of Gynt, dies, while the hare-brained son is amusing himself and he-guiling his mother by feigning that her bed is a sleigh which he is driving to the gates of St. Peter. Her death, and the grief of the son, following upon all the fantasy of preceding scenes, comes as a human interlude that, in spite of its sadness, is peculiarly acceptable.

But so large an element of egotism, foolishness, selfishness, and restless vanity go to the making up of Peer Gynt's character that, although he is, presumably, typical of man with his inconstancy, his cruel heedlessness in the pursuit of pleasure, and the colossal egotism of his imaginative flights, still, metaphysics are not properly located in the theatre, which should be a temple for the cultivation of sympathetic emotion.

While witnessing a dramatic representation of "Peer Gynt" our poor sympathies are left dangling, their threads waving helplessly in the rarified atmosphere of imaginative philosophy, trying to find something normal and simply human to which to attach themselves.

Solveig's is the only figure that appeals to our grateful perception of what is gentle, pure, and tender, and to it we willingly extend almost the sympathy that is naturally granted to more conventional characters in the drama. That we do not altogether do so is due to the fact that the mist composed of a blending of poetry, philosophy, and metaphysics, which obscures the true significance of "Peer Gynt," is altogether too much for us.

Louis James has not permitted himself to lapse too far from Mansfield's original achievement, and the piece is put on in first-class style, and well acted. There are several tremendously effective settings, among others one showing a ship tossing upon huge billows, and eventually going down to its doom.

A further element of pleasure to the audience is found in the exquisitely beautiful "Peer Gynt" music of Grieg, which is heard, in connection with the more dramatic scenes, almost continuously throughout the performance.

"A-many years ago," or, no, not so very, very many, unless one is in the teens and counts a decade as a century—well, at any rate, quite a sizable number of years ago, a first-class New York company (Frohman's, probably) gave an excellent representation here of Bronson Howard's "Aristocracy," the play selected by the Valencia Theatre management for the bringing out of their new stock company.

The hero of "Aristocracy" is one Jefferson Stockton, a Western multi-millionaire, who is a man of character and large ideas. In the beginning of the play he had already treated himself to a handsome young wife, and in order to silence some doubts and repinings she has been expressing about her social status in the effete East, he calmly spends a fortune for the purpose of securing his pampered bride an historic town house, and a social hacking in London town that would be sure to make her Eastern sister aspirants green with envy. In London Mrs. Stockton is socially and successfully launched, and there meets, subjugates, and is almost subjugated by a Viennese prince, whose character, career, and ambitions approximate very closely to those of the various European noblemen wedded to American heiresses who figure freely and numerously in divorce courts, and suits to secure slices of their wives' millions.

Sometimes it is apparent that the strict rules of precedence governing the assignment of rôles in a theatrical company are altogether too strict. I remember in the Frohman production that they assigned the rôle of Jefferson Stockton, of all men, to Maurice Barrymore, an actor who had an ineradicable elegant accent and could no more shed his air of being a man of the world than the leopard can change his spots.

Jefferson Stockton is a man, the real thing, you know, and no mistake, while the prince is a sort of broadcloth dummy, made up, externally, of the plunthio of social etiquette, and internally of rank immorality and secret license. He is like dozens, hundreds, of his peers, while the American millionaire, who is supposed to be a little crude and abrupt in the drawing-room, is a virile enough figure, and has a fine scene, which makes American blood rather tingle with satisfaction, in which is shown the immense moral and physical superiority of the sturdy Westerner of clean life and genuine manliness over the corrupt, debased descendant of a hundred princes, who crumbles to nothing when it comes to an issue between primitively fighting, hare-fisted man and man.

At the past and gone representation of which I speak William Faversham was the prince—a very satisfactory representation of one, too—and Blanche Walsh, always a little inflexible and unalluring, in spite of her undeniable beauty and fine physical equipment, was Mrs. Stockton.

Curiously enough, the same incongruity exists in the assignment of the leading characters at the Valencia as existed then. In spite of the superior acting possibilities in the rôle of the husband, Robert Warwick, who made him too easy and elegant in appearance and manner, and too much a well-bred man of the world, should have been the prince. We could then better have understood the spell that Von Holdenwald exerted over the troubled senses of the American wife.

And, as with Blanche Walsh, Blanche Stoddard, in spite of her excellent stage presence, is a little too stern and commanding in style to fit into one's conceptions of the young wife whose glowing Western beauty acts as a lure to the unprincipled aristocrats in her newly purchased circle.

Psychology has come very much to the fore since Bronson Howard's days, but that dramatist, who was rather more progressive than his fellow-authors, brings in quite a psychological point when he allows the American wife to all but yield, in rebellious subjection to the trained fascination and the dominance of evil in the nature of the prince. It is an ugly fact in human nature, but a true one, that Bronson Howard brings out, and one calculated to make American husbands and fathers thoughtful.

But in spite of Bronson Howard's little psychological issue, it was interesting to observe how soon, in the course of the years, had descended upon the play the atmosphere of old-fashionedness.

The Valencia management has gathered together a new company with a good record, who gave a sufficiently satisfactory if indistinguished performance of "Aristocracy" to make one look forward with some interest to seeing their work in more up-to-date pieces.

Blanche Stoddard has had much valuable experience, and is an actress of considerable poise. Helen Lackaye proved herself a capable, if conventional, young actress in a sentimental rôle, while Thomas McLarnie and Darrell Standing, in the rôles of the Viennese prince and the English marquis, made a better showing than we have a right to expect in a house in which such low prices prevail.

The death of the original Topsy must recall vividly the stirring era when the drama of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was a power in the land. Mrs. George C. Howard of Cambridge, Mass., was reared in a theatrical atmosphere, appearing as a child with such actors as Edwin Forrest and Charles and Fanny Kemble. Abandoning all other rôles to assume that of Topsy in 1852, Mrs. Howard was an instant success. In the same presentation her daughter was Eva, and her husband St. Clair. Mrs. Howard continued to play Topsy until the death of Mr. Howard in 1887. The play in its early years had some runs until then unprecedented, and possibly it possessed no single stronger feature than that essayed by Mrs. Howard.

Henry B. Harris has a contract with Charles Klein whereby the latter will write plays for no one but him. Mr. Harris made clear out of "The Lion and the Mouse" $750,000.

Charles Klein's drama of modern business life, "The Lion and the Mouse," will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre for two weeks, beginning next Monday night. The demand for seats, already large, is an indication that the popularity of the play still holds, and there is good reason for this. In other hands the theme might easily have suffered in treatment and in force, but the author is skillful as well as hold. It is not difficult to understand why his work held the boards of one theatre a year in New York, and in other cities has made a scarcely less remarkable record. More than a little credit is due the company presenting the play. Paul Everton, who has the part of John Ryder, the richest man in the world, and the "lion" in the drama, is now in his third year of success in this rôle. Edna Archer Crawford, the "mouse," is credited with no less clever a characterization. Others in the cast are Frederick Malcolm, William Burton, George O. Morris, James Cooley, Harris L. Forbes, Clifford Leigh, Eleanor Sheldon, Hazel Temple, Eileen Errol, and Ida Glenn.

"Zira," as was expected, is a hit at the Valencia Theatre. Robert Warwick and Blanche Stoddard are especially effective in their rôles, and their support is distinctly capable. The last performance of the play will be Sunday afternoon and evening. On Monday evening "The Lost Paradise," adapted from the German of Ludwig Fulda by Henry C. DeMille, will be presented. This is a drama of every-day life, with many complications and strong scenes. It tells the story of a forceful, intelligent workman who has earned his way to the superintendent's desk of a big mill, and at the same time permitted himself to fall in love with the millionaire manufacturer's daughter. Robert Warwick will have this exacting part, and Blanche Stoddard will be Margaret, "the pearl of the works." The supporting stock company will have acceptable places in the long cast of characters. As ever, the stage sets will be elaborate and realistic, the second act showing some novel and notable mechanical effects. Under Herr Heller, the orchestra at the Valencia Theatre has become a strong attraction in itself.

Kolh and Dill continue to be the "important noise" at the Princess Theatre, as the going phrase describes it. Certainly they are filling the theatre nightly with their new offering, "Weiner and Schnitzel," and there are no indications of any ebb in the tide of their popularity. Some credit may be given to their support, however, for the comedians do not wish to be the whole show. Maud Lambert, Billy Clifford, Sarah Edwards, and Marie Howe, with a bright and handsomely dressed chorus, do their share in making the piece not merely lively and funny, but tuneful and many-hued as well. Next week will be the third of "Weiner and Schnitzel," and a successor, "The Politician," is in preparation, but there is little need of announcing it yet.

The Orpheum seems never at a loss for vaudeville attractions of the highest class. Next week's bill, which opens Sunday afternoon, will present Eva Taylor, an actress of skill and personal charm, in "Chums," the amusing comedy, by arrangement with Charles Frohman. Miss Taylor's supporting company includes Lawrence Grattan, Louis Alhion, and Eleanor Pierson. Another feature of particularly attractive quality is the return of Billy Gaston and Ethel Green, who made themselves such favorites here a year ago. They have a new playlet, called "Spoonville," which is suited to their refined and entirely captivating style, but in any act they would be welcome. Mr. Gaston composes all the songs introduced. The Four Franklins are aerial artists from Europe, and their turn is said to have created a sensation everywhere. Carrie Clark Wardle will appear in a farcical hit called "The Cook Lady," which is alleged to be the work of Sedley Brown, the well-known stage director, and author of "A Navajo's Love." Next week will be the last of Harry Tate's English Company, the Italian Trio, the Majestic Trio, and of Gus Edwards's Blonde Typewriters and Arthur Conrad, who have made a great hit.

Among advance announcements for the Valencia Theatre are promises of production in the immediate future of "The Unforeseen," by Captain R. H. Marshall; "The College Widow," by George Ade; and a new and untried drama by Upton Sinclair, entitled "Prince Hagen."

The final performance of Louis James's "Peer Gynt" at the Van Ness Theatre will be on Sunday night.

Madame Cavalieri's Emeralds.

The sensation of the opera season just closed has been Mme. Cavalieri's emeralds, says a London paper. Not Mme. Cavalieri's beauty, which is great; nor her grace, which is unusual; nor her singing, which is very fine indeed; nor her acting, which is the best we have ever seen on the stage of Covent Garden—but those big, green, flawless stones with which she arrays herself to the tune of many thousands of pounds. They are emeralds said to have belonged to an empress, and their like has yet to be displayed in England. The Roman singer is one of the few women who has ever succeeded in looking well in emeralds, which are hard and masculine and distinctly unbecoming.

Lady Auckland has been good enough to come to New York and to stay there for six weeks. Furthermore, she condescends to express her intention to write a hook about New York, having in the aforesaid six weeks made herself intimately familiar with the many phases of life to be found in the metropolis. She will produce "one of the smart hooks of the year," as she expressed it to a World reporter, and the hook will be illustrated by her own sketches.

We shall await this volume with a palpitating uneasiness. To see ourselves as others see us is something of an ordeal, especially when there is reason to believe that the picture is not a pleasing one. Indeed, Lady Auckland is already laughing at us, and we may expect a perfect explosion of merriment by the time her ideas are coordinated into a novel. "Yesterday," she said to the reporter, who seems to have listened with becoming abasement, "I had a funny experience. Riding downtown on a tram car, a great, stout woman—so many New York women are so unmercifully stout—annoyed me beyond endurance. She had on one of those ridiculously high hats—which women wear here for the street." Lady Auckland, while she talked, had on a close-fitting, jaunty toque, which, she says, is the proper thing for street wear. "Well, this woman," she continued, "had a dyed turkey feather in her hat about two yards long. I said: 'Would you please take your dyed turkey feather out of my eye?' She glanced at me fiercely. I moved to a seat across the way and took out my pad and pencil and sketched her right then and there. I intend to put this woman in my hook, to show some of the annoying things one has to put up with in New York."

Then Lady Auckland turned her attention to society. "New York society is awfully small and confined to such small limits," she said. "London society is immense and many times more interesting. There is no comparison. Of course, London society has changed in the last ten years, with so many new people coming in. Lots of them bring wealth, but brains—well, there is not an over-stock of them. One has to be more careful going about in London society. It is not like it used to be, when every one knew every one else. New York women need to know lots of things. I was walking down Fifth Avenue with a New York society girl. She walked with a stride and swung her arms until she resembled a windmill. I finally asked her if she would not please walk with her feet instead of her arms. That may be the style here, but I do not admire it."

Then Lady Auckland took a rap at New York men.

"Your men lack, what shall I say? Backbone; yes, that's it. They are too namby-pamby. Our men are fine specimens of manly men. Well, I guess that comes from fighting, don't you think so? If the New York men had more fighting ancestors hack of them, who had really distinguished themselves in war as ours have done, well, it would give them more real character and manliness. As for your suffragettes," continued Lady Auckland, "well, I met some of them one afternoon at the Colony Club. Funny looking women. They all looked as though they had been disappointed in love or something of that sort, and wanted to fight somebody or something just to relieve their minds. They all wore stiff linen collars.

"And goodness knows most of them looked untidy enough. Their hair hung down into their eyes or trailed and sagged at the sides, and most of them looked awfully out of date. Like most American people, they take themselves so deadly serious that it is funny, awfully funny. Yes, I have some good sketches of them I shall use. It won't do a hit of harm, will it?"

"Now I am not going to say anything more," said Lady Auckland, with a majestic wave of the hand. "I want to use my opinions and my ideas for my own purposes. I am not here expressing opinions. That is so American like. Americans tell everything they think and talk so much. We English think a lot and do little talking."

Lady Auckland comes from a long line of English aristocracy. She is the daughter of Colonel George Hutton of the English army, and a descendant of Bacon, the first haronet in England, created in the eleventh century of the family of Guillaume de Stracey, who came over with William the Conqueror.

Mme. Melha is evidently of an optimistic temperament. She believes that women will gradually discard the fantastic and the grotesque and that daintiness will be the prevailing mark of the really new woman. It is true we shall have to wait a hundred years, but no one minds that with such a glittering goal in front. Mme. Melha says:

"In a hundred years from now I believe the prevailing type will be of extreme daintiness. Greater use of her brain will spiritualize the woman of the future. Her countenance will be alight with intelligence.

"Freak fashions will die. There will be harmony in dress, daintiness in manner and speech, a shunning of hollowness and affectation."

The diva had been talking about woman suffrage, in favor of which she has strongly declared herself.

"Woman's freedom," she argued, "which she will surely win, will not rob her of woman's love of home.

"After a man has battled with the world and been huffed by it he returns with an ever-growing longing for the peace and beauty of the home environments. So when a wider hook of life opens before a woman, she will surely find the bonds of home life drawing more tightly around her.

"A woman will always be a woman. The hard, unsympathetic facts of life will make her home seem even more of a haven than ever."

There is something of idealism about this, but it is pleasant to think that in a hundred brief summers or so we shall be able to read our newspapers in a street-car unobscured by the hat of the lady in the front seat.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

In developing the idea of truthfulness, a teacher asked the question, "What is the best thing in the world to do, and at the same time the hardest?" A little girl raised her hand timidly. "Well, Emma?" "To get married."

One day a number of colleagues were discussing the subject of speculation, when one of them said to an investor who had some disastrous remembrances: "Old chap, as an

"Been four highway robberies there in the past month. Aren't you afraid that somebody will hold you up and go through you some night?" "Should say not," said the big Texan. "Why, Ah've got so few means on my person at the present time that the robber who goes through me will get himself in debt."

This was overheard in the lobby of a big hotel in Cincinnati when a bus load of traveling salesmen came from the station. Every man of them, as he signed the register, paused to shake hands with the hotel clerk—fatherly

"please give my best thanks to the young lady for these pretty feathers. I was aware of the fact that she plucked her admirers, but I really did not imagine she did so on my account."

In the Hungarian parliamentary session of 1841, a certain Baron Szjel lived in Pressburg, with two intimate friends, George Majlath and Barthel Szemere. One day, the baron became envious of their laurels. He called Szemere aside and said to him: "My good Szemere, write me a speech." "Most willingly, my dear friend; about what would you reëchoed with "vivas" and applause. At this moment, the president rose and asked: "Is anybody here to answer this speech?" The baron looked sneeringly around. The members all remained silent. Then Bartholomæus Szemere arose. He began: "Worthy gentlemen, what the orator said is from beginning to end incorrect," and then he began to show, in an able speech, the mistakes the baron had made. "Don't you believe him, gentlemen!" the baron cried angrily, interrupting him suddenly: "it was he himself who wrote the speech for me." Every one of the fifty-two members rolled in his seat nearly expert, give us a definition of the term, 'honzanza.'" "A honanza," replied the experienced man, with emphasis, "is a hole in the ground owned by a champion liar."

A little chap in Philadelphia, whose father is a prominent merchant, and, as such, never loses an opportunity to descant upon the virtues of advertising, one day asked his mother: "May Lucy and I play at keeping store in the front room?" "Yes," assented the mother; "but you must be very, very quiet." "All right," said the youngster; "we'll pretend we don't advertise."

Champion Hayes of Marathon fame praised, at a dinner in New York, a walker. "He a walker?" some one said. "Yes," said Mr. Hayes, "and the next race he enters, mark me, he will win." "Why, I didn't know he had had any experience as a walker," said the other, in a puzzled voice. Mr. Hayes laughed. "No experience as a walker, eh?" said he. "And the fellow's owned an $80 second-hand motor car for the last two years!"

Michael MacDonagh, in "Irish Life and Character," tells of a prisoner, refractory and obstinate, who flatly refused to work in the treadmill. The man was brought before the governor of the prison for disobedience. The governor asked him what reason he could give for not following out his orders. "Me go on the treadmill!" exclaimed the prisoner, drawing himself up to his full height of offended dignity. "Never, sir! I'd rather leave the jail first!"

A man who had been playing golf with a clergyman heard him swear two or three times under his breath. Suspecting the lapse, he could not be sure of it, until one monosyllable came out with unmistakable clearness. After he had finished the match, a friend of his said: "I saw you playing just now with the Rev. Mr. Dash; of what denomination is he?" "Some people say he is a Congregationalist," replied his late opponent, "but I should call him a Profanitarian."

Most golfers will have heard of the old lady from a remote country district who visited Edinburgh for the first time and happened to arrive as a party of golfers were hurrying to catch a suburban train for the links. "It's a braw toun, Mr. MacWheezele," she informed her minister, after her return; "but it hurt me sair tae see sae mony decent-like men carrying bags o' broken umbrellas. There maun hae been sair douncomes, an' though I widna mention it for the war! to anither, there was twa or three that lookit as if they had been ministers."

Charles Edwards of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, a few nights ago, in Washington, was warned by a friend that he lived in a dangerous neighborhood.

old fellow who had been there many years. "Ah," said one of them to the clerk, "it's a good thing you're still on deck, Uncle Dave; I don't think the house could run without you." "Couldn't it, though!" said Uncle Dave. "You fellows would come in here, and if there was a strange clerk you'd say, 'Where's Uncle Dave?' And the clerk would say, 'Why, didn't you hear? He died a month ago.' And then you'd say, 'Well, I'll be darned! That's too bad. Say, when'll dinner be ready?'"

In a Southern town a lady was approached by her colored maid. "Well, Jenny," she asked, seeing that something was in the air. "Please, Mis' Mary, might I have the afternoon off three weeks from Wednesday?" Then, noticing an undecided look in her mistress's face, she added, hastily, "I want to go to my finance's funeral." "Goodness me!" answered the lady. "Your fiancé's funeral! Why, you don't know that he's even going to die, let alone the date of his funeral. That is something we can't any of us be sure about—when we are going to die." "Yes'm," said the girl, doubtfully; then, with a triumphant note in her voice, "I'm sure about him, Mis', 'cos he's goin' to be hung!"

Preston Kendall, the actor, tells a story of a ne'er-do-well in a little New England town, where he has often spent his summers. "I was walking down the main street one day," said Mr. Kendall, "when I saw old Silas grinning from ear to ear. I hardly thought that he was that glad to see me. So, after speaking to him, I said: 'Why the smile that won't come off, Silas? What has happened to make you so happy this morning?' 'I've been a-gittin' married this morning,' was the unexpected reply. 'Married! You?' I exclaimed. 'Why, Silas, what on earth have you done that for? You know you can't even support yourself as it is.' 'Wall,' said Silas, 'you see, it's this way: I ken purty near support myself, an' I kind of figured out that she could finish up the job.'"

A Parisian journalist recently wrote a rather unfavorable criticism of the performance of a well-known actress. The latter was keenly wounded, and watched for a chance to avenge herself. She was one evening at the Varieties, with a young aristocrat for an escort, when she espied the critic. She had a package with her, which she requested her friend to deliver in person. The dandy rose and, taking the package, walked over to where the journalist was sitting with a party, and presented it to him, saying: "Mademoiselle, who admires your talent, has requested me to present you with this souvenir from her." The critic took it and opened it before his friends, who had heard the dandy's little speech. It contained about a dozen goose quills, and smiles and suppressed laughter went around. But the critic was equal to the occasion. "Ah, my dear sir," said he to the messenger, like to speak?" "It is all the same to me, if the speech is only a nice one—wonderfully nice." "You will be satisfied with me," he answered, and next day brought the manuscript. The baron memorized the speech and delivered it on the third day. The chamber convulsed with laughter, and then and there the baron made a vow never again to speak in public.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

Many society folk are planning to spend the holidays out of town and the nearby hotels and country places will be filled with guests. In the meantime affairs go on merrily here and much is in prospect for the coming fortnight.

The engagement is announced of Miss Marie Christine de Guigne, daughter of Mr. C. de Guigne, to M. Elic de Dampierre of Paris. The wedding will be celebrated in San Mateo in February.

The engagement is announced of Miss Clara Stevenson, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Howard Griffith Stevenson of Menlo Park, to Ensign Ferdinand L. Reichmuth, U. S. N.

The wedding of Miss Grace Hammond, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Hammond, to Mr. Welbore Stewart Burnett will take place today (Saturday) at noon at the home of the bride on Broadway, the Rev. Edward Morgan of St. Luke's Church officiating. Miss Daisy Hammond, the bride's sister, will be the maid of honor and her only attendant, and Mr. John Young will be the best man. Only relatives and a few intimate friends will be present at the wedding. Mr. Burnett and his bride will leave on a wedding journey of a month's duration, and on their return will live in this city.

The wedding of Miss Anita Davis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Winfield Scott Davis, to Mr. Kenneth MacDonald, Jr., took place on Wednesday evening at nine o'clock at the First Presbyterian church, the Rev. William Kirk Guthrie being the officiating clergyman. The bridesmaids were Miss Marian Wright, Miss Juliet Coleman, and Miss Elsie Benedict. Mr. Allan MacDonald, brother of the bridegroom, acted as best man and the ushers were Mr. Allen Dimond, Mr. Frederick Nickerson, Mr. George Applegarth, and Mr. William Volkman. A reception followed the ceremony at the home of the bride's parents at 3 Presidio Terrace.

Mrs. William Ford Nichols and Miss Claire Nichols will entertain at a tea on Tuesday next at the Episcopal residence on Webster Street.

Mrs. Harry T. Scott entertained at a luncheon on Tuesday of last week at the St. Francis in honor of Mrs. Julius Kruttschnitt. The guests were Mrs. Mountford Wilson, Mrs. Joseph B. Miss Sophie Coleman and Miss Lucy Gwin Coleman entertained at a tea on Thursday of last week at their home on Pacific Avenue in honor of Mrs. Richard Hammond. Assisting in receiving were Mrs. Walter Bonner, Miss Julia Langborne, Mrs. George Cadwalader, Mrs. Gerald Rathbone, Mrs. Harry Stetson, Mrs. Baldwin Wood, Miss Hill, and Miss Christine Pomeroy.

Miss Helen Bowie was the hostess at a tea on Thursday of last week at her home on Jackson Street. Assisting in receiving were Miss Mary Keeney, Miss Anna Weller, Miss Helen Baily, Miss Violet Buckley, and Miss Alyce Sullivan.

The marriage of Miss Florence Rosenberg of Hollister and Mr. Howard Joseph Friedlander of this city will take place in the red room at the St. Francis Hotel on Wednesday, December 16, at high noon.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a résumé of movements to and from this city and Coast and the whereabouts of absent Californians:

Mr. and Mrs. Horace Blanchard Chase, who were in town last week as the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Oxnard, have returned to their country place in the Napa Valley.

Mr. and Mrs. James Carolan have returned from an Eastern visit of several months' duration and are again occupying the house on Buchanan Street which they had last winter.

Mrs. William Kohl and Mr. and Mrs. C. Frederick Kohl will spend the rest of the winter season at Riverside.

Dr. and Mrs. Beverly MacMonagle left this week for New York, where they will spend the Christmas holidays.

Mrs. Frank S. Johnson will spend the holiday season in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. William Gwin left last week for the East, where they will spend the Christmas holidays.

Miss Jennie Crocker and Mr. Templeton Crocker left on Saturday last for a brief Eastern trip and will return before Christmas.

Miss Agnes Tobin has left for London, where she will spend the winter.

Mrs. David R. C. Brown has arrived from her home in Colorado for a visit to her parents, Dr. and Mrs. W. F. McNutt.

Mr. James Otis and Miss Cora Otis left this week for a brief trip to Vancouver.

Mr. Samuel Hamilton has left for a brief Eastern trip.

Miss Laura Hamilton and Miss Alexandra Hamilton, who have been abroad for some months, are spending the winter in Florence.

Miss Edwina Hammond and Miss Daisy Hammond returned on Sunday last, after a stay of a year in Europe.

Mrs. Thomas Leggett and Miss Constance Borrowe left on Monday last for Mrs. Leggett's home in Plainfield, New Jersey, where Miss Borrowe will spend the winter.

Miss Lucie King has returned to New York, where she is spending the winter as the guest of Mrs. William P. Fuller.

Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Spreckels, Jr., returned last Thursday from New York, and are receiving a most cordial welcome home from their many friends.

Dr. and Mrs. Louis D. Meed, formerly of Byron Hot Springs, have come to San Francisco to live and will for the present make their home at the Colonial.

Mr. H. Michaels of Los Gatos has just returned from Japan, whither he went as a member of the San Francisco touring party. Mr. Michaels has taken a house in Alameda for the winter.

Mr. O. H. Harrison and Mr. Walter Cox left this city November 27 for Mexico and expect to return early in the new year.

Mr. Edgar J. DePue will leave San Francisco on Saturday of this week for New York, where he expects to meet his wife and daughters upon their return from a year's visit to Europe. After a brief stay in the East, Mr. DePue and his family will come on home.

Mr. and Mrs. William Fries and family expect to visit the Hawaiian Islands next month.

Mr. F. Bopp, German consul, and family have returned to their former residence, 2313 Hearst Avenue, Berkeley, after an extended European trip.

Among arrivals from San Francisco at Byron Hot Springs during the past week were: Mr. and Mrs. E. L. Brayton and Mrs. J. J. Rauer.

Father Junipero Serra.

The bronze statue of Father Junipero Serra, done by Arthur Putnam for Mr. E. W. Scripps—to be presented to the city of San Diego—will be on exhibition at the Studio Building, 147 Presidio Avenue, daily between ten and three, from Wednesday, December 9, to Thursday, December 31. The figure of the priest is monumental in size and of quite extraordinary force and simplicity. It is to be hoped that the proposition to erect a statue of St. Francis, to be placed before the old Church of the Mission Dolores, will meet with financial encouragement, and that it may receive as dignified treatment at the sculptor's hands.

The firm yet delicate portrait busts of Mr. Ralph Stackpole are shown for the first time since his return from Paris, and paintings by Olga Ackerman, Julie Heyneman, Anne Bremer, Mary Menton, Emily Travis, Mary Brady, Martinez, Piaggioni, Bruce Porter, Del Miré, and William L. Carrigan make this exhibition one of unusual interest. The admission will be 25 cents, and the proceeds will go to the hospital fund for artists.

A Popular Reading.

Mr. Walter Risley Hearn, British consul-general, will give a reading of Dickens's "Christmas Carol" on behalf of the British Benevolent Society at Lyric Hall, on Larkin Street, Friday, the 18th instant, at eight o'clock p. m. There will also be a selection of music. The society has heavy calls on its benevolence at Christmas time, and donations and subscriptions will be gratefully received by Major H. D. Gerrard, the secretary, at 268 Market Street. Tickets for the reading and concert (price, 50 cents) may be had from the secretary and from any of the British societies and from Sherman, Clay & Co., corner of Kearny and Sutter, Mr. J. J. Newbegin's book store, 242 Market Street, or George T. Marsh, corner of Polk and California Streets.

The Nordica Concerts.

Mme. Lillian Nordica, the famous dramatic soprano, assisted by Emma Showers, pianiste, Frederick Hastings, haritone, and Andre Benoit, accompanist, will give her first concert Sunday afternoon at the Van Ness Theatre, presenting a remarkable programme, in which she will sing no less than fourteen great numbers.

Some of the most interesting features will be the rendition of the "Curse Scene" from "Tristan und Isolde," a number never before given on the concert stage; a transcription of a Chopin nocturne (made expressly for Mme. Nordica), and Schubert's greatest epic, "The Erlking."

At the second concert, which will be given the following Sunday afternoon, the dramatic aria from Bemberg's "Death of Joan of Arc" and Schubert's "Die Altmacht" will attract the music lovers, although every work on the Nordica programmes is worth hearing.

Seats may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where programmes may be obtained.

Next Tuesday evening, December 15, Nordica sings a special programme at Ye Liherty Playhouse, Oakland, Managers Greenbaum and Bishop deeming the occasion of such importance that the entire stock company will be laid off for the night at full pay in order to make this great event possible. Seats for this concert are on sale at the box-office of the theatre.

Hother Wismer's Concert at the Fairmont.

Mr. Hother Wismer, the violinist, will make his first public appearance since his return from Europe at his concert at the Fairmont Hotel, Thursday evening next, December 17. Mr. Wismer will be assisted by Mrs. M. E. Blanchard, Mrs. Mathilde Wismer, and F. Maurer. The programme is as follows:

Suite, op. 11, E major, Goldmark, H. Wismer and F. Maurer. Songs—"Ständchen," "Mairnacht," Brahms; "The Deep Sea Pearl," E. F. Schneider; "May Morning," Manney; Mrs. M. E. Blanchard. Scotch Fantasia, for violin, op. 46, Max Bruch (introduction, grave—adagio—allegro—andante—finale, allegro guerrier), Hother Wismer. Prelude and Grand Fugue, A minor (violin alone), Bach, Hother Wismer. Songs—"Lass deine Stimme ertönen," "Snow Queen," Gade; "Vor meiner Wiege," Fr. Schubert; Mrs. Mathilde Wismer. Valse Caprice, op. 52, Saint-Saëns-Ysaye, Mr. Wismer.

Not only the friends of pupils of Mr. Wismer, but the public as well, may look forward with pleasing anticipation to this event. Mr. Wismer has an assured position as a player, won in years of serious if enthusiastic study and practice, and his work gives proof of his ability to sustain it. Tickets for the concert are $1.

Mr. Taft and the Tariff.

We do not find it easy to get a satisfying "line" on the tariff situation at Washington. On the surface everybody is in favor of the kind of revision espoused by Mr. Taft last year and promised by the Republican convention at Chicago. At the same time there is universal question if those who have hitherto supported the stand-pat idea are sincere in their professions of friendship for revision or if they mean to make the revision on a genuine and thoroughgoing system. Somehow the feeling grows that unless Mr. Taft shall exercise his powers to the utmost, the revision pledge will come to nothing better than a hollow and nominal enactment more pleasing to those who profit by the tariff than to anybody else. Mr. Taft manifestly is resolute in his purpose to see the revision scheme through on the line of strict integrity and good faith. The only criticism of his attitude is that he has possibly gone too far in publicly declaring that he will veto any bill which does not meet his ideas of reform. While it is eminently proper that Mr. Taft should take a strong position, while he would be eminently right in vetoing an inadequate and unsatisfactory measure, he is none the less a little out of bounds in threatening to use the veto power full four months before entering upon the presidency. To threaten is oftener than otherwise a vexatious and irritating and therefore a mischievous policy. Probably Mr. Taft in talking about a possible veto spoke rather in careless frankness than upon the basis of fixed purpose. Probably very much more has been made of his "tariff threat" by the Washington gossips than his utterances have really deserved.

A Knock at a Closed Door.

Every little while something crops up to demonstrate that the law which excludes Chinese laborers from the United States is a special and tentative thing, accepted in the spirit of tolerance rather than under conviction of its utility and propriety, chronically subject to assault by those whose sentiments or interest it crosses and who have no sympathy with its motives and aims. It is not going too far, we think, to say that a majority of the people of the United States, duly represented by majorities in both houses of Congress, are critical of if not hostile to Chinese exclusion, and that today, if the whole subject were to be taken up anew, legislation upon existing lines would be out of the question. Restriction was conceded to the Pacific Coast, partly as a means of quelling a vexatious social disturbance, more directly perhaps by the Republican majority in Congress as a point of partisan tactics. If this general statement be questioned as lacking in discretion from the Pacific Coast standpoint, the answer is that nothing is to be gained by concealments or through shutting of eyes to the real situation. It is commonly the best as it is always the sincerest policy to look at things as they are, to cherish no illusions. It is better, therefore, that in any consideration of the Chinese issue we should understand that the general attitude of the country is critical and even condemnatory of Pacific Coast opinion, which is the basis of the policy under which we have been operating for something now more than twenty years. The reasons are plain enough. First, there is tradition, based on the old sentiment of America as a refuge for the down-trodden and the oppressed. More vital still is the commercial ambition which looks to extension of trade and which sees clearly enough that there can be no very great growth of intercourse between this country and China so long as we draw a hard and fast line of exclusion against the Chinese people. A free commerce implies other forms of interchange, among them hospitality and protection, with freedom in all forms of legitimate activity for the people of one country within the territories of the other. Whatever our wishes may be as to the presence of Chinese subjects in this country, we must not disregard the fact that we shall have no close, friendly, or largely profitable relations with China so long as we discriminate against the Chinese, refusing to them privileges which we freely extend to the other peoples of the earth.

The latest suggestion of the persistent pro-Chinese sentiment above referred to comes in the form of a paragraph in the annual report of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor given to the public within the week. Dealing with certain problems growing out of our restrictive arrangements, Secretary Straus says:

The obvious course to pursue is to place the matter of Chinese immigration where it essentially belongs, namely, within the operation of the system of regulation applicable to immigration generally; in other words, to let the methods and the machinery provided with respect to the admission and exclusion of aliens generally be applied in the case of aliens from China as well.

There is nothing obscure in this very bland suggestion. It aims at nothing more or less than complete repudiation of the laws and regulations under which Chinese immigration is now so restricted as to be in effect a negligible quantity. Mr. Hart North, commissioner of immigration, put the matter bluntly in a newspaper interview a few days back. "To place the Chinese," he said, "on the same footing with other immigrants would mean that any healthy Chinese, able bodied, could come into the country. Of course, this would mean an increase in the number of Chinese in this country, and one man can make as good a guess at the probable increase as another." This states the case precisely. As to what would happen, we need only to remember what did happen before the period of restriction and to what has more recently happened in the case of the Japanese. With Chinese immigration "within the operation of the system of regulation applicable to immigration generally"—with the bars down—we should have a large influx of Chinese coolies, followed by the same sort of social agitation which marked the excited and bitter days of the middle and late seventies. Indeed, we should probably have something very much worse, since the universal system of labor organization, grown up since the old period of Chinese agitation, would afford ready-made the machinery of class protest. As to how far this protest would go and as to what forms it would take—these are questions which few among us would care to answer. At the very least the open door to Chinese coolies in this country would add another to the graver social problems of the Pacific States and tend still further toward that separation of interest and sentiment which is rapidly creating here a system of class divisions even more serious than those of the older world because no traditions or sanctions, no accepted system of practice and usage, lie behind them. We had something very like civil war in California, Oregon, and Washington twenty-five years ago with respect to the Chinese issue; probably we would have the same sort of thing multiplied and intensified if the old aggravation should be restored.

While the laws restricting Chinese immigration may fairly be set down as a concession to Pacific Coast sentiment, there could be no greater mistake than the presumption that opinion on the Pacific Coast with reference to Chinese immigration is all one way. Labor sentiment, political sentiment, superficial sentiment—the general tone and atmosphere of opinion and expression—stand opposed not only to the Chinese, but to all Orientals. None the less, we are by no means assured that if the issue were put to popular vote, restriction would not be repudiated. The economic interest, in other words the property interest, would certainly favor the incoming of Chinese laborers in moderate if not in unrestricted numbers. It is the common notion of those whose opinions are dominated by economic motives that the material interest of the Pacific States would be largely promoted by an increase in the supply of disciplined, contented, and reliable labor. Perhaps the greatest of our material problems is that of getting the work of the country done efficiently and promptly and at a cost within the limits of commercial profit. Wages are high with us, but it is not so much the wage rate as the indifference, unreliability, and general insufficiency of labor that embarrasses enterprise and stifles progress on this Coast. Very much of the work required to be done here is of a kind calling for disciplined and patient hands. The work of the orchard, the work of the packing-house, the work of the sugar-beet field, the work of our great fishing industry—these and a thousand other kinds of work cry aloud for willing and reliable hands, but they cry in vain. Nobody excepting under protest seems willing to perform those labors necessary to original production and therefore essential to the highest development of the potentialities of our country.

How large a part of the acreage of the Pacific States lies unused or used only in a secondary and subordinate sense for want of willing and capable labor, we will not undertake to say, but it is certain that the figures, if it were possible to present them, would be startling. The conditions of the labor market are such that few feel justified in enlarging the scope of those industries and enterprises whose success and profit depend upon coöperation of hands. Indeed, the tendency is the other way, since it appears to be the desire of every man who can do it to get his business in such shape that he may operate it with few hands instead of many.

In the old days before restriction, John Chinaman was a main if not the main dependence of those who exploited the resources of the country in large ways. The Chinaman did not work cheap, for the wages paid in California always compared favorably and even extravagantly with the wage schedules of other regions and countries for the same kind of work. But the Chinaman, if not cheap, was patient and dependable. The universal testimony of employers is that he was not only patient and dependable, but honest. The employing classes in the Pacific States have always liked the Chinaman either outdoors or indoors; dislike and enmity have always been confined to those with whom the Chinaman, either actually or in imagination, came into competition. If the truth were told—and there is no reason why the Argonaut should not tell the truth—the main opposition to the Chinaman came from other classes of aliens, from those whose claim to preference lay in the color of their skins and in their racial affinities. The anti-Chinese crusade of twenty-five years ago was largely an Irish movement, chiefly participated in by persons whose claims and pretensions were sentimental rather than tangible and whose individual capabilities as mere workers were far below those against whom their animosity was so great. That there was ever any serious ground for industrial or moral opposition to the Chinese is a doubtful matter; and probably no small part of the famous anti-Oriental crusade proceeded from a fixed propensity to opposition and agitation, allied with a traditional and temperamental love of a free fight.

The Japanese who have come to California in such great numbers in recent years have succeeded the Chinaman in many departments of our industry without by any means occupying his place in the esteem of employers. In olden days, as we have already said, employers liked and trusted the Chinaman and found him equal to every responsibility he assumed. Nobody on the Pacific Coast has ever come to like or trust the Japanese as a class. They are less persistent and patient than the Chinese, far less faithful to their engagements, notably less honest in their dealings, and as completely alien and unassimilable. Go up and down the farm, garden, and orchard districts where Japanese are largely employed, go into households where Japanese help is kept because no other is to be had, go through the length and breadth of California, and we venture to declare you will not find ten men or women to say that they prefer Japanese over Chinese or would accept their service on any terms if it were possible to replace them with Chinamen. As between the two races, California—employing California—favors the Chinese a thousand to one.

Curiously enough, not many of our people appear to have taken the commercial argument seriously. Perhaps we have been too absorbed in the social and industrial aspects of the question to consider it in its broader relationships. In the East, at the centres of finance and industry, the limitation to trade between this country and China implied in our discrimination against the individual Chinaman, is much more seriously regarded than in California. Indeed, this point is rarely raised in local discussions excepting by those who have some immediate and direct interest either in the business of export and importation or in the interest of transportation. The Chinese issue with us presents itself chiefly in those phases which relate directly to the industrial and social aspects of life. Perhaps we should add the interest of politics; and in this connection it is safe to say that if the Chinaman, like the Irishman and the Sicilian, had been capable of political action, in other words if he had been a voter, we should never have had any such thing as the Chinese issue. The political interest which espoused the anti-Chinese cause and which forced the enactment of our exclusion laws would have taken quite another course if in dealing with the Chinaman there had not been something to gain with nothing to lose.

As the Chinese question stands today, we believe that the economic argument—certainly the immediate economic argument—is all on the side of a freer if not an entirely free incoming of Chinese laborers. The Pacific Coast region would profit immediately and enormously in a material sense by letting down the bars to the extent, say, of fifty or a hundred thousand Chinese per year for a period of several years to come. This suggestion, be it remembered, was formally and seriously urged some two or three years ago by various commercial bodies up and down the Coast, having the backing of the orchard interest and of many other employers who found their operations restricted by the limitations of the labor market.

On the other side, nothing can be more certain than that the letting down of the bars to Chinese laborers would be the signal for a social ruction even more embittered than that which marked the period preceding restriction. We should have on our hands an agitation bordering on social warfare in its hostility to the new order of things. That it would be or might be pitifully mistaken in its calculations—this would in no sense mitigate the condition. There are those, among them our best and wisest, who declare that the true policy would be to do what the material interest of the country suggests, leaving time to justify that policy and to heal all wounds growing out of it. The Argonaut is not of this mind. In its judgment no material advantage is worth the cost of social confusion and discord. We think California will be better off with less production, less convenience, slower progress, than to gain these advantages through social conflict. And we believe that conflict would surely come if the attempt were made to restore conditions as they prevailed before the days of restriction.

Mr. Taft's Southern Aims.

No President of the United States since Abraham Lincoln has exhibited so warm and intelligent an interest in the South as Mr. Taft. He has long lived within eye-shot of Dixie land and in constant association with men of Southern breeding and sympathies. More than one of his public addresses have betrayed not merely his sympathetic interest in the South, but the fact that he has been a student of Southern problems, particularly of that preëminent problem illustrated in the rigid status of Southern politics. In a recent speech before the North Carolina Society, Mr. Taft has revealed a positive sentiment, a real affection, for the country "below the line." He sees plainly the illogical and unhappy situation of the South, and quite as plainly he hopes to do something to relieve it during his term in the presidential office.

All the political troubles of the South, including the practical paralysis of Southern initiative and influence in the government, rest upon the stubborn insistence of the Southern people in making one obsolete and outworn question the measure and inspiration of its political affiliations and policies. In the South the negro question overslaughes and subordinates every other political suggestion and interest, in spite of the fact that this question has practically no existence save as a memory and a tradition. In the North we know of no negro question; our politics rests upon a multitude of interests which have arisen since the time when there was in fact a negro question. It is because the South does not or can not or will not see that times are changed, that there is no rhyme or reason in hugging an outworn delusion, that it does not address its political thought and purpose to newer and more vital subjects.

If the South is to be censured as well as pitied for its illogical devotion to a fixed political habit, it is to some extent the fault of the North, for it is the attitude of the North toward the negro which persistently stimulates Southern apprehension and stirs Southern resentment. The South has the negro as its special problem. It knows the negro as the North can not know him. Intelligent Southern opinion believes that the maintenance of civil order and domestic peace in the South, with the political and social domination of intelligence and property, requires the complete social separation of the races, and the unreasoning popular instinct seconds and emphasizes this judgment. The South would make, in fact it does make, a special caste of the negro. The South holds the North to be not only stupidly wrong, but stubbornly and designedly unfriendly in such "coddling" as it gives to the negro, or rather to particular individuals of the black race. It finds or thinks it finds its own problem made more difficult by the attitude of the North toward the black race—or at least to the Southern part of it, for the North gives to its own relatively few blacks a no larger measure of social recognition than does the South.

We suspect that Mr. Taft in pursuance of his manifest aim of rescuing the South from the slough of confirmed political error and failure will find his best field of operations in the North. He may do something towards solving the special problem of the South if he can persuade the North to leave the negro to the South. We believe that if the South could be assured of a policy of non-interference on the part of Northern men with any phase of the negro problem, she would, perhaps not immediately but in course of time, pigeon-hole the "issue" which has so long dominated her political thoughts and motives and address her politics to more timely, more rational, and more vital subjects.

But, seriously, we fear that the prospect of disjoining the South from an outworn political idol is not a very hopeful one. Prejudice and habit are among the profound motives of life, and when to the force which they exert in Southern politics there is added that legacy of hatred and distrust which still abides with many of the older generation and which to some extent has been passed on to the new, the problem seems hopeless, at least with respect to an immediate solution. Probably nothing but time will remedy a condition which has no leg of expediency to stand upon and which only becomes more stubborn and impregnable by reason of the hardship it puts upon those who sustain it.

The Mote and the Beam.

In another column we print a very interesting, albeit a very critical, letter from a citizen of New York who is severe not because he hates but because he loves San Francisco. Mr. Wiel's suggestion that San Francisco imperatively needs a period of total eclipse is neither unwarranted nor untimely. None the less, we must protest against a judgment which classifies San Francisco somewhere "beyond the limit" for the reason that we are fighting over conditions not more grievous in a moral sense than those which other cities, very notably New York, are enduring without protest, even with something very much akin to unresenting tolerance.

The return as a visitor of Mr. Richard Croker, after a prolonged absence in Europe, is giving the country an opportunity to see how New York regards one who long occupied in her civic organization a status precisely parallel to the position of Abraham Ruef in San Francisco prior to two years ago. For nearly a month Croker has been the centre of what the New York Evening Post styles "the politico-social activities of the city." He was received at the dock not only by representatives of various civic organizations, but by a vast concourse which hallooed itself hoarse as Croker drove in a beflowered carriage to a suite of reserved apartments in the finest hotel in the city. There have not been hours enough either in the day or in the night for the attentions with which an admiring city has deluged him. A great banquet was given in his honor at which the mayor, three supreme judges, and no less a personage than District Attorney Jerome sat as guests. Dinners, luncheons, special receptions, followed without number, and as a climax—to be duly followed by other climaxes—a grand luncheon and "woman's reception" was given last week to Mr. Croker by the National Democratic Club. There were flowers by the wagon-load and other flub-dubs, including a striped canopy duly carpeted for this all-conquering hero to walk through as he passed from a carriage to the club-house. We may well applaud the conscience and the courage of Rabbi Stephen Wise, of whom we know something on the Pacific Coast, who from his pulpit has pronounced all these orgies of conscienceless sycophancy as shameless beyond words.

Whatever may be said in criticism of the methods by which San Francisco is pursuing the devils of her municipal corruption, it must at least be said that she is actively, aggressively, and to some extent successfully pursuing them. San Francisco is not sitting supine, tolerant, complacent; much less is she studying ways and means of manifesting her consideration and devising schemes to honor those—either on one side or the other of her graft warfare—who have corrupted and discredited her.

The Argonaut understands the motives of Mr. Wiel in what he has to say about San Francisco. It does not resent his strictures; on the contrary, it deems them entirely deserved. At the same time we think it would not be amiss for New York to cast the beam from her own eye before she makes overmuch of the mote in the eye of San Francisco. In view of the interest which New York has shown in the return of Mr. Richard Croker, in consideration of the place held by that fine gentleman in a dozen local associations of capitalists and other eminent citizens, we can but feel that New York might do well to look to her own conditions before growing over-censorious towards San Francisco.

The Invasion of England.

When Lord Roberts, speaking a week or so ago in the House of Lords, impressively urged the English government to raise an additional force of one million men for the purpose of resisting a German invasion, he spoke as a soldier rather than as a statesman. Lord Cromer, whose own far more diplomatic utterances and predictions have done not a little to quicken the national pulse, was quickly on his feet in praise of Lord Roberts's foresight, but not of his discretion. Lord Cromer readily agreed that the danger was a real one, but he said that to press the government for a statement of intentions would be unwise. Such a statement must be based either on an adoption of the invasion theory, which would be an insult to Germany, or on its rejection, which would disquiet England. The nerves of Europe, said Lord Cromer, were already strained overmuch, and needed a sedative rather than a stimulant. It was enough to point out the danger from the military point of view, to indicate the remedy, and then to leave the government to find such salvation as it might feel itself to need. Lord Roberts pressed his motion notwithstanding, and it was carried by a large majority, but emanating as it did from the House of Lords it was no more than the expression of a pious opinion.

If Lord Roberts stood alone, if he were unbacked by a large body of public opinion, there would be no need to take his forebodings very seriously. It is the custom of military experts all over the world to magnify dangers from abroad and to beat the drum in support of large armies. Lord Roberts himself has done it before, and there is general and good-humored recognition in England that the late commander-in-chief is unable to understand why any man should wish to be born except for military purposes. But Lord Roberts did not stand alone. His opinion was sustained, as we have seen, by Lord Cromer and also by the Marquis of Lansdowne, while it is notorious that the government has gone a long way to rehabilitate itself in popular approval by its sudden determination to build fourteen new warships a long way in advance of the naval programme. The nation seems to be satisfied that Germany is planning an invasion and that to rely upon a sea defense would be a serious mistake. While Lord Roberts made no claim to a knowledge of German intentions, he did say in the most emphatic manner that a German army of 150,000 men could be landed in England, that it could be prepared and dispatched so secretly as to elude the English fleet, and that after it had once effected a landing it could only be dislodged by a total force of one million additional men. He evidently believed that such a scheme was contemplated. Duplicate every ship in the navy, he said, and the million men would be just as necessary as before. He might have gone further to quote Sir Hiram Maxim, who has just gone upon record as saying that if war with Germany should break out within a year London could be reached and bombarded far over the heads of the fleet. But has aerial navigation actually reached that point?

English alarm at the prospect of invasion is not to be silenced by even the most conclusive demonstrations that Germany has nothing to gain by such a step. If the future were to see no wars except those based upon reasonable calculations of profit and loss, we might be much more tranquil than we are. As a matter of fact, very few wars have been undertaken by intelligent self-interest, but a great many have been caused by racial hatreds, by jealousies, and by gusts of unreflecting passion, and sometimes the very factors that seem to preclude war have precipitated it. England at the present time has many hundreds of thousands of men out of work, and banners bearing the words "work or revolution" have been not uncommon sights upon the streets. Germany, on the other hand, is facing a constitutional crisis; her debt is increasing by $100,000,000 a year; she is now forced into an additional expenditure of $17,000,000 for new ships; her government credit in the money market is lower than that of Italy, while the debt of Prussia alone is twice that of the United States. England, in spite of unprecedented distress, can yet afford to build fourteen new warships and to consider the question of raising a million more soldiers. War itself might be less expensive and less calamitous than the preparations for war, and nations have sometimes chosen war as a solution to the problems of internal dissensions and domestic discords. The German emperor has suffered a severe rebuke from his own people and is smarting under a conviction of incapacity in diplomacy. Gloomy reports of his mental health have once more become current, while the circle of his unofficial advisers, drawn in the main from the army and navy, are known to look upon war with England as the natural culmination of years of patient preparation. We may well hope that a better feeling will presently prevail between the two countries, but if there should be a continuance of the present fanatical enmity there can be but one result.

Mr. Johnson and the Graft Cases.

The Citizens' League of Justice or some other of the movements organized in support of public morals has now opportunity to do a real service by engaging Mr. Hiram Johnson, who has just brought about the conviction of Abraham Ruef, to continue as a special prosecutor. That Mr. Johnson's services are not desired by those who are managing the graft prosecution is apparent; none the less, under all the circumstances they could hardly discover the hardihood to decline coöperation with him if the League of Justice should insist upon it. Mr. Johnson's capabilities as a prosecutor need no exploitation. When he came into the Ruef case, some weeks ago, hope of its successful prosecution had practically been abandoned. The procedure had degenerated into a Kilkenny fight between opposing lawyers, each seeming more eager to vilify his antagonist and to exhibit himself before the public as a "fighter" than to promote the cause before the bar. Mr. Johnson, assisted by Messrs. Dwyer and Sullivan, who with him volunteered to take up the work of the prosecution after Haas's assault upon Heney, instantly changed the atmosphere of procedure. Acrimonious passages between attorneys ceased; there was no badgering of witnesses, no spectacular stunts like the exposure of Haas, no unseemly threats to shoot, no invitation to "finish fights" on the street. By the dignity and skill of his conduct of the case, Mr. Johnson cut from under Ruef's attorneys the only ground upon which they were qualified to stand and make head. Held severely to the line of legitimate procedure, they broke down completely, as the event bears witness. That this result could have been achieved by methods which in former trials again and again failed, no man of judgment believes.

The man who has won this success—the man who has demonstrated his power by convicting Abraham Ruef—ought not to be allowed to pass out of a service which needs expert legal ability and personal self-command as grievously as it did when he entered it six weeks ago. The work legitimately to be done now by the graft prosecution is precisely what it was a year and a half ago when the Argonaut again and again defined it and urged it upon Mr. Spreckels and his associates, namely—to "pursue criminality wherever it may be found, in places high and in places low, without fear or favor as to individuals." Mr. Johnson is precisely suited to this work; and in view of recent events it is not going too far to say that he is better suited to it than any other man. By all means he should be held in it. And since the prosecutors, although means ample for all legitimate purposes are being supplied to them from the public treasury, have not retained him, it would seem entirely proper for the League of Justice to step into the breach and insist upon Mr. Johnson's continuance in the work, even providing the means to retain him if that be necessary. With Mr. Johnson in the conduct of affairs there is a reasonable prospect for further success in those cases where convictions ought to be achieved. Without him—with the course of procedure turned back into those channels of passion and contention with which we have become too familiar—there is the smallest possible chance for a successful outcome.

It is to be considered that Ruef though formally convicted is not yet in stripes. Once before he was convicted, and the public has not forgotten the extraordinary combination of procedures which followed, ending in nullification of the finding against him. It would be an assurance to those who want to see Ruef not merely "convicted" but punished, and whose present doubts rest upon the substantial basis of a historical record, if the conclusion of the immediate procedure against the convicted man might be in the hands of one whose resolution, skill, and address have achieved a worthy success and about whose intentions and whose ways of going about things there exists no question in any mind. Furthermore, Ruef's attorneys are preparing an appeal upon the basis of the long record in Judge Lawlor's court. The conviction which has been achieved must now be sustained in the higher courts, and it is a matter of the largest importance that a lawyer of unquestioned capacity shall present the argument in support of the recent finding. Who, let us ask, is better qualified to do this than Mr. Johnson, especially in the light of his connection with the case and its event?

The graft movement has been and continues to be a very serious and costly thing for San Francisco, directly and indirectly, in ways obscure and in ways plain. It appeared to start right, but later failed of its original purposes because it turned away from straight courses. Mr. Johnson's conviction of Ruef puts the movement, in so far as Mr. Johnson is related to it, back to a point where it stood in the early months of 1907. Upon the basis of his success in the Ruef case, Mr. Johnson is in a position to go forward upon the original lines of the graft prosecution and to regain for it the public respect which it lost through blunders and vagaries. And with this consideration in prospect it would appear a course of stupendous folly to permit Mr. Johnson to go and to again hand over the movement to the condition from which he rescued it.

As to the conviction of Ruef, little remains to be said. That the man is guilty, grossly and colossally guilty, no one has ever doubted for one moment. Nobody of sound moral sense or with the capacity to separate motives of honor from motives of shame, has ever sought or desired immunity for him or has wished him to evade the penalties which his multiplied infamies have merited. So far as Ruef is concerned, the thing now to be desired is that his punishment shall be speedy and severe, that there shall be no further bargainings with him, secret or confessed, that there shall be the fewest possible delays, to the end that San Francisco may point to his punishment as a mark of her power, even under circumstances of unparalleled difficulty and stress, to stay and to scourge the hand of municipal corruption.

Dreyfus and Madame Steinheil.

It is a matter of relatively small moment whether Mme. Steinheil, now under arrest in Paris, did actually murder her husband and his mistress. Robbed of its political reminiscences, the crime becomes a very sordid and vulgar one, although of that dramatic and spectacular order that seems to find its home in the French capital. But public interest is legitimately aroused when it is known that the name of Mme. Steinheil was linked with that of President Faure at the time of the latter's sudden death, and our memory at once goes back to the whispers that were common in Paris when it was asserted that the fatal seizure of the president had occurred amid surroundings of the most discreditable kind and in the presence of the very woman who is now charged with a brutal and revolting murder.

Those who followed the Dreyfus case with any attention, and especially those who were in Paris at the time, will remember the very positive evidence that was quietly circulated as to the circumstances surrounding the president's death. Upon a basis of sufficiently ugly fact was raised a superstructure of still more ugly suspicion and innuendo variously colored by the frantic passions aroused by the "affaire." Facts and suspicions alike were suppressed by the authorities, while the reputable press frowned upon an attempt to import yet further bitterness and shame into a situation already threatening civil war. That the president's death was surrounded by disgraceful circumstances there was little question; the eye-witnesses were too numerous, but other questions were asked, and unless official suppression is once more attempted they are likely now to be answered. Was the president's death a natural one? If it was not natural, did Mme. Steinheil have any hand in a crime thus aimed at the head of the state? If so, was she bribed to aid in the removal of the one man who was supposed to stand inflexibly between Dreyfus and the rehearing of his case? Or, on the other hand, was she persuaded to the deed by those who feared that the president was weakening before the growing demand for justice? Did President Faure write to Mme. Steinheil a series of confidential letters embracing the whole secret history of the great cause, and if so, where are those letters now? That such letters existed was a common rumor at the time, and Mme. Steinheil was said to be under surveillance for a long while in the hope of their recovery.

These questions were the talk of the street of the time of the president's death. Their interest faded away as the solution of the mystery seemed to become impossible. And now, after all these years, Mme. Steinheil's iniquitous life has brought her once more into the limelight. There is no particular reason why the crime of which she is now accused should be related to the tragedy with which her name was linked long ago and of which the president of the French republic was the victim, but the fact that she is the very same woman around whom so terrible a suggestion once hung so closely has aroused a public curiosity that will hardly be satisfied with anything short of a full, if tardy, revelation.

Editorial Notes.

It would be more seemly all round if the President, Mr. Pulitzer of the World, Mr. Laffan of the Sun, and the Indianapolis News man had given more study to the simple facts connected with the canal transaction and less ingenuity to the framing of vituperative epithets. If the transaction was a straight one, there surely must be a way of demonstrating it; and such an exposition gains nothing from the tirades flung by the President and Mr. Pulitzer and Mr. Laffan. If the transaction was a crooked one, that, too, must be capable of exposition without explosive talk. An incident, no matter how much or how little scandal may lie at its base, is made a scandal by the vulgarity with which it is treated by everybody connected with it, including the President. What the public wants is not Mr. Laffan's or Mr. Pulitzer's opinions of the President, not the opinions of the President with respect to his critics, but the plain facts. And, since the issue has been raised, the public will have the facts before the incident is dismissed.

In the modern social organization, under the system which substitutes authority of law for authority of force, there is no higher function than that of the lawyer. And by the term lawyer we mean not the mere trader in the mechanism of legal procedures, rather than man whose considerations of the law are founded in regard for it as an agency for the promotion of justice among men. Judge John Garber, dead within the week, was a lawyer of the best and soundest type, sustaining perhaps in a truer sense than any other among us in recent years those high responsibilities which rest upon the legal profession in the larger range of its activities. Judge Garber was no mere abstract thinker, he was no mere moral dreamer; he was above all a man of affairs. He never shot into the air. He always shot at a mark. And wherever the shafts of his logic were aimed they carried unfailingly wisdom and enlightenment. Judge Garber was a great man and a great citizen, perhaps not more by his special activities than upon the basis of the example and stimulus which he supplied to the profession of which he has long been recognized as an eminent figure in California.

There are many, we find, who failed to grasp the significance of the vote given last month favorable to the enactment of a direct primary law. Last month's vote did not create such a law; it merely gave to the legislature constitutional authority to do it. Beyond a doubt we shall have a direct primary law at the hands of the coming legislature, since the sentiment of the State seems to be overwhelmingly for it. None the less, the Argonaut regards the whole business as a stupid blunder and awaits the day when it shall be able to say "I told you so." Let us add that all direct primary laws are not alike and that it is quite possible to choose between the utterly bad and the not-quite-so-bad. The muddle into which conditions have fallen in the State of Oregon ought at least to suggest caution to the most radical of innovators. Whatever else we may get, let us avoid a condition under which a legislature overwhelmingly Republican or Democratic may be committed to elect to the United States Senate a man of opposing political views. If we must have a direct primary law, with its inevitable cheapening of political agents, let us at least have one so drawn as to avoid the grosser evils of too hasty legislation elsewhere.

Gifford Pinchot is already chosen, it is said, for Secretary of Agriculture in Mr. Taft's Cabinet. Overton W. Price, assistant forester, has been selected as Mr. Pinchot's successor in the office of chief forester. There is a possibility that Mr. Pinchot will enter office while Mr. Roosevelt is still President, but it is admitted that Secretary Wilson may remain until the end of the Roosevelt term if he wishes.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A few weeks ago the New York Evening Post published the results of a canvass of New York Democrats as to the causes of the recent political overthrow and the policies that the Democratic party can most hopefully follow in the future. The Post has now supplemented this inquiry by another one along similar lines and directed to the editors of Democratic newspapers in the South and West. The editor has sometimes a greater facility in the expression of opinion than the politician. He is more closely in touch with public sentiment and he has a better mental equipment for its analysis. Certainly the replies from the editors are more thoughtful and more judicial than those from the politicians, and this, after all, is what might have been expected.

Charles H. Henry of the Spartanburg (S. C.) Journal is decidedly lugubrious. He can find no balm in Gilead anywhere. The election of the Democratic governors brings no solace to his soul, inasmuch as they were elected by the whisky interests, and no good can come of such support. Mr. Bryan's defeat shows that the party can not succeed under a radical banner, while Mr. Parker's discomfiture proves that conservative leadership is equally useless. In point of fact, no party can succeed without the aid of the big interests.

J. H. Bloom, manager of the Devil's Lake (N. D.) Journal, is made of sterner stuff than that. He faces the foe and cries no surrender, but he is under no disillusion as to the Democratic governors. He would like to see what these governors will do, and he asks for fruits meet for repentance. Then he says that we "who are neighbors to Minnesota understand why Johnson was elected," and we may understand from this delphic utterance that some tale might be unfolded. "If it is principle we are fighting for, continue the fight on the lines of the last campaign, taking no backward step."

Claude S. Burr of the Oklahoma State Capital allows himself to deviate into some regrettable technicalities. He says if the party wishes to succeed "it must first deliberately burn the deck—unwrap a new one—being careful to sort the cards and discard all advertising slips and the joker." These formalities being accomplished, it should then stand firmly for tariff revision, but "revision with reason."

Wade H. Harris of the Charlotte (N. C.) Evening Chronicle thinks that Democratic opportunity will come through the exceeding stand-patness of Speaker Cannon, and in the meantime "cut loose from Bryanism in every manner, shape, and form; make tariff reform and the revival of the currency system the issue at the bands of the congressmen."

Richard W. Knott of the Evening Post, Louisville, repeats the previous explanation of the election of the Democratic governors. In Ohio and Indiana the success of the ticket was due "to the worst influence in American politics, which is the American saloon, its backers and supporters. I consider the surrender of the Democratic party in Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Tennessee to the liquor elements the most sinister event in recent politics. You can not reorganize the Democratic party by the assistance of saloons."

Gilbert D. Raine of the Memphis (Tenn.) News Scimitar says "we want abler hands" and he asks us to note that he speaks in the plural. There are some men who must be relegated to obscurity. The party has had too much Jeff Davis of Arkansas, too much Guffey "and other camp followers," and perhaps too much of the Murphys and Conners. As to the tariff, "our view is that the minority should not make an exception of tariff on print paper. It should not be a party to organized greed's escape by making a scapegoat of one of the privileged interests. The minority should not contribute towards throwing a sop to the self-interest appetite of the pink-tea reformers in the press. It should rather see that they feel, learn, and inwardly digest the economic and moral deformities of the present tariff."

J. P. Caldwell of the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer says that the party must be united on the tariff, that it should be encouraged in the choice of an unobjectionable candidate by the success of the Democratic governors, and that it should eliminate Mr. Bryan. "No plan of action for the future will be worth while until Mr. Bryan announces unequivocally that he will not be a candidate, active or receptive, for the nomination in 1912; that he would not accept the nomination if it were tendered him, but will give his cordial support to the nominee of that year, and bring his influence in behalf of that nominee to bear upon his own followers."

Desha Breckinridge of the Lexington (Ky.) Herald also believes that Mr. Bryan must evaporate. He feels that the tariff should take precedence of all such policies as the guarantee of bank deposits, foreign policies, and "efforts to follow the example of Mr. Roosevelt in the bunko game of denouncing rich malefactors, while failing to enact any law which will strike at the source of their power and influence." If Mr. Bryan will aid in developing such men as Johnson, Marshall, and Harmon, the next election can be won, but "if he continues his past policy of attempting to destroy every man who appears who is not subservient to his ambition, it may be within his power to prevent the election of any Democrat."

W. R. Nelson of the Kansas City Star suggests that it is difficult to "put" the organization into abler hands. Leadership comes spontaneously from within, and men arbitrarily selected would have no following. Mr. Bryan's strength arises from the fact that he was not imposed on the party. "He grew up from within it." But the right leaders must be found and they must make it clear that they are the enemies of privilege and ready to walk along broad and constructive paths. The Democratic party must develop for itself such leaders as Roosevelt, Taft, Hughes, La Follette, Hadley, Cummins, and Beveridge. Then it can make a strong appeal to the nation.

Louis T. Golding of the St. Joseph (Mo.) News-Press joins in the cry for the subsidence of Mr. Bryan. It must be "final and complete." The present prospects for the party are bright if it will concentrate upon the tariff. Notwithstanding the sincerity of Mr. Taft, the stand-patters will prevail, and this will be rebuked by the people in 1912. But the leader must be equal to his opportunities. He must have "broad intelligence, wide experience, special training, and, above all, that common sense that amounts to genius." Mr. Bryan has none of this. He is a "splendid exhorter, and would almost make another Moody, but he can not be seriously considered as a national executive." Moreover, why not choose a candidate from the South, or from the border? How about David R. Francis of Missouri?

S. L. Retter, formerly editor of the Raleigh (N. C.) Evening Times, says by all means put the leadership into new hands. Good Democrats can hardly be expected to follow the Tammany bosses, Tom Taggart backers, Haskell and his scandals, or Fingy Conners and his saloon chain. There should be no more connection with "ward-beelers and gentlemen who can 'control' and 'swing' votes. The tariff has become the supreme issue and the people are heartily sick of the present schedules. The hallmark of a convention carries little weight with the voter who makes up his own mind upon what he knows of the candidate. Nominate for President in 1912 one of the successful governors of the doubtful States, is my answer to the question as to how the election of Democratic governors can be utilized. Still make the tariff the paramount issue."

Charles I. Stewart of the Kentucky Evening Gazette is in no hurry upon the leadership. The problem must solve itself from the inside. Mr. Stewart is somewhat in the minority in his relegation of the tariff to a secondary position. By all means let there be an united and consistent tariff policy, but it must not "obscure the question of the restraint of those who have profited by other forms of special privilege." Future Democratic success must come through Republican dissension. "The antagonism between the different elements in the Republican party has been plain to every close observer of affairs, and this antagonism was not removed by the truce of the factions for the recent presidential campaign. It is not likely that Mr. Taft as President will have the courage to seek the overthrow of the present House machine, and from the moment an extra session of Congress is called we may expect a conflict to rage between the liberal element of the Republican organization led by Taft and the reactionary forces led by the House machine, backed by all of the old stalwart Republican politicians and the powerful interests and corporations that have profited by control of legislation and the public administration."

Last but not least comes Henry Watterson of the Louisville Courier-Journal. He asks who is to select the new leaders, who is to name time and place, and who is to determine the standards of "ability." "It was not 'ability' that was lacking on the Democratic side in the last campaign, or was present on the Republican side. The trend of the popular thought, thoroughly commercialized, reduced the contest to a man-to-man issue; it became a duel between Mr. Bryan's record and Mr. Taft's record; for all his vociferation the President dropped quite out of it; great masses of the voters believed that with Taft they took no risk, but, on the contrary, that they would get an improvement on Roosevelt, while with Bryan they knew not what; certainly continued agitation for something which went by the name of Reform. Decidedly, the bread-and-butter argument had the floor. It was doubtless helped along by money and machinery—fortified by threats and fears. But it was predominant, and it prevailed."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

As Seen from New York.

NEW YORK, December 4, 1908.

EDITOR ARGONAUT: There appeared in the New York Sun of December 2, 1908, an article descriptive of conditions in San Francisco which produced in the breasts of many San Franciscans abroad feelings of shame, humiliation, and profound disgust. The article is but an index to the opinion of San Francisco which has found a firm lodgment in the minds of a large number, and perhaps a majority, of the people of the East, and, unfortunately, the picture is, in the main, a faithful representation of one view of the present situation utterly detrimental to San Francisco's material interests.

The unenviable notoriety gained through the sensational events of recent years has caused the people in the East to believe that San Francisco has sunk in a state of lawlessness hardly less chaotic than that which prevailed in the days of the Vigilantes. One may pour into the Easterner's ears the wonderful tale of accomplishment since the fire; one may quote the statistics of building operations, customs receipts, bank clearings, etc., but to these he gives only a distracted attention. When one has finished one's speech, he asks with eager interest, "Is San Francisco really such a lawless city and are the streets as unsafe as we are told they are?"

San Francisco should rouse itself from its state of fatuous complacency and realize that these harmful ideas take firm root and multiply, whereas the accounts of her recent remarkable achievements in the line of progress toward rehabilitation fall on barren soil.

What San Francisco now imperatively needs is a period of total eclipse. She has been thoroughly advertised, but, unfortunately, she gave the advertising contract to enemies. If San Francisco would retire from the limelight, if she would permit the influence of time to efface from the minds of men the humiliating memory of the past few years of sensationalism, miserably sordid quarrels, perversions of justice, and municipal misgovernment, and by a concerted effort of her better citizenship resume a normal course of life, she would the sooner reinstate herself in the good opinion of the American public. San Francisco seems to be the helpless victim of some hateful influence blunting her perceptions. She appears to ignore, or to view with equanimity, a state of affairs which meets with the severest reprehension outside. She seems complacently to bear the finger of scorn and pitying contempt continually pointed at her by the Eastern press and people. To be sure, nothing, not even the strenuous efforts of her rivals without and her false friends within, can permanently prevent the fulfillment of her manifest destiny, but present conditions can and do operate to retard greatly the day of its accomplishment.

It is furthermore safe to say that were the San Francisco newspapers as unanimously and as unselfishly devoted to the best interests of San Francisco as is the Argonaut, a continuance of present conditions would speedily become impossible. Such, at least, are the views of many San Franciscans in exile, one of whom has the honor to subscribe himself as

A BUDDHIST POPE IN PEKING.

Visit of the Dalai Lama to the Chinese Capital.

Holier than the Pope of Rome, for he claims to be the reincarnation of a God, and more absolute than the Czar of Russia, for he is spiritual as well as temporal autocrat, the Dalai Lama of Thibet holds a unique position. It is well known that the secret of romance is remoteness, and this his advisers have so thoroughly understood that they have always taken care to shroud their priest-king in mystery. In Lhasa he was seldom allowed to go outside the gilded palace—the wonderful Potala; the faithful who journeyed from all the Buddhist Himalayan States, from the remotest corners of Mongolia, and even from China itself, worshipped him with lowered eyes. He was, in fact, kept impersonal, remote, undividable, for the sake of his spiritual prestige.

When the British expedition entered holy Lhasa in 1904 his unveiling seemed inevitable. Nothing but the most extreme measures could save him from being dragged into the disillusioning glare of publicity. Either he had to suffer the indignity of being gazed on by unsympathetic crowds, of being dragged into durbar as a signatory, or he had to flee. To escape the ordeal he fled—and in the most picturesque and effective way possible at dead of night, silently, up the narrow valley which leads to Mongolia.

Since that unlucky year, he has been traveling continually over mountain ranges and across deserts, and his visit to Peking is by express invitation of the Emperor of China, who wished to consult with him about the tangled web of Thibetan politics. The Chinese capital was certainly not originally included in the programme of his wanderjahr, and he came with reluctance.

First he lingered for five months at the holy city of Wu Tai Shan, where the Chinese spent enormous sums in fitting out the temple for his reception. The roofs were retiled with glistening yellow porcelain tiles; the rooms were hung with yellow silk from the imperial looms, and the floors were covered with the finest camel's hair carpets. A continuous stream of pilgrims came daily to ask his blessing.

Among other visitors, he received Mr. Rockhill, United States minister to China, who in former years traveled extensively in Thibet and who still speaks Thibetan fluently. The Dalai Lama, when the first greetings were over, when he had partaken of tea and food with his guest (this was an exceptional unbending), naively inquired, "Well, what have you brought me?" Like all Orientals, he has a mania for new toys, which please and distract him and temporarily break the monotony of his long dull days. The only gift to which he took exception was a phonograph sent him on one occasion by the Maharajah of Nepal. For a few moments the Dalai Lama listened to it attentively. Then he suddenly rose and ordered it removed. "I can not live with a voice that has no soul," said he.

Though greedy for gifts, he is quite willing to repay them in kind, and he presented the American minister with Buddhas and prayer wheels. These, of course, were in addition to the ceremonial scarfs which at every audience the Dalai Lama places on the shoulders of his visitors. The higher the rank of the caller, the finer the scarf, but so far as coloring goes, the very best of them are disappointing. All are simple blue and white, specially woven in the Chinese province of Shantung, and of coarse silk.

It was far from easy to persuade the Dalai Lama to leave Wu Tai Shan for Peking. Possibly he was nervous for his safety in a capital. He finally set out, however, traveling for the first time in his life by train. Two other "specials" transported his attendants and baggage, and the entry into the city was magnificent. Fifty stately camels gay with red and yellow trappings carried his personal possessions. Fifty horses—temporarily detached from the Chinese cavalry—carried his more important followers, and in addition there were numberless carts to transport odds and ends such as tents and camp-followers. As they passed through the mediæval gateways of old Peking, the effect was more than beautiful. Yellows, reds, greens, stood out in vivid contrast to the gray of the walls, and in addition to these sunset colors of the Thibetans, there were the brilliant sunrise colors of the Manchu women come out to see the sights—the pinks and mauves and magentas marvelously and daringly combined in gowns and shoes and head-dresses.

If these good ladies had a lurking feminine desire for a little admiration from the strangers, they were disappointed. The Dalai Lama himself stepped straight from the train into his yellow-covered chair and neither saw nor was seen by any one. As for his followers, they seem singularly incurious. In most of the faces indifference and apathy could be plainly read. There was nothing pleasant or human about them, as there invariably is about a Chinese crowd; on the contrary, thick lips, hawk eyes, and heavy jowls gave them a forbidding appearance. They rode along in silence, turning occasional proud and disdainful glances on the sightseers, and appeared to resent being stared at. Yet they must have realized that the best bred crowd in the world must have stared at their picturesque dresses, their long over-garment shaped like a burnoose and leaving one bronzed arm bare, at their quaint peaked caps tipped with sable, at their single earring set with a heavy lump of matrix turquoise and—most of all—at the kodaks slung over the shoulders of several priests.

The procession passed directly across the city to the temple beyond the outer walls where the Dalai Lama was to lodge. It is situated on the same plain that the Allies encamped upon when they came to Peking in 1860. Now, as then, it is covered with tents—but these latest arrivals, instead of being white and regular, are brown and straggling. Camels lie beside them; shaggy ponies are tethered to their ropes, and before almost every one there is a crowd of Mongol men and women loafing about and talking loudly. There seems to be no attempt at order, and all Mongols, no matter how dirty, are welcome.

The Dalai Lama's own quarters are superintended by Chinese officials, who observe all visitors, and, indeed, take them in charge from their arrival to their departure. What they probably dread is some intrigue—especially a Russian intrigue, for the Dalai Lama is known to favor the Russians, while he detests the British. Rumor says that it was a Russian Lama named Dorjief, by the way, who helped to arrange the famous flight from Lhasa.

Naturally the Russian minister has been to call upon the Dalai Lama, but so have all the other diplomats in Peking. One plenipotentiary asked for an audience not only for himself, but for his staff and the officers of his legation guard. The request was granted and the party made a brave show, all the military being naturally in uniform. But as soon as the Dalai Lama saw the gold lace and swords he looked startled, trembled perceptibly, and asked that the officers retire immediately. He feared that they were meditating a coup d'état, that they had come to take him prisoner, and since that occasion he has steadily refused to receive any one in uniform, and never more than two or three persons at a time.

During the audiences he sits upon a high, bench-like throne with his hands folded and his feet carefully placed in the ceremonial attitude—that is, heels together and toes at right angles to each other. He wears a simple flowing garment of dark red Thibetan cloth, and all his surroundings are equally unpretentious. The four Chief Lamas who form his council usually stand round him with bowed heads, and one of them generally translates.

Personally the Dalai Lama is rather above the average height, thick set, with a heavy, square jaw and a nose unusually long and straight for a Thibetan. His eyebrows turn upward and give him a forbidding look. He looks more than his thirty-three years, and his menacing expression seems to be a true index to his character, so far as the character can be judged of one whom it is considered blasphemous to scrutinize and criminal to discuss. There is little doubt, however, that he is cleverer than the majority of his predecessors—as well as proud, headstrong, and determined. The last characteristic he plainly showed in his discussions over his audience with the Emperor of China. He made so many conditions—one of which was that the emperor should drag him into the throne room with a silken cord—that the whole matter nearly fell through. But finally outside influence obliged him to give in and, notwithstanding his sanctity, make his nine kotows before the Son of Heaven like other people. The interview then proceeded amicably, and the Dalai Lama took the opportunity to submit a long list of Thibetan reforms, including the construction of a railway to Lhasa.

And now that some form of agreement—the exact nature of which, of course, the public may not know—has been concluded, the Dalai Lama is impatient to start back to Thibet. The question is, should he return, will the regent who has been governing the country in his absence abdicate gracefully? Since the assumption of temporal power by the fifth Grand Lama in the seventeenth century, the whole history of the Thibetan hierarchy has been a record of bloodshed and intrigue. No less than twelve Dalai Lamas have been suddenly absorbed into the universal essence when their continuance in this mortal coil became inconvenient. Truly the life of the "Eloquent, Noble-Minded Tübdan," as the present incumbent is called, can not be an enviable one. He has no amusements. His days pass in pious abstraction or in the monotonous repetition of "Om Man Padme Om" and he has neither companions nor friends. Surrounded by ignorant and brutal men, he is almost certain in the end to fall a victim to some plot, and meanwhile he has the satisfaction of knowing that when he does suddenly disappear, no questions will be asked—that those who hear of his death will simply say, "Who shall presume to judge the doings of the divine Lord of Mercy and Judgment or to question the hour when he ordains that a spirit shall enter a higher state?"

Bremen was the first port of the Continent that undertook to establish a regular steamship service with the United States. From that small beginning in 1847, sixty years ago, it has constantly increased its shipping and trade until during last year, 1907, Bremen ships carried over 225,000 emigrants, and more than $52,000,000 worth of merchandise to the United States, and brought back to Bremen from the United States $154,000,000 worth of merchandise.

A kippered herring is a combination of a smoked and pickled fish. To produce it the fresh herring is first put through a light pickling process, and is then smoked the same as is any other fish.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Miss Ida Tarbell has written a letter protesting against the report that she favors the suffrage for women. She actually belongs to the hostile organization of anti-woman suffragists.

Bringing the thanks of a grateful people for the remittance by the American government of a large part of the Boxer indemnity, Tang Shao Yi, president of the Chinese board and created a special ambassador for the occasion, has arrived in Washington.

The French ambassador, M. Jusserand, last week officiated at the unveiling at East Orange, New Jersey, of a memorial tablet to the great French inventor, André-Marie Ampere. It has been set up in the Ampere station, near the Crocker-Wheeler factory, by Dr. Schuyler Skaats Wheeler, head of the company.

Captain Watt, the commodore of the Cunard fleet, retired into private life a few days ago when he brought the Lusitania into harbor at Liverpool. Captain Watt's sea career extends over half a century, and his record covers five hundred and twenty-eight voyages across the Atlantic without an accident to any of the vessels under his charge.

Miss Marguerite Frey, winner of the widely advertised newspaper American beauty competition, has just been married to Mr. Wilkins McClair Armour, of Dallas, Texas. Tired of being pointed out as the most beautiful woman in America, Miss Frey wanted to avoid as much publicity as possible, so a quiet wedding was decided upon, and only her parents knew of the date.

Walter Wellman, through his lawyer, Donald Harper, has filed a libel suit for $100,000 and rectification against the sporting review, La Vie au Grand Air, because of the publication of an article characterizing Wellman's expedition to the North Pole as "an American bluff, designed for personal profit and carried out under the cover of impossible scientific conditions." The article of which Mr. Wellman complains was printed last spring.

Miss Cicely Horner, one of the noted beauties of London society and an artist besides, is going to marry George Lambton, a brother of the Earl of Durham, much interested in racing. Miss Horner's is an old Somersetshire family, and it is said that the original "Jack Horner," who "put in his thumb and pulled out a plum," was a distinguished ornament thereof, being steward to the abbot of Glastonbury when the abbey lands were distributed, and getting a fine plum.

Ignacio Fragosa, who is in prison in Mexico City under sentence of death for homicide, has saved his life and may lead to his receiving an unconditional pardon and high honors. He has invented an aeroplane while in prison. He drew such perfect plans of the machine, which is projected upon a new theory that promises to revolutionize all that has ever been done along this line, that the prison authorities called the attention of the minister of war to the invention.

Professor Metchnikoff, the Russian sub-director of the Pasteur Institute, who will receive half the Nobel prize this year for medico-physiological research, declares that he will devote the sum to further study of means to promote longevity. He will continue his efforts to discover how the body can get its chance, so to speak, and how it can be prevented from being needlessly sacrificed in early youth—comparatively, that is—at seventy or eighty years of age, when it ought to hold out until it is 150.

Ex-Queen Liliuokalani of Hawaii, accompanied by Prince and Princess Kalaniano'le and her secretary, Aimoku, have reached Washington from Honolulu. She will appear before Congress and urge the passage of Delegate Kalaniano'le's relief bill to indemnify the queen for certain lands which were confiscated by the United States. She contends that at the time the lands were confiscated—the period of occupancy by American troops in Hawaii—property of the crown yielded an income of $50,000 a year.

Dr. Ferrero, the Italian scholar and historian, in a recent lecture before the Lowell Institute in Boston, said that Antony's love for Cleopatra is a myth. Latronne, a French investigator of about a century ago, found that in 36 B. C. Antony married Cleopatra and became King of Egypt, although he did not dare so to proclaim himself. He wanted not Cleopatra, but Egypt. He desired to establish a Roman protectorate in the Valley of the Nile, a base within striking distance of Persia. Cæsar knew of the wealth of Egypt, and the intrigue of Antony was political and was based on the plans of Cæsar.

Dr. Cosmo Gordon Lang has been elevated to the great English See of York—which shares with the See of Canterbury the archiepiscopal direction of the Established Church. A Scotchman, he was born in 1864, and was educated at Glasgow and at Kings College, Cambridge. At one time it seemed that he might follow the lawyer's life, at another the scholar's. He studied for the bar at the Inner Temple, but when almost on the eve of being "called" became convinced that his vocation should be the Anglican ministry. Dr. Stubbs, the famous Bishop of Oxford, ordained him and he became a curate. Some seven years or so ago he was made Canon of St. Paul's, then Suffragan Bishop of Stepney, which positions he occupied at the time of his appointment to the archbishopric of York.

DIANA'S BANDIT GUIDE.

By Jerome A. Hart.

XLIV.

How Diana found herself in the saddle, and galloping through the darkness beside the bandit, she could not exactly tell. She remembered her maid Luisa with a sly smile giving her Eugene's letter: she remembered the shock with which she read the news of Arthur's peril of death; she recalled her sending Pepe to seek Basquez and to bid him meet her with horses. She vaguely remembered also leaving a line for Mrs. Lyndon, but what explanation she made of her absence she could not tell. All she knew was that appalling news had come to her—news that Arthur Alden lay in a Vigilante prison, that he was sentenced to die a shameful death, and that her testimony might save his life. And with this dreadful news had come to her also like a flash the sudden conviction that she loved Arthur Alden—loved him passionately—loved him more than all the world beside. She felt herself blushing in the darkness.

The bandit by her side rode on in silence—although a man of many murders, he was muy cobolero, and instinctively felt that she was busy with her thoughts. "Why did I treat him so?" she asked herself in a passion of self-reproach. "Was it his fault if we were cut off by the flood alone together for a day and a night? How could he have helped it? If I had not—that is, if I had—if I had not spoken to him so harshly, perhaps he might never have gone to this dreadful place. His life might not now be hanging by a thread. Why did I treat him so? All for a question of conventionality—something which even in cities is artificial, and which here, out on the frontier, where men and women live free lives and think frank thoughts, is not only artificial, but absurd."

For some miles they had been riding through the valley, as she knew by the cool feeling of the lush alfalfa on either side of the road—it was a feeling rather than an odor. But the heavy clay road began changing to a dry and sandier soil, and the keener odor of the yerbo santa reached her nostrils. They were leaving the valley now. Ahead of them in the darkness she thought she could discern the low clumps of sage-brush. They were on the edge of the desert.

How was it the bandit called this desert when they started? It was some odd name.

"Como se llamo este desierto?" she said to him abruptly.

"Se llama 'Salsipuedes,'" he replied.

Salsipuedes—"escape if you can!" What a strange name, she thought to herself. Baptized by desert wanderers, probably, with death facing them from thirst. And straightway her brain fell to following their horses' hoof-beats, in the rhythmical leaps of the gallop, with the refrain:

"Sal-si-puedes! Escape-if-you-can!
Sal-si-puedes! Escape-if-you-can!
Sal-si-puedes! Escape-if-you-can!
Sal-si-puedes! Escape-if-you-can!

Click! Something shut like a shutter in her brain, and the refrain ceased suddenly. "Escape"—here she was babbling of sounds, and names, and words, when across that stretch of desert her lover lay in prison sentenced to death. "Sal-si-puedes! Escape if you can!" Would he escape? Perhaps the despairing desert cry was ringing in his ears, but with a different meaning. Could she help him to escape? Ah—God grant that it were so!

She felt a momentary impulse of impatience with the valiant little mustang which bore her along so tirelessly. "When do we reach the camp where we change horses?" she asked querulously.

"A media noche."

It was not until midnight then. But Basquez had already told her—she had forgotten. He had said that they could get no fresh horses until they reached his camp at the old stage station on the abandoned road across the desert. After that, he had said, the moon would be up, and they could ride faster. Oh, that midnight and the moon were come, and they were riding faster—faster—faster—on the further side of the desert—on the side where he was, and not here.

"Click!"

What was that? It was neither the jingle of bridle-chain nor spur-rowel. It was only a bit of flint thrown up by her horse's hoof, and striking the metal band around her spurred boot. Would her strong nerves fail her? But no, she thought, as she galloped on in her high-peaked Mexican saddle. Her sure seat and her coolness with horses would stand her in good stead tonight. She remembered Arthur's look of surprise when he saw her appear ready to ride for the rodco. She thought then that, mingled with his look of frank admiration, there was visible a tinge of distaste for the semi-masculine equipment. She remembered that she had mentally resented it at the time. Now, she thought to herself, perhaps he would forgive her for her masculine fashion of riding, if thus she might save his life.

Ah, he had more than that to forgive her for! He did not know that she had innocently shielded the bandit whom the Vigilantes were pursuing—the bandit accused of wounding him on the stage-coach. But what of that? Was she not riding under the protection of that very bandit? She set her teeth as she determined that she would stick at nothing to save Arthur. Were Basquez and his men all red-handed murderers, she would not hesitate to use them if thus she could save his life.

On and on they rode through the darkness, for what seemed hours. How her companion knew the road, if there was a road, she could not understand. At last ahead of them the stars began to grow pale, the sky luminous. The moon was rising. On the horizon ahead she could see a black line of saw-like mountains, outlined against the cold glimmer of the moon. And as the light gradually transmuted the dark desert into a waste of gray and silver, she thought she saw ahead what looked like human habitations. As they drew nearer her companion bade her draw rein and she saw that she was right. A sharp challenge came from the lookout by the road-side.

"Que gente?"

Her companion replied with a password, and they drew up in front of a large adobe house. Out of this there poured a dozen or more Mexicans, who received Basquez with hearty greetings. At her they gazed curiously, but did not venture to address her. It was evidently not yet known to the band who or what she was. Basquez did not always take his cutthroats into his confidence. If the chief had carried off a young Americano for ransom—muy bien. If not for the band and for ransom, but for a querida for himself, why not so well, but porque no?

The bandit chief took off his sombrero with a flourish: "Mi cosa, señorita," he said, "es lo nuestro."

It was the conventional Spanish greeting for a host to say to his guest, "My house is yours," but through Diana's mind there ran the whimsical thought, how can he offer what is not his? It certainly was not his house to give nor hers to accept. While three or four of his band were making some slight attempt to put it in order before she entered, she asked Basquez what manner of place it was. He told her that it was an old stage-station, disused when the stage-coaches had abandoned the direct road across the desert. As new mining camps sprung up on the edge of the desert, the stage road had followed the more circuitous route around, skirting the mountains. There was a good spring or water-hole here, hence its name "Los Pozos."

By the light of the full moon, now climbing higher above the horizon, Diana could see that the adobe which they were preparing for her was the main building—this must be the old station. The other structures were mere shanties built of upright cactus poles and thatched with cactus leaves. There were two corals, also built of cactus poles; in these there was a large herd of horses—much larger, she thought, than was needed to mount all the Mexicans in the band.

Since their chief's arrival these men were all busy as bees. Several were putting the adobe house to rights for her; one was making a fire there, for the night winds on the desert are often keen and cold. Others were unsaddling their weary beasts, and taking them to the corral. Still others were making preparations for supper; on a fire which was smouldering in a trench, a bunch of dried mesquite twigs was thrown; juicy rib collars were cut from a quarter of beef hanging in front of the adobe, and soon they were sizzling over the clear embers. Another bandit made steaming coffee, while the baker of the band prepared hot torillas.

When the two mustachioed housemaids had finished their hasty tidying, Diana was ushered in with much ceremony, and left alone. The room was meagrely furnished—its only contents were the wooden counter of the stage station and two broken chairs with seats made of rawhide thongs. The walls bore for sole garniture several superannuated saddle-trees hanging on pegs. The adobe house consisted of a single large room, lighted only by the fire. To this Diana drew up, seated herself in one of the rawhide chairs, and with a shiver extended her booted feet to the blaze, for the night wind was growing very cold. Not many minutes later Basquez brought her in a smoking hot supper on a tin plate and a tin cup of coffee.

Diana protested that she did not care to eat.

"Gracias, no tengo hambre, no tomaré nada," she said.

But Basquez insisted that she must eat, if only a little, or her strength would fail before her long, hard ride was done. Reluctantly, therefore, she ate a few morsels only, but drank all of the hot coffee, and it gave a fillip to her spirits. She became impatient to be off. She looked out, but there was no sign of activity—the bandits were lolling around their fire, smoking cigaritos.

"Why do we not start?" she cried to Basquez.

He hastened to explain to her that it was little past midnight, and that he did not wish to arrive at the town too early.

"But I wish to arrive early! tengo usted entendido!" she declared, stamping her little foot. "Understand me! muy de moñona! Tan pronta como possible!"

"No es posible!" replied Basquez, laughing at her imperiousness. He was not used to taking orders.

"And why is it not possible? Why do you not want to arrive before daylight?"

"Because, señorita," replied the bandit gravely, "that town before daylight is no place for you." He added with a twinkle in his eye, "And after daylight it is no place for me."

With a sigh Diana turned back within the hut. She realized that if Arthur's life was at stake, there were other lives as well. She had forgotten for the moment the handbill she had seen at Captain Helmont's, offering thousands of dollars for certain men, dead or alive; she did not know—she did not want to know—but she could not help suspecting that some of the men on whose heads a price was set were seated around that camp-fire a few yards away from her, and that the man under whose charge she had come so far—and with whom she had yet to go many miles—was Joaquin Basquez, the most daring bandit in the State.

But what did it matter, she thought impatiently. If he had brought her so far in safety, he would surely bring her the rest of the way. And a certain recklessness which was in her blood made her dismiss these thoughts of the methods from her mind, and think only of the goal.

The sound of men's voices, the whinnying of the animals in the corral, the grunting of the mustangs that were being cinched—these noises brought her to the door. She rejoiced to see that preparations for departure were under way. Two selected animals were ready saddled for her and Basquez, while six of the bandits were looking over their mounts, tightening thongs, and knotting girths.

"Why are all these men going with us?" asked Diana in surprise.

Basquez replied that in the desert they were at home, and asked no odds of any one. But he frankly admitted that near the towns they were obliged to be wary.

"You mean that you are afraid of capture if you accompany me alone?" Diana asked. She said it innocently enough, but she would have given worlds to recall it when she saw the bandit's eyes flash and noted the look on his face.

"Eso puede ser," he said with an effort, and then went on, quietly enough; "But no—that is not what I meant. The señorita is young and beautiful. There are bands of Americanos near the town who are worse for women than the band of Basquez."

Diana shuddered.

"Have no fear, señorita," he said. "My six men will protect you to the town—and then—quien sabe?—they may be necessary to protect me back again," he added with a laugh. "But have no fear—you will reach there safely. Con perdon—may I help you to mount? No?" He looked around. "They are all ready—todo esto listo? Pues vamosnos!" And the little cavalcade swung into column, and the light-footed mustangs loped out on the desert highway.

As they set forth, Diana involuntarily looked back toward the miles of darkness over which they had come. Everything was lighted now—the desert was all a-shimmer with moonlight. Around the old stage-station there were patches of shadow, for a scattering grove of cottonwoods grew about the water-hole, and followed the little stream which ran from the spring through bunches of salt grass till it lost itself in the desert. But as she looked toward the East, whither they were journeying, she saw little left of the darkness, save the black shadows of the cactus. Before them, rolling away to the distant mountains, lay broad, moon-lighted stretches of sand and shale. Dotted methodically over the desert were clumps of sage-brush, only a little darker than the surrounding sand. Interminable files of the tall yucca marched like silent soldiers toward the horizon.

And thus they rode on for long miles over the vast plain, gaunt and dreary by day, but by night unearthly and spectral under the cold metallic tones of the moon.

Basquez did not speak to her, nor was there talk among the men riding behind them. Perhaps he had ordered them to maintain silence, as she could understand most of what they said when they spoke. Whether it was through fear of offending her with their speech, she did not know; possibly yes—the talk of bandits on the march might not be suited for a young lady's ears.

Once they passed a clump of ragged greasewood, and two or three animals seemed to start out of the darkness. Long afterward, Diana remembered this group, sharply photographed on her brain—a black mule, a white mule, and two big burros, hobbled near a pile of pack-saddles and camp-stuff; two recumbent figures, their heads resting on their saddles; one of them sitting up suddenly as the silent troop swept by. Even this bivouac under the moonlight brought no word from her silent escort—there was no sound save the "pad-pad" of their horses' hoofs, the creak of saddle-leather, and the jingle of bit-chains and spurs.

The miles were rolling away beneath the feet of their tireless animals. The moon had climbed high in the heavens, and had passed the zenith. The black cactus shadows had shortened, and were lengthening again. A faint light was fluttering behind the grim mountains which lay to the eastward. The moon was growing pale and wan. The whitish stretches of alkali which lay like leprous patches on the desert's bosom were turning to a vivid leaden hue. The mountains were coming nearer; in the clear, cold air of the desert night they had stood out sharp and colorless under the chilly light, like the dead peaks of the lunar world; now there was a faint suggestion of color about them—not yet warm and flaming reds and yellows, but cold, dull tints of amethyst and amber.

The desert began to change; the monotonous plain was broken here and there by ravines, while low limestone ridges rose out of the alkali, and traveled, steadily rising as they ran, toward the mountain's base. The cactus and sage-brush found themselves met by chaparral and occasional piñon; the sad-colored dunes of the desert yielded to hummocks and knolls of reddish yellow clay. The dawn was coming. The cool night breeze was dying. Every now and again they rode into basins and hollows filled up to the brim with warmer air. They were on the edge of the desert.

Long before she could distinguish objects at such a distance, Basquez pointed out to her a blur at the base of the mountain. This, he said, was the town to which she had asked to be guided. As the light grew stronger and the distance less, at last she could discern houses—so clear was the air that she could see smoke rising from a few of them. And when they were within an easy distance of the town, Basquez signaled to his band to draw rein, and turning to her said:

"No pueda andar mas."

"You say you can go no further?" began Diana, when she was interrupted. A babel of voices broke out from the hitherto silent band. Basquez strove to still the clamor, but it would not be stilled. Again Diana began to speak:

"There is no further need, señor. The way is clear, the darkness is over, the town is in sight. I thank you with all my heart for what you have done, but there is no need to go further."

She spoke to Basquez in Spanish, and again the wild clamor broke forth. Although they could understand her, she could scarcely understand their rude dialect, and she turned in alarm to Basquez for an explanation. But his smile as he told of the plight of his bandits reassured her:

"Pardon these sin verguenzas for their folly, señorita, but they insisted when we started that they must escort you into the town itself. I strove to convince them that it was unwise, but they would not listen. So to humor the rascals I promised."

"And now?" queried Diana in consternation.

"And now, señorita, I take back my promise. Hence their discontent."

"Why, how could they possibly—" and here Diana stopped. It seemed embarrassing to touch on the fact that her escort were not free agents.

"Their plan was simple," explained Basquez, "it was to ride into the town quietly, and leave you safely within the doorway of the casa principal. Then I was to give the signal, and the entire band was to ride at full speed out of town, firing at every one in the streets and into the houses as they rode. Thus they would do you honor, strike terror to the hearts of the Americanos, and dash back to the desert victorious."

"And have you persuaded them to keep out of the town?" asked Diana, aghast.

"They have consented very reluctantly, but they will obey. Pera falta andar—it is growing late. We must go. Vaya usted can Dios, señorita!"

And after him, like a litany, the band repeated, in deep-voiced unison:

"Vaya usted can Dios!"

Diana waved her hand to the little group of outlaws, and turned the head of her wearied mustang toward the town. Not the least curious thing in this strange night was the farewell of the bandits as she left them:

"May God go with you!"

ALDRICH, THE POET AND EDITOR.

The Story of a Literary Life, Told by Ferris Greenslet, and Illuminated by Many Letters.

It is nearly two years since Thomas Bailey Aldrich died, but the sense of loss that came with the announcement of the event is still present, even with the many who knew the author only from his work. Ferris Greenslet has prepared a biography of the poet, now presented in a handsome volume, and though the newspapers and the magazines have printed in the past months many columns of reminiscence, anecdote, and criticism that have served to fix in the memory of his admirers the striking passages of his career, the book is fresh in interest. Aldrich's life was rich in movement and in new and attractive associations. Mr. Greenslet has not merely followed the line faithfully, but has written with appreciation and with skill, and in the main may be commended for the restraint which must mark the ideal biographer. Not the least among the many valuable features of the work is the offering of letters written by the poet-editor to his friends in the literary world. Aldrich did not pose in his letters. He was the artist at all times, the conscientious critic of himself and others, but always the frank and genial correspondent. Almost every one of these familiar epistles might be quoted, with full warrant, and it is hard to choose from among them. The lines selected are fragments from the ore as it runs, and not rare specimens chosen after long search. They are intimate in their display of the author's sentiment, wit, fancy, and dramatic power.

Thomas Bailey Aldrich was born in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, November 11, 1836. All his life he kept in memory the beauties of his boyhood home, and its scenes described in his "Story of a Bad Boy" and "A Rivermouth Romance," and in his verses and other stories, were true to the colors of his youthful admiration. In 1883 he wrote of the old town as follows in a letter regretting his inability to be present at a Portsmouth reunion:

I write in behalf of one of those unavoidably absent sons—a prodigal who would be as glad as he of the parable to get home again. His loyalty to that spot of earth where his eyes first opened on sea and sky, and where, on his arrival, he lost as little time as possible in rigging up a fishing-rod for the smelt at the end of Long Wharf—his loyalty, I repeat, is not to be challenged. Though he has more or less been known as a Bad Boy, he has never been known as an ungrateful one. So far as his slight gift went, he has sung the praises of the Old Town by the Sea; in prose and verse he has sung them, until he was sometimes afraid that good folk might weary of the strain. Now and then he has veiled Portsmouth in a fictitious name, but his affection for her never went veiled; and nothing has ever touched him more nearly than when some book or page of his has caused the stranger to turn aside from his route of travel in order to take a stroll through the streets of Rivermouth.

The beautiful old town in which we all passed our childhood! How her loveliness deepens and freshens year by year, as if the waters of the Piscataqua, sparkling at her lip, had their rise in those Fountains of Perpetual Youth which Ponce de Leon sought! How our purest memories have crystallized about her! What a strong sentiment it is that periodically impels us to flock back to her from every point of the compass—making her the Mecca of loving pilgrimages! We who are Portsmouth born and bred never get wholly away from the glamour of early association. One night, a year ago, lying half-awake in a hostelry in Russia, I fancied that I heard the nine o'clock bell tolling in the steeple of Old North Church, and was conscious of being out rather late!—Just as it used to be.

Many times has been told the story of the young poet's first success, won with his "Ballad of Babie Bell," written while he was a clerk in a shipping office in New York, and only nineteen years old. Five or six thin volumes of verse came from his pen during the next eight years, all of which time he had occupied in literary work, contributing to the Sunday Atlas, writing criticisms as a member of the editorial staff of the Evening Mirror, acting as sub-editor of the Home Journal, associate editor of the Saturday Press, war correspondent of the New York Tribune, and managing editor of the Illustrated News, but it was not until his poems were collected, in 1865, and published in the Blue and Gold Series of Ticknor & Fields, that he felt that he had reached an assured place among American poets. That blue-and-gold volume brought this wise and entirely kind letter from an older poet and no less uncompromising a critic:

My Dear Mr. Aldrich,—Thank you very sincerely for your book of blossoms. I have just been reading them and find them dewy and sweet-scented. "Babie Bell" has most of your heart's color in it. "When the Sultan goes to Ispahan" is espigle, lively, poetical—the moons of their full brown bosoms" is succulent and musky. "The Lunch" is a little Keatsy, but very neatly carved and colored. "Dawn" and "morn," p. 20, "dawning" and "morning," p. 46, are, as some kind friend has told you before this, inadmissible cockneys. This utterance is Rhadamantian. You must not feed too much on "apricots and dewberries." There is an exquisite sensuousness that shows through your words and rounds them into voluptuous swells of rhythm as "invisible fingers of air" lift the diaphanous gauzes. Do not let it run away with you. You love the fragrance of certain words so well that you are in danger of making nose-gays when you should write poems.

There are two dangers that beset young poets—young American poets at least. The first is being spoiled by the praise of women; the second being disgusted by the praise or blame—it makes little difference which—of the cheap critics. You may have noticed that our poets do not commonly ripen well—they are larks in the morning, sparrows at noon, and owls before evening. One reason is that our shallow universal culture is wanting in severe standards of taste and judgment. We have no Fahrenheits and Réamurs and centigrades to gauge our young talent with, and allow it to form false estimates of itself. Now your forte is sentiment and your danger sentimentality. You are an epicure in words and your danger is that of becoming a verbal voluptuary—the end of which is rhythmical gout and incurable poetical disorder. Let me beg you, by your fine poetical sense, not to let the flattery of insufficient persons render you too easily contented with yourself, nor yet the hideous content of reporter-critics alienate you from the love of verse (which does not seem to thrive so naturally and spontaneously as art in your great city), nor lastly your tendency to vanilla-flavored adjectives and patchouli-scented participles stifle your strength in cloying euphemisms.

It would have been cheaper to praise without reading than to prose after doing it. Still, I think you will take these few words kindly, for they are really complimentary—much more so than the vague generalities with which I commonly clear my table of presentation-copies. There is so much that is sweet and true in your best lines that I want you to be fair to yourself and pinch off all the idle buds before the summer of your fruitage. These poems are most of them must, not wine. Happy man, whose voice time will be mellowing when he is cracking those of us your preterpluperfect contemporaries! Very sincerely yours, O. W. HOLMES.

While Aldrich's novel, "The Queen of Sheba," was running in the Atlantic Monthly, in 1877, the author wrote to his friend, E. C. Stedman, concerning it, and this paragraph gives a peep at some of his personal convictions and ideals:

I have tried to avoid in this story the fault of James's novel, "The American." I think that characters in a novel should develop themselves by what they say and what they do—as in the drama. It appears to me a mistake to devote one or two hundred pages to the analysis of characters which accomplish nothing. The persons in James's book affect me like a lot of admirably "made up" actors in the green-room waiting for their cue. Ad resté, I greatly admire Henry James. He is an essayist of the very finest type; but he is not a natural story-teller. I don't mean to assume by all this that I am a born story-teller. I don't know, and am trying to find out.

When Ticknor & Fields brought out Every Saturday, in 1866, Aldrich was chosen to edit the paper. In an adjoining office worked the editors of the Atlantic Monthly, published by the same firm, and there Aldrich met W. D. Howells, who had been brought from the West to be assistant editor under Mr. Fields. Fifteen years later Aldrich succeeded Howells as editor of the magazine. From the first essay in editorial labor, long before, Aldrich took a serious and dignified view of his duties. This is from a letter to Stedman, written when he had been less than a year the directing spirit of the Atlantic:

In your letter you speak of having written two poems. I wish you'd send them to me. I am slowly making up my mind to publish none but incontestably fine poems in the Atlantic—which means only about four poems per year. What do you think of that plan? If you could see the piles of bosh sent to this office you'd be sick at heart.

There is something more than playfulness and wit in these reminiscences of the editorial presence:

Once when he was annoyed by too many interruptions from the lower office, he sprang up with the insouciance of a bad boy—"but not such a very bad boy"—plugged the speaking-tube with a cork and drove it in with the poker. On another occasion, his masterful publisher, Mr. Houghton, who had been submitting to the Atlantic the manuscripts of divers "friends of the house" with rather ill success, said to him jocosely: "I have written a story and I'm going to send it to you under a fictitious name." "Then," said Aldrich, "I advise you to send it to a fictitious editor."

Good anecdotes of this quick, incisive intelligence are numerous:

Another time he soberly asked the telescope man on Boston Common, who draws a living from star-gazing Bostonians, whether Venus were "naked to the visible eye." The owner of the "ingenious perspicall" twice assured him that she was, before the light broke on him.

A friend once remarked to him that a certain eminent and indefatigable laborer in the field of letters was a very learned man. "Yes," said Aldrich, "a very learned man, but like a gas-pipe, no richer for the illumination he has conveyed."

In 1890 Aldrich gave up his editorial position and then followed years of ease and leisure, yet they were not seasons of idleness. He wrote as the spirit moved him. Many tempting offers were made to him, but he found no difficulty in evading proffered responsibilities. This is from a letter to Stedman, written in 1892:

During twenty-five years of my literary life I have had a salaried position; this has enabled me to leave untouched the small property I had from my father, and to save the income from my magazine writings and that of my copyrights. I am now in a comfortable ease; neither rich nor poor, but quite independent of hack-work, and the lightest sort of editorial harness would gall me. Moreover, the man who undertakes a department similar to Curtis's (Curtis can not be replaced, only succeeded) should live in New York City and be in close touch with the great currents of life there. It would take a great deal more money than my poor services are worth to induce me to break up my home here.

Some of the tendencies of the time or his distaste for them, increasing with age, drew from him this comment in a letter to R. W. Gilder, written in 1898:

But I haven't any business to be writing about poetry, for the Muses have kept their nine snowy shoulders turned on me these many months, and in future I do not intend to make love to any of those capricious girls, if I can help myself. At a time when it is supposed to be poetical to write "Gawd" instead of God and otherwise mutilate God's choicest language, perhaps silence is the best poem for a man who respects his art. Oh, no, this is not sour grapes. My verses still sell—from force of habit; but what the great American public really likes is:

"Her body's in the baggage car."

At the Howard Athenaeum the other night I saw an audience of apparently human beings deeply moved by the singing of this rot. A stereoscopic picture of "the baggage car" brought tears to the eyes of all the burglars and murderers in the upper gallery. For a homely, horny-handed, whole-souled heart-song give me "Her body's in the baggage car."

It was in 1904 that Nance O'Neil, after playing an unsatisfactory Italian version of the story of Judith, suggested to Aldrich that he dramatize his narrative poem of "Judith and Holofernes" for her use. The poet was attracted by the suggestion and took up the work. "Judith of Bethulia" was the result, and it was produced at the Tremont Theatre in Boston, October 13, with success. In New York it did not do so well. Miss O'Neil was not a favorite in the metropolis then. On the opening night in New York, Aldrich wrote this letter to the actress, which is illuminating in its revelation of the poet's dramatic instinct:

Boston, Dec. 9, 1904.

Dear Miss O'Neil—In spite of being in Boston, I was with you and the play last night at Daly's! At precisely 8:15 p. m. I took up the little book and waited for the curtain to rise. Then I followed you through each scene and act, making due allowance at the proper places for the heartbreaking time it takes Daly's Theatre to make an "instantaneous" change of scenery. So I came to the end of the fourth act, where my imagination grew blurred. I sat wondering if Judith—"Judith the willful"—again missed her opportunity for a fine dramatic climax. I wondered if she stood there inert, with all the people around her motionless and dead, while the curtain slowly went down on nothing! Or did she take two or three steps towards the wings, and, with a look back over her shoulder, cry, "Let no one born of woman follow me!" Did Achior advance, as if to disobey her, and did Bagoas clutch his arm to restrain him? And did the crowd lean forward, spellbound, standing with outstretched hands? If so, the curtain went down on a thrilling dramatic tableau. Judith's swift exit at the end of Act II—making the whole act a success—was not stronger than this would have been. Judith need not leave the stage, but she must seem on the point of doing so. She said she was going, and she ought to go! What is she waiting for? Is there more to come?

All passed through my mind last night, as I "made believe" I was at the play, and so I write it out for you this morning. I can not tell you, Miss Nance O'Neil, what a rare pleasure you have given me by your acting of my tragedy. I am glad that I did so rash a thing as attempt to be a dramatist!

Yours sincerely, T. B. ALDRICH.

The last word is not yet said of Aldrich as poet, as story-teller, and as editor, but Mr. Greenslet's book will be prized as an intimate, authoritative, and sympathetic record. Its concluding chapter, on the poetry of Aldrich, is kindly criticism, but by no means highly laudatory. The bibliography and thoroughly considered index are of especial value. More than thirty fine engravings illustrate the volume, among them portraits of Aldrich, N. P. Willis, E. C. Stedman, Edwin Booth, W. D. Howells, Mark Twain, Bayard Taylor, and Nance O'Neil. In letter-press and binding the volume is most attractive.

W. C. Brown, known in the little town of Dallas, Oregon, as "Uncle Billy," entertained seventy-six widows at a banquet recently. The number included all the widows in his town and the immediate vicinity. It was strictly an invitation affair, and if any were omitted it was by inadvertence. The event was in celebration of the eighty-fourth anniversary of Mr. Brown's birth. Mr. Brown is a widower.

LIGHTLY'S GREAT SUCCESS.

How He Combined Hypnotism and Literature, but Overshot the Mark.

When I went into the club the other night, I found Lightly turning over the pages of the Christmas number of All the World. His face would have afforded a fine study for a picture of contentment, and my first thought was that he must have an article or story in the magazine. For Lightly is something of a writer, and whenever he gets anything published—which is not very often—he hores us all for weeks afterward, telling how it happened.

As soon as he caught sight of me he beckoned me to his table, and I thought that I was in for at least a half-hour's punishment. But it turned out for once that I was interested in his talk.

"Have you seen it?" he asked, tapping the cover of the magazine, and giving a little eager laugh as he spoke, which confirmed my impression that he must be in luck.

"No," I answered; "have you anything in it?"

"Anything?" he almost shouted. "Why, man, I wrote the whole number."

At this I began to wonder if his brain—never too strong—had not suddenly given way. As you well know, All the World is one of the most conservative periodicals—as I will admit that I have found to my own sorrow in the past—and it was preposterous that it should make up a whole number, and a Christmas number at that, from the work of one man. And it was clear to my mind that Lightly would not have been that one man, in any event.

While trying to think of something quieting to say, I took the magazine and glanced over the table of contents. It was one of Lightly's fancies—which did him no good in a literary way—to have a dozen or more pen names. He used these indiscriminately, as the humor moved him, and it happened that I knew most of them. So you may judge of my surprise when I tell you that every poem, story, article, and essay in the entire magazine was signed by some one of the many names that I knew he used. The first was a Christmas poem, signed G. O. Lightly. Then a Christmas story, signed T. S. Weaver (this, he had once explained to me, stood for The Story Weaver). Then an article on "Jerusalem—Nineteen Hundred Years Ago"; "Christmas—Past and Present"; and the usual run of such material as editors have fallen into the habit of serving up for the holiday issue. None of the topics were new, nor, so far as I could discover in a hasty glance, were they treated with much brilliancy. The signatures were all composed upon the same puerile plan as the one I have given.

Poor as much of the stuff probably was, I still could not believe that Lightly had written it all, much less secured its publication in a single number of All the World. I turned to him for an explanation.

"Draw up a chair," he said, with what I thought an air of some condescension. "I can afford to fly high tonight, so let us have a bird and a bottle quietly in this corner, while I tell you all about it."

"Of course," he said, as soon as we were fairly settled, "this is all on the quiet. I should not tell even you, if you were not one of my best friends, and if I did not mean presently to ask a great favor of you. You know," he continued, "how people have been talking about the science of hypnotism for months past?"

I nodded my assent, and he went on with an uninterrupted flow of words:

"Well," he said, "I chanced some time ago to be thrown in contact with an adept in this art, or science, or whatever you are minded to call it. I recognized at once the value that a knowledge of it might be to me in making fiction, and I asked the fellow to give me some insight into it. This he did, for a consideration, and to such good purpose that I was soon able to practice the science to some extent. I presently found that it was not difficult for me to gain a hypnotic influence over any man of less robust physique than myself, but I rarely attempted to use the power.

"When I finally did, it was wholly without premeditation, and it happened in this way. A few weeks ago—in fact, just as they were making up the Christmas number—I happened into the office of All the World, and while there offered Aldeson this poem," Lightly put his finger on the printed page as he spoke, but went on without pause.

"Aldeson put me off with some stock remark about being full of material, of having more than he could handle, and did not even look at the poem. This nettled me considerably, and it suddenly occurred to me that Aldeson was a smaller man than myself, and that I ought to give him a good thrashing for his impudence. Then it came to me all at once that I could hypnotize him and make him accept my poem. I asked him to send his assistant away, as I wanted to speak to him privately. When we were alone, I at once began the effort to make him subject to my will. In less time than I am telling you, I had him completely under my influence, and he had accepted the poem and promised it the initial place in the number.

Then the thought came to me to try my power a little further. Calling a messenger, I sent to my rooms for a bundle of manuscript, and sorted out from it everything that would do for a Christmas number. You know," he added, parenthetically, "that I always keep a stock of material on hand, ready for all needs and seasons. I took these Christmas things up, one by one, and brought them to his attention, and he accepted each one and made a place for it in this holiday number. Then he called his assistant in and gave instructions for making up the copy—and I took him away with me and gave him a royal good time for a week. When he got back to the office it was too late to make any changes, and so you see the number has come out with nothing but my work. And a very good number it is, too," he concluded, complacently.

"But what do you expect to gain by it?" I asked; "the story will surely come out, and it will do you no good, but quite the reverse." "You are all wrong," replied Lightly, quietly; "the story will not come out. You can see that Aldeson must be the last man to tell it. And he could have no object in doing so, especially as the number has already made such a good impression."

With that he took from his pocket copies of a half-dozen leading papers and reviews, and showed me comments that were not only favorable, but flattering in the extreme.

"Paid for?" said I, not a little disgusted with the whole business, and particularly at being made a confidant of.

"Yes," he laughed; "but it goes, just the same. And now," he added, with a slight show of hesitancy, "for the other matter."

"Go ahead," I answered, not very graciously, considering that I was dining with him; "I might as well hear it all now."

"You asked me what I expected to gain by it. You know Lettie Underwood." I started at the name, but nodded with what composure I could command. "That dear girl," said Lightly, "has promised to marry me as soon as I have won a place in literature—in fact, or soon as I have an established standing with any of the leading magazines. This settles that point." To emphasize his meaning, he tapped All the World triumphantly.

"But, surely," I said, "you would not consider this fair? You would not be willing that she should know—"

"All's fair in love, my boy. And I want you to be my best man."

I managed to get off with some half promise, and then, pleading an engagement, I got out of the club as quickly as possible and into a cab, and gave the driver the number of Lettie Underwood's house.

The dear girl—I could have choked Lightly for using the words; they were in my heart whenever I thought of her, which was all the time—was at home and received me with her usual sweet welcome. But I held her at arm's length, and, with all the sternness that I could command, exclaimed:

"Letitia, you are a wretched trifler. Give me back my heart."

"What is the matter with the poor hoy now?" she cooed, softly.

"Matter enough. You have promised to marry Lightly."

"Yes," she laughed, "I remember. He proposed to me six months ago. I told him I would when he had made a success—"

"Your exact words," I said, severely, "were—when you have a standing with any of the leading magazines."

"Same thing," she answered, airily; "he will never achieve either. It was my way of letting him down easily."

"Letitia, listen to me," I said; "Lightly has written the entire Christmas number of All the World."

At this Lettie looked at me reproachfully.

"Dick," she said, "where have you been dining?"

"No, it is not that," I protested; "I dined at the club, and Lightly told me himself, and he showed me the magazine, and asked me to be his best man, and we only had one bottle between us."

"Well, this is a scrape!" she exclaimed, ruefully; "I suppose I will have to keep my promise and marry him."

"And what about your promise to me?" I asked, sarcastically.

"That was indefinite," she answered, thoughtfully; "there was never any time set for that. So I shall have to marry him now, and if he should die, or anything happen, I could marry you afterward."

"Thanks," I replied, dryly; "but that programme does not suit me. Now let me plan a little. You have been a willful creature, never ready to name the day, and see the trouble you have got into. I suppose Lightly will be here bright and early tomorrow to marry you. Now, I propose to marry you myself tomorrow, at noon."

At this her eyes opened in wide protest.

"Yes," I continued, "I shall send a note to Lightly, telling him of your change of plans, and asking him to be my best man."

"But, Dick, this is so sudden. What shall we live on?"

"Love, you practical girl," I cried, catching her in my arms; "besides, the publishers of All the World today offered me the editorship of the magazine, vice Aldeson, resigned. I suppose his going out has some connection with this business of Lightly's. I am sorry for him, but I might as well have the place as another."

"And then you can print anything of your own that you want to, can't you, dear? I am so glad that you won't have to be rejected any more."

"Not even by you, sweetheart?"

"Not even by me—any more."

* * * * *

Do you want the finis?

We were married on the morrow, and Lettie was as pretty a bride as ever was seen—as pretty as though she had been given months, instead of hours, for making ready. But on second thought, I am not sure that she had not been making ready all the time that I had been vainly asking her to name the day. I confess that I do not understand the sex.

There was but one thing to cloud our happiness. Lightly refused to be best man, or even to come to the wedding. And he has never offered any further contributions to All the World.

Perhaps this is because I am not, like Aldeson, "of a less robust physique" than himself.

CURRENT VERSE.

A Little While.

'Twas in the mellow autumn.

A haze was on the hill,

That perfect day I walked with her

And all my heart a-thrill.

Through lane and wood and meadow

We strayed a happy mile,

And all the gold my life could hold

Was in that little while.

Her beauty made me silent,

My tongue refused to speak.

I saw the love-light in her eye,

The blush that warmed her cheek.

My heart too faint to follow

The ways of maids and men,

I let her pass unwooded, alas!

Till we should meet again.

And never comes the autumn

With haze upon the hill

But in a dream I walk with her

And all my heart a-thrill.

Through lane and wood and meadow

We stray a happy mile,

And all the gold my life can hold

Is in that little while.

—Nixon Waterman, in Smart Set.

A Mile with Me.

Oh, who will walk a mile with me

Along life's merry way?

A comrade blithe and full of glee,
Who dares to laugh out loud and free

And let his frolic fancy play,
Like a happy child, through the flowers gay,
That fill the field and fringe the way
Where he walks a mile with me.

And who will walk a mile with me
Along life's weary way?
A friend whose heart has eyes to see
The stars shine out o'er the darkening lea,

And the quiet rest at the end of day—
A friend who knows and dares to say
The brave, sweet words that clear the way
Where he walks a mile with me.

With such a comrade, such a friend,
I fain would walk till journey's end,
Through summer sunshine, winter rain—
And then? Farewell, we shall meet again!

—Henry Von Dyke.

An Autumn Song.

The shining sickle-blades no longer flash
Among the waving grain. The steady hum
Of tireless threshing is no longer heard—
The thresher's labor finished, it is dumb.

The rust will gather on the unused blade,
The busy spider weave its fairy lace
Across the bins where lies the garnered wheat—
Upon the golden chaff, frost leaves its trace.

And you, O fields, will lie in dreamless sleep
A little while—in snow and darkness hid;
Then wake beneath the subtle touch of Spring,
To once more hear, to once more be harvested.

—Beth Slater Whitson, in Ainslee's Magazine.

Mme. Alhani is not alone among the great singers who have appeared in vaudeville (observes an English paper), for Mr. Sims Reeves, Miss Esther Palliser, Mr. John Coates, and Miss Ruth Vincent have all been heard in London variety theatres; while the beautiful Mme. Cavaliere, it will be remembered, made her debut as a chanteuse at the Empire some eleven years ago. Mme. Tetrassini, after her famous debut in London last November, received numerous offers, at sums ranging from £1000 a week, to sing at the "halls," but at present has accepted none of them.

An official announcement comes from Bayreuth to the effect that the usual lapse of two years will not take place in the festival, which will begin on July 22, 1909, and last until August 22. There will be two performances of the "Nielhungen Ring," seven of "Parsifal," and five of "Lohengrin." Frau Cosima Wagner is reported to have regained her strength, and to be able to take an active part in the preparations for the coming festival.

Professor Lounsbury of Yale and Professor Phelps are in agreement as to the extent of the taste for English literature that has been stimulated by the new college courses. Professor Lounsbury says: "I am sorry to say that, in my opinion, the new English requirements in colleges have not had the slightest effect toward increasing the taste for good literature among young men. Actually, I fear, a great many men have acquired instead a violent hatred for English literature, owing to the preparation required in it." The professor goes on to say that proficiency in English depends not so much upon the pupil's schooling as upon his ancestors and that training at home is what actually counts. In other words, the cultured student is the product of the cultured home, and not of the college course.

Studies of the Eighteenth Century in Italy, by Vernon Lee. Published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.

The republication of these fine essays and in a form so imposing is perhaps confirmatory evidence of the author's contention that there will be a renaissance of the Italian music of the eighteenth century. On the other hand, this second edition may argue more for the charm of the author's style and the extent of her knowledge than for any dormant vitality in the Italian music and literature that she handles with so much lucidity and grace. It is at least a courageous prediction that the music of Pergolesi, of Durante, of Lotti, of Jommelli, and of Cimarosa will soon be remembered and sought for, and printed and performed, ill or well; and that the Italian eighteenth century will yet contribute its share to our eclectic culture. It may be so. If the men and women who are now "mere ghosts" did indeed contribute something of permanent value to the art of the world, we may be certain that it will not be lost and that the recurring cycles will show its worth. Indeed, the author, by her enthusiasm, almost persuades us that we have been unmindful of real treasures.

The present volume contains six chapters, together with the preface to the new issue and an introduction to the original edition. There is also a "conclusion," an appendix, and about forty illustrations chosen for the purpose by Dr. Guido Biagi, of the Laurentian Library in Florence. The six chapters are on "The Arcadian Academy," "The Musical Life," "Metastasio and the Opera," "The Comedy of Masks," "Goldoni and the Realistic Comedy," and "Carlo Gozzi and the Venetian Fairy Comedy." The author has done for Italy what none of her own sons have done, at least with such enthusiasm and skill. Moreover, she has given to us a work of classical excellence and of important historical value.

Along the Riviera of France and Italy, written and illustrated by Gordon Home. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; $3.

The man of letters combines pleasingly with the artist in the production of a fine volume. Mr. Home complains gently that the tourist shows an undue tendency to follow a beaten track and to be guided overmuch by the guide-book. A "travel exhausted night" at Genoa is usually enough for that strange city, while as for the Gulf of Spezia, Lerici, and Porto Venere, they are overlooked altogether, although as we travel east both dust and wind disappear.

The author certainly knows how to write an enticing travel book. He describes every place along the whole coast, from Marseilles to Pisa, and he spares us the tiresome statistics of rainfall and other kinds of "promotion" information that are too often a weariness to the flesh. Moreover, he presupposes on the part of his reader an intelligent interest in the history of the places that he visits and he selects the salient points with satisfactory discrimination. The twenty-five colored illustrations are unusually fine in their bold effects, while an equal number of illustrations in black and white are a valuable aid to an understanding of the charms in which southern Europe is so rich. The series to which this notable book belongs should be a popular one.

The Coming Science, by Hareward Carrington. Published by Small, Maynard & Co., Boston; $1.50.

Psychical research is not perhaps the coming science, but it is certainly a coming science. That is to say, its results are rapidly approaching a point of general acceptance; they are ridding their skirts of the credulities and superstitions that attach themselves inevitably to new explorations in fields hitherto forbidden.

The author is to be congratulated upon his avoidance of mere marvel hunting, upon his attempt to construct some kind of philosophy upon a basis of careful experiment, and upon his freedom from a lofty and intolerable dogmatism that sometimes distinguishes modern writers upon psychical research. His book is distinguished by a true scientific spirit of anticipation and hopeful inquiry.

It is, after all, with the deductions from the marvels that we are concerned, rather than with the marvels themselves. We wish to know whether consciousness and thought are functions of brains and nervous tissue, as is the contention of materialism, or whether we may now say justifiably that the perception of a sensation through nervous tissue is a function of consciousness. And if such perceptions are but a function of consciousness, may we ask what other functions consciousness possesses? May it exist independently of nervous tissue, and if so what is its range and its potentiality?

This brings us very close to the domain of religion, because the states of consciousness peculiarly religious are those that are furthest removed from sense perceptions. It may be too soon to believe, but it is not too soon to hope, that psychical research may move for us the frontiers between knowledge and faith, and our hope is measurably quickened by this thoughtful and speculative book.

The Virgin in Judgment, by Eden Phillpotts. Published by Moffat, Yard & Co., New York; $1.50.

Dartmoor is prolific in good stories and Mr. Phillpotts has done justice to his subject and to the curious characters that the west country preserves as relics. "The Virgin in Judgment" centres around three families. There is the rabbit catcher, Elias Bowden, with his nine silent and stolid children and his ten dogs. There is Bartley Crocker, clever, lazy, and kind to his mother, and lastly there are the Stanburys, whose daughter Margaret is the gentle and patient heroine. The romantic interest of the story centres around the rivalry of David Bowden and Bartley Crocker for the hand of Margaret, and when we see that David is to win the race we fear that with all his bucolic virtues he will never be able to appreciate the exquisite character of his bride.

Mr. Phillpotts has given us a life picture of Dartmoor, but we wish that his description of the great fight between Bartley and David had been less realistic. It encroaches too much upon the essentials of a strong story, and when we find that David's beautiful but frigid sister Rhoda is to act as his second we are a little disgusted. Rhoda is a remarkable character, and some license in its development may be allowed, but we do not see why she should leave her own home to take up her abode with David and his wife. It suggests an infelicitous expedient in the staging of the final tragedy, and when Rhoda begins at once to spy upon Margaret and to misinterpret her innocent friendship with Bartley we see at once what the end must be, although we are shocked and a little indignant with the author when it occurs. But the story is undeniably powerful, and while it is not great it clings to the memory far beyond the average space of time allowed to the modern novel.

Round the Corner in Gay Street, by Grace S. Richmond. Published by Doubleday, Page & Co., New York; $1.50.

This simple and unaffected story ought to be popular. It treats of two families, one wealthy and the other poor. The Townsends of Worthington Square, with every luxury at command, yet lack the element of contentment and good-will that is to be found so abundantly among the young people in Gay Street. The two families are gradually drawn together and we watch the development of some very pleasant romances.

Poem Outlines, by Sidney Lanier. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.

We have here a little book of exceptional interest, affording as it does a glimpse at the building material of a poet. Each page contains a scrap, a fragment, of thought in prose or verse, originally jotted in pencil on the backs of envelopes or torn scraps of paper, and intended for ultimate poetic use. Some of them can be identified in Mr. Lanier's finished poems, while others were never used, but they are all of them of the essence of poetry, visible flashes from a central fire.

The Sunny Side of the Hill, by Rosa Nouchette Carey. Published by the J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia; $1.50.

A simple and naturally told story of a young girl who is invited to become companion to her aunt and who leaves her home unwillingly and from a sense of duty. Maureen is a nice little girl, and we are glad to watch the happy results that are slowly unfolded from her act of devotion. "The Sunny Side of the Hill" is an unpretentious story suited to women rather than to men, but it strikes no jarring notes.

The Children's Treasure Trove of Pearls, edited by Mary W. Tileston. Published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $1.50.

This substantial volume contains a collection of about forty stories for children, largely taken from books now out of print for many years, but which were favorites in their day and ought to be favorites again. The book is suitable for children of from five to nine years and the illustrations are good.

New Publications.

"In Peanut Land," by Eva Dean, published by R. F. Fenno & Co., New York, is a rhyme book enlivened by quaint illustrations for little children. Price, $1.25.

Paul Elder & Co., San Francisco and New York, have published "The Perfectly Good Cynic's Calendar," by E. W. M. Grant, Addison Mizner, and Oliver Herford, with colored illustrations and decorations upon every page. Price, 75 cents.

Maria Edgeworth's tales ought certainly to be among those that "never die." A tasteful illustrated edition of these tales has just been issued by the H. M. Caldwell Company, New York and Boston. It is edited by Charles Welsh with an introduction by Charles Eliot Norton.

Carolyn Wells knows how to write rhymes for children. "The Happychaps" is a substantial volume full of the work that she does when in her best vein, while the line illustrations by Harrison Cady that appear upon every page form an admirable supplement to the text. The book is published by the Century Company, New York. Price, $1.50.

From the J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia, come three useful books for children—"Young Folks' Ideas," "Young Folks' Queries," and "Young Folks' Whys and Wherefores." Almost every subject of legitimate childish curiosity finds a place in these volumes, and a surprising amount of scientific knowledge is conveyed in pleasant narrative form and with quaintly appropriate illustrations.

The Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston, have published a valuable book on "Accounts," by William Morse Cole, A. M., assistant professor of accounting in Harvard University. The author explains that accounting is scientific analysis and record of business transactions, that it attempts to tell about every transaction everything that can be of service when known. His work is inclusive and it is lucidly written. Price, $2.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE CHAT.

Holdover attractions are the rule at the theatres for the coming Christmas week, but fortunately they are of merit. At the Orpheum there will be something in the nature of a sensation, as the week will bring the annual visit of the Orpheum Road Show, which is a genuine event in vaudeville. No dearth of entertainment is to be apprehended. Habitual theatre-goers will find satisfaction if not satiety before they have completed the round.

At the Van Ness Theatre good houses have been attracted by "The Lion and the Mouse," a strong play interpreted by a company that in several particulars is above the ordinary standard. Paul Everton and Edna Archer Crawford, in the leading parts, have justified the favor which has been shown by their audiences, and their support is capable. They will continue through another week, with a special holiday matinee performance on Christmas.

"The Lost Paradise," at the Valencia Theatre, is proving to be eminently suited to the demands of the season, partly because of the interesting and moving story told in the play, and partly because the company is making its characters real in appearance and passion. Robert Warwick and Blanche Stoddard seem especially well suited to the rôles in which they appeal to the audiences, and the minor parts are in hardly less worthy hands. Helen Lackaye, Beatrice Nichols, Gerald Harcourt, Robert Homans, Charles Dow Clark, and Thomas MacLarnie should be mentioned for effective work. The play will be continued all next week, with matinee performances on Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday. Herr Heller and his orchestra have a special music programme which will include the "Reverie" of Vieuxtemps, a violin solo by the leader.

General Manager Martin Beck of the Orpheum Circuit is well pleased with his selections for the Orpheum Road Show for this season. The organization comes to the San Francisco home of the Orpheum Company next week, beginning with the Sunday afternoon performance. Mile. de Dio, the famous French danseuse, who heads the list of artists, will make her first appearance here, and present her European triumph, "Terpsichore's Dream," an electrical, scenic, and dancing novelty in four pictures of light, color, and rhythmical movement. Edwin Holt, supported by his own company, will appear in a one-act play entitled "The Mayor and the Manicure." Hyman Meyer, "the man at the piano," will offer a musical monologue in which he will sing one of Eddie Foy's late songs. Charles and Fannie Van will be seen in their skit of theatrical life, "A Case of Emergency." Frank Work and Reinhold Ower are acrobats and comedians as well. Merian's Canine Players are remarkable performing dogs, and their act is a real drama in which the animals play their parts without assistance. The Four Franklins, the muscular acrobatic aerialists, and Gaston and Green in their delightful songs and pastoral comedy, will be retained from this week's bill.

Kolb and Dill continue to pack the Princess Theatre with their musical farce, "Weiner & Schnitzel," and in consequence of its continued success it will be retained for another week, positively the last. The next production by Kolb and Dill and their company will be an amusing story with music, entitled "The Politicians." Several new people have been brought from the East especially to appear in this play, for which great preparations are being made.

Following "The Lost Paradise" at the Valencia Theatre will be George Ade's comedy, "The College Widow," in which Robert Warwick will play Billy Bolton, the famous half-back, Blanche Stoddard will be the fascinating "widow," and Helen Lackaye will have a great opportunity as Flora Wiggins, the waitress.

"Ben Hur," in Klaw & Erlanger's great spectacular production, will usher in the new year at the Van Ness Theatre, opening Monday evening, December 28.

The management of the Valencia Theatre hopes to be able to give a thousand loaves of bread to the Salvation Army to help out the Christmas dinner, and asks its patrons to bring offerings of bread to the theatre on or before next Wednesday afternoon's performance. Prizes will be awarded to twenty-five of the most successful cooks.

Richard Carle comes to the Van Ness Theatre early in the coming year with "Mary's Lamb."

The Last Nordica Concert.

The farewell concert of Mme. Lillian Nordica will be given Sunday afternoon at the Van Ness Theatre, at half-past two. The great prima-donna will again sing a remarkable programme of fourteen numbers in French, Italian, German, and English. The specially interesting features will be the aria from "The Death of Jeanne d'Arc," by Bemberg, and Schubert's wonderful work, "Die Altmacht." Other numbers by Richard Strauss Robert Franz, Schumann, Cornelius, Vidal Paladilhe. Gomez. Quilter, Henschel, and Branscombe will be included in the offerings.

Mr. Frederick Hastings, the splendid haritone, will sing works by Strauss, Verdi, Schutt, and Kaun, and Miss Emma Showers will play works by Schumann and Liszt.

Complete programmes may be had at the box-office, which is at Sherman. Clay & Co.'s until Sunday, on which day it will be at the theatre after 10 a. m.

LITERARY NOTES.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

"Rosa Bonheur: sa vie, son œuvre" is an expensive memorial volume compiled by Anna Klumpke, the American friend and testamentary executor and legatee of the great woman painter. It is published in Paris by E. Flammarion at 50 francs.

Henry Mills Alden, in "Magazine Writing and the New Literature," has assembled so many facts concerning the American magazines that one part of his book is very like a biography of the periodicals. The fact that the North American Review, for so many years a literary feature of New York, grew out of a Boston magazine, the Anthology Magazine, started by the cluh of that name, has escaped many readers. The Review is close to a hundred years old, having been first printed in 1815.

Arthur Bartlett Maurice, in the current Bookman, says that the book "Richard Carvel" and the play made from it yielded to Mr. Churchill over $300,000. Just at present, as a literary property, Mr. Maurice says Robert W. Chambers has a value second only to the value of Mr. Churchill. He is probably among the men and women who command a 20 per cent royalty and in consequence receive thirty cents for each copy that is sold. Others of this patrician class are Winston Churchill, James Lane Allen, Marion Crawford, John Fox, Richard Harding Davis, F. Hopkinson Smith, Booth Tarkington, Thomas Dixon, George Barr McCutcheon, Alice Hegan Rice, and Kate Douglas Wiggin. Mr. Howells, on the other hand, it is illuminating to note, has gained from his books only a "comfortable competence."

The remark as to Macaulay being "a very common sort of hookhuyer, who always hought books to read," which, Sir George Trevelyan tells us, emanated from the late Bernard Quaritch, famous London bookseller, recalls an anecdote related by Locker-Lampson in "My Confidences." "Bedford, Emperor of Morocco, once sent me home a little binding which I considered unsatisfactory—the volume did not shut properly; it gaped. When I pointed out this grievous defect, his only remark was, 'Why, bless me, sir, you've been reading it!'"

Mrs. Annis Lee Wister, who won a place in American letters by her translations of German novels, died in Wallingford, a Philadelphia suburb, a few days ago, having entered upon her seventy-ninth year. Mrs. Wister was daughter of Rev. William Henry Furness, a noted Unitarian minister, a leading abolitionist in his day, and a sister of Horace Howard Furness, the Shakespeare scholar, with whom she had lived of late years. She married a physician and naturalist, Dr. Caspar Wister, who died in 1886. Owen Wister, the novelist, was her nephew. Her remarkable faculty in rendering German sentiment with so absolute a sympathy that her translations read like original writings places her apart from most of those who have introduced to America the novelists of Germany in the middle of the nineteenth century. Especially she gained immediate acceptance for herself as well as for "E. Marlitt" (whose real name was Eugenia John), with whose German romantic genius she fairly identified her own. "The Old Mam'selle's Secret" captivated all readers with a touch of that peculiar charm, and "Gold Elsie," "Countess Gisela," "The Little Moorland Princess" and "The Second Wife" were chief among her great number of translations.

On his way Eastward, the eminent haritone singer, Emilio de Gogorza, was interviewed in Chicago, and said, among other things: "Careless interpretation or loss of voice do not go in the West, and don't underrate your San Francisco public, for there is an enthusiasm there which is usually only found in the southern countries of Europe."

Margaret Anglin will not act in America this season. She will end her present tour of Australia at Sydney just before Christmas; she will next go to Egypt for a holiday of some weeks, and then travel westward to London. If Australian prediction is true, she may act in London, where she has not hitherto appeared, next spring.

Ferdinand Gottschalk is a member of the cast which is presenting "Lady Epping's Law-suit," Hubert Henry Davies's latest comedy, at the Criterion Theatre, London.

Miss Garden's Opinions.

Mary Garden, who is one of the best talkers among singers, on her recent return from Europe, declared that Richard Strauss was the most modest man in the world, that his "Salomé" was the most wonderful opera in the world, that Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande" was the most marvelous music in the world, and that music of the kind written by Strauss and Debussy was going to conquer the world. In the face of this exalted and passionate prospectus issued in the bewitching words of a prima donna, observes the New York Sun, it is saddening to note that deep public interest continues to centre around the question of what Miss Garden will or will not wear in "Salomé." That she will dance the dance of the seven veils she admits, and she confesses that she will dance it on her toes, a method long ago worn to a "frazzle" in the honorable service of the vaudeville stage. Let Miss Garden usefully employ an hour in reading the "Herodias" of Flaubert. Toes, forsooth!

Many of the leading actors and actresses of the British stage recently decided to give a matinee in His Majesty's Theatre, London, in recognition of the dramatic art of Italy, as represented by Adelaide Ristori, to whose memory an impressive monument is to be erected at her birthplace, the village of Cividale, in Italy.

NORDICA'S CONCERT—"ZIRA."

By Josephine Hart Phelps.

Nordica swept majestically upon the stage of the Van Ness Theatre, like a large, stately ship, rigged out with rose-colored sails. Our American prima donna, with true American acuteness, had had her costume all planned out to indicate, so far as was possible, the slenderness dwelling in long, straight lines; with drapery sleeves falling from the shoulders, a long, stole-shaped trimming hanging loose in front, and a tremendous, red velvet Watteau train sweeping royally from the shoulders. But all this concealing billow and froth and foam of chiffon and velvet could not do away with the fact that there is a great deal of Nordica.

All the same, by the time the concert was over, it was flatteringly apparent that the audience felt that there couldn't be too much of Nordica. This in spite of the fact that the splendid, famed dramatic soprano voice is beginning to show traces of the tooth of time. She can not always count on bringing forth a note that is "one entire and perfect chrysolite." Yet the voice is still a most beautiful one, with many powerful, crystalline tones, and the singer has lost little or none of her ability to charm a concert audience.

Nordica began her programme with the famous curse aria from "Tristan and Isolde," in which Isolde sends forth a string of eloquent maledictions that requires a very sizable voice to do justice to. The volume was there, and the dramatic power. There is nothing tame about Nordica on the concert platform. She can not refrain from acting, keeping the while a strict discipline maintained over her arms, to see that they do not violate concert traditions, and extend themselves in grand operatic abandon.

But, although Nordica gave this imposing aria in fine style, the big, Wagnerian vocal thunderbolts were too taxing to allow the quality of tone to remain unimpaired, and her greatest triumphs were won in subsequent numbers, in which the beautiful pianissimo effects she employs with such skill were delightfully evident.

In the German group of songs the passing away of the freshness and certainty of tone was not evident, and she sang into them all that tender, charming sentiment which is particularly characteristic of the German lyrics of love.

The exquisite delicacy of tone with which she rendered Tchaikowsky's "Inmitten des Balles" charmed the audience, and, although the final note was an anti-climax, the powerful voice soaring up to the exultant heights of Pippa's radiant faith in that always popular number, "The Year at the Spring," offered a contrast that showed the singer's great versatility and variety of expression.

And how beautifully she sang the Chopin "Nocturne"! In such songs as this one should close one's eyes, in order that the sense of sight may not interfere nor for one moment distract from the concentrated pleasure of bearing one of the world's great voices float like a hovering bird, or ripple like a silver stream.

In "Twilight," a bit of real poetry gemmed about by the beautiful musical setting of Walter Rummel, the voice brought strangely and solemnly a sense of solitude at night, by the sounding sea.

The grand climax was Schubert's "Erlkönig," that brief yet wonderful music-drama of terror and enchantment, which, often as it is repeated on the concert platform, never grows hackneyed. It was sung with all that variety of tone and volume which the great singers know so well how to employ in expressing the terror of the child, the reassurance of the father, and the wicked woven enchantments of the erlking.

We have probably heard most of the famous songbirds of the world sing this wonderful composition, yet never before heard we it sung like this. Yet—I did not care for it so much as with other singers—say Gadski, for example. It was a remarkable feat, both vocally and dramatically. I have to admit it. But it seemed to me that it fell away a little from the perfect balance of true art and became slightly sensational when the singer put such unusual stress upon the spells uttered by the erlking.

Mme. Nordica was accompanied upon the piano by M. Benoise, a performer who, in his exquisitely executed accompaniments, accomplished the feat of subduing the hard and tinny tone of an unsatisfactory piano to softness and perfect beauty.

The piano solos were rendered by Miss Emma Showers, a very young girl, who gave little indication in her school-girl countenance and prim little school-girl how of the poise and promise of her playing, although temperament is not her strong card.

The baritone singer, Mr. Frederick Hastings, is not a particularly happy choice. True, his voice, though rather hard, has volume and ring. True, he is evidently a hard student, and tackles the musical and linguistic difficulties that challenge the ambitious singer with enthusiasm and energy. But he is not yet up to singing in the same concert with great singers. The comparison was too trying, and made the earnest, uninteresting young singer seem as provincial as a promoted village favorite.

Young Mr. Hastings, by the way, sang "Requiem" as an encore. Oh, Gogorza! Gogorza, oh!

"Zira" is a telling play. There is no doubt of it. Yet, come to think, it is built of an old, old novel. It was made over from Wilkie Collins's "The New Magdalen," to be sure. I had almost forgotten. The novel all but lost its identity when it passed into the play made notable by Clara Morris's tremendously emotional acting. And then Henry Miller, who has developed an assured business sense in these later times, recognizing its possibilities for exhibiting Margaret Anglin as an actress of great emotional power, in collaboration with J. Hartley Manners, modernized, rewrote, and renamed the piece, giving credit where credit was due, and now it is endowed with a new vitality.

It is a highly dramatic play, and the first act, located in the midst of war's alarms, is intensely interesting and has the added merit of leading up to a telling and pregnant finale.

In the made-over play the dramatists have been just as hard on Ruth Wilding as in the original one. In the book, I remember, Wilkie Collins didn't give her the ghost of a show. She was pictured as hard, plain, hiter, highted, narrow, aggressive, suspicious, and intolerant. Everybody in the book hated her so bitterly that they quite forgot she had right on her side—a little peculiarity which is shared by audiences.

Yet we must not forget she had one gracious impulse, when she offered help and social countenance to the beautiful nurse who subsequently stole her identity.

And there's another piece of forgetfulness. We are so sorry for Zira that her little peccadilloes are almost overlooked. And why? Because the clever dramatists have not omitted to make her a victim instead of a sinner in her first misfortune. That was a clever device and did much to soften strong hearts. For, after all, those apparently soft-hearted weepers in front are every hit as hard-hearted as Ruth Wilding, and, I am quite persuaded, would have acted much as she did. For nothing starts our fighting blood to boiling quite so hotly as to have one's rights and identities stolen away.

"He that filches from me my good name robs me of that which" (in this case forswear the metre and leave out the "not") "enriches him, and makes me poor indeed!"

So, if we want to amuse ourselves by anything so foolish as discussing the ethics of a play, we must agree that Zira's dramatic creators have followed on Wilkie Collins's lines, in being over-compassionate to a woman who so mightily transgressed, simply because she was young, good-looking, magnetic, and hungry for affection, friends, and a home. For the original Mercy Merrick was a beauty, built physically on grand, noble lines, which seemed to endow her with nobility of character, and she was so beautiful and magnetically attractive that she bowled over everybody that came within the sphere of her influence, including old Lady Janet Something-or-other, her boldly appropriated aunt.

In "Zira," Lady Janet becomes Lady Clavering, which is a nice, high-sounding, English name for a nice, high-sounding English old lady. It is a very delightful character, that of Lady Clavering. We grow tired of the conventional, silver-haired old girl of the drama, who boasts of correct silver-haired sentiments, and a genteel, silver-haired manner. Lady Clavering (as played very prettily by Lillian Andrews), is a lovable, rochetty, affectionate old thing, who is tired of being shelved, and out of the game of life, and clings fondly to the warm humaneness of contact with the affections and interests of her young kinfolk.

Wilkie Collins, I remember, gave an added touch of piquancy to the character by making Lady Janet willfully shut her eyes to the truth, and, even after divining the fraud, cling to the interloper whom she loved, while sending coldly away her kinswoman, whom she cordially disliked. Poor kinswoman! She had the best of reasons for saying, "Excuse me for lying."

Helen Lackaye played with the appropriate effect of hitherness the rôle of the luckless girl who accomplished the very ticklish feat of coming back to life after being dead. From Enoch Arden down, who ever found it oaid?

Blanche Stoddard had a trying rôle in the part of Zira, and acquitted herself most creditably, except for her absolute unintelligibility of speech during the most exciting part of Zira's big scene.

Robert Warwick was not a very parsonic parson. These dizzy leading men who make such fascinating Satans are not wont to be. I don't mean to say he didn't go through the motions all right. He did, indeed. But there was a subterranean hollowness about it all which made it seem all acting.

The Valencia company, by the way, has been very much strengthened, particularly in the masculine side of it. Messrs. Thomas MacLarnie and Darrell Standing gave their two rôles of the tipping officer and the sanctimonious bishop in a style that approached excellence, and, although in a lesser degree, Robert Homans merited encomiums for his little character sketch of Hester Trent's father.

In fact, it rather struck me that "Zira" was the best all-round performance I had seen at this house. A pretty good augury for what can be done in the future.

Enthusiast Heller is continuing to make a specialty of the music programme. He played Handel's "Largo" most beautifully, and after refreshing his soul with that number, he came down to earth, and an anti-climax, and delighted the audience by playing "Violets" as if he thought it stood on the same plane as the Handel composition. But he didn't. I know it from the way he played the "Largo."

Once when George Ade had written a play which proved to be one of his very infrequent failures, a friend of the elder Ade ventured to mention the fact to the old gentleman, when Ade's father responded, with a fine show of dignity: "Sir, I wish you to understand that my son writes plays so rapidly that they don't have to be produced but once."

May Irwin will begin a tour presenting both "The Mollusc," in which she will play the part now assigned to Miss Carlisle, and also continue in "Mrs. Peckham's Carouse."

Aida Hemmi, well remembered for her singing at the Tivoli Opera House, is in the cast of a Chicago company which is doing "The Love Tales of Hoffman."

VANITY FAIR.

The recent failure of a large floral company in New York uncovers a peephole into the foolish life that calls itself fashionable. The president of the company when he was interviewed as to the cause of the disaster explained that he was by no means financially ruined. His patrons were rich and prominent men, and if they were somewhat backward in coming forward with their money, it was only a case of waiting and everything would be all right in the end. But there must be no publicity. He would rather lose money than enforce payment of the amounts due to him. He had never yet sued a customer for a hill, and he never would. Think what it would mean. In the verdant innocence of our hearts we stopped just here and tried hard to think what it would mean and what reason there could possibly be why defaulting customers should not be sued for flower hills just as quickly and as remorselessly as for any other kind of hill. But we had to give it up and to seek enlightenment. And yet the reason was so simple after all. This is what the president says: "Suppose now it was made public that one of them had been sending flowers to women other than his wife. This would immediately stop patrons sending flowers, for fear they might be exposed." Who would have supposed that so much guile could be associated with the flower business?

But that is not all. The president of the company has something more to tell us of human fatuity. He tells us that many a young man, entrusted by mysterious Providence with great wealth, spends a thousand dollars a week on flowers for chorus girls. Think of it—a thousand dollars a week, and then realize that many of these girls seldom earn more than $12 a week and are constantly in need of both food and clothing. Flowers, unfortunately, can be used in neither capacity, and so we may try for ourselves to estimate the feelings of a girl who has to go without her dinner through sheer poverty while wearing a hundred-dollar bouquet that will be dead and gone by the morning. And so the girls come to the flower shop and they say "the next time So-and-So comes to buy flowers take the money and keep the flowers, too, but give me $100. I need it for food and clothes." And sometimes the girls bring back their flowers and ask for the return of the money paid for them.

Why does the young man "void of understanding," as the Scripture tersely puts it, give flowers to the chorus girl. The unco guid will assume that there is some discreditable interchange of favors, but those who know the chorus girl know also that this is seldom the case. Chorus girls as a class are quite as virtuous as any other class of young girls, and more virtuous than some. The young millionaire, whose chance of heaven is infinitely smaller than that of his intended victim, may have hopes, but they do not often fructify, and while the trade of the chorus girl is to be winsome, and while she naturally takes what comes in her way, she has a pretty shrewd idea of where the line must be drawn, and that idea does not originate wholly in self-interest. An English nobleman, on hearing that his son was spending large sums of money upon a stage beauty, remarked that the young hopeful was either getting some return on his money, in which case he was a knave, or he was getting nothing in exchange, in which case he was a fool. In this instance he was only a fool. In the majority of instances we may assume that the millionaire who gives flowers to a hungry chorus girl intends to be a rascal, but succeeds only in being an idiot.

The New York Sun reminds us that when Yvette Guilbert was here last she said that to sit in a New York street-car was to face a row of turnips. She referred, of course, to the absence of the mustache, and the prejudice of the American man against the mustache seems to be something more than a fashion and to have become permanent.

But there was a rumor that the mustache would return to favor, and certain young millionaires who are conspicuous enough to make fashions are said to have begun their growth. "That is the usual fall report," said one of the barbers who looks after many men of fashion at an uptown hotel. "I have seen no increase in the number of my customers who wear mustaches.

"This talk is easy enough to explain. Seven out of every ten Americans who go to Europe for the summer come home wearing mustaches. Over there smooth-faced men are conspicuous, except in England. It is therefore the style that Americans avoid, for they do not want to be put down as Americans immediately on account of this national peculiarity. Nearly all the young New Yorkers of wealth who spend half or more of every year in Europe sport mustaches. The rest still prefer to go smooth-faced.

"The crop of fall mustaches is also large because the men who go to Europe like to be free for a while from the necessity of shaving, and to release even the upper lip from that necessity is a relief. Then some of the men who go away for a vacation feel like turning out a mustache for a lark.

"The first cold days of winter nip these sprouting growths and by the middle of winter the crop has disappeared. I have known travelers returning from Europe to get rid of this facial ornament on the steamer coming home."

The Sun goes on to say that while the reports as to the mustache may be wrong, there is without doubt one decided change in men's fashions—the mode of brushing the hair. It does not often happen that men change the style of wearing their hair. For the last ten years men have followed a mode that has in a way suggested the portraits of a century ago, notably some of the Stuart pictures of George Washington. The hair is brushed back from the brow and then combed up on the temples until it stands out an inch from the side of the head. This method of dressing the hair requires, of course, that the part shall be on the side. Usually on the right side, as few men are able to part the hair on the left side without laborious training.

"Now, there should be no puff visible on the sides of the head," the accomplished coiffeur already quoted told the Sun reporter. "The hair is brushed straight back from the brow on the top as well as on the sides of the head.

"If there is a part of any kind it will probably be found on the right side, but the part is not indispensable. Many men make no part at all. The most modish way of wearing the hair is to brush it straight back from the face with no suggestion of parting."

This is in a way a revival of the old pompadour, which was thought to impart an especially intellectual and thoughtful look to its wearers. The new style differs from the old in one important respect. Where the hair formerly stood up like a shaving brush it now lies close to the head. Men with stiff hair that will not lie down of its own accord must use some means of making it.

"This style began in the colleges, as so many men's modes do nowadays," said this authority, "and is a direct descendant of the exaggerated football hair of recent years. The present fashion requires no such care and preparation as the last style before it did, but it is vastly more dandified than the football mop ever was.

"Men who find it necessary to use something on their hair in order to make it lie flat should wet the hair thoroughly once a day and then brush it. It will be found that it will lie flat all day. I always advise my customers against the use of oil or any kind of grease.

"To acquire this new style of wearing the hair it is not necessary to have it cut in any particular way. Any good cut will produce the result. But it may take several weeks before the hair will lie down as it should."

Men with coarse, curly hair are much better suited to the new style than others. Men with fine silky hair may have the satisfaction of being aristocratic, but their heads do not lend themselves to successful rough-and-ready treatment.

The preponderance of the pompadour, however, has not served to make long hair in the least degree modish. The hair must be of a certain length to wear it in the new style. It must be cut close to the neck behind and not noticeably long on the sides.

"Nothing is further removed from smartness in men's dress than the look of a student or a literary person," said the barber. "They are rarely, if ever, well dressed, and to wear the hair the slightest degree too long suggests the sort of person who could never be a model for well-dressed persons. One of the very first signs of a smartly dressed man is his closely trimmed hair."

A report from London gives an account of a series of unconventional lectures upon famous lovers, now being delivered by Madame de Perrot at the Hotel Ritz. The subject selected by the lady is one calculated to arouse interest by its novelty, and that the discourses are in French gives to them a piquancy that seems eminently appropriate. The audience is described as "not large, but notable," and this means that a lord was in the chair, and that most of those present belonged to the class that toils not, neither does it spin.

Madame de Perrot's first lecture was on Ahelard and Heloise, while future addresses will be devoted to George Sand and Alfred de Musset, Mademoiselle de Lespinasse and D'Alembert, Madame de Stael and Benjamin Constant, "Ma Soeur Henriette" and Ernest Renan, and Madame de Recamier and Chateaubriand. The lecturer promised that she would have something fresh to relate about some of these lovers, and also that she would repeat the lectures in English, "for the benefit of a larger audience."

Now, what does she mean by that? At the first glance, we supposed that the lady spoke in French because she was unable to speak in English, but it seems that she had other reasons. Can it be that she chose French because she had revelations to make, unsuited to a more vulgar language? And are we to believe that the English lectures "for the benefit of a larger audience" will be identical with those in French? We all know that French covers a multitude of sins, and that nothing in that language can be really immoral; but we have a strong suspicion that the English version will be diluted with a propriety not so conspicuous in the original French.

Madame de Perrot is said to have lamented the difficulty of finding anything new to say about Ahelard and Heloise. She might have arranged for the exclusion of the police, and then have told the truth. That would have been new, but embarrassing, even in French. When it comes to these eminent but illicit lovers, the whole world is in a league of falsification. Who, for instance, would dare to tell the whole story of Madame de Stael? And are we at all deceived by the recitation of tender love missives, or the description of clandestine interviews? Do these things constitute the whole of such a love story, and do we fail to get glimpses of a repulsiveness and of a suffering more real than the sentiment that is purveyed for popular consumption?

And why does the lecturer delve into the records of the past for her material? The present is so much more interesting. The fashion of love-making has not changed so materially in the course of a century, and there are causes célèbres of today that contain just as much passion, that are just as sentimental, and just as ugly. Now, if a certain number of ladies who have the ability to lecture would only tell us about their own love affairs, the subject would have a vivid and immediate interest that the records of a hundred years ago entirely lack. If the lecturer felt herself liable to deviate inadvertently from fiction into fact, from the region of sentiment into other regions more natural, but less beautiful, she might shelter herself under the French language, which would be ample justification for a realism that would be shocking in any other language.

The reign of the tall girl is not over, says a London society paper, but the little woman is coming into her own again. There is a growing request for her, because the fashion of the moment in hats tends to give her a diminutive appearance which is positively fascinating.

In Fritzi Scheff's new opera, "The Prima Donna," no tights are worn, not even a short skirt, by any of the sixty girls in the chorus. Another novelty is the fact that all the chorus girls are tall, none being under 5 feet 10 inches.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The director of the zoological gardens was on his vacation. He received a note from his chief assistant, which closed thus: "The chimpanzee seems to be pining for a companion. What shall we do until your return?"

Two colored women stood chatting at a Philadelphia street corner. One of them, ostentatiously clad in mourning, said, with a doleful shake of the head in reply to a query from the other: "Yas, he died in de height of his zen-ith."

George, the four-year-old grandson of an extremely pious and devout grandfather, came rushing into the house a few days ago in a state of wild excitement. "Grandpa! Grandpa!" he called. "Mr. Barton's cow is dead! God called her home!"

Cardinal Logue, during a country visit, was asked how many sermons a preacher could prepare in a week. Smiling, Cardinal Logue answered: "If the preacher is a man of extraordinary ability, he can prepare one sermon; if a man of average ability, two; if a blockhead, ten or twelve."

Frank Lincoln, an American entertainer and humorist, had been appearing in London for a time in a monologue. One afternoon he had just made his bow and was about to begin when a cat walked in and sat down on the stage. "You get out!" said Mr. Lincoln, severely. "This is a monologue, not a catalogue!"

While a German resident was driving an English friend from Frankfurt to Homburg, a motor-car passed at a terrific pace, raising a cloud of dust. "Ah!" said the German, "There goes our emperor." "How do you know?" inquired the Englishman. "Do you suppose anybody else could raise a dust like that?" was the reply.

Sir Oliver Lodge, the English scientist, learned to play golf at St. Andrews thirty years ago. His teacher was Professor Tait. "You don't play golf with your muscles," Professor Tait said to him one day; "you play with your morals." "But I hope," said Sir Oliver, with a hasty glance round, "that no one will consider my morals as bad as my golf."

At Princeton a lecturer said that Mr. Cleveland had little sympathy with the rush and hurry that the American business man so complacently affects—no sympathy with train and boat dictation, with the lunch table telephone, the letter phonograph, and the other bluffs. "Don't rush so," Mr. Cleveland once said. "Lightning might do a great deal more if it wasn't always in such an awful hurry."

Mr. Sirius Barker had been cheated in a horse trade and the experience formed his chief topic of conversation for some time. "Can't you get over talking about the way you got cheated in that horse trade?" suggested a friend, who had heard the story several times. "No," answered Mr. Barker. "I don't mind the man's getting my money so much, but I do hate to think I've lost his respect."

Scotland has a great reputation for learning in the United States, and a lady who went over from Boston expected to find the proverbial shepherd quoting Virgil and the laborer who had Burns by heart. She was disillusioned in Edinburgh. Accosting a policeman, she inquired as to the whereabouts of Carlyle's house. "Which Carlyle?" he asked. "Thomas Carlyle," said the lady. "What does he do?" queried the guardian of the peace. "He was a writer—but he's dead," she faltered. "Well, madam," the big Scot informed her, "if the man is dead over five years there's little chance of finding out anything about him in a big city like this."

Tompkins had suffered terribly, and at one time it appeared that his illness might have a fatal termination. But skillful doctors and a pretty nurse tended him most carefully, and the crisis was successfully passed. The pretty nurse was Tompkins's one ray of sunshine during his weary hours, and he fell desperately in love with her. "Nurse Edith," he said one day, "will you be my wife when I recover?" "Certainly!" replied the consoler of suffering humanity. "Then my hopes are realized. You do really love me?" queried the anxious Tompkins. The pretty nurse stammered. "Oh, no," she said; "that's merely part of the treatment. I must keep my patients cheerful. I promised this morning to run away with a man who has lost both his legs."

Last summer the congregation of a little kirk in the Highlands of Scotland was greatly disturbed and mystified by the appearance in its midst of an old English lady, who made use of an ear trumpet during the sermon, such an instrument being entirely unknown in those simple parts. There was much discussion of the matter, and it was finally decided that one of the elders, who had great local reputation as a man of parts, should be deputed to settle the question. On the next Sabbath the unconscious offender again made her appearance and again produced the trumpet, whereupon the chosen elder rose from his seat and marched down the aisle to where the old lady sat, and, entreating her with an upraised finger, said sternly: "The first toot—ye're out!"

Some good political speeches were not included in the campaign text-books. There was a meeting in a country school-house, and after the speeches a leading German was called on for a few remarks. He said: "Fellow-citizens: We haf hert d' chin music, yes! Und d' time has now come ven we must all git toggedder und undo that vich ve haf not dit. All git toggedder und roll up such a Democratic majority in Burks County that it vill roll und roll und roll und it rolls all ofer Berks County, all ofer d' State of Pennsylvania, all ofer the United States, vill roll across d' ocean und vill roll up to Queen Victoria vere she is sitting on her throne, und she vill say: 'Good gracious! vot a Democratic majority Berks County dit roll up.'"

W. H. Taft's glass remained turned down throughout the little dinner that he gave recently at Hot Springs to some political visitors, and this fact aroused comment. "Yes, and it is going to stay turned down," said the President-elect. "I am not going to drink anything again, ever." "You never did drink enough so that any one could notice it," said a hoyhood friend present. The remark was as superfluous as the boy's indorsement of his grandmother's neatness: "Grandma can take snuff when she is making bread and not get a hit in the dough," he asserted to the circle of visitors. "Why, how can you say such things!" cried the old lady, in distress. "Well, you may have dropped a little," was Johnny's compromise, "but not enough to make any difference."

The Army Riding Test.

I have stormed the height when a rain of lead
Beat men to the sodden ground;
I've piled up cords of my gory dead
While bearing a grisly wound;
I've faced the foe with the starry flag
Draped over my stricken breast;
But I draw the line at a sway-hacked nag,
And a four days' riding test!
I've walked with ghosts in the dismal camps,
And slept at a dead man's side;
I've heathred the air of the noisome swamps,
Where the fevers of doom abide;
I've faced the fates with a hero's smiles,
And laughed at the halls that flew;
But I will not travel a thousand miles
On a livery kangaroo.

I lost one arm on the Shiloh plain,
And a leg on another field;
The sword of a Southron clove my brain,
And the wound is scarcely healed.
I hear my sears as I hear my jug,
Nor sigh of the pains that rack;
But I will not ride on a knock-kneed plug
To Kalamazoo and back!
—Walt Mason, in Puck.

Lord Salisbury, as is well known, was a very absent-minded man, and his memory for faces was just about as had as King Edward's is excellent. On one occasion, when both the Bishop of London and Lord Salisbury were visiting at Sandringham, the former observed that the premier did not seem to recognize him. Lord Salisbury knew the face, but just whom it belonged to he couldn't think. "I've met that man before, I know?" declared the premier to his royal host. "Well, I should think you have," replied King Edward, "seeing that you made him Bishop of London!"

PERSONAL.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The past week has been a fairly quiet one, save for the flurry of excitement of the Greenway hall last night and its attendant dinners, and most of the social world is devoting itself to preparations for the holiday season. Shopping fills all the spare hours, and some of the larger shops have the air of crowded receptions.

The engagement is announced of Miss Amy Porter, daughter of Mrs. M. C. Porter, to Mr. William Bethune Ireland. Their wedding will take place on December 29.

The wedding of Miss Helen Gentry, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Richard Gentry, to Mr. Edward Bonneau Nohle, will take place on Wednesday evening, December 30, at eight o'clock, at the home of the bride's parents, at 2600 Troost Avenue, Kansas City. Mr. Nohle and his bride will be at home after February 15 at 2405 Webster Street, San Francisco.

The wedding of Miss Roma Paxton, daughter of Mrs. Bessie E. Paxton, to Midshipman Lawrence Austin, U. S. N., took place on Thursday evening at the home of the bride on Jackson Street. The ceremony was celebrated at half-past eight o'clock by the Rev. Edward Morgan of St. Luke's Church. There were no bridesmaids and Lieutenant Leonard, U. S. N., was the best man. The ushers were Lieutenant Beecher, U. S. N., Lieutenant Kurtz, U. S. N., and Lieutenant Robinson, U. S. N. Only relatives and intimate friends were present. Midshipman Austin and his bride have gone to San Diego to remain while his ship, the Albany, is stationed there.

The wedding of Miss Terecita Elvira Garcia to Mr. Montague Broome of Santa Barbara took place on Wednesday evening of last week at the home of the bride on Jackson Street. The ceremony was performed at nine o'clock by the Rev. Father Santandreu of the Spanish church. Miss Hortense Garcia was the maid of honor and Mr. Niatias Garcia the best man.

Mrs. Carter Pomeroy has sent out cards for an informal dance at her home on Clay Street on Wednesday evening, December 30.

The first of the Assemblies under the direction of Mr. Edward M. Greenway took place last night in the Fairmont ball-room.

The officers and ladies of the Presidio entertained at a dance at the post on Friday evening of last week.

Frederick Warde will next summer inaugurate a summer institute for teaching dramatic art, oratorio, and stagecraft, at his place on North White Lake, New York.

A Yuletide Play.

A Yuletide play, "On the Stairway of Life," by Mrs. Harry Alston Williams, is to be given at the Century Hall in San Francisco on Monday evening, December 21, at 8:15 o'clock, to be followed by dancing from ten to twelve o'clock. It will be given for the benefit of the Telegraph Hill Neighborhood Association and the West Berkeley Day Nursery. A number of prominent women of this city and Berkeley will act as patronesses. Tickets may be obtained from Mrs. Frederic H. Beaver, Mrs. George C. Boardman, Mrs. C. O. G. Miller, Mrs. C. P. Pomeroy, and Miss Alice Griffith in San Francisco, and from Mrs. Harry Alston Williams, Mrs. Sidney V. Smith, Mrs. Virginia Pennoyer, Mrs. Frederick Slate, and Mrs. James Spiers in Berkeley.

In London, last season, when "H. M. S. Pinafore" was revived, Sir W. S. Gilbert gave Captain Corcoran a line referring to strained relations between popular naval officers. It was received on the first night with cries of "Author!" from the gallery, and one stentorian remark, "Stick to the book." The situation was summed up by Sir W. S. Gilbert, who wrote: "My dear Barrington, I'm glad you referred to the gallery objecting to my interpolation. I find myself in the Gilbertian situation of being the only man alive who is not permitted to gag these libretti."

The Shaftesbury Theatre, a West End London playhouse, is about to be pulled down, after a checkered career of twenty years. In spite of its many misfortunes, the Shaftesbury has had some notable triumphs. A year after it was built the production of Henry Arthur Jones's play, "The Middleman," resulted in a triumph for E. S. Willard, as well as for its author. Two years later the first performance in England of Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" was given, while the triumph of "The Belle of New York" packed the theatre for over eighteen months.

"Faust," in which the late Lewis Morrison for so many years starred as Mephisto, has been revived, with Rosabel Morrison, daughter of the deceased actor, elevated to stardom, as Marguerite. The production is on an elaborate scenic and musical scale, with particularly fine accessories for the Brocken scene. Miss Morrison opened her season in Wilkesbarre, Pa.

Maude Fealy is leading woman with Nat C. Goodwin in "Cameo Kirby."

AMONG THE ESTABLISHMENTS THAT HAVE moved down town or that established other headquarters in the down-town district, while maintaining their former stands at locations on Fillmore or Van Ness, is the Original Vienna Bakery. Every bon-vivant knows that the Van Ness Avenue Original Vienna Bakery and Café is at 1014, and that this is the rallying place of the noon-day crowds and the ladies on their shopping tours. The enterprising manager, with a desire to enlarge his field, has opened another café at 139 Ellis Street, and here will be welcomed the downtown patron. This is one of the best locations in the city. Its spacious, well-lighted rooms are a pleasure to look upon, and its kitchens are as clean and airy as my lady's parlor. Breakfast, luncheon and dinner at popular prices.

Colonel D. L. Brainard, Commissary Department, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty as chief commissary of the Department of California and left last week for the East on two months' leave of absence. He will then proceed via Suez to Manila, where he has been ordered for duty.

Colonel C. W. Mason, U. S. A., recently promoted from lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-Ninth Infantry, U. S. A., has arrived from the Philippines and assumed command of the Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., with station at Fort McDowell, Angel Island.

Colonel Daniel L. Appel, Medical Department, U. S. A., Medical Supply Depot, San Francisco, has been promoted to his present rank in place of Colonel Philip F. Harvey, U. S. A., retired.

Lieutenant-Colonel John Biddle, Engineer Corps, U. S. A., is spending a fortnight in Seattle, inspecting the construction work in that harbor.

Lieutenant-Colonel Charles G. Woodward, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., inspector-general of the Department of the Gulf, with station at Atlanta, Georgia, will be relieved of that duty and will proceed to this city on January 1 to assume the duties of inspector-general of the Department of California.

Major Walter A. Bethel, U. S. A., judge-advocate of the Department of California, has been ordered to proceed to Spring Garden, Plumas County, for the purpose of taking a deposition.

Major James M. Kennedy, Medical Corps, U. S. A., acting chief surgeon, Department of California, has been ordered to proceed to Agnews and Napa for the purpose of inspecting the asylums at those places.

Major Albert E. Truly, Medical Corps, U. S. A., is detailed as a member of the examining board, convened at the General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, vice Colonel George H. Torney, U. S. A.

Captain Peter C. Hains, Jr., Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been transferred from the Forty-Eighth Company, Coast Artillery Corps, to the Sixty-Second Company, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., to take effect on February 1.

Captain E. B. Mainwaring, U. S. M. C., is ordered to the Marine Barracks, Navy Yard, Mare Island, for duty.

Lieutenant David L. Roscoe, First Cavalry, U. S. A., now on sick leave of absence, is relieved from further treatment at the General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, and will proceed to Fort Du Pont, Delaware, take station at that post, and assume charge under the instructions of the quartermaster-general of the army of construction work at Fort Du Pont and at Fort Mott, New Jersey.

Lieutenant Lewis C. Rockwell, Third Infantry, U. S. A., is transferred at his own request to the Tenth Infantry, U. S. A.

Lieutenant John Randolph, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Fort Shafter, Honolulu, has been granted four months' leave of absence, to terminate not later than May 4, 1909.

Lieutenant Ernest K. Johnstone, Medical Reserve Corps, U. S. A., Presidio of San Francisco, was ordered to report to the commanding officer, Battery F, Fifth Field Artillery, U. S. A., for duty with that command en route from the army transport Thomas to Fort Sheridan, Illinois.

Passed Assistant Surgeon F. M. Munson, U. S. N., when discharged from the Naval Hospital at Canacas, is ordered to the Monadnock and Monterey for duty.

Hammerstein's Philadelphia Opera House.

When Mr. Hammerstein opened his new opera house in Philadelphia a few days ago, fully five thousand persons sat or stood within it, and many hundred more crowded the streets outside. The governor of the State came to proffer his congratulations; the socially elect of the town sat in numbers in the boxes and in the orchestra; the mere opera-going public testified its pleasure in the house itself; in all that it heard and saw in the performance of "Carmen" on the stage; and when the time came for Mr. Hammerstein's speech, in his courage, energy, and good faith, as a manager. Of course, Mr. Hammerstein rioted in superlatives: "Great music is like a great misfortune," he said; "it makes us all akin. I have striven to give you the greatest opera house in all the world. I rest on your verdict. I have done all that I promised." The house shook with applause; the men of the chorus bore the manager from the stage on their shoulders; Philadelphia had an opera house of its own—the first in America, outside New York and New Orleans; and sixteen hundred persons were trying to find sixteen hundred carriages in the press without.

The building is imposing in its simple architectural lines, viewed from Broad Street. It stands amid old-fashioned red brick and brownstone houses, a dignified pile of white brick and stone. Opposite its many exits and entrances in Poplar Street is a high, old-fashioned brick wall fencing an old mansion. For an hour before the doors were opened this wall was capped with men and women, for those who could not get inside were content to gather and watch the fashion of the town stream out from carriages and motors into the great structure.

Within there rose the sloping vista of 1800 men and women in opera dress in the orchestra chairs. Above this in a half circle were the occupants of the boxes stretching from rim to rim of the proscenium, and above these, in a gentle rise, were the 2000 persons who filled the balcony. The construction of the balcony is such that there seems no division between it and the gallery, which seats those nearest the high ceiling of the house. There is just a little rise about half way up, and without pillar or post or wall to obstruct sound or view, these 2000 people sat, heard, saw, and enjoyed. To those who had not seen the inside of the building before, the first view was striking for its beauty. The pillars are of Pavenazza marble, white streaked with black, the general tone of the walls is a deep red with gold decorations, and the mural paintings are gorgeous in warmth of color. The boxes of the subscribers are separated from the main promenade by a stretch of open space which shows the marble balustrades and caryatide pillars to fine advantage, giving a sense of roominess. The promenade is richly decorated, the carpets are of richest crimson. The opera of the evening was "Carmen," with Mr. Dalmorès as Jose, Miss Labia as Carmen herself for the first time in America, Mr. Dufrance as the bull-fighter, and Mr. Campanini conducting. Singers, choristers, orchestra, scenery, costumes, everything, in short, that the performance required, had seemingly been brought from the Manhattan in New York, but within a short week he had divided his forces and given Philadelphia a chorus and an orchestra of its own.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Don't you admire the old-time melodies?" "No; I'm a fresh-air fiend."—Dramatic Telegram.

Knicker—Whom does the baby resemble? Backer—Its yell takes after its father's college.—New York Sun.

"Her husband has been a sufferer for many years, hasn't he?" "I don't know—how long have they been married?"—Cleveland Leader.

The Landlady—What part of the chicken will you have, Mr. Newcomer? Mr. Newcomer—A little of the outside, please.—Puck.

"When she hit him with the golf ball, did it knock him senseless?" "I guess so. I understand they are soon to marry."—Town and Country.

Harald—What did she say when you turned out the gas and kissed her? Rupert—Said she felt as if she never wanted to see my face again.—Tit-Bits.

Nell—Mr. Guzzler's conversation is rather spicy, don't you think so? Belle—Well, it is generally tinged with the aroma of cloves.—Philadelphia Record.

Dactar—You have only a few moments to live. Have you anything to say? Patient—Only this, doctor—that you've made a mighty quick job of it.—Scraps.

Brawn—Did you ever have absent treatment? Jones—Oh, yes, and when I get home I'll have present treatment for being absent so long.—Brooklyn Life.

Dashaway—How much money has Miss Spilger got? Clevertan—I don't know. I've never been enough in love with her to find out.—New York Herald.

It is very simple: Mr. Loeh is to accept full responsibility in the St. Paul Dispatch for whatever Mr. Roosevelt says in the Outlook.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

A five-year-old hoy on hearing grace asked for the first time at breakfast gravely remarked, "I only say my prayers at night. That is the dangerous time."—Life.

"Professor," said a senior, trying to be pathetic at parting, "I am indebted to you for all I know." "Pray don't mention such a trifle!" was the reply.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Bridegroom (in church)—Good heavens! I've forgotten the minister's fee. Best Man—That's all right. We'll send the ushers around with the collection boxes.—Boston Transcript.

Young Parks (grumpily)—I never met a man yet who was on the dead level. Old Marks—My hoy, the man on the dead level is only to be found in the cemetery.—Wall Street News.

"I see a New York dame claims that a woman needs $70,000 a year for clothes. I s'pose hers is an exceptional case." "Not at all. Every woman needs that much. Only they don't all get it."—Milwaukee News.

Stella—There are two undesirable types of husbands. Bella—Yes, the man who wants to stay home every evening, and the man who doesn't.—Brooklyn Life.

"What is your business?" asked the thin-lipped woman, not encouragingly. "I'm an after-dinner speaker," replied the applicant for a hand-out, "before dinner."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"I hear you are going to marry Charley?" "Yes; he asked me last evening." "Let me congratulate you. Charley is all right. He is one of the nicest fellows I was ever engaged to."—Stray Staries.

"What's that curious looking charm you are wearing on your watch chain?" "That is our new coat-of-arms—chaffeur rampant, policeman couchant, justice of the peace expectant."—Montreal Standard.

Mrs. O'Taale—She's takin' on awful. Her husband got three years—but he kin git twelve months off for good behavior. Mrs. Daoley—Tell her to rest aisy. Sure, an' he may not behave himself.—Life.

"What is this peculiar key on your typewriter? I never saw it on any before." "Hist! My own invention. Whenever you can't spell a word, you press this key and it makes a hlur."—Boston Transcript.

"What would you say," said the prophet of woe, "if I were to tell you that in a short space of time all the rivers in this country would dry up?" "I would say," replied the patient man, "go and do thou likewise."—Stray Staries.

Dally—No, dear; I can't go any place with Molly. I hate her—the cat! Pally—But, darling, you used to be chummy with her. What did she do? Dally—She told me a lot of the nasty things you said about me, dear.—Cleveland Leader.

Tourist—So you would advise me to come back by the Sunday night train in order to catch the boat on Monday morning? Station Master (severely)—A wud advise nae man tae profane the Sawhath; hut a'll jist repeat—if ye wait till the Monday ye'll nae get the connection.—Punch.

Mexico has a new volcano, the reports saying "that the top of a low mountain was blown off by a subterranean explosion, and that lava and sulphurous flames have been pouring from the crater for several days." There is some talk of calling the newcomer Mount Theodore.—Puck.

"Say, Rufe, what dis I hear 'bout your son Gahe gettin' in trouble at church last Sunday night?" "Taint nothin' serious, parson. He jes' musin' hisself some. Broke up de meetin' wid a axe handle, and carve he name on three of them deacons' face wid a razzor. Dat's all."—Boston Traveler.

Cabinet Organization.

The selection by President-elect Taft of Senator Knox of Pennsylvania for the portfolio of State is eminently a strong one. No better man could possibly have been chosen, for Knox combines demonstrated ability with experience and proved working power. As a member of McKinley's Cabinet, and later as a member of Roosevelt's Cabinet, he fully sustained a reputation previously made as a lawyer and a man of affairs; and since his retirement from the Cabinet to enter the Senate, he has stood practically at the head of the latter body. It was Mr. Knox, be it remembered, whose initiative and legal resource won the first success in trust-restraining operations in the Northwestern merger case and in other suits connected with the anti-trust movement; and no like success has been gained since his retirement.

The President-elect is himself authority for the statement that no other Cabinet assignments have been made. At the same time there are many indications that Mr. Taft is giving a great deal of attention to Cabinet organization. The indications are that Representative Burton of Ohio will be Secretary of the Treasury, that Secretary Wilson will continue in charge of the Agricultural Department, and that Mr. Frank Hitchcock will be the new Attorney-General. As to who will represent the Pacific Coast we are left in doubt, although the names of Judge Ballinger of Seattle and George Knight of California are under consideration.

The Argonaut hopes that the gossip which connects the names of Mr. Roosevelt's private secretary and half a dozen other minor figures with possible Cabinet assignments is gossip merely. We should like to see the Cabinet made up of men who stand for something in the country upon the basis of definite public achievement rather than for mere clerical deftness. The President's Cabinet ought to be something more than a group of clerks; it ought to be something more than an organization made up of two or three high-class men and half a dozen nobodies. The President-elect will, we believe, please the country if he shall return to the old practice of bestowing Cabinet appointments only in connection with established high reputation.

The New Senate.

The changes in the United States Senate due to come with the end of the political year—March 4—are more than usually important. The terms of thirty-one senators are due to expire, of whom some eighteen or nineteen are practically certain of reelection. The losses which are likely to be permanent are Fulton of Oregon, Foraker of Ohio, Teller of Colorado, Hemenway of Indiana, Ankeny of Washington, Kittredge of South Dakota, Long of Kansas, and McCreary of Kentucky. Allison of Iowa was recently lost to the Senate by death, and Knox of Pennsylvania will retire to become Secretary of State in the Taft Cabinet. The new senators, so far as they have been chosen or their choice indicated, will be Elihu Root of New York, Joseph Bristow of Kansas, Wesley L. Jones of Washington, M. N. Johnson of North Dakota, George Chamberlain of Oregon, E. D. Smith of South Carolina, Duncan U. Fletcher of Florida, and W. O. Bradley of Kentucky. Cummins of Iowa has so recently come into the Senate as fairly to be included in the list of new men.

Interesting contests are in progress in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Oregon, with much uncertainty as to the outcome. If Representative Burton should be elected to succeed Foraker from Ohio, the result would add notably to the strength of the Senate. But if, on the other hand, Mr. Charles P. Taft should be elected, the loss will be something, for Mr. Taft, albeit a respectable man and a generous brother, has no particular qualifications for the Senate. Looking to the strength of the Senate alone, the election of Mr. Burton is immeasurably to be preferred to that of Mr. Taft, who, indeed, would never have been thought of for the place if he were not the brother of the President-elect, and more important still, if he had not put up a large amount of money to sustain his brother's presidential candidacy. In Pennsylvania the contest will lie between several members of Congress from the western region, with the chances of success in favor of Representative Dalzell, a man of good working habits, but of no distinction at the point of intellectual ability. Mr. Alfred Henry Lewis, who usually writes from inside information, predicts the election of Mr. Dalzell, which will imply the substitution of a man of moderate powers for one of very exceptional ability and force.

There is as yet no authoritative solution of the Oregon problem, although the disinclination of the Republican majority to elect the Democrat Chamberlain becomes more and more marked. Under the rules of the Oregon direct primary system Chamberlain is entitled to election. If the members of the Oregon legislature shall stand by pledges formally made he will be elected. None the less the opinion of those best informed, in and out of Oregon, is that not Chamberlain but some Republican, probably other than Fulton, the incumbent, will be chosen. On many accounts this Oregon contest is the most interesting incident in the recent political history of the country. It puts to the test the question of whether under any system of primary pledges a legislature dominated by one party can be depended upon to elect to the United States Senate a man representing another party.

The loss of Knox to the Senate is serious. Since the retirement of Mr. Spooner he has perhaps been the largest individual force in the senatorial body. The loss of Fulton is likewise one of importance, for he is a very capable lawyer, an experienced legislator and a man of general working capability. The loss of Foraker is that of a brilliant and interesting man, but one who, despite his talents, has ceased to be effective in the work of the Senate. While possessing many admirable traits, Foraker lacks the cooperative mind, which is another way of saying that his temperament and habit do not in the present posture of affairs fit him for useful service.

The accession of Mr. Root is a very important matter. For all-round ability he surpasses anybody, with the possible exception of Spooner, who has held a seat in the Senate for many years. His intellectual and legal abilities are of the highest order; furthermore, his experience and reputation will add immensely to his power. He will at once take a place as a foremost figure in the senatorial body. Cummins of Iowa is also a man of exceptional power, while Bristow of Kansas, who is by no means new to public life, will likewise add to the power and dignity of the Senate. In the interest of the Senate itself it is much to be hoped that Burton will be successful in Ohio. These four men alone—Root, Cummins, Bristow, and Burton—are competent by their exceptional capabilities and powers to lift the Senate from the rut into which it has fallen and to restore, measurably at least, its consideration with the people of the country. Even if Mr. Burton should be drawn into the Cabinet, as now seems more than likely, the new Senate will be stronger by far than any we have known for a long time past.

The President and Congress.

The immediate cause of the trouble between President Roosevelt and Congress was an amendment by Congress of the secret service appropriation bill, providing that no part of the money appropriated should be applied to the "cost of transfers or details of detective agents to other departments." The intent of this provision was plainly enough to limit those activities all over the country in which the President or his executive agents have employed detectives of the secret service to purposes little suspected by the public and at prodigious cost.

Congress, as the duly authorized custodian of the public purse, has not only a constitutional but a moral right to determine the use to which money appropriated by it shall be employed. The President has a constitutional and moral right to advise Congress, but there his right ends. He has no mandate to lecture or berate Congress or to allege wrong motives if it declines to give what he asks.

Mr. Roosevelt is much given to what is vulgarly called gum-shoeing. The fondness for secret methods has grown upon him with his years of power, and it is probably true that he has employed more secret agents than any other two men—perhaps any other ten—who have occupied the presidency. He has assumed it to be a part of his duty to spy upon the doings of other departments of the government, and in more than one instance he has lent officers of the government detective bureau to the service of public and private prosecution in different parts of the country.

We have seen too much of this sort of thing on the Pacific Coast, especially in the operations of William J. Burns in Oregon and California. Only a few days ago, on Munday of this week, to be specific, we saw in the evidence of Police Commissioners Cutler and Keil before the Biggy inquest how a government secret-service agent may, by the President's permission, work himself into local and even personal affairs, and how he may employ methods more suggestive of the Spanish inquisition than of modern and accepted processes of detecting crime. It was to put a stop to this sort of thing that Congress voted to limit the use of the secret service, as it had an unquestioned right to do.

The President's outburst against Congress in his annual message was not only an impropriety, but one which Congress could not overlook with self-respect. Hence the resolutions of protest adopted both by the Senate and House; hence the inquiry proposed. The President's outgivings with respect to these procedures are even less excusable than his original expression. He might, indeed, very properly have discussed the point with Congress, presenting his views with the support of any arguments which he might be able to bring to bear upon them. But no man has the right, under any circumstances, to be grossly abusive and vulgar in his expressions, much less the President of the United States in dealing with the Congress of the United States.

In this controversy Mr. Roosevelt has exhibited the worst faults of a very imperfect temperament. He exposes himself as a man of overweening self-esteem, childishly intolerant of anybody or anything tending to limit his purposes or plans. His mind apparently never sees but one side of any question, and in presenting his views he has no sense of the dignities of his office or of the limitations which they should put upon him. He blurts out his resentments as freely and as coarsely as a dock laborer, mindless of the fact that his office gives to his expressions a significance to which they would not be entitled on their own account. This is not the mark either of wisdom or of courage; rather it is proof that Mr. Roosevelt, no matter how great his merit in other respects, is a man deficient in judgment and lacking in taste. Furthermore, it exhibits him as one who either does not comprehend the limitations of his office or who, in his eagerness to have his own willful way, is ready to disregard them.

The President intimates in his angry retort to Congress that if the proposed inquiry shall be persisted in, he will unfold a tale of dereliction on the part of senators and congressmen that will amaze and shock the country. Inferentially, he threatens Congress with exposure of wrongdoing on the part of its members if it shall fail to knuckle under to him. In other words, he holds a big stick over Congress and offers for the price of concession to withdraw it without striking. He forgets apparently that in taking this position he puts himself in an amazing posture before the country. If, in truth, he has any information that the country is entitled to or that he as President has the right to give out, he ought to present it without regard to any quarrel which he may have with Congress. His duty to expose or withhold is not affected in the slightest degree by any contentions which have arisen between himself and anybody else. For the President in the mood of anger and resentment to present charges which in the mood of good nature he would suppress, is to put the presidential office in the attitude of serving the private whim of the man who holds it.

Men who truly love their country, and who are properly regardful of the proprieties and dignities of its government, may well be solicitous concerning the outcome of this unhappy quarrel. There is too much reason to fear that neither the President on one hand nor Congress on the other will be sufficiently considerate of their representative character and of the largeness of the moral issues incidentally at stake in any quarrel between them. The danger is that each, nagged and given license by the extravagances of the other, will proceed to lengths tending, as we have already remarked, to the destruction of that confidence which must lie at the basis of representative government if such government is to command the respect and support of an intelligent and decently moralized people.

The seriousness of the contention is a matter not easily exaggerated. There has not arisen a situation so strained between President and Congress since the day of President Johnson. The most fortunate outcome would be for the President to recognize the weakness and impropriety of his position and to do what a man of fine moral courage always does when he discovers himself in the wrong. There are intimations from Washington that the President may follow this course. For the sake of the country, for his own sake, for the sake of public regard for certain broad moralities which stand associated in the popular mind with Mr. Roosevelt's name, we should be glad to see the quarrel thus ended. At the same time it is not easy to be hopeful for such a termination. In times past the President has rarely exhibited the kind of courage which dares openly to confess a fault.

The Case of J. Dalzell Brown.

The twelve thousand and five hundred depositors who were swindled in the collapse of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, not to mention everybody else who had any knowledge of the case, were jarred on Saturday last when, on motion of the district attorney, all charges pending against J. Dalzell Brown were wiped off the records. Brown, be it remembered, was the manager of the bank and the active agent in that series of crimes by which its resources were fraudulently appropriated and otherwise dissipated. His part in the wrecking operations was calculated and villainous to the last degree. Others, to be sure, shared with him in the profits of the transaction, but his own share was large enough to excite the wonder of all who observed the evidences of his extraordinary prosperity.

The wiping out of the charges against Brown on motion of the district attorney is a formal payment for certain testimony which Brown gave in his resentment against his associates and as a means of clearing himself. True, he told nothing which might not have been gotten at in other ways, nothing which as yet has resulted in the imprisonment of anybody else. He simply gave such testimony as he was bound to give. It is understood that at one time he promised to make such exposition of the affairs of the wrecked bank as would save a large sum for distribution among its defrauded depositors, but up to now no such exposure has been made and there is no indication of his intention to make it. On the score of his testimony against his associates in crime Brown was given the nominal sentence of eighteen months in San Quentin, this period of imprisonment subject to reduction by prompt obedience to prison rules, and, under the special circumstances of the case, subject to other notable mitigations. For example, much of the time since his sentence Brown has been kept, not at San Quentin, but in San Francisco, and the Chronicle is authority for the statement that he has been allowed frequent automobile rides in the open air and the privilege of dining at home. In short, Brown's punishment has been no punishment at all when compared with the penalties prescribed by law for such crimes as he committed. Indeed, it is prophesied that his brief period of nominal confinement will be over and done with before the prosecuting attorney gets round to the conviction of his associates, even assuming that that shall in the end be accomplished.

The plain English of all this is that Brown, a swindler of the grossest character, who publicly picked the pockets of twelve thousand and five hundred bank depositors, has by the fiat of the prosecuting attorney practically been rendered immune. What happened to eighteen boodling supervisors whose guilt was notorious and confessed has happened to this unspeakable miscreant. In a brief time he will be free to go his ways without fear of punishment and to enjoy the loot which no doubt he has somewhere put aside to await the day of his release. The facts speak for themselves. We have, it appears, a prosecuting office which assumes, not only in the graft cases, but in all other cases, the privilege of determining not who is or is not guilty, but who among the guilty shall be free and who shall be punished. It is an assumption beyond precedent here or elsewhere in the magnitude of its operations, based on no foundation of law, atrocious in its breach of justice, and tending surely to social demoralization. If J. Dalzell Brown, guilty of unnumbered, calculated crimes, may be cleaned of his sins and set at liberty in the poor discretion of a prosecuting attorney, what hope is there that any other criminal may be brought to punishment? If this is to be the system—if immunity is to be the rule for the worst criminals—then pray what use is it to maintain a prosecuting office at all? There would be less irritation and less demoralization in letting criminals go free from the beginning with no pretense of prosecution and punishment.

This incident ought at least to serve one purpose; it ought to convince the twelve thousand and five hundred defrauded depositors of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, not to mention anybody else, that the Argonaut was right when, during the last candidacy of Mr. Langdon, it declared him to be a man unfit by temperament, by mental capacity, by independence of character, or by moral self-control for the exercise of any public trust.

New York and the Taft Administration.

Under all the circumstances, the election of Mr. Root to the Senate implies a radical change in conditions long existing in New York politics and tending to affect the politics of the whole country. Mr. Root has long been an authoritative factor in the government; he is a close friend of the President-to-be. As a senator from New York he will undoubtedly have his way in relation to executive matters as they affect New York, including presidential appointments in that State. In other words, Mr. Root's election is bound to restore that close connection between the President and the New York senatorial delegation which was destroyed in the historic quarrel between President Garfield and Senator Conkling in 1881.

Speaking broadly, that rule in the making of appointments commonly styled "senatorial courtesy" obtains wherever President and senators are of the same party excepting in the State of New York. Several causes have contributed to this exception, the most important being the fact that New York's senators have hardly ever in recent years been persona grata at the White House. In the case of Mr. Roosevelt there have been other factors in the situation besides dislike and distrust of the New York senators. Being himself a citizen of New York and having his own group of political friends there, and desiring furthermore to build up a more or less personal political organization, he has acted upon his own initiative in the matter of appointments and has apparently been quite as well pleased with the ill-will as with the approval of the New York senators. His selection of Mr. Root for the Cabinet, of Mr. Whitelaw Reid for the English ambassadorship, etc.—these appointments were made without regard to the wishes of the New York senators and even without consulting them. Other appointments within the State of New York have likewise been made upon the President's own initiative, and only now and then, and always in relation to minor things, have Messrs. Platt and Depew been consulted. It was much the same way during the McKinley administration. Mr. McKinley was more diplomatic and gracious in his methods than Mr. Roosevelt, but none the less he did as he pleased in most things where New York was concerned, notably in the appointment of Cornelius N. Bliss to the Cabinet, of General Horace Porter as ambassador to France, of General Stewart L. Woodford as ambassador to Spain, of Andrew D. White as ambassador to Germany, of Joseph H. Choate as ambassador to Great Britain, and of Elihu Root as Secretary of War. Most if not all of these capitol appointments were offensive to Senator Platt, each in turn being regarded as a blow to the party organization of which he was the head.

The situation was hardly more favorable to coöperation between the New York senators and the White House during the periods of Democratic control of the government. Evarts and Hitchcock, Republicans, were New York's senators during Cleveland's first term, and there was naturally enough no political coöperation between them and a Democratic President. During Cleveland's second term Hill and Murphy were the senators from New York, representing a wing of the Democratic party radically at odds with Mr. Cleveland's own faction. There was, of course, no sympathy and practically no coöperation. Indeed, the only period in recent years when New York's senators have had any serious consideration at the White House was that of the Harrison administration. Harrison was thoroughly schooled in the close corporation system of Indiana politics; furthermore, he was on excellent terms with the New York senators, seeking and following their counsel as he did that of senators from other States in relation to the important appointments.

Senator-to-be Root is very far from being a politician as that term is commonly used. Nevertheless, he has taken an active interest in politics for many years, and his long connection with executive service at Washington has instructed him as to the necessities of party organization, which can only be sustained by a judicious apportionment of the honors of political success. He has not been indifferent in recent years to circumstances and conditions as they affect the party, and he is not likely to be more so in the Senate than out of it. He will wish naturally and not improperly to hold the party organization in New York in support of his own courses and of those of the administration. Undoubtedly he will have the friendship of the President, with such powers as that may give him at his disposal, and there is further no doubt that he will employ these powers in accordance with his own notions of propriety and discretion.

It has been suggested that Mr. Roosevelt after his return from Africa may wish to have a hand in New York politics, and that he is likely to have enough influence with President Taft to secure his cooperation. This is looking a good way ahead. In the two years of Mr. Roosevelt's absence the relations between the New York Republican organization and the Taft administration will have become fixed in pursuance of definite plans not easily disturbed. Furthermore, it is by no means an assurance that the Taft administration will be in the mood to accept Mr. Roosevelt's suggestions. Nothing is more likely than that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft, long before the latter's term is ended, will elect to go different roads in politics. The two men, while sharing many ideas in common, are wide apart as the poles in temperament and methods. The people expect from President Taft an administration of the affairs of the government on lines very different from those pursued by Mr. Roosevelt, and we think he is not likely to disappoint them. In other words, we believe that Mr. Roosevelt needs hardly to be regarded as a factor in the coming administration.

Who Got the Money?

The dispute as to the Panama purchase money now being waged between the President on the one hand and the editors of the Indianapolis News, the New York World, and the New York Sun upon the other, can hardly remain in its present position. Charges of the gravest nature have been made, and the President has replied by a torrent of vituperation and by a number of tempestuous and ill-considered statements that were doubtless made in the best of faith, but that are demonstrably inaccurate at almost every point. Mr. Delevan Smith of Indianapolis, Mr. Laffan, and Mr. Pulitzer of New York are quick to see their advantage and perhaps also to resent a personal abuse of the most galling and intolerable description.

The charges are simple in their nature. They controvert the usually accepted belief that the United States bought the Panama Canal site and workings from the French government and that the $40,000,000 involved represented the purchase price in a straightforward buyer-and-seller transaction between the two governments. They assert, on the contrary, that certain highly placed American citizens acted as intermediaries between the American government and the French company, that these citizens acquired the Panama stock at bankrupt prices from its original French holders, thereby themselves becoming the Panama Company, and that they then sold the stock to the American government at immensely enhanced values and at a colossal profit to themselves. They contend that a control of the canal could have been bought by the United States government for about $4,000,000 from the bankrupt French company, but that instead of buying at the current market price of a few cents on the dollar the government officials allowed a few private citizens to acquire the property and then purchased it from them for $40,000,000. The obvious inference is, of course, that these favored persons acted in the light of exclusive information and that the eventual price of $40,000,000 was a matter of complicity between buyer and seller; in other words, that the American government, through negligence or connivance, was persuaded or coerced into paying $40,000,000 of public money for a property that could have been acquired for $4,000,000 and that this deal was arranged for the illicit enrichment of a certain number of privileged citizens. The names of Mr. Charles P. Taft and Mr. Douglas Robinson, the President's brother-in-law, have been mentioned as among the beneficiaries of the deal. Mr. Taft has denied all connection with it, and his denial is, of course, conclusive. Mr. Robinson refuses to make any statement at all.

We are, of course, by no means precluded from believing that the transaction, whatever it may have been, was entirely proper merely because the President has allowed himself to deviate into a series of tempestuous inaccuracies. The best of causes may be injured by its advocates, and it will be seen at once that the President's denials, regarded as evidence upon either side, are entirely valueless. He says, for example:

any American citizen. The government paid this $40,000,000 direct to the French government, getting the receipt of the liquidator appointed by the French government to receive the same.

Now it is an indisputable fact that the $40,000,000 was paid by check, not to the French government, but to J. P. Morgan & Co. as disbursing agents, and the check is on exhibition at the Treasury Department between pieces of glass so as to show front and back. Moreover, Mr. Cromwell testified to the same effect before the Senate committee, and he added the statement that he himself had distributed the larger part among the stockholders, but he absolutely refused to state who those stockholders were, although repeatedly urged to do so by the late Senator E. D. Morgan. Therein lies the whole crux of the question. Were these stockholders French or American? If any of them were American, how many of them, and what were their names? Upon what date did they become stockholders, and upon what terms? Did they constitute a syndicate that takes over the property of a bankrupt concern, thus creating a holding company on a recapitalization, keeping the majority control in a syndicate trusteeship?

The President, as though unaware of the vital importance of these questions, then goes on to say:

The United States government has not the slightest knowledge as to the particular individuals among whom the French government distributed the same.

Quite so, but if the government has not the "slightest knowledge" of the identity of the Panama stockholders, how can the President say with so much fury that none of them were Americans who had acquired their stock at bankrupt prices in order to sell it again to their own government under a recapitalization? That, after all, is just what the offending newspapers have said, and the President might as well have begun and ended his reply with that one statement that he had not the "slightest knowledge" of the facts under discussion. Instead of that he devotes two columns of small type to a feverish denunciation of his opponents with charges of deliberate falsehood in every paragraph and all of it upon a matter of which, by his own admission, he has not the "slightest knowledge."

It is unfortunate that the Senate committee did not dispose of this unpleasant question long ago. It would have done so had Senator Morgan lived and had it been possible to persuade the facts from Mr. Cromwell's exclusive keeping. Senator Millard was chairman of that committee, and he now says that the failure to ascertain the identity of the Panama stockholders was due to the action of Mr. Cromwell in blocking all efforts to obtain that information. Mr. Millard continues:

The French government had nothing to do with the sale of the canal property. About the only man who had anything to do with that, so far as our committee was able to find, was William Nelson Cromwell. We were never able to find the names of stockholders of the concern which he represented.

Every leading question we asked, which pointed toward the real men behind Cromwell, was met with a blank refusal to answer. Who they were we were never able to find out, although throughout the six weeks of that investigation that question was asked time after time.

I know the money was paid to J. P. Morgan & Co. instead of to the French government, as stated by Mr. Roosevelt. And I have reasons to believe that money was sent to France. But whether all, or any of it, found its way back to stockholders in this country, I can not say. But none of it was paid to the French government, so far as I know, and the French government did not have the distribution of it.

Why should there be any secrecy in such a matter? There is, of course, no necessary connection between secrecy and dishonor, nor would it be a crime to own stock in the French Panama Company. But the fact that there is secrecy, and obstinate secrecy, a secrecy avowed and contemptuously defended, inevitably suggests that the stock was acquired under some exclusive information or privileged facilities and that the resulting negotiations between the new Panama company and the government officials were not of a nature that would be improved by daylight. There seems, therefore, to be some justification for an unimpassioned demand on the part of the public to know to whom their money was paid. There is no need to assume the existence of a "scandal," but the readiest way to avoid suspicion or imputation is to raise the veil completely and to err, if at all, upon the side of publicity rather than that of reticence. The President's contention that the names of the stockholders can not be ascertained without an impossible demand upon the French government has been seen to be baseless, inasmuch as the French government had practically nothing to do with the matter. It is evident enough that the information is available in this country, seeing that Mr. Cromwell has virtually admitted that it is in his possession. Then why not make it known? Why not court publicity? However inconvenient the demand may be, there can be no possible question that the people who pay the money have a right to know its exact disposition, while a refusal to satisfy their demand will be attributed inevitably to evil motives. By all means let us know at once Who Got the Money.

Editorial Notes.

There has been a good deal of anxiety to know by what means President-elect Taft induced Timothy Woodruff to abandon his senatorial ambitions in favor of Mr. Root. All the public knows about it is that Mr. Woodruff had been active in his own behalf for several weeks and that he seemed to have a fair chance of success when he was summoned to Hot Springs for a conference and immediately thereafter announced his withdrawal from the senatorial race. It is argued, and not without reason when the character and political habits of Mr. Woodruff are considered, that all this did not happen without something substantial in the form of quid pro quo. Mr. Taft must have employed something besides mere hypnotism to induce Woodruff to abandon hopes which have long been cherished in the public eye. The first suggestion was that Woodruff would be given a Cabinet position; but this theory has found no support in subsequent developments. Possibly Mr. Taft promised Mr. Woodruff a foreign mission, a thing likely to appeal strongly to a man of active vanities and noted for his social aspirations, likewise a man with a rich wife. Whatever the fact may be, it has not yet developed. In the meantime Woodruff's political associates who had hoped for many advantages through his election to the senatorship are indignant with him for having, as they very pointedly intimate, knuckled under to the President-elect.

Among Mr. Taft's more particular admirers the quiet suppression of Tim Woodruff is remarked upon as illustrating exceptional powers of dealing with bothersome personal and political problems on the part of the President-elect. It is pointed out that while he does not make any exhibition of a big stick, and while he cracks no whips in public, he has a persistent fashion of getting precisely what he wants from all sorts and conditions of men. Besides disposing of Tim Woodruff and assuring the election of Mr. Root, he has apparently brought Speaker Cannon into line and reduced the most pronounced stand-patters to innocuous desuetude. The New York Evening Post, which can hardly be classed as a special admirer of Mr. Taft, commends him for quietly getting what he wants in the most cordial terms. "It is," remarks the Post, "the Hughes method of executive persuasion installing itself at Washington, to the relief of a nerve-racked people."

An interesting question has arisen in connection with the illness of Governor-elect Cosgrove of the State of Washington, due to be inaugurated on the eleventh of next month. For several weeks Mr. Cosgrove has been at Paso Robles Hot Springs in California under treatment for Bright's disease, and it is said that there is no prospect of his being able to return home for inauguration on the day constitutionally fixed. There is nothing either in the State constitution or in the statutes declaring where a governor may be inaugurated, and in view of this fact it is now proposed that a justice of the Supreme Court, several members of the legislature, and other State officials shall go to Paso Robles and there go through the ceremonies of inauguration. Former United States Senator Turner, a member of the convention which framed the State constitution and widely regarded as a profound lawyer, takes another view of the case. His position is that a governor can only be inaugurated in the State itself. The present governor, he argues, will continue to serve as a hold-over until Mr. Cosgrove shall be able to return to Washington and be duly inducted into office at the State capital. So far as anybody can recall, the incident is the first of its kind in the history of the country.

This incident recalls another similarly out of the ordinary connected with the territorial history of the present State of Washington. In the era which preceded the railroads in the Northwest there was but one practicable way of passing between the eastern and western sections of the State, there being only an Indian trail across the Cascade Mountains. Persons going from one section to another in either direction were compelled in the ordinary course of travel to pass out of the State to Portland, Oregon, and on to their destination. This made Portland in a practical sense the center of the Territory of Washington. Portland was the convenient point for political and other gatherings representative of the whole Territory and it was in fact the common practice for such gatherings to meet there actually if not nominally. The editor of the Argonaut well remembers a territorial Republican convention which met in 1878 in a public hall at Portland as a caucus, named committees, adopted a platform, and made nominations in due form. The following morning the delegates took a special boat to the town of Vancouver, on the Washington side of the Columbia river, six miles away, and in less than an hour went through formal procedures in ratification of what had actually been done at Portland the night before. With their work thus duly performed the delegates returned to Portland, where a grand banquet was held by way of putting the campaign on its feet in good shape. The "finish" of a political party responsible for this sort of procedure in these modern days might easily be prophesied.

At the age of eighty-one Lord Ripon has just retired from the British Cabinet, not because of infirmities, for, although past the more strenuous capabilities of life, he is still fairly active both mentally and physically, and wishes "a little time to himself before passing out of the world." Lord Ripon entered Parliament in 1852 and as a Cabinet official he dates back to the premiership of Lord Palmerston. He has never been what might be called a brilliant man, but he has been preëminently a safe one, and in one way or another his services have always been in demand by the British public. The wholesomeness of Lord Ripon's mind, his propensity for hard work, and his capacity for public usefulness—these qualities have had their foundation in prudent habits of life and in an unconquerable optimism of character. Lord Ripon was asked upon his retirement by an English editor to give a message to the younger men of the country. His reply was as follows:

That is rather a large order. But if I had to say anything, this is what I would say: In the governance of the world, as in all other affairs of life, accept no other guide than the voice of your own conscience. In dealing with the affairs of state, as in dealing with the affairs of your own private life, let your moral judgment be supreme. In the governing of countries, as in everything else, so rule that all those over whom you wield authority shall recognize that your first object is to make truth and justice prevail.

The Geneva Cassaro, in an article on the age of actors, says that, despite the work and excitement which go with the calling, actors do not grow old, and that at the age of sixty innumerable stage heroes still played the part and not upon the stage alone. "Florio Ande, for years Duse's leading man, is an old man," says the writer, "but to an audience he is still twenty-five. Reinach, Giraud, and Ferravilla are old men. The great stars of the Italian stage reach the highest age in their profession. Adelaide Tessaro was ninety when she died, and Adelaide Ristori was not so much younger. Tommaso Salvini will be eighty next January. Among the French and Germans, Got, Perrier, La Roche, and Dangeville were over eighty when they died. Dumesnil had celebrated her ninetieth birthday and Jeffroy and Hauteroche their ninety-first birthdays when they passed away. Dancourt was ninety-five, and Guerin, who married the widow of Molière, lived to be ninety-two. Fierville saw the curtain of his life descend after he had passed the century mark."

It is still possible to get a tasting order to the wine vaults of the London docks, and given a strong head the excursion is an interesting one. In the vaults their miles of casks symmetrically arranged are a wonderful sight, and the casks bear dates which make a connoisseur's eyes glow. The visitor is not a little puzzled and surprised on being provided with a tin oil lamp on the end of a stick, such as was in use 100 years ago. The vaults nowadays are sufficiently lit if not brilliantly lighted, and the purpose of the lamp, except as a survival of an old custom, is difficult to fathom. The explanation is simple. Careful tally is kept of the number of lamps, for a missing lamp means somebody lost in the vaults who must be sought for before the closing hour. There are worse places to be lost in.

The remuneration of physicians originally consisted in presents, but at the time of Hippocrates payment in money was already customary. Physicians received also public praise, the "crown of honor," the freedom of the city, the privilege of eating at the king's table. Physicians employed by the state received a yearly salary, as high as $2000 in some instances. Rich people would pay enormous sums for a successful treatment, and a case is recorded in which $200,000 was paid.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The choice of Mr. Root for the New York representation in the United States Senate has been received with general approbation as reinforcing that body with a measurable quantity of intellectual vigor. But there is another aspect of the matter that has not gone wholly without comment, and that is the influence of Mr. Taft as a determining factor in the selection. The comment is kindly, but it is none the less emphatically pointed out that we have here one more example of executive interference to which the political life of the country in its earlier stages was wholly unaccustomed, but that has now become a commonplace.

Mr. Taft's action, while admirably suave and unprovocative, is cited as a continuation of Mr. Roosevelt's methods. A correspondent of the New York Evening Post says:

It has been the fashion for the President's apologists to say that it was merely "his way," his "temperament"—to accomplish, we will say, a laudable result by wholly unlawful means. Those croakers who expressed fears lest executive aggression and personal government become the rule, and not the exception by the mere good-natured acceptance of single instances, were told that with Roosevelt gone the return to constitutional forms would be easy, and of course. One of the strongest arguments advanced in Mr. Taft's behalf before the election was that he was a man who, in training, temperament, and mental habit, was the antithesis of Mr. Roosevelt, one who could surely be counted upon to observe with strictness the constitutional limitations of his office.

While it would be too soon to say that these comfortable foreshadowings have been falsified, there is certainly no evidence that confirms them. Mr. Taft has "no more compunction or hesitation about overstepping the limits of his office" than had Mr. Roosevelt, and while the suaviter in modo acts as a pleasant lubricant to the encroachment, the fortiter in re is no less in evidence than heretofore. We have had seven years of "unconstitutional executive domination." Mr. Taft has been "corrupted" by it. So has Mr. Root with his "gentleman's agreement" with Japan, while the public has become placidly indifferent to the whole thing. But then the public is always placidly indifferent to anything that has no immediate and evident bearing upon the "dinner pail," as that useful implement finds its expression in our various social strata.

Reports from Washington suggest that the President is ready with the soft answer that turneth away wrath when confronted with the action of Congress in the secret service matter. This seems almost too good to be true, and in the meantime there is an uneasy stirring of the national conscience that for the first time recognizes the firm establishment of a spy system that is repugnant to the historic national sentiment.

Representative Samuel W. McCall of Massachusetts recently epitomized the situation in a public speech:

We are all to be regulated in our business and modes of life by gentlemen sent out from Washington, and the gentlemen sent out from Washington are to be regulated by one man in the White House. To show the extent to which this national detective system has grown, Congress at its last session appropriated about nine millions of dollars to inspect various kinds of business, or more than five times the amount appropriated for similar purposes ten years ago. And there are still proposals for further increases of the system, and the end is not yet.

This speech was delivered before the issue of the presidential message that has brought the evil to a focus. Referring specifically to the message, the Baltimore Sun says: "So far as we can recall, the reflection upon the honor of the Congress contained in the President's late message is without precedent." Quoting the terms of the message, the Sun continues:

If a more insulting form of words could have been devised for use in a message to Congress, we are ignorant as to how it could be done. The plain and unvarnished meaning of the President's words seems to be that there are criminals in Congress, that the chief reason for the enactment of the law was for the protection of criminal congressmen, and that Congress as a whole was influenced by this argument to protect crime.

The Pittsburg Post follows in the same vein. "It is not a question," says the Post, "whether congressmen have so far demeaned themselves as to require supervision by government sleuths":

The squabble must have its issue between the President and the coordinate branch of the government which he has attacked. The point that stands out most boldly is the manner adopted by the occupant of the White House in bringing the matter to the fore. He went way round the block to unload a stinging rebuke, and in his rôle of universal reformer offered a cynical insult that no self-respecting body of men would pass over. He has kicked an iron dog to see if it was iron, when he might have satisfied himself by whistling to it.

The New York World hopes that there will be no surrender on the part of Congress, inasmuch as surrender would be confession:

Congress would reduce itself to the degraded status of wretched creatures in the toils of a Tammany police system. If it intends to yield to Mr. Roosevelt's threats, Congress might far better abdicate than to continue the pusillanimous pretense of being an independent branch of a free government and the representatives of a free people.

The Brooklyn Eagle waxes ironical over the situation and implores Congress not to be unduly sensitive. If it has to suffer it will do so in good company:

It was not singled out for attack or for insult. It shares the fate of many. It shares the fate of the judge who is not a philosopher, and of every other man in the country whose views are not identical with those of the President. To differ from him is to be blind or cunning, or law-defying, or a wrongdoer, or a swindler, or a bribe-taker, or a bribe-giver, or wrong-headed, or a traitor. To see things not as the President sees them is to be either a knave or a fool, with more than a mere possibility of being both.

Never before has there been a greater outpouring of the journalistic spirit than has been caused by the attack upon the Panama purchase procedure. The consternation of the press is aroused as much by the intemperate language used upon both sides as by the magnitude of the charges that have been brought. The Springfield Republican, for example, deprecates the "amused tolerance" with which the public views the open bandying of charges of deliberate falsehood between the President and his opponents. The Troy Press sees further evidence of its contention that Panama "will blast more reputations than it makes." The Lowell Courier-Citizen, while believing that the whole thing is a mare's nest, says "turn on all the light and let the matter be known exactly as it is." The Omaha World-Herald says that the President "has chosen to discuss the topic in the language of the slums and with the attitude of the bully," and now nothing can postpone the whole truth. The Memphis Commercial Appeal wants to know "who did get the money anyway." The Rockford Star suggests the presence of an "Ethiopian under the woodpile" and advocates the use of smoke for his discovery. The Saratoga Sun believes it to be possible that "Mr. Roosevelt is perfectly honest when he lies and thinks he is speaking the unsullied truth when he is traversing the records with the daring grace of an irresponsible pettifogger." The Wilmington Evening demands that William Nelson Cromwell, the man who "knows it all," should be forced to testify. The Milwaukee News asks for an investigation to determine "not only what became of the $40,000,000, but when, where, and by whom the conspiracy was hatched to dig up the French Panama skeleton and vitalize it with the millions wrung from the American people." The Troy Press deprecates the whole "sickening scandal" and considers that the outcome will be anything but pleasing to the President. The Jamestown Post says "the people want to know the facts." The Pittsburg Dispatch says that Cromwell's evidence, such as it was, leaves the President in an uncomfortable position. The Cleveland Plain Dealer is willing to excuse the President on the ground that he "does not know what he is talking about." The Middletown Argus asks who made the "dicker" and who pocketed the "diff." It adds "let Congress investigate." The Waterville Sentinel says the demand for an investigation "can not be repudiated by the President." The Richmond News Letter deprecates that the President "seems to be unable to learn any sense in some matters or to absorb any idea of good taste and his responsibility to the public." The Raleigh News and Observer thinks it better to belong to the Ananias Club than to "crawl on their bellies before the great Ego." The Louisville Courier-Journal says the story is "very ugly reading." The least of its incidents is something "worse than unsavory." But the Courier-Journal is not hopeful of results. "Theirs was a blind pool, with headquarters in France, and they got completely away with the swag. The bucket-shops of Paris tell no tales. The lobby at Washington keeps no books. And Morgan of Alabama is dead, well-a-day!" And so on all along the line and from all parts of the country. Scores of newspapers might be quoted to like effect and newspapers of all shades of political opinion. They are unanimous in their demand for investigation.

Westminster College, at Fulton, Missouri, has shown commendable firmness in handling the hazing evil. One of the chief reasons for the tolerance of hazing, rowdy class fights, and other evils that have become associated with college and university life, is that most institutions have a severe struggle to keep their heads above water financially. They can not afford the loss of revenue that might result from wholesale dismissals or defection of students in an effort to maintain better control and discipline. Such a college as this is Westminster, yet it did not hesitate to dismiss eight students for hazing, and it stood fast when the student body practically went on a strike in sympathy with their dismissed associates. The outcome is that the student body has agreed to abolish hazing and the college has taken back the dismissed students with this pledge. Westminster has shown what college authorities can do to reform abuses if they only have backbone and appreciate their responsibilities.

Mount McCulloch, a peak 300 feet high west of Unalaska, has dropped into the sea following a volcanic eruption, according to information brought to this city by the revenue cutter McCulloch. Officers of the government vessel say that instead of the mountain there is now a landlocked bay three miles wide, into which the cutter sailed, and in which she made soundings. The water showed a depth of from eight fathoms at the edges to twenty-five fathoms in the centre. Mount McCulloch was first seen a year ago, when the cutter after which it is named arrived off the coast.

Turkey is fighting Austria in the most modern way by waging a trade war in the form of a vigorous boycott of Austrian goods. Many demonstrations have taken place in Constantinople, and shops have been threatened with wreckage unless their owners give up the selling of articles imported from Austria. One of the most curious signs of this trade war has been the discarding of the red fez by many Turks. This particular fez is made in Austria, and the patriotic Turk has substituted for it the home-made white fez.

There has been an offer of many thousand dollars, standing for over a hundred and fifty years, in the name of a great company in London, for anything that will dissolve fogs by the penetration of a created light. The money has never been earned by any inventor yet. Fog still persists, increasing the tax of commerce in proportion as the volume of commerce multiplies. The man who can clear the ship channel of New York harbor from fog, even for a few hours at a time, will be hailed as the wonder of the age.

THE AMBASSADOR AND THE DANCER.

A Chancery Suit Promises an Interesting Disclosure of Lord Sackville's Domestic Life.

An application has just been made to Mr. Justice Eve, sitting in the chancery division, that promises to develop into one of the sensational causes of the day. It will certainly be watched with interest in America, seeing that it hinges upon the private life of Baron Sackville, who died a few months ago at the age of eighty-one after spending forty-one years in the diplomatic service, his last appointment being as minister plenipotentiary to the United States. It is, in other words, that same Lord Sackville whose interference in a presidential election extinguished forever his diplomatic career. Lord Sackville died in possession of Knole House, one of the most famous mansions in England, not only full of priceless treasures of art but surrounded by a park of 1000 acres.

The application to the judge in chancery is of a routine nature. It merely foreshadows a contested succession and asks for an order protecting tenants in the payment of their rents. But enough of the story had to be told to show the sensational nature of the dispute and the delicate matters of domestic life that were involved.

Upon the death of Lord Sackville the property passed into the hands of his apparent heir, Mr. Edward Lionel Sackville-West, who is the son of Lord Sackville's younger brother, forty-one years of age, and a major in the West Kent Imperial Yeomanry. There was no apparent obstacle in the way of the succession until the filing of the present claim originating with Mr. Ernest Henry Jean Baptiste West, who asserts that he is the legitimate son of Lord Sackville by a secret marriage, his mother having been Josephine Durian de Ortega, a beautiful Spanish dancer who died many years ago. The sole question awaiting determination is the legitimacy of the Spanish woman's son. That Lord Sackville was his father there can be no question, but it is open to doubt whether he actually married the beauty who won his heart and with whom he lived.

The opposing batteries were not, of course, fully unmasked at this preliminary application, but sufficient evidence was offered to show the bona fides of the dispute. It was shown that the claimant was born at Arcachon, in the Gironde, and that his godparents were the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha and the Countess De Dion. The baptismal certificate describes the father as the Hon. Lionel Sackville-West and the mother as Josefa de Ortega. This, of course, is not positive evidence of legitimacy, although it is hardly likely that a brother of the prince consort would stand as religious sponsor to a child whose birth was in any way irregular. Then came the fact that the claimant's mother died in 1871 and in the register of deaths she was described as the wife of Lionel Sackville-West, although the registration was not made by Lord Sackville himself and was not therefore in the nature of an admission.

But soon after Josephine's death the following announcement appeared in the public press: "Lionel de Sackville-West, first secretary of the British embassy at Paris, and minister plenipotentiary par interim, begs his friends and acquaintances to assist in one of the masses held in the Church of Notre Dame on March 21 for the repose of the soul of Josephine Countess de Sackville-West, his wife."

This seems to prove the fact that Josephine was Lord Sackville's wife, although we must still ask if she was his wife when the present claimant was born. He certainly recognized his moral responsibilities toward the claimant, seeing that he sent him to school in France and later on to Stonyhurst College, where he entered him as his son. So far there seems to be no actual evidence that the claimant was born in wedlock and the contention that he was not so born is supported by the fact that Lord Sackville had declared over and over again and under his own hand that he had no legitimate children. There is also the fact that the claimant, when in South Africa, had been told that he was illegitimate and believed himself to be so, and that on the date of his sister's marriage he wrote to her and said that both she and he were illegitimate.

That Lord Sackville did live with Josephine for some time before the marriage—if there was a marriage—and that children were born under those circumstances was made clear enough. There were at least four of these irregular births before we come to Amelia, who was born in 1868, that is to say, one year before the present claimant. Amelia was registered by the father himself as the legitimate daughter of himself and his wife. Her godparents were Prince and Princess Adalbert of Bavaria and the Infanta of Spain was present. In August of the same year Lord Sackville executed a deed of gift to "my wife" and in an action brought by the midwife Lord Sackville gave a power of attorney for the defense of the case on behalf of himself and "my wife." Now if Amelia was legitimate, then the present claimant, who was born a year later, must be also legitimate, and, as has been already pointed out, the exalted people present at the two ceremonies must have been satisfied that everything was as it should be, and it may be said that royalty as a rule is amply protected against such a faux pas as would be the recognition of an illegitimate child. On the other hand the evidence that any marriage at all occurred is inferential. There is no record of such a ceremony, although a careful search has been made.

The case will of course come to extended trial in due time. The advantage is all on the side of the present holder of the estate, Lord Sackville's nephew, and very positive proof will be required to dispossess him. It is evidently by Lord Sackville's own wish that he has inherited, seeing that he was living with his uncle at the time of the latter's death and that the present claimant made a personal application to Lord Sackville for recognition and was refused. The case will certainly be an interesting one when it appears for final determination.

OLD FAVORITES.

Under the Holly Bough.

Ye who have scorned each other
Or injured friend or brother
In this fast fading year,
Ye who by word or deed
Have made a kind heart bleed,
Come gather here!
Let sinned against, the sinning,
Forget their strife's beginning
And join in friendship now.
Be links no longer broken,
Be sweet forgiveness spoken
Under the holly-bough.

Ye who have loved each other,
Sister and friend and brother,
In this fast fading year;
Mother and sire and child,
Young man and maiden mild,
Come gather here!
And let your hearts grow fonder
As memory shall ponder
Each past unbroken vow.
Old loves and younger wooing
Are sweet in the renewing
Under the holly-bough.

Ye with o'erburdened mind
Made alien from your kind,
Come gather here!
Let not the useless sorrow
Pursue you night and morrow,
If e'er you hoped, hope now.
Take heart—uncloud your faces,
And join in our embraces,
Under the holly-bough.

—Charles Mackay.

If We Had the Time.

If I had the time to find a place,
And sit me down full face to face
With my better self, that can not show
In my daily life that rushes so,
It might be then I would see my soul
Was stumbling still toward the shining goal,
I might be moved by the thought sublime—
If I had the time!

If I had the time to let my heart
Speak out and take in my life a part,
To look about and to stretch a hand
To a comrade quartered in no-luck land,
O God! if I might but just sit still
And bear the note of the whip-poor-will,
I think that my wish with God's would rhyme,
If I had the time!

If I had the time to learn from you
How much for comfort my word could do,
And I told you then of my sudden will,
To kiss your feet when I did you ill!
If the tears aback of the coldness feigned
Could flow, and the wrong be quite explained—
Brothers, the souls of us all would chime
If we had the time! —Richard Burton.

I Heard a Soldier.

I heard a soldier sing some trifle
Out in the sun-dried veldt alone:
He lay and cleaned his grimy rifle
Idly, behind a stone.

"If after death, love, comes a waking,
And in their camp so dark and still
The men of dust hear bugles, breaking
Their halt upon the hill.

"To me the slow and silver pealing
That then the last high trumpet pours
Shall softer than the dawn come stealing,
For, with its call, comes yours!"

What grief of love had he to stifle,
Basking so idly by his stone,
That grimy soldier with his rifle
Out in the veldt alone?
—Herbert French, in "Apollo and the Seaman."

Opportunity.

They do me wrong who say I come no more
When once I knock and fail to find you in;
For every day I stand outside your door
And bid you wake, and rise to fight and win.

Wail not for precious chances passed away,
Weep not for golden ages on the wane!
Each night I burn the records of the day—
At sunrise every soul is born again!

Dost thou behold thy lost youth all aghast?
Dost reel from righteous Retribution's blow?
Then turn from blotted archives of the past
And find the future's pages white as snow.

Art thou a mourner? Rouse thee from thy spell;
Art thou a sinner? Sins may be forgiven;
Each morning gives thee wings to flee from hell,
Each night a star to guide thy feet to heaven.

Laugh like a boy at splendors that have sped,
To vanished joys be blind and deaf and dumb;
My judgments seal the dead past with its dead,
But never bind a moment yet to come.

Though deep in mire, wring not your hands and weep;
I lend my arm to all who say "I can!"
No shame-faced outcast ever sank so deep
But yet might rise and be again a man!
—Walter Malon.

The bark Dec, from Talcahuano, Chili, on arrival at Queenstown reported that off the coast of Patagonia on September 4 not less than 100 icebergs were seen, one fifty miles long and 200 to 250 feet high.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

President Roosevelt has accepted the invitation of the president of the Royal Geographical Society to deliver an address before the society on his visit to London about April, 1910.

Governor Folk has decided that under the Missouri statute the entire electoral vote of the State should be counted for Taft, notwithstanding one Bryan district elector ran ahead of one of the Republican electors-at-large.

According to the governor of Porto Rico, the island has had the most prosperous year in its history. But the late elections there show that this had no effect in reconciling the people to the American government imposed upon them.

Judge A. Heaton Robertson has certified that he spent over $33,000 to be defeated as the Democratic candidate for governor of Connecticut. George L. Lilley, the Republican candidate, reported his expenses as $23,375. The salary of a governor is $4000 a year.

From many parts of Indiana demands have come since the recent election for a reorganization based on the leadership of Senator Beveridge, and it is understood that Mr. Fairbanks will acquiesce in it and make no contest for the control of the next State committee.

Richard J. Higgins, Democrat, elected judge of the Court of Common Pleas in Wyandotte County, Kansas, is probably the youngest member of the judiciary in the United States. He was born in Kansas City May 14, 1883. He graduated in law from the University of Kansas in 1903.

George R. Sheldon, treasurer of the Republican National Committee, has published a report showing that contributions to the Republican national campaign fund amounted to $1,655,518.27. There were 12,330 subscribers. The list of those who gave $500 and more fills two long columns.

Dr. Carlos Finley, one of the best known physicians in Cuba, has been appointed by Governor Magoon honorary chief of the national department of sanitation in recognition of his service in the discovery of the mosquito theory of yellow fever. The appointment is for life and carries with it a salary of $2500 per annum.

Representative Henry Barnhart of the Thirtieth Indiana District took his seat in Congress this month. Mr. Barnhart succeeds Representative Brick, who died in April. Mr. Barnhart's commission and salary will be retroactive. A congressman's pay amounts to $625 per month, and Representative Barnhart's pay for the seven months he did not serve, but for which he will be paid, amounts to $4375.

President Roosevelt has appointed Rufus Thayer of the District of Columbia as judge of the United States Court at Shanghai, China, succeeding Judge Lebbeus I. Wilfley, resigned. Judge Wilfley was for a long time under serious charges brought by Americans in Shanghai, but careful examination of these charges by the State Department and Congress resulted in his exoneration. His resignation at this time is understood to be voluntary.

United States Senator Stone recently went home to Missouri and announced that he had come to prevent the Republican majority in Missouri's house of representatives from deciding eight Republican contests for seats in that body in favor of the contestants, which would elect a Republican to his seat. Governor-elect Hadley, who is a Republican, declared himself ready to exert all his official influence to seat Democrats honestly elected.

Champ Clark, who succeeds John Sharp Williams as leader of the Democrats in the House of Representatives, is fifty-eight years old and was born in Kentucky. He is a tall, handsome man, with square shoulders and a big, deep chest. He takes up three or four aisles and most of the space in the well of the House when he makes a speech. When he is through he is blowing like a porpoise and mopping his bald head with a red-bordered handkerchief.

John D. Pringle, editor of the Labor World, has been appointed appraiser of customs at Pittsburg. The Labor World was one of the first labor papers to repudiate Gompers and declare for Taft. Samuel B. Donnelly of New York, another labor leader who supported Taft, has been made public printer, and Daniel J. Keefe of Detroit, one of the vice-presidents of the American Federation of Labor, who advocated Taft's election in spite of Gompers, has been appointed commissioner-general of immigration.

As Truman H. Newberry takes up the duties of Secretary of the Navy, Colonel Herbert L. Satterlee steps into the shoes of Mr. Newberry as assistant secretary of the navy. Colonel Satterlee is a member of a prominent law firm in New York, but is far more widely known through his marriage to Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan's eldest daughter, Louise. The wedding, which took place November 15, 1900, was one of the most brilliant and costly affairs that ever took place in New York City. It is estimated that more than half a million dollars was spent in preparation for the wedding. Mrs. Satterlee traveled a great deal during her girlhood, visiting kings and queens of Europe and being received at court many times.

THE JUSTICE OF GOLD GULCH.

By Jerome A. Hart.

XLV.

Early as was the hour set for the Vigilante tribunal, it found all the members already assembled, and listening attentively to the words of the judge.

"We should hear soon from Yarrow, the prisoner's counsel, if he expects to save his man," he began. "This is the day to which we reprieved the prisoner, and the time will soon be past."

"Yarrow's here already—ben a-waitin' for some time, he says," replied one of the Vigilante court. "He's got a gal with him—mighty fine-lookin' gal. Dunno who she is."

"Mebbe she's the witness the other young feller needs so bad," commented another.

Yarrow had indeed been in attendance ever since the arrival of Diana, for whose coming he had waited with sleepless vigilance throughout the night. His implicit faith that she would come had greatly moved her. He had hurried her off at once to the Vigilantes' headquarters, and as soon as he was admitted before the tribunal he told the judge that he had a witness who could clear Alden beyond the shadow of a doubt. "Then bring in your witness," ordered the judge, and Yarrow withdrew to call Diana.

"Returning to what we were talking about," went on the judge, "I fixed this early hour so that the sentence may be carried out decently and in order. Our last execution was seriously interfered with, I am sorry to say, by the regular authorities, abetted by a number of strangers who happened to be in the town. Of course we carried out our sentence, but it was only after great disorder, and some shooting, in which a couple of strangers were killed. This is much to be regretted. While orderly executions by popular tribunals are all right, these riotous shooting scrapes are greatly to be deplored."

"Don't you think, jedge," here interrupted one of his colleagues, "that we stand some chanst for another mix-up if we hang this young feller right here in the town?"

"That's right," added another. "Town's full of tenderfeet jest now, and they're all talkin' agin Six Hundred and One."

"I have provided for that," the judge said calmly. "If the prisoner fails to clear himself within the next hour, we will take him out on the desert, and execute him there."

"But how kin we string him up out there? There aint no trees there, nor nothing else that you kin make handy for hangin' a man," again objected the far-sighted colleague.

"That has all been arranged. Strang is on his way out there now, and will wait for us. I don't know what sort of a contrivance he has got, but he assures me that it will work. We are to ride out with the prisoner, and meet Strang by the big bed of red granite outcroppings, about two miles from town. But here comes the prisoner's counsel, with his witness. Let the prisoner be brought in also."

As Diana entered, attended by Yarrow, the members of the Vigilante tribunal gazed at her with surprise. Her dark garments, her hair, her very eyebrows, were covered with the ashen-gray dust of the desert. It gave her a look of premature age—or rather the appearance of a youthful person who had suddenly taken on gray hairs. But the factitious appearance of age was belied by her color—for her great fatigue had not blanched her face—her cheeks were burning and her eyes were sparkling with fever. There were lines around her lips and heavy shadows under her eyes, but worn as she was with fatigue and grief, she was still strikingly beautiful. Involuntarily the Vigilantes took off their hats, ceased to sprawl, and put their feet on the floor.

As she took the chair which Yarrow gave her, and seated herself in silence, the door opened again, and Alden entered, accompanied by a guard. As their eyes met he turned pale and Diana started to her feet. But Yarrow's friendly hand was placed on her shoulder, and as he whispered in her ear she sank into her chair again. A shudder ran through her when Alden took his place, for he was carrying in his hand a light logging-chain which was attached to his ankles, and which, when he seated himself, he let fall with a clank on the floor. But again, under the kindly encouragement of Yarrow, she composed herself, as she was called upon to testify.

The judge began with the usual questions as to her name and residence, and then asked:

"Do you know this prisoner?"

"Yes."

"What is his name?"

"Arthur Alden."

"It is in evidence here that his true name is Burdew, and he is accused of murdering one Stewart on the night of February 22 at Treasure Hill."

"His name is not Burdew, it is Alden. On the night of February 22 he was not at Treasure Hill."

"Where was he on that night?"

"He was with me at—that is, near the Rancho Plancha Grande."

"If he was at that rancho there must be others who can corroborate your testimony?"

"No—there is no one."

"But are there not many people living at that rancho?"

"I did not say he was at, but near the Rancho."

"Where was he exactly, then?"

She paused, but answered: "At a sheep-herder's hut some miles from the Hacienda."

"And you were with him?"

"Yes."

"There was no one else there?"

"No one else."

"Did he spend the whole night there?"

"Yes."

"And you two were alone together?"

There was a long pause, and then came the scarcely audible answer:

"Yes."

Here Alden could contain himself no longer. "Let me explain," he cried excitedly, "we were cut off by a flood, and—"

"Let the prisoner be silent, or he will be removed," said the judge, sternly. "The witness must not be interrupted or prompted in any way."

The judge turned and conferred briefly with his colleagues. Then he continued his interrogation:

"Are you this man's wife?"

"No."

"Are you his promised wife?"

Here for the first time in her ordeal Diana looked up. Yarrow's burning eyes, Alden's haggard eyes, were fixed upon her. Her own glance was lowered again.

"You say you are not this man's wife. I ask you, are you his promised wife?"

"No."

"You are not related to him?"

"No."

"You hear," said the judge, turning to his colleagues.

"This young lady testifies that the prisoner was with her on the night of February 22—the whole night—alone—at Plancha Grande, which is sixty miles distant from Treasure Hill. She testifies that they were alone together, in a sheep-herder's hut; yet also testifies that she is not his wife, and is not engaged to him or related to him. If you have faith in her testimony you doubt her character; if you have faith in her character, you doubt her testimony."

"Say, jedge," interrupted one of the bench, "accordin' to law, a wife can't testify in a case where her husband is mixed up. Perhaps this lady is hidin' the fact that she's married to the prisoner, because if she aint, then, by the Lord, she oughter be! Ha! ha! ha! She had oughter! Ha! ha! ha! She had oughter!" And he garnished his jest with loud belows of laughter.

"Order in the court!" cried the judge, sharply.

There came the clank of chains from Alden's place, as he rose indignantly and made a step forward. But his guard checked him.

"Guard, remove the prisoner," ordered the judge. When the door had closed behind Alden he said:

"We have no right to pick and choose in the witness's testimony. Either we will assume that it is all false or all true. If the witness, in order to establish an alibi for the prisoner, testifies to facts which will blast her reputation, she must have some powerful motive. If, not being the prisoner's wife, she was his promised wife, that would be a powerful motive. But according to her testimony, as given here, there is no apparent motive for submitting to such mortification as few women would care to undergo. Therefore, all we can do is to weigh her testimony in the balance with the evidence already given against the prisoner."

Here the judges began a whispered colloquy, and Diana looked up, with uncomprehending eyes, brimming over with tears. What could it mean? Did they not believe her? Had this shame, this humiliation, been put upon her for nothing? Were these men deaf to the voice of truth? Were they still bent on condemning an innocent man to a shameful death?

The judge, his whispered conference over, turned to Yarrow and said: "You may take away the witness, and return at once. The judgment of the court will be delivered speedily. You and the prisoner must be present, but not the witness."

Half dead with fatigue, stunned by the way the Vigilante committee received her testimony, Diana suffered Eugene to leave her at the forlorn hotel, while he hastened back to watch over the fate of the hapless Arthur.

When he arrived at the Vigilante headquarters, where he had left his horse in charge of a man, he found a number of other saddle animals there. The Vigilante judges, the guards, and Alden had just appeared in the street, and were preparing to mount. Surprised, Yarrow asked some questions, but was curtly told to mount his horse and accompany them. He was not permitted to converse with Alden, who rode between two armed guards. The chain had been taken from his ankles, but a lariat ran from his horse's hackamore to the saddle pommel of one of the guards. Thus his escape was almost impossible, although the fact that he was a prisoner was not readily apparent to the passers-by. But few were met in the street, which was almost deserted, for it was still very early.

The little troop of men rode out of the town toward the desert. All were silent. The Vigilante judges uttered no word as to their decision. Alden's guards were equally dumb. Yarrow wondered what this strange silence meant. Why had not the tribunal rendered its decision? Why were they going out into the desert? Did it mean banishment? That must be the solution of the enigma, for the first threat Alden had received was an order to leave the town. Now they were going to take him out into the desert, and warn him not to return under penalty of death. That was a frequent procedure of the Mountain Vigilantes, Eugene reflected, with a sense of relief.

The sun was rising. The slender cactus spears were projecting their long morning shadows. As he gazed to the westward out over the desert through the maze of up-pointing spikes, Eugene's eye was suddenly arrested by a taller spear among the cactus. A horseman was ahead of them, gazing intently toward the town. At his side, rising high above his head, was a long lance-like object, apparently attached to his stirrup. Seen at a distance, he looked like a lancer or a mounted color-bearer. Standing near a bed of granite crags, the horseman seemed as if he were waiting for some one.

The oddly equipped rider was noted by the others at the same time, and the Vigilantes held a colloquy in an undertone. As they rapidly approached, the stranger appeared to recognize them, and putting spurs to his horse, hastened forward to meet them. As he drew near, Yarrow saw he was a tallow-skinned man with a brutal face, and small evil eyes. He was mounted on a powerful sorrel, with a handsome saddle and trappings. A pistol-holster was strapped to the tapadero of his stirrup; out of this rose the curious object which at a distance made him look like a lancer. It was a fascis made of three light poles or rods bound together with rawhide thongs. What it was intended for, Yarrow could not guess.

"Mornin', jedge! Mornin', gentlemen!" was the salutation of the new arrival. "Wall, I see you got your man town' on a lariat. You'd oughter strapped him to his horse—he might 'a' got away."

"The guards have him well in hand," replied the judge briefly. "We did not wish to attract attention in the town. That's why we're doing the business out here. But are you ready for us, Strang? I see no preparations."

"Won't take more'n a minute, jedge, soon's I git at it. This is Vigilante business brought down to a fine point, sure." And quickly dismounting, he slipped a hobble over his horse's fetlocks, and set to work.

What did all this mean? Yarrow was lost in wonder. Surely they could not intend to hang Alden—out on this treeless plain there was no way of hanging him. If they meant to shoot him, why come so far, and why meet this man Strang? Yarrow looked at Alden, to see if the mystery was any clearer to him. Alden's eyes were fixed on Strang, and in his glance Yarrow saw a mixture of anger, terror, and loathing. But the predominant element in Alden's look was terror—mortal terror.

Strang had unbound the thongs from one end of his fascis, and spreading out the three rods into a wide base, he thus made a tripod, the legs of which he set in the sand. To the top—which was still firmly bound together by thongs—he suspended a short piece of lariat already made into a hangman's noose. When he had tested the tripod's solidity by hanging from the noose with both hands, and jerking it in various ways as if to imitate death-struggles, he said with an unpleasant smile:

"Well, jedge, I reckon the apparatus is all ready, if your man is."

"You don't mean to say that you can hang a man on a gimcrack cage like that, do you?" cried the judge, his scornful laughter echoed by the other Vigilantes.

"That's jest what I mean!" retorted Strang, nettled by their sneers.

"How you goin' to hang him?" queried one of them. "Why, you aint got no fall!"

"Don't need none!" cried Strang, angered at the sneering laughter. "Look here—all you got to do is to make your man get under and put his head in the noose. Then—see here?—you jest move the legs of the tripod closer together. That lifts your man off'n the ground a few inches, but that's plenty. You don't need no fall. You kin hang a man as easy with his feet just two inches off'n the ground as two yards."

Filled with horror at the cold-blooded words, Yarrow looked around to see if Alden heard them. Alden had dismounted, and was with his guards some little distance away, but from his face it was plain that he had heard. Yarrow raged inwardly as he realized that they were entirely at the mercy of this small group of iron men; a fickle mob might be moved; in a town some unforeseen event might lead to a postponement or a rescue. But out here on the lonely desert there was no hope.

Still he determined to make a last appeal to the justice of the Vigilantes, for his friend was innocent; and, failing in that, to their pity, if they ever felt it. Before he could speak, there came again the sound of Strang's brutal voice:

"But there aint no use talkin' when we've come for a hangin'. Better hurry up and get through. Might be somebody'll come along and interfere. Might be somebody might stop this picnic and try to hang us. Ha! ha! ha!"

His croaking laughter had no echo. He stopped and raised his voice:

"Now, mister," he shouted, addressing Alden, "if you'll jest kindly step this way and git under here, we'll fix you in a minute."

There was no answer in words, but Alden and his guards advanced toward the tripod. The other Vigilantes closed up around them. About the instrument of death was a compact circle of men.

Strang looked at Alden with the same evil smile.

"Now, judge," he said, "jest tell your man to git under."

"Get under!" came the answer. It was the judge who spoke. His quiet order acted as a signal. Like lightning the two guards strapped Strang's arms to his sides with his belt.

"Take away his pistol, boys—he might break loose," counseled one of the Vigilantes.

"Get under!" came the same quiet command.

For some moments the wretch was dumb with surprise and terror. When he recovered his speech he shrieked out his entreaties for his life:

"For God's sake, boys, don't kill me! Le' me go this time!"

"Get under!"

"But I'm not fit to die. Oh, Christ, boys, I'm not fit to die!" he wailed.

"Get under!"

Shrieks, oaths, and prayers poured from his trembling lips. His yellow face, writhing with terror, was beaded with sweat. Under the straps which bound his arms, his claw-like hands clutched ever at the air. The dull blue muzzles of the revolvers which encircled him he did not, perhaps, fear so much as his own terrible tripod, for they bore only a bullet with its merciful quick death, while the tripod meant the horrors of slow strangling. But as he still refused, they beat him with their revolver barrels—beat him, brutally—beat him on the head—until, blinded by blood, he yielded to the instinctive shrinking of the flesh from pain. Standing under the tripod, his legs were strapped and his head placed in the slim lariat noose. At a sign from the judge the Vigilantes pressed closer together the rods of the tripod. The base contracted—the top slowly rose. Choking, gasping, screaming shrilly like a woman, the wretch slowly drew up his legs once—twice—thrice—then they relaxed, and his body grew limp. It was the end of Strang.

More than once had Yarrow seen men done to death by hanging—sometimes by Vigilantes, sometimes by the law. But never had he seen anything to equal in horror this hideous scene. Averting his eyes from the tripod with its grisly burden, he turned to speak to Alden. The unfortunate young man had borne himself with fair composure until now, but at last he had given way. Human nature could stand no more. The thought that he had barely escaped a hideous end—how or why he scarcely understood—the doubt whether he was yet safe—the sight of the awful paroxysms of the dying wretch—the image of himself under that instrument of death—all these things conspired to attack the fortitude with which he had borne himself. When Yarrow spoke to him, he saw that Alden's knees were giving way beneath him, and he made haste to support him lest he should fall. After some minutes Alden recovered himself slightly, but he was still as weak as water and it was with difficulty that he was lifted on his horse.

Once or twice Yarrow spoke sympathetically to Alden, but he replied only in monosyllables and with an effort. His mind was benumbed. He had just come back out of the Valley of the Shadow. His flesh still quivered as he felt the sweep of the flying Azrael. In his ears there still roared like thunder the rustling of the Death Angel's wings.

Alden sat uncertainly on his horse like a drunken man, and gazed with dim, unseeing eyes around him. Yarrow felt such pity for him that he thought it greater kindness to leave him alone to recover himself. He therefore joined the judge, who was some little distance away.

"He is a wreck," Yarrow said, pointing to Alden. "He is almost in a state of collapse. If you intended to clear him, why did you expose him to this terrible ordeal?"

"Because otherwise I was not sure of getting that assassin in there," replied the judge, pointing to the hanging body. "I've tried it more than once. But he is—or rather was—a cunning rascal, and as alert as a lynx."

"But why was it necessary to leave Alden and me, and—and—his friends in ignorance that your tribunal had found him innocent? Why bring him out here on the desert in the belief that he was to undergo punishment?"

"It was necessary in order to get Strang out here where we would have him safe and sure," replied the judge. "If we had tried to execute Strang in the town, the miners would have interfered; very probably they would have rescued him, and very possibly they might have hanged us."

"Did you not suspect that Strang's story was false even before Miss Wayne testified?"

"I was certain of it—I know the man. But the other Vigilante judges were doubtful. Their doubts were not removed until the young lady testified."

"What possible motive could the wretch have had for hatching such a murderous plot against an innocent stranger?" asked Yarrow.

"The fellow was a professional perjurer, a cold-blooded assassin. He went from camp to camp, from mine to mine, and hired himself as a tool to accomplish private ends. His false testimony before the Mountain Vigilantes has hanged many an innocent man. In this case, he was evidently in the pay of the men who had jumped Alden's land. When their forged notice signed '601' failed to scare Alden out of town, they determined to denounce him to the Vigilantes, on a false charge, and paid Strang to do their murderous work."

Yarrow was not ignorant of some of the dark deeds done under cover of the Vigilante name in the mountains. But so black was the picture painted by the judge's words that he was filled with horror. Involuntarily he exclaimed:

"My God! Such villainy is beyond belief! Why do you belong to a body of men which permits itself to be put to such uses? You are not a criminal nor a tool of criminals. You are a keen-witted man, and far superior to your associates. Why, then, do you stand with them?"

The judge smiled, and looked at the other Vigilantes, who were busy preparing some kind of a writing. "There are the reasons," he said, pointing to his colleagues. "They are not men of trained minds. Some of them are honest, a few of them are criminals, most of them are ignorant, and nearly all of them are easily led or misled. I have accomplished much more in this capacity than I could have done as an officer sworn to execute impotent laws. I have done more in this position than I could have done as a law-and-order Pharisee, criticising those officers who failed to execute the laws. I have saved some innocent men's lives. I have saved your friends'. Could I have saved him had I been a regular officer of the law, do you think?"

Yarrow was forced to admit that he did not think so. "Could I have saved his life had I stood to one side, and railed impartially at the peace officers who failed to carry out the law and at the Vigilantes who enforced lynch law?"

Again Yarrow found himself unable to make reply. "After all is said and done, your friend is at least safe and sound, and not hanging there where that cut-throat hoped to put him. His experience has been disagreeable, I admit, but it is a great deal better than being hanged. Besides, think of that fine girl who came to save his life. Of course she loves him. There is some mystery about the night they were together—some story into which I did not go. Don't you think so?"

Yarrow's lips moved, but he could not shape an articulate word.

"God! She is a magnificent creature!" cried the judge enthusiastically. "Would you not be willing to undergo even what he has suffered to have such a woman ride over deserts and mountains, thus tacitly admitting her love for you, and all to save your life?"

Yarrow recovered his power of speech. "Yes," he said deliberately. "I would undergo even more. For such a woman's love I would be willing to die—even that shameful death." And he pointed to the tripod.

The judge looked at him in some surprise. "I don't know that I would go quite so far as that," he said, with a smile. "But let us look at this writing—our friends are preparing a notice to the world of the last agony of Jonas Strang."

"What is it?" asked Yarrow.

They approached. On the body one of the Vigilantes had just pinned a card bearing the words:

"Executed by order of 601."

The men were mounting. Just as they were about to start one of the Vigilantes suddenly dismounted, and went back for Strang's horse, which he led by his lariat. As he rejoined the main group he remarked, with a somewhat sheepish grin:

"We come mighty near forgettin' Strang's nag. Some of them greasers might 'a' got him."

The little group of men and the led horse turned toward the town, leaving behind them the tripod with its silent burden. As they rode, a shapeless shadow darkened their pathway—then another.

Yarrow's nerves were on edge. "What is that?" he cried, startled.

The judge looked up. Yarrow followed his glance. Two great birds, with skinny necks and glossy black wings, were already wheeling over the tripod. Poised on extended wings, they slanted and circled, circled and slanted, down, down, down.

"Buzzards!" exclaimed Yarrow.

"Those are vultures," said the judge. "You can tell them by the white patches under their wings; they are earlier than the buzzards. There come the buzzards now."

Yarrow felt an ugly thrill run up his spinal column and into his hair. He turned his face away, and set it steadfastly toward the town.

The nationalization of the Italian railways has had a curious result. The employees are now under the ban of the criminal law, and the strikes of last year by the railway workers have resulted in the prosecution of 2962 railway men at Turin for participation in the big general strike of last year. They are being tried in batches of thirty each in the Turin law courts, and five days in each legal week are assigned for the trials until the whole of the cases are disposed of. It is reported that similar trials on a smaller scale are taking place at Rome, Milan, Bologna, and other centres involved in the general strike. The lowest penalty yet inflicted has been a fine of 16 lira and fifty days' suspension of civil rights. The law under which the men are tried is the provision against strikes in the public services.

While Vermont is considering the construction of two main trunk highways running north and south through the State, with half a dozen intersecting lines, at an estimated cost of $2,500,000, Pennsylvania is talking about abolishing her toll gates.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Benjamin Harrison McKee, who was the "Baby McKee" of the White House, is now a Yale senior.

The Rev. Dr. William R. Huntington, rector of Grace Church, Broadway, found a check for $40,000 under his plate at breakfast the other morning.

Mrs. de Navarro, formerly Mary Anderson, with her husband, her twelve-years-old son, and her three-years-old daughter, is now in New York on her first visit to America in eight years.

Henry W. Taft, brother of the President-elect, was chosen president of the Ohio Society of New York at a meeting held in the Hotel Manhattan. Colonel John J. McCook, the retiring president, had held the position for five years.

Dr. William S. Bigelow, who is responsible for the cutting of the new United States gold coins in intaglio instead of in relief, a new departure in coinage, is neither a sculptor nor a numismatist, but the author of the recent book on "Buddhism and Immortality." He has given years of study to the literature of the Far East.

The deposed President of Hayti was at least the oldest if not the most distinguished of living rulers, for his years are estimated to be anywhere between ninety and one hundred, the exact date of his birth being unknown. Nord Alexis has lived, accordingly, nearly as long as the Haytian republic has, and at times it has seemed as if he might outlive it.

Recently enrolled among the freshmen at the University of Pennsylvania is a Spanish nobleman, the Marquis Carlos de Potstad, a youth of eighteen, who speaks English like a native of England, having attended school in that country for several years, and has already received his A. B. degree there. His family is one of the noblest of Spain, and his father occupies a high government position.

New York State's collections relating to Indian life are to be enriched by a gift of $15,000 from Mrs. Frederick F. Thompson. Mrs. Thompson is the daughter of the former governor, Myron H. Clark, who took much interest in the State museum at Albany, and the proposed "museum of Iroquois culture" will be known by his name. No State possessed in its territory a more remarkable development of Indian civilization.

Lord Ripon, at the age of eighty-one, recently resigned from the British Cabinet. The long span of his political life is suggested by the fact that he also sat in Palmerston's Cabinet. Entering Parliament in 1852, he has since filled several of the great offices, having been at the head of the war office, the India office, the admiralty, besides serving five years as viceroy of India. And in old age he has preserved not only vigor and sagacity, but an alert hopefulness of spirit.

The Earl of Granard of Castle Forbes, County Longford, Ireland, whose engagement to Miss Beatrice Mills, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ogden Mills, was announced a few days ago, is thirty-four years old. He entered the army in the Scots Guards, a crack infantry regiment, and became a captain, serving in the South African campaign of 1900-1902. He is master of the horse and lord in waiting to the king, and deputy lieutenant for the County Longford, Ireland. The earldom is in the Irish peerage, but the holder sits in the House of Lords as Baron Granard in the peerage of the United Kingdom. He has a fine seat, Castle Forbes, at Newtownforbes, Longford, with some twenty-odd thousand acres of land.

The movement in Los Angeles to give a house in that charming city to Rear-Admiral Evans must have been started by some one with a short memory. Probably no popular naval hero in this country for generations to come will accept a house from his admirers; to propose such a thing to "Fighting Bob," who has seen the effects of one such episode, was a singular ineptitude. The admiral has answered the proposal of his Los Angeles friends in no uncertain style. "Of course," he writes, "the people of Los Angeles who know me will understand that I don't want to be placed in the position of accepting a house, and those who don't know me had better be told that I would not accept a house or any other present." What will take him to Los Angeles as a resident is his election to a responsible position by the harbor commissioners, but before settling down the admiral will try himself out in a lecture tour.

Expatriated Cipriano Castro, late President of Venezuela, arrived in Berlin with quite a flourish of trumpets. It is said that he is there for medical treatment, also that he wishes to secure a loan for his country. He had engaged the royal suite of ten rooms at the newly opened Hotel Esplanade. This is the most expensive location in Berlin. The rooms are hung with Gobelin tapestries, laid with thick Turkish carpets and equipped with Louis Seize furniture. Among those waiting to greet him were Señor Velez, the Venezuelan minister; Señor Machod, the Venezuelan consul; the latter's pretty daughter, who carried a fine bouquet of roses, which she presented to Señora Castro; Dr. Israel and most of the members of the Venezuelan colony. He descended from the train with some difficulty. After listening to a short address of welcome by Señor Machod he walked, leaning on the arm of his wife, to an automobile, which hurried him to the Hotel Esplanade.

GREAT MUSIC OF THE PAST.

George P. Upton Writes of Singers and Players He Has Known.

Fifty years of intimate connection with musical affairs in America are covered in George P. Upton's latest volume, "Musical Memories," and few of the many readers that will follow his record closely but will envy him his delightful experiences. Mr. Upton wrote the first musical criticism printed in a Chicago newspaper, but he had been a listener and a critic before that time, and his recollections touch the career of every prominent musician of his time, at least of those who visited America. In his book he has drawn not alone upon his memory but on the innumerable souvenirs collected in his long and serious devotion to the art, and the result is a well digested arrangement of biographical and critical notes, with authoritative lists and dates. It would be easier to fill pages with entertaining chat from these recollections than to choose from such an interesting collection.

First of the great singers mentioned is Jenny Lind, and Mr. Upton writes from personal knowledge, as he heard her in Providence, Rhode Island, a city that boasted the presence of an expressman who paid $650 for a choice of seats at the Jenny Lind concert—the record price. The half-century included in his review began with this notable engagement:

Jenny Lind arrived in this country September 1, 1850, conveyed by Phineas T. Barnum. I have often wondered, considering her rare simplicity and unostentation, if she did not suffer at times from the peculiarly bombastic methods of management practiced by that showman. Her first concert was given at Castle Garden, New York, September 11. Her supporting artists were Sir Julius Benedict, Richard Hoffman the pianist, who was engaged in New York for the American tour, and Signor Beletti, barytone. Her numbers in the opening night's programme were the "Casta Diva" from "Norma"; the "Herdsman's Song," popularly known as the "Echo Song"; and the "Welcome to America," the text of which was written by Bayard Taylor and the music hastily set by Benedict. She also sang with Beletti in the duet "Per piacer alla Signora" from Rossini's "Il Turco in Italia," and in a trio from Meyerbeer's "Camp in Silesia," for voice and two flutes.

Barnum managed only the first tour of the Swedish singer:

The American tour included the following cities, in the order named: New York, Boston, Providence, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Charleston, Havana, Matanzas, New Orleans, Natchez, Memphis, St. Louis, Nashville, Louisville, Cincinnati, Wheeling, Pittsburg, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York. Jenny Lind made a second tour after canceling her contract with Barnum, giving sixty-one concerts between June and December of 1851.

The second tour included Buffalo, Cleveland, and Columbus, but did reach Chicago.

Many descriptions of Jenny Lind are in print, but Mr. Upton's is satisfying, though brief:

I see Jenny Lind gliding down the stage with consummate grace—she never seemed to walk—amid the acclamations of the audience; a girlish figure of medium height, with fair hair and blue eyes, gowned in velvet, and wearing a single rose in her hair. She was plain of feature, and yet her face was expressive and in a sense fascinating. It was a wholesome face. She may not have been beautiful, judged by the conventional beauty tests; but if not extremely good-looking, she "looked good," as some one has said. And that goodness drew every one to her, and she was "Jenny" with every one—no Signora Lind, or Mademoiselle Lind, or Miss Lind, but Jenny Lind, as we say Annie Cary or Lilli Lehmann. Her voice, as I remember it, was of full volume, and extraordinary range, and had a peculiar penetrating quality also, because of its purity, which made its faintest tone clearly audible and enabled her to use exquisitely soft pianissimos. Her high notes were as clear as a lark's, and her full voice was rich and sonorous. Her singing was genial and sympathetic and marked by the fervor and devotional quality which characterized her nature. It evinced a noble musical endowment and great reverence for her art. She was little affected by adulation, but acknowledged the wild, frantic applause courteously and with evident pleasure. Benedict, her leader, said "she made a conscience of her music."

European songbirds came in flocks when the success of Jenny Lind was known. Among those who followed her, Mr. Upton gives first place to Henriette Sontag, who was a great artist and who had a romantic life:

At the very zenith of her career, while enjoying the plaudits of the multitude, the friendship of great musicians, and the adulation of titled and untitled admirers, Sontag attracted the attention of Count Rossi, an Italian diplomat, who wooed her with such ardor that they were speedily married. They went immediately to The Hague, where he was representing Sardinia. The King of Prussia granted her a patent of nobility, whereupon she retired from the stage. After a quiet life of eighteen years together, reverses overtook them. She lost her fortune and decided to return to the stage, and Count Rossi resigned his position so that he might be at liberty to accompany her. As it eventually he might better have remained at home and permitted her to be a wage-earner under some competent manager.

They came to this country in 1852, bringing with them Pozzolini, tenor, and Badiali, barytone. The stories of her great success abroad, of her remarkable beauty, and of the romance of her career, had preceded her and aroused much interest. Her reception was cordial, but there was no "fever," as in the case of Jenny Lind. As I remember Sontag, she was a blonde, somewhat slight of figure, with large, bright blue eyes and hair inclining toward auburn in color. . . . As she was very pretty and her toilettes were elegant, she of course became the fashionable rage and was guest of honor at innumerable society functions. Her carriage was exceedingly graceful and her manner on the stage sprightly, coquettish, and fascinating. Von Bülow was right when he called her a "forty-eight-year-old soubrette." She was about that age when I saw her, and her elegance of manner and personal charms are still vivid in my recollection. In these respects she was the Sémbrich of her day. Her voice was an exquisitely pure high soprano, with a mezzo piano in it which Nilsson afterwards used so effectively. Her execution was graceful and refined, and her style must have lent itself best to rôles requiring coquetry and archness, like Martha, Rosina, or Amina.

And the end of all this splendid endowment is one of the strangest and saddest events in the history of the stage:

Poor Sontag's fate was a sorrowful one. Prima donnas' husbands are notorious mischief-makers and intermeddlers, if not hoodoos, for their wives, and impresarios always dread them. The bonanza in her case proved to be rich in troubles. She had to contend in the first place against Alhoni, greatest of contraltos, and, beautiful and fascinating as she was, she could not make headway against her. Count Rossi kept her in litigations, so irascible was he, as well as ignorant of stage matters. Yielding to his importunities, and disregarding the advice of friends, they went to Mexico at a time when the cholera was epidemic there. After a performance of "Lucrezia Borgia," she suddenly caught the disease and died in a few hours, June 17, 1854. Six others of her troupe, among them Pozzolini, her tenor, were also victims.

There was a time when Ole Bull was considered one of the greatest of violinists. Many still remember him, and this, from the tribute the critic pays to his memory, will stir recollections of thirty-odd years ago:

Ole Bull belonged to no school. Perhaps that was another secret of his success, for people neither know nor care about schools, but like a player to be himself. Ole Bull was certainly all that. He imitated certain of Paganini's eccentricities by attempting effects of a bizarre sort, but yet he was always Ole Bull. He reminded you of no one else, and he always played Ole Bull in all his versatile moods. To this extent he was the most eccentric of modern virtuosos, with Remenyi a close second. Who but these two would have climbed to the top of Cheops's Pyramid and played for the benefit of the Sphinx? He rarely attempted the classical, probably because it is so unyielding in construction that it does not admit of moods or humors, so his repertory was comparatively small. He resembled Paganini in another respect: he was an ordinary composer. He wrote two pieces in this country, "Niagara" and "Solitude of the Prairie," but they were ephemeral. He was more at home in variations and Norwegian fantasies like his own "El Saterbosk," some measures of which he wrote out in his sprawling notation and gave to me with the remark that it was one of his favorites. And when the kindly faced old man, lovingly bending over his violin with his eyes closed, played these fantasies, I used to think he was at his best. Perhaps they called up visions of the land he loved very dearly and for which he made many sacrifices.

Operatic tenors were the favorites of those days, no less than now. Of one of the greatest Mr. Upton writes with illuminating appreciation:

Among the tenors I have known, Brignoli always seemed to me the most interesting personality, as well as one of the most captivating singers. He made his American debut in 1856 and was a member of the first regular Italian opera troupe which appeared in Chicago (1859). The season was opened with "Martha," and Brignoli was Lionel. During the next ten or fifteen years he sang in Chicago almost every season, either in concerts or opera, and was a universal favorite. He is said to have been very delicate, as well as timid and nervous, in his early youth, but when I first saw him he was robust and broad-chested, and gradually grew quiet stout, in spite of which he always carried himself with a kind of aristocratic elegance. He told me once that he never wholly overcame stage fright, and I fancy that his lack of pronounced dramatic ability and his awkwardness of gait may have conducted to it. If he found himself in the vicinity of the prima donna, he was always nervous, and in scenes requiring the platonic stage embrace he would implore her not to touch him. Brignoli was an indifferent actor, but he was a master of tone-production. His tones had a silvery quality and were exquisitely pure. He never forced his voice beyond the limit of a sweet musical tone, and rarely expended much effort in reaching a climax, or in closing an aria with one of those marvelously beautiful sforzandos which other tenors tried in vain to imitate. He never sang the high C, that stood in trade of sensational tenors, though he could reach it with ease, for he had great range and power of voice. He used to say that "screaming is not singing; let those fellows wear their throats out if they will; Brignoli keep his." And he did. His highest ambition was tonal loveliness, and in this quality he had few equals.

Only four of the greatest names mentioned by Mr. Upton are referred to in these passages, but his book holds personal remembrances of hundreds. The old-time stars of the opera and the concert stage are all recalled, and with them memories of other footlight favorites, orchestra leaders, hurled queens, minstrels, impresarios, and theatre huilders. Of each one, as the figure passes, the critic writes understandingly and with skill. His hook is one for the reference-volume shelf, for after it has been once enjoyed it will remain a treasury of information invaluable to all who wish for exact knowledge of modern music and musicians. Many good portraits illustrate the handsome volume of more than three hundred pages, and the index is full.

Kipling's India Days.

E. Kay Robinson was the editor of the Civil and Military Gazette of Lahore when Rudyard Kipling was on the staff. In a recent issue of the London Telegraph he gives some entertaining reminiscences of that time, and his association with the budding genius:

Journalism in India is uncommonly hard labor for the few Englishmen who constitute an editorial staff, and with the greatest dislike of using a razor to cut grindstones, I could not help hurdening Kipling with a good deal of daily drudgery. My experience of him as a newspaper hack suggests, however, that if you want to find a man who will cheerfully do the work of three men, you should catch a young genius. Like a blood horse between the shafts of a coal wagon, he may go near to bursting his heart in the effort, but he'll drag that wagon along as it ought to go. The amount of stuff that Kipling got through in a day was indeed wonderful; and though I had more or less satisfactory assistants after he left (the staff grew with the paper's prosperity), I am sure that more solid work was done in that office when Kipling and I worked together than ever before or after. There was one peculiarity of Kipling's work which I really must mention—namely, the enormous amount of ink he used to throw about.

In the heat of summer white cotton trousers and a thin vest constituted his office attire, and by the day's end he was spotted all over like a Dalmatian dog. He had a habit of dipping his pen frequently into the ink pot, and as all his movements were abrupt, almost jerky, the ink used to fly.

When he darted into my room as he used to do about one thing or another in connection with the paper a dozen times in the morning, I had to shout to him to "stand off," otherwise, as I knew by experience, the abrupt halt he would make, and the flourish with which he placed the proof in his hand before me, would send the penful of ink—he always had a full pen in his hand—flying over me.

He was always the best of company, bubbling over with delightful humor, which found vent in every detail of our day's work together; and the chance visitor to the editor's office must often have carried away very erroneous notions of the amount of work which was being done when he found us in the fits of laughter that usually accompanied our consultations about the make-up of the paper.

This is my chief recollection of Kipling as assistant and companion; and I would place sensitiveness as his second characteristic. Although a master of repartee, for instance, he dreaded dining at the club, where there was a resident member, since dead, who disliked him, and was always endeavoring to snub him. Kipling's retorts invariably turned the tables on his assailant, and set us all in a roar; and, besides this, Kipling was popular in the club, while his enemy was not. Under such circumstances an ordinary man would have courted the combat, and enjoyed provoking his clumsy opponent; but the man's animosity hurt Kipling, and I knew that he often, to avoid the ordeal, dined in solitude at home when he would infinitely have preferred dining at the club, but I could never persuade him of the folly of doing so.

Apart from his marvelous faculty for assimilating local color without apparent effort, Kipling neglected no chance, and spared no labor, in acquiring experience that might serve a literary purpose. Of the various races of India, whom the ordinary Englishman lumps together as "natives," Kipling knew the quaintest details of habits and language and distinctive ways of thought. I remember well one long-limbed Pathan, indescribably filthy, but with magnificent mien and features—Mahabb Ali. I think, was his name—who regarded Kipling as a man apart from all other "sahibs." After each of his wanderings across the unexplored fringes of Afghanistan, where his restless spirit of adventure led him, Mahabb Ali always used to turn up, travel-stained, dirtier, and more majestic than ever, for confidential colloquy with "Kuppeling Sahib," his "friend"; and I more than fancy that to Mahabb Ali Kipling owed the wonderful local color which he was able to put into such tales as "Dray Wara Yow Dec" and "The Man Who Would Be King."

The elevators in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, in New York, which run to the ladies' parlors, to the dressing-rooms and to the women's Turkish baths are now in charge of young women, who have been trained for their duties.

CURRENT VERSE.

A Health.

I fill this cup to one made up
Of loveliness alone.
A woman, of her gentle sex
The seeming paragon:
To whom the better elements
And kindly stars have given
A form so fair that, like the air,
'Tis less of earth than heaven.

Her every tone is music's own,
Like those of morning birds,
And something more than melody
Dwells ever in her words;
The coining of her heart are they,
And from her lips each flows
As one may see the burdened bee
Forth issue from the rose.

Affections are as thoughts to her,
The measures of her hours;
Her feelings have the fragrance,
The freshness of young flowers;
And lovely passions, changing oft,
So fill her, she appears
The image of themselves by turns,
The idol of past years!

Of her bright face one glance will trace
A picture on the brain,
And of her voice in echoing hearts
A sound must long remain;
But memory, such as mine of her,
So very much endears,
When death is nigh my latest sigh
Will not be life's, but hers.

I fill this cup to one made up
Of loveliness alone,
A woman, of her gentle sex
The seeming paragon—
Her health! and would on earth there stood
Some more of such a frame,
That life might be all poetry,
And weariness a name.

—E. C. Pinckney.

A Song of the Service.

When th' lean line crouched for th' final charge
Then I seen his gills turn blue;
An' I seen him blink an' I seen him shrink—
But wot kin a sergeant do?
Oh, I heard him wheeze at th' bullets' sneeze,
An' I seen him dodgin' too;
His face wuz old an' his feet wuz cold—
But wot kin a sergeant do?

Then it's "Skirmishers, forward!"
An' th' guide is right—
Oh, th' bugles callin', callin'.
Then: "Steady on th' left—an' start th' fight!"
"Oh, who's that fallin', fallin'?"
"Comp'ny—halt! Lie—down!"

When th' word come down an' we had to go,
An' th' fightin' line drove through;
Oh, I see him stop, an' I see him drop—
But wot kin a sergeant do?
I used th' boot an' I told him shoot—
(An' he shot th' best he knew);
If his aim wuz bad, oh, his heart wuz sad—
But wot kin a sergeant do?

Then it's: "Load!" an' "Fire!"
An' th' range is long;
But th' haze is driftin', driftin'.
It's "Steady that left—an' keep it—strong!"
An' th' light is siftin', siftin'.
"Comp'ny—rise! 'Nance by rushes!"

When th' lean line stopped from th' final charge
I seen him—gills turned blue!
For there he lay on th' wicked day—
But wot kin a sergeant do?
(Boo-hoo!)

Oh, he did his best, an' he got his rest—
An' I've told you all I knew;
They said: "How brave!" as we dug his grave—
An' wot kin a sergeant do?

Then it's volleys three—
An' spade him in!
Oh, th' hugh's sighin', sighin'.
He'll never see parade agin—
An' a rooky's cryin', cryin'.
"Comp'ny—'tention! Stack—arms!"
—Alfred Damon Runyon, in New York Sun.

Mirbeau's play, "Le Foyer," seems to be renewing the riotous nights of Sardou's "Thermidor" in the nineties at the Théâtre Français in Paris. In "Thermidor" Sardou dared to question some of the traditional glories of the Revolution; the audiences resented his point of view; there was clamor within the auditorium and tumult without, and the piece was speedily withdrawn from so "official" a stage as that of the Comédie. Mirbeau's piece is bitterly satirical of social, moral, and financial hypocrisies as an Academician and a philanthropist incarnates them. A part of the two audiences, thus far, for the piece have resented it; while another part has as vehemently applauded it, with resulting "demonstrations" within and without that the police have finally suppressed.

Strauss does not always choose gruesome themes, observes the Musical Courier. "Till Eulenspiegel" is a monumental piece of musical humor. "Don Quixote," "Heldenleben," "Symphonia Domestica," and "Feuersnot" contain many pages that display marked evidences of a merry mood. The gruesome subject in opera did not originate with Strauss. Wagner's "Walküre" is based on a not particularly palatable relationship between brother and sister. Count di Luna, in "Travatore," is a fratricide. In "Rigoletto" a father murders his child. In "La Juive" they "hoi, 'em alive." In "Aida" they hurry 'em alive. "Carmen," "Bohème," "Favorita," "Traviata," "Thais," "Manon," and innumerable other operas glorify the most ancient female profession in the world.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

By Sidney G. P. Coryn.

The Privileged Classes, by Barrett Wendell, Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.25.

The four essays of which this book is composed are delightful by their thoughtful suavity and convincing by their moderation. The first two, "The Privileged Classes" and "The American Revolution," are properly related as cause and effect. Putting caricature upon one side and the exaggerations of demagogues, the author asks us to consider the familiar spectacle of the union laborer in the street-car who occupies a double space, to the discomfort of his fellow travelers, and for no better reason than that he is a laborer and therefore privileged. Here we have privilege in its simplest form, but illustrating a principle that is slowly corroding the heart of democratic institutions. That such encroachments are hastening us toward a revolution the author does not assert. Indeed, he hopes that such a danger will be avoided, as even greater dangers have been avoided in the past, but the probability of it is clearly in his mind. Nor does he mean by revolution the "cautious and normal modifications" involved in healthy growth, but rather a sudden change, "malignant, violent, irresistible." This, he thinks, would be a tragedy greater than any of the revolutions of history, because it would show that democracy itself, the dream of the future, is no better than the nightmares of the past. The present discontent is "growing to be tremendous." If it shall have its way, "the end may be the end of our ancestral democracy."

The two remaining essays on "Our National Superstition" and "Of Education" are a review of our current teaching systems. An occasional resort to a light badinage is perhaps the most effective way of dealing with educational methods that permit of a total inability to read a French book after three lessons a week in that language carried out for three consecutive years. Elsewhere we are told of a Harvard student who was unable to arrange certain papers in alphabetical order because he had never learned the alphabet, his school teacher having conceived the theory that the usual arrangement of letters is arbitrary and therefore not reasonable.

Gardening in California, Landscape and Flower, by John McLaren. Published by A. M. Robertson, San Francisco.

There need be no doubt of the welcome awaiting this fine book. The author has had thirty-five years of experience in various parts of California, and for twenty years he has been superintendent of Golden Gate Park, probably the finest park in the world. He explains that inquiries and requests for advice have come upon him in unmanageable numbers and that the present book is perhaps the best way to share his experience and to furnish the help that can not be given by correspondence.

He certainly seems to cover the whole ground of California gardening. He tells us how the garden should be planned out and the ground prepared with its roads and lawns. Special chapters—there are twenty-two chapters in all—are devoted to "Trees," "Climbers and Twiners," "Bulbous and Tuberous Plants," "Palms, Ferns, Bamboos, and Grasses," "Succulents," "Herbaceous and Bedding Plants," "Ponds and Lakes," "Parlor Gardening," "The Window Box," "The Amateur's Conservatory," "Diseases of Plants and Injurious Insects," and "A Calendar of Operations." No book could be better devised or better written for practical use. The information is clear, concise, and inclusive, while over one hundred and fifty illustrations of unusual merit are a valuable addition to the work.

The Courage of Captain Plum, by James Oliver Curwood. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis.

This remarkable story relates to the Mormon settlement on Beaver Island, Lake Michigan, and to that extraordinary fanatic, James Jesse Strang, who ruled it. Captain Plum, for reasons of his own, has decided to make war upon the Mormons. Going ashore to reconnoitre, he first meets Obadiah Price, a Mormon elder, whom he subsequently finds to be in the service of the United States government, and through him he makes the acquaintance of Marion, the beautiful girl who is doomed to be Strang's seventh wife. The thread of the narrative is the determination of Plum to rescue Marion, a resolve that nearly costs him his life and that succeeds at the last moment only through the intervention of the United States ship Michigan, sent by President Pierce to overthrow the rule of Strang.

Apart from the romance of the winning of Marion, the main interest of the story is in its picture of Mormon rule and of the almost incredible atrocities associated with it. We see a desperate attack upon the settlement by the people of the mainland, infuriated by the theft and enslavement of their women. We see the victims of Strang's displeasure flogged, tortured, and crucified by an infamous despotism sustained by the genius of one man. The picture is indeed so forceful as to suggest exaggeration to those who are unaware of the extent to which an imperium in imperio was established by the Mormon power. The author has written a story nearly faultless in execution and with a direct and sustained appeal to human sympathy.

The Justice of the Mexican War, by Charles H. Owen. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

The author writes with all the strength of his conviction that the war with Mexico was justifiable and was one of national preservation and not of aggression. He shows the patience with which America endured a long course of wrongs and insults, including the capture of her ships and the many outrages inflicted upon her citizens. All this is ancient history, but it is summarized by the author with vigorous precision and historical accuracy.

But Major Owen seems to argue that the actual cause of the war is to be found in the Monroe Doctrine and the impossibility of allowing a "French and Mexican empire or a British suzerainty on our immediate borders." His case would perhaps have been stronger had he confined himself for a casus belli to the unbearable provocations that were then the order of the day. For there is no evidence of French or British designs upon Mexico, although no one can say what might have been the results of continued and tempting opportunity. Undoubtedly the possibilities of foreign aggression were present in the minds of American statesmen and were not without their influence, but it would be hardly wise to assume that such aggression had entered the field of contemplated events. Major Owen has written a valuable book, full of well arranged fact and honestly presented conjecture, and while it does not revolutionize our ideas, it presents a good deal of matter for renewed reflection.

A Prisoner of the Sea, by Chauncey C. Hotchkiss. Published by the John McBride Company, New York; $1.50.

This good story of the sea is somewhat after the style of Mr. Clark Russell. John Raymond, financially stranded in Cuba, accepts the position of first officer on a mysterious steamer, only to discover when too late that its reputed owner, who is on board as a passenger, is a defaulting bank official and that his baggage contains the plunder. Unfortunately, there are others on board who know the facts, and the result is a plot to get possession of the treasure, with a succession of mutinies, fights, and hairbreadth escapes. There is also a very pleasant love incident.

Villa Ruben, by John Galsworthy. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; $1.50.

This is the story of an Austro-English family in Switzerland, of a native artist who falls in love with the eldest daughter, of a vain and selfish father who strongly opposes the match, and of a big-hearted uncle who saves a painful situation at the cost of his life. Christian's struggle between love and duty is well told, but when the artist finally secures his bride we should like to feel a little more certain of his worthiness. There seems to be something in his nature that does not ring quite true.

Robin Aroon, by Armistead C. Gordon. Published by the Neale Publishing Company, New York and Washington.

A very pleasant sketch of Southern life on the Rappahannock in the year 1774. The easy irresponsibility of the Southern gentleman is well depicted, a light-hearted carelessness as evident in his love affairs as in his tobacco planting. There is no reason to doubt that Robert Henning found a good wife in Judith Montfort, but a more prudent age demands a greater circumspection.

Evening Thoughts, by J. R. Miller. Published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York; 65 cents.

The idea of the author is to present little one-page talks based upon selected verses of Scripture to be used as an evening devotion. Mr. Miller's theology is not always consonant with modern thought, but it may be hoped that his unassuming sincerity will always be consonant with the best aspirations of the race.

The Panther, by Anne Warner. Published by Small, Maynard & Co., Boston; $1.25.

This curious mystical tale of a woman whose mental temptations take objective form as a panther is worth reading from the standpoint of unorthodox and unconventional psychology.

Home Occupations for Boys and Girls, by Bertha Johnston. Published by George W. Jacobs & Co., Philadelphia.

An admirable little book for winter evenings. All kinds of useful and educational pastimes for children are described profusely and clearly.

New Publications.

Lovers of beautiful booklets should possess every volume of the Rubric Series issued by Duffield & Co., New York. The chaste workmanship is unique and the selection irreplaceable. The latest volumes are the "Sermon on the Mount" and "Poor Richard's Almanac." Price, 60 cents each.

Admirers of Anne Warner, and their name is legion, will welcome a collection of short stories from her pen. Under the title of "An Original Gentleman" we have twenty-two of these sketches, all of them of a bright and sympathetic homeliness, unaffected and wholesome. The publishers are Little, Brown & Co., Boston, and the price is $1.50.

The John McBride Company, New York, have published a neat edition of "More's Millennium," being the Utopia of Sir Thomas More rendered into modern English by Valerian Paget. We are reminded that "More's Millennium" was "a source from which the builders of the American republic largely drew their inspiration." The price is $1.50.

"Pete, Cow Puncher," by Joseph B. Ames, is a good picture of cowboy life. Donald Harrington, having quarreled with his father, goes West and begins his ranch apprenticeship at the foot of the ladder. His story of adventure is well told, and without the improbabilities and exaggerations that are used overmuch in stories of this kind. The book is published by Henry Holt & Co., New York.

Moffat, Yard & Co., New York, have published a cook book for children entitled "When Mother Lets Us Cook," containing simple recipes with important cooking rules in rhyme, together with handy lists of the materials and utensils needed for the preparation of each dish. The author is Constance Johnson and the price is 75 cents.

The American Book Company, New York, Cincinnati, and Chicago, have published a handy edition of Heine's "Die Harzreise," edited with notes and vocabulary, map and illustrations, by Parke R. Kolbe. Price, 50 cents. Also an edition of Corneille's "Le Cid," edited with notes and vocabulary by James D. Bruner, Ph. D. Price, 45 cents.

The Oliver Ditson Company, Boston, have published a fine collection of "Songs from the Operas" for mezzo soprano, edited by H. E. Krehbiel. Twenty-five operas are represented and the selection is in all cases good. From the same house comes a collection of "Piano Compositions" by Johann Sebastian Bach in two volumes, edited by Ebenezer Prout. The musical interests of the country are indebted to the Oliver Ditson Company for a steady supply of the best material.

"Omar Repentant."

It might be thought that the lesser poets of today would seek to avoid the comparisons incidental to an attempted imitation of Omar Khayyam. Mr. Richard Le Gallienne feels no such reluctance, and hence we have a little volume entitled "Omar Repentant," from which a single stanza may be quoted without malice:

You drank that whisky pretty quick, young sir—
Now keep your eyes from off that woman there,
And hear me talk—look at her face, you say!
Poor soul! there are a million more of her.

There are thirty-six stanzas and the book is published by Mitchell Kennerley, New York.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE CHAT.

For this holiday season the offering at the Van Ness Theatre next week is particularly appropriate. It is the great dramatic spectacle, "Ben Hur," made from General Lew Wallace's hook, and though it has been seen here more than once it may be depended upon to draw large audiences. There is nothing exactly like it on the stage—nothing that combines so many attractive features. Not only the scenes of the chariot race and the galley and the great storm, but the impressiveness of the story and its associations, make for permanent interest. It will continue to appeal to the many so long as it is given with a careful regard for its many requirements. The present production is described as more than adequate in every detail. The San Francisco season of "Ben Hur" is limited to two weeks. No Sunday performances are ever given of the Wallace drama. Matinees are scheduled for Wednesday and Saturday of each week, also New Year's Day. Seats for the first week are now obtainable.

George Ade's comedy, "The College Widow," will be put on at the Valencia Theatre next Monday evening, for the first time in this city by a stock company. The play is probably the brightest and best of Ade's numerous successes, and some of its characters have become as familiarly known as any in the stage world. In the cast of this production Robert Warwick will be Billy Bolton, the famous half-back; Blanche Stoddard will fascinate as "the widow"; Helen Lackaye will have the exacting but effective rôle of Flora Wiggins, the waitress; and Charles Dow Clark, who was the "Buh" Hicks of the original production, will again play the rural youth who quickly assimilates the fraternity spirit. Other members of the company are well placed, and the scenic possibilities of the play will have particular attention, from the original models. In addition to the usual matinees there will be a special performance on New Year's Day.

"The Lost Paradise," now in the closing nights of its two weeks' run, has been notably well done. It will be seen for the last times Sunday afternoon and evening.

Kohl and Dill begin the ninth week of their engagement at the Princess Theatre next Monday night with another new musical farce, entitled "The Politicians." The piece is said to be as well suited to their needs as "Playing the Ponies" and "Weiner & Schnitzel," both of which have been very successful. There are graft issues, campaign schemes, and official appointments galore in "The Politicians," all of which are utilized for laughing purposes exclusively. A number of new people will appear in the new production, among them George A. Wright, Charles E. Swickard, Richard Staunton, Adele Rafter, and Netta Vesta. Jack Mason, the new stage manager, has lately arrived from the East, especially to superintend preparations for the piece. In the meantime "Weiner & Schnitzel" is in its last nights, and with overflowing audiences.

The Orpheum Road Show is giving the patrons of the Orpheum one of the greatest hills of the year. A review of some of its striking features is given in another column, and this may explain why the management finds it impossible to seat all who come in spite of two performances every day. All next week Mlle. de Dio the dancer, Edwin Holt the comedian, Hyman Meyer the pianist, Charles and Fannie Van the actors-singers, Work and Over the acrobats, and Merian's clever trained dogs will continue to entertain, and in addition two new attractions will be crowded into the long programme. Gus Edwards's School Boys and Girls, a whole show in themselves, with new songs, and Rogers and Deely, singing comedians, will have a share in the applause winning.

The Valencia Theatre management has given the playhouse for the use of the Associated Charities on Thursday afternoon, December 31, and a big Christmas tree, laden with gifts for the needy, will be prepared by the leaders in the philanthropic organization. Charles Dow Clark, the comedian, will appear as Santa Claus on that occasion.

Isadora Duncan's Dancing.

While Miss Duncan's dancing has had in New York and in Boston almost as high praise as it won in Europe, it is not altogether free from serious criticism. This is from a recent notice of her entertainment printed by the New York Evening Post:

"Miss Duncan attempted to dance a sort of emotional 'programme' to Beethoven's music. She moved across the stage sometimes gracefully, at others almost grotesquely; she moved not only her feet, but her arms; she tossed her head about and made it assume poses; she endeavored to portray emotions with her features, which are not particularly expressive. Whenever the music became lively or loud, she threw up her knees and cavorted across the stage in a sprightly fashion, and when the music subsided, she quieted down, too. It was entertaining for five minutes, and then the lack of variety and the insignificance of it soon made it pall.

"What was most surprising was that Miss Duncan did not dance rhythmically with Beethoven's music. After the symphony, she danced a prelude, a valse, and a mazurka, of Chopin, whose lovely music also was never intended to subserve such a purpose. There are many who can be moved to tears by Chopin's music, but to see it danced, dries them up at their source. It is impossible for us to go back to the times of the Greeks, who were moved to tears by the portrayal of sorrowful emotions by dancers. The farther we go back among the stages of culture the more importance we find attached to the dance. 'In the infancy of civilization,' says E. B. Tylor, the eminent British anthropologist, 'it was full of passionate and solemn meaning. Savages and barbarians dance their joy and sorrow, their love and rage, even their magic and religion.' We do not."

The Sunday Afternoon "Pop" Concerts.

From educational and musical points of view important events of the season will be the series of four chamber music concerts to be given at popular prices at Lyric Hall on Sunday afternoons, at intervals of four weeks, by the Lyric String Quartette, assisted by other splendid artists.

This organization is the pet hobby of Manager Will Greenbaum. The object of the concerts is to foster a love for a high class of music, and the prices are placed so low that pecuniary gain would be impossible. Mr. Greenbaum hopes to establish his organization here just as the Joachim Quartette is in Berlin, the Rose in Vienna, and the Kneisel in Boston.

The rate for the season tickets will be only $2.50 and $1.50, and these may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s on and after December 30, at the Kearny and Sutter Streets store.

The first concert will be given Sunday afternoon, January 3. Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt will be the assisting pianist and the violin part in the Tortini sonata will be played by William Hoffmann, first violin of the organization, who was for many years concertmaster of the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch.

Prices for single concerts will be 50 cents and $1.

De Koven's Successes.

Reginald de Koven, at the time "Robin Hood" was brought out, was only thirty-one years old, having been born at Middletown, Connecticut, on April 3, 1859. The opera was given in Chicago for the first time in 1890. His education was partly in foreign lands, and he took his degree at St. John's College, Oxford, in 1879. He studied in Stuttgart under Lehert and Spiedel, and he had harmony lessons from Pruckner. Then he went to Dr. Hauff, in Frankfurt-on-Main, and subsequently to Florence, where he took up singing and vocal work with Vanucini. Work of a special kind was afterwards pursued by De Koven, under the treatment of Gené, operatic composition in Vienna, and subsequently with the distinguished specialist and composer, Leo Delibes, in Paris. That was the basis of De Koven's subsequent work. After "Robin Hood" success came "The Fencing Master," "Roh Roy," "The Tzigane," "The Highwayman," etc. The public responded, as it always has with De Koven, with a certain amount of assurance that something good would be forthcoming, and there has been no disappointment, for his latest work, "The Golden Butterfly," now a success, with Grace Van Studdiford singing the leading part, is a kind of culmination of De Koven's ideas, limited as they must be by the fact that he dare not overstep certain bounds if he wishes to meet the popular demand for opera of this kind.

The Social Register, through the facts and figures which it collects for its readers, finds that it has fewer marriages to report for the present issue than for the one just preceding it. In New York the decrease is put definitely at 20 per cent. And there has been a decrease throughout the country, also, which this authority characterizes as "general." The consideration of expense has evidently upset some of the best laid plans of Cupid. But he may share in the prosperity that is scheduled for the coming year. The marriage rate regularly affords a fairly good barometer of business conditions.

Gerald Du Maurier, now one of the able light comedians of the London stage, and Irene Vanhugh, as accomplished a comedienne, and already seen here as the manicure of Piner's "Quex," are soon to act together here in America.

Seventeen young women from Washington State College are giving demonstrations of 125 different ways of preparing the apple for food, at the Spokane national exhibit now in progress.

Josie Intropidi is in the cast of "Mlle. Michiel," Lulu Glaser's latest success.

LITERARY NOTES.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford has written the introduction to Little, Brown & Co.'s new and complete edition of the poems of Louise Chandler Moulton. The two writers were intimate friends, and Mrs. Spofford gives some biographical notes of particular interest and a sympathetic study of Mrs. Moulton's poetic gift.

J. Berg Esenwein, editor of Lippincott's Magazine, has completed a volume entitled "Writing the Short Story," which will soon come from the presses of a Boston publishing house. It was Mr. Esenwein's good fortune to find in a neglected corner of a Lippincott safe two manuscripts by Ouida, written twenty-five years ago and held under the condition that they were not to be published during her lifetime. The papers will appear during the coming year in the magazine.

Now that his political campaign is over, and he has been defeated as the Democratic candidate for congressman in the Seventh New Jersey District, Edward W. Townsend, the creator of Chimmie Fadden, has turned himself again to hook-making, and is busily completing a novel in which is promised more slang, but of a new order from that which made him famous as a depicor of Manhattan low life. It will have for title "The Climbing Courvatels," and it will be published in the spring.

The manuscript of Lamh's "Dream Children," written on two folio leaves and bound by Riviere, is offered for sale in London for $1250. It is recalled that for two years of his work on the "Eli" essays Lamh received but $850.

At last the friends of the late Oscar Wilde possess funds to build him a monument in Pere la Chaise. The giver of $15,000 for this purpose does not wish his name known, and whether he is chiefly interested in Wilde or the young sculptor Jacob Epstein is not sure; but his one condition is that Epstein should do the work.

The thirty-sixth anniversary of the big Boston fire was celebrated by the veteran firemen's association of that city recently. The association numbers about 200 members, and annually they get together to exchange tales of the memorable two days in 1872 when more than $60,000,000 worth of property was destroyed, 800 buildings were leveled or made useless, and eleven lives lost. A year ago the surviving members of the common council of that year met for a reunion. Of the sixty-four members there were seventeen survivors in 1907.

The new special delivery stamp bears the cap of Mercury instead of the figure of a messenger boy. Nothing short of a flying apparatus will satisfy the modern demand for rapid transit.

A "BANNER" ORPHEUM BILL.

By Josephine Hart Phelps.

It is the custom to remark gravely each week, in the press-agent-inspired utterances that are printed as theatrical news, that the Orpheum has a banner bill; but this week it is really true. The bill is both interesting and meritorious from start to finish.

Mlle. De Dio is featured as the star, but, thoroughly as her really beautiful act deserves stellar honors in vaudeville, the leading number in point both of merit and popularity is "The Mayor and the Manicure," an exceedingly bright, clever, and entertaining, as well as realistic, playlet by George Ade, which is acted in first-class style by Edwin Holt and his small group of players. The piece contains a delightful sketch of a typical American; one of those shrewd, good-humoredly cynical men, full of quick, dry American humor, and warmed through, almost if not quite to the point of loveliness, by the wholesome heartiness of family affections. This is the mayor of the piece, a successful and prosperous man of affairs, who controls both business and politics in his town, and is consequently more than a match for the spectacularly blonde manicure who comes to him with a handful of letters from his son, which she claims are compromising. The mayor speedily grasps the situation, and sizes up the character and pretensions of the golden-tressed manicure almost at a glance.

The rich thing in the scene that follows is his attitude toward her. His surface careless politeness, the disdainful familiarity with which he addresses the meretricious charmer by her first name, his general air of jovial contempt, made one realize how deep-rooted is the scorn of the wholesome-natured man, no matter how worldly he may be or tolerant of other things, for the adventuress who trades on her woman's attractiveness for the purpose of feathering her nest.

Edwin Holt made the mayor live before us. The comedy side of the characterization was first-class; yet it was all natural and spontaneous. There was absolutely not a breath of that unctuous commonness, that open appeal to the childish side of a vaudeville audience, by which so many comedians, even in the line of legitimate comedy work, win cheap victories.

Mr. Holt is a first-class actor, and he did not drag the first-class playlet down to the ranks of second-class material. Besides contributing his own excellent work he added to the success of the piece by having good players. Caroline Greenfield's portrait of Genevieve Le Claire, the too, too plump, sheath-gowned manicure of presumably tender years, whose young affections are claimed to have been sought and then slighted by the mayor's undergraduate son, was a triumph of apt characterization. Everything was in keeping. The flashy, up-to-date dress, with its liberal revelations of line and curve, the bleached hair, the extensive pompadour, the hard, confident look, the assured tone, and above all that air of complete assurance with men which is the really pathetic sign manual of the women whom hardening experience has enlightened as to the weakness of man when in the clutch of temptation of the feminine gender.

Paul Byron, as the indiscreet undergraduate who admits to his twinkly-eyed sire to having "chased around a little" with the lovely Genevieve, attested by his fresh youthfulness and the stamp of intelligence on his work as to the wisdom of his selection for the post of juvenile in the little company, while the fourth member, Dorothy Gibson, was clearly selected because of the contrast afforded by her air of ingenuous youth to the sophisticated and well-emphasized charms of the gilt-haired blackmailer.

The piece, considering its small size, is rich in bright repartee and hits of the good-humored yet shrewd cynicism which is recognized as one of George Ade's trade-marks.

"Did you make love to little Genevieve here?" inquires Milford, senior, of his son, when the latter weakens upon being confronted by the manicuring siren. "I—I chased around with her, more or less," admits the entangled youth. "My son," says the mayor, solemnly and judicially, "don't you know that it is only married men who go chasing around after affinities?"

The son pleads weakly that his love-making was all in joke, but the mayor, with a visible relaxation of the corners of his mouth, declares that "a woman never gets old enough to regard love-making as a joke."

Altogether, the play offers a most attractive sketch of the type of man who is broad-minded enough to understand life and human nature, and yet preserve a fund of amused toleration, while keeping perfectly straight clear through.

Mlle. De Dio's number, in point of importance, comes next on the week's programme. Mlle. De Dio herself was invisible for quite a time, while we gazed upon wonders of electric display taking shape on the diamond-studded curtain of darkness in front of us. There were great curves that slowly resolved themselves into wonderfully patterned wheels, and great wheels which, attracting to themselves intricate and marvelously beautiful borderings, were transformed into revolving circles, the elaborate patterns of which glittered with millions of electric diamonds against the velvet-dark background.

We gazed, fascinated like children looking into a fairyland made real. And presently we saw the Titania of all this fairy realm. A woman's form was faintly seen, shimmering, glowing, flashing, under a hundred waves of light and color. Or was it a butterfly? It moved, advanced, and, in vague, elusive glimpses, the glittering mystery at last revealed itself as the shape of a lovely woman.

Then began the gorgeous display of light and color made familiar, but never tame nor common, by Loie Fuller and Papinta. There were countless ripples of silk unfurled in the fire-red and orange glow which looked as if the supple form they surrounded was drawing its vivid life from flame.

Then everything shifted. There was a grotto in ocean depths, and from a huge shell, over which a diver bent, a lovely woman, clothed in rainbow draperies, hounded forth. This was supposed, in spite of the unpearl-like ardor of the colors with which she glowed, to be the birth of the pearl.

At last came the dance, rather indifferently done, by the way. A little French, Papinta-like figure flitted around the stage, changing its aspect continually under the shifting patterns cast by the electric attachment at the rear of the auditorium.

Finally came De Dio, out in ordinary gaslight, draped in multitudinous yards of white silk, with light and color and shimmer and glow playing all about her. A pretty, black-haired, white-teethed, smiling woman, a Latin through and through. The press agent designates her as the lady who declined the hand of an Austrian archduke, and, of course, there is absolutely not the faintest shadow of a doubt that the story is true. Dancers who reject archdukes are as common as June strawberries.

Even after these good things, there were other numbers worth seeing. There were Billy Gaston and Ethel Green, Billy as cute and "mother's-darling-boy"-ish as ever. Ethel Green has not acquired any new tricks that spoil the ingenuousness of her coqueteries with her stage lover, and her rich little soprano, with its childlike sweetness of tone, is prettier than ever. I hope, though, if Ethel should consult one of her friends, in the anxious way women do, and say "Do you really think I ought to send this dotted muslin to the wash?" I hope, I hope her friend will be candid and say "yes."

Herman Meyer, the interrogative pianist, who talks, and plays, and propounds riddles and conundrums, and throws in a bucketful of jokes, made an unqualified hit. His patter is bright and amusing, his imitations of musical instruments cleverly realistic, and his German dialect, that a vaudeville audience always adores, very complete. However, he put the worst thing he did—the hen imitation—at the end of his act, which shows how impossible it is always to depend upon one's own judgment concerning one's self.

Even that tiny skit "A Case of Emergency," played by Charles and Fannie Van, which began with the usual yawping commonly known as singing in song and dance acts, turned out to be amusing. The man is the leading comedian, but, trifling as it was, the woman so sunk herself into her part and was so grave and matter-of-fact in the rehearsal of her song, that she steadily grew in the favor of the audience.

A very elaborate turn, done by trained dogs, completed the programme. This was supposed to be a play, but seemed to consist merely of a series of exits and entrances by the animals, who were costumed in great variety, and who invariably entered upright, walking gravely on their hind feet, and looking like monkeys, freaks, and nondescripts. The act was funnily pathetic. Poor little martyrs! One felt ashamed of laughing at them. Yet they were funny. Some of them, like Patricia O'Brien, were so temperamental, and betrayed it in the way they crossed the stage. No dog was allowed to linger. It was fatal, as he speedily lost the perpendicular. So each one made for a friendly opening, into which he climbed, or fell, or holted, trying with all his doggish might to win the approval of his unseen trainer by keeping his forefeet up in the air. Some walked slowly and with care, others harked protestingly, dashing like mad to the haven which offered succor. Some tottered like little-feeet Chinese women—the poor things even had shoes on—others scurried to the exit, every nerve and sinew seeming to declare "I want to get the durned thing over."

The effect of the turn was most peculiar, on account of the invisibility of the trainer, the variety and human style of the costumes, and the elaboration of the stage settings. So this act may also be counted as a great success, as it held the audience amused and diverted for a long time.

Mr. Kennedy's "The Winterfeast."

Charles Rann Kennedy's second play, "The Winterfeast," is a dismal failure in New York in spite of the praise of literary critics. In other words, it displays the ability of the author, except as a dramatist. The Evening Post has this to say of the piece, but it is really not particularly consoling:

"But the play is none the less a work of solid literary and dramatic merit, revealing uncommon powers of imagination and constructive development. There is very little in it, of course, to delight the souls of those who find refreshment in the dreary inanities of the ordinary farcical or musical comedy. The choicest entertainment which it offers is meant primarily for those who can appreciate the purpose and quality of an artistic design and the beauties of artistic workmanship in the elaboration of it. There have been many more cheerful and inspiring tales than this study of the ultimate consequences of an original wrong, complicated by misrepresentations, aggravated by malice, and working upon the fiercest of the primitive emotions. But it is not offered under any pretense of being merely amusing. It is, in its way, a morality, showing the harvest of horrors which is reaped from the original sowing of deceit. The story might seem extravagant in modern setting, but in no way exceeds the limits of poetic or dramatic license when submitted as an Icelandic saga."

Mrs. Fiske's latest production, "Salvation Nell," in which she plays the name part, is too realistic for some of the New York critics. It is a great popular success, however. Mrs. Fiske's point of view regarding the play is shown in an extract from a letter written by her to a friend: "I am told that the truth in 'Salvation Nell' is disturbing to some persons. Perhaps some of those persons would digest, without difficulty, the suave vulgarity of the sexual society play. My heart has always been in the slums and with dumb animals. The poor and the dumb know the truth about life. The others barely skirt it. In the luxurious quarters of the city there are tragedies enough, but for the most part they are of our own making. They are born of the demons within—of our vanities and passions. There is in them more fantasy than truth. But down there in the underworld they know. Down there we find the 'bitterness and cruelty' of life, but we find there other things besides—cheerfulness and happiness, and many beautiful things, among them generosity—almost an unknown quality save among the very poor."

VANITY FAIR.

Evidently the modern invention of the boycott is no respecter of persons, since it has made a victim of King Edward. It seems that the king has received a notification from the Windsor tradesmen that they will close their shops unanimously upon the next occasion when royal visitors are entertained at the Castle.

It must be admitted that the tradesmen have a grievance from their own peculiar point of view. Queen Victoria used to spend a good deal of her time at Windsor, and it was by her wish that the supplies for the castle were ordered from the local shops. But King Edward has different ideas. Windsor sees very little of him, certainly for not more than about three weeks in the year, and even upon these rare occasions he deals exclusively with the London tradesmen, ordering even the fodder for his horses from the metropolis. The royal dinners and luncheons come direct from London caterers, and those who associate royalty with prodigality may be interested to know that state luncheons are paid for at the rate of $1.50 a plate and dinners at $3.25 a plate, including wine. When the King of Sweden recently visited Windsor the tradesmen sent a deputation to the king asking for a share of the royal custom. The king was angry and refused to receive the worthy shopkeepers, who, in retaliation and with an unexpected spark of independence, have sent an intimation that their shops will be closed upon the next occasion of a royal visit to Windsor.

But we need not suppose that the king will abdicate as a result. He probably had a good reason for what he did. He may have heard that a quite intolerable funkism prevailed throughout the town of Windsor, and that royal patronage implied a certain amount of insolence to every one who was not royal, or at least titled. Complaints of this sort of thing were common enough in the old days, and the king's known hatred of toadyism is quite enough to account for his domestic policy in this respect. He may have discovered, moreover, that he was being overcharged, another thing to which he has a deep and reasonable objection. There are two classes of English towns that are saturated with an atmosphere positively asphyxiating to a good democrat. Royal towns are bad enough, but there are very few of them. But there are a great many cathedral towns, and their atmosphere on the whole is the more unbearable. Episcopal funkism is of the most offensive variety, with its adoration of deans and bishops and its retinues of obsequious clients. Royalty nowadays is usually democratic, and even the dignitaries of the church are slowly getting themselves into the right perspective for self-observation. It is one of their misfortunes that they are not able to reduce—or rather to elevate—their admirers to their own level of common sense.

There are some points in connection with the presidential election to which far too little attention has been given, and we are grateful to Mrs. Frederick Tyson of Baltimore for pointing them out. Permitting ourselves for the moment to use a detestably vulgar phrase, it may be said that Mrs. Tyson is a "prominent society woman" and of an old Maryland family. Mrs. Tyson has been looking at the election from "a purely social standpoint," and she finds that everything has happened according to Hoyle. Mr. Taft is much superior to either Mr. Bryan or Mr. Roosevelt.

He has more tact, more refinement than President Roosevelt, and much more than Mr. Bryan. Mr. Roosevelt has that unpardonable thing in a man—a loud voice and that hammer-and-tongs manner of going about things. His vulgar manner of expressing himself at inopportune times has taught us that we must have a more refined man in the presidential chair. What would other countries think of us if our President were not a man who had all the instincts and marks of gentle breeding and inestimable tact and finesse? Mr. Taft has all of these.

Mr. Bryan is too democratic. I have been told that he once went to a store in Lincoln in a rickety farm wagon, wearing jeans, and came out laden with purchases—wire and coffee—and on one occasion a huge coffee pot, which he wielded and said:

"The wife calculates to have some company and she says the old pot is too small. I guess this will serve the purpose."

"That is absolutely impossible in a President or in one who wishes to be. And then he said he was going to have Mr. Kern in the White House with him. Mr. and Mrs. Kern, ladies, are quite impossible people. I assure you.

Now, if all this had been said before the election we might have been spared some very prolix explanations of the Republican triumph. In spite of Mrs. Tyson's silence at a time when she ought to have spoken, there must have been a general dread throughout the country of the foreign condemnation that would have certainly followed the choice of a President who was not of "gentle breeding." But we are genuinely sorry to hear that horrible story of Mr. Bryan. We had no idea that things had gone so far. Imagine a presidential candidate in jeans. Picture him riding in a farm wagon, and a rickety one at that, and buying wire, coffee, and a coffee pot. Apparently he had not even the decency to have them wrapped up, while as for the coffee pot, he actually wielded it while avowing the base and unworthy purpose to which it was to be put.

We wonder what Mr. and Mrs. Kern have done that they should be "quite impossible people." After the Bryan story it is hard to imagine any lower depth to which these unlucky people could have descended. Can it be that Mr. Kern was detected in the act of buying a frying pan, for example? But why speculate? It is enough that he and Mrs. Kern are "quite impossible people." The ballot box was the first to say so, and now Mrs. Tyson confirms the voice of the people.

It is to be noted that Mrs. Tyson has nothing to say about Mrs. Taft, but surely all Mr. Taft's sweetnesses would be wasted on the desert air without the social cooperation of the future mistress of the White House. Really, Mrs. Tyson should be more inclusive. She should not leave us in this dismal state of suspense and conjecture. But the Atchison Globe helps us out to a certain extent, although the social judgments of Kansas must be inferior in value to the cultured verdicts of Maryland. The Globe seems to think that we are hearing just a shade too much about Mrs. Taft, and if there is already a superfluity of information, what may we expect later on? The latest report is to the effect that Mrs. Taft is the "best cook in Cincinnati." The Globe very pertinently remarks that there is no way of finding out who is the best cook in so large a city, but it is probably not Mrs. Taft. The best cook is most likely a man, and a foreigner at that. The Globe continues: "But Mrs. Taft seems to have a fondness for seeing her name in print. And we are profoundly sorry. Mrs.

Roosevelt was a fine exception. We'll miss Mrs. Roosevelt from the White House."

The efforts that are being made to stamp out the tipping habit show a failure to understand the weaknesses of human nature upon which that habit is based. Take, for instance, the discussion on the subject that has just found a place in the proceedings of the Hotel-Keepers' Congress at Rome. This discussion culminated in a proposal to add a certain percentage to the bill, this additional amount to be divided by the hotel proprietor among the waiters.

The experiment will be a short one. The most lavish tip giver will resent an increase in his bill quite as much as any one else, because he will give the tips just the same as he did before. The psychology of the tip is a desire to enter into personal relations with the waiter and to place him under such peculiar obligations, or the expectation of them, that he will give special and particular service. The tip is not given from the abstract desire that the waiter shall be enriched. The tip giver has no more than the ordinary allowance of selfishness, if, indeed, he has so much, and his idea in giving the fee is to raise himself at the points of comfort and service above the heads of those who have given smaller tips or no tips at all. This desire will not be gratified by an increase in his bill, because he knows quite well that the additional amount thus exacted will not return to him in the shape of exceptional service to himself. Tip-giving is but a form of the old evil of special privilege hunting; it is an attempt to buy something exclusive, and if the wages of the waiter were to be quadrupled tomorrow his harvest of tips would not be seriously diminished.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

But recently arrived, a shade bustling up to St. Peter. "My good man," said he, "will you tell me where I must go to get souvenir post-cards?" And St. Peter, eying him sourly, told him where he could go to.

The traveler exhibited a peculiar nervousness on seeing the long-legged, slim, fierce-looking hogs that roamed at will over the country. At length he asked a native sitting on a fence by the roadside: "Aren't these razorback hogs rather dangerous?" "I never heard of none of them doing any harm," remarked the native. "I think they must be safety razorbacks."

The village postmaster doubted that the animal offered for sale was really "a valuable watchdog," and eyed rather dubiously the nondescript canine. "Deed he am, hoss," asseverated Rastus. "But if he was as good a watchdog as you make out, how is it you want to sell him at all?" "Yo' see, hoss, it am dis way: In dese hard times I aint done got nuthin' to watch."

De Lancey Nicoll, the New York lawyer, discussing a celebrated case, gave his idea of a suspicious question—one of those suspicious questions which carry their own conviction with them. "It is just such a question as a gilded youth asked the head waiter in a Broadway restaurant the other morning. 'Was Blank here last night?' he hegan. 'Yes, sir,' the waiter answered. 'And,' said the youth, nervously, 'was I with him?'"

They passed a magnificent building during their travels. "That's a fine house," said Brown to Jones, "and yet I can not bear to look at it." "Why not?" asked Jones. "Why?" repeated Brown. "Because the owner huilt it out of blood, the aches, the groans of his fellow-men; out of the grief of children and the wails of women." "Great Scott!" exclaimed Jones: "the hrute! What is he—a money lender?" "Oh, no, dear friend; he is a dentist!"

When General Schenck, whose greatest fame rests upon his having introduced the game of poker into England, first arrived in London as American minister to the court of St. James he took a little of his spare time to visit the sights of the British capital. Among other places he visited Mme. Tussaud's wax works. "And what do you think of our great wax work exhibition?" asked a friend. "Well," replied the general, "it struck me as being very like the ordinary English evening party."

Hayti was in the midst of a revolution. As a phase of it two armed hodies were approaching each other so that a third was about to be caught between them. The commander of the third party saw the predicament. On the right government troops, on the left insurgents. "General, why do you not give the order to fire?" asked an aide, dashing up on a lame mule. "I would like to," responded the general, "hut, Great Scott! I can't remember which side we're fighting for."

The late Charles Eliot Norton was wont to deplore the modern youth's preference of brawn to brain. He used to tell of a football game he once witnessed: "Princeton had a splendid player in Poe—you will remember little Poe?—and Professor Norton, thinking of 'The Raven' and 'Annabel Lee,' said to the lad at his side: 'He plays well, that Poe.' 'Doesn't he?' the youth cried. 'Is he,' said Professor Norton, 'any relation to the great Poe?' 'Any relation?' said the youth, frowning. 'Why, he is the great Poe.'"

Being pursued by a farmer and his three sons after being caught in the chicken yard, a young colored person had just made up his mind that he was not eluding his followers as quickly as might be when a long-eared jack rabbit jumped up from the roadside and started down the road ahead of him. The would-be chicken thief had run a few hundred feet further when the farmer and his boys were astonished to hear the negro shout, in a voice that quavered with fright, though unrestrained: "Say, for de Lord sake, yo' rahhit, get out ob de way and let some one run who can run."

In a volume lately published in London, "Piccadilly to Pall Mall," there is this queer anecdote of the vagaries of social life in the capital: Some years ago an eminent personage accepted, or suggested, a dinner with a certain millionaire, at that time comparatively unknown. The first guest to arrive, having explained to the hutter that being unacquainted with his host he would wait till some one else came who could introduce him, lingered in the hall. The second was in the same predicament, as were the third, fourth, fifth, and other guests up to the ninth, who chanced to be "the eminent personage" himself. Upon the dilemma being explained to him, he cheerfully said, "Oh, come along with me. I will introduce you all—I know him."

Two men from New York awoke one morning to find themselves in Savannah. Remembering that they were in a prohibition State, and having a thirst worthy of their surroundings, the pair started out on a still hunt for an eye-opener. They were not acquainted and were in a quandary as to where to start on their quest, and while they were debating the question mentally between them they were approached by a pleasant-looking policeman, who wished them good morning. "Say, Jim," said one of the pilgrims to the other, "this is an opening. Here's a good fellow; let's ask him." It was agreed, and the officer answered their question by saying laconically, "Follow me." He walked them three hocks until they stood in front of the cathedral. Here he paused. The travelers looked at each other in astonishment. "Surely, my good man," said the first, "you do not mean to tell us that a hind tiger is being operated in church?" "You see the church, do you?" asked the policeman solemnly. "Yes," assented the two. "Well, that is the only place in Savannah that you can't get it," said he.

Cut Up.

There was a man in our town,
And wondrous wise was he,
And with an axe and many whacks
He once cut down a tree.

And when he saw the tree was down,
With all his might and main
He straightway took another axe
And cut it up again.

A Serious Love Spell.

A young lady sits in our choir
Whose hair is the color of foir,
But her charm is unique,
She has such a fair chique,
It is really a joy to be noir.

Whenever she looks down the aisle
She gives me a beautiful smile;
And of all her beaux,
I am certain she sheaux
That she loves me the best all the whaisle.

Last Sunday she wore a new-saquee.
Cut low at the front and the baquee,
And a lovely houquet,
Worn in such a cute wuet
As only few girls have the knaquee.

Some day, ere she grows too antique,
In marriage her hand I will sique.
If she's not a coquette—
Which I'd greatly regruette—
She shall share my two sovereigns a wique.

The Dear Girls.

That Christmas time is near at hand
Strong evidence I find,
For all the girls I know have grown
Of late exceeding kind.

Contented.

They are having fourteen inches of snow in Michigan,
And every time I read it I'm a plum' contented man;
My habies are a-playin' with their curls hare in the sun,
And the butterflies are driftin' where they laugh and romp and run,
And a mockin' bird is liftin' of his voice up for to sing
And I'm pushin' of the baby in the little old rope swing,
And I stop to pick an orange for the little kids to eat,
And they clamber on the seesaw an' set there an' swing their feet.

I kin see the snow a-driftin' in my mind's eye,
And I turn
From the picture with a shiver, where the lily and the fern
And the roses are a-growin', and the kids are laughin', too;
And I see the clouds a-driftin', and the skies are warm and blue;
O, I never want to leave it, and I never want to go
Where the frost has gripped the country and the fence is hid by snow;
I prefer to see the children sit bareheaded in the swing,
And to hear the birds a-hidin' in the leafy trees to sing.

I prefer the good old summer lasting all the year around,
I prefer the blooming roses to the snow-drifts, and the sound
Of the little babies laughing to the moaning of the wind
As it whirls around the corner in the night and shakes the blind,
Like the spirit of all mischief was a-ridin' on the storm,
And you can't build up a fire that will half ways keep you warm.
Let them have their fourteen inches of cold snow in Michigan,
I'm a-hangin' out in Texas, and am a contented man.

PERSONAL.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

Christmas cheer and family reunions have caused a slight cessation of the gaieties of the winter, but it is merely a pause, and the two months before Lent will be even busier in the social world than the first half of the winter has been.

The wedding of Miss Amy Porter, daughter of Mrs. M. C. Porter, to Mr. William Bethune Ireland will take place on Tuesday evening, December 29, at the home of the bride's grandmother, Mrs. C. M. Clarke, in Presidio Terrace.

The wedding of Miss Frances Helen Trent, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lamartine Trent, to Mr. Harold Power took place on Tuesday of last week at the home of the bride's parents at Auburn. Mr. and Mrs. Power spent a fortnight in Southern California and will be at home at Bullion, California, after January 15.

Among those who entertained before the Nordica concert at the St. Francis last week was Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who had as her guests Mrs. Julius Kruttschnitt, Count d'Abbas, Miss Alyce Sullivan, Mr. Franklin Gregory, Miss Maud O'Connor, Mr. S. G. Murphy, Mr. and Mrs. R. P. Schwerin, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, and Mr. Downey Harvey.

Mr. Harry Scott entertained at dinner in the Hotel St. Francis last Thursday in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Oliver Tobin. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer Smith, Mr. and Mrs. George T. Cameron, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Rebecca Kruttschnitt, Miss Enid Gregg, Miss de Young, Mr. Ferdinand Theriot, Mr. Cyril Tobin, and Mr. Charles de Young.

The members of the Burlingame Club will entertain at a fancy dress dance on New Year's Eve.

The officers and ladies of the Presidio will entertain at a dance on Wednesday evening, December 30.

Mrs. Carter Pomeroy will entertain at an informal dance for Miss Harriet Pomeroy on Tuesday evening next at her home on Clay Street, instead of the following evening as originally announced.

Miss Katherine Farrell will entertain at a luncheon on Wednesday, December 30, in honor of Miss Anna Weller.

Mrs. James L. Flood was the hostess at a luncheon at the Fairmont on Thursday of last week in honor of Miss Katharine Donohoe. Those present were Mrs. Gerald Rathbone, Miss Florence Breckinridge, Miss Margaret Newhall, Miss Claire Nichols, Miss Dolly MacGavin, Miss Mary Josselyn, Miss Elena Robinson, Miss Martha Calhoun, Miss Mary Keeney, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Margaret Calhoun, Miss Harriett Alexander, Miss Marian Newhall, Miss Elizabeth Newhall, Miss Elizabeth Woods, Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, Miss Clara Allen, and Miss Florence Hopkins.

Miss Leslie Page entertained at a luncheon at her home on Pacific Avenue on Friday of last week.

Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels was the hostess at a luncheon on Wednesday of last week at her home on Pacific Avenue in honor of Miss Elizabeth Woods.

Mrs. Alexander Hamilton was the hostess at a luncheon at the St. Francis on Monday of last week.

Miss Gertrude Perry entertained at a luncheon at the Fairmont on Monday last in honor of Miss Dorothy Chapman.

Mrs. Patrick Calhoun was the hostess at a dinner on Wednesday evening of last week at her home on Broadway, taking her guests afterwards to the concert of the St. Francis Musical Art Society.

Mr. and Mrs. George Almer Newhall entertained at a dinner on Friday evening of last week before the Greenway dance in honor of Miss Elizabeth Woods. Those present were Mr. and Mrs. Robert J. Woods, Miss Virginia Newhall, Miss Frances Newhall, Miss Harriett Alexander, Miss Louisiana Foster, Miss Marian Miller, Mr. Rudolph Bertheau, Mr. Alan Van Fleet, Mr. Lovell Langstroth, Mr. Almer Newhall, Mr. Edwin Newhall, and Mr. Frank Langstroth.

Mrs. J. J. Brice was the hostess at a tea on Saturday afternoon last at the Hotel Knickerbocker in honor of Miss Anna Weller. Assisting in receiving were Mrs. Charles Weller, Mrs. Ernest Stent, Mrs. George Holcombe, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Margaret Calhoun, Miss Justine McClanahan, Miss Innes Keeney, Miss Hanna Du Bois, Miss Emily Du Bois, Miss Ethel McAllister, and Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick.

Mrs. Dixwell Hewitt was the hostess at an informal tea at her home on Broadway on Thursday afternoon of last week.

Miss Cora Smedberg entertained at an informal tea on Sunday afternoon last at her apartment at the Hillcrest.

Miss Dolly MacGavin was the hostess at an informal tea on Sunday last at her home on California Street.

Mrs. Elsa Draper and Miss Dorothy Draper entertained at an informal tea on Friday afternoon of last week in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont.

Mrs. A. H. Loughborough entertained at an informal tea at the Fairmont on Tuesday of last week.

Miss Rebecca Kruttschnitt was the hostess at an informal tea in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont on Thursday afternoon of last week.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a résumé of movements to and from this city and Coast and the whereabouts of absent Californians:

Mrs. William S. Tevis, who has been in town for a few weeks, returned this week to her Bakersfield ranch for the Christmas holidays. She was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Romualdo Pacheco, who arrived on Sunday last from New York for a visit.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Girvin (formerly Miss Pauline Duncan) arrived last Saturday from Ishpeming, Michigan, and are spending a brief time at the Girvin country place at Menlo Park before coming to town to make their home.

Mrs. Julius Kruttschnitt and Miss Rebecca Kruttschnitt left on Friday of last week for the East, after a stay here of a month's duration.

Mrs. J. G. Kittle and Mr. Allen Kittle will leave early in January for Egypt, where they will spend the rest of the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert G. Hooker have closed their Burlingame home and are at the St. Francis Hotel for a month's stay.

Miss Jennie Crocker and Mr. Templeton Crocker have returned from a brief trip to New York.

Mrs. J. R. K. Nuttall and Mrs. Rosenstock have gone to Southern California for the holiday season.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert Dibblee are spending the winter in town and have a house on California Street.

Miss Sara Coffin has returned, after a brief visit in Michigan.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Oxnard will leave early in January for a visit to New Orleans, and will probably go to Europe before returning to California.

Mrs. E. A. Selfridge has returned from a stay of some weeks in the East.

Mr. and Mrs. George H. Pope and Mrs. William H. Taylor have returned, after spending several months in Europe and New York.

Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lent are planning to go abroad in January.

Miss Margaret Tucker, who is the guest of Mr. and Mrs. James Ellis Tucker, will not return to her home in Virginia until after the New Year.

Mrs. Alston Hayne and Miss Roherta Heath left this week for Santa Barbara for a stay of several days.

Mrs. John F. Swift has returned to her home in Berkeley, after a visit to relatives in Norfolk, Virginia.

Dr. Henry Stevens Kiersted, U. S. A., and Mrs. Kiersted left last week for Philadelphia, where they will spend several weeks as the guests of relatives.

Mr. Drummond MacGavin leaves in a day or two for Shasta, where he will remain for some time.

Miss Willatta Hill has come down from her home in Wawona for a few days and is at the Fairmont Hotel.

Among diplomats recently at the Fairmont Hotel was the Hon. J. H. Van Royen, minister plenipotentiary and ambassador extraordinary from Netherlands to Tokyo, Japan. Mr. Van Royen was accompanied by Mme. Royen and children, with maids and valet.

Among recent arrivals from Los Angeles at the Fairmont Hotel were Mr. Frank S. Hicks, Mr. J. C. Thompson, Mr. J. B. Alexander, Miss Margaret Drake, Mr. Charles Drake, Mrs. James W. Winston, children, and maids, and Mr. T. A. Hays.

Dr. and Mrs. David Cohn and Miss Edith Cohn have returned from Europe and are occupying apartments at the Fairmont.

Mrs. Phebe Hearst is occupying her apartments at the Fairmont for a few days.

Mr. William Randolph Hearst arrived in San Francisco on Tuesday and has taken apartments at the Fairmont.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sutro are back at the St. Francis.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert G. Hooker have come up from Burlingame to spend a month at the St. Francis.

Miss Agnes Tillmann, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Tillmann, Jr., who went abroad in the spring, was recently joined by her father, and they expect to spend the Christmas holidays with relatives in Germany, afterwards making a tour of the Continent.

A few of the recent arrivals from San Francisco at the Tavern of Tamalpais were: Mrs. O. G. Hallett, Miss Mary Hallett, Mrs. H. Bush, Mrs. B. W. Stone, Mr. B. W. Stone, Miss J. Snyder, Mrs. Kate Webster, Mr. Daniel E. Hayes, Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Powell, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Lierly, Mr. E. B. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Smith, Miss Lucille Smith, Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Linzee.

Among recent registrations at the Hotel Argonaut are: Dr. H. B. F. Christian, Philadelphia; Mr. L. B. Fulton, Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Morton, Sacramento; Mr. R. Glocking, New York; Mr. H. E. Cosgrove, Seattle;

Mr. Dale Burgess, Denver; Mr. C. Eaton Young, Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. O. G. Gould, Bakersfield; Mr. and Mrs. L. S. G. Glass, Los Angeles; Mr. F. G. Calkins, Los Angeles; Mr. C. Rosen, Germany.

The Gadski Concerts.

Mme. Johanna Gadski, one of the world's greatest artists, will appear at the Van Ness Theatre, under the Greenbaum direction, for two concerts, Sunday afternoon, January 10 and 17. On these occasions Mme. Gadski will offer programmes quite different from any she has previously sung in this city, with the exception of the Wagnerian numbers, without which a Gadski programme would scarcely be accepted. Mme. Gadski is an active member of the Metropolitan Opera House company, but put a clause in her contract giving her six weeks in which to make this concert tour.

Mail orders for this attraction will be received and filled in order of their receipt. They must be accompanied by check or money order and made payable to Will L. Greenbaum, at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where all communications should be addressed.

It is probable that Mme. Gadski will appear at a matinée in Oakland, but the date for this event has not been definitely decided on. It will be announced next week.

Prices for the Gadski concerts will range from $2.50 down to $1.

Hother Wismer's Concert.

A large and enthusiastic audience greeted Hother Wismer, the violinist, at his concert at the Fairmont, Thursday evening of last week. Mr. Wismer proved more than a satisfaction to his many friends, and a delight to all who heard him for the first time. He has gained in technic and in the ability to interpret the composer's work since his appearances in the days before he went abroad. There is a suggestion of Kreisler in his earnest, serious manner, and in his firm grasp of the quality of his music. He feels the beauty and strength of the compositions he plays, and is able to govern his moods. Frederick Maurer played the accompaniments admirably, Mrs. Blanchard sang with her usual grace and charm, and Mrs. Wismer, in a list of songs that might well have been longer, was in voice and artistic expression invariably pleasing.

Mrs. James Brown Potter, the actress, will appear in vaudeville shortly after the new year. She will begin her engagement at the Lincoln Square Theatre in New York and will receive $2000 a week for a season of twenty weeks. It is asserted incidentally that Mrs. Potter's relatives and former friends have attempted to persuade her to drop the "Potter" from her stage name, even offering her a large monetary consideration to do so. Mrs. Potter is the daughter of Colonel David Urquart of Louisiana. She was married to James Brown Potter, son of Howard Potter and partner of Brown Brothers & Co., the bankers, at the age of sixteen. In 1887, at the height of her social career, when she was associated with Mrs. Paran Stevens and Ward McAllister, she made her appearance in the Haymarket Theatre, London, as Anne Silvester in Wilkie Collins's "Man and Wife."

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy officers who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

The promotion of Brigadier-General Frederick A. Smith, U. S. A., to his present rank was confirmed by the Senate on December 14. Lieutenant-Colonel Walter L. Finley, General Staff, U. S. A., is relieved from duty in the Department of the Lakes and will proceed to San Francisco and report to the commanding general, Department of California, for duty as chief of staff. He will arrive here about January 1.

Lieutenant-Colonel William R. Abercrombie, Twenty-Fifth Infantry, U. S. A., having reported at headquarters, Department of California, from leave of absence, is assigned to temporary duty at headquarters, pending the sailing of the transport from this port on or about January 5, when he will stand relieved and proceed on that transport to Manila, Philippine Islands.

Major W. W. Forsyth, Sixth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been ordered to report by letter to the Secretary of the Interior for assignment to duty as superintendent of the Yosemite National Park in addition to his duty as commanding officer of the troops designated for the protection and administration of the park. Major Forsyth will sail from the Philippines not later than February 15 for San Francisco.

Major John P. Hains, paymaster, U. S. A., is relieved from duty in Chicago, Illinois, to take effect upon the expiration of his leave of absence, and will then proceed to San Francisco and report in person to the commanding general, Department of California, for duty.

Major John S. Parke, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A., having reported at headquarters, Department of California, is assigned to temporary duty at headquarters pending the sailing of the transport on January 5, when he will stand relieved and proceed on that transport to Manila.

Captain Cornelis C. Smith, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been ordered to report by letter to the Secretary of the Interior for assignment to duty as superintendent of the Sequoia and Grant National Parks in addition to his duty as commanding officer of the troops designated for the protection and administration of the parks.

Captain Herbert B. Crosby, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., is detailed for general recruiting service and will proceed to Fort Slocum, New York, and report in person on January 1 to the commanding officer of the recruiting depot at that post for duty.

Captain Charles B. Drake, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty at the recruiting station, Fort Slocum, New York, and will proceed to join his regiment.

Captain Hugh K. Taylor, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., is detailed for general recruiting service and is ordered to proceed to Fort Slocum, New York, for ten days' instruction in methods of examining recruits, proceeding then to Birmingham, Alabama, for recruiting duty at that place.

Captain James M. Wheeler, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Presidio of San Francisco, has been appointed district ordnance officer to succeed Captain Solomon Avery, Jr., U. S. A., discharged from the service.

Captain Edwin G. Davis, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered to report in person to the commanding officer, Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, for surgical treatment.

Captain Henry B. Clark, quartermaster, U. S. A., has had his orders amended so as to direct him to take station temporarily at Seattle, Washington, in connection with his duties as constructing quartermaster at Fort Ward, Washington.

Captain William H. Bertsch, Fourth Infantry, U. S. A., is relieved from duty at the recruiting depot, Fort Slocum, New York, and will proceed to join his regiment. Upon his arrival in San Francisco, en route to the Philippines, he will report in person to the commanding general, Department of California, for duty, pending the departure of the transport on which he may secure accommodations.

Captain William L. Reed, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., has been relieved from recruiting duty at Evansville, Indiana, and ordered to rejoin his regiment. He will be stationed at Fort Mason and will command that post.

Commander J. H. Sears, U. S. N., has been detached from the command of the Concord and ordered to duty as naval attaché at Tokio and Peking.

Lieutenant-Commander T. S. Wilson, U. S. N., is detached from the Navy Yard, Mare Island, ordered home, and granted one month's leave of absence.

Lieutenant William T. Carpenter, Coast Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Presidio of San Francisco, has been granted two months' leave of absence, to take effect on or about January 1.

Lieutenant Ralph A. Jones, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., Fort Mason, has, under exceptional circumstances, been granted leave of absence for two months, to take effect at once.

Lieutenant Russell James, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., Fort McDowell, has been ordered to proceed to Fort Mason, reporting upon arrival to the commanding officer for duty, relieving Lieutenant Jones, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., while on leave.

Lieutenant Luther Felker, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Presidio of San Francisco, Lieutenant Harry Pfeil, First Field Artillery, U. S. A., Presidio of San Francisco, Lieutenant James H. Burns, First Field Artillery, U. S. A., Presidio of San Francisco, Lieutenant William C. Russell, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., Fort McDowell, Lieutenant William C. Whitener, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., Fort McDowell, Lieutenant Robert J. Binford, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Presidio of Monterey, and Lieutenant George C. Bowen, Twentieth Infantry, Fort Shafter, Honolulu, H. T., have been selected for a course of instruction at the School of Musketry, Presidio of Monterey, and will report to the commandant of the school on or before January 3.

The battalion of the Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., commanded by Major Samuel W. Dunning, stationed at Fort Shafter, Honolulu, will remain there during the tour of duty in the Philippine Islands of the headquarters and two battalions of that regiment sailing from this port in June.

American Chivalry.

The London Chronicle has a good word to say for American chivalry. It is not in vain, we are told, that American men call their attitude towards women "chivalrous." It is in fact a precise reproduction of that of sixteenth-century Italy, allowing for difference of idiom—a quite delightful difference. Here, for example, are the two declarations in regard to a gentle fiction of love intended to offer woman an appropriate but temporary compliment. This is the word of Count Baldassare Castiglione, writing of high life and manners: "Discourse of love is used by every gentleman . . . not only when impelled by passion, but also merely to do honor to the lady with whom he speaks. The pretense of loving her is at any rate a testimony to her worthiness to be loved. She, on her part, will for a time seem to fail to understand, and anon will take it all as a merry jest."

And here is the American gentleman's equivalent course of action. He was telling us of the visits of girls to country houses of the South where he and his contemporary young men were also guests. "We want to give them a good time," he said (generous wish! we can hardly imagine any other nation's men deliberately setting out with it), "and so we always propose to them." "Well, that is no doubt cheerful," said the Englishman, "and they, of course, understand it. But," he added, as an afterthought that apparently had not occurred to Count Baldassare Castiglione, "suppose one of them should take your courtship in earnest." "Then," said the American, and the fine phrase of the sixteenth century could not have been more expressive, "Then, of course, I should see her through."

Mme. Sembrich, the mischievous Rosina, the sprightly Zerlina, the brilliant Violetta, the grief-stricken Lucia, astonished the musical world recently with the announcement that she would retire from the operatic stage when her season ends in February at the Metropolitan. Mme. Sembrich said: "I have been thinking of it for a long time, and thought I had realized the full extent of what retirement means, but when I saw it in print I only then knew what renunciation meant. I know now why artists sometimes remain too long on the stage, and this was something I wished to avoid. It is not for the income, it is not through vanity, it is not that they do not know that they have no longer the charm of youth, but it is through love—through love of that dear public, to give up which is like parting with one of the dearest members of a family. You see perhaps we idealize the public as much as the public idealizes us. It is near us with its affection and admiration, it is far from us in the small things and the disagreeable events of daily life, just as from the stage they do not see the human weaknesses from which we all suffer."

Readers of "Gulliver's Travels" are naturally brought up sharp when first confronted by the word Houyhnhnm, the name given to the half horse half man creature, whose reasoning power Dean Swift makes so acute. The word is obviously an attempt to spell out the sound given by a horse's neigh—what the philologists call nomatopoeia—but one hesitates to pronounce it. An eminent English authority—no less than Professor Saintsbury—approves its pronunciation to rhyme with minim, and it has been so used in English verse.

Two notable weddings among stage and literary people are of recent record. John Fox, Jr., the novelist, was married to Fritzi Scheff, the comic-opera prima donna, a few days ago. Eugene W. Walter, the playwright and former newspaper man, was married the first of the present month to Charlotte Haden, known on the stage as Charlotte Walker, and who is a star in "The Warrens of Virginia," produced by David Belasco.

JANUARY NUMBER

THE BLUE MOON—A story of mystery and romance in the quest of a lost mine in Nevada. This is the latest novel by Mary Austin, famous as the author of "The Land of Little Rain." It begins in January and will run through six numbers.

DEFENSE OF THE PACIFIC—Two stirring articles, profusely illustrated, and written from army and navy standpoints. Naval Constructor H. A. Evans discusses from the viewpoint of an expert the vital question of provision on the Pacific Coast for the care of a great fleet. Colonel M. P. Maus, U.S.A., who commanded the recent army maneuver camp at Atascadero, points out what such schools of war mean to the country's defense.

JIMMIE—The $500 prize story, a tale of the desert and the mystery of man's soul. A powerful tale by a new writer, Ralph W. Gilman.

HELPING THE INDIANS—An authoritative statement by President Jordan of Stanford University regarding the Riverside conference, its aims and its results.

Two hundred and eight pages of pictures by the best artists and stories by the brightest writers, all upon Western subjects and full of Western color.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Maud—Belle doesn't wear French heels any more. Her husband won't let her. Ethel—I said she would lower herself by marrying him.—Boston Transcript.

Braidsen Tapes—Yes, I'm fired: Discharged without any reason! Silkson Thredd—Well, you didn't have any when you took the job, did you?—Syracuse Herald.

Ella—I'm going to hang up my stocking on Christmas. Stello—What for? Ella—By special request of papa and mamma. You know they believe in Santa Claus.—Life.

"Mr. Chairman," began the man who is unaccustomed to public speaking. "I—er—I—er—I—er—" "Well," interrupted the chairman, kindly, "to err is human."—Washington Herald.

"You don't seem to be keeping up your tennis." "Well, I don't know so much about tennis," remarked the Washington official. "I don't know if it's as good a game as golf."—Pittsburg Post.

Curate—And so, Mrs. Howard, you come to church every Sunday? Mrs. Howard—Yes, Mr. Priestley, we're such strangers in town yet that we have no other engagements.—Brooklyn Life.

"That man who was here just now seemed to move you a great deal?" "He did." "By a touching story?" "No; by three loads in two wagons, and he broke nearly every piece."—Baltimore American.

Mr. Highbrow—It was Michelet, I believe, who observed that "woman is the salt of a man's life." Miss Keen—Quite true! Young men aren't half so fresh after they get married.—Boston Transcript.

Husband—Well, what did the phrenologist say about Willie's head? Wife—Nothing. He simply sighed and handed me my money back! Husband—Just as I expected—be's going to be a poet!—Puck.

"I like to see a man take an interest in his work." "So do I. I once knew a policeman who was so enthusiastic that it positively pained him to see anybody out of jail."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

The Minister—Then you don't think I practice what I preach, eh? The Deacon—No, sir, I don't. You've been preachin' on the subject o' resignation fur two years, an' ye hivna resigned yit.—Exchange.

"You ought to know better, Johnny," said Mrs. Lapsling, reprovingly, "than ask me what the difference is between courage and bravery. They are pusillanimous terms and mean the same thing."—Chicago Tribune.

"Will father be an angel?" asked the little boy. "He's got whiskers, and angels don't have any." "Well," replied the grandmother, "your father may get there, but it will be by a close shave."—Atlanta Constitution.

"What do you think!" exclaimed the theatrical star, proudly. "They are going to name a new cigar after me." "Well," rejoined the manager, "here's hoping it will draw better than you do."—Chicago News.

"Which do you think affords greater pleasure, pursuit or possession?" "I don't know," answered the man with a motor-car. "Possession is a fine thing. But I have sometimes suspected that the police get more fun out of my machine than I do."—Washington Star.

Playwright (describing play)—Then you have a very strong scene when you trample on all the ties of home affection, and—Well-known Actor—Cut that out. Playwright—But it's a very strong scene. Well-known Actor—Maybe so, but I don't propose to tramp on any ties.—Philadelphia Ledger.

"What is your daughter doing now, Mrs. Dagny?" "She's workin' downtown in an office." "I suppose she must get pretty good wages." "Yes, but it's awful hard work. When she come home last night she was all wore out, havin' copied more than 300 letters on a heliotrope."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"That's a nice-looking chap at the next table," said the young man who was treating his best girl to a lobster supper. "Is he a friend of yours?" "Yes, indeed," laughed the pretty girl. "Well, er—I think I'll ask him to join us." "Oh, this is so sudden!" "What's so sudden?" "Why—why, that's our young minister."—Chicago Daily News.

"I don't know much about the politics of your country," remarked the visiting Englishman, "but I have read of your politicians. Mr. Bryan belongs to what is known as the Democratic party, does he not?" "No, sir," answered the man with the bulging brows. "What is known as the Democratic party belongs to Mr. Bryan."—Chicago Tribune.

"The constable seems wonderfully certain about the details of my case," said a defendant, with a sneer; "but how is it he doesn't call his fellow-officer to corroborate what he says?" "There's only one constable stationed in the village, sir," explained the policeman. "But I saw two last night," indignantly asserted the defendant. "Exactly," the policeman rejoined, smiling broadly. "That's just the charge against you."—Stray Stories.
