ATTORNEYS' CERTIFICATES.—In the year ending 31st March, 1873, the number of these certificates was 14,053, and the duty charged £92,635, in the United Kingdom. The advent of a new Government and Parliament seems to be a favourable opportunity for considering the propriety of abolishing or of further modifying this annual tax.

OLD PARCHMENT.—When writing has been faded by time, the ink not having been removed by any chemical process, the pristine state of the writing may be restored by dipping the parchment in fresh spring water and allowing it to remain for a minute or a minute and a half. To prevent crumpling, it should then be pressed between two sheets of blotting-paper. The process, if necessary, may be repeated several times.

ELECTION LAW.

THE BALLOT ACT—REJECTED BALLOT PAPERS.

MR. E. B. MORLEY, of Nottingham, writes to the Leeds Mercury:—

In your impression of Wednesday last an extract from a letter in the Times from Mr. Gerald A. R. Fitzgerald appeared, commenting upon the course adopted by the returning officer for Finsbury in rejecting certain ballot papers at the recent Parliamentary election there, on account of their not being marked in conformity with the directions for the guidance of voters in voting contained in the second schedule of the Ballot Act.

Mr. Fitzgerald says that these directions are not imperative, but merely directory. There can be little doubt that this was the intention of the Legislature, or it would have been directly provided that ballot papers marked otherwise than in accordance with such directions should be rejected by the returning officer.

The second section of the Act provides that any ballot papers on which anything except the said number on the back (i.e., the number of the ballot paper corresponding with the number of the counterfoil) is written or marked by which the voter can be identified shall be void and not counted.

Having had considerable experience in the official working of elections under the Ballot Act (having conducted six elections in a constituency numbering over 16,000), and having paid particular attention to the Act and the variety of ballot papers which came before the returning officer for his decision as to their validity, I shall be obliged if you will allow me an opportunity of stating a few facts which have come under my own observation, and of which only those who have a practical acquaintance with the subject can be aware.

1. The returning officer must reject all ballot papers not marked with the official mark.

In the whole of the elections in which I have been concerned it happens, fortunately, and to the credit of the officers engaged, that there has not been a single ballot paper rejected under this head. If any papers are rejected, it must be through the neglect of the presiding officer, who, if he does his duty, and sees that every ballot paper bears the official mark before he allows it to be placed in the ballot box, must have a check on any remissness on the part of his clerk, who should stamp the paper, and on any attempt to introduce forged ballot papers.

2. As to voting for more candidates than entitled to, the returning officer is never called upon to exercise any discretion in dealing with ballot papers of this kind.

In the elections in which I have been engaged, the mode of dealing with ballot papers under the head of "writing or mark by which the voter could be identified," is precisely the same as that adopted at Finsbury and numerous other places within my own knowledge.

Mr. Fitzgerald advises, in effect that the returning officer can only reject such ballot papers as are actually marked with the name and address of the voter; for by these particulars alone could the voter be actually identified.

According to Mr. Fitzgerald, if, instead of putting the necessary ×, the voter signed the name of "John Smith," the returning officer would not be justified in rejecting the paper if there were several John Smiths on the register, as he could not trace it to any particular John Smith.

I consider that if the leniency in dealing with these ballot papers in Mr. Fitzgerald's letter were generally adopted, it would be a means of security to parties bribing that the majority of the parties bribed voted for the right candidates. I will explain how this could be done.

The candidates usually appoint a certain number of agents to attend at the counting of the ballot papers, and all the ballot papers come under the personal observation of such agents.

For example, suppose an agent has promised a bribe to a large number of voters (say 500), and that he instructed them to mark their ballot papers in a certain way contrary to the directions in the Act, say either by marking the cross with a coloured pencil, or in ink, or on the left hand side, or marking a figure 1, or any other distinctive mark than a cross. Then he instructs his sub-agents who attend the counting to take note of how many ballot papers so marked pass under their observation. He gets this information from his agents, by which he can tell whether the majority of persons bribed have gone the right way, and thereby ensures that the money expended or about to be expended in bribery has answered its purpose.

It would be a most dangerous system to adopt Mr. Fitzgerald's notions; for depend upon it, whilst the candidates' agents and the persons who are always open to take bribes are aware that this leniency is shown, a scheme may always be concocted to defeat the intention of the Act.

If returning officers reject all ballot papers not marked according to the directions in the Act, it will be a means, and is the only means, of educating the voters; for if they find their vote is lost, depend upon it, if they value it, they will be more careful in the future.

OPERATION OF THE BALLOT ACT.

The following letters appeared in the Times:

"Sir,—I have just read the letter of Mr. Gerald Fitzgerald, which appeared in the Times of the 9th inst. on the subject of rejected ballot papers and the effect to be given to the 2nd schedule of the Ballot Act. Having acted at five Parliamentary and at several municipal elections under the Ballot Act, and having in my official capacity had to advise the returning officers as to the rejection of ballot papers, I can, I think, point out the difficulty with which the matter is beset. Mr. Fitzgerald has, I think, overlooked the 28th section of the Act, which enacts that "the schedules and directions therein shall be construed and have effect as part of the Act." When, therefore, we find that the form given in the schedule directs that the voter is to place a cross on the right-hand side opposite the name of the candidate for whom he votes, how can this be departed from without opening the door to all kinds of marks by which the voter or a number of voters as a class may be identified by those employed at the counting of the votes? It is the Legislature's and not the returning officer's fault if a large number of ballot papers are rejected. There is a very simple remedy for this, which I hope will be adopted by the new Government,—viz., let the voter be directed to strike out the name of the candidate he does not wish to vote for. This will be intelligible to the most illiterate voter, many of whom I verily believe put the cross against the name of the candidates they object to, simply because they are accustomed to use the cross as a sign by which they indicate their objection to anything. So long as the present directions are in force it is not unlikely that there will be a considerable number of rejected ballot papers.—Your obedient servant, C. M. HOLE, Town Clerk.

Sir,—The returning officer for Marylebone urges an extension of time between the nomination and polling day for large boroughs. I trust it may be extended to counties. Fortunately for me, in Suffolk, we had a walk over for the Western Division, but for the Eastern Division I had to provide for nineteen polling places scattered over the county and some most inconveniently situated for access. Another difficulty arose (except in one place where the returning officer may happen to be), it being necessary that the declaration of secrecy by all claiming right of admission should be taken by a magistrate before the opening of the poll. At more than one of the polling places I was assured that no magistrate was resident within many miles. Is it reasonable to expect in the winter time nineteen gentlemen to attend at half-past 7 in the morning? Had it not been for a warning I gave all parties concerned, to take the declaration beforehand, and be in a position to produce it, I am well assured that difficulties, even amounting to vacating the election, would have arisen. My remedy would be that each presiding officer, having himself taken an oath or declaration, should be empowered to administer it to all others at his station. As to counting the votes, I have had experience of more than one way, and I am of opinion that the sorting process is the quickest.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, JAMES SPARKE, Under-Sheriff of Suffolk.

PREPARATIONS FOR POLLING.—Sir,—Referring to Messrs. Knight and Co.'s letter, which appears in your issue of the 14th inst., p. 271, a misapprehension exists that the parties who supplied the stamping machines to the returning officer for Lambeth were Messrs. Knight and Co. This is not the fact, as I personally furnished the stamping instruments (eight in number) direct to Mr. Abbott, as he is willing to testify, if necessary. Since the passing of the Ballot Act I have made the manufacture of my embosser and lever presses the subject of my especial attention, and I have supplied all the city and metropolitan returning officers (except Westminster) therewith, in addition to a very large number in the country, and to many of the School Board and municipal elections.—M. LOWENHEIM.

PAUPER ELECTORS.—At the meeting of the Kidderminster guardians on Tuesday, Mr. Pountney asked whether it was legal to fetch a pauper out of a workhouse to poll at an election. A man who was admitted to the house some time ago under a note from the medical officer was fetched from the workhouse on the day of the Parliamentary election and taken to the poll. The chairman (Mr. Kiteley) said it was an abstract question. The man could give notice of his intention to leave the house, and then he could do what he chose. Mr. Holloway said the pauper, being on the register, had a right to vote, and no one could stop him voting, but on a scrutiny his vote could be disallowed as that of a pauper. The clerk said he did not see that they need discuss the question, and when pressed for an answer to the question, said he did not see anything illegal in the matter.

THE BALLOT.—A correspondent in the Times suggests that as the voting papers delivered to electors are individually marked with the number of the elector claiming to vote, a sure record is created of his voting, and access to such record may be had in a variety of ways. It is suggested that some better plan is required to frustrate the chances of intimidation or of bribery, which were to have been destroyed by the ballot, and which have been abolished according to popular belief.

ELECTION PETITIONS.—By the Parliamentary Elections Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125) a petition against a member must be presented at the Rule Office of the Common Pleas within twenty-one days after the return has been made to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and if it alleges corrupt practices and payment since the return in pursuance of such corrupt practices, then the petition must be presented within twenty-eight days of such payment. At the time the petition is lodged, or within three days, security must be given for £1000 to pay costs, or the deposit of the money be made.

MAGISTRATES' LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

POOR LAW—LIABILITY TO SUPPORT RELATIONS—CHILDREN—GRANDFATHER AND GRANDCHILD.—The word "children" in 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 6, does not include grandchildren. A grandchild is therefore not bound to maintain his grandfather: (Maund v. Mason, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 837. Q. B.).

QUARTER SESSIONS—PRACTICE—ENTRY AND RESPITE OF APPEAL SUBJECT TO A CASE.—Quarter sessions granted an application to enter and respite these appeals against poor rates, subject to a case for the opinion of this court. The court heard the arguments, but, after consideration, and although no objection was raised by either side, declined to express an opinion in a case reserved on such an order: (Reg. v. Sutton Coldfield, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 840. Q. B.)

LICENSING ACT—SUPPLYING BEER TO A CONSTABLE ON DUTY.—Sect. 16 of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 74) enacts that "if any licensed person . . . . supplies any liquor or refreshment, whether by way of gift or sale, to any constable on duty, unless by authority of some superior officer of such constable," he shall be liable to a penalty. The servant of a licensed person having supplied to a constable in uniform and on duty a certain quantity of brandy, in the ordinary course of business: Held, that the master was liable to the penalty imposed by the statute, personal knowledge on the part of the master not being necessary to constitute the offence: (Mullins v. Collins, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 838. Q. B.).

REMOVAL OF INDICTMENT BY CERTIORARI—PRACTICE.—Sect. 5 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, after reciting that "it is expedient to make further provision for preventing the vexatious removal of indictments into the Court of Queen's Bench," enacts "that whenever any writ of certiorari to remove an indictment into the said court, shall be awarded at the instance of a defendant or defendants, the recognizance now by law required to be entered into before the allowance of such writ shall contain the further provision following, that is to say, that the defendant or defendants, in case he or they shall be convicted, shall pay to the prosecutor his costs incurred subsequent to the removal of such indictment," &c. This enactment is general in its application, and renders it unnecessary that the prosecutor, in order to be entitled to the payment of his costs, should be "the party grieved or injured," as required by 5 & 6 Will. & M. c. 11, s. 3: (Reg. v. Oastler, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 830. Q. B.)

MUNICIPAL ELECTION—RIGHT TO VOTE AT WARD ELECTIONS—CHANGE OF PREMISES—OCCUPATION.—By the City of London Municipal Elections Amendment Act 1867, the right of voting for ward officers is given by sect. 2 to persons who shall, for a period of not less than twelve months previous to 1st Dec. in any year, have been in the occupation of premises within the City. By sect. 3 every person on the register of voters for the city of London in use at elections for members to serve in Parliament, and then in force, in respect of the occupation of premises therein, shall be entitled to vote. By sect. 6, before voting every person shall declare that he is an occupier of premises in the ward, and is on the list of voters entitled to vote. A man whose name was on the parliamentary list changed his occupation of premises for that of others in the same ward. The alderman and council of the ward, without notice to him, struck his name off the ward register, and refused to re-enter it upon his application at a subsequent election. Held, upon mandamus to compel the insertion of his name in the list of voters, that the third section gave a qualification quite distinct from that of the second; and that the mandamus must go: (Reg. v. Ward of Cheap, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 842. Q. B.)

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

DEVISE OF A MORTGAGED ESTATE—PAYMENT OF DEBTS—LEASEHOLDS—LOCKE KING'S ACT.—A testator directed that all his just debts should be paid out of a fund consisting of the moneys arising from the sale of an estate devised in trust for sale and the residue of his personal estate. Held, that this direction was not a sufficient expression of a contrary intention within the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113, as amended by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69, and therefore that the devisees of certain estates in mortgage were not entitled to have the mortgage debts paid out of the fund: (Gael v. Fenwick, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 822. M. R.)

SPECIFIC DEVISE—APPORTIONMENT OF RENTS.—The Apportionment Act 1870 applies to all wills coming into operation after the passing of the Act, whether made before the passing of the Act or not. A testator seised in fee, by a will made prior to, but confirmed by a codicil made subsequently to, the passing of the Apportionment Act 1870, devised his lands in the county of N. to A. for life, with remainders over, and died between the two half-yearly days for payment of rent: Held, that the apportioned part of the rent accruing between the last half-yearly rent day, and the day of the death of the testator, formed part of his general personal estate, and did not go to his devisee: (Capron v. Capron, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 826. V.C. M.)

TRESPASS ON LAND—NOTICE TO QUIT PART OF DEMISED PREMISES.—Defendant leased about twenty acres of land for five years, at a yearly rent, from the owner in fee simple, under a memorandum of agreement, and immediately afterwards sub-let about six acres, part of the premises, to another person on a yearly tenancy. At the conclusion of the term, defendant continued possession of the whole, and during the first year after the term expired the lessor conveyed to the plaintiff the six acres which the defendant had sub-let, and agreed with the plaintiff, but without the consent of the defendant, as to the amount of rent to be apportioned to this part of the premises out of the rent which the defendant paid. Although notice of the conveyance and agreed apportionment of rent was afterwards given to defendant, he never recognised plaintiff as his landlord, but continued to pay rent for the whole premises to his lessor, who handed over the agreed portion to plaintiff. Plaintiff gave defendant notice to quit the sub-let premises six months before the expiration of a year's tenancy; and the defendant forwarded this notice, with a further notice to quit from himself, to his sub-tenant. At the end of the year the sub-tenant gave up possession of his premises to plaintiff, but the defendant wrote to the latter claiming to hold the same as tenant to the original lessor, and requiring possession. Defendant then did certain acts upon the premises which had been in his sub-tenant's occupation, for which plaintiff brought this action of trespass. Held, that plaintiff's notice to defendant to quit part only of the premises demised to him was invalid; that his passing on the notice to his tenant did not preclude his disputing it; and that the action could not be maintained: (Prince v. Evans, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835. Q. B.)

EJECTMENT—PAROL EVIDENCE OF BOUNDARIES.—In 1861 Burgess Plowman, a common predecessor in title of both plaintiff and defendant, being possessed of 27 rods of land, conveyed to the defendant's predecessor in title "all that piece of garden ground, containing by estimation 20 rods, bounded on the south by other land, or garden ground belonging to the said Burgess Plowman." In 1866 the same Burgess Plowman conveyed the residue of the property to the plaintiff's predecessor in title, describing it as "15 rods more or less;" the result being that if the measurement of the deed of 1861 was accurate, the defendant took under it 12 rods instead of 20, while, if the measurement of the deed of 1866 was accurate, the plaintiff took under it 7 rods instead of 15. The plaintiff brought ejectment for the 8 rods in dispute. Held, that the parol evidence of Plowman was admissible to show that he had conveyed 12 and not 20 rods by the deed of 1861: (Jarvey v. Styring, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 847. Ex.)

MARRIAGE LICENCES.—There were 9841 in the year ending 31st March 1873, obtained in the United Kingdom, and the stamp duty amounted to £4920.

MARITIME LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

SALVAGE — DERELICT — ABANDONMENT BY FIRST SALVORS—RIGHT TO REWARD—PRACTICE—EVIDENCE. — Where in a salvage cause the plaintiffs' petition states expenses to have been incurred in rendering the services without stating their amount and the defendants' answer admits all the allegations of the petition, the High Court of Admiralty will not allow evidence to be called by the plaintiff to show the amount of the expenses. If specific amounts are claimed they must be pleaded so as to give the defendant the opportunity of admitting or denying them. Semble, that the court will, if necessary, amend the pleadings, allowing the plaintiffs to set forth the amounts, but giving the defendant time to admit or deny such amounts. Where, in a salvage suit the defendants admit all the allegations of fact in the plaintiff's petition, but deny the inferences of fact made therefrom in the petition, the plaintiffs may call evidence to establish those inferences. Where a steamship having taken in tow a vessel in distress, after towing her for some hours, on the weather getting worse and the lives of her crew becoming endangered, takes the crew out of her and finally abandons her in a place where she is afterwards picked up by another vessel and taken into port, the owners, master, and crew of the steamship are entitled to salvage reward in respect of the lives so saved, but not in respect of ship and cargo: (Eintracht, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 851. Adm.)

COUNTY COURTS.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

COUNTY COURT ACTS, 28 & 29 VICT. c. 99, s. 9; 30 & 31 VICT. c. 142, s. 14—JURISDICTION—TRANSFER OF CAUSE TO COURT OF CHANCERY—STRIKING OUT A CAUSE.—Plaintiff filed a plaint for partition of a messuage, alleging bond fide by the plaint that the messuage was under the value of £500. At the hearing the defendant brought forward evidence proving that the messuage was above the value of £500, and objected to the jurisdiction. The County Court Judge struck out the cause, for want of jurisdiction: Held, on appeal, that the County Court Judge ought to have transferred the cause to the Court of Chancery: (Thomson v. Flinn, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 829. V.C. M.)

COUNTY COURT—ADMINISTRATION—EX PARTE INJUNCTION BEFORE DECREE—ORDER 1, RULE 8; ORDER 12, RULE 1.—A. brought an action at law against the executor de son tort of B. A plaint for the administration of B.'s estate was subsequently filed in the County Court, and before a decree was pronounced the County Court granted an ex parte injunction, restraining the action at law: Held, that the County Court Judge had no power either to grant the injunction ex parte, or to grant it before decree in the administration suit: (Nokes v. Gandy, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 828. V.C. M.)

LIVERPOOL COUNTY COURT.

Wednesday, Feb. 11.

(Before J. F. COLLIER, Esq., Judge.)

BAYLEY v. THE LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Personal luggage—Samples or patterns.

Sutton for the plaintiff; Bellringer for the defendants.

His HONOUR said—The facts of the case as I find them are these:—The plaintiff, a commercial traveller, reached the Exchange station of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company on the morning of the 21st July last. He gave his luggage, consisting of a portmanteau, hatbox, and bag, into the custody of one of the company's servants, telling him it was for Nelson. The plaintiff then took a third class ticket for Nelson, and before getting into his carriage saw his portmanteau on a truck near the luggage van of the train. He again told the porter in charge of the truck that it was for Nelson. The portmanteau was not labelled or directed, but it had the first and last letters of plaintiff's Christian and surname engraved on a brass plate. It contained wearing apparel, a number of sheets of paper, called in the particulars "samples," but more properly described as "patterns," which he was to use, and which were necessary for his use as a salesman for a commercial firm; it also contained his journey accounts and an account book or books. On the journey to Nelson the portmanteau was handed by a stranger out of a third class carriage to the station master at an intermediate station, with the statement that a passenger to whom it belonged had got out at a previous station. On the plaintiff's arrival at Nelson it was missed, and it did not reach him until about a week after, when he found it at his own home at Liverpool, to which it had been brought by the railway company. At Nelson, the plaintiff expressed his intention of going on to Leeds, which was a place on his journey, and the station-master at Nelson undertook to write for the portmanteau (there was no telegraph) and to forward it to Leeds if he got it. The plaintiff claims damages for his detention at Leeds in consequence of the loss of the portmanteau, resting his claim, as I read his particulars, on his deprivation of the patterns and accounts; he also claims for wearing apparel which he was obliged to buy, and for a journey from Leeds to Livepool and back to fetch clean clothes. I think I may at once dismiss these two latter claims. In the first place, I do not think the particulars include wearing apparel; and in the second, the plaintiff cannot claim compensation for wearing apparel which he retains. And I am of opinion that the journey to Liverpool was too remote a result, if any, of the loss of the portmanteau on which to found a claim against the company. It remains to be seen whether he can recover in respect of detention of the samples and accounts. It was contended that these articles were not ordinary or personal luggage, and that the railway company were not bound to carry them, and were, therefore, not liable for damage arising out of their loss or detention. The company's Act of Parliament was not put in. I shall therefore assume that the sections relating to passengers' luggage are to the same effect as those usually found in Railway Acts, viz., that each passenger was allowed to take with him his ordinary luggage, not exceeding certain weight, free of charge. The question of what is and what is not personal or ordinary luggage has received much consideration in the cases, amongst others, of Cahill v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (13 C. B., N. S., 818), Phelps v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (19 C. B., N. S., 322), and Macrow v. The Great Western Railway Company (6 L. Rep. Q. B. 612). In Phelps v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, which is in many respects an analogous case to this, it was held that title deeds and securities conveyed by an attorney in his portmanteau were not personal luggage. In that case Erle, C.J. says: "It is agreed on all hands that it is impossible to draw any well-defined line as to what is and what is not necessary or ordinary luggage for a traveller. But the general habits and wants of mankind must be taken to be in the mind of the carrier when he receives a passenger for conveyance, and the law makes him responsible for all such things as may fairly be carried by the passenger for his personal use." In Macrow v. The Great Western Railway Company, Cockburn, C.J. says: "We hold the true rule to be that whatever the passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of the journey, must be considered personal luggage;" and he goes on to instance the gun or the fishing-rod of the sportsman, the easel of the artist, the books of the student, &c. In both these cases the learned judges, while giving a liberal interpretation to the meaning of personal luggage, confine it to articles intended for the personal use of the traveller; and there I think the line must be drawn, that is to say, between articles intended for personal use, and articles connected with trade or commerce. If not, the liabilities of railway companies would be incalculable, and a wide door would be opened to fraud. We must consider what was in the contemplation of the parties. It would be a great strain upon the ordinary interpretation of words, and upon common sense, to hold that a company contracting to carry a man and his ordinary luggage contracted to carry samples which might be of almost priceless value, and account books, the loss of which could hardly be compensated by money. For these reasons I think that the samples and accounts, on the detention of which this case is founded, do not come within the definition of ordinary or personal luggage, and my judgment is for the defendants. Although the sum claimed in this case is small, I have thought it desirable to consider the subject at some length, as it is one of great importance both to railway companies and to the public.

NEWMARKET COUNTY COURT.

Monday, Jan. 26.

(Before EDMOND BEALES, Esq., M.A., Judge.)

BRAHAM v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers of passengers—Delay in carriage of luggage—Damages—Loss off the booking company's line.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiff, who is a commercial traveller, residing at Birmingham, to recover the sum of £25 for damages sustained by him, through alleged delay to a portmanteau.

Kitchener, instructed by Fallows, of Birmingham, appeared for the plaintiff.

E. Moore, of 2, Furnival's-inn, appeared for the company.

On the 4th July last, plaintiff, who had been to Newmarket races, took a through ticket from Newmarket to Birmingham. On the departure of the train he had with him a hat-box and a portmanteau, both of which he saw put into the train at Newmarket. He also stated that he saw them taken out of the van at Cambridge, and then told a porter to take them over to the train for Birmingham. On arriving at Birmingham, he inquired for the luggage, and only the hat-box could be found. He made several inquiries for the portmanteau, and also wrote a letter to the agent of the London and North-Western Company, telling him that unless his portmanteau was sent to him at Liverpool by a certain day, he would have to buy some clothes and linen, to supply the place of those in the lost portmanteau, and make a claim against the company for the amount expended, and also charge them for his loss of time. The portmanteau was sent to Liverpool, but he had gone. He eventually received the portmanteau back again, after a month's delay, and admitted that the clothes were then in as good condition as when he had first lost them. He now claimed £18 10s., the amount he had expended in buying new clothes and linen, and also £6 10s. for his loss of time and inconvenience caused to him by the delay.

Moore, on behalf of the Great Eastern Railway Company, contended, that as the portmanteau was not lost on that line, that company was protected by a condition in the published time-table (and to which the ticket referred), which was to the effect, "that as the through booking of passengers to stations off their own line, is only an arrangement made for the greater convenience of the passengers, they, the company, would not hold themselves liable for any delay, loss, or injury arising off their own line." He also contended that the London and North-Western Company, on whose line the delay occurred, were not liable for the damages claimed, inasmuch as the portmanteau had been sent after the plaintiff to Liverpool in accordance with his instructions, and that even if there had been any delay, the damages were such as the plaintiff could not recover. He had received his clothes again in perfect condition, as admitted by him, and in any event would have had to buy some new clothes, although not perhaps quite so soon. He bought the clothes at his own risk and expense. The claim for loss of time, he contended, could not be recovered, and quoted several cases in support of his argument.

After hearing Kitchener in reply,

His HONOUR held, that as the portmanteau and its content had been found and returned to the plaintiff in good condition, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from the company the money he had laid out in new clothes and linen. He knew of no case where a man had recovered after having taken his portmanteau back again. On the authority of the cases quoted by the solicitor for the company, he should also hold that he could not recover for his loss of time. As to the point raised, as to whether the condition in the time-table protected the Great Eastern Railway Company, it would not be necessary then to decide that. He gave Judgment for the defendants but without costs.

WIGAN COUNTY COURT.

Wednesday, Feb. 4.

(Before J. W. HARDEN, Esq., Judge.)

TURNER v. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Passenger's luggage.

MRS. TURNER sued the London and North-Western Railway Company for £7 6s. 4d., the value of the contents of a hamper, which had been lost by the company.

Ellis appeared for the plaintiff.

Parkerson for the defendants.

It appeared that plaintiff was travelling to Wigan in June last, and had with her two boxes and a hamper. When she arrived at Wigan the hamper was missing, and had never since been heard of. The hamper contained a quantity of glass and other things, which were intended by plaintiff as presents for her Wigan friends.

The defendants admitted the loss of the hamper, but contended that the contents were not "personal luggage," and therefore they were not responsible for the loss.

Ellis contended that the articles came within the definition "personal luggage;" and further that, as the hamper was labelled "glass, with care," the company had notice of its contents, and had accepted the hamper as personal luggage, and were therefore bound to take proper care of it.

A number of cases were cited on both sides.

His HONOUR reserved his decision.

His HONOUR.—In this case the plaintiff took a ticket in the usual way to be conveyed by the defendants' railway from Stamford to Wigan, having with her besides smaller packages a hamper containing an antique punch bowl, a quantity of glass, and some eggs, cream, cheese, and vegetables. The hamper was labelled "glass with care," and was handed to the porter and placed in the luggage van in the usual way; there was no attempt at concealment on the one hand, nor was any question asked in the office, but the hamper never reached its destination, and this action is brought to recover £7 6s. 4d., the alleged value of its contents. That the plaintiff was only entitled to take a certain amount of "ordinary personal luggage" free of charge was admitted, and that punch bowls and wine glasses do not come within that category, but it was contended by Mr. Ellis on behalf of the plaintiff that a hamper in itself is not an ordinary receptacle for personal luggage, and that the words "glass with care" upon the direction was equivalent to notice to the defendants that the hamper contained something different from ordinary luggage, so that if they chose to waive the protection they are by law entitled to, and to permit an innocent passenger to take as personal luggage articles that they might have objected to, they were liable as common carriers and insurers for the loss of the goods. In the Great Northern Railway Company v. Shepherd (8 Ex. 30), Lord Wensleydale is reported to have said: "If indeed they (the company) had notice, or might have suspected from the way in which the parcels were packed that they did not contain personal luggage, then they ought to have objected to carry them, and again, if the plaintiff had carried those articles exposed, or had packed them in the shape of merchandize so that the company might have known what they were, and they had chosen to treat them as personal luggage, and carry them without demanding any extra remuneration, they would have been responsible for the loss; and also, if the company chose to allow a passenger to carry a greater weight than he was entitled to they would be liable." The question raised in this case is one of some nicety, but after the consideration I have been able to give it, I arrive at the conclusion that if there be any trickery or concealment on the part of a passenger, and he tries to evade a trifling payment by taking as personal luggage what ought to be paid for, he forfeits all claim for redress if the goods are lost; but that in the absence of concealment, and when the attention of the officials is challenged either by the nature of the packages, the partial exposure of its contents or something on the direction, it is the duty of the carrier to make inquiry. In Macrow v. Great Western Railway Company (6 Q. B. 618), Cockburn, C.J. said: "The law is now too firmly settled to admit of being shaken that the liability of common carriers in respect of articles passed as passenger's luggage in that of carriers of goods as distinguished from that of carriers of passengers." And the liability of carriers I find thus defined in Walker v. Jackson (10 M. & W. 168), where Parke, B. says: "I take it now to be perfectly well understood that if anything is delivered to a person to be carried, it is the duty of the person receiving it to ask such questions about it as may be necessary; if he ask no questions, and there be no fraud, to give the case a false complexion, on the delivery of the parcel he is bound to carry the parcel as it is." It is the duty of the person who receives it to ask questions, if they are answered improperly so as to deceive him, then there is no contract between the parties; it is a fraud which vitiates the contract altogether. But there is no imputation of fraud or concealment; the defendants have been less watchful than they might have been, and must make good the loss. I think, however, that an extra price has been put upon the goblets in respect of their being old family friends, and I assess the damages at £5 5s.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Friday, Feb. 13.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne) and the LORDS JUSTICES.)

Ex parte IZARD; Re COOK.

Act of bankruptcy—Assignment.

THIS was an appeal by the trustee under the liquidation of William Cook and John Cook, two brothers, who were grocers at Reading, from the refusal of Mr. Registrar Murray, acting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, to declare that a certain deed, executed by the debtors on the 5th April 1873, was void as against the trustee, under the liquidation. In April 1868, the debtors purchased the grocery business. In Nov. and Dec. 1870, Aaron Cook, the father of the debtors, advanced them two sums of £80 and £170, and in July and Aug. 1870, Robert Cook, the debtors' brother, advanced them two sums of £100 and £150. On the 29th Aug. 1870, an agreement in writing was entered into between the debtors and Aaron Cook and Robert Cook. This document contained a recital that Aaron and Robert Cook had already advanced £500 to the debtors to enable them to carry on their business, and that the debtors required further advances; and it was agreed that, in consideration of the advances already made and of further advances to be made, the debtors would on demand assign the business carried on by them to Aaron and Robert Cook, together with the lease of the premises in which the business was carried on (which lease was deposited with Aaron and Robert Cook by way of equitable charge to secure the due observance of the agreement), as also the fixtures, stock-in-trade, and book debts, so that Aaron and Robert Cook might be able to carry on the business either in their own names or in the name of W. and J. Cook. If the debtors should repay the £500, and also the further advances with interest, the agreement was to be void; but if the debtors should not pay what was due, an inventory and valuation of the property was to be made, and payment of the purchase-money and valuation, or the balance thereof (if any), was to be made in the manner agreed to by the parties, or otherwise upon valuation, according to the custom of the trade. It was also agreed that Aaron and Robert Cook should retain the debtors in the management of the business at a salary. The lease was afterwards deposited. In March 1873 the debtors became embarrassed. A demand of an assignment according to the agreement was served on them by Aaron and Robert Cook. A valuation of the lease, business, fixtures, stock-in-trade, and book debts, was made on the 4th April at the sum of £683 10s. The debt, with interest, amounted to £560. The balance of £123 10s. was paid by Aaron and Robert Cook to the debtors, and an assignment of the property was executed on the 5th April 1873. This deed included all the debtors' property except some furniture valued at £30, for which Aaron and Robert Cook also paid. Possession of the premises of the stock was given to them, and shortly afterwards a circular was sent to the wholesale firms who were the principal creditors of W. and J. Cook, informing them of the transfer of the business. The £123 10s. and the £30 were employed by the debtors in paying two of their creditors. On the 16th April the debtors filed their petition, and stated their debts at more than £1800 and their assets as nil. The registrar refused to declare the deed of the 5th April void. The trustee appealed.

De Gex, Q.C. and Finlay Knight argued for the appellant.

Roxburgh, Q.C. and Colt supported the order of the Registrar.

Lord Justice MELLISH delivered the judgment of the court, to the effect that the deed of the 5th April was not rendered void either by the Bankruptcy Act or by the Bills of Sale Act. Under the agreement of August 1870, no right to the property agreed to be assigned (except the lease) passed either at law or in equity, until demand. When the demand was made, an immediate right in equity to the property agreed to be assigned as a security accrued. The agreement, therefore, after demand became a valid equitable security on the property of the debtors. The agreement of August, 1870, was not itself, as the evidence showed, a mere security for a then existing debt; the £250 advanced by Robert Cook was really advanced on the faith of the agreement. That agreement gave to Aaron and Robert Cook a good equitable security upon all the property comprised in the deed of April 1873, and that being so, it was impossible to say that the deed itself was an act of bankruptcy. Its effect was only to convey the legal estate in the leasehold property and to furnish a record of the completion of the transaction. The beneficial interest was already in Aaron and Robert Cook. There was no evasion of the Bills of Sale Act, for possession of the property was given on the execution of the deed. On the whole, therefore, the judgment of the Registrar ought to be affirmed; but, as the circumstances of the case were very suspicious and required investigation, no order would be made as to the costs of the appeal.

Ex parte BROOKE; Re HASSALL.

Execution creditor—Part payment of debt by debtor when sheriff in possession—Liquidation petition—Right of trustee to securities and money handed to sheriff by debtor.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. On the 26th July 1873, John Mills Hassall, a cloth miller at Huddersfield, filed a liquidation petition. Messrs. Brooke and Sons had a short time before recovered judgment against him for £169 4s. 2d. in an action upon two bills of exchange. They had also recovered judgment against a Mr. Binns, who was also liable upon the same bills. Execution was issued, and Hassall, who expected that a levy would be made on his goods, called on the sheriff's officer on the 24th July and said that he hoped to be able to pay soon; and the same afternoon he gave to the sheriff's officer a good bill of exchange for £65, a cheque (which he had received from a customer) for £26 3s. 6d., and three £5 Bank of England notes (thus making up £106 3s. 6d.). The rest of the debt was paid by Binns to the sheriff's officer, but not till after Hassall's liquidation petition had been filed. On the 28th July the sheriff's officer handed over all that he had received to Brooke and Sons' solicitor. Meanwhile, on the 26th July, an interim order had been made by the County Court restraining further proceedings in the action against Hassall, and this order was served on the sheriff's officer the same day. The judge of the County Court decided that the bill, the cheque, and the notes were the property of the trustee under the liquidation for the benefit of the creditors generally, and this order was affirmed by the Chief Judge. Messrs. Brooke and Sons appealed. The Court of Appeal allowed some new evidence to be adduced, and to-day Mr. Edward Brooke was examined, and stated that on the 25th July his firm told the sheriff's officer that they consented to take what he had received from Hassall in part payment of their debt.

De Gex, Q.C. and Finlay Knight, were heard on behalf of the appellants.

Little, Q.C. and Winslow, Q.C., supported the order of the Chief Judge.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said the evidence given, coupled with the probabilities of the case, was sufficient to show that the creditors had accepted what the sheriff had received from Hassall in part payment before the petition was filed. That being so, there was no seizure by the sheriff, and the provisions of sects. 6 and 87 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, did not apply. There was sufficient pressure by the creditors to support the payment, and they were entitled to retain what they had received. The order of the Chief Judge must therefore be altered. This point as to the assent of the creditors was not made the leading point in the argument before him or in that before the County Court judge, and very possibly both those judges would have arrived at the same conclusion as this court if the argument before them had been of the same character.

The LORDS JUSTICES concurred.

LIVERPOOL BANKRUPTCY COURT.

Re HILL AND SMITH.

Bankruptcy Act 1869, sect. 15—Reputed ownership. Held, that goods in the order and disposition of bankrupt at the date of bankruptcy are not in his reputed ownership where it is a custom in the particular trade for the purchaser of goods to leave them with the vendor until required.

Ex parte Watkins, re Couston and Co. (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 793) followed.

THIS was a motion under the bankruptcy of this firm, rice cleaners and merchants in Liverpool. Mr. Samuel B. Hill was the only representative of the firm, and he absconded in September last. An adjudication of bankruptcy ensued, and Mr. Banner was chosen trustee. The present motion on his behalf involved a sum of between £4000 and £5000. The circumstances were these:—The firm of Hill and Smith were in the habit of importing large quantities of rice, and Messrs. James Maxwell and Co. acted as their brokers, the National Bank being the bankers. The course of business between the parties was for the bankrupt firm, on the arrival of a cargo of rice, to warehouse it either in the dock warehouse or those of a private individual, in the name of Messrs. Maxwell, the bankrupt firm drawing upon Messrs. Maxwell for an amount equal to the value of the cargo, and discounting the bills with the National Bank, giving the latter a letter of hypothecation on the cargo. In the month of July last the bankrupt firm imported 12,756 bags of rice, for which bills amounting to £9300 were drawn in the manner described, and letters of hypothecation were given to the bank. Other transactions in relation to 10,835 bags of rice took place between the parties, and on the maturity of the bills drawn they were renewed, and fresh letters of hypothecation given to the bank. In the months of July and Aug. last, after the letters of hypothecation had been given, the bankrupt, without the knowledge or consent of the bank, obtained from Maxwell and Co. delivery orders for certain portions of the rice in the warehouses mentioned in the letters of hypothecation, and removed it to his mill in Edmund-street for the purpose of cleaning, a process necessary before sale. On the rice being cleaned it was replaced in sacks and set aside in a separate part of the mill distinct from the other rice. The bankrupt, in fraud of the bank, as was alleged, disposed of a large quantity of this rice, and the residue in the warehouse at the date of the bankruptcy were sold, and the proceeds held by the trustee to abide the decision of the court as to the rights of the parties.

Butler, instructed by Hull, Stone, and Fletcher, appeared for the trustee.

W. Thompson (of the Chancery Bar), instructed by Bateson, Robinson, and Morris, appeared for the bank.

His HONOUR, who had reserved his judgment, now said:—I am opinion that the documents signed by Maxwell and Co. were declarations of trust under which they undertook as trustees of the bank to hold the rice for the bank and to pay the proceeds to the bank in discharge of the bills on the goods unsold. Maxwell and Co. as trustees, with a power of disposition, were, I think, the true owners of the rice. That it was in the possession, order, and disposition of the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy is not disputed. Taking the facts as set forth in that statement, I am unable to distinguish this case from that of Ex parte Watkins, re Couston (sup.) (L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 520). I do not think that any reputation of ownership attached to the bankrupt's possession of the rice, and this being so, I must hold that it did not pass to his trustee. The rice being trust property did not pass to Maxwell and Co.'s trustee in bankruptcy, and having been sold by arrangement between the parties, that is to say, by someone acting on behalf of Maxwell and Co., the proceeds are the property of the bank. The costs will come out of the estate. The next and only remaining question to be considered is whether the bankrupt was at the time of the bankruptcy the reputed owner of these goods, for if this ingredient is absent the title of the trustee fails. This question was not argued on the first occasion when the case came before me, and my impression was that the reputed ownership of the bankrupt was admitted; on this, however, being strenuously denied, I suggested that it should be argued on a future day, and that has now been done on a statement of facts agreed upon by both sides.

SALFORD COUNTY COURT.

(Before J. A. RUSSELL, Esq., Q.C., Judge.)

Wednesday, Feb. 11.

Re MORRISSY; Ex parte TAYLOR.

Bankruptcy Act 1869—Meeting of creditors—Resolutions—Rejection of vote.

T., a creditor, claimed £250 "at the least" under an unfulfilled agreement. At a meeting of creditors, at which the solicitor for the debtor presided, proof of this debt was refused, and the creditor's proxy was ejected from the room.

Held, on application to register the resolution passed at this meeting, that proof of T.'s debt ought to have been accepted: Re Buffle (42 L. J., N. S. 82, Bank.); also, that the resolutions passed at a properly constituted meeting of creditors are only provisional, and that the ejection of T.'s proxy rendered the proceedings at the meeting in question null and void. Registration refused.

S. Taylor (barrister), instructed by Vaughan, the solicitor to the creditor T.

Jordan (barrister) instructed by Hampson, the solicitor to the debtor.

In this case it appeared that the debtor had filed his petition under the 125th and 126th sections of the Act, and that a meeting of creditors had been summoned, to be held at the offices of a Mr. Hampson, the solicitor of the debtor. No notice of this had been sent to the Messrs. Taylor, with whom the debtor Morrissy had entered into a contract for certain alterations and additions to dwelling-houses in Regent-road, Salford, Feb. 1873, and who failed to carry out such contract, but they by their proxy attended the first meeting and tendered a proof, in which they claimed "the sum of £250 'at the least'" for money due to them from the said Morrissy under the agreement above referred to, and for the breach or non-performance of such agreement by the said Morrissy. The solicitor to the debtor objected to the proof, and also to the proxy being present, and to the examination of the debtor, and on his declining to leave the meeting ejected him by force. Notice to register a resolution passed at this meeting was given to Messrs. Taylor.

Taylor contended that first there was no meeting, as the chairman was not elected by a majority of the creditors, or those claiming to be creditors present. Secondly, that the proper course would have been for the chairman to have left the registrar to deal with the objections, and that the chairman had no such power, and cited the case of Ex parte Buffle, re Drummelow (42 L. J. Rep. N. S. 82, Bank.), as an authority for the proposition, that where a creditor in respect of a breach of contract will pledge his oath that there is so much at least, due he is entitled to vote in respect of that sum. He also contended that the vote at a properly constituted meeting was only a provisional one, and liable to be altered or reversed on the registration of the resolution.

Jordan, on the other hand, contended that the case was governed by sect. 16, sub-sect. 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the case cited was in reality in his favour.

His HONOUR ruled that the creditors were entitled to vote in respect of the sum as to which they had pledged their oath; that the vote was a provisional one, and that the proceedings in consequence of the ejection of the proxy were a nullity. He rejected the motion for registration of the resolution, with costs.

WANDSWORTH COUNTY COURT.

(Before H. J. STONOR, Esq., Judge.)

Re LANDON (an Infant); Ex parte HODGSON.

Liability of infants under the present Bankruptcy Act (1869).

Thompson appeared for the petitioning creditor.

Pearce for the debtor.

HIS HONOUR.—This was a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy against Sidney Clark Landon, an infant under the age of twenty-one years, by Annie Hodgson, also an infant under twenty-one years, by her next friend, John Hodgson, under the following circumstances:—The debtor was robbed on the Brighton racecourse of his watch, and, subsequently meeting the petitioner, gave her in charge of a policeman, who brought her before a magistrate, by whom she was committed for trial at the next borough sessions, but admitted to bail. The defendant subsequently discovered that he was mistaken, and withdrew the charge at the sessions. The petitioner brought her action in the Common Pleas for false imprisonment; the defendant appeared but did not defend, and on an inquisition in pursuance of a writ of trial, recovered £320 damages and costs. It does not appear by the writ of trial whether the defendant appeared by guardian or next friend, or in person, or by attorney, and counsel were unable to inform me as to the fact. If he did not appear by guardian or next friend it was error in fact, and the court will order all the proceedings to be set aside, and the defendant to appear by guardian: (Carr v. Cooper, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323.) For the present I am bound to assume that all things were rightly done, and that there is a valid subsisting judgment for damages and costs against the debtor, and the question I have to decide, and which I am told has never yet been raised under the existing bankruptcy law, is whether the infancy of the debtor, which has been proved before me, is a bar to his being adjudicated a bankrupt. Before the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, only traders could be made bankrupt, and by the law of England no infant could trade, and it was consequently held that an adjudication of bankruptcy against an infant was not only voidable but void. See the cases of Rex. v. Cole (1 Raym. 443); Ex parte Sidebottom (1 Atk. 146); Ex parte Adam (1 V. & B. 494), and Belton v. Hodges (9 Bing. 365). Although under some circumstances the court refused to supersede bankruptcies in which proceedings had taken place: (Ex parte Moule, 14 Ves. 602; Ex parte Watson, 16 Ves. 265; and other cases.) But under the Act of 1861 "All debtors, whether traders or not, are made subject to its provisions" sect. 69; and it was held by that eminent judge in bankruptcy, Mr. Serjt. Wheeler, in the County Court of Liverpool, in Re Smedley (10 L. T. Rep. N.S. 432), that an infant, whether a trader or not, was liable to the operation of the bankruptcy law under the Act of 1861; and that decision was approved of and followed by the commissioners of the London Court of Bankruptcy in Re Purser (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 23). By the present Bankruptcy Act, 1869, sect. 6, all persons, non-traders as well as traders, are likewise liable to be adjudicated bankrupts for any debts due by them, and, a fortiori, for debts due by them upon judgments recovered against them in actions of tort, like the present, and there is no exception in the Act as to infants. I therefore think that the petitioner is entitled to an order of adjudication against the debtor if he appeared by guardian or next friend, or in the event of his not having so appeared if he does not take steps to set aside the judgment now recorded against him without delay. I propose to adjourn the hearing of this petition until it has been ascertained whether the defendant appeared by guardian or next friend. If he did so appear, adjudication will pass at once; if not, I shall further adjourn the hearing until he has had an opportunity to set the judgment aside. If he succeed in setting the judgment aside, the present petition will be dismissed without costs, if he fail, adjudication will then pass. Adjourned to the next court.

Feb. 17.—An affidavit was handed to the court showing that the debtor in this case had appeared by his next friend in the action, and thereupon adjudication passed.

THE repeal of the American bankruptcy law is still before Congress, but definite action is not yet taken, or even foreshadowed. The discussion of the Army Appropriation Bill brings up the question of reduction; and much testimony has been taken, the drift of which seems to be that a reduction of the standing army would be injudicious at this day. But yet there is a spasm of economy upon the party that has lavishly squandered millions, which requires some penny wisdom to alleviate it.

LEGAL NEWS.

LORD ST. LEONARDS. — This venerable legal Peer and author completed his 94th year of age on the 12th inst., and is in the enjoyment of his faculties and health.

CHANCERY ORDER.—The Lord Chancellor has made an order that the Chancery Easter Vacation shall commence on the 2nd of April and terminate on the 11th of the same month, both days inclusive.

AN order appeared in the London Gazette of Tuesday last, fixing the tables of fees to be taken on and after the 2nd of March next by the officers of the Court of Probate in the Principal and District Registries thereof.

A BILL has passed in the United States Senate, which authorises the employment of a secretary, at a salary not exceeding 2500 dols., to assist any Federal judge who, by reason of physical infirmity, is unable, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, to perform his judicial duties without such assistance.

WE observe that one of the members of the Bar, Mr. Locock Webb, who came forward as a candidate in the recent general election was spoken of in a number of the daily papers as a Queen's Counsel. This description is incorrect. The learned gentleman although he has been in a leading position as a "junior" for a considerable number of years is not only not a Q. C. but he was not even among the recent applicants for "silk."

CHURCH PROPERTY. — The reversion of the patronage of St. Mary's Church, Kirkdale, Liverpool, was recently offered for sale by auction. There was a large attendance, the announcement of the sale having caused considerable interest. On behalf of the vendors £500 was offered, and no advance was made upon this price for some time. At last, however, a local solicitor offered £510, and this being the highest bid the reversion was "knocked down" to him for that sum.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Regius Professor of Civil Law gives notice that the examination for the degree of Master of Law required of all persons desirous to take that degree, except graduates in the Law Tripos, will be held on two more occasions only in the subjects now required—the Commentaries of Gaius and the 4th Book of the Commentaries of Blackstone. The dates of these examinations will be 24th March and 11th Dec. 1874. After the last mentioned date all candidates for the degree of LL.M. will be examined at the time of the Law Tripos only in each year, and will be required to satisfy the examiners in the three following papers:—1. Passages for translation taken from the sources of Roman Law, particularly from Gaius, Ulpian, Justinian, and some specified portion of the Digest. 2. Questions on Roman Law and its History. 3. English Criminal Law.

A LEGAL PUZZLE.—The death of the celebrated Siamese twins has caused the following curious reflections on the part of a lay contemporary: "It is a very fortunate thing that the Siamese twins were law-abiding citizens. Had they not been they would have given the authorities no end of trouble. In fact, it seems to us that they could have committed all sorts of crime with impunity, had they been so inclined. If Chang had committed an assault, how would it have been possible to have arrested him without arresting Eng also, and had Eng been entirely innocent of all participation in the affair, why should he have been arrested? In order to punish the guilty, it would have been necessary to punish the innocent also; and locking up Chang would have included locking up Eng. We do not see any way out of the dilemma that would have arisen except a temporary one; that is the confining of Eng as a witness. But when it came to punishing the guilty party, justice would have been nonplussed, for the law does not permit an innocent party to suffer for crimes he has not committed. If Eng, on the other hand, had perpetrated a murder, he could never have been hanged, no matter how strong and conclusive the evidence had been against him. He could not have been imprisoned for life, for in these instances it would have necessitated the death or the life-long confinement of the unoffending Chang, who, having a separate identity, could have obtained a writ of habeas corpus, and demanded his liberty. Had one of these twins been a rogue, he would have, therefore, caused no end of embarrassment to the officers of justice. If Chang were drunk and disorderly in the streets, what policeman could have arrested him without laying himself open to a charge of false imprisonment from the unoffending Eng? Had these twins been evil-minded, and conscious of the perplexities they could have originated, there is no knowing what might have happened. The law would have been powerless, for vice must have triumphed and virtue been oppressed, or, virtue triumphed and vice gone unpunished. Twins of this description are by no means desirable under such possible contingencies.

FEE STAMPS.—The increase in the year which ended on the 31st March 1873, was £34,617 compared with the preceding year.

RACEHORSE DUTY.—The decrease in this duty for the year ending 31st March 1873, was £801, compared with the year 1872, when the amount was £9521.

JUDGE DWINELLE, of San Francisco, it is said, recently fined a whole jury 5 dols. each for being five minutes late, and the next morning he was half an hour late himself.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. — A Liverpool dog fancier has been sentenced to two months' imprisonment with hard labour for having conveyed by railway, from Liverpool to London, seven dogs in a closed box, and without sufficient ventilation, so that the animals were suffocated, after injuring themselves by endeavouring to escape.

RAILWAY LAW.—A writer in the Times states that having applied for a new season ticket, the directors of the Brighton Railway Company have insisted upon the applicant's signature of the following clause as a condition precedent to such renewal, viz., "That the company are not to be liable for any stoppage, hindrance, or delay in respect to the starting, speed, or arrival of any train, whether arising from any accident, negligence, or any other cause." The question seems to merit the notice of the Railway Commissioners, as it is one which affects the public.

THE NEW COUNTY COURT JUDGE.—The Lord Chancellor has selected as the successor to Mr. W. Raines, who was appointed judge of County Courts in the East, West, and North Ridings in 1847—and held the office until his death a few days ago—Mr. Chapman Barber, of the Chancery Bar, with whose name the public has been long familiarised by the reports of the Tichborne case. Mr. Barber is, by his long experience and very considerable ability, fully qualified to discharge the duties of a judge of County Courts, but it is singular that he should have been called to the Bar at the same time in 1833 as his predecessor, who held office for twenty-seven years. The appointment to a judicial office of a gentleman who has reached the age at which many judges begin to think of retiring is remarkable.—Globe.

JUDICIAL SALARIES IN AMERICA.—The question of judicial compensation is before the General Assembly, and has elicited the usual diversity of views. Messrs. Newmyer, Brockway and McCormick take a proper view of the subject, while others seem to think it better to keep the judges on short pay. The experience brought to notice in the sad death of the ex-Chief Justice last week leads us to some reflections on the case of the judges of our highest tribunal, which appear pertinent to the question in hand. Here we have the case of a lawyer of great ability and ripe experience, who had been trained for the position he assumed by six years upon the Bench. From the moment he took his seat he was prepared for the full performance of his duties; and by the united testimony of his professional brethren, shown in our columns, he did perform them faithfully and well. Setting aside the unpleasantness of the spectacle of one who had filled so exalted a position, doffing the ermine and coming down as it were into the arena of forensic strife, a matter in our opinion of great moment, as it affects the dignity of the Bench and the maintenance of that proper respect which should surround the justice seat; there are other considerations, of great weight, that bear upon the question. Recurring to our example, we find that Judge Thompson, after fifteen years of duty on the Bench of the Supreme Court, was very little if at all improved in circumstances, and was obliged to resume practice under all the disadvantages consequent upon such a sudden change of function, from the judge to the advocate. Now it is manifest that if this accomplished lawyer had remained at the Bar, and had been employed in one-fourth the number of cases which he was during his long service obliged to master, so as to decide them; at the lowest rate of legal remuneration in ordinary cases, his emoluments would have exceeded four-fold the whole amount paid him as salary. Why should this be so? If it be the duty of the State to furnish judges equal to the task to be performed, it should be likewise a duty, to be enforced by the self respect of the people, to pay a fair remuneration for their services. When the late Chief Justice laid off his robes of office, although he had no tenable legal claim upon the Commonwealth, there is no question in our minds that, on a fair adjustment in foro conscientiæ, if such could have been had, a large balance would have appeared to his credit. In this view of the case it is manifest that the amounts reported by the committee, 9000 dols. for Chief Justice, and 8000 dols. for the associates, are not up to the mark; but as the present General Assembly is not the body to which the final adjustment of this matter is committed, we would advise all who feel an interest in the subject to bear it in mind when the next selection of representatives is to be made. —Philadelphia Legal Intelligencer.

MR. PALLES, the Irish Attorney-General, has accepted the vacant office of Chief Baron of the Exchequer.

ADULTERATION.—Out of 212 samples of tobacco analysed by the Inland Revenue Board in the year 1872, 129 samples were adulterated. Out of 26 parcels of snuff only one was proved to be adulterated.

AMERICAN THIEVES.—Five armed highwaymen robbed the stage coach near Hot Springs, in Arkansas, on 15th Jan. The robbers opened the mail bags and stole the best of the horses belonging to the stage. About 2000 dols. were taken from the passengers, including money belonging to a Mr. Crump, of Memphis, one of the passengers. This individual was robbed of his watch also; but he received from the leader of the band his money and watch, as he had been a Confederate soldier, and the enmity of the robbers was against the Yankees.

STATISTICS OF THE ENGLISH COURTS OF JUSTICE.—On Monday evening, at the fourth ordinary meeting for the present session of the Statistical Society, held at the society's rooms, at St. James's-square, Dr. Guy, F.R.S., president, in the chair, Mr. F. H. Janson president, of the Incorporated Law Society, read a paper entitled "Some Statistics of Courts of Justice and of Legal Procedure in England." The lecturer, in opening, observed that, from an expression put into the mouth of Hamlet, it was clear that even in Shakespeare's time the "law's delay" had become proverbial, and it can readily be conceived that in ancient times much delay must necessarily have resulted from the centralisation of the courts of justice. The delays in the administration of justice, especially in the business of the Court of Chancery, may be said to have culminated in the first quarter of the present century. Our courts of justice might be classified in two grand divisions—those of common law and those of Chancery, and there were two general courts of ultimate appeal—the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Two hundred years ago, in the reign of Charles II., when the population of England and Wales was about one-fifth, that of the metropolis one-tenth of its present number, and the business of the courts bore no comparison with that of the present day, there were twelve common law judges, with the same number of assistant masters as at present; a Lord Chancellor and a Master of the Rolls, who were assisted by the Masters in Chancery. The additions to the judicial force made since that period are—to the three principal courts of common law two judges each, six in all; to the Court of Chancery three Vice-Chancellors; and for appeals in the first instance two Lords Justices; but, independently of the increase of business arising from the growth of wealth and population, there are now thrown upon the common law judges the business of hearing petitions on disputed elections and appeals from the decisions of the revising barristers; whilst the Chancery judges have the heavy work of what are called "winding-up" cases, viz., the settlement of the affairs of joint stock companies in liquidation, besides the various kinds of administrative business confided to it in recent years by various statutes. He ought not to omit to mention that the apparent expedition with which some judges of the Court of Chancery have got through the business of their courts is attributable to the practice of throwing upon the chief clerks important duties which they were not originally intended to perform. The delays at common law are less severely felt, but still the work is always more or less in arrear, and a fresh arrangement of business between the judges of the various courts, which may be the result of the new Judicature Act, will not lessen the total quantity to be got through. This is manifestly too great for the present staff, the increase of labourers not having by any means kept pace with the increase of the work to be done. In his own opinion the real cause of the delays in the administration of justice arose from, first, the want of a sufficient judicial force in the Court of Chancery; and, secondly, the occurrence of what are technically called vacations. To many it seemed remarkable that there should be any period during which the machinery of justice is allowed to stand still. No doubt the judges and their subordinates, like other people, require a holiday to recruit their powers, which are often severely tried; but with a proper system of relays there need be no cessation of judicial work throughout the year; while each judge and official would have a fair amount of rest from his labours. Appended to the paper was an elaborate statistical analysis showing the judicial power and the judicial work of the various courts. The reading of the paper was followed by an animated discussion, in which Mr. W. G. Lumley, Q.C., Mr. W. J. Bovill, Q.C., Mr. J. T. Hammick, Mr. R. B. Martin, Mr. Brewer, and other gentlemen took part. After a warm vote of thanks had been passed to the lecturer, the proceedings closed with the usual compliment to the chairman.

MALE SERVANTS.—On the 1st Jan. 1874 the duty on the male servants of hotel keepers ceased. The loss to the revenue is estimated at £30,000 annually.

MR RAFFLES, the Liverpool stipendiary magistrate, had before him a charge against a cabman for being drunk and assaulting the police. One of the policemen admitted charging the prisoner with knowing more "about a jackass than a horse;" and Mr. Raffles wished it to be understood that if the police "chaffed" a man under the influence of drink, he would not commit him for assault. It was, he said, the business of the police to receive "chaff" and not to give it.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.—Law Department.—Mr. Bernard Edward Hodgson has been appointed to a clerkship in the Queen's Bench Master's Office. The East Indies.—Mr. F. Clarke, barrister-at-law, receiver of the High Court, Bengal, in place of Mr. H. Millett, resigned; Mr. R. Evans, assistant-magistrate and collector of Cawnpore, North-West Provinces; Mr. E. H. Little, C.S., has been confirmed in his appointment to act as Registrar of the High Court, Bombay, appellate side, during Mr. Jardine's absence on private leave; Major N. B. Thoyts, S.C., as cantonment magistrate at Kurrachee.

LEGISLATION AS TO MERCHANT SHIPPING.—We have received from Mr. David McIver a rough memorandum of his views in regard to the present position of merchant shipping legislation. He thinks that there is no reason why the attention of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade should, so far as annual survey is concerned, be devoted exclusively to British passenger steamers; nor any reason why foreign vessels should be permitted to load outwards from British ports, on conditions other than those under which British vessels may compete with them. He regards the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, as at present constituted, as being an unfit tribunal to be intrusted with increased arbitrary powers, but thinks that there would be no difficulty in Government nominating a board, as a court of appeal or otherwise—say, not less than three, nor more than seven—of persons possessing the confidence of the country, who could perform such duties satisfactorily. Mr. McIver thinks the system of courts of inquiry into maritime disasters is so bad that hardly any change could be made for the worse; and therefore that it is high time the question were intrusted to competent legal authority, with a view to practical suggestions for improving the mode of procedure in such manner as would be likely to best elicit information, while giving shipmasters reasonable opportunities for defence—which at present is not always the case. There are many instances where substantial injustice has been done to unfortunate shipmasters; and also where the owner has been prejudiced in a court of law by the allegation that his master had been adjudged in default—and that, perhaps, by a tribunal not very competent.

THE RIGHT TO ONE'S FACE.—The right of a man to control the publication of his own features is a rather delicate point of personal law which has never been sufficiently elucidated. The well-known practice of photograpers in exhibiting copies of the portraits which they have taken is one which, on some grounds, may be deemed open to grave exceptions. The position of the illustrated papers in the matter might also repay inspection. A contemporary, having prepared for publication a portrait of a lady whose husband is in high official position under the present Administration, the picture was reluctantly suppressed at the request of the latter on the assurance that it was the lady's wish. At the same time, the journal announced that this was the last time such a concession would be made to private prejudices. It proclaimed the doctrine that neither man nor woman had any property in the reflection of their features, and that hereafter, in a similar case, it should not "feel compelled to regard the wishes or request of the party concerned." The same journal announced in one of its early impressions that it would give representations of private wedding parties whenever it felt inclined, and that it "should not feel compelled to regard the objections of the parties concerned." In cases like these it is difficult to draw the precise line where liberty ends and licence begins; but men of right feeling and true delicacy know by instinct what is correct, and what is a violation of personal rights and domestic privacy. If the portraits thus published in disregard of wishes and requests were uniformly artistic or approximately like, one part of the objection, though not the essential part, would vanish; but they are often such hideous caricatures as to amount to positive pictorial libels. The paper we speak of published a day or two after his death, what is called a portrait of Charles Astor Bristed. The face depicted might have belonged to a butcher or a drover, but had not a trace of the intellect and high breeding marked in every feature of its pretended subject. It may be said that very few people really object to have their portraits published. That is probably true, yet it is not exactly to the point. The question is not whether it is generally right and proper for an illustrated paper to publish such portraits as it may deem of interest to its readers, but whether such portraits may be rightfully and properly published in defiance of the expressed will of their prototypes. It would certainly be a most interesting case for a court of law.—New York Times.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it.

THE WORKING OF THE BALLOT.—Having acted as a presiding officer in one of the Metropolitan boroughs at the recent Parliamentary election, I am able to confirm the observations in your last issue upon this subject, and especially as to the stupidity shown by electors from whom it could not be expected, in reference to complying with the provisions of the Act relating to the mode of recording votes, and as to the many errors on the register by which the balloting is checked. The chief of the new government in embryo will do well to consider the suggestions upon the former subject, contained in the letter of a "Town clerk," which appears in to-day's Times, namely, inter alia, that the voter should either strike out the names of the candidates for whom he does not wish to vote, or else that he should be required to put the cross against such names. As regards the delay in ascertaining the state of the poll—at present wholly unavoidable in large constituencies—I suggest that from time to time during the polling day the presiding officer might, in the presence of the necessary agents, examine the ballot papers, and register each vote on a list, so that almost immediately on the closing of the poll each presiding officer might go to the returning officer with a correct summary of the votes taken by him, having a separate list of the papers on which any irregularity appears. Thus could the returning officer, within a few hours of the closing of the poll, make the necessary declaration. While writing on the above subject, I must add that the front of the building in which I acted as stated, was so covered with the bills of one of the candidates that it cannot have failed to favourably impress many an ignorant elector in favour of such candidate. When we reap the expected results of the Education Act and School Boards, such a matter will be of no moment, but until then I think that if common decency does not forbid such a proceeding, the Legislature ought.

CHARLES FORD.

Feb. 18, 1874.

THE CITY OF LONDON COURT.—I beg to call attention to an occurrence that took place to-day before Mr. Commissioner Kerr, at the City of London Court, as showing the judicial impartiality that distinguishes that tribunal. The occurrence took place in an action brought by a plaintiff for a sum of about £3, for tea sold and delivered. Incidentally it came out in the course of the proceedings that the plaintiff had previously sued defendant in the Mayor's Court for a sum of about £16, and recovered judgment, and that the sum of £3 now sued upon had been omitted by mistake in the former action. The judge, who had been sharply questioning the defendant, now asked to have the Mayor's Court plaint handed up to him, and on observing that there was an amount of £2 4s. 8d., or thereabouts, for costs, exclaimed, "Two pounds four and eightpence costs on a debt of sixteen pounds!" and suddenly turning to plaintiff, asked him, "Are you lost to all sense of shame?" The plaintiff, who seemed a quiet young man, was rather taken aback by this strange question so suddenly put to him. Again the judge asked him, "Are you lost to all sense of shame?" The plaintiff faltered out something to the effect that his solicitors had acted for him in the Mayor's Court proceedings, whereupon the judge remarked, "That if ordinary people had any sense of shame attorneys had not," or words to that effect. He continued his abuse of the attorneys for some time in this strain, and said that if plaintiff had come to the City of London Court for his £16 he might have had a plaint for 16s. Thus the whole ground of this abuse of the unoffending plaintiff and the profession of attorneys was that he had adopted a course of procedure regulated by the same authority as that from which the learned judge himself derived his authority—a course by which he had obtained judgment at the expiration of eight days from issuing the plaint without any trouble to himself, but at an expense of £2 4s. 8d. Had he on the other hand adopted the course proposed by the judge, he must have waited for a month, in entire uncertainty whether the case would be defended or not, his costs would have been, not

16s. as the judge said, but £2 9s. out of pocket, and in addition he would have to pass through the ordeal of an interview with Mr. Commissioner Kerr, the prospects of which may well be sufficient to frighten many plaintiffs from the City Court to the Mayor's Court over the way. I say nothing of the remarks upon the profession of attorneys, but beg to subscribe myself ONE OF THEM.

REPEAL OF ATTORNEYS' CERTIFCATE DUTY.—I was pleased to see the following lines in the last number of the LAW TIMES: "We think in view of recent legislation, that Mr. Disraeli, with his large surplus, may well relieve solicitors from the payment of the annual certificate duty, and the claim ought to be advanced by our representatives in the House." I cannot see why the attorneys should pay an annual certificate duty and members of the clerical and medical professions pay none. I would not wish to have it wholly repealed, but a part taken off, and that part (if Her Majesty's Government cannot afford to lose it) be put on the other two professions above-mentioned in equal proportions. If the leading members of our Profession were to take up this matter with a determination to get it modified it would be done; but as this annual payment to them is a matter of so little importance, they are supine in the matter, in fact, do not wish to have it modified or repealed, under the idea that it keeps the Profession respectable. How is it the other two professions are kept respectable without it? Do, Mr. Editor, kindly use your powerful pen, and assist us in this matter, and you will deserve and earn the thanks of our Profession in general, and those who are barely earning a living and cannot afford to pay the tax (and there are hundreds of them) in particular. If you will kindly give this a place in your next paper you will much oblige your old subscriber, J. T. S.

SECURITY FOR COSTS—31 & 32 VICT. c. 54.—In your impression of the 14th inst., you state that "in one case it was held that plaintiffs resident in Scotland and Ireland cannot be compelled to give security for costs, the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 54 having provided a process of enforcing an English judgment in those countries. This was the case of Raeburn v. Andrews in the Queen's Bench on the 29th ult." As some misapprehension may exist as to whether this Act is applicable to the inferior courts of record in England, you will kindly allow me to state that it is still necessary that security for costs should be taken in all the inferior courts, the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 54 only applying to judgments obtained in the courts at Westminster. The judgments of the inferior courts can certainly be removed to, and be made the judgments of, the Superior Courts, but subject to certain restrictions. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 49, provides the following for judgments obtained in the County Court: "If a judge of a Superior Court shall be satisfied that a party against whom judgment for an amount exceeding £20 exclusive of costs has been obtained in a County Court has no goods or chattels which can conveniently be taken to satisfy such judgment, he may, if he shall think fit, or on such terms as to costs as he may direct, order a writ of certiorari to issue to remove the judgment of the County Court into one of the Superior Courts, and when removed it shall have the same force and effect and the same proceedings may be had thereon as in the case of a judgment of such Superior Court; but no action shall be brought upon such judgment." Pollock and Nicol, in their County Court Practice, 7th edit., p. 167, state that the above provision can only be exercised by a plaintiff where a defendant has no goods. The defendant, then, if the case be tried in the County Court, has no remedy against the plaintiff on his judgment if resident out of England, and if no security has been taken by the registrar the costs will have to be sued for and proved in the court where the action is brought, as an action will not lie on a judgment obtained in a County court: (3 Bl. Com. 160; Berkeley v. Elderkin, 1 E. & B. 805; 22 L. J. 281, Q.B.; Austin v. Mills, 9 Ex. 288.)

63. SEAL.—In a marriage settlement in place of seals there are merely ribbons inserted (wax having been accidentally omitted to be put on). Will this affect its validity? T. P. H.

64. TEN YEARS' CLERK.—B., a ten years' clerk, is desirous of being articled. He is also desirous of obtaining an order dispensing with the Preliminary Examination. Will you, or any of your readers, say what course B. should adopt in order to obtain such order, and what formula is to be gone through. X.

65. POWERS OF ADMINISTRATRIX.—A., who was possessed of some freehold property, died intestate, leaving a widow and three children (minors) him surviving. At the time of his death A. owed several sums of money, and his widow, who has taken out letters of administration, is desirous of selling the property, in order to satisfy the intestate's debts. Will any of the readers of the LAW TIMES inform me if the administratrix can sell and convey without the necessity of any other parties joining in. RUSTICUS.

66. TRESPASS.—A. is the lessee of certain property upon which his house stands; he underlets one field, a portion of the said property, to B., at a yearly rent. While this field is in B.'s possession a third person, who is building a row of houses on a plot of land next to the field, drives his carts along the latter, and, in fact, makes it a thoroughfare, much to the annoyance of A., whose dining-room window overlooks the field. What remedy has A., and against whom? Cases would oblige. ALCIPHRON.

LAW SOCIETIES.

MANCHESTER INCORPORATED LAW ASSOCIATION.

THE annual general meeting of the members of the association was held on the 19th Jan, last, at Cross-street Chambers, when an account of the receipts and disbursements (previously audited by two of the members), was submitted and passed, and the officers and committee were elected for the ensuing year.

The proceedings of this society for the last year were stated in the following report, which was read by the hon. secretary, and unanimously adopted.

In presenting to the members of the Manchester Incorporated Law Association the thirty-fifth annual report, the committee have again the pleasure of recording the prosperous condition of the association, both in the number of its members and the state of its finances. The accounts of the treasurer show a balance in hand of £116 15s. 10d. The amount invested in Consols is £672 12s. 3d., which, with the sum of £80 1s. 3d. for accumulated dividends thereon, is held in trust for the association.

The legislation of the session, though comprising comparatively few Acts of interest to the Profession, is rendered memorable both to lawyers and the public by the passing of

The Supreme Court of Judicature Act (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66).—The principle of this Bill, the provisions of which are now too generally known to need recapitulation, was based by the Lord Chancellor on a judicious carrying out of the well-considered recommendations contained in the first report of the Judicature Commission for the fusion of law and equity. The Bill proposed to transfer to the Supreme Court the jurisdiction of the present Superior Courts of Law and Equity, and of several other courts, including the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster and Court of Pleas at Durham. It did not affect the Chancery of Lancashire (except as to appeals), nor the County Courts, Salford Hundred Court, or other inferior courts. Your committee after carefully considering the Bill were of opinion that it was, on the whole, a beneficial improvement on the present system, and deserved the support of the Profession, but that the necessity for securing district registries in Lancashire (before the suitors were deprived of the benefits afforded by the Common Pleas at Lancaster), and of granting greater facilities for the trial of causes in Manchester and Liverpool should be urged on the Legislature. Your committee and the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool communicated with the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cairns, with the result of extending and improving the District Registry Clauses, so as to provide for the continuance of the Lancashire registries. When the Bill had passed the Upper House and stood for second reading in the House of Commons, a joint deputation from the Liverpool and Manchester Societies had an interview with a number of members of that House to urge them to support the Bill, and your committee presented a petition praying that the Bill might pass. By means of the united action of the Associated Northern Provincial Law Societies the attention of many other law societies was called to the Bill, and observations were drawn up from time to time, in reference to the District Registry, Referee, and other clauses, and forwarded to members of Parliament. Ultimately the Bill, after much discussion in committee, where the Registry Clauses were at one time threatened with serious opposition, passed through all its forms, and has become one of the most important Acts relating to the administration of the law which has ever appeared upon the Statute Book.

The Custody of Infants Act (36 Vict. c. 12)—makes an important change in the rights of mothers as regards the custody of their infant children. It empowers the Court of Chancery to order that a mother may have access to, or the custody of, her children under the age of sixteen, and legalises an agreement in a separation deed for the mother to have the custody of her infant children. It repeals the Act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 54.

Intestates' Widows and Children Act (36 & 37 Vict. c. 52).—This Act enables the widow or children of an intestate, where the estate does not exceed £100 in value, and if residing more than three miles from a registry of the Court of Probate, to obtain letters of administration through the registrar of the County Court of the district where the intestate had his fixed abode, for a small scale of fees.

Professional Remuneration.—A joint committee of the Incorporated Law Society and the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association having been appointed with a view of framing a scale of charges which should be generally approved by the Profession, a circular letter was issued by them to each of the Provincial Law Societies, referring to the scale prepared in 1871 by the Incorporated Society, and to that agreed on about the same time by the law societies of Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Worcester, and requesting information as to the experience of the Profession in regard to the two scales. Your committee, after carefully considering the subject, replied to the effect that in their opinion a scale of commission requires legislative or judicial sanction for general adoption, that the London scale of 1871 was so high as to be altogether impracticable in the country, and that the scale recommended by the provincial societies is also, if anything, too high in large transactions. They suggested the omission of the second column of the provincial scale, with a view to simplicity and reduction on large amounts, but in other respects upheld the provincial scale, and its separation of negotiation from conveyancing charges, and its principle of giving a smaller fee to the vendor's solicitor than to that of the purchaser. The London societies subsequently submitted the draft of the revised scale which has since been adopted by them. This scale, though approaching more nearly to that of the provincial societies, especially in the adoption of a fee to the vendor's solicitor of three-fourths only, of that of the purchaser's solicitor, your committee consider it still too high for adoption in this district. A revision, in some respects, of the provincial societies' scale is under their consideration.

Organisation of the Profession.—An important step towards the better representation of the Profession has been taken during the past year by the Incorporated Law Society in obtaining a supplemental charter, by virtue of which the council now consists of forty ordinary members, elected by proxy (of whom ten are solicitors practising in the provinces), and ten extraordinary members, elected annually by the council from the presidents of provincial law societies. At the recent election ten of the most active country members of the Profession were elected to the council, including your former president Mr. Bateson Wood. The question of an amalgamation of the Incorporated and Metropolitan and Provincial Societies was again considered at the provincial meeting of the latter Association, at Birmingham, in October last, when papers were read on "The Organisation of the Profession," by Mr. Marshall, of Leeds, and on "The Amalgamation of the two London Societies," by Mr. Saunders, of Birmingham, and it was resolved to continue the efforts for the proposed amalgamation. The council of the incorporated society have since passed the following resolution on the subject:—"That the council being prepared to entertain proposals for the admission of members of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association into the Incorporated Law Society on the dissolution of the former, is not unwilling to pledge itself to hold an annual general meeting, out of London, in the autumn, provided that the terms of admission can be satisfactorily arranged." Your committee trust that this will soon be accomplished, believing that those who are at present country members of the Metropolitan and Provincial Association will, as members of the incorporated society, find when in London an advantage in having access to the rooms of the society and reference to its library, and that the influence of the Profession will be increased by its representation in London being united, especially now that so many country solicitors are on the council.

Bills of Sale Act as regards Trade Fixtures.—The attention of your committee has been given to the question of the registration of mortgages of trade fixtures in consequence of decisions, first by Vice-Chancellor Malins in the case of Begbie v. Fenwick (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58), and next of the Court of Queen's Bench in Hawtrey v. Butlin (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 29), in both of which cases it was held that a mortgage of trade fixtures in connection with leasehold premises to be valid, as against creditors, must be registered under the Bills of Sale Act. On the faith of the previous well known cases of Mather v. Frazer, and Boyd v. Shorrock, mortgages comprising trade fixtures have not usually been registered. Your committee came to the resolution that it was desirable to obtain an Act of Parliament for the purpose—First, of giving to the holders of such mortgages the opportunity of registering them within a time to be limited after the passing of the Act; and, next, to provide that future mortgages comprising trade fixtures should be declared to be within the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act, no matter what might be the tenure of the property to which they were attached. A deputation from your committee waited upon the then Attorney General (now Chief Justice Coleridge) to bespeak his aid in carrying out this resolution, which he promised to give in the ensuing session, but said it was too late to enter upon the matter in the last session. Your committee also put themselves in communication with the Chamber of Commerce, who promised their support to a Bill to carry out these views. In July last, the case Ex parte Daglish, re Wilde, Weekly Reporter, vol. 21, No. 63, page 893, came before the Lords Justices, who have confirmed the ruling that an unregistered mortgage of trade fixtures attached to property leasehold for 999 years is invalid, as against a trustee in bankruptcy, which renders action in the matter more necessary. The subject has been brought before the Incorporated Law Society, and by the council of that society before the present Attorney-General, Sir Henry James; but he states that there are so many Bills requiring the attention of himself and the Solicitor-General during the coming session, that there will be little chance of any Government Bill affecting the subject being introduced. He adds that in case of any private member submitting a Bill to Parliament to carry out the above views he will be happy to confer with them thereon. Under these circumstances your committee recommend the association to take up the subject, and to prepare, and endeavour to get passed, an Act to do justice to those whose securities are so unexpectedly called in question, and to set at rest the present unsatisfactory state of the law.

Clerk of the Peace, County Palatine of Lancaster Act.—Your committee having recently learnt that the justices contemplated the introduction, during the coming session, of a Bill to repeal or amend this Act, and to vest the appointment of two deputy clerks of the peace in the clerk of the peace, instead of in the Chancellor of the Duchy, as provided by the Act, a joint letter from the Liverpool and Manchester societies was addressed to Mr. Rathbone, M.P., one of the justices, pointing out the objections to such a change. Mr. Rathbone afterwards forwarded the letter to the Chancellor of the Duchy, and asked him not to consent to any such Bill, and communicated it to the justices at their adjourned annual sessions. The justices, however, resolved to proceed with the Bill, and your committee feel no doubt their successors will be prepared to co-operate with the Liverpool Society in opposing this attempt to neutralise the benefit conferred by the Act.

Common Pleas at Lancaster.—The retirement of the prothonotary (Mr. Harris), having afforded an opportunity of combining the duties of associate with those of the district prothonotary, in each district, your committee addressed the Chancellor of the Duchy in support of the proposal, and an arrangement has accordingly been made by which the office of associate at the Manchester Assizes will, in future, be filled by the district prothonotary.

County Court Changes.—Your committee finding that it was again proposed to transfer Mr. Russell from Manchester to Liverpool, and to make further changes in the circuits in and about Manchester, appointed a deputation, which in company with deputations from the Corporation of Manchester and the Chamber of Commerce, was received by the Lord Chancellor, and the representations then made induced his Lordship to abandon the intention of removing Mr. Russell, and to determine to make no change at present in the Lancashire Circuits.

New County Court.—Your committee have much pleasure in reporting that the numerous representations made by your association and other public bodies, as well as by the judge and officials of the court, regarding the inadequate accommodation for the increasing business of the Manchester County Court, have at length taken effect. Your committee lately received a letter from the First Commissioner of Works stating that the Government had under consideration the question of providing a New County Court, and requesting an expression of their views before he finally decided on a site. To this communication a reply has been sent urging the importance of a central situation. Details of the accommodation required for the public and the Profession were also given, and the hope expressed that the future requirements of a rapidly increasing mercantile district would not be overlooked.

Heelis Memorial.—The committee have received subscriptions amounting to about £400, with which it has been decided to found a Gold Medal, to be called "The Stephen Heelis Prize for Manchester and Salford Students," to be annually awarded to the student who among the candidates from Manchester and Salford shall during each year have passed the best final examination, provided he attain a sufficient standard of merit to entitle him to a prize or honorary certificate of the Incorporated Law Society, and shall not have completed his 26th year. The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have approved the scheme, and undertaken to award the medal, of which the design has been approved, and the dies are now being made, so that the prize may be open to competition during the present year.

Point of Practice—Conditions of Sale.—The Kent Law Society having asked for the opinion of your committee as to the propriety or impropriety of certain conditions of sale stipulating or offering inducement to a purchaser to employ the vendor's solicitor to prepare the conveyance, your committee replied that such a practice was so unusual in this neighbourhood that your association had not experienced the necessity of making any rule on the subject, but that as an association we should object to any stipulation of the kind being inserted in conditions of sale.

Prize for Essay on the Law of Tenure.—The prize of £7 7s. in books, given by Mr. Davies, for the best essay on the "History and Law of Tenure of Real Property," was awarded by your committee to Mr. Alfred Wallis, of Bluepits, an articled clerk of Mr. William Scott, of Rochdale.

The Preliminary Examinations of Candidates prior to articles have, as usual, been held in Manchester during the year, under the conduct of members of your association as local examiners.

Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.—The usual annual provincial meeting of this association was held in Birmingham, on the 21st and 22nd Oct., at which your association was represented by a deputation. The meeting was attended by 103 gentlemen, of whom 9 were metropolitan members and 94 provincial. After the address of the president a number of interesting papers were read most of which were followed by important discussions, those of the subject of amalgamation with the Incorporated Law Society have been already adverted to. The association was received by the members of the Birmingham Law Society with great hospitality and attention, and it was decided that the next autumnal meeting should be held in Leeds.

The following gentlemen were elected the officers of the association for the ensuing year: President, Mr. W. H. Guest. Vice-Presidents, Mr. John Taylor and Mr. A. Percy Earle. Treasurer, Mr. James Street. Honorary Secretary, Mr. S. Unwin. Chairman of Committee, Mr. G. F. Wharton. Deputy-Chairman, Mr. Percy Woolley.

BARRISTERS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

THE first annual meeting of the Barristers' Benevolent Association was held on Friday afternoon, the 13th inst., by the kind permission of the Benchers, at the Hall of the Middle Temple.

Lord Coleridge took the chair; and amongst those present were the Attorney-General (Sir Henry James), the Solicitor-General (Sir William Harcourt), Mr. Manisty, Q.C., Mr. Herschell, Q.C., Mr. Edlin, Q.C., Mr. Garth, Q.C., Mr. McIntyre, Q.C., Mr. J. J. Powell, Q.C., Mr. D. T. Evans, J. C. Matthews, and numerous other gentlemen.

It will be remembered that this association was called into existence at a meeting of the Bar in the Middle Temple Hall on 10th Jan. 1873, and its object "is to afford assistance to necessitous and deserving members of the English Bar, special pleaders, and conveyancers, their widows and children."

The rules of the association prepared by the committee appointed at the first meeting were submitted to and finally settled by a subsequent meeting of the Bar, over which Sir John Coleridge presided.

The Hon. Sec. (Mr. Macrory) opened the proceedings by reading the notice convening the meeting; and in the report which he submitted to the meeting it showed that the general committee had opened lists for donations and subscriptions, and made appeals to the Profession, which resulted in donations to the end of 1873 amounting to £2035 15s. (received and promised), and in annual subscriptions amounting to £479. Of this sum nearly £200 had been devoted to the grant or assistance in cases which the committee, after careful examination, considered deserving. The report went on to state that the benevolent operations of the association during the first year of its existence had been limited in their scope, owing to the uncertainty felt by the committee as to the funds actually at their disposal, and it added that several urgent applications for relief were at present under their consideration.

The Chairman, in moving that the report be printed and circulated, said that it was not necessary for him to address the meeting at any length, for the association was now upon its legs, and, he hoped, regularly formed; and he trusted that it would continue to increase in power and influence. (Hear, hear.) From what had reached him quite recently he was sure that there were cases in the Profession which urgently called for relief of the kind the association proposed to give, to be administered by persons who could fully estimate the real need of their common charity. There were many instances which had reached him which, but for the stepping in of friends of the Profession, owing to the delicacy and feeling which actuated those who needed help, would have led to the most melancholy and miserable results which words could not describe. A great friend of his own—a person of considerable position and distinction—was brought, by no fault of his own, exceedingly low. Being a gentleman, delicacy stopped him from making known his position, and his case would have led to disastrous results had not attention been called to his condition. In cases of this kind an association such as the present one was of the greatest value, and what one man did not know of the condition of necessitous members another did; and if the committee were properly formed, they would find that such lamentable results as he had suggested would be avoided. He for one had never found that where there was any real need for charitable relief, the hearts and purses were shut against the Profession. (Hear, hear.) But it often happened that among those who were the least successful cases of distress and abject poverty frequently occurred of which they were not aware, and it would be the duty of the association to find such cases out. With regard to the financial condition, he was glad to find that an exceedingly small sum was spent in the working of the association, the expenditure being very moderate; and to the hon. secretary (Mr. Macrory), who had devoted his time and attention for nothing, they owed a deep debt of gratitude. (Applause.) He regretted, however, that many of the subscribers were in arrears, and he trusted that steps would shortly be taken to draw in money by means of a printed circular to be sent round to the defaulters. In conclusion, he said that he was glad to think that the association had now been successfully begun, and he only trusted that year by year they would have larger funds to dispose of to those who sorely wanted them. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Edlin, in seconding the resolution, hoped that the circulation of the report would be substantially conducive to the good of this association.

The motion was then carried.

Mr. Manisty, Q.C. said that with regard to the arrears that might be in some respect due to a delicate feeling which prompted the committee not to apply for the money, but that difficulty would in future be removed; and they might anticipate good results from a new collector who had lately been appointed. There was not the slightest reason to fear but that the money would be quickly got in, for the Profession had come forward more unanimously and earnestly than it had ever done before, and he ventured to hope that the donations would be largely increased, as well as the number of annual subscribers.

The Attorney-General deplored the abstention of the common law judges from all participation in the operations of the society, and urged the noble president to use his influence with his brethren on the bench in their behalf.

The Chairman said that he could not understand why the judges as a body had not contributed to the funds of the association, and he promised that its claims should be fully made known to them, for he had never found that they would shut their hearts or their pockets against any reasonable claim. (Cheers.)

The Solicitor-General then proposed a vote of thanks to the Benchers of the Middle Temple for the use of the hall, which was carried.

The committee of management and the auditors were also appointed, and votes of thanks were awarded to the officers of the association in general, and in particular to Lord Coleridge, for his services in the cause, he also consenting to act as one of the trustees for the current year.

The proceedings then terminated.

LEGAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

WE are asked to remind our readers that contributions in aid of the funds of this association may be sent to the honorary treasurer, Mr. J. M. Clabon, 21, Great George-street, Westminster, or they may be paid into the account of the association at the Temple Bar branch of the London and Westminster Bank. The success of this association, having in view the accomplishment of the most important objects, is due in a large degree to the undeviating and consistent support given to it by the present Lord Chancellor; and it will indeed be most fortunate if, with the resignation by Baron Amphlett of the post of president, and the resignation of the Government, Lord Selborne could be again induced to place himself at the head of the association.

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.

We are requested by the Honorary Secretary of this Society to say that meetings of the Parliamentary committee were held on the 19th and 26th Jan. last, and the 9th and 16th Feb. inst., resulting in the framing of a Bill which will be introduced into the House of Commons, having for its object the protection of the Profession against the depredations of unqualified persons.

DUBLIN LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

A GENERAL Meeting of the Society was held in the Lecture Hall, King's Inns, on Feb. 16, when the following subject was debated: "That the present system of Legal Promotion requires Reform."

DUBLIN LEGAL AND LITERARY DEBATING SOCIETY.

THE usual weekly meeting of this Society was held on Thursday evening last, at 53, Lower Sackville-street. The chair taken at eight o'clock, by Mr. Trevor Overend, President. An essay was read by Mr. J. H. Franks on "Irish Land Tenures."

A. SCHALCH, ESQ.

FROM Jamaica, intelligence has been received announcing the death of Mr. Ernest Alexander Clendining Schalch, the Attorney-General of that island, which occurred on the 31st ult., from an attack of yellow fever. The deceased gentleman, who was of German extraction, was the elder son of the late Edward Vernon Schalch, Esq., of the East India Company's service, and was born about the year 1839. He gained a studentship at the Inner Temple in Jan. 1864, and was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple in Easter Term of that year, and joined the Home Circuit. He practised with considerable success as a special pleader, and attended the Surrey Sessions. He left England about three years ago, on being appointed to the Attorney-Generalship of that island, and lived to acquire a high reputation in the colony. Mr. Schalch was married, and had a family; his only daughter, Miss Gertrude Geraldine Schalch, died about the same time as her father.

W. JENKINS, ESQ.

THE late William Jenkins, Esq., Q.C., LL.D., of Clifton Court, near Bristol, who died on the 22nd ult., in the sixty-eighth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late William Jenkins, Esq., formerly of the Treasury, Dublin Castle, and a lineal descendant of the learned lawyer and judge David Jenkins, who was detained a prisoner in the Tower of London, and again in Wallingford Castle, for his loyalty to Charles I. He was born in the year 1805, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took his Bachelor's degree in 1826, proceeded M.A. in 1832, and was made LL.D. in 1856. He was a student of the Inner Temple, and was called to the Irish Bar in Trinity Term 1829. He was appointed a Q.C. in 1860, by the then Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Sir Maziere Brady, and retired from the Bar in 1863, since when he resided at Clifton Court. Mr. Jenkins had the reputation of being a sound equity lawyer, and was particularly successful in investigating titles. He also practised in the Court of Chancery, where he distinguished himself in many important cases. Mr. Jenkins married on the 26th Sept. 1835, Helen, eldest daughter of the late John Thompson, Esq., of Bath, by whom he leaves one son, William, barrister-at-law of the Western Circuit, and also two daughters.

H. HOLLIST, ESQ.

THE late Hasler Hollist, Esq., of Lodsworth House, near Petworth, Sussex, barrister-at-law of the Middle Temple, who died on the 30th ult., in the 77th year of his age, was the only son of the late Anthony Capron, Esq., who assumed in 1833 the name of Hollist in lieu of his patronymic; his mother was Margaret, daughter of Richard Hasler, Esq., of Bury, Lancashire, and he was born in the year 1797. Mr. Hollist was educated at Winchester, and at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1820, and proceeded M.A. in 1823. He was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple, in Michaelmas Term, 1823, and was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for Sussex. He married in 1825, Frances Georgiana, eldest daughter of the late Sir Francis M. Ommanney, by whom he has left a family to lament his loss; his eldest son, Mr. Edward Ommanney Hollist, is a captain in the Royal Artillery, and an instructor of artillery at Woolwich.

S. STONE, ESQ.

THE late Samuel Stone, Esq., many years town clerk and clerk to the magistrates for the borough of Leicester, who died on the 5th inst., at his residence, Elmfield, Stonygate, near Leicester, in the seventieth year of his age, of whom we gave a short notice in our last impression, was the second son of the late Samuel Stone, Esq., at Kington, in the county of Leicester, by Mary, daughter of Joseph Chamberlin, Esq. He was born at Kington in the year 1804, and was educated at Leicester under the Rev. Charles Berry. He was admitted a solicitor in Michaelmas Term 1825, and was appointed on the 1st Jan. 1836 to the office of town clerk of the borough of Leicester. In April of the same year he was made clerk to the magistrates of that borough, and in 1849 he was appointed clerk to the Local Board of Leicester. He retired from practice in September 1872, in consequence of failing health, and was immediately afterwards made a magistrate for the borough of Leicester. Mr. Stone, says the Leicester Journal, during his lifetime, "was one of the few men who contrived to gain the friendship and respect of all parties. He was an active, straightforward, honest citizen, and as a public officer served the town faithfully and uprightly for more than a quarter of a century, winning the esteem and affection of his fellow townsmen, as the testimonial presented to him a short time back on his retirement from public life amply testified. Mr. Stone will be much missed in Leicester. His familiar face was always welcome at any public gathering, and he had ever a kind word for those with whom he came in contact. Affable and amiable to a degree he made no enemies, and has died respected by all. His example is one which other citizens may profitably imitate." Mr. Stone married in 1829 Catharine Smart, daughter of Benjamin Fowler, Esq., by whom he has left a family of six children. The remains of the deceased gentleman were interred in the Leicester Cemetery, the funeral being a public one, attended by the mayor, magistrates, and corporation of the borough.

To Readers and Correspondents.

FREDK. WM. JACOMB.—The case you name will appear in the Reports in due course.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The term junior can apply only where there are two. It could not be used in the case you name. The sons would have to be known by their Christian names. The difficulty you name is one which has not been contemplated by the law, as far as we know.

A. Z.—A cross-examination of some directors in a Chancery suit was considered unduly severe—nothing more. We never heard the expressions you name applied to the learned gentleman.

The Law and the Lawyers.

THE logical faculty does not appear to be very largely developed in some of the members of the City bench of magistrates. On Tuesday the question of the salary of the Chief Clerk to the LORD MAYOR was considered at a meeting presided over by his Lordship. Mr. Alderman FIGGINS, taking exception to the payment of £1000 a year to that official, said that judging from the candidates who had applied, the amount was too large. Had the worthy alderman urged the circumstance of inferior persons, such as subordinate clerks, making application for the appointment, as a reason why the salary offered should be £1500, we could have understood it, the logical inference from the circumstances which he mentions being that £1000 a year is not enough to tempt the best men to apply. The result of the meeting, however was satisfactory. It was resolved to confine the selection to the legal profession, and the salary is not to be less than £800 or more than £1000. The position of Chief Clerk to the LORD MAYOR is one of great responsibility, and £1000 a year is certainly not too much to pay a competent officer.

THE sittings at Guildhall which terminate to-day commenced with heavy cause lists in all the courts, there being entered in the Queen's Bench more than 200 cases. And the business transacted has, as a rule, been legitimate city business, Lord Chief Justice COLERIDGE having been severely tested as a judge in dealing with complicated matters of mercantile law. It is not for us to pay his Lordship a tribute, but it is satisfactory that he proves himself a decided acquisition in the Court of Common Pleas. We regret that any arrears should remain at Guildhall, but when the new system comes into operation and delays disappear, we believe it will be found that no better tribunal for the disposal of commercial disputes is to be found in Europe than one of our Judges and a Guildhall special jury.

THE death in the streets of a benighted wayfarer, who had sought admittance into no less than five public-houses at Barton-le-Clay, and had been refused at all of them, on the ground of their being "quite full," has raised the question whether the well-known obligation of innkeepers to admit travellers has been extinguished by the Licensing Act of 1872. This is, of course, not the case, as a reference to sect. 25, which contains the express saving for bonâ fide travellers, will show; but it is equally certain that the innkeeper is not bound to admit them when his inn is full. It is probable enough, however, as we have already remarked in connection with the decision in Roberts v. Humphreys (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 483; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 387), that the construction put by the Judges upon the Act in that case will make publicans more chary of admitting travellers than before. We have said the obligation to admit travellers is well known. It is, in fact, an obligation at common law, existing many centuries before licensing Acts were thought of. And it was so recently as 1835 that an innkeeper was indicted by an attorney for refusing to admit him late one Sunday night. The innkeeper was fined 20*s.*; and Mr. Justice COLERIDGE said he had no doubt whatever about the law—the innkeeper was bound to admit his guests at whatever hour of the night they might arrive: (R. v. Ivens, 7 C. & P. 213, where the form of the indictment is printed at full length.) As to the bonâ fide traveller, he is a very modern invention. There were no closing hours at all in any licensing Act until 1822, when Sunday closing was first introduced by 3 Geo. 4, c. 77. And until the Public House Closing Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 64) public-houses were allowed to be open all night long. The epithet "bonâ fide," we may remark, first occurred in the short-lived Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 79), which, if our memory rightly serves us, caused no slight riots from the sharpness of its Sunday closing regulations, and was repealed the very next year by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118, as having been "found to be attended with great inconvenience to the public." In the substituted Act "bonâ fide" did not appear; but the Licensing Act of 1872 has replaced the term. We doubt whether it will prove of any service either to publicans or travellers. "A man is either a traveller or he is not, and the addition of 'bonâ fide' makes no difference," said Mr. Justice WILLIAMS, in Atkinson v. Sellers (28 L. J. 13 M. C.), and we thoroughly agree with him.

THE limit of the doctrine of the irresponsibility of a master for the injury sustained by one servant from the negligence or wrongful act of a fellow servant, has been discussed in a case in the United States Supreme Court, and a view taken which we incline to think is more consistent with justice than the strict rule in favour of the master which prevails in this country. In the case in question a man was employed to attend to some very complicated machinery; he had a boy under him, who was told to obey his directions. Most imprudently and improperly the man directed the boy to go up a ladder to adjust a belt which drove a portion of the machinery, and in doing so the boy was caught and lost his arm. For this injury an action was brought against the employer. On behalf of the plaintiff it was contended that the act so directed to be done was outside the boy's employment as a helper, and that the master was responsible for the wrongful act of the fellow servant. And the Court adopted this view, saying, "For the consequences of this hasty action the company are liable, either upon the maxim of Respondeat superior, or upon the obligations arising out of the contract of service. The order of Collett was their order. They cannot escape responsibility on the plea that he should not have given it. Having entrusted to him the care and management of the machinery, and in so doing made it his rightful duty to adjust it when displaced, and having placed the boy under him with directions to obey him, they must pay the penalty for the tortious act he committed in the course of the employment. If they are not insurers of the lives and limbs of their employees, they do impliedly engage that they will not expose them to the hazard of losing their lives, or suffering great bodily harm, when it is neither reasonable nor necessary to do so." This is not in accordance with English law on the subject, and whilst we think that our own principle is somewhat contracted, we consider that the United States Court has gone too far. The act of the man Collett was not mere negligence, it was wrongful, and we do not see that the employers should be liable for the consequences any more than they would have been if Collett had thrust the boy into the machinery. It is understood that a master shall not expose his servant to extraordinary risk, but if the servants employed are of ordinary skill, he cannot be made responsible for orders given by them which those to whom they are given might justifiably disobey. But whether the American court has gone farther than sound principle justifies, it is very doubtful whether our English rule is sufficiently elastic.

THE Times published on Wednesday a somewhat extraordinary article on law reform. Announcing without official information, that Sir JOHN KARSLAKE and Sir RICHARD BAGGALLAY would be respectively Attorney and Solicitor-Generals, it proceeded to discuss the probable future of the law. To whom, it is asked, can Lord CAIRNS look to support him in his contemplated attack on the Inns of Court, and his projected scheme for the localization of legal business? It is plainly hinted that Sir JOHN KARSLAKE will have as much as his health will enable him to do in disposing of the ordinary routine business of his office, whilst Sir RICHARD BAGGALLAY is put on one side as actuated solely by the hope of a swift translation to the Bench. According to the Times, therefore, Lord CAIRNS is unsupported by any member of the Government as regards the task of extreme difficulty which lies before a law reformer. As a fact there can hardly be any doubt that both the law officers will give the LORD CHANCELLOR all the support they can, and the hope of advancement which Sir R. BAGGALLAY, entertains, we suppose, in common with law officers generally, will not, we are sure, cause him to disregard the claims of law reform. The most remarkable portion of the Times' article is that which suggests that it is very extraordinary that we look upon the names of our Lord Chancellors with equal respect whether they have or have not done anything in the way of reforming the law. Our contemporary seems to overlook the fact that it is only within the last few years that the amount of law reform projected or effected by a Lord Chancellor has formed an element of consideration in judging of his merits. Now we admit it is otherwise, but we sincerely trust that Lord Chancellors will not be driven on to reforms in order to save their reputations. That there are scandals connected with the law all lawyers must admit, and the scandal upon which the Times bases its remarks—the enormous costs incurred in the liquidation of Joint Stock Companies—is the most prominent, and calls loudly for the improvement of our judicial system in that respect. But the subject is one hedged round with difficulties. The simple truth is that nothing is so easy as to urge reforms in the law, and nothing is so difficult as to carry them into practical effect. We are confident that nothing will be done in this direction as it should be until a standing body is appointed by Parliament, whose sole business it shall be to initiate reforms and codify the law. A Lord Chancellor has too much to do to enable him to conceive and carry out in detail large reforms, and it would be the worst policy in the world to kill our eminent men by overwork.

MR. CALVERT, Q.C., has published a pamphlet entitled "Remarks upon the Jurisdiction of the Inns of Court," and he summarises these remarks thus: "I venture to think that I have completely answered the charges brought by the LORD CHANCELLOR against the Inns of Court. I say that the resolutions of the LORD CHANCELLOR would, if adopted, prove a check to scientific education, and lead to evil consequences, the extent of which it is hard to foresee." This is somewhat startling, considering that Lord SELBORNE'S resolutions have been supported by so many members of both branches of the Profession. Mr. CALVERT appears to base his opinion upon the supposed impracticability of educating barristers and solicitors together. He points out that the education of most barristers commences after they leave the University—at from twenty-one to twenty-three years of age—whilst that of solicitors begins frequently at sixteen, and he says that it would be absurd to send them both to a law school together. To this it may be replied that arrangements might very well be made for elementary studies; and inasmuch as the non-university articled clerk serves five years, while the graduate serves three only, there ought to be no difficulty in classifying the students. But Mr. CALVERT'S argument is that there are many possible evils attending the proposed reform, whilst the defects of the existing system might very well be remedied so as to meet the requirements of the Profession. But when we find so high an authority as Mr. CALVERT asserting that "in truth the Inns of Court have been incessantly exerting themselves in the improvement of the condition of the students," we are led to consider whether facts are not likely to present themselves in different forms according to the standpoint from which they are regarded. It is certainly remarkable that the "incessant exertions" have not produced a more favourable impression. We freely admit the efforts made very recently to educate students of the Inns of Court, but they resulted from strong pressure, and the objection to leaving legal education in the hands of irresponsible bodies is that they have no motive in encouraging reforms, but find it extremely easy to let things alone. We do not agree with Mr. CALVERT in his desire to keep the two orders of law students apart. The practice of a barrister is doubtless essentially different from that of a solicitor, but that is no reason why they should not receive the principles of law from the same source. Finally, we admit that as governing bodies the Inns of Court have some virtues; but to render them wholly satisfactory, Benchers ought not to be elected by the Bench. The Bench ought to be representative. If it had been representative we doubt whether legal education could have continued in the scandalous condition in which it was up to a very recent period.

THE "invitation to alight" has once more been discussed in the case of Weller v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 888), and the Court of Common Pleas has pretty successfully distinguished the four preceding decisions in the cases of Bridges, Praeger, Cockle, and Lewis, which contain the law of the subject. It was sufficiently established by the first of these cases that the mere calling out of the name of a station is no invitation to alight, this being done, as Mr. Justice BLACKBURN remarked in Lewis's case, "by way of preparing passengers to get out." But what remained to be settled was, what length of stoppage at a station would justify a passenger in taking it for the final standstill, and so alighting unbidden. "It is not for a judge to say what are the ordinary habits of railway companies or of passengers," says Mr. Justice BRETT in delivering judgment in Weller's case, and the plaintiff having been nonsuited, the court has very properly, we think, made the rule absolute for a new trial. The true principle in all these cases is, we imagine, that laid down by Mr. Justice BRETT in Hogan v. South Eastern Railway Company (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 271), that "negligence is always a question for the jury unless it would be a palpable want of reason in them to find for the plaintiffs." Now that the point has been so thoroughly ventilated—for three of the cases above referred to went to the Exchequer Chamber—a nonsuit on the "invitation to alight" may be expected to become comparatively rare.

THE NEW LORD CHANCELLOR AND THE COUNTY COURTS.

LORD CAIRNS is said to entertain views with respect to the County Courts, which, if carried into effect, will very soon bring about the entire localization of legal business. And in view of this possibility it is worth while to consider what ought to be done to secure proper provision being made to deal with the business in a manner satisfactory to the public.

The reforms which we have hitherto witnessed have been as extraordinary as anything to be found in the history of the law. Originally nothing but tribunals for the recovery of small debts, the County Courts have had their proper jurisdiction extended, and other jurisdictions grafted upon them, until at present a County Court Judge if he is to do his work efficiently must be familiar with our entire jurisprudence. But this is not the only extraordinary result of the spasmodic and piecemeal reforms which have taken place. A large amount of judicial work has been thrown upon registrars. In bankruptcy it is quite common for registrars to sit for the Judge; in equity they have to take accounts which may often prove larger in amount than the common law claims to which the jurisdiction of the court itself is limited. We have repeatedly expressed our opinion that the registrars are, as a rule, able men, and in their particular sphere thoroughly capable. We do not now say that by experience they cannot become good judges; but what we do contend is that it was never contemplated by the Legislature that they should be judges, and we object to the process of reform which, whilst thrusting a mass of heterogeneous business upon the courts, makes no special provision for the disposal of it.

It will be gathered from the foregoing observations that we do not consider the County Courts as standing at present upon a satisfactory basis, and we freely admit that the attention of the law reformer may well be directed to them. What, however, are we to look for from Lord CAIRNS? The past twenty or thirty years have been marked by fragmentary measures of reform. Until the Bankruptcy Act 1869, Parliament shrank from giving unlimited jurisdiction to the County Courts except by consent. The Act of 1867 worked a small revolution, for as appears by the Judicial Statistics, a large amount of business has been kept out of or drafted from the Superior Courts. But notwithstanding that Act, many causes remain in the Superior Courts which are just above the limit of amount giving costs, but are fit only for tribunals such as the County Courts. This circumstance proves that the Act of 1867 was only partially efficacious from the point of view of the law reformer—and we are taking that view exclusively without regard to the interests of lawyers. And we do so, not because we are careless how the interests of the Profession are affected, but because we see plainly enough that law reform will be made to progress quite irrespective of any such considerations. We repeat, therefore, that whilst the Act of 1867 worked a small revolution, it was not by any means a good, much less a perfect, measure.

The principle upon which a discretion is given to a Judge to award or withhold costs in cases brought in the Superior Court, which, by their nature, ought to be brought in the County Court, is unsound, and indeed vicious. But it shows that the Legislature distrusted the County Courts. Now this distrust ought to be removed, or a hard and fast line should be drawn between their jurisdiction and the jurisdiction of the Superior Courts. We conceive that the County Courts ought not to have had their powers extended until it was seen that they were qualified to deal with every kind of suit or action, and we anticipate that the step which should have been taken in 1867 will be taken by Lord CAIRNS now —the courts consolidated, the number of judges reduced, their salaries increased, their position raised by the prospect of advancement to the High Court, and men selected to fill the positions, not for reasons which are the growth of particular circumstances, but because their professional eminence points them out as fitted by capacity and learning for the discharge of important judicial duties.

We strongly oppose any increase of the jurisdiction of the County Courts as at present constituted, but it is impossible for an unbiassed observer to dispute the wisdom of the reform which Lord CAIRNS is said to entertain. With Superior Court Judges sitting four times a year at such centres as Liverpool and Manchester, and first-class men as County Court Judges presiding at centres of enlarged districts, and having unlimited jurisdiction, arrears would probably disappear. The great argument against localization is that it will scatter the English Bar, and thus remove one of the most useful restraints upon the Bench. The effect of this decentralization it is altogether impossible to imagine, but whatever may be the consequences to the Bench, we believe that the Bar as a body will benefit in a commercial point of view. There must always be a considerable Bar in London, and with existing facilities of intercommunication, the esprit de corps would probably be maintained.

It seems, however, tolerably certain that Lord CAIRNS will follow in the steps of Lord SELBORNE, and we would prepare our readers for the consideration of a large scheme of reform affecting the County Courts. A supplement to the Judicature Act is spoken of, but whatever form the measure may take, it will deserve and require the close attention of the legal profession.

RECENT BANKRUPTCY DECISIONS.

CASES arising under the Bankruptcy Act 1869 multiply rapidly, and it is almost necessary at short intervals to take a retrospect. The question which perhaps has received the most attention is that which has reference to the position, under various circumstances, of secured and execution creditors. It is not yet very satisfactorily established what a secured creditor is, and, therefore, we will first look at recent decisions upon this point.

The 12th section of the Act speaks simply of a "creditor holding security," and by sect. 16, subsect. 5, a "secured creditor" is defined to mean "any creditor holding any mortgage, charge, or lien on the bankrupt's estate, or any part thereof, as security for a debt due to him." In illustration of the variety of circumstances under which this question may arise, it is only necessary to refer to two very recent cases, Ex parte Tate and Co., re Keyworth (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 849), and Emmanuel v. Bridger (Weekly Notes, Feb. 21, p. 42). In the former case a plaintiff in an action on a bill of exchange, claimed to be a secured creditor in respect of a sum of money brought into court by Judge's order to abide the event of the action. In the second a creditor had obtained a garnishee order, which was made absolute before the bankruptcy, and the question was whether in respect of the moneys attached he was a secured creditor within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. In the former it was held that he was not a secured creditor, and in the latter that he was. There does not appear to be any tenable ground of objection to either of these decisions. In the case of attachment the security is indisputable when the garnishee order is made absolute, and it would seem to be arguable that the mere service of the order would give the creditor a security liable to be defeated by the discharge of the order. It is equally clear, on the other hand, that money brought into court to abide an event, is not the property of the creditor until judgment in his favour, and neither is it the property of the debtor paying it into court so as to pass to his trustee on his subsequent bankruptcy. A very elaborate argument appears to have been presented to the Chief Judge by counsel for the trustee in Ex parte Tate, who seemed indeed to look upon payment into court under a Judge's order of a sum to abide an event as analogous to attachment under a garnishee order. The learned Chief Judge considered, however, that there was no analogy, and that the argument as to attachment had no application at all to the case before the Court. The most forcible part of the argument for the trustee was that which dealt with the fact of the action on the bill of exchange having been restrained by the County Court in which the liquidation proceedings were instituted. Said the learned counsel, "the deposit was to abide the result of the action, or to await until the action was determined. That, however, is a matter that can never arise; that is an event that now can never happen, because the Judge of the County Court has by his injunction made it impossible for the plaintiffs to proceed with the action." The Chief Judge admitted the plausibility of thus putting the case; but he referred to the remarks of Lord Hatherley in Ex parte Rocke, re Hall (25 L. T. Rep. N.S. 287), that the granting or not granting an injunction at the discretion of a County Court Judge cannot affect the rights of creditors inter se. The learned Judge again took occasion to deplore the failure to re-enact in the Act of 1869 the 184th section of the Act of 1849, a section the spirit of which he imported into the new Act by his decisions which were overruled by Ex parte Rocke. In the result he held that the plaintiffs in the action were entitled to have the question between them and the debtors determined. It was suggested that the amount paid into court should be transferred into the liquidation, and some proceedings taken to determine how much the plaintiffs were entitled to.

Another case on this subject of execution creditors—proving, we think, the absurdity of making a distinction between trader debtors and non-trader debtors, and executions for sums above and below £50—is that of Ex parte Lovering, re Peacock (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 897). In this case again the Chief Judge points out that all the confusion has arisen from the failure to re-enact sect. 184 of the Act of 1849. In Ex parte Lovering creditors of a trader for sums above £50 had seized but not sold. Then a creditor for less than £50 seized. Had the 184th section of the Act of 1849 been still law, there having been no sale, the creditors would have been entitled only to rateable parts of their debts. Section 87 of the Act of 1869, deals only with the case of the goods of a trader being taken in execution for above £50 and sold. If the sheriff, within fourteen days, receives notice of a bankruptcy petition having been presented, he will hold the proceeds on trust for the trustee. This section does not affect an execution creditor of a trader for less than £50, and the Chief Judge held that in such a case the small creditor was entitled to the proceeds —on the authority of Slater v. Pinder (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 475).

The decisions, although by their conflict tending to confuse the law, in the result place it upon an intelligible footing. Seizure without notice of an act of bankruptcy vests the right to the goods in the execution creditor, and the only question then is whether he is within sect. 87. If he is, it matters nothing whether the execution is restrained by injunction or a petition merely is presented; the goods are, in the hands of the sheriff, in custodiâ legis, and it is the same thing whether they or their proceeds have to be dealt with. And by seizure under an execution a creditor does not become a secured creditor, for if he is within sect. 87 the goods belong to the trustee, and if he is not within that section, the creditor is not only a secured creditor, but absolutely entitled to the property seized. It appears to have been thought in Ex parte Raynor, re Johnson (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 306) that there is some magic in a sale. A creditor who was within sect. 87, but who had only seized, wished to compel a sale. The sheriff had been restrained, and the goods were held to belong to the trustee, who was decided to be entitled to them, and not to be bound to sell.

The cases to which we have referred make it plain, we think, what is the meaning of the term "secured creditor." We quite agree with the Chief Judge, that it was a mistake to omit from the Act of 1869 a provision similar in terms to sect. 184 of the Act of 1849. The interpretation of terms in sect. 16, sub-sect. 5, is too narrow, whereas the Act of 1849 was full and explicit. As the law stands, a creditor is not "secured" by seizing under an execution; he is absolutely entitled, or the goods belong to the trustee. Being absolutely entitled as not affected by sect. 87, he may, of course, treat the seizure as security and place himself in the position of a secured creditor.

BOARD OF TRADE INQUIRIES.

IN our last issue we noticed a letter from Mr MCIVER which pointed out the utter failure of the present Board of Trade inquiries, and suggested certain alterations that are well worthy of attention. In calling attention to the present system of inquiry by the Board of Trade into marine casualties we heartily indorse Mr. MCIVER'S opinion as to the insufficiency of the present tribunal, and the desirability of having its status raised. With a view of making the whole subject intelligible to our readers, a short notice of the enactments under which these inquiries are held may be useful.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 very properly provided for inquiries being held in cases of wreck, collision, loss of life, and certain other instances named. It is there enacted (sect. 432) that (1) whenever any ship is lost, abandoned, or materially damaged on or near the coasts of the United Kingdom; (2) whenever any ship causes loss or material damage to any other ship on or near such coasts; (3) whenever by reason of any casualty happening to or on board of any ship on or near such coast loss of life ensues; (4) whenever any such loss, abandonment, damage, or casualty happens elsewhere, and any competent witnesses thereof arrive or are found at any place in the United Kingdom, the inspecting officer of the coastguard, or the principal officer of customs, at or near the place where the loss, abandonment, or casualty occurred, may hold an inquiry if the same occurred on or near the coast of the United Kingdom; but if it occurred elsewhere the inquiry is to be held by one or other of those officers at or near the place where the witnesses arrive, or are found, or can be conveniently examined. The Board of Trade has also power to appoint any person specially to conduct this inquiry, which is only preliminary, and for the purpose of collecting evidence. In effect, this inquiry is conducted by the Receiver of Wreck of the District, who is usually, if not always, principal officer of customs, or by a Board of Trade inspector, if there be one there resident. Full power is given to enforce the production of evidence. This preliminary inquiry having been held, or without it, if the officer thinks fit, the above-named officer should be consider a more formal investigation necessary, must apply to any two justices, or to a stipendiary magistrate to hear the case; the Board of Trade has also power to order such an inquiry to take place, and this is the more usual way in which it is instituted. The magistrates or justices are assisted in the inquiries on questions of nautical skill by assessors appointed by the Board of Trade. These assessors are usually experienced masters of merchant vessels. In most of our large seaports there is a local marine board established under the Act for the purpose of controlling and regulating the affairs of the mercantile marine, such as the shipping of seamen and the granting of certificates to officers, &c. One of the members of this board ex officio is the stipendiary magistrate of the place, and wherever such an officer exists it is provided that the Board of Trade inquiries shall take place before him. The magistrate conducting the inquiry has, for the purpose of compelling the attendance of witnesses and the regulation of the proceedings, the same power as he would have in a matter over which he has summary jurisdiction. The local officer of the Board of Trade is bound to render all assistance in the conduct of the case, and generally to superintend. In practice, however, the Board of Trade instructs a barrister to conduct the inquiries in almost all the inquiries. The investigation held is as to the cause of any such loss, abandonment, damage, or casualty as is included in the heads above given. Such an investigation naturally involves inquiry into the conduct of the officers of the ship the loss or damage to which has originated it. With a view of making this effectual, and of giving full power to punish for any misconduct, the magistrate may call upon any master or mate possessing a Board of Trade certificate of competency or service, whose conduct is called in question, or is likely to be called in question, to deliver up to him the certificate. He holds it till the close of the inquiry, and then, according to the result, returns it to the master or mate, or sends it to the Board of Trade to be cancelled or suspended, as it sees fit. In practice the court itself suspends or cancels, and the Board of Trade confirms the report.

From this account it will be seen that the Board of Trade tribunals are possessed of very considerable powers affecting not only the officers of merchant ships, but also the owners. It lies with them to say whether a ship was seaworthy or unseaworthy, well found, or ill found, well or ill navigated, lost or not lost, by the negligence of the owners or crew. This power will necessarily to some extent affect the rights of the owners as to the recovery of their loss, whether from a wrongdoer or from underwriters, and it may materially affect their reputations as carriers. With respect to the officers these powers are not less important. On the word of the magistrate and his assessors may hang a man's reputation for life. If his certificate is cancelled or suspended what are his chances of employment? These are important considerations and naturally lead to the question whether the tribunal formed under the Act is well adapted to its purpose. Without in the least wishing to disparage our stipendiary magistrates, before whom these inquiries are usually held, we venture to think that a higher class tribunal is required. For this several reasons may be given; three will suffice for our purpose. The first is that such high interests ought not to be intrusted to an inferior tribunal; the second, that magistrates from their very position can have little experience in dealing with nautical matters; the third, that the existing tribunal is not satisfactory to the persons whose interests it affects. With regard to the first it would seem obvious that, if it be deemed right that in a contested case between two ships the investigating tribunal should occupy the high position of the High Court of Admiralty, a question affecting interests as great, if not on some occasions even greater, should be tried before a tribunal of equal importance, and we would suggest that these Board of Trade inquiries should be held before the High Court of Admiralty. If this is objected to on the ground of the expense of bringing the parties up to London, then let them take place in a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction, with an appeal to the Admiralty Court, or reserving the right to the owners to have the proceedings transferred to the Admiralty Court. This would be a benefit in many ways. At present it not unfrequently happens that the Admiralty Court and the Board of Trade decide differently in a collision cause. If these inquiries were held in the Admiralty Court one examination of the witnesses and one decision would be sufficient in every case of collision. This would at least give satisfaction to owners and officers. Secondly, that magistrates cannot have such experience in nautical questions as the Admiralty Court or even the County Courts is clear, when it is remembered that the only questions of this nature investigated before magistrates are matters arising in these very inquiries. As to the present tribunals not giving satisfaction we need say no more than remind our readers of Mr. McIver's letter, and the numerous instances where the results of these inquiries has been in direct conflict with a subsequent finding of the Admiralty Court. Moreover, the mode in which they are conducted is unsatisfactory. The officers and crew are called as witnesses by the Board of Trade to condemn themselves out of their own mouths, and the attack upon them by the person conducting the inquiry is made so that they have little chance of setting matters right, namely, in examination. This is against our usual notions of fairness, and would not occur if these things were investigated as between party and party before a higher tribunal.

There is in the pigeon holes of the Board of Trade office a gigantic Bill on the subject of merchant shipping, and it is to be hoped that when it again sees the light of day some alteration in these inquiries may be among its provisions.

The Law of Insurance as applied to Life, Fire, Accident, and Guarantee, and other Non-Maritime Risks. By JOHN WILDER MAY. Boston: Little, Brown, and Co.

A BRANCH of our jurisprudence daily increasing in importance is that which relates to insurance against risk of loss by the elements and by accident and death—matters over which human prescience and care have no control. Maritime risks are naturally far more numerous than terrene risks: there is an infinite variety of contingencies which it is almost impossible to define, and modern decisions in that department of our law have added largely to existing principles, or furnished exceptions to rules hitherto considered as settled and comprehensive. Fire insurance stands upon much the same footing as marine insurance; the prevailing principle is to indemnify the assured. Mr. Phillips, the celebrated American authority, treats marine and fire insurance together. We certainly think that it is desirable that those two subjects should be dealt with in combination, and that life and "other risks" should be made the subject of a separate treatment.

It will be seen by the name of the publishers that Mr. May is an American lawyer, and the predominating element in the work is, of course, American. With the exception of Kent, Story, and Phillips, American authors are not generally accepted as authorities in this country, and they will only become so by setting the principles of jurisprudence, prevailing on each side of the Atlantic, in prominent contrast where they differ. This is done with great ability by Mr. Phillips, whose method we strongly recommend to persons setting about the compilation of treatises. Diffuseness is the great enemy of codification. Every treatise which elaborates a definition renders future condensation more difficult. The mischief in this direction which is likely to result from a work like Mr. May's will appear when we look at the commencement of his chapter on Concealment. His first paragraph (sect. 200), is thus:

> Representations should not only be true, but they should be full. The insurer has a right to know the whole truth. And a lack of fulness, if designed, in a respect material to the risk is tantamount to a false representation, and is attended by like consequences. This lack of fulness is termed a concealment, which is the designed and intentional withholding of some fact material to the risk which the insured in honesty and good faith ought to communicate to the insurer. It is not mere intentional silence or inadvertence. It is a positive intentional omission to state what the applicant knows, or must be presumed to know, ought to be stated. It is a supression of the truth whereby the insurer is induced to enter into a contract which he would not have entered into had the truth been known to him. It is a deception whereby the insurer is led to infer that to be true, as to a material matter, which is not true. Hence, strictly speaking, under the general law of insurance, there can be no concealment of a fact which is not known to the applicant.

What can be the general condition of a writer's vocabulary who talks about "the lack of fulness"? This is Mr. Phillips: Concealment in insurance is where in reference to a negotiation therefor, one party suppresses or neglects to communicate to the other a material fact, which, if communicated, would tend directly to prevent the other from entering into the contract or to induce him to demand terms more favourable to himself, and which is known or presumed to be so to the party not disclosing it, and is not known or presumed to be so to the other.

The loose kind of generalisation which Mr. May's work discloses is well illustrated by the passage which we have cited, but we do not for a moment desire to say that considering what the treatise is the defect detracts to any appreciable extent from the intrinsic value of the book. We say distinctly that if a different plan had been adopted the result would be of greater advantage to the practical lawyer. But looking at the scope of the book—seeing that it is written comprehensively, upon decided cases, the more modern of which it discusses elaborately—we recognise that common order of ability which enables a lawyer to understand what he is writing about. We incline to the opinion that Mr. May is a good insurance lawyer. We have already stated, however, that he is an American, and the cases upon which he founds his treatise are mainly American; and American policies frequently differ from English policies, Boston being famous for "special stipulations;" and there is a special statute affecting insurance law in the States. On these grounds we anticipate that English lawyers generally will not be disposed to adopt the work as a text book. In America, on the other hand, we can understand that it will receive consideration, and be very generally used.

The plan of the work is scientific. It takes the contract of insurance in its inception, and treats in succession of insurable interest, warranties, representation and concealment, special provisions (very fully discussed), assignment, duration of risk, and estoppel, remedies, evidence, and pleading. An excellent index completes the volume, which is handsomely printed.

Equity in the County Court. Second Edition. By H. F. GIBBONS and NATHANIEL NATHAN, Barristers-at-Law. London: Horace Cox.

BOOKS of practice in the County Court are very useful to practitioners, but, as far as our experience goes, it is a mistake to expect that Judges will accept evidence of what the law and practice is inferior to the best evidence; if they cannot get Daniell, and Seton, they may possibly refer to works expressly prepared for County Courts. Judges ought of course to know the general principles of the law which they administer, but with the multiplied jurisdiction which now exists it is not surprising that they should constantly go wrong; and going wrong as they do we consider that they ought not to despise the small works, which are built upon the larger works and reported cases, devoted to County Court practice.

This treatise, the second edition of which is brought out by Messrs. Gibbons and Nathan, is wisely framed, mainly with a view to the practice in the County Courts. Forms and orders are set out so as to guide the practitioner in each step in the cause, legal principles are shortly stated, but conciseness does not prevent the authors from giving accurately the existing condition of the law on the several subjects within the jurisdiction of the inferior courts.

A useful chapter on Probate jurisdiction is given in this volume and so far as intelligence and industry can make a book of practice serviceable, we think this will be found so. A complete index renders reference a matter of no difficulty.

The Elementary Education Acts, 1870 and 1873, &c., &c. By HUGH OWEN, jun., Barrister-at-Law. Eighth Edition. London: Knight and Co.

IN this volume we have the Education Acts named above, and the Agricultural Children Act, and an appendix containing incorporated Acts, the General Orders of the Education Department as to elections, the new code, order of accounts, &c. The introduction is, perhaps, the most valuable portion of the work, as it presents a digest of the provisions of the famous Act of 1873 under convenient headings, such as "Constitution of School Districts," "Proceedings preliminary to formation of school boards." This introduction is very well written, and in a small compass states the existing law with reference to education. As such, it will be valuable not only to school board clerks (to whom, indeed, Mr. Owen must be an essential companion), but to all members of the Legistature who wish to be in a position to take part in the debates which will doubtless occur with reference to the working of the Act of last year.

The book is of convenient size, well printed, and inexpensive, and thoroughly deserves the large measure of popular favour which it has received.

The Law and Practice of Election Petitions. By HENRY HARDCASTLE, Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens and Haynes.

THE several authors who have run the risk of inaccuracy in order to get rapidly into print would appear to have reckoned in a great measure without their host. We are fully informed as to the law, but where are the petitions to be tried? An election petition is a very expensive luxury, and in the recent contests there was very little time for the exercise of those arts which ordinarily give work to lawyers after a general election. Ireland would seem likely to monopolise this business, or if petitions are presented in England, the chances now are that they will be very few.

However, as we have said, we have the law clearly laid before us, and Mr. Hardcastle is not the least successful exponent. He gives us an original treatise with foot notes, and he has evidently taken very considerable pains to make his work a reliable guide. Beginning with the effect of the Election Petitions Act 1868, he takes his readers step by step through the new procedure. His mode of treating the subject of "particulars" will be found extremely useful, and he gives all the law and practice in a very small compass. In an appendix is supplied the Act and the Rules. We can thoroughly recommend Mr. Hardcastle's book as a concise manual on the law and practice of election petitions.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

WE are glad to notice that the proper authorities are alive to the necessity for certain much-needed reforms in connection with Her Majesty's Court of Probate. A new table of fees to be taken in this court after the 2nd March next has been published in the London Gazette, as announced by us in our last issue. A new table of fees to be taken by solicitors and others in non-contentious business, as well in the principle as the district registries, has been promulgated. There are also some additions and alterations as to fees in contentious business. The above are issued pursuant to the provisions of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95. Those members of the Profession much engaged in the business of this court will have to provide themselves with copies of the above tables of fees, which can be procured of Messrs. Harrison and Sons, of St. Martin's-lane.

THE President of the Incorporated Law Society, in his valuable paper, referred to by us in our last issue, and which he read last week before the Statistical Society, observes as follows in relation to the delay in conducting almost every kind of legal proceeding: "There is a common impression that the practitioner benefits by the law's delay, but nothing can be more erroneous. The delays arising from the periods of time which, according to the present system of procedure, must elapse between certain stages of the proceedings in all the courts, and the delays which arise, especially in the Court of Chancery, from the difficulty of getting business proceeded with continuously before the subordinate judges or chief clerks, is extremely prejudicial to the attorney or solicitor. He has to keep the subject-matter more or less simmering in his mind (which new business would more profitably occupy) for an unnecessary length of time, and to look up the facts and figures afresh each time he has to attend before the officers upon it; and, as he has to bear all the outlay for fees to counsel, court fees, as well as his office expenses, the delays referred to involve a very serious loss in the interest of money, which the few additional attendances engendered by the delay do not at all compensate for. One consequence is, that the work is not so well done, and that there is an increase of cost to the suitor without corresponding benefit to the practitioner, so that all parties suffer." We hope that these observations will not pass unnoticed, for they are of great moment to the public and the Profession. The actual loss at times inflicted on solicitors in Chancery suits is beyond question owing to delay, which is often ruinous to clients. If the Judicature Act accomplishes the necessary reform in this direction it will be welcome for that alone.

MR. JANSON, in his paper, also observes as follows upon the subject of the members of our branch of the Profession: "They are admitted to practise in the various courts by the judges, and are liable to be struck off the rolls for misconduct by the same authority. Whether it is on the whole expedient to leave this very large power in the hands of dignitaries who are appointed from among barristers, with whom the attorneys and solicitors are in constant intercourse, may be open to question. It cannot be alleged that in recent times the power has been used with undue severity; some perhaps might think it has been at times too leniently exercised; but the following narrative introduced into an admirable biography of Lord Kenyon, which appeared some thirty years ago in the Law Magazine, will show what power for mischief such authority, vested in an arbitrary and prejudiced though well-meaning judge may confer. 'The effect of this intemperate mode of administering justice, my memory recalls with painful recollection in the case of a Mr. Lawless, an attorney and an honourable member of that Profession. He was involved in the groundless and general prescription of the day. Complaint was made to the court against him for some imputed misconduct, grounded on an affidavit which the event proved was a mass of falsehood and misrepresentation; but it being on oath, and the charges serious, it was thought sufficient to entitle the party applying to a rule to show cause why Mr. Lawless should not answer the matters of the affidavit. He could have no opportunity of answering them till he was served with the rule, and had obtained copies of the affidavits on which it was granted. Natural justice would point out, and the practice of the court was conformable to it, that he should be heard in answer to them before he was convicted. For that purpose a day was given by the rule on which the party is to show cause, during which time everything is considered as suspended This indulgence was refused to Mr. Lawless, though the rule was obtained on an ex parte statement before any opportunity was afforded him to answer the charges, or to be heard in his defence. Lord Kenyon, in addition to the common form of the court's assent to the application, which is in these words, addressed to the counsel: "Take a rule to show cause;" added "And let Mr. Lawless be suspended from practising until the rule is disposed of." He happened to be present in court when this unexampled judgment was pronounced, and heard the sentence which led to his ruin; he rose in a state of most bitter agitation. "My Lord, I entreat you to recall that judgment; the charge is wholly unfounded; suspension will lead to my ruin; I have eighty causes now in my office." What was Lord Kenyon's reply to this supplicatory appeal to him! "So much the worse for your clients who have employed such a man! You shall remain suspended until the court decides on the rule." The rule came on to be heard at a future day, after the affidavits on the part of Mr. Lawless had been filed. The charges against him were found to be wholly without foundation, and the rule was accordingly discharged. Mr. Lawless was in consequence restored to his profession, but not to his character or peace of mind. He sunk under the unmerited disgrace to which he had been subjected, and died of a broken heart.' It is not improbable that under changes which are in contemplation in relation to both branches of the legal profession, the government of our own body, and the power of suspension or removal from its ranks may be altogether entrusted to the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, just as the members of the Bar are subjected to the authority of the several Inns of Court, which consist of persons of their own order." The case of Mr. Lawless, in these days happily without precedent, is yet of a nature to occasion anxiety to all of us, and the sooner the power of removing a solicitor's name from the roll is transferred from the judges to the Incorporated Law Society (of which every solicitor ought to be a member), the better.

WE publish in another column a report in connection with the annual banquet of the Manchester Incorporated Law Association. Mr. P. F. Garnett (vice-president of the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool) stated his views of the great value and utility of law societies, when proposing the toast of the evening. We fail, however, to discover the "methodical and combined influence" of which he spoke. It is the very thing that is wanted so badly. We venture to assert that there is practically no combination amongst us, none such, at all events, as Mr. Marshall, of Leeds, has advocated, but there are signs of such action as is required, the arguments in favour of which, by the most able and intelligent members of our branch of the profession, are so forcible that they must bear their fruit in due season. In all other professions, owing to combination, there are steps by which a man can rise to a position of distinction and honour, while for solicitors there at present exists no such means to such a desirable end.

WE gather from editorial answers to correspondents in the School Board Chronicle that the editor of that publication is beset with all kinds of questions, principally relating to the Education Act, of a strictly legal nature. It is not, therefore, surprising to find such notes as the following:—"With every desire to answer in full your query, we must beg to refer you for a reply either to the legal adviser of your board, or to any other competent lawyer."

THE Irish Law Times and Solicitors' Journal, referring to the Irish solicitors who are elected members of Parliament, observes as follows of Mr. Charles E. Lewis, M.P., for Londonderry City:—"It is true he is an Englishman, and practises in London, but we are much mistaken if he does not make the common interests of the Irish and English solicitors his especial study. He is already well known in London (independently of his large practice) for his exertions in reference to the Incorporated Law Society of England, and has also, we believe, had the good sense to recommend his English friends to imitate the energy and intelligent zeal for the interests of their profession displayed by their brethren of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland." Upon the subject of law reform the same journal says: "When we consider the position of legal reforms in England, and the anxious expectation with which their extension to Ireland is looked forward, we feel consoled to think we shall have in the House of Commons sufficient representatives of our professional interests to provide that due care shall be taken of them, and that efficiency of legal administration shall not be considered less important than a diminution of the charges on the Consolidated Fund." As regards the annual certificate duty, it adds: "Some time since we called the attention of the Profession to the necessity of agitating for a repeal of the duty which is now annually levied from them. The amount of this duty is not much, it is urged, and solicitors in practice do not feel it, while it may be useful; but we think it is positively of no use in the interests of the Profession or the public; it brings in a mere trifle to the treasury, and we think the present a most opportune occasion to appeal to the Government for its remission. There is a large surplus to be disposed of, and most people admit that the way to keep up a high professional standard is not to impose more taxes but to make entrance to the Profession a difficult matter by responsible apprenticeship and examinations." If any reform is to be effected in relation to this impost it will be best secured by combined action on the part of solicitors in England and Ireland. If no substantial movement is set on foot it may fairly be contended that we do not require such reform.

MR. T. REDWOOD, Professor of Chemistry to the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, and analyst under the Adulteration of Food, Drink, and Drugs Act, writing to the Daily Telegraph on the 19th inst, upon the subject of the adulteration of bread, observes, in relation to the failure of legal proceedings in a case under the Adulteration Act: "The result of this and some other cases in which proceedings have been taken under the Adulteration Act, shows the necessity of having legal assistance to conduct the prosecutions, instead of leaving them, as the county cases are now left, to be conducted by the inspectors. This is especially the case where the defendants are professionally represented. I consider that the failure of the case heard yesterday at Edgware was entirely due to the want of legal assistance in preparing and presenting the evidence for the prosecution." It certainly does seem idle to expect that inspectors appointed under the Act in question should be capable of instituting and conducting such proceedings. The new Government may take a different view of what is and what is not a wise economy as compared with that which governed the policy of the late administration upon such matters.

A MEMBER of the Legal Practitioners' Society, also a member of the Incorporated Law Society, writes to us to say that he considers that the first-named society ought to be supported by the Profession on the principle that prevention is better than cure—that is, that it is far wiser to protect the Profession from the depredations of unqualified men who take from them the earnings to which they are entitled, than permit such depredations, and yet support the Solicitors' Benevolent and other similar associations. We agree in part with our correspondent; for instance, if proper protection was afforded the Profession against the encroachments complained of, we cannot doubt but that much work now undertaken by accountants and agents of all kinds would pass into solicitors' offices—it may be the offices of those least prosperous, who are, however, none the less on that account entitled to be protected by the Legislature; and if work so changed hands, the demands on the funds of solicitors' charitable institutions would certainly decrease.

SHARP practice amongst solicitors is not to be countenanced or tolerated for a moment in these days. A case has just been brought to our notice in which a plaintiff's attorney, having received from the defendant's attorney certain pleas for which an order for leave to plead them was necessary, and it was not issued owing to the fault of the clerk to the defendant's attorney, he (plaintiff's attorney) signed judgment for want of a plea. On a summons to set aside such judgment, it was stated that defendant's attorney had no intimation that the judgment was signed, and that the plaintiff's attorney must have known that the non-issuing of the necessary summons for leave to plead was a pure oversight from the fact that in engrossing the pleas which were delivered the clerk copied in the fold of the paper the usual memorandums by counsel as to leave required, &c. The master, of course, ordered the judgment to be set aside on payment of 10s. 6d. costs. We should have preferred to hear that the master had set the judgment aside, and that the defendant was to be paid all his costs occasioned by the judgment snapped as described.

IN addition to the names of solicitors elected members of Parliament, which appeared in our two last issues, we have to add those of Mr. Murphy, elected for Cork City, and Mr. Fay, who headed the poll for Cavan. This makes in all thirteen solicitors in the House of Commons.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PRIVATE ACT OF PARLIAMENT—MISDESCRIPTION OF PROPERTIES IN SCHEDULE—CONSTRUCTION—PLEADING—BILL BY INFANT—ACCOUNT—INTRUSION.—The settled estates of the Duke of Shrewsbury were, by an Act passed in 1719, settled upon the Earl of Shrewsbury, with a proviso against alienation. Two Acts were subsequently passed—one in 1803, and the other in 1843—by which portions of the settled estates, described in the schedules, were vested in trustees, upon trust to sell, and invest the purchase-money in the purchase of other estates to be settled upon the same trusts. Some of the lands described in the schedules did not form part of the settled estates when the Act of 1719 was passed. In 1856 the then Earl of Shrewsbury devised all his estates over which he had a power of disposition to the plaintiffs, who filed this bill to obtain possession of the lands which, though not forming part of the settled estates in 1719, were included in the schedules to the Acts of 1803 and 1843. Held, that the intention of the Legislature was to vest in the trustees lands which were actually part of the settled estates in 1719, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. Held also that where a person has intruded upon the estate of an infant, the infant may sue in equity, although he has both a legal and equitable title, and is entitled to an account. Crowther v. Crowther (23 Beav. 305) not followed: (Howard v. Earl of Shrewsbury (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 862. Rolls.)

PRACTICE—SETTLEMENT—LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES ACT, s. 1.—A testatrix devised real estate to trustees upon trust for A., in case she should attain twenty-one, or marry previously to attaining that age; with a gift over in strict settlement in case A. should not live to attain a vested interest: Held, that this was a limitation "by way of succession," within the meaning of the Act: (Re Horn's Settled Estates, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 830. V.C. M.)

PLEA TO WHOLE BILL—PLEA OF "NOT A PARTNER IN THE MONTE VIDEO FIRM"—PLEA OVERRULED.—The bill alleged that the defendants, A., B., and C., carried on business as merchants at Montevideo under the firm of A. and Co.; and at Liverpool under the firm of B. and Co.; and that the members of both firms were identical. He further alleged that certain goods (the subject-matter of the suit) were consigned to A., B., and C., to their firm of A. and Co., through their firm of B. and Co.; and that A., B., and C., as well in respect of their firm of A. and Co., as in respect of their firm B. and Co., received these goods with full knowledge that they were the plaintiffs' trust property, and sold them and received the proceeds for them on that footing. The defendant C. pleaded to the whole of the bill, that he was not, and never had been, a partner in the Monte Video firm; and averred that the members of the two firms were not identical. Held that, though this plea would have been a good plea if the bill had merely sought to charge him as a partner in the Monte Video firm, yet as it contained allegations sufficient to render him liable as a partner in the Liverpool firm, the latter liability was totally uncovered by the plea, which must therefore be overruled: (Roberts v. Le Hir, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 873. V. C. M.)

APPORTIONMENT—PARTNERSHIP PROFITS—INCOME.—Profits in a partnership business partly earned in the testator's lifetime, but not ascertained until after his death, are not apportionable, but are income of the testator's estate: (Lambert v. Lambert, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 878. V. C. B.

PRACTICE—EVIDENCE—CROSS-EXAMINATION—EXPENSES OF WITNESS—ORDER 5TH FEB. 1861, RULE 19.—The expenses of a witness summoned for cross-examination must, in the first instance, be borne by the parties on whose behalf his evidence in chief has been given: (Richards v. Goddard, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 884. V.C. H.).

SOLICITOR AND CLIENT—PROPERTY RECOVERED FOR INFANT—FUND IN COURT—LIEN FOR COSTS—JURISDICTION—23 & 24 VICT. c. 127, s. 28.—A solicitor's lien for costs in any suit or proceeding instituted for recovering an infant's property must be established by filing a bill under the general jurisdiction of the court, and not under the Attorneys and Solicitors' Act 1860: (Pritchard v. Roberts, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 883. V.C. H.).

PRACTICE—TRANSFER OF CAUSE—JUDGE FORMERLY COUNSEL.—Where a case involving voluminous accounts was attached to the court of a judge who had formerly been counsel in the case, and his chief clerk had after much consideration, decided the principle upon which the accounts were to be taken, the court refused to order a transfer of the cause to another branch of the court till it became necessary to make some application to the judge in person: (Jackson v. Ward, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 861. Chan.).

ARTICLED CLERK—COMPUTATION OF SERVICE—DELAY IN STAMPING—EMERGENCY—6 & 7 VICT. c. 73, ss. 8 & 9.—Upon the mistaken legal advice that articles of clerkship need not be stamped for six months after execution, the applicant's articles were executed without stamp; and before the first six months elapsed the applicant's father became unable, in consequence of unexpected losses in business, to pay the amount required. The service, however, continued under the articles, and three years afterwards the father paid the stamp and penalty. Held, upon application to compute the service from the date of the articles under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, ss. 8 & 9, that, although an articled clerk who has been tricked or misled should have every consideration, the court will not accept as an excuse for the ordinary requirements of the law upon admission to the profession of an attorney circumstances which are loosely called an emergency, and which do not show a bona fide intention from the commencement to carry out the duties imposed; and that the circumstances of this case did not constitute a sufficient excuse. Ex parte Matthew Breden (31 L. J. 321, C. P.) disputed: (Ex parte Morris Both, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 885. Q. B.)

LORD MAYOR'S COURT.

Wednesday, Feb. 18.

LANE v. OAKES (MACKENZIE, Garnishee.)(a)

Married Women's Property Act, s. 7—"Become entitled to"—Reduction into possession.

THIS was an attachment cause, tried at the December sittings of the court, when a verdict was obtained for the plaintiff. It appeared at the trial that the money sought to be attached, amounting to £137, was bequeathed to the defendant's wife before her marriage, subject to a life interest. The defendant married in 1871. The life interest expired in 1873, when the defendant and his wife presented a joint petition to the Court of Chancery, where the estate was being administered, to pay to the husband, in right of his wife, the money in question. In pursuance of that petition the money was paid to the garnishee, who was the attorney and agent of the defendant, and in his hands it was attached by the plaintiff, a creditor of the defendant.

McCall for the garnishee (instructed by Lake, Beaumont, and Lake), having obtained a rule for a new trial, on the grounds that there was no reduction into possession, and that the case came within the Married Women's Property Act, s. 7,

Kemp, for the plaintiff (instructed by Reep, Lane and Co.), showed cause.—The husband receiving the fund, or authorising some one to receive it for him, is enough to change the wife's interest in the property and reduce it into possession of the husband: (Fleet v. Perrins, 38 L. J. 259, Q. B.; Jones v. Cuthbertson, 41 L. J. 146, Q.B.) Mrs. Oakes "became entitled" to the money when the will was proved in 1865. Her right was perfect before the expiration of the life interest, and therefore the Married Women's Property Act, which did not come into force till 1870, does not apply. She became entitled before and not "during her marriage."

M'Call, for the garnishee, in support of his rule.—There was no reduction into the possession of the husband. This is often a difficult question to determine. The onus is upon the plaintiff to show "some clear and distinct act" on the part of the husband: (Scarpellini v. Aitcheson, 14 L. J. 333, Q.B). In Hart v. Stevens (14 L. J. 150, Q. B.) the interest on a promissory note given to the wife before marriage was received by the husband during coverture, and it was held not sufficient to reduce the debt into the possession of the husband. In Prole v. Soady (37 L. J. 248, Ch.), where the fund was carried over to the joint account of husband and wife, it was held no reduction into possession by the husband. "Reduction into possession is a question of intention; therefore it seems to me that the joint authority of husband and wife negatives any intention on the husband's part to reduce the money into possession." (Per Cleasby, B., Jones v. Cuthbertson, 42 L. J. 223, Ex.) Secondly, the case comes within sect. 7 of the Married Women's Property Act, which provides inter alia that "where any woman married after the passing of this Act shall during her marriage become entitled to any sum not exceeding £200 under any will, such property shall belong to the woman for her separate use." It was intended so far to do for married women what is sometimes accomplished by marriage settlements. The Act is to be construed with reference to its policy: (Winter v. Winter, 16 L. J., 112 Ch.) Her property in expectancy needed no such protection, but that in possession or capable of being reduced did, being subject to the marital rights of the husband; and the language of the section bears out this view. This section, as well as the 8th, which refers to real property, follows the language of the usual covenant in a marriage settlement. In Archer v. Kelly (29 L. J. 911, Ch.) Kindersley, V.C., held that "become entitled" signified a change of condition from expectancy to possession. According to plaintiff's construction, the language of the section should have been "shall become entitled to any interest whatsoever:" (Mackenzie's Settlement, 36 L. J. 320, Ch.) The construction for which I contend is upheld in Clinton's Trust (41 L. J. 192, Ch.), where Wickens, V.C., discusses all the cases. The wife of the defendant, therefore, became entitled to this money upon the death of the tenant for life, that is, during her marriage and after the passing of this Act. The money being therefore due to the wife, and the judgment being against the husband, this is not a debt owing or accruing to the judgment debtor so as to be attachable: (Dingley v. Robinson, 26 L. J. 55, Ex.) Cur adv. vult.

The DEPUTY RECORDER (Sir Thomas Chambers).—In this case an action was brought against the defendant and the garnishee, and the question was, whether a sum of money in the hands of the garnishee could be attached by the plaintiff. At the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiff. Objection was made by Mr. McCall for the garnishee, that the money in question was bequeathed to the wife of the defendant, and was reduced into possession by the husband. This objection is not tenable. The husband and wife presented a joint petition to the Court of Chancery, and upon that petition an order was made for the money to be paid to the defendant in right of his wife. The money was paid to the garnishee under a power of attorney given by the husband alone. That is sufficient to reduce the fund into the possession of the husband. The second objection made was, that under the Married Women's Property Act this money belonged to the wife for her separate use, and therefore could not be attached for the debt of the husband. Two cases in particular were cited, where it was decided upon similar terms in a marriage settlement, that such words covered a reversionary interest which falls into possession during coverture, and would be protected by such a covenant. These cases (Archer v. Kelly, and Clinton's Trusts, sup.), were decided by Kindersley, and their decisions seem to apply to this section of the Act. Although at first the property seemed to me to be unprotected by the statute, I have been so much influenced by the able argument of Mr. McCall, that after conferring with Mr. Justice Quain, I think the case comes within the protection of the statute. On this ground, therefore, the rule will be made absolute for a new trial. I make no order as to costs.

(a) A short report of this case appeared last week.

THE QUALIFICATIONS OF SPECIAL JURORS.

MR. ERLE writes to the Law Magazine:—

The proper qualification of special jurors for the City of London is one of the first and most serious questions which must necessarily engage the consideration of the framer of any measure intended to affect the law relating to juries, and on the preparation of the bill of last session, the attention of the then Attorney-General was carefully directed to the matter. The point is one of some difficulty, since no criterion of the possession of intelligence and good judgment can be fixed by Act of Parliament, nor can a peculiar degree of knowledge of commercial matters, such as is supposed to be wanted to give a Guildhall special juror a proper aptitude for his duty be ascribed as a certainty to any man, except as a consequence of his following some avocation which compels the acquisition of such knowledge. But it will be found by experiment that it is, in practice, quite impossible to particularise specific callings as necessarily rendering those who pursue them desirable as special jurors in the city. To take one case only, out of a great number, as an example. Men who are described simply as "agents," take, as is well-known, a very important part indeed in mercantile transactions. But the profession of men styling themselves agents, extends from the members of a most respectable and wealthy class down to persons living from hand to mouth on their wits, and ready, like a Græculus esuriens, to do anything in the world for a shilling.

In default, then, of any available test which could be founded on a man's profession of his fitness to be a special juror, and the old formula of "banker, merchant, or Esquire," having proved to be little better than useless, it was thought necessary, in framing the Juries Bill, to propose, as has been already stated, that the qualification of special jurors should be constituted by rating or rental only. It is not, of course, for a moment denied that rating or rental supplies but a very imperfect indication of a man's capacity for serving as an effective special juror. Still, these tests, rough as they are, afford some evidence, however inconclusive, of vigorous and successful habits of business, or at any rate of the prosecution of some substantial calling, or of the possession of some such means and position in life as are generally found to be accompanied by a certain degree of education, and they may, therefore, be at least preferred to the caprice, or opinion, or, as will certainly be suspected, the favour dependent on occult considerations, of the framers (in many cases very ignorant people) of the jury lists, which are probably the very worst "fancy" qualifications which could possibly be invented. It may very reasonably be doubted whether there is any sufficient foundation for the common assumption that causes involving questions relating to peculiar interests, as, for example, shipping cases, cannot be satisfactorily tried except by special juries composed of men who are practically familiar with such matters. Probably, a mixed assembly containing men of business of various occupations, and thus free, as a body, from the bias or contracted opinion which may, unsuspectedly, sway the members of any particular trade or clique, is the best tribunal for the trial of any issue of fact, whether the dispute be on a mercantile or any other transaction.

The Act of 1870, besides enlarging the standard of qualification of special jurors, introduced also two material alterations in the mode of summoning. It is necessary to speak of these, since they have acquired some relation to the subject of the qualification of special jurors.

The first of these was the abolition, as far as all ordinary practice is concerned, of the system of summoning a separate special jury for the trial of each particular cause; a system which had been fully shown to involve, without any adequate degree of compensating advantage, the vices of unnecessary inconvenience and expence in all their most aggravated forms. It substituted a general panel of jurors to serve for a certain limited period, and available to try all the causes which may happen to come on for hearing during that period.

The second of the main alterations introduced by the act in question in the mode of summoning juries was in fact a declaratory statement of the existing law, and an injunction that it should be better observed, rather than the initiation of any new practice. For it required sheriffs and their representatives to do what was, and always had been, their duty by summoning special as well as common jurors for service on common juries.

It has been alleged that the quality of special juries, especially in the city of London, has latterly deteriorated. Now, since it is plain that this fact, if such it be, cannot possibly be attributable to the system of promiscuous summoning just referred to, which has affected common juries only, a supposition has been sometimes expressed that it must necessarily be due either to the enlargement of the standard of qualification, or to the new method, just now described, of summoning special juries; that is to say, by general panels instead of by a separate panel for each particular case. But the truth will be found to be that the system of summoning which is pursued in the city of London, and which, in its principle, is also followed to a greater or less extent in many of the English counties, precludes the forming of any dependable conclusion as to the quality of the special jurors' list taken as a whole. This will be understood on a statement of what that system is. To describe it in the shape in which it is found in the City. The secondary, with whom the duty of summoning jurors rests, does not at any time, when called upon to discharge this function, resort to any general list of jurors supplied from the whole area of the City, but lays the 28 wards into which the City is divided successively under contribution. His plan, as it has been given in evidence, is to "work," to use a common expression, two wards at a time, taking half the special, and half the common jurors who may be wanted at the moment, from each of these wards; and after exhausting the lists of these two districts, to treat two other wards, the next in geographical sequence, in the same manner. In actual practice, this scheme of summoning would not seem to be always quite strictly adhered to, since the result which is witnessed is that of jurors brought from even a still narrower field than would be covered by the arrangement just described. For it will be seen on inspecting the lists of special jurors supplied to any of the Superior Courts for its sittings at Guildhall, that in many instances the whole, or nearly the whole, of the men whose names appear or any particular panel are drawn from some single, and frequently very small, locality. Last year one of the panels which was furnished to the Court of Common Pleas, was almost equivalent to a column of the directory under either of the headings, "Woolbrokers," or "East India Avenue." The jurors' list is made out by streets, and not according to the alphabetical order of the names, so that in the natural course of things a summoning officer, when dispatched on a professional excursion, has to net his prey by proceeding along some series of contiguous houses. This system of summoning has prevailed for a great many years past, and was handed down to, and not introduced by, the present secondary. It is unquestionably a bad one, combining, as it is so well calculated to do, the maximum of public inconvenience with the minimum of expediency as regards the jury box. Each trade or business, as is well known, is concentrated in some particular locality in the city. The district which takes in a part of the Bank and of the Royal Exchange, in the Broad-street ward, is largely occupied by stockbrokers, and dealers in stocks and shares of all descriptions. The head quarters of corn merchants are in Mark-lane, and those of sugar brokers in Mincing-lane, both of which streets, or the greater part of each, are in Tower ward. Tower-street, with its wine merchants, is in the same ward. Fruit merchants are thickly settled in the adjoining ward, that of Billingsgate. Each leading business, in short, which is followed in the City, has, generally speaking, its own local habitation, or, at any rate, a local nucleus which is its centre of vitality. The area of each ward being, roughly speaking, not more than about one twenty-eighth of a square mile, the effect of its being fastened upon for jurors is partially to depopulate it for the time being, and the trades carried on within it are, on such occasions, more or less paralysed, the bulk of those who conduct them being carried into captivity at Guildhall. The juries also, which are thus collected, are not so completely efficient for the purposes of justice as they would be if composed of men familiar, taking them altogether, with a greater variety of occupations, and thus less liable, as a body, to be affected by any of the narrowing influences or feelings which are sometimes found to prevail in particular circumscribed localities, or among the members of limited communities. In view also of the well known natural tendency which leads some men who, although of sound intelligence, are of so diffident or pliant a disposition as to surrender their whole independence of understanding to an inveterate habit of submitting their own opinion to the control of such of their neighbours as may happen to possess a more robust decisiveness of judgment or a spirit of more active self-assertion, it is better that the members of any given jury should come from several different districts, rather than from one only, since in the latter case they would be likely to be all more or less personally known to one another, and some of them might exercise an undue ascendancy over the rest.

It is obvious that the quality of juries must, under the system which has been described, vary extremely according to the spots from which they may happen to have been taken. The Aldgate, Langbourne, and Tower Wards probably supply the best jurors, and those of Farringdon Without and Cripplegate Without, which are largely occupied by retail tradesmen, the worst. A short time ago, in the result of the arrangements which are pursued at the Secondary's Office, the common jury panel of forty-eight jurors, which served throughout the after-term sittings in the Court of Common Pleas at Guildhall was exclusively composed of men qualified as special jurors, and several of the most considerable names in the City were noticeable on it. The special jury panel, which was provided for the same court for the same period, was of a very inferior quality to that of the common jury. A reasonable complaint was made of the composition of the special jury panel, but could the two panels have been interchanged, no ground for adverse observation could have arisen. Application was made not long since to the Court of Common Pleas by Sir John Karslake for a new trial of a cause which had been heard at Guildhall, on the ground that the special jury which had tried the case had not consisted of such elements as to possess even any moderate degree of capacity for dealing with a mercantile question in a satisfactory manner. It may quite confidently be assumed that in the case just referred to the state of circumstances which apparently with much justice, formed the subject of complaint, arose from the accident that some infelicitous vein of special jurors had been struck by the summoning officer, and that the yield thence obtained was untempered by the admixture with it of the product of any sounder mine. It is a matter of simple arithmetical demonstration that if the entire City, and not merely some one, or two, small precinct, or precincts, within its area were to be taken as the recruiting field on all occasions when jurors are demanded, a special jury of so poor a quality as that which incurred the observation of Sir John Karslake could not ever, according to all the distinct arithmetical conditions of probability, have existence.

It will thus be seen that no reliable judgment can be formed from any single example as to the result of any given standard of qualification until it has been ascertained whether the sheriff who has supplied the panel summons at all times from the whole body of the county, whether corporate or at large, for which he acts, or whether, under some private arrangements of his own devising, he draws upon limited portions of it only. Ample provision was made by the Juries Bill against the summoning by sheriffs on various independent systems of their own, of which the public has no knowledge whatever, and founded on their own caprice, convenience, or notions of expediency, by imposing on them under penalties, easily recoverable, the observance of a rota. The objection that the system which is, as has been described, followed in the City of summoning the inhabitants of a whole street at a time, economises the distance to be traversed by the summoning officer, would have been fully met by the provision of the Juries Bill, which required that all summoning should be by post, under certain prescribed arrangements. The direction to summon, by post only, secures other advantages also, among which may be mentioned that it precludes, in the sole way probably in which this can be insured, all attempts to corrupt summoning officers, and it thus relieves such officers from the imputations and suspicions of bribery to which they are now exposed.

It was proposed by the Juries Bill that in the City of London the managing directors of public companies carrying on their business within the City should be made liable to serve there as special jurors. In the absence of any express provision for bringing such officers within the scope of the Act, by enduing them with an ex officio qualification, they would as now, being neither rated nor paying rent, nor being, in any sufficiently full legal sense, occupiers of premises, escape service. The propriety of this measure will scarcely be questioned when it has been mentioned that there are nearly 1500 of such companies holding premises in the City, and constantly using the courts as litigants, and since mercantile business is passing in a constantly increasing degree into the hands of companies, the burden of service on juries at Guildhall, which is now thrown on private traders only, would become more and more oppressive and unfair if the present total exemption of all the representatives of companies were to continue. The very moderate proposal of the Juries Bill was materially enlarged by the House of Commons by extending its terms so far as to reach, not the managing director or manager only, but every director of every public company carrying on its business within the City. Some remonstrance or protest on the part of directors who have no semblance of actual occupation in their own persons of premises in the City, and who are only bound to attend occasionally at their respective offices, may probably be anticipated if the proposal to make them liable to serve as special jurors for the City should at any future time pass into law.

MAGISTRATES' LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BASTARDY—APPLICATION—HEARING OF SUMMONS—CONSTRUCTION OF RATE.—The mother of a bastard child signed a form of application for a summons against the putative father containing the words "who saith that she hath been delivered of a bastard child since the passing of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act 1872." When the summons came on to be heard, objection was taken by the defendant that the child was born before the passing of the Act; the mother was sworn and admitted this was so, and the justices dismissed the summons. Upon another summons, reciting the same application but without the mistake therein, justices made an order of 2s. 6d. a week against the defendant. Held, upon certiorari, that the dismissal of the first summons was not such a hearing as to exhaust the application; and that the order upon the second summons was within the justices' jurisdiction: (R. v. The Justices of Lancashire, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 886. Q.B.)

DEBTORS' ACT 1869, s. 15, SUB-SECT. 5—FRAUDULENT REMOVAL OF PROPERTY BY DEBTOR—ASSIGNMENT BEFORE LIQUIDATION.—A debtor on the 17th Oct. 1873 filed his petition for the liquidation of his affairs by arrangement, and a trustee was duly appointed. In Dec. 1872 he had assigned his property to L. and W., to whom he was indebted (L. having then advanced a further sum of £350 for the purpose of enabling the business to be carried on), upon trust, for the benefit of L. and W. and his scheduled creditors. There were other creditors than those scheduled. On the 14th, 16th, and 17th Oct. 1873, the debtor fraudulently removed portions of the property so assigned to L. and W., and in respect of these removals, he was indicted under the Debtors' Act 1869, s. 11, sub-sect. 5, for having, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation of his affairs, fraudulently removed part of his property, of the value of £10 and upwards: Held that the offence was not proved, for the property was not his at the time of removal, but that of L. and W., the trustees under the assignment. Secondly, that the assignment required to be registered under the Bills of Sale Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, and was inoperative against the trustee under the liquidation: (Reg. v. Creese, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 897. Cr. Cas. Res.)

CHIEF CLERK TO THE LORD MAYOR.

ON Tuesday, at a meeting of the magistrates of the City of London, held at the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor presiding, the Court, pursuant to notice, proceeded with the further consideration of a report of their General Purposes Committee on the reference of the 20th Jan. last relative to the duties and emoluments of the Chief Clerk to the Lord Mayor, and recommending that the salary of the office be £1000, and that the payments for copies of depositions should no longer form part of the emoluments of the Chief Clerk; also that the committee be authorised to advertise for candidates for the office. Sir Benjamin Phillips now moved that the report of the committee be approved and adopted. To that Mr. Alderman Sidney objected, holding that £1000 a year was an extraordinary leap from £300, the salary of which the late Chief Clerk was in receipt on his first being appointed Assistant Clerk in the justice room. He moved, as an amendment, that the report of the committee be adopted, with the modification that £750 be substituted for £1000. The amendment was seconded by Mr. Alderman Allen, who took occasion to remind the court that, although Mr. Oke was originally in the receipt of £300 a year as Assistant Clerk, he was in due time paid £900 as Chief Clerk. Mr. Alderman Figgins said up to that time he had supported the motion for the increased stipend in connection with the office of Chief Clerk, believing it to be the duty of the court to maintain the high standard in the administration of justice with which the Mansion House justice room had been long associated, but when he saw the class of candidates who were presenting themselves for election he thought £1000 a year was a great deal too much, some of them having been junior clerks at salaries of between £200 and £300 a year. He submitted that even £750 was too much. Alderman Sir Thomas Gabriel, replying to Mr. Alderman Figgins, said, with much emphasis, knowing well the onerous and responsible duties which devolved on the Chief Clerk to the Lord Mayor, he hoped the selection would be made from no such class as that to which Mr. Alderman Figgins had referred. It occurred to Sir Thomas that a rational way of solving the matter was to resolve that, instead of making the salary £1000 a year, it should not exceed £1000. That would give the Court of Aldermen a discretion in the matter; and if they got a man for the office worth £1000 a year, well and good; but if not they could hold their hand. Mr. Alderman Sidney, as the mover of the amendment, said he had no objection to adopt the suggestion of Sir Thomas Gabriel by inserting in the amendment that the stipend should not exceed £1000. Mr. Alderman Stone said he had no doubt they would find a man in all respects competent to discharge the duties of the office for £1000 a year, and well worth the money. He thought Mr. Alderman Figgins was in error as to the class of men who were soliciting the office. The court had not yet advertised for candidates. He submitted that if they made it a condition that none but members of the legal profession should be eligible, they would find no difficulty in electing a suitable man. He thought the salary should not be less than £800 a year, if they did not give £1000 a year eventually. He suggested that there should be a reference back to the committee that the salary should not be less than £800, but should be increased to £1000 if the committee should think fit. This suggestion was supported and enforced by Mr. Alderman Cotton, M.P., who held that £1000 a year was none too much to enable a man in such a responsible position to live as a gentleman, and that Mr. Alderman Figgins had been a little wrong in his premises, seeing that the Court of Aldermen had never given it out that the salary was to be £1000. The motion for that sum as the salary was also warmly supported by Sir Thomas White. Alderman Sir Benjamin Phillips explained that the matter had been well discussed by the committee, who were of opinion that, if an eminent man could be obtained, a salary of £1000 a year would not be too much, the duties of Chief Clerk at the Mansion-house, as they all knew, being very onerous, and requiring a thoroughly able man for their satisfactory discharge. The only question with the committee was whether a proper man could be obtained for £1000 a year. He was sorry Mr. Alderman Figgins had to some extent prejudiced the matter. The duty of the court clearly was to avoid appointing an inferior man, and to bid for a thoroughly good one. He was willing so to amend his motion that the minimum salary might be £800, and not exceed £1000. Eventually the motion was adopted in that form. Mr. Alderman Stone then suggested that it be an instruction to the committee to select the candidates from the legal profession, submitting that, to fill such an office worthily, the Chief Clerk should be a man of position and education, and capable of holding his own. The suggestion was supported by Mr. Alderman Gibbons, who argued that, if they could not find in the legal profession a gentleman competent to perform the duties, they were not likely to meet with him out of it. The motion for confining the selection to the legal profession was agreed to, and the court adjourned.

COMPANY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PRACTICE—PETITION—CONSENT.—A petition to wind-up a company will, for the future, be called on in its turn in the list of petitions, instead of being treated, as heretofore, as an opposed petition: and if, when the petition is called on, the company appear and consent, and no one appears to oppose, the petition will be taken as unopposed, and the order made thereon accordingly: (Re Bedway, &c. Coal Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 828. V.C. M.)

EVIDENCE OF NEGLIGENCE—CROSSING OF LINE BY PERMITTED TRESPASS—WHETHER ANY WARNING NEED BE GIVEN TO PERMITTED TRESPASSERS.—The defendants drove trains over a line belonging to a dock company, and running between the dock and a public promenade. The public were allowed to cross the line at all points, but there was one regular crossing where they more usually crossed. The plaintiff crossed the line at a point some distance from the regular crossing, and was knocked down and injured by a train of the defendants' driven at four miles an hour. There was a short curve at the spot, but no whistle or other warning was given by the defendants. Held, no evidence of negligence to go to the jury, and a rule to set aside a nonsuit discharged: (Harrison v. The North-Eastern Railway Company, 29, L. T. Rep. N. S. 845. Ex.).

WINDING-UP—COMPROMISE OF ACTION—CREDITING SHARES OF THIRD PARTY AS FULLY PAID UP.—An action having been brought by W. against the company, a compromise, which was made a rule of court, was agreed upon, whereby the company were to pay £3200 to W., and to credit certain shares held by F., with a sum which would make them fully paid up. Certificates of the shares as fully paid up were given to F., and they were marked in the books of the company as such. Shortly afterwards the company was ordered to be wound-up. Held, that the crediting F.'s shares under the terms of the compromise with W. was a payment in cash within the meaning of the 25th section of the Companies Act 1867: (Ferrao's Case, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 876. V.C. B.).

CONTRIBUTORY—TRANSFER OF SHARES BY A MORTGAGEE TO HIS SERVANT.—By the direction of P. certain shares in a company, of which he was mortgagee, were transferred into the name of E., one of his servants. The company was ordered to be wound-up and a return of capital had been made to the shareholders. E. duly accounted to P. for the moneys received by her in the winding-up. Notice of a further return of capital had been given, and E. now claimed to be absolutely entitled to the shares, on the ground that the transfer to her was made in fraud of the company, in order that P. might escape all liability in respect of the shares. On bill filed by P., held, that the transfer was not frandulent, and that E. was a trustee of the shares for P.: (Colquhoun v. Courtney, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 887. M. R.)

RAILWAY COMPANY—AGREEMENT TO BUILD A STATION—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.—In consideration that W. would withdraw his opposition to a Bill before Parliament for the construction of a railway, the promoters agreed with W. to erect "a station" on his land. W. accordingly withdrew his opposition, and the Bill was duly passed. The company subsequently, while admitting themselves bound by the agreement, refused to build the station. On a bill filed by W. for specific performance of the agreement, Held, that the agreement was too vague in its terms to enable the court to make a decree for specific performance, but an inquiry was directed as to compensation to which W. was entitled, and the company were ordered to pay all the costs: (Wilson v. The Northampton and Banbury Railway Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879. V.C. B.)

WINDING-UP — CREDITOR'S PETITION — PRACTICE. — A creditor who has presented a petition for winding-up a company is dominus litis, and is therefore entitled at the hearing to have his petition dismissed upon payment of the costs of all parties, including the costs of a creditor who appeared, although he had notice that the petitioner intended to have the petition dismissed: (Re The Hereford &c., Engineering Co., 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 881. V.C. B.)

AGREEMENT OF COMPANY TO ASSIGN PROPERTY—ULTRA VIRES—COMPANIES ACT 1862.—The directors of a limited company agreed to assign the property and goodwill of the company to A., who was to use his best endeavours to form a new company. The agreement did not bind A. to form a new company, or state anything as to its proposed name, capital, or shares. B., a shareholder, gave notice of his objection to the proposed transfer, but resolutions were passed confirming the agreement, and for winding-up the company voluntarily. The resolutions for winding-up the company were subsequently abandoned. Held, on bill filed by B. against the directors and the company, that the agreement with A. and the resolution confirming it were ultra vires, and that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restraining the transfer to A.: (Bird v. Bird's, &c., Sewage Co., 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 881. V.C. B.)

RAILWAY — NEGLIGENCE — INVITATION TO ALIGHT—SEASON TICKET HOLDER—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.—Where, upon the approach of a train to a station the name of the station is called out by the officials of the company, and the train overruns the platform and comes to a final stop, and no warning is given to the passengers, and no attempt made to back the train, held sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the company to be left to a jury. If a passenger gets out after the train has stopped, and is injured by falling where there is no platform, the fact that it was so dark where the plaintiff alighted that he could not see the platform is not necessarily proof of contributory negligence on his part, the other facts having happened: (Wellen v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 888. C. P.)

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PRACTICE—SUIT BY MORTGAGEES FOR SALE AND GENERAL ADMINISTRATION OF TESTATOR'S ESTATE—COSTS.—A legal mortgagee who institutes a suit for the sale of the mortgaged property, and for the general administration of the mortgagor's estate, is entitled to have the amount of his principal, interest, and costs, paid out of the proceeds of the sale of other mortgaged property in priority to the costs of the suit: (Pinchard v. Fellows, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 882. V.C. B.)

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—ELECTION.—A testatrix advanced £900 to M. on an assignment by him of a covenant by F. to transfer to M. £1000 stock, and to pay interest at £5 per cent. By her will she gave F. £3000, and all sums due to her by him, and directed her executors not to require payment of the £900 due from M., but out of the £3000 given to F. to retain enough to purchase £1000 stock, in satisfaction of the covenant by F., and to pay the surplus thereof beyond the £900 and interest to M. F. having predeceased her, she by her codicil directed the £3000 to form part of her residuary estate, but directed her executors not to call on F.'s representatives for payment, or transfer of the £1000 stock, nor to enforce payment by M. of the £900. A special case having been filed, in order to ascertain the rights of the defendant M., and the representative of F., Lord Justice James (sitting for Vice-Chancellor Wickens) decided that M. was not at liberty to enforce against F.'s estate, the covenant to transfer the £1000 stock. Held, on appeal, that the decision of the court below was correct, except as to the trifling difference between the £900 and the value of the £1000 stock (£10 12s. 6d.) the payment of which M. was at liberty to enforce against F.'s estate: (Synge v. Synge, 29 L. T. Rep. 855. Ch.)

MARITIME LAW.

SPECIMENS OF A CODE OF MARINE INSURANCE LAW.

By F. O. CRUMP, Barrister-at-Law.

Definition.

PERILS of the sea embrace all kinds of marine casualties, such as shipwreck, foundering, stranding, &c., and every species of damage to the ship or goods at sea by the violent and immediate action of winds and waves, not comprehended in the ordinary wear and tear of the voyage, or directly referable to the acts and negligence of the assured as its proximate cause.

Arn. 4th edit. 681; Ph. sect. 1099.

Element of Negligence.

Although negligence may be the remote cause of the loss, yet if the perils of the sea be the proximate cause the loss may be recovered:

Davidson v. Burnand, L. Rep. 8 C. P. 117. (A discharge pipe left open and by loading brought below the water line); Heyman v. Parish, 2 Camp. 149; Everth v. Hannam, 2 Marsh. Rep. 74; 6 Taunt. 375; Blyth v. Shepherd, 9 M. & W. 763, to be considered overruled; Buller v. Fisher, 3 Esp. 67; Hodgson v. Malcolm, 2 B. & P., N. S. 339.

If the negligence of agents of assured in allowing a ship to be condemned and broken up when she might have been repaired brought about condemnation the underwriters are not liable:

Tanner v. Bennett, Ry. & M. 182.

Examples of what are Losses by Perils of the Sea.

Foundering at sea proximately caused by the fury of storms and tempests.

Shipwreck caused by the ship being driven ashore, or on rocks and shoals in mid-seas, by violence of the winds and waves.

Gregson v. Gilbert, 3 Doug. 232 · 2 Marsh. Ins. 493; Tatham v. Hodgson, 6 T. R. 656; 5 B. and Ald. 111.

By Collision.

The loss recoverable in each case is governed by the terms of the running down clause.

See Cosy v. Smith, 22 Court of Sess. Ca. N.S. 955; and Taylor v. Dewar, 5 B & S. 58; 33 L.J., 41 Q.B., which are in conflict, and; Xenos v. Fox, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 630.

Where the collision is purely fortuitous, and there is no fault on either side, the loss is recoverable:

Buller v. Fisher, 3 Esp. 67; Xenos v. Fox, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 630; Smith v. Scott, 4 Taunt. 126; De Vaux v. Salvador, 4. Ad. & E. 420.

If damage to the ship only be provided for by the "running down" clause, damages for personal injuries sustained from the same collision by persons on board either of the vessels, cannot be recovered:

Taylor v. Dewar, 5 B & S. 58; 33 L. J. 141, Q. B.

An owner whose ship had done damage to another standing by and seeing his ship sold, under a decree of a court of admiralty, for less than she is worth, can only claim for the amount actually paid under the decree, and cannot claim for loss by reason of the forced sale under decree:

Thompson v. Reynolds, 7 E. & B. 172; 26 L. J. 93, Q. B.; Xenos v. Fox, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 665.

ILLEGALITY.

An insurance upon a subject is void if the interest insured is illegal, or if the contract contemplates an unlawful use of it.

Redmond v. Smith, 1 M. & Gr. 437.

If the trade be illegal it defeats the policy on the ship as well as that on the cargo.

Any illegality in the prior stages or at the outset of an integral voyage vitiates a policy, though effected only to protect some later stage of it in which there is no illegality.

The illegality of a distinct and separate voyage has no effect on the voyage or venture described in the policy.

Arn. 630, 631, 4th edit.; Phillips, sect. 231; Sewell v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 4 Taunt. 855.

A contravention of law, though it have relation to the subject or the risk, will not affect the insurance if it be remote, and distinct from the contract, or only collateral.

Phillips, sect. 221.

A risk legal in its commencement becoming illegal by some subsequent law, the assured may prosecute it without sacrificing his insurance.

Where the policy is avoided in consequence of the illegality of the risk, the underwriter is entirely discharged from all liability, although he himself was aware of the illegal nature of the adventure.

Arn. 630, 4th edit., citing Bynkershoek Quæst. Jur. Pub. lib. 1, c. 21; and Holman v. Johnson, 1 Cowp. (per Lord Mansfield) 341, 343.

Illegality is not presumed if the instrument can be read so as to be consistent with a legal object.

The policy may be illegal on the following grounds:

(1) That the adventure is opposed to the policy of the law.

See Arn. 4th edit., pt. II., c. 5.

(2) That it is in fraud of the Revenue, Trade, or Navigation Laws of the home country.

(3) In contravention of international commercial treaties and occasional statutes.

(4) In contravention of the law of nations.

(5) In contravention of embargo.

(6) In violation of the country's war policy.

1 and 2.—Revenue and Navigation Laws.

The export or import of goods being prohibited, a contract of insurance in respect of them is illegal and void.

NOTE.—A contemplated violation of the laws of foreign countries does not affect the insurance: (Arn. 531, 4th edit.; 3 Kent, Com. s. 283.) [The latter author says: "The principle does no credit to the commercial jurisprudence of the age."]

A violation of statutory regulations as to the equipment of vessels would seem to be an illegality avoiding a contract of insurance.

Arn. 4th edit. 635.

3.—Commercial Treaties and occasional Statutes.

All insurances on ships or goods navigated or conveyed contrary to the provisions of any commercial treaty to which the home country is a party or statute passed for temporary purposes is void.

NOTE.—Lord Stowell says, "Every treaty is part of the private law of each of the countries which are parties to it, and is as binding on the subjects of each as any part of their own municipal laws: (The Eenroom, 2 C. Rob. Adm. R. 1, 6.)

Prohibited Trading.

No licence being obtained an insurance is invalid.

If only a small portion of a cargo owned by one person, or by several acting in partnership or by a common agent, covered by one contract of insurance, comprises prohibited goods, the contract is vitiated entirely.

Parkin v. Dick, 2 Camp. 221; Hagedorn v. Bazett, 2 M. & G. 100.

If part of a cargo is legal, but the residue, though legal, is intended to cover an illegal design, and the whole is insured in one policy, the insurance is void:

Gibson v. Vaughan, 12 East, 302.

A licence having been obtained, the contract is not void by reason of prohibited goods of other persons being on board, but is invalid to the extent that the assured has exceeded his licence by shipping a surplus of prohibited goods:

Keir v. Andrade, 6 Taunt. 496; Butler v. Allnutt, 1 Stark, 223.

An informality in the mode of obtaining a licence for exporting prohibited goods makes it of no effect, and avoids the contract of insurance if made on a general cargo belonging to the same owners:

Camelo v. Britten, 4 B. & Ald. 184; Gibson v. Service, 5 Taunt. 433.

An act may contravene the strict terms of an order in council without amounting to an illegality so as to avoid a contract of insurance.

Ex gr.—If the object be legal:

Atkinson v. Abbott, 1 Camp. 535; 11 East, 135.

4.—The Law of Nations.

Contravention may be:

(1) By a neutral supplying to a belligerent articles which are contraband of war.

(2) By violating blockade.

(3) By engaging in the privileged trade of a belligerent.

Contraband of war includes:

Arms, warlike equipments and naval and military supplies.

Provisions destined for a military force, or to a place which is beseiged or blockaded.

Articles of ordinary convenience or necessity if going to a belligerent port where such articles are used for warlike purposes.

Raw materials capable of being turned to the purposes of war.

[See fuller enumeration of particular goods, Arn., 4th edit., pp. 647, 648.]

Marsh Ins., 54, 55.

Contraband of war may be insured in a neutral country if its nature is made known to the underwriter.

[See "Concealment: Liability to Capture."]

Such insurances are void in the country of the hostile belligerent, and cannot be enforced in his courts.

Arn., 4th edit., 649, n. 3.

[See further on this subject, and as to (2) and (3). Warranties: Express—Neutrality.]

5.—Violation of Embargo.

A Government in time of war having laid an embargo on all ships sailing for a particular port an insurance on a contravention of such embargo is void:

Arn. 4th edit. 639; Delmada v. Motteux, 1 Hild. Park. Ins. 505.

6.—In violation of the Country's War Policy.

Trading with the enemy during war without a licence is illegal, and the insurance on such trading is void:

Potts v. Bell, 8 T. R. 548.

Exception.—A native of a belligerent country domiciled in a neutral country may trade with the enemy of his country and insure the adventure:

Bell v. Reid; Bell v. Butler, 1 M. & S. 726; Willson v. Marryatt, 8 T. R. 31.

All insurances effected in the home country to protect property liable by its situation in an enemy's country to British capture, are void:

Arn. 4th edit. 642.

An insurance on goods to a friendly or neutral port there to be delivered to a neutral is valid though the neutral himself be resident in a port of hostile occupation:

Bromley v. Hesseltine, 1 Camp. 75. See Hobbs v. Henning, 34 L. J., 117, C. P..

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

FORECLOSURE SUIT—COUNTY COURTS ACTS—COSTS.—In a suit to foreclose a mortgage for £50. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to his full costs of suit: (Brown v. Rye, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 872. M. R.)

BRADFORD COUNTY COURT.

(Before W. T. S. DANIEL, Esq., Judge.)

Jan. 23 and Feb. 6.

Ex parte BARTHELMES; Re OLDENDORFF AND ANOTHER.

Bankruptcy—Surety—Substituted liability.

In order to transfer a separate liability of A. into the joint liability of A. and B., there must be the mutual agreement of both A. and B. to do so. That agreement may be proved by conduct. There must also be the agreement of the creditor of A. to accept the liability of A. and B. in lieu and discharge of the liability of A.: (Ex parte Whitmore, 3 Deac. 365; Rolfe v. Flower, L. Rep. 1 P. C. 27.)

Semble, if a creditor accept the joint liability of A. and B. in lieu of the separate liability of A., he discharges a surety for the separate debt of A., as accepting a distinct and perhaps less valuable security. (See observations by Alderson, B., Lyth v. Ault, 7 Ex. 669.)

Shaw, instructed by Wood and Killick, for the motion.

Jordan, instructed by Rawson, George, and Wade, opposed.

This was an application by or on behalf of Ernestus Emilius Barthelmes, of Erfurt, Germany, gentleman, made in the matter of the liquidation by arrangement of Ludolf Henry Oldendorf and Joseph Myers, of Bradford, stuff merchants, trading in co-partnership as Oldendorf and Myers, for an order directing that the decision of the trustee rejecting the proof by the said E. E. Barthelmes upon the joint estate of the said debtors, may be raised or reversed, and that the trustee may be directed to admit the said E. E. Barthelmes as a person entitled to prove upon the joint estate of the said debtors for the sum of £2368 12s. 5d. The notice of motion by an amendment made by consent at the hearing, asks for certain alternative relief, with which it will be more convenient to deal hereafter. The debt of £2368 12s. 5d. sought to be proved against the joint estate is composed of a sum of £2000, originally a separate loan by Barthelmes to Oldendorff, and £368 12s. 5d. for commission due from Oldendorff and Barthelmes, upon an agreement which originally was the separate agreement of Oldendorff. The question whether these two debts, originally separate, have become joint, depends upon whether the facts, as established by the evidence show—first, that the firm of Oldendorff and Myers had assumed the liability to pay these two debts, as joint debts of the firm; and, secondly, that Barthelmes had, before the date of the petition for liquidation, agreed to accept the firm as his debtors, and to discharge Oldendorff from his original liability in his separate engagements. The facts are as follow:—Barthelmes had for some time prior and up to the 1st Jan. 1870, carried on the business of a stuff merchant at Bradford, and by an agreement dated the 10th March 1870, between himself and Oldendorff. Art. 1. Barthelmes transferred to Oldendorff his said business as from the 1st Jan. 1870, from which date it was to be deemed to have been carried on by Oldendorff on his sole account. Art. 2. Oldendorff is to have the right to use and carry on the firm of Barthelmes and Co. for five years from the 1st Jan. 1870, and Barthelmes binds himself not to establish any business in Yorkshire during that period. Art. 3. Oldendorff agrees to take for his account, and credit Barthelmes with, certain stock and effects amounting to £2803 15s. 6d. Art. 4. Barthelmes hands over to Oldendorff for collection certain trade debts, amounting to £6279 12s. 4d., which Oldendorff agrees to collect and therewith pay certain trade liabilities of Barthelmes, amounting to £4429 0s. 3d., and to pay out of the remainder a balance of the receipt £1000 to Barthelmes' liquidation account at the Bradford Banking Company, and the rest upon three months' notice after 1st Jan. 1871. Art. 5. Barthelmes agrees to leave Oldendorff against guarantee capital to the amount of £2000 for five years from 1st Jan. 1870, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum, payable half yearly; Barthelmes takes upon himself the liability upon bills drawn previously to 1st Jan. 1870 and due in 1870 amounting to £2519 7s. 10d. Art. 6. For cession of the goodwill of the business Oldendorff agrees to pay Barthelmes a commission of one half per cent. on the amount of a business turned over by him during the five years beginning 1st Jan. 1870 to the end of 1874, and to render a half yearly statement of the same. Art. 8. Oldendorff agrees to take Barthelmes' warehouse in Bradford on a lease of fourteen years at a yearly rent of £400 payable half yearly, with a right to sublet part or the whole thereof. Art. 9. Oldendorff agrees to induce Mr. H. Averdieck, of Bradford, to guarantee Barthelmes the payment of £4000 within five years from the 1st Jan. 1870, and agrees to pay all necessary stamps and legal expenses. The lease provided for by Art 8 was duly executed. The guarantee provided for by Art. 5 was duly given. From the 10th March 1870 down to the month of Jan. 1873, the agreement was acted upon by both parties, and the terms thereof complied with, except as to the payment of the first year's commission provided by Art. 6. Barthelmes having released Oldendorff from the payment of it by reason of the badness of trade arising from the French and German war, Oldendorff carried on the business from the 1st Jan. 1870, and received the assets and paid the debts of the old firm of Barthelmes and Co., and reduced the balance due to Barthelmes to £2000, which he retained on loan according to Art. 5, secured by Averdieck's guarantee, according to Art. 9 In the early part of 1872 the account between Oldendorff and Barthelmes was made up to 31st Dec. 1871, and showed a balance of £2051 9s. 6d., the £51 9s. 6d. being due for interest on the £2000. This sum of £51 9s. 6d. being small was not paid, but the balance was continued and carried forward: (See Oldendorff's affidavit, 30th Dec. 1873, pp. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9). From this evidence it is clear that the £2000 was originally a loan from Barthelmes to Oldendorff on his separate security, and the payment was guaranteed by Averdieck to Barthelmes, as the separate debt of Oldendorff. In the autumn of 1872 Oldendorff was desirous of obtaining a working partner to assist him with capital and in the conduct of the business. The defendant was introduced to him through a friend of both parties, and after some negotiation a partnership was agreed to be formed between them, and the terms were contained in an agreement dated the 22nd Nov. 1872. Art. 1. The stock of the business now carried on by Oldendorff, under the firm of Barthelmes and Co., to be taken on 31st Dec. 1872, and the assets and liabilities of the firm to be ascertained by the balancing of the books as early as possible after that day, the balance then standing to the credit of the old firm being transferred to Oldendorff's account, and reckoned as his share of capital in the new partnership business. Art. 2. This agreement to be based upon the assumption that Oldendorff's capital thus ascertained amounts to £8000, and Myers to deposit £5000 in the business as his requisite share of capital. Art. 3. The capital of each partner, to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. Art. 4. The profit or loss to be apportioned three-fifths to Oldendorff, two-fifths to Myers. Art. 5. The drawings of the respective parties from the business not to exceed in one year £1000 by Oldendorff, and £600 by Myers, unless by consent of his copartner. Art. 7. The partnership now formed to be carried on under the name of L. H. Oldendorff and Myers, and to commence from 1st Jan. 1873, and to continue for five years from that time. Art. 14. Should any losses arise from the debts due to the firm of Barthelmes and Co., and placed to the credit of Oldendorff in the new partnership, such losses to be placed to the debit of Oldendorff's private account. Art. 15. This agreement to be rectified after the opportunity has been given of verifying the facts upon which it is based. The partnership between Oldendorff and Myers, as constituted by the agreement of 22nd Nov. 1872, was carried on from the 1st Jan. 1873, up to the 23rd July 1873, when the petition for liquidation in the matter was filed; but the embarrassments of the firm began in the month of June. Upon the question whether the firm of Oldendorff and Myers agreed to adopt the debt of 2000*l.*, and the liability of Oldendorff to the commission of half per cent to Barthelmes, there is a direct and irreconcilable conflict of evidence upon the affidavits of the two debtors. I have carefully read and considered those affidavits, and I have come to the conclusion that, whatever may have been the intention of Oldendorff upon the subject, it was never the intention of Myers to adopt those liabilities as liabilities of the partnership; that he believed, and was justified in believing, and acted on the belief, that the 2000*l.* formed part of Oldendorff's capital, and that the commission was a liability which Oldendorff would settle and arrange with Barthelmes. And it appears to me that the letters from Oldendorff to Barthelmes, set out in Oldendorff's affidavit dated 8th Nov., 11th Dec., 23rd Dec. 1872; 13th Jan., 7th Feb., and 26th June 1873, confirm the view of the transaction as given by Myers. The letter of 27th June 1873 is the first letter in which Oldendorff treats Myers as in any way interested in his proposals to Barthelmes, and I observe this was written from Whitby after Myers, as he states, had ascertained the embarrassed position of the firm, and had decided to stop payment, and Oldendorff says he never did communicate with Myers as he stated in that letter he should. It has been attempted, however, to be made out that apart from express agreeduct the firm of Oldendorff and Myers has by consent adopted these separate liabilities of Oldendorff as joint liabilities of the firm. The conduct relied upon consists in the payment to Barthelmes by cheques drawn in the name and payable out of the funds of the firm or of two cheques for £200 and £393 10s. 3d. The cheque for £200 was for half a year's rent of the warehouse. This warehouse had been leased by Barthelmes to Oldendorff for fourteen years, from 1st Jan. 1870, at £400 per annum, and was occupied by the firm at the same rent, as sub-tenant to Oldendorff; the firm were not the assignees of the lease, but they held it from Oldendorff at the same rent, and the £200 thus paid direct by the firm to Barthelmes was not a payment for which they were liable to Barthelmes, but their liability to Oldendorff being of the same amount as his to Barthelmes, the payment was made direct to avoid the needless circuit of two cheques, and appears to me to have no bearing on the question. The other cheque for £393 10s. 3d. was for the balance over and above the £2000 which was due to Barthelmes from Oldendorff up to 31st Dec. 1873: this sum was paid by a check drawn in the name of the firm by Oldendorff and which when it was pointed out to him by Myers (as stated by him in the 21st paragraph of his affidavit, and not specifically contradicted by Oldendorff). Oldendorff stated he had told Schreiber (the cashier) to place to the debit of his private account, and this payment, therefore, proves nothing to the point. I am unable, therefore, to find either from the evidence or the conduct of the partners, sufficient ground for concluding that Myers ever agreed that these separate liabilities of Oldendorff for the 2000*l.* and the commission, or either of them, should be treated as joint liabilities of the firm. But even if such an agreement were established, it must then be shown by Barthelmes that before the petition for liquidation he knew of this agreement, and adopted the firm as his debtors in lieu and discharge of the separate liability of Oldendorff. Mr. Barthelmes is resident in Germany, and on the day on which his proof was made, the 19th Aug. 1873, he was in Bradford, and was examined and cross-examined privately and voluntarily at the office of the trustee's solicitor by his own solicitor and the solicitor of the trustee, and both parties consented at the hearing before me that the examination might be read as evidence. I have read that examination, and have not been able to find in it anything which would show an adoption of the liability of the firm in lieu and discharge of the separate liability of Oldendorff. And I am unable to understand how Mr. Barthelmes could have intended or been advised to make such an adoption. The debt of Oldendorff was guaranteed by Averdieck, who was represented to be, and I presume is, a substantial man and able to meet his guarantee; and Mr. Barthelmes was therefore always secure of receiving 20s. in the pound in this debt, treating it as the separate debt of Oldendorff, whereas by accepting the joint liability of the firm in discharge of the separate liability of Oldendorff he might (according to the judgment of Baron Alderson in Lyth v. Ault, 7 Exch. 669, probably would) have lost the benefit of Averdieck's guarantee by substituting a different and what might have been a less valuable security, the benefit of which Averdieck would have lost if he had been called upon to pay upon his guarantee. It was suggested during the argument by the counsel for the trustee that this motion was really made in the interest of Averdieck, because as it appears from the proceedings that the dividend upon the joint estate will be much larger than the dividend upon Oldendorff's separate estate, and as upon Averdieck paying Barthelmes this debt in full, he will be entitled to the benefit of Barthelmes' proof—it is for the benefit of Averdieck that the proof should be made against the joint estate. The suggestion is plausible, and may be well founded, but I have no facts in evidence before me that show that Barthelmes' proof is made for such a purpose, and I rest my decision upon the absence of sufficient evidence that Myers ever agreed to adopt Oldendorff's liabilities to Barthelmes for the £2000, and the commission on either of them as liabilities of the firm of Oldendorff and Myers; and also upon the ground that even if such an agreement were shown to have been made, Barthelmes ever agreed to adopt the joint liability of the firm in lieu and discharge of the separate liability of Oldendorff; and according to the cases of Ex parte Whitmore (8 Deac. 365), and Rolfe v. Flower (L. Rep. 1 P. C. 27), both these must concur. The motion, therefore, so far as it seeks to discharge or vary the trustee's decision respecting the proof as a proof against the joint estate, will be refused with costs. The notice of motion, however, proceeds to ask in the alternative that if the court shall be of opinion that the said E. E. Barthelmes is not entitled to prove upon the joint estate of the said debtors therefor, a declaration that such of the assets and property now in the possession or under the control of the trustee as were on the 31st Dec. 1872, the separate estate of the debtor Oldendorff, trading as Barthelmes and Co., but which are included as assets in the joint balance sheet filed by the debtors, are the separate estate of the said Oldendorff, and applicable in the first instance to the discharge of his separate liabilities, and that for the purposes aforesaid, all necessary accounts may be taken, and inquiries made, and for an order declaring and ascertaining the rights of the said E. E. Barthelmes in respect of the joint and separate estates of the said debtors respectively. Upon this part of the notice of motion, I decline to make any such order as asked for. First, because the order asked for would be premature, as there is no proof on the file showing that Barthelmes is a separate creditor of Oldendorff for any definite sum, but, secondly, because it is reasonably clear that there cannot be any such assets, inasmuch as by the effect of the partnership articles of 29th Nov. 1872, and what was done under them by the debtors as shown by the twenty-first par. of Oldendorff's first affidavit, all the assets of the firm of Barthelmes and Co., were, as from the 1st Jan. 1873, carried on to the firm of Oldendorff and Myers. They formed part of the capital of Oldendorff in the firm of Oldendorff and Myers just as much as the £4000 or whatever the sum may have been which Myers brought into the firm as capital, and the whole became joint estate and to be applied in payment in the first instance of the joint debts. If any creditor of this partnership had recovered judgment against the debtors, I apprehend it is quite clear he could have taken in execution as goods of the partnership, the goods which are by the notice of motion sought to be declared to be the separate estate of Oldendorff. In truth, what this part of the notice of motion aims at, is to raise a question affecting the capital account between the partners—a question with which the joint creditors have no concern, and cannot be raised so as to prejudice them. I therefore make no order upon the alternative part of the notice of motion, and dismiss the rest of the motion with costs.

(Before T. H. INGHAM, Esq., Judge.)

FEARON v. THE MARYPORT AND CARLISLE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway—Obstructing a level crossing.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiff, who is a tenant farmer residing at Crosby, near Maryport, against the defendants, for having negligently and improperly obstructed a level crossing leading over the company's line of railway to the plaintiff's field at or near to Bullgill. The plaintiff alleged that he had the right to use the crossing, and that from the year 1869 up to the date of bringing his action, it had been almost uninterruptedly blocked up by mineral and other trains, being shunted over, and allowed to remain upon it. The company had compensated the plaintiff, it was alleged, on a previous occasion for a similar obstruction, and had promised him that a further repetition of it should be prevented. This the company had failed to do, and the plaintiff claimed £50 as compensation.

Wicks, of Cockermouth, appeared for the plaintiff.

E. T. Tyson, of Maryport, for the defendants.—The company's statutory rights are paramount to the subordinate easement rights reserved to the vendor and those claiming under him. The vendor has already been fully compensated for injuries sustained by him in consequence of the company having taken his land, and the deed of conveyance to the company recites this. The use of the line in the way complained of is necessary to the proper working of the traffic. The claim, if recoverable at all, is in the nature of "unforeseen damage," and must be recovered before two justices, as prescribed by the Lands' Clauses Consolidation Act. Moreover, the plaintiff must prove that he has sustained special damage resulting in actual loss.

His HONOUR said there could be no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the court, and he would award 40s. damages, with costs on the lower scale.

NEWBURY COUNTY COURT.

(Before H. J. STONOR, Esq., Judge.)

Thursday, Feb. 19.

RICKETTS v. HEATH.

Reservation, or grant of sporting to lessor—Whether exclusive or Concurrent—Construction of lease.

THE case was heard before a jury in January last.

The plaintiff is a farmer, residing at Faccombe, North Hants, and he sued the defendant (Mr. Alan Boman Heath), his landlord, who resides at East Woodhay, for the sum of £50 as damages sustained by him in consequence of his failing to keep down the rabbits on the estate as he (defendant) had promised to do.

W. H. Cave appeared for the plaintiff.

Sills, barrister (instructed by Smith, of Andover), for the defendant.

The damages were admitted, and his Honour then said the case resolved itself into a nonsuit or otherwise upon the terms of the covenant. He directed the jury to give a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount, subject to his decision on the point.

His HONOUR, this day, delivered judgment as follows: By a lease dated the 13th April 1863, Mr. A. B. Heath demised to Mr. E. Ricketts a farm at Faccombe, in the county of Hants, for a term of seven years, from Michaelmas 1862. In the lease was contained the following exception or reservation: "Except and always reserved unto the said A. B. Heath, his heirs and assigns, all game, rabbits, and wild fowl, with full and free liberty for the said A. B. Heath, his heirs and assigns, and his and their gamekeepers, servants, friends, and acquaintances, and all and every other person or persons by their orders and consent, at all times during the term hereby granted to hunt, course, shoot, or sport in, upon, or over the said hereby demised lands and premises, or any part thereof." And in the said lease was contained a covenant by the lessee not to shoot or destroy hares, partridges, pheasants, or other game (but not mentioning rabbits), and not to permit any persons except the lessor to shoot or destroy the game (but not mentioning rabbits) in or upon the said premises, with an exception that in case the rabbits injured the crops, and the lessor should not, after notice in writing to that effect, destroy the same or refuse compensation for such injury, it should be lawful for the said E. Ricketts after such notice and refusal of compensation (but no mention as to refusal to destroy the rabbits), to destroy a sufficient quantity of rabbits by ferrets, but in no case to set a gin or wire, or use any other instrument for the purpose of killing such rabbits. In 1863-4-5 the lessee did not shoot or destroy rabbits. In 1865 the rabbits had increased and did damage, and such damage was valued at £50 by two valuers and paid by the lessor to the lessee. In 1866-7-8 the lessee had permission to shoot, and kept down the rabbits. In the autumn of 1868 this permission was revoked, but subsequently it was renewed and the lessee shot until Feb. 1869. Since then the lessee neither shot nor destroyed any rabbits till September last. In the spring of 1872 the rabbits had again increased, and on the 10th May in that year the lessee's attorney wrote to the lessor complaining that the rabbits were doing considerable damage to the lessee's crops and requiring the lessor to destroy them or to pay compensation, and in answer thereto the lessor wrote to the lessee's attorney a letter dated 11th May 1872, in which he says, "I am surprised to hear about the rabbits, as I am told there is scarcely a rabbit in the whole place, but I must refer you to the lease." In the summer of 1873 the rabbits had increased to a very great extent, and had done serious damage to the growing crops. On the 16th June 1873, the lessee's solicitor again wrote to the lessor, requiring him to destroy the rabbits or to pay him compensation; and on the 8th July 1873, the lessor wrote a letter to the lessee's solicitor, simply declining to give any compensation, and took no steps to destroy the rabbits. In Sept. 1873, the lessee put on two men to trap the rabbits, but previously the rabbits had eaten up a great deal of the wheat and vetches, and were beginning to injure the root crop. In the month of Aug. 1873, the lessee had a valuation made, and the damage to the wheat was certified to be upwards of £37 7s. Notice of the valuation was sent to the defendant, but he did not attend to it. The damage to the vetches and other crops was estimated by the plaintiff at £12 13s. and upwards, and he now sues the defendant for £50 damages, according to the above valuation and estimate. The amount of damage was admitted, but the liability of the plaintiff, under the lease, or otherwise, was disputed, and a verdict for the plaintiff was taken, subject to the opinion of the court as to the defendant's liability. It appeared by the evidence of the plaintiff on the trial that the rabbits could be destroyed by means of ferrets in the autumn or winter, but not in the spring or summer, on account of the young rabbits, which the ferrets devoured, instead of pursuing the old rabbits. The plaintiff deposed to a conversation with the lessor's agent during the treaty for the lease, as to the rabbits on the farm, but it was of so vague a nature as certainly not to amount to a collateral parol agreement within the cases of Erskine v. Adeane (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 234), and Morgan v. Griffiths (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 783). The two questions which now remain for my decision are, first, whether the defendant is liable under the lease, and, secondly, whether he is liable in consequence of the subsequent transactions. With regard to the defendant's liability under the lease, it is to be observed that the provisions of that instrument are most inaccurately framed. In the first place the usual and almost universal error is committed of excepting or reserving to the lessor the game, rabbits, and wild fowl with liberty to hunt and shoot the same, instead of inserting a grant by the lessee to the lessor to that effect, but as it is well established that such an exception or reservation will operate as a grant by the lessee, if he executes the lease (Wickham v. Hawker, 7 M. & W. 63), this point is perhaps immaterial. The next point, however, is of much importance and difficulty, and practically affects the present case, viz., whether this grant is a grant to the lessor of an exclusive right of shooting or only a grant of a concurrent right with the right which the lessee has at common law (Year Book, 14 Hen. 3, Bac. Abr. "trespass" H. 3; Lifford's case, 11 Rep. 48; Moore v. Earl of Plymouth, 7 Taunt. 614), and which since 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32, is wholly unrestricted and unqualified unless by the agreement of the parties. Upon the whole I am of opinion, but with some doubt, that the lessor's right is not exclusive but is concurrent with the lessee's. The covenants which follow however expressly bind the lessee not to exercise his concurrent right as to "hares, partridges, pheasants, or other game," but not affecting whatever right he otherwise would have to shoot and destroy rabbits and wild fowl. For although the term "game" does sometimes include rabbits (Jeffreys v. Evans, 34 L. J., 263, C. P.), yet it is clear that they are not intended to be included in the term "game" in these covenants, as the word "rabbits" is superadded to it in the previous reservation or grant. At the end of these covenants, indeed, comes an exception which singularly and improperly relates to rabbits, although they are not mentioned, nor, as I think, included in the covenants, and this exception appears to me to be altogether void under the rule that an exception must relate to part of a thing previously granted or covenanted to be done: (Touch. 77.) This exception provides "that in case the rabbits injure the crops and the lessor shall not, after notice in writing, destroy the same or refuse compensation for such injury, it shall be lawful for the lessee after such notice and refusal of compensation, to destroy a sufficient quantity of rabbits by ferrets, but in no case to set a gin or wire, or any other instrument for the purpose." As I have already said, it is in my opinion utterly void, and nowise limits the concurrent right of the lessee to shoot the rabbits and to prevent them becoming a nuisance, and on this point I would refer to the dictum of Byles, J., in Jeffreys v. Evans (34 L. J. 265, C. P.), as to the right of a lessee to destroy rabbits when they become a nuisance, even where the right of sporting granted to the lessor was exclusive. To sum up this part of the case I am of opinion that under the very inaccurate and contradictory provisions of the lease, the lessee is entitled concurrently with the lessor at any time to shoot the rabbits or otherwise to destroy them. The only argument to the contrary which I can see is, that on the construction of the various provisions contained in the lease, a general intention is discoverable, that the lessee should neither shoot nor destroy game or rabbits, except in the one case of the rabbits injuring the crops or the lessor refusing compensation, and that to carry out the intention, the right of shooting granted to the lessor is to be considered as exclusive, and the word "game" in the covenants is to be held to include rabbits, but I cannot conceive that this argument would

Verdict for defendant without costs.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BANKRUPTCY "PENDING PROCEEDINGS FOR OR TOWARDS LIQUIDATION"—COSTS OF LIQUIDATION PROCEEDINGS — BANKRUPTCY RULES 1870, R. 292.—A debtor filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement, under which a receiver was appointed. At the first meeting the creditors negatived a resolution for liquidation by arrangement, and on the following day the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt. Held, that the bankruptcy had occurred "pending proceedings for or towards liquidation," within the meaning of the 292nd of the Bankruptcy Rules 1870, inasmuch as through the appointment of the receiver the property remained under the protection of the court, and that the costs of the abortive proceedings for liquidation must therefore be paid out of the debtor's estate. Decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy affirmed: (Ex parte Howell; re Hawes, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 859).

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNMENT OF GOODWILL AND FIXTURES—NON-DELIVERY OF POSSESSION —SALE BEFORE BANKRUPTCY.—A debtor executed an assignment of the goodwill and fixtures of his business to his brother, in satisfaction of moneys advanced. Two years afterwards the debtor, who had retained possession of the goodwill and fixtures, sold them, and his brother obtained payment of the purchase-money. The debtor was then insolvent, and soon afterwards presented a petition for liquidation by arrangement. Held (reversing the decision of one of the registrars), that the payment of the purchase-money to the debtor's brother was not a fraud upon the other creditors, and could not be set aside: (Ex parte Wilson, re Wilson, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 860. Chan.).

COMPOSITION — MOTIVE OF KINDNESS TO DEBTOR—FRAUD—PROPERTY SUFFICIENT TO PAY DEBTS IN FULL—BANKRUPTCY ACT 1869, s. 127.—A debtor, whose property was sufficient to pay his debts in full, filed a petition for liquidation, and the requisite statutory majority of his creditors, with a knowledge of the value of his property, passed resolutions to accept a composition of 10s. in the pound, partly from a desire to assist the debtor, and partly in order to avoid the necessity of waiting for their money till the property was realised. Two months after the creditors had granted the debtor his discharge, a dissenting creditor applied to the court to rescind the resolutions. Held (affirming the decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy), that the application must be refused, inasmuch as there had been no fraud on the part of the debtor, and none of the creditors had, in fact, been deceived as to the value of his property: (Ex parte Linsley, re Harper, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 857. Chan.)

Re JONES; Ex parte MILES.

Liquidation by arrangement—Leave to proceed de novo on petition—Discrepancy between debtor's statement and proofs—Adjournment of first meeting.

Griffith Jones for Miles, a creditor.

David Pugh for trustee.

Jones applied to set aside the resolutions passed for liquidation of the debtor's affairs by arrangement at a meeting held on 20th Sept. last, on the following grounds: First, that the court had no power to order de novo first and subsequent meetings on the petition, which had lapsed by reason of the non-attendance of a quorum of creditors at a previous meeting; secondly, that a discrepancy appeared in the amount of two claims in the debtor's statement of his affairs and the proofs exhibited; thirdly, that the first meeting summoned upon the order to proceed de novo not having been attended by a quorum of creditors, and no resolution for adjournment having been passed, the proceedings lapsed again, and no subsequent meeting could be legally held.

The REGISTRAR.—Respecting the first ground, I was at the time I granted the order to proceed de novo, and still am of opinion, that this was a case in which I ought to exercise the enabling power given by the Bankruptcy Act 1869 to hold a first and subsequent meetings of creditors, where the first lapsed for want of the presence of a quorum of creditors; secondly, I am also of opinion that a discrepancy between the debtor's statement of some of his creditors' claims and the proofs exhibited, if I believe the same arose from forgetfulness or error of judgment, is not a ground for invalidating the proceedings, and that it would be necessary to show the debtor wilfully misstated the claims of friendly creditors, or inserted fictitious claims to constitute the statutory majority of creditors favourable to the debtor, or for some other fraudulent purpose—there is nothing to lead me to believe that this exists in this case; thirdly, I am of opinion the first meeting of creditors, which was properly convened upon the order to proceed de novo for the 13th Sept. not having been attended by a quorum of creditors, the law of its own motion adjourned the meeting to the 20th of the same month, at the same hour and place, pursuant to Article 94 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870. The proceedings which took place at that meeting appear from the file to have been quite regular, and the resolutions passed thereat for liquidation of the debtor's affairs by arrangement having been subsequently registered, I cannot and will not set them aside. Mr. Jones further applied to rescind an order bearing date 17th Feb. 1872, to restrain one John Williams, a creditor from proceeding in an action commenced by him against the debtor in the Exchequer of Pleas to recover £120, on a promissory note of the debtor, but I see no ground whatever for doing so, and as the other and principal application failed, this and the other restraining orders granted in this case continue. I think the trustee is entitled to his reasonable costs of resisting the application.

NANTWICH COUNTY COURT.

Wednesday, Feb. 18.

(Before ST. J. YATES, Esq., Judge.)

Re T. and J. H. LITTLER; Ex parte T. LITTLER.

Creditor and surety—Resolution to accept composition to which creditor assents—Absolute release of surety.

THIS motion was heard on 13th Jan.

Jordan, instructed by Lisle, supported the motion on behalf of T. Littler.

Heelis, solicitor, opposed for the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company, who are creditors for £1669 12s. 9d.

Feb. 18.—His HONOUR delivered his judgment, as follows: Mr. Jordan, by his motion, asked for an order upon the Manchester and Liverpool Banking Company to deliver up certain title deeds which had been deposited with them by Thomas Littler in June 1870. In June 1870 Thomas and James Brotherton Littler, who were then in partnership as bone grinders and manure dealers, got into difficulties, and Thomas deposited with the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company the deeds which were the subject of this motion, and which related exclusively to his private estate, as security for advances which had already been or might afterwards be made by the bank to the firm of Thomas and J. B. Littler, or to either of them alone. A memorandum to this effect was signed by Thomas Littler, and accompanied the deposit. In Oct. 1872 Thomas Littler retired from the business, but it appearing shortly afterwards that the firm was insolvent, the partners filed in this court, on the 12th Oct., a petition under the 125th and 126th sections of the Act of 1869. At a statutory meeting of their creditors, held on the 30th of the same month, it was resolved by the prescribed majority, that the creditors accept in satisfaction of their respective debts a composition of 10s in the pound, payable in two instalments of 5s., the second to be guaranteed by the persons named in the resolution. It was also resolved that the terms of the composition be embodied in a deed, to be prepared by Mr. C. S. Brooke and approved of on behalf of the creditors, such deed to contain proper covenants for carrying into effect the resolutions and for releasing the debtors. At a second statutory meeting in the same matter, held on the 11th Jan. 1873, the foregoing resolutions were, with a modification which is for present purpose immaterial, duly confirmed. The Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company was an assenting creditor at both meetings, and voted in favour of the resolutions. Similar meetings were also called of the private creditors of the partners, at one of which—namely, of J. B. Littler's creditors—the foregoing resolutions were unanimously adopted; at the other it appeared that there was only one private creditor of Thomas Littler, and he had been paid. On the 10th Feb. the resolutions were duly registered, and the composition was afterwards paid and accepted by the creditors. The deed prepared by Mr. Brooke with the view of carrying the resolutions into effect was in substance as follows: It bore date the 20th March 1873. The parties were Thomas Littler and J. B. Littler, of the first part; the creditors who might execute it, of the second part; and Thomas Fowles and John Issard, as trustees, of the third part. After reciting, amongst other things, the proceedings in composition, and that it had been agreed that the securities held by the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company upon the private estate of Thomas Littler should not be prejudicially affected by their assenting to and receiving payment of the composition, Thos. and J. B. Littler assigned the property comprised in the securities held by the bank, and also their personal estate and effects, to Fowles and Issard, to indemnify them against any loss they might sustain by reason of their having guaranteed the second instalment of the composition. Then followed a release of the debtors conditioned upon the payment of the composition, covenanted by them, and the sureties to pay it, and a declaration that the deed should in nowise prejudice the rights and remedies of the creditors against sureties, or in respect of any collateral securities they might hold. Upon this state of facts Mr. Jordan contended, first, that the principal debtors being discharged by force of the resolutions, followed by payment of the composition, the liability of Thomas Littler as surety was also at an end: (Slater v. Jones, 29 L. L. Rep. N. S. 56; Capes v. Ball, Ibid; Edwards v. Combe, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 519). Secondly, that as a right of action once suspended is gone for ever, and cannot be revived (Ford v. Beech, 11 Q. B. 867), the deed of the 20th March 1873, in so far as the provisions were framed with a view to set up or keep alive for the benefit of the bank, Thomas Littler's guarantee, and the securities deposited by him for the partnership debt was inoperative. The learned counsel also submitted that it was inoperative because, while it professed to embody the terms of the composition, it contained stipulations which the creditors did not contemplate in passing the resolution. Mr. Heelis on the other hand, relied upon Ex parte Peacock (2 G. & J. 27) and Ex parte Davenport (1 M. D. & D. 313), as showing that where a joint creditor has a security upon the separate estate of one partner he may prove against the joint estate without giving up his security. He also argued that as Thomas Littler was solvent as to his separate estate at the date of the resolutions, he was free to deal with it as he might think fit, and at all events he could not be admitted to falsify his own solemn act. Upon the first point I hold altogether with Mr. Jordan, for whether the resolutions operate as an accord and satisfaction defeasible by condition subsequent, that is by nonpayment of the composition, or a new agreement of which the consideration to each creditor is the forbearance of the others, the effect of them is that by the agreement of the creditor the surety is placed in a situation different from that in which he had contracted to be placed, and his liability is gone. Creditors may, no doubt, when they resolve on a composition, reserve their rights and remedies against sureties: (Re Glendinning, ex parte Buck, 517; Bateson v. Gosling, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 570.) But the reservation must appear on the face of the resolutions. If it do not the defect cannot be cured by parol evidence of intention, or by subsequent arrangement. Ex parte Peacock and Ex parte Davenport, upon which Mr. Heelis relies, are not in point. They are cases in bankruptcy. This is a composition, which is a very different thing. In bankruptcy there is no agreement. It is as the result of adjudication that the estate is realised, and distributed so far as it will go. But the debts are not realised, at all events until the bankrupt obtains his discharge. In composition the creditors agree to accept part of their respective debts in satisfaction of the whole, and upon payment of the sums agreed to be accepted the original liability is ipso facto at an end. It remains only now for me to deal with the deed of the 20th March, upon which Mr. Heelis in a great measure rests his case. His contention was in reality that, whatever might be the effect of the composition, his clients, the bank, were by force of the special provisions contained in that deed expressly restored to their original rights and remedies against Thomas Littler and his private estate, precisely as if the resolutions of the 10th Feb. had never been passed. Whether as between the principal debtors and the general body of creditors the deed is void, only in so far as it goes beyond the scope of the resolutions, or void as a whole, and to use Mr. Jordan's words "so much waste paper," is a matter which I am not called upon to decide, nor is it material, for the instalments are paid. The question is whether as between the surety and the creditor claiming the benefit of the suretyship, the provisions of the deed suffice to renew the liability of the former, which was suspended or discharged by the resolutions to which the latter had assented. I am of opinion that they fail altogether in their object upon principle, for a right of action once suspended by the act or agreement of the party entitled to it is gone for ever and cannot be revived: (Cheetham v. Ward, 1 Bos. & P. 630, 633; Ford v. Beech (11 Q. B. 867). And upon authority, the recent decision of Bacon, V.C., in Wilson v. Lloyd (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 331) is conclusive. The facts were almost on all fours with those of the case now before me. Omitting all extraneous matters, the plaintiff in that case was surety for the defendant in respect of certain bonds in which Messrs. Harvey were the obligees. The defendant and his partner, Chatteris, filed their petition under sects. 125 and 126 of the Act of 1869. The creditors resolved to accept a composition, payable by instalments, and that a deed should be prepared to give effect to the resolutions. Messrs. Harvey proved their debt and were assenting creditors. The resolution contained no reservation of the existing rights against sureties; but in the deed which was afterwards executed the creditors reserved to themselves, as in bankruptcy, their respective rights and remedies against any surety or sureties or person or persons other than the said debtors in respect of the said sums of money thereby released. Provisions were added to meet the event of the debtors making default in payment of the instalments, and the debtors were released. The learned Vice-Chancellor, in the course of a lengthened judgment, in which he goes fully into the law of the subject, citing numerous cases, especially Oakely v. Pasheller, decided in the House of Lords and reported in 4 C. & F. 203, says—"The resolutions are clear and distinct, beyond the possibility of doubt, and contain no reservation of any rights, though there is a reservation in the deed. But even if I were to give more effect to that reservation than I am disposed to do, it would be still to be observed that the resolutions were binding before the deed was executed. They were capable, no doubt, under the statute, of any reasonable modification, but the modification must be agreed to at the meeting of the creditors, and must not depart from the original stipulation, or it must not depart to the prejudice of any one." The more recent decision in Ex parte Radcliffe Investment Company, re Glover (L. Rep. 17 Eq. 121), contains expressions which are in accordance with these views. It may perhaps be urged that the cases are not analogous; that in Wilson v. Lloyd the surety was not a party to the composition deed; that in the present instance he was. But that is not the case, nor would it I think, as the deed is framed, be material if he were. Thomas Littler is not, however, a party to the deed of the 20th March as surety, but as one of the principal debtors; and in that character he, and his late partner (J. B. Littler), by the description of "the debtors," join in the provisions relating to the composition, as also in the clause upon which Mr. Heelis relies to defeat this motion. In fact, the two deeds resemble each other so clearly that they might have been the work of the same hand, and they fail in operation for the same reasons. Upon the ground, therefore, that by force of the resolutions of Feb. 10, the rights and remedies of the bank against Thomas Littler, as surety, were suspended or discharged; and that the deed of 20th March failed in reviving them, I hold that Thomas Littler is entitled to the return by the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company of the deeds deposited with them in June, 1870. The order will be made accordingly, and the bank must pay the costs.

LEGAL NEWS.

MR. C. J. COLEMAN, of the Northern Circuit, has been appointed stipendiary magistrate for Sheffield.

THE Times states that "It was proposed to confer upon the Right Hon. Russell Gurney the Grand Cross of the Bath, in recognition of his labours in the Washington Claims Commission, but Mr. Gurney did not desire a distinction which seemed incompatible with his profession."

THE TEMPLE CHURCH. — There is a special service in this edifice every Wednesday evening during Lent, at eight o'clock, and a lecture by the Rev. Dr. Vaughan, Master of the Temple. The subject of the lectures will be "The Lord's Prayer."

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.—A correspondent of the Times directs public attention to the fact that members of both Houses of Parliament now take the same oath before taking their seats, so that no person can be excluded for his religious belief. The statute 29 Vict. c. 19 (30th April 1866) is cited in support of this statement.

INNKEEPERS' LAW.—The Rev. Arthur Blomfield, in the Times inquires whether the Licensing Act has repealed, what he terms the "old law," cited in the Cabinet Lawyer, Digest of Laws, pp. 166-7, that "Innkeepers are bound by law to receive guests who come to their inns," and that "if an innkeeper refuses to entertain a guest on tendering him reasonable price, not only may his house be suppressed, but damage obtained by action."

DR. MAIR, Editor of "Debrett's House of Commons, and the Judicial Bench," in an elaborate summary of the late Parliament, published by him in the Times a few days ago, stated that the said Parliament existed five years and forty-eight days, during which period 54 members died, 23 resigned, 18 succeeded to peerages, and 11 to baronetages, 11 were created peers, 5 were promoted to baronetcies, 20 were sworn Privy Councillors, 15 accepted office of profit under the Crown which were incompatible with Parliamentary position, 31 were unseated, 9 received the honour of knighthood, 1 changed his constituency, 6 seats were disfranchised, 135 new members were elected.

FRENCH LAW OF MARRIAGE. — The Civil Tribunal of Toulouse has given judgment in a cause of nullity of marriage recently, under these circumstances: About fifteen months since notice was given to the Maire of the Commune that two persons would appear before him for the performance of the civil form of marriage. The maire, for some unexplained reason, quitted the town suddenly, after receipt of the notice, and instructed his deputy not to perform the ceremony. A member of the municipal council, a general of division, consented to act in lieu of the maire, and solemnised the marriage. Proceedings were adopted to declare the marriage null and void; but the court, after hearing the evidence, decided it to be valid. It was pleaded that the irregularity was caused by the ill-will of the maire, and that the husband and wife had acted honourably.

LAW REFORM.—It seems to be admitted that the new Government may venture upon doing much in the way of law reform if its chiefs can agree among themselves as to what should be done. Lord Derby two years ago indicated this sphere as one upon which a Conservative administration might enter without embarrassment and without timidity. It may be added that law reform would certainly be popular with the country. The law is viewed by laymen as an awful institution, the ways of which are not to be understood by ordinary mortals; and if anything can be done to make its nature more simple, the amendment will be welcomed with amazement and gratitude. There will, indeed, be much incredulity until the result is accomplished, for we have been so often promised wonders, and they are so slow in coming. Who that read a short paragraph in our Law Reports last week which told us, on the authority of Vice-Chancellor Malins, that the winding-up of a small company, with a bona fide subscribed capital of only £4500, and legitimate debts under £4000, had already cost £6750, though the process was not yet complete, would have believed that this was the result of that simplification and cheapening of legal processes for which we have trustfully waited? It is a scandal, one scandal out of many, and any resolute attempt to abate it deserves support, even though it prove ineffectual. Things can but end as they are now, and, while they may get better if we try, they will certainly get worse if we let them alone. So we pluck up hope once more, and watch to see what will be done.—Times.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—The next Sessions will commence on the 2nd March. The judges on the rota are Mr. Justice Keating, Mr. Justice Archibald, and Baron Pollock.

POOR RATES.—For the year ending the 25th March 1873, the sum levied in England and Wales was £12,426,566, being 10s. 6d. per head, less a halfpenny. The sum of £24,068 was disbursed in legal charges during this period.

THE ALBERT ARBITRATION.—We understand that Lord Cairns will continue to act as arbitrator in this matter, as it is so near completion. The final dividend has been paid, and the final award may be looked for within the three years from the passing of the Act, which received the Royal assent on the 25th May, 1871. A short Act is to be passed to deal with the unclaimed dividends, and the arbitrator's duties will then be ended.

PAUPER ELECTORS.—The chairman of the Kidderminster Board of Guardians stated recently that it was an "abstract question"—whether it was legal to fetch a pauper out of a workhouse to poll at an election. The clerk to the board stated that it was not illegal for the pauper to vote, and, consequently, the question should not be discussed; but according to another opinion, on a scrutiny the vote would be disallowed as being that of a pauper, although as his name was on the register the pauper had a right to record his vote without impediment. As in the case of a close election—and the recent Hertfordshire election is an instance—even one vote is of consequence. This question is one which should be decided by competent legal authority.

LORD CHANCELLOR O'HAGAN AND THE IRISH BAR.—Dublin, Feb. 21.—A gratifying demonstration was made to-day in the Court of Chancery on the occasion of Lord O'Hagan sitting for the last time before handing over the seals of office. As it was expected that some public expression would be given to the feeling of respect and esteem entertained for him by the Bar, all the benches of the court were filled with members of the Profession representing different political parties. Among the Queen's Counsel who testified their desire to join in paying a tribute to the Chancellor for the uniform courtesy and kindness which he evinced to all who came within his court, and for his impartiality and dignity in the discharge of his official duties, were some prominent members of the Conservative party who are spoken of as likely to hold office under the new Government. After judgment had been given in two causes which stood on the list, the Solicitor-General asked permission, on behalf of the Bar, to express their appreciation of the manner in which the Lord Chancellor had presided during the last five years. They cordially acknowledged the attention and patience with which he had ever listened to each one of them, as well as the kindness and unfailing courtesy which he had shown to them all, and the dignity with which he had discharged the duties of his high office. They felt that his exercise of the important jurisdiction committed to him had been such as to command the respect and confidence of the Bar and of the public, and now that he was about to retire they desired to assure him that he carried with him the very best wishes of the Irish Bar for his welfare and happiness. Lord O'Hagan listened to the valedictory address with visible emotion, and replied as follows:—"Mr. Solicitor-General,—I am deeply moved by the words you have spoken, and by the feeling which they indicate on behalf of the Bar of Ireland. With that distinguished body it has been my pride to be identified throughout the chequered years of a laborious life, and never, in all its chances and vicissitudes, have I for one instant failed to maintain with them the best relations of cordiality and confidence. And now, when my judicial career is closing, I feel a just pride in receiving such signal proof that those relations have continued unbroken to the end. Fully conscious of many shortcomings, I am conscious, also, that I have striven to fulfil the duties of my great office with impartiality and faithfulness, and I thank the eminent persons who have thronged to meet me to-day for their spontaneous assurance that I have not so striven entirely without success. I pass from the Bench, remembering with the truest pleasure the uniform courtesy, consideration, and respect which I have received at all times from all to whom I have so long had the daily privilege of listening in this court; and I should be the most ungrateful of men if, in the coming years and in the new sphere of activity on which I may enter, I should not be eager and earnest on all fit occasions to aid in advancing the honour and the interest of our noble profession. I believe that the maintenance of the Irish Bar and the Irish Judiciary in full integrity, efficiency, and independence, is essential in the highest sense to the welfare of Ireland; and I trust that the day may never come when anyone of them will lose its lustre and sink into decay. Again I thank you for your great kindness, and with a full heart and faltering tongue I bid you all farewell." At the conclusion of Lord O'Hagan's reply the Bar rose and applauded him with great fervour as he retired from the bench. The demonstration was creditable to the generous spirit of the Bar, and was in perfect unison with the feeling of the public. No chancellor has ever presided in the court who so fully enjoyed or deserved the sympathy, esteem, and friendship, of all ranks and classes of the Irish people.

A paper "On the Rules of Evidence, as applicable to the Credibility of History" will be read by Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., M.P., at the meeting of the Victoria (Philosophical) Institute, on Monday next, when the election of several new members will take place.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.—The John Bull, with reference to the selection of a judge in lieu of Sir W. Bodkin, observes that "without saying anything disparaging to Mr. Edlin, for a post requiring great experience and tact as well as legal knowledge, he cannot compare with Serjeant Cox, who has fairly earned the post, while by his courtesy and consideration, he has won the respect of all. Few men have had larger experience, and are able with greater facility to get at the real gist of a story overlaid, as it often is, with extraneous matter, while his ready detection of imposture, and the facility with which he detects a criminal and protects a prisoner who has been taken in by rogues, makes him no ordinary judge. The outgoing Attorney-General may be glad to see Mr. Edlin provided for, but in doing so, he strangely forgets the good turn that Serjeant Cox has done him in the Taunton election.

THE GENERAL ELECTION.—The aggregate number of votes polled throughout the United Kingdom was 2,485,183, of which 891,836 were polled in favour of unsuccessful candidates. In Scotland there were 36 contests, in which 24 Liberals polled 102,160 votes, against 30,218 votes polled by 12 Conservatives. In Ireland, 83 seats were contested, 83,970 votes having been given to 50 Liberal candidates, and 54,696 to 33 Conservatives. The 346 members who stood a contest in England and Wales received 1,306,405 votes, of which 718,545 were given to 188 Conservative members, and 587,880 to 158 Liberal members. According to a parliamentary return published in February 1873, there were 2,645,564 registered electors in the United Kingdom: 2,157,295 in England and Wales, 262,758 in Scotland, and 225,511 in Ireland. The aggregate polls in England and Wales were 2,053,511, in Scotland 212,330, and in Ireland 219,342. The House of Commons now consists of 653 members, 351 Conservatives, and 302 Liberals. The four disfranchised boroughs are Beverley, Bridgewater, Sligo, returning formerly 6 members. There is a double return for Athlone.

THE NEW HOME SECRETARY.—An episode in the General Election of 1868 is brought to our mind by the fact of Mr. R. A. Cross, just fifty years of age, having at one bound risen from the position of a private member to that of a Cabinet Minister. In 1857 he entered Parliament as one of the members for Preston, being then in full practice as a barrister of the Northern Circuit. At once he made his mark as a practical member, and carried a Bill reforming our municipal councils so far that candidates now require to be named several days before the day of election, instead of coming in by stealth, as was often the case before. He then turned his attention to the vexed subject of church rates, and introduced various Bills on that subject, but his Parliamentary career had to be cut short in 1862, by the exigencies of the Old Bank at Warrington—of which his deceased millionaire father-in-law had been a chief proprietor—requiring new blood to meet the extraordinary extension of the town and trade of Warrington. For four years he became a banker, and missed an excellent chance of one of the legal prizes which fell in showers during the term of office as Prime Minister of Lord Derby, and then of Mr. Disraeli. As a banker, a chairman of quarter sessions, and the leading resident Conservative gentleman of the district, he was pursuing a quiet course when the General Election of 1868 took place. There was a great want of a first-class candidate among the Conservatives of South-West Lancashire to run against Mr. Gladstone. Day after day passed, and one after another refused to be a David for the time being. The Warrington Guardian, from which we extract the previous facts, called attention to Mr. Cross, then relieved from the most onerous duties of a banker by the Old Bank being purchased by a company of which he became chairman. The Times and other papers copied the article; the Conservative press endorsed it, Mr. Cross was received with acclamation, and his course through South Lancashire, and especially at Preston and Warrington, where he was best known, was quite an ovation. It is matter of history how he defeated the first man of his age among the Liberals —Mr. Gladstone—and that so thoroughly that no opposition was offered to him at the late election. His experience as a barrister eminently fits him for the office of Home Secretary, and his further experience as a banker will enable him to give practical aid, when required, to his colleague, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The financier under whose chairmanship a bank has been able to pay 17½ per cent., is no mean addition to even the strong Government of Mr. Disraeli.—Sun.

SUIT BY A BARRISTER.—A suit, instituted by Mr. Charles Neate, late M.P. for Oxford, and of Lincoln's Inn, barrister-at-law, against the Hon. Richard Denman and the Hon. George Denman, the executors of the late Lord Denman, and the Right Hon. Sir W. M. James, the treasurer of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, came before Vice-Chancellor Hall on Wednesday upon a demurrer to the plaintiff's bill. In 1869 the plaintiff petitioned that his name might be taken off the books of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, and received an order to that effect, conditionally upon certain customary payments being made within a month. He did not, however, pay the dues within a month, but subsequently offered to pay all dues owing by him upon the bond of release being delivered up to him, but the society declined to release him till he had signed an altered form of petition, which had since been adopted by them, which, however, he was unwilling to do. He, therefore, filed a bill for a decree which would practically enable him to leave the bar without making any further payments or declarations.

THE TICHBORNE CASE.—A limit has at last been definitely set to the Tichborne trial. Yesterday the Lord Chief Justice announced that his summing-up would be finished on Saturday, and the jury will then be permitted to enter upon their final labours. Whatever regret or inconvenience individuals may experience at the conclusion of this case, the public generally will welcome the statement of the judge. The trial during its progress has aroused much unhealthy excitement, and has exercised an influence on popular feeling which cannot be regarded as beneficial. Whatever the termination may be, no one can suppose that the respect due to the administration of justice has been increased, or the interest so widely felt in the result has assisted the cause of culture in the country. The direct tendency of a trial of this kind is to render the process of law a matter of popular interest, and to attract to legal proceedings a vast amount of unintelligent criticism. One of the chief advantages of the complexity and difficulty of the English legal system is that its decisions are above the reach of shallow comment. Nowhere else does there exist the same reverence for courts of justice, and this reverence is no doubt due to the absolute impartiality with which law has been administered. The sort of feeling which has been raised with regard to the Tichborne trial tends to render the position of English Judges more difficult than it has been, and the intelligence that the end is near is therefore on every ground to be regarded as satisfactory.—Globe, Thursday.

TRANSFER OF LAND.—Mr. Swanston, Q.C., is reported by the Hampshire Telegraph to have spoken as follows on the subject of the transfer of land, when addressing his would-be constituents in South Hants at the recent elections:—"Let me say a word on another point—the free transfer of land. One of the articles of the creed of the Liberal party is that we should have a plan for an easy and cheap transfer of land. (Hear.) Our object is that the capital of the small capitalist should be applied to the culture and improvement of land, so that the owner of a few hundred pounds may buy without difficulty and without serious expense the land on which he can lay out the rest of his capital and labour, without fear of the tyranny of the landlord, or the terrible difficulties which sometimes oppress the leaseholder. At present he is deterred by seeing, before he can become owner in fee simple, what a fearful process he has to go through. It is true he may contract with the owner of the land to buy a few acres. But years may elapse before he can get actual possession of the land; and in all this fearful process he may have to pay more to the various lawyers engaged than to the owner for the land. This is a rag of the barbarous ages, a remnant of the feudal laws which, abolished in other matters, remains still in connection with landed property. The Liberal party seek to sweep it away. It is done in Australia by the bill of Mr. Torrens, and nothing is more simple than to do it in England. Can you have anything more easy and simple than to have a list with one column for the owner of the land, and another for the land; and if John Smith, the owner of acre No. 1, be minded to sell to Richard Jones the said piece of land, to go to the register-office, say 'I have entered into a contract for the sale of acre No. 1, and I ask you to register Richard Jones as the owner instead of me?' The whole thing is done with the stroke of a pen, and is as simple as the transfer of stock or shares. And what stands in the way? A heap of vested interests and Conservative policy; but if you return Liberal members to Parliament in sufficient strength, you may be sure that this nonsense and red-tapism will soon be swept away." [We suppose the expression "vested" interests refers to solicitors.] At the same meeting, speaking on the subject of the codification of the law, he is thus reported: "One topic more, and I have done with the measures we propose—the codification of the law. You may be told, and to your cost, by its administrators, that every Englishman is supposed to know the law. Nothing can be a greater absurdity. No lawyer knows the law. He may know better than others where, among the hundreds of volumes, to find the law or decided cases, and he may give an opinion, which may be worth little or more, as to what the law is. But in this 19th century, in a nation calling itself highly civilised, priding itself on its intelligence and its education, which, it says, it is spreading through all classes, what prevents us having what some nations on the Continent have—a simple code of law in an octavo volume, so simple that a man who runs may read, and which would prevent the idea of every Englishman knowing the law being any longer a mischievous absurdity? I would have this taught in the higher classes of our elementary schools. I would have no man start in life who had not had preliminary instruction in this code; and if you return honest, hard-working Liberals, there will not be the slightest difficulty in reducing all the various laws of the country into a small volume."

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it.

REPEAL OF ATTORNEYS' CERTIFICATE DUTY.—Now we are so ably and numerously represented in the present Parliament by gentlemen belonging to our branch of the Profession, really something ought to be done to secure their aid to make an effort to have this tax repealed. It bears heavily on the younger members of the Profession who can barely bring both ends to meet, because in addition to this yearly tax of £6 the income tax gatherer does not forget to make his call. I quite concur with your remarks and those made by "J. T. S." in your last issue. As the leading members of our Profession to whom the payment of £6 is a mere flea-bite, are supine in the matter, those who are needy and feel the effect of the burthen ought to be up and doing and not cease agitating the questions until the tax is removed altogether, it being for many reasons a most unjust one. That a practitioner whose income does not exceed £150 net should have to pay a tax of £6 is a great injustice, and our present Premier, I feel assured, would not permit any class to be so unfairly burthened if the matter was properly brought to his notice. I trust, Mr. Editor, at every favourable opportunity, you will give us your assistance by giving the subject ventilation.

SUUM CUIQUE.

THE WORKING OF THE BALLOT.—In p. 295 of your publication of this day, Mr. Ford suggests that to avoid delay in counting up the votes "the presiding officer might, in the presence of the necessary agents, examine the ballot papers, and register each vote on a list, so that almost on the closing of the poll each presiding officer might go to the returning officer with a correct summary." I would suggest to Mr. Ford the great protection to the secrecy of the ballot, secured by sect. 34 of the first schedule, providing that before the counting begins the whole of the ballot papers from the various polling stations must be mixed together, and will illustrate it thus. An extensive landowner may have estates reaching over the whole of a polling district, and every tenant might vote for the opposite candidate; at present it would be impossible for him to trace how his tenants had voted, but if the numbers in every box could be checked with the numbers of votes for each candidate, he could make a tolerable guess as to how the bulk of them had voted, and the protection to the voter intended by the ballot would be much reduced. The same observation would apply to the more probable tyranny exercised by trades' unions, &c. I have had some little experience in the working of the Ballot Act, and consider the present system is admirably adapted for the purpose intended. The immediate ascertainment of the result of the poll is of little consequence. I would rather provide that the boxes should not be opened till 10 o'clock on the following morning; everyone would then be fresh for work.

A TOWN CLERK.

Feb. 21.

— Referring to my letter hereon which found a place in your issue of to-day, may I add as an improvement on my suggestion (it is nothing more than a suggestion which may be capable of practical application) upon the subject of counting the ballot papers as the votes are recorded, that an elector having been supplied with a ballot paper, and having marked the same as he wishes, should, instead of depositing it in the ballot box, pass it through a small aperture in a partition of the room in which the voting takes place, such ballot paper being received and the vote or votes recorded at once in a register by a presiding officer on the other side of the partition? I do not attempt to work out my proposal in detail, leaving rather to those more experienced in the working of the ballot, who could, no doubt, improve my suggested plan, which, after all, would be principally of use in large constituencies, and especially in large boroughs. In small constituencies at all approaching to pocket boroughs it would probably operate undesirably. No one will contend that the Ballot Act is such a perfect piece of machinery that it is not capable of improvement.

NOTES AND QUERIES ON POINTS OF PRACTICE.

NOTICE.—We must remind our correspondents that this column is not open to questions involving points of law such as a solicitor should be consulted upon. Queries will be excluded which go beyond our limits.

Queries.

67. COUNTY COURT PRACTICE.—A County Court summons has been issued against a client of mine who does not dwell or carry on business within the district of the court which issued the summons, and who has not done so at any time within six months, and the cause of action (if any) did not arise wholly or in part within the district, but my client dwells within 500 yards of the boundary of the district and was served at his dwelling-house. Has the Judge of the County Court which issued the summons (it is not in the Metropolitan District) jurisdiction in this case? I refer to 19 & 20 Vict., c. 108, s. 17, and to 30 & 31 Vict., c. 142, s. 1.

A LONDON SOLICITOR.

68. BALLOT ACT—PERSONATION.—By the 24th section of the Ballot Act 1872, it is enacted that any person who "applies for a ballot paper in the name of some other person, &c.," shall be deemed to be guilty of the offence of personation. By the 6 & 7 Vict., c. 18, s. 86, it is provided "that, if at the time a person tenders his vote, or after he has voted and before he leaves the polling station, any agent appointed as aforesaid (i.e. personation agent) shall declare to the returning officer or his respective deputy, that he verily believes and undertakes to prove that the person voting is not in fact the person in whose name he assumes to vote, it shall be lawful and he is hereby required immediately after such person has voted to order him to be taken into custody." Assuming that a voter does apply for a ballot paper in the name of another person, and on the usual questions being asked by the presiding officer before the ballot paper has been delivered to him, the person so applying distinctly says that he is not the same person whose name appears as A. B. in the register and refuses to vote, would the presiding officer under such circumstances and reading the above schedules together be justified in ordering him into custody?

ESMOND.

69. QUALIFICATION OF JUSTICES.—B., a justice of the peace, is suspected of having spent property to an extent that would leave insufficient to give him a qualification to be made a justice, in case he were not already one. Such being the case, does his right to be and act as a justice cease? What steps are necessary to ascertain his qualification, and, if necessary, prevent him from acting?

CORWEB.

Answers.

(Q. 63.) SEAL.—Certainly. It will operate only as a simple contract and be entirely void for all the purposes of a deed. Sealing is more requisite to the validity of a deed than even signing.

OWL.

(Q. 65.) POWERS OF ADMINISTRATRIX.—The heir, who is an infant, is the party to convey; and the widow will only join for the purpose of releasing her right to dower. But as an infant cannot make a conveyance to bind him upon attaining twenty-one, to make a good title to a purchaser the property must be sold under the direction of the Court of Chancery.

OWL.

(Q. 66.) TRESPASS.—A. can sue for damages at law or file a bill for an injunction to restrain the nuisance. Assuming that it could not continue without B.'s cognizance and permission, I think B. should be made defendant; unless B. has sublet to the builder, when the latter may be made defendant. I do not think action for trespass should be brought.

MANCHESTER INCORPORATED LAW ASSOCIATION.

THE annual banquet of the Manchester Incorporated Law Association was held at the Albion Hotel, in that city. There was a large attendance. The chair was taken by Mr. W. H. Guest, the president; and the vice-chairs by Mr. J. Taylor (Bolton) and Mr. A. Percy Earle, the vice-presidents. Among the invited guests were—The Mayor of Manchester, the Mayor of Salford, the Principal of the Owens College (Professor Greenwood); deputation from the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool, consisting of Mr. Garnett (vice-president) and Mr. Kenion (hon. sec.); and amongst those present were, Messrs. E. Andrew (town clerk, Salford), C. Aston, T. T. Bellhouse, Richard Brown (Stockport), John Cooper, H. Stanley Cooper, Thomas Claye, T. L. Farrar, J. A. Foyster, James Greenhalgh (Bolton), H. Galloway, James Gill, Thomas Holden (Bolton), C. H. Holden (Bolton), George Hadfield, jun., T. W. Heelis (Bolton), Thomas Jepson, W. W. Kirkman, Alfred Leaf, J. B. Payne, John Peacock, Richard Radford, T. L. Rushton (Bolton), G. F. Wharton, P. Watson (Bury), G. B. Withington, H. Wheeler, M. Bateson Wood, Henry Wood, Percy Woolley, and S. Unwin (hon. sec.).

After the banquet the chairman proposed the ordinary toasts.

Mr. P. F. Garnett, vice-president of the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool, proposed the toast of the evening, "The Manchester Incorporated Law Association." He said these law associations, particularly the Manchester Law Association, had had very great weight of late and very great influence, not only internally upon the body of solicitors themselves, raising the standard and raising the status of the solicitor; and externally no one could be insensible to the influence and effect of late years, to the methodical and combined influence and zeal of the gentlemen connected with those associations, and above all with regard to the Manchester Association. Probably he had been asked to propose the toast from the fact of his being a member of the Liverpool Incorporated Law Society, and therefore probably better able to appreciate the advantages and good services rendered by the Manchester Association. To those services he, on the part of his society bore very ready testimony. (Applause.) He had very great pleasure in proposing the toast.

Mr. Taylor, vice-president, responded to the toast, and congratulated the members on the success of their association, both in respect to the funds, its influence on public opinion, and its maintenance of the status of the legal Profession. (Hear, hear.) This was an age of progress, but perhaps not altogether an age of real improvement, but one thing was certain, that if they did not move they would get put aside. (Hear.) He was happy to see from the report that the new Judicature Bill and the bill for the remuneration of their Profession had occupied attention. He could not say much for the first, but the last was very important—(hear, hear, and laughter)—and it would have the good effect, at all events, that if they could make a bargain they would do better than some of them had done under the old system of taxation. (Hear, hear, and applause.)

Mr. Cooper proposed the "Mayor and Corporation of Manchester."

The Mayor of Manchester (Mr. Ald. Watkin) in responding said when he went into the council he went with the notion that he was going to mix with a body of savages, but he had remained in it until he had come to the conclusion that he was associated with a body of honest and really intelligent men. (Hear, hear.) They had singularities among them, and all sorts of crotchets frequently arose, but from an experience of fifteen years, he could say that the business of this city was conducted with ability, and with a conscientiousness which would satisfy anyone who understood its operations. (Cheers.) He thought that in every sort of transaction co-operation and goodwill was always necessary to success. He thought it most useful that the authorities should always keep up the entente cordiale with every member of their profession, (Hear, hear.) The members of the council had the highest respect for the members of their Profession, and he, as their mouthpiece, thanked them for the handsome manner in which they had expressed their good wishes to the corporation. (Cheers.)

Mr. Rushton proposed the "Health of the Mayor of Salford," which was received with cheers.

The Mayor of Salford (Mr. Harwood) said the honour of replying to the toast was greatly enhanced by the fact that the gentleman who had proposed it was a personal friend of his own, one who had been mayor of Bolton for two consecutive years, and a member of that corporation for a quarter of a century, and one who had left his mark on all the improvements in Bolton during that time. He also felt ashamed to reply to the toast in the presence of Mr. Alderman Radford, whom he looked upon as one of the fathers of the Corporation of Salford. (Applause.) He (the Mayor) had not been connected with the Corporation of Salford long, but he found it was composed of a body of gentlemen who came there for no other purposes than to render the best services they could to those who had sent them to the Council. (Hear, hear.) The office which he held was no sinecure. Recently he had had to attend to the school board election, and that was no light matter. As they would have seen from letters in the papers, the Mayor of Salford's bill was challenged, and under the able guidance of Mr. Andrew, their clerk, he had had to apply to the Educational Board. The result was that the school board had decided to pay every farthing of that bill, thus proving that the bill was a just and proper one. He should have been ashamed to send in any bill which he could not stand by. (Hear, hear.) In conclusion he thanked them for the honour which they had conferred upon him as Chief Magistrate of Salford.

Mr. Alderman Radford proposed "The Lord Chancellor and the Judges, including the Local Judges." He felt sure that in proposing that toast he carried with him the sympathy of every member of the society—(hear, hear)—for there was not one among them, from the youngest to the oldest, but must regard with veneration the illustrious persons who filled the highest positions in their Profession. After eulogising the Lord Chancellor, he referred to our common law judges, and said we could not but regard with wonder the extraordinary power displayed by them in the discharge of their duties. Those who had looked to the marvellous charge now being delivered in that cause celebre, the Tichborne case, by the Lord Chief Justice (Sir A. Cockburn) must regard it as one of the most wonderful instances of the power of the elucidation of a case surrounded with difficulties and with an unequalled mass of evidence, which could only be dealt with by one who had had such an extensive legal training. (Applause.)

Mr. Jepson responded to the toast.

Mr. M. Bateson Wood proposed "The Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool," which was responded to by Mr. Garnett, the vice-president of that society; and the Mayor of Manchester then proposed "The health of the President of the Manchester Incorporated Law Association," who responded.

The proceedings were shortly afterwards brought to a conclusion.

MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

THE half yearly general meeting of the society was held on Wednesday at the offices, King-street, Cheapside. Sir Sills John Gibbons, Bart., presided, and there was a large attendance.

The formal business having been transacted, the report and accounts were taken as read. The former was as follows:

"The revenue account and balance sheet for 1873, which the directors have the pleasure to lay before the members, are ready for deposit at the Board of Trade, and are prepared in the manner prescribed by the Life Assurance Companies' Act, 1870, which is now generally adopted. In this form comparions can easily be made with the accounts of other offices, and members of the Mutual can without difficulty ascertain the comparative position of the society. The accounts appended hereto present the following characteristics:—1. Increase in the total assurances and policies in force; 2. In the assurance fund; 3. In the new assurances effected during the year; 4. In the new premiums; 5. In the rate of interest on investments; 6. In the expenses of management; and 7. A decrease in the amount of claims. The total assurances now in force amount to £2,477,374, under 4417 policies. The assurance fund has increased in the past year from £769,538 to £802,381. The new assurances have increased from 189 policies, assuring £96,506 in 1872, to 249 policies, assuring £150,140 completed in 1873, being an increase of 56 per cent. in the twelve months. The new premiums have increased from £3113, in 1872, to £4639 in 1873, being an increase of 49 per cent. The rate of interest on the total cash assets of the society has increased from £4 3s. 4d. per cent. in 1872 to £4 7s. 2d. in 1873, being equivalent to a clear gain to the society of about £1540 a year on the interest account alone. The expenses of management have increased by £1116 on the year. Against this is to be set a largely increased new business, which is steadily developing, and an increased new premium income for 1873 of £1526 over that of 1872. The increase on the average rate of interest of 3s. 10d. per cent., which on £802,381 is about £1540, brings a total of over £3066 per annum to the credit of the revenue account as a result of the extra expenditure of the society during the past year. The directors have pleasure in stating that the claims for 1873 are only £58,285, against claims in 1872 amounting to £61,054. Notices to the members giving the particulars of the sums which will be added to their policies in the event of their becoming claims in 1874 will be sent out as soon as possible.

The Chairman said it became his very pleasing duty to address them in reference to the business of the year 1873. He did so with more than ordinary pleasure, because he felt sure that they had all given very minute and particular attention to the report of the directors, by which they would find that the business of the society had increased in a satisfactory manner. The improvement which had occurred was, in his judgment, of a very marked character, seeing that they were gaining to a greater extent than they had ever done before the confidence of the public, who were most anxious to become acquainted with this very flourishing office. When they looked to the continued increase of the funds they would see that in the year just ended they amounted to £48,285. The income was in proportion. The new insurances had increased from £96,506 in 1872 to £150,140 in 1873, being an increase of 56 per cent. in the year. He wished to say most emphatically that the same care and scrutiny as usual had been observed. It was not for the sake of doing new business that the increase had been made—(hear, hear)—and therefore he thought the result of the past year's work was a sourse of very great gratification, and he thought it would be so regarded by the shareholders. (Hear, hear.) They had increased their business between £50,000 and £60,000; and the same vigilance was exercised as heretofore. From that vigilance very great results had been obtained. During the past year it was thought that the claims would reach something like what they were in 1871 and 1872, but tho fact was that they were some £3000 below the amount which they reached in 1872. That was another very agreeable feature in the report, for it showed that they had not been wrong in their calculations which they had made in respect to the mortality that might be looked for. The rate of interest on the total cash assets of the society had increased from £4 3s. 4d. per cent. in 1872 to £4 7s. 2d. per cent. in 1873, giving a clear gain to the society of about £1540 on the interest account alone. This tended to show to the proprietors that the directors had not lost sight of anything which would benefit the society. The tabular account of the society's progress during the last forty years—namely, from 1834 to 1873—was of a very gratifying character indeed. They all knew how the society was first constituted—that there was no proprietary capital; that a number of gentlemen bound themselves together, feeling certain that they could so found the society on mutual principles that they would require no capital whatever. They pledged themselves that in the event of certain losses occurring they should be defrayed pro ratâ, as they stood. If those present examined the statement to which he referred they would see how rapidly the income of the society had increased from £4211 in the first year up to £10,447 in four years. In that he thought they had much to congratulate themselves upon, and with their permission he would now propose the adoption of the report. (Applause)

Mr. Ingall (late of the Imperial) seconded the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

A proprietor proceeded to offer some remarks upon the tabular statement showing the progress of the office since its establishment, and observed that he thought it a very satisfactory state of affairs for any office to show to its members. He, for one, felt grateful to all the directors and officials, past and present, whose watchful care had contributed to the present flourishing position of the society.

Mr. H. M. Dunphy proposed, and Mr. Stafford Northcote seconded, a vote of thanks to the chairman and board of directors for their exertions during the past year.

The motion was carried unanimously, and briefly acknowledged by the chairman.

Mr. Pellatt proposed, and Mr. Gull seconded, a vote of thanks to the actuary, Mr. Thomas Tully, to whom, said the proposer, the society was greatly indebted for his energetic and successful attempts to increase their business. (Applause.)

The motion having been unanimously agreed to,

Mr. Tully, in acknowledging the compliment, expressed the gratification which it afforded him to have so soon obtained a public recognition of his services. He assured the meeting that the resolution just passed would act as an incentive to future exertions; and, without wishing to make any pledges for the future, he thought he might go so far as to say that no efforts would be left untried by him to augment the business and extend the popularity of the society. (Hear, hear.)

The proceedings then terminated.

BRISTOL ARTICLED CLERKS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held in the Law Library on Tuesday evening, the 3rd instant, at seven o'clock, F. Gilmore Barnett, Esq., solicitor, in the chair. The following was the point for discussion:—Do the words "cause of action," in sect. 18 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, mean the whole cause of action or only the breach of contract? (See Durham v. Spence, L. Rep. 6 Ex. 46, 19 W. Rep. 162). Mr. Fenwick opened, and Mr. Bryant opposed. The majority were in favour of the latter view.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at Clement's-inn Hall, on Wednesday, the 25th Feb. Mr. H. H. Crawford, solicitor, in the chair. Mr. Joseph opened the subject for the evening's debate, viz.: "That the principle of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Permissive Bill is worthy of support." The motion was lost by a majority of eight."

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

AT the meeting of Tuesday evening in last week, held at the Law Institution, the question appointed for discussion was No. 532 legal:—On the decease, if a woman entitled by descent to an estate in fee simple, is her husband, having had issue by her, entitled, according to the present law, to an estate for life by the curtesy of England in the whole or any part of her share? Mr. Indermaur presided. There was a large attendance of members, and after a good debate the question was decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

The Law and the Lawyers.

Mr. EDLIN, Q.C., was on Thursday sworn in and took his seat as Assistant-Judge of Middlesex. Mr. POWNALL, after passing a very warm eulogium on Sir W. BODKIN, congratulated the new Judge on his appointment. Mr. BRINDLEY and Mr. W. SLEIGH, on the part of the Bar, expressed their concurrence in the remarks of Mr. POWNALL. They begged also to express their sense of the ability and courtesy with which Mr. Serjt. Cox had so long discharged the duties of the court during the illness of the late Judge. Mr. EDLIN, in response, hoped that the most cordial relations would always subsist between himself and the Bar, and Mr. Serjt. Cox said that it would be affectation in him to conceal a deep sense of disappointment that he had not been permitted to reap the reward of his long public service, but in retiring from that bench it was a satisfaction to learn that he took with him the approval of those who had acted with him. He added, however, that he could most heartily congratulate the county on so efficient a successor having been appointed. He had known Mr. EDLIN for many years on circuit and as a private friend, and he could say that as a lawyer and a gentleman he deserved to be heartily welcomed by the magistrates and by all connected with the court. A better man for the office could not have been found. The new Judge then proceeded with the trial of prisoners.

As a matter of practice in bankruptcy attention may usefully be called to the case of Ex parte Jacobs, re Carter, before the CHIEF JUDGE on Monday last. The Registrar of the Birmingham County Court upheld an objection to the proof of a bank in respect of certain bills of exchange, such bills not being produced at the first meeting of creditors. On appeal to the County Court Judge he ordered the proof to stand admitted, thus reversing the decision of the registrar. The CHIEF JUDGE has confirmed the already established practice, which is that a creditor coming to prove his debt, holding a bill of exchange, ought to produce it. He added that in case of difficulty in producing the securities a discretion may be exercised.

MR. BUSHBY, one of the metropolitan police magistrates, has drawn attention to the fact of an Act of Geo. 1, affecting the relation of master and servant, remaining unrepealed as to one of its sections, such section making a singular provision for the punishment of servants who fraudulently purloin or embezzle their master's property. The section of the Act (9 Geo. 1, c. 27, s. 4) is expressly named in the first schedule of the Master and Servant's Act of 1867, as specifying a contract to which the latter Act shall apply. The Act itself is entituled "An Act for preventing journeymen shoemakers selling, exchanging, or pawning boots, shoes, slippers, cut leather, or other materials for making boots, shoes, or slippers, and for better regulating the said journeymen." And the punishment provided for offences covered by the 4th section includes whipping, which is not a punishment considered in the present day appropriate in the case of felony by adults without violence to the person. The Act was passed in 1740, and was adapted to a condition of things very different to that which now prevails. There is, of course, no objection to the Master and Servant's Act (if it is maintained unmodified) being made applicable to offences by journeymen shoemakers, but the penal provisions of the old Act ought to be removed from the Statute Book.

THE lawyers as a body have suffered considerably by the Tichborne incubus. That the services of three Judges of one court should be lost to the public for a period of seven months—the remaining three extending over the Long Vacation were sacrificed by the Judges from their own leisure—is a great calamity, and it has largely obstructed the dispatch of business. The state of things at Guildhall, which is to some extent owing to a want of Judges, is forcibly illustrated by the figures. The court of Queen's Bench commenced the sittings with a list of 214 causes; of these eighty causes were tried, withdrawn, or struck out. This leaves 134 remanets, 111 of which are special jury cases. The list of remanets of special jury cases left at the end of the previous sittings is not yet cleared off, so that not one of the special jury cases entered for the last sittings has been tried. For four days during last week no second court was sitting. To be defendant in a cause at the bottom of the Queen's Bench list of special juries at Guildhall is to be safe for twelvemonths from the possible inconvenience of an adverse verdict. This, assuredly, is a scandal only second in magnitude to the Tichborne case itself.

THE legal aspects of the Tichborne case might be treated with great elaboration, but when the points arose in the progress of the trial they were noticed by us, and our readers, we apprehend, would not desire to see them redressed. The conclusions which strike us as the most important are few. In the first place, we are inclined to agree with the Times, that the scandal of the great length of the trial, if a scandal at all, was inevitable. That the proceedings might have been abridged, had the interrogation of the defendant been possible, or had the Judges possessed the power to call the Orton family, seems to be generally admitted. This, however, as a reflection upon the case itself, is little to the purpose. As an argument in favour of the reform of our law of evidence it is extremely cogent. One of the greatest lessons furnished by the case has reference to the amendment of our system of trial by jury. It is a subject for wonder that twelve men who had never, probably, met before, should have continued to assemble day by day, with short holidays, for a period of ten months, in a vitiated atmosphere, without any one of them contracting serious illness. It can hardly be doubted that the illness or death of a juryman was among the calculations of the defendant, and he must be considered in this sense, if in no other, very unfortunate. Lord COLERIDGE, in his Juries Bill, provided against so disastrous a termination to a great trial by making the verdict of the remaining jurymen valid and effectual, and no time should be lost, supposing a comprehensive measure dealing with our jury system cannot be passed, in placing such an enactment upon the statute book. Another very important question is whether the huge swindle might not have been exposed had a public prosecutor existed, who could have proceeded against the claimant on his landing in England, for obtaining money under false pretences. The improbabilities which lay on the surface of the case would have justified such a step. The mass of evidence subsequently obtained from sources foreign to the man's own knowledge would have been absent, and the cheat would have been speedily detected. The purely professional aspects of the case we deal with in another column, and we leave the subject of the trial with a feeling of the most intense relief.

MR. NEATE'S gallant effort to free himself from the control of the Inn, of which he became a member thirty-two years ago, is one which will excite the sympathy of many who are similarly placed. The short point in the case is this: Is an Inn of Court entitled to decline to relieve a member from the bond into which he enters on joining the society if he, on his side, declines to sign conditions restricting the practice of his profession as a barrister. Mr. NEATE'S argument was that any such restriction is contrary to public policy and void. The prayer of his bill was that Mr. NEATE might be allowed to withdraw without paying any fine or composition, or signing any conditions restricting his liberty in his Profession. Vice-Chancellor HALL allowed a demurrer to the bill for want of equity. The inevitable answer to all appeals to the courts against the acts of the Inns of Court is that they are "voluntary societies." The government of the societies is in the hands of the Benchers, from whom an appeal lies to the Judges. Rules may be made and bonds inflicted upon members who join, and the courts will grant no relief. It does not appear unreasonable, however, that the Inns should give up their control over barristers who may possibly resume practice. The Inns of Court alone have control over a barrister, and if he ceased to belong to any Inn it might be difficult to deal with him for misconduct. The jurisdiction, however, is in many respects ridiculous and unsatisfactory, and we shall be very glad to see the Bar governed as a public institution instead of as a private club.

IT is always satisfactory to find a defence which is more technical than meritorious got over by a judge. This was the result in the case of Sale v. Lambert, before the MASTER of the ROLLS on the 2nd inst. There was a sale of buildings by auction to the defendant, and in a suit for specific performance of the contract a defence was set up that there was no contract within the Statute of Frauds, because the vendor's name was not inserted in the contract. The printed particular was indorsed with a memorandum, signed by the solicitors of both parties. The purchaser was mentioned but not the vendor, and the question was whether this omission brought the case within the Statute of Frauds. The MASTER of the ROLLS said he did not remember a case in which the vendor's name was inserted in the conditions of sale, and that the real question in such cases is, "Can you find out from the contract who it is who is selling the property?" The vendor's solicitor had undertaken by the memorandum "that the vendor shall, in all respects, fulfil the conditions of sale mentioned in the said particular." Sir GEORGE JESSEL held that "vendor" was as good a description of a man as his Christian name and surname, and that evidence might be admitted to show who was meant by the vendor, as well as to show who was meant by the name of John Smith. This is a decision of great practical importance, but it need not prevent greater strictness being observed so that similar difficulties may be avoided.

THE fire at the Pantechnicon causing a most lamentable loss of property has raised a question of great importance with respect to the liability of the proprietors, Messrs. SMITH and RADERMACHER. There seems to be a disposition on the part of some of the depositors of property to litigate the matter, and whilst considering the general principle of law applicable to the case, we shall avoid remarking on the incidents of it which, to some extent, are considered as raising the question of negligence. The great authorities on the law of bailments, Sir WILLIAM JONES and Lord HOLT, make no mention of the class known to the civilians as locatio custodiæ, or the hiring of care to be bestowed in guarding a thing bailed, and it is doubtful whether it is strictly within what is understood in law as a bailment. In bailments proper the care to be bestowed with reference to the keeping of the property bailed is only an incident of the bailment; but in the hiring of care to be bestowed in guarding a thing deposited, the bailment is a necessary incident of the contract. The question, therefore, between the proprietors of the Pantechnicon and the depositors is one of contract. A. says to B., "In consideration of your taking care of my property, I will pay you so much." B. says to A., "In consideration of your paying me so much, I will take care of your property." There is mutual benefit and a binding contract, and simple negligence causing loss would be a breach of it, for which B. would be liable. But B. is not an insurer, as carriers of goods are, and if he has exercised due care, there is no remedy against him. What is due care is a question for a jury in each case. There can be no suggestion in this instance of a false representation as to the fireproof nature of the building; but we should rather say that the belief of the proprietors in its fireproof construction was a circumstance in their favour in considering the question of negligence. A very recent case in the Queen's Bench would seem to go somewhat beyond our view, and to make the contract one of bailment. In Searle v. Laverick (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 122), the proprietor of some carriages, sought to recover damages against a livery stable keeper for injuries sustained by some carriages by the fall of a shed in which they had been placed by the defendant. In delivering the judgment of the court, Mr. Justice BLACKBURN said, "The question which we have to determine is what was the extent of the obligation of the defendant as to the security of the shed in which he placed the plaintiff's carriages. We think it is beyond question that he did come under some obligation; but it is a different and difficult question what the precise obligation was." In the end the court concluded that it was necessary to show some negligence, and that a competent builder having been employed, the defendant was not liable if by want of care or skill on the part of the builder, the shed fell. A nonsuit directed by Baron POLLOCK at the trial was therefore sustained. Whatever the obligation of such persons as the proprietors of the Pantechnicon therefore may be called in law, the difficulty of fixing them with liability is manifest.

WE find some interesting cases reported in the Irish Law Times of last week on the practice under the Debtors' Act and in bankruptcy, and we will briefly summarise the decisions. In M'Blain v. Weir, in the Queen's Bench, it was sought to obtain an order to arrest a defendant unless he gave security that he would not leave Ireland. It was admitted that the plaintiff could prove his case without the defendant, but it was urged that the action would have to be abandoned if the defendant were allowed to leave, whereas if arrested he would pay the debt. There is a section in the Irish Act analogous to sect. 6 in the English Act, and the words are "that the absence of the defendant will materially prejudice the plaintiff in the prosecution of his action." It has been held by our Court of Exchequer that the section is not intended to give imprisonment as a means of enforcing payment of a debt, the defendant in Hume v. Druyff (L. Rep. 8 Ex. 214; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64) being ordered to be discharged from custody after final judgment obtained in the action. The motion in M'Blain v. Weir was evidently made under a misapprehension as to the effect of the abolition of imprisonment for debt. The body of a debtor can only be detained so long as it is necessary to enable a creditor to obtain judgment giving him power to attach the debtor's goods or to compel payment where there is ability to pay. In a case of O'Donnell v. Smith in the Consolidated Chamber, application against a debtor for payment was made in court. By the Act, a "Judge sitting in chambers" is given the power to commit for non-payment. The motion was refused, it being held that it should be made to a Judge in camerâ. We should have thought the point barely arguable. In the matter of a disputed adjudication a question arose in the Court of Bankruptcy whether rent accruing due and payable after the passing of the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act 1872, by a lessee or assignee of a lease, executed or assigned before the passing of the Act, was a good petitioning creditor's debt. Mr. Justice HARRISON delivered an elaborate judgment, and said that his first view was that as there was no debt until the respective gales of rent in question fell due, which they admittedly did after the passing of the Act of 1872, it must be considered that the debt was then contracted, and was a good debt to support an adjudication against a non-trader. Further consideration, however, convinced him that this view was not correct, the authority which he mainly relied upon in coming to an opposite conclusion being the case of Ex parte Harding, re Williams (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 117; 33 L. J. Bank. 22.) In that case it was held by Lord WESTBURY that a call ordered to be made after the passing of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, on the winding-up of a joint stock company, whose deed of settlement bore date the 15th March 1847, was a debt contracted after the passing of the Act of 1861, on which the official manager could present a petition in bankruptcy on which a valid adjudication could be made against the party making default in payment of such calls. That case was affirmed in the House of Lords. Our present Act differs from the Act of 1861, so as to make the discussion of the Irish Court unimportant in this country.

THE LICENSE AND THE PUNISHMENT OF COUNSEL.

THE interest which the public take in legal proceedings and all that concerns the legal Profession, renders the position of counsel one of high importance and great responsibility. The growth of this interest has been fostered by the extraordinary incidents of the great trial which has just come to a conclusion, and there is every probability that under an improved judicial system the courts will become even more than they have been hitherto, the arena in which many of the battles of public and private life will be fought out. Under these circumstances, it is of the last importance not only that the advocates admitted to practise before the Judges should be well educated, and well trained, but that they should be keenly alive to the peculiarities of their position, their influence for good or evil upon a mixed society, and the importance of the trust reposed in them by their clients, and by the Inns of Court to which they belong.

Of all the painful and humiliating incidents connected with the trial of the claimant to the TICHBORNE baronetcy, the most painful and the most humiliating, so far as the legal Profession is concerned, and more especially the Bar, is the ill-judged and most unfortunate line of conduct pursued by Dr. KENEALY. But in order to understand the accumulated follies which in the aggregate constituted an offence which aroused the indignation and anger of three of the most amiable Judges on the Bench, disgusted a singularly indulgent jury, and shocked the educated public, it is necessary to consider the probable influences of circumstances upon the mind of the offender. Dr. KENEALY, although widely read and liberally educated, is undoubtedly a man of extremely small mind and narrow and contracted views. The class of cases in which he had been mainly engaged was precisely suited to his peculiar temperament, and his conduct of the Overend and Gurney prosecution showed how easy it is for a doubtful case to be made utterly hopeless by ill-judged advocacy. But with all his narrowness and littleness of mind Dr. KENEALY was ambitious, and it is now perfectly plain that when he found himself leading a defence in a stupendous cause, which he more than once boasted was a State trial unparalleled since the trial of Charles I., the little discretion which he possessed disappeared before the overwhelming sense of his own importance. To him it was a great misfortune that he should have been selected to lead such a defence; and whilst we have no desire to shield him from any of the consequences of his misconduct, we think that the nature of the delinquent, and the extraordinary circumstances by which he was surrounded, should be attentively considered before his censure by the Bench and the jury is accepted as a conclusive reason why he should no longer be allowed to practise his profession.

We do not propose to go into the merits of the indictment which must be preferred against the learned gentleman; but it is necessary that we should consider how far forensic excesses are to be justified by circumstances or palliated by a mistaken sense of duty. The first point raised is, what is to be the standard of decorum, and upon what evidence is counsel to be condemned? We can see many reasons why the denunciation of a presiding Judge should not be accepted even as evidence against counsel. There may be cases in which it becomes the positive duty of an advocate to resist the control of a Judge, and even to retort upon the Bench. Under such circumstances the Judge becomes pro hac vice the opponent of the advocate, and when the Judge is summing up, no reply upon him being possible, it is only natural that he should make his assailant feel the full weight of his hand. True it is that in the celebrated cause now ended we have three Judges and a jury all concurring in one view, which renders it the more difficult to select any outside standard by which to judge counsel. But as a rule we are disposed to think that an outside standard is the only fair test which can be adopted. The voice of the Profession and of the public ought to determine whether the extreme penalty, if any, is to be inflicted.

In the present instance the public press has, with singular unanimity, called upon the Benchers of the Inns, of which Dr. KENEALY is a member, to consider the course which their duty to the public dictates. We admit that an immediate investigation is inevitable; but, dealing as we are with the subject generally, we must regret that the tribunal before which an offending barrister is arraigned to take his trial for dear professional life, is composed of non-representative men. The Benchers of Gray's Inn are gentlemen who have recently shown a disposition to elevate and improve the position of their society, but they are not the most eminent members of the Profession, and we cannot consider that they will constitute a satisfactory tribunal before which the fate of a Queen's counsel charged with grave breaches of decorum and decency should be decided. It is obviously absurd that the governing body of an almost extinct Inn of Court should adjudicate upon a matter in which the entire Profession and the public are so largely interested. The governing bodies of the Inns of Court are not representative, being self-elected, and any one body even if it represented the members of its own society, could not be taken as representing all the members of the other three Inns. There is no other tribunal, however, which can take cognizance of the alleged offences.

The next subject for consideration is the nature of the penalty which should be attached to breaches of professional propriety. Clearly this must depend altogether upon the nature of the offence. We are not, however, without precedents, one being recently furnished by a leading inn of court, the Inner Temple. Mr. EDWIN JAMES was disbarred for sins against his profession rather than against public morality. Driven by overwhelming necessity he sacrificed his independence by accepting pecuniary aid from an opponent. This and other questionable monetary transactions caused him to be expelled from a society which his brilliant eloquence had adorned, and the decree was found to be irrevocable after years of exile and contrition. Dr. KENEALY, on the other hand, is charged with the most reckless violation of all the rules which should govern the conduct of counsel in the cross-examination of witnesses and in making comments upon their evidence, whilst it is said that the Government of the country, the impartiality of the Judges, the living and the dead who were connected with the case for the prosecution, were reviled in the bitterest and coarsest terms. These are not only offences against the Profession—that they do indeed bring dishonour and discredit upon the Bar is admitted on all hands—but they are offences against public morality, and calculated to impede the course of justice. If proved to the satisfaction of the judges to whom Dr. KENEALY is bound to answer, and if they cannot be excused on the ground of the exigencies of the case, the extreme punishment would seem to be inevitable. It is impossible to contrast such a case with the precedents to which we have alluded without feeling that we have reached the lowest depth which the Profession has experienced, at any rate within the memory of the living.

We would gladly find some excuse for Dr. KENEALY in the extraordinary circumstances which surrounded him, and the enormous and bewildering labour which was imposed upon him. He spoke the truth when he said that he had to contend with difficulties in defending his client which no counsel had ever encountered before. Virtually single handed he had to contend with an array of skill and talent of no mean order—as high indeed as the English Bar could furnish; whilst the keen intellect of the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE allowed scarcely a single fallacy advanced by him to pass without dragging it into light and almost compelling the counsel who supported it to make blind and mad efforts to produce impossible explanations, and to reconcile the irreconcileable. These, undoubtedly, are matters to be considered, and grave as the position is in which Dr. KENEALY has placed himself, he is as yet uncondemned by the constituted authority, and his case should be approached—as we are certain it will be approached—with scrupulous impartiality and freedom from prejudice, with a full sense of the importance of the issue, not to Dr. KENEALY only, nor indeed to the Profession, but to law and order and the administration of justice.

THE LIABILITY OF AN EXECUTION CREDITOR TO REFUND.

A CREDITOR before resolving to sue out execution against the goods of a trader debtor for a sum exceeding 50*l*., should read, mark, and inwardly digest the decision arrived at by Lord Justice Mellish, on the 20th ult., in Ex parte Villars, re Rogers. In that case a creditor whose debt exceeded 50*l*., purchased of the sheriff the goods seized in execution, and the sheriff, after retaining the purchaser's cheque for fourteen days in compliance with the 87th section of the Act of 1869, returned the cheque to the creditor at the end of that period. Within six months after the sale, a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor was presented, on which he was declared bankrupt. The registrar considering that the 5th sub-section of sect. 6 of the Act rendered the seizure and sale so followed by adjudication, an act of bankruptcy, ordered the creditor to give up the goods to the trustee. Lord Justice Mellish held that the creditor was entitled to the goods by virtue of his purchase, but that he must refund the purchase money. This is a startling result. We do not say that on the true and fair method of construing the Act of 1869, the result is not a logical consequence of the language used. We do, however, say, that it is impossible to read carefully the 87th section without feeling that it could never have been the intention of the Legislature that a creditor fairly and honestly pursuing his legal remedies, was to have his common law rights under an execution interfered with to any greater extent than was expressly provided for by the section; viz., that the sheriff should refrain from paying over the proceeds of the sale for fourteen days, in order that an opportunity might be afforded for the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy. If it had been intended that the right of the creditor should not be absolute at the end of the fourteen days, or at all events as soon as the money was paid over by the sheriff, it is most difficult to understand why such a period, instead of the period of six months mentioned in sect. 6, should have been arbitrarily fixed; and if such were not the intention, nothing could have been easier than to have provided that, notwithstanding payment to the creditor, his right should not be absolute, but on the contrary, should be defeated, if an adjudication should take place within twelve months, founded on a petition presented within six months from the time of the sale. If for six months the creditor was intended to remain in a state of doubt and uncertainty whether in consequence of the possibility of a petition for adjudication being subsequently presented against his debtor he might not have to refund, some clear intimation of the design of the Legislature should have been furnished, in order that the creditor instead of dealing with the money recovered as his own, might as a prudent man, place it to a suspense account. We observe that the Lord Justice attached considerable weight to the argument that it would be anomalous to allow validity to the sale, the fons et origo mali, which is declared by the statute to be an act of bankruptcy, and which defeats by relation all subsequent transactions between the bankrupt and persons affected with notice; and also to the argument that whereas sect. 73 of the repealed statute of 1861 expressly affirmed the rights of the execution creditor, the Act of 1869 is silent on the point. We by no means wish to underrate the force of these arguments, though we are far from satisfied that they are sufficient to outweigh other opposing considerations. However the judicial result may be arrived at, we confess that it does appear to us monstrous that a judgment creditor, whose common law rights have been expressly suspended for fourteen days by the 87th section, should, after experiencing probably much trouble and delay in recovering what he very naturally must look upon as his own money, be exposed to the action of a piece of legal mechanism in the nature of a trap, by which after the interval of many months he is to be called upon and compelled to refund it. We regret that a question of this magnitude and difficulty should be decided on appeal by a single Judge—however eminent.

To complete the assignment of a chose in action, or of any equitable interest (which by the way may be effectually done by letter, Lambe v. Orton, 29 L. J. Rep. N. S. 319, Eq.), notice to the debtor, trustee, or other person owing or holding the money, fund or other property which, or an interest in which, has been assigned, is absolutely necessary. If a debt be assigned and no notice be given to the debtor, the original creditor can give the debtor an effectual release: (Stocks v Dobson, 22 L. J. Rep. N. S. 884, Eq.) If an interest in property held by trustees be dealt with, and no notice be given to the trustees, they would be justified in transferring the property to the original cestui que trust for whom they held it, and, having done so, there is no remedy against them to bring back the property: (Donaldson v. Donaldson, 23 L. J. Rep. N. S. 788, Eq.) After an assignment of a debt, and notice thereof to the debtor, he can effectually plead the assignment and notice in an action against him by the original creditor: (Jeffs v. Day, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 372.) The effect of notice to the trustee is to convert him into a trustee for the assignee: (Dearle v. Hall, 2 L. J. Rep. 62, Ch.)

The assignee who, without notice of any assignment prior to that in his favour, first gives notice to the trustee, will have priority of title, and the fact that he has or has not made inquiries of the trustee is quite immaterial: (Loveridge v. Cooper, 2 L. J. Rep. 75, Eq.)

Notice to the solicitor to the trustee is sufficient, but the solicitor must be acting for the trustee at the time and in relation to the property in question (Rickards v. Gledstanes, 31 L. J. Rep. N. S. 142, Eq.) Where there are several trustees notice to one is sufficient if he survive (Smith v. Masterman, 3 L. J. Rep. N. S. 42, Ex.), even if that one be the vendor or mortgagor (Willes v. Greenhill, 31 L. J. Rep. N. S. 1, Eq.), but if the trustee to whom notice is given die without informing his co-trustees of the receipt of the notice, a second incumbrancer, who subsequently gives notice to the remaining trustees, would seem to be entitled to priority: (Meux v. Bell, Hare 73.) And where there are several executors notice of the assignment of a legacy or an interest in the residuary personalty should be given to all, or it would seem that the executors to whom notice has not been given may pay the legacy or interest to the original legatee, and, consequently, a second assignee would gain priority by giving notice to all the executors: (Timson v. Ramsbottom, 2 Keen, 35.)

Where there are two sets of trustees, as, for instance, where a reversionary interest in stock standing in the names of trustees becomes the subject of a settlement, upon any dealing with interests created by the last-mentioned settlement, notice must be given to the trustees in whose names the stock is standing, and an assignment of which notice is so given will prevail over a prior assignment of which notice has previously been given to the other set of trustees: (Bridge v. Beadon, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 665.) In Holt v. Dewell (15 L. J. Rep. N. S. 15, Eq.), where a person entitled to a reversionary interest bequeathed such interest, and the legatee twice assigned his interest, it was held that until the executor had assented to the legacy notice to him would prevail over notice to the trustees holding the fund. And it would seem that so long as the second set of trustees have not actually received the fund, the title of an assignee of an interest in it, who had given them notice of his assignment, would not be preferred to that of a prior assignee who had neglected to give such notice (Buller v. Plunkett, 30, L. J. Rep. N. S. 641, Eq.; Somerset v. Cox, 33 L. J. Rep. N. S. 491, Eq.), but it is not prudent for an assignee to neglect to give notice to both sets of trustees.

No notice is necessary of dealings with equitable estates in realty, or money charged upon land without the intervention of trustees, as, for instance, where a testator bequeathed leaseholds charged with an annuity, it was held unnecessary for an assignee of the annuity to give notice to the trustees (Wiltshire v. Rabbitts, 13 L. J. Rep. N. S. 284, Eq.), but notice is necessary to complete the assignment of the proceeds to arise by the sale of real and personal estates given to trustees for sale (The Consolidated Investment and Insurance Company v. Riley, 29 L. J. Rep. N. S. 123, Eq.), the rule being that if the interest of the assignor be an interest in land no notice is necessary, but that notice is necessary where the interest of the assignor is confined to money to be raised on or by the sale of land: (Re Hughes, 33 L. J. Rep. N. S. 725, Eq.)

Where a creditor of a bankrupt assigns his debt, notice to the trustee in bankruptcy is sufficient, and where the debt is that of a company in course of liquidation, notice must be given to the official liquidator: (Re Breech-loading Armoury Company, Wragge's case, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 285.)

When a fund is standing in the name of the Paymaster-General of the Court of Chancery, it is useless to give the Paymaster-General notice of assignments of interests therein (Warburton v. Hill, 23 L. J. Rep. N. S. 633, Eq.), but priority can be gained only by the assignee obtaining a stop order, and lodging it in the Paymaster's office. Where money is paid into court by a trustee, it is not necessary for an assignee, who, previously to such payment in, has given notice to the trustee, to obtain a stop order, for a stop order would not prevail over the notice if the trustees then had the money in their hands: (Bearcliffe v. Dorrington, 19 L. J. Rep. N. S. 331, Eq.) If part of a testator's estate consists of a fund in court, notice to the executors of an assignment of an interest in the estate is sufficient without a stop order: (Thompson v. Tomkins, 31 L. J. Rep. N. S. 633.)

In Macleod v. Buchanan (33 L. J. Rep. N. S. 149, 306), it was held that a general stop order will be confined to the particular incumbrance in respect of which it was obtained, so that in case of a further charge a second stop order is necessary, and in the same case it was decided that the name of the assignor should appear in the stop order. An incumbrancer who has gained priority by placing a stop order on the fund will, without a further order, retain his priority, notwithstanding the carrying over of the fund to a new account, entitled the account of the assignor and his incumbrancers: (Lister v. Tidd, 4 L. Rep. 462, Eq.)

Previously to the passing of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, a chose in action or other equitable interest which had been assigned, but of the assignment of which no notice had been given to the debtor or trustee, was considered as being in the order and disposition of the assignor, whether the original owner or his assignee, and so liable to be sold for the benefit of his creditors in case of his insolvency or bankruptcy. It was decided in the case of Stuart v. Cockerell (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 607), that a mortgagee, prior to the bankruptcy, who had neglected to place a stop order upon the fund in court retained his priority over the assignee in bankruptcy by obtaining a stop order which the assignee did not do. As we have before stated, we do not concur in the decision, and we believe the law to be as follows: If an assignee neglected to give notice the title of the subsequent assignee in insolvency or bankruptcy would prevail, notwithstanding the prior assignee subsequently gave notice and the latter assignee altogether neglected to do so. If, however, the assignee in insolvency or bankruptcy by neglecting to give notice enabled the bankrupt to assign to another person, who had no knowledge of the insolvency or bankruptcy, and who duly gave notice, the title of the assignee lastly referred to would prevail: (Re Barr's Trusts, 27 L. J. Rep. N. S. 548, Eq.; Re Brown's Trusts, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 88.) As between an assignee in insolvency and a subsequent assignee in insolvency or bankruptcy, where the first-named assignee had not given notice to the trustees, the question to be settled would be whether the first assignee was aware of the existence of the interest, and, if not, his title would be preferred, because, although the interest was left in the order and disposition of the insolvent or bankrupt, it could not be said that it was with the consent of the true owner thereof: (Re Rawbone's will, 26 L. J. Rep. N. S. 588, Eq..)

Notice to the debtor or trustee should be distinct, and, for the convenience of proof, should be in writing, but such is not absolutely necessary. In Lloyd v. Banks (L. Rep. 3 Ch. App., at p. 490), Lord Cairns declined to lay down any rule as to what would be a sufficient notice to a trustee, but he considered that all that was necessary was in some way to bring to the mind of the trustee an intelligent apprehension of the nature of the incumbrance which has come upon the property, upon which a reasonable man, or an ordinary man of business, would regulate his conduct in the execution of the trust. If the notice be not general, that is if a mortgage of a reversion to secure a certain principal sum and interest, contains a charge in respect of premiums on a policy of assurance, and in the notice the deed is referred to as securing the principal and interest only, a subsequent assignee will have priority over the charge for the premiums: (Re Bright's Trusts, 25 L. J. Rep. N. S. 449, Eq.)

A trustee who, after receiving notice of a charge, deals with the trust funds as if no charge had taken place, will be liable to refund to the person having the charge, and the fact of the assignee disputing the charge will of course make no difference (Hodgson v. Hodgson, 7 L. J. Rep. N. S. 5, Eq.); but a trustee who, without notice of a charge, which by reason of proper notice having been given to former trustees was complete, deals with the trust funds as if no charge had been made, will not be liable to refund: (Phipps v. Lovegrove, Prosser v. Phipps, 16 L. J. Rep. N. S. 80, Eq.) The result of the last decision will be to occasion periodical inquiries by the assignee, and the giving to the new trustees when they are appointed copies of the original notice.

From what we have above said it will be apparent that an intending purchaser or mortgagee of an equitable interest must inquire not only of all the trustees of the fund, but also of any retired trustee, and of the personal representatives of any deceased trustee, whether notice of a charge has been given to any of such trustees. When the fund is in court a certificate of the fund should be obtained from the Paymaster-General's office, which will show what, if any, stop orders affect the fund; and, in addition, when the fund has been paid in by a trustee, inquiries should be made of him and all other trustees, as above stated: when the fund has been paid in under the Trustees Relief Acts, the affidavit upon which the payment took place should be referred to, and should show of what notices the trustee was aware.

Solicitors neglecting to make proper inquiries are liable as for negligence, and so they are if they neglect to give notice to the trustees: (Dearle v. Hall 2 L. J. Rep. N. S. 62, Ch.)

A trustee is bound to give information to a purchaser or mortgagee, he being for that purpose the agent of the vendor or mortgagor; and a trustee who, even inadvertently, gives wrong information or does not mention the fact that he has received notice of a previous dealing with the property, will be liable to recoup the purchaser or mortgagee any loss he may incur: (Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 470.)

In the case of a resale or transfer of mortgage of an equitable interest, it is unnecessary, except where the original vendor or purchaser has become bankrupt or insolvent, for the original purchaser or mortgagee to show that notice had been given, because if no subsequent purchaser or mortgagee had given notice, the point is immaterial, but full means must be afforded to the subpurchaser or transferee of inquiry whether notice has or has not been given, and therefore it is necessary to show who from time to time have been the persons representing the character of trustees: (Hobson v. Bell, 8 L. J. Rep. N. S. 241, Eq.)

As notices of assignments of policies of assurance are the subject of a special Act of Parliament we have not referred to them here, but shall do so hereafter.

THE LAW OF ALLUVION IN ENGLAND AND IN INDIA.

By LAWRENCE BIALE, Barrister-at-Law.

HAVING now considered the principles of law which govern the subject of alluvion, and also such as govern the acquisition of land by avulsion, it becomes necessary to consider the cases which have been decided in India, and in the Privy Council, both prior to, and since, the passing of the Act of 1825. One of the first cases of alluvion decided in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut was that of Isurchund Rai and others v. Ramchund Mothurja (1 S. D. A. 221). The case was heard on 11th Dec. 1807. The court held, that the whole of the lands claimed as having been gradually annexed by alluvion to the respondent's talook of Hilalpoor were his property. The deserted bed of a public river, which ran between the two properties of Hilalpoor and Maholah (the proprietors of the latter being the appellants), was declared divisible between the appellants and respondents, each party to be entitled to that part of it contiguous to his own estate, in compensation for loss sustained by them from the excavation of a new channel. It would seem from this case that the doctrine of English law which considers the State as the sole proprietor of navigable rivers, and necessarily of land, when deserted by such rivers, does not apply to cases where there has been an artificial divergence of the channel by State agency. After the famine now pending in Bengal, in consequence of the extension of the Soane canal, cases of a similar kind are likely to arise. The case of Rajah Griesohund v. Maharajah Tezchund (1 S. D. A. 274), decided on the 8th May 1809, was a suit for alluvion land which had accumulated on the estate of the respondent by the gradual recession of a river that formed the boundary between the estates of the appellant and the respondent, and was afterwards severed from the respondent's estate, and left united to that of the appellant, by the sudden return of the river to its former course. The Sudder Dewanny Adawlut disallowed the claim of plaintiff, i. e., the respondent. It is material to note in this case that the land adjudged to appellant was alluvial land, formed by prior encroachments of the river on respondent's estate, afterwards joined by gradual accession to the estate of respondent, and subsequently re-annexed to that of appellant by the sudden return of the river to its former channel. Had the river, by a sudden change of its course, intersected the old land of respondent's zemindary, leaving each bank still capable of being identified as the estate of respondent, the general law of alluvion, in India as well as in Europe, would not have entitled appellant to the land situate between the new and old channel of the river; and the local usage admitted by the parties with respect to Shekust Pywust (literally, broken and joined) or alluvial land, viz., that the river flowing between the two estates should form their mutual boundary, could not have been available to appellant as constituting a title to land not gained by alluvion. It may be added that the general rule of law is that just as what is gained by gradual accession is the property of him to whose estate the recess of the river or sea has annexed it, so what is lost by the gradual encroachment of the river or sea is a loss without reparation to the owner whose estate is thus destroyed. In the next case that of Radhmohun Rai and others v. Soorujnarain Banojiah (1 S. D. A. 319), decided on 29th April 1811, the plaintiffs and defendant, were zemindars of two estates separated by a river; and the river for many years encroaching in a semi-circular form on the estate of the defendant, washed away lands from the estate of defendant, and annexed them to the estate of plaintiffs, thereby forming the chur or alluvion in question. The court held that on the established principle that land thus gained by the gradual retirement of a river, under the general rules of alluvion, is the lawful accession of the estate to which it is so annexed, the plaintiffs were entitled to the chur in question. The next decision was that of Koonwur Hurree Nath Rai v. Mussumut Jyedoorga Burwain (2 S. D. A. 269), heard on 9th Sept. 1818. The suit was a claim to some alluvial land, the river Burrumpooter flowing on each side of the land claimed. Held, that the most equitable decision would be, to give to the parties respectively the land adjoining to their respective estates. In cases of contested alluvial land the grand channel of a river is considered to constitute the division between the estates; but in this case the evidence was contradictory on this point, each party declaring that the branch which flowed under his boundary was fordable, while the other branch was broad and deep. In Zieboo Nisa v. Persun Rai (3 S. D A. 316), heard 1st March 1824, the claim being to certain lands alleged to have been washed away by the stream from the plaintiff's estate, the judgment was given in favour of the defendants, to whose estate they had become gradually annexed. In the case of Ramkisen Rai v. Gopee Mohun Baboo (3 S. D. A. 340), the Senior Judge of Provincial Court of Dacca, held that inasmuch as the lands in dispute were surrounded by the plaintiff's zemindaree, they belonged to him conformably to established usage in such cases, and accordingly ordered that he should be put in possession, and he ordered the Aumeen to make an estimate of the profits of the above lands from the existing documents, and to deduct a reasonable sum for the payment of the expenses which had been incurred; the defendants being declared liable for any excess above such reasonable expenditure. The S. D. A. on appeal on the 26th April 1824, affirmed this decision. The principle of this decree has since been recognised in a formal enactment. Regulation XI. of 1825, sect. 4, cl. 1, provides that land gained by gradual accession from the recess of a river or the sea is to be considered an increment to the tenure of the person to whose estate it may be annexed. One of the first cases since this Regulation was that of Mussumat Imam Bandi v. Hurgoovind Ghose (4 M. I. A. 403). Lands having been submerged, by a change of the course of the river Ganges, after several years, reappeared, each party claiming the lands to be part of his mouza; the Sudder Court held the plaintiff's claim to be barred, first, by the Bengal Regulations of Limitation, from lapse of time; and, secondly, that the lands were alluvial and attached to the mouza of the defendant. Such decree, upon appeal, reversed, the Judicial Committee holding, first, that the question of limitation not having been put in issue by the pleadings, could not be allowed to operate upon the case; and, secondly, that the court had mistaken the question, in supposing it one of alluvion, the point at issue being one of boundary only, and the question being, to whom did this land belong before the inundation; whoever was the owner then, remained the owner while it was covered with water, and after it became dry, and that the plaintiff had made out his title as such owner to possession. This case was decided by the Privy Council on 7th July 1848, but the litigation had commenced in India in 1830. The case of Sree Eckowrie Sing v. Heeraloll Seal (12 M. I. A. 136), was a case of a claim to land washed away and reformed in the bed of a navigable river, the ownership of the soil of which is not commonly in the riparian proprietors of its banks, and which was not proved in the case to have belonged to the predecessor in title of either disputant. Lord Chelmsford in the judgment says, "the reforming of land in such a stream, after a considerable interval and frequent floods, is not primâ facie to be ascribed to a loss from any particular portion of territory, nor is the land which has been removed by a sudden avulsion reclaimable unless the circumstances supply evidence of identity, which is wanting in the case before us." Again: "The title by accretion to a new formation generally, is not founded on equity of compensation, but on a gradual accretion by adherence to some particular land. The land gained will then follow the title to that parcel to which it adheres." And "a detached chur, independent of usage, in such a stream would belong to neither riparian proprietor, and the circumstance that it was subtended by the land of one would not be enough to entitle him to it." The Privy Council therefore disallowed the claim of the plaintiffs as being not sufficiently proved, and dismissed the appeal on the 14th Dec. 1868. In the case of Rajah Burdacant Roy v. Baboo Chunder Coomar Roy (12 M. I. A. 145), decided in December of the same year, their Lordships considering that the original title to the land in dispute was in the appellant's ancestors, were of opinion that they had never lost it, either by the perpetual settlement or by the revenue sale; and even if it were proved that some part of the said land had passed to the respondent at the time of the sale, they held that the land which had since been recovered from the Bheel (marsh) (and great part of the land in question was admitted to have been so reclaimed since the date of the sale) had not so passed, as their Lordships were clearly of opinion that the whole site of the Bheel was and remained under the dominion of the appellant. This is a remarkable point for the consideration of Indian lawyers, that the right of occupancy is considered to be paramount to all grants by Government or other parties, and that the settlements by zemindaries under the Permanent Settlement of Lord Cornwallis are to be strictly construed as to the quantity and area that passed under those settlements. It was held also in this case, that in a case of disputed boundaries, where one of the claimants is in possession by virtue of a magistrate's order under Act IV. of 1840, it lies on the party seeking to oust him to show a better title to the land claimed than that of the party in possession. In Lopez v. Muddun Mohun Thakoor (13 M. I. A. 467), heard on the 11th July 1870, the facts were, that the land in dispute forming part of a mouzah or estate on the banks of the Ganges, by reason of continual encroachments of that river, became submerged, the surface soil being wholly washed away. After recession and re-encroachment by the river, the waters ultimately subsided and left the land reformed on its original site. Held, following Mussumat Imam Bondi v. Hurgovind Ghose (see above), that the land washed away and afterwards reformed on the old ascertained site, was not land gained by increment within the meaning of sect. 4 of Reg. XI. of 1825, but was the old land identified. In March 1872 one of the last cases on the subject decided by the Privy Council was that of Sham Chand Bysack v. Kishen Prosaud Surma (14 M. I. A. 595). Two riparian proprietors of land on opposite sides of a river, respectively claimed churs which had been diluviated, i.e., covered by water, for a great many years, and afterwards re-formed by a change of the course of the river, as belonging to their respective estates. After a police inquiry, the magistrate, in 1836, put A. in possession. B., the other riparian proprietor, took no steps till the year 1847, to obtain possession of the churs. Held (1), that the long delay in bringing a suit raised a presumption against B.'s title; and (2), that he had failed to identify the churs as having been formerly part of his lands, or as an accretion thereto. In conclusion, it may be well to remind the Indian lawyers, as a matter of practical importance, that Hodges' maps of the Sunderbund and Backergunge districts, Reynolds' maps of the north-eastern districts of Bengal, and the recent Survey maps issued by the Survey department of India, are of great usefulness in the litigation of these cases for purposes of identification of churs and whether they are accretions or otherwise.

PATENT LAW.

HUDDART v. GRIMSHAW. N. P. 1803.—Action for the infringement of a patent for a new mode of making cables and other cordage. Evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff by an engineer, who was familiar with the subject of rope-making, that some rope, proved to be of the defendant's manufacture, agreed in its structure and in all its qualities with the rope made by the plaintiff's patented method. The witness knew of no other method of manufacturing such rope, which he believed to have been made in accordance with the plaintiff's patent. Held, that this was primâ facie evidence, till the contrary is shown, of an infringement of the plaintiff's patent. (Dav. P. C. 288; 1 Web. P. C. 91.)

Hill v. Thompson. 1818.—Dallas, J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, said: "A slight departure from the specification for the purpose of evasion only, would, of course, be a fraud upon the patent; and, therefore, the question will be, whether the mode of working by the defendant has, or has not, been essentially or substantially different." (1 Web. P. C. 242; 8 Taunt. 391; 2 B. Moore 448.)

Forsyth v. Riviere. N. P. 1819.—Action for the infringement of a patent for the application of detonating powder to the discharge of fire-arms. Drawings were annexed to the specification "exhibiting several constructions (of locks) which may be made and adopted, in conformity to the foregoing plan and principles, out of an endless variety which the subject admits of." The defendant applied the principle of the invention by using a lock of a different construction to any shown in the annexed drawings. Verdict for the plaintiff. (1 Web. P. C. 97; 1 Carp. P. C. 401.)

Hall v. Boot. N. P. 1822.—The sale of an article which might, during its manufacture, have been improved according to a patent process, coupled with the fact of the defendant having the machine necessary for practising such process in his possession, is sufficient evidence of infringement. (1 Web. P. C. 100.)

Jones v. Pearce. N. P. 1832.—Action for the infringement of a patent for an improved method of making carriage wheels on the principle of suspension. A wheel upon the same principle, but of different construction, had been made by Mr. Strutt prior to the date of the patent. Patteson, J., in summing up the case to the jury, said: "The defendant has constructed a wheel whose construction is on the suspension principle. That alone would not make it an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, because the suspension principle might be applied in various ways; but if you think it is applied in the same way as according to the plaintiff's patent it is applied, then the want of two or three circumstances in the defendant's wheel, which are contained in the plaintiff's specification, would not prevent the plaintiff's recovering in this action for an infringement of his patent. It would be quite a different thing if it was shown that the defendant had his communication long before with Mr. Strutt, and had taken up Mr. Strutt's invention in Derbyshire, and had constructed something like Mr. Strutt's without any knowledge of the plaintiff's patent, and had actually borrowed it from Mr. Strutt's, which was good for nothing; it would be the hardest possible thing to say that this was an infringement of the plaintiff's patent. . . . The terms of the patent are, 'without leave or licence, make,' &c. Now if he did actually make these wheels, his making them would be a sufficient infringement of the patent, unless he merely made them for his own amusement, or as a model." (1 Web. P. C. 122.)

Russell v. Cowley. N. P. 1834.—The specification having described the invention to consist in welding iron in the manufacture of tubes by circular pressure through dies or holes, the welding produced by passing the iron through grooved rollers, though not so perfect, is an infringement. (1 Web. P. C. 462.)

Minter v. Wells. N. P. 1834.—The invention claimed being the application of the self-adjusting leverage to the back and seat of a chair, any combination of that to the same subject is an infringement. (1 Web. P. C. 130.)

Minter v. Williams. 1835.—Exposing an article manufactured by a patent process for sale is not an infringement of the letters patent. (1 Web. P. C. 135; 5 Nev. & M. 647; 4 Ad. & El. 251.)

Morgan v. Seaward. N. P. 1836.—Alderson, B., in summing up the case to the jury, said: "Upon that subject (infringement) the question would be simply, whether the defendant's machine was only colourably different, that is, whether it differed merely in the substitution of what are called mechanical equivalents for the contrivances which are resorted to by the patentee. . . . You are to look to the substance and not to the mere form, and if it is in substance an infringement, you ought to find that it is so. If in principle it is not the same, but really different, then the defendants cannot be said to have infringed the patent." (1 Web. P. C. 171.)

Jupp v. Pratt. 1837.—Alderson, B.—"You may take out a patent for a principle coupled with the mode of carrying the principle into effect, provided you have not only discovered the principle, but invented some mode of carrying it into effect. But then you must start with having invented some mode of carrying the principle into effect; if you have done that, then you are entitled to protect yourself from all other modes of carrying the same principle into effect, that being treated by the jury as piracy of your original invention." (1 Web. P. C. 146.)

Gillet v. Wilbey. N. P. 1839. Coltman, J., in summing up the case to the jury, said: "The plaintiffs must make out to your satisfaction that the whole of the improvements were new, and that some of them have been pirated. It is not necessary that they should all have been used, but they must be shown to be all new, and if they are all new, and the defendant has infringed any of them, it will be sufficient to support the action, and it is not necessary that he should have infringed them all. (9 Car. & P. 334; 1 Web. P. C. 271.)

Gibson v. Brand. N. P. 1841. Action for the infringement of a patent. The declaration, after the usual averments, assigned as a breach, "that the defendant directly or indirectly made, used, and put in practice the said invention." Tindal, C. J., said to the jury, "If they (the defendants) have themselves sold an article of exactly the same fabric, made in the same manner as that for which the patent was taken out, such sale may be considered as a using of the invention within the terms of the declaration." (1 Web. P. C. 630.)

Walton v. Potter. N. P. 1841.—The question of infringement is one of fact for the jury. A specious variation in form, or ingenious alteration in the mode of adaptation, is an infringement of a patent. Tindal, C.J., in summing up the case to the jury, said: "Where a party has obtained a patent for a new invention, or a discovery he has made by his own ingenuity, it is not in the power of any other person, simply by varying in form or in immaterial circumstances the nature or subject matter of that discovery, to obtain either a patent for it himself or to use it without the leave of the patentee, because that would be in effect and in substance an invasion of the right; and therefore, what you have to look at upon the present occasion is, not simply whether in form or in circumstances, that may be more or less immaterial, that which has been done by the defendants varies from the specification of the plaintiff's patent, but to see whether in reality, in substance, and in effect the defendants have availed themselves of the plaintiff's invention in order to make that fabric, or to make that article which they have sold in the way of their trade; whether, in order to make that, they have availed themselves of the invention of the plaintiff. (1 Web. P. C. 586, 589.)

Neilson v. Harford. N. P. 1841.—Action for the infringement of a patent for the improved application of air to produce heat in furnaces. Parke, B., told the jury that if the invention consisted, as claimed by the plaintiff, in applying the air, heated while in transitu, then, however great the improvement which the defendant's apparatus for accomplishing that object may be on that described in the specification, it is no less an infringement. (1 Web. P. C. 310.)

Walton v. Bateman. N. P. 1842.—The doing any of the acts specified in the prohibitory clauses of the letters patent, is an infringement. (1 Web. P. C. 615.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

IN a case lately reported from an Irish Court, an affidavit sworn in the matter, by deponents residing in Canada, was said to be informal, and the officer of the court refused to file it on the twofold ground that while it was a joint affidavit, there was only a single jurat, also that the description of the commissioner before whom it was made was insufficient, on the ground that, whilst he described himself as "commissioner for taking affidavits in Chancery," he omitted to add "in Canada." We are glad to notice that an order has been made that this affidavit should be received and filed. It would, indeed, be unfortunate if, on such grounds, the proceedings should have been delayed, that the affidavit might be returned to Canada to correct the alleged irregularities. It does not appear from the report but that the affidavit was sworn by the two deponents at the same time, and a reference to the Law List shows that the Canadian commissioner was what he described himself to be. Solicitors when discharging the office of commissioner of oaths cannot, of course, be too careful in complying with every formality, and that they are so in the generality of cases is evidenced by the fact that it is only very occasionally that objection is taken to those parts of an affidavit for which they are responsible as commissioners.

MR. F. H. JANSON, in his paper lately read before the Statistical Society, and to which we have already referred, observes, in reference to the compensations paid to proctors, "That it did not include the loss of office as practitioners in the Ecclesiastical Courts." Sir R. Phillimore has recently decided that they have still the exclusive privilege of practising there, and as the race is rapidly dying out the business must come to a standstill unless the Legislature applies a remedy or the litigant parties are willing to conduct their cases in person.

MR. F. CALVERT, Q.C., in his Remarks upon the Jurisdiction of the Inns of Court, observes as follows in reference to education and etiquette affecting the two branches of the Profession: "To put the examination for the Bar on the same footing as an examination for the profession of an attorney or of a medical man is quite a mistake. Persons who require the aid of an attorney or a doctor, go directly to them. They may sustain serious injury, if anyone is allowed to offer himself to the world in general, as a practitioner in either of those professions, without having proved an adequate amount of proficiency. But persons, who require the aid of a barrister, do not go directly to him. They consult their attorney, and through the attorney as intermediate agent consult the barrister."

AS yet the office of Chief Clerk to the Lord Mayor is still vacant, and we look with some anxiety for the choice of the City magistracy. That it should be bestowed upon a solicitor is beyond question, and if not so bestowed solicitors will have far more cause of complaint than the other branch could have if a solicitor were appointed to the office of Solicitor to the Treasury. Magistrates' clerks are invariably solicitors, and they bring to bear upon the discharge of their duties the utmost tact and judgment, as well as a practical knowledge of their work. The City authorities will find no scarcity of thoroughly good men if the remuneration is adequate to the responsibility of this important office.

THE apparent expedition with which some Judges of the Court of Chancery get through the business of their courts is attributable to the practice of throwing upon the chief clerks important duties which they were not originally intended to perform, says Mr. Janson in a paper lately prepared, and he adds, it has often been urged that an addition to the number of judges of this court would enable them to work out in chambers their own decrees, while the facts and circumstances were fresh in their minds, leaving the chief clerks to dispose of the administrative business, which is now too often kept waiting for the consideration and discussion of important questions of principle that would be more properly dealt with by the judges. Another great want is that of readier access to the judge. If there were the same facility of appeal from the chief clerk to the judge as there is from a solicitor's clerk to his principal, as there easily might be if a judge sat in chambers three days in each week, much valuable time would be saved. This was suggested in the report of a very large committee of solicitors to the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, so far back as the year 1851, and this report was afterwards submitted for the consideration of Parliament. See vol. xiii, "House of Commons Reports, 1852."

SOLICITORS cannot be made parties to suits in Chancery with a view to charging them with costs, unless counsel and solicitors are found who are ready so to charge their brothers in the Profession. The practice of so seeking to charge solicitors has largely obtained of late years, but happily for the credit of the Profession there has grown up by the side of it a determination on the part of the judges of the High Court of Chancery to set their face against making solicitors, who are properly witnesses in a suit, and who are not primarily chargeable with any part of the relief prayed, parties to the suit with a view of charging them with costs only. Our readers will do well to consider carefully the case of Barnes v. Addy, reported in our present issue, as affecting this question, the judgment in which, by the ex Lord Chancellor (Selborne) and the Lords Justices will, we feel sure, be studied with interest. It is an appeal from, and affirmation of a decision of Wickens, V.C., who concludes his judgment thus: "With a view to discouraging, as far as possible, suits of this nature against solicitors, I shall dismiss the bill against him (a solicitor), also with costs." The Court of Appeal entirely concurred with the Vice-Chancellor's desire to discourage such suits.

COMPLAINT reaches us from a solicitor who appeared for a defendant charged with felony before a country bench of magistrates, that notwithstanding his objection, the partner of the magistrates' clerk was allowed to appear and conduct the prosecution. We think this a very bad precedent, and one which we hope will not be followed, the better opinion being that much evil may arise from such a practice. We believe the rule is that partners of magistrates' clerks never appear as in the above case. This matter and the present right exercised by clerks of the peace in the distribution of quarter sessions business among local solicitors, needs regulation.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE MR. J. C. GROCOTT.

THE remains of the late Mr. J. C. Grocott, solicitor, Liverpool, were consigned to their last resting place in the family vault, St. George's churchyard, Everton, Feb. 27, the mournful ceremony being attended by many gentlemen connected with the Legal Profession and numbers of the general public, who were desirous of paying this last mark of respect to the memory of one of Liverpool's best known and highly respected citizens. The funeral cortege started from the residence of the deceased gentleman in Park-road, a little before eleven o'clock, and reached the church at twelve, where a large concourse awaited its arrival. The chief mourners were Mr. John Cooper Grocott, the only surviving son of the deceased; Miss Elizabeth Mary Grocott, Mrs. John Hayward, Miss Catherine Bird Grocott, Miss Martha Adams Grocott, daughters of the deceased; Mr. Chichester S. Willan, nephew; and two Masters Hayward, grandsons. Invitations were sent to his worship the mayor (Mr. Alderman A. B. Walker), Mr. Councillor John Pearson (ex-mayor), and Mr. Joseph Rayner (town clerk), to attend the funeral; but they were prevented by official business. The mayor's carriage and that of Mr. Pearson followed the cortege from the house to the church. Among the gentlemen who attended at the grave to witness the last sad rites performed to their departed friend were—Messrs. J. K. Blair, late judge of the Liverpool County Court; H. Hime and J. F. Watson, registrars of the County Court; John Fleet, registrar of the Court of Passage; Henry Walter, prosecuting solicitor; Henry Bremner, David Evans, R. A. Payne, Timpron Martin, T. Seddon Smith, J. B. Wilson, Charles S. Goodman, — Jenkins, Charles Pemberton, Mr. Councillor J. Hughes, Edward Cotton, Richard Williams, William Williams, John Willox, James Sykes, Henry Bolland, Thomas Baker, T. Parker, J. Bromley, J. P. M'Bride, Woodburn, Roberts, R. P. Ellis, and Goode, officials connected with County Court; W. Howell, J. F. Jones, Dr. Graham, Dr. Lyth, Dr. R. Williams, J. Gilbert, A. W. Chalmers, P. B. M'Quie, E. Hampson, T. Ambler, Robertson, Seaman, Alcard, and others. The service for the dead was read in a most impressive manner by the Rev. T. W. Swift, M.A., incumbent of St. George's; and those present having taken a "long last look" at the resting-place of the lamented deceased, the sad concourse separated. Although in his eightieth year, the deceased was engaged in the discharge of his professional duties almost up to the day of his death; and to his last hour his intellect retained its clearness.

By Mr. Grocott's death the office of sergeant-at-mace for the borough is rendered vacant. In the meantime, the discharge of the duties of the office will fall upon Mr. Clarke Aspinall, who, according to the Act of Parliament, will have to act as the sergeant-at-mace until the office is filled up. The council at its next meeting will be called upon to appoint a successor to Mr. Grocott.

ROLLS COURT.

Monday, March 2.

SALE v. LAMBERT.

Contract of sale—Particular—Memorandum—Name of vendor omitted—Statute of Frauds.

THIS was a suit for specific performance. The defendant was the owner of a malting and other buildings situate at Baldock, which were put up for sale by auction in the usual way in July 1872, and were knocked down to the plaintiff. There were several defences to the suit, one of which was that there was no contract within the Statute of Frauds, owing to the vendor's name not being inserted in the contract. The printed particular described the property as to be sold by the direction of the proprietor, who was not named or otherwise described therein, and the memorandum of the sale, which was endorsed on the particular, and was signed in duplicate immediately after the sale by the solicitors of both parties, and was in the usual form—namely, "I do hereby acknowledge that Mr. William Sale, by Mr. Thomas Veasey, his solicitor, has been this day declared the purchaser of lots 3, 5, and 6, mentioned and described in the particular hereunto annexed, at the sum of £1242, and that he has paid a deposit of £186; and I do hereby agree that the vendor, on his part, shall in all respects fulfil the conditions of sale mentioned in the said particular."

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Baggallay) and C. Walker having been heard for the plaintiff, and Southgate, Q.C. and Dauney for the defendant,

Sir G. JESSEL, without calling for a reply, said the chief question was, whether the omission to insert the vendor's name in the memorandum of sale brought the case within the Statute of Frauds. It was a question of great importance, for it was almost, if not quite, the universal practice not to insert the vendor's name in the memorandum of sale, and the form used in the present instance was one that was used by many of the most repectable auctioneers. For his own part, he did not think he had ever seen a case in which the vendor's name was inserted in the memorandum of sale. He did not feel disposed to quarrel with the conclusion of the text writer (Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, vol. 1, p. 202), that, in order to satisfy the statute, both parties should be specified either nominally or by sufficient description. It all came back to the question, "What is a sufficient description? Can you find out from the contract who it is who is selling the property?" If a memorandum of sale were signed by two agents, the names of the principals not being disclosed, parol evidence would be admissible to show who the principals were; and why should not parol evidence be admissible to show who was meant by the term vendor? In fact, "vendor" might be as good a description of a man as his name and surname. Evidence might be admitted to show who was meant by the description of vendor, as well as to show who was meant by the name of John Smith. Here the vendor mentioned in the memorandum of sale was the person referred to in the particular as the proprietor, by whose direction the auctioneer sold the property, and what more could the purchaser want to know? The term "proprietor" might be thought an excellent description of the vendor, seeing it was so used in recent Acts of Parliament. Being of opinion that the term "proprietor" was a sufficient description of the plaintiff to satisfy the the statute, and that the other defences to the suit failed, he must make the usual decree for specific performance, with costs.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THIRD COURT.

Tuesday, March 3.

(Before Mr. Commissioner KERR.)

CHARLES BARNES NASH, 46, described as an agent, was charged with forging and uttering the indorsement to a banker's cheque for £20, with intent to defraud.

Montagu Williams and Walter Ballantine for the prosecution.

Besley for the defence.

The prisoner had been, for nine years, the managing clerk to Mr. Alexander Hemsley, solicitor, of No. 5, Albany, and in that capacity had charge of a Chancery suit, Rowland v. Bingley and Bennett, in relation to an estate estimated to be worth £60,000. The property in question included some houses in Greenwich, the rents of which, amounting to upwards of £50, were collected by the Rent Guarantee Society. In July 1872, two cheques drawn by that society, one for £38 16s. 3d. and the other for £20, in favour of the executors, fell into the hands of the prisoner, who gave receipts for them. Those sums represented the net rents which the society had collected, but the prisoner for some reason asked to have the amount remitted in two cheques instead of one, which was done. He gave a receipt for £58 16s. 3d., that being the aggregate of the two. A Mr. Jackson, a builder, had been employed to do some repairs to the property, but nothing was due to him at that time from the executors. Notwithstanding that, the prisoner got the society to make out a cheque for £20 in favour of Jackson, and afterwards, as was alleged, in a disguised hand, indorsed it in the name of Jackson. By this he was enabled to receive the money, but he never accounted for it to the estate, nor did he produce any receipt of Jackson for it.

The defence set up by the prisoner was that the accounts connected with the estate were in much confusion, and that by a mistake he was led to believe that £20 was due to Jackson, the builder. He intended subsequently to hand over the money, but had omitted through forgetfulness to do so.

Mr. Hemsley, the prisoner's master, replying to Mr. Montague Williams, said the deficiencies, in all, amounted to at least £200.

The jury found the prisoner guilty of feloniously uttering the forged cheque.

Montagu Williams said there was another charge against the prisoner of embezzling two sums of £52 odd belonging to the estate, but, after the verdict, he did not propose to proceed with it. The prisoner, he added, had been convicted at this court upwards of twenty-two years ago; but the officer who had him then in charge had died, and it was impossible formally to prove the conviction.

Mr. Commissioner KERR sentenced him to five years' penal servitude.

MR. JUSTICE BLACKBURN'S complaint, at the recent sittings at Guildhall in the City of London, upon the subject of the inconvenience occasioned by attorneys not giving notice to the officers of the court when causes were intended to be withdrawn, was, we think, misdirected. Attorneys are themselves officers of the Superior Courts, and it is competent for the judges to make rules on the subject in question, with which, of course, all officers of the courts will comply, and for complying with which their proper costs, charges, and expenses should be allowed on taxation.

THE Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is composed of the Lord President, the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, the Lord Chief Justices of the Queen's Bench and Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of Exchequer, the judge of the Court of Probate and High Court of Admiralty; also such prelates as are Privy Councillors, and all Privy Councillors who have held any of the offices before mentioned, with four paid judges and the following subordinate officers: An Indian Assessor, a Clerk of Appeals, a Registrar, a Registrar in Admiralty and Ecclesiastical Causes. A large portion of the business which comes under the cognizance of this tribunal is conducted by gentlemen who are not members of the legal Profession.

THE following is, we believe, a correct list of the names of the several solicitors who have from time to time been concerned in the celebrated case commonly known as the Tichborne case, now happily terminated: Messrs. Holmes; Moojen; Gibbes; Baxter, Rose, and Norton; Gorton; Hendricks; Harcourt; Dobinson and Geare; Cullington; Gray, Q.C.; Pollard; Stephens; and Bowker.

THE following Lectures and Classes are appointed for the ensuing week at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, for the Instruction of students seeking admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors: Monday, class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock, Conveyancing; Tuesday, class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock, Conveyancing; Wednesday, class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock, Conveyancing; Friday, lecture, 6 to 7 o'clock, Common Law. To prevent interruption at the lecture, subscribers are not admitted to the Hall after a lecture has commenced.

AN issue of 2,500,000 dols. (£500,000 sterling) First Mortgage Seven per Cent. Sinking Fund Gold Bonds of 1000 dols. (£200) each of the Paris and Danville Railroad and Coal Company of Illinois is announced. The issue price is £170 sterling per bond of £200. At the price of issue these bonds will yield as an investment nearly 8½ per cent. per annum. The principal and interest of this issue are secured by a first mortgage upon the whole of the company's railroad franchises, rolling stock, and property of every description, and real estate, including coal and mineral lands now owned. The bonds having a priority of lien upon all the franchises and property of the company of whatever kind or quality of every description of the value of £1,800,000 now owned, and also upon all property which may be hereafter acquired by the company. The following particulars are furnished by the company: The road is located between the Illinois Central Railway and Wabash River through a densely populated, wealthy, and productive country, of about seventy miles in width, containing no other parallel railroad in competition for its business. Its line is through a succession of highly-cultivated farms, growing cities, and villages. The road, when completed, will form the middle one-third of a through line from Chicago to Cairo, Paducah, and Shawnee town, and connecting these points, and through them the leading southern railways with Chicago by the most direct route. The road is 102 miles long, thirty-six miles of which are now completed and in operation. 1,050,000 dols. have been expended in the construction of the road and the purchase and development of the mines. 5000 dols. per mile is paid up to the capital stock of the company at par by individual and corporate subscribers.

MAGISTRATES' LAW.

WORSHIP-STREET POLICE COURT.

Monday, March 2.

(Before Mr. BUSHBY.)

Master and Servants Act — Shoemakers — 9 Geo. 1, c. 27.

A MAN was brought up charged with stealing a pair of boots, value 18s., the property of his employer. The short facts of the case were that the prisoner had been employed by a bootmaker to make up a pair of boots, he working on his master's premises. He left ostensibly for dinner, and never returned. The boots were afterwards missed, and information was given to the police. Some time afterwards the prisoner was apprehended, and when charged said that he would pay for the boots if the prosecutor would forgive him. Before the court he attempted to set up the defence that some other person had stolen the boots.

The prosecutor, however, in reply to Mr. Bushby, said that the prisoner did not return for his wages.

Mr. BUSHBY, having looked into the Master and Servants Act, said that he found recited there the Act 8 & 9 Geo. 1 c. 27, s. 4. That Act provided for offences of the kind charged against the prisoner, and from its being unrepealed it was impossible to deal with the charge in any other way. The Act provided that from and after the 1st May 1740 any person or persons employed in cutting, making up, &c., any skins, boots, shoes, &c., who should fraudulently purloin, "embezil," secrete, pawn, exchange, &c., any portion of the material in which such person or persons should be employed, or do any act to lessen the value of such material, either before or after the making up, &c., should upon conviction be ordered to make a reasonable recompense for his offence, such recompense not to exceed the double value of the goods so purloined, "embezziled," &c. He had, therefore, to order the prisoner to pay the double value, 36s., of the boots he had purloined, or in default of sufficient distress to be imprisoned for fourteen days with hard labour. The Act further provided that the prisoner while in gaol should be once whipped in such manner as the justice might think fit. He could not think, however, that the Legislature, when amending the law relating to master and servant, had intended, although referring to the Act of Geo. 2, c. 8, but not mentioning the section, to allow such a law to stand, and, therefore, he would take upon himself to dispense with the second portion of the punishment. He added that the Act ought to be called attention to, and he hoped it would be done. By the same section a person guilty of purloining or making away with any portion of goods intrusted to him to make up by a master is rendered liable to pay quadruple value, and to be twice flogged publicly.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

WILL—ESTATES OF TRUSTEES—PAYMENT OF DEBTS — RULES OF CONSTRUCTION — CONTINGENT REMAINDERS—DECREE.—J. C., by will, in 1827, devised freeholds to trustees, their heirs, and assigns, and to the survivor of them, and his or her heirs, upon trust that they and their heirs, and the survivor of them, and his or her heirs, should stand seised thereof during the life of W.C., and also until the testator's debts were paid, upon trusts to set and let the same, and to apply the rents and profits, and the value of the timber, in discharge of debts, and then for W. C. for life, and then and after the debts were paid, for the heirs of the body of W. C., with remainder to his own heirs. In 1830, the debts having been paid, the trustees conveyed to W. C. for life. In 1838 W. C. suffered a recovery. He subsequently mortgaged to the defendant in fee. Upon a bill filed to have it declared that the conveyance of the life estate by the trustees was a breach of trust, and that the defendant was a trustee for the plaintiff, a son, and heir at law, of W. C.: Held (disapproving the decision of Lord Romilly in Collier v McBean, 34 Beav. 426), that the trustees took an estate of freehold; that the devise to them "and their heirs" gave a fee simple, unless something appeared by the will to cut it down; that it is not to be cut down unless another estate can be pointed out on the face of the will for the trustees to take; that neither a chattel interest superadded to, or concurrent with, the life estate, until the debts were paid, was a proper construction of the gift, nor was it a correct view that they took a freehold interest per autre vie during the life of the tenant for life with a further chattel interest, till the debts were paid; but that they took the fee; that a trust to "set and let" gives not a bare power, but an estate which, being indefinite, must be a fee simple; that a trust to apply the "value of whatever timber may be considered at its best growth" implies a fee for tenant per autre vie, as the owner of a chattel interest cannot cut timber; that the contingent remainder having gone at law by recovery it did not remain in equity; that the trustees were not in any sense trustees to preserve contingent remainders; and that the conveyance to the tenant for life was not a breach of trust. There is no such thing as an implied trust to preserve. Held, also, that the mortgagee having in another suit, to which the present plaintiff was a party, obtained a decree for getting in the outstanding legal estate, the plaintiff was bound by that decree: (Collier v. Walters, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 869. M. R.)

AUCTIONEER—MEMORANDUM IN WRITING OF A BARGAIN—INTERNAL REFERENCE TO SEVERAL DOCUMENTS—STATUTE OF FRAUDS. — Plaintiff authorised defendant, an auctioneer, to sell a mare, which was accordingly entered as a lot in the catalogue attached to the conditions of sale for a certain day; "49, grey mare, 6 years old, 15-3 hands high; steady to ride and drive." She was knocked down at the sale on the day fixed for 33 guineas, and a clerk made an entry at the time, opposite the lot, in the defendant's sales ledger, of the price and name of the buyer. This ledger was headed "Select Sales by Auction," with the same date as the catalogue. The description had been entered before the sale, as "Lot 49, grey mare, aged 6." The buyer the same day returned the mare to the defendant, with a letter written and signed by him, "I herewith return the grey mare, Lot 49, bought at your sale this day, as not being steady in harness, as warranted:" Held, in an action against the auctioneer for damages for not making a binding contract with the buyer, that, without express authority, an auctioneer's clerk cannot be taken to be agent to sign a buyer's name; and that there was not sufficient internal reference to each other in these three writings to constitute a note of a bargain within the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds (Pierce v. Corf, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 919. Q. B.)

COLLISION—FOG—RIGHT OF FERRY BOAT TO RUN—LIABILITY—PRACTICE. — A steam ferry boat continuing to cross and recross the river Mersey during a dense fog takes upon herself the responsibility incident to such a course, and is not entitled to set up public convenience against the probability of loss of life and property; but she will be liable for any damage done to other vessels with which she may come into collision, provided those vessels take the precautions required by law to warn her of their position. COMPANY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

CONTRIBUTORY — VOID AMALGAMATION — BETWEEN APPLICATION FOR SHARES AND LETTERS OF ALLOTMENT.—In the year 1869 an amalgamation was agreed upon between the P. Company (Limited), and the U. Company, which was an unlimited company, under which the paid-up shareholders in the P. Company were to have paid-up shares in the U. Company to the amount of their shares in the P. Company, and the partly paid-up shareholders in the P. Company were to have shares in the U. Company, on which an amount was to be considered to have been paid proportionate to the amount credited on their P. shares. The P. Company was to assign its assets to the U. Company, and the U. Company to undertake its liabilities. An indenture in two parts was drawn up and executed by the two companies, but in consequence of a variation between the respective parts executed by the companies the indenture was in 1873 held incomplete, and the amalgamation void. B., the holder of forty shares in the P. Company, on which £100 had been paid, signed, and sent to the P. Company a form of application supplied by them to him, for shares in the U. Company, "credited with £100 thereon, in exchange for forty shares held by me in the P. Company, on which £100 has been paid," and on the 5th Aug. 1869, received a letter of allotment informing him that he had been entered as a shareholder in the U. Company, and that "the amount to be credited on such shares will be the proportionate amount of the net assets of the P. Company (Limited)." B. took no steps to repudiate the shares, although the allotment letter varied from the application, but made several applications for certificates of the shares allotted. The certicates were never sent to B., and on the 9th Nov. 1869 a winding-up order was made against the U. Company. Held, that there was no contract between B. and the U. Company to take shares, that he was not bound by acquiescence, and that he could not be placed upon the list of contributories: (Beck's case, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 907. V.C. B.)

ALDRED v. WHITEHEAD.

Equitable mortgage.

A., an equitable mortgagee, without deposit of deeds, under an agreement which charged certain leasehold property with the payment of a certain sum, and in which it was provided that the defendant should at any time thereafter execute a legal mortgage of the property with such power of sale and other powers as the plaintiff might require, asked for the usual accounts and a sale of the mortgaged property.

Held, that he was only entitled to specific performance of the agreement.

Ashton v. Corrigan, Matthews v. Goodday, Peto v. Hammond, Hermann v. Hodges, and James v. James referred to.

S. Hall (barrister), instructed by C. W. Dawson, Bolton, for the plaintiff.

Dr. Pankhurst (barrister), instructed by Gooden, Bolton, for the defendant.

This was a plaint by an equitable mortgagee asking for the usual accounts and sale of the mortgaged property. The plaint stated an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant, whereby the defendant, in consideration of £283 10s. owing by him to the plaintiff, charged certain leasehold premises with the repayment of the said £283 10s., and of further advances and interest, and agreed at any time thereafter to execute a legal mortgage of the said premises subject to certain building society mortgages, with such power of sale and other powers as the plaintiff might require; and after stating that the defendant refuses either to execute a mortgage or to pay the amount owing on the security of the said agreement, prayed the relief above mentioned. There was no actual deposit of deeds. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that the proper relief on the above plaint was not a sale, but a specific performance of the agreement, and counsel quoted Ashton v. Corrigan (L. Rep. Eq. 76), James v. James (16 L. Rep. Eq.), Seton on Decrees (vol. 1, p. 443), and Fisher on Mortgages (vol. 1).

Hall, for the plaintiff, in reply, said that under the above stated agreement he was entitled to a sale at his option, if he chose to waive the specific performance of the agreement, and referred to Prideaux's Precedents (vol. 1), from which the agreement seemed to have been taken, and also to Matthews v. Goodday (8 Jur. N. S. 90), and Peto v. Hammond (8 Jur. N. S. 550). Ashton v. Corrigan only decided that the mortgagee under the special terms of his agreement was entitled to a mortgage containing an absolute power of sale, and the earlier cases were not discussed. Neither that case nor the later cases of Hermann v. Hodges, and Janes v. James, nor the authorities in Fisher and Seton are inconsistent with Matthews v. Goodday. There could have been no actual deposit of deeds in this case, but that can make no difference.

His HONOUR, in giving judgment, said that so careful and distinguished a judge as Wickens, V. C. would not have decided Ashton v. Corrigan without considering its effect on the earlier cases, and on the authority of that case he should hold that specific performance of the agreement was the proper remedy, and not sale. Leave would be given to amend, and the costs would be reserved.

On the 10th Feb. the case came on again, when specific performance was decreed, and costs were allowed to the plaintiff.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Monday, March 2.

(Before Sir J. BACON, Chief Judge.)

Ex parte JACOBS, Re CARTER.

Proof—Secured creditor—Production of securities.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the Birmingham County Court upon a point of some little importance in practice—whether it is necessary at the first meeting of a bankrupt's creditors, under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, to produce bills of exchange and other securities, the particulars of which are scheduled to the proofs of creditors.

De Gex, Q.C. and Finlay Knight, were counsel for the appellant.

Roxburgh, Q.C. and Horton Smith, for the respondents.

The facts of the case appeared to be that at the first meeting, held on the 19th Jan., Mr. Registrar Chauntler presided, when Mr. T. S. Smith, the holder of a proxy of the Worcester City and County Banking Company (Limited), tendered a proof on their behalf for £2301, for money lent to the bankrupt by the company, and for interest, commission, and other banker's charges, and the proof stated that the bank had received no security or satisfaction for that sum other than a mortgage or charge upon a messuage, therein described and thereby assessed at the value of £740, and the bill of exchange and promissory notes, particulars of which were set forth in the form prescribed by the Act, but the bills themselves were not produced. The proof was objected to on the ground of the non-production of the bills, and the Registrar overruled the objection. Application was then made to the judge by the counsel for the debtor, when the judge ordered that the proof should stand admitted. Mr. Jacobs, on whose behalf the objection had been taken, appealed.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the practice in bankruptcy had been established for many years. A creditor coming to prove his debt, who had a bill of exchange or other security, ought to produce it. That he was bound to produce his security before the receipt of dividend was quite another thing. There might be cases in which, from some accident, a creditor seeking to prove could not produce his securities. In such cases the judge would exercise his discretion. Here the bank was the holder of the bills, and there was no shadow of a reason why they should not be produced. The order of the court below would be discharged.

LIVERPOOL BANKRUPTCY COURT.

Ex parte BOLLAND; Re MALLEY.

Bankruptcy Act 1869—Order and disposition section.

Goods in the possession of neutral or third parties standing in the name of the original owner, without notice to the neutral parties of change of ownership

Held, to be property divisible amongst the creditors.

Quære, whether a transfer of property requires registration as a bill of sale.

THIS was a motion by Mr. Bolland, the trustee of the property of the debtor, a rag and rope merchant in Liverpool, for an order of the court to declare that certain rope lying at the railway station in the name of Malley, of which rope a Mr. Hewetson held the railway advice notes, was the property of the trustee.

Kennedy, instructed by Masters and Fletcher, appeared for Mr. Hewetson.

Martin, solicitor, for Mr. Bolland.

The question, by arrangement, originally came before a jury, and was reported in the LAW TIMES of 16th Dec. last, but it being found that the issue was one of law rather than of fact, the jury were discharged, and the question left for the decision of the court.

His HONOUR now said: In this case certain rope, the ownership of which is in dispute, was sold by arrangement between the parties, and the trustee under the liquidation moves for an order that he is entitled to retain the money arising from the sale. This application I think well founded, for, assuming that the writing of 30th Sept. 1872, given by Malley to Hewetson did not require registration under the Bills of Sale Act 1854, I think that the rope in question was property divisible amongst Malley's creditors, as being, by the consent of Hewetson, in the possession, order, or disposition of Malley, the reputed owner, within sub-sect. 5 of sect. 15 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869. I therefore make the order asked for, and with costs.

Friday, Feb. 27.

(Before J. F. COLLIER, Esq., Judge.)

Ex parte BOLLAND; Re LUND.

Bankruptcy Act 1869, rule 292—Costs of proceedings under an abortive composition arrangement—When are the proceedings pending?

Held that an extraordinary resolution to accept a composition which is duly registered, and the composition unpaid when due, still leaves the court with jurisdiction over the debtor, and therefore, where bankruptcy supervenes, the proceedings are pending, and the solicitor for the debtor under the composition petition is entitled to his costs out of the bankrupt's estate.

THE facts of this case are fully set forth in the judgment.

T. H. James, instructed by Bellringer, supported the order for costs.

Myburgh, instructed by Duncan, Hill and Dickenson, opposed.

His HONOUR said.—The motion in this case is that the court should order the trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Thomas Lund to pay to Mr. John Leigh, an attorney, the amount of his taxed costs in the matter of a petition for liquidation or composition, filed by the said Thomas Lund in the County Court of Lancashire holden at Blackburn. The facts are these: On the 22nd Aug. 1872, Thomas Lund filed a petition for liquidation or composition in the Blackburn County Court. The first meeting of creditors was held on the 17th Sept., at which a resolution was duly passed to accept a composition of 10s. in the pound in instalments extending over a period of twelve months. That resolution was confirmed at a second meeting, and the two together formed the extraordinary resolution required by the Act. The resolutions were duly registered. The debtor proved unable to pay the first instalment. Another meeting of creditors was called on the 1st Nov., under the 126th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, to vary the previous resolution, but no resolution was passed. Mr. Leigh was the attorney employed in and about the affairs of the debtor up to the registration, and to him the registration of the resolutions was entrusted by the creditors. On the 28th Nov. a petition was filed by a creditor who had not assented to the composition, that the debtor should be adjudicated a bankrupt, the act of bankruptcy alleged being the filing of the original petition for liquidation or composition. The debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt on this act of bankruptcy on the 9th Dec., and on the 30th the proceedings in the bankruptcy were removed into the Liverpool court. Under these circumstances Mr. Leigh claims his costs, as taxed by the registrar of the Blackburn court, from the trustee in bankruptcy. The 292nd rule provides that where bankruptcy occurs pending proceedings for or towards liquidation or composition, the proper costs incurred in relation to such proceedings shall be paid by the trustee, unless the court shall otherwise order. The question is, were proceedings for a composition pending at the time of the bankruptcy? Fortunately, I am not entirely without guidance as to the construction which ought to be put upon this rule. In the case of Ex parte Howell, re Hawes (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 859), Mellish, L. J. is reported to have said that the object of the provision made by the rule was, he thought, plain enough. If there were no such provision, no solicitor would ever act on behalf of a debtor who desired him to present a petitton for liquidation, or would recommend a debtor to adopt such proceeding, without getting his costs beforehand, and that might prevent many persons from presenting petitions at all. The object of the rule was that solicitors, if they acted fairly, might be able to get their costs although the proceedings for liquidation proved abortive and bankruptcy ensued. That being the object of the rule, such a construction should, if possible, be put upon it as would fairly carry out that object. In his Lordship's opinion it was not necessary to put such a strict construction on the words as to hold that whenever anything occurred which rendered liquidation impossible under the petition, the proceedings were no longer pending. In that case a petition for liquidation had been filed; at the first meeting the creditors negatived the resolution for liquidation, and on the following day the debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt. The Chief Judge, whose decision was upheld on appeal, held that the proceedings were pending within the 292nd rule, and that the solicitor in the liquidation was entitled to his costs out of the bankrupt's estate. I quote that case only because I believe all previous cases bearing on the subject were mentioned in the argument, and it is the latest case in which the subject has been considered. Mellish, L.J., based his decision principally upon the fact that as the receiver had not been discharged the property remained under the protection of the court, and the proceedings for liquidation were thus still pending. I am afraid I have hardly such substantial ground to go on; but the composition was payable by instalments extending over twelve months. By the 126th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, it is provided that the provisions of any composition may be enforced by the court on a motion made in a summary manner by any person interested. This being so, can it be said that the proceedings are absolutely dead until the composition has been paid? But if they are not dead they are pending. The court still has cognisance of the matter. Again, if a composition is not paid, the original debts may be recovered in full by action at law, or, in the alternative, the better opinion seems to be—though this, I believe has not been actually decided—a creditor may ask for an adjudication on the act of bankruptcy committed by filing the petition; but if this is so, if the creditors may revert to the petition, if anything is in action by means of which the creditors may resort to further proceedings, can the proceedings in the composition be said to have come to an end? I think, although I acknowledge the matter is not free from doubt, that, upon the construction which ought to be put upon the 292nd rule, they must be held to be sufficiently alive to enable the solicitor in the composition to have his costs paid. For these reasons I think that Mr. Leigh is entitled to have these costs out of the estate. On the question by whom they should be taxed, I have come to the conclusion that the taxation ought to be conducted in the Liverpool Court. The trustee in bankruptcy has to pay them out of the bankrupt's estate; he is responsible to the creditors in bankruptcy; the proceeding is in bankruptcy, not in composition; the bankruptcy is in the Liverpool Court; and I think the taxation should be in the court in which the bankruptcy is pending. The costs will come out of the estate.

Re A. TAPPENBECK AND CO.

Rejection of proof.

IN this case

His HONOUR said:—This matter comes before me on an application to vary or reverse the decision of the trustee of the estate of Augustus Tappenbeck and Co., rejecting a proof for £300. The following are the facts:—About the beginning of the year 1873, Mr. Augustus Tappenbeck and Mr. A. L. Christiansen carried on business as merchants in Liverpool, under the style of Augustus Tappenbeck and Co. On the 15th Feb. in the same year, the same two persons established the firm of Augustus Christiansen and Co., in Para, in Brazil. The two firms, although consisting of the same persons, carried on different businesses. The firm in Brazil bought produce on account of the firm in Liverpool, and shipped it to them. The Liverpool house traded in the goods, but the Brazil house received commission only.

Messrs. Nash, Ferreira, and Co., another firm carrying on business at Para, having occasion to make remittances to England, were in the habit of buying bills of exchange drawn by Christiansen and Co. on Tappenbeck and Co., and payable to Nash, Ferreira, and Co., and remitting them after endorsement to their correspondents Messrs. Shaw, Hawkes, and Co., of Birmingham. Several bills were thus treated, and were accepted by Tappenbeck and Co., and paid at maturity—among others, the following three bills, viz., one drawn on the 7th April for £100, and two on 5th May for £200 and £100 respectively. On the 1st May 1873, Christiansen and Co. admitted into partnership in the Brazil house one Mr. Schramm. A deed of partnership was executed, a circular in the usual form was issued, and, as Mr. Christiansen says, circulated in the commercial community of Para. Moreover, he swears that he himself told Mr. Ferreira, Mr. Nash's partner, of the admission of Schramm. Schramm had nothing to do with the Liverpool house. On the 17th June, a bill for £200, and on the 17th July a bill for £100, were drawn in the usual way by Christiansen and Co., on Tappenbeck and Co. in favour of Nash and Co., endorsed by them to Shaw, Hawkes, and Co., and remitted to the latter firm. These bills were in the handwriting of Schramm, who at that time was the only partner at Paris. They were duly presented for acceptance about twenty-five or thirty days after they were drawn, but by the time the first one reached England Tappenbeck and Co. had filed their petition in liquidation, and the bills were not accepted. Shaw, Hawkes and Co. now seek to prove on the estate of Tappenbeck and Co. for the amount of these bills. Their claims are advocated on two grounds, which, it may be observed, are inconsistent with one another. First, it is said that Christiansen and Co., who drew the bills, were in reality identical with Tappenbeck and Co., and Mr. Nash said that his firm purchased the bills on that belief and understanding. It is unnecessary to consider what might have arisen from this state of things if it existed, because in fact it did not exist. The admission of Mr. Schramm, before the bills were drawn, was known to Nash and Co. through one of their partners, Mr. Ferreira, and that disposes at once, I think, of the supposition that Tappenbeck and Co. were liable as the drawers of the bills, for that is what the argument must come to, and that in fact is what Mr. Nash says was his belief. Next it is alleged that Christiansen and Co. were the agents of Tappenbeck and Co. As I said before, this status of Christiansen and Co. is inconsistent with the former one; for if Tappenbeck and Co. and Christiansen and Co. were the same persons, and both firms, as was argued, principals, they could not be one another's agents. But I have no objection to consider this argument, which amounts to this: Christiansen and Co. were Tappenbeck's agents, and as such had authority to contract, and did contract, on behalf of Tappenbeck and Co., that they, Tappenbeck and Co., would accept these bills. But there is no evidence of any such agency, authority, or contract. All we have is that Tappenbeck and Co. did previously accept similar bills, and that Nash and Co. bought the bills on the faith that Tappenbeck and Co. were responsible; but this is very far from being sufficient to establish a contract between Tappenbeck and Co. and Nash and Co. I am therefore of opinion that this proof was rightly rejected, and I dismiss the motion with costs. As the circumstances respecting Mr. Goodley's proof are precisely the same, the same decision will apply to both.

Bankruptcy Act 1869—Re-hearing.

Application for re-hearing on the ground that fresh evidence had been discovered since former hearing, referred by Chief Judge in Bankruptcy to County Court Judge.

Application refused, there being no ground for suggesting "surprise," and the question being one in the discretion of the court under the 71st section of the Bankruptcy Act.

Ambrose, barrister, in support of the motion.

THE facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgment.

His HONOUR, in giving judgment, said this case was originally tried before him on the 18th July last year, and, after hearing the evidence and arguments thereon, he found as follows:—First, that prima facie there is no authority in law for one partner to bind a firm by giving a guarantee; secondly, that J. M. Wike had not, in point of fact, any authority, express or implied, to give guarantees in the name of his firm; thirdly, that the money—the subject of proof—was not borrowed by J. M. Wike, in the name of or for the purposes of the firm; and, fourthly, that Mr. Keighley, sen., the plaintiff in the case, was aware of that fact. Now, he was asked to grant a re-hearing, not on the first point, which was a point of law, and, he supposed, could not be disputed—nor upon the third and fourth points; but upon the second, because evidence had come to the knowledge of the plaintiff since the former trial, showing that in point of fact Mr. Geo. Wike had given an authority, either express or implied, to his son, J. M. Wike, to give the guarantee upon which this action was brought. He (the Judge) regretted exceedingly that this question, which was of considerable importance, had been left in the first instance to his decision. The power of granting a re-hearing was one which ought to be exercised with extreme caution. At common law, unless the plaintiff could show "surprise," it was never exercised. In this case there seemed to be no ground whatever for suggesting surprise on the part of the plaintiff, because the question from beginning to end was whether or not the firm was bound by the transaction of J. M. Wike. The question here was, what was the authority of J. M. Wike? If he had authority there was an end of the matter; if not, then the decision must be the other way. Apart from the question of surprise, the motion was made under the 71st section of the Act, which gave him (the Judge) power to "renew, rescind, or vary" any order previously made. Upon what principle was that section to be worked out? The power which it gave must be cautiously exercised. This was not a case in which there had been a failure of justice through inadvertence; it was substantially an application for a new trial upon new facts. If he were to grant such an application, where would the matter end? Within what limits was that kind of discretion to be exercised? How long after a case had been decided were parties to be allowed to come forward and say, "Oh, since the case was decided we have discovered new facts; we are prepared to lay an entirely new case before the court, and we desire it to be re-opened?" That was a practice which he, for one, would never be a party to. As this was a matter in the discretion of the court, he was bound to say that, there being no justification for this motion on the ground of surprise, he did not think it was a case in which, having reference to all the circumstances, he should be justified in granting a re-hearing. The motion must therefore be dismissed.

BARRISTERS v. THE INNS OF COURT.

A CASE of Neate v. Denman was decided by Vice-Chancellor Hall on the 26th ult., which is of the utmost importance to barristers as upholding the absolute and arbitrary jurisdiction of the Inns of Court over persons who become members of the societies. We take the following report from the Times:—

The plaintiff in this case was Charles Neate, Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, and a barrister-at-law of Lincoln's Inn. The defendants were the Hon. Richard Denman and the Hon. George Denman, the executors of the late Lord Denman, and the Right Hon. Sir William Milbourne James, the Treasurer of the Society of Lincoln's Inn. The cause came on to be heard upon a demurrer to the plaintiff's bill for want of equity. The facts of the case were these:—The plaintiff, in 1832, being a member of Lincoln's Inn, was then called by that society to the decree of utter barrister. He signed the usual bond, with a surety to secure the payment of his dues to the society. The condition of the bond was this:—

"That if the plaintiff should, from time to time, and at all times thereafter during his life, or so long as he should continue a member of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, duly and orderly perform, pay, and discharge all such debts, duties, and charges, sum and sums of money as should grow due and chargeable upon him for pensions, preacher duties, commons, taxes, fines, penalties, amerciaments, and all other duties whatsoever thereafter to be due or imposed upon him by virtue of any order or orders of the said society theretofore made, or at any time or times thereafter to be made, or by virtue of or according to the usage and custom of the said society, then this obligation to be void, or else to remain in full force and virtue."

In the year 1845 the plaintiff withdrew from practice at the bar, but from the time of his being called to the bar up to the year 1862 he continued from time to time to pay the whole of the amount claimed from him by the society, as due up to the last-mentioned year, in respect of any of the items mentioned in the bond, and such payments amounted to upwards of £60. In the year 1869 the plaintiff wrote to the society expressing his wish or intention to withdraw from it, and received in reply the following form of petition to the society, to be presented by him to the Master of the Bench:

"That your petitioner is desirous that his name may be taken off the books of this society, as he is not now practising at the Bar, and it is his intention not to practise as a barrister in future either in this country or in any of the colonies. Your petitioner therefore prays your Worship will be pleased to take his name off the books of the society, and order the bond to be cancelled on payment of all his arrears of dues and duties to the treasurer and the fine on leaving, within one month from the date of the order made hereon."

Since the time when this petition was sent to him, the terms thereof, as now required to be signed by members of the society desirous of withdrawing therefrom, have been altered by the addition of the word "India" after "colonies," and by the substitution of the word "composition" for the word "fine," by which latter alteration, as the plaintiff believed, the Masters of the Bench of the society meant to assert more plainly the right of retaining, if they think fit, upon their books for the term of his life, the name of any one who might have been called to the Bar by the society. The plaintiff signed the above petition, and shortly afterwards he received the following order, dated the 15th Dec. 1869:

"Upon the petition of Charles Neate, a barrister of this society, praying that his name may be taken off the books, as he is not now practising at the Bar, and it is his intention not to practise as a barrister in future either in this country or in any of the colonies, it is ordered accordingly, and that his bond be cancelled on paying all his arrears of dues and duties and the customary fine to the treasurer of this society within one month from the date hereof, or this order to be void."

The plaintiff did not, in fact, pay the amount of dues then owing by him to the society within the month allowed by the order, and so lost the benefit thereof, and he continued to be, and was now, a member of the society. The plaintiff stated by his bill that he was now indebted to the society in the sum of £23 11s. for dues and charges. In July 1873 the defendants, the Hon. R. Denman and the Hon. G. Denman, as executors of the late Lord Denman (the surviving obligee of the bond), sued the plaintiff at law for the amount. They did so, as the plaintiff alleged, by the direction of Lord Justice James, as treasurer of the society. The plaintiff offered to pay the £23 11s., but, wishing to cease to be a member of the society, desired at the same time to have the bond delivered up to him. The society, however, declined to release him till he had signed a declaration of intention according to the "altered" form of petition already referred to. The bill then stated that the plaintiff refused to make any such declaration of intention as that which was required of him by the terms of the altered petition, because it would be a restraint upon his using any right that he might otherwise have by law of practising as a barrister without being a member of Lincoln's Inn or of some other similar society, and because such declaration was evidently intended to assert for the Inn, or the Masters of the Bench of it, the right of imposing such restrictions; that the making of such declarations a condition of withdrawal from the Inn was contrary to public policy, and, therefore, illegal, as restricting the plaintiff or any person making the same from practising in any part of the United Kingdom; that such condition was, further, contrary to public policy as interfering with the right which our colonies or some of them had or claimed to have of regulating the practice of their own courts; that the Society of Lincoln's-inn was and claimed to be a private association, and, as such, claimed to exercise the uncontrolled right of admitting whom it pleased to be members thereof, and administering or allowing the Masters of the Bench to administer, without publicity or accountability to any but themselves, the funds and property belonging to or held in trust for the society; that the society had at different times repudiated and successfully resisted the right of the Court of Queen's Bench to interfere with their proceedings by the process of mandamus, which right the Court of Queen's Bench would undoubtedly have if the society were a body corporate or politic, or otherwise claiming to exercise or to possess any public function or character; that, even supposing that such monopoly of conferring the right of admission to the Bar might in some other form be useful and desirable, it was, nevertheless, contrary to public policy that such a monopoly should be enjoyed and made a source of revenue by a private and irresponsible association; that such monopoly was in fact a source of revenue or pecuniary advantage to the society, and more especially to the Masters of the Bench of it; that no grant of such monopoly or of any share therein was ever in fact made by any charter or letters patent to the society; and that, even supposing

(which the plaintiff did not admit) that any such monopoly could be legally claimed on the ground of prescription by a body corporate or politic, the society, not having that character, and not being or having been otherwise capable of receiving a grant in its collective capacity, was not capable of making a title to it by prescription; that for the reasons so stated the plaintiff was entitled to be discharged from his liability under the bond, and to have the same delivered up to him or cancelled on paying to the defendants or to the society the dues incurred by him up to the present time, which the plaintiff had already offered and thereby again offered to do on delivery or cancelling of the bond, and that he was further willing and thereby offered to pay all costs hitherto incurred by the defendants, the Hon. Richard Denman and the Hon. George Denman, in the action at law; but that as to the composition required of him, in addition to the dues, the plaintiff desired to be informed of the amount of such claim and the grounds thereof. The bill then, as originally framed, prayed a decree that the defendants might make a full and true discovery and disclosure of and concerning all and singular the transactions and matters in the bill mentioned, and that in the meantime the defendants (the plaintiffs in the action at law), might be restrained by injunction from proceeding in the action at law commenced by them against the plaintiff in this suit, and from commencing or prosecuting any other action or proceedings at law against the plaintiff in respect of or concerning the matters aforesaid, or any of them, and that the defendants, or such one or two of them as had the custody or disposal of the bond and petition, or either of them, might, on payment by the plaintiff of the dues and costs and also of the composition, if properly chargeable upon him, to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, deliver up the bond and petition to the plaintiff. The bill (as amended during the hearing at the bar) then prayed for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to retire from the Society of Lincoln's Inn without giving any undertaking not to practise as a barrister, and without being subject to any condition against his practising as a barrister, and without being liable to the payment of any fine or composition on his retiring from the society.

Dickinson, Q.C., and Pemberton, for the defendants, supported the demurrer, and contended that there was no equity whatever in the plaintiff's case. They said, inter alia, that what he really sought to obtain by his bill was the power of practising, if he chose to do so, as a barrister, without being also the member of an Inn of Court. But both law and custom were alike opposed to that. To be a barrister, a man must first become a member of an Inn of Court. The benchers of his inn, in due course called him to the Bar. The publication of the call to the Bar was by the benchers of the society, who had, as benchers, no authority in court. The call was not to the bar of this or any other court, but only to the Bar of the particular society. That was a consequence of the moots or exercises which, in ancient times, were required from those who desired to attain the degree of a barrister-at-law. If a man ceased to be a member of any of the inns of court, he lost his right to practise as a barrister in the ordinary sense of the term. The inns of court were private bodies. Their origin was, perhaps, obscure; but from time immemorial they had the power of admitting members or rejecting applicants for admission to their own societies. They alone had the privilege of calling their own members to the Bar; and in all matters of internal regulation and management of their property and otherwise, the only forum of appeal for the societies or their members, if aggrieved or at variance inter se, was to the judges of the Superior Courts of England, as visitors of the societies. There had, indeed, been some cases at common law in which the jurisdiction of the inns of court over their members had come under discussion with respect to the issuing of a writ of mandamus, such as Cunningham v. Wegg (2 Brown's Ch. Cas. 241); Reg v. Gray's Inn (1 Douglas, 353); Reg. v. Barnard's Inn (5 Ad. & Ell. 17); Reg. v. Lincoln's Inn (4 Barn. & Cres. 858). But there never had been any instance of the interference of a court of equity with the private and internal affairs of an Inn of Court. The plaintiff's position then was, in equity, this: He had voluntarily joined a voluntary society, governed by rules of its own, to which he, as a member, had assented, and he had given that society his bond, conditioned for the payment of certain money, which by his bill he admitted he owed, and for which he had been sued at law, and yet he sought to be discharged from such liabilities. No doubt he had ceased to practise, but he could not say he had not derived some benefit from his having been a member of the society. In conclusion, there was not any ground for his bill. He had not made out a case, either of trust or of contract, of fraud, mistake, or account. There was absolutely nothing to justify the interference of this court, as he proposed; and if the court did grant him the relief he sought, it would not only be utterly without precedent, but would operate as a revolution of the society which there was nothing to palliate or excuse.

Neate, who appeared in his robes.—The points which he intended to raise were these: That there was a monopoly now enjoyed by the Inns of Court, which depended entirely on the allowance of the judges; that it was in the power of the judges to admit other persons than members of an inn of court to practise as barristers—for instance, those who had taken a degree in laws at the Univerities; that the judges possessed that power under delegation from the Crown, as appeared from Dugdale's "Origines Juridiciales"; that the paper which the society required him to sign on leaving it was intended to restrain him from using the liberty which might be given by any alteration in the rules to be made by the judges, and was therefore contrary to public policy.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, having heard the plaintiff state a résumé of the arguments he proposed to offer in support of his bill, said that if the defendants' view was correct—viz., that this court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit—it would not only be waste of time, but improper to discuss, as he otherwise must do, the characters, constitutions, and powers of Lincoln's and other similar societies. He wished the plaintiff, therefore, to confine his arguments to the preliminary question of jurisdiction.

Neate upon that contended that the right of every man now to enter into the service of the public in any way he chose was much more fully recognised than it was formerly. The case of the profession of a barrister was analogous. It was perfectly idle, therefore, to regard our Inns of Court as mere private bodies, and as wholly and solely governed by what was called a domestic jurisdiction. The Inns of Court were really public bodies. Each was a corporation "de son tort," if he might so say. The defendants spoke of an appeal to the Judges, but was there ever any case heard of—certainly none like the present—in which they had acted, or would be disposed to act, in the manner now suggested? He then commented briefly on some of the authorities cited on the other side. After a few observations on the pleadings, and remarking that a Master of Arts of either University might be, and was a M.A., without being a member of the University, concluded by submitting that he was entitled to the relief he prayed by his bill, and that the demurrer to it ought to be overruled.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said.—It appears to me that I have no jurisdiction to try the question raised in this case. Mr. Neate, no doubt, is well aware of the difficulties which may arise between a member of an Inn of Court and the Inn itself with reference to the management of its property, because he has commented on the case of Cunningham v. Wegg (ante). He says that decision cannot be maintained. But sitting here as a Judge of First Instance, I could not do otherwise than follow it. However, I will express no opinion on that case; for my judgment in the present one does not depend on that case. The jurisdiction of this court, as well as that of a court of law, may in certain cases, and, indeed, must in some, be found to exist in respect of the management of property, even although in such instances an Inn of Court may be parties to the litigation. However, a case of property, in the strict sense of the term, is one with which I am not dealing on the present occasion. If it it were such a case, I should be found to follow Cunningham v. Wegg (ante). This is a case in which the question is between the plaintiff and the defendants, the latter of whom may, for the purposes of this suit, be considered as representing the Society of Lincoln's-inn. The question is simply and solely as to the position and rights of the plaintiff as a member of the society. He voluntarily became a member of it, and gave it a bond to pay certain dues during the whole of the time that he should be and until he ceased to continue a member of it. The condition of the bond contains no stipulations as to the mode or circumstances by or under which he should cease to be a member of the society. That was left to the internal regulations of the society itself, of which he had become, and still is, a member. Therefore, in that state of things, the right to retire from the society which the plaintiff claims is entirely a question between him and the society. He says he has a right to retire. He does not say he has already retired and is not now a member, because if he had said that it would have been a defence to the action at law. He says he made a proposal to the society to be allowed to retire from being a member of it, but that they refused to permit him to do so except on terms with which he says he is not bound to comply. That is a question entirely for the peculiar jurisdiction which has been referred to in the arguments, and which has always been recognised—namely, that of the Judges of the Superior Courts of England. They have the power of deciding such questions as the present. If the plaintiff had no remedy by an appeal to the Judges, he might, and probably would have, a right to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus. That, however, would be by reason of the fact that he had no other remedy. No case had been referred to in which the courts of equity have interfered between the Benchers of an inn of court and a member of the same society to restrain an action at law under such circumstances as the present. I consider that the judgments in the cases of Reg. v. The Benchers of Lincoln's Inn (ante), and Reg. v. Gray's Inn (ante), although judgments of common law courts are binding on me and prevent my entertaining any jurisdiction in this case. If there were no appeal to the Judges, there might be a right to a mandamus. I think I have no power to deal with this case, and that the bill in it is not well-founded. It was said, however, that the claim to have the bond delivered up would of itself confer an equity on the plaintiff. With reference to that, the rule of this court is, as Mr. Neate knows, that the court will not interfere if the invalidity of the instrument appears on the face of it. A document is, on the face of it, either legal or it is not. If it is illegal, it is inoperative, and there is, therefore, a valid defence at law with respect to it. If, on the other hand, it is legal, but the circumstances are such that the party cannot avail himself of them at law, then, if the case be as this is, one between a society and a member of it, with a proper forum to which to appeal—viz., the Judges—this court ought not to interfere; and this court will not be induced to do so merely because the bill seeks the delivery up of the document. I may observe that it is not in every case that this court does interfere when it can. Its jurisdiction as to the delivery up and cancellation of documents is peculiar. It usually interferes in the instances of bills of exchange and promissory notes, because they may be negotiable; but the considerations applicable to these cases do not affect that of a bond. I have recently had to consider that in a case of Binns v. Fisher (17th Dec. 1873), in which I held that the plaintiffs had not sufficient equity to entitle them to have their bond delivered up to them. On the whole of this case, I am of opinion that the plaintiff has failed in establishing his right to the relief which he seeks. I have not made any observation on Mr. Neate's offer to pay the £23 11s., and his admission that he might have had, as he no doubt has had, some benefit from being a member of this society, such as the use of its library, and so forth. He does not rest his case on that; and, if he had done so, I think it would not have assisted him. Perhaps I should say that any relief he may seek with respect to future actions against him he may embody in his appeal to the judges. His case here really seems to me to be found in the amendment which was proposed to his bill—namely, the declaration that he is entitled to retire from the Society of Lincoln's-inn without giving any undertaking not to practise as a barrister, and without being subject to any condition against his practising as one, and without being liable to the payment of any fine or composition on his retiring from the society. In conclusion, I must hold that the demurrer must be allowed.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND ON THE DUTIES OF A JUDGE.

IN the course of his peroration in summing up the Tichborne case Sir A. Cockburn said—We must remember that while it is the business of judicial action to protect innocence, so, on the other hand, it is the duty of the judge to take care that the guilty do not escape. In the conviction of the innocent and also in the escape of the guilty lies, as the old saying says, the condemnation of the judge. It is the condemnation of the judges of the fact as well as of the judge who presides at the trial. You must take care that the innocent does not suffer, but you owe it to society that if guilt is brought home to the accused that guilt shall carry with it the consequences of the verdict. You have been asked, gentleman, to give the defendant the benefit of any doubts you may entertain. Most assuredly it is your duty to do so. It is the business of the prosecution to bring home guilt to the accused to the satisfaction of the jury. But the doubt of which the accused is entitled to the benefit must be the doubt that a rational, that a sensible man may fairly entertain, not the doubt of a vacillating mind that has not the moral courage to decide, but shelters itself in a vain and idle scepticism. It is not a doubt of that kind; it must be a doubt which honest and conscientious men can entertain. But, gentlemen, you have been addressed in language the like of which has never before been heard within these walls. You have been exhorted, if there should be one man who might entertain any different opinion from the rest of his brother jurymen, that he should obstinately stick to it without seeking to reconcile it with the opinion of the rest of the body. I never heard that language addressed to a jury before, and therefore I am obliged to express my judicial sense of such an argument, not that I believe there is the slightest necessity for warning you against the doctrine, which might lead to mischievous consequences if it were to be entertained. But as the doctrine has been propounded, I must make an observation or two upon it. I should be the last man to suggest to any individual member of the jury that if he entertains conscientious, fixed convictions, although he may stand alone against his eleven fellow jurors, he should give up the profound and unaltered conviction of his own mind. The law requires the unanimous verdict of twelve men before a verdict of either "Guilty" or "Not guilty" can be finally pronounced, and I say that if a man is satisfied on the evidence, after having given to the case every attention in his power, that he cannot find a verdict with the rest of his fellow-jurymen, it is right that he should stand by his conviction. But then we must recollect that he has a duty to perform and that it is this. He is bound to give the case every possible consideration before he finally determines upon the course he will pursue, and if a man finds himself differing from the rest of his fellows with whom he is associated in the great and solemn function of the administration of justice as jurymen, he should start with the fair presumption that the one individual is more likely to be wrong than the eleven from whom he differs. He should bear in mind that the great purpose of trial by jury is to obtain unanimity and to put an end to further litigation; he should address himself in all humility and all diffidence in his own judgment to the task he has to perform, and carefully consider all the reasons and arguments which the rest of the body are able to put forward for the judgment they are ready to pronounce, and he should let no self-conceit, no notion of being superior to the rest in intelligence, no vain presumption of superiority on his part, stand in the way. What I am anxious to impress on you, and not on you only, is that the one or two who may stand alone against their fellows are bound to do their best to satisfy their minds that sound sense and judgment are not with the majority instead of with the few. That this is the duty which the juryman owes to the administration of justice and the opinion of his fellows, and therefore I must protest against the attempt to encourage a single juryman, or one or two among a body of twelve, to stand out resolutely, positively, and with fixed determination and purpose, against the judgment and opinion of the majority. If such rules as were laid down by the learned counsel for the defendant were adopted and acted upon, and great trials rendered abortive by no verdicts being pronounced, and the recommencement of long protracted litigation would be necessarily occasioned, it would make trial by jury not the blessing that it is—the great and noble institution that it is, but a curse in the administration of justice, and lead by legislation to a modification in our existing course of procedure—a modification which I for one do not desire to see introduced. I have long thought that a jury, assisted by a judge, is a far better tribunal for the elucidation and establishment of truth than a judge unassisted by a jury would be. But I am perfectly satisfied that it is the business of the judge to assist the jury in the way I have sought to assist you, by placing the whole case before you, by pointing out all the facts and the inferences which appear to me to arise from those facts. I trust you will be able, whichever way your verdict goes, to pronounce an unanimous verdict, and to put an end to this litigation, so as not to create in the popular mind the intense dissatisfaction which would arise from this trial being rendered abortive by the dissensions of the jury, which might lead to the introduction of a change in our system which then, I think, would be loudly called for, a change which I for one would deprecate and deplore, although its necessity would perhaps be undoubted, and the change would be one which everybody would approve. So much for that matter. But I have also heard other language addressed to you, such as I never heard before in a court of justice, and which I hope and trust I shall never hear again. You have been invited to pronounce your judgment not simply with reference to your own convictions, but with a view to promised "ovations" at the hands of your fellow countrymen. I am sure there is not one of you, however much you may desire that public opinion should go along with you and should ratify your verdict, however much you may desire that that which you do should find favour in the sight of your fellow countrymen, I am sure there is not one of you who would not consider it an insult to be asked to sacrifice his own sense of duty and of right for the sake of popular applause, or the idle gratification resulting from what is called "the ovation" of your countrymen. There is but one course to follow in the discharge of great public duties. No man should be insensible to public opinion who has to discharge a public trust. No man should be insensible to the value of the good opinion, if you like, the applause of your fellow countrymen. But there is a consideration far higher than that. It is the satisfaction of your own internal sense of duty, the satisfaction of your own conscience, the knowledge that you are following the promptings of that still small voice which never, if we listen honestly to its dictates, misleads or deceives—that still small voice whose approval upholds us even though men should condemn us, and whose approval is far more precious than the honour or applause we may derive, no matter from what source—that voice whose approval makes us walk by day serene and makes our pillow smooth by night. Listen to that, gentlemen, listen to that; do right and care not for anything that may be thought, or said, or done without these walls. In this, the sacred temple of justice, such considerations as those to which I have referred ought to have and can have no place. You and I have only one thing to consider, it is the duty we have to discharge before God and man, according to the only manner we should desire to discharge it — honestly, truly, and fearlessly, without regard to any consequences except the desire that this duty should be properly and entirely fulfilled. And, gentlemen, I say it without fear, and I say it not unadvisedly, that we have been threatened. A system of intimidation has been attempted to be brought to bear upon us who are seated here to administer justice. We have been told that if our countrymen do not meet us with sufficient reprobation the history of this cause shall be written in which those who do not take part with the defendant, or who think it necessary in the honest and fearless discharge of their duty to point out things that may make against him, shall be delivered over to the unrestrained licence of unqualified abuse. We are to be handed down to posterity covered with infamy. I have heard language applied to this tribunal which I will undertake to say in the whole annals of the administration of justice in this country no advocate ever before dreamt of addressing to a court. When I say I heard it, I must correct the phrase. I did not hear it. It had been spoken with bated breath, and I must suppose only with the purpose and intention that I should not hear it. If I had heard it, most unquestionably it should not have passed without that punishment which it is competent for this court to inflict, and which should be inflicted upon those who outrage decency, and heap upon it indignity and insult. The learned counsel spoke with bated breath, loud enough for the reporters to catch his words, but not for us. And yet one or two words caught our listening ears, which to me seemed as if some contumely or insult was intended to be conveyed, and I called upon the learned counsel to speak out as a man should speak; but his answer was that his indisposition, brought about by overwork and exertion, prevented him from speaking aloud. Afterwards, however, when he changed his subject, he was loud enough to be heard at the other side of Westminster Hall. I must say that in the way the learned counsel comes forward to insult this court there is cowardice and insult combined. I rejoice to see the Bar of England here, in order that its members may hear the way in which a member of their body addressed the Court of Queen's Bench—I will say the august Court of Queen's Bench. There is abundant opportunity for pointing out any errors into which it may fall, but the Court is not to be insulted and bearded in this manner. "There is no actor in this trial," says the learned counsel, "from the humblest to the most exalted" (we know whom he means), "who may not well look with apprehension and almost with dismay at the position he may occupy before his countrymen and the world for all future ages. I should be sorry to think that there is any person connected with this great controversy who does not look with a species of pride in maintaining an honest fame before the world and posterity. I should be sorry to think that there was one of us who was dead to the future—who did not sometimes ask himself, with the utmost feeling of solemnity, 'How shall I also appear in the historical reminiscences of this great trial?' For my own part, from the first moment that I became connected with it I knew that it was one which must cover the names of all prominently engaged in it, in future ages, either with infamy or with honour, and I on a former occasion took the liberty of calling your attention to the blazon of glory which still surrounds the names (this is intended for you, gentlemen), and which will for ever surround the names, of all those noble jurymen who were connected, in a former age, with the great Annesley trial, and I am anxious that a similar illumination of splendour should surround not your names only, but the names of others also, in the eyes of those persons who will read this trial during all ages, because never was there a trial in England, I believe, since that memorable trial of Charles I. which has excited more the attention of Englishmen and the world than this. Many things have passed in the course of this trial which I would give a portion of my heart's blood had not passed. Many things have occurred in the course of this trial which in my judgment will for ever blur and sully the name of certain individuals—individuals with whose name and glory many of us were concerned, individuals whose name and glory are part—" Here I said, "Will you speak a little louder?" and the learned counsel said, "I will speak as loud as I can." It would be idle to affect or pretend not to know to whom these observations connected with the alternative of infamy or honour were addressed. Whose names are to be "blurred and sullied" for the future? Is that the way in which counsel is to speak of the judges of the tribunal before whom he is pleading? I am sure that there must come but one response from the body that I see before me. (Applause from the Bar, which was immediately checked.) Gentlemen, the history of this cause may be written by whom it may; I care not. I am conscious of having done my duty in it, and I can only say—

> There is no terror in your threats,
> For I am armed so strong in honesty
> That they pass by me like an idle wind
> Which I regard not.

But the history of this cause may be written hereafter by a pen steeped in gall and venom—a pen that may not scruple to lampoon the living or revile and calumniate the dead; I have no fears, the facts will speak for themselves. I have administered justice here now for many years. I cannot hope that my memory, like that of the great and illustrious men who have gone before me, will live unto after ages; but I do hope it will live in the remembrance—may I venture to say in the affectionate remembrance—of the generation before whom and with whom I have administered justice; and if my name shall be traduced, if my conduct shall be reviled, if my integrity shall be questioned, I leave the protection of my memory to the Bar of England (applause, which was again immediately suppressed), my relations with whom have never until this trial been in the slightest degree other than the most pleasant, and whose support has been, I may say, the happiness of my judicial life. Gentlemen, I have done; I have discharged my duty to the best of my ability. It only remains that you shall do yours, and I am sure that the verdict you will pronounce will be received on all hands, except by fanatics and fools, as the judgment of twelve men who have brought to the consideration of this great cause the most vigilant attention, the most marked and, I may say, remarkable intelligence, and the most sincere desire to discharge their duty before God and man according to what they believe in their hearts and souls to be the truth and justice of the case.

Mr. Justice MELLOR also said: I am proud to say that throughout the whole of this trial there has never been a difference of opinion between us on a single point. I adopt the directions of my Lord Chief Justice fully, and I consider myself as responsible for them as if I had uttered them myself, entirely agreeing with him, as I do, in his views of the evidence, and also in his remarks on the highly censurable conduct of the leading counsel for the defence. I cannot but think that if a like spirit were manifested by the Bar, if advocates were at liberty to treat as enemies all those who were on the other side, to brand them as perjurers and conspirators, and to use denunciation and slander as a weapon, the so-called independence of the Bar would become a public nuisance. I am sure I know the feeling of the Bar of England too well to think for a moment that they would wish to use any such weapon, or that they would accept the challenge which the learned counsel has chosen to throw out. The views of the Lord Chief Justice are the views of us all, and I emphatically say I entirely concur with what he has laid down as the duty of a judge. Some people seem to think that the more cogent the facts the more the judge ought to try to neutralize them. I cannot concur in such an opinion; the duty of the judge is to assist the jury in the discovery of truth, whether the truth make for one side or the other.

THE NEW ASSISTANT JUDGE OF THE MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Thursday, March 5.

THIS morning Mr. Edlin, Q.C., of the Western Circuit, who has been appointed Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions, in succession to Sir William Bodkin, was sworn in. Mr. Edlin only received his appointment at a late hour last night, consequently very few of the magistrates were present, and a long delay occurred before a sufficient number could be got together to form a quorum. The Bar was represented by Mr. Brindley, Mr. Warner Sleigh, and Mr. Sims. Mr.

Edlin was first sworn in as a justice of the peace, and having retired, he returned into court robed, and was then sworn in as the Assistant Judge.

Mr. Pownall said he could not permit the opportunity to pass of his Lordship taking the chair of the court as Assistant Judge without expressing the extreme sorrow he felt with regard to Sir W. Bodkin, whose ill-health had compelled him to resign. He was speaking the sentiments, not only of every magistrate on that bench, but of every member of the Bar, and of all who had been in attendance at that court, that Sir William Bodkin was, by his integrity, by his great ability, and by his great knowledge pre-eminently qualified for the office which he held. The high standing in his profession which he (Mr. Edlin) held fully justified the choice made, and on behalf of the Bench he assured him that he would be received with kindness, cordiality, and friendship. He sincerely trusted that he would long be spared to adorn the Bench, and that he might long enjoy tranquillity of mind to go through his laborious duties.

Mr. Brindley, as the senior member of the Bar present, congratulated his Lordship on his appointment to a position for which his high standing in his Profession eminently qualified him, and assured him that the Bar would always extend that courtesy and consideration which he was sure the Bar would receive from his Lordship.

Mr. Warner Sleigh, on behalf of the Bar, paid a high compliment to Sir William Bodkin, whose resignation had been received with great regret by the whole Bar. He assured Mr. Serjeant Cox that the Bar appreciated the uniform kindness and courtesy which had always been characteristic of him, and that in leaving he took with him the entire unanimous goodwill of the whole Bar.

His Lordship returned his sincerest thanks for the kind and cordial welcome which had been accorded to him by the Bench and the Bar on his taking his seat as Assistant-Judge of these Sessions. It was to him a source of great satisfaction to know that he would be assisted in the discharge of his duties by a body of gentlemen, learned, and very much experienced in the conduct of the business of the court. With regard to his friend Mr. Serjeant Cox, he had known him for a period of twenty-five years, and from the first day to this, they had been on terms of complete confidence, and not one word had ever passed between them which could not be regarded with satisfaction to both.

Mr. Serjeant Cox said that he left the court with considerable feelings of disappointment. He had certainly hoped that long services would have led to his appointment to the office, the duties of which he had so long discharged. Her Majesty's late Ministers had, however, thought differently, and he bowed to their decision. The learned gentleman then congratulated Mr. Edlin on his appointment, and said that no better man could have been found for the post.

The Assistant Judge then proceeded with the business of the court.

DR. KENEALY.—The Pall Pall Gazette writes:—Not presuming to paint the lily or adorn the rose, we would direct attention to one particular point in connection with the trial which ought not to be allowed to drop. We refer to the charges made by the Lord Chief Justice against the defendant's counsel. Dr. Kenealy has not only been rebuked by the Bench with a degree of severity with which in all probability no counsel ever was rebuked before; but he has been specifically charged with the gravest professional misconduct of which a barrister can be guilty. The Lord Chief Justice says, in a great variety of different ways, that he has scattered foul accusations against all manner of persons without the smallest excuse or ground for it. Now this is surely not an accusation which ought to be made against a Queen's Counsel by the Lord Chief Justice of England without leading to something further. It is not decent that a man who occupies a conspicuous public position and discharges important public functions in respect of it, should have such imputations publicly thrown upon him and that nothing whatever should come of it. If what the judges have publicly said of Dr. Kenealy is true, he ought to be disbarred. If it is not true, he ought to be publicly relieved of the imputations made against him. The state of things is very much as if an officer in the army were publicly charged by the Commander-in Chief with gross misconduct in the field. Such a charge ought to be publicly investigated and adjudicated upon. We have heard a great deal lately about legal education and the Inns of Court, and, oddly enough, a case was decided within the last day or two as to the right of a barrister to withdraw from his inn without forfeiting his right to practise. If there ever was a case in which the particular Inn of Court, of which Dr. Kenealy is a member, ought to feel itself bound to act, it is the present case. One of its leading members stands publicly charged with a number of odious and gratuitous slanders upon the characters of a great variety of persons in the course of the discharge of his professional duties. If they have nothing at all to say on the subject, the public will be apt to think that their existence and their powers are an anomaly which ought at once to be superseded by something more effective. The case is not one in which any elaborate inquiry into matters of fact is necessary. Shorthand writers' reports of what Dr. Kenealy said are easily accessible, and the only questions, as it appears to us, which require to be settled are these two; first, were the charges which he made made under circumstances which justified him in making them?—were they, that is, made under instructions as to their truth, to which he was bound to pay attention, or under circumstances which formed in themselves a reasonable ground for supposing them to be true? Secondly, if this is not the case, is a man who makes such charges at random a fit person to practise the profession of a barrister? After what has been said upon the subject, it is due to Dr. Kenealy himself, and it is also due to the public at large, that these questions should be investigated by a tribunal competent to adjudicate upon them. The liberty of the Bar in the matter of bringing charges against persons who are connected with proceedings in which they are engaged is no doubt a matter of great public importance; but like every other sort of liberty it must be subject to some limitations, or it leaves no liberty for anyone else. Such language as the following on the part of the highest of the common law judges ought not to be allowed to pass unnoticed. It ought in common decency to lead to further investigation: "There never was in the history of jurisprudence a case in which such an amount of imputation and invective has been heard before, and I sincerely hope there never will be another. Although the prosecution has been instituted by her Majesty's Government, and carried on on behalf of the Crown, you have been told that every one connected with it, from the highest to the lowest—counsel, solicitors, clerks, detectives, everybody—is engaged in a foul conspiracy, has resorted to the most abominable means in order to corrupt witnesses." "One man is called a villain against whom there is no more reason for bringing such a charge than against any one of us. The authorities of Stonyhurst are accused upon no ground of any sort or kind not only with not teaching morality to their students, but with the design of corrupting their minds, . . . and all this with no more foundation than if the imputations had been brought against the authorities of Eton, Westminster, or any other of our great public schools. The dead are served in the same way. . . . Captain Birkett, who has gone to his account, who went down in the Bella, is actually charged with having scuttled the ship in which he unfortunately perished. Who could conceive it possible that such vile and slanderous imputations could have been brought forward in a court of justice?" That "vile and slanderous imputations" should be brought forward in a court of justice on an occasion to which so much public attention was directed is bad enough, if the fact be so; but it will be almost a greater scandal to the Bar of England if so tremendous a charge, judicially made against a conspicuous member, should be allowed to remain uninvestigated because it is nobody's business to consider the subject.

TICHBORNIA.—The removal of all the books, papers, family photographs, oil paintings, maps of different parts of the gobe, a model of the Bella, stupendous briefs, and all other legal paraphernalia of the prosecution from the large office at Westminster occupied by the solicitors to the Treasury during the late trial has just been completed. The most interesting of the débris was a huge album, containing life-like portraits of the Dormer, Arundell, Radcliffe, Lushington, Seymour, Tichborne, and Orton families, which are so arranged as to show at a glance contrasts in the status and physiognomy of the former ancient line and the Ortons with their pedigrees. This album will now be deposited in the archives of the trial.

An authentic representation of the Tichborne trial is now in the course of execution in the Court of Queen's Bench. The selection of the characters in the picture has been made, we are happy to say, with great judiciousness, and from a professional point of view the artist, Mr. R. Lincoln Alldridge, who is well known at the Royal Academy for felicitious portrait painting, has exercised a praiseworthy determination that his picture shall not offend the punctilious etiquette of the Bar, and shall embrace the portraits of none but those who will be historically connected with the trial. The portrait of Mellor, J., is remarkably faithful, and has received the approval of the learned judge. Both Mr. Hawkins and Mr. Serjeant Parry are happily delineated, and the characteristic expression of the former learned gentleman in the course of cross-examination is very happily caught. It only remains to be said that as the portraits in the picture are taken with the consent of, and at private sittings given by those represented, and with a scrupulous regard to the etiquette which a picture may so easily infringe, an engraving of the picture will present an authentic and quasi-authoritative representation of a great legal event which might well form an addition to the limited number of sober ornaments which legal fastidiousness prescribes as fit for lawyers' offices.

NEW COUNTY COURT JUDGE.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Mr. Francis A. Bedwell, of the Equity Bar, to the County Court Judgeship of the East Yorkshire Division, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Chapman Barber. Mr. Bedwell was called to the Bar in 1855.

DEATH OF A COUNTY COURT JUDGE.—The judgeship of the County Court Circuit No. 49 is vacant by the death of Mr. William Carmalt Scott, which occurred on Tuesday, at his residence, Eccleston-square. Mr. Scott was called to the Bar in 1848, at the Middle Temple. In 1858 he was selected for the important office of principal secretary to the Lord Chancellor (Lord Chelmsford), which he held until June 1859, and again occupied the same post from July to September, 1866. In July 1865, Mr. Scott was appointed Gentleman of the Chamber to Lord Cranworth, and held that office up to July 1866. Three months after he was appointed judge of the County Court Circuit No. 53 (the Cheltenham and Gloucester district), but within a month he was transferred to Circuit 49, which includes Ashford, Canterbury, Deal, Dover, Faversham, Folkestone, Hythe, Margate, Ramsgate, Romney, Sandwich, Sittingbourne, Tenterden, and Cranbrook.

CITY POLICE COURTS.—There appears to be some prospect of a considerable alteration in the police court arrangements of the city. A proposition is in course of consideration to abolish the Mansion House as a police court, and to transfer the business at present transacted there to the Guildhall. The centralization under one roof of the whole criminal business of the city would be a great improvement upon the present divided system, but in order to render such a reform possible it would be necessary to build a new court, that at Guildhall being utterly inadequate in point of accommodation. Indeed, it is asserted that even one new court, however commodious, would not be sufficient for the purpose; but if it be possible to conduct the business of the city at present with two courts, at one of which the aldermen sit only three hours daily, and the other of which is only open from twelve to two, there can be little doubt that one court sitting the whole day, as is the case in other metropolitan districts, could encompass the work. The advantages claimed for the new plan are—first, a saving of expenses to the corporation of about £3000 a year; second, the fact that the Mansion House would then be solely the private residence of the Lord Mayor, while much more space would be available for grand receptions, banquets, and balls. To all persons connected with police court business in the city, the erection of a new and commodious court would be a great boon, and it is to be hoped that the proposed plan will, if found practicable, not occupy quite so long a time in execution as the Palace of Justice only just commenced west of Temple Bar.—Observer.

SOLICITORS AND ATTORNEYS.—At the final examination at the Incorporated Law Society 1873, the following special prizes have been awarded: Timpron Martin Prize for candidates from Liverpool.—Mr. George Barrow Cummins having passed the best examination in the year 1873, and having attained honorary distinction, the Council have awarded to him the prize, consisting of a gold medal, founded by Mr. Timpron Martin, of Liverpool. Mr. Cummins served his clerkship with Messrs. Hore and Monkhouse, of Liverpool, and Messrs. Milne, Riddle, and Mellor, of London, and obtained a prize in Michaelmas Term 1873. Atkinson Prize for candidates from Liverpool or Preston.—Mr. George Hime having, from among the candidates from Liverpool or Preston, shown himself best acquainted with the Law of Real Property and the Practice of Conveyancing, having otherwise passed a satisfactory examination, and having attained honorary distinction, the Council have awarded to him the prize, consisting of a gold medal, founded by Mr. John Atkinson, of Liverpool. Mr. Hime served his clerkship with Messrs. Anderson, Collins, and Robinson, of Liverpool, and Messrs. T. and T. Martin, of Liverpool, and obtained a prize in Michaelmas Term 1873. Broderip Prize for Real Property and Conveyancing, open to all candidates.—Mr. Henry Nicholas Grenside having among the candidates in the year 1873 shown himself best acquainted with the Law of Real Property and the Practice of Conveyancing, having passed a satisfactory examination, and having attained honorary distinction, the council have awarded him the prize, consisting of a gold medal founded by Mr. Francis Broderip, of Lincoln's-inn. Mr. Grenside served his clerkship with Messrs. Walker and Langborne, of New Malton, and Mr. Leonard Hopwood Hicks, of London, and obtained a prize in Hilary Term 1873. Scott Scholarship, open to all candidates. — Mr. Edwin Murcott being, in the opinion of the council, the candidate best acquainted with the theory, principles, and practice of law, they have awarded to him the scholarship founded by Mr. John Scott, of Lincoln's-inn-fields, London. Mr. Murcott served his clerkship with Mr. George Cattell Greenway, of Warwick, and Messrs. Robinson and Preston, of London, and obtained a prize in Michaelmas Term 1873. Birmingham Law Society's prize for candidates from Birmingham.—The examiners also reported that among the candidates from Birmingham in the year 1873, Mr. Richard Alfred Pinsent passed the best examination, and was, in the opinion of the examiners, entitled to honorary distinction. Mr. Pinsent served his clerkship with Messrs. James and Oerton, of Birmingham, and Messrs. Church and Clarke, of London, and obtained a prize in Easter Term 1873.

THE DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.—The dissolution of the recent Parliament is the twentieth of the century, the various periods having been chiefly in June and July. During this century the dissolutions have occurred as follows, viz., on June 29th, 1802; Oct. 24th, 1806; May 27th, 1807; Sept. 29th, 1812; June 10th, 1818; Feb. 29th, 1820; June 2nd, 1826; July 24th, 1830; April 22nd, 1831; Dec. 3rd, 1832; Dec. 30th, 1834; July 17th, 1837; June 23rd, 1841; July 23rd, 1847; July 1st, 1852; March 21st, 1857; April 23rd, 1859; July 6th, 1865; and Nov. 11th, 1868.

THE PATENT OFFICE.—The Athenæum is glad to perceive that the state of the Patent Office is attracting public attention. One useful mode of employing some of the annual surplus—£80,000—would be in preparing a general index to the patents. It is alleged that the new annual indexes are a hindrance, instead of a help to investigation; and the partial classified indexes cannot supply the want of a complete index to every patent in the office. The subject has engaged the attention of the Society of Arts recently, and a deputation has attended the Lord Chancellor, urging that some steps should be taken with reference to the Patent Museum, which should not be distinct from the Patent Office.

THE NEW LAW COURTS.—Lord Henry Lennox seems to be fortunate in the beginning of his career, for on Monday the most important step yet taken in connection with the new Law Courts was recorded. This certainly is not much towards completion, but is something as suggestive of more. On Monday Messrs. Bull and Son, of Southampton, the contractors, laid the foundation stone of their own offices, immediately on the completion of which, building operations will be vigorously proceeded with. Their Clerk of the Works estimates that they will hand the building over complete in a little less than seven years.

The following quaint and characteristic production was written by the late Mr. Grocott, a Liverpool solicitor:—

A LAWYER'S WILL.

25th Jan. 1835.

This is my last Will and Testament:
Read it according to my intent.

My gracious God to me hath giv'n
Store of good things that, under heav'n,
Are giv'n to those "that love the Lord,
And hear and do His sacred Word:"
I therefore give to my dear Wife
All my Estates, to keep for life,
Real and Personal, Profits, Rents,
Messuages, Lands, and Tenements;
After her death, I give the whole
Unto my Children, one and all,
To take as "Tenants in Common" do,
Not as "Joint Tenants," "per mie—per tout."
May God Almighty bless His Word
To all my "presents from the Lord,"
May He His blessings on them shed
When down in sleep they lay their head.
I give all my "Trust Estates" in fee
To Charlotte my Wife and Devisee,
To hold to her, on Truste, the same
As I now hold them in my name;
I give her power to convey the fee,
As fully as though 'twere done by me,
And here declare that from all "charges"
My Wife's "Receipts are good dis-charges."
And now, my Wife, my hopes I fix
On thee, my sole Executrix—
My truest, best, and to the end
My faithful Partner, "Crown," and Friend.

In Witness whereof, I hereunto
My Hand and Seal have set,
In presence of those who names below
Subscribe and witness it.

J. C. G. (L.S.)

This will was published, sealed, and sign'd,
By the Testator, in his right mind,
In presence of us, who, at his request,
Have written our names these facts to attest.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF JAMAICA.—The Earl of Carnarvon has nominated Mr. G. H. Barne, of the Western Circuit, to the Attorney-Generalship of Jamaica, vacant by the death of Mr. E. A. C. Schalch.

OFFICIAL LIQUIDATORS.—To-day is the last day for official liquidators to apply at the Rolls for remuneration during the present sittings.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—Lord Cairns has just made an order, countersigned by Sir George Jessel, that forty causes before Vice-Chancellor Hall be transferred to the Master of the Rolls.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS.—Some new regulations are now in force, one of which is that the judges will not take summonses which can be heard by the master unless the same are referred to him. The business will not commence before eleven o'clock, and counsel will be heard at twelve o'clock, and the name of the counsel, when known, is to be given to the opposite side. A new regulation will be enforced by the Lord Chief Justice—that he will not sit on Saturdays while he is the "judge in town."

THE Standard says that the Great Seal in Ireland will be placed in commission, it having been deemed best for the public interests that no appointment to the office of Lord Chancellor should be made until the final settlement of the various questions affecting the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland.

Re OCCLESTON (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 785, Chan.).—Judicial endeavours to visit the sins of the parents on the children have been frustrated since 1838 by the Wills Act, which provides that, to save continual re-executions a will shall speak as if signed at time of death, unless a contrary intention appears. Occleston clearly intended his will to speak from his death, and at that time Margaret Occleston was "born" and had acquired the necessary reputation, and did not fall within the alleged rule of law prohibiting provision being made for illegitimate children "to be begotten." If Occleston had signed his will again just before his death no question could have arisen, and the Wills Act in reality did this for him. Although not decided it would appear that children of single women en ventre sa mere cannot take except by special description, but the addition of such a provision (without naming the father) for children of whom the female might be pregnant at time of testator's death, would make everything safe.

MAKING INFANTS BANKRUPTS.—I perceive that in a leading article in the LAW TIMES the writer expresses an opinion that the decision of Mr. Stonor, in Re Landon, that an infant may be made a bankrupt under the present Act of 1869, is opposed to the case of Maclean v. Dummett, in the Privy Council (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710), "and must, therefore, be doubted, if not disputed." On reference to the case in question, I think you will find that this is not so. That case was on a Colonial (Barbadoes) Bankruptcy Act, and referred to traders only; and the decision of the Privy Council was that there was no petitioning creditor's debt, even if the party had been adult, and certainly none as he was an infant. In other words there was no trading and no debt. This was in accordance with the bankruptcy law of England up to 1861. But in the Acts of 1861 and 1869, both traders and non-traders are liable to be made bankrupt, and its having been decided that an infant may be made bankrupt on his own petition (Re Smedley and Re Burser); and I cannot see any reason why an infant may not be made bankrupt for any lawful debt, as for necessaries, or judgments recovered against him, &c. The only argument I can see against it is that there are no special provisions as to infants in the Act, but I cannot think that this is sufficient to control the clear operation of this Act.

HILARY FINAL EXAMINATION.—Seven weeks have elapsed since last Term's final examination was held, and there are, as yet, no signs of the list of honour men being published. Peradventure, the examiners are a-sleeping? At our Universities the lists of law honours are settled in a week; but there the examiners are men selected because of their capacity to examine.—

REJECTED BALLOT PAPERS.—At the last election for my borough, on examining the ballot papers previously to counting the votes, I found one containing a card folded in it, issued by the candidate's agent to the voter, pointing out his number on the register and his polling station. I placed the ballot paper on one side, intending to reject it, but by accident it got mixed with other ballot papers, and I could not identify it. The placing the card in the ballot box, no doubt, was an offence under the sub-sect. 4 of sect. 3 of the Ballot Act, but it would be impossible to discover the offender without opening the packet of used counterfoils. Would the ballot paper have been rightly rejected under the above circumstances? If not, it would lead to bribery to any extent. I think that the above case has not yet come under the notice of your readers.

70. SCHOOL BOARD ACCOUNTS.—I am at a loss to make out from the orders for the school board accounts how the clerk is to show his balances properly, and if any reader who has had experience of school board accounts can and will enlighten me, I shall be greatly obliged. The clerk is to receive, as far as I can see, no money, and to pay but very little, as the fees are to be paid to the treasurer and the rates and Government grants, and the treasurer is to pay all sums over £5. These sums not passing through the clerk's hands in any way, in what manner is he to take account of them? Is he simply to debit or credit any moneys which he knows have been received or which the board have ordered to be paid? Is there any treatise published on school board accounts? A CLERK.

71. PARTNER OF MAGISTRATE'S CLERK.—A client of mine was charged before a bench of magistrates at petty sessions with felony. The solicitor who appeared for the prosecution was objected to by my counsel on the ground that he had no right to appear for the prosecution as his partner was clerk to the Bench hearing the case; the Bench, however, overruled the objection. I should be glad if any of your correspondents who are experienced in magisterial business would inform me whether the Bench were right or not in overruling the objection. A SUBSCRIBER.

72. PROMISSORY NOTE—ALTERATION OF SIGNATURE BY HOLDER—RIGHT OF ACTION.—The maker is illiterate. He put his signature to a note, leaving out, through ignorance, some of the letters of his name. Holder (without fraud) inserted the letters which had been omitted to make it clear who was the maker. Would this be a "material alteration" so as to effect the holder's right of action? J. H. L.

73. ARTICLED CLERK—BOOKS, &c.—I shall be glad if some of your readers will enlighten me on the following: Before execution of articles (a few months ago) I was under the impression that my principal was to supply me with the use of proper books. He now advises me to purchase later editions than he has in his possession. There is no article in the indenture referring to books, but my father has covenanted to find "medicine, clothing, and all other necessaries." Are books included in "necessaries," or is my principal, who has covenanted to instruct me by the best means in his power, bound to find me proper books to study from? LINCOLN.

 INTESTACY — ASSIGNMENT OF LEASEHOLDS (1000 YEARS).—The children of the intestate are infants and orphans. Is the administrator alone able to assign? If so, who should be the parties to convey? An answer will oblige. E. V.

75. LANDLORD AND TENANT.—At the expiration of the term the tenant's son carries off the padlocks of barns, which padlocks belong to the landlord. No notice is taken of the latter's application to the tenants to replace. What course should be taken? X. Y.

76. EJECTMENT BY MORTGAGEE.—A., B., C., and D., are tenants in common of certain freehold premises held by one tenant upon a yearly tenancy. A. is entitled to seven-tenths of the whole; B., C., and D., to one-tenth each. A.'s share is mortgaged, and the mortgagees are in possession. A. and her mortgagees are desirous of determining the tenancy with a view to raising the rent. B., C., and D., refuse to concur in giving notice. Can A. and her mortgagees do so and sustain effectually an action of ejectment (if requisite) as to the whole, or what course must be adopted? T. F. H.

77. SATISFIED MORTGAGE TERM.—In 1840 A., an owner in fee, mortgaged his estate to B. for £100. The mortgage was by demise in the usual form for 1000 years. In 1850 the mortgage money was paid off, and an indorsement made on the mortgage to that effect, and signed by the mortgagee, who thereupon handed over the deed to the mortgagor. The mortgagor has now sold the estate, and the purchaser's solicitor requires the concurrence of the mortgagee. But is this necessary since the Act of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112 (Satisfied Terms Act)? X.

78. CONVEYANCING — HABENDUM. — After the usual testatum granting the property to the purchaser and his heirs, the habendum runs as follows: "To have and to hold the said hereditaments and premises hereby granted, with their rights, members, and appurtenances unto the said A. B., his heirs and assigns, for ever." The words "and to the use of" are omitted, and as I never remember to have seen this done, I should like to know whether in the opinion of any of the readers of the LAW TIMES the title to the property is affected in any way. TYRO.

Answers.

(Q. 63.) SEAL.—I think "Owl's" answer is incorrect. The real question is, whether the settlement is sealed. He begs the question. Lord Coke (3 Inst. 169) defined a seal to be wax impressed, or wax with an impression, adding that wax without an impression is not a seal. Practically, an impression upon some tenacious substance capable of being impressed (4 Kent's Com. 452; 6 Peterdorff's Abridg. 363). But it has in recent times been held that a stamped ink impression is a sufficient seal; and in these days, when mere technicalities are discouraged, and no distinctive seal is usual, it is open to the parties in executing the deed to adopt a piece of green ribbon as a seal if they think proper, and it was indeed expressly decided in Re Mayer (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 373) that the usual attestation clause in a case like that mentioned by "T. P. H." is prima facie evidence that the deed is sealed. C. H. B.

(Q. 68.) BALLOT ACT — PERSONATION. — The voter would be guilty of personation, but I do not think the presiding officer could order him into custody. It is evident he could not do so except at the request of a personation agent, who must declare that he verily believes, &c.; and this circumstance is omitted from the case put. But I will suppose that a personation agent makes this statement to the officer. The officer is then required "immediately after such person has voted to order him to be taken into custody." To vote is to complete the offence, which is till then only inchoate. The time for the lawful arrest is clearly specified, "immediately after the vote," and no other arrest will be lawful. By not voting the voter prevents this moment from arriving, and the officer has consequently no power to order him into custody. OWL.

(Q. 69.) QUALIFICATION OF JUSTICES.—The course is a quo warranto information, leave to file which must be obtained from the Queen's Bench. Upon motion supported by an affidavit of the relator or person bringing the charge, the court grants a rule calling upon the defendant to show cause why information should not be filed. The defendant replies by affidavit, and if cause is not shown to the satisfaction of the court leave is granted to file the information. See 32 Geo. 3 c. 58. OWL.

Replication.

(Q. 63.) SEAL.—Can "Owl" give an authority for his answer? Are not the words "I deliver this as my act and deed" a sufficient adoption of the silk as a seal? Surely the red paper of the wafers used on paper deeds has no intrinsic virtue which is lacking to green silk. LOOKER-ON.

SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

THE Board of Directors of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, in transmitting a copy of the reports for the past year to the members of the association, announcing that the Right Hon. Lord Selborne has kindly consented to preside at the ensuing anniversary festival of the association, which, with his Lordship's concurrence, is appointed to take place at Willis's Rooms, King-street, St. James's, London, on Wednesday, the 17th June next, at half-past six o'clock p.m. The anniversary festival has been proved to be one of the most effective means of promoting the interests of the association, inasmuch as it affords an opportunity for mutual effort, without which an association extending, as this does, over the whole kingdom can be but imperfectly advanced. This association has already attained a position honourable to the solicitors as a body; but, looking at the wide area over which it has to extend its benevolent operations, and to the numerical strength of the solicitors in England and Wales, it must be admitted that there is room for great improvement. It is hardly necessary to say how much this association deserves the support of the legal Profession.

The usual monthly meeting of the Board of Directors of this association, was held at the Law Institution, Chancery-lane, London, on Wednesday last, March 4, Mr. Wm. Shaen in the chair; the other directors present being Messrs. Brook, Hedger, Smith, Torr, and Williamson, Mr. Eiffe (secretary). A grant of £50 was made to a deceased member's widow, being her fourth application for assistance, and a sum of £60 was distributed in relief of five families of deceased non-members; fourteen new members were admitted to the association, and other general business transacted.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at Clement's-inn Hall, on Wednesday, the 4th March, Mr. T. B. Girling in the chair. Mr. Baker opened the subject for the evening's debate, viz.: "That the 25th section of the Elementary Education Act should be repealed." The motion was lost by a majority of one.

LAW ASSOCIATION.

AT the usual monthly meeting of the directors, held at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane, on Thursday, the 5th inst., the following being present, viz., Mr. Steward (chairman), Mr. Carpenter, Mr. W. S. Masterman, Mr. Sidney Smith, Mr. H. Vallance, and Mr. Boodle (secretary), a grant of £10 was made to a very aged solicitor who was in great distress, and the ordinary business was transacted.

THE COURTS AND COURT PAPERS.

NOTICE.

THE following regulations for transacting the business at the judges' chambers will be observed until further notice:—

Summonses will be issued and made returnable at eleven o'clock at the chambers of the judges of the court in which the actions are pending.

Acknowledgments of deeds will be taken at eleven o'clock. Adjourned summonses will be heard first at eleven o'clock, and the summonses of the day will be taken immediately afterwards. Counsel will be heard at half-past twelve o'clock.

As to applications to be made to the Masters.

Adjourned summonses will be heard at eleven o'clock precisely in each court, and the summonses of the day immediately afterwards. Counsel will be heard at twelve o'clock; and the Lord Chief Justice directs particular attention to the rules of Michaelmas Term 1867, and desires it to be distinctly understood that he will not hear any summons or application, directed by the said rules to be heard by the Masters, unless such summons or application shall be specially referred to him by the Master.

Counsel.

Whenever a summons is served with notice to attend by counsel, the name of counsel (if known) should be written on the copy summons served upon the opposite party.

The Lord Chief Justice will not attend chambers on Saturdays.

LEGAL OBITUARY.

NOTE.—This department of the LAW TIMES, is contributed by EDWARD WALFORD, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Genealogical and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the LAW TIMES Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

C. WORDSWORTH, ESQ., Q.C.

THE late Charles Wordsworth, Esq., Q.C., who died on the 8th inst., at Wallington, Surrey, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, was the second son of the late Robinson Wordsworth, Esq., some time collector of customs at the port of Harwich, who died in 1856, by Matilda Forth, his wife, and a relative of the Right Rev. Dr. Wordsworth, Bishop of Lincoln. He was born in the year 1806; he was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple in Hilary Term 1833, and attained some degree of eminence as a special pleader. He also went the Home Circuit, and formerly attended the Hertfordshire and Essex sessions, and in 1857 he had conferred upon him the honour of a silk gown. Mr. Wordsworth, (whose father was a cousin of the poet Wordsworth) was the author of a professional work on Joint Stock Companies.

WILLIAM SANDYS, ESQ., F.S.A.

WILLIAM SANDYS, of the junior branch of the family of Sandys, long established in Cornwall, was born on the 29th Oct. 1792, educated at Westminster School, was admitted as a solicitor in Hilary Term 1814, and continued to practice as such until he died on the morning of Ash Wednesday, the 18th Feb., after an illness of some weeks' duration. He was the author of the following works: An Essay on Freemasonry, 1829, a portion of this appeared as an article in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana; Select Specimens of Macaronic Poetry, 1831; Christmas Carols, Ancient and Modern, with an Introduction and Notes, 1833; this has been often and freely quoted by writers on similar subjects; Specimens of Cornish Provincial Dialect, 1846; Christmastide, 1848; Festive Songs in the 16th and 17th Centuries, with an Introduction, 1848; History of the Violin, in conjunction with the late Mr. Forster, 1864; the whole of the first and historical portion of this work was written by him, and the latter by Mr. Forster; Transactions of the Loggerville Society, 1867; this work was intended chiefly for private circulation; and numerous lesser publications and contributions to different literary journals from time to time on subjects of antiquarian research, especially in relation to the county of Cornwall, very many of which cannot now be traced; but amongst them may be named, A Notice on the Cornish Drama, Transactions in Cornwall during the Civil War, Some Remarks on the Fairies and Giants of Cornwall, in the journal of the Royal Institution of Cornwall. He had for many years given much of his spare time to the study of antiquities of Cornwall, to which county, as being that of his origin, he was to the last greatly attached. He was an accomplished violoncello player, having been taught by the celebrated Robert Lindley, who pronounced him to be the best amateur pupil he ever had. He possessed a singular faculty for mental arithmetic. Retiring and unobstrusive to a fault, within his private circle no man ever had more firmly attached friends. He married, first, in 1816, Harriette, eldest daughter of Peter Hill, late of Carwhythenack, in the county of Cornwall, Esq., by whom he had several children, who all died in his lifetime, except one daughter, Harriette, the wife of Edward Davies Browne, of 22, Grove End-road, Esq. His first wife having died in Aug. 1851, he married, secondly, in Sept. 1853, Eliza, daughter of Charles Pearson, late of Ravensbourne House, near Greenwich, Esq., by whom he had no issue, and who is now his widow. His remains were interred in his family grave in Kensal Green cemetery.

C. T. EALES, ESQ.

THE late Charles Thomas Eales, Esq., of Eastdon, Devonshire, formerly distributor of stamps at Bristol, who died on the 24th ult., at his residence at Clifton, in the 81st year of his age, was the only son of the late Richard Eales, Esq., of Eastdon, many years distributor of stamps for Devonshire, who died in 1852, at the age of ninety; his mother was Elizabeth, daughter of Philip Young, Esq., of Netherexe House, Devonshire, and he was born in the year 1793. Mr. Eales, who was highly respected by all who knew him, held for many years the post of distributor of stamps at Bristol. He married in 1823 Frances Elizabeth, daughter of the late George Daniell, Esq., M.D., and granddaughter of Sir Richard Warwick Bamptylde, Bart. (now represented by Lord Poltimore), and by her, who died in 1871, he had a family of two sons and a daughter. His elder son, Mr. Charles Eales, barrister-at-law, of the Inner Temple, is a clerk in the House of Commons. He was born in 1826, and has been twice married; first to Eleanor Halford, daughter of the late Capt. Rose H. Fuller, R.N., and secondly, to Diana, only daughter of the Rev. W. P. Hopton, of Canon Frome, Herefordshire, prebendary of Hereford Cathedral. His younger son, Lieut.-Col. George Daniell Eales, of the Bombay Staff Corps, died on the 19th ult., on his passage home from India.

J. C. GROCOTT, ESQ.

THE late John Cooper Grocott, Esq., solicitor, of Liverpool, who died recently at his residence in that town, at an advanced age, in early life formed a strong desire to follow the sea as a profession, he was accordingly apprenticed to a firm of shipbrokers, and went to sea on board a Liverpool ship called The Sally. After the first voyage, however, he accepted a situation in a broker's office, but soon afterwards gave up his commercial pursuits and adopted the law as his future avocation. After serving his articles, he was admitted an attorney in Trinity Term 1821, and from that time up to the period of his decease, his legal career, says the Liverpool Mercury, has been one of marked success. "Mr. Grocott," says the above journal, "was an authority upon recondite questions of law. He was known as one of the best 'old case' lawyers in Liverpool, and it was always to him a pleasing duty to 'coach' younger practitioners upon points of law which the more modern school of advocates might consider old-fashioned, but which are regarded as necessary to a successful practice in the local courts. He was a voluminous writer upon legal subjects, and his book upon the practice of the borough court of Liverpool, and treatises on kindred subjects, are regarded as standard works, and have run through several editions. He was looked upon for years as the leader of the County Court bar. During the absence of the registrar, Mr. Hime, he frequently acted as his deputy, and his courteous, kindly demeanour won for him the esteem of the judges and the officials of the court, as well as his fellow practitioners; in fact, he became to be regarded as one of the 'institutions' of the court." It was not only as a lawyer that Mr. Grocott earned for himself more than a local reputation, his literary acquirements were varied and extensive, and his Book of Quotations, an able and useful collection, has run through several editions. By the death of Mr. Grocott the office of sergeant-at-mace to the corporation of Liverpool has been rendered vacant. His remains were interred at St. George's, Everton.

The Law and the Lawyers.

SOME interesting points of election law have arisen during proceedings at chambers in connection with the pending election petitions. Of one we give a report elsewhere, the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE having ordered particulars to be given by the petitioners eight days before the day of hearing, with leave however to add any fresh particulars of cases coming to their knowledge after the commencement of the eight days. This is a considerable modification of the old practice, and we understand that the order will be appealed to the court. The other case to which we refer raises the question from what period the twenty-one days within which a petition must be filed is to run—from the posting of the return by the returning officer, or from its receipt by the Clerk of the Crown? The fate of a member may depend upon the way in which this point is decided. It would be well if an Election Judge were sitting at chambers, the pressure of business having been serious during the last few days.

THE railway companies are being hit hard by barristers in the matter of unpunctuality, the example of Mr. FORSYTH, Q.C., at Reading, having been followed by Mr. C. H. TURNER, of the Chancery Bar, at Marylebone. The plaintiff sued the Great Western Railway Company, not only for expenses entailed by having to sleep at an hotel when he had a return ticket by which, if the trains had carried him according to the time bills, he could have returned to town the same night, and for loss of time, but for loss of his franchise, the object of his journey being to vote at the recent election. Owing to delay on the railway he arrived at the booth two minutes late, and was consequently unable to voto. Mr. Serjt. WHELLER has reserved his judgment until the 14th of April. In another case, heard and decided at Salisbury, by Mr. LEFROY, the South-Western Railway Company was held guilty of negligence in delaying a train until the arrival of a train on another line. This is important, as trains on one line (if not competing) frequently wait in trains on another line. The learned Judge said that negligence of one company did not excuse another, and that there was no sufficient explanation of the failure to be at the destination at the time advertised in the time bill.

THE growing pressure of work thrown upon the Education Department of the Privy Council by the working of the Elementary Education Acts of 1870 and 1873 has again necessitated an increase of the permanent staff. Many of the existing Inspectors of Schools have found it difficult, even with the help of the assistants who were assigned to them in 1870, to keep pace with their work, as every month adds new schools to their lists. In many cases managers are prevented from placing their schools under Government supervision and obtaining annual grants, solely by the impossibility of procuring the services of a certificated teacher, and it may be expected that the number of successful candidates at the last Christmas examination, the results of which will be published in a few days, will not be found nearly sufficient to supply the demand. Five additional Inspectors of Schools are at once to be appointed, and will shortly be gazetted. It is believed that the nominations have already been made by the Lord President, the Duke of Richmond. In addition, the staff employed in the office of the department at Whitehall has been increased by the addition of three examiners, Messrs. Pooley, Robertson, and Ritchie, of whom the two former gentlemen had previously acted as Inspectors of Returns under the Act of 1870.

IN a pamphlet, the main features of which we notice at length elsewhere, Lord Justice CHRISTIAN discusses the relative positions of law and equity, and arrives at the conclusion that to appoint a common law lawyer to an equity court involves a radical misconception. It follows necessarily from this that he considers that for the purposes of the Judicature Act, equity lawyers should be raised to the Bench in preference to professors of the common law. At the same time, however, he admits that "to be a good equity lawyer one must begin by being a good common law lawyer." Admitting this, we do not quite see how it is possible to follow his lordship, when he objects to the appointment of common law lawyers to the Equity Bench. There are very few lawyers in the present day who do not know a good deal of equity, and it is the practice of the Court of Chancery which makes it difficult for a member of the Common Law Bar to administer equity satisfactorily. But even on this ground we question whether an eminent common law lawyer would refuse an equity judgeship, and we doubt whether Lord Justice CHRISTIAN is right in his facts when he says that Sir JOHN COLERIDGE refused the Mastership of the Rolls from a want of confidence in his capacity to deal with the work of the court. Again, in his comments upon the present constitution of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, we do not think that the LORD JUSTICE is reasonable in his inferences. He notices quite properly that Lord Justice MELLISH in cases of pure equity observes a discreet reserve, leaving his colleague to deliver judgment, and contenting himself with simple concurrence. What would happen, asks Lord Justice CHRISTIAN, if the common-law member of the court were the senior Lord Justice? The reply is that he would be worked harder than a Judge familiar all his life with equity jurisprudence; but that he would deliver luminous and sound judgments we have not the smallest doubt. This is not Lord Justice CHRISTIAN'S opinion; he considers that "the equity Lord Justice would be compelled in every case of difficulty or importance to deliver a second full judgment for the purpose of dispelling the confusions or supplying the shortcomings of his undisciplined leader." What idea can be entertained by the LORD JUSTICE of the capacity of the eminent men practising at the Common Law Bar that he should consider them absolutely "nescient" of the principles of equity jurisprudence or incapable of solving a problem in equity? But the LORD JUSTICE throughout his pamphlet is driven to extremes, and in this instance he uses one of his wildest suppositions. "And let me," he says, "add this further proposition, that this self-asserting (sic) Common Law Justice instead of being a MELLISH, were merely some declaimer from the Old Bailey or the Guildhall, and I ask how long then the Court of Appeal in Chancery in England would continue to justify the great name that has come down to it?" What possible object is there in supposing utter impossibilities? We might as well ask, supposing the O'DONOGHUE were made Lord Chancellor of Ireland, what would happen to the court of Lord Justice CHRISTIAN? We are willing to admit, however, that as a Court of Equity the English Lords Justices' Court was stronger in the days of their Lordships' predecessors; but that as at present constituted, dealing largely as it does with joint-stock and bankruptcy cases, it is an excellent Court of Appeal no one can dispute; and we certainly cannot agree that it affords any argument against the appointment of common law lawyers to the Equity Bench, or to any division of the future High Court.

IT is the proverbial wish of the vindictive that their enemy should write a book; and we regret that Dr. KENEALY should have voluntarily placed additional weapons of destruction in the hands of those who desire to see him degraded, by writing to the newspapers: first, a letter amounting almost to a challenge; and, secondly, a letter of explanation and quasi apology. We regret it the more because it is perfectly evident that the learned gentleman has been, as we stated last week, led away by his peculiar temper, and by the force of circumstaces, and we believe him when he says that he means no disrespect to the Judges who presided at the recent trial. The first of his two letters was altogether of a piece with his speeches, full of rhetorical sarcasm and covert abuse, whilst it was intended to be an exculpation and justification. One portion of the letter deserves particular notice, because it refers to proceedings believed to be pending. Why, asks Dr. Kenealy, did not the judges commit him for contempt, instead of waiting until after the trial to persecute him and crush him in some hole and corner investigation? The great majority of the learned counsel's indiscretions and improprieties possibly were not contempts in the technical sense, and it would have been exceedingly inconvenient to have dealt with them as such while the trial was proceeding. Further, it must not be assumed that the conduct of an advocate which is not punishable as contempt is therefore not a matter to be taken cognizance of by the governing bodies of the Bar. The serious question which the Benchers if they do their duty must investigate is whether a member of an inn of court has been guilty of any offence against the rules of conduct which must be strictly observed if the Bar of England is to maintain its reputation, and further, whether by violating those rules he has proved himself to be a person who cannot be safely entrusted with the high and responsible privileges of an English barrister.

WE believe that the "Railway Travellers' Protection Society" will shortly put forward its full prospectus. The minimum subscription is to be fixed at 10s. annually for the general, and 3s. 3d. annually for the mercantile public. In return for this small amount subscribers are to be entitled to the assistance of the society in obtaining redress of railway grievances. Besides the attainment of a reasonable prospect of safety in travelling, the society is to do its best to secure remedies for inconvenient arrangements at booking offices, unpunctuality of trains, inadequacy of train and station accommodation, and defects of comfort in railway carriages and stations. As regards goods traffic, terminal charges, special rates, and the clearing house classification, are to be carefully scrutinised. Reports of railway cases, whether heard before the railway commissioners, or the courts of law, reports of the Board of Trade on railway companies, and the half-yearly reports are to be collected and registered, while the companies are to be supported in any improvements which they may show a disposition to introduce. The attention of the Government is to be called to the shortcomings of particular companies, and fresh railway legislation is to be promoted when found desirable. The whole forms an ambitious programme, and one which, if judiciously carried out, is likely to be widely useful. Those companies who conduct their business properly will be gainers rather than losers by it, inasmuch as they will have grievances brought before them with the deliberation and calmness of a public prosecutor. As for those companies who conduct their business improperly, the sooner they are prosecuted and punished the better. The present special modes of proceeding against railway companies appear to be three, either (1) by means of the Board of Trade, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 17, whenever it shall appear to the Board of Trade that a company is either contravening a statute or acting "in a manner unauthorised" by statute (as to which see Attorney-General v. Great Northern Railway Company, 29 L. J. 794, Ch.); or (2) by an application to the Railway Commissioners (under 36 & 37 Vict. c. 48) to enjoin a railway company to give "reasonable facilities for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of traffic, or to cease giving an undue preference (as to which see Baxendale v. Great Western Railway Company, 5 C. B., N. S., 336; 32 L. T. Rep. 128); or (3) an action for damages. The consciousness of belonging to a society which will at all events know which of these three remedies to select will inspire a new vigour into railway passengers. And if a grievance be discovered which the law cannot remedy, the companies, well aware of the significant clause which is to be found in every special railway Act passed since 1845, to the effect that "nothing herein contained shall . . . . exempt the railway by this Act authorised to be made, from the provisions of any general Act relating to railways . . . . or from any future revision or alteration under the authority of Parliament, of maximum rates and charges," will no doubt hasten of their own accord to provide a remedy.

THE great weight of Lord ST. LEONARDS' authority makes any extra-judicial statement of his almost as binding as the decision of a Judge, and his works are constantly quoted as decisive upon any point to which they refer. We would therefore respectfully urge that the statement on p. 301 of his work on Powers, relative to the interpretation of the 27th section of the Wills Act, requires modification, both in view of the end and scope of the statute itself, and of actual decision explanatory of it. That section provides that unless a contrary intention appear by the will, a general devise or bequest will include property over which the testator has a power to appoint in any manner he may think proper. The important question in interpreting this clause is, What is meant by a general power or a power to appoint "in any manner" the testator "may think proper?" The words of Lord ST. LEONARDS are, "General powers only therefore are within the statute, and a general power of disposition is for this purpose deemed equivalent to a fee." That is to say, the power must be one exercisable either by deed or will in favour of any person whom the testator may select, the words "in any manner" relating not only to the objects of the power, but also to the instruments by which it may be executed. A general testamentary power, therefore, according to this view of the clause, would not be legally executed by a general devise or bequest. This seems, however, to be a very artificial construction of the Act, and is entirely opposed to its spirit, which was to facilitate rather than impede the execution of powers. And the statute, relating exclusively to the making of wills and other testamentary instruments, contemplates no other than a testamentary execution of a power, and cannot be supposed to lay down rules, even constructively, in respect of the execution of powers by deed. The words "in any manner" are sufficiently satisfied by explaining them to mean "in favour of any objects whom he may select" in contradistinction to a power to appoint to children or any other limited class; and indeed, the above quoted dicta of Lord ST. LEONARDS may now be regarded as practically overruled. And the case of Moss v. Harter (2 Sm. & G. 458), quoted in Powers 8th edit., p. 305, scarcely justifies the narrower construction. In that case there was a power to appoint by instrument in writing and gift over in default of appointment. The donor of this power appointed part by deed, and afterwards made his will, by which he gave all his personal estate not otherwise effectively disposed of, and all that the decision amounted to was that the testator did not intend to deal with property which was otherwise effectually disposed of. The cases of Bush v. Cowan (32 Beav.); Prover v. Hassel (1 J. & H.), and Minton v. Kirwood (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 781), seem to be decisive in favour of the more liberal interpretation.

THE case of Hatton v. Heywood, which came lately before the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices, clearly defines and places in a satisfactory position the relative rights and duties of judgment as compared with simple contract creditors. The law was previously perfectly clear as to judgments which affected the legal estate in land. This, however, was a case which only affected an equity of redemption, the debtor having previously mortgaged the property. A judgment was obtained, but as the legal estate was outstanding in the mortgagee, the land could not be delivered in execution. The law on the subject is embodied in three statutes, viz., 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, according to which judgments are to operate as a charge on all the debtor's interests in land; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, which requires that all judgments shall, in order to take effect, be duly registered in the manner provided by the Act, and enforced within three months of registration. Unless these conditions be complied with, the judgment is null and void as against purchasers and mortgagees with or without notice. Hence the inconsistency has been avoided which is to be found in some of the decisions concerning the registration of deeds in places where there is a Land Registry, requiring registration for the validity of an instrument, and yet holding that notice of an unregistered, that is, of an incomplete and invalid instrument, shall affect purchasers. The third statute is 27 & 28 Vict., which provides that no judgment shall affect any land which has not been actually delivered in execution by writ of eligit or other lawful authority. These statutes exhibit a varying tendency on the part of the Legislature, and the rights of judgment creditors have been considerably curtailed by the two last-named statutes, which expressly refer only to legal interests, whereas 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 declares that judgments shall operate as a charge on all the debtor's interests in land, that is, we may presume, legal or equitable. The decision in this case furnishes an admirable instance of the ratio decidendi as applied to the interpretation of a statute. It establishes an equitable as well as a legal remedy in cases of this class, and lays down the rule that when the interest is equitable, and the sheriff returns nihil, and the bill is not filed till the debtor becomes bankrupt, no charge is established before the bankruptcy which can be set up against the trustee; but that e contra (according to Lord Justice MELLISH'S judgment) whilst legal interests may be reached by the judgment creditor by means of an action at law, equitable estates may be vested in the creditor by a decree of a court of equity, "which therefore does in respect of equitable interests that which the sheriff's return does as to legal interests;" the decree in equity being the "other lawful authority," referred to in addition to the writ of elegit in the statute 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, which therefore leaves the earlier statutes in force except in so far as they are expressly repealed.

LORD JUSTICE CHRISTIAN ON IRISH APPEALS.

THE Irish Lord Justice (Christian) has published some observations upon the pending changes in the appellate system of the United Kingdom, and with his usual vigour he points out what he conceives to be the dangers attending the abolition of the jurisdiction of the House of Lords. The Judicature Act does not deprive Ireland of the right of appeal to that House, but Lord Justice Christian foresees that this remnant of judicial power will soon be taken away, and he predicts that the consequences will be most disastrous. The grounds upon which he arrives at this conclusion are not altogether flattering to Irish lawyers, whilst, on the other hand, they must be very gratifying to English lawyers. Looking at the provisions of the Act, and the importation of Irish judges into the Court of Appeal, our learned author considers it likely that in course of time Irish appeals will be heard by a band of Irish judges sitting in Dublin. We cannot agree that this catastrophe is at all probable, and we, indeed, recently published, on what we deemed to be sufficient authority, a rumour that the disposition of the Conservative Government was rather in favour of restoration than of further demolition. The views of such a judge as Lord Justice Christian must, at a time like the present, carry considerable weight, and if there was foundation, in fact, for the rumour we have mentioned, his pamphlet should influence ministers and induce them to stop at the point now reached if they cannot see their way to giving back the jurisdiction which the Lords have already abandoned.

We must confess, however, that we are somewhat surprised to find the Lord Justice taking such remarkably strong views in favour of the old jurisdiction of the House of Lords. Overlooking entirely the inherent weakness of the tribunal, and its haphazard constitution, he finds in it an object not only of his veneration and respect, but of his unbounded enthusiasm. He speaks of it as having preserved the unity of jurisprudence, and thereby given strength and substance to the parchment bond of union between the two countries, "for happily," he says, "it is not in the way of paper ordinance merely that the law of England has been the law of Ireland; the Anglican spirit and genius have hitherto, as a rule, inspired the Irish tribunals in their administration of that law." This we willingly concede—it is desirable that the law of the United Kingdom should come from one source; but the question is whether the two or three law lords who have been in the habit of sitting on appeals could be considered from an imperial point of view a satisfactory tribunal. As an English court of appeal from the Lords Justices and Lord Chancellor, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber, it was inefficient; but it must be acknowledged that whilst inefficient as a court of appeal from English courts, it may be, and probably is, an excellent court of appeal from Irish Courts. At any rate it would seem to be the opinion of the Lord Justice that an appeal to even inferior English Judges sitting at Westminster would be better than an appeal to the ablest Irish Judges sitting in Dublin. He tells us, indeed, that "Her Majesty's Court of Appeal," as constituted under the Judicature Act, when extended to Ireland, may be found as satisfactory to that country as the House of Lords has been, but more so it cannot by any possibility prove. He adds, "The contentment of Ireland, with that House as its court of last resort has, in fact, been boundless." The Lord Justice, in his experience of nearly forty years, has "never heard a murmur against it." "The Judges whose decisions may have been reversed, even the unsuccessful parties or their counsel, however disappointed by the result, never reclaimed against that tribunal"—which, if true, shows the Irish to be a much maligned race—"and even when, as would sometimes happen, the reasoning of the Law Lords might seem a little bald and inconclusive, it was still the same; no one cared to look beyond the mere factum of their conclusion. In short, the House had won for itself that fulness of acceptance which is the truest touchstone of desert for a court of last appeal, when all would be ready to say, after the decision was made, 'Now we know it is the law, because they have said it is.'"

We venture to think that no condemned tribunal—and condemned out of its own mouth—ever possessed a blinder panegyrist, and we fear that the excess of the zeal of the Lord Justice must detract from the cogency of his remarks. We find it very difficult to believe that no murmur has ever arisen within the last forty years from Irish Judges whose decisions have been reversed, and from unsuccessful counsel and parties. Possibly such murmurs would not reach the ears of so devoted an admirer of the tribunal as Lord Justice Christian; but if the fact be as he states it, there must have been a predisposition to consider Irish Judges as likely to be in the wrong. With a strong Bench in Ireland, and a Bench in the ability of which the people believed, it seems to us impossible that the decision of two English ex-Chancellors and a Scotch Law Lord reverisng a decision of that Bench should be received without discontent. The Lord Justice evidently does not desire to cast any reflection upon the Irish Bench as a body, and we must assume that it is regarded with respect. This being so, the absence of discontent is an extraordinary circumstance, and proves either that the Irish people accept the decisions of a tribunal on its reputation without regard to its constitution, or that they possess very limited power of discernment.

The important question is, however, whether the tribunal, such as it is, should be retained or be abolished, and a new court created which by possibility so far as Ireland is concerned, may become a purely Irish Court of Appeal—that is a court composed exclusively of Irish judges. The first point to be agreed upon is this: supposing the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal to be extended to Ireland, is it probable that Irish cases will be relegated to an Irish division of the Court of Appeal? The Lord Justice does not seem to have any doubt on the matter. "It may be anticipated with tolerable certainty," he says, "that, as a rule, the divisional courts that would sit for Irish appeals would be, in the whole or in the majority, composed of Irish judges." Why? Because, says the Lord Justice, the English members of the court would find themselves burdened with English business, and would say to the Irish members "mind your own business and leave us to ours." To find a man of the ability and capacity of Lord Justice Christian arriving at such a conviction is certainly amazing. To believe in a result of that kind is to underrate the common sense and conscientiousness of English judges; moveover, such a division of labour would be altogether opposed to existing notions of what a Supreme Court of Appeal ought to be and how it should do its work. But according to Lord Justice Christian, not only the English Judges would be anxious to promote the relegation of Irish business to the Irish members. "Depend upon it," he says, they would be supported in maintaining that distribution by the English suitors and the English Bar. These two classes would not only grumble at any delay in their own affairs, but they would energetically reclaim against any active interference of the Irish element with themselves." Could anything be more preposterous or absolutely baseless? There have been delays enough in the House of Lords, but it has never been urged, to our knowledge, that Irish and Scotch business should be put on one side. Before suitors or the Bar could have a voice in the matter, however, the Judges would have to initiate the division of business. This we are satisfied they never would do, and consequently it becomes unnecessary to discuss the possible action of other persons interested. It also becomes unnecessary to consider further whether the appellate court would be likely to be transferred to Dublin.

We cannot help thinking that the Lord Justice has been oppressed by the thought of what might happen if Irishmen were left to manage their own affairs. A passage which he puts in italics is very significant. It is this: "The inevitable outcome of it all would be that the function of supreme appeal for Ireland would eventually fall into the hands of a little band of Irish Judges located in Dublin." From this fear oppressing the mind of the Lord Justice arises all that he imagines—first, the division of the Court of Appeal into as many departments as there are countries from which appeals come (certainly, if the Lord Justice's theory is correct as to Scotland and Ireland); and, secondly, local apellate courts—hence the degradation of the law, damage to society, and, lastly, the loosening of the bonds of union between the countries.

The answer to all this is perfectly simple. In the first place it is by no means certain that the Irish and Scotch appeals will be taken away from the House of Lords. Supposing they were, what says the Judicature Act? That in the absence of rules or orders of court the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal shall be exercised as nearly as may be in the same manner as the same might have been exercised by the respective courts from which such jurisdiction shall have been transferred, or by any of such courts: (s. 23.) No order of court could possibly be made by which particular business should be disposed of by Judges who came from the same country as the business, and the Judges could not venture to arrange matters amongst themselves so as to secure such a result Whilst, therefore, we repeat that the observations of Lord Justice Christian are entitled to high consideration, we are driven to the conclusion that, impelled by his dread of Irish legal business being entirely localized, he has unduly exalted the virtues of the House of Lords, and bases his regrets for the possible abolition of its Irish jurisdiction entirely upon his fears. If his fears are quieted, if it appears that the Court of Appeal for the empire will treat all business alike, the whole of his argument falls to the ground. On the other hand, however, his Lordship makes some suggestions which are well worth considering. One is that the Judges of England and Ireland should be Judges of both countries, English Judges going Irish circuits, and vice versâ. This, perhaps, might be better for Ireland than England. Another is that the Bars of both countries should be thrown open and have free inter-communication. This the Lord Justice regards as likely to lead to the abolition of a Lord Chancellorship in Ireland. He concludes his observations by recurring to the proposal of last July to hand over the Irish appeals to the new court. "That proposal," he says, "if carried into effect, would make the first step towards a disastrous partitioning by nationalities of the supreme pronouncements of the law, a dislocating of our one living unity, the unity of jurisprudence, and a slackening of our best curb upon the disintegrating forces which underlie the Irish policy of these latter years. The fusion of law and equity is very well in its way, but the fusion of England and Ireland is a greater subject still; and if the so much vaunted Judicature Act should be found so to work as to obstruct or retard by even a little that noblest consummation, it will have done a mischief for which not all the good that the most devout of its votaries could anticipate for it, within its own more narrow sphere, would be an adequate equivalent."

THE LIABILITY OF INFANTS TO BANKRUPTCY.

WE have recently had occasion to advert to a decision of a learned County Court Judge to the effect that an infant against whom damages had been obtained in an action of tort might be adjudicated bankrupt. We expressed our doubts as to the soundness of his Honour's law, and the question raised, being undecided by any case under recent Acts of Parliament changing the operation of the law of bankruptcy is one of some interest.

The history of the bankruptcy law with reference to infants is somewhat curious. Early authorities, notably Lord Cowper and Lord Macclesfield, decided that a commission might issue against an infant, but in Ex parte Sidebotham Lord Hardwicke said that since those judges had pronounced their opinions the law had been declared to be the other way. It is not quite clear to what Lord Hardwicke refers, but it is evident that in his time it was considered as absolute law that a commission against an infant was at any rate voidable, that is to say, that an infant might bring his action against his assignee, and, on proof of infancy, vacate the commission. Lord Holt also decided that an infant could not be a trader subject to a commission, and he said that though the debts of an infant are only voidable at his election, yet no man can be made a bankrupt for debts which he is not obliged to pay. These early decisions would appear so thoroughly to have settled the law that as stated in the argument in M'Lean v. Dummett (22 L. T. Rep. N.S. 710), it has ever since been considered that an infant could not be made a bankrupt unless he had induced persons dealing with him to believe him to be sui juris. Had there been no reform in our bankruptcy laws concerning the class of persons to be brought within their operation, no question could have arisen with a chance of being decided otherwise than in accordance with the decision of Lord Hardwicke. The Act of 1861, however, made all debtors, whether traders or non-traders, liable to bankruptcy, and the point now to be considered is whether the fact that non-traders are liable to be made bankrupt alters the position of infants.

It is of course not open to question that in respect of contracts an infant's liability is not affected by the fact of his being a trader. For any debt due by virtue of any contract save for necessaries he is not liable, and inasmuch as (to use the words of Lord Holt) he cannot be compelled to pay his debts, he cannot be made bankrupt in respect of them. The question of trader or no trader is therefore immaterial, and under the Act of 1861 it was decided (in the cases of Smedley and Prosser), that infants might make themselves bankrupt on their own petition, whilst under a colonial Act "for the more effectual settlement of the debts of insolvent traders," an infant trader was held not liable to be adjudicated bankrupt on the petition of a creditor: (Maclean v. Dummett). A correspondent has submitted that this last case does not affect the ruling of the learned County Court Judge, having been decided upon a statute dealing with traders. It is, however, on that score none the less of an authority upon the general question; but we notice in the judgment delivered by Lord Justice Giffard, it is said "Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that if any action has been brought against Maclean, a plea of infancy would have been fatal to that action; and therefore upon that ground that these proceedings in bankruptcy ought to have been superseded." This observation is in favour of the view that where a debt is the result of an action to which infancy could not be pleaded, it may ground bankruptcy proceedings against an infant. But does it go the length of establishing that an infant can be made a bankrupt on a judgment in an action for unliquidated damages? We shall be very glad if it can be so held, as in that event the adjudication by the County Court Judge was perfectly right. What then is the effect of the verdict and judgment? It would appear clear that the case would come within the section of the Debtors' Act which says that "any court may direct any person in pursuance of any order or judgment of that or of any other competent court to be paid by instalments," and in default of payment to commit to prison. If then an infant under such order might be committed, why might he not be made bankrupt?

As we have stated, the old authorities proceeding on the ground that no one could be made bankrupt upon a claim which he was not bound to satisfy, decided that an infant could not be made a bankrupt. Non-traders have been liable to bankruptcy since 1861, but during the thirteen years which have elapsed it has not been held that an infant could be compulsorily made a bankrupt. Mr. Stonor is the first Judge who has so held. He has more reasons in support of his view than at the first blush we thought he had, and, whether he is right or wrong, it is difficult positively to say. The question is one which some time or other must be settled by high authority.

THE LEGAL ASPECT OF THE RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY.

A STATISTICAL and energetic article in the Railway News of Feb. 21 in favour of the repeal of the passenger duty contains the remarkable statement that for the year 1872 alone the amount claimed from the railway companies was £960,000, of which the companies have paid only £506,189, for reasons which we will examine presently, and that the Inland Revenue are now suing for the difference. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, it is added, complain of the great delays which the law allows the companies to interpose, and have reported that these delays will doubtless prove prejudicial to the shareholders when called upon for the accumulated arrears of duty. The sum of £300,000, to which the arrears must now amount, if our contemporary be correct (and there is no reason to doubt his correctness), is so enormous, that it becomes of real interest to taxpayers to inquire whether it is likely to be recovered. The point is purely a legal one, and lies in a very narrow compass.

By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85 (the State Purchase Act 1844) s. 6, after reciting that "it is expedient to secure to the poorer class of travellers the means of travelling by railway at moderate fares, and in carriages in which they may be protected from the weather," it is enacted that "all passenger railway companies . . . shall by means of one train at the least to travel along their railway from one end to the other . . . once at the least each way on every week day . . . provide for the conveyance of third-class passengers to and from the terminal and other ordinary passenger stations of the railway," with statutory obligations and immunities, "and also under the following (seven) conditions, that is to say: . . . such train shall, if required, take up and set down passengers at every passenger station which it shall pass on the line . . ." The other conditions are, approval of the time by the Board of Trade, speed of twelve miles an hour, including stoppages, protection from the weather, maximum fare of one penny a mile, allowance of certain weight of luggage, and half fares for children. By s. 9, "no tax shall be levied . . . from the conveyance of passengers at fares not exceeding one penny for each mile by any such cheap train as aforesaid." These two sections of the Act of 1844 contain, we believe, the whole law of the subject. Now for the facts. We presume that the following extract from the Report of the Select Committee on Railway Amalgamation 1872, p. xvii., may be taken to be correct:

> The differences in principle between the companies and the department of Inland Revenue are serious. The companies claim exemption on all the trains they may run in the day which comply with the Parliamentary condition of conveying passengers at fares not exceeding 1d. a mile, provided they are approved by the Board of Trade. The Inland Revenue denies their right to exemption unless the other conditions of the Act are complied with, as to taking up and setting down passengers, and so forth. The companies claim exemption on double journey tickets, where the aggregate fare is less than 1d. a mile. The department denies their right to exemption unless the single journey is also charged for at 1d. a mile, or less. The ocmpanies claim exemption where less than 1d. a mile is charged for the whole distance, although the trains may not stop at every station. The department deny the claim unless the train stops at every station throughout the whole journey. These questions are now (1872) being brought before the courts (sic.) of law. . . .

Now which is in the right, the companies or "the department?" The whole question, we think, depends upon what meaning is to be given to the words "if required" in the condition as to stopping at every station which we have set out verbatim above. Do they mean that each of the exempted trains must be prepared to stop at every station if required there and then, or do they mean that the power to require the stoppage is exhausted when the passenger takes his ticket for a station beyond any station which is advertised to be passed without stopping? Quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto. Section 6, as the preamble shows, is for the benefit of the passenger, and why may he not waive a condition which may in some events be obviously prejudicial to him from the mere fact of delaying his journey? On the other hand it may be argued that, the time tables of the company binding them, (see Denton v. Great Northern Railway Company, 25 L. J. 129, Q. B.), they have put it out of their power to stop if required by any passenger who should not choose to waive his right. Had not the section received judicial construction, it might be worth while to examine the worth of such like arguments pro and con. But we imagine that the Inland Revenue will enter the lists of the Court of Exchequer with a light heart, and bearing well in mind the case of Attorney-General v. Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company (31 L. J. 218, Ex.). It was there held by Chief Baron Pollock, and Barons Channell and Wilde, that the defendants were liable for duty in respect of trains which did not stop and put down passengers at every station; that inasmuch as the defendants claimed an exemption from a duty granted in very clear terms, it was for them to bring themselves precisely within the terms creating the exemption; and that the obligation to stop if required means that "the general arrangements of the train shall be such as to admit of a passenger stopping at any station he may pass." It is true that Baron Martin dissented from the judgment, and that the case is ever so faintly distinguishable from the ordinary cases upon which the present disputes arise, on the ground that the defendant company had by express agreement with another company, put it out of its power to stop at every station "if required" without breaking that agreement, whereas in the cases of to-day the companies have only put it out of their power to stop by advertising in their time tables that they will not; but with a decision so strong to all appearance against the companies, the only wonder is that the Inland Revenue are only "now suing" for the full duty, and have not recovered it long ago. One reason perhaps was—to quote again from the report of the Amalgamation Committee—the fear that the companies might withdraw the extra and highly popular facilities for third-class traffic which they have recently commenced giving. But the development of that traffic is becoming so prodigiously productive to the companies themselves that so suicidal a policy is in the highest degree unlikely. "The third-class traffic," in fact, "no longer requires either the compulsory legislation of 1844 or the stimulus of exemption from taxation." We have already expressed an opinion in favour of the remission or alteration of the passenger duty in general, though we do not quite concur in a public utterance made the other day, that the imposition of the passenger duty was "an act of barbarity worthy of the Emperor of Morocco." But we would ask the companies to consider whether they are coming forward with the best grace in the world to ask for the repeal of a duty, half of which they appear to have for some time ceased to pay.

As a large number of estates and interests, both in possession and reversion, are created by the exercise of powers of appointment, we must point out some precautions to be adopted in dealing with property which has been the subject of an appointment.

In nearly all settlements, whether made by will or deed, and whether of real or personal property, where the property is given to parents for lives, and afterwards to their children, it is usual to leave the extent of the share or interest of the children to the pleasure of the parents, and to give the children equal shares only in case the parents do not make any different appointment.

The object of giving the power of appointment to the parents is to prevent the children dealing with their shares whilst they are still reversionary, as no purchaser or mortgagee would care to part with his money for an interest which may be superseded at the will of the parents of the vendor or mortgagor. Moreover, it would seem that the giving the parents such a power enables them after the closing of a child's bankruptcy or insolvency to make an appointment in his favour, which will not operate for the benefit of his creditors, even if the share appointed be the same as the child would have taken in default of appointment: (Re Vizard's Trusts, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 588; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 815.)

The court of equity has established a rule that all appointments made in pursuance of limited powers must be made bonâ fide for the sole benefit of the appointee, and in cases of infringement of the rule, the court will set the appointment aside, and also all subsequent dealings consequent upon the appointment. In Hall v. Montague (8 L. J. Rep. 167, Eq.) a conveyance made for valuable consideration was set aside, as it proceeded upon an appointment made two days before the date of the conveyance by a father to his son, to enable the father and son to sell. In Wade v. Cox (4 L. J. Rep. N. S. 105, Ch.) an appointment of a fund made in favour of a son was, eighteen years afterwards, set aside in consequence of an arrangement that the trustee should retain part of the fund to pay a debt due from the father to him, and notwithstanding that the son had given the trustee a release.

As an appointment would be bad if made to a person not an object of the power, so it is equally bad if made to an object of the power with an agreement under which a person not an object of the power would get an interest, and the appointment and any subsequent settlement or dealing would be set aside (Salmon v. Gibbes, 18 L. J. Rep., N.S., 177, Eq.); but it would seem that an appointment made to a daughter previously to marriage with an understanding that a settlement was to be executed by which persons not objects of the power would derive benefits, would be good even perhaps where the terms were settled by the appointor (Pryor v. Pryor, 32 L. J. Rep., N. S., 731, Eq. and 33 Ib. 441, Eq.). (See also Cooper v. Cooper, L. Rep. 5 Ch. App. 203; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1.)

Where a female is the object of a power of appointment the property may be appointed to her for her sole and separate use, but any attempted restriction against alienation will be void, unless, perhaps, where the appointee was living at the date of the instrument creating the power: (Re Cunynghame's Settlement, 11 L. J. Rep. 324, Eq.)

If the appointor intended to get a benefit by the appointment, although it cannot be actually proved that he did so, the court will set the appointment aside unless the persons interested in the appointment can prove that the appointor's intention was abandoned at the time of the appointment (Humphrey v. Olver, 28 L. J. Rep. N. S. 406, Eq.), and ignorance by the appointee of the intention of the appointor, or even of the existence of the appointment, does not alter the case: (Re Marsden's Trusts, 28 L. J. Rep. N. S. 906, Eq.) If the appointee agrees to carry out the wishes of the appointor it is immaterial whether the agreement be made before or after the appointment: (Topham v. Duke of Portland, 32 L. J. Rep. N. S. 81, Eq.)

A power to appoint by deed is well exercised by an appointment by will (Bruce v. Bruce, L. Rep. 11 Eq. 371; 24 L. T. Rep. N.S. 212), although the converse proposition does not hold good. A power can be effectually released so that any subsequent attempt to exercise it will be useless: (Whittle v. Henning, 17 L. J. Rep. N. S. 151, Eq., and 18 Ib. 51, Eq.) An appointment may be apparently invalid, yet certain subsequent events may have the effect of making it good as for instance where a person having a non-exclusive power of appointment among his four children makes an appointment of a part of the fund in favour of one and a subsequent appointment of the residue between two of the others. If the first appointment be good, the second will be bad, because by it the whole of the unappointed fund is dealt with, and one object of the power is altogether left out; but if the first appointment be set aside, the second will operate, because there will be some part of the fund to devolve upon the omitted object: (Ranking v. Barnes, 33 L. J. Rep. N. S. 539, Eq.) After a power has been once fully exercised, the appointor cannot again exercise it, notwithstanding an appointment may have been set aside.

In Badham v. Ince (2 L. J. Rep. N. S. 4, Eq.) it was decided that where a power of appointment in fee simple in favour of his children over an estate was given to a bankrupt, and, subject to the power, the estate was limited in tail to the children, with an ultimate remainder in fee to the bankrupt, the latter could not exercise his power in such a manner as would interfere with the ultimate remainder in fee limited to him.

Whenever a person is dealing with property the subject of a special appointment, he should be particular in inquiring what, if any, previous appointments have been made in exercise of the same power, and if any had been made he should, if possible, inspect them; he should also inquire both of appointor and appointee, whether any person other than the appointee was to receive any benefit from the appointment. Where the appointment was an equal one between all the objects of the power, it would seem that an agreement between the appointor and one of the appointees for the benefit of some person other than the appointee, would not vitiate the appointment. To ascertain whether any previous appointment had been made the only safe course to adopt is to inquire of the trustees, if any, and of all the other possible objects of the power.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

THE Registrarship of the Lord Mayor's Court, which became vacant by the appointment of Mr. Brandon to the Assistant Judgeship of that court, is, we understand, about to be filled up. The appointment is, we believe, worth about £1000 a year, and is in the gift of the Court of Common Council of the City of London. The question of what arrangements should be made in reference to this office has been referred to the Law, Parliamentary, and City Courts Committee, of which Mr. Frederick Kent is chairman. We feel satisfied that the Court of Common Council, recognising the claims of solicitors to this post, and alive, as we are sure they are, to the necessity of bestowing it upon a professional man having practical experience and of business habits, will elect a solicitor to the vacant office.

REFERRING to the notices recently issued by direction of the Lord Chief Justice, and posted at judges' chambers, particular attention is called to the rules of Michaelmas Term 1867, as regards the business which the masters of the several courts are called upon to discharge in chambers. No doubt much work in chambers is often undertaken by judges which ought to be disposed of by the masters under the rules above referred to; and indeed we have known cases in which business having been disposed of by a judge, which should have gone before a master, another judge has been called upon to consider it as an appeal summons, which appeal is provided for under the rules in case either party is dissatisfied with a master's decision. We thoroughly approve, too, of the requirements in the notice referred to, by which, when on service of a summons, the usual notice is given that it will be attended by counsel, the name of counsel is to be written on the copy summons served on the opposite party. We hope to see this universally adhered to, and indeed it would be advisable that the notice of intention to attend by counsel as well as the name should be indorsed on the copy summons and on the original. As regards the necessity for certifying for counsel in such cases, in order to get the costs allowed on taxation, it is in practice often omitted by judges and masters, owing to their attention not being called to it. We think it should be in the discretion of the taxing masters to allow such costs without the usual certificate.

MR. PETER ELLIS EYTON, of Englefield House, Rhyl, Flintshire, who has been returned for the Flint boroughs in the advanced Liberal interest in the place of Sir R. A. Cunliffe, was born in the year 1830, and was admitted on the roll of solicitors in Hilary Term 1853. He was appointed town clerk and clerk to the magistrates of Flint in 1856. He is a director of many local companies, and also holds the appointment of Registrar of the County Court at Mold. What his views are in relation to the two branches of the Legal Profession is not known, but it may, of course, be assumed that he will not be found wanting in a desire to advance the interests of solicitors whenever an opportunity offers. It may also be expected that he will always be ready to raise his voice in the House of Commons in favour of confining the appointment to vacant offices usually held by solicitors to members of his own branch of the Profession.

THE duties of the taxing masters of the common law courts have by recent legislation become materially altered, and future legislation is likely to introduce further changes. We feel sure the authorities are taking, or will take, into their serious consideration the necessity of appointing solicitors to these posts as vacancies occur. Already the taxation of costs is a minor part of the duties of the masters, which are rather assuming the character of the work devolving upon the chief clerks in Chancery, and which offices are so ably filled by solicitors. With the operation of the Judicature Act, and abolition of pleading, the proper discharge of the duties of the masters at judges' chambers will more than ever involve a knowledge of the routine of a solicitor's office.

A CORRESPONDENT in our last issue complained of the delay in publishing the names of gentlemen entitled to honorary distinction in connection with the final examination at the Law Institution in Hilary Term last, and he compared this delay with the expedition used by the examiners at our universities on the same subject, and our correspondent added, parenthetically, that the latter examiners were selected because of their capacity to examine. It is perhaps not generally known that the examiners at the Law Institution receive no remuneration whatever for their labours. The time has unquestionably arrived, in our opinion, when such examiners should be remunerated in the usual way, and that only those should be appointed by the council who are especially qualified for such duties. Whatever may be said to the contrary, it must be generally conceded that irrespective of the delay complained of, the questions are often not such as can be fairly asked of law students. What is wanted is to test their general knowledge, for which purpose out of the way questions, such, for instance, as those often found in books, the matter in which is accumulated by the so-called "coach," should, as a rule, be avoided.

IT may be interesting to our readers to know that the chief clerks and taxing masters in Chancery sit about 210 days out of the 365, from ten to four. In vacation one chief clerk attends for all the courts four days in the week for two hours, and one taxing master is available in vacation also. The chief clerks frequently work over office hours, indeed the preparation of their reports (technically called certificates) could hardly be got through during the period of the day allotted to the sittings in public. The taxing masters also frequently devote their evenings to the perusal of papers. It cannot be too well understood that the office of chief clerk in Chancery is a most laborious office.

THE carelessness of editors of lay newspapers, by which they constantly lay themselves open to legal proceedings in consequence of improper publications affecting individuals, is particularly illustrated by what appeared in a London morning paper a day or two ago. It was a statement made by a person in the interest of a convict who had been a clerk in a solicitor's office. This statement in effect pointed to the innocence of the convict as regards the matters charged against him, and in reference to some of which he had been convicted. Worse than this, the statement amounted to a serious reflection on the solicitor whose clerk the convict had been. As might have been expected, in a subsequent publication of the same newspaper a letter appears from the solicitor denying the statements as affecting himself. We think the publishers are fortunate that the solicitor has selected this course of dealing with his grievance. We cannot protest too strongly against the adoption by the press of a course similar to that now complained of, whereby professional men are at the trouble and annoyance of pursuing a course as adopted herein. It would be serious indeed, if every convict was permitted to publish in a daily paper, through the agency of a friend, his explanations of the matter charged against him. We refer to the case of Reg. on the prosecution of Rowland v. Charles Barnes Nash, who was convicted at the late session of the Central Criminal Court.

MR. C. J. FAY, of Kingstown, Dublin, returned to Parliament in the Home Rule and Liberal interests for the county of Cavan, was born in 1842, educated at the Jesuit College at Clongowes-wood, Ireland. He was admitted a solicitor as recently as Easter Term 1866.

THE following lectures and classes are appointed for the ensuing week at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, for the instruction of students seeking admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors: Monday, class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock, Common Law; Tuesday, class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock, Common Law; Wednesday, class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock, Common Law (the last of the present series); Friday, lecture, 6 to 7 o'clock, Conveyancing. To prevent interruption at the lectures, subscribers are not admitted to the hall after a lecture has commenced.

A COUNTRY ATTORNEY calls our attention to the following advertisement, cut from the Birmingham Daily Mail newspaper:

REFORM your Lawyers' Bills.—Advertiser is about opening Offices in Birmingham as General Law Agent, &c., to an eminent London firm. Actions brought and defended in the Superior Courts and Chancery at nominal charges. Persons served with writs, &c. Communicate immediately.—Address No. 50, Daily Mail.

This kind of advertising is on the increase, and we can but regret that no measures seem likely to be adopted to put a stop to it.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

TESTAMENTARY SUIT—COSTS NOT PAID—WRIT OF ELEGIT—20 & 21 VICT. C. 77, S. 25.—The power of issuing writs of elegit is one of the powers transferred to the court by the 25th section of the Probate Act. In a testamentary suit the defendant, who was the unsuccessful party, was condemned in the costs, but did not obey the order. On affidavit that he was possessed of realty, but of no personal property, the court ordered a writ of elegit to issue for the recovery of the costs: (Heath v. Heath, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 931. Prob.)

PRACTICE—SECURITY FOR COSTS—PLAINTIFF OUT OF THE JURISDICTION—OFFICER IN THE ARMY.—The bond of an officer in Her Majesty's service cannot be objected to as security for costs on the grounds that the obligor is stationed out of the jurisdiction: (Miller v. Hales, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 10. V.C. B.)

INTESTACY — ADMINISTRATION — OATH OF ADMINISTRATOR.—The mother of an intestate was the sole forthcoming next of kin, and as no positive intelligence had been received of the father's death, though he had been missing since 1852, the court allowed the administratrix to swear that she believed herself to be the sole next of kin: (In the goods of Reed, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 932. Prob.)

FORMA PAUPERIS—INJUNCTION—COMMITTAL FOR CONTEMPT — DISPAUPERING ORDER.—A defendant, who had been restrained by injunction from removing the crops from a farm, and who had been committed to prison for a breach of the injunction, obtained an order of course to defend in formâ pauperis, upon an affidavit in the usual form, that he was not worth £5, save the matters in question in the suit: Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that he ought to be dispaupered: (Ridgway v. Edwards, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 906. Chan.)

COMPOSITION—APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEE—DEFAULT OF TENDER—MISTAKE OF TRUSTEE—INJUNCTION TO STAY ACTION—BANKRUPTCY RULES 1870, r. 279.—When creditors, on passing a resolution to accept a composition, appoint a trustee under the 279th of the Bankruptcy Rules 1870, for receipt and distribution of the composition, the court will not allow the debtor to be sued by reason of any default on the part of the trustee to tender the composition to any of the creditors: (Ex parte Waterer; Re Taylor, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 907. Chan.)

PRACTICE—NOTICE OF APPEAL — VACATING ENROLMENT.—A notice of an appeal motion must be signed by the intending appellant or his solicitors, and where a notice not so signed is served, and the respondent refuses to waive the irregularity, the notice is of no effect, and will not prevent the enrolment of the decree: (Re The Limehouse Works Company, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 4. Chan.)

SECURITY FOR COSTS — PLAINTIFF IN SCOTLAND—31 & 32 VICT. C. 54, SS. 2 AND 5.—The reason for the rule of practice, that a plaintiff residing in Scotland should give security for costs, having ceased in consequence of the Judgments' Extension Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 54), s. 2, which provides that a certificate of an English judgment shall have the same effect as a decree of the Court of Session: Held, that although security for the costs of an action is not expressly rendered unnecessary by the 5th section, yet the court will not continue the practice: (Raeburn v. Andrew, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15. Q. B.)

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, LANCASTER—SERVICE OF WRIT OUTSIDE THE COUNTY PALATINE—JURISDICTION OF THE COURT—IRREGULARITY, HOW WAIVED—APPEARANCE BY PARTY OUT OF THE JURISDICTION.—Where plaintiff and defendant both resided out of the County Palatine of Lancashire, and the cause of action arose also wholly outside the county, and a writ of summons issued out of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster was sent to the defendant's attorney in Staffordshire, who gave an undertaking to appear, and afterwards did appear, it was held that the service could not be set aside, as any irregularity had been waived by the defendant's appearance. The Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster being a Superior Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter of an action arising out of the County Palatine, provided the parties come within the jurisdiction: (Oulton v. Radcliffe, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 22. C. P.)

MEASURE OF DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT.—The plaintiff having received an order from P. to supply from 150lb. to 200lb. wound cotton daily, verbally agreed with the defendant that the defendant should undertake the winding of it, informing the defendant, as was the fact, that the plaintiff had taken upon himself the consequences of late delivery, if any, to P., and obtaining from the defendant the assurance that he the plaintiff might rely on him. Afterwards, and on the day of the interview, the plaintiff sent the defendant a written order for the cotton, "on the express condition" that the same "should be delivered daily," but containing no notice or stipulation as to the sub-contract of the plaintiff with P. The defendant failing to deliver regularly to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff to P., the result was that P. claimed, and the plaintiff paid to P. the sum of £300 by way of reimbursing P. for his loss upon resale of the goods which P.'s customers had refused to accept, as having been delivered late. Held that the plaintiff might recover the sum of £300 from the defendant as damages for the breach of contract to deliver the cotton daily: (Sawdon v. Andrew and another, 30 L. T. Rep. N.S. 23. Ex.).

DAMAGES — ASSESSMENT — APPEAL AS TO QUANTUM.—The Court of Appeal will not entertain an appeal from an order of the court below assessing damages, unless it is shown that the court below has acted on a wrong principle in assessing the quantum of damages: (Ball v. Ray, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1. Chan.)

ADMINISTRATION WITH WILL ANNEXED—ADMINISTRATION BOND — SURETIES.—Where the administrator, who was the sole person entitled in distribution had no friends in this country willing to become sureties, the court, though it refused to dispense with the ordinary bonds, allowed the amount to be spread over several sureties, or to be secured by one surety alone: (In the Goods of Col. R. Smith, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 932. Prob.)

DEMURRER—CROSS BILL FOR MORE EXTENSIVE RELIEF—UNDERTAKING FOR DAMAGES.—A company who were in possession of certain coal mines after the expiration of their lease, filed a bill against the owner of the mines for specific performance of an alleged agreement for a new lease, and for an injunction to restrain the owner from taking proceedings to deprive them of possession. On motion for an injunction no order was drawn up, but the owner gave an undertaking not to sue at law, and the company had their undertaking to be answerable for damages. Subsequently the owner filed a cross bill against the company, praying for an injunction to restrain them from taking any coal from the mines, for a receiver, and for an order that the company should deliver up possession of the mines. Held (reversing the decision of Bacon, V.C.), that the undertaking given to the other suit, did not interfere with the owner's right to file a cross bill, and a demurrer by the company was accordingly overruled: (Moon v. The Original Hartlepool Collieries Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 901. Chan.)

COPYRIGHT — PIRACY — ACQUIESCENCE— INJUNCTION—COSTS.—M., the proprietor of a magazine, had for eight years regularly sent to S., the proprietor of a country newspaper, his magazine for the purpose of being reviewed. S. from time to time published reviews and extracts, and occasionally entire stories, from these magazines, always acknowledging from whence he took them, and sending M. the paper containing such review, extract or story. In Nov. 1873, S. published an entire story from the November number of the magazine. Shortly afterwards M., without giving S. any notice, filed a bill to restrain S. from pirating his works. Held, that M. was entitled to an injunction, but under the circumstances each party was ordered to pay his own costs: (Maxwell v. Somerton, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 11. V.C. B.)

CONVERSION—GOODS INVOICED TO DEFENDANT BY FRAUD OF BROKER—ENDORSEMENT OF DELIVERY ORDER TO BROKER.—The defendant received from the plaintiffs two invoices in respect of a quantity of barley, which G., the broker of the plaintiffs, had falsely represented to have been ordered by the defendant. G. afterwards procured the defendant to endorse over to him a delivery order for the barley to a railway company, on the strength of which he obtained the barley and then absconded, whereby the barley was lost to the plaintiffs. The jury found that the defendant had acted bonâ fide in endorsing the delivery order to G. Held, that the defendant was guilty of a conversion of the barley. Per Bramwell, B. Conversion is best defined as doing an act unauthorised which deprives another of his property for an indefinite time. Per Cleasby, B. It was not necessary to ask the jury whether the defendant did what was reasonable under the circumstances or not: (Heugh v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 676, distinguished): (Hiort and another v. Bott, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 25. Ex.).

MANDAMUS — INSPECTION OF REGISTER — MOTIVE OF APPLICANT—SOLICITOR OF OPPOSING LITIGANTS.—Defendants were incorporated under Acts of Parliament which provided, amongst other things, for inspection by the shareholders of the company's books and documents. A shareholder of nine years' standing was solicitor to a waterworks company, who had obtained a decree in Chancery against the defendants, and it was under consideration whether the defendants should appeal. This shareholder applied to the defendants' secretary, without stating his object, for inspection of the register of shareholders, and was refused. Upon a rule for mandamus by the shareholder to obtain this inspection, the defendants' secretary stated on affidavit, and it was not contradicted, that the prosecutor made his application for inspection in the interest of his clients, and not for any purpose or in the interest of the defendants or of any member of the company as such; that his object was to canvass the shareholders and endeavour to persuade them to oppose the said appeal. Held, by Blackburn and Archibald, JJ. (Quain, J. dissentiente), that this was not sufficient reason for discharging the rule: (Reg. v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 922. Q.B.)

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION OF COUNTY COURT—COLLISION IN THE BODY OF A COUNTY —COSTS.—The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, gives jurisdiction to the High Court of Admiralty to decide all claims and demands whatsoever for damage received by any ship or seagoing vessel, whether such ship or vessel may have been in the body of a county or upon the high seas. The 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3, gives to County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction authority to try and determine any claim for damage by collision in which the amount claimed does not exceed £300. The plaintiff brought an action in the Court of Queen's Bench to recover damages in consequence of injury caused to his ship by the defendant's barge coming into collision with it in the body of a county, and recovered £15 damages. The master having allowed the plaintiff's costs, a rule was obtained calling upon the master to review his taxation. Held, that the action could have been brought in the County Court, which had jurisdiction, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to costs: (Purkis v. Flower, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 40. Bail Court.)

FALSE REPRESENTATION BY A BANK MANAGER —LIABILITY OF BANK—SIGNATURE OF PARTY TO BE CHARGED—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.—9 GEO. 4, c. 14, s. 6.—Plaintiff was a dealer in iron rails at Sheffield, and the defendants were, one the public officer of the Gloucestershire Banking Company, and the other, G., a manager of the said bank. Plaintiff having been offered in payment for certain rails an acceptance by one R. for about £3000, and having been referred, as to R.'s solvency, to the above named bank, requested his own bankers to make the necessary inquiries. The manager of plaintiff's bank accordingly wrote, asking G.'s opinion in confidence as to R.'s respectability and standing, and whether he considered him responsible to the extent of £50,000. G. replied that R. was lord of a manor, that he was told the rent roll was over £7000 a year, &c., and that he did not believe R. would incur the liability named unless he was certain to meet the engagement. In consequence of this reply the plaintiff supplied the rails, and, R. having afterwards become insolvent, brough an action against the Gloucestershire Bank and G. for a false representation as to the solvency of R. It having been found at the trial that the making and answering of such inquiries was within the general scope of the authority conferred on bank managers, and that the representation made by G. was false to his knowledge. Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench) that G. was personally liable for the false representation; but (reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench) that the Gloucestershire Banking Company could not be made liable for the fraudulent representation of G. (per Lord Coleridge, C.J., Bramwell, and Pigott, BB., Grove and Denman, JJ.) on two grounds; first, because G. was an agent of the banking company and a representation signed only by him was insufficient to render the banking company liable, under sect. 6 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 14; secondly, because the inquiry as to R.'s solvency was addressed to, and the reply given by, G. in his individual and personal capacity, and not as representing and acting on behalf of the banking company. Per Cleasby, B., on the second ground only: (Swift v. Jewesbury (P.O.) and Goddard, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 31. Ex. Ch.)

Correspondence.

SIR,—Under the heading of "Solicitors' Journal," in your impression of the 21st ult., you refer to a Dublin solicitor having informed you that applications by English solicitors to be appointed commissioners for oaths in the Irish courts had been several times lately made without success, and that in fact there was no utility for such an appointment, as, since the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 44, came into operation, English Chancery Commissioners are authorised to take Irish Chancery affidavits. This is correct to an extent, but the Act goes further; see sect. 81, whereby commissioners in common law in England, as well as those in Chancery, can take such affidavits, and who also take acknowledgments by married women to be acted upon in Ireland.

A PETITION against the respondent, the sitting member for the borough of Wakefield, alleged bribery by the respondent and his agents, also general bribery.

The election took place on the 3rd Feb. 1874, and the petition was duly presented against the return of the respondent, within twenty-one days after the return.

On the 4th March a summons was taken out for the delivery by the petitioners of full particulars of the allegations contained in the petition within ten days from the date of the order (if any) to be made thereon, and was heard before Lord Chief Justice Cockburn at chambers.

MAGISTRATES' LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

CORRUPT PRACTICES (MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS) ACT 1872 (35 & 35 VICT. c. 60)—JURISDICTION OF JUDGE AT CHAMBERS TO AMEND PETITION—WHAT IS A FRESH PETITION—POWER OF SUPERIOR COURT UNDER SECT. 21.—Sect. 13 of the Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict.) c. 60, directing that a petition shall be presented within twenty-one days after the day on which the election was held, is imperative, and admits of no exception but the one specified in that section, and therefore when a petition has once been presented it cannot be amended by the addition of other charges against the respondent, and a judge at chambers has no power under sect. 21, sub-sect. 5, to make an order allowing an amendment, which varies the charge originally preferred. Per Lord Coleridge, C.J., two classes of offences are included in sect. 7 of the Municipal Elections Act 1872—viz., the employment of voters living within the ward, and the voters living without the ward: (Maude and others v. Lowley, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 924. C. P.).

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—INJURY TO PREMISES NOT TAKEN UNDER COMPULSORY POWERS.—Where a school board acquires land as a site for a school, under the compulsory powers given by the Elementary Education Act, and builds a school so as to obstruct the ancient lights of an adjoining landowner, the remedy of the adjoining landowner is by claiming compensation under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and not by bill for an injunction: (Clark v. The School Board for London, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 903. L. C. & L.JJ.).

RATING OF RAILWAYS—BRANCH RAILWAYS.—The appellants, a railway company, were owners of a branch line connecting their main line with three other main lines. If the branch were in the market, either of the three companies which owned these three other main lines would, in consequence of the traffic which it would bring to their line, be willing to acquire it upon the same terms in every respect as those upon which the appellants held it; if so acquired by either of such other companies, they would work it in a similar manner to that in which it was worked by the appellants, and under such circumstances the traffic upon it would not produce a higher rateable value, caculated upon the mileage principle in respect to the traffic of the branch only, than what it produced to the appellants. Held that, in assessing the part of the branch line within the respondents' parish, this circumstance must be taken into consideration in estimating the rateable value: (Reg. v. the London and North Western Railway Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 910. Q.B.)

LINE OF SHOPS—GOODS PROJECTING.—By a local Act of 1872, if any person places, hangs up, or otherwise exposes any furniture, goods, produce, wares, merchandise, matter or thing, so that the same projects or project into or over any footway, or beyond the line of any house, shop or building, at which the same is or are exposed, he shall be liable to a penalty. Justices refused to convict defendant, who was charged under this section; but they stated, in the case reserved at the complainant's request, that defendant exposed greengrocery, in which he dealt, on a cooler or tray of wood, projecting 2ft. 9in. beyond the line of the brickwork of his building. This tray fell forward from the shop window, and when used was supported by iron stanchions and hinges. The steps of the adjoining house projected three inches further than this tray during the day. At night, and on Sundays, the tray was not beyond the line of defendant's and the adjoining house; the street was exceptionally wide at this particular part. The defendant's premises had been erected between thirty and forty years, and during that period the tenants had always used the same cooler or tray, or something of the same description. Held, that the Act must be taken to refer to the line of shop existing at the time of its passing, which in this case was the line of the tray; and that the justices were right: (Wilson v. Cunliffe, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 913. Q. B.)

PAVING AND SEWERING—INCIDENTAL COSTS.—Defendant was owner of some houses, and occupied land bounding or abutting on a new street, which the plaintiffs had paved under sect. 105 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and sewered under sect. 52 of the Amending Act of 1862. Amongst other items which the plaintiffs had apportioned to defendant's contribution were costs of collecting apportioned amounts, of survey plan and obtaining names of owners, and of filling up, printing, advertising, and serving notices. These sums were all paid to persons employed for the purpsoe, and not plaintiffs' servants, although plaintiffs had in their employ a surveyor and a clerk, and payments were requested at their office. Defendant occupied the said land under a building agreement, by which the owner of the land agreed to demise to defendant or his nominees the several pieces of land upon which the defendant was to build, as the houses and buildings respectively became erected and covered, for 80 years, at the rent of a peppercorn for two years, and of sums increasing every year up to £364 in the sixth and following years. The defendant was to be considered as holding the undemised portion on the terms of the leases. There was a power of re-entry upon non-completion of the building covenants. The houses at this time were in every stage of building progress, and some had been demised to other persons at defendant's nomination. Held, upon an action to recover defendant's apportionment, that with the exception of the houses demised to other persons, the defendant was liable as owner of all the premises, and that the above items were incidental costs and charges within the 77th section of the said Act of 1862. (Poplar Board of Works v. Love, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 915. Q. B.)

HIGHWAY—DEDICATION TO THE PUBLIC—NEW STREET—METROPOLITAN LOCAL MANAGEMENT.—Respondent had leased land for building purposes, and the road between the houses he had built was, before 1863, used for sawpits and building materials. Since then footways on each side had been made by the appellants' vestry, and paid for by the lessees or owners of the houses. A barrier had been kept by the respondent across part of the carriage way, and the remainder could be closed by a folding bar. Respondent had occasionally prevented the passage of vehicles, and had once recovered damages for trespass along this road. The freeholders also had given public notice that they objected to this road being used as a thoroughfare. The appellants, without notice to the respondents, resolved to pave, and paved this carriage way, and summoned respondent for his proportion of the expenses of a new street, under the Metropolis Management Act 1855, s. 105. The justices decided that this road had not been dedicated to the public, that it was not a new street within that section, and that respondent could be liable only if the appellants had proceeded under sect. 106. Held, on a case stated, that upon these facts the finding of the justices was conclusive as to the dedication of the road to the public; but that sect. 105 relates to the paving or forming new streets, as may deemed expedient by the vestry, whether highways or not; that sect. 106 relates only to the repair of streets, not being highways, which have not been paved by the vestry; and that, therefore, the appellants had here proceeded rightly under sect. 105, and were entitled to recover: (St. Mary, Islington v. Barrett, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 11. Q. B.)

POOR RATE—HOSPITAL—BENEFICIAL OCCUPATION.—St. Thomas's Hospital was founded by royal charter for the relief and sustenance of poor sick and infirm people, and vested in the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London. The patients pay nothing for their maintenance or the medical services rendered to them. There is a medical school connected with the hospital, and its students pay certain fees, which are wholly devoted to the expenses of the medical school, and are not paid to or in any accounted for to the governors of the hospital. Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench), that the hospital was liable to be rated, and not at a merely nominal sum: (Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital v. The Churchwardens and Overseers of Lambeth, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 37. Ex. Ch.)

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

COLLISION — STEAMSHIP — DUMB BARGE — LIGHTS—COURSE ON THE THAMES—DUTY. — Dumb barges in motion driving with the tide up or down the river Thames at night are not bound to carry lights. A dumb barge coming up the river Thames in a flood tide may keep on either side of the river, and there is no obligation on her by custom or otherwise to keep in mid-channel. There is no duty on a dumb barge driving with the tide in the Thames to keep out of the way of a steamship; but it is the duty of the steamship to keep out of the way of the barge: (The Owen Wallis, 30 L. T. Rep. N.S. 41. Adm.)

COLLISION—PRACTICE—DUTY TO BEGIN—FOG OVER ANCHORAGE GROUND.—In all causes of damage, the onus being upon the plaintiff to establish negligence against the defendant, the plaintiff must begin; and this rule applies to cases where the only defence is inevitable accident and the plaintiff's vessel is at anchor, contrary to the former practice of the High Court of Admiralty. Where a steamship, whilst in a good and well-known anchorage ground, enters a dense fog, it is her duty to anchor at once; and if she neglects to do so, and continues her course, she will be to blame for a collision ensuing, provided that the other vessel has done all that the law requires: (The Otter, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 43. Adm.)

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT. SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

THE STEAMSHIP FRANCIS WRIGHT.

Charter-party—Unseaworthiness of vessel—Injury to cargo by delay—Agency of master and engineer.

A steamship was chartered by a written charter for six months to run between certain ports. The owners covenanted that the vessel should be kept tight, staunch, well fitted, tackled, and provided with every requisite for such a voyage; that the whole of the vessel except the necessary room for the sails and cables should be at the disposal of the charterers; and that the owners would take and receive on board during the voyage all the merchandise which the charterers desired to ship. The charterers covenanted to man, coal, and victual the steamer, and pay all expenses except insurance on vessel and repairs, and to pay charter money at a certain rate. The charter also contained these clauses: "Vessel to be returned to the owners at the expiration of this charter in the same order and condition she is now in, less the ordinary wear, and charterers to take and deliver the steamer at New York. Owners to nominate and charterers to appoint chief engineer, to be paid by the charterers. Charterers to appoint captain subject to the approval of the owners." The captain and chief engineer were appointed as agreed, and the vessel was taken from New York to Philadelphia, where the charterers resided, and was there fitted up with a refrigerating apparatus. She took on board a quantity of ice and some general cargo, and sailed for Galveston. On the voyage out there were several stoppages, owing to the tubes of the boiler giving out. At Galveston she took on board a quantity of fresh beef, which it was intended to keep fresh by the refrigerating apparatus. She started from Galveston on her return voyage, but a few hours after starting twenty-six tubes of her boiler gave out without any ostensible cause, and she was compelled to put back, and was detained seven days before the repairs to the boiler were completed. She then sailed again, and put into Key West, where she took on board some coal and 20 tons of ice, and sailed again; but before reaching Philadelphia the beef was spoiled, and was thrown overboard. But for the delay in going back to Galveston, the vessel would have reached Philadelphia on the day she left Key West. The charterers libelled the vessel to recover 25,000 dols., the value of the beef, claiming that the beef was good till several days after the time when the vessel would have reached Philadelphia but for the delay, and that the loss of the beef was due to the delay caused by the unseaworthy condition of the boiler.

Held, that, under the charter, the owners were bound to keep the boiler and its tubes in proper condition during the voyage, through the master and chief engineer as their agents. That the boiler and its tubes were not kept in proper condition, and that from that cause the voyage was delayed and prolonged. That the charterers must prove, in order to recover, that the loss occurred from such delay; and inasmuch as, on that evidence, it was not satisfactorily shown that the beef was merchantable when the vessel was at Key West, or if it was that it might not have been kept so, provided more ice had been purchased at Key West, the libel must be dismissed.

ON the 13th Sept. 1872, Messrs. Duncan and Poey, of Philadelphia, entered into a written charter-party with Woodhouse and Rudd, owners of the steamer Francis Wright, then at New York, whereby Woodhouse and Rudd chartered the steamer to Duncan and Poey "for the term of six months, to run between Philadelphia or New York, and Galveston, or any intermediate safe port in the United States, or any foreign port not prohibited by the insurance," with the agreement that the charterers were to have the privilege of cancelling the charter at the expiration of three months, on giving Woodhouse and Rudd fifteen days' notice, and the payment of 1500 dols. bonus. The instrument then set forth the following agreements by Woodhouse and Rudd: First, that "the said vessel in and during the said voyage shall be kept tight, staunch, well fitted, tackled, and provided with every requisite for such a voyage;" secondly, that "the whole of the said vessel (with the exception of the necessary room for the sails, cables), shall be at the sole use and disposal of the libellants during the voyage aforesaid;" thirdly, that Woodhouse and Rudd will "take and receive on board the same vessel, during the aforesaid voyage, all such lawful goods and merchandise as the libellants may think proper to ship." The instrument then set forth the following agreements by the charterers. They were (1) "to man, coal, and victual steamer, and pay all expenses of every nature (including port charges, &c.) connected with running of the steamer, except insurance on vessel and repairs;" (2) to pay to Woodhouse and Rudd for the charter of vessel "eighty-five dollars per day, United States currency, due daily, but payable at the expiration of each and every month, in New York; vessel to be returned to the owners, at the expiration of this charter, in the same order and condition as she is now in, less the ordinary wear, and charterers to take and deliver the steamer at New York." Then followed these provisions:—"Owners to nominate and charterers to appoint chief engineer, to be paid by charterers at the rate of 125 dols. per month. Charterers to appoint captain subject to the approval of the owners. It is also agreed that this charter shall commence at New York on the 18th Sept. 1872. If, from any derangement of machinery, a steamer is delayed, the time lost is not to be paid for by charterers, and in such derangement (if any) owners to have privilege of cancelling charter. In case of any wreckage, towage, or salvage accruing to the vessel, whilst under this charter, one half of said earnings to be paid to the owners of the steamer." In accordance with the terms of the charter party, John A. Sherman was appointed chief engineer of the vessel, and Henry Dennison was appointed her captain. She was taken to Philadelphia, and there the charterers fitted her with a refrigerating apparatus to bring a cargo of fresh beef from Galveston, Texas, to Philadelphia. The put on board of her at Philadelphia a general cargo of merchandise and proper fuel, and about 260 tons of ice, the latter to be used in connection with the refrigerating apparatus, to preserve the fresh beef on the homeward voyage. She left Philadelphia for Galveston on the 3rd Oct. 1872, and arrived at Galveston on the 17th of the same month. This libel was filed by them to recover for the entire loss of the beef on the homeward voyage.

The libel alleged that during the voyage from Philadelphia to Galveston, the vessel gave evidence of unseaworthiness by having a number of her boiler tubes blown out, and by great and unusual leaking in her boiler tubes, which rendered it difficult to make steam on the vessel by reason of the water from the blown out and leaking tubes escaping into the furnaces, and affecting and diminishing the fires therein; by reason whereof the steamer was unable to attain her usual and proper speed, and was fourteen days in making the passage from Philadelphia to Galveston, instead of ten days, which is the full, usual, and ordinary time for a steamer of that capacity to make such voyage; that when the vessel arrived at Galveston, Woodhouse and Rudd, through their agent and representative, the chief engineer of the vessel, were requested to make the proper and necessary repairs to the boiler and to its tubes, in order that there might be no further delays, after the cargo of fresh beef was laden on board, and and that the vessel might make the return passage in ten days; that the chief engineer promised that all necessary and proper repairs to the boiler and its tubes should be made; but they were not made, by reason whereof the steamer, having on board about seventy tons of fresh beef, was, on the 31st Oct. 1872, being then four hours at sea out of Galveston, on her voyage to Philadelphia, compelled to put back to Galveston for repairs, by reason of the tubes of the boiler blowing out and leaking badly, and was detained at Galveston seven days thereafter in repairing some of the tubes; that the steamer again left Galveston for Philadelphia on the 7th Nov. 1872, and was fifteen days making the voyage owing to the unseaworthy condition of the steamer, some of the tubes blowing out, and others of them leaking so badly, that the boiler could with difficulty make steam, and thereby the speed of the vessel was greatly reduced below what her ordinary speed would have been if her boiler tubes had been kept in a proper and seaworthy condition; that by reason of the detention of the steamer at Galveston while making repairs and by resson of the detention of the steamer in making her passage from Galveston to Philadelphia owing to the unseaworthy condition of the boiler tubes, and by reason of the hot water which escaped from the defective boiler tubes, and was negligently allowed to run into the bilge of the steamer and melt the ice in the refrigerator where the fresh beef was stowed, the beef became damaged, spoiled, and entirely lost to the libellants; that Woodhouse and Rudd did not perform their covenant, that the vessel in and during said voyage, should be kept by them tight, staunch, well-fitted, tackled, and provided with every requisite for such a voyage; that the value of the fresh beef at Philadelphia was 23,000 dols.; that by reason of the failure of Woodhouse and Rudd, and the vessel to comply with said covenant, the fresh beef has been wholly lost to the libellants; and that at the time of the making of the charter-party Woodhouse and Rudd knew that the steamer was chartered by the libellants for the purpose of carrying fresh beef from Galveston to Philadelphia, and also knew that the steamer was in an unseaworthy condition as regards her boiler and its tubes. The libel claims 30,000 dols. damages against the vessel and her owners.

The answer of Woodhouse and Rudd as claimants, set up that the libellants had the entire charge and possession of the vessel, and denied that the chief engineer was the agent or representative of the claimants, and averred that the repairs which the claimants were bound to make were made, and that the steamer was, so far as the claimants were bound to do so, kept as called for by the charter-party, and denied all the allegations of the libel in which the libellants claim a recovery.

R. D. Benedict, for the libellants, argued that under the charter the owners must be held to have retained the possession of the vessel, as far as was necessary for the making of repairs, and that the master and engineer were their agents for that purpose: (citing Certain Logs of Mahogany, 2 Summer's Rep. 597; Hooe v. Grovermann, 1 Cranch's Rep. 215; Christie v. Lewis, 5 Moore, 211; The Milches, 5 Blatchford's Rep. 336; Swainston v. Garrick, 2 L. That the vessel was not kept in repair, but was unseaworthy: (citing Wright v. The Orient Mercantile Insurance Company, 6 Bosworth's Rep. 269; Hathaway v. The Sun Mercantile Insurance Company, 8 id. 54). That the owners having agreed that the vessel should be kept in repair, were bound to keep her so: (citing Paradine v. Jayne, Aleyn, ; Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N. Y. Rep. 107) and were liable for the damages resulting from the delay occasioned by the failure to keep her so, and that the loss of the beef resulted from that delay.

For the steamer, C. Donohue.

BLATCHFORD, J.—It may not be difficult to hold that, under the charter-party, the claimants were bound to keep the boiler and its tubes in proper condition during the voyage, through the master and the chief engineer as their agents; that the claimants remained in possession of the vessel for such purpose, through those officers, as agents for such purpose; that the boiler and its tubes were not kept in proper condition; and that from that cause the voyage was delayed and prolonged. By the charter-party the claimants agree so keep the vessel, while on a voyage named in the charter-party, well fitted and provided with every requisite for such a voyage; and it is agreed that the libellants shall not pay any expense of repairs. To enable the claimants to discharge such duty, it is provided that they shall have the nomination of the person who is to be chief engineer, and that no appointment of a captain shall be made otherwise than subject to their approval. The chief engineer was nominated by them, and the captain was appointed with their approval. The claimants assumed absolutely the obligation referred to. They either deprived themselves voluntarily of all means of fulfilling it, by not having any agent on board to attend to its fulfilment, or the officers referred to must be regarded in the interest of the claimants, through their mode of appointment, for the purpose of seeing to the fulfilment of such obligations. The claimants contend that the libellants were in the exclusive possession of the vessel. But the provisions that the vessel shall be at the sole use and disposal of the libellants, and that the libellants shall man, coal, and victual her, and pay her running expenses (except insurance and repairs), and return her at the expiration of the charter in proper condition, less ordinary wear, and take and deliver her at New York, and pay one-half of her salvage earnings to the claimants, are not at all inconsistent with a fulfilment by the claimants of the agreed duty of keeping the vessel well fitted and provided with every requisite for the voyage, or with such possession by the claimants, through the captain and chief engineer appointed in the manner prescribed as would enable the claimants, through those officers, to represent them in that regard, to see that the agreement was performed. That the boiler and its tubes were not kept in proper condition during the voyage is established by the evidence. The boiler was not seaworthy. Whatever its apparent condition was when the vessel left Galveston for the first time, with her cargo of beef on board, subsequent events and the results show that the boiler was unseaworthy. There was no cause to produce the blowing out and leaking of the tubes, but the inherent defects of the boiler. Having left Galveston on the 31st Oct. at 11 o'clock a.m., the vessel was stopped at 7 p.m., because twenty-six out of the 144 tubes in her boiler were leaking. She lay until 10 a.m. on the 1st Nov., making repairs, and then returned to Galveston, and remained there making further repairs till 7 a.m. on the 7th Nov., thus losing full seven days of time. The return to Galveston was necessary in order to obtain a proper tool with which to make the repairs. On the voyage from Philadelphia to Galveston the vessel was stopped at sea on the 8th Oct. for five and a half hours, to make repairs on the boiler and engine, and on the 12th for two and a half hours, to plug leaking tubes, and on the 17th for two hours, for repairs to the boiler. This indicated a condition of things which required that the boiler should be thoroughly repaired before starting on the return voyage. But the repairs made were not thorough as shown by the result. The return to Galveston was the result of the co-operating judgment of the captain and the chief engineer, that such return was necessary. On the return voyage the vessel put into Key West, arriving there at 3 p.m. on the 14th Nov. During the passage to Key West the boiler leaked, though there was no stoppage. The vessel left Key West on the 15th inst at 2.30 p.m. On the 16th and 17th the boiler leaked. On the 18th the vessel stopped for seven and three-quarter hours and stopped up three tubes, and on the 21st she stopped for four and a half hours and stopped up one tube and repaired three others. She arrived at Delaware city three and a half hours below Philadelphia at noon on Nov. 22nd, with twenty-six of her tubes plugged up. The quarters of beef were on slated racks in a refrigerating room in the hold of the vessel. In such room was a box, standing on the floor, about four feet square and eight or nine feet high. This box was replenished with ice from time to time. By machinery outside of the room the air of the room was driven through the box, and into contact with the ice, and out again into the room, constantly circulating. There was no opening into the room except by a hole in the top, and there was an opening into the box from the outside of the room, to replenish the box with ice from the general depository of ice elsewhere. The difficult question in the case is as to whether it is satisfactorily shown that the beef was spoiled and lost through the causes set forth in the libel. The burden of proof is on the libellants to show this. The averment of the libel is, that by reason of the detention of the steamer at Galveston, while making repairs, and by reason of the detention of the steamer in making her passage from Galveston to Philadelphia, owing to the unseaworthy condition of the boiler tubes, and by reason of the hot water which escaped from the defective boiler tubes, and was negligently allowed to run into the bilge of the steamer and melt the ice in the refrigerator where the fresh beef was stowed; the beef became damaged, spoiled, and entirely lost to the libellants. It is not enough to show the unseaworthy condition of the boiler tubes, and that the vessel was detained at Galveston to repair them, and was detained on her passage by reason of them and to repair them, and that hot water escaped and ran into the bilge, and some ice was melted from such cause. It must be shown that, but for such things the beef would have been and was unspoiled, and merchantable as fresh beef.

Zane, the person who came in the vessel from Galveston in charge of the beef, testifies that when the vessel left Galveston the first time the temperature of the room was 39 deg. Fahrenheit; that while they were stopped at sea, outside of Galveston, it rose to 46 deg.; that when they returned to Galveston it was 44 deg.; that the day before they arrived at Key West it was about 50 deg; that they had about 100 tons of ice when they left Galveston the first time, and about 95 tons when they left the second time; that they had about 15 tons left when they reached Key West; that they procured 20 tons more at Key West; that the first day out from Key West (16th Nov.) the temperature of the refrigerating room was about as usual, say 40 deg.; that the next day it became 60 deg., and afterwards increased to 68 deg., when they were about at Cape Hatteras; that then the beef spoiled and part of it was thrown overboard, and that at that time the ice was not quite all used up.

The libellants contend that the beef remained unspoiled until after the vessel had left Key West for Philadelphia, and that the cargo would have been landed in good merchantable order at Philadelphia before the time it, in fact, spoiled, but for the detentions specified in the libel, because, but for such detentions, it would have been at Philadelphia unspoiled at a time when it was at sea, unspoiled.

No complaint is made as to any loss of time by putting in at Key West. From the time the vessel left Galveston the second time (7th Nov., at 7 a.m.) till she substantially reached Philadelphia (22nd Nov., at 3½ p.m.) was 15 days and eight and a half hours. Leaving Galveston 31st Oct., at 11 a.m., a trip of 15 days and eight and a half hours, would have brought her to Philadelphia, Nov. 15, at 7½ p.m., at which time she was at sea, having left Key West five hours before. Was the beef unspoiled and merchantable at the time the vessel left Key West? Captain Dennison, on his direct examination, testifies that he saw the cook cutting some of the beef, and cooking it, and the men eating it, on the Monday after leaving Key West (which Monday was Nov. 18), that it was on the cabin table, and eaten by same, after leaving West Key, and that it cut as if it was good. On his cross-examination this is his evidence:—Q Did not you yourself at that time, at Key West, after the attempt was made to get the beef, say it was stinking?—A. I do not remember that I did. Q. Will you swear you did not?—A. I will not. Q. Will you swear it was not stinking?—A. I will not swear. Q. Was it not, in fact, beginning to taint?—A. That is a hard question for me to answer, because I did not know the condition of it then. Q. You have been swearing to something about its condition; I ask whether it was not beginning to taint?—A. I had my suspicions about it. Q. Were not your suspicions that it was beginning to taint?—A. I was told it was not. Q. Did you not know that that beef was beginning to taint at that time?—A. I would not swear it was good, nor would I swear it was bad. Q. You were one of the persons interested in the beef?—A. I was very anxious to get it here safe. Q. Did you not state, in Key West, at that time, that it was beginning to taint, or was tainted?—A. I might have said so, but I do not remember. Q. Did you not say to Mr. Sherman, your chief engineer, that the beef stank, at Key West?—A. I may have said so, but I do not remember that I did. I will not swear I did not, because I said a great deal about the beef being bad. Q. Did you not say, at Key West, that it was "all up?"—A. Not that I remember. Q. You will not swear you did not?—A. I will not swear I did not. Q. Did you not say, in Key West, that you were very much worried about buying the ice, as you thought it was so much money thrown away?—A. I said, in Key West, that I would not buy the ice, if the party in charge did not give me a written order to buy it. I may have said I feared it; ice was so very high there that I hated to buy it, and I thought we had enough, when we left Galveston, to see us home. Zane, in his direct examination, says that the beef was in good order when they arrived at Key West; that he is sure it was good the Tuesday morning, after leaving Key West (which Tuesday was Nov. 19th); that he knows it was good then because he ate of it, and saw others eat of it; that he examined it himself, and that he detected indications of its spoiling the next day. On cross-examination, he says that he gave some of the beef to one of the government vessels at Key West, and it was good. The evidence shows that this was an experimental voyage, to see whether the refrigerating apparatus and machinery would work successfully. There were 15 tons of ice left on arriving at Key West. The consumption of ice from Galveston to Key West, in 7 days and eight hours had been 80 tons. The running time of the vessel from Key West to Philadelphia was 6 days and twelve and three-quarter hours, after deducting the stoppages. Yet the vessel did not have over 35 tons of ice (including the 20 tons purchased at Key West) for use during that time. The same rate of use as from Galveston to Key West would have required over 71 tons for the voyage from Key West to Philadelphia, instead of 35 tons. If the beef was good at Key West, these facts would tend to show that its subsequent spoiling was due to a want of sufficient ice; or, if there was ice enough, to the inability of the apparatus to preserve the beef. Notwithstanding the delay, the libellants were bound to use all accessible means to preserve the beef. If ice was needed, and could be procured, it should have been procured at Key West, and such additional expense, and not the loss of the beef, have been thrown on the claimants. It does not appear that more ice could not have been obtained at Key West. The impression produced by the evidence is that, as the ice was going out, the beef began to spoil, and that it spoiled because the ice gave out. The first day out from Key West the temperature of the refrigerating room was about 40deg., the usual, and as I understand from the testimony, the proper temperature. The fact that so small a supply of ice was procured at Key West, and that there was such reluctance on the part of the captain to procure what he did, looks in the direction, very strongly, of a spoiled condition in the beef at Key West, or such a condition as made it substantially unmerchantable when it reached Key West. This is confirmed by the halting testimony of the captain. If true, then the delay before the vessel reached Key West was not the reason why the beef did not reach Philadelphia in merchantable condition. Because, the delay before reaching Key West was only seven days, and the running time from Key West to Philadelphia added to the time the vessel remained at Key West was seven days and twelve and a quarter hours. If the beef was good at Key West, and spoiled afterwards for want of ice, the claimants are not shown to be responsible for the loss. If there was plenty of ice after leaving Key West, and yet the beef spoiled, it would indicate inability in the apparatus to prevent the spoiling, and for this it is not shown that the claimants are liable. As to any melting of ice by hot water in the bilge, any effect therefrom to spoil the beef is covered by the views before stated. But I am not satisfied, from the evidence, that any hot water in the bilge, from the leaking tubes, had any effect to raise the temperature of the refrigerating room or to melt any ice. On a full consideration of the whole case, I can come to no other conclusion than that the libellants have not made out the the cause of action set forth in the libel, and that it must be dismissed, with costs.

MERCANTILE LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

VERBAL CHARTERING—NO BILL OF LADING—MATE'S RECEIPT NOT CONCLUSIVE EVIDENCE AGAINST MASTER OF QUANTITY SHIPPED.—The plaintiffs having verbally chartered the ship of the defendant to carry iron from Glasgow to Swansea, the ship was loaded with iron bought by the plaintiff from W. and Co. The iron was weighed by the agents of W. and Co., to whom the mate gave a receiet signed by him for 330 tons, but there was no bill of lading. On delivery at Swansea the quantity of iron was discovered to be 326¼ tons only, but the mate deposed, and was not contradicted, to the delivery of all that had been shipped. The plaintiffs having paid on the full amount of 330 tons to W. and Co., who refused to repay them the difference, sued the defendant for short delivery. Held that there was no evidence of negligence in the defendants, and that if there had been, it would not be negligence causing loss to the plaintiffs, and a County Court judgment in favour of the plaintiffs for short delivery reversed: (Biddulph and others v. Bingham, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 30. Ex.)

BILL OF LADING—DELIVERY OF LESS QUANTITY THAN THAT STATED IN BILL.—The whole freight named in the bill of lading is payable to the shipowner carrying under it, although a less quantity of goods than the quantity named in the bill of lading be delivered, if the quantity delivered be no less than the quantity received by the shipowner. By French law the whole freight is payable whether the whole quantity named in the bill of lading be carried or not, and therefore, in the case of a bill of lading executed in France, it is immaterial whether or not the shipowner received the whole quantity named in the bill of lading. By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 3, "every bill of lading is conclusive evidence of the shipment as against the person signing it." Semble that by this statute the bill of lading is conclusive evidence as to quantity, not to weight: (Blanchet v. Powell's Llantwit Collieries Company (Limited), 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 28. Ex.)

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BREACH OF TRUST—NEW TRUSTEES—APPOINTMENT OF SOLE TRUSTEE—LOSS OF TRUST FUND—LIABILITY OF SOLICITOR—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS.—Those who create a trust clothe the trustee with a legal power and control over the trust property, impesing upon him a corresponding reponsibility, which responsibility may be extended in equity to others who are not properly trustees if they are found either making themselves trustees de son tort, or actively participating in any fraudulent conduct of the trustee to the injury of the cestuis que trust. But strangers are not to be made constructive trustees merely because they act as the agents of trustees in transactions within their legal powers, even transactions of which a court of equity may disapprove, unless those agents receive and become chargeable with some part of the trust property, or unless they assist with knowledge in what they know to be a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees. The court does not approve of solicitors or others, who are properly witnesses, and who are not primarily chargeable with any part of the relief prayed, being made parties to suits with a view of charging them with costs alone. A testator bequeathed his residuary estate to three trustees, upon trust as to one-fourth part thereof, for the separate inalienable use for his daughter A. for life, with remainder to her children. Two of the trustees died, and the surviving trustee appointed A.'s husband sole trustee of his wife's share of the trust fund, and that share was transferred into the sole name of the husband, who employed it in his business and became bankrupt. A solicitor, who had previously acted in the affairs of the trust, prepared the deed of appointment, but only after strong protestations against the transaction, and another solicitor, after informing A. of the danger of the proposed appointment, approved of the deed on behalf of A. and her husband. Held (affirming the decision of Wickens, V.C.) that the solicitors were not liable to make good the loss of the trust fund, and that a bill seeking to make them liable had properly been dismissed with costs: (Barnes v. Addey, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 4. Chan.)

EXECUTOR DE SON TORT—ASSIGNEE OF LEASE—AGENT OF EXECUTOR DE SON TORT.—The executor of an executor de son tort may become himself executor de son tort in respect of the estate of the original intestate, and where the father was executor de son tort with regard to a lease, and the son upon his death acted as agent to the mother till her death, and then continued in possession of the lease for the benefit of himself and the other children, it was held that he became assignee of the lease, and liable upon the covenants therein: (Williams and Another v. Heales, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 20. C. P.)

LORD v. HARDMAN.

Piecework—Supply of materials—Liability of employer.

A power-loom weaver, paid by piecework, but bound not to leave his employment without giving seven days' notice in writing, is not entitled in the absence of express contract to damages for loss of wages through not being fully supplied by his employer with materials for his loom, where the deficient supply was not occasioned by the wilful refusal or negligence of the employer. The limit of the implied legal liability of the employer is to find reasonable employment according to the circumstances of the trade: (Pilkington v. Scott, 15 L. J. N. S., 329, Ex.; Reg. v. Welsh, 22 L. J., N. S. 145, Mag. Cas.; Aspkin v. Austin, 5 Q. B. 674.)

Deane (Blackburn) for plaintiff.

Baldwin (Burnley) for defendant.

HIS HONOUR.—This action is brought to recover the sum of 10s. 6d. as damages for loss of wages to the plaintiff, through an alleged breach of contract by the defendant. Though the sum sued for is small, the case was treated as involving a question of considerable importance to the trade and industry of this district. The plaintiff is a power-loom weaver, and the defendant is a manufacturer occupying room and power in a mill in Burnley, in which he has 170 looms, upon which from 40 to 50 weavers are employed, all of whom are paid by piecework according to an agreed list of prices. The wages are paid weekly, and are made up to the Wednesday, and paid on the following Saturday in each week, and the amount of wages payable to each weaver necessarily depends upon the quantity of work done by him during the week. The following is a copy of the rules in force at the defendant's mill, and which regulates the terms on which the plaintiff was employed.

"NOTICE.—All persons employed in these works are required to give seven days' notice, in writing, at the counting house before leaving their employ, and seven days' notice in writing will be given by the undersigned before the discharge of any person from such employ, except in the event of any person being guilty of wilful neglect, or spoiling of work, disobedience of orders, or any misdemeanour, in which case the person offending will be liable to immediate discharge, and on proof of wilful damage to forfeit any wages that may be due at the time of such discharge. All notices to be given on Wednesday night before six o'clock. Any person being absent from work without a substitute will be considered to have left without notice. Any persons leaving without notice will forfeit all wages due to them.—Signed, RICHARD HARDMAN."

The plaintiff entered upon his employment as a power-loom weaver, having four looms under his management; and on the Monday in the first week of his employment his looms were stopped for two hours for want of weft, and he was stopped all day on the following Wednesday from the same cause. On that day he gave the defendant the seven days' notice in writing required by the rules to leave his employ. He was supplied with weft on the following day (Thursday), but he had none on Friday or Saturday, and notice was given by the defendant that the weavers need not come till after breakfast time on the following Monday. At that time the plaintiff attended his employment again, and he was supplied with weft and warp for his looms from that time till the following Wenesday night, when his employment terminated according to his notice. Upon his wages account being made up to that time, the quantity of work done being less than it would have been if he had had a continued supply of weft, the amount of wages payable to him was less than he would have been able and expected to have earned by the sum claimed, namely, 10s. 6d., which he demanded of defendant, and defendant refused to pay. A question was raised by the defendant as to the amount, it being insisted on his behalf that the difference between what the plaintiff earned and what he might have earned did not exceed 7s. 6d., but I adopt the plaintiff's computation of his loss. The case, as at first opened on behalf of the plaintiff, was that the non-supply of weft was attributable to the wilful refusal or neglect of the defendant to supply it. The result of the evidence satisfied me that the defendant had done all that a prudent manufacturer, acting for his own interest and the interest of those employed by him, could be reasonably expected to do under the circumstances. I am satisfied that what the defendant did he did according to the usual custom of business, and he acted for the best for his own interest and the interest of the plaintiff and the other weavers in the same employment, and he was not, in my opinion, bound to do more. It was then contended for the plaintiff that the contract between him and the defendant involved an implied obligation on the part of the defendant to keep the plaintiff supplied with sufficient material to enable him to keep his looms going during the whole period of his employment, so as to enable him to do as much work as the looms were capable of turning out under his management, and thereby secure for himself as large an amount of wages as his skill and industry would enable him to earn. And it was further contended that this obligation was absolute, and that the plaintiff ought not to be affected by any circumstances which might occasion the deficient supply, though those circumstances might be beyond the control of the defendant, and though they actually arose out of the ordinary hazards and risks of the trade, and, in short, that the defendant must be considered as insuring the plaintiff constant remunerative employment, and as taking all risks and hazards upon himself. That, on the one hand, the wages to be earned by the plaintiff were the only fund out of which he could provide the necessaries of life for the support of himself and family; while, on the other hand, the question with the defendant was only one of more or less profit upon capital, with which labour had nothing to do. This contention would seem to apply to every description of remuneration for labour by piece work, and to every form of interruption to the continuance of that labour however occasioned. The importance of the question as thus stated to the commercial and industrial classes generally is obvious; but, in endeavouring to arrive at a proper decision of the question, it must be borne in mind that though the argument on both sides had a tendency to drift into the discussion of vexed questions between capital and labour, those questions cannot be discussed here. In this court the question can only be dealt with as one of contract, and must be determined by the application of principles and rules established by authority, and illustrated by examples of decided cases. Two cases were cited and relied upon by Mr. Deane on behalf of the plaintiff as authorities for the principle of the implied absolute obligation for which the plaintiff contends. The first case was that of Pilkington v. Scott, which occurred in 1846, and is reported 15 L. J., N. S., 329, Ex. Ch. That was an action by one rival manufacturer against another for harbouring one Joseph Leigh, a servant of the plaintiff's. The defendant pleaded not guilty. The case was tried at Liverpool before Patteson, J., and an agreement of service between Leigh and the plaintiffs was put in, which the defendant contended was invalid as being unilateral and not mutual, on the ground that the plaintiffs were not bound to employ Leigh, but only to pay him as long as he was employed, and that such an agreement was in restraint of trade, and therefore void as being against public policy. The learned judge overruled the objection, and the plaintiff recovered a verdict for £4. The agreement was that Leigh should and would at all times during the term of seven years to be computed from the date, serve the plaintiffs, their executors, &c., as a crown glass maker; that he should not during the term work for any other person at any other glass house or place of business without the licence of the plaintiffs; that it should be lawful for the plaintiffs to deduct from his wages any fine that he might incur for breach of their rules; that during any depression of trade he should be paid a moiety of his wages; that if he was sick or lame, the plaintiffs should be at liberty to employ any other persons in his stead without paying him any wages; that the plaintiffs should pay him a sum, and so long as he should be employed and work as a crown glass maker wages by the piece (stating them), and £8 per annum in lieu of house rent and firing, and that the plaintiffs should have the option of dismissing him on giving him a month's notice and paying him a month's wages. A rule nisi for a new trial was obtained for misdirection on the ground that the judge ought to have directed the jury to find for the defendant, inasmuch as the agreement was invalid, being unilateral and not mutual, the master not being bound to employ the workman at all, but only to pay him as long as he might be employed, and that the agreement was in restraint of trade. After argument the court discharged the rule, holding that the agreement was not in restraint of trade (an objection which has no application here), and that upon the question whether the agreement was void for want of mutuality, as containing no undertaking on the part of the masters to employ the workman, Baron Alderson says, "We must take the whole of the contract together. The workman agrees to serve the plaintiffs on certain terms, and the plaintiffs agree to pay him some certain wages on certain terms. And they are to have the option of dismissing him on giving him a month's notice or a month's wages. Now, if all these stipulations are taken together, they clearly point to an undertaking on the part of the master to employ the workman for seven years, subject to the terms above mentioned. This is a reasonable bargain made with good consideration, and the amount of the consideration is not material." The other judges, Baron Rolfe and Baron Platt concurred, giving similar reasons. That case merely decided that on the agreement in question there, there arose an obligation on the part of the master to find employment for the workman, but the extent of the obligation, which is the question in this case, was not decided or even discussed. The other case relied upon was Reg. v. Welch (22 L. J., N. S., 145, Mag. Cas.), decided in 1853. This was an application by T. F. Griffiths for a rule calling on certain justices of the borough of Birmingham and Robert Whitaker to show cause why the justices should not hear, determine, and adjudicate upon an information and complaint laid by Griffiths on behalf of himself and his co-partners, under 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, against Whitaker for breach of a contract of service. In that case, by an agreement in writing dated 2nd Dec. 1852, Whittaker agreed with Griffiths and his partner, in consideration of £3 lent by Griffiths and Co., and of wages to be paid him to serve Griffiths and Co. as a tinplate worker, and not to serve anyone else without their leave in writing, for the term of twelve months, and until the expiration of three calendar months after notice by Whitaker to Griffith and Co., of his intention to determine the service. And in consideration of his good and faithful services Griffiths and Co. agreed to pay him on Saturday night in every week during the said term such wages as the articles made by Whitaker should amount to at Griffiths and Co.'s usual workmen's prices. The agreement then contained a proviso enabling either party to determine the service after the said term of twelve months by a three months' notice, and a stipulation authorising Griffiths and Co. to deduct 10s. per week until the sum of £3 was paid. The justices refused to adjudicate upon the hearing or to order Whitaker to return to the service on the ground that the agreement was bad on the face of it, for want of mutuality—there was an express obligation on the part of Whitaker to serve, but no express obligation on the part of Griffiths and Co. to employ him. The court, however, held that there was an implied obligation on Griffiths and Co. to find Whitaker employment. During the argument Lord Campbell observed: "It would be for the jury to say what was a reasonable quantum of work. The agreement provides for its continuance until one or other party gives notice. Does not that imply a contract to find employment?" And in giving judgment, Lord Campbell, after stating the terms of the agreement, says: "Under these circumstances it is surely a necessary implication that the employers shall find reasonable work for the servant as well as pay him wages for the articles he makes. The contrary would be to suppose a most unreasonable intention, which could never have entered into the heads of either party. The stipulation as to giving notice after the expiration of the twelve months shows that some obligation was cast upon the employers, and I think that was, according to the circumstances of the trade during the time of the contract to find reasonable employment for the servant. This being so, the contract is not a unilateral one, but one binding each party to the performance of some obligation, and therefore valid." The expressions of Lord Campbell in that case were strongly relied upon by Mr. Deane as justifying his contention that there was in this case an implied obligation on the part of the defendant to find work, arising from the fact that by the terms of the agreement the defendant had stipulated for seven days' notice being given by the plaintiff before he could leave his employment. But when Lord Campbell says that there is an implied obligation on the employer to find work, he limits that obligation to finding reasonable employment according to the circumstances of the trade. The question what is reasonable employment is left undetermined, as it must depend upon the circumstances of each case. All that was decided in that case, as in the case of Pilkington v. Scott, was that there was a sufficient consideration upon the face of the agreement to enable the court to say that it was not void for want of mutuality, and thus afford an excuse for the workman for a breach of his contract. I cannot regard either case as an authority for the contention raised here. Admitting that the provision in the rules which requires the plaintiff to give seven days' notice before leaving his employment raises an implied obligation on the part of the defendant to find the plaintiff employment, the case of Reg. v. Welsh decides that that is reasonable employment according to the circumstances of the trade. Now, what that reasonable employment is is a question of fact to be determined by evidence—it is not a question of law to be deduced from the terms of the contract or the nature of its provisions. The parties might by express stipulation define what should be the limits and extent of the obligation; but those limits and extent, if intended to modify or increase the limit and extent prescribed by law, would depend upon the mutual intention of the parties, and should therefore be made the subject of express stipulation. In the case of Aspkin v. Austin (5 Q. B. 674), Lord Denman, C.J., in delivering a considered judgment of the court, thus speaks of the danger and impropriety of implying terms that might, if intended, be made the subject of express stipulation: "It is one thing for the court to effectuate the intention of the parties to the extent to which they may have, even imperfectly, expressed themselves, and another to add to the instrument all such covenants as, upon a full consideration of the court, may deem fitting for completing the intention of the parties, but which they either purposely or unintentionally may have omitted. The former is but the application of a rule of construction to that which is written; the latter adds to the obligations by which the parties have bound themselves, and is, of course, quite unauthorised as well as liable to great practical injustice in the application." These remarks, resting upon such high judicial authority, are, as it seems to me, pointedly applicable to the present case. The rules, after providing for seven days' notice being given on each side before determining the employment, expressly provide that any person being absent from work without a substitute will be considered to have left without notice; and any persons leaving without notice will forfeit all wages due to them. The plaintiff's contention would require that there should be considered as inserted in the rules a converse provision to this effect: That if from any cause a weaver paid by piece-work shall not be kept constantly supplied with weft and warp in his loom, the employer shall pay him by way of damages such a sum as he might have earned as wages for the work he might have done if his looms had been kept constantly supplied with weft and warp. Such a provision might, of course, be the subject of express agreement, but for the law to imply it against the defendant, and without his consent, would be unjust. The defendant might and did say such a provision is contrary to the universal and well-known usage of the particular industry, as was proved to be the fact in this case. The plaintiff admitted he had never made or heard of such a claim being made before. And the defendant might and did further urge that the constant and continuous supply of weft and warp for his looms is a matter in which he is as much and even more interested than his weavers, his loss in such supply failing being greater than theirs, and that this supply depends upon circumstances which involve trade risks which are beyond his control, and must be and are known to be so to the plaintiff and all engaged in this branch of skilled labour. For instance, the risks of irregularity and unavoidable delay in transit whether by railway or otherwise, besides the risk of disputes and differences arising between employers and workmen in other branches of industry, which are involved in placing the weft and warp in the loom, and other instances might be given. The result, therefore, which I have arrived at is that, as a fact, the plaintiff has had reasonable employment according to the circumstances of the trade, and that his further claim is unsuppoted by any decided case, and is not warranted by any sound principle, and recognised by law as applicable to the construction of this contract. I should not have considered it necessary to have entered into the case at such great length, as I believe I decided the same point the same way in a case which occurred some time since at Chatham; but I was informed that in this case the claim had been brought forward at the instance and in the interest of the general body of weavers in this district, who are paid piece work, with the view of having their rights in this matter settled by the decision of a court which it will be their duty to respect, and as the decision of this court is binding only as a decision of the particular question in the particular case between the particular litigants, and is of no authority as a precedent, I am willing to grant the plaintiff leave to appeal, but of course upon the usual terms. And these, as he is supported by his union, there will be no difficulty on his part in complying with. The judgment will be entered in this court for the defendant with costs.

CARDIFF COUNTY COURT.

Wednesday, March 4.

(Before J. M. HERBERT, Esq., Judge.)

Admiralty—Necessaries—Pilotage.

His HONOUR said: This was a suit for necessaries, instituted by the plaintiff for the recovery of a sum due for the pilotage of the ship from Penarth Roads to a point beyond Ilfracombe and back, the master having put back from stress of weather. The plaintiff claimed £5 16s., being the amount which a regular pilot of this port would be entitled to under the bye-laws; but the plaintiff being only a dock pilot, and his licence not extending beyond Penarth Roads, he is not entitled to the amount allowed by the bye-laws, but only to such a sum as might have been agreed upon, or as his services were worth. The plaintiff swore that he had told the captain that the pilotage to Lundy would be £4 7s. 6d., and the master having decided upon going back to Penarth Roads after the pilot had passed Ilfracombe, he contended that he was entitled to one-third more for the back pilotage, as allowed under the bye-laws to the licensed pilots. The captain refused to pay him the sum claimed on the ground that he had not taken the ship to Lundy, and referred him to Mr. Lucovich, as the agent of the ship. Mr. Lucovich having seen the plaintiff, and knowing the captain's ground for disputing the claim, agreed with the plaintiff that the captain should pay him £4 for his services; and the plaintiff having agreed to accept that sum in full, Mr. Lucovich gave him a letter to the captain, directing him to pay the plaintiff £4. The plaintiff took away the letter, leaving Mr. Lucovich under the impression that the matter was thus settled; but instead of delivering the letter to the captain, he destroyed it, and commenced this suit, and had the ship arrested. Mr. Lewis Reece appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Ingledew for the owners. Mr. Ingledew objected that the suit was wrongly brought, and that pilotage could not be recovered in a suit for necessaries, but only, if at all, in a suit for wages. This objection, if tenable, is one of importance, because the jurisdiction of the County Court in admiralty, being limited to certain specified causes of suit or grounds of claim, it is necessary that the præcipe should set forth the ground of claim in proper form and with sufficient accuracy to show that it comes within the jurisdiction. It is further necessary with regard to the rights of the sureties, for if the bail bond be given to secure the plaintiff his damages to be recovered in one form of suit, it would, I conceive, be impossible to enforce the bond for the recovery of damages for a cause of suit not coming under or within the head or description of claim set forth both in the præcipe and the bail-bond. Now it is clear that a claim for pilot's services, if it can be enforced in the County Court in Admiralty, must come under the head of necessaries or of wages. There is no other subject-matter of the jurisdiction given by the statute applicable to it. But if it comes within a suit for necessaries, no such claim could have been brought in the High Court of Admiralty before the passing of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, the 6th section of which enacts "That the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas when the necessaries were furnished in respect of which the claim was made." And this right to sue in the Admiralty Court for necessaries was extended by the 5th section of the Admiralty Act of 1861, to "any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown, to the satisfaction of the court, that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." Hence a claim for necessaries supplied to a ship can only be enforced in the High Court of Admiralty, when the ship is either a foreign ship or a British ship, not in her own port, and not having an owner or part owner domiciled in England. And it appears from The Dowse (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627; L. Rep. 3 Ad. 135), and Everard v. Kendall (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408), that the jurisdiction of the County Court in admiralty is limited in the same way as the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty is limited. Hence it follows that if pilotage be recoverable as necessaries, it could only be so recoverable when the pilotage services were rendered to a foreign ship or to a British ship when not in her own port, and not having an owner or part owner domiciled in the kingdom. But it seems pretty clear from the authorities that a pilot could always sue for his wages in the Admiralty Court. In the Prince George (3 Hag. 379), it was held that any person employed on board a ship is entitled to the privilege of arresting the ship in the Court of Admiralty for his wages, and so widely has the term "Mariner" been stretched as to include the surgeon of a ship, so as to entitle him to arrest the ship for his wages. In Ross v. Walker (2 Wils. 266) a pilot had sued in the Admiralty Court for his wages, and a prohibition was applied for; and it was held that, though a pilot is a mariner, yet if he sue for wages for piloting a ship from Sea Reach to Deptford, both within the body of a county (which circumstance took away the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court until the passing of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65), prohibition will lie; and in "Pritchard's Digest" this case is cited as an authority that "a pilot may sue in the Admiralty Court for his wages unless the contract be made and the work done infra corpus comitatus," 2 vol. 922. The Benjamin Franklin (6 C. Rob. 350), was a suit for wages on the part of a pilot for conducting the ship, an American vessel, from the Downs to Flushing; and the demand was resisted on a suggestion of want of skill in running the vessel on a sand bank, by which considerable damage was sustained. This suit was instituted in 1806 (during the war), and Sir W. Scott decided against the pilot on the ground of his navigating a foreign ship to an enemy's port. This point was not raised by the owner, and Sir W. Scott, at the end of his judgment, says, "Costs are asked, but as the owners did not take the objection on which my judgment is founded, by appearing under protest, and since by that omission the other party has been led on to defend himself upon the merits, I shall not give costs." This case appears to me to be inferentially a strong authority that the cause was well brought for wages. Being then satisfied by these authorities that pilotage is included under the head of claim "wages," I think however much disposed I may feel to consider that the service is in the nature of a necessary, that I ought to hold that the Legislature did not intend to include it under the class or description of necessaries, for which the right to sue is given by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, especially as such right to sue is limited in the way I have mentioned. I, therefore, am of opinion that the suit was wrongly brought, and that I ought to discharge the bail. But I intimated at the hearing that I was inclined to think I might amend, under the provisions of the County Courts Acts, those Acts being incorporated with the County Courts Admiralty Act by the 34th section; and inasmuch as the agent of the ship and the captain had full notice of the nature of the claim, I think I ought to exercise the power if it exists, without prejudice to the right of the sureties to be discharged from the bail bond. Now the 57th section of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, appears to me fully large enough to give me the power of amendment required. It is, "The judge of a County Court may at all times amend all defects and errors in any proceeding in such court, whether there is anything in writing to amend by or not, and whether the defect or error be that of the party applying to amend or not; and all such amendments may be made with or without costs, and upon such terms as to the judge may seem fit; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing suit the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made, if duly applied for." The only question in controversy between the parties to this suit is the question of plaintiff's wages. I shall, therefore, under this section, if I am asked by the plaintiff so to do, strike out the word "necessaries" from the præcipe, and substitute for it the word "wages," But, having regard to Mr. Lucovich's evidence that the plaintiff agreed to accept £4 in full payment of his claim, and being of opinion that that agreement was binding upon him under the circumstances (for, notwithstanding he swore that the master agreed to his terms, and the master was not called to contradict him, it was clear that the master denied the agreement and its performance, as stated by the plaintiff, and therefore the matter was sufficiently in dispute to make the compromise binding), I shall decree only the sum of £4 for the plaintiff's services; and inasmuch as the destruction of Mr. Lucovich's letter was most improper and inexcusable, and as the institution of this suit was, in my opinion, under the circumstances, quite uncalled for, I shall not allow the plaintiff any costs of the suit.

IPSWICH COUNTY COURT.

Saturday, Feb. 21.

(Before J. WORLLEDGE, Esq., Judge.)

DOUGHTY v. PRESS.

Tithes—Covenant running with the land—Right of assignee.

HIS HONOUR this morning gave judgment in a case in which Miss Mary Ann Doughty sought to recover from Mr. Edward Press the sum of £39 4s., being the amount of eight years' land-tax, which the plaintiff had been called upon to pay, and had paid, in respect of a moiety of the tithes arising from certain lands in the parish of Syleham, and which moiety of tithes Miss Doughty's father purchased of Mr. Press's uncle as long ago as the year 1827. The case came on for trial at Harleston, in May 1873, when Mr. Merewether was counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. Blofeld for the defendant. On the 19th Dec. 1827, John Latham Press, defendant's uncle, was owner for the residue of a term of 1000 years, created by deed, dated 26th Jan. 1549, of the tithes of Syleham, and contracted with the plaintiff's father, George Clarke Doughty, for the sale to him of a moiety of the tithes, which were then compounded for at £216 16s., for the sum of £2703 15s. purchase-money. No conveyance was then executed, but instead thereof, by an indenture dated the 19th Dec. 1827, John Latham Press covenanted to convey upon request. The indenture also contained a covenant to indemnify against various charges, including land tax. Mr. Doughty died on the 22nd April 1832, and Mr. Press on the 19th Dec. 1835, both before any conveyance had been executed. Doughty bequeathed his moiety or the tithes to his daughter, the plaintiff, and Press, his moiety to his nephew, Edward Press, the defendant, and George Latham Press; the defendant being also his heir-at-law. Mr. J. L. Press also in his will directed two of his executors, William White and Thomas Lombe Taylor, to perform the agreement contained in the deed of 1827. On the 14th March 1839, a deed was executed, to which the executors, defendant, and his brother, and Miss Doughty were parties, by which the executors assigned the moiety of the tithes to Miss Doughty, and personally covenanted that they did not encumber. The two brothers Press were, then, merely parties for the production of the deeds. There was no covenant in this deed, however, by either of the parties indemnifying Miss Doughty against land-tax. In 1821 the tithes were commuted to £245; but no demand was made upon Miss Doughty for land tax till 1853, when she paid £2 12s. 4d., and had since paid various other amounts. She made no demand, however, for the repayment of these amounts till the 4th April 1872, when Messrs. Josselyn and Sons, having been consulted by the plaintiff, wrote to the defendant, calling his attention to the deed of 1827, and requesting payment of £106 5s. 6d. Mr. Merewether argued that plaintiff, as assignee of his uncle, the covenantee in the deed of 1827, was entitled to sue the defendant as assignee of his uncle, the covenantor, upon the covenants contained in that deed, or if not as assignee, as heir-at-law of his uncle; in other words, that the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit, and defendant was liable to the burden of the deed of 1827. His Honour remarked that it was clear that by the deed of 1827 the legal estate in the moiety of the tithes did not pass to Mr. Doughty, and he, in fact, never acquired the legal estate in it, the latter being vested in Mr. J. L. Press. After the death of Mr. J. L. Press it vested in the executors, and passed, by the deed of 1839, to Miss Doughty, so that, as far as the legal estate was concerned, she was the assignee of J. Latham Press, the covenantor, and not of her father, the covenanted. Until he (His Honour) heard Mr. Merewether's argument, he always supposed that for a covenant to run with land—and it was the same with tithes—the assignee of the covenantee was enabled to sue on it, and the covenantee must have some legal estate in the land to which the covenant could be attached, and this view was supported by the case in Coke upon Littleton, 387 A., and by Webb v. Russell (3 Term Rep. 393). Mr. Merewether contended that Webb v. Russell was not a binding authority, and referred to a case in which Lord Tenterden was reported to have remarked that the decision in that case had caused a great deal of feeling at Westminster, and the Real Property Commissioners expresed an opinion that it would be well if the law as laid down in that case could be altered. Mr. Merewether also quoted Wakefield v. Brown (9 Q. B. Rep. 209) and Magnay v. Edwards (22 L. J., N. S., 170, C. P.). The latter was a case in which the Court of Common Pleas had confirmed a previous judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. His Honour said the facts in Wakefield v. Brown were not identical with the present case, and not only so, but from the words of Jervis, C.J., in giving judgment in Magnay v. Edwards, and from the remarks made by Willes and Keating, the learned editors of Smith's Leading Cases, it was clear that the case Wakefield v. Brown was regarded as a doubtful authority. He would, therefore, decline to follow it, and extend its operation to the present case. Mr. Merewether had also referred to two Irish cases, Averall v. Wade (Lloyd's and Goold's Reps., Temp. Sugden, 252), and Hatton v. Waddy, a case on the equity side of the Irish Court of Exchequer (2 Jones's Irish Exchequer Reps. 541). He (his Honour) did not consider that these cases applied. It, therefore, appeared to him that at the time of the execution of the deed of 1827 Miss Doughty, the covenantee, had no legal estate in the moiety of the tithes in question, and these cases were no authority whatever that Miss Doughty could maintain an action at Common Law, upon the covenant to indemnify contained in the deed of 1827. Therefore upon the sole ground that Miss Doughty had no right of action at common law, whatever remedy she might have had at equity, he would give judgment for the defendant with costs. But in the event of an appeal against his decision the other points raised by Mr. Blofeld, the defendant's counsel, must be open to the defendant.

MANCHESTER COUNTY COURT.

Saturday, Feb. 7.

(Before J. A. RUSSELL, Q.C., Judge.)

Re SIMPSON AND SONS.

Bankruptcy Act 1869—Partnership—Death of partners—Distribution of property.

J. A. S. entered into partnership with his son, W. S., in April 1864, as cotton spinners. J. A. S. died, and in May 1865 an agreement was entered into by and between the executors of J. A. S. and the several parties interested in his estate, under which it was arranged that three of the sons, W. S., C. J. S., and F. S., should take the goodwill, stock, and machinery of and in the said business at an agreed price, and should carry on the business in manner set out in that agreement. The business was carried on for two or three years, when another son, A. S., was taken into the partnership, and the business was carried on under the agreement of May 1865 and a further agreement then made with the executors. On 2nd Jan. 1871 articles of partnership were entered into by the four brothers, which provided, amongst other things, that in case of the death of either of the four brothers in the partnership, the partnership should not be dissolved, but the survivors should carry on the business, and the shares of either of them should be ascertained at the succeeding stocktaking after such death. There were other provisions as to the mode of dealing with the property in such an event. The capital of the firm consisted of money left by the father, debts owing to the concern, and the machinery and stock. No balance sheets were made out, as provided by the articles.

A. S. died in Sept. 1871; C. J. S. died in Jan. 1872. Their shares were not ascertained at the stocktaking succeeding their decease. The business was carried on by the two surviving brothers, the assets of each of the deceased remaining in the business. New stock was purchased and intermixed.

On the bankruptcy of the firm, after the death of A. S. and C. J. S., those creditors whose debts were contracted before that time contended that the proceeds of such of the machinery as could be distinguished as having belonged to the partnership of the four should be divisible amongst the creditors of the early partnership, in priority to those of the creditors who had become so after the death of A. S. and C. J. S. respectively.

Held, that the matter must be decided by the terms of the agreement of May 1865, and that the proceeds of such of the machinery as could be distinguished as having belonged to the partnership of the four should be divided amongst the creditors of the four partners.

Ambrose, barrister, instructed by Boote and Edgar, appeared on behalf of the creditors of the two surviving partners.

Coventry, barrister, instructed by Cooper and Sons, for the creditors of the four original partners.

Jones, attorney (of the firm of Sale, Shipman, and Co.), for the trustee under the bankruptcy.

It appeared that on the 12th April 1864, Mr. J. A. Simpson, who was the father of the debtors, Walter Simpson and J. A. Simpson, entered into a partnership with Walter Simpson to carry on business at Park-lane Mills, Preston. J. A. Simpson died on the 25th April 1864, and on the 3rd May 1865, an agreement in writing was entered into between the executors of J. A. Simpson and the beneficiaries under the will. By the agreement it was arranged that Walter Simpson, C. J. Simpson, and Frederick Simpson, the sons of the testator, should carry on the business, and should take the goodwill, stock, and machinery thereof, at an agreed price. The business was carried on till June 1867, when a further agreement was entered into. The business was continued by Walter Simpson, Fred. Simpson, C. J. Simpson, and Arthur Simpson, under the agreement of the 3rd May. On the 2nd Jan. 1871, articles of partnership were entered into which contained a clause that, in case of the death of either of the four brothers—the members of the partnership—the partnership should not be dissolved, but the survivor or survivors should carry on the business, and the shares of either of them should be ascertained at the succeeding stocktaking after such death. The half of the balance then found to be due to any of them was to remain in the hands of the firm, except as to a sum of £200 for the period of three years from such decease, and the other half, except as regarded the £200, should remain in the hands of the survivors for five years, and the whole of the said balance should be secured to the representatives of either or any of them by the promissory notes of the survivors, such notes bearing interest at the rate of 7½ per cent., payable to such representatives quarterly, and the £200 should be paid to the representatives of the remainder within one calendar month of the death of any one of them. The brother Arthur died on the 27th Sept. 1871, and the business was continued by the three surviving partners. Charles J. Simpson, another of the brothers, died on the 15th Jan. 1872, and from his death up to the commencement of the proceedings in liquidation on the 19th Dec. 1872, the business had been carried on by the two survivors. There had been no stocktaking after the death of either of the brothers, nor had their shares been ascertained. No promissory note had been given to the representative of either of the deceased partners, nor was the £200 paid in either case within the month. Small sums had from time to time been paid to the widow of each, but not specifically in respect of the £200. Upon the death of Arthur, the assets remained, and were used for the purpose of the business, and the same happened at the death of Charles John.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the creditors of the four partners were entitled to have the machinery or such part as could be distinguished as having belonged to the partnership of the four, or the proceeds of such machinery divided amongst the creditors of the four in priority to the other creditors.

Coventry contended that the clause in the partnership deed, although it might amount to the agreement to assign the shares of the deceased partners, was executory, and that therefore the case came within the rule laid down in Ex parte Wheeler, Buck, 25, and Ex parte Cooper (1 M. D. & D. 358), and the shares of the deceased partners remained subject to the lien of their representatives to have the creditors of the old firm paid, and that such creditors could take advantage of that lien, and claim priority over creditors of the new firm. He cited also Ex parte Ruffin (6 Vesey, 119), Ex parte Williams (11 Vesey, 6), and was then stopped by the judge.

Ambrose, on the other hand, contended that whether or not the agreement was executory, the ascertaining of the shares was not a condition precedent to the passing of the property or shares of the deceased partners to the survivors, and distinguished the cases of Ex parte Williams and Ex parte Cooper.

In giving judgment—His HONOUR stated the facts as given above, and having referred to the clause in the agreement on which the case turned, said:—On one side it is contended that the clause operates as an absolute assignment, and on the other that it does not operate absolutely. The principle on which the decision of this case depends is laid down in Lindley on Partnership, p. 674, 3rd edit. After quoting the principle as here stated, he went on—Let us look at the position of the parties at the time of this agreement being entered into. The clause says, that the partnership should not be disturbed in case of death, and that the business should be carried on. Without such a clause death would have dissolved the partnership, which would have been most inconvenient. But there is something further, viz., that on the death of one of the partners, all that had been the property of the firm should not eo instanti become the property of the three surviving partners, but that the share of the deceased partner should be ascertained, and then left in the concern; that his share, which by his death had been severed, should be ascertained and brought back as a share. Before it was ascertained, how could it be valued? Before it was valued, how could it be bought? As the value of the share had never been ascertained, it has never become the property of the surviving partners. Matters stand now as they stood at the moment of the death of the first of the partners. I therefore answer the question left for the opinion of the court in the affirmative, and find that the creditors of the four are entitled to have the machinery or such part thereof as can be distinguished as having belonged to the partnership of the four, or the proceeds thereof, or such portion of them as can be distinguished as aforesaid divided amongst the creditors of the four in priority to the other creditors; the costs of those for whom Mr. Ambrose appears to be paid out of the estate, and I refer it to the registrar to inquire whether the machinery referred to, or any and what part thereof, could at the date of the petition be distinguished as having belonged to the partnership of the four, and in what manner such machinery was fixed to the freehold, with liberty for any party to apply.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

DISCHARGES UNDER LIQUIDATION AND COMPOSITION — RELEASE OF CO-DEBTOR — JOINT CREDITOR—EQUITABLE SET-OFF.—The 49th and 50th sections of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), which enact that an order of discharge shall release the bankrupt from all debts provable under the bankruptcy (cases of fraud excepted), but shall not release any person who at the date of the order of adjudication was a partner with the bankrupt, apply to discharges under sect. 125 and 126, and the word "bankrupt" in sects. 49 and 50 is to be read as applicable to any debtor obtaining a discharge under the statute. A discharge releases only the debtor to whom it is granted, and leaves a co-debtor liable to be separately sued by a joint creditor. M. and H., who were partners, gave their acceptances to G. for goods sold. The acceptances became due, and were dishonoured, after which M. and H. dissolved partnership, H. undertaking to pay all the firm's obligations. H. then filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and it was subsequently agreed that a composition of 10s. in the pound should be accepted by H.'s creditors, among whom were the holders of the acceptances, endorsed by G. to them, and H. was granted his discharge. G. then filed a petition, and the creditors, on condition that G. should pay 9s. in the pound, authorised the trustee to transfer to G. any debts which should not be realised, the names of the debtors being set out in an annexed schedule. The debt of M. and H. was not inserted in the schedule, the bills being considered by the trustee of no value, but there was no intention of reserving a right of action to the trustee in respect of them, and they ultimately were given to G. by the holders. In an action by M. against G. for a separate debt, G. pleaded an equitable set-off, setting up the debt due to him from M. and H. Held, that the discharge of H. did not discharge M., and that it left M. liable to G., who could therefore maintain his right of set-off in the action. Held, also, that the right of action was either legally in the defendant or legally in the trustee, to hold it in equity in trust for him, and that evidence was admissible as to the reasons why the plaintiff's liability in respect of the bills was not inserted in the schedule of debts to be transferred to G. by the trustee: (Megrath v. Gray, Gray v. Megrath, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 16. C. P.)

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNMENT OF ALL DEBTOR'S PROPERTY—PRIOR AGREEMENT TO ASSIGN ON DEMAND—PART DEBT AND PRESENT ADVANCE.—In 1870 two traders who carried on business in partnership agreed, in consideration of past and present advances, that they would, on demand, assign to their father and brother the business then carried on by them together, with the lease of their business premises (which lease was afterwards deposited with the lenders), and also the fixtures and their stock and utensils in trade; and it was provided that if the debtors should repay the sum due with interest, then the agreement should be void, but should they be unable to repay the sum due, then a valuation of the premises thereby agreed to be assigned should be taken, and the amount whereby such valuation should exceed the sum then due should be paid by the father and brother of the debtors. In 1873 an assignment was made in accordance with the agreement, and the amount whereby the valuation exceeded the sum then due to them was paid by the father and brother to the debtors, who expended the same in paying certain creditors, and shortly afterwards presented a petition for liquidation, stating their assets to be nil, and their debts to be £1833: Held, that the agreement of 1870 gave the father and son a good equitable security upon all the property of the debtors included in the assignment of 1873, and that the assignment therefore was not fraudulent or an act of bankruptcy. Held, also, that the effect of the assignment was only to pass the legal estate in the lease, and that if the assignment had never been executed, and the debtors had merely given possession to their father and brother of the premises, stock-in-trade, &c., comprised in the agreement, on receiving the balance of the valuation, the title of the father and brother to the property under the agreement would have been good. Held, also, that the assignment was not an evasion of the Bills of Sale Act, inasmuch as possession of the property assigned was given at the same time the deed was executed. Decision of Mr. Registrar Murray affirmed: (Ex parte Izard; Re Cook, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 7. Chan.)

DEBTOR'S SUMMONS—ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—ISSUE OUT OF LOCAL BANKRUPTCY COURT—RESIDENCE.—A debtor's summons for a debt exceeding £50 was issued out of a County Court within the jurisdiction of which the debtor's father lived, the creditors being unable to find out his residence. The summons was served upon the debtor in London, the debtor having, after the summons was issued, stated that he resided at a house in London, to which the goods in respect of which the debt arose had been sent. Held (affirming the decision of one of the registrars), that as the debtor's summons had been issued out of a court within the jurisdiction of which the debtor did not reside, neglect to comply with it was not an act of bankruptcy within the Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 6, sub-sect. 6. Petition for adjudication of bankruptcy accordingly dismissed with costs: (Ex parte Boyle, re Plummer, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 2. Chan.)

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Wednesday, March 11.

(Before Mr. Registrar MURRAY, sitting as Chief Judge.)

Re ELFORD.

Proof—Voting—Application to restrain creditor.

THE debtor, Henry Elford, a metal merchant of Oxford-street, recently filed a petition for liquidation under which the court appointed a receiver. This was an application on behalf of creditors to restrain the debtor from voting, under a resolution passed in the case of Messr. Burrs, whose failure was announced some weeks since, for the acceptance of a composition of 1s. in the pound.

Stibbard, solicitor, appeared in support of the application.

Finlay Knight opposed it.

It would seem that the debtor had been engaged in transactions of an extensive character with Messrs. Burrs, and in consequence of their failure his affairs became embarrassed, and on the 16th Feb. a debtor's summons, under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, was issued against him, and on the following day he filed a petition for liquidation. A few days before the presentation of the petition a first meeting was held under proceedings for liquidation by Messrs. Burrs, which resulted in an adjournment to the 26th ult.; and at the adjourned sitting the present debtor, with the assent of the receiver, proved a debt of £16,934 against the estate, after deducting the value of certain securities which he held and which he assessed at £10,000, and by his proxy voted in favour of a resolution for the acceptance of a composition of 1s. in the pound. The grounds of the application were substantially these, that after the debtor had presented a petition for liquidation he had no right to vote upon the resolution, and that the value of the securities was not properly stated; but from an affidavit filed in reply, it appeared that the debtor at the first meeting under Messrs. Burrs's liquidation tendered a proof; the composition of 1s. in the pound was more than the assets showed; and the securities had been gone through and their value agreed upon.

His HONOUR said this was quite a novel application; an experiment, indeed, to induce the court to exercise its discretion in a way which would be productive of great mischief and inconvenience. The proof had been tendered and the matter was in the hands of the creditors, and any objection would be dealt with in the usual way. The application was made, not with the view of ascertaining a principle, but with transparent object of affecting the validity of the composition, and the court was bound to refuse it.

LEGAL NEWS.

MANSION HOUSE POLICE COURT.

Charge of Libel.

RUPERT RAINS, a solicitor, was charged with publishing a libel.

Hume Williams was counsel for the prosecution.

Montagu Williams defended the prisoner.

When the case was called on, Montagu Williams stated that he proposed, with the consent of the court and of the other side, to take a course which would save all further trouble. The defendant was a solicitor of forty years standing, and he had been mixed up with certain matters in which the prosecutrix was concerned. He very much regretted having written the letter containing the alleged libel, and he wished to disclaim any intention to place that construction upon it which the prosecutrix and her advisers had done. He, therefore, made this apology for his conduct.

Hume Williams thought the defendant had, under the advice of his counsel, acted wisely in making an unqualified apology to the prosecutrix, which she was perfectly willing to accept, and he hoped the recollection of these proceedings would serve as a caution to him for the future.

Alderman BESLEY expressed his satisfaction at the course that had been adopted, and allowed the summons to be withdrawn, the defendant paying the cost of the proceedings.

LAW AND PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE OF THE COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.—This committee dined together at the City Terminus Hotel, Cannon-street, on Monday evening, under the presidency of the chairman, Mr. F. Kent, solicitor, who was supported by Mr. Serjeant Simon, M.P., Mr. Skinner (recorder of Windsor), Mr. Brandon, Mr. Deputy Shephard, Mr. R. Cox, Mr. Fricker, Mr. Creasey, Mr. Greenwood, Mr. Scott, Mr. Mathews, Mr. Innes, jun., Mr. Lowe, Mr. Catty, and others. After a well-served dinner, a variety of toasts were given, those relating to royalty being the prelude to others. "The Lord Mayor and Corporation" was allotted to Mr. Skinner, who spoke of his admiration of the public spirit of the corporation, and concluded by expressing a hope that it would be preserved for ever. The name of Mr. R. Cox was connected with the toast, and he replied to it, saying that, in common with those with whom he was associated, he fully appreciated any compliment to the corporation. The chairman proposed the "Houses of Lords and Commons," and took occasion to say that, whatever party was at the helm of affairs, they would endeavour to so discharge their public duties as to add lustre to the name of England. Mr. Serjeant Simon responded, paying a tribute to the constitution under which we live, and concluded by an assurance that, though he would be one of those in the cold shade of opposition, he should in no way be factious in his treatment of the action of the ministry. "The Bench" was given by the chairman, who associated with the toast the name of Mr. Brandon, who, he said, was always polite and attentive in his judicial duties. This gentleman had recently been appointed assistant-judge of the Mayor's Court, which was the best court in the city. Mr. Brandon, in acknowledging the compliment, assured those present that, had it not been for the kindness of the committee, he should not have aspired to the position he now held. Mr. Innes, in giving "The Chairman of Committees," coupled with the toast the name of Mr. Fricker, who answered it. The Chairman said he was now about to propose the toast of the evening. It was that of "Their late Chairman, Mr. Deputy Shephard," who had presided over the committee during the past year in such a "pastoral" way as would lead them to give a cordial reception to the toast. They had amongst themselves resolved to present his friend with a testimonial. It had taken the shape of a handsome clock, and, in handing it over to the recipient, he had, in the name of the committee, to wish him the enjoyment of health and prosperity for many years to come. Mr. Deputy Shephard (replying) remarked that he had, during his year of office, received the cordial support of the committee. If this had not been so, their reports would not have received the favour at the hands of the court that they had done. He was pleased that his conduct had met with their appreciation, and he could assure them that their presentation that evening would ever recall to his mind the kindness extended to him. Mr. Serjeant Simon proposed the "Health of the Chairman" in flattering terms, predicting for him some eminence in the future, and incidentally referring to the corporation as a road to political life. The Chairman, in reply, observed that he was always actuated by a desire to be of use to the community. He added that to be chairman of the committee was a high reward to him for anything he had done. Mr. Innes, responding to "The Vice-Chairman," a post he occupied, spoke of his admiration of the energy and patience with which many gentlemen of the Court of Common Council gave themselves up to the hard work of the corporation.—City Press.

BANQUET TO LORD CHIEF JUSTICE COLERIDGE.—This being the first time that Lord Coleridge, one of the Judges of the Oxford Circuit, has visited Oxford since his elevation to the Bench, a sumptuous banquet was given him in honour of the event by the Rector of Exeter and the Fellows, in Exeter College Hall, on Thursday evening, last week. Lord Coleridge was formerly a Fellow of this college, and it is a curious fact that his father, Sir John Taylor Coleridge, was similarly entertained at this college in 1835, soon after his elevation to the Bench. The Rector of Exeter presided on Thursday, and there were 130 present, among them being the Bishop of Oxford, the Vice-Chancellor, the Hon. W. Coleridge, of Trinity College, son of Lord Coleridge, many of the Heads of Houses. Dr. Adams (Recorded of Birmingham), and the leading members of the Bar. Various toasts were proposed, that of the guest of the evening by the Rector of Exeter.

A BARRISTER SENTENCED TO PENAL SERVITUDE.—At the Old Bailey on Tuesday, George Rutherford, described as a barrister, aged 54, pleaded guilty to a charge of obtaining furniture and other goods from tradesmen under false pretences. The prisoner had gone about representing himself as being about to marry an heiress worth £30,000, and that he required furniture to fit out a residence in accordance with his coming high position. His story turned out successful, and he obtained the credit which he now acknowledged to be fraudulent. The Common Serjeant said it was marvellous that tradesmen should be such dupes. It was evident that the prisoner had been getting his living for many years by swindling, and a previous conviction of five years' penal servitude having been proved against him, the sentence now was that he be kept in penal servitude for seven years.

THE LATE LORD WESTBURY'S WILL.—A correspondent who certainly ought to be aware of the facts, informs us that it was deemed advisable, for reasons of a private nature appertaining to the family, and not on account of any obscurity in the language of the will, that the administration of the estate of the late Lord Westbury should be accomplished under the Court of Chancery, by means of what is called a friendly or amicable suit. Accordingly, this suit was advisedly commenced in the chambers of the Master of the Rolls, at the time when Lord Selborne was acting for the Master of the Rolls, and when it was generally anticipated that Lord Coleridge would succeed Lord Romilly. In the course of administration questions naturally arise from time to time upon which the trustees under the will seek to avail themselves of the guidance of the court, and these questions are accordingly adjourned into court for the purpose of amicable argument. Our correspondent asserts that "counsel whose opinions always commanded at least equal respect with that of Sir George Jessel when practising at the Bar have certified that no obscurity whatever exists either in the words of the marriage settlement to which allusion has been made or in the words of the late Lord Westbury's will. There may have been an omission in the latter document, which does not constitute obscurity."

THE Queen has been pleased to grant the office of Solicitor-General for Scotland to George Millar, Esq., one of her Majesty's counsel.

The following specimen of a Greek epigram is well worth quoting, from Mr. J. S. Phillip's Elegiac Translation:—

> The legal Hydra to the charge
> Renascent rushes, twice as large;
> A hundred heads, and all elate
> With tongues exclaiming, "Six and eight;"
> We cut him down—a hundred more
> Rise up and cry, "Thirteen and four."

Re THOMAS WEBSTER.—This case came before the London Bankruptcy Court last week. The debtor, who filed his petition for liquidation in June 1870, was described as of Pump-court, Temple, of Great George-street, Westminster, and of Sandown, Isle of Wight, barrister-at-law. This was an application by Mr. Saunders for an interim injunction to restrain Mr. Thomas Greenhill from issuing execution upon a judgment recovered by him against the debtor and Mr. Jonathan Jolliffe. It appeared that Mr. Greenhill's action was for an alleged breach of an agreement in reference to the construction of the Isle of Wight (Newport Junction) Railway Company. The court had declined to restrain the action, but Mr. Saunders said he had now to submit that, the final award having been made in the action, Mr. Greenhill stood in the position of a creditor whose debt had been ascertained, and for which he might now prove under the liquidation proceedings. His Honour granted an interim injunction.

IRISH LAWYERS IN PARLIAMENT.—The list of lawyers who have been returned to the new Parliament by various constituencies in Ireland is unusually long, at all events in excess of former Parliaments. It includes not only the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General for that country (Dr. Ball and Mr. Law, Q.C.), but eighteen barristers and four solicitors, exclusive of several country gentlemen who are members of the Irish Bar, but who do not practise. The former are:—Sir Colman O'Loghlen, County Clare; the Hon. David Plunket, Q.C., Dublin University; Mr. Isaac Butt, Q.C., Limerick; Mr. William Johnston, Belfast: Mr. Keyes O'Clery, County Wexford; Mr. Richard O'Shaughnessy, Limerick; Mr. Serjeant Sherlock, Q.C., King's County; Mr. Patrick Leopold Martin, Kilkenny County; Mr. Charles Henry Meldon, County Kildare; Sir George Bowyer, County Wexford; Mr. Philip Callan, Dundalk and County Louth; Mr. Edward John Synan, County Limerick; Mr. John Dunbar, New Ross; Sir Patrick O'Brien, King's County; Mr. Denis Maurice O'Conor, County Sligo; Mr. John William Ellison Macartney, County Tyrone; Sir John Esmonde, County Waterford; and Mr. Patrick James Smyth, County Westmeath. The solicitors who sit in Parliament for Irish constituencies are:—Mr. Charles Edward Lewis, Londonderry City; Mr. M'Carthy Downing, County Cork; Mr. Charles Joseph Fay, County Cavan; and Mr. John George M'Carthy, Mallow.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it.

COUNTY COURTS.—In any future reform of the County Courts one thing should engage the attention of the Lord Chancellor, which I am sure the Profession would gladly see brought about. It is this—the remuneration of the practitioner placed on an entirely new footing. I do not myself see, in the first place, why substantial costs should not in all cases follow the event. In theory I know that the County Courts are supposed to afford to parties an easy, economical, and speedy mode of asserting their rights, without having to run to an attorney; and therefore his remuneration, when he is employed, is either altogether unprovided for, or, at best, but inadequately secured. In practice, however, this theory is an utter absurdity, and the sooner such a "legal fiction" is exploded the better. True, the later enactments which regulate the County Courts (and which have conferred upon them additional jurisdiction as well), have partly met this, by providing, in certain cases, a higher scale of costs; but every practitioner knows that the rate of remuneration, even in these cases, is altogether out of character with the importance of the work to be done and the responsibility which arises out of it. Of course the question must be looked at from a reasonable point of view, and I don't for a moment say that a claim for 40s. should entail the same expense for its recovery as a claim for £40. At the same time it should be remembered that a small sum in dispute may, and often does, involve questions of most serious importance, and the same rules and questions of law have to be considered and disposed of whether the claim be for 40s. or a much larger amount. The court fees, which are at present unnecessarily heavy, might advantageously be lowered, and the costs of attorney proportionatly increased. A. B.

OUR INVADERS.—I have cut the following from the Echo of 6th March 1874:

LEGAL ADVICE and ASSISTANCE.—Debts recovered, railway claims, divorce and other suits prosecuted. Deeds and wills prepared and proved. Consultations free.—Mr. MARSH, 4, Symond's-inn, Chancery-lane.

And I need scarcely add that the advertiser does not figure in the Law List for this year.

NOTES AND QUERIES ON POINTS OF PRACTICE.

NOTICE.—We must remind our correspondents that this column is not open to questions involving points of law such as a solicitor should be consulted upon. Queries will be excluded which go beyond our limits.

N.B.—None are inserted unless the name and address of the writers are sent, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for bona fides.

Queries.

79. PROBATE DUTY.—Should the value of a gift donatio mortis causâ be included in the estimate of a testator's estate for probate duty? Such a gift is expressly liable to legacy duty under 36 Geo. 3, c. 52 s. 7, as a legacy within the meaning of that Act. W. E.

80. SETTLEMENT OF FURNITURE.—Furniture in a house belonging to A. B. is seized and sold by the sheriff to C. D. C. D. sells the furniture to E. F. (the father-in-law of A. B.), who assigns the same to two trustees for the benefit of his daughter, the wife of A. B., and her children. The furniture remaining apparently in the order and disposition of A. B., is it necessary, in order to protect the same as against creditors, that the assignment or settlement should be registered under the Bills of Sale Act, and also re-registered every five years? Please quote authorities. H. C.

81. BANKRUPTCY—PRACTICE IN COUNTY COURTS.—Can any of your readers inform me if the registrar of a County Court, which has not the bankruptcy jurisdiction, is compelled to administer oaths to parties pre-seating proofs under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, to be used in another County Court, without payment of any fee? Is sect. 58 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108) prospective: and does it apply to affidavits under the Bankruptcy Act 1869?—E. S.

82. NEGLIGENCE.—At a recent auction sale a man purchased a bedroom carpet, and went, according to custom, the next morning, to pay for and remove said carpet. In pulling the carpet from under a wardrobe the glass of the door fell out, and broke into a thousand pieces. The auctioneer insists on the purchaser of the carpet paying for a new glass plate, or taking the wardrobe as it is for the sum at which it was knocked down to another man. The glass plate was, of course, insecurely put in, or it could not have fallen out so easily. How far is the purchaser of the carpet liable? I ask the question on behalf of a poor man, and shall hope to see an answer in your next impression.

FAIR PLAY.

83. SOLICITOR'S ACCOUNTS.—A solicitor acts for lessee on granting of a lease and subsequent mortgage of same in January 1873 for £800 and deducts his charges from mortgage money, but supplies no account. Also a subsequent further charge on lease to secure £150. Out of this sum he sends his client only £100, and furnishes no account. He collects the rents of the mortgaged property as agent for the mortgagor from March to December 1873, viz., £86, and delivers an account showing whole amount expended on repairs, commission, taxes, &c., except £4, which he remits as balance. What remedy, if any, is there against the solicitor for accounts, &c.? Q.

84. CORONER'S LAW.—Can any of your correspondents inform me whether the case of Reg. v. Justices of Carmarthenshire (10 Q. B. 796) has been either overruled, or in any way varied, or whether there are any more recent cases bearing on the same point? Cases will oblige. CORONER.

85. TITHE RENTCHARGE.—A., owner of a farm, sold part of some closes to B., a railway company; B. entered and worked the land so purchased, but eventually abandoned the line. The land so worked by B. is an inclosed unproductive waste. C., the tenant of the farm, has always paid the rentcharge on the whole farm, including the land sold to B.—about thirteen acres; he now refuses to pay for such thirteen acres. What remedy has the proprietor of the rentcharge? Are the remaining portion of the closes, severed by B., chargeable with the whole rentcharge apportioned in respect of those closes? Reference to authorities will oblige. J. C. P.

86. TRUSTEES AND CESTUIS QUE TRUST.—Trustees and executors of a will, both having accepted, and being parties interested under it, one as tenant for life of all the property, and the other remainderman as to part thereof (i.e., one share equal to that of others who are not trustees). Is it competent under any circumstances for the latter or either trustee alone to interfere with the principal or otherwise deal with the estate, whether real or personal? REMAINDERMAN.

Answers.

(Q. 78) CONVEYANCING—HABENDUM.—It is not absolutely necessary to state that an estate is granted "unto and to the use of" the grantee, if a consideration is mentioned in the conveyance. It is, however, customary and advisable to insert these words, in order to prevent any doubt arising as to whether the grantee was to take for his own benefit: (See Williams on Real Property, 13th edit., p. 182.) LEGAL EXTRACTS.

THE BENCH AND THE BAR.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette).

DR. KENEALY published a letter the other day in the Standard which is intended apparently to protest against a suggestion made in these columns, and, as we belive, adopted elsewhere, that the charges made against him by the Lord Chief Justice and his colleagues and by the jury in the Tichborne case ought, in justice to himself, to the Bar, and to the public at large, to be investigated and adjudicated upon by the Benchers of the Inn of Court of which he is a member. It seemed to us when we published that article, and it seems to us now, that if such a censure as was applied to Dr. Kenealy is to pass unnoticed it will form the worst possible precedent. Men of the age and position, social and professional, of Judges and Queen's counsel are too old and too high placed for scolding matches. When such terms as "Scroggs and Jefferies" on the one side, and "slanderer" on the other, are exchanged between them with no result at all, the profession to which they belong, and the administration of justice itself, are disgraced. Duelling was a barbarous practice no doubt, yet it did in, in a rough objectionable way, recognise the truth that a man's honour is a valuable thing, and that he ought not to sit down with an insult unless he is contented to be disgraced. This was as natural and honourable a feeling as the superstition that a man atoned for an insult by shooting the man whom he had insulted was absurd.

We are well rid of the one, but we ought carefully to preserve the other as far as possible. It would, we think, be generally understood that a man who submitted to an imputation on his character in the public press without suing his slanderer for libel or compelling him to apologise was disgraced. There are cases in which an officer in the army ought to demand a court-martial; and it seems to us that when a Queen's Counsel has heavy charges brought against him not only as a barrister, but as a man of honour and a gentleman, by three judges, one of whom is the Lord Chief Justice of England, and by a jury which by common consent showed inexhaustible patience and great intelligence in dealing with a case of unparalleled difficulty, he ought to be anxious to have those charges investigated by a court of honour to which he happens to be subject; and if that the matter does not present itself to him in that light, the benchers of his Inn ought to take it up for the credit of the Profession, and for the security of the public.

It ought never to be forgotten, though some people are much inclined to forget it, that the public have a strong and direct interest in the good behavour of the Bar—in the maintenance of their privileges on the one hand, and on their being kept within proper bounds on the other. It is a profession which has in most cases, and which ought to have in all cases, a sense of honour and professional morality as distinct and as strictly enforced as those of officers in the army. A barrister has, and ought to have, great privileges. It is his right and duty to say and do without fear or favour things which no other man is allowed to say or do. Private character and conduct are to a great extent at his mercy. It is in his discretion to drag to light secrets which may cover a man with shame for the rest of his days. It may be his duty to discover secret machinations for the injury of others in which persons of the highest social standing and most respectable character are concerned. He can say what he likes without having the fear of the law of libel before his eyes. He can not only ask questions which it would be an unpardonable affront in another man to suggest, but compel the persons questioned to answer him completely and directly; and it is absolutely necessary that he should have these powers in order that justice may be duly administered between man and man. It seems to us that it is at least equally necessary that he should not abuse them; for if he does he becomes one of the vilest and most mischievous of all conceivable social pests. It is impossiblee to imagine a more utterly abominable character than a man who deals to use the fine expression of Chief Justice Erle, in "words sold and delivered," or to use a well-known metaphor of Chief Justice Cockburn's, quoted in the recent trial by Dr. Kenealy, a man who, instead of being a soldier using his sword according to the laws of war, is a prowling assassin armed with a dagger. It may be impossible to draw the line between the two characters in words, and to lay down definite rules by which it may be known in all cases whether a particular act falls on one side of the line or on the other, but it is very far from being even difficult for a body of honourable men, with all the facts of a particular case before them, to assign to any particular man the position which he ought to occupy. Privileges of every kind have their corresponding obligations; and a man who is intrusted by the public with the privileges of a barrister should be made to feel that he runs the risk of infamy and ruin if he abuses them. We pass no judgment at all on Dr. Kenealy's conduct. We express no opinion on what he has said or done. We merely point out the fact that three judges and the jury have accused him of grossly abusing the privileges of his position. We say that such an accusation should make it the duty of his Inn to inquire into his conduct, to set him right with the world if the accusation is false, to protect the public against him for the future if it is completely justified, and to visit him with whatever censure may be thought proper if, though exaggerated, it is not unfounded.

This was and is the view which we take of the matter. Dr. Kenealy's letter to the Standard (dated March 7) rather confirms than weakens it. His letter is a justification of his conduct. As regards the charge of disrespect to the Bench he says with a good deal of force: "If I was guilty of contempt of court, why was I not punished at the time, or at all events when the case was over, and when my punishment could no longer prejudice my client?" This, we think, is an answer: Courts of justice are well able to protect themselves against insult, and are armed with special powers for that purpose, and it no doubt would be hard upon a man if the benchers of his Inn were to punish him for acts of disrespect to judges which the judges had not thought it necessary to punish. That, however, is not the real charge which has been made against Dr. Kenealy. The real charge is that he attacked private character recklessly, falsely, without proper grounds, in a great number of cases, and in intemperate language. It is put shortly and plainly enough, though not quite as precise as it might have been, in the note appended by the jury to their verdict. "The jury desire to express their opinion that the charges of bribery, conspiracy, and undue influence brought against the prosecution in this case are entirely devoid of foundation; and they regret exceedingly the violent language and demeanour of the leading counsel for the defendant in his attacks upon the conduct of the prosecution, and upon several of the witnesses produced in the case."

Dr. Kenealy's reply to this consists of two parts. First he says, "It is false, as laid at my door, that I charged the counsel, the solicitors, everybody, as being engaged in a foul conspiracy. So far from having done so, I did the very reverse, as my assailant must have known." Here is a plain issuce of fact between Dr. Kenealy and the jury. Let some one decide between them. The shorthand writers' notes are in existence. Let the Benchers of Gray's Inn read them, and say whether Dr. Kenealy did or did not say what the jury say that he said and what he says he did not say.

Further, Dr. Kenealy observes: "I claim a right to say what I have said" (against the witnesses), "because in my judgment there existed grounds for my assertion as exhibited at the trial." Some of these grounds he proceeds to assign. This is an equally plain issue, and it is the really important issue in the case. Had Dr. Kenealy grounds for the imputations which he made, or did he make them at random or without grounds? In the one case let him by all means be acquitted, in the other let him be disbarred; but in any case, for the honour of the Bar, for the safety of the public, and for his own honour, let him be tried. Let us have something in the nature of a decision by a public body acting judicially on the question whether or no a great breach of public decency has been committed and great private wrongs inflicted by a man holding a conspicuous and honourable public position. Let it not be said that the Chief Justice of England publicly taxed one of her Majesty's counsel with an "unceasing torrent of invective and foul slander;" that Mr. Justice Mellor concurred in that censure, and spoke also of his "braggart demeanour;" that Mr. Justice Lush declared, in reference to the same subject, that "If advocates were at liberty to use denunciation and slander as a weapon, the so-called independence of the Bar would become a public nuisance;" and that the jury added to these declarations of the judges the note which we have just quoted; that all this passed by as so much idle wind, and that Dr. Kenealy was permitted to continue to practise his Profession without any inquiry into the subject by any body of persons competent to hear and determine the matter. If this should be the case, it will constitute one of those crying public scandals which bring about legislative changes. The Bar will be in a position as disgraceful as that of a regiment in the army in which the colonel on parade calls a subaltern a liar and a coward, the subaltern replies that the colonel is a spiteful old fool, and the parties sit down at the mess-table afterwards and talk and laugh as if nothing had happened.

The rest of Dr. Kenealy's letter consists of recrimination and of fustian about "emasculating and enslaving the bar," a "reign of terror," "my profession which it is sought to awe into oriental suppleness and servility," "lords, ladies, and priests who have vast influence in the press, and who are exercising that influence for my destruction," and other matters undeserving of attention.

He held the post of principal secretary to Lord Chancellor Chelmsford from Feb. 1858 to June 1859, and again from July till Sept. 1866; and he also held the appointment of gentleman of the chamber to Lord Chancellor Cranworth, from July 1865 till July 1866. In Sept. 1866 Mr. Scott was appointed Judge of County Court, Circuit No. 53, and in the same month was transferred to Circuit No. 49, holding his courts at Ashford, Canterbury, Deal, Dover, Faversham, Folkestone, Hythe, Margate, Ramsgate, Romney, Sandwich, Sittingbourne, Tenterden, and Cranbrook.

The Law and the Lawyers.

WE regret to hear that Mr. Justice HONYMAN is suffering from a paralytic seizure, which it is feared may prevent him from resuming his seat on the Bench for some months.

IT was hardly to be expected that the Tichborne case would die as to all its incidents with the incarceration of ORTON, and it now seems probable that in the result everybody's wounds will have been kept green for a reasonable period. The Benchers of Gray's Inn have decided that it is their duty to investigate the conduct of Dr. KENEALY, and, as a counterblast, Mr. HAWKINS is petitioned against by Mr. WHALLEY, in the Middle Temple. The Profession will be content to let the issues in both cases rest in the hands of the Benchers; and it will certainly be a subject for congratulation if the professional questions raised are finally set at rest by the decisions which may be arrived at.

WE are glad to observe that the decision of Lord Justice MELLISH in Ex parte Villars, re Rogers, noticed by us in our issue of the 7th inst., p. 321, is to be reviewed by the full Court of Appeal. It would otherwise have been appealed against to the House of Lords. The question is whether an execution creditor for more than 50*l*., who has seized and sold is liable to refund the proceeds of sale after the expiration of fourteen days. Lord Justice MELLISH decided that he was so liable if a trustee was appointed under the debtor's bankruptcy on a petition presented within six months of the sale.

THE cry of the oppressed railway companies is beginning to go up in earnest. Every railway shareholder in the country, we understand, is to receive for signature a memorial to the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, praying for the total and unconditional repeal of the passenger duty. From a mere statistical point of view it would be interesting to know how many railway shareholders there are, and we hope that the "Railway Shareholders' Association" will take advantage of their opportunities to give us some information upon this point. The thing could be done by merely counting the names entered in the "correct copies of the shareholders' address book," which all railway companies are bound to print under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119, s. 34. But how about the debt of eight hundred thousand pounds, already due to the Exchequer, as we pointed out last week, for arrears of unpaid duty? It is not very likely that the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER will introduce a Bill excusing the payment of it. And it is just possible, especially about Budget time, that he may say to the railway companies, "Pay your just debts first, and I will discuss the question of remission with you afterwards."

THE Queen's speech is pregnant with subjects interesting to the Legal Profession. Our present system of land transfer, the extension of the Judicature Act to Ireland, the amendment of legal procedure and the system of land transfer in Scotland, the law of master and servant and conspiracy, the licensing laws and the laws relating to friendly societies, occupy the entire address to the House of Commons. We append the paragraphs, as clearly indicating the course of legislation in the immediate future:—

The delay and expense attending the transfer of land in England have long been felt to be a reproach to our system of law, and a serious obstacle to dealings in real property. This subject has, in former sessions, occupied the attention of Parliament, and I trust that the measures which will now be submitted for your consideration will be found calculated to remove much of the evil of which complaint has been made.

You will probably be of opinion that the re-arrangement of the judicature, and the blending of the administration of law and equity, which were effected for England by the enactment of last session, ought, on the same principles, to be extended to Ireland, and you will be asked to devote some part of your time to the accomplishment of this object.

The greater part of these changes would be inapplicable to the tribunals of Scotland; but you will be invited, as to that part of my kingdom, to consider the most satisfactory mode of bringing the procedure upon appeals into harmony with recent legislation, and, among other measures relating to her special interests, a Bill for amending the law relating to land rights, and for facilitating the transfer of land, will be laid before you.

Serious differences have arisen, and remonstrances been made by large classes of the community, as to the working of the recent Act of Parliament affecting the relationship of master and servant, of the Act of 1871, which deals with offences connected with trade, and of the law of conspiracy, more especially as connected with these offences. On these subjects I am desirous that, before attempting any fresh legislation, you should be in possession of all material facts, and of the precise questions in controversy, and for this purpose I have issued a Royal Commission to inquire into the state and working of the present law with a view to its early amendment, should it be found necessary.

A Bill will be introduced dealing with such parts as the Acts regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors as have given rise to complaints which appear to deserve the interference of Parliament.

Your attention will also be directed to the laws affecting friendly and provident societies.

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER has been overwhelmed with suggestions lately from all quarters, first one class of the community, and then another, asking for special relief from taxation. We will make one more suggestion, which if adopted would tend to the relief of all, while the loss to the Exchequer would, we believe, be comparatively slight. It is simply this, that 5 per cent. discount should be allowed on the amount of all taxes paid within a week of their falling due. Only collectors of taxes know the length of time for which taxes are often allowed to fall into arrear, and it is obvious that the longer they remain in arrear, the greater is the risk of their becoming ultimately irrecoverable. The principle, we may remark, has been already adopted in the case of the Succession Duty, which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may receive in advance, allowing discount at the rate of 4 per cent., or at such other rate as may from time to time be directed by the Treasury. (See Succession Duty Act 1853, 16 & 17

Vict. c. 51, s. 40.) Nor do we see any reason why it should not be applied to the collection of rates as well as of taxes, or why those who pay late should not be chargeable with interest. Unless debts due to the public be all promptly paid, those who lag behind in payment are in a certain measure being supported at the expense of those who do not. Moreover, anything which would tend to lessen the necessity of pressing visits from either tax collector or rate collector could not fail to be a boon both to the collectors and the public. As for the special claimants for relief from taxation, why one class is entitled to relief more than another, let Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE decide that question if he can:—whichever he singles out for relief, he is sure to offend all the others.

A COMPARISON of the Bishops' Resignation Act 1869, with the Incumbents' Resignation Act 1871, will show that the beneficed clergy are not quite so favourably dealt with by the Legislature in regard to resignation as the bishops are. By the Bishops' Resignation Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 111) s. 2, a retiring bishop is entitled to whichever may be the greater sum, one-third part of the income of the see, or two thousand a year, irrespective of the period of service. By the Incumbents' Resignation Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 44) a retiring incumbent is entitled to not more than one-third of the revenues of his benefice, and this amount may be cut down at the discretion of the commissioners appointed under the Act, and is not grantable at all unless the incumbent has served the same benefice for seven years continuously—a restriction which prevents allowance being made for exchanges or promotions. The Deans' Resignation Act 1872 (35 Vict. c. 8) is between the two, allowing the one-third to be made up to certain fixed sums, varying with the nature of the preferment, "if the retiring dean holds no other ecclesiastical preferment." Nothing can be more salutary than the principle of all the three Acts, but we think that it might well be extended to all ecclesiastics with equal liberality, that the beneficed clergy might be guaranteed a minimum retiring pension, and that length of service in the church, not in the particular benefice occupied before retirement, is the proper element for determining it. Neither the revenues of the vacated benefice, nor those under the control of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would, we presume, suffice for pensions on the scale of civil service pensions—ten-sixtieths of salary after ten years' service, rising one-sixtieth every year for thirty years until the maximum of two-thirds is reached; but we should be glad to see length of service in small livings more liberally rewarded than is possible under the present law.

IN the case of Miles v. Harrison, which came before the LORD CHANCELLOR and the LORDS JUSTICES on the 2nd March, an important principle of equity was involved, any deviation from which ought to be watched with the greatest jealousy. The Rev. JOHN MILES, by his will dated July 1855, after various directions to the trustees and executors relative to the payment of debts, legacies, and annuities, immaterial to the question at issue, disposed of all the residue of his personal estate in favour of certain charitable objects, and added the following proviso: "And my will is and I expressly direct that the three last-mentioned legacies or bequests shall respectively be paid and satisfied out of such part of my personal estate, as can lawfully be applied to the payment thereof, and which shall be reserved by my trustees or trustee for the time being for that purpose." The question was whether or not these words constituted a sufficiently explicit direction to marshal the assets in favour of the charities, to overrule the general rule of law. Vice-Chancellor WICKENS held that they did not, and directed the funeral expenses, debts, and legacies to be paid out of the pure and impure personalty rateably. Upon appeal the decision of the Vice-Chancellor was reversed: (Weekly Notes, March 14.) The old rule, which, we had thought, was too well settled to be disturbed, was that nothing short of a clear and unmistakable intention appearing explicitly on the face of the instrument was sufficient to enable a testator's assets to be marshalled in favour of charities. No marshalling, in fact, could take place unless the testator had, totidem verbis, directed it. Such a rule would be intelligible and easily applicable, and would have the effect of discouraging litigation. The new principle—for so we regard it—which seems to be established by the present case, that even slight indications on the testator's part in favour of marshalling will be sufficient, tends to create endless complication and difficulty; and the question of what amounts to a sufficient indication is one which it will be rarely possible to solve without an appeal to the court. The direction to pay the charitable bequests out of the pure personalty amounts to nothing, as they are words added, of course, by conveyancers in every well-drawn instrument; and the further words, "which shall be reserved by my trustees or trustee for the time being for that purpose," are merely an amplification of what had preceded, and clearly do not constitute an unmistakable expression of wish on the testator's part to have the assets marshalled. And there is no decision which justifies the result arrived at in the present case. In the cases of Sturge v. Dimsdale (6 Beav. 462) and Robinson v. Geldard (3 M. & G. 735) there were equally plain directions as to the funds from which charitable legacies were to be paid, and it was held that no marshalling was to take place. Nor does the case of Wills v. Bourne, decided last year by the late Lord Chancellor, go to such lengths as the present, although Lord SELBORNE expressed some doubt as to Vice-Chancellor WICKENS's judgment in the present case, without, however, being fully acquainted with all the circumstances. That case differs materially from this, inasmuch as the testator by clear implication had made his real estate the primary fund for the payment of his debts; and not only was there a direction to pay the charitable bequests out of the pure personalty, but, as the LORD CHANCELLOR expressed it (the gift in favour of charities being of the residue), "there was a clear separation from the residue of what could not be effectually given to charity." We earnestly hope that this important question will ere long obtain a final and decisive settlement by a judgment of the highest court of appeal.

THE letter of Mr. Serjeant Cox in the Times of Tuesday directs attention to a very strange fact: the payment of a judge, like a labourer, by the day. It appears from this communication that the Judge of the Second Court of the Middlesex Session is not paid, like the Judge of the First Court, and like all other Judges in England, by salary, but by a fee of five guineas per day. There is no necessity to urge the impropriety of such a form of payment for such a service; it will be at once universally acknowledged, and needs but to be named to be remedied on the earliest opportunity. Such an opportunity will speedily offer itself, for a Bill is about to be submitted to Parliament by the Home Office to settle the salary of the Assistant Judge, which lapsed on the resignation of Sir W. BODKIN; and the appeal is now properly made for removing at the same time the singular anomaly in the second court. The amount of salary that should be allowed to the Judge is unimportant as compared with the manner of payment, which at present is derogatory to the court, to the Judge, and even to the administration of justice. Mr. Serjeant Cox shows that the business of the Middlesex Sessions is second in importance and quantity to that only of the Central Criminal Court. It appears that in his court alone he has tried, during the five years of his presidency, nearly four thousand criminals, a greater number, we believe, than has been tried by any other living Judge, except Sir W. BODKIN. The cases that come before the Middlesex Sessions are, as he points out, not the petty offences usually disposed of at quarter sessions in the country. Metropolitan crime has many special features. It includes a vast variety of frauds, ingeniously concocted, involving often very difficult questions of law and fact. The police magistrates sift the business and dispose of the lesser cases, and only the more important are sent to the sessions. The court sits fortnightly all the year round, with few exceptions, and is usually engaged for a week. There is no vacation. But for all this the Assistant-Judge has the very modest salary of £1500 per annum, and the Judge of the Second Court, paid by five guineas a day, never receives more in the year than £650, which, as he says, is little more than half the salary of a police magistrate, and not half that of a County Court Judge. There can be no doubt that the Judges of both of these courts are insufficiently paid. The salary of the Assistant-Judge ought not to be less than £2000, nor should that of the Judge of the Second Court be less than £1500. But Mr. Serjeant Cox is more modest in his suggestions. He proposes only that the salary of the Judge of the Second Court should be the same as that of a police magistrate. We should contend that it ought to be more. The further suggestions of the letter are that the Judge of the Second Court should be made such eo nomine. We should prefer the title of Second Judge. He proposes, also, that the two courts should have co-ordinate jurisdiction, so that one Judge should always be enabled to act in all matters in the absence of the other. This would be obviously a great improvement. We trust that the letter will have the desired effect of directing the attention of the members of the new Parliament to the subject, or that when the Bill is before them due provision may be made in it for effecting the obviously desirable objects of payment of a Judge by a salary instead of by the day, whatever the amount of such salary may be.

THE case of Gainsford v. Dunn, which came before the MASTER of the ROLLS on the 4th inst. seems to call for comment, and to open questions of very serious moment. The decision of Sir G. JESSEL in this instance appears to establish a principle of wide application, which is perhaps scarcely warranted by the authorities. By a settlement in 1841, the trustees of certain funds were directed upon the happening of certain events (which took place), to hold the same in trust for the brother and sisters of ANN DUNN, or their respective issue, in such proportions as ANN DUNN should by will appoint. ANN DUNN made her will in 1869, in which the only words which disposed of any property were—"I give and bequeath to my brother, T. DUNN, and to my sisters, ELIZABETH, the wife of R. J. GAINSFORD, and JANE J., the wife of H. T. STAUNTON, the sum of £5 each. All the rest and residue of my property of whatever kind and wheresoever situate, and over which I have any power of appointment or disposition, I give, devise, and bequeath unto, and to the use of my sisters, MARY and S. R. DUNN, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns respectively, for their own absolute use and benefit." It was contended by the plaintiff's counsel that the power being non-exclusive was not well executed. The MASTER of the ROLLS, however, decided that the legacies were, in accordance with the principle laid down by Greville v. Browne (7 H. of L. Cas. 689), charged upon the settled property, and that the appointment was valid. In the very brief report of the case in the Weekly Notes of the 14th March, it does not appear whether ANN DUNN was a feme covert, and whether she had any disposing power over any property not included in the settlement. But in the case as there stated, the novel principle seems to be established that a particular and non-exclusive power may be validly exercised without reference either to the power or to the property subject thereto. The provision in the Wills Act refers only to general powers, and, according to Lord ST. LEONARDS (Powers, 301)—though this statement is open to question—only to powers of appointment by will or deed. And the case of Greville v. Brown did not refer to the execution of a power. All that is established by that and similar cases is, that where there is a gift of legacies followed by a residuary devise and bequest of real and personal estate, the legacies constitute a charge upon the real estate; the question having been whether, upon the personalty proving insufficient to satisfy the legacies, the deficiency was to be made up out of the realty, or the legacies were to abate pro tanto. The personalty would, of course, be the primary fund for payment of the legacies. If in the present case any property whatsoever, however small, was subject to the will, other than what was settled, it seems to us that the decision cannot be supported. And, indeed, its correctness seems open to question even supposing the testatrix had no other property—as, this being a case of a particular power, according to the general rule some reference is necessary either to the property or to the power of appointment. And the words of the will clearly imply that the testatrix had other property than what was settled, in which case the legacies would be payable out of the unsettled property, and the testatrix was attempting to exclude some of the objects of a non-exclusive power.

LEGAL ASPECTS OF THE TICHBORNE CASE.

THE literature of the Tichborne case has already been sufficiently voluminous, and what possible object is to be attained by publishing contradictory correspondence of the relations of a convicted felon, about whose crime no fragment of doubt now remains, it is hard to understand. When, however, commentators like Mr. JOSEPH BROWN, Q.C., and Mr. FITZJAMES STEPHEN, Q.C., deal with the subject, the sentamentalism which has surrounded it wholly disappears, and we find ourselves in the cool atmosphere of judicial contemplation. Mr. BROWN has taken the trouble to compare Orton's impostures with other great impostures of a similar kind, and he finds the main features identical. "So far," he says, "from the Tichborne case being a novelty, to those who are well acquainted with history and jurisprudence, it was but a repetition of a play acted many times before, with the same catastrophe, and generally presenting the same features of romantic interest and plausibility to the multitude, and the same indubitable marks of fraud and imposture to the jurist." And he adds: "I will only ask the reader to bear in mind the most prominent circumstances which appear to have held the juries so long in suspense. They seem to have been the following: the recognition of the Claimant by his supposed mother; the number of acquaintances of the real TICHBORNE who swore to his identity with the Claimant, many of them being above suspicion of collusion; the number of circumstances related by him which had unquestionably occurred to the real TICHBORNE, and which were supposed to be known only to him, and the coolness with which he bore a long and trying cross-examination. To this should be added an argument urged by many, that an ignorant butcher would not have wit enough to invent or sustain the part of ROGER TICHBORNE with such cleverness and vraisemblance. These were the features of the case which seemed to stick in the minds of the jury, and cause them to hesitate so long. I shall now show that every one of them occurred before in reported cases of the same kind, which yet proved to be gross impostures, and bore the same marks of fraud as this case." This he proceeds to do by relating the incidents of several familiar cases, beginning with that of MARTIN GUERRE, and ending with the attempted personations of LOUIS XVII. Mr. BROWN closes his pamphlet with some practical suggestions. He writes: "Our statute law has provided for the crime of false personation of stockholders in the public funds, with the view of fraudulently getting possession of their dividends, and of officers and soldiers in order to get their pay and pension, or of voters at elections, in order to exercise the franchise. But there is no such crime known to our law as false personation of the lost heir to an estate, with a view to get possession of his property. The villain who attempts this part can only be reached if he commits perjury or conspiracy to promote his claims, and consequently he can neither be arrested at the outset of his career, nor punished to the full measure of his deserts when he is convicted. He may act the part of the impostor for months or years, during which he is daily acquiring fresh knowledge of the history and habits of the missing heir, and thereby daily making fresh dupes; he may even get into possession of the property with impunity; it is only when he comes into a court of justice and swears falsely in support of his claim that the criminal law can reach him, and even then it can only punish him for perjury. Now, when it is considered that impostures of this kind are generally attempts at robbery on a gigantic scale, and attempts to make the very courts and officers of justice the instruments of fraud and plunder, that they tend to involve innocent families in enormous expense and ruin, and even to get up a popular outcry against the ministers of justice, it may seem that perjury is the least part of such an offence. If a man falsely and wilfully swore that he saw another commit a murder, and thereby caused an innocent man to be hung, the public would think such a crime involved murder as well as perjury. Surely there ought to be a statute that if any man falsely personates another, with intent to defraud any person of any property or title, or to claim a false relationship to any family, he should be guilty of felony, and punishable as such. This would enable the aggrieved family to make an effort to arrest and convict him at the outset of his career, before he had got a crowd of dupes to follow him. The antiquated forms and precedents of our courts are also wholly inadequate to deal with such cases in their full length and breadth, and ought to be reformed, so as to do full and vigorous justice. The court ought to have power at any time to order the body of the claimant to be examined by impartial surgeons, and himself to be examined as a witness first and foremost; to order any witness to be called who could give important evidence, and to prohibit the impudent assumption of the name and title by the claimant until after the trial. And when judgment is given, it is clear that the court ought to have power to declare finally who and what the imposter is; to prohibit him from using or claiming the name to which he has no title, and not only to punish him, but to compel him to make amends, so far as possible to the injured family." Mr. FITZJAMES STEPHEN is equally instructive, and even more practical. His letter, addressed to the Pall Mall Gazette, is too lengthy for reproduction. In it he goes through the history of the legal proceedings, and whilst admitting that the process in Chancery facilitated ORTON'S design, it nevertheless was a material step towards his detection. "The cross-examination which ORTON underwent at the Law Institution was the first step towards his detection. It left much undiscovered, but it showed the other side that if they wanted to detect the fraud they must inquire in Australia and Chili. The Tichborne family might have been placed in very great difficulties if they had never been able to cross-examine ORTON at all, or to learn what his case was till he came into the witness-box on the trial of an action of ejectment; and this must not be forgotten if the proceedings in Chancery are complained of. The question how far a defendant ought to have a right to know the plaintiff's case before it is brought forward in court is a most important one, and the course taken by the Tichborne case ought to be carefully considered in reference to it by those who are now engaged in remodelling civil procedure and fusing law and equity." Mr. STEPHEN then proceeds to show that in this case the interrogation of the defendant, which Mr. BROWN, as appears by the quotation which we have made, thinks ought to have taken place, would have been a mistake. "I have always," says Mr. STEPHEN, "been in favour of the interrogation of accused persons, and I have advocated the introduction of the practice on a variety of occasions for many years; but surely if there ever was a case in which an 'interrogation by a public prosecutor' would have been simply a useless prolongation of a trial it was the Tichborne case. ORTON actually had been 'subjected to an interrogatory' for many days by Lord COLERIDGE and every word of it was read over to the jury on the trial for perjury. What conceivable advantage could have been gained by asking him any more questions?" Mr. STEPHEN also differs from Mr. BROWN as to the advisability of giving the Judges the power to call and examine witnesses. "If the Judges could call witnesses," he says, "I am much mistaken if they would often think it wise to use their power. I doubt, indeed, whether they would have done wisely to use it in the Tichborne case. When a witness is called by a party he is carefully examined in private before he is put forward in court, and his evidence, if necessary, is tested by collateral inquiry. Are the Judges to be at liberty to employ an attorney to take the proofs of a witness whom they think of calling or not? If yes, they are at once mixed up in the detail of the case in a manner not easily reconcilable with the general character of their duties. If no, they expose themselves by calling an unknown witness to being the instruments of fraud. Suppose that the Judges had called CHARLES ORTON and his sisters, and that they had contradicted each other in the witness box as they have in the columns of the Daily Telegraph, would that have been of much use? Suppose, again, that CHARLES ORTON, being called, had shuffled and equivocated, and said in substance that he could not say whether the defendant was his brother or not, and suppose that he had been forced to admit in cross-examination on the one side that he had signed statements that the defendant was not his brother, or at all like him, and on the other that he been receiving £5 a month from the defendant, and that he had given information to the other side when money failed, would matters have been much advanced? Or suppose, again, he had said simply, 'Of course it is only my opinion, but as far as I can judge that man is not my brother Arthur'. Practically he would have risked nothing by saying so. No jury would ever have convicted him of perjury for what might have been a mistake; but, being called as the witness of the Judges, his testimony would have had almost decisive weight." It must be admitted that there is very great force in this reasoning. It is satisfactory to find so great a master of procedure and evidence as Mr. STEPHEN coming to the conclusion that the great length of time during which the Tichborne case lasted does not bring to light any special defect in our procedure, "except, indeed, the defect which is now universally admitted of the intricacy of real property law, and the distinction between law and equity." "The two trials, especially the trial for perjury," he adds, "might have been shortened to some extent if the rules of evidence had been more strictly enforced, and if the prisoner's counsel and the Judge had taken a different view of their duty; but the only alteration in the substance of the procedure which would have saved much time would have amounted to a revolution in the administration of justice." A practical suggestion which Mr. STEPHEN makes is this. "Would it not be possible," he asks, "in cases in which it is obvious that there is perjury and fraud on one side or the other to empower the Judges to order that the plaintiff or any particular witness or witnesses should not be called unless before they were called they made an affidavit as to the truth of the principal matters to which they were about to depose, and that when the trial took place the jury should not only try the question whether the plaintiff or defendant was entitled to the verdict, but the question whether perjury had been committed by swearing the affidavit; and that if they found it had the court should pronounce sentence on the offender? This would be a very strong check upon a crime which is constantly committed, and which is very seldom punished." Finally, Mr. STEPHEN agrees with everybody else that the punishment of perjury is not severe enough, "and that the whole law on that subject is in a very bad state;" but he does not consider that the case is a disgrace to our system, pointing out that old Lady TICHBORNE was the real causa mali. "The law," he remarks, "cannot protect people against the consequences of the fancies of a person incurably wrongheaded on particular points, but not mad enough to be locked up."

KNOWLEDGE BY A PURCHASER OF TENANCIES OR CHARGES AS AFFECTING HIS RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

THE judgments delivered by the Lords Justices in a case of Caballero v. Henty, heard on the 11th inst., will, it is to be hoped, prevent any further development of the pernicious and, as we believe, unfounded doctrine propounded by Lord Romilly in James v. Lichfield (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 521; L. Rep. 9 Eq. 51). That doctrine, we may remind our readers, is that a purchaser who contracts to buy land which he knows to be in the occupation of a tenant cannot succeed in a suit against the vendor for specific performance, with compensation, although it should turn out that the tenant had a lease. In his judgment Lord Romilly is reported to have said: "The case of Daniels v. Davison (16 Ves. 249) determines that as between the tenant himself and the purchaser, the purchaser was bound to inquire, and cannot dispute the tenant's rights. Does that duty apply to the case between vendor and purchaser as well as between purchaser and tenant? I have found no case exactly in point, but the principle appears to me to be the same, and to be applicable to both cases. Why is the purchaser bound to inquire as regards the tenant, and yet not bound to inquire as regards his rights against the vendor? The principle is thus stated in argument in that case: 'Whatever puts a purchaser upon inquiry shall be held notice, and if, therefore, he knows that a tenant is in possession he is considered as having notice of the whole extent of his interest,' . . . if the purchaser chooses to bind himself by agreement with the vendor, knowing of the tenancy, but without having accurately ascertained what was the extent and character of it, and what the results of such inquiry would have led to, he must, as it appears to me, be bound in the same manner as all other persons. I think also that no distinction can properly be drawn in a court of equity, because the matter rests in contract, and the conveyance of the legal estate has not been made to him."

The whole of this ruling is, as it seems to us, utterly unsound. The analogy is faint indeed between the case of a tenant in possession at the time of a legal conveyance to a purchaser for value, asserting as against such purchaser equities of which the fact of possession is held to be sufficient notice, and the case of a vendor who, while contracting to sell in terms which imply that the subject of sale is an estate in possession free from any lease, tenancy, or charge, afterwards turns round and, while admitting the existence of these or similar incumbrances, nevertheless insists that the contract must proceed as if they did not exist, and contends that from the fact of the land being in occupation the purchaser ought to have inquired, and as a consequence of inquiry might have ascertained the real nature of the occupiers' holdings and interest. Such an analogy can only be looked upon as the doctrine of constructive notice run mad. We observe, however, that even in James v. Lichfield, the case was not decided on the mere fact of the tenant's possession (which would have been sufficient to protect the tenant's own equities, whether the purchaser were actually aware of such possession or not), but on evidence that the purchaser did actually know that there was a tenant in possession. A similar remark applies to the cases of Carroll v. Keays and Keays v. Carroll (22 W. Rep. 243), in which we see, with some degree of amazement, that the Court of Appeal in Ireland, consisting of two judges so experienced as Lord O'Hagan and Lord Justice Christian, thought it incumbent on them to follow James v. Lichfield as an authority, although Lord Justice Christian said that that case was "actually startling from the length to which it goes." In Caballero v. Henty the Lords Justices very clearly pointed out the absurdity of expecting that a person contracting to purchase should make preliminary inquiries on the land as to the fact or nature of occupancy, and that the interval between the contract and the time of completion was the proper period for such investigations. The facts of the case of Caballero v. Henty did not call for any decision on the question as to the effect on a purchaser of actual previous knowledge on his part of the existence of a tenancy, lease, or charge not disclosed by the contract for sale.

The suit was one by a vendor for specific performance without compensation, under circumstances rendering success hopeless, and was unhesitatingly, and without a reply being called for, dismissed with costs by the Lords Justices in affirmance of the decision of the Master of the Rolls. The value of the case consists in the opinions elicited from the court by the line of argument adopted by the plaintiff's counsel. From those opinions it seems tolerably clear that the question as between vendor and purchaser is really one of description, and not of notice or knowledge—as to what, on the fair meaning of the contract, was the subject of it—as to whether the contract was for an estate in possession, or reversion, free from or subject to tenancies, leases, or other charges.

It appears, also, that the Lords Justices were dissatisfied with the propositions of the late Master of the Rolls in James v. Lichfield.

We absolutely fail to see why a purchaser, as between himself and his vendor, is to be affected by the fact of his knowledge that there are tenants in possession; it is no business of his to make inquiries as to the nature of their holdings previously to entering into the contract. The vendor may be supposed to know his own business, and the nature of his own interest in his own estate, and if he undertakes to sell in words which imply that he is selling an estate in possession or free from charges, we think it clear that the purchaser is primâ facie entitled to insist on specific performance with compensation. If the purchaser knows no more than the fact of the estate being in the occupation of tenants, he is surely entitled to assume, as against the vendor, either that they are tenants at will, or that their tenancies will expire by effluxion of time before the day fixed for completion of the purchase, or that by some arrangement between them and the vendor he will be enabled to give possession at the appointed day. Taking the case most unfavourable for the purchaser, viz., that of his having actual and precise knowledge not merely of the fact of the land being in the occupation of tenants, but of the precise nature of their holdings and equities, and that those holdings and equities are of such a nature that it is improbable or impossible that a vendor could have intended to sell otherwise than subject to them—still we say that, even in such a case, although a suit by the purchaser for specific performance with compensation would fail on the ground of mistake (and mistake of which the purchaser was aware) on the part of the vendor, it would not, generally speaking, where the contract was, or was required to be in writing, be competent for the vendor to maintain any suit for specific performance against the purchaser, and certainly not, except on the condition of granting compensation, in respect of the charges or tenancies.

On an assumption of the authority or more properly of the value and correctness of James v. Lichfield, the Appeal Court of Ireland thought themselves bound to overrule the decision of Vice-Chancellor Chatterton, and to decree specific performance without compensation in respect of yearly tenancies at the suit of a vendor who had contracted to convey an estate in possession. It was there argued that notice of a lease was notice of all its contents, or at least of such as are fairly incidental, even as between vendor and purchaser, and that no doubt is so where there has been no misrepresentation or improper concealment, and where the existence of the lease appears expressly or impliedly on the face of the contract; beyond this we do not think the doctrine can be carried. Lord St. Leonards has intimated an opinion that it has already been carried too far.

The courts, and especially those of appellate jurisdiction, have repeatedly declared that the doctrine of constructive notice is not to be extended, and we have on several occasions thought it our duty to remark upon decisions of courts of first instance in which this rule of non-extension has, as we conceived, been too much lost sight of. Thus in an article LAW TIMES, vol. xlv., 157, we endeavoured to show, in opposition to a decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins in Hunt v. White (37 L. J., N.S., 326, Ch.), that clear and unambiguous covenants for title contained in a purchase deed ought not to be controlled by the fact that a particular incumbrance or defect was actually or constructively known to the parties.

So again, in articles LAW TIMES, vol. l., pp. 154, 492, we pointed out instances in which, as it appeared to us, the doctrine of constructive notice has been unfairly and improperly strained to invalidate the title of a purchaser. There is, happily, now no reason to fear that the English Court of Chancery Appeal will countenance any attempt to extend the doctrine of notice beyond its existing limits.

CONVERSION—ESSENTIAL ELEMENTS.

THE singular case of Hiort v. Bott (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 25), in which Bramwell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB., have recently delivered a considered judgment, deserves notice, as well illustrating the law of conversion, and especially as laying down decisively that the animus convertendi is not necessary to constitute it. Very shortly stated, the facts were that the plaintiffs and defendant were both the victims of a fraud, whereby the broker of the plaintiff had caused goods of the plaintiff to be sent to the defendant which had never been ordered by him; and the defendant indorsed a delivery order for them to the broker, with the intention, as the jury found, to get the goods back to the plaintiff, but with the result of depriving the plaintiff of them, though the broker obtaining the goods by means of the delivery order and making away with them. The defendant, therefore, not only did not intend either to convert the plaintiff's goods to his own use or to deprive the plaintiff of them, but intended to get the goods back to the plaintiff in what he conceived to be the quickest way, and for this, for doing in complete innocence what turned out not to be the wisest thing under the circumstances, the court has held him liable in conversion. Nor is there any reason to question the correctness of the decision, but it is said in Addison on Torts, p. 320, that a man is not guilty of a conversion of goods "unless he removes the goods for the purpose of taking the goods away from the plaintiff, or of exercising some dominion or control over them for the benefit of himself or of some other person," and the intention of the defendant has been laid such stress on in so many of the leading cases on conversion, that it is no wonder that Mr. Justice Archibald had directed a verdict for the defendant at the trial. The facts of the case are not at first sight distinguishable from those in Heugh v. London and North-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 51; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 676) which was pressed upon and distinguished by the court. In that case the plaintiffs, acting upon an order supposed to be sent by one of their former customers, but in reality sent by a fraudulent traveller of their own, consigned certain goods to their customer by the defendant's railway. The defendants essayed to deliver the goods according to the address, but the person in charge of the premises refusing to take them in, the defendants took them back to the station and advised the consignees that the goods were held by them not as common carriers, but as warehousemen. Shortly afterwards, upon the traveller bringing the advice note, and also a letter signed by him for the consignees, requesting the defendants to deliver the goods to bearer, the defendants delivered them to him, whereby they became lost to the plaintiffs. It was sought to charge the defendants for a misdelivery on the grounds (1) that they had acted voluntarily in the matter; (2) that they had claimed warehouse rent; but the Court of Exchequer held that the jury had been rightly asked whether the defendants had acted reasonably under the circumstances, and, the jury having answered in the affirmative, upheld a verdict for the defendants. "Their position," said Kelly, C.B., "was that of involuntary bailees; they found these goods in their hands without any default of their own, under circumstances in which the character of carriers under which they received them had ceased." The defendant in Hiort v. Bott may, perhaps, also be best described as an involuntary bailee, and had become so by means of fraudulent orders very similar to those in Heugh's case. What then is the distinction between the two cases? The distinction is that whereas in Heugh's case the defendants were acting in the course of their business, and it became a question for the jury whether they acted reasonably, in Hiort's case the defendant went out of his way to do the act which caused the plaintiff to lose his goods. The defendant had only either to do nothing, or else send the delivery order back to the plaintiff himself, and no harm would have been done. Moreover in Heugh's case it was the plaintiff's act in giving credit to his traveller that the whole difficulty arose, whereas in Hiort's case it was the endorsing of the delivery order to the broker which caused the loss; and the rule is plain, that where of two innocent parties one must suffer by the wrong of a third he who has enabled the third party to occasion the loss must sustain it. (Per Ashhurst, J., in Lickbarrow v. Mason, 1 Sm. L. C. 690.)

The case of Hiort v. Bott is also noticeable for having produced a new definition of conversion, issuing from a court which may be said to have an hereditary right to deal with the subject of conversion. The frequently cited case of Fouldes v. Willoughby (8 M. & W. 540); the case of Burroughes v. Bayne (5 H. & N. 296), where the whole history of trover may be found in the judgment of Martin, B.; and, lastly, the case of England v. Cowley (L. Rep. 8 Ex. 126; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 68), where Martin, B., dissented from the opinion of the rest of the court that the "wrongful deprivation" must be a total and entire deprivation, all proceeded from the Court of Exchequer. And we have it now laid down by that court that conversion "is where a man does an act unauthorised which deprives me of my property for an indefinite time." This is a definition which is perhaps legally rather than verbally correct, extending as it does the meaning of conversion so as to include wrongful deprivation. It is always well to bear in mind the mistake which occurs in the statutory form of declaration under the Common Law Procedure Act. "That the defendant converted to his own use, or wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the possession of," are the words in the schedule. The mistake, which has no doubt caused much confusion, arose in this way. In the original Bill the words "or wrongfully deprived," &c., did not appear. Lord Denman inserted them, but within brackets, and when the Act came to be printed the brackets were left out: (see London and Westminster Discount Company v. Drake, 28 L. J., 297, C. P., per Willes, J; Day's Common Law Procedure Act, p. 239.)

It is somewhat singular that there should be but little, if any, authority on the liability of a person who finds himself in possession of an article left at his house by mistake, or by some would-be seller with whom he has had no communication respecting it. Is there any legal obligation, for instance, to keep a sample sent by post which one has not ordered, and if there be, how long does it exist, and could anything be recovered for the expense of keeping it? Advertisements constantly appear to the effect that if A. B. do not fetch away the property which he left behind at C. D.'s house, the same will be sold to pay expenses. It would seem to follow from Baron Bramwell's remarks that there is an authority in these cases to deal reasonably with the articles, and that it would be for a jury to say whether there had been a reasonable dealing or not. It was, however, decided in the old case of Lethbridge v. Phillips (2 Starkie, 544), that there is no obligation in these cases to keep safely. In that case a picture had been damaged which had been borrowed of the plaintiff by a third person in order to show to the defendant, who had not asked to see the picture, nor had had any communication with the borrower on the subject, and it was held that no action would lie upon an implied contract to keep the picture safely, Chief Justice Abbott observing "it often happened that articles of great value were left at gentlemen's houses by mistake, and that in such cases parties could not be considered as bailess of the property without their consent." And Story's comment on the case is that where there is a substantial mistake, or fraud, or imposition, practised by one party on the other, the common law would deem the "contract of mandate," properly so called, void: (Story on Bailments, p. 146.)

LAW LIBRARY.

The Theory of Stock Exchange Speculation. By ARTHUR CRUMP. London: Longmans and Co.

THE connections between the Stock Exchange and the Legal Profession are very intimate, and it is of great importance that lawyers should be familiar with the mysterious proceedings of jobbers, brokers, bulls and bears, and speculators generally on 'Change. Safe investments are not sufficiently tempting to the enormous amount of capital which is floating about the country, and hence it is that so many thousands of innocent people become involved in "settling days," and too frequently, in violent efforts to escape from overwhelming liabilities, have recourse to the law. The recent cases of Dent v. Nickalls and Maynard v. Eaton, to name two out of dozens, illustrate the important part which Stock Exchange business plays in our courts, and on this ground we think that this work of Mr. Arthur Crump on "The Theory of Stock Exchange Speculation" will prove of interest and value.

A very good instance of the utility of the work is found in the first chapter, in which the author explains certain technical terms. He says:

> The members of the Stock Exchange are of two descriptions, jobbers and brokers. The jobber deals in stocks and shares, either as a buyer or seller, at the market prices. The broker deals with the jobber, and is paid a commission by his principal for transacting the business between the two.
> A bull is a speculator who buys for the settlement with a view of selling at some future date at a higher price and gaining by the difference.
> A bear is a speculator who hopes to gain by the reverse operation. He sells for the settlement, hoping to buy back at a cheaper price, and gain by the difference.
> Contango means continuation charge, for instance: if a bull speculator has £2000 Brighton railway stock open for the account, of which there are two in a month, one in the middle and one at the end, and the settlement which is to take place, say in the middle of the month, is approaching without the price having advanced as much as he supposed it would at the time when he bought, he wishes to carry over or keep the stock open for another fortnight. For this accommodation he must pay the jobber in the house of whom the stock has been bought, a certain rate per cent. to allow the speculator to continue a bull of the stock, instead of paying the money and taking it off the market. The contango rates depend upon different circumstances. Sometimes instead of having to pay any contango, a bull will get something paid to him. If the stock is very scarce, and the jobber finds it difficult to deliver to purchasers, he will be glad to carry over a bull account for nothing, and may be he will pay a consideration to postpone delivery for a fortnight. On the other hand, if the stock is very plentiful when the settling day arrives, if the sellers have been numerous, and the deliveries are large, the jobber will prefer delivering the stock to the bull speculator to continuing it to the next account, because he wants money to pay those who have sent their stock to market. Under these circumstances the contango rate may be ¼ per cent. on the money price of £220,000 nominal stock for the fortnight, or it may reach a much higher figure, even exceeding 1 per cent. for the fortnight, but such a rate is seldom charged.

The contango rates depend very much upon the state of the money market, and hence the fluctuation in the price of public securities in sympathy with the rise and fall in the value of money.

It has become more of a custom with bankers to lend money to the Stock Exchange than was the case formerly; one reason being that, through the more enlightened management of the Bank of England of late years, the changes in the rate of discount are made more in obedience to the varying condition of the money market as a whole, as reflected in the Bank return, than was the case in former years, when the directors would come down to the city some Thursday afternoon to put up their terms when there was very little available money left upon which to obtain the increased charge. In other words, the value of money changes more frequently than it used to, and bankers, desiring to act at all times in view of contingencies, find it very convenient to lend their surplus balances for a fortnight upon easily convertible securities with a good margin. Moreover the risks attending bills of exchange are avoided. The contango rates at the settlement may rise suddenly through unexpected demands upon bankers arising out of a bullion drain, and a fall in the foreign exchanges, which compels them to refuse to continue their loans upon stock. Such stock must then be turned out upon the market, and if there happen simultaneously to be more deliveries than there is stock taken off the market the contango rates will rule high.

It may be here observed that the contango charge is an item in the cost of speculation which the haphazard operator seldom takes into account at all; yet, if speculation be engaged in upon a large scale, the item of contango charges may become a formidable one, and when added to the commission charged by the broker takes so much out of the possible advance in price which may take place in the period of, say, two accounts, or the space of one month, that if requires no great experience to show that the game is not worth the candle, taking one operation with another.

These are only a few of the terms which are explained and illustrated, of some of which we never heard before. The second chapter deals with the "importance of special knowledge regarding the regularly recurring causes that influence the markets;" and the whole work, whilst furnishing a useful guide to the speculator, gives ample warning to the inexperienced. Light writing, and at times writing somewhat too free for a work of authority, is thrown in to make easy reading, and on this score many persons may find it amusing as well as instructive. To those who, like ourselves, desire for professional purposes to know the crooked paths of the Stock Exchange, and to understand the various manœuvres of professed speculators, the work is a decided acquisition.

PATENT LAW.

Gibson v. Brand. 1842.—Tindal, C.J., in delivering judgment, said: "The breach alleged in the declaration is that the defendant infringed the patent, by making and putting in practice the plaintiff's invention; and the evidence is, that he gave an order in England, which order was executed in England, for making articles by the same mode for which the plaintiffs had obtained their patent, which articles were afterwards received by the defendant. This is quite sufficient to satisfy an allegation, that he made those articles; for he that causes and procures to be made, may be well said to have made them himself." (4 M. & G. 196; 1 Web. P. C. 631; 11 L. J., N. S., C. P. 183.)

Gamble v. Kurtz. 1846.—Action for the infringement of a patent for "improvements in apparatus for the manufacture of sulphate of soda, &c." The plaintiff, in his claim, said: "I do not claim the exclusive use of iron retorts, but I do claim, as my invention, iron retorts worked in connection with each other, as above described." The defendant had used two chambers, one of iron, and one of brick, connected by an opening through which the material could be pushed from one into the other. Held, that there was an infringement. Coltman, J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, said: "The essence of the plaintiff's improvement in making sulphate of soda was the use of two chambers, with separate furnaces, for the two stages of the process; so that both could be kept in action at the same time, at the different temperature required for each stage; and that principle is equally acted upon, and the same advantage gained, whether both chambers are of iron, or one is of iron and one of brick. The material of which the chambers are composed, not being of the essence of the invention claimed, the patent right might be evaded, although the chambers used by the defendant were not of the material mentioned in the plaintiff's specification." (3 C. B. 425.)

Barker v. Grace. 1847.—The specification of a patent for "improvements in the process of finishing hosiery and other goods manufactured from lamb's wool, &c.," stated the invention to consist in submitting hosiery, and other similar goods, to the finishing process of a press heated by steam, &c., in the manner hereinafter mentioned. A description was then given, by letters, of a drawing which represented a press, which consisted of a box heated by steam, up to which another box similarly heated was to be pressed by means of hydraulic pressure, or by screws, or other well-known means. After describing the method of pressing the goods between these hot boxes, the specification concluded by confining the inventor's claim to the process as above described. Held, that a method of finishing hosiery goods, by passing them through heated rollers, was not included in this patent, and therefore was no infringement of it. (1 Ex. 339; 17 L. J., N. S., Ex. 122.)

Stevens v. Keating. N. P. 1848.—Action for the infringement of a patent for the manufacture of cements. The specification states the invention to consist in producing certain hard cements of the combination of the powder of gypsum, powder of limestone and chalk, with other materials, such combinations being (subsequent to the mixing) submitted to heat. The specification then describes the method of making cement from gypsum, in the course of which alkali (for instance, best American pearlash) is to be used, and is to be neutralized with an acid (sulphuric acid is stated to be the best); the result is to be subjected to heat. The patentee claimed "the processes of mixing the powdered materials, alkalies, and acids, as hereinabove described, &c." The defendant manufactured cement by combining gypsum with borax, and subjecting the whole to heat. It was in evidence that borax is composed of an acid and an alkali. Held, by Pollock, C.B., that there was sufficient evidence of infringement. His Lordship, in summing up the case, told the jury that "if it had turned out that they (the defendants) had, by the use of borax, produced a substance very superior indeed, I think it would have been a fair question for the jury to consider, whether that was a colourable imitation or evasion, or whether it was a person travelling in his own direction, and making discoveries in the field that was not closed against him." Upon the plea of not guilty his Lordship said: "The question is, has the defendant done that which is within the claim—no matter whether the claim is good or not." (2 Web. P. C. 181.)

Sellers v. Dickinson, 1850.—Pollock, C.B.: "There may be an infringement by using so much of a combination as is material, and it would be a question for the jury whether that used was not substantially the same thing. . . . I think it may be laid down as a general proposition (if a general proposition can be laid on a subject applicable to such a variety of matters as patent law—matters, indeed, incommensurable with each other, for the same doctrine which would apply to a medicine would scarcely apply to a new material or a new metal), that if a portion of a patent for a new arrangement of machinery is in itself new and useful, and another person, for the purpose of producing the same effect, uses that portion of the arrangement, and substitutes, for the other matters combined with it, another mechanical equivalent, that would be an infringement of the patent." (5 Exch. 324.)

The Electric Telegraph Company v. Brett. 1851.—Action for the infringement of a patent "for improvements in giving signals and sounding alarums in distant places, by means of electric currents transmitted through metallic circuits." The defendant arrived at the same result by using a circuit not wholly or continuously metallic throughout, but by using the earth, to an extent nearly amounting to the half, as the connecting medium between two portions of the metal. It appeared in evidence, that after the grant of the letters patent, it had been discovered that a large portion of the wire through which the electric current returned to the battery might be dispensed with by plunging into the earth the two ends of wire which would have been joined by the parts left out, the electric current passing from one end of the wire to the other as effectually as if a continuity of wire had been kept up. Held, that though a circuit upon this principle would not be wholly metallic, yet, inasmuch as it was so in all that part which formed the substance of the patentees' claim, viz., that part which gave the signals, it amounted to an infringement of the plaintiffs' patent. The breaches alleged in the declaration were that the defendant had used and counterfeited the said invention; the evidence was, that the defendant had used or counterfeited part only. The specification described nine several improvements. Held, that the declaration, in speaking of the said invention, was to be understood as charging the using or counterfeiting of the said nine improvements, and that it was sufficiently proved by showing that one of them had been used. (10 C. B. 838.)

Smith v. The London and North-Western Railway Company. 1853.—Action for the infringement of a patent for "an improved wheel for carriages of different descriptions." The patentee stated, in his specification, that the "said improved wheel is manufactured wholly of bar iron, by welding wrought iron bars together into the form of a wheel, whereby the nave, spokes, and rim, when finished, will consist of one solid piece of malleable iron. The specification then described the manner in which the invention was carried out. In the claim, the patentee stated that the new invention consisted in the circumstance that the centre boss, or nave, arms, and rim of the said wheel being wholly composed of wrought or malleable iron, "welded into one solid mass, in manner hereinbefore described." The defendants used a wheel, made by welding pieces of wrought iron together so as to form a single compact piece of wrought iron; the mode of forming the nave was the same as that in the specification: the mode of forming the rim was different. Held, that it appearing that the mode of forming the nave was a material, new, and useful part of the invention, the use of it by the defendant was an infringement of the patent. Campbell, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "Where a patent is for a combination of two, three, or more old inventions, a user of any of them would not be an infringement of the patent; but, where there is an invention consisting of several parts, the imitation or pirating of any part of the invention is an infringement of the patent." (2 Ell. & B. 69.)

Palmer v. Wagstaff. 1854.—The plaintiff's patent, obtained for "the mode of manufacture of candles by the application of two or more plaited wicks, so disposed that the ends always turn outwards," is not proved to be infringed by the mere production of a candle, made by the defendant, in which the wicks were so plaited and turned outwards. It must be further shown that the defendant made it by the method described in the plaintiff's specification, or in some way that the jury might consider colourable. (9 Ex. 494; L. J., N. S. Ex. 217.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

SOLICITORS will be glad to hear that the long talked of and contemplated amalgamation of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association with the Incorporated Law Society is practically un fait accompli, as will be seen from a report in another column the of proceedings at the twenty-seventh annual general meeting specially held on the 11th inst. at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society. As we said long since in reference to this subject, union is strength, and we trust the council of the Incorporated Law Society will mark this important era in the history of the society by redoubled energy and exertion to promote the professional prosperity of our branch of the Profession. This amalgamation accomplished, let the council at once direct its attention to similar objects, with a view to additional acquisition of strength. Let it, in fact, work out to its conclusion the excellent plan of organisation so forcibly and reasonably urged by Mr. Marshall, of Leeds. This achieved, and we are perfectly satisfied that we shall then no longer endure unjust exclusion from judicial offices, a subordination to the other branch which is warranted neither by any supposed inferiority in legal or general education, social position, or a continued deprivation of the enjoyment of those professional posts productive of the most pecuniary benefit; neither shall we then suffer such an exile from the dignity of the Profession as is suggestive of an inferiority in the status of the legal profession, which in truth is not warranted by the labours, responsibilities, and, above all, relative positions of trust and confidence of the two branches of our common profession.

THE subject matter of a letter which last week appeared in a London morning lay newspaper, under the title "Leases of the London Corporations," and which bore the signature "A Solicitor of Thirty Years' Standing," is certainly not without interest and importance to our Profession. For the information of our readers, and, indeed, at the request of an influential member of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, we print the letter in question in another column. A perusal of it shows that there has long existed a monopoly in reference to the legal conveyancing business in question, which cannot for a moment be justified, either on the ground of expediency or in the interests of the public or the Profession. The matter has only to be brought to the notice of the governing bodies in order to secure the omission of this objectionable clause or covenant from the deeds and documents in question. It must often enough occur that the lessee knows nothing of this covenant when he completes the transaction; and annoyed he may well be afterwards to find that instead of being able, in the usual way, to entrust subsequent dealings with the property to his accustomed solicitor, in whom he would have complete confidence, he must accept the services of those who, after all, cannot faithfully "serve two masters." Indeed, it must often happen that the unfortunate lessee, not content with the legal professional assistance rendered by those in the Profession (both branches) who represent the Corporations in question, is driven to seek the advice of his own solicitor, thus incurring double expense and delay. To solicitors practising in the City of London interested in this matter, and we presume most of them are, we commend the provisions of 36 & 37 Vict. cap. 48, by which the newly appointed Railway Commissioners can require railway companies to give "reasonable facilities for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering, or to cease giving an undue preference." The Profession and the public may, with equal propriety, demand, not only that reasonable facilities should be afforded the latter for entrusting their legal business, connected with the London Corporation, &c., to whom they please, but also that no undue preference should be given to those professional gentlemen who transact the legal business of such corporations.

A LETTER signed "A. B.," which appeared in our last issue, upon the subject of the remuneration to which solicitors practising in County Courts are at present entitled, is well worthy of attention. It cannot be doubted that in consequence of recent legislation practitioners in our County Courts are expected to have, and generally speaking have, a far better knowledge of the law and practice of such courts than was formerly necessary, and it certainly constantly happens that although a sum sought to be recovered is small in amount, yet questions of much more serious importance, as well pecuniarily as otherwise, are often involved in the dispute. Process can be issued in the Superior Courts for the recovery of any amount on payment of a court fee of 5s., whilst the court fees payable on the issue of the process from the County Courts are often of serious consideration for creditors. We should gladly see such court fees in certain cases reduced in amount, and such a system of professional remuneration introduced as would secure payment for professional services to be regulated according to the nature of the case undertaken. At present a solicitor's costs for recovery of a simple contract debt of say £22 is far in excess of what would be allowed to the same gentleman if in seeking to recover a sum nominal in amount he was called upon to argue certain points of law involving indirectly large and important interests to his clients.

FROM a case which came under the notice of the Master of the Rolls in Dublin last week it seems that the Attorneys and Solicitors Act (Ireland) (29 & 30 Vict. c. 84) is in some respects very difficult of construction. The matter before the court was in the nature of an application by a gentleman to be admitted on the Roll of the Court of Chancery, notwithstanding that the Master of the court refused to furnish the applicant with the usual certificate, and the ground for the application seems to have been that, notwithstanding the reference in the Act contemplating five years' service, yet by sect. 9 of the Act all that is necessary is to "attend two years' law lectures and pass the law examination in the University of Dublin." This the applicant had done, but this provision was inconsistent with other sections in the Act in question. The learned judge took time to consider the question raised.

THE Consolidated Regulations of the several Societies of Lincoln's-inn, the Middle Temple, the Inner Temple, and Gray's-inn, dated Michaelmas Term 1872, will, we sincerely hope, soon be brought under the notice of Parliament, especially upon the subject of that portion of them which practically excludes solicitors from being called to the Bar. Why should attorneys at the present day be ear-marked and proscribed by the benchers? Had the arbitrary power now assumed by the benchers been of earlier existence, the integrity, the intellectual qualifications, and distinguished services of many illustrious men would have been lost to the community, to say nothing of the individual injustice they themselves would have sustained. The following instances strongly support our view of this important question: Lord Tenterden was engaged in an attorney's office (that of Messrs. Sandys and Horton, of Craig's-court, Charing Cross), Mr. Bently was for a considerable time in one of the principal agency houses in London. Baron Thompson pursued his studies in an attorney's office, so did Lord Wynford and Sir William Grant. Lord Thurlow was articled to a solicitor in Bedford-row; so was Lord Hardwick. Mr. Dunning was engaged in the duties of his father's office, who was a practising attorney; Lord Macclesfield actually practised as an attorney. Lord Kenyon served his articles with an attorney; Sir William Garrow was some time in a solicitor's office; so was Sir Samuel Romilly. Lord Gifford, afterwards Chancellor of Ireland, was regularly articled, as were also Sir George Wood and Mr. Justice Buller. In our own immediate times Mr. Serjeant Wylde, afterwards Lord Chancellor Truro, was for many years in extensive practice as an attorney. One of Her Majesty's present judges now presiding at Westminster (than whom no more able and efficient judge exists) would by the present rules of the Inns of Court have been among the proscribed. We believe our present distinguished Attorney-General was once a clerk or student in the office of his father, a practising attorney; he, too, would have fallen under the same ban of "expediency." We will add one instance more. Lord Brougham was known to declare publicly in the Court of Chancery that if he had to recommence his legal studies he would begin as a clerk in an attorney's office. The exclusion of which we complain is most illiberal and unjust, for each kind of labour in the Profession should surely be as a step in the ladder affording to capable men an opportunity to reach the highest aim of their ambition.

IT may not be generally known that in order to secure a call to the Colonial Bar, the applicant must either have been called to the bar in this country, or, in some cases, in other colonies; but if not so called, he must be first articled to an attorney in practice in the Superior Court or courts of the colony to the Bar of which he seeks to be called. The term of service varies, we believe, from three to five years, and at the expiration of the articles, the candidate is called upon to pass an examination before the judges of such court. In most of our colonies the two branches are united, that is, each member of the legal profession may act at one and the same time as attorney and advocate in the colonial Superior Courts. It would indeed be of the utmost advantage if a short term of service under articles to an attorney was necessary before a call to the Bar in this country.

THE case of Neate v. Denman, recently before the Court of Chancery, is another striking instance calling for an investigation of the assumed power of those voluntary societies, as they are termed, and of their practical utility. The benchers of the Inns of Court, acting upon a resolution made by themselves on the ground of expediency, have decreed that (though attorneys for centuries had enjoyed the privilege of membership) they shall be treated as unworthy and unfit to become members of that society. For upwards of two centuries down to the year 1852, it was compulsory on attorneys to be admitted members of one of the Inns of Court. Many attorneys are now members of Gray's Inn, some for upwards of a quarter of a century. It is worthy of note that the rule of 1852, excluding attorneys, was passed by the benchers only on the ground of expediency. It came into operation in Trinity Term 1852, and is as follows:—19. "That it is expedient that no attorney at law, solicitor, writer to the signet, or writer to the Scotch courts, proctor, notary public, clerk in Chancery, parliamentary agent, or agent in any court, original or appellate, clerk to any justice of the peace, or person acting in any of these capacities, and no clerk of or to any barrister, conveyancer, special pleader, equity draftsman, attorney, solicitor, writer to the signet, or writer to the Scotch courts, proctor, notary public, parliamentary agent, or agent in any court, original or appellate, clerk in Chancery, clerk of the peace, clerk to any justice of the peace, or of or to any officer in any court of law or equity, or person acting in the capacity of any such clerk, should be admitted a member of any of the said societies for the purpose of being called to the Bar, or of practising under the Bar, until such person, being on the roll of any court, shall have taken his name off the roll thereof, nor until he and every other person above-named or described shall have entirely and bonâ fide ceased to act or practise in any of the capacities above-named or described." So that if A. B. C. and D. are a firm of attorneys-at-law, and Mr. A. desires to become a member of Gray's Inn, he cannot accomplish that wish until B. C. and D. have taken their names off the rolls. It is a singular fact that several of the present benchers of Gray's Inn who pronounced the order of expulsion in reference to Mr. Gresham, jun., have been in their day themselves on the roll of attorneys and in practice as such. The average number of members attending in the hall (exclusive of the benchers) is about a dozen. During sixteen terms, extending over four years, and with an annual income of upwards of £8309 the Honourable Society of Gray's Inn, called only thirteen members to the Bar. As we have often before pointed out, four years' income (£33,372 13s. 8d.) is no inconsiderable sum. The society's chambers are numerous and commodious, and till lately one member, we believe, was a holder of no less than forty-eight sets of chambers, which were underlet. Of the present barristers, members of the Inn, some are, we believe, engaged in commercial pursuits, or are members of other professions than the law. Why should attorneys at the present day be ear-marked and proscribed by the benchers? Had the arbitrary power now assumed by the benchers been of earlier existence, the integrity, the intellectual qualifications, and distinguished services of many illustrious men would have been lost to the community, to say nothing of the individual injustice they themselves would have sustained. The following instances strongly support our view of this important question: Lord Tenterden was engaged in an attorney's office (that of Messrs. Sandys and Horton of Craig's-court, Charing Cross), Mr. Bently was for a considerable time in one of the principal agency houses in London. Baron Thompson pursued his studies in an attorney's office, so did Lord Wynford and Sir William Grant. Lord Thurlow was articled to a solicitor in Bedford-row; so was Lord Hardwick. Mr. Dunning was engaged in the duties of his father's office, who was a practising attorney; Lord Macclesfield actually practised as an attorney. Lord Kenyon served his articles with an attorney; Sir William Garrow was some time in a solicitor's office; so was Sir Samuel Romilly. Lord Gifford, afterwards Chancellor of Ireland, was regularly articled, as were also Sir George Wood and Mr. Justice Buller. In our own immediate times Mr. Serjeant Wylde, afterwards Lord Chancellor Truro, was for many years in extensive practice as an attorney. One of Her Majesty's present judges now presiding at Westminster (than whom no more able and efficient judge exists) would by the present rules of the Inns of Court have been among the proscribed. We believe our present distinguished Attorney-General was once a clerk or student in the office of his father, a practising attorney; he, too, would have fallen under the same ban of "expediency." We will add one instance more. Lord Brougham was known to declare publicly in the Court of Chancery that if he had to recommence his legal studies he would begin as a clerk in an attorney's office.

AN official return lately issued from the Admiralty shows that courts martial were held in the last quarter of 1873 on thirteen officers and fifty-two seamen and marines. It is greatly to be hoped that the authorities will, in their way, shortly be entering upon an investigation of the present cumbrous mode of conducting these proceedings. It is hardly to be believed that in these days the evidence before such courts is taken in such a laborious manner that proceedings last days which would otherwise last only so many hours. To any extent to which the First Naval Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Alexander Milne, G.C.B.) has it in his power to contribute to such desirable reforms in reference to such proceedings, as we have often before urged in these columns, we are sure he will, and we can assure him that it is only necessary for him to bring to the knowledge of the Judge Advocate General the injustice which, owing to the present cumbrous machinery, both prosecutor and prisoners at times experience and the difficulties under which they labour, to secure such an investigation as will lead to healthy reforms.

THE Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have been pleased to order the name of Mr. Edwin John Harvey, solicitor, of Portsea, and Deputy Coroner for the County of Hants, to be inserted in the Navy List as Admiralty Law Agent for the Port of Portsmouth. Mr. Harvey was articled to the late Mr. William John Hellyer, of Portsea, then Deputy Judge Advocate of the Fleet, and was admitted an attorney in Trinity Term 1855, and is now the senior partner in the firm of Messrs. Harvey and Addison. He acted for some years as deputy to Mr. William Swainson, the late Admiralty Law Agent and Coroner of the Fort, and since that gentleman's decease, which took place in the early part of 1870, Mr. Harvey has discharged the full duties of the office.

ELSEWHERE we print a portion of the proceedings which took place at the recent annual meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom. The most important resolution, which we are pleased to notice was unanimously carried, was moved by a commercial man from Leeds; and, as will be seen from our report, was in reference to the onus of proof as to ability to pay by a debtor, which by the Debtor's Act 1869, sect. 5, sub-sect. 2, is thrown upon the creditor. Every solicitor who has ever issued a summons under the above provision knows how serious is the injury inflicted upon creditors in consequence of this statutory provision. We quite agree that it is, in the terms of the resolution, "unjust and unreasonable." A defendant ought, we certainly think, to be liable to be committed for contempt when failing to attend and answer a judgment summons; instead of which the practice at present is to direct a second summons to issue calling upon the defendant to attend personally before the Judge, and if he then so attends any excuse usually relieves him from payment.

A PRACTICE has long obtained by which the clerks of the London agents of sheriffs leave the successful party in interpleader summonses to draw up the order. On taxation the drawing up of such orders is invariably disallowed, and we, therefore, think it necessary to call attention to this point of practice, so that common law clerks may make a point of seeing that the sheriff draws up the order himself in all such cases, and which it is perfectly clear he is, strictly speaking, bound to do.

A SOLICITOR who contemplated offering himself as a candidate for the office of Chief Clerk to the Lord Mayor of the City of London, writes to us as follows in reference to the duties and emoluments: "I certainly never saw such conditions. A professional man is required to perform the most arduous and responsible duties in the greatest and richest city in the world, and is required to perform them and give up every other kind of business for £800 to £1000 a year. It seems most illiberal treatment. They want a man who, on the one hand, must be competent to advise upon the most difficult matters in criminal law, and, on the other hand, is expected to appoint the laundress and superintend the day and night watchmen."

IN consequence of numerous communications from solicitors in town and country who are commissioners to administer oaths in Chancery in England upon the subject of their rights and powers in reference to swearing affidavits for use in the Court of Chancery (Ireland), we print below the several sections of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 44 (The Chancery (Ireland) Act 1867), which in any way affects the question:

Sect. 80. Nothing herein contained shall abridge or lessen the power of the Lord Chancellor, as it now exists, to appoint fit persons to administer oaths, and take affidavits in Chancery, or to regulate the fees to be taken by them, and where any Act of Parliament refers to the Masters Extraordinary in Chancery, or to their powers or duties, the reference shall be held to apply to and include the commissioners hereinbefore mentioned, or to their powers or duties, as the case may be: Provided that solicitors and attorneys of not less than five years' standing shall be preferred for such appointments if otherwise suited thereto.

English country solicitors are often country commissioners for taking affidavits in common law directly after admission.

Sect. 81. All answers, disclaimers, examinations, and affidavits in causes or matters depending in the High Court of Chancery in Ireland, and also acknowledgments required for the purpose of enrolling any deed in the said court, shall and may be sworn and taken in England or Scotland, or the Isle of Man, or the Channel Islands, or in any colony, island, plantation, or place under the dominion of Her Majesty in foreign parts, before any judge, court, notary public, or person lawfully authorised to administer oaths in such country, colony, island, plantation, or place, respectively, or before any of Her Majesty's consuls or vice-consuls in any foreign parts out of Her Majesty's dominions; and the judges and other officers of the said Court of Chancery shall take judicial notice of the seal or signature, as the case may be, of any such court, judge, notary public, person, consul, or vice-consul attached, appended or subscribed to any such answers, disclaimers, examinations, and affidavits, acknowledgments, or other documents to be used in the said court.

Sect. 82. All persons swearing before any person authorised by this Act to administer oaths and take affidavits shall be liable to all such penalties, punishments, and consequences for any wilful and corrupt false swearing contained therein as if the matter sworn had been sworn before any court or person now by law authorised to administer oaths and take declarations, affirmations, or attestations upon honour.

The reference to acknowledgments in sect. 81 does not seem to refer to acknowledgments of deeds by married women, as suggested by a correspondent in our last issue, but it seems clear that a commissioner to administer in common law in England can take affidavits for use in the Irish Court of Chancery.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

ARBITRATION—POWER OF JUDGE TO ENLARGE TIME FOR MAKING AWARD.—A superior court or a judge at chambers may enlarge the time for making an award beyond that fixed by the parties themselves in the agreement of reference: (Re Denton, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 52. Q.B.)

ADMINISTRATION — ADMINISTRATOR BANKRUPT AND OUT OF THE COUNTRY—REVOCATION OF GRANT REFUSED.—An administrator became bankrupt, and in his capacity as administrator proved for a debt owing by him to the deceased's estate, a dividend became payable to the deceased's estate, but in the meantime the administrator became bankrupt again, and left the country. The court refused to recall the letters of administration granted to him, and to make a fresh grant to his creditors' assignee: (In the goods of Hammond, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 76. Prob.)

SLANDER — WORDS NOT DEFAMATORY — SPECIAL DAMAGE.—An action for slander cannot be maintained for words which are not necessarily of a defamatory nature, even although special damage may have resulted to the person of whom they were spoken. Therefore a declaration alleging, with proper inducement and innuendoes, that the defendant falsely and maliciously said of the plaintiff, "He was the ringleader of the nine hours' system," and "He has ruined the town by bringing about the nine hours' system, and he has stopped several good jobs from being carried out by being the ringleader of the system at Llanelly," laying special damage, was held bad on demurrer: (Miller v. David, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58. C. P.)

TWO WILLS—RESIDUARY CLAUSE—REVOCATION—PROBATE.—A testatrix left two wills, by the first of which, after giving certain legacies, she bequeathed a life interest in the bulk of her property to her daughter, whom she nominated her residuary legatee. By the second will, which din not expressly revoke the first, she increased the legacies, but directed they should not be paid until the death of her daughter. The second will contained no residuary clause. The court granted probate of both papers, as together constituting the will of the deceased: (In the goods of E. Pechell, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 74. Prob.)

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Re SOUTH.

The rights of judgment creditors.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins, and it involved a question of some importance as to the rights of judgment creditors. On the 23rd Dec. 1872, in an action for seduction brought by Caleb Houghton against Thomas Denton South, the plaintiff recovered judgment for £500 damages and £62 costs. The damages were afterwards reduced to £300. At this time South was an infant, he having been born on the 16th Feb. 1853. Under the will of his grandfather he was entitled to an estate in fee simple in remainder in a house in Kent, expectant on the death of his grandmother, and subject also to the contingency of his dying before her. He was also, under the will of his father, entitled to an estate in fee simple in remainder in some land in Middlesex, expectant on the deaths of his grandmother and his mother. Houghton, in order to enforce his judgment, served out writs of elegit directed to the sheriffs of Kent and Middlesex respectively. In pursuance of the writ directed to him the sheriff of Middlesex caused an inquisition to be held on the 5th June, 1873, by which it was found that South was "seised in his demesne of the reversion in fee simple" of and in the above-mentioned land, "being of the clear yearly value of £124," and in his return to the writ the sheriff stated that he had caused the said land to be delivered to Houghton "by a reasonable price and extent, to hold to him and his assigns" until the balance remaining unsatisfied of the judgment debt and costs, together with interest thereon, should have been levied. A similar return was made by the sheriff of Kent, stating that the annual value of the property extended by him was £20. On the 3rd Nov. 1873, the judgment and the two writs of elegit having been duly registered, Houghton presented a petition to the Court of Chancery, under the Judgment Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112), praying for a sale of South's interest in the house in Kent and the land in Middlesex in order to pay what was due in respect of the judgment debt, costs, and interest. On the 22nd Jan. 1874, South paid to Houghton's solicitor £382 16s. 9d. in discharge of the judgment debt, costs, and interest, but notwithstanding this payment, the Vice-Chancellor on the 20th Feb. (South meanwhile having attained twenty-one) made an order that South should within a month pay to Houghton his costs of the petition, including his costs of the writs of elegit and inquisitions, and any charges properly payable by him to the sheriffs in relation thereto, Houghton undertaking, if the payments were made punctually, to accept his costs out of pocket in full discharge, but without prejudice to his right to enforce payment of his whole costs in default of punctual payment. From this order South appealed, and the question raised was whether it was competent to the court under the circumstances to direct an estate in remainder to be sold in order to pay the sheriffs' charges. This turned upon the question whether, by means of a writ of elegit, an estate in remainder could, within the meaning of sect. 4 of the Judgment Act of 1864, be "actually delivered in execution" to the creditor, or whether it was not necessary that there should have been an "equitable execution" by means of a suit in Chancery. There was the further question whether, as in this case, the sheriffs' return had been untrue in calling the estate of the debtor a "reversion" instead of a "remainder," and in stating that it had an annual value, whereas in fact it had none, any sale could be made of such interest as the debtor really had.

E. C. Willis and Clare for the appellant.

Everitt (with whom was Glasse, Q.C.) supported the Vice-Chancellor's order.

Lord Justice JAMES was of opinion that the Vice-Chancellor's order could not be sustained. The case was governed in substance by the recent decision of the full Court of Appeal in Hatton v. Haywood (22 Weekly Reporter, 356), that there must be a suit in equity before this debtor's interest could be taken in execution. But independently of that, the sheriff's duty was to seize lands of which the debtor was "seized or possessed." A man could not be said to be "seized or possessed" of a remainder. Whoever prepared the returns to the writs in this case must have been well aware of the difference between a remainder and a reversion. The petition asked for a sale of a remainder upon a return which stated that the debtor was seized of a reversion. It was much the same thing as if the return had stated that the debtor was seized of Blackacre, and the petition had asked for a sale of Whiteacre. The petition must be dismissed, and, inasmuch as it was presented only a few months before the debtor attained twenty-one, and the petitioner might as well have waited till then, it must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice MELLISH concurred.

VAUGHAN v. HALLIDAY.

Specific appropriation—Ex parte Waring.

THIS was a mercantile case, of some technical interest, relating to the equitable doctrine of specific appropriation. The doctrine was first mooted in a case in bankruptcy, Ex parte Waring, so long ago as 1815, before Lord Eldon. In that case the drawer of bills of exchange lodged certain short bills for the protection of the acceptee. On the bankruptcy of both drawer and acceptee, both estates being liable to the holders, a question arose between the assignees as to which was entitled to the short bills which had been appropriated to meet the joint liabilities. Lord Eldon then held that, in order to clear both estates from the liability, the property held in stake was to be applied directly in paying the bills, and that the billholders were therefore entitled by a kind of parasitical equity or right. Though cases similar to Ex parte Waring are continually arising in the Court of Chancery, the exact circumstances which were now brought before the court were novel. Messrs. Ryder carried on business as Brazilian merchants at Liverpool, Bahia, and Pernambuco under slightly different names. Mr. F. W. Ashton, merchant and cotton spinner, of Manchester and elsewhere, was for some years engaged in bill transactions with Messrs. Ryder's Brazilian firms. The Bahia firm was in the habit of drawing bills, to the limit of £2000 a month, on Mr. Ashton, and sending other bills drawn on England, for Mr. Ashton to sell and appropriate the amount realised to meet his liabilities on his own acceptances. In Aug. 1871, Messrs. Ryder's Bahia firm drew three bills, for £800, £700, and £500 respectively, on Mr. Ashton, which were sold in Bahia and ultimately came into the hands of the plaintiff, Mr. Charles Vaughan, of Manchester. Mr. Wiatt, Messrs. Ryder's Bahia manager, bought two bills, one for £900 the other for £1000, and sent them in a letter to Mr. Ashton, dated the 8th Sept. 1871, by which, after advising the drawing of the three bills, purchased by the plaintiff, he wrote,—"Remit. To cover the above exchange operations we enclose 90 days' sight bill," with a description of the two bills for £1900, which were drawn by the Bahia branch of the Brazilian Bank on their London branch. The bills drawn on Mr. Ashton were presented to him on the 2nd October 1871, but, owing to the then recent failure of Messrs. Ryder, his affairs were so embarrassed that he refused to accept them. Mr. Ashton was soon after adjudicated bankrupt, and Mr. H. W. Banner appointed trustee of his estate. Mr. C. W. Ryder, the surviving partner in all Messrs. Ryder's firms, filed a petition for liquidation of his estate by arrangement, and Mr. James Halliday was appointed his trustee. The plaintiff claimed to have the Brazilian Bank bills, which were in the hands of Mr. Halliday, applied to meet the bills he held, and instituted this suit to enforce his claim, making both Mr. Halliday and Mr. Banner parties. It was contended by both the defendants that, inasmuch as the bills held by the plaintiff had never been accepted, and Mr. Ashton's estate being, therefore, under no liabilities in respect of those bills, the rule in Ex parte Waring could not apply, and that, but for other circumstances, the securities ought simply to be handed back to the trustee of Messrs. Ryder, because the purpose for which Messrs. Ryder had intrusted the securities to their correspondent had failed as between themselves. Mr. Halliday contended that the estate be represented was entitled to a lien on the securities in respect of a general balance. Mr. Banner, on the other hand, claimed the benefit of the securities as having been assigned for a specific purpose only, which had failed. This question, however, was not directly before the court.

Kay, Q.C., and Giffard appeared for the plaintiff.

Bardswell for Mr. Banner.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, after stating the facts, said, as between receiver and remittee, the equities were the same as existed up to the bankruptcies. The securities were sent to cover the acceptances, and for nothing else. Neither Ashton nor any one else through him could honestly claim the securities for any other purpose. It had been argued that the principle in Ex parte Waring did not apply, inasmuch as there had been no acceptance. The cases were different to that extent, no doubt, but the principle did apply to this case, and if there had been any doubt on that point it would have been set at rest by the decision of Re Richardson (2 Law Jour. Bank. 23.) The securities had been assigned, coupled with a trust which, under the circumstances, enured for the benefit of the plaintiff; they were sent for a specific purpose, which the accident of bankruptcy prevented being carried out in the way intended. But the remittance had been earmarked to meet the particular bills, and must be so applied. He made a decree in favour of the plaintiff.

SHAND v. DU BUISSON.

Attachments in the Lord Mayor's Court.

THIS was a bill to enforce an attachment in the Lord Mayor's Court, which could not be carried to a successful issue in that court by reason of a previous collusive attachment. The plaintiffs, Messrs. Shand and Co., of Roodlane and Madras, were creditors to the amount of £752 of one Poolacoora Veerabudra Chetty, a native of Madras, who was, on the other hand, a creditor of Messrs. Henckell, du Buisson, and Co., for £1035. On the 2nd April 1868 Messrs. Shand issued an attachment out of the Lord Mayor's Court against Messrs. Henckell and Co., as garnishees, and against Poolacoora Veerabudra Chetty, as defendant, and attached the £1035 for their debt. The garnishees pleaded a previous attachment issued by Poolacoora Sarabiah Chetty, of Madras, son of Veerabudra Chetty, and on which an order had been made. The bill was filed to restrain Messrs. Henckell from paying over their debt to Sarabiah Chetty, on the ground that he had obtained his order in the Lord Mayor's Court fraudulently, and was not a bona fide creditor of his father. Veerbudra Chetty was adjudicated bankrupt and soon after died. A Mr. Benjamin Brooks, of Madras, was appointed his assignee in bankruptcy. Messrs. Henckell, by the consent of all parties, paid the money than owed into court, and were dismissed from being parties to the suit. Mr. Brooks, who was also made party, disclaimed.

Kay, Q. C. and W. F. Robinson appeared for the plaintiffs.

H. M. Jackson, Q.C. and Bardswell for Poolacoora Sarabiah Chetty, who was now the only defendant.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR held that the defendant had failed to establish a good debt, and directed an inquiry of what was due to the plaintiffs for principal, interest, and costs, which was to be paid them out of the fund in court.

LEASES OF THE LONDON CORPORATIONS.

THE following letter appears in the Daily News:

"Attention has been directed of late, on several occasions, to the conditions of tenancy, more especially as affecting the agricultural class, and the policy of effecting some arbitrary restrictions has been somewhat freely discussed. There is a growing feeling that property having its duties as well as its rights, the law should step in to abrogate, or at least modify, unreasonable and oppressive conditions, as being not only unfair to the tenant, but indirectly injurious to the community at large. The discussions have been limited to the tenancy of land, but there is a class of conditions affecting that of house property held under certain great bodies within the metropolis which certainly call for some interference. It may not be generally known that it is the practice of the law officers of the London Corporations to insert in their leases covenants binding the lessee, under pain of forfeiture, to employ such law officer or solicitor to prepare all instruments (except wills) affecting in any way his leasehold interest. The lessee, therefore, who wishes to assign or mortgage his lease, or even to underlet the property (for any of which purposes he must furthermore obtain a licence from the landlord), is required to employ, for the preparation of the necessary documents, a person who may be, and generally is, a perfect stranger to him, and who, in a large number of cases, has had no legal training. If the course prescribed by the covenant be strictly followed, the business has to wait the leisure or convenience of the lessor's law officer, who acts under no sense of responsibility, and who, in the case of a mortgage, must be fully instructed in all the special arrangements agreed upon between the parties. This absurdity, however, is almost invariably avoided by payment of a fine (generally fixed at £5) which the law officer accepts as compensation for not being required to do the work. The practice, no doubt, originated with the law officers, who saw an opportunity of turning this power to account for their personal benefit, and it is still adhered to in leases granted by the municipal corporation, although its law officers are paid by salary, and all fees received are paid to the City Chamber, and with many of the City companies it seems resorted to as a means of eking out the clerk's remuneration. It is the client's grievance, for he must either pay the fine, or (unless he foregoes the assistance and advice of the solicitor whom he has been consulting up to the point of the preparation of the document) pay two solicitors' bills. When, as is often the case, two solicitors are employed, questions arise as to who is to bear the charges of the lessees' solicitor, and the settlement of this question again entails further expense. The plea put forward for this objectionable practice is, that it secures to the lessors, through their officer, an opportunity of knowing upon what terms the leasehold interest is changing hands, and thus enabling them, when the lease falls out, to obtain the highest rent the property will carry. But this object can be equally secured by prescribing that every assignment or underlease for a given term shall within a fixed period from its execution be brought to the lessor's solicitor or law clerk to have the contents noted. The provision objected to is not to he found in the leases of houses on the Duke of Westminster's, the Duke of Portland's, the Duke of Bedford's, the Duke of Devonshire's, Lord Portman's, the Pollen, or the Sutton estates, or those held under Smith's Charity, nor, so far as I know, in leases of any of the great estates throughout the kingdom, except those belonging to or managed by city corporations, including the hospitals and livery companies. It so happens that an eminent city firm are solicitors to one of the noblemen above-mentioned, and also to a great city corporation. The leases of the estate belonging to the nobleman contain no such clause. It is invariably inserted in the leases of the corporation property under their management. It may be argued that these bodies have a right to impose what conditions they please in the letting of their own property; but such provisions are surely in excess of their powers in granting leases of the large trust properties committed to their care. The impropriety of introducing such provisions has been pointed out to the Charity Commissioners, who fully admitted their injurious tendency, but thought it was not quite within their province to interfere. It is by no means clear that the enforcement of these covenants might not be resisted as contrary to public policy, but until some one is found with sufficient spirit to try the question, the only alternative seems to be to endeavour to bring public opinion to bear upon this objectionable (not to say disreputable) practice.—I am, Sir, yours,

ELECTION LAW.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (IRELAND).

(From the Irish Law Times.)

Saturday, Feb. 28.

O'DONEL v. TIGHE AND ANOTHER.—SHIEL v. ENNIS AND ANOTHER.

31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 11, c. 16—37 General Rules 1868—Jurisdiction of judge on the rota, not being a judge of the Common Pleas.

Motion to have the case raised by a Parliamentary election petition stated as a special case refused, the motion being made to a judge on the rota as election judge who was not a judge of the Court of Common Pleas, instead of being made to the Court of Common Pleas, or to a judge of that court on the rota in chamber.

APPLICATIONS on behalf of the petitioners in the Mayo County and Athlone County Election Petitions respectively, to have special cases stated pursuant to the provisions of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 11, c. 16, which provides: "Where, upon the application of any party to a petition made in the prescribed manner to the court, it appears to the court that the case raised by the petition can be conveniently stated as a special case, the court may direct the same to be stated accordingly, and any such special case shall, as far as may be, be heard before the court, and the decision of the court shall be final, and the court shall certify to the Speaker its determination in reference to such special case." The same point arising in both applications, they were, at the request of the court, argued together by the respective counsel.

Armstrong, Serjt., for petitioners in the Mayo case, and (with him David Fitzgerald) for petitioners in the Athlone case.—By 44th General Order, it is provided that "all interlocutory questions and matters, except as to the sufficiency of the security, shall be heard and disposed of before a judge, who shall have the same control over the proceedings under the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, as a judge at chambers in the ordinary proceedings of the Superior Courts, and such questions and matters shall be heard and disposed of by one of the judges upon the rota, if praticable, and if not, then by any judge at chambers." By 37th General Order, it is provided that "the application to state a special case may be made by rule in the Court of Common Pleas when sitting, or by a summons before a judge at chambers, upon hearing the parties." Reading the 37th and 44th General Orders together, the intention appears to have been to meet the very exigency that has arisen. The 37th General Order may be said to refer to such a judge as is pointed out by the 44th Rule, that is to say, a judge of the rota. [DOWSE, B.—The rule is constructed in a rather slipshod manner; and there is no precedent to go by, as there has been only one similar application made since the passing of the Act, and that was made before Keogh, J., who was also a judge of the Common Pleas.] He acted in his capacity as one of the judges on the rota. The order does not say that the application shall be made to "the Common Pleas, or to any judge thereof." The words are "a judge," which must mean any judge; the other construction would be a narrow one. If all the judges of the Court of Common Pleas were out of town, great delay and inconvenience would arise, unless it were held that a judge of another court on the rota could entertain the application.

Purcell, Q.C. (with him Costello), for respondents in the Athlone case.—This application can only be made to the full Court of Common Pleas, or to a member of that court. The Act confers this power upon the "Court." By sect. 2 that word is defined to mean the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster or Dublin respectively. It is, therefore, plain that, unless there is some alteration caused by the rules which the judges are authorised to make by sect. 25, there is no jurisdiction, except in the Court of Common Pleas. Rule 37 only says such application shall be made to the Court of Common Pleas when sitting, or to a judge in chambers; and such a judge in chambers must manifestly mean a judge of the same court.

Sheridan, for respondents in the Mayo case.

DOWSE, B.—The way the matter stands is this: This application is made to me under sub-sect. 16 of the 11th section of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868. The 11th section of that Act deals with the trial of election petitions, and the 16th clause provides that if, upon the application of any party, it appears to the court that the case raised can be conveniently stated as a special case, the court may direct it to be stated, and any such special case may be heard by the court, and the decision of the court shall be final, and the court is to certify its determination to the Speaker of the House of Commons. The judges upon the rota are to hear and try the petition; but the present motion is to take the case out of the order of hearing before a judge in the country, and to make it, as it were, a question for demurrer, as contradistinguished from a case at Nisi Prius, and there is every reason why that application should be in strictness heard and decided by a judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and even by the full court. I have no jurisdiction except that conferred by the statute. The court that directs the case to be stated is the court that finally decides the case; and on referring to the interpretation clause of the Act, the word "court" is defined to mean the Court of Common Pleas at Dublin. Under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act this word "court" generally means the full court, though there are cases where it has been held to be applicable to a judge. The Parliamentary Elections Act 1868 gives the judges full power to make general orders, which are to have a statutory force. These rules so made are copied totidem verbis from the English rules, the judges wisely doing so for the sake of uniformity. Rule 37 prescribes that the application is be made to the Court of Common Pleas when sitting, which I take to mean the full court; but, considering that election petitions arise suddenly, and that the Court of Common Pleas only sits in banco for about twelve weeks in the year, the rule then provides that, if not before the court—that is, supposing the full court not to be available—the application may be made before a judge in chamber. But it seems to me that the words "a judge" there mean a judge of the Court of Common Pleas in chamber; and I think that the three learned judges who drew up the rule so intended. I am strengthened in that opinion because the 44th General Order, in providing for interlocutory motions, prescribes that they may be dealt with before a judge of the rota "if practicable, and if not, before any judge at chamber." There the word "any" is used. Another difficulty I feel is, that supposing I were to entertain the application, has the party against whom I would in such case decide the opportunity of controlling my decision? There is no appeal given. So that if, on the present application, I were to make an order to state a case, and if, when it came before the court, it were contended that I had no jurisdiction to make the order, and if the court were to allow that objection, what would be the result? I am not ambitious to undertake duties not imposed upon me by the terms of the statute, whilst at the same time I am willing to do whatever is imposed on me. There being no appeal if I were to grant the order, and entertaining as I do, not indeed a positive opinion, but a grave doubt as to my jurisdiction, I shall make no rule on these applications, saying nothing as to costs.

No rule.

Attorney for petitioners in both cases, Dillon.

Attorneys for respondents in Athlone case, Costello.

JUDGES AT THE MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

MR. SERJEANT COX writes to the Times: "Sir,—A Bill is about to be submitted to Parliament to regulate the salary of the Assistant-Judge. Permit me, through your influential columns, to prefer the claim of the Second Court to be provided for in the same enactment. Having for nearly five years discharged the duties of judge of that court, I am enabled to state the facts, which will, doubtless, be a surprise to your readers. In this Second Court there are tried yearly upwards of 600 prisoners. One-eighth of the crime of England and Wales sent to a jury is disposed of at these sessions, and the offences are not of the same petty character as are those usually dealt with at quarter sessions. Metropolitan crime has many peculiar features. It includes an extraordinary number of ingenious frauds, often involving difficult and complicated questions of law and fact. To deal satisfactorily with London crime demands much knowledge of localities, persons, the habits, the practices, and even the faces of its habitual criminals, such as can be acquired only by long experience. Skilled police magistrates dispose of all the more simple and trifling cases, and those alone are sent for trial which have in them something special. Hence it is that in the importance and difficulty of its business, as well as in the number of cases tried, this court is second only to the Central Criminal Court.

"The sessions are held fortnightly throughout the year, with three exceptions, when there is an interval of a fortnight. Usually they occupy one whole week, and often extend far into the next. I have no vacation. I have now sat for five years without a single holiday, and in that time have tried upwards of 4000 criminals. And for all this the payment is 5 guineas per day. In no year has the total exceeded £650, that is to say, just one-half the salary of a police magistrate, and not one-half that of a County Court judge. Of the other qualifications required for a judge in such a court it would not become me to speak.

"I venture to appeal to Parliament and to the public alike against the amount and the manner of payment. The judge of the second court of these sessions—the second criminal court in England—is the only judge in England paid by the day, and there is no other judge, nor even a recorder, who is not rewarded more liberally.

"I have no personal motive for submitting this complaint. I have undertaken the office because I like the employment, and I would willingly discharge its duties were it only a post of honour. But I ask for a revision of the present manner and amount of remuneration for the honour of all judges, for the credit of this court, in the interest of my successors, and as due to the administration of justice.

"The suggestion I would respectfully offer is that the assistant-judge should receive the proposed salary of £1500 per annum; that the judge of the second court should be constituted such, eo nomine, and receive a salary not less than that of a police magistrate; that the judges should have co-ordinate jurisdiction, so that either may at any time act for the other in illness or unavoidable absence without the present inconvenient process of application to the Home Office. In fact, that they should be in the relationship of chief and puisne judges. In such case I would suggest, further, that the second judge, as is now the assistant-judge, should be appointed by the Crown, and so the present obstacle to promotion be removed, which practically excludes the very persons who have the best title to it—that of knowledge acquired by experience and the claim of long and faithful service."

OXFORD CIRCUIT—STAFFORD.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE.)

Stealing as a bailee.

MARGARET HANDSBURY was indicted for stealing, as a bailee, the sum of £14, the moneys of Patrick O'Hara.

Underhill prosecuted.

Young defended the prisoner.

The facts of the case were these: The prisoner was an old woman verging on eighty years of age, who lived at Wednesbury, and the prosecutor was a young Irish labourer who lodged in her house. In the early part of the year the prosecutor had saved a sum of £12 in gold, which he was in the habit of carrying about with him, having nowhere to put it. The prisoner represented to him that this was an unsafe proceeding on his part, and suggested that she should keep his money for him. This offer the prosecutor accepted and gave her the £12, which she put into a box, on the terms, as he said, that she should keep it safe for him and give it him when he wanted it. Subsequently, on different occasions, he gave the prisoner two more sovereigns to take charge of. On the 3rd March prosecutor's cousin, John O'Hara, came to borrow a sovereign, whereupon the prosecutor asked the prisoner to fetch him one of his sovereigns to lend to his cousin. The prisoner then said that she had put the money into the Post Office Savings Bank for him, and would show him the book on the following day. However, several days elapsed and the prisoner did not produce the book, and eventually these proceedings were taken. Upon the opening of the case by the learned counsel for the prosecution,

Young raised the objection that there was no bailment within the meaning of the statute; that the prisoner's position with respect to the prosecutor was similar to that of a banker towards his customers, as the prisoner had no duty to do anything with the money but keep it—that is, be a banker herself; and that it was not the same as if she had it for some specific purpose. Mr. Young cited the case of Reg. v. Arden (12 Cox Crim. Cas. 512), in which the prisoner had been intrusted with money to pay for coal, but instead of doing so, had appropriated it to his own use, and on these facts was held rightly convicted of larceny as a bailee; also Reg v. Henderson (11 Cox Crim. Cas.), where the prisoner was intrusted with two brooches, on the terms that if he did not sell them within a certain time he was to return them to the bailor. He did not sell them within the stipulated time, but after that had expired pawned them, and was held rightly convicted of larceny—in order to show that to constitute a bailment the goods must be delivered to the bailee for a specific purpose. Mr. Young also referred to Reg. v. Hassall (Cox Crim. Cas), to show that a person under an obligation to return a sum of money, but not the specific coins, is not indictable as a bailee under the statute.

His LORDSHIP said this was surely the ordinary naked bailment defined by Lord Holt in Coggs v. Bernard (2 Lord Raymond, 909) as the delivery of an article to the bailee to keep and return it. The point as to the delivery of specific coins did not arise in the present case, as, according to the evidence of the prosecutor, he asked prisoner to give him one of his own sovereigns to lend to his cousin.

The jury convicted the prisoner, and the judge sentenced her to six months' imprisonment, with hard labour.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

SHARES—TRANSFER—LIABILITY TO FUTURE CALLS—RIGHT OF TRANSFEREE TO INDEMNITY.—Plaintiff, the holder of a number of shares (not fully paid up) in a joint stock company, sold twenty of them to the defendant in Dec. 1865, the transfer to the defendant being duly executed and registered; and in March 1866, the defendant transferred these shares to one M., in whose name they were at the same time registered. In April 1866 the company stopped payment, and in May 1866 an order for compulsorily winding it up was made. In July 1866 an A. list of contributories (i.e., of actually existing members) was made out on which M was placed in respect of the twenty shares; and in Oct. of the same year M. executed a deed of inspectorship under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and the liquidator proved under the deed for the amount of the calls, but nothing was paid. The A. list of contributories being unable to satisfy the contributions required, a B. list of contributories was made out, consisting of persons who had not ceased to be members for a period of one year or upwards prior to the commencement of the winding-up, and both plaintiff and defendant were placed on this list. In Dec. 1867 defendant executed a deed of inspectorship under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. In March 1869 a call was made on the defendant of £40 per share, and the liquidator proved against his estate, but nothing was paid. By a compromise with the liquidator, which was sanctioned by the court, the plaintiff paid the official liquidator £15 per share, and now brought an action against the defendant to recover the amount so paid. Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench), that the defendant was bound to indemnify the plaintiff against all calls in respect of the twenty shares made after the transfer of them by the plaintiff to the defendant, and that the inspectorship deed executed by the defendant was no defence to the action, as the plaintiff could not have proved under it: (Kellock v. Enthoven, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 68. Ex. Ch.)

RAILWAY COMPANIES.

A SPECIAL general meeting of the Railway Shareholders' Association, for obtaining the repeal of the railway passenger duty, was held on Tuesday last at the Cannon-street Hotel; Sir A. Brady in the chair.

Mr. H. S. Ellis, the hon. secretary, having read the notice convening the meeting,

The Chairman stated the object of the meeting, which was to consider a memorial to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the repeal of the passenger duty. He hoped that every railway shareholder in the room would sign the memorial which lay on the table for signature. The tax was much more injurious to the travelling public than many persons supposed.

Mr. Parkes read the report of the association, claiming the cordial support of all classes of railway shareholders in its endeavours to obtain the repeal of the railway passenger duty. It stated that the experiment of conveying passengers on railways at a speed exceeding that of stage coaches, initiated by the Liverpool and Manchester, and Stockton and Darlington Railways, having succeeded, the railway system began to develope in 1832 by the promotion of the London and Birmingham Railway, and Parliament, apprehensive of the loss of revenue from the transfer of passenger traffic from stage coaches to railways, imposed in that year on railway companies a duty of ¼d. per mile for every four passengers. In 1842 the duty was altered to 5 per cent. upon the receipts from passengers of all classes. In 1844 exemption (under certain conditions) was granted from the duty in respect of passenger traffic when the fare did not exceed 1d. per mile. The duty on stage carriages was finally abolished on the 31st Dec. 1869. The Inland Revenue Department contended that the exemption from duty in respect of fares not exceeding 1d. per mile could only be allowed under certain conditions, the principal of which was that the train should stop at every station. The duty was disadvantageous to the public. Railways and, in fact, almost all public works in this country for the accommodation of trade had been made by private enterprise. If the railways had been left to the Government to construct, very few indeed would have been in existence at the present time, and the progress of the country would have been greatly retarded. Means of rapid locomotion for transaction of business, for residential purposes, and for health were a necessity in the present condition of the nation, and whatever tended to limit the facilities and power of a railway company to supply those means of locomotion was detrimental to the public. A portion of the public would receive an immediate benefit from the removal of the duty. The duty was oppressive on railway shareholders. Although the metropolitan lines were the most aggrieved, the inequality of the tax pressed on all the lines having suburban services. It was idle to call railways monopolies, the companies having paid most liberally for the property they had taken, and generally had by their works caused a large increase in the value of the estates through which their lines passed. The public and companies suffered alike in some respects from the duty. When the third class fare exceeded 1d. per mile the great bulk of that class of traffic was still carried by the parliamentary trains. Those trains at some seasons were crowded to excess, to the great inconvenience of the traveller and of the company, causing confusion, risk of accidents, and unpunctuality. The contention of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue before referred to obstructed any arrangements for a substantial remedy of this inconvenience. The duty pressed most heavily on the southern lines, upon which the passenger traffic greatly exceeded the goods traffic. The association trusted that every shareholder would communicate with his representative in Parliament, and urge upon them the consideration of this important question, and solicit their support of the total and unconditional repeal of the duty. He hoped that every shareholder would sign the memorial. A copy of it would be sent to every shareholder in Great Britain for signature, to be returned by post to the association. He then moved a formal resolution to the effect that the meeting approved the memorial, and that it be presented to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Morgan seconded the resolution, remarking that no property in the country was so badly represented in Parliament as railway property, although apparently there were so many members to represent it. (Hear, hear.)

A discussion ensued, in which Mr. Hale, Mr. Castleman, the Rev. Mr. Hodgson, Mr. Wright, and other shareholders, took part. The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. Adams then moved a resolution to the effect "that copies of the memorial to the Chancellor of the Exchequer be sent to every director and shareholder for signature, to be returned at once to the association, requesting each shareholder to ask the members representing him in Parliament to vote for the repeal of the passenger duty."

Mr. Ball seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously.

Mr. Castleman proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman for presiding, and to the hon. secretary for his able services. The resolution was carried unanimously, and the proceedings then terminated.

MERCANTILE LAW.

ASSOCIATED CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

THE annual meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom commenced on Tuesday last and continued on the two following days, at the Westminster Palace Hotel, Mr. Sampson S. Lloyd, M.P., in the chair. There was a large attendance of delegates from various parts of the country.

The London agent (Mr. Hole) read the report, which dwelt on the following questions: Bankruptcy, Law Amendment, Tribunals of Commerce Bill, Registration of Trade Marks Bill, Registration of Firms Bill, Railway and Canal Act, Bank Charter Act, Income Tax, Trade with Spain and Portugal, Adhesive Stamps on Bills of Exchange, Bills of Lading, Charges by Receivers of Wrecks, Merchant Shipping, Supply of Sails for the Mercantile Marine, Suez Canal Dues, Minister of Commerce, French Chamber of Commerce, Imperial and Local Taxation, &c. The report added that the Parliamentary session of 1873, like its predecessors, had not been fruitful of measures affecting commerce. Though the production and export of one or two important branches of manufacture exhibited a diminution, the council believed that the year had, on the whole, been one of extensive productions, though, from the great want of prices, not one of great profit to the mercantile and manufacturing community generally. The total number of chambers now in union with the association was forty-nine.

The chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and statement of accounts, expressed his own and the council's satisfaction that the association had met again in undiminished numbers. The principle advocated by the association received substantial support from chambers of commerce, and was thoroughly self-supporting from a financial point of view. If the association could not point to any large measure of reform during the past year, there were one or two subjects which afforded matter for congratulation. Whether the new French treaty would be as satisfactory as that which M. Thiers contemplated had to be determined, but it was satisfactory to hear that the rates of Mr. Cobden's treaty of 1860 remained unaltered. He understood, also, that the new treaty would be one of navigation as well as commerce. Our Government had concluded a supplementary convention which gave some further protection to trade marks, and it was satisfactory to hear that the international commission on the Suez Canal had recommended that the levying of dues on the gross tonnage should be abandoned. The appointment of the railway commission also would be beneficial. With respect to a Tribunals of Commerce Bill, he regretted that private members of Parliament had not been able to deal with the subject satisfactorily, owing to the rule which prevented the Bills of such members coming on after half-past twelve o'clock. The chairman concluded by an expression of regret at the lamented death of Mr. Lupton, of Leeds, one of the honoured founders of the association.

The motion for the adoption of the report having been seconded by Mr. Behrens, of Bradford, was carried unanimously.

THE DEBTORS' ACT.

Mr. Staples, of Leeds, moved "That the Debtors' Act 1869, sect. 5, sub-sect. 2, throwing the burden of proof of a debtor's ability to pay on the plaintiff is, in its operation, unjust and unreasonable; and it is the opinion of this association that the onus of proof of inability to pay should be upon the defendant, whose non-appearance when summoned should be contempt of court." The present law placed the plaintiff at a great disadvantage, as, in many cases, it was impossible for him to prove the debtor's ability to pay.

Mr. Hurst, of Leeds, seconded the motion, which, on a division, was carried by 39 to 1.

BANK CHARTER ACT.

Mr. Barker, of Sheffield, moved a resolution to the effect that the association was of opinion that the subject of the Bank Charter Act 1844, was worthy of the consideration of a select committee of the House of Commons, or of a Royal commission; and that a memorial be presented to her Majesty's ministers embodying the resolution as an expression of the opinion of the association.

In the discussion which followed, Mr. Mundella suggested that the association should draw the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the necessity of inquiring into the Bank Charter Act, but not propound any theory of their own. The resolution was carried.

Many other important questions were also considered.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

DEBTOR'S SUMMONS—NON-PAYMENT UNDER—PETITION DISMISSED BY CONSENT—FRAUD—SECOND PETITION—THE BANKRUPTCY RULES, R 39.—Prior to the hearing of a bankruptcy petition an arrangement was entered into between the petitioning creditor and the debtor, by which the petition was dismissed as for want of prosecution in consideration of the debtor having promised to give security for the debt. The debtor having failed to give the agreed security, the creditor, by leave of the court, presented a second petition based upon the same act of bankruptcy. It being objected on behalf of the debtor that the act of bankruptcy had been purged by the dismissal of the first petition: Held, that the petitioning creditor was, under the circumstances, entitled to present the second petition: (Ex parte Love, re Jagger, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71. Bank.)

LIQUIDATION—BANK OF DEPOSIT—VERBAL ASSENT TO.—The provisions of ss. 20, 30, of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and the 109th rule, with respect to the duty of a trustee under a bankruptcy to audit his accounts, and pay all moneys into the Bank of England unless otherwise directed by the creditors, or the committee of inspection, apply also to liquidations by arrangement. Under a liquidation, however, it is not in every instance necessary, under sect. 125, cl. 8, by formal resolution to prescribe the bank into which the moneys are to be paid if the evidence clearly shows that the creditors have assented to and adopted the course proposed by the trustee: (Ex parte Old, re Bright, 30 L. COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Monday, March 9.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Ex parte FURNESS AND OTHERS; Re J. A. SIMPSON, SONS, AND CO.

Bankruptcy—Partnership—Surviving partners—Partnership assets.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the Judge of the Manchester County Court upon a special case stated for his opinion in the above liquidation. The case was reported in the LAW TIMES of 14th inst.

Marten, Q.C. and Ambrose appeared for the appellants, the creditors of the two partners.

De Gex, Q.C. and Ford North for the respondents, the creditors of four partners.

Fardell for the trustee.

Marten opened the proceedings by stating the facts; whereupon

His HONOUR called upon

De Gex and Ford North, who contended that the decision of the learned judge of the Manchester County Court was correct, upon the ground that there was neither an assignment nor agreement to assign the property to the surviving partners on the death of either of the other two, and in support of the contention cited numerous cases.

His HONOUR, without hearing a reply, held that the creditors of the four partners were at liberty to sue the representatives of the deceased partners and the continuing partners, but had no right to apply any particular assets in discharge of their debts. The representatives of the deceased partners had no claim to the partnership assets until the joint debts were all paid. At the time of the bankruptcy the continuing partners who were liable for all the debts, were in possession of the partnership property, and the only way of administering the estate was to treat all the creditors as if they had all proved their claims under the bankruptcy. There was no foundation for the question raised by the special case, and the order was therefore varied by answering the special case in the negative. The costs of all parties to come out of the estate.

Re BARRETT.

Injunction—Discretion of court—Fraud of debtor—Composition.

THIS was an application on behalf of Mr. J. J. Barrett, surgeon, of Balham, for an injunction to restrain proceedings in an action brought by Mr. Albert Fleming, solicitor, for the recovery of a sum of £54.

Washington supported the application.

Plumtree opposed it.

It would appear that in July last the debtor presented a petition to this court under the arrangement clauses, and at the first meeting of creditors a resolution was passed, and afterwards duly confirmed, to accept a composition of 3s. 6d. in the pound. At that time Mr. Fleming was a creditor for £66 in respect of law costs; he proved his debt, opposed the registration of the resolution, but ultimately received his dividend. In opposition to the application, it was contended that, the debt having been contracted by fraud, the creditor was not bound by the resolution. With reference to the charge of fraud, the evidence showed that Mr. Fleming had been employed by the debtor as his solicitor in reference to the sale of some property of which he professed to be the owner. A purchaser having been found, the debtor admitted that the property did not belong to him at all, but explained that he had acted in the matter under the authority of his father, who was the real owner. Mr. Fleming thereupon declined to act for the debtor any further, and, having received the dividend upon the amount of his debt, sued him for the balance. The allegation of fraud was denied on the part of the debtor.

Plumtree, in the course of his argument, pointed out that, by the 15th section of the Debtors' Act, a debtor making a composition with his creditors remained liable for the unpaid balance of any debt incurred by fraud, "provided the defrauded creditor had not assented to the arrangement or composition otherwise than by proving his debt and accepting dividends."

His HONOUR, in giving judgment, said the statute gave the court power to restrain any action which might be brought against a debtor, but the jurisdiction must be exercised with discretion. Having regard to the decided cases, he thought the creditor had a right to try the question as to the alleged fraud in a court of common law. The application would therefore be refused.

HALIFAX COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Tuesday, March 10.

(Before Mr. Registrar RANKIN (sitting for the Judge.)

Ex parte HARPER AND ANOTHER v. OGDEN AND MAUDE.

Hearing petition for adjudication—Act of bankruptcy on debtor's summons—Notice to dispute act of bankruptcy only—Proof required of petitioning creditor's debt—Time for issuing debtor's summons.

England for petitioning creditors.

Horace Smith for debtor Ogden.

Godfrey Rhodes, for debtor Maude, not heard, not having given notice to dispute.

The facts of the case were shortly these: The petitioning creditors are maltsters, and the debtors brewers, at Halifax, and the creditors had supplied the debtors with malt and hops in the course of trade. In the heading of the creditors' invoices it was stated that a month's credit was allowed. The debt was £99 11s. 6d., for goods sold, &c. Goods for about £74 of this had been supplied previously to and on the 16th Jan. last, the rest afterwards. On the 17th Feb. demand was made of the whole of the debt. It appeared by affidavit filed that both of the debtors thereupon refused to pay the debt. The same day (17th Feb.) a debtor's summons was issued and duly served, and no notice having been given for more than seven days of any application to dismiss the summons, a petition for adjudication —alleging the default in paying or securing the debt due on the summons as the act of bankruptcy—was filed, and duly served, and a day fixed for the hearing. The debtor Maude gave no notice of disputing the adjudication. The debtor Ogden gave notice of disputing the act of bankruptcy only.

On the hearing this day H. Smith proposed to show that there was no debt due sufficient to support the petition, whereupon England objected to the court entering upon that inquiry, no notice having been given of disputing the petitioning creditor's debt, and he quoted cases in support of his argument, but it did not appear whether in those cases the act of bankruptcy was founded on a debtor's summons.

The REGISTRAR.—I should be governed by those cases if the act of bankruptcy in the present instance were one of those specified in sub-sections 1, 2, 3, 4 or 5, of the 6th section of the Act. Those acts of bankruptcy are each single in substance, and quite distinct from, and independent of a petitioning creditor's debt, and therefore if adjudication in such cases be opposed, notice should be given to dispute the debt (if so intended) as well as the act of bankruptcy. But here the act of bankruptcy under sub-section 6 is composed of many items, each of which must be proved to make up altogether the act of bankruptcy. You must prove that a sufficient debt was due, that demand was made for payment, that in default of payment a summons was issued and duly served, and that the seven days had elapsed without payment of, or security for, the same. Therefore, notice of disputing this particular act of bankruptcy comprises in itself notice of disputing all the items of which that act is composed; of which the fact of a debt being due is certainly an important one. I must therefore overrule Mr. England's objection, and I will take evidence as to the debt.

The account for goods sold, &c., having been proved,

H. Smith proposed to reduce the amount which could be legally inserted in the summons, by striking off the items dated on and after the 16th January, as not being due under the heading of the invoice allowing a month's credit; and he argued that the demand having been made on the 17th Feb., and the summons issued the same day, the latter was premature and invalid, as the debtors were entitled to a reasonable period after demand, within which to settle.

The REGISTRAR.—A sufficient amount of debt was due on the 16th Feb., after allowing the month's credit. It may seem a quick movement to demand payment the next day, and issue a summons immediately afterwards; but then the parties never applied, as they might have done, to dismiss the summons, but let the seven days allowed expire. A reasonable time, no doubt, ought to be allowed as a general rule, but in this particular case I think it might be dispensed with, as the debtors, it appears, expressly refused to pay; and after that could not expect further time. Moreover, I am of opinion that the items of account of date previous to the 16th Jan. would by themselves make up an amount sufficient to support the petition. I consider the debtor's summons a valid one, and a sufficient debt proved, as well as the other requisites on which to adjudicate.

Order of adjudication granted.

LINCOLN COUNTY COURT.

Tuesday, March 10.

(Before JAMES STEPHEN, Esq., LL.D., Judge.)

Re WILLIAM PEARSON (a bankrupt).

Bankrupt's property—Prosecution for fraud—Costs.

A MOTION was made to the court in this matter on behalf of the trustees of the bankrupt, Messrs. Jay, of Lincoln, and A. T. Lister, of Gainsborough, for an order declaring certain drapery stock seized by them as such trustees on the bankrupt's premises at Spittlegate, Grantham, on the 29th July last, to be their property as against certain other claimants. It appears that Pearson was made a bankrupt in Sept. 1871, he residing at that time at West Kennald Ferry, Owston, Lincolnshire, and carrying on the business of a draper there. The whole of his then estate, however, passed to one Peter Platt, a bill of sale holder. The trustee contested the latter, but without success. Shortly after this, on the matter coming before the court, from certain evidence then given, it appeared that the bankrupt had removed certain boxes of goods from his premises.

His Honour thereupon recommended that the bankrupt be prosecuted, but the trustees having no funds in hand, were unable at that time to do so. The matter then stood over, none of the creditors (except the one above referred to) having been paid. On the 29th July last, however, the trustees, from certain information then received, seized a large stock of drapery from the bankrupt's premises at Friendly House, Grantham, aforesaid. The bankruptcy being still in continuance, the bankrupt not having obtained his discharge, and he trading at the time in his own name. Since that time there had been a considerable amount of litigation going on in the matter, the bankrupt having filed a petition for liquidation of his affairs in the Nottingham County Court (which proceedings were afterwards transferred to the Manchester Court), under which certain trustees were appointed, they laying claim to the property in question. The property was also claimed by one Brown (an alleged partner), and a bill of sale holder (one Thos. Rees, solicitor), the latter claim being for £1000.

After the matter had been thoroughly discussed, his HONOUR held, that the property seized by the trustees belonged to them, and ordered, first, that the fund be applied in paying the creditors of the bankrupt in full; secondly, that the trustees be allowed their costs; and, thirdly, that the bankrupt be prosecuted out of the said fund, and that the balance be paid into the Manchester court to abide the decision on further claims.

R. Toynbee appeared for the trustees, Messrs. Jay and Lister.

Palmer (of counsel) for the alleged partner and bill of sale holder.

NOTTINGHAM BANKRUPTCY COURT.

Monday, March 16.

(Before Mr. REGISTRAR PATCHITT, sitting as Judge.)

Re F. WALPOLE; Ex parte YOUNG AND ROGERS.

Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 15—Reputed ownership.

UNDER an agreement for the hire of certain furniture at £2 per week, the furniture to become the property of the hirer on the payment of a certain number of instalments, on a petition for liquidation by hirer, and the furniture being then in his possession, it was held to be in his order and disposition, and passed to his trustees, notwithstanding the whole of the instalments had not been paid.

In the course of the arguments the following appear to be the facts of the case:

Frederick Walpole, prior to Dec. 1871, carried on business as a mattress manufacturer, at 2, Malin Hill, Nottingham, and then removed to London-road, where he carried on business as a bobbin and carriage mender, in which capacity he employed two apprentices besides his family.

On 1st March, 1871, Walpole hired or purchased some furniture of Messrs. T. Corby and Co., under an agreement, which was as follows: "The said Thomas Corby and Co. hereby agree to let, and the Frederick Walpole agrees to hire, the goods specified in the schedule hereto at £2 per week. In case any of the said weekly payments shall be in arrear, or the said Frederick Walpole shall call his creditors together, or shall become bankrupt, compound with his creditors, or cease to reside in his residence, then it shall be lawful for the said Thomas Corby and Co., their agent or agents, to enter the premises where the aforesaid goods may be and retake possession of the said goods. In case the said weekly payments shall be punctually made until payment in full, then the said Thomas Corby and Co. do hereby agree to assign the said goods and furniture over to the said Frederick Walpole."

It did not appear in the agreement what was the total sum to be paid by instalments, but Corby and Co. entered in their book the price of the goods as £116.

On the 12th July 1873, Messrs. Corby and Co. filed a petition for liquidation of their affairs, and Charles Rogers was appointed trustee of their property.

Walpole paid twelve of the instalments, and at the time of his filing a petition for liquidation he was in possession of the furniture, and there was owing £47 10s. in respect of arrears of the instalments.

On the 6th Feb. 1874, Walpole filed a petition for liquidation, and described himself as "formerly crrying on business as a mattrass manufacturer, but now as a bobbin and carriage mender," and at the meeting of creditors Messrs. Young and Rogers were appointed joint trustees, the trustee of Thomas Corby and Co. proving for the said sum of £47 10s. against the estate of Walpole, and voting at the meeting.

J. Bright (A. Parsons and Bright), of Nottingham, now applied on behalf of the trustees under Walpole's estate for an order that the furniture was in the debtor's possession order or disposition within the meaning of the 15th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and passed to the trustees for the benefit of and formed part of his estate.

F. Acton, of Nottingham, for the trustee under Corby's estate, showed cause.—The debtor is not a trader, and the 15th section has no operation. The agreement gives Corby and Co. a right to take possession on Walpole calling his creditors together, and the case is governed by Ex parte Emerson, re Hawkins (41 L. J., N. S. 20).

J. Bright, contra.—The debtor describes himself as formerly carrying on business as a mattress manufacturer, and there are now debts owing by him which were or had been incurred then. The case is distinguishable from Ex parte Emerson. In that it was a mere hiring, in this, in fact, it is a conditional sale. The hiring could not be terminated whilst the instalments were duly paid. If all the instalments but one had been paid, could Corby and Co. claim the furniture on Walpole then instituting proceedings in liquidation? I think not. The agreement should be registered under the Bills of Sale Act. The case is governed by Darby v. Smith (8 T. R. 82).

After Walpole, the debtor, had been examined as to his debts and business transactions during the last three years,

The REGISTRAR found, as a fact, that he was a trader within the meaning of the 15th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and held that the furniture was in the debtor's possession order or disposition, and passed to the trustee under Walpole's estate for the benefit of his creditors.

LEGAL NEWS.

THE TICHBORNE CASE AND THE RULES OF EVIDENCE.—Mr. Fitzjames Stephen, in a letter to the Pall Mall Gazette, says: "The relation of the Tichborne case, both to the legal rules of evidence and to its rational principles is a very curious matter, which I cannot discuss at present I will confine myself to saying that for some reason or other the ordinary rules appear by common consent to have been relaxed to a remarkable degree. If the counsel on the one side and the other had insisted upon the exclusion of all matters which are commonly excluded, the case would have been considerably shortened. I will give a single instance of what I mean. In the early part of the charge of the Lord Chief Justice (p. 8 of the unabridged report) there is inserted at full length a letter from Sir James Tichborne to Lady Tichborne's father describing his various domestic troubles. This is used by the Chief Justice as evidence to explain Lady Tichborne's character, and to show the sort of influences which were at work in the formation of Roger Tichborne's character. How this letter can have been what is technically called "evidence" I cannot imagine. It is a statement made by the father of the man whose identity is in question to his grandfather about the character of his mother, and it is used to explain the reasons why his education followed a particular course. "Hearsay" has been defined in all sorts of ways, but if this is not hearsay nothing is. As an illustration of the difference between a strict and lax interpretation of the rules of evidence, I may observe that a few days ago a commonplace action was tried for the wrongful dismissal of a servant, which was justified on the ground that he was habitually drunk. The evidence of people who had known him well, and seen him constantly during the whole term of his service (two or three months), and who were prepared to swear that they never knew him drunk on any occasion whatever was tendered by his counsel. The evidence was excluded, on the ground that it was irrelevant, and that the plaintiff was bound to show that he was not drunk on the particular occasions when it was suggested that he was drunk. I do not say that this was wrong, but I do say that if the parties had been held as close to the issue in the Tichborne case, Sir James Tichborne's letters about his wife, a vast deal of matter as to the sayings and doings of intermediate agents, the novels which were read by Roger Tichborne, and much other matter would have been shut out. It is, for instance, by no means easy to explain the grounds on which some of the evidence about Luie was let in. The general rule about contradicting witnesses I have always supposed to be that a witness may be contradicted as to any matter relevant to the inquiry to which he deposes, but that he cannot be contradicted on matters which affect his credit only, though he may be indicted for perjury if he swears falsely upon them. I do not pretend to say whether this principle might not be made to cover what was admitted against Luie; but in common cases it would have been found in practice nearly as difficult to get the evidence given against him admitted as to procure the evidence itself. Some other matters, and particularly the enormous length of the speeches of the defendant's counsel and the extreme minuteness of the summing up, seemed to render the case interminable. It would not become me to criticise the manner in which judges and counsel exercised their discretion. It is a matter on which no two persons would be of the same opinion. To many persons, for instance, it might appear that the best defence which could have been made for the defendant would have consisted of an expansion of the simple remarks that the burden of the proof lay on the prosecution, that it was impossible to justify the defendant's conduct or even to explain parts of it; but that so large a number of persons swore positively that he was Tichborne and was not Orton, that the jury ought to give him the benefit of the doubt. A great defender of prisoners once remarked to his junior, in a case of murder which they were defending, "This is a case in which we must begin by dismissing from our minds all logic, for if you once begin to put the facts together there is but one conclusion for them to point to." I was reminded of this by the Tichborne case, and thought it indicated the proper line of defence; but, of course, an outsider's impression on such a matter is worth very little. To others it might appear that the summing up need hardly have been so minute, considering the extraordinary knowledge of the case which the jury had acquired by their prolonged attention. But, after all, questions like these must be left to those who have to decide them, and who are responsible in many ways for the correctness of their decision."

MR. WHALLEY AND MR. HAWKINS.—The following has been published: "16, Suffolk-street, Pall-Mall, March 18, 1874. To the Treasurer of the Honourable Society of Gray's Inn. Sir,—As I see by the public press that the Benchers are moved to investigate Dr. Kenealy's conduct in the late trial at Bar of the Queen v. Tichborne, I think it right and respectful to the Bench, being myself a member of Gray's Inn, to intimate that it is my intention to prefer a charge against Mr. Hawkins, Q.C., to the Benchers of the Middle Temple, for the conduct of that gentleman in imputing to me the having been engaged in a conspiracy to promote the cause of the defendant, without any grounds for such accusation, and, as I have reason to believe, without any instructions, connecting with myself in such groundless and gratuitous imputations Lord Rivers, Mr. Onslow, and others, with the object and, as I believe, the result of making available his position as counsel for the prosecution for preventing a fair trial and defeating the ends of justice. I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant, G. H. WHALLEY.

THE JURY ON THE TICHBORNE TRIAL.—When the late trial of the claimant had concluded, the jurors addressed a letter to the Commissioners of the Treasury, reminding their Lordships that at an early stage of the case the jury applied to the court for a remuneration of two guineas per day. That application was, they understood, favourably received by the Lords Commissioners of the late Government. The case, however, had continued much longer than was expected, and they submit that such a sum "is by no means adequate to meet the losses incurred," inasmuch as the jury was composed—with one exception—of men engaged in commercial pursuits, "to whom the continual absence from their respective businesses has been most disastrous." In reply to this request Mr. W. Law was instructed to state that the subject in question had never been formally submitted to the Treasury until a few days before the conclusion of the trial, and their Lordships then instructed their solicitor to pay each juryman three hundred guineas. On receipt of this communication the foreman wrote, in the name of the jury, to express their disappointment, and to request the commissioners to reconsider their decision. To this letter their Lordships reply that they should not feel justified in sanctioning any larger payment than the sum which has already been authorised, and that, looking at the sacrifices persons similarly situated are often called upon to make in the interests of justice, they do not regard the remuneration allowed as an illiberal compensation for the time and labour bestowed.

AT a pension held on Wednesday evening the Benchers of Gray's-inn decided that it was incumbent upon them to institute an inquiry into Dr. Kenealy's conduct during, and with reference to the late Tichborne trial; and they have appointed a committee to report upon the charges which, in their opinion, Dr. Kenealy should be called upon to answer.

WE understand that Mr. Charles Ford has expressed his willingness to move the following resolution before the Union Society of London:—"That in the opinion of this House the present consolidated regulations of the four Inns of Court as affecting solcitors desiring to become members of the other branch of the Profession require modification, and that greater facilities should be afforded to barristers at law desirous of becoming solicitors." We shall be glad to hear that such a resolution is carried, and although, of course, it will not come with authority from the above society, still it may lead to the matter being considered by the Benchers of the Inns of Court and the council of the Incorporated Law Society.

EUROPEAN ASSURANCE ARBITRATION.—On Friday, the 27th inst., Lord Romilly will commence a sitting in this arbitration.

WE learn that Mr. W. J. Hollist, who for forty-five years has ably filled the office of magistrates' clerk for the Farnham division, has resigned his appointment. The magistrates, in recognition of Mr. Hollist's services, have paid him a graceful compliment by presenting him with a handsome and valuable silver salver, bearing an appropriate inscription. The appointment of magistrates' clerk has, we understand, been conferred upon Mr. R. Mason, Mr. Hollist's partner, a gentleman already fully conversant with the duties, and who will fulfil them with much ability.

DUTIES TO BE PERFORMED BY THE CHIEF CLERK IN THE JUSTICE ROOM AT THE MANSION HOUSE.—Among these, which are arranged under different headings, and which number in all nineteen, we understand that the following are to be found: 3. To hear in private all applications for process relating to criminal and other cases, and to see sufficient evidence is given by way of information and deposition or otherwise as required by law, before the issue of any summons or warrant. To advise on the admissibility, &c., of evidence. 9. To superintend, direct, and control (amongst others) keeper of the lock-up, front door keeper, gate porter, day and night watchmen. 15. To appoint the laundress to the justice room. It will be seen from the above that the duties, which are numerous and responsible, extend from having to advise as to the acceptance or rejection of evidence, or indeed from being soundly read in the law of evidence, to the appointment of laundress, and the care of night watchmen. Elsewhere we publish the opinion of one of the many would-be candidates for this vacant office. The salary is to be not less than £800 a year, but with no perquisites. Candidates must be members of the legal profession. He who is successful must give up all other business, and devote himself solely to the duties of the office. Unhappy lawyers!

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it.

LEASES OF THE LONDON CORPORATIONS.—Under this heading a letter appeared recently in the Daily News, signed by "A Solicitor of Thirty Years' Standing." I hope you will find space to direct attention to this scandal, namely, the insertion of a covenant by which lessees are forced to employ the professional men representing such corporations, in case of any subsequent dealing with the leasehold property. Surely the public have a right to employ their own solicitors in their own concerns. The matter complained of falls little short of a public evil, and only needs exposure in the public press, and to be written down by your powerful pen, to ensure a cessation of such a practice. It causes much inconvenience to our branch of the Profession.

A LONDON SOLICITOR.

THE LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.—In reading clause 3 of the Bill of The Legal Practitioners Act 1874, it strikes me that a person who should say to another: "I will prepare for you a legal document; I will not charge you anything for it, nor do I wish you to promise to pay me anything; but, without any expectation of being paid existing on my part, if you do afterwards make me a present I shall not be offended or complain,"—such a person, afterwards receiving a present, would hardly come within the definition subject to the penalty, and yet would be clearly within the mischief intended to be guarded against. It seems to me that the words which I have in red ink added to the section would meet this contemplated difficulty. J. B.

[We have added these words in the reprint of the Bill.—ED. SOLS. DEPT.]

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.—I have read with interest and fervent wishes for its success the draft of the Legal Practitioners' Act 1874, which you have been good enough to publish in your columns. But let us not err by making the law too stringent. No one acquainted with the history of English legislation will deny that it is not the severest law which generally succeeds best. I would suggest, then, that in addition to the proviso at the end of sect. 3 there should be words (as in sect. 60 of Stamp Act 1870) exempting wills, agreements under hand, and transfers of stock, containing no trust or limitation, from the operation of that section. The same object could be effected by altering the definition of "instrument" in sect. 2. Such an alteration would render the Bill more likely to pass, and more effectual when in operation. GEORGE WHALE.

NOTES AND QUERIES ON POINTS OF PRACTICE.

NOTICE.—We must remind our correspondents that this column is not open to questions involving points of law such as a solicitor should be consulted upon. Queries will be excluded which go beyond our limits.

N.B.—None are inserted unless the name and address of the writers are sent, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for bona fides.

87. ASSIGNMENT OF TERM.—Would some one explain how it is that a legal term cannot be assigned so as to give successive interests to successive takers: (Smith's Eq. 10th edit. p. 133). ALCIPHRON.

88. LIQUIDATING DEBTOR—CONVEYANCE.—I find it is the practice to make a debtor, whose estate is in liquidation, a party with the trustee or trustees to any deed of conveyance of real estate sold by the trustee in process of realising the assets. Is it really necessary to do so, and if a debtor refuses to join, can he be compelled, and how? M. J.

Answers.

(Q. 64.) TEN YEARS' CLERK.—If "X.," whose letter appeared in the LAW TIMES of 21st Feb., will communicate with me, I shall be happy to supply him with the information he requires. FRANCIS R. CROWTHER.
9, Victoria-place, Scarborough.

(Q. 73.)—ARTICLED CLERK.—BOOKS, &c.—This sort of inquiry is rather too frequent. It is absurd for an articled law student to expect his master to supply him with a library. He is sure to have access to the more expensive works of reference usually found in a solicitor's office, but he ought to buy his own text books. The money is not wasted, for he will, if wise, make them part of his mind, note them up, and always keep them with him, even after obtaining his certificate. It is highly questionable whether a person who cannot afford a few pounds for books is a fit subject for articles. IBB.

(Q. 82.) NEGLIGENCE.—If, as is stated, the glass plate was insecurely put in, that would amount to contributory negligence on the part of the owner of the wardrobe, and it is laid down by Byles, J. in Witherley v. Regent's Canal Company (12 C. B. 8), that if the negligence or default of the plaintiff was in any degree the proximate cause of the damage he cannot recover, however great may have been the negligence of the defendant, and it was further decided in the same case that no action will lie for the consequences of a negligent act where the party complaining has, by his own want of due care and caution, been in any degree contributory to the misfortune. LAW SOCIETIES.

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.

THE following is the draft of a Bill prepared by the Parliamentary committee of the above society, and which Bill it is proposed should be introduced into the House of Commons on as early a day as the forms of the House will admit. We published this last week, and are asked again to do so in consequence of certain alterations made in the draft at the suggestion of counsel and country members of this society:—

Whereas it is expedient to discourage the employment of unskilled and unqualified persons in the preparation of legal documents, and to amend the laws relating to bills of sale.

Be it enacted, &c., &c.

1. This Act may for all purposes be cited as "The Legal Practitioners' Act 1874."

2. In the construction and for the purposes of this Act the following words shall have the meanings by the section assigned to them, unless it is otherwise provided, or there be something in the context repugnant thereto.

(1.) "Qualified practitioner" means and includes any serjeant-at-law, barrister, duly certificated attorney or solicitor, proctor, notary public, certificated conveyancer, special pleader, and equity draftsman.

(2.) "Instrument" means and includes every written document.

(3.) "Write," "written," and "writing," includes every mode in which words or figures can be expressed upon material.

(4.) "Person" includes company, corporation, and society.

3. Any person who, not being a qualified practitioner, either directly or indirectly, for or in expectation of any fee, gain, or reward, writes, draws, or prepares any instrument relating to real or personal estate, or to any proceedings in law or equity, or any instrument in the nature of a contract under hand or seal, or who shall receive any fee, gain, or reward for writing, drawing, or preparing any such instrument, shall forfeit the sum of £50 to any person suing for the same, by action of debt in any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster, in which it shall be sufficient to declare that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £50, being forfeited by an Act intituled "The Legal Practitioners' Act 1874," and the plaintiff, if he recover in such action shall have his full costs of suit. And in any such action it shall not be necessary for the plaintiff to show that the defendant has received any fee, gain, or reward, specifically for the writing, drawing, or preparation of any instrument, and he shall only be required to show that the defendant has received a fee, gain, or reward, for the business or transaction in respect of, or in regard to which he has, directly or indirectly, written, drawn, or prepared such instrument: Provided always, that the foregoing section does not extend to—

(1.) Any public officer, drawing or preparing any instrument in the course of his duty.

(2.) Any person employed merely to engross any instrument or proceedings.

(3.) Any banker or broker preparing any instrument relating to stocks or shares.

4. That no bill of sale, assignment, transfer, or other document mentioned and comprised in the Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36), and thereby required to be registered, made or given by any person, shall be of any force, power, or effect, unless there shall be present a certificated attorney or solicitor on behalf of such person executing, making, or giving such bill of sale, expressly named by him and attending by his request to inform him of the nature and effect of such bill of sale before the same is executed, and such attorney or solicitor shall subscribe his name as a witness to the due execution thereof, and thereby declare himself to be the attorney or solicitor for the person giving the same, and state that he subscribes as such attorney or solicitor, and that the person so executing the same did fully understand the nature and effect thereof.

5. Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise any qualified practitioner to do any act which he is not now authorised by law to do.

6. This Act shall not extend to Scotland or Ireland.

We are requested by the Honorary Secretary of the Society (Mr. Charles Ford) to add that it is in contemplation to frame other Bills dealing with the appearance before, and the conduct of business in, magistrates', and County Courts by unqualified persons, and otherwise to offer to the public and the Profession additional protection in the direction indicated by the above Bill; also to adjust the relations of the two branches of the legal Profession, and to remove certain disabilities attaching to solicitors in relation to the recovery of the amount of Bills of Costs, and generally to deal with all necessary reforms.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.

LAST Monday evening, the 16th inst., Mr. John Coryton, barrister-at-law, read a paper on the "Policy of Granting Letters Patent for Inventions, with observations on the working of the English Law," at a meeting of the Law Amendment Society, held at the rooms, 1, Adam-street, Adelphi.

The chair was taken by Mr. T. Webster, Q.C., and there was a large attendance, much interest being manifested in the subject.

In the course of Mr. Coryton's remarks, he said the subject of patent law was just now passing through a very interesting phase, inasmuch as causes would seem to be actively at work, which must soon lead to an entire revolution, if not abolition, of this species of trade privilege. At home they had a constantly increasing tendency on the part of capitalists to speculate in patents; and hardly a company is launched but professes to have secured special rights in respect of lighting, disinfecting, or performing some duty which, in modern society, must be considered as a necessary of life. Looking abroad they saw still more significent signs of change, and one of the great Powers on the Continent had recently considered the patent system, and determined to have no more patents. Another, although adopting the principle in all its rigour, excepts from its operation precisely that branch of industry on which the prosperity of the country depended chiefly, and was just now witnessing with dismay the threatened destruction of another branch, owing to a decision of its courts of law, with reference to one patent. For Germany the 10th Dec. 1868 was, in respect of patent rights, a memorable day, for on that day Count Bismark issued a proclamation declaring that the Government of Prussia, having taken into consideration the whole question of patent rights, was of opinion that such rights should cease. In competition with Germany, therefore—and it was Germany whose progress in foreign markets the English commercial world had for some time been watching with something like jealous anxiety—the English manufacturer must, unless effect could be given to the recommendation of the recent committees of the House of Commons, be prepared to find themselves weighted with whatever royalties English patentees could manage to impose upon their goods. If the principle upon which the law was founded be just, they ought, no doubt, to continue in their present course, but if, as many persons believed, it was founded in error, they had an admirable opportunity for emancipating their commerce from the influence of that error. So far as the public was concerned, he could see no necessity for a patent law at all. His own belief was that they should, without any such law, have precisely the same inventions, and in the same order as they had now; and further, that the system of granting a fourteen years' monopoly to the person who made an improvement in the working of any particular handicraft was one that hindered rather than helped the general progress of industrial art. Since the establishment of patents, their grandest inventions—railways, electric telegraphs, and photography, among them—had come into general use without monopoly. It was an old saying, that "it is society that invents." He would interpret it as meaning that there were few grand discoveries made in science or art, but had foreshadowed themselves in the speculations of intelligent men; and, similarly, that few grand improvements had been effected in the manufacturing world, either in chemistry or mechanism, in which the great body of thinking men connected with those arts were not pressing forward eagerly in the direction of the discovered improvements. It was with a strong impression of the difficulty they found in saying who was the inventor of any of the changes made in the ordinary course of manufacture, that they should best proceed to the other side of the question, viz., the right of the inventor to have a patent that was to exclude everybody for fourteen years from making use of the invention, or anything which was virtually the same as the invention. If they found it just to award these rights as a reward to the first, they must admit that the penalty to which they subjected the second in the race was certainly, for a manufacturing country, a terrible one. The right of the patentee as against the public was frequently founded on the expense to which he had been put by the experiments he had instituted before arriving at his discoveries. Discoveries of great principles were almost confined to men of scientific occupations. Such men, patient and unselfish workers, of whom Faraday might be taken as a type, were happily not rare in England, or, indeed, in any State of Europe, and in these they recognized true improvers of their manufactures. Regarded as a general scheme for rewarding inventive merit, the law which conferred a monopoly of the thing invented, and left the patentee to make the best of the grant, was a very imperfect one. The difference of certainty of the monopoly in the case of different discoveries was enormous. Regarded, therefore, from the public or private point of view, it seemed to him that a patent law was not a just one. In theory a patent was the grant of a special privilege conferred by a grateful country on a manufacturer who had added to the country's wealth. In practice "the grant of letters patent is the grant of a right of action, which may be exercised in the most arbitrary manner, and for the most illegitimate purposes." The reforms proposed by an Act of Parliament, affecting patent law, passed after mature deliberation, and affecting the whole commercial world, had been entirely ignored by every successive Government for the last two-and-twenty years; and the Patent-office, too, still remained in premises never intended for such a purpose. The condition of the building, and the neglect to appoint working commissioners, cannot, at any rate, be set down to deficiency of funds, for the Patent-office was a department of the State that more than pays its way. Let them suppose that good working commissioners had been secured, men well acquainted with manufactures and fairly conversant with the law. They should, in the first place, determine: First, That the invention was a proper one to be protected; and, secondly, that the applicant was the person entitled to the privilege. The first matter to be decided was as to what was patentable matter. It was with a view to avoid complexity that he proposed, many years ago, in publishing a work on the law and practice of patents, to substitute a single definition at once, as he hoped, comprehensive and concise, viz., "the material result of an unpublished improvement in the manufacture of articles for public use." In conclusion, he went on to say, whatever doubt might exist as to the justice of a patent law, viewed as an abstract question, he felt certain that there was a tolerable unanimity of opinion as to the needless costliness of litigation about patent rights. To some extent, no doubt, the expense was unavoidable, from the nature of the subject. It might be diminished in proportion as the patentee's rights were defined by responsible authority; but, in any event, it must remain extremely costly. At present it was not only costly but uncertain. The present system as reformed would, he thought, be a step in the right direction which the American law had long assumed—viz., the assumption by the State of the duty of inquiry before granting the patent. The feeling was general in the United States that they had gone too far in that direction, and that it would be desirable to issue patents freely, leaving their value to be determined by the crucial test of litigation. With regard to the suggestion as to a registry of invention, he saw no objection to it himself, and the report of it would, he thought, be looked for by the public with the deepest interest. If he had to sum up his own opinion on the patent laws, he would say that no law was ever passed the theory of which was more equitable, and that no law, having for its object the furtherance of commerce was ever issued ending in such a complete disappointment. He hoped to live to see their abolition, for their abolition would, he believed, be the first step to the recognition of the national duty of marshalling their scientific powers in getting hold of the men who really advanced manufactures, and employing them in the most economical manner. A discussion followed, and the proceedings terminated in the usual manner.

CHARLES PIDCOCK, Chairman.

EQUITY AND LAW LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting was held on Tuesday, March 3, at the offices, 18, Lincoln's-inn-fields, George Lake Russell, Esq., the chairman of the directors, presiding.

Mr. G. W. Berridge (the actuary and secretary) read the notice convening the meeting, and the report of the directors, which was as follows:

"The directors have again the pleasure of reporting to the proprietors a successful year.

"A large amount of new assurances has been effected with the society, and now, for the first time, the assets of the society exceed one million sterling.

"The gross amount of new premiums received in the year is £17,849 13s. 10d. Of this, £7863 1s. 6d. has been received in single premiums, leaving £9986 12s. 4d., and after deducting from this sum the amount of reassurance premiums, there is left a net new annual income of £9669 7s. 8d.

"The number of policies is 190, and the net amount assured is £334,080. Reversionary annuities have also been granted amounting to £1350 per annum; a large portion of the single premiums has been received for the purchase of these annuities. £14,643 0s. 6d. has also been received for the purchase of eighteen annuities, amounting to £1781 7s. 6d.

"The amount of interest and dividends received in the year is £44,867 1s. 11d.; this is a larger amount than the corresponding item last year by about £7000; but it includes a sum of £3116 19s. 9d. charged as interest on the re-sale of a large reversion.

"The total premium income of the year, after deducting reassurances, is £114,419 15s. 5d., and the total receipts from all sources, exclusive of repayment of loans, is £174,303 17s. 7d. The total amount of claims and all other outgoings, including a sum of £300 written off the cost of the society's house, is £106,738 16s. 9d., and, consequently, the assets of the society have been increased by a sum of £67,565 0s. 10d. The amount of the funds at the end of the year, after providing for outstanding claims, dividends, &c., was £1,020,298 10s. 5d. Deducting the reversions, outstanding premiums and interest, and cash on current account, the remainder was invested at an average rate of £4 19s. 9d. per cent., or, including the reversions and assuming that they produce 6 per cent., the average rate becomes £5 3s. per cent.

"The number of deaths proved during the year was 36, causing claims under 60 policies assuring £85,774. Of this sum £54,024 were on the participating scale and carried bonuses amounting to £8335.

"The claims for the year were, however, reduced by £18,811 received from other companies. Although the claims for the present year are high, yet, taking the average of the four years which have expired of the current quinquennium, the amount is only £52,135, which is considerably below the expectation.

"The expenses of management, £6425 1s. 9d., amount to only 3¾ per cent. on the total income.

"The directors have to regret the loss by death of one of their members, Mr. E. F. Moore, Q.C., and there is therefore a vacancy to be filled up at this meeting.

"The directors who retire by rotation are Mr. Birch, Mr. Hilliard and Mr. Dunster. Mr. Boodle, one of the auditors for the proprietors, and Mr. Bailey, one of the auditors for the assured, also retire by rotation; all these gentlemen offer themselves for re-election.

"Since the last meeting the society has lost the services of Mr. Sprague, who for more than twelve years most ably discharged the duties of actuary and secretary. While, however, the directors have to regret his loss, it is satisfactory to know that he left the society in consequence solely of his obtaining a much more valuable appointment. In his successor Mr. G. W. Berridge, the directors are satisfied that the society has secured the services of a gentleman in whose experience and ability it may place entire confidence.

"The following minute was made in the books of the society on the occasion of Mr. Sprague's leaving:—'That this board cannot part with Mr. Sprague without expressing their appreciation of the very great ability, care and attention that he has shown in the performance of his duties of actuary and secretary of the society for the twelve years he has been with them. They request, on the part of the society, his acceptance of a piece of plate, of the value of 100 guineas, as a testimony of his services.'

"GEORGE LAKE RUSSELL, Chairman."

The report was unanimously adopted.

The retiring directors—Messrs. Birch, Hilliard, and Dunster—were re-elected, and Mr. Henry Cecil Raikes, M.P., was elected a director in the room of Mr. Moore, Q.C., deceased.

Mr. Boodle was re-elected an auditor on the part of the proprietors, and Mr. Bailey on behalf of the assured.

Mr. W. G. Lemon proposed, "That the thanks of the meeting be presented to the directors, and that the sum of £2000, free of income tax, be voted to them for their services during the past year." He felt that the mode in which the business had been conducted during the past year would ensure the most cordial approval of this resolution. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution was seconded, and at once agreed to, and acknowledged by Mr. J. Moxon Clabon, the deputy chairman.

The thanks of the meeting were voted to the auditors, together with the sum of 40 guineas, for their services during the past year.

On the motion of Mr. Eiloart, a hearty vote of thanks was presented to the chairman, and the meeting dispersed.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at Clement's-inn Hall, on Wednesday, the 18th March, Mr. E. F. Stanway, solicitor, in the chair. Mr. Wingfield opened the subject for the evening's debate, viz., "That an acceptance of a retainer or papers by counsel should constitute a simple contract." The motion was carried by a majority of three.

HUDDERSFIELD LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

AT a meeting of this society, held on Mouday evening last, at the County Court, the question under discussion was, "Is the unanimity required in juries conducive to the attainment of justice?" Mr. J. H. Sykes, one of the vice-presidents, occupied the chair. Mr. J. H. Dransfield opened the debate in the affirmative, and was supported by Mr. E. H. Armitage. Mr. G. F. Johnson conducted the negative. The question was decided in the affirmative by a majority of one.

LEGAL OBITUARY.

NOTE.—This department of the LAW TIMES, is contributed by EDWARD WALFORD, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Geneaological and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the LAW TIMES Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

A. LANGDON, ESQ., LL.B.

THE late Augustus Langdon, Esq., LL.B., barrister-at-law, who died at 38, Norland-square, Notting-hill, on the 4th inst., in the sixty-first year of his age, was the second son of the late William Langdon, Esq., of Cadogan-place, Chelsea, and was born in the year 1813. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his degree as Bachelor of Laws in 1836. He was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn in Hilary Term 1835. Mr. Langdon was an ardent numismatist, and was a fellow of several of the learned societies, though his infirmity of deafness prevented his taking part in their proceedings; and there are few charities in London that will not miss in him a kind and constant friend. He married in 1836, Miss Sarah Watts, daughter of the late Edward Watts, Esq., of Yeovil, Somersetshire, by whom he has left a family of eight children. His remains were interred at Brompton Cemetery.

MR. J. C. SMITH.

THE late Mr. John Campbell Smith, secretary of the City of London Conservative Association, whose death, at the residence of his father, in Roxburgh-street, Greenock, North Britain, has just been announced, at the age of thirty-two years, was a student of Lincoln's Inn, and was a gentleman well known in literary circles. He was born in the year 1842, and besides holding the above-mentioned appointment, he had acted as central agent during the recent parliamentary election. Mr. Smith, who was maternally descended from a good old family of Scottish extraction, was an occasional contributor to the Fortnightly Review and other magazines, and was to have been called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn in the course of next month. The death of Mr. Smith is stated to have resulted from heart disease, hastened by nervous injury received in the railway accident at Wigan while on the journey from London to Scotland last year.

The Law and the Lawyers.

A VERY important question in bankruptcy with reference to what are "debts due in the course of his trade or business" (sub-sect. 5, sect. 15 Bankruptcy Act 1869), is reported by us to-day as having been decided by the LORDS JUSTICES: (Ex parte Kemp; re Fastnedge.) The debts in question were based upon certain marginal notes given by bankers when discounting bills deposited with shipping documents. Such bills are usually discounted to the extent of 70 per cent. and upwards, "marginal notes" being given as to the balance on the bills remaining due to the pledgors. The question was whether the sums held back by the banks were in the ownership and disposition of the persons entitled to receive them on the bills being honoured at maturity, and so passed to the trustee on the bankruptcy of such persons. Lord Justice JAMES, on the 20th inst., read the written judgment of Lord Justice MELLISH, who came to the conclusion that the word "due," as used in the Bankruptcy Act, means "payable," but that a debt is due although not immediately payable. It is clear that it would be absurd to hold that a debt which by its nature is payable at a future time is excluded from the list of debts due by or to a debtor. But where, as in the case of these marginal notes for balances, it is dependent on a contingency whether anything will ever be payable by the bankers there is no debt due, and it has therefore been held that such debts are not within sect. 15 sub-sect. 5, and no not pass to the trustee under the bankruptcy of the pledgors.

MR. W. FFOOKS WOODFORDE, who has been appointed to succeed Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL as Judge of the Derbyshire County Courts, was called to the Bar in 1844, and has hitherto practised on the Western Circuit and at Bristol. The two appointments to judicial office by the present Government have fallen upon gentlemen known almost exclusively as barristers localized on the Western Circuit.

A CORRESPONDENT puts forward a very pertinent inquiry as to the rights of trustees in bankruptcy to deal with the property of a bankrupt after his estate has paid 20s. in the pound. Is the trustee entitled to retain possession of the bankrupt's property in order to prosecute him? Our correspondent says "to compel a man to pay the costs of his conviction when he has been convicted is one thing; to put your hand into his pocket merely on the chance of getting him convicted is surely quite a novelty. What right beyond 20*s.* in the pound can the trustees, creditors, or the court have?" The answer appears to us to be sufficiently plain. It may very well be that a debtor endeavours by fraud to deprive his creditors of a certain proportion of his estate when in the whole it will pay 20*s.* in the pound. The fraud is detected, the property recovered, and 20*s.* in the pound paid. Is the trustee not to prosecute? If he is to prosecute, is he to give up possession of the means wherewith to pay his costs? It must be remembered that a prosecution is ordinarily directed on a primâ facie case being made out to the satisfaction of a court of bankruptcy, and that circumstance, and not the possible failure to obtain a verdict, is the circumstance which has to be looked at. If our correspondent's view were to be adopted, it would amount to this, that a debtor is never to be prosecuted save at the expense of his creditors, which could by no means be allowed. An alleged fraudulent debtor is doubtless in a more unfavourable position in this respect than defendants in criminal cases generally, but we see no means of relieving him. The instances in which an estate pays 20*s.* in the pound are, however, so rare that no large amount of alarm need be excited.

LAST week we protested against the practice of payment of Judges by the day, as illustrated by the case of the Chairman of the Second Court at the Middlesex Sessions. In our opinion, which we believe is that of the entire Profession, such a manner of payment for judicial services is even more objectionable than the amount. But what shall be said of the extraordinary condition which, in the Bill just introduced to Parliament, is attached to the receipt of even this paltry fee? It will scarcely be credited that the Bill expressly limits the Judge's remuneration to such days only "on which he sits and acts for not less than six hours in the court." Was anything more insulting to a Judge ever proposed to a Legislature? Not merely does it make him a journeyman, but it treats him as such, or rather subjects him to worse treatment. The journeyman bricklayer is paid for all the hours he works, and he receives double pay for overtime. But the journeyman judge is by this astonishing Bill—strange to say the first coming from a Conservative Home Secretary—not only compelled to work a certain number of hours or to forfeit his fees altogether if his work is curtailed by a quarter of an hour—while if he works for nine hours, as often he does, no addition is to be made to it. Mr. CROSS has been a Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and must well know the impossibility of measuring the work of a Judge like that of a bricklayer. Trials are of uncertain length. They cannot by any contrivance be made to fit exactly six hours. If this ridiculous provision should become law, what will be the consequence? If the Judge adjourns for luncheon he loses his fee. If a trial ends at half-past three o'clock, and there is no case that will not occupy less than three or four hours, as occurs continually, he must forfeit his fee or take a case and sit nine hours and receive only the pay of six. If for the accommodation of witnesses and to save costs to the prosecution it is desired to appoint a case for trial on a special day, the unfortunate Judge will not be paid for that day's work unless the trial lasts for six hours. There is no end to the inconveniences it will occasion and the injustice that will be done. If the object be to prevent needless protraction of business, the right course will be to pay by a salary. But some confidence must always be placed in the honour of public officers. The Judge who would needlessly lengthen work because he is paid by the day would be unworthy of the office. We are reluctant to believe that the new HOME SECRETARY was aware what he was approving when he placed his name upon the back of this unprecedented Bill. If he did so, it is of evil omen for the conduct of the Home Office under its new régime. Such a measure might have been looked for from Mr. LOWE; it is altogether unworthy of Mr. CROSS. We hope, indeed, that it was his inheritance, and not his offspring. If so it be, we are sure that his attention has but to be called to it to secure the summary excision of the objectionable provision, which, though applicable to two Judges only, is not the less an insult to all Judges.

THE Bill which is to deal "with such parts of the Acts (sic) regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, as have given rise to complaints which appear to deserve the attention of Parliament," must needs be a marvel of legislative skill, if it is not make confusion worse confounded. The complaints of the publicans are well known; they have been summarised, published, and put forward by a deputation whose claims included a uniform hour of closing, the abolition of orders of exemption, the power of entertaining friends after closing hours, the mitigation of the oft-recurring clause as to recording a conviction upon a licence (the sting of the late Act), and the extension of licensing restrictions to grocers. It is impossible to say that these claims, put forward as they are by persons thoroughly conversant with the subject, do not deserve the attention of Parliament; whether or not and how far they call for legislation is another question. Add to them the complaints of the valuation clauses on the part of the holders of wine and beer licences, the complaints on the part of teetotallers that the recent Act did not go far enough, and last though not least the complaints from the Bench that the licensing Acts are very difficult to understand, and it will then be seen that it will be no easy task to make all things plain. As further legislation of some kind is now determined on, we hope that it will include the repeal of the minimum penalty of 1l. under sect. 67 of the Act of 1872, which, singularly enough, does not appear to have been asked for by the licensed victuallers themselves. The power to impose a nominal penalty in trivial cases would render it no longer possible for magistrates to dismiss informations in spite of the clearest evidence in support of them, or to give out beforehand that they "would not convict" if such and such an offence were brought before them, or to disregard the law by imposing less than the minimum penalty. Indeed, we doubt whether the simple repeal of sect. 67 would not be a sufficient amendment of the law at present, unless indeed consolidation be attempted, in which case the name of the desirable amendments is legion, simply from a legal point of view. Unless it be of the simplest kind we fear that any measure short of a consolidating one is likely to create new difficulties of construction without solving the old ones.

BY a singular coincidence, the Times of Saturday last contained notices of two remarkable cases of alleged conspiracy. Of the one, the charge of conspiracy to hiss an actress off the stage, we believe the law to be undoubted, that this is a common law conspiracy. There is, in fact, a familiar case precisely in point. The law of the Burnley case, on the other hand, in which union workmen were charged with a conspiracy to induce non-union workmen to break their contracts with employers whose practice it was to employ non-union men alone, to the serious damage of those employers, is in a state unsatisfactory and obscure to the last degree. There is much force in the contention that "the two streams of common law and statute law have been brought into one, and that the only offence of molesting and obstructing is that interpreted so precisely by the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1871," but Baron AMPHLETT let in the whole stream of common law under cover of the words "nothing shall prevent any person from being liable under any Act or otherwise," and we can hardly dispute the correctness of the ruling. Nevertheless, we should like to see some strong judicial construction of the proviso that "no person shall be liable to punishment for conspiring to do any act on the ground that such act tends to restrain the free course of trade." Is this proviso applicable to the facts of the Burnley case, and if not, why not? It is, we think, much to be regretted on public grounds that the jury had to be discharged without giving a verdict, thus preventing the law of the case from being solemnly decided by the Court of Criminal Appeal. The judgment of that court would have formed an admirable text for the report of the recently constituted Royal Commission to examine into the working of the Master and Servant and Criminal Law Amendment Acts. To know the law is the first step towards amending it, if it is to be amended. Apropos, it is a sad pity that so many of the influential leaders of the union party have decided upon the policy of having "nothing to do" with the Royal Commission. Such a policy is open to the criticism that those who wish to shut out evidence are not themselves prepared with such a body of evidence on their side of the question as would justify an alteration of the law. Quite independently, however, of the proposed investigations of the Commission, we think that it is highly desirable to codify the law of conspiracy at once. A Bill for this purpose, one of the most valuable measures of the late Government, was unfortunately introduced too late last session to admit of its being passed. The codification of the general law of conspiracy need not be complained of as being directed against a special class, but could and should be effected in a bill containing no mention of either "master" or "servant," "employer" or "employed."

THE existence of local courts of record, in districts where there are County Courts, is undoubtedly an anomaly. Provision will doubtless soon be made for consolidating the jurisdictions, and in the City of London, as well as in the country, it would be greatly to the advantage of the public that the practice in all courts of law should be uniform. These remarks are suggested by a case which has reached us from Oswestry, where it appears there is a court of record presided over by a recorder. In the case in question the only question which the recorder had to decide was one of costs, he having a right to certify much as a Judge in the Superior Courts of Common Law. The debt was admitted, but the recorder, nevertheless, certified, the consequence being, apparently, that whereas a few shillings would have been the extent of the defendant's liability for costs in the County Court, he has been ordered to pay £7 5s. 10d. as taxed costs on a debt of £1 3s. This, doubtless, is an enormity, but the defendant had brought the calamity upon himself by keeping his creditor at arms' length for several years. On this ground (certainly somewhat novel) the Judge certified. But it is really not surprising that any court should be selected by attorneys in preference to the County Court. An Oswestry attorney, speaking of this case, gives an instance of the injustice which is inflicted by the present scale of charges in County Courts. "I once had," he says, "a County Court case of demurrage, where the amount claimed was between £10 and £20. I conducted the case on the hearing; judgment was reserved. Next court day I went to hear it; it was against me on a point of law. The Judge was wrong, and the following court day I moved successfully for a new trial. The arguments on the new trial took me a day or two to prepare, and two hours to deliver. Next court the Judge reversed his decision on the point of law, and I had judgment; but all the costs I could get out of the other side towards my own charges were 15s.! So that instead of handing the sum recovered over to my client untouched—as one ought to have been able to do—it had to be sweated to pay my own fee." This is certainly the practical consequence of the statutory regulations. Whilst, therefore, we think that jurisdictions should be uniform, professional allowances ought to be placed upon a just and sensible basis.

THE relations between the Bench, the Bar, and the public are daily becoming more delicate, and the scoldings which the heads of the Profession frequently receive from the Press are, in our opinion, of very doubtful expediency. The learned Judge who is the last offender against the journalistic code of judicial propriety is Vice-Chancellor Sir RICHARD MALINS, who, having a case of gross hardship and injustice brought before him wrapped up in a technicality, was bold enough to condemn the injustice whilst deciding the point of law raised for his determination. The journal whose wrath was excited to the most remarkable degree was the Pall Mall Gazette. The opinion emanating from this periodical has been adopted by quotation in the Times, which makes it the more important, and it is to the effect that the conduct of the Judge was discreditable to the administration of justice. It is no special duty of ours as a legal journal to defend our Judges; but of all critics in the Press the one least entitled to express its views on the decision of the demurrer in the case of Dr. Hayman is the Pall Mall Gazette. Never, probably, was there a more excessive use of the power of the press than that of which the Gazette was guilty in writing Dr. HAYMAN out of Rugby, and in considering its estimate of the Vice-Chancellor this must be borne in mind. By press persecution to crush a man, and then to object to an honest judge expressing natural feelings of indignation when he has the opportunity, evinces a spirit which disqualifies a writer from acting as a critic, as much as Dr. TEMPLE's prejudice disentitled him to sit as a judge on Dr. HAYMAN. But in what sense is Sir RICHARD MALINS's conduct "discreditable to the administration of justice"? He ought not, we are told, to have suggested a compromise; he ought not to have expressed a wish that the defendants should abandon the demurrer in order that the case might be heard on the merits; he ought not (his suggestion being rejected) to have said that he considered Dr. HAYMAN hardly used, or that Dr. TEMPLE had offended in any sense, if he had not acted corruptly; in short, that the point raised being one of pure law, the governing body were entitle to be spared all punishment in the shape of judicial condemnation because they had availed themselves of a technical defence. Is, then, a free expression of opinion by a Judge with reference to facts alleged in a bill which are admitted by a demurrer to be true, "discreditable to the administration of justice," the party demurring having thereby declined to give any version of the facts whatever? That this proceeding on the part of a Judge may not be quite consistent with the strict administration of technical law, we might admit, but that it is any offence against the proper administration of "justice" we deny. A very analogous case is that of Osgood v. Nelson, in which a deserving officer of the Corporation of the City of London, was arbitrarily dismissed under powers conferred by a private Act of Parliament. There the point simply was whether the Corporation had the arbitrary power claimed. In deciding, on an application for a mandamus, that they had the Court of Queen's Bench (more particularly the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE), did not consider it discreditable to the administration of justice to express sympathy with the dismissed officer, and to reflect somewhat strongly on the Corporation. Every one who goes into Vice-Chancellor MALINS's Court knows that he may there find something more than naked law administered. The VICE-CHANCELLOR hates all iniquity and unfairness. Nine times out of ten the expression of his indignation does infinite good, and we are disposed to think that in the result this is the effect of his comments and judgment in the case of Dr. Hayman.

THE ARBITRARY POWERS OF PUBLIC BODIES.

RECENT experiences show that it is quite possible for great public bodies to exercise vexatiously the powers which Parliament has seen fit to confer, and a question which seems likely to come forward prominently is whether and under what circumstances individuals should be shut out from the ordinary remedy of an appeal to the courts of the country. It is hardly possible to believe that the advisers of Dr. Hayman in his proceedings against the Governing Body of Rugby School, felt any confidence, that failing to establish that that body had acted corruptly in dismissing him the Court of Chancery could interfere. The provisions of the Public Schools Act of 1868 are exceptionally clear. The 12th section says that "the head master of every school to which this Act applies, shall be appointed by and hold his office at the pleasure of the new Governing Body." The New Governing Body did not appoint Dr. Hayman, but they did decide that he should not hold office.

It is plain enough that the only arguable question was whether the two members of the Governing Body complained of by Dr. Hayman, namely, Dr. Temple and Dr. Bradley, were disqualified as members of a governing body sitting upon his case, and undoubtedly it is important to consider from this point of view when a person exercising a judicial or quasi-judicial office is incapable of acting. The Court of Queen's Bench, in the Queen v. Rand (L. Rep. 1 Q. B.) said at pp. 232, 233, that "wherever there is a real likelihood that the Judge would from kindred or any other cause have a bias in favour of one of the parties, it would be very wrong in him to act; and we are not to be understood to say that where there is a real bias of this sort this court would not interfere." But they add that Reg. v. Dean of Dorchester (17 Q. B. 1) "is an authority that circumstances from which a suspicion of favour may arise do not produce the same effect as a pecuniary interest."

Now, in Reg v. Rand the persons complained of were justices of the peace, and in Reg v. Dean of Dorchester a schoolmaster contended that a visitor of a school, whom the schoolmaster had abused in a publication, had no right to sit in judgment upon and dismiss him. In each case, however, the act complained of was sustained, and the case of Rugby School is certainly not stronger than those on the side of the dismissed master. It would be going very great lengths to say that a body exercising judicial functions should not be allowed to entertain strong individual views of a servant whom they may be called upon to pass judgment upon, and if the principle of disqualification, on the score of interest or bias, were applied to such a case, it might be very difficult to know where to stop.

As regards the controlling influence of the courts of common law by mandamus, we have no doubt that nothing short of pecuniary interest, or something distinctly analogous, will call for its exercise over a body which is given arbitrary powers by Act of Parliament; and the case of Daugars v. Rivaz (23 Beav. 233), shows, with sufficient clearness, the only conditions under which a court of equity would feel called upon to review the decision of such a body. The Master of the Rolls found that between the governing body of the French Protestant Church in London and the pastor a trust existed, that the latter might compel the execution of the trust in his favour, and, being dismissed, claim to be reinstated. There the question was as between the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery and a common law court, and the existence of the trust decided the case in favour of the jurisdiction in equity. Therefore where a trust exists or there is a corrupt exercise of statutory power, a jurisdiction vests in the Court of Chancery. But even where there is a trust it is easy for trustees to make their servants enter into express agreements to submit to arbitrary dismissal. The elders and deacons of the French Protestant Church adopted this course when the difficulty arose in Daugars v. Rivaz, and thus took themselves out of the jurisdiction of the courts. The Master of the Rolls observed that the result of such a proceeding was to give the elders and deacons absolute control over the minister, both as to conduct and doctrine, and this without the control or possibility of interference on the part of the congregation. "Such an authority," he said, "if recklessly exercised (and all uncontrolled authority is liable to be so) might wholly subvert the objects and purposes for which this institution was founded." This is an argument against giving uncontrolled power to any governing body whatsoever, but general expediency points in the other direction. It is a common observation that hard cases make bad law, and it is a subject for congratulation that largely as the Vice-Chancellor sympathised with Dr. Hayman, he did not allow himself to be carried outside the settled principles which limit his jurisdiction.

FREEHOLDS.

THE searches to be made when freeholds in possession or reversion, or any legal or equitable estate therein, are being dealt with are for judgments, writs of execution (except in cases of equitable estates not entitling the owner to the whole of the profits), lites pendentes, crown debts, annuities, rentcharges, improvement charges, bankruptcies, insolvencies, composition deeds, and liquidations by arrangement. The state of the title or the smallness of the property may, however, render some of the searches unnecessary. In previous papers we have shown against whose names the several searches should be made. Inquiries should be made of the tenants as to the terms of their holdings, and whether they have any further interest in the property or are aware of the claim of any person other than the vendor or mortgagor. Inquiries should also be made as to easements affecting the property, and particular care must be taken to see that all succession duties have been duly satisfied, or in the case of the purchase of the reversion due regard must be paid to the effect of the recent decision of The Solicitor-General v. The Law Reversionary Interest Society (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 769; L. Rep. 8 Ex. 233). If the deeds are not in the custody of the vendor or mortgagor it must be ascertained that they are in the hands of persons entitled to retain them, and that such persons have no claim upon the property being dealt with. In register counties a search should be made at the register office, to see that all documents of which the purchaser or mortgagor is aware have been registered, and that nothing else affecting the property has been registered, and as soon as possible after completion a memorial of the conveyance or mortgage should be registered.

FREEHOLD MANORS.

Although, perhaps, not always usual, we would suggest, in addition to the above searches and inquiries, that a strict search should be made of the court rolls of each manor in order to ascertain that no copyholds exist of which the purchaser or mortgagee has not been informed, and that the existing copyholders of whom he is aware have no privileges other than those ordinarily attaching to their estates.

To show the importance of a search of the court rolls we quote the following case, which, although entirely supposititious, is founded upon the facts of a case which recently happened within the writer's knowledge. In the year (say) 1790, a settlement was made by A, whereby the manor of Whiteacre and certain freehold lands in the parish of X. were limited to A. for life, with remainder to B. (his son) for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of B. in tail, with remainder to C. in fee. The manor then included a large quantity of land held by copyholders, the interest of the whole of whom A. purchased and caused to be surrendered to a trustee for himself. A. also purchased some freehold land in the parish of X., which was conveyed to himself. A. died in 1825, having by his will, made shortly before his death, devised all estates held by or in trust for him to similar uses to those declared by his settlement of the Manor of Whiteacre. Upon A.'s death B. entered into possession and received the rents until his death in 1865, when D., his only son, entered into possession, and immediately executed a disentailing deed, which was duly enrolled in Chancery. After being in possession some years, D. contracted for the sale of the whole of the property as freehold, and the purchase was duly completed. D. died without issue a short time after completion, and by an accidental search of the court rolls it was discovered that the entail in the copyholds which had never been merged had not been barred, and consequently that under A.'s will C. was entitled to them.

LEASEHOLDS.

The searches and inquiries will be the same as in the case of freeholds, except that no search need be made for judgments. In addition, it must be ascertained that all the lessee's covenants have been performed or waived by the lessor, and that sufficient probate duty has been paid upon all the testator's estates, of which the leaseholds formed part. In some cases the assent of the lessor is necessary to any assignment, and in others notice of every assignment has to be given to the lessor, or the assignment has to be registered; the requirements (if any) of the particular lease must of course be properly complied with. In dealing with a lessee's fixtures, where the lessee is in possession, search should be made for bills of sale, and a mortgage, or post-nuptial settlement, of such fixtures should be registered as a bill of sale.

COPYHOLDS.

In dealing with lands of this tenure the principal search will be of the court rolls of the manor of which the lands are holden. The search will show what surrenders and admissions have actually taken place, and what charges (if any) affect the property, and it will also show what (if anything) is required to be done to complete a sale or mortgage, or to prevent a forfeiture by force of any special custom of the manor, and also what the customs generally are. Unless the purchaser or mortgagee, or his solicitor has notice of any judgment, it is unnecessary to search for judgments and writs of execution, but with the exception of Crown debts, for which no search need be made, the other searches and inquiries above suggested with reference to freehold property should be made.

INNS, PUBLIC HOUSES, &c.

The provisions of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94) must not be lost sight of when dealings take place with licensed houses. After providing that upon conviction for certain specified offences, a record of the conviction is to be endorsed upon the offender's licence, sect. 30 provides that upon a subsequent conviction after two convictions have been recorded on the licence, it shall be forfeited, and the premises, in respect of which the licence was granted shall, unless the court having cognizance of the case in its discretion thinks fit otherwise to order, be disqualified from receiving any licence for a term of two years from the date of such third conviction. With respect only to the convictions of persons who after the passing of the Act (10 Aug. 1872) become licensed in respect of premises, the 31st section provides (1) that the second and every subsequent conviction recorded on the licence of any one such person shall also be recorded in the register of licences against the premises; (2) when four convictions (whether of the same or of different licensed persons), have within five years been so recorded against premises, those premises shall, during one year, be disqualified for the purposes of the Act; (3) if the licences of two such persons licensed in respect of the same premises are forfeited within any period of two years, the premises shall be disqualified for one year from the date of the last forfeiture. For the owner's protection, however, sect. 56 provides that where the tenant is convicted of an offence the repetition of which may render the premises liable to be disqualified from receiving a licence, the justices' clerk is to send a notice of the conviction to the owner. Where an order of the court has been made declaring premises disqualified, notice is to be served upon the owner, if not the occupier, with a statement that a petty sessions will be held when and where specified, at which the owner may appeal against the order on all or any of the following, but on no other grounds: (a) That notice of the prior offence had not been served upon him; or (b) that the tenant held under a contract made prior to the commencement of the Act, and that the owner could not legally have evicted the tenant in the interval between the commission of the offence, in respect of which the disqualifying order was made, and the receipt by him of the notice of the immediately preceding offence, which on repetition renders the premises liable to be disqualified; or (c) that the offence in respect of which the disqualifying order was made occurred so soon after the receipt of such last-mentioned notice, that the owner, notwithstanding he had legal power to evict the tenant, could not with reasonable diligence have exercised that power in the interval which occurred between the said notice and the second offence. Upon the owner satisfying the court that he is entitled to have the order cancelled on any of the above grounds, the court must direct the order to be cancelled, and it thereupon becomes void. The justices are to make rules, in pursuance of which any person other than the owner interested in any licensed premises as mortgagee or otherwise, is to be entitled, upon payment of a fee to be fixed by the rules, to receive from the justices' clerk a similar notice to that sent to the owner.

In Mow v. Hindmarsh (28 L. T. Rep. N.S. 644, Ex.), it was held that upon the letting by parol of a public house, a covenant by the lessee to use the premises in such a manner as not to cause a forfeiture of the licence could not be implied. Care should be taken in framing such leases to insert such a covenant, as well as a power of re-entry upon the first conviction for a recordable offence after a previous order for indorsement on the licence had been made, and the owner must be diligent in availing himself of his power so as to enable him to take advantage of an appeal in case a third conviction speedily followed the second. In cases of sales or mortgages the register of licences at the justices' clerk's office, should be carefully searched, and a mortgagee should avail himself of the clause under which he can have sent to him notices of convictions. A purchaser should see that his name was recorded as owner in lieu of that of his vendor. In case the mortgagor is also the tenant the mortgage should contain a power enabling the mortgagee, in the event of a second recorded conviction, to enter upon the premises and evict the mortgagor, notwithstanding that no principal or interest money is then, or has, in fact, become due.

WHEN ARE JUDGMENTS CHARGES ON LAND.

THE anomalies of the law relating to "judgments," so forcibly pointed out some years ago in a report of a committee of the Law Amendment Society,—the anomaly that a sheriff should be obliged to fold his arms, when property, which he is told to extend, turns out to be an equity of redemption, and to say he knows nothing about it; that the judgment creditor should, after finishing his action at law, have to begin again a new suit in equity to enforce his judgment; that a court of law should be unable to enforce charging orders which it is expressly empowered to grant; that sheriffs and receivers should oftentimes come into unseemly collision—are such as may, and we hope will, be cured by the Judicature Act; but it will not be able, we fear, to cure the evil and confusion which has arisen from the provisions of the Judgment Acts Amendment Act (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112), that a judgment shall not "affect land till actual delivery thereof in execution."

A notable instance of this has recently occurred on appeal from Vice-Chancellor Malins, before the full Court of Appeal in Chancery, in the case of Hatton v. Haywood (Weekly Notes, Nov. 15, 1873 and Jan. 24, 1874), which we noticed shortly a few weeks since. A judgment debtor had, at the date of the judgment, legally mortgaged his land, and afterwards became bankrupt. The judgment creditor, who had issued an elegit on which the sheriff returned "nihil," brought his bill against the trustee in bankruptcy, praying a declaration that the judgment was a lien on the land in mortgage. The trustee put in a demurrer for want of equity, which the Vice-Chancellor allowed; and his decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal, the reason given being that an equity of redemption not being extendible, the judgment could not be enforced in equity, until the legal obstacle of the mortgage had been removed. The course for the creditor to pursue, the Lord Chancellor (Selborne) said, was to redeem the mortgage and then come and petition for sale. Now, putting out of view for the moment the effect of this decision upon the earlier law and authorities upon the subject, we see what an inconvenience might arise in practice, not to say injustice, under this state of circumstances. The mortgagee might claim six months to be redeemed in, during which time the debtor might make a second mortgage, the second mortgagee might give notice of it to the judgment creditor, and it is difficult to see how he could help acquiring priority over him. The judgment creditor had not lent his money on the credit of the land, and would therefore have no right to tack his judgment to the first mortgage. And we are told this difficulty has actually arisen in practice since the decision in Hatton v. Haywood.

Now the first question that occurs to us is, what effect the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, has on the earlier statute, i.e., on the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. Vice-Chancellor Malins—in answer to the argument pressed on him in another case, that notwithstanding the 27 & 28 Vict. the judgment creditor has an interest in land by virtue of his judgment, because 1 & 2 Vict. is not repealed—has said, that, as the two Acts are inconsistent with each other, and cannot stand together, the earlier Act is virtually repealed by the latter: (Earl of Cork v. Russell, L. Rep. 13 Eq. 215; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 230); whilst the late Master of the Rolls, speaking less positively, thinks a strict construction of the words "actually delivered" in different parts of the later Act raises serious doubts whether sect. 13 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 (which first made judgments an equitable charge on land) has not been repealed; or, if not, how far it is reconcileable with the provisions of 27 & 28 Vict. (Padwick v. Duke of Newcastle, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 700; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 343). That was a case in which the plaintiff, a shrewd and well-known solicitor, appears to have miscarried in his attempt to enforce his judgment against a leasehold of which the defendant was equitable tenant for life, on the ground that it was not a case of simple trust, which is the only equitable interest in land which is extendible, and that he had issued a fi. fa. instead of an elegit, whereas the only cases in which sect. 11 of 1 & 2 Vict. gives the judgment creditor a remedy at law, are those in which he has sued out an elegit. On the other hand Lord Hatherley, then Vice-Chancellor Wood, in Re Cowbridge Railway Company (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 102; L. Rep. 5 Eq. 416) thought "it could not have been intended that all the remedies given by 1 & 2 Vict. should be swept away" (by 27 & 28 Vict.) "by a sidewind."

Another question which has arisen, and on which there seems a conflict of opinion between different branches of the court, is as to the necessity of making judgment creditors parties to a foreclosure suit, the Master of the Rolls having held that such creditors who have not issued execution are (Mildred v. Austin, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 939; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 220), and Vice-Chancellor Malins having held that they are not, necessary parties: (Earl of Cork v. Russell (ubi sup.), in the report of which, it should be observed, there is an error in a head-note). We hope, however, that this conflict may be guarded against for the future by the rules of procedure now being framed under the Judicature Act.

A third, and perhaps more important question is, what is an "actual delivery in execution by virtue of a writ of elegit?" Lord Hatherley thinks it "very difficult to give any meaning to those words," and so, we confess, do we. And again: "There is some difficulty," said that learned Judge, "in knowing what the Legislature meant by saying that the land must be absolutely" (the word of the Act is 'actually') "delivered in execution." Now the first thing, and perhaps the only thing, which is clear in the whole matter is, that the word "actual" is not to be taken in its literal signification, and does not mean "actual," and that the delivery of an acre is a different sort of delivery from the delivery of a chair or any other purely personal chattel. For how can, for instance, incorporeal hereditaments, which are "lands" within 27 & 28 Vict. (see sect. 2), or a trust of land, where the possession is in the trustees, be "actually delivered" in that sense? "Actual" is a word often occurring in modern legislation and in private instruments, and several decisions have turned upon it, e.g., in the construction of executory trusts (see Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon, 1 J. & H. 40; Hogg v. Jones, 32 Beav. 45), though it has nowhere, so far as we are aware, been defined, as assuredly it ought to be.

Vice-Chancellor Giffard was of opinion that the priorities of judgment creditors inter se against the land are ascertained according to the dates at which the writs are placed in the sheriff's hands (Guest v. Cowbridge Railway Company, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 871; L. Rep. 6 Eq. 619), which shows that they affected the land, in his opinion, prior to delivery thereof, and the decree in Mildred v. Austin, which, like Hatton v. Haywood, was a case in which land was in mortgage at the date of the judgment, declared that the defendants, the judgment creditors, acquired a charge on the lands comprised in the mortgage from the time they had performed three acts, viz., issued the writ, placed it in the sheriff's hands, and procured a return to it. But if the return be nihil, as it would be where the debtor's interest is only an equity of redemption, we do not see how the return can give them any interest. They have, however, a right to remove a legal obstacle, e.g., to redeem, upon putting the writ in the hands of the sheriff, and before the return. They had this right under the old jurisdiction prior to 1 & 2 Vict., and it is not taken away by the recent Act, as the Court of Appeal admitted in Hatton v. Haywood. But if they had a right to redeem the land, it can only be by having an interest in the land, because those only may redeem who have such an interest (2 Cruise Dig., 4th edit., 104), and a demurrer for want of equity would lie to a bill by a party having no such interest, and that interest can be nothing short of a lien or charge, and, if so, it is difficult to understand the law which enacts, that the security shall only first affect the land upon an event, such as delivery long subsequent, it may be, to the date of the judgment.

In short, the matter is full of difficulty, and of frequent occurrence, and can, we believe, only be cleared away by a comprehensive code or digest of the whole law of judgments, both statutory under the Acts of the Queen, and otherwise—that is, under the old jurisdiction as it existed previous to those statutes.

We may notice that within the last few days the doctrine in Hatton v. Haywood has received confirmation by the Court of Appeal in another case, Re South (Times, March 17, 1874; Weekly Notes, March 21, 1874), with reference to the subject of a remaind r in land.

LAW LIBRARY.

The History of the Common Law of Great Britain and Gaul. Part I. By PYM YEATMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens and Sons.

THIS is the first instalment of a work of apparently a similar character to Reeves' History of the English Law. Of works of this class it is difficult to form a just opinion until the whole is presented to the reader, and always ungrateful to form a hostile one, because, whatever their demerits, they are monuments in a way of considerable industry. The present work, however, cannot be read without serious doubts arising that its excessive originality will disqualify it for a very wide success. Its scope is the investigation of the ancient law of the Ancient Britons, with a view to establishing that the Roman Civil Law was in a great measure derived from it. The author is sanguine that the result of his lucubrations will be considerably to affect the modern decisions of the judges upon numerous points (p. 7). Whether such anticipations are well founded is not a matter for present speculation; but until the author more firmly establishes upon authentic evidence the facts which support his main theory of the origin of the civil law, his conclusion on the subject of the origin of that law will probably rank with another conclusion at which he arrives, p. 59, viz., "that they (i.e., the Druids) had retained the science of the Noachidæ and must, in fact, have been the direct descendants of that son of Noah whose issue it is conjectured settled down on this portion of the globe," &c. A conclusion not more ridiculous, however, than the fable of Brute the Trojan, which many historians condescend to notice, and which our author condescends to believe (p. 51), on the ground that Homer and probabilities establish it. A large amount of learning is undoubtedly displayed by the present work, and also considerable skill in the art of writing lucidly, which ought to be employed more profitably than in advocating the most hopeless of newly-invented theories. On many questions, a superficial acquaintance with which is creditable, this work discloses much knowledge; but its conclusions, which are avowedly opposed to those of Maine, and certainly deviate widely from the positions maintained by the more accredited historians, are certainly unworthy of a laborious support, and incapable of a successful one. If this publication is to be continued, it will require a very careful rescension, for sometimes the author differs as widely from himself as from Freeman. Thus it is laid down (p. 79), "Britain must have become half Roman in its population," and at p. 77, "There is no reason, but the contrary, to suppose that the conquest of Britain by the Romans made any great change among the inhabitants"—two assertions which ought not to be left to the student to reconcile with one another. The necessity of asserting even by implication (p. 40) "that the ancient inhabitants of this country were the descendants of Japhet," "that (p. 54) Homer clearly referred to the Druids," and various other matters of a similar description, might also profitably be reconsidered on a rescension. On the same occasion expediency might suggest that the main theory of the work does not pledge the historian to go so far as to declare (p. 63) that the ancient Britons were superior in civilisation to their Roman contemporaries, and were "a nation of poets and philosophers, who had imparted the light of their learning to ancient Greece itself," and that declarations of such nature must be an obstacle to the success of any work which contains them. The theory which this history seeks to establish is sufficiently startling to awaken all the incredibility of mankind, and its acceptance will assuredly be rendered more difficult by being associated with many views which the world is in the habit of treating with ridicule.

We have already commended the volume from a literary point of view, and therefore there is less objection to pointing out a few of its demerits in point of style. It seems unnecessary in discussing the Venerable Bede (p. 5), to leave that respectable author and assert "that Protestants have lied to cover every iniquity," and to declare (p. 6) that people "worship themselves instead of truth," and "pervert history into lies." The historian would do well to avoid the monosyllable which expresses mendacity, and to abandon also the forcible feeble invective, which leads to the expressions, "shocking impositions" (p. 206), "trash and trumpery of dilettanti" (p. 7), and various similar phrases which are unfitting the dignity even of unsuccessful historical compilations. There is a style of invective which demolishes those views against which it is directed and does not damage the person who employs it. If, whenever the author requires the aid of passion and denunciation he would employ such invective, his language which is generally of considerable merit would be freed from blemishes which even a coarse and blunted fastidiousness must feel to be distasteful. Our candid opinion is that this history should not absorb any further labour; the positions which it seeks to establish have no practical interest and cannot excite much popular or professional curiosity; and if the historian desires to waste his labour upon a work of the nature of this one, he will find a wider audience and an equally good subject if he turns to the famous question which has been for a long time before minds of a paradoxical and curious turn, viz., the question whether the English people are not identical with the lost tribes of Israel.

The Commentaries of Gaius and Rules of Ulpian. Translated with Notes by J. T. ABDY, LL.D., Judge of County Courts, and late Cambridge Regius Professor of Laws, and BRYAN WALKER, M.A., LL.D., Law Lecturer of St. John's College. New edition. Cambridge: At the University Press, 1874.

THE first edition of Gaius, translated and annotated by the above gentlemen, was published in 1870, and the whole of that edition having, as we understand, been exhausted, the editors now republish the work, and for the first time bind up with Gaius the well-known "Rules of Ulpian." The contents of the book are an English translation and notes placed underneath the corresponding text of Gaius and Ulpian, an appendix consisting of nineteen short dissertations or notes, and an index verborum.

The ability of the editors to produce a translation and annotation worthy of Cambridge has been recognised by the Syndics of the University Press, for whom the work was specially prepared. We have found the "Commentaries of Gaius" in the English dress here appearing easy and agreeable reading. The notes contain the kind of information and references which the student will, at the time he is reading the originals, be most in need of, and they are free from the sins besetting the German commentators upon the civil law of being almost interminably long and vexatiously inconclusive. Criticism and knowledge of an ampler nature involving the setting out of numerous distinctions, requirements, exceptions, and details are dealt with in the appendix, under such heads as "Status," "Potestas," "Tutors," "Acquisition," "Lex Julia et Papia Poppæa," "Bonorum Possessio," "Proceedings in a Roman Civil Law Action," "The Dissolution of Obligations," &c.

The undergraduate or Bar student who is about to commence the study of Roman law will do well to place this text book upon his book shelf, and we see no reason why it should not have a prosperous future before it in the book market, notwithstanding the rival editions with which it must continue to compete.

LEGISLATION AND JURISPRUDENCE.

Friday, March 20.

SALE AND TRANSFER OF LAND.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR gave notice that on Thursday next he should call attention to the subject of the sale and transfer of land in England.

Papers were laid on the table by the Marquis of SALISBURY, the Earl of CARNARVON, and the Earl of DERBY.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

On the motion of Lord REDESDALE, the following resolutions were agreed to:—"That this House will not receive any petition for a private Bill after Monday, the 30th day of this instant March, unless such private Bill shall have been approved by the Court of Chancery; nor any petition for a private Bill approved by the Court of Chancery after Monday, the 12th day of May next." "That this House will not receive any report from the judges upon petitions presented to this House for private Bills after Monday, the 12th day of May next." "That so much of Standing Order No. 179, s. 3, as requires that 'no such Bill shall be read a second time earlier than the fourth day nor later than the seventh day after the first reading thereof' be suspended during the present session, and that every such Bill shall be read a second time on the fourth day after the first reading thereof, whether the Standing Orders applicable thereto have or have not been complied with; and that so much of the Order of the 15th day of March 1859, as requires two clear days' notice of the day on which any Bill shall be examined, shall also be suspended during the present session in respect to Bills originating in this House."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, March 24.

HYPOTHEC, &c. (SCOTLAND).

Mr. J. BARCLAY asked the Lord-Advocate whether he intended, on behalf of the Government, to introduce a measure abolishing agricultural hypothec in Scotland, and if he was prepared to inform the House what were the "other measures relating to her (Scotland's) interests" referred to in Her Majesty's speech.—The LORD-ADVOCATE said there had not yet been time for maturely considering what measures relating to Scotland could be advantageously introduced at present. The interests of Scotland would not be neglected, but the hon. member must allow the Government to choose the proper time, with reference to the other business before the House, for the introduction of such measures. (Hear.)—Mr. J. BARCLAY said the learned Lord had scarcely answered his first question.—The LORD-ADVOCATE said his answer had been intended to cover it. (A laugh.)—Mr. J. BARCLAY also asked the cause of the delay in publishing the Census returns for Scotland, and when they would be issued.—The LORD-ADVOCATE was understood to say that two volumes of these returns had been presented to Parliament, and the delay as to the rest was the subject of a correspondence between the present Home Secretary and the authorities in Scotland. He was informed that it was caused to some extent by the necessity of preparing certain special returns in connection with the Education Act.

PATENT LAW.

Newton v. Grand Junction Railway Company. 1846.—Pollock, C.B. "It was argued that the same criterion is to be applied to the question of infringement as to that of novelty. But that is not so. In order to ascertain the novelty, you take the entire invention, and if, in all its parts combined together, it answers the purpose by the introduction of any new matter, by any new combination, or by a new application, it is a novelty entitled to a patent. But, in considering the question of infringement, all that is to be looked at is, whether the defendant has pirated a part of that to which the patent applies; and if he has used that part, for the purposes for which the patentee adapted his invention, and for which he has taken out his patent, and the jury are of opinion that the difference is merely colourable, it is an infringement." Alderson, B. "If the invention consists of something new and a combination of that with what is old, then if an individual takes for his own and uses that which is the new part of the patent, that is an infringement of it." (5 Ex. 331; 20 L. J. 427, Ex.)

Unwin v. Heath. H. L. 1855.—A. obtained a patent for certain improvements in the manufacture of iron and steel. The specification described the invention as consisting in "the use of carburet of manganese in any process whereby iron is converted into cast steel," and directed the unfused carburet of manganese to be put into the pot containing the steel in a fused state. The patentee claimed as his invention "the use of carburet of manganese in any process for the conversion of iron into cast steel." B. manufactured cast steel by placing oxide of manganese and carbonaceous matter into the pot at the same moment as the steel. Evidence was given that carburet of manganese would be formed by the combination of these substances before the steel was melted. They produced the same effect upon the steel as the carburet of manganese, at a cheaper rate. This method of producing the effect was not known at the time of taking out the patent. Held, that this was a new invention, and not an infringement of the patent. The judges, in answering the question put to them by the House of Lords, differed as to the question of infringement. Crowder, J. "The process of the plaintiff in error is an improvement upon the invention of the defendant in error (the patentee) while at the same time it is an infringement of his patent." Crompton, J.—"I do not agree with the argument for the plaintiff in error, that the question of infringement can depend on whether the mode of working alleged to be an infringement was, or was not known to the patentee, or to those skilled in the particular matter at the time of the specification. . . . . If a new process, of which he (the patentee) and all others were ignorant at the time of the specification, is found out afterwards, the exercise of such new process may be an infringement, provided that it is substantially the same with or includes the patented invention. An improved method of doing in effect the same thing may well be an infringement of the patent, though not known at the time of the specification. . . . . The use of different things producing the same effect, whether operating in the same or a different manner, might be the use of things out of the patent, and might properly be called the use of an equivalent. The present is not, in my opinion, the use of what can be properly termed an equivalent." Williams, J.—"Though the use of a chemical or mechanical substitute, which is a known equivalent to the thing pointed out by the specification and claimed as the invention, amounts to an infringement of the patent, yet if the equivalent were not known to be so at the time of the patent and specification, the use of it is no infringement. . . . . If a patent is taken out for the application of a principle, coupled with a mode of carrying the principle into effect, the patentee is entitled to protection from all other modes of doing so, whether known or not known at the time of the specification." Erle, J.—"I am of opinion that a patent for the use of a substance in a process is infringed by the use of the elements of that substance known to be equivalent thereto at the time of the use, if used for the purpose of taking the benefit of the patent and of making a colourable variation therefrom." Parke, B., said: "In delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in a former stage of this case, I stated the opinion of the court to be, that there could be no indirect infringement if the defendant did not intend to imitate at all. That part of the judgment has since been justly objected to in Stevens v. Keating, and no doubt we were in error in that respect. There may be an indirect infringement as well as a direct one, though the intention of the party be perfectly innocent, and even though he may not know of the existence of the patent itself. . . . The specification must be read as persons acquainted with the subject would read it, at the time it was made; and if it could be construed as containing any chemical equivalents, it must be such as are known to such person at that time; but those which are not known at the time as equivalents, and afterwards are found to answer the same purpose, are not included in the specification." Pollock, C.B.—"The right of the plaintiff does not turn upon the extent of his claim, but upon the communication made to the public as to the mode of accomplishing his object, and he has no right to claim anything but that which he has communicated to the public, however large in point of language his claim may appear to be . . . The present invention has four points, but it is with the fourth alone that we have to deal, and upon which any question arises. This is stated in the specification to be, 'Fourthly, the use of carburet of manganese in any process whereby iron is converted into cast steel.' This statement does not, in my opinion, give to the patentee, as some of my learned brothers seem to think, the exclusive right of using carburet of manganese in any and every possible process, or in any and every mode of using it, in order to convert iron into cast steel; but it only gives to the plaintiff such an exclusive right as regards such process or processes as he afterwards further describes, declares, and makes known for the benefit of the public, and such other similar processes as are reasonably within the description, according to the then state of knowledge; also he is protected against fraudulent imitations, or evasions of, or substitutions of equivalents in his process or processes as specified. . . . I entirely agree with my brothers Alderson and Coleridge (referring to their judgments as given in the Court of Exchequer Chamber), that the patent (as explained in the specification) covers and protects not only the process actually specified, but any process with chemical equivalents known as such at the date of the patent, but not chemical equivalents discovered afterwards, for this would be giving the patentee not only the benefit of his own discovery, but the benefit of the discoveries of other persons subsequently to the date of the patent." (5 H. of L. Cas. 505; 25 L. J. 8, C. P.) Coleridge, J., in delivering judgment in this case in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, said: "There can be no doubt, I think, that an equivalent has been used. If that equivalent were known at the date of the specification to the plaintiff or ordinary chemists—those, I mean, who would bring to the reading of the specification such knowledge as must be presumed in those to whom the patent must be taken to be addressed—then it is within the specification, and the use of it is an infringement. If not the contrary conclusion follows, and the use of it is an improvement, in virtue of a new discovery, . . . Whether the equivalent be in its nature near to or remote from the thing itself, seems to be in principle wholly immaterial, and equally so that the one should be so nearly identical with the other, as in themselves the component parts may be of composite substances:" (2 Web. P. C. 244; 12 C. B. 522; 22 L. J. 7, C. P.; 16 Jur. 996; 13 M. & W. 583.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

IF the Legal Practitioners' Society continues its labours at the same rate and with the same vigour as marked its commencement, we cannot doubt but that, ere long, it will have been the principal means of accomplishing many important reforms in connection with the legal profession. We are glad to notice that the Bill entitled, "The Legal Practitioners' Act 1874," the provisions of which were published in our two previous issues was, on the 20th inst., read a first time in the House of Commons, leave being given to Mr. W. T. Charley and Mr. C. E. Lewis to introduce the same, and, seeing that the terms of the formal leave so given were to introduce a "Bill to amend the law relating to legal practitioners," the promoters are not as yet pledged to any particular form of Bill, or indeed any particular objects, the Profession ought not to lose this opportunity to include in the measure all isolated cases affecting the interests of solicitors, which need to be dealt with by legislative enactments; and the Bill itself, as at present framed, should be carefully considered by the Profession, and observations and suggestions thereon, together with the like on all other subjects needing reform, which might be included in the measure, should be forwarded to the honorary secretary, in order that he might submit them to the Parliamentary Committee appointed by the society to frame the Bill. Unfortunately, some time must elapse before the second reading of the Bill, for we are asked by the honorary secretary to state that the measure stands the first order of the day for the second reading on the 8th July next, being the first clear day that could be obtained. The best use that can be made of this long interval is, as we said before, for solicitors to use every means in their power to secure the measure becoming law in a well-digested and useful form, the object being to protect the public not less than the Profession. We are very glad to have had the opportunity of seeking to advance the interests of solicitors by giving every publicity in our power to the Bill which has been introduced into Parliament; and, this much done, it will be very disheartening to us if through the apathy of the Profession the measure goes the way of all other Bills in Parliament which have not the hearty support of those who are interested in their becoming law. We are asked to add that prints of the Bill as at present framed can be had on application by letter addressed to the honorary secretary at the office of this journal. Subscriptions, which are much needed, are limited to the sum of 5*s.* annually, except in the case of vice-presidents, whose subscription is one guinea.

THE subject of the issue of commissions to solicitors to administer oaths in the various courts is a matter, says a correspondent, well worthy of the attention of the Legal Practitioners' Society. The authority for the issue of these commissions is to be found in numerous Acts of Parliament, and subject to a great variety of regulations and restrictions. Our own opinion is that the better course to adopt is to await the operation of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, and then that the Parliamentary Committee of the society should take the matter into consideration, and, if necessary, frame a bill upon the subject, which would, no doubt, receive the support of the council of the Incorporated Law Society. There seems to be no reason why a solicitor of a certain number of years' standing should not be entitled, after notice to the secretary of the Incorporated Law Society, to a commission empowering him to administer oaths in connection with business in every court in the United Kingdom.

A LETTER which appeared in the Times of the 21st inst., under the heading "Election Expenses," and bearing the nom de plume "Reasonable," is probably one of the most unreasonable for some time past published in the leading journal. Speaking of solicitors, the writer observes, "that all interested in elections" should "make a stand and resist the attempt which is being made by professional agents to establish a precedent by charging for their services sums which are unreasonable and unjust. Candidates, who had no experience of the ballot, were obliged to use the old system of agency by solicitors, one or more taking charge of each polling district; those who are selected are often men with small legal businesses, they make the most of the opportunity, and think any charge fair at an election, and care not to check extravagant charges." This letter may be described as scurrilous. Are solicitors to blame for the operation of the Ballot Act, and the increase of expenditure occasioned thereby at contested elections? The writer in question offers no evidence or information as to the alleged attempt on the part of solicitors to establish a precedent which, if so attempted, we would readily join with him in condemning. We suppose the correspondent in question was an unsuccessful candidate at the recent election, and, of course, had to pay for the honour with which he sought to cover himself; and as regards his complaint that candidates "were obliged to use the old system of agency by solicitors," it is very well known that these duties are often undertaken by solicitors in very extensive practice; and we know of cases innumerable in which solicitors, by devoting themselves with zeal to the interests of the political party with which, for years in country towns, they have been associated, have suffered losses in connection with their business, for which their remuneration as political agents, affords but an indifferent recompense. We say, too, advisedly, that solicitors, as a rule, above all things, work from genuine political zeal, and they are not ready to work for whichever side will pay them best; indeed, we are not sure whether we are wise in noticing such unjust observations. We hope, with the writer of the letter, that "the friends of candidates will speak out very decidedly, and resist" all imposition shown to exist, and which, we are quite sure, solicitors will be the first to denounce as readily as they will the disappointed correspondent of the Times, for recklessly attacking a body of professional men without the slightest justification.

SINCE the time when this journal was first published, now exactly thirty-one years ago, we have always urged upon the Profession the necessity of fostering and encouraging reforms which, though they may not tend to the immediate interests of the Profession, yet are necessary for the public good, and if so necessary will surely ultimately prove of benefit to solicitors. We look, therefore, with anxious expectation, for the Lord Chancellor's measure affecting the transfer of land. If it points to benefits to be conferred upon the public, we, and no doubt the Profession, will accept and adopt it; but if on the other hand it is a measure ill-digested, and promising nothing but reform for reform's sake, a measure which, while it curtails the legitimate profits of solicitors, offers no equivalent in the shape of a boon to the public, in such case it will merit all the opposition which it is happily in the power of solicitors to offer to it, if they only choose to exert that power by proper organisation. The last measure introduced into Parliament upon the subject of the transfer of land, received its quietus rather in consequence of its own demerits than any combined efforts on the part of the Profession to expose them. The Profession will read with interest the debate that has already taken place upon the measure.

No doubt many law stationers work in the legitimate grooves of their calling, but some there are most assuredly who undertake much work which should be dealt with in solicitors' offices. We are informed by a country correspondent that applications for grants of probate and letters of administration, where the estate is sworn under £500, though at times much over the amount, are made to a large extent by certain firms of law stationers, accountants, and agents. Country solicitors are—says our correspondent—known to send such matters to persons, who slightly undercut the Profession in their charges. We are certainly of opinion that no papers should be received into any of the registries unless bearing the name of a solicitor. This would be surely acceptable to the officials, because it would be a guarantee against papers being carried in (as at times we are assured they are) in such a form as clearly indicates that they have been prepared by some incompetent and non-professional person. Law stationers whose business consists of what the name indicates (and there are many well-known firms so working in conjunction with our Profession) would, we are sure, welcome such a rule which would clearly operate—as it should—to their advantage. We some time since called attention to the fact that many of the forms and instructions issued from Somerset House require that certain matters and things of a quasi legal nature should be transacted "by an agent." We urged then, and do so still, that the words "by a solicitor" should be substituted.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to inquire what will become of the expressions "Barrister-at-Law," "Special Pleader," and similar terms, such as "Attorney-General," &c., &c., when the Judicature Act comes into operation, and the long talked of "fusion" takes place. The Act itself provides for the substitution of the name "Solicitor of the High Court" for all other names by which members of the lower branch of the Profession are known. The other titles are not affected.

GREAT complaint is made, and justly so, of the wretched production, in the shape of Common Law Stamps, recently issued from Somerset House, for use at judges' chambers and elsewhere. It seems that the stamped impression can be almost, if not entirely, removed from the paper on which it is impressed even by the heat of the hand; so much so that a report for some time existed at chambers that fraudulent stamps had been made use of, for which, however, there is not the slightest justification. A formal complaint has, we understand, already been made to the authorities. It is certainly a matter that needs immediate attention.

IT is reported that the Law and Parliamentary Committee of the Court of Common Council are disposed to recommend a junior in the office of the Lord Mayor's Court for promotion to the vacant office of registrar of that court. We do not know whether the gentleman in question happens to be a professional man, but, if not, we hope the committee will hesitate before taking a step which it can hardly be expected that the Common Council will adopt.

WE are glad to notice that a solicitor, in the person of Mr. Goldney, M.P., has been appointed to serve on the Royal Commission of inquiry into the relations existing between masters and servants, the other members of the commission being the Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Winmarleigh, Mr. Bouverie, M.P., the Recorder of London, Sir M. Smith, Mr. Roebuck, M.P., Mr. T. Hughes, and Mr. M'Donald. M.P.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

ACTION FOR NEGLIGENCE—GENERAL ALLEGATIONS OF NEGLIGENCE—APPLICATION FOR PARTICULARS—NEGLIGENCE IN THE NAVIGATION OF A SHIP.—Where the declaration in an action against the defendant for negligent navigation of his ship, causing injury to the plaintiff, contains only general allegations of negligence on the part of the defendant in respect of navigation, and of keeping the machinery and the ship in good repair, the court will not require the plaintiff to give particulars of matters which he may suppose to constitute the negligence of the defendant, such being within the knowledge of the defendant and his servants, and not necessarily within the personal knowledge of the plaintiff: (George v. Watts, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 60. C. P.)

WILL—DUE EXECUTION—FOOT OR END—15 & 16 VICT. c. 34.—Testatrix made a will on a lithograph form. The disposing part began on the second side, and was continued on the third, the fourth was a blank; and the appointment of executors, execution, and attestation clause were on the first page. Held, that the will was duly executed: (In the goods of Wotton, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75. Prob.)

LIVERY STABLE KEEPER—CARRIAGE DEPOSITED FOR SAFE KEEPING—LIABILITY OF KEEPER—OBLIGATION AS TO CONDITION OF BUILDING.—The obligation of a livery stable keeper, who for reward receives carriages for safe keeping, as to the building in which the carriages are kept, is to take reasonable care that the building in which the carriages are deposited is in a proper state so that the things therein deposited may be reasonably safe in it. He is not responsible for the fall of the building by the careless or improper conduct of the builder of which he had not notice. The defendant a livery stable keeper, employed a builder (not a servant of the defendant, but an independant contractor), to erect on part of his yard a building of which the lower part was a shed for the reception of carriages for reward. Plaintiff deposited two carriages with the defendant for safe keeping, which were placed in the above-mentioned shed. Whilst the carriages were there the building was blown down by a high wind, and the carriages were injured. The builder was one whom a careful and prudent person might trust, and the defendant had no notice of any negligence on the builder's part. An action having been brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, evidence was offered at the trial, on the part of the plaintiff, to show that owing to the neglect of the builder and his workmen, the building was in fact unskilfully built and unsafe, and that this was the cause of the fall. The judge rejected this evidence and nonsuited the plaintiff: Held, that this evidence was rightly rejected and that the nonsuit was right: (Searle v. Laverick, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 89. Q. B.)

WILL—SHIFTING CLAUSE—RE-SETTLEMENT OF THE ESTATE.—T. M., by his will made in 1837, devised his P. estates to trustees, in trust for his grandson T. C., the second son of J. C. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to W. M. for life, and to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder over, and the testator declared that if T. C., or his issue male, should become seised, or entitled in possession to the S. estates settled on the marriage of J. C., then the trust of his said real estate in favour of T. C. should absolutely cease, and his said estates should go the person next beneficially entitled in remainder under the trusts, in the same manner as if T. C. were then deceased without male issue. In 1854 the S. estates were disentailed and resettled as to part thereof to the use of J. C. in fee; and, as to the rest, to uses under which, on the death of the eldest son of J. C. without issue, and of J. C., T. C. became tenant for life. On a bill filed by W. M., claiming under those circumstances the benefit of the shifting clause; Held, that the event contemplated by the testator had not happened. The shifting clause was only intended to operate in the event of T. C. or his issue becoming entitled to the S. estates under the settlement. The entail under that settlement had been barred, and T. C. had come into possession of a portion only of those estates under a different title. The shifting clause did not apply to such a state of things: (Meyrick v. Mathias, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77. Chan.)

APPRENTICE—NECESSARIES—EVIDENCE OF CUSTOM TO EXPLAIN THE TERMS OF A DEED—TECHNICAL MEANING KNOWN TO ONE ONLY OF TWO CONTRACTING PARTIES.—Where in a deed of apprenticeship the master covenanted to find meat, drink, lodging, and all other necessaries, and certain wages: Held, that he was not entitled to set-off the wages due to the apprentice against the cost of clothes and washing supplied to him. A custom to do this could not be supported, as it would contravene the terms of the indenture. A custom among the masters to interpret the word "necessaries" as excluding clothes and washing in apprenticeship indentures would not bind the apprentice, he not being a person in the trade who would have knowledge of the word bearing a meaning other than the ordinary one. A custom to control the meaning of a word in a deed between parties must be a custom of trade known to the parties, and must be definite and not variable: (Abbott v. Bates, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 99. C.P.)

ANNUITY CHARGED ON LAND—RECEIVER—POWER OF DISTRESS—4 GEO. 2, c. 28—LAND OF AMPLE VALUE TO PAY THE ANNUITY.—A testator by his will bequeathed certain leaseholds to the defendant, upon condition that he paid thereout, or out of the rents thereof, an annuity of £70, by half-yearly payments, to the plaintiff during his life. The leaseholds were of amply sufficient value to secure payment of the annuity. The annuity had been regularly paid since the death of the testator. One half-yearly payment of the annuity being in arrear, the annuitant filed his bill to enforce payment thereof, and for the appointment of a receiver. Held, that the annuity being charged on land of amply sufficient value to secure payment thereof, with a power of distress superadded by the statute 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, the plaintiff was not entitled to have a receiver appointed, and bill dismissed with costs: (Kelsey v. Kelsey, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 82. V.C. M.)

FREE MINER—FOREST OF DEAN.—In 1868, D., a free miner of the Forest of Dean, duly applied to have a particular gale granted to him, pursuant to the provisions of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 43, s. 60. The gaveller acceded to his application, and issued a notice that a grant would be made to D. on a day named. Prior to this day rival claimants to the gale started up, and subsequently other claims were made, the result being that D. died before any grant was actually made to him. Held, that D. had acquired a transmissible interest in the gale. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 43, s. 38, enacts that "an application made by any person for a gale, but which has not been duly granted by" the gaveller, "shall not confer a title to any gale." Semble, that this section applied only to applications already made at the time of the passing of the Act, and did not apply to applications subsequently made: (James v. The Queen, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 84. V.C. M.)

DISTRESS — COLOUR OF RIGHT — RIGHT OF COMMON PUR CAUSE DE VICINAGE — SURCHARGE OF CATTLE.—A claim of a custom from time immemorial that cattle upon adjoining commons strayed from one to the other, is a sufficient colour of right to deprive a commoner of one common of the remedy of distress against trespassing cattle of a commoner of the adjoining common, even although the latter has surcharged his own common: (Cape v. Scott, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87. Q. B.)

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS (3 & 4 WILL. 4, C. 27), S. 3—DISCONTINUANCE OF POSSESSION—RECEIPT OF RENT BY AGENT.—So long as an agent is in receipt of the rent of land, the Statute of Limitations will not run against his employer; and if a person commence to receive rents as the agent of another, and afterwards continue to recieve such rents, without paying them over, he must be presumed to receive as agent till the contrary is shown: (Smith and Another v. Bennett, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 100. Ex.)

WILL—RENUNCIATION OF EXECUTORS—RETRACTATION OF RENUNCIATION.—A renunciation of executorship is not complete, and may be retracted at any time before it is filed in the court: (In the goods of Morant, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 74. Prob.)

BLOOMSBURY COUNTY COURT.

Thursday, March 19.

STEVENSON v. SAVORY.

PLAINTIFF, a stationer of 99, Oxford-street, W., sought to recover the amount of £6 for stationery supplied to the defendant Savory, a money-lender, &c., of 40, Great Marlborough-street, Regent-street. The circumstance, as stated by Alsopp, for the plaintiff, and the evidence went to show that the defendant ordered stationery of the plaintiff, items of which consisted of professional cards and envelopes. On the cards was engraved the name of the defendant "Mr. Savory, solicitor," and on the envelopes the intertwined monogram, "S. C." Plaintiff stated that defendant came to his shop and ordered the goods which were accordingly sent home, with an invoice, the money having been subsequently several times demanded. It was urged on the part of the defence, that some of the goods were for a Mr. Chidley, a solicitor, also living at 40, Great Marlborough-street, and were bought on his account. This was denied by plaintiff, who had already refused to trust him for a desk, which he had desired to purchase. It was also asserted, and not contracted, that although the defendant had acted as a solicitor he had no right to do so. He said he acted conjointly with Chidley, whose brass plate was on the door with the name of Savory underneath. The envelopes were intended for the joint and separate use of both parties, but the cards were a mistake, and were never issued.

His HONOUR was of opinion that this case required time to consider, he therefore adjourned it for judgment.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

COMPULSORY LIABILITY OF LAND BY A CORPORATION—SPECIAL ACT.—A corporation, previously to applying to Parliament for a special Act, served the usual preliminary notice on A., a landowner, informing him that his property, or some part of it, might be required for the purposes of their undertaking. The schedule to the notice described his property by reference to the numbers on the deposited plans, and contained the following note: "Property in the line of the proposed work, as at present laid out (including property any part of which is within eleven yards, or thereabouts, of the centre line of such proposed work, as delineated on the plan)." The special Act authorised the corporation to take such of the lands described on the deposited plans as they required for the purposes of their undertaking. The corporation then gave A. the usual notice to treat for a strip of land, thirty-three yards wide, in the centre line of the proposed work, being part of the property comprised in the former notice. The whole of the strip was within the limits of deviation. Held, that the words eleven yards "or thereabouts" in the preliminary notice, meant eleven yards, or so much more as might reasonably be required for the purposes of the undertaking, and did not limit the corporation to take eleven yards only on each side of the centre line; and that therefore they had power to take compulsorily the whole of the strip of land comprised in the notice to treat: (Corporation of Huddersfield v. Jacomb, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 78. V.C. M.)

RATING—OCCUPATION OF DOCKS AND SHEDS—PREFERENTIAL USE—POSSESSION OF DOCKS BOARD.—By the Mersey Docks Act Consolidation Act 1858, the dock board may appropriate docks, quays, or sheds to persons for the reception of their vessels and goods, provided they and their servants shall be subject to the regulations of the board; and the board may let such quays and sheds on such rents, terms, and conditions as they may deem expedient; but all persons employed shall be in the service of or approved by the board. By the Mersey Docks (Corporation Purchase) Act 1861, goods which have lain upon any quay or in any shed after a certain time, are liable, by way of penalty, to pay a rental per hour to the board. The appellants had appropriated to them, under the Act of 1858, certain docks, quays, and sheds; and the board fixed a charge per square yard per annum for the use of the shed space, such charge to commence from the date of occupation. This was a provisional agreement, and made during the pleasure of the board. When these appropriated premises were not actually in use by the appellants, they were, by direction of the board, and without appellant's consent, used by other vessels and their owners. The board's servants had access to all the premises. The goods of appellants were liable to the penal rent as well as those of other persons, and keys of some of the sheds were kept both by the appellants and the Customs' authorities. One of the appellants had used some ground within the dock property, as a coal depôt, for eighteen years. It was allotted to him for this purpose only and upon sufferance, he being bound to give it up at a week's notice; payment to be made for the use thereof at 1d. per square yard per week: Held, that the appellants were rateable for none of these premises: (Allan v. Liverpool Union, 30 L. T. Rep. N.S. 93. Q B.)

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—PURCHASER FOR VALUE WITHOUT NOTICE—LEGAL ESTATE OUTSTANDING.—The equitable doctrine that a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, who, at the time of purchase, gets nothing but an equitable title and afterwards has notice of an equitable interest, created prior to his purchase, may, nevertheless, get in a legal title and hold it as against such equitable interest, applies to a transferee under the Crown Lands Occupation Act 1861, of New South Wales. G., an occupier of lands in New South Wales, under promise of a lease from the Crown, being indebted to the appellants, gave them a transfer of his interest as security, which they neglected to register as required by the colonial statutes; he afterwards gave a transfer to the respondents, for a good consideration, without notice of the former incumbrance, they registered it and a lease was granted to them in accordance with the regulations in force in the colony. Held (affirming the judgment of the court below) that as the appellants had not made use of the documents of title they had obtained, they were entirely without any equity as against the statutory right of the respondents. Where a statute gave power to make regulations "for carrying it into full effect so as to provide for all proceedings, matters, and things arising under and consistent with the provisions thereof, and not therein expressly provided for;" held, that regulations admitted to be reasonable, and convenient, and not inconsistent with the Act, but which affected not only matters of form, but also matters of substance, were not ultra vires: (Blackwood v. The London Bank of Australia, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 45. Priv. C.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—SALES OF LAND—FARM—PARCHASER BOUND BY SPECIAL TERMS BETWEEN VENDOR AND TENANTS.—At the death of a landowner, three yearly tenants of his farms, on receiving from the defendants, trustees of his will, notice to quit when the tenancies should expire at Michaelmas 1869, asserted that the testator had promised them leases, whereupon the defendants entered into an agreement with them, in which, after reciting the alleged promise, it was agreed that, on the expiration of their tenancies, the tenants should be allowed half a year's rent, and market value for their hay, straw, &c., whereas, by the custom of the country, fodder value only was payable. The estate was afterwards sold by the defendants to the plaintiff, under particulars of sale describing the farms by the full annual rent at which they were held, and giving the names of the tenants, but no mention of the agreement was made in the particulars or conditions of sale, or abstract of title, under the bonâ fide belief that it was unnecessary to allude to it; nor did the plaintiff become aware of the existence thereof until an interview with the tenants after the sale. At the expiration of these tenancies, the farmers claimed from the plaintiff for their hay, straw, &c., the fodder value, which much exceeded the market price, and he, meaning to keep the farms in hand, paid their demand, and sought to recover the amount so paid from the defendants in an action. Upon a special case: Held, that he took the estate subject to the existing rights of the tenants, and, therefore, the defendants were not liable: (Phillips v. Miller, 30 L. T. Rep. N.S. 61. C.P.)

ACTION FOR PENALTY—3 & 4 WILL. 4, c. 90—POLLUTION OF WELL BY A GAS COMPANY—LEAVE AND LICENCE.—Where noxious matter percolates through the soil from gasworks, so as to foul a well, such percolation will render the defendants liable under the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, which imposes a penalty of £200 on any gas company, "who shall suffer any washings, &c., to be conveyed into any well." A well which, on account of its having become contaminated, has been disused by the owner for several years, and has been covered over, does not cease to be a well within the meaning of the Act. Non-user, and closing of his own well in consequence of its being polluted, even coupled with the acceptance by the plaintiff of the use of substituted wells of the defendants is not such an abandonment of the former as to alter its character and make it no longer a well, nor can any licence to pollute be inferred from such a state of facts. Quære per Keating, J. whether a man could by deed give an irrevocable license to pollute a well. A prescription to foul a well will be defeated by variation and excess in the degree of fouling during the prescribed period. Where an Act of Parliament, making an act illegal, comes into force while the prescription to do that act is running, semble, per Brett, J., that the prescription when acquired by due lapse of time will be an answer to an individual, suing as an individual, notwithstanding the statutory declaration: (Millington v. Griffiths and others, 30 L. Tep. N. S. 65. C. P.)

ANNUITY—CHARGE—INCOME OR CORPUS—ARREARS—COSTS.—A testator, after giving an annuity of £500 to two annuitants for their lives and the life of the survivor, and directing the income of his residuary real and personal estate, after payment thereof, to be accumulated for a term of years, devised his real estate, after the determination of the term, subject, nevertheless, and charged with the payment of the annuity as if the same had been secured by a lease for years, to his nephew for life, with remainders over in tail. The payment of the annuity was allowed to fall into arrear. Held, that the arrears were payable out of the income and not out of the corpus of the estate, that the charge was not restricted to the income of any particular year, and that it would, if necessary for payment of the arrears, continue beyond the lives of the annuitants: (Taylor v. Taylor, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 49. V.C. H.)

AGREEMENT TO LEASE—ABSENCE OF TITLE WITHOUT FAULT IN LESSOR—BUILDINGS COMPLETED—MEASURE OF LESSEE'S DAMAGES.—Plaintiff and defendants, who occupied adjoining premises, had entered into an agreement, in pursuance of which defendants pulled down part of plaintiff's premises, erected new buildings on the site thereof for themselves, and derived substantial and permanent benefit from the agreement. They also, in pursuance of the agreement, made a passage and side entrance to his premises for the plaintiff, but other persons, whose land it was, shut up the passage, and rendered the entrance impossible. Defendants were in the bona fide belief, until after all these buildings were completed, that they were owners in fee simple in possession of the land on which they built the passage, and no negligence or want of due care could be imputed to them, nor to the plaintiff, for acting on that assumption. The agreement also provided that the defendants, within two months of the completion of the buildings, should execute a lease to the plaintiff of, amongst other land, that which formed the passage, and that the lease should contain covenants similar to those in an indenture of lease recited in the agreement, so far as the same were applicable. The said recited indenture contained, amongst others, the ordinary covenant for quiet enjoyment. Held, in an action upon the agreement, that Flureau v. Thornhill (2 Wm. Bl. 1078) did not apply to this case; that the agreement between the parties was absolute, although the covenant to be inserted in the lease, and to run with the land, was to be restricted to the usual form; and that the plaintiff was entitled to the pecuniary amount of the difference between the present state of things, and what it would have been if the contract had been performed, and the plaintiff had got a title to this entrance: (Wall v. City of London Real Property Co., Limited, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 53. Q. B.)

MARITIME LAW.

SPECIMENS OF A CODE OF MARINE INSURANCE LAW.

By F. O. CRUMP, Barrister-at-Law.

AGENTS (OF INSURERS).

AGENTS for insurance purposes are so by express authority or by implication.

The appointment of an insurance agent may be by writing or orally, or impliedly by the course of business and correspondence between the principal and agent; and one is agent of another for whom he volunteers to act without any authority to do so, where such other recognizes his agency and ratifies his acts.

Phillips, sect. 1848.

The same person may be agent of both assured and underwriters.

Phillips, sect. 1850; Acey v. Fernie, 7 M. & W. 151.

An agent may employ a sub-agent, but cannot, without the consent of his principal, delegate his authority and transfer his responsibility to another.

Phillips, sect. 1869.

The revocation of an agent's authority does not affect any agreement he may have made, though he will cease to be authorized to bind his principal further.

Phillips, sect. 1871.

Persons having implied Authority to insure.

A partner to insure partnership property.

NOTE.—The firm will be liable to the broker for premiums and commissions.

Hooper v. Lusby, 4 Camp. 66.

NOTE.—Semble, a special partnership for a particular adventure implies the authority of each partner to insure the partnership property.

Arn. 4 edit. 147, citing Lindsay v. Gibbs, 4 Jur. N. S., 779; on app. 28 L. J. 692, Ch.; Green v. Briggs, 6 Hare, 395; Alexander v. Simms, 23 L. J. 721, Ch. Phillips, sect. 1852.

A consignee making advances.

Wolff v. Horncastle, 1 B. & P. 316; Carruthers v. Sheddon, 6 Taunt. 14; Smith v. Lascelles, 2 T. Rep. 187; Crawford v. Hunter, 8 T. Rep. 23. See Elsworth v. The Alliance Marine Insurance Company, L. Rep. 8 C. P. 596 (in which the court were divided as to the right of consignees under advances to insure an entire cargo in their own names, and to recover as trustees beyond their own interest for the consignors).

A general agent of a foreign principal having uncontrolled and unassisted management of the business:

2 Duer. 111, 113.

A master (or supercargo) (a), where the position of the subject matter raises the implication:

Arn., 4th edit., p. 149, citing Crawford v. Hunter, 8 T. Rep. 23; (a) per Jones, J., in De Forrest v. Fulton Fire & M. Ins. Co. 1 Hall, 84.

A merchant returning a consignment as in excess of order has authority to insure as agent of the consignor:

Cornwall v. Wilson, 1 Ves. Sen. 511.

A prize agent as such:

Stirling v. Vaughan, 11 East, 619.

An agent fully empowered by owners of ship and cargo captured as prize to protect their interests in a foreign court and "to forward the ship:"

Robertson v Hamilton, 14 East, 522; 2 Duer. 101, 102.

An agent who undertakes to insure, or, being a person to whom application would naturally be made, being applied to and not declining so to act:

Smith v. Lascelles, 2 T. Rep. 187; 1 Emerig. 148, c. 5, s. 87.

Persons not having implied Authority.

Part owners.

Naked consignees and agents for procuring consignments.

Ship's husband, merely as such.

Master and supercargo, merely as such.

Ratification.

Insurance being made by a person acting voluntarily without instructions or order from the party interested for whom the policy is intended, will, if it is ratified by the latter, be available to him.

Phillips, sect. 1868.

Ratification may be proved by adoption of the policy or be inferred from surrounding circumstances:

French v. Backhouse, 5 Burr. 2727; Robinson v. Gleadow, 2 Bing. N. C. 156; Lindsay v. Gibbs, 4 Jur. N. S. 779, 28 L. J. 692, Ch.; Routh v. Thompson, 13 East. 274; Lucena v. Crawford, 2 B. & P. N. R. 269; Barlow v. Leckie, 4 J. B. Moore 8.

Knowledge of the insurance having been made is necessary to an effectual ratification, and if a general order to insure is given before the unauthorised insurance is made, but not received until afterwards, that would not amount to a ratification:

Bell v. Janson, 1 M. & S. 201.

An express ratification, though conditional in its terms, is equivalent to a prior authority if the contingency on which it was to depend has happened when received:

Bridge v. Niagara Ins. Co., 1 Hall 247.

THEIR LIABILITY.

I.—As to effecting Insurance.

An agent who undertakes, so as to bind himself, to insure, is liable to his principal if he fail to do so, or does not exercise ordinary skill and care.

Story on Agency, 149, 150; Wallace v. Tellfair, 2 T. Rep. 188, in notis; Hurrell v. Bullard, 3 F. & F. 445.

Clear, precise, and intelligible directions must be followed as far as they are lawful.

Glaser v. Comic, 1 M. & S. 52.

An agent who has faithfully followed express written instructions is not liable for omitting a provision which, from the verbal communications of his principal, he might fairly have inferred to be necessary.

Fonia v. Oswell, 3 Camp. 357.

There is a binding obligation on the agent.

(1) When he undertakes for reward.

(2) When he voluntarily undertakes and does something in performance.

(3) When he has in his hands effects of his foreign correspondent, or funds are remitted for the purpose to a commission merchant or insurance broker.

2 Duer, 125.

(4) When he has been accustomed in the course of dealing to insure for his correspondent.

NOTE.—Unless he has well grounded information that the correspondent is insolvent.

2 Duer, 124.

(5) When he accepts bills of lading, accompanied by an order to insure as an implied condition.

Arn., 4th edit., 155.

(6) When it is the usage of the particular trade to which his agency and the insurance relate that he should insure.

2 Duer, 127, 128.

Total failure to fulfil such obligation (without notice) subjects the agent to an action for all the loss which his correspondent may have sustained from the non-insurance:

Smith v. Lascelles, 2 T. R. 187; 2 Duer, 120.

Notice of refusal to act as agent, inability to procure insurance on terms named, or of difficulties delaying the insurance, should be given to the principal within a reasonable time.

Corlett v. Gordon, 3 Camp. 472; Arn, 4th edit. 157; Callander v. Oelrichs, 5 Bing., N. C., 58.

A policy broker is bound to know—

(1) What is material to be communicated to an underwriter:

Seller v. Work, 1 Marsh Ins., 305; 2 Duer, 202, 203; Maydew v. Forrester, 5 Taunt. 615.

(2) All the formal details necessary to make a sea policy a legally valid instrument:

Turpin v. Bilton, 5 Man. & Gr. 455.

(3) The clauses essential to be inserted in a policy:

Mallough v. Barber, 4 Camp. 150; Park v. Hammond, Holt's N. P. 80; 4 Camp. 344; 2 Marsh Rep. 189; 6 Taunt. 495.

If by failing to communicate material facts, or to make the policy valid by attention to details, or to insert essential clauses, the insurance is avoided or insufficient, he is liable to his principal for the loss.

The practice being unsettled, and the law uncertain, the mistake of the agent affords no evidence of the want of reasonable skill and ordinary diligence:

2 Duer, 214.

NOTE.—A general order to insure seems to be satisfied by an insurance in the form in general use at the place to which the order refers; but reasonable diligence must be used to obtain the best terms.

Combes v. Anderson, 1 Camp. 523; Moore v. Mourgue Cowp. 479; 2 Duer, 231.

The question whether a broker exercised reasonable and proper care, skill, and judgment, is one of evidence in each particular case.

NOTE.—It would seem that the evidence of skilled witnesses is admissible as to the construction of facts otherwise proved, or inferences to be made from them:

Phillips, sect. 2112; Arn, 4th edit, 167, 168.

Right to Recover.

To enable a principal to recover in an action against the agent for failure to insure, there must be

(1) Default; and

(2) Damage resulting from it.

Webster v. De Tastet, 7 T. Rep. 157.

Default is not actionable if the projected insurance is illegal, and would therefore be void if entered into:

Ibid.

Nor is concealment of a material fact, by which the insurance is avoided, actionable, if disclosure would have deterred the underwriters altogether from accepting the risk:

Paley on Principal and Agent, 20; Glaser v. Cowie, 1 M. & Sel. 52.

Defence.

An agent cannot take advantage of any defence arising out of his own wrong.

With this exception, all the defences open to the underwriters sued upon the policy are open to him:

Arn. 4th edit., 170, 171.

And he is entitled to make the same deductions as the underwriters:

Harding v. Carter, 1 Marsh Ins. 309; Delany v. Stoddart, 1 T. R. 22; Wilkinson v. Coverdale, 1 Esp. 75; Glaser v. Cowie, 1 M. & S. 52.

If the principal puts himself in communication with his agent and is in accord with him in what he does, or neglects to do, he cannot recover against his agent any damage that ensues:

Anderson v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 7 East, 38.

What recoverable.

The agent may be made liable not only for such loss as would be recoverable against the underwriter, but beyond, ex. gr. for the costs of a previous action on the policy brought with his concurrence, or brought without his concurrence but defeated by some misconduct of his in effecting the insurance not disclosed to the principal until action brought:

2 Duer. 330; Seller v. Work, 1 Marsh. Ins. 305.

Losses irrecoverable against underwriters paid by them without suit but voluntarily refunded, may be recovered against the agent:

Maydew v. Forrester, 5 Taunt. 615 (concealment by the agent of certain material letters).

Semble, if the principal seeks to recover from the agent for a constructive total loss he must abandon to the agent:

2 Duer. 326-7.

II. After effecting Insurance.

The agent retaining possession of the policy is bound:—

To enforce the rights and protect the interests of his principal in all matters arising out of the contract.

2 Duer, 245; Richardson v. Anderson, 1 Camp. 43n; Goodson v. Brooke, 4 Camp. 163; Xenos v. Wickham, 33 L. J., 13, 21 C. P. (Blackburn, J.)

This includes:

Demanding return of premium;

Giving notice of abandonment;(a)

Preparing and submitting proof of loss; settling amount, receiving same and handing it over to his principal.(b)

(a) Jardine v. Leathley, 3 B. & S. 700; (b) Bousfield v. Cresswell, 2 Camp. 545.

Cancellation of Policy.

The agent can only cancel a policy by express authority of his principal.

Xenos v. Wickham, 14 C. B., N. S., 452; L. Rep. 2 H. of L. 296.

THE DERBYSHIRE COUNTY COURTS.

TRANSFER OF MR. RUSSELL, Q.C.

AT the Derby County Court, on Saturday week, it being understood that the judge (Geo. Russell, Esq.), who has been appointed to the Kent County Court in the room of the late Mr. Scott, would sit for the last time, there was a very large attendance of members of the legal profession and laymen having business connections with the court The Deputy Judge (Jno. Huish, Esq.) and John Bailey, Esq., J.P., were also present, and occupied seats upon the Bench.

At the conclusion of the ordinary business, which was of an uninteresting character,

Mr. Leech, addressing the learned judge, said that his Honour would doubtless be somewhat surprised at the large assemblage of professional gentlemen which he saw before him, but that fact need not cause any alarm, as the business of the court had been concluded, and his legal brethren and himself were there in the performance of a bounden duty. The case which was just over, was, he deeply regretted to say, the last, in all human probability, which he (the learned judge) would ever hear in that court. The announcement of his Honour's retirement from this County County circuit, to undertake the duties of another, had come upon his legal brethren and himself by surprise, or perchance, the acknowledgement of respect and gratitude which it devolved upon himself to tender to his Honour on their behalf, might have assumed a more tangible and permanent shape than mere words. Such, however, had not been the case, and it only, therefore, remained for him to say that though they deeply deplored his Honour's removal, they ventured to hope that the step he was about to take would lead to that still higher promotion, in a legal sphere, to which they all felt he was so deservedly entitled. (Applause.) It was now precisely seven years since his Honour came amongst them as an entire stranger, and during the period of time which had since elapsed he (the Judge) had heard and adjudicated upon as many as 6000 plaints per annum, in the Derby Court alone, and those, exclusive of cases remitted to his Honour by the Superior Courts, and a vast amount of other business belonging to other departments of the law, and in which the best interests of society were deeply involved. In the mass of common law cases which had been disposed of by his Honour—42,000 in all, there had been very few new trials indeed, so few that he could literally count them on his fingers, and only one appeal, and in that case the judges of the Superior Court before whom it was brought were unanimous in affirming his Honour's decision. (Applause.) He (Mr. Leech) was old enough to remember when County Courts were first instituted, and he need scarcely remind his Honour that they were then looked upon as little more than courts for the recovery of small debts, and were consequently but little thought of. Great changes, however, had now taken place in their constitution and degree of importance, equitable jurisdiction had been given up to a stipulated amount, and the vast changes introduced with the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 had caused County Courts to be second in importance to none in the kingdom. Not only was the liberty of the subject dealt with in a very important degree, but questions involving thousands of pounds were frequently adjudicated upon. Most, if not all, of these changes had occurred in his (Mr. Russell's) time, and he had therefore had to grapple with and master difficulties which, at the time of his appointment, he could not possibly have anticipated, and which his previous experience could not have fitted him for. Let them pause for a moment, therefore, and consider in what manner these high and important functions had been performed in the Derby district during the last seven years. He (Mr. Leech) declared and spoke the sentiments of all who heard him, and, he was assured and convinced, by all who might read his words, when he said that the duties to which he had briefly alluded had been discharged with dignity and honour, with courtesy and firmness, and with an amount of patience, zeal, and ability, without a parallel in the experience of any one of them. Nay, he felt he should shrink from his duty as spokesman upon that occasion were he not to say that they were one and all impressed with an earnest conviction and belief that come what would, happen what might, it was impossible that the court could ever be presided over by a more excellent judge, or one more deservedly popular than he who now presided over them. (Applause.) The learned gentleman then impressively concluded his remarks in the following terms: Sir, in taking leave of you, which we do with the deepest regret, we feel that we have many, very many shortcomings to deplore—we must have sorely tried your patience, as we have unduly occupied your time, but in this moment of all others we desire that these should be passed lightly over. In your goodness of heart we know that our misdeeds will be as mere words written upon the sand, and that you will only look at the bright side of the picture. During your stay amongst us, your single authority has never been doubted or called in question—every person, lawyer or layman, has bowed with submission to your most superior judgment, because it is well known and understood that you have always been actuated and guided in your decisions by a reliance upon the principles of good law, sound equity, and, above all, by your own strong common sense, blended, as these have been, by extreme courtesy and kindness. We have not only revered you as a judge, but respected you as a friend, and the loss, therefore, which we are about to sustain in your departure is great indeed. Sir, it is said that you are about to remove to a district which is not inaptly designated one of the gradens of England, and where the sun mostly shines. That it may shine upon yourself, your family, your friends, and your connection, giving to you and them peace and joy, prosperity and happiness, is the dearest and sincerest wish of us all. (Applause.) We bid you a respectful and tender farewell, and, when in after life you reflect upon what has occurred during your stay amongst us, may you dwell with satisfaction upon the assurance I now convey to you, that in the whole district you have never made an enemy, whilst you will have left behind the warmest admirers, the most sincere friends, and that these, while they live, will bear and cherish towards you the purest and highest sentiments of regard and esteem, respect, and goodwill. (Loud applause.) On behalf of my legal brethren and myself, I now bid you an affectionate "farewell."

His HONOUR, who was visibly affected, said that he should be a very different man to what he was if he had been able to have heard unmoved the words which Mr. Leech had addressed to him, or if he could have witnessed unmoved the unmistakably hearty manner in which they had been received by those around him. He (Mr. Russell) had been indebted for many past favours to the gentlemen of the press whom he saw present that day; but one favour more he trusted that they would extend to him—viz., by embalming those words which Mr. Leech had just uttered, in order that he (Mr. Russell) might preserve them as a record of the feelings of that gentleman and of those on behalf of whom he spoke—a record of the deepest possible value to him, as being the sentiments of those towards himself, whose good opinion he most highly prized. As Mr. Leech reminded them, it was now seven years since he (Mr. Russell) first came to preside over the County Courts of this district. He was then a very young man—at least, very young to have had such important duties as those of a County Court judge entrusted to him, and in comparison with the age of those to whom such duties were usually assigned. He (Mr. Russell) was told, not long ago, that Chief Justice Erle, who combined the finest judicial faculties with the noblest of characters, had, when a member of the Judicature Commission, before advising any recommendation to the Legislature with regard to changes in the constitution of County Courts, made himself personally conversant with the duties which the judges had to discharge, and for that purpose attended one of the London County Courts on several occasions, where, unknown, he had watched the proceedings. He informed his (Mr. Russell's) friend—who repeated it to him—that the result of these visits had been to convince him that it required a better man to make a good County Court judge than to make a judge of one of the Superior Courts. It might be said that if it was so, there could be no such thing as a good County Court judge—but whether that was so or not, with the experience which he (Mr. Russell) had had, he was not prepared to say that Lord Chief Justice Erle was wrong. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Russell) would briefly state those qualities which he considered were requisite to a man to constitute a good County Court judge. First, he must be a gentleman, he must have a good head, a good heart, and a good temper. He must be a man of the world, combining firmness, tact, courtesy, and discretion, with the most perfect impartiality. (Applause.) He should be a lawyer, but, as such, he should be practical rather than technical, and should seek so to apply the law that right and truth should always prevail. (Loud applause.) If he (Mr. Russell) was right in saying that the qualities he had mentioned were necessary to constitute a good County Court judge, they all of them must know how far short he had fallen of the standard he had set up; but, painfully aware as they must be of the fact, he assured them that they were not half so conversant with it as he was himself. If, however, he had, during the time which he had presided over this circuit, achieved any success in the discharge of his judicial functions, he attributed it to the fact that he had constantly had that ideal before his eyes, and had endeavoured, so far as in him lay, to attain to it. (Applause.) That success, however, would have been of very little use to himself but for the cordial co-operation which he had met with from every officer of that court and the solicitors who practised in it, and to whom the credit of his success, if he had achieved any, was mainly due. He, therefore, took that opportunity of acknowledging the very great assistance which he had received from the registrars and officials generally of his district, and especially he tendered his most hearty thanks to Mr. Weller, the registrar of the court, for the advice and support and cordial co-operation which he had extended to him on all occasions, and also to Mr. Wykes, the deputy registrar, whose heart had always been in his work, and also to the officials of that court and the district generally, for the most efficient manner in which they had discharged their duties during his term of office. He also had to thank Mr. Leech and the other professional gentlemen practising in this and the other courts in the district, for the great assistance which they had rendered to him. They had on all occasions considered it their duty not to try and win a verdict by obscuring his mind or by confusing the jury, but had invariably so frankly and fairly, and fully and ably put the case before him, that he had been able to do justice to every case, and should have been wanting in good sense if he had not been able to do so. He could not recall a single instance in which any lawyer practising in that or any other court in his district had addressed a single discourteous remark to himself—(applause)—whilst he could, had he time, recall hundreds of occasions when he had received at their hands the most courteous kindness and consideration. He begged now to say how grateful he felt for the kindness and assistance which had been so rendered to him, and also to say how greatly he had prized the good will which they had always evinced to him. (Applause.) The present was not the time to speak of the many friendships which he had formed since he came into the district, some of them with the officials of that court, and often those who had connections with it. This only would he say, that his heart was very full of them now; that in leaving this district he did not leave those friends, for where he was there, in his memory, they would be also—and that wherever he might be in future, if any of those many friends, whether high or low, rich or poor, should happen to be at the same place, he (Mr. Russell) should always be most happy to see them. (Applause.) He bade them heartily and gratefully—"Farewell."

BROMPTON COUNTY COURT.

Wednesday, March 18.

(Before Mr. Serjeant WHEELER.)

DAKIN v. LLOYD.

Damages to furnished house—Auctioneers' valuation.

THIS was an action to recover £17 2s. 6d. for damages to house and furniture let by the plaintiff to the defendant, including £1 1s. paid for a rate.

Tabor appeared as counsel for the plaintiff.

R. H. Davies solicitor for defendant.

In support of plaintiff's case a witness named Rae was called, who described himself as assistant to Messrs. Graves, of Talbot-road, auctioneers, and deposed that he made a valuation of the damages complained of, and that £16 1s. 6d. was fair, reasonable, and proper.

Davies cross-examined as to the data on which his evidence was given, when the witness read from a memorandum book a list of items, which being cast up amounted to £8 10s. only, for which sum, with £1 1s. for the rate, judgment was given.

On the application of Davies the Judge ordered the expenses of the witness Rae to be disallowed.

MARKET DRAYTON COUNTY COURT.

(Before W. SPOONER, Esq., Judge.)

HICKMAN v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Negligence as carriers—Liability—Goods sent at owner's risk.

THIS action was brought to recover the sum of £2 10s. 6d. damages sustained by the plaintiff through the non-delivery by the company of 10 pads of herrings.

Pearson, of Market Drayton, appeared for the plaintiff.

Moore, of 2, Furnival's-inn, London, for the company.

Pearson said that the facts were admitted, and were, that on the 29th Nov. last the plaintiff's agent, at Yarmouth, sent to him at Market Drayton 10 pads of fish, they were not tendered to him until the 8th Dec., and then were in such a bad condition that he declined to accept them. He now sought to recover the value of the fish from the company. The company sold the herrings for 7d.

Moore admitted the delay, but said that the sender of the fish had signed a consignment note on which was printed the following condition: "That in consideration of the company carrying the fish at a lower rate than their ordinary rate, they should be relieved from all liability, and forwarded solely at the risk of the owner, with the exception that the company should be liable for any wilful act or default of their servants if proved," &c. He contended that this was a good and reasonable contract, and protected the company. That the burden of proving wilful negligence was upon the plaintiff. He quoted the cases of McCawley v. The Furness Railway Company and Glenister v. The Great Western Railway in support of his contention.

After hearing Pearson in reply,

His HONOUR decided that the condition relieved the company from liability, and gave a verdict for the company with costs.

Moore however did not ask for any costs.

Verdict for the company.

NORWICH COUNTY COURT.

Tuesday, March 17.

(Before W. H. COOKE, Esq., Q.C., Judge.)

DAY v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Consequential damages—Too remote.

THIS was an action brought to recover the sum of £50 damages for loss arising out of the alleged negligence and delay of the company in forwarding a quantity of nets and hurdles from Norwich to Lakenheath in November last.

Carlos Cooper, of the Norfolk circuit, instructed by Stanley, of Norwich, appeared for the plaintiff.

E. Moore, of London, for the company.

The company had paid into court 7s., but disputed the remainder of the claim. The plaintiff had purchased a lot of turnips at Feltwell to be eaten off the ground by sheep, which it was necessary to protect by netting and hurdles; and having been told that if he sent them off from Norwich one day they would arrive at Lakenheath the following day, they were duly delivered over to the company's servants at Thorpe on the 12th Nov. On the Monday previous (the 10th) the plaintiff's man commenced his journey with twenty score sheep, and arrived at Feltwell on the 12th, but on going to the station at Lakenheath he found that the nets and hurdles had not arrived. In consequence of this the sheep had to be put where there was insufficient food, and it was not until several days after that the hurdles were delivered to the plaintiff, they having been by mistake sent to Fakenham. The result was that the sheep became depreciated in value, for which the plaintiff claimed £40. He also claimed the further sum of £9 13s. for hiring other hurdles, for money he had expended in food for the sheep, and for expenses incurred by him in going to look after the sheep, and the sum of 7s. for the man's journey to Lakenheath to fetch the hurdles.

For the defence Moore said that the facts were not disputed, but the company admitted liability to the extent of 7s., which amount had been paid into court, that the plaintiff might possibly be entitled to that amount, as he had made a useless journey to the station to meet the hurdles. As to the remainder of the claim he contended that, as the company had not notice, at the time of delivery of the hurdles at Norwich, that they were intended for any special purpose, the plaintiff could not recover, the damages claimed being consequential and too remote. The company never knew or supposed for what purpose the hurdles were required.

HIS HONOUR said that there had been undoubted negligence by the defendants, but there was no contemplation in the mind of the parties at the time the truck was hired as to the liability of the company for the depreciation in value of the sheep by its non-arrival at the period understood. Hence the damages claimed were too remote. He suggested that he should enter the verdict for 21s., besides the amount paid into court, as the plaintiff had been a loser by the delay, but to this Moore strongly objected. His Honour said he had no alternative but to give judgment to the defendants, but without costs.

Moore pressed his Honour to allow the company their costs, as by not doing so it was holding out an inducement to the public to bring vexatious and frivolous actions against the company, as they knew that even if the company won their cases, they would be put to little or no expense, but his Honour would not allow the company any costs. Verdict for defendants without costs.

OSWESTRY COURT OF RECORD.

(Before F. R. KENYON, Esq. Q.C.)

County Courts and Courts of Record.

GEORGE BENNION, brewer and innkeeper, Oswestry, sued Richard Jones, butcher and grazier, also of this town, for £1 3s., the price of half a barrel of ale, purchased by defendant from plaintiff.

E. Jones, solicitor, appeared for the plaintiff, Rowland Venables, instructed by W. I. Bull, was for the defence.

Jones having briefly opened the case, proceeded to examine Mr. Bennion: You are the plaintiff in this case, are you not?—Yes.

Did you serve Richard Jones with a half barrel of ale in January 1871?—Yes.

What was the price at which it was charged?—23s.

Did he order it himself?—Yes.

And you delivered it to him?—Yes; that is, my man delivered it.

The RECORDER: You mean you directed your waggoner to deliver it?—Yes.

Examination by Jones continued: Where did the defendant live then?—In the Castle Fields, in this town.

Do you know in what position the defendant is?—He is a master butcher, and has a lot of property of his own.

The RECORDER: Where was your place of business?—In Willow-street, in this town.

It was there you sold the article to him? Have you applied to him for payment?—Yes, many times.

What answer did he make to your application? He only promised to pay.

Cross-examined by Venables: I suppose you sell a good many casks in the course of a year or two?—No, not so many.

When did you first apply for payment?—At the end of six months.

Had you ever occasion to summon anyone before?—Yes, once.

And in what court did you summon him?—In the County Court.

And why did you not summons this man there?—It was too much trouble.

Did you not want your money?—Yes.

And why did you not summons him in the County Court? You know it sits every month.—Yes, I am aware of that.

And as you wanted your money why did you not go to the County Court?—I thought it would be less trouble.

The RECORDER.—This court sits every week.

Venables.—I did not know that, your Honour.

Bull.—For trial of issues every three months.

Venables (continuing).—Did you instruct your attorney to apply for a summons in this court?—Yes.

Then you intended to have the action tried in this court?—Yes.

Will you swear you did not say you wanted to go to the County Court?—No.

Did the defendant ever offer to pay you?—No, or I should soon have taken it.

Did you ever hear he offered to pay your attorney?—No, although he promised most faithfully.

Jones was going to call a witness to prove the delivery of the ale, but Venables said he would admit this, which concluded the case for the plaintiff.

Venables called Richard Jones, the defendant, who said he was a butcher and grazier in the borough of Oswestry.—Can you tell me when you were served with that writ (produced)?—I cannot exactly tell you.

Look at the date it was issued, 13th Nov. 1873, and now can you tell me?—I cannot exactly.

What did you do when you were served?—Three or four days after I took the £1 16s. 4d.—£1 3s. for the account, and 13s. 4d. for the summons—to Mr. Jones, and he would not receive it.

Did you see Mr. Jones at the office?—He was not in the office, and I took it to the shop. He said he could not take it, as he did not know what the expenses were.

Cross-examined by Jones.—You say that three or four days after you had the writ you asked me to take the money?—Yes.

You never had anything else but the writ, no notice of declaration?—No, no.

You swear you were never served with a notice of declaration?—I was never served with it.

Bull.—He does not know what a notice of declaration is. We will put them in.

Jones.—Will you swear that it was not on the 19th Nov. you saw me?—I will swear I saw you, but I cannot tell when.

Will you swear you did not go to Mr. Bull that day or the day after?—I went to Mr. Bull the very same day.

That was the first time?—It was the first time I went to him in respect to this matter.

And it was the same day you said you offered the money to me?—The same day.

Venables, in addressing the court for the defence, said—As I need hardly tell you after my cross-examination of the plaintiff, we really admit the debt, and the only reason we have fought it to-day is on account of the expense of the costs. There is a court—the County Court—formed for the speedy recovery of small debts, and in this court the expenses are made less than in the superior court. This debt is a small one—£1 3s.—and if the case had been tried in the County Court I believe I am right in saying the costs would have amounted to only 5s., whereas having come here, where they are on a higher scale, the costs will be nearly £10. There is another reason why the case should not have been brought here, and that is, that it is hardly fair to trouble men like you (the jury) to come here, when it might have been heard at the County Court. If the plaintiff were anxious for his money—and you heard him state he applied for it often, and he seemed rather cross over it—why could he not have gone to the County Court?—he would have got his money there in December. We pleaded we did not owe the money.

The RECORDER.—You pleaded you were not indebted.

Venables.—Yes, we were obliged to plead to raise the question of costs.

The RECORDER.—You might have paid the money into court.

Venables.—And then the plaintiff might have taken it out and taxed his costs.

The RECORDER read the writ, which set forth the amount claimed, and that if the money were paid within a certain number of days "further proceedings would be stayed," and said: If you had paid it, further proceedings would have been stayed accordingly.

Venables.—We were obliged to plead, or judgment would have been signed for default and the costs taxed. I am only arguing about the costs, for it is only a question of that.

The RECORDER.—What have the jury to do with costs? They have simply to decide the question of the debt.

Venables.—We admit the debt.

The RECORDER then briefly directed the jury to find for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, which they at once did.

Jones.—It would appear by the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, that your Honour has to certify for costs before they can be allowed, and that, as I understand, seems to have been the principal objection to the action. I never dreamt, when the action was commenced, however, that any defence would be offered, as the defendant had admitted the debt to me over and over again.

Venables.—It is the 29th section of the Act; but I shall certainly oppose the application.

The RECORDER.—Of course, I shall hear you before I decide.

Jones—I warned the defendant before I issued the summons what I would do. I made an application for the money in October, and he took no notice. I met him in the street, and asked him about it, and he said he had never received my letter, but afterwards remarked, "I daresay it is somewhere about the house." He said he would not pay the money, he would rather go into the court; and I said, "I will not deceive you. I will sue you in the borough court, and the cost of the summons will be 13s. 4d." He took no notice until the notice of declaration was served, and I say he is to blame for the costs being incurred.

Venables.—All I can say is, is this or the County Court the proper place for the action? I submit it is a question for the County Court, and if we admitted our debt it was all the more reason to go there. It is simply an action for costs, and I say that it ought to have been brought in the court where the costs would have been on a lower scale. The plaintiff would have been at liberty to take out the money and tax his costs here had we paid the money into court. The County Court Act seems to go against his case, for while, perhaps, in the case of a larger amount—£10, £20, or £30—this might be cheaper than the County Court—it is much more expensive for small cases of £1, and I do not think a precedent should be made for bringing such cases here when there is a County Court for them at an inexpensive cost.

The RECORDER.—I think the case is a fit one to be brought into this court, and I have no difficulty in certifying for costs. Ample opportunity has been given for the payment of the money, as it was due in 1871, and it is now 1874. The money has been due three years, and the defendant might even have paid it under the terms of the writ of this court when summoned. He did not, however, and it therefore became necessary for the plaintiff to proceed to a notice of declaration, which was not served until the 20th. The defendant pleads he never was indebted, which is a denial of the debt, and has brought the matter here to be tried. In February an endeavour was made by summons to stay proceedings upon payment of the debt and 2s. for costs, being the costs which would have been charged for a County Court summons, but really you would not have me for a moment suppose that it was the intention of the Legislature to allow this to go on and after costs had been incurred here to let the defendant get off by paying 2s. for costs. It was asking the Registrar to do what neither he nor any registrar could do. I think upon the whole the defendant has brought the matter upon himself and that to apply the Act in the way I have been asked to do was never intended.

Costs having been certified for accordingly, his Honour thanked the jury for their attendance, and they departed thence "until further summoned."

Monday, March 16.

MICHAEL POLLESTEINI v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Carriers of goods—Liability.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the sum of £8, in consequence of the non-delivery at Christmas of some poultry and wine, and raised the question as to consequential damages.

Fulcher appeared for the plaintiff.

Moore (of 2, Furnival's-inn) for the defendants.

From the evidence of the plaintiff and his witnesses, it appeared that on the 23rd Dec. last he had sent to him from Norwich a quantity of poultry and wine, and that the hamper containing the goods was delivered in Norwich at the company's station at about quarter to 10 that evening. The hamper was forwarded by the mail train the same evening, which ordinarily arrives in London at about half-past 4 the following morning. The hamper, however, did not arrive at the plaintiff's house, which is at Bow, until twenty minutes to 2 on Christmas Day. The plaintiff then refused to have it, saying that he wanted the goods for his Christmas dinner, and as they had not arrived sooner he had bought some more. He claimed £3 14s. 7d., the amount he paid for the poultry and wine at Norwich, and also £4 5s. 5d. for the eatables he had to buy to supply the place of those ordered from Norwich.

In cross-examination by Moore, the plaintiff stated that although he had intended to have the contents of the hamper for his dinner on Christmas day, he could not tell what was in the hamper.

Moore, for the defence, contended that, as the plaintiff's claim was for goods which he expected at a certain time, and for a certain purpose, he could not recover the amount he claimed, unless he proved that the company had entered into a special contract to deliver the hamper by that time, and quoted the cases of Lord v. The Midland, and Taylor v. The Great Northern Railway Company. That the company would only be liable if there had been unreasonable delay in carrying the hamper. He would show by evidence that owing to the enormous pressure of the Christmas traffic, the company used their best endeavours to deliver the hamper at the earliest moment possible, considering the increase and press of traffic. He had several other points to raise and argue, but the learned Judge stopped him and said that he thought the defence was a good one, and that the plaintiff was wrong in refusing to accept the hamper, the company having had no notice given to them that the goods were intended for any special purpose.

His HONOUR asked Fulcher if he had anything further to say, but as he had not, the plaintiff was non-suited, costs being allowed for the defendants' witnesses and attorney.

Plaintiff nonsuited.

Tuesday, March 17.

(Before H. J. STONOR, Esq., Judge.)

TYSON v. GEEVES; JOHN BAUGHAN (Claimant).

Interpleader—County Court Act 1867, s. 31.

Mansell Jones for the claimant.

Robins for the respondent.

His HONOUR delivered judgment in the following terms: On the 1st Dec. 1873 execution was levied on goods upon premises occupied by the execution debtor for £56 11s. 4d., debt and costs in the above action, and on the 2nd Dec. notice was given to the bailiff by the claimant's agent that the goods seized were the property of the claimant, a money lender, under a bill of sale dated the 25th Jan. 1872, duly registered. The bailiff inquired of the claimant's agent what sum of money was due on the bill of sale, but the latter refused to give him any information. The goods were valued at £116 15s., and the claimant paid into court £62 9s. 10d., being the debt and costs (£56 11s. 4d.) and expenses of levy (£5 18s. 6d.), and was let into possession of all the goods. The money was paid to the bailiff by the claimant in the presence of the execution debtor, and the latter actually borrowed £3 of the bailiff to make up the amount, and handed it to the claimant. The sum was subsequently repaid by the execution debtor to the bailiff. These circumstances are in themselves very suspicious. On the 16th Dec. an interpleader summons issued returnable on the 6th Jan. The hearing of the interpleader summons was postponed, partly by consent and partly through the accidental default of the claimant, until the 20th of Jan. when it appeared for the first time that the sum of £25 only was due on the bill of sale (£19 for principal and £6 for expenses), and that the bill of sale had been originally given as a security for £50, advanced at the date thereof and any further advances not exceeding £250 and interest. At the hearing an order was made by consent that the same should be adjourned to the 3rd Feb., that the bailiff should in the meantime sell the goods in the possession of the claimant and pay the costs of the levy, the claimant's demand of £25, the execution creditor's debt, and costs of £56 11s. 4d, and the balance to the judgment debtor. Of course, if this order had been carried out, the sum of £62 9s. 10d. deposited in court would, on the adjourned hearing, have been ordered to be paid to the claimant, and there would have been an end of the matter. But, unfortunately, this was not the case. The bailiff proceeded on the same day, and almost immediately on the order being made, on the premises, and found that the claimant or his agent had allowed the execution debtor to take possession of all the goods, and that the execution debtor had barricaded the premises and refused possession to the bailiff. The latter applied to the claimant to assist him in getting possession, but he refused to do so. The summons came on again for hearing on the 3rd Feb., and was again adjourned by consent to the 3rd March, in order to give the parties an opportunity to come to some arrangement. No arrangement, however, was come to, and on the 3rd March the claimant applied for a verdict in accordance with his claim, and for an order for the payment to him of the money deposited in court. It then appeared that the judgment debtor had made away with a considerable portion of the goods, amounting in round numbers to one-half of the whole in value, and that the claimant had regained possession of the remaining goods of the like value. The counsel for the execution creditor suggested that the case ought to be decided in the same way as if the order of the 20th Jan. by consent had not been made, to which the counsel for the claimant assented. If this view were correct I think it would follow that as the claimant at that time appeared to have had a valid claim under his bill of sale, although only for £25, that he was then entitled to the possession of the goods, and also to the return of his deposit of £62 9s. 10d. But, on consideration, I do not think that this view is correct. The order made by consent between the parties, the failure of that order through the act of the claimant or his agent in giving possession of the goods to the execution debtor, the subsequent abstraction of half of the goods by the execution debtor, and the return of the remaining half to the claimant, appeared to me to have varied the legal and equitable rights of the parties materially. For I think that there is now strong evidence of a fraudulent complicity and collusion between the judgment debtor and the claimant, which goes far to shake the validity of his claim altogether, and at all events to raise a presumption of its payment and satisfaction. It will be observed that there is some £60 worth of goods admitted to be still in the claimant's possession. This amount, if sold under the consent order, would produce sufficient to meet the cost of the levy and the claimant's debt of £25, but not the execution creditor's debt of £52, nor, of course, the costs of the hearing and adjournments, which the remaining moiety of the goods abstracted by the execution debtor, by the permission or neglect of the claimant however would have been amply sufficient to have covered. But putting aside for a moment the claimant's debt of £25, and supposing it to be satisfied, the goods now remaining in his possession would be sufficient to meet substantially the execution creditor's debt and costs, and the costs of the levy, or in other words to recoup the claimant the sum of £62 9*s.* 10*d.* paid by him into court in the event of the verdict being against him, and that sum being paid over to the execution creditor. Now, it can be believed that pending this claim the claimant permitted the rest of the goods, say £60 in value, to be abstracted by the execution debtor without first obtaining payment or satisfaction of his claim of £25. Looking at all these transactions together I do not at present feel satisfied that at the date of the execution the sum of £25 was really due and owing to the claimant on his bill of sale, and at all events I believe that if then due and owing it has been paid or satisfied to him since or that his claim, if not at first, is now nothing more than a fraudulent collusion with the execution debtor. I am, therefore, of opinion that the execution creditor is entitled to a verdict. and that the money in court ought to be paid to him, deducting the costs of the bailiff, and that the cost of this claim should be borne by the claimant and the judgment debtor. The 31st section of the County Court Act 1867, empowers the judge of this court upon an interpleader summons "to make such order between the parties in respect thereof, and of the costs of the proceedings as to him shall seem fit," and the order which I have made is whah seems to me fit, that is to say, consonant with justice. Verdict for execution creditor, with costs against claimant and judgment debtor.—Money to remain in court for a month.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

(Before W. T. S. DANIEL, Esq., Q.C., Judge.)

Ex parte BUCKLEY; Re WERNER.

Secured creditors—Proof.

To convert a primary security into a collateral security so as to take the creditor out of the rule obliging him to deduct his security from his debt, and prove only for the balance, the transaction must be real and founded upon consideration for the benefit of the debtor's estate, and not merely such as would be good between the parties if there were no insolvency. Ex parte Sherrington (1 M. D. & De G. 196), and Ex parte Turney (3 M. D. & De G. 576), considered.

Jordan (instructed by Dawson and Greaves, Bradford) for motion.

North (North and Son, Leeds) opposed.

His HONOUR.—This was an application by Charles James Buckley, the trustee under the proceedings for liquidation by arrangement of the affairs of Maximilian Edward Werner, of Bradford, worsted manufacturer, for an order that the Halifax Commercial Banking Company (Limited), and John Graham Wheelwright, their manager, may deliver to the trustee of the property of the said M. E. Werner, Great Western Railway Debenture Stock to the value of £1100, and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Stock to the value of £140, upon the ground that the said Halifax Commercial Banking Company (Limited) have proved upon the estate of the said M. E. Werner for the full amount of their debt, and have not given up the said stock held by them as security deposited by the said debtor, to the said trustee, to be realised for the general body of the creditors of the said M. E. Werner, and that the said company may pay the costs of and incidental to this application. The only question agreed by the parties to be argued before me in the first instance was whether the stock mentioned in the notice of motion, which it was admitted had been originally the property of the debtor Werner, and deposited by him with the banking company as security for his debt to them, had, previously to the institution of the proceedings for liquidation, ceased to be the property of the debtor and become the property of Arthur Clement Bartrum, and as his property had, previously to such proceedings, been made by him a collateral security to the banking company for Werner's debt. The facts were as follow: The debtor Werner had for some time previously to the 23rd July 1873 been a customer of the banking company, and had been allowed an overdraught of £4000, as security for which he had transferred into the name of Wheelwright, as bank manager, £1100 Debenture Stock in the books of the Great Western Railway Company, and the £140 Debenture Stock in the books of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company; and the banking company also held as further security the guarantee of the said A. C. Bartrum for £1000, given in June 1873, and against which Werner had deposited with Bartrum as an indemnity £500 cash and a bill for £350. Previously to the 23rd July 1873 Bartrum had returned to Werner £350, part of the £500 cash. On the 23rd July 1873 Werner's account with the bank was overdrawn to the amount of £4231 or thereabouts, and he applied to the bank to increase his overdraught from £4000 to £4500, and I assume, for the purposes of the present decision, that he made representations to Wheelwright as to his means which led Wheelwright to believe that he was solvent. He was, however, on the 23rd July 1873, hopelessly insolvent. On that day, as appears from the trustee's affidavit (6th Jan.), Werner's debts and liabilities amounted to £7656 1s. 1d., and his assets to about £2854 4s. 8d. And he presented his petition for liquidation on the 29th July 1873, and by his balance sheet, presented to the first meeting of his creditors, he represented that his unsecured debts amounted to £8850 8s. 8d.; and his assets to meet them amounted to £2918 9s. 2d. Whatever, therefore, may have been the representations he made to Wheelwright, and whatever may have been the belief such representations induced him to form, it is quite clear that Werner was on the 23rd July 1873, hopelessly insolvent. The bank, however, under Wheelwright's advice, entertained Werner's proposal to increase the overdraught from £4000 to £4500; and it appears that he had the benefit of such overdraught, for the bank have proved under the liquidation for the sum of £5033 7s. 9d. as due to them from Werner upon the balance of his banking account. As an inducement to the bank to entertain and ultimately accede to the proposal of Werner, an arrangement was made with Bartrum and Werner, and Wheelwright, that Bartrum should increase his guarantee to the bank from £1000 to £2500, upon the distinct agreement, as it now appears, that Bartrum should not come under any personal liability to the bank or Werner in respect of such increased guarantee. And the arrangement for this increased overdraught was purported to be carried into effect by the agreement of the 23rd July 1873, a copy of which is set forth in the seventh paragraph of the trustee's affidavit. This agreement was prepared by Wheelwright, and is signed by him on behalf of the bank, as manager, and is also signed by Werner and Bartrum, and by Wheelwright again in his own right, and the signatures are witnessed by one of the bank clerks. The agreement is between the Halifax Commercial Banking Company (Limited), of the first part, Maximilian Edward Werner of the second part, and Arthur Clement Bartrum of the third part; and it proceeds thus: "Whereas the said Maximilian Edward Werner has for some time past had a banking account with the Halifax Commercial Banking Company (Limited), and has been permitted to overdraw such account to a limit of £4000, this banking company having as security therefor £1100 worth of Great Western Debentures, and £1040 of Lancashire and Yorkshire Stock, property of the said Maximilian Edward Werner (and which debentures and stock stand in the name of John William Wheelwright, the manager of this banking company), and also a guarantee by the said Arthur Clement Bartrum for the sum of £1000. And, whereas, the said Maximilian Edward Werner desires a further overdraft, and he and the said A. C. Bartrum have requested the said banking company to extend and increase the said limit to £4500, which the said banking company have agreed to do in the following terms, and on having the following security, namely,—That A. C. Bartrum shall increase his guarantee of £1000 from £1000 to £2500, as hereinafter contained. And the said John Graham Wheelwright shall hold the said debentures and stock in the first place to so far secure the said banking company the payment of the said guarantee of £2500 by the said A. C. Bartrum, and, after payment thereof, to transfer the said Great Western Debentures and Lancashire and Yorkshire Stock to the said A. C. Bartrum, by way of indemnity to him against any loss in respect of his guarantee of £2500. Now, therefore, in pursuance of, the above arrangement I, the said A. C. Bartrum hereby guarantee to the said Halifax Commercial Banking Company (Limited) to the extent of £2500, the payment to them of all sums in which the said Maximilian E. Werner now is, or at any time hereafter shall become, indebted to the said banking company on any account whatever, in the aforesaid terms of a guarantee, intended as a collateral security by a surety to a bank for a bank customer's debt." And the agreement concludes thus—"And I, the said J. Graham Wheelwright, undertake to hold the said debentures and stock for the said banking company, until the said A. C. Bartrum is discharged from all liability to them hereunder, and then to hold the said debentures and stock upon lien to secure any balance that may be due to him hereunder; or if there be nothing due to the said A. C. Bartrum, then to hand the said debentures and stock to the said Maximillian Edward Werner, all claims of the said banking company having been first discharged." This document appears upon the face of it to have been prepared by a person not properly skilled in the preparation of legal instruments, and ignorant of the law applicable to such transactions as the document affects to deal with; and its proper construction, taking the document by itself, might not be altogether free from difficulty. It was contended on behalf of the bank, that as they had really given Werner the full benefit of his overdraft upon the faith of the agreement by Bartrum to increase his guarantee from £1000 to £2500, and the stock in question had by the agreement been, or intended to have been made the property of Bartrum in order to indemnify him against his liability under the guarantee, the bank had a right to treat the stock as having been converted by the agreement from the property of Werner into the property of Bartrum, and to be entitled to the benefit of all the consequences which would result from such conversion; one of which would be that in their proceedings for liquidation of the affairs of Werner they would not be bound to treat the stock as part of his estate, but as the estate of Bartrum, and held by them as a collateral security. This view of the case was met on behalf of the trustee by the argument that on the face of the agreement itself no property in the stock was vested or intended to be vested in Bartrum to the prejudice of the then existing security of the banking company, unless and until Bartrum had actually paid the banking company £2500 in his charge pro tanto of Werner's debt; and that as against Werner and his creditors Bartrum could acquire no interest in the property until as surety he had paid the principal debt. This he never did—he, like Werner, was hopelessly insolvent on the 23rd July 1873, and on the 25th July, twelve days after, filed his petition for liquidation in this court. On behalf of the trustee, the case of Ex parte Sherrington (1 M. D. & De G. 195), was cited to show that a surety cannot apply to have property pledged to him by way of indemnity sold under a bankruptcy, until he has paid the principal debt for which he is surety, and that, therefore, Bartrum could not as against Werner's creditors have disposed of the stock in question even if the property passed to him until he had paid the banking company the £2500, the amount of his guarantee, and certainly he could not have done so as against the banking company without their consent, and thus either way if the £2500 had been paid, and Bartrum had acquired the property in the stock, Werner's estate would have had the full benefit of the stock by the reduction of the banking company's debt | at least an equivalent amount. In support of the company's contention that the agreement had made the stock the property of Bartrum, and thus operated as a conversion so as to make the security of the banking company a collateral security as being no longer a security on the estate of Werner, but a security on the estate of Bartrum, reliance was placed upon Ex parte Turney (3 M. D. & De G. 576). In that case a father seised of freehold estate of inheritance equitably mortgaged that estate to a creditor of his son for a debt of the son, and afterwards died intestate, indebted to an amount exceeding the amount of his assets, and the inheritance thus charged descended upon the son, who afterwards became bankrupt. Upon a proof being made by the creditor upon the estate of the son, it was contended that he held a security upon the estate of the son, and must deduct its value from his proof, and give it up for the benefit of the son's creditors, but it was held he was not bound to do so. In that case the security was originally a collateral security in the true sense of the term. The son (the debtor) had no interest in the father's estate when the security was created. When the father died the inheritance which descended upon the son was charged with debts of the father beyond its value, so that the son took no beneficial interest in it which could be made available for the benefit of his creditors—he was a mere trustee of the legal estate for the benefit of his father's creditors, and bound to deal with it as they should direct. Under those circumstances the learned judge (Knight Bruce, V.C.) held that the case was an exception to the general rule, as in effect the creditor is able to state truly that he takes no part of the bankrupt's estate within the "just expression and interpretation of the rule." I am at a loss to see how that case has any application to the present, favourable to the contention of the banking company. In that case a legal subtlety was not allowed to prevail to deprive a bona fide creditor of a bona fide collateral security to give an unfair advantage to creditors. In the present case, as it seems to me, what is little better than a legal subtlety is relied upon as having had the effect of converting a bona fide security upon the property of the debtor, which would clearly have entitled his creditors to the benefit of the rule obliging the secured creditor to deduct the value of his security before proof, into a collateral security, by an attempt to convert the property of the debtor into the property of a third person for no real consideration moving from him for the benefit of the debtor's estate. I might, perhaps, safely have disposed of this case upon what appears upon the face of the agreement of the 23rd July 1873; but, upon the hearing, the trustee proposed to refer to certain examinations of Wheelwright and Bartrum taken before the registrar on the 5th Dec. 1873, and now on the file of proceedings, and both of which are referred to in the trustee's affidavit, but an objection was raised on the part of the banking company that no notice had been given to read them as evidence, and there had been no proper opportunity of cross-examining Bartrum. I held the objection good, and the notice stood over to give the trustee an opportunity of giving notice to read the examination, upon his undertaking to produce Bartrum for cross-examination. This was afterwards done, and Bartrum and Wheelwright have been since examined and cross-examined before me, and the result, as far as affects the part of Bartrum's examination, I am about to read, has been confirmed by those examinations. In his examination on the file Bartrum says: "As far as I am aware, the arrangement for the security to the bank originated with the debtor. I was given to understand by Mr. Wheelwright that the agreement of the 23rd July 1873, was merely a form of converting a real security into a collateral security, and that I should not be injured thereby in any respect. I told Mr. Wheelwright that it appeared to me that the advantage which would be given to the debtor was entirely disproportionate to the advantage which the bank would gain by the transaction. He replied that he did not think so. He also gave me an honourable pledge that my being a party to it should in no way imperil my interests." The substance of this examination was repeated before me, and Mr. Wheelwright deposed that it was a condition of the arrangement that Bartrum should not be required by the banking company to pay or be under any real liability to pay any portion of his increased guarantee—namely, the difference between his original guarantee of £1000 and the guarantee of £2500 purported to be given by the agreement of 23rd July 1873. Viewed in the light afforded by these facts, this agreement, so far as it is the act of Werner, appears to me null and void — first, as a voluntary disposition of property made by an insolvent debtor to a third party, and therefore void as against creditors under the statute of Eliz.; secondly, as an act of bankruptcy by Werner being a fraudulent disposition of a part of his property within sect. 6, sub-sect. 2, of the Bankruptcy Act 1869. The banking company (whether Wheelwright knew it or not), in dealing with Werner, were dealing with an insolvent, and they must take the consequences. Bartrum was intended to be and was a mere cipher in the transaction; but through the instrumentality of Bartrum, Wheelwright co-operating with Werner sought to make Werner convert his property which Wheelwright held as security for the bank debt into the property of Bartrum, in order that in the event of the insolvency of Werner, the banking company might have the right to prove against Werner's estate for their whole debt relieved from the obligation to deduct the value of their security, an obligation under which they undoubtedly were up to the time of the execution of the agreement. To effect this result the agreement, as contended for by the banking company, must be considered as a transfer or disposition by Werner of the stock treated as his property (subject to the lien of the banking company, which for the purposes of the agreement they don't insist upon) to Bartrum, so as to become his property as an indemnity against his liability for £2500, as to £1000, part of which sum, he held an independent indemnity, and as to £1500, the residue of which sum it was intended and expressly agreed that he should never be under any liability to pay anything, thus, in effect, by force of this contrivance, withdrawing from Werner's estate, and in fraud of his creditors, the stock in question. The agreement of 23rd July 1873, appears to me to be, upon the face of it, of no force or effect for the purpose of converting the property of Werner into the property of Bartrum; and when reviewed by the light of the evidence of Bartrum and Wheelwright as to the motive and object of the agreement, it was a transaction which the law regards as a fraud upon the right in bankruptcy of Werner's creditors, and it became therefore unnecessary, as it seems to me, to consider any question of actual fraud in the transaction; but that question is, by agreement of the parties, left open for inquiry hereafter before a jury, if my decision upon the case as it stands should be reversed, or substantially varied upon appeal. The question remains as to the form of the order. The notice of motion asks that the stock may be given up by the banking company to the trustee, leaving the proof for the whole debt to stand, and the banking company entitled to the benefit of the dividend. Upon the hearing it was agreed that as the value of the security was about equal to the dividend, the order (if my decision was adverse to the bank) should be that the banking company, insisting upon retaining their stock mentioned in the notice of motion, and refusing to realise or give credit for the value thereof in reduction of their proof, be and they are hereby excluded from all share in any dividend under this liquidation in respect of their proof now on the file, or any other proveable debt they may have against the estate of the debtor, M. E. Werner, covered by the security. And I order that the banking company do pay all the costs of this application to be taxed by the Registrar. I observe that the notice of motion is addressed to the trustee under Bartrum's liquidation, and to Bartrum, but they have not appeared, and no additional costs have been incurred in consequence.

WARRINGTON COUNTY COURT.

Thursday, March 12.

(Before J. W. HARDEN, Esq., Judge.)

Re JACKSON; Ex parte THE CROFT BURIAL SOCIETY.

Petition for liquidation.

Priority of friendly societies to payment out of the assets of their insolvent officer of moneys in his hands by virtue of his office.

Necessity of friendly societies taking security from their officers, as required by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63.

HIS HONOUR this day delivered judgment in the above matter as follows:—This was an application under the 23rd section of the Friendly Societies Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63), that a debt due from John Jackson, who has filed his petition for liquidation, to the burial society of which he has for several years acted as treasurer, should be declared to have priority over his other debts, and there can be no doubt that such priority is given both by the section of the Friendly Societies Act above referred to, and by the Bankruptcy Act of 1849. The question is, whether both have not been abrogated by the later Bankruptcy Act of 1869, on the principle "leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant." By three consecutive sections in the Bankruptcy Act of 1849, viz., sects. 166, 167, and 168, priority is given to assessed taxes, debts due from the officers of friendly socities in their official characters, and three months' wages or salary; the 167th section is incorporated and amplified by the 23rd section of the Friendly Societies' Act 1855, and by the Bankruptcy Act 1861, sect. 156, the priority already given to assessed taxes is extended to parochial rates. Then comes the Bankruptcy Act 1869, which is silent as to the Friendly Societies' Act, but expressly repeals the three Acts of 1849 and 1861, and in sect. 32, re-enacts the provisions having reference to rates and taxes and wages in the following words: "The debts hereinafter mentioned shall be paid in priority to all other debts, that is to say, all parochial or other local rates" (to a limited amount) "all assessed taxes, land tax, and property or income tax" (to a limited amount) "all wages or salary of any clerk or servant, &c." (to a limited amount), the section concluding with these comprehensive words: "save as aforesaid all debts provable under the bankruptcy shall be paid pari passu," in other words, rates, taxes, and wages shall be the only exceptions within sect. 12 of the Act which provides that "where a debtor shall be adjudicated a bankrupt no creditor to whom the bankrupt is indebted in respect of any debt provable in the bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the bankrupt in respect of such debt except in manner directed by this Act," that is, pari passu with other creditors. My attention has been called to an elaborate judgment by Mr. Herbert, the Judge of the County Court at Newport, in April 1872, and to one by Dr. Stephens, the judge of the County Court at Lincoln, reported in the LAW TIMES of the 24th Aug. 1872, arriving at opposite conclusions. I agree with Mr. Herbert, and am of opinion that one effect of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 is to deprive friendly societies of the priority they were previously entitled to in respect of debts due to them from persons in their employ. Whether an earlier statute is repealed by a later one generally depends upon the presumed intention of the Legislature, but I fear that the Legislature sometimes has credit for greater circumspection and forethought than it is in the habit of exercising, and in this case I am inclined to think that the framers of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, thinking only of bankruptcy, simply lost sight of the fact that the 167th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1849 was re-enacted in the 23rd section of the Friendly Societies' Act 1855, having applied the sponge to the three classes of debts entitled to priority in bankruptcy, they expressly re-enacted two of the three, and declared that all others should come in pari passu, not thinking of the Friendly Societies' Act at all, and certainly not intending that two of the three sections repealed should be re-enacted in words, and the middle one by implication. Admitting for the sake of argument that the 23rd section of the Friendly Societies' Act is not repealed Mr. S. Taylor, on behalf of Lewis Voisey (of the firm of Joseph Davies and Co.), the trustee of Jackson's estate, further contended that the Burial Society in this case had forfeited all claim to the priority which they would have had prior to 1869, inasmuch as they had not taken any security from the treasurer as they were bound to do both by the terms of the Act of Parliament and their own rules. Submitting that the priority must be confined to the duly appointed officers of friendly societies, and that the Croft Burial Society had no right to protect itself from the consequences of its own carelessness at the expense of the general body of creditors. Mr. E. J. Nicholson, on behalf of the society, contended that such a strict construction ought not to be put upon the acts or omissions of a small society of this kind, in a country village, meeting at the beerhouse once a month, and contributing their monthly pence for many years to provide for their own funerals, and leaving their contributions in the hands of "mine host who had acted as treasurer for many years and whose honesty was never doubted." I am sorry that the members of the society should lose their money, but "business is business," the same principles must govern societies of this kind whether large or small, and if it were an open question under the 72nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, I should still be of opinion that the society ought only to rank pari passu with the other creditors.

E. J. Nicholson.—I presume that your Honour makes no order against the burial society with regard to costs?

HIS HONOUR.—No; the costs of the trustee must be borne by the estate, and the burial society will pay its own costs.

Solicitors for the burial society, Nicholson, White, and Nicholson.

Solicitors for the trustee, Davies and Brook.

LEGAL NEWS.

THE next session of the Central Criminal Court commences on the 7th proximo. The judges on the rota are The Lord Chief Justice of England, Mr. Justice Brett, and Baron Cleasby.

MR. JUSTICE HONYMAN.—We are glad to be enabled to state that Mr. Justice Honyman, who was compelled by ill health to leave his circuit and return to London, is making satisfactory progress towards recovery, and will, we hope, in no long time be enabled to resume his judicial duties.—Times.

THE TICHBORNE COSTS. — A supplementary estimate was issued on Saturday, presented to the House of Commons, of additional sums to the money already provided for 1873, required to be voted for the year ended the 31st March inst., in which appears a sum of £40,000 to defray the further costs of the prosecution in Reg. v. Castro.

A REMARKABLE OCCURRENCE.—A reporter at Marlborough-street Police-court says: "There was only one night charge this morning, and in that the prosecutor did not attend. Such a circumstance has not occurred at this court during the past twenty-five years."

A large majority of the Associated Chambers of commerce has resolved that the abolition of imprisonment for debt is not desirable. A motion was also adopted for calling on the Government to institute an inquiry into railway management, with reference to a diminution of accidents both to passengers and railway servants. The Associated Chambers will meet next year at Newcastle.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.—On Saturday an application was made to Sir Robert Phillimore, sitting at the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as Judge of the Court of Admiralty for the discharge of a captain of a vessel and of the pilot who had taken the ship the Armenian out of Millwall dock while in the custody of Mr. Evan Jones, the marshal under arrest in a suit for £20,000. The captain (Hall) had been taken at Cardiff, on an order for contempt, and Stanley, the pilot, was brought before the court by Bartlett, the officer of the marshal, in custody. As the matter was pressing Sir Robert Phillimore was asked to take the case at the Privy Council Office. Mr. Gainsford Bruce appeared for the captain, and Mr. Clarkson for the plaintiffs in the action; Mr. Butt, Q.C., held the brief of the Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.). Affidavits were produced, and the captain expressed his regret for what had been done and submitted himself to the court. The pilot, who was present, made an affidavit that he did not know he was doing wrong. His affidavit was required to be amended, and he was to express his regret and submit himself to the court. The application was not opposed, and the suit, it was understood, was settled. Sir Robert Phillimore said a gross contempt of court had been committed, but he was not disposed, after the submission of the parties and after ascertaining there was no opposition, to refuse the application. It must be known that a serious contempt had been committed, but the release would be ordered on the payment of the costs incurred by the Marshal and of all costs in the matter.

LORD COLERIDGE ON GAME LAWS.—In trying a serious case of night poaching at Salop Assizes, Lord Chief Justice Coleridge allowed his opinion upon the game laws to be pretty plainly seen in his charge to the jury. "It was to be regretted," he said, "that so much money should be paid, and so much blood spilt, for what was after all the protection of the pleasures of but a few, but with this the jury had nothing to do;" and again, "however much we might be prejudiced against the people who filled our gaols for their pleasure, this feeling ought not to have any influence when the law had been broken." That is putting the matter in a strong light, in which the conduct of the game-preservers may easily be misunderstood. Of course, in one sense, they no more "fill the goals" for their pleasure than any honest citizen, who wishes to enjoy life peaceably, fills them for his comfort; but there is a certain amount of truth in what Lord Coleridge said, which, coming from the Bench, will strike the public mind, and ought to strike it. The question, whether the pleasures of a few shall be protected at the expense of the many, is rising to the surface, and will have to be decided. It cropped up in the agricultural discussion at Bridgnorth, where a reference to the cost of maintaining poachers in gaol was received with "great applause."

COURTS OF RECORD v. COUNTY COURTS.—It is quite possible there are many of our Oswestry readers who never heard of the ancient Court of Record in which an action was tried last week. The court has been virtually superseded by the County Court, and although several issues have been entered, we believe, the recorder has only been troubled with the hearing of one or two for a very long period. In fact, the Court of Record may almost be said to have fallen out of the memory of the lawyers themselves, and its revival has given rise to good deal of criticism. The sole question to be decided on Thursday was one of costs. If the action had been heard in the County Court, a few shillings would have covered the official expenses, whereas the defendant will now have to pay £7 5s. 10d., taxed costs, on a debt of £1 3s., to say nothing of the fees which his own attorney has a right to charge! In fact, we are not overstating the case when we say that for a debt of a pound a total bill of £13 or £14 might be run up in the Court of Record; and it is obvious, therefore, that debtors in Oswestry are exposed to a serious danger, and that a resort to the court ought to be regarded with a certain amount of suspicion. The matter is one which intimately affects the townspeople, because, if the custom of trying issues in this court is to be revived, anyone, however honest, is liable to be heavily fined for disputing a debt. The safeguard, of course, is the recorder, with whom it rests whether costs shall be certified for, and although no intelligent Englishman ever doubts the honour of an English judge, and Mr. Kenyon's desire to do justice is above suspicion, it is open to question whether it is desirable to maintain a tribunal where such serious risks are run, side by side with another where justice is so much more economically administered. Mr. Kenyon would be the first to acknowledge that he might make a mistake, and if the defendant, on Thursday, instead of having wrongfully neglected to pay a debt, had honestly disputed it, and discovered that the law was against him, he might still have found himself saddled with these extravagant costs. With all deference to the recorder, we venture to think the Legislature never intended that costs should be certified for in a case like that of Bennion v. Jones. The custom of the Superior Courts, we believe, and it is a reasonable custom, is to certify for costs in cases where certain points have to be tried which can be better disposed of there. In this case, so far from there being any difficult question, the debt was admitted; and if the recorder was right, it is open to any attorney to sue an obstinate or poverty-stricken debtor in the court of record, and subject him, even if he pays on summons, to six or seven times the amount of costs incurred in the County Court! In the particular case under consideration the defendant brought the penalty upon himself by his neglect, but in legal matters precedent must be strictly guarded, and we are sure the recorder would not like to see his court extensively used for the recovery of small debts. There are, of course, two sides to the question. We have given one of them, and the other is stated with much force by an attorney, in our correspondence column. It is impossible to deny that County Courts are unpopular, both with tradesmen and attorneys, and the reason is plain enough. The irrational feeling against lawyers' costs—which are generally earned quite as honestly as tradesmen's profits—seems to be embodied in the constitution of the County Court, and plaintiffs are often punished either in feeling or pocket, as our correspondent points out, for trying to recover a just debt. It has long been apparent that a reform of County Court procedure was necessary, and we may perhaps hope that the subject will be taken in hand by the Legislature at the same time as various "ancient courts" which seem to many persons to have outlived their usefulness, though others would contend that they are worth preserving in these days, when the recovery of debt is becoming more and more difficult, if only to hold in terrorem over the heads of obstinate debtors. It sometimes seems as if the law of England were specially designed to enable people to incur debt with the smallest possible amount of danger of ever being made to pay it!—Oswestry Advertiser.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.—UNQUALIFIED PRACTITIONERS.—As a law stationer of long standing, and undesirous that members of our craft should invade the province of the solicitor, I shall not object to see the Bill that is being promoted by the society pass into law, with a slight—but, to the law stationer, important—alteration. I assume the society would allow that the calling of the law stationer is a useful and legitimate one, and that, therefore, the society have no desire to rob the law stationer of his chief source of occupation. Nevertheless, an injury to this extent will, I think, be inflicted by the proposed Bill if it passes as printed in your columns—by the importation into it, that is, of one word which does not appear in the provisions of the Stamp Act 1870, of which provisions the proposed Bill is but an amplification. The prohibitions in the Stamp Act are against drawing and preparing, whilst in the Bill they are extended to writing also; e.g., "Any person who . . . writes, draws, or prepares any instrument," &c. With this word "writes," allowed to remain, the law stationer would, it seems to me, be prohibited his chief and legitimate occupation, that of writing. I submit, on the other hand, that if this word be erased, there would be no real weakening of the protection intended to be effected by the Bill.

A SUBSCRIBER.

— The suggestions contained in the letter of Mr. George Whale in your last week's issue with reference to sect. 3 of the proposed bill were anticipated and fully discussed by the Parliamentary Committee of the society on settling the draft. It was the unanimous opinion of the members that in no case did the public require greater protection than in the matter of wills, which it was thought highly improper unqualified persons should prepare for remuneration. It was also considered that agreements under hand often comprise matters of equal importance and intricacy as deeds. I think your correspondent will find that transfers of stock are included in subsect. 3 under the term of "any instrument relating to stock or shares." The law, I submit, should not be less effectual by being consistent in its objects. A MEMBER OF THE COMMITTEE.

THE LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' ACT 1874.—I am extremely anxious for the success of the Legal Practitioners' Society, and feel confident that it can secure to the Profession many useful measures if the committee go properly about their task. Sufficient materials are in their hands to enable them to carry a strong Bill for the suppression of unqualified persons and their practices. This being so, I do most strongly protest against the miserably feeble bantling printed in your last edition. The proposed Bill really consists of two sections. Sect. 3 is to inflict a certain penalty upon an unqualified person for preparing certain documents "for or in expectation of gain, fee, or reward," but the complaining party, who is to risk an expensive and doubtful issue in the Superior Courts as a common informer, is to prove that some reward has actually reached the offender. Knowing, as the committee do, the class of men we are proposing to legislate against, what chances are there in nine cases out of ten of action being taken to recover a penalty, of the success of such an action against men of this class, or of the recovery of either penalty or the "full costs" provided for by the Act? Sect. 4 has nothing to do with our grievances. It merely assumes that ignorant or imprudent people sign their names without advice, and are injured. That is not a matter for this society to expend its time and money upon. By far the most important ground is (for what reason I have not the remotest idea) left to be dealt with in another bill. Why another Bill when a couple of clauses to the present Bill would suffice! Every practitioner knows that an enormous share of professional work in the County Courts, Magistrates, and Bankruptcy Courts is usurped by unqualified persons, and that without these sources of revenue the class could not exist. Why not annihilate them by a blow at the foundations of their existence, instead of wasting valuable time upon this feeble attempt at legislation?

A DISAPPOINTED MEMBER.

— A correspondent in your last issue suggests that the proposed Legal Practitioners' Act 1874 should not be drawn so as to prevent unprofessional persons from preparing for gain "wills, agreements under hand, and transfers of stock containing no trust or limitation." I think that the mischief and litigation caused by ignorant "will-makers" is almost incalculable, and that to make a special exception in their favour would be anything but an advantage to the public. Every professional man knows that considerably more skill and discretion is required for the preparation even of a comparatively simple will than is required for the preparation of an ordinary conveyance, and it has been said by an eminent legal authority that the drawing of an elaborate will is the task which tests most severely the skill of an experienced conveyancer. Every professional man, too, knows that there are no documents in the preparation of which so much is left to his own individual discretion and judgment, and there are assuredly no documents which affect more vast and varied interests, or the preparation of which is more clearly within the special province of the legal profession. I think, therefore, that the alteration suggested by your correspondent would hardly be an improvement on the section as drawn. I would, however, suggest that the section should be amended, so that the defendant might be sued in the County Court for the penalty, instead of at the assizes, if the plaintiff should prefer to take this course; and also that some provision should be made to meet the common case of a solicitor lending his name to some unprofessional person on the terms of receiving a share of the profits of the business done by him. In many towns in the north of England it is quite a common thing for a solicitor's clerk who has managed to make the acquaintance of a number of clients, to commence practice on his own account, under the name of some solicitor, who, beyond receiving a share of the profits, never exercises the smallest supervision over the business done in his name. If a clause were inserted, prohibiting solicitors from entering into any arrangement in the nature of a partnership with unadmitted persons, it would do something at all events to mitigate the evil, and a good deal of disreputable touting for business on the part of such persons would be done away with. I observe that the new Government propose to bring in a bill for lessening "the delay and expense of land transfer," which are said to be "a reproach to our system of law and a serious obstacle to dealings in real property." Now it seems to me that a very considerable proportion of the expense of dealings with real property arises from the excessive stamp duty charged upon transfers thereof. In conveyances of large or even moderately-sized estates, the stamp duty frequently amounts to hundreds of pounds, all of which goes to swell the solicitor's bill, which in many instances would be cut down more than one half if the payments for stamp duty were taken out; for instance, the stamp duty on the conveyance of a couple of farms producing £500 a year will be over £60, which, in an ordinary case, would probably be as much as all the rest of the charges which the purchaser would have to pay put together. There can be no doubt whatever that the heavy stamp duty payable on conveyances is really one of the most "serious obstacles to dealings with real property," and no greater boon could be conferred upon the landed class than a substantial reduction of the impost, which produces for the Revenue a sum (some few hundred thousand pounds) utterly insignificant when compared with its effect as an obstacle to the free transfer of land. If the stamp duty on conveyances were reduced from 10s. per cent. to 2s. 6d. per cent., so as to be uniform with the stamp duty on mortgages, I believe that this would have more practical effect in lessening the cost of the transfer of land than any other provision of the measure which may be introduced by the Government. There can be no doubt whatever that a great portion of the odium which has been cast upon the legal profession in consequence of the cost of conveyancing, has been occassioned by the heavy stamp duties, of which solicitors are practically made the collectors from the purchasers of real property. I think this is a matter which might very properly be brought under the notice of the framers of the Government Bill by the Legal Practitioners' Society, and I trust no time will be lost in having this done. Another somewhat analogous grievance which I would commend to the attention of the society is the high scale of fees charged in County Courts in actions between £5 and £20. If these fees were put on a level with those charged in the Superior Courts in similar cases, and some reasonable remuneration allowed to the plaintiff's solicitor the County Courts would be extensively resorted to in many undefended cases which are now taken into such courts as the Lord Mayor's Court, the Court of Passage at Liverpool, and the Salford Hundred Court of Record, &c., simply because in those courts the plaintiff can avail himself of professional assistance without cost to himself, and without increasing the expense to the defendant.

A LANCASHIRE SOLICITOR.

THE PROSECUTION OF BANKRUPTS.—In your number of March 21, under the heading of "Lincoln County Court," you have inserted a notice of the case of "William Pearson, a bankrupt." Your report states that one Peter Platt ("Platts" is the name) was a creditor, and that "none of the creditors (except the one above referred to) had been paid." The facts are just the reverse, "all the creditors, except Peter Platts, have been paid," and Peter Platts would have been paid before the seizure referred to, but that he claimed for principal and interest a sum of more than £100, being the balance of a debt of £1242 proved in the bankruptcy, which was all the bankrupt contended he owed him for both, and which sum was tendered to the trustees and this creditor, "Peter Platts," who had then received over £1100 since the adjudication. All other creditors' claims, principal, and interest had already been settled. The alleged removal of the boxes can and will be satisfactorily explained, for they were not trust property, and, therefore, no loss to the estate, and, moreover, were removed during the absence of the bankrupt from home, and without his knowledge, privity, or consent. But a far more important question remains, which I should like to see answered in your columns, viz., When, as here, a bankrupt's estate can pay more than 20s. in the pound, upon what authority, statute, or principle of law is his surplus money to be detained, in order that his trustees may spend his own money in trying to convict him of that of which he is at least, by presumption of law innocent, and, if he should be found by verdict "Not Guilty" who is to return his money; who and what can compensate him; and are his trustees, who receive 20s. in the pound, to pay themselves, without control, whatever money they may choose to spend in this experiment? If prosecution was necessary, if they, the trustees, had "no funds in hand," surely the county, in the first instance, and then the Treasury, would have provided and paid all necessary "costs" (especially when ordered by a judge) for prosecuting the offence (if there ever was any offence) at the time of the former order, which has been, it appears, over three years in abeyance. To compel a man to pay the costs of his conviction, when he has been convicted, is one thing; to put your hand into his pocket merely on the chance of getting him convicted is surely quite a novelty. What right, beyond 20s. in the pound, can the trustees, creditors, or the court have? In this case the surplus funds are admitted to belong to either the bill of sale holder or the trustee under the liquidation. What right then have the original trustees—whose debts are paid, with costs and interest—to speculate in a prosecution, at the expence of new creditors, and so reduce the funds divisible amongst others?

AN ATTORNEY.

ARBITRATION CLAUSES IN LEGAL DOCUMENTS AND THE PROFESSION.—Now that the interests of the Profession are being somewhat more carefully looked after than they have been hitherto, I should like to direct the attention of solicitors to the way in which arbitration clauses in agreements, &c., are generally framed. For example: on page 114, vol. I. of Prideaux's Precedents in Conveyancing (sixth edition), we find a clause giving power to an architect to determine on the legal effect of the entire instrument (a building contract) as well as on those matters in it with which an architect is supposed to be conversant. The practice of drawing clauses in this form is one (amongst many others) of the causes which lead to so many legal documents being found in the offices of persons who are not lawyers, and which furnish them with precedents highly detrimental to the Profession.

COPYRIGHT IN PHOTOGRAPHS.—Will some of your readers be good enough to state what are the relative rights under the Act 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68, of the author and owner of a photograph of a picture in which the person for whom the photograph is executed for reward has the registered copyright, or who shall have registered the photograph, there being no registered copyright in the picture, and their assigns, in the absence of express agreement.

NOTES AND QUERIES ON POINTS OF PRACTICE.

NOTICE.—We must remind our correspondents that this column is not open to questions involving points of law such as a solicitor should be consulted upon. Queries will be excluded which go beyond our limits.

N.B.—None are inserted unless the name and address of the writers are sent, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for bona fides.

Queries.

89. STAMP.—I observe a receipt stamp on some legacy receipts (Government form) and none on others, in each case the legacy being over £2. Which is strictly correct?

NEMO.

90. ELECTION PETITIONS.—Will any of your correspondents who have had an election petition tried in their borough, favour me with information as to what is necessary to be done for the reception of the judge? And what expenses, and how much the Treasury will allow?

W. H. BAILES.

Answers.

(Q. 79.) PROBATE DUTY.—No. A donatio mortis causâ differs from a legacy in these respects: (1) It takes effect sub modo from the delivery in the lifetime of the donor; and, therefore, it cannot be proved as a testamentary act in the Court of Probate. (2) It requires no assent or other act on the part of the executor or administrator to perfect the title of the donee. Smith's Manual of Equity, 11th edit., p. 120.

D.

(Q 80.) SETTLEMENT OF FURNITURE.—The sale in the first case being notorious as having been made by the sheriff, and the possession being consistent with the terms of the deed of assignment to trustees, I do not think registration is necessary.

D.

(Q. 81.) BANKRUPTCY—PRACTICE IN COUNTY COURTS.—Certainly not. Even registrars of County Courts, possessing jurisdiction in bankruptcy, charge for taking affidavits of proofs of debt, &c.

D.

(Q. 83.) SOLICITOR'S ACCOUNTS.—By action at law. The relation of principal and agent does not of itself entitle the principal to come into equity for an account if the matter can be fairly tried at law: (Barry v. Stevens, 31 Beav. 258; Smith v. Leveaux, 1 Hem. & M. 123; 2 D. J. & S. 1.) An action of account was brought recently at common law; vide Beer v. Beer (12 C. B. 2.)

D.

(Q. 88.) LIQUIDATING DEBTOR—CONVEYANCE.—It is not necessary that the liquidating debtor should concur in the conveyance. On the bankruptcy of any person the whole of his freehold as well as his personal estate is now vested in the creditor's trustee by virtue of his appointment in trust for the whole body of the creditors. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 25, par. 5, empowers the trustee "to exercise any powers the capacity to exercise which is vested in him under this Act, and to execute all powers of attorney, deeds, and other instruments, expedient or necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Act." The trustee can even bar estates tail and exercise powers of appointment in the same manner as the bankrupt (which term also includes liquidating debtors) might have done for his own benefit

LAW SOCIETIES.

BRISTOL ARTICLED CLERKS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held in the Law Library on Tuesday evening, the 17th inst., J. Osborne, Esq., solicitor, occupying the chair. The following was the subject for discussion: "Which is the most advantageous to the holder, an estate in fee simple, fee farm, or for a term of 1000 or more years?"

Mr. Mosely opened and Mr. Baylis opposed.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

THE Society met on Tuesday evening last at the Law Institution, as usual. The following question was discussed by a well attended meeting: (CCXXVII. Jurisprudential) Should the law be amended so as to give effect to the verdict of a majority of a jury? and decided in the negative by the casting vote of the chairman.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at Clement's Inn Hall on Wednesday, the 25th March, Mr. Rubinstein in the chair. Mr. Baker opened the subject for the evening's debate, viz., "That the Government was not justified in making war on the Ashantees." The motion was lost by a majority of two.

BIRMINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AT a meeting of this society, held on Tuesday evening last, Dr. Sebastian Evans, Barrister-at-Law, in the chair, a discussion took place on the following subject: "That the breach of a contract for personal service should not be treated as a criminal offence." Mr. Glaisyer, LL.B., (solicitor), read in the affirmative, and was supported by Messrs. Wm. Johnson, F. Smith, and Heath (Walsall); Messrs. F. W. Lowe, David, and W. H. Warlow spoke in the negative. After which the chairman summed up the various arguments, remarking that in many civil cases imprisonment was as merited a punishment as the being mulcted in damages, the sin against morals being scarcely less than in some criminal offences; also, that the labour struggle was not so much one between master and employé as between the former and trades unions, which at present were richer than a small employer standing by himself, but now that the masters were combining this would not long be so. The voting was in favour of the negative by a large majority.

LEGAL OBITUARY.

NOTE.—This department of the LAW TIMES, is contributed by EDWARD WALFORD, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Geneaiogical and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the LAW TIMES Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

SENATOR SUMNER.

THE late Mr. Charles Sumner, the distinguished American politician and author, whose death, at New York, has just been announced, was born at Boston, Massachusetts, in January, 1811, so that he had just completed his sixty-third year. He was educated at the Boston Latin School and at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1830; he studied law in the same institution after taking his degree. Being called to the Bar in 1834, he began to practise at Boston, and was soon esteemed a sound lawyer. Prior to his admission to the Bar he had contributed to, and afterwards became editor of, the American Jurist, a quarterly law journal, and shortly after his admission he was appointed lecturer on constitutional law and the law of nations to the Cambridge Law School. In 1836 he edited Dunlop's "Treatise on the Practice of the Admiralty Courts in Cases of Civil Jurisdiction at Sea," and in the same year he was offered a professorship in the law school, and also one in Harvard College, both of which he declined. Mr. Sumner visited Europe the following year, and was present in Paris during General Cass's embassy. He remained in Europe nearly three years, of which one was spent in England, where he was received with great cordiality by some of the most eminent jurists. Whilst at Paris he wrote, at the request of the ambassador, a defence of the rights of the United States in reference to the questions then pending between the two Governments. On his return to Boston, in 1840, he resumed practice, and in 1844-6 published, with annotations, "Vesey's Reports," in 20 vols. In 1845 Mr. Sumner avowed himself an advocate of peace in a speech before the municipal authorities at Boston, on the "True Grandeur of Nations." He subsequently signalised himself by his opposition to the annexation of Texas, and by his support of Mr. Van Buren, as candidate for the presidency in 1848. In this year he also became associated with the Freesoil party, and gave them efficient aid. Two years later, on the resignation by Mr. Webster of his seat in the Senate, to enter Mr. Fillmore's Cabinet, Mr. Sumner was, after a severe contest, elected his successor by a coalition of Freesoilers and Democrats. His first important speech was an attack upon the then pending Fugitive Slave Law, which he strongly denounced. In 1856, after a protracted struggle against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and the wrongs done to Kansas, he made an eloquent speech of two days, subsequently published under the title of "The Crime against Kansas," in which he severely denounced the action of some of the Southern members of Congress. For this, two days afterwards, he was brutally attacked by Mr. Brooks, a Southern member; and the result of the injuries he received was a long and serious disability, from which he was three or four years in recovering. He was re-elected to the Senate in 1857; but though he resumed his seat for a few months, in 1858, he was unable to perform any active duties till the latter end of 1859. Mr. Sumner's name is famous in Europe as the champion of slave abolition, which is in no small degree owing to his elaborate and eloquent speech on the "Barbarism of Slavery," delivered in the session of 1859-60. He took an active part in the presidential contest of 1860, opposing all concession to a compromise with slavery, and during the war that followed he proposed emancipation as the speediest mode of bringing the war to a close. From 1861 to 1871 he filled the post of chairman of the committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate. In 1862 he made an elaborate argument in the Mason and Slidell case, in which he took the ground that their seizure was unjustifiable on the principles of international law, which the United States had always maintained. During the war, and since its termination, Mr. Sumner has been conspicuous for the statesmanlike views he has advanced on all the great questions of state, though offence was taken at the position he was supposed to have maintained in regard to the Alabama claims. On the removal of Mr. Sumner from the chairmanship of the committee on Foreign Relations, in 1871, the New York Tribune observes that "after all fair deductions and qualifications have been made, Mr. Sumner stands to-day the foremost American senator. Say, if you will, that he has been needlessly harsh and bitter in his opposition to Santo Domingo—that he might have strenuously, forcibly resisted annexation without making a personal issue with our mild-mannered President and his most urbane Secretary of State—that entitling his speech against annexation 'Naboth's Vineyard' was excessively severe and offensive—what does all this amount to but that he might better be somebody else, and not Charles Sumner? In this world of limitations and imperfections, it seems wiser to value every one according to the good we find in him, and not exact of each the possession and display of every conceivable excellence. That it was a mistake in the Senate to remove Mr. Sumner from the chairmanship of its committee on Foreign Relations, we cannot doubt. And yet the position to which he was transferred was better adapted to his genius, and more accordant with his lofty renown. For, while we have had no senator since Salmon P. Chase entitled to rank with Charles Sumner, and though that must be a very meagre compend of American history which omits his name, yet his honourable eminence has been nowise achieved through the chairmanship aforesaid, but wholly through that eager, uncompromising, unsleeping devotion to the equal rights of man which the position just assigned him by the Senate must afford him the largest opportunities to subserve. If he had asked the Senate to relieve him from further service in the committee on Foreign Relations, and assign him instead to just such duties as have now been imposed on him, the wisdom and fitness of his choice would have been generally admitted." Besides the law books mentioned above, Mr. Sumner was the author of "A Defence of the American Claim in the North-Eastern Boundary Controversy," and "White Slavery in the Barbary States," published in 1847; he has also published numerous speeches, which have been issued in 4 vols. A collection of his complete works, edited by the Hon. Charles A. Phelps, with a life, has been published in 10 vols. in America.

The Law and the Lawyers.

BARON FITZGERALD sitting in the Irish Consolidated Chamber has refused to follow our Court of Queen's Bench in its decision in Baeburn v. Andrew (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15), as to the alteration of the rule of practice which entitled a defendant to security for costs from a plaintiff resident out of the jurisdiction. There Mr. Justice BLACKBURN considered that the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, removed the reason of the rule, inasmuch as a judgment obtained in England can now be entered up in the Courts of Scotland and Ireland, and execution issued upon it. Baron FITZGERALD gave no reason for adhering to the old rule, and in another case Chief Baron PALLES declined to decide in chambers whether the court would depart from it. The great absurdity is that Scotland and Ireland should be out of the jurisdiction, and it would be a step in advance if there could be but one jurisdiction throughout the British Isles. That a different practice as to security should exist in the three countries is decidedly objectionable.

IT is satisfactory to state that immediately upon his attention being called to the wonderful provision in the Middlesex Sessions Bill, that the Chairman of the Second Court and Deputy Judge should be paid only when the Court had sat for full six hours, Mr. CROSS consented to strike the obnoxious words from the Bill. We are still more pleased to learn that they were not inserted with the consent or even with the knowledge of Mr. CROSS. The Bill had been prepared by his predecessor, and he simply took it as he found it, and in this discreditable shape it would have passed had not keen eyes out of doors detected the mischief that had been cleverly condensed in those seven words. If the HOME SECRETARY had not thus voluntarily conceded the amendment, Serjeant SIMON, M.P., had resolved to move its rejection, and if necessary to divide the House upon it. No action was taken in opposition to the payment of the Judge by the day instead of by salary, the urgency of the Bill being pleaded. But the whole question of the administration of the Criminal Law will soon be inquired into by the Judicature Commission, and then this anomaly will doubtless be reviewed and removed.

ON the question of the possible postponement of the Judicature Act 1873, a correspondent writes:—"It may, perhaps, be interesting to your readers to know that, in reply to an inquiry whether there is any foundation for the rumour current in legal circles that the General Rules will not be ready by next November—the date when the Judicature Act comes into operation—I have received a letter from the LORD CHANCELLOR informing me that his Lordship is not at present aware of any reason which may render the postponement of the operation of the Act necessary."

AN application for an attachment against a solicitor for non-payment of moneys due to a client was made to the Irish MASTER of the ROLLS on the 4th ult. The solicitor acted under a power of attorney to draw an annuity, to which a lady client was entitled, and received a portion of the annuity, which, however, he did not pay over. A petition was then filed against him. The amount he retained was 60*l.*, and he claimed credits which, on examination, proved to amount only to 1*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* The court, in the first instance, ordered him to pay 58*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* within one month. He failed to do so, and the application was made for an attachment. The MASTER of the ROLLS, on this application, gave the solicitor a month to pay half the amount and two months for payment of the residue. "There is," he said, "no excuse for a solicitor who applies to another purpose money which belongs to his client. It should be a golden rule to all solicitors, that the money of a client should be regarded as sacred." And, further, "If he has received money of his client he is guilty of a breach of duty, unless he has it ready when it is called for, and if he makes default the court always considers him liable to punishment."

IT was contemplated at one time that the commitment of Mr. WHALLEY by the Court of Queen's Bench for contempt might give rise to some difficulty with the House of Commons. The freedom of members of the House from arrest when the House is sitting is a provision of the Constitution which cannot be too strictly observed; but the uninterrupted and free administration of justice is of even greater importance. What the position of matters would have been had Parliament been assembled when Mr. WHALLEY was committed, may be a question of some interest to the student of Constitutional Law, but does not invite discussion. The Select Committee appointed to inquire into the matters referred to in the letter of the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE to the SPEAKER has reported, informing the House of all that Mr. WHALLEY had to say; but they consider that the circumstances referred to by him do not require the further attention of the House, and express the opinion that the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE did right in communicating to the House the fact of the commitment. The learned Judge has thus most probably anticipated any hostile motion which Mr. WHALLEY might have seen fit to make, and which, by no possibility could have done any good.

THE case Re Ellis's trusts which came before the MASTER of the ROLLS on March 21st, is one more added to the long list of cases which establish the law as to a married woman's separate estate. ELIZABETH ELLIS by her will made in 1860, gave a legacy of 500*l.* Consols to HENRIETTA RUSSELL, a married woman, absolutely; and by a codicil made in 1871, she declared that all provisions, whether absolute or limited, thereby, or by her will made for any female, should be for her separate use, and while she should be under coverture, without any power of anticipation. Mrs. RUSSELL presented a petition for the transfer of the consols on the ground that the restraint on anticipation was ineffectual, the bequest being of a gross sum. The MASTER of the ROLLS, however, decided that the restraint upon anticipation was operative as to the consols, on the ground that they were a perpetual annuity, and that they restrained alienation. And in support of his judgment his Honour quoted Bagget v. Meux (1 Coll., and upon appeal, 1 Phil.). He declined, however, to decide what would have been the effect of a gift of a gross sum of money in similar circumstances. It is to be regretted that the decision covers such extremely narrow ground, and there are two or three questions involved, upon which it is most desirable that judicial opinion should be expressed. The legatee in this case was prevented from appointing the sum of consols, as it was in the nature of annual income. Would she, on the same principle, have been prevented from selling out and re-investing the money? The terms of the judgment seem to imply that she would be obliged to enjoy the property in specie, which would certainly be a hard case, as she would be debarred from more profitable investments. If she is not so forbidden to change the investment, the argument that the legacy was a perpetual annuity redeemable by the State falls to the ground. Involving so minute an issue, the present case will only be an authority when the circumstances are precisely similar. But, according to the authority of Bagget v. Meux, upon which mainly the judge based his decision, there seems to be no reason why the rule laid down in this case should not be equally applicable to a gift of a gross sum of money. KNIGHT BRUCE, V. C., in that case, after stating the validity of general clauses however expressed, in restraint of alienation or anticipation, said: "I am at a loss to discover any sufficient reason why that which holds good as to a life interest should not equally hold good as to an absolute estate. Why should there be any difference?" And upon the appeal in the same case, COTTENHAM, L. C., said: "The reasoning evidently applies to a fee as much as to a life estate, to real property as much as to personal." The two statements taken together certainly go the whole length of the position that a gross sum of money bequeathed to a married woman, is subject to a general clause in restraint of alienation or anticipation. That case was one of real property, and the Vice-Chancellor seems to refer to real property only, but the Lord Chancellor, whilst confirming the judgment below, expressly extends the principle to personal property, whether held for life or absolutely.

THE speech of Sir CHARLES DILKE, on the subject of vote by ballot, exhausts, we believe, all the shortcomings and defects of the system. His motion for a Select Committee is postponed until the pending election petitions have been disposed of. It seems to be expected that the Election Judges will throw some light upon the practical operation of the ballot, but only in those cases in which there is a scrutiny will any report be made calculated to teach the House of Commons more than it has learnt from Sir CHARLES DILKE. We do not know in how many of the nineteen petitions the validity of the voting will be inquired into, but we believe that in the majority of the cases the petitions simply allege the usual corrupt practices. A scrutiny would of course bring to light many of the defects of the Act and its operation, and as no great harm can be done by delay in appointing a Select Committee it is expedient to wait. There are one or two matters put forward by Sir CHARLES DILKE, of which we have not heard before. He attended and watched the proceedings at five elections, and he said that voters were allowed to take their ballot papers out of the booths. This he argues opens the door to bribery and fraud, as the stamp on the paper might be imitated; and he adds that during the busy period, the presiding officers must find it difficult to stop this proceeding, and in the instances which came under his notice they were anything but vigilant. Further he is not satisfied with the process of counting; it is said to be impossible to supervise thoroughly. We certainly do not see how this is to be secured. Lastly we may refer to the subject of the remuneration of returning officers. Somebody whether candidates or ratepayers should pay these gentlemen well, and they ought not to be left to make charges which vary in amount all over the country, or to make none at all, as we regret to find has been the case in some instances. A select committee will be able to suggest remedies for these grievances and must eventually be appointed.

WE shall not have an opportunity this week of considering as closely as they deserve the measures of Lord CAIRNS, dealing with the Transfer of Land, which his lordship introduced into the House of Lords on Thursday night in last week. We will notice, therefore, their general outline. The object which they seek to attain is a simplification of the transfer of land, and the use which is to be made of registration shows the difference between previous legislation and that which is now contemplated, and which will certainly, though possibly to some extent modified, be accomplished. Hitherto, as his lordship pointed out, registers have been historical records of deeds containing the whole of the deeds registered. To simply extend this system would not be of any advantage in the transfer of land, and conveyances would be as cumbersome and expensive as they are at present. The register is to be a register of titles, and not of deeds, and the titles which are to be registered are thus described:—(1), A title absolute or indefeasible; (2), a title limited, that is to say, certified to be good from a particular date, but not beyond it; and (3), a simple title of the proprietor in possession, and asserting himself to be owner. The next question is, What are to be considered indefeasible titles? First, the registrar is to be empowered to register titles having their root forty years back. And if a registrar has before him a marketable title, about which, however, there is some theoretical imperfection, he may apply to the court, which, if satisfied that such imperfection may be waived and disregarded, will direct that it be registered as indefeasible. The registrar is also to be empowered to accept as facts recitals in deeds twenty years old. Foreseeing that if questions of boundaries are to be raised before the registrars many questions which now slumber by mutual consent of adjoining landowners would be raised and form the subject of much litigation, the LORD CHANCELLOR has determined that such questions shall be left to take care of themselves. Of what estates then is it proposed to register the title? The answer is—fee simple estates, leaseholds of a certain length, and charges where mortgages are on the estate. Registration is to be voluntary for three years after the passing of the Act; but subsequently to that time, whenever a sale of land is made, there will be an obligation to register the title. The registrar at the head of the Land Office will be the registrar under the new Act, and he will act under the Supreme Court of Judicature, or under whatever judge to whom the duty may be assigned of dealing with any questions which may be referred to the court. It is not proposed to begin with local registries, but the registry in London will have divisions, and if at any future time it is found that the amount of work done in any particular division would justify the establishment of a local registry, it will be done. The two other measures introduced by Lord CAIRNS, propose, the one to reduce the periods of limitation fixed by the Prescription Act of Will. 4, from twenty years to twelve, and from ten to six respectively, and as to succession claims to make thirty years the utmost limit; and the other, to make a forty years' title sufficient as between vendors and purchasers. This Bill also provides that the purchaser shall not be entitled to attested copies of the deeds except at his own expense. We have briefly sketched the scope of the proposed legislation, and we shall in subsequent issues deal carefully with the details of the several measures.

THE LIABILITIES OF INSURANCE AGENTS.

THE liability of agents for not carrying out the express instructions of their principals is one which requires to be carefully watched, and in no cases more so than in those having reference to insurance. This question is forcibly illustrated by the decision in Great Western Insurance Company v. Cunliffe (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 113), but, before considering the facts of that case, we may notice the principles upon which the courts have hitherto proceeded. In a useful alphabetical classification of the principles of marine insurance law, which has been from time to time published in these columns, we find the following propositions laid down, and supported by references to authorities English and American:

"An agent, who undertakes, so as to bind himself, to insure, is liable to his principal if he fail to do so, or does not exercise ordinary skill and care."

"Clear, precise, and intelligible directions must be followed as far as they are lawful."

"An agent who has faithfully followed express written instructions is not liable for omitting a provision which, from the verbal communications of his principal, he might fairly have inferred to be necessary."

"Total failure to fulfil the obligation to insure (without notice) subjects the agent to an action for all the loss which his correspondent may have sustained from the non-insurance."

"Notice of refusal to act as agent, inability to procure insurance on terms named, or of difficulties delaying the insurance, should be given to the principal within a reasonable time."

Total failure to fulfil an implied obligation to insure—i.e., an obligation imposed upon an agent by his relation to his principal and the circumstances by which he is surrounded—it will be seen renders the agent liable for all the consequences; and therefore in all cases where the principal has a right to expect that the agent will insure, he is entitled to damages if that expectation is not realised. The only question remaining when the obligation is admitted or proved, is whether notice of inability to perform the obligation is given to the principal in time, or the insurance was not made owing to impossibility of procuring it or to circumstances amounting thereto. Of this nature was the question arising for decision in Cunliffe's case, and which we may observe is nearly analogous to that which was decided in Smith v. Cologan (2 T. R. 188, in notis). There Buller, J., said "The foundation of this action is negligence in the defendants, by which the plaintiffs have been injured. The defendants were the correspondents of the plaintiffs. As to the orders for insurance having been received and accepted there is no doubt. The only question is whether the defendants have been guilty of negligence at any period of time which will make them liable." It there appeared that the defendants were unable to effect an insurance in London at the premium they offered, not, however, on the ground that the premium was too low, but because the underwriters would not undertake the risk, the vessel not being registered at Lloyd's. The learned Judge already quoted said: "If the defendants who live in London had gone no further, and done nothing else, it might have been a considerable doubt whether they would have been liable; for, if a person to whom such orders are sent does what is usual to get the insurance made, that is sufficient, because he is no insurer, and is not obliged to get insurance at all events." This it was not necessary to decide, for—the insurance sought to be effected being upon cargo—the defendants applied to the shipowners at Newcastle who effected the insurance but kept the policy, and would not give it up when the loss occurred. The foreign principal adopted the acts of his agents until he found he would sustain loss by so doing, and then sought to make them personally liable for the manner in which they caused the insurance to be made. The direction of the Judge and the verdict, however, went in favour of the defendants, the former observing that they had acted meritoriously, and that, if the principal had intended to hold them liable, he should never have looked to others at all.

The case which we have just stated is useful in considering the Great Western Insurance Company v. Cunliffe, because in the latter a question was raised whether the agents ought not to have made greater efforts than they did to effect an insurance instead of writing to their principals to cover their risks at New York. The excuse made by the defendants was that there was a panic at Lloyd's, and that excessive rates would have to be paid even if the risk were taken at all. They consequently communicated these facts to their principals in New York, but before the insurance could be made the loss occurred. The view taken by the Vice-Chancellor of the excuse of the defendants was this: "The agents in this country had nothing to do with exorbitant rates of premium; they were ordered to reinsure, and from the evidence, showing the manner in which the defendants had previously conducted reinsurance business, it is clear that they considered themselves bound to reinsure. . . . The agency being constituted, the instructions being complete, the duty is cast upon the defendants to show why they did not comply with them. . . . They have failed to do so, by writing a letter which could be of no use for the purpose of the business in which the principals and agents were concerned until after the loss had taken place." The Vice-Chancellor accordingly decided that upon the commonest principles of justice and honesty the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. He exercised jurisdiction although it was strongly urged that the case was one for damages which should be sued for in a court of law, and moreover, he decided that the broker was not entitled to deduct from the claim of the plaintiffs the allowance which is always made to brokers by the underwriters.

No possible objection can be taken to the manner in which this case was decided, and it teaches agents a lesson which few we should apprehend require to learn, and which those who do should not forget. There were express instructions to effect a reinsurance; and an elementary principle, which we stated at the outset, requires literal performance. There is no discretion to decline to pay excessive rates when the alternative is to leave the risk uncovered, and we must confess that it is surprising that agents should have incurred the danger which, in the result, overtook them. Three years elapsed between the discovery of the negligence of the agents and the filing of the bill. The Vice-Chancellor, however, did not consider that any bar to relief, and held that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the accounts gone into, and the loss by failure to reinsure made good.

THE FUNCTIONS OF THE RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

THE supervision of railways by a special railway commission is no new thing. Such a commission was first established in England in 1846, by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105, its duties being to report upon railway Bills, especially with reference to competition and amalgamation, and also to perform all the functions theretofore performed by the Board of Trade, as to certifying to the security of railways before opening, and the like.

In 1851, however, the commission was abolished by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, and the powers transferred to it from the Board of Trade were revested in that board, which is still charged with very numerous and onerous railway duties, such as by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 17, the prosecution of railway companies for any contravention of the law, and by the Traffic Acts of 1854 and 1873, neglecting to provide reasonable facilities for the forwarding of both their own and other companies' traffic.

But it is in America that "Railway Commissioners" have the widest powers. The States of Ohio, Michigan, Massachusetts, and Illinois have all general railway Acts of considerable stringency, and in the two latter States commissioners have been appointed to see them carried into effect. We have before us the second and third annual reports of the Illinois Railway Commission (for the years 1871 and 1872), and it is interesting to see how a people similar to our own are proposing to deal with their railway difficulties. "The railroad interest," say the commissioners, "is by far the greatest now in the State, involving nearly every other one." "The board or its members have travelled pretty extensively over the state, and have noted manifest violations of the police laws heretofore existing." And we are glad to find that the board has not been without its reward, inasmuch as "information has been received from various parts of the State that the very existence of a supervising board has had beneficial effects, and that more care and vigilence are being employed in the management of this all-important interest." This sanguine estimate of the result of the labours is however somewhat modified by the subsequent statement that "the Board have found their course beset with difficulties, arising from the fact that the laws under which they were to act lacked system and symmetry, and presented many obscurities of language and meaning." Whether the State even possesses an Act similar to our own Railways Clauses Consolidation Act we are not aware; but we should imagine our own Railway Commissioners would be led to sympathise with them from their experience of the numerous London and South-Western Railway Acts which the counsel for that company, in Goddard's case, produced in proof of the power of the company to charge what they pleased for the carriage of goods. The Illinois Commissioners, however, have drafted a Consolidation Bill, which appears in the Appendix to their second report, which we would recommend to the consideration of our new President of the Board of Trade. It is not likely that English railway legislation will stand still, and it is likely enough that abolition of the passenger duty may be accompanied by a contemporaneous statute having the effect of giving the public something in return for the loss of revenue. However that may be, it is important to bear in mind the remarkable clause which has been inserted in every special railway Act since 1845, to the effect that "nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to exempt the railways by this Act authorized to be made" from any future general Act respecting railways. A clause like this would at any rate render impossible any such answers denying the jurisdiction of the Illinois Commissioners, of which the following is a sample: "The company denies the right of your commission to call for the following report, for the reason that it believes the law creating your commission and authorising it to interfere with the regulation of our rates of freight and fare, to be unconstitutional and void." The report was made notwithstanding, and the protests do not appear to have been renewed.

We extract a few of the leading clauses of the Illinois Bill:

The railway commissioners have the right of passing in the performance of their duties concerning railroads on all railroads in the State.

Every railway company is to furnish the commissioners with a full annual statement of its financial affairs, of the rate of fare for passengers for each month, what running arrangements it has with other companies, a separate list of passengers killed and wounded, and of employés killed and wounded.

[In addition to this, no less than forty-three interrogatories are to be administered by the commissioners, and the commissioners may "make and propound" any further ones they please.]

Said commissioners shall examine into the condition and management of railroads . . . . and whether such railroad companies comply with the laws . . . . And whenever it shall come to their knowledge, either upon complaint or otherwise, or they shall have reason to believe that any such laws have or are being violated, they shall prosecute all corporations guilty of such violation.

All railroads shall be classified according to the gross amount of their respective earnings.

[Four classes are then prescribed, the maximum charge for carriage of passengers rising from 2½ cents. per mile in the case of railways earning 10,000 dollars a mile or more, to 5½ cents in the case of railways earning 4000 dollars a mile or less.]

A far more stringent supervision, then, is actually at work in America than in England, and it is proposed by the Railway Commissioners themselves to increase its stringency. The question at once arises, whether it would be desirable to introduce similar provisions here; and it is a question of some practical importance, as it has, by a writer in the Law Magazine for March, been contended—wrongly, we think, but not without some show of reason—that "inspectorial functions," of a character hitherto unthought of, are conferred by the recent Regulation of Railways Act 1873 upon our own Railway Commissioners. It has been contended that the Act, besides giving power to prosecute inquiries by inspection after the commissioners have been once set in motion by litigation, gives them also power to prosecute such inquiries of their own motion, and before any litigation is commenced. The words relied on for this contention are those of sect, 25, which provide that "they" (the commissioners) "may by themselves, or by any person appointed by them to prosecute an inquiry, enter and inspect any place or building. . . . the entry or inspection of which appears to them requisite." But we think that the words "for the purposes of this Act," which occur at the beginning of the section, limit the powers of inspection to cases where a party interested has done something to set the commissioners in motion. This may be seen perhaps better from sect. 14 than from any sections of the Act. That section gives the commissioners power to make orders requiring a company to distinguish "terminals" from tolls "on the application of any person interested." But however this may be, the commissioners themselves at present have taken the more restricted view of their "inspectorial functions," as may be seen from Gen. Ord. No. 16, providing for the conduct of in inquiries at any stage of the proceedings, obviously excluding inquiries ante litem motam.

But is it expedient that if the Commissioners have this power they should exercise it, or if they have it not, that it should be given to them? We imagine not. Inspectorial functions exercised of the Commissioners' own motion, would tend to make them highly unpopular with the railway companies, a result which is to be avoided, if the object in view can be gained any other way, and would tend to destroy their judicial character. It is not desirable that the same persons should be both prosecutors and judges. But we think that there is much force in the argument that "the public, who cannot determine what are undue preferences, unjust prejudices, or unreasonable facilities, is in the same position that an infant is with regard to business transactions." The true remedy, in our opinion, lies in the appointment of special railway public prosecutors, independent of the Government of the day. The Board of Trade has been our public prosecutor in this matter for thirty years, but whether from fear, caution, or absence of necessary information, it has contented itself with taking measures (with what success we are not now inquiring) for the public safety, and has, so far as may be gathered from law reports, utterly neglected the duties, thrown upon it by the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, of enforcing arrangements for the public convenience. Only in one solitary case under the Act of 1854—Barret v. Great Northern and Midland Railway Company (1 C. B., N. S., 423; 28 L. T. Rep. 254)—does it appear that the Board of Trade took any part, and even then the point raised by the Board —whether railway companies are compellable to book through traffic—appears to have been allowed to drop. And the part taken by the Board in the Dover case under the Act of 1873 was merely a ministerial one, taken under sect. 13 of the Act. Whether municipalities should be allowed to appoint public prosecutors by an extension of the principle adopted in the Municipal Corporation Amendment Act 1871 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 91), whereby any governing body, such as a corporation or local board, may apply their public funds to the costs of legal proceedings deemed necessary for the promotion or protection of the interests of the inhabitants of their district; or whether such a thing could be best done out of imperial funds, is a somewhat difficult question. But signs are not wanting that the railway companies are now becoming so powerful, that short of State control or purchase, nothing can hold them properly in check but the creation of a body of public prosecutors, charged with the duty of prosecuting railway companies and nothing else, and, above all, absolutely independent of the Government of the day.

FELONY BY CARRIERS' SERVANTS.

It is obviously important that bailors whose goods are lost whilst in the custody and care of carriers should know what their remedies are, and how the loss is to be brought home to the carrier. Carriers have been very properly protected by Act of Parliament against liability for the loss of goods above 10*l.* in value, unless such value is declared at the time of the consignment, but by the 8th section of the Carriers' Act, it is provided that nothing in the Act shall be deemed to protect any mail contractor, stage coach proprietor, or other common carrier for hire from liability to answer for loss or injury to any goods or articles whatsoever arising from the felonious acts of any coachman, guard, bookkeeper, porter, or other servant in his or their employ. On this section a case which is instructive was recently decided and reported by us last week: (Vaughton and another v. The London and North Western Railway Company, 30 L. T. Rep., N.S. 119.) There the question was one of evidence—was it necessary, in order that the plaintiff might recover, that he should prove affirmatively a felony by some particular servant or servants of the company? The plaintiffs had obtained a verdict at the trial, and the argument took place upon the rule to set aside that verdict.

It may be useful shortly to notice the facts and arguments. The property lost was a box of jewellery, and portions of the jewellery were found by different persons laying about a siding platform. One servant of the company was taken into custody, but said that he had found the property in his possession, and was thereupon discharged. Two other servants named respectively Hindley and Wilson were suspected, Hindley being driver of a parcel van on the morning of the robbery in which the box for delivery was duly entered. Wilson was a clerk in the parcel office, who had possession of some of the property. It was proved that there was no part of the defendant's station open or accessible to the public nearer the spot where the parcel van was, while the parcels were being placed in it, than from six to ten yards. The defendants called no witnesses, and the learned Judge in summing up to the jury, told them that they must, before they could find a verdict for the plaintiffs, be satisfied that the goods were stolen by the felony, not of one of the public, but of one or more of the company's servants, although the plaintiffs might not be able to fix the felony on any one particular servant, nor was it necessary that the jury should be satisfied as to which of two or more implicated servants was the actual thief.

The argument for the company was, that they could not have placed the suspected men in the box, for that to do so would have been to subject men with a criminal charge hanging over their heads to cross-examination, and, further, that it would have been to try them on such charge upon an entirely collateral issue. It is impossible not to see the inconvenience and possible injustice attendant upon calling the suspected men to deny the felony, but it is difficult to see how the company could successfully avoid it. And the result shows that it was not possible. It was out of the question that these men should be called by the plaintiff, and, in the absence of a positive confession of the men, what could the plaintiff do? Only that which they did, namely, make out a primâ facie case. "It is quite sufficient," was the argument on their behalf, "in a case like the present, if it be shown beyond reasonable doubt that the loss of the goods in question must have resulted from a felonious act on the part of some one or other of the servants of the railway company, and it is not incumbent on the plaintiffs to fix by their evidence any one servant in particular with the felonious act, nor even to adduce such distinct and precise proof of the act as would be held needful to establish a case for the jury if one of the servants were on his trial on an indictment for the felony."

This argument was fully appreciated by the court. The Lord Chief Baron referring to the section of the Carriers' Act (sect 8) said: "The intention of that section is manifestly to protect the public from loss or injury to their goods arising from the felonious act of any servant of the carriers or company, and to make the latter liable whenever the articles in question are stolen by persons under their control. Is it possible to say that such a case as the present does not come within that section?" His Lordship then draws a distinction between cases of felony and civil cases, and the evidence which should be given under different circumstances. He said: "We must deal with cases arising under it [i.e., the section of the Act] on very different principles from those which are applicable to a case of a person indicted for a felony. In the latter case where the prisoner cannot give evidence or be examined, if evidence were given that the particular article had come into the prisoner's possession, and had been in his possession for a time, and had then disappeared, the bare fact of possession which might, consistently with the rest of the evidence given, lead to no other inference than that the party charged had been guilty of negligence, could not justify a Judge in leaving the case to the jury at all. But is not the case very different here, where the company could have called all the servants in their employ who were at all suspected of being implicated in the matter to have explained the disappearance of the box, and anything in the circumstances that might really be deceptive? Here there is much circumstantial evidence against Hindley, from his having possession of the book, the parcels mentioned in which had been checked and looked over, and his being also in the exclusive possession of the van in which they were placed. The question then arises, whether there is any difference between a civil action, in which we have to consider whether the words of this Act of Parliament have been complied with or not, and the case of the same individual (Hindley), if he had been indicted for a felony. It might be no justification for a Judge leaving such a case to a jury, had Hindley been indicted for the felony, that there was circumstantial evidence that he had had possession of the parcel, and that it had disappeared at the time when it was his duty to deliver it; but in a civil action like the present, it is surely no answer to say, in argument, merely that there was no case to go to the jury, because the man might never have had actual possession of the parcel, or if he had, that it might have been stolen from his van on the way to the hotel."

We have quoted extensively from this judgment because the subject is one of great importance, and the admission of circumstantial evidence in a civil case to prove a primâ facie case of felony—which to all intents and purposes is equivalent to a conviction of the suspected servants—is apparently an infraction of the strict laws of evidence. It is undoubtedly a forcible observation to say that the procedure in civil and criminal trials is different, and evidence may be admitted in one case which would be rejected in another; but that this would not be generally contemplated, and that for the purposes of a civil suit men would not be assumed guilty of a felony who were not proved by direct affirmative evidence to be so, is clear. And we think that Vaughton and another v. The London and North Western Railway Company, must be considered as introducing a somewhat novel principle, but one nevertheless which we confess appears to us to have been necessarily applicable to the case in order to give the plaintiffs their proper remedy.

LAW LIBRARY.

A Digest of the Laws relating to Public Health and Local Government for Sanitary Authorities. Sixth Edition. By Geo. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S., Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens and Sons; Knight and Co., 1874.

This digest does not very well keep in view the difference between a digest and an index. The laudable object of the author to convey (page 2) information in the fewest possible words has led to the attenuation of this work almost to the skeleton dimensions of an index. Of this a sort of consciousness is visible in the remark (page 2), that not a single paragraph of the work should be consulted independently of the statutes on which it is based. It is very difficult to see how this work can abbreviate the labour of studying statutes when the abbreviation it is competent to produce consists in reading the work as well as the statutes. We cannot consider this work anything else than an index which deviates from the intelligible manner in which indices are usually framed. We can however safely recommend the work to those who desire a handy index for collections of special Health Statutes which may have none affixed to them.

The Factory and Workshop Acts. By J. NORCUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens and Sons, 1874.

THIS is a collection of Acts which are technically called the Factory and Workshop Acts, and there is appended, passim, a number of the well-known cases decided upon the different sections of those statutes. The book as it stands is a very creditable and useful work, and the cases cited are all of considerable authority and well-recognised standing. We can recommend the book to all who require a handy compilation of a few special statutes, and do not care to go to the expense of the more elaborate works on master and servant, which naturally embrace as a portion of themselves, what constitutes the whole of this work. We think that the author might have added the Master and Servants Act, which everyone identifies with the Workshop and Factory. Technically, no doubt, the Act in question is properly excluded from the present treatise, but the work would have had greater professional use had that exclusion not taken place.

A Treatise on Easements and Servitudes. Third Edition. By E. WASHBURN, LL.D., Bussey Professor of Law at Harvard University, U.S. Boston (Am.): Little, Brown, and Co.

THIS is a treatise of intolerable dimensions (776 pp. 8vo.) considering the subject which it discusses, and the success it appears to have achieved is probably traced to its true source when it is attributed by the author (p. vii.) to "a want in the Profession to be supplied." This inaccurate expression rests the success of the work before us on demand and supply, and we can very easily believe that legal books, just like other wares, find a ready market whatever their quality, where they have no competitors. But whatever native reputation this work has obtained, there is not, we think, likely to be any extensive foreign demand for it, at least, so far as England is concerned. The English legal profession possesses the various editions of Gale's work on the subject of easements; all lucid in style and compendious in form, and written with strict technical accuracy. To none of these qualities can Mr. Washburn's work lay even a colourable claim; technically, the book is deformed by errors of definition; it is, moreover, devoid of anything but a pretence of arrangement; it is obscure, and forms a wilderness of marginal notes. Juridical writing, as a matter of course, requires clearness and definiteness of thought, and lucidity of expression. From the beginning to the end of this work Mr. Washburn does not seem to have made up his mind as to what are easements. Thus he says (p. 4): "All rights of way are easements. So is the right to enter upon another's land and to erect booths thereon on public days, or to dance and play at lawful sports." The proposition that a right to dance and play at sport is an easement is a deviation from the express decision in Mounsey v. Ismay (3 H. & C. 496), that such a right is not an easement at all. Even the merit of being consistently wrong does not belong to Mr. Washburn, for (p. 6) he says, "In further explanation of the distinction there is between an easement or servitude, properly so called, and a right by custom, it may be stated that among the rights which have been held to be gained by custom are those of the people of a particular vil coming together to dance in a particular close," and this inaccuracy continues through the book. Sometimes Mr. Washburn does arrive at a conclusion, and then this valuable product of his professorial intellect is not suffered to rest. § 67, § 70, p. 114, s. 8, § 72, all contain a statement in almost the same words of the same conclusion, and although it cannot be suggested that some conclusions are not worth endless reiteration, yet a little trouble would certainly obviate such a fault of arrangement. Whether this repetition of a conclusion is what the author alludes to when he describes this edition of his work as "having (p. vi.) a more thorough completeness" than the editions already issued is not within our province to inquire, but if such be the case the exuberant thoroughness which the author seems to think belongs to completeness may with advantage be pruned down.

We have alluded to the above errors—where we have alluded to them specifically—as specimens of those which here and there deform and vitiate this work. Clearly no man can write accurately upon that which he is unable to define, and Mr. Washburn is no exception to this rule. He has also adopted a scheme for this work which can promise nothing but bulk. He has undertaken apparently, though not avowedly, to investigate not only what an easement is, but what it is not. Another style of investigation is to investigate only what an easement is. This latter style applied to the present subject results in a clear lucid work of moderate dimensions similar to Gale on Easements, and the former naturally results in a work of the portentous size of that before us. It would be well if Mr. Washburn would adopt the system of Gale; he might produce then a work of moderate dimensions perhaps not wholly free from obscurity; but as his work at present stands it is open to the reproach of treating of easements et de quibusdam aliis, and though it may have some possible use, cannot very much be commended from a professional point of view.

WE have received the seventh issue of Crockford's Clerical Directory, 1874 (Horace Cox, 10, Wellington-street, Strand), which must by this time have attained to almost absolute accuracy, and forms a most useful book of reference. It stands in the same relation to the clergy as the Law List does to lawyers, whilst the particulars given are necessarily much fuller. Great care seems to be bestowed upon it, so as to entitle it to the success which it has attained.

Thursday, March 26.

TRANSFER AND TITLE OF LAND.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My lords, a notice of motion with regard to the transfer of and title to land in this country has generally been the prelude to a very long speech, and it is probable that I myself, a number of years ago, may in that respect have been a considerable offender in the other House of Parliament. But I think I may undertake to your lordships that on this occasion I can compress in a very small space all the observations I desire to make. My lords, I can do that the more readily because I know my noble and learned friend, who lately occupied the position I have now the honour to hold, made in the course of last session a speech by no means too long, but most able and comprehensive, in which he went through the history of the attempts at legislation already made in respect of this subject. My lords, therefore, without any prelude, I shall proceed to the legislation which I shall ask your lordships to enter upon. I shall not stop to argue upon the advantages of a cheap and easy mode of transfer of land. Upon that point I think we are all agreed, and I think we are also agreed upon the blot which has hitherto existed in our system of law by reason of the complexity, delay, and expense which at present surround all the dealings with regard to real property. My lords, for the purpose I have in hand I will ask your lordships to look to four different dates and the attempts at legislation which were made on those occasions. I will refer for a moment to the years 1859, 1862, 1867, and last session. In 1859 it was my duty, as Solicitor-General of the Government which then existed, to introduce in the House of Commons two measures which were founded mainly upon a report of a Royal Commission. Those measures were on the subject of the registration of titles to land. My lords, the phrase "registry of title to land" is very frequently used without adequate precision as to meaning, and therefore I must ask you to allow me in a few sentences to explain what it really is, and I can best do so by asking you to look at the difference between a registry of the title to land and a registry of deeds and assurances of land. The latter may be thus stated: Every deed connected with the property is placed upon the register. It is either transcribed at length or described in a formal manner. The consequence is that the register becomes an historical narrative of all the deeds of every kind connected with the property. It is obvious that a registry of that kind may add security to the title to land, but it by no means facilitates the transfer of land. On the contrary, it has quite the opposite effect, because a mass of deeds is placed on the register; and if a person purchases land he has not only to examine the deeds connected with the property, but also to go to the register and see that the entries there correspond with the deeds themselves. We now come to the registry of the title to land. In the registry you will have no deeds whatever. You will have on the register a description of the property—where it is, how it is called, and as far as possible its boundaries; but beyond those particulars you will have nothing except the name of the proprietor of the property. Let us see how that will work in practice. The owner of a fee simple estate with a perfectly good title contemplates selling it in lots—say in fifty lots. Well, as the law at present stands, when he comes to deal with the purchaser of the first lot he must make out a title and give an abstract of all the dealings with the property for forty years back. Great expense is incurred in the case of this lot; but the matter does not end there, because the same course has to be gone through in the case of every one of the other lots into which the property is divided. Now, under a registry of title, the land would be placed on the register with a simple description of the situation, and the name of the proprietor. That being done, every one of the fifty intending purchasers has nothing to do but come to the register and satisfy himself that the piece of land which he proposes to buy has been entered there by name. The limitation of time and expense would be as great as can well be conceived when we compare that process with the one which has at present to be gone through. The establishment of a registration in that sense was the object of the Bills which I introduced in 1859. At that time the proposal was novel; but it met with very considerable approval by the Profession and the public. The bills were read a second time, but a dissolution of Parliament having come on shortly after, the subject was allowed to slumber. In the year 1862, the second of the epochs to which I am desirous of calling your lordships' attention, the late Lord Westbury, as Lord Chancellor, introduced in your lordships' House a bill on this subject, which was subsequently carried through Parliament. It was based on the principle of a "registry of the title to land," so far as the term; but it was not a measure for the registry of land in the sense I have endeavoured to explain it. It was a registry which, under the name of a registry of land, was a registry of deeds, and, in my mind at least, it was a registry of deeds of the worst kind, because it was a system under which the person registering had the power to place on the register, not the deeds themselves, but a statement of what he conceived to be the effect of the particular deed. In the House of Commons I took the liberty of objecting to that system on two grounds. The first was the ground I have just stated; the second was that the Bill provided that in the registration of the estate the boundaries of the estate should be settled irrevocably by a judicial decision, the probable consequence of which would be disputes as to boundaries among all the adjacent owners. However the Bill passed into law, and a registry office, with a registrar and staff, was established in London with a view of carring the measure into effect. A certain number of proprietors brought in their properties for registration in the office, but the number was so small, as compared with the aggregate of proprietors of land in this country, that the Act was generally regarded as a failure. I now ask your Lordships to come on with me to the year 1868. At that time I filled the office which I have now again the honour to hold, and I was unwilling that the subject of the transfer of land should be allowed to remain in its present position. Accordingly a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the working of the Act of 1862. That commission was composed of men well qualified for the duties they had to discharge in connection with it. Besides several of the law lords, it included several eminent barristers, conveyancers, and solicitors. I may venture to commend the report of that commission to any of your lordships who may not have read it, as a very interesting piece of reading, and one which throws real light upon the present state of the law. It enters into the history of what was done in 1862, and states that, in the opinion of the commissioners, the Act of that year had proved a failure. It then states what, in the minds of the commissioners, had been the causes of its failure. I think the most conspicuous of those are the causes which I have already stated—its mode of dealing with boundaries, and its want of simplicity in placing what I may call the title of deeds on the register. The commissioners assigned some other causes of failure also, and they recommended that another system should be adopted — that there should be a recurrence to the principle on which the Bills of 1859 had been framed. Five of the commissioners recommended a literal reproduction of the Bills of 1859, the other commissioners recommended that the principle of those Bills should be adhered to. I now pass from the report of 1868 to the last session, when my noble and learned friend who then occupied the Woolsack (Lord Selborne) brought in a Bill which was mainly founded on the report of the commissioners, and which adopted, I venture to think, the true principle of the registry of the title to land. There were two differences between the Bill of my noble friend and the Bill of 1859. My noble and learned friend proposed to take the office of the Land Registry in London, created by the Act of 1862, as the registry to which titles were to be brought; whereas the bill of 1859 provided for the establishment of a Landed Estates Court similar to that which exists in Ireland. He also proposed that after a time there should be a compulsory registration of land, whereas the Bill of 1859 had left the registration entirely voluntary. Your lordships will recollect that in the last session you were very much engaged in the consideration of the Judicature Bill, which occupied a very considerable time. It was obvious when my noble and learned friend first introduced his Bill on the subject of land there would be much difficulty in considering them before a select committee, and yet it was obvious that the provisions required to be minutely inquired into. Under those circumstances, I recommend my noble and learned friend not to proceed with the scheme, but to refer it to some distinguished conveyancer in the interval between the two sessions, that it might have the benefit of his revision. My noble and learned friend adopted that suggestion, and placed his Land Titles and Transfer Bill before Mr. Hall, now Vice-Chancellor Sir Charles Hall, who was then practising at the Bar. I must pause to say that I think, if my noble and learned friend had applied to the profession at large as to the person best qualified to deal with a matter of this kind in a manner safe and satisfactory, there would have been an unanimity of opinion that he could not have made a more judicious selection; and I further think that it is of the greatest possible advantage that the matter has been considered by a person so experienced in the law of real property as Sir Charles Hall. (Hear, hear.) I must also pause to say another word with regard to my noble and learned friend. A short time before the change of Government, but when that change was said to be intended, my noble and learned friend communicated to me that it might possibly be my duty to introduce a measure on this subject, and he handed over to me the papers connected with his measure, that I might have the fullest possible opportunity of considering it and making any alterations that might appear to me to be necessary. I thanked him in private, and now I thank him in public. (Hear, hear.) I regard what he did as not only courteous to myself personally, but useful to the public, because under no other circumstances would it have been in my power, within a week after the commencement of the session, to place before your lordships the Bill which I have now the honour of submitting for your consideration. (Hear.) My lords, I will now explain what it is I propose to do. It will not be necessary for me to go through all the provisions of this measure, but there are questions which will naturally occur to the minds of some of your lordships, and will also occur to the public out of doors, and these questions it may be convenient for me to anticipate and answer. One question that will be asked is this: What is the kind of title you are going to register; is the title, once registered, to be thenceforth indefeasible? My lords, under this bill I propose that there may be a registry of three kinds of title—viz., a title absolute or indefeasible; a title limited—that is to say, a title certified to be good from a particular date, but not beyond it; and a simple title of the proprietor in possession and asserting himself to be owner. We should then have a title certified to be absolute, a title certified for a limited date, a title not certified. I know it has been proposed that what is called "a good holding title" should be allowed to be certified by registration as indefeasible. I am not able to make that proposition. "A good holding title" is not an uncommon phrase, but it is not a legal phrase; it has no legal precision, and cannot be defined in legal terms. Quite the contrary, because it must be remembered that what may be in the opinion of one conveyancer "a good holding title" may be in the mind of another conveyancer a title surrounded with difficulty and doubt, and for that reason a title which he would not allow his client to accept. There can be no doubt that in the dealings with land such a title is very often accepted, but it is always one which the purchaser accepts at his own risk, and if loss results from it the loss is his. It would be a very different thing to allow by law a registry of such a title as that, with the view to a legal certificate that it was indefeasible. But I propose to do that which I think will do full justice to those who wish to deal with good holding titles. I propose that if persons come before the registrar with a title which is marketable and good, but in which, by reason of some incident, there is a theoretical imperfection, the registrar is to be at liberty to state that incident to the court, and if the court is satisfied that it may be waived and disregarded, it is to be at liberty to act on that opinion and certify the title as indefeasible. I propose to go further. No title is now considered by the Court of Chancery as marketable which has not its root sixty years back. I propose that, under this Bill, the registrar may accept titles having their root only forty years back, providing there be nothing to lead him to suspect that there are imperfections in the earlier period of the title. I also propose that he shall be at liberty to receive as facts recitals of deeds twenty years old. The next question is — What are you to do about boundaries? I have stated that an objection to the Bill of 1862 was that it required the boundaries to be settled. I propose that the boundaries should not be settled. I propose that the registrar should describe the boundaries in the best way he can, but that he should not be charged with the duty of deciding questions of boundary as between adjoining owners, and I make that proposition on this principle: It was shown before the Royal Commissioners of 1868 that in practice boundaries never create any difficulty in the buying and selling of property; that questions of boundary were managed quite easily on the spot, and never came before counsel. In the next place, my objection to a settlement of boundaries by the registrar is this—that it would bring forward disputes and lead to litigation. On many estates there have been unsettled questions of boundary for hundreds of years, but they have been allowed to remain in abeyance and never have caused any difference among the owners of adjoining estates. But if the duty of settling the boundaries devolved on the registrar that satisfactory state of things might be put an end to, because if those questions were raised for decision, the parties on either side might be unwilling to concede. I am of opinion, therefore, that this settlement of boundaries would be a means of creating unnecessary difficulties. (Hear, hear.) But there is a still further reason against it. It would be impossible for the registrar to decide as between adjoining owners unless he had all those owners before him; but when John Smith comes before him to register his title to Whitesacre, how is the registrar to know the boundaries of all the owners of property on both sides of Whitesacre? The registrar, if he were to settle the boundaries of John Smith of Whitesacre, would have to enter into an examination of all the titles of the adjoining owners, in order to satisfy himself that he had all the real owners before him. All that for the objects we have in view is unnecessary. It is disregarded in the practical dealings with land, and is a thing nobody asks for. I cannot present this view better than it was presented by the late Mr. Waley to the Royal Commission of 1868: "The relinquishment of the practice of determining the boundary of registered lands . . . . will leave the registered owner subject to the possible claims of his neighbours, so that an indefeasible title will mean a title beyond question by any except adjoining owners. To this I think that there is no practical objection. The possible rights of adjoining owners may be classed with rights of way and other rights, the liability to which is practically consistent with indefeasible ownership." Well, then, the next question which will be asked is this—What do you propose to have a registry of? My lords, I propose to register fee simple estates, leaseholds of a certain length, and charges where mortgages are on the estate. Then comes the question—Is the registry to be compulsory or is it to be voluntary? I propose that for three years there shall be no compulsion in any form. I myself am very sanguine that it will be found that if this measure should have your lordships' approval, and become law, a great deal of business will have been transacted under it, and a great quantity of land will have been registered before the expiration of three years. I say so for this reason: This is a subject on which the public mind has been maturing for fifteen years; the attention of the profession has been directed to it, and the attention of the public has been directed to it, and I think that almost without exception there has been an opinion universally expressed in favour of a registry of title such as I have described it. A registry of land such as I have described it brings up land as far as can be to the average of ships and stock. It is that the public ask for, and the public desire to have. Moreover, we have the advantage derived from the experience of the failure of the Act of 1862. We know the causes which led to the failure of that legislation and we are able in these proposals to avoid them. I am therefore sanguine enough to hope that without any compulsion we shall have a very large amount of business transacted in the registration of title within the course of three years. I know it has been stated, and stated very strongly sometimes, that the solicitors will oppose a measure of this kind and prevent it from succeeding. I do not think so. I have had some experience of solicitors; and without adverting to what is obvious, that even in a matter of self-interest whatever improves the law and gives greater facilities for dealing with land must be a benefit, and not an evil to the Profession—without adverting to that consideration, I speak from my own experience of solicitors when I say of the great mass of them that I believe there is not in the kingdom a body of men more intelligent, more liberal in their views, more desirous of improvement in the law, and more anxious to avail themselves of such improvement when made. (Hear.) But that does not depend upon my testimony, because if your lordships refer to the evidence given before the Royal Commission, you will find a great deal of testimony on this point; and the commissioners say that there is evidence to show that after the passing of the Act of 1862 there was the greatest anxiety among the most eminent solicitors to take advantage of that enactment, and that they did not abandon it until experience had shown them that it was unsatisfactory and more expensive than the old system. Your lordships will find it was no opposition of the solicitors that caused the failure of the Act of 1862; and therefore, unless I much deceive myself as to the advantages of this measure, I do not think it is one which will have to encounter the opposition of the Profession. I propose, then, my lords, that for three years after the passing of the Act there shall be nothing in the shape of compulsion. But I propose that after that time, whenever a sale of land is made, there shall be an obligation to register the title. If such registration be not effected the purchaser shall only obtain an equitable title. A legal title he shall not obtain till he registers. That mild kind of compulsion will not be put in operation till we have had three years' experience of the working of the registration system. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, the question will be asked, Who is to register the title? I take the office which already exists—the office of the land registrar. I own—it may be, perhaps, a partiality for my own offspring—that I should have been better pleased to have established in this country a Landed Estates Court, after the fashion of the Irish Landed Estates Court; but there is the difficulty of having an office which has been already created and which I wish to utilise. In addition to that consideration there is the fact of the passing of the Judicature

Act of last year, the principle of which is to congregate all the principal Courts of the kingdom. It would be somewhat at variance with the provisions of that Act to establish a fresh court outside; but I am not without hope that if this measure turns out successful we may have at some future period, a conveyancing judge whose court would form a part of the Supreme Court under the Judicature Act, and be charged with the duty of registering titles. But I take the Land Office as it stands, and the registrar at the head of that office will be the registrar under this new Bill. He will act under the Supreme Court of Judicature, or under whatever judge of that court to whom the duty may be assigned of dealing with any questions which may be referred to the court under the measure which I am about to introduce. I must say a word on a point respecting which a question will be asked. Are you going to have local registries? or is the London Registry Office to do the work of the whole kingdom? That appears to me to be a question of some difficulty. It is one on which there is a great deal to be said on both sides. It sounds very plausible to say that, on the same principle which makes us hold that justice should be brought home to every man's door, dealings with property should be brought as close as possible to the property dealt with, and that, especially in the case of small properties, it is very desirable that there should be a local office for doing the business on the spot. But, on the other hand, you must bear in mind what is to be said on the other side. Could anyone go further than to suggest that there should be a registry in every county of England. But take the case of a large county, 60 or 80 or 100 miles long, and have but one office in each county. The consequence will be that persons will often have to go to as great a distance to the registry in their own county as they would to come to the one in London, and perhaps the communications, as to locomotion, will be more difficult. In addition to that, you must bear in mind that while the local registries are in operation a very large amount of dealings with property will be going on in London. Dealings of this kind will always go on to a very large extent, because of the greater facilities for them that are to be found in the metropolis. The consequence will be that persons from London will have to go down and make examinations at the local registries. What I propose to do is to proceed tentatively. I propose that the London Registry should have within its own office district divisions. Should it be found that for any district of the country the transaction of business is so large as to afford a good prospect that a registry established in that district would be self-supporting, there will be a power vested in the proper authority to order the establishment of a local registry in that part of the country. I believe that arrangement will meet the wants of the case. My lords, I have two other Bills to introduce to your lordships' notice, which are connected with this subject, but are of a more limited scope than the one to which I have been referring. One of them deals with the question of the limitation of claims and actions regarding real property. By it I propose an alteration of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, which at present regulates the limitations in respect of suits relating to real property. There are various provisions in that Act by which these limitations as to the bringing of suits in respect of real property extend to twenty years, while in some cases the period is ten years. It has been for some time felt as a crying evil that these periods should be so long. They are felt to be unnecessarily long; but it is very hard to say what should be the periods of limitation. I propose to shorten the period of twenty years in the Act of Will. 4 to twelve years, and the period of ten years to six. The limitation in respect of succession claims, which stands at forty years, I propose should not go beyond thirty at the utmost. The third of the Bils relates to vendors and purchasers, and by it I propose that there should be a change in some parts of the laws, which at present are felt to be in a very unsatisfactory state. I propose that if there be no stipulation to the contrary, forty years' title should be sufficient to show, and that the purchaser shall not be entitled to attested copies of the deeds, except at his own expense. There are other provisions in this Bill as to the rights of vendors and purchasers in respect of leaseholds, and as to those of executors and administrators after payment of mortgages. Both the latter Bills are independent of the Registry Bill, though, of course connected with the transfer of land. I commend all three measures to your lordships' attention, and I will venture to hope that they may find favour with your lordships and become the law of the land. I do so in view of the interests concerned, and because I believe that by passing them your lordships will respond to an expression of hope contained in her Majesty's gracious speech. The present system has long been a disgrace to our law, and I would ask your lordships to abolish and remove it. (Cheers.) The noble and learned Lord concluded by laying all these Bill on the table of their Lordships' House.——Lord SELBORNE.—My Lords, I am glad that the conduct of these measures should have fallen into the hands of my noble and learned friend, because, if any man in this country has given long and close attention to these subjects, and thoroughly understands them, it is my noble and learned friend. In one sense they are peculiarly his own, because it was his fortune in 1859 to be the first to lay on the table of the other House of Parliament well-developed measures applicable to dealings with these subjects. I was thankful to my noble and learned friend last session for the approval he then expressed of the leading principles of my Bills, and also for the suggestions he then made; and I am glad to hear the approbation he has so kindly expressed of the choice I made of the gentleman who discharged the very important duty of revising the Bills which I then introduced. I believe the opinion my noble and learned friend has expressed on that point will be generally endorsed by all acquainted with the matter. No man could have been better fitted to discharge that duty than Sir Charles Hall, and I am sure my noble and learned friend will admit that the duty could not have been more admirably fulfilled. I am glad to avail myself of this opportunity to thank the learned Vice-Chancellor for the assistance he has rendered in respect to this subject. (Hear, hear.) This is not the time, nor, indeed, is it necessary, to go into the points which my noble and learned friend was quite right to explain, and on which there is some variance between the Transfer Bill of my noble and learned friend and that which I laid upon the table of your lordships' house last year. In the Bill of last year there were three points which I thought cardinal ones. The first was that of facility for the registration of all possessory titles, as well as for those which might be established. The second was power to relax the strictness of the present requirements for a marketable title when the title has been accepted for a period of time. The third was the introduction of compulsory registration after a reasonable lapse of time from the passing of the Act. On all points I am happy to think that, as between my Bills and those of my noble and learned friend, there is not anything that deserves to be called a substantial difference. (Hear.) It may be that in the mode in which I proposed to relax the strictness of the requirements for a marketable title I erred on the side of too much laxity. My noble and learned friend proposes to define more exactly the principle on which relaxations will be allowed; and I am willing to consider whether this may not be a better way of accomplishing the object in view. I am sure, at all events, that the proposals of my noble and learned friend will be a very valuable improvement. With respect to compulsion, the difference between my noble and learned friend and myself, is the difference of a single year, and I think I may pass that over. Upon the subject of local registration I quite concur in the view expressed by my noble and learned friend. There can, I think be no doubt that as the measure works it will be found that increased local facilities will become necessary, and will require to be afforded; but my present impression is that it is a safe principle not only in its application to local registries under this measure, but also to all other matters where it is important to afford reasonable local facilities, to measure the reasonableness by the cost, and where the amount of business will probably be sufficient to pay its own expenses, in such case a very strong claim may be established for local facilities. On the other hand, if the amount of business is so trifling that the establishing of local registries might tend to throw a great charge upon the public at large, then I think the burden of proof would lie very strongly upon those who would advocate their establishment. I am glad also to find that my noble and learned friend has adopted the principle of the provision of the Bill of last session with respect to limitation, although he has adopted the periods of twelve years and six instead of ten and five, which I proposed last year. I quite concur with my noble and learned friend in the reasons which he has given for making a change in the direction he has pointed out. There are, at all events, some reasons in favour of the limitations my noble and learned friend proposes, and the proposal substantially accomplishes the main object I had in view. The third Bill, which is quite new, and belongs altogether to my noble and learned friend, depends very much upon matters of detail. So far as I understand its provisions, it aims at accomplishing a desirable object, and I have no doubt that it will give rise to little difference of opinion in your lordships' House. I am happy to think that we now have a real opportunity of taking a very great step—I hope a final and adequate step—towards an object of the greatest possible importance to the public; one which will relieve our commercial and business transactions from obsolete encumbrances, difficulties, delays, and expenses, which, I venture to say, are both a very great annual pecuniary loss to the country at large and a disgrace to our present system of jurisprudence. (Hear, hear.)——Lord HATHERLEY was happy to think, from the manner in which the Bills had been introduced and received, that the time had at length arrived for which many who had grown grey in the Profession had ardently longed, in which some improved system of conveyancing would be established, and some intelligible means of placing title on record afforded. The extreme importance of this step, both as regards the increased value of property to those who held it, and to those who might desire to raise money upon it, could not be exaggerated. An enormous advantage would also arise to those who desired to acquire small parcels of land, but who, owing to the present state of the law, were absolutely precluded from doing so, except through the medium of joint-stock companies formed for the purpose of purchasing large estates with a view of selling them again in small lots. He would only mention one instance of the great expense of acquiring small portions of land. A certain company purchased a cottage and a couple of acres of land on which it stood, and the cost of the conveyance exceeded the purchase-money—amounting to about £130. From the second Bill mentioned by his noble and learned friend, whereby the time for making claims was further limited, a material advantage would be derived by all owners of property, and it would besides tend to promote the success of the larger measure. Up to the present time it was found most difficult to create a feeling in favour of the registration of title, owing to the long period of years which should elapse before the benefit to be derived from it could be completely felt. Few people care for an advantage the full effects of which could not be enjoyed until a period of sixty years had elapsed. He remembered one case in which the assignees of a bankrupt disposed of property which had been enjoyed for fifty-eight years, and in which case the purchaser lost his money. The property in question was derived from a person who had made a will believing himself to be owner in fee simple. The property, however, as it turned out, was held for three lives, and the last of the lives dropped within two years of the purchase from the assignees. The length of time to which he had referred had, beyond doubt, operated as an immense obstacle in the way of a general registration of title. The details of the Bill would be carefully considered in committee, but meanwhile he heartily concurred with his noble and learned friend below him in wishing them all possible success.——Lord ROMILLY, who was indistinctly heard, was understood to anticipate the best possible consequences from the operation of the Bills, and to suggest that they should be referred to a select committee. The Bills were then respectively read a first time.

ILLEGAL PRACTICES IN THE CHURCH.

Mr. HOLT gave notice that on Tuesday the 31st, he will move for leave to introduce a Bill to provide remedies against the introduction or the continuance of practices which are contrary to law in churches of the Established Church.

BENEFIT BUILDING SOIETIES.

Mr. GOURLEY asked the Home Secretary whether he intended this session to introduce a Bill to amend and codify the laws regulating benefit building societies, and if so, whether such Bill would be independent of or comprise a part of that intended to be introduced for the regulation of friendly societies.——Mr. CROSS said that since that question had been put upon the paper notice had been given by the hon. member for Finsbury that he would introduce a Bill on Monday next on that subject. The Government, as the House were aware, had undertaken to deal with friendly societies this year, and until their Bill was in a more mature state than it was at present it was impossible for him to give a definite answer whether they would themselves take in hand the question of building societies this session. But if they did it would be independent of the measure they would bring in with respect to friendly societies.

GAS COMPANIES.

Mr. GOLDNEY asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he would lay upon the table of the House a copy of the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, to the effect that the Board of Trade Commissioners, in settling the price of gas to be paid by the public, are precluded from inquiring into the mode in which the gas companies have raised or expended their capital——Sir C. ADDERLEY.—There is no such opinion of the law officers as the question implies. There is an opinion given by Sir J. Karslake, Sir R. Baggallay, and Mr. Round on a question referred to them as to the powers of the Commissioners appointed by the Board of Trade on the application of the Imperial Gas Company in 1869 to revise the scale of illuminating powers. I am about to present papers giving the minutes of the proceedings of the Commissioners for 1873 and 1874 as soon as they are concluded, which will include the opinion referred to.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. GOLDNEY asked the President of the Board of Trade if he intended introducing a Bill this session, making provision for the adjustment and verification of weights and measures by persons other than the police, in accordance with the suggestions in the Standard Commissioners' Report——Lord J. MANNERS was understood to say that the report was under the consideration of the Government, but that they had no intention of introducing a Bill on the subject this session.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS BILL.

Sir H. SELWIN-IBBETSON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, stated that in accordance with the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71, under which the Assistant Judge was appointed, a salary was paid to him out of the Consolidated Fund of £1200 a year. He was allowed, besides performing his duties as a Judge, to practise as a barrister, and by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, a second chairman was allowed to be appointed, with the view of facilitating the transaction of the business. That second chairman was also allowed to practise as a barrister; but under the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 4, a fresh arrangement was made, the county agreeing to pay a sum of £300 in addition to the £1200 paid out of the Consolidated Fund, the Assistant Judge being required to give up practice. Upon the resignation of Sir W. Bodkin a short time since, it again became necessary to deal with the question, and the present Bill would give effect to an arrangement between the county and the Treasury for the joint payment of a salary of £1500 a year, the Treasury agreeing to pay the five guineas a day for a deputy whenever the Assistant Judge became incapacitated by illness or other reasonable cause from attending to the discharge of his duties. The arrangement was one which had been carefully considered, and which would, he believed, be advantageous to the county.

The Bill was read a second time.

BILLS OF SALE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. LOPES, on leave being given, introduced a Bill to amend the Act of 1854 relating to bills of sale, and the measure was read a first time.

THE COMMITTAL OF MR. WHALLEY.

Mr. DISRAELI moved the appointment of a Select Committee on Privilege to inquire into and report with regard to the recent committal of Mr. Whalley by the Court of Queen's Bench.

An amendment had been put on the paper by the hon. member for Peterborough with the object of adding the Attorney-General and Mr. Roebuck to the Committee, and, there being no objection felt to this alteration, the motion was now submitted with the addition of those two names.——Mr. WHITBREAD, without opposing the motion, pointed out that the course which was being pursued raised an entirely new question and might lead in the future to great inconvenience. It was desirable that Government should take into consideration the propriety of proposing at the beginning of every session the appointment of a carefully-selected Committee of Privileges, which would be able to deal promptly with any case that might arise. Matters of privilege, involving party considerations, might at any time demand their attention, and it would be extremely inconvenient and unsatisfactory in such a case for the Government to name a special committee to deal with it. The best time to appoint the committee was when there was no question of privilege immediately before them. (Hear, hear.) The resolution was agreed to, the members of the Committee being—Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Goschen, the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Cave, Sir. C. Forster, Sir S. Fitzgerald, Sir H. James, Viscount Holmesdale, Sir E. Colebrooke, Sir G. Montgomery, Mr. Massey, Viscount Crichton, and Mr. Roebuck. The Committee will have power to send for persons, papers, and records, and five will be a quorum.

ACTION AGAINST MR. PLIMSOLL.

On the motion of Mr. C. LEWIS, it was agreed—"That the proper officer of this House have leave to attend the forthcoming Liverpool Assizes as a witness for the defendant in an action in the Court of Queen's Bench, Houghton and others v. Plimsoll, and to produce any documents in his custody which he may be lawfully required to produce."

INNKEEPERS' LIABILITIES.

Leave was given to Mr. WHEELHOUSE to bring in a Bill to abolish certain liabilities now attaching to innkeepers, and the measure was read a first time.

Friday, March 27.

NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Mr. GREGORY asked the First Commissioner of Works whether he would lay on the table a copy of the contract for these courts.——Lord H. LENNOX regretted that he could not accede to that request. The production of a particular contract such as the hon. gentleman specified would be injurious to the public service and unjust to the contractors.

COUNTY CONSTABLES (SCOTLAND).

Sir W. ANSTRUTHER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he would reconsider the amended rules and regulations for the government of county constables, issued from the Home Office by the late Secretary of State for that Department, which related to the employment of constables on other than police duties, and cancel the same, so as to enable the police to aid the authorities and officers acting in the execution of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, as they did prior to the issuing of the said rules and regulations.——Mr. CROSS said the Government were considering that matter, and he was at present in communication with the Lord Advocate about it.

THE BALLOT ACT.

Sir C. DILKE rose to call attention to the defects in this Act, and to move for a Select Committee to investigate its working, with power to suggest amendments. He disclaimed any idea of bringing the subject forward as a result of the last election, it being generally agreed that hon. members opposite, who had been returned in a large majority, did truly represent the opinion of the constituencies. The question which he was about to submit to the consideration of the House had been anticipated two years ago, when it was repeatedly stated by hon. gentlemen that after the Act had been tried at one General Election, it would be necessary that it should undergo revision. Now, if that was the opinion of many hon. members at the time of the passing of the Act, any one who had watched its working at the late election could hardly deny that inquiry was necessary. This was shown by the statements of men who had conducted elections, by the various questions referred to counsel for opinion, by letters in the papers on various points, and notably by a remarkable correspondence in the Times, in which gentlemen whose authority on the subject would not be questioned took opposite views as to the meaning of some important clauses in the Act. He might add, since he had put the notice on the books, he had received a very large number of letters on the subject from almost every constituency in England. The particular blots to which he wished to call attention were, first, the doubts as to what voting papers should be admitted and what rejected by reason of some informality. The second was a small discrepancy between the number of papers found in each box and the number returned by the presiding officer, who was responsible. That point was one of more importance than might appear at first sight, because the smallest discrepancy of that kind admitted of the perpetration of what was well known as "the Tasmanian dodge." The third blot was the defective stamping of the voting papers. Thousands of papers had been admitted and counted which, besides the regular official mark, contained also another, which, though it might not vitiate the vote, yet might become the means of tracing how the elector had voted. A mark very little more than might have been produced by a thumbnail was made in many cases on the voting paper, and that was owing, perhaps, to the different rules which prevailed in different places as to the mode of stamping. Another proper subject of inquiry was as to the mode of numbering the votes. These were the principal matters to which he wished to direct attention; but then there were also two or three smaller points which affected the returning officer, the most important of which were as to the time allowed him in preparing for an election, and as to the returning officer's expenses as affected by the Act. There were two other matters which also might be inquired into, the one relating to the evidence we had that votes had become extensively known, partly through the provisions respecting the illiterate voter, and partly through the transparency of the paper made use of at the elections, the other relating to the nomination of candidates. With regard to the whole subject, he was told it was not the intention of the Government to grant a committee at this moment, on the ground that we ought to wait for the report of the election judges. He regretted that decision, because hardly any of the points he had raised would come before the judges, and it was by no means to be assumed that they would not affect elections in future. Some of those points, and notably the mode of stamping, were matters which might be more fitly investigated by a select committee than by the judges of the land. Bringing such matters before a judge was a costly and slow proceeding. If the House did not take up the subject now, next session it would probably be cast aside, the last general election would be more or less out of mind, controversy in the newspapers would have ceased and these things would be forgotten before a new election would occur. The first point to which he had referred would seem to have arisen from a singular inconsistency in the Act itself. It would appear that the Act was loosely drawn, and therefore there was a necessity for revision. The Act said that the papers should be marked on both sides with the official mark, and that the voter should place it in the box after having shown to the presiding officer the official mark on the back. It then said that any paper which was otherwise so marked that the votes could be identified should be rejected. That showing of the ballot-paper to the presiding officer was the only means we had of checking "the Tasmanian dodge." But he was prepared to prove by reference to different places that a vast number of presiding officers, in doing the duty imposed upon them by the Act, did things for which they were properly punishable, such as writing on the back of each paper the number of the voter on the register. That had occurred in dozens, nay, hundreds of constituencies. In doing so those persons clearly placed on the voting-paper a number by which the voter could be identified. But those papers were counted, though the Act said they should not be. They were counted, after argument by competent men, because it was said that those who were to count the papers should not look at the backs, and if they did not they could not know that the papers were thus marked. He had received a letter from the editor of a paper in the North of England stating that, by order of the Sheriff of the county, the presiding officer gave to each voter a voting-paper with his own registered number upon it. in that way all the voter could be identified. That was a point which ought to be investigated by a Select Committee, and which, in London alone, affected hundreds. The second point to which he wished to direct attention was as to the effect on an election of the discrepancy between the number of papers in the box and the number returned by the presiding officer. He was present himself at the opening of 53 or 54 boxes, and in every one of them there was a slight discrepancy. The abstraction of one official voting paper by an elector who took it outside the polling booth instead of putting it into the box furnished an easy method of bribery, because the official stamp might be imitated, or the abstracted paper might be filled up under the eye of a briber outside, who, by the help of an agent outside, would be able to ascertain almost with certainty how a man voted, while each elector so bribed could bring out an unused official voting paper. This Tasmanian dodge showed the importance of preventing any voting paper from being carried away from the booth. Yet in the five elections at which he had been present he had been the means of stopping voters, who, he believed, were quite innocently carrying away their voting papers. At certain times of the day, when the crowding was considerable, the voting papers might be abstracted easily unless the presiding officer was much sharper than some he had seen. Many of the ballot-boxes, when opened, were found to contain polling cards or other unofficial documents, and the risk thus disclosed of possible abstraction with a view to imitate the official stamp was a point which had far better be raised in this House than before an election judge. It was no answer to say that there was no proof of fraud at the recent election. In every constituency there were plenty of scoundrels who did not then know the working of the Act or the possibility of plotting with a view to counteract it, as they would at another election. He thought he had shown that if fraud had not occurred at the last election, it might occur at a future election; and therefore the House should provide against any such a contingency. Another matter required investigation—the counting of the votes. This was a point of much importance as affecting the returns. In the great majority of places there were seven or eight presiding officers, with a clerk to each, but only one agent to watch the whole process of counting. That being so, you could only trust to the honesty of the clerks. In his opinion the House should lay down rules for the guidance of the presiding officer in counting the votes. Again, insufficient time was now allowed the returning officers to prepare for the election. In large boroughs three days between the nomination and the polling day were quite inadequate to enable the returning officer to make the necessary arrangements, and he had no right to assume that there would be a contest before the actual nomination. In one case a returning officer said he had within three days to arrange for 70 polling places, with 300 secret compartments, and appoint 70 competent presiding officers, with 70 clerks. In the competition which existed at an election time for clerks possessing the smallest pretensions to sobriety, it was very difficult to obtain the requisite staff within the limited period allowed for the purpose. Another point worthy of investigation was the question of the expenses of the returning officer. There seemed to be no regular scale of charges. Cases had occurred in which returning officers had charged no fee at all. There were other cases in which they had charged 50, 100, or even 200 guineas. The largest fees were not always charged in the largest boroughs, and he had even heard of cases in which candidates whose return had not been contested were charged 100 guineas for the returning officers' fees, and 50 or 60 guineas for their expenses. Another point bore upon the means afforded of ascertaining how voters had voted by means of the illiterate voter clause. On this point he had received an interesting letter from the mayor of a small borough in the West of England, who said it was astonishing to find nearly all the electors in a small country parish voting as illiterates. There was reason to fear that this provision in the Ballot Act had been made use of to ascertain how the electors had voted, and this impression was strengthened by the fact that in the large boroughs, where it was not an object to ascertain how a man voted, there was hardly any illiterates. In one of the largest wards in Chelsea two persons only availed themselves of the provision as to illiterate voters, many illiterate persons preferring to vote by the light of nature rather than by the hand of the returning officer. Again, the transparency of the voting paper enabled an agent to see for whom the voter had polled. A country returning officer had written to him to the effect that, without at all wishing to see how voters had given their votes, he could not help seeing, owing to the transparency of the material, in consequence of which any bystander could read through the folded paper. That, too, was a matter which deserved investigation. The most important question, however, was, what was the mark by which a voter could be identified? The Act stated that all voting papers should be rejected which did not bear a particular mark, and the question was, What constituted such a mark? When the Bill was in the course of passing through the House different views were expressed on the subject by different members. Some hon. members took the strict view of the provisions of the Bill, as did many other authorities of great weight—namely, that only the mark given in the schedule should be made by the voter, and that any other must lead to the rejection of the vote. The right hon. gentleman the member for Bradford, who had charge of the Bill took a different view, and after a great deal of debating upon the point, the Bill passed into law without any authoritative definition being given as to what was meant by the words of the clause in question. For his part, he believed that all the elaborate provisions of the Act to secure non-identification of the voter could be readily evaded if any other mark were allowed but that which was to be found in the schedule. In small boroughs it was impossible to prevent the identification of voters. By puncturing the paper with a pencil, by the mark of a dirty thumb, by tearing off a small piece of the corner, and in various other ways a dishonest or unscrupulous agent could easily ascertain how particular persons had voted. If it were found on inquiry, as he thought it would be, that these elaborate provisions of the Act were useless for the purpose for which they were intended, surely they ought to be discarded or amended? They had been read two different ways at the late election, and that fact alone was sufficient to justify the interference of the House. In the borough of Chelsea hundreds of voting papers were put aside for further consideration under the name of "duffers." Finally they came to the conclusion what should be done with those papers, and, as it did not interfere with the result of the election, he might mention that he had a considerable majority of the "duffers," while his hon. colleague opposite had a large majority of what were called the "hopeless duffers." (A laugh.) The decision that was arrived at in Chelsea was to count all the papers which were so marked as to give a clear indication of the intention of the voter. A different principle was, however, adopted in other metropolitan boroughs and in various other constituencies, and the consequence was that thousands of voters were virtually disfranchised. The town clerk of Swansea informed him that he actually advised the mayor—who was the returning officer—one way, when his opinion was the other. He was of opinion that any mark which clearly showed how the voter desired to vote was a good mark; but counsel whom he consulted thought differently, and consequently many votes were rejected because they were not marked with a Maltese cross. This part of the subject was of special importance in small boroughs, to which the Act was specially intended to apply, because in such boroughs it was chiefly needed. For all those difficulties there was but one cure—namely, inquiry by a committee and amending legislation by Parliament. If, however, he pressed his motion, he feared it would be rejected, and probably by an agreement between him and the concurrent action of the two front benches. His hon. friend, the member for Whitehaven, who had lately fallen from his high estate (a laugh), and who used, in criticising such an agreement, to say that both front benches must be wrong, would doubtless now, if he went to a division, go into the lobby with the members for Bradford and Taunton. The opinion was, he understood, entertained that no action should be taken, at all events, until the reports of the election judges were received. He earnestly hoped, however, that the subject would not be lost sight of. It was one which concerned them all. The right hon. gentleman the member for Bradford had just cause to be proud of the Bill. When it became law it was as good an Act as, under the circumstances, could well have been passed. Experience, however, had disclosed its defects, and, that being so, he thought the House would agree with him that the Act was deserving of revision at the hands of a select committee. (Hear, hear.)

——Mr. C. LEWIS had no doubt that the House were desirous that the Ballot Act should be made as perfect as possible in their own interests and in the interests of the constituencies of the country generally. It was very desirable that the loss of votes should be prevented, and accurracy in counting votes should be secured. It was only necessary for him to remind the House that not fewer than twelve members of the House had been returned by majorities of ten and under, and that twenty-four members had obtained majorities of twenty or under. These facts were sufficient to show that precision and accuracy were of the utmost importance, and that the power of the returning officer for good or bad reasons to reject voting papers which had some peculiarity in them—without decision or authority to guide him—was a subject which deserved consideration. (Hear, hear.) In reference to the loss of votes, he might say that at the late election for Coleraine, out of a total of 1100 votes, no fewer than 190 were rejected by the returning officer. The returning officer, in fact, possessed enormous powers, and much depended not only on his honesty and integrity, but upon his intelligence and his accurate reading of the provisions of the Act. This was a point on which both sides of the House and both large and small constituencies were equally interested, and it was highly expedient, in order to secure the purity of our electoral system, that steps should be taken to obtain uniformity of procedure at elections. Under the present mode of taking the ballot there was every inducement held out to dishonest returning officers to act improperly. Thus in a county constituency which should be nameless, an hon. friend of his who had been elected by a small majority of fifty-three or fifty four in 1868 was returned by a large majority in 1874. At the recent election one of the friends of the candidate who was present at the counting of the votes had a suspicion that one of the clerks who was entering the number of votes in a book was manipulating the counting—that was to say, he was omitting a batch of thirty votes in favour of the candidate in question. On being challenged with the offence the clerk expressed great indignation at his honour being so assailed, but on the votes being compared with the book in which he was entering the number of voters, it was found that not one but two batches of thirty votes in favour of the particular candidate had been omitted. It might be said that that was a fault on the part of a certain clerk and not of the system, but when it was recollected how various were the modes of counting the votes, some of them being of the loosest character, and how impossible it was in very large constituencies that the candidates could exercise proper supervision over the counting, it appeared to him that at the proper time—which he was not prepared to say the present was—the House should give the question its minute and impartial investigation. (Hear, hear.) His own constituency being a small one, every vote had been counted under the supervision of the candidates themselves; but in large constituencies such scenes had been witnessed as seven or eight sets of persons being engaged in the same room in counting the votes, the names of the candidates and the votes given on each ballot-paper being shouted out in such a way as must almost inevitably lead to confusion and mistakes. A trifling mistake in the numbers of the votes given for a particular candidate might be of the gravest importance, because in many of our largest constituencies members had been returned by merely the nominal majorities of 50, 100, or 200. Having had personal experience twice of a contested election under the ballot, he had taken some little trouble to inquire into the working of the present system, and he had come to the conclusion that it was for the interest of all members, whether in existence or in posse, that the defects in it should be removed. What might be the determination of the House on the subject of the Ballot when its term of eight years had expired it was impossible to prejudge; but it is clear that those who had opposed it for so long might be proud that they had at length accepted it, whilst those who had urged its adoption for so many years had found that it had brought destruction of the party which had carried it into law. ("Hear," and a laugh.) Thus that which was to have caused the entire destruction of the Conservative party had had exactly the opposite effect, and it was remarkable that, under the Ballot, where the Conservative party were strong before they were stronger now, and that where the Liberal party were strong before they now found their strength diminished. He made these remarks not for the purpose of rousing party feeling, but to point out that the question might be considered without regard to its bearing on either party, and merely with the view of making the mechanical operation of voting safe for both the candidates and their constituents. (Hear, hear.) One word as to returning officers' expenses. (Hear, hear.) Anything more unsatisfactory than the present system for honest returning officers and for the unfortunate candidates he could not conceive. The honest returning officer in a large constituency was obliged to work night and day without receiving the smallest remuneration for his labour unless it took the form of an honorarium from the winning or perhaps all the candidates. Thus the returning officer for Marylebone had had to work for a week and a half, night and day, at the last general election, during which time he was unable to attend to his business, and all returning officers were obliged to work in a similar manner if they wished to escape the odium which had fallen upon the returning officer of another of the great metropolitan boroughs. It was most unsatisfactory when the returning officer had to put down a fee for himself, and it was equally unsatisfactory when he had to accept that as a gift which he ought to receive as the legitimate reward of his labour. In other cases he heard that monstrous charges had been made in small boroughs, and in one instance where the candidate, who was called a Conservative working man's candidate had refused to pay the returning officer the sum of £50, the returning officer had refused to allow him to be nominated, and the noble lord who was the other candidate, was returned as unopposed, the consequence being that a petition had been presented on behalf of the rejected candidate. There were, he believed, numbers of cases of that character which were a scandal and a discredit to the law. Another thing he complained of was that the first set of candidates should be compelled to pay for the ballot boxes, which would suffice for their own constituencies for the next twenty or thirty years. In some instances candidates had merely hired the boxes, but the hire was probably more expensive than the purchase of them would have been. He thought that the facts which had been made public, coupled with the individual experience of hon. members, would induce the Government to take the question up, and take steps to put an end to the present slovenly and inaccurate mode of counting the votes, and he was satisfied that any measure that might be proposed would receive the careful attention of the select committee of that House to which it might be referred. (Hear, hear.)——Mr. GREGORY said that whenever a committee was appointed it would be necessary to consider the question of the expenses of returning officers, who could not proceed for their recovery against the nominated candidates, but only against those who went to the poll. The question of the expenses charged by returning officers for themselves was also deserving of attention.——Mr. FORSTER said that he considered the difficulties would continue until the constituencies themselves bore the necessary expenses of elections.——The discussion then terminated.

Tuesday, March 31.

THE COMMITMENT OF MR. WHALLEY.

Mr. WALPOLE brought up the report of the Select Committee on Privilege, to which had been referred the letter of the Lord Chief Justice to the Speaker informing the House of the commitment of Mr. Whalley, one of its members, for contempt of court. The committee had had before it two orders made by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of the Queen against Castro. By the first of these orders Mr. G. H. Whalley, then and now one of the members for Peterborough, was ordered to appear in court to answer for his contempt, in writing and printing a letter in the Daily News on the 21st Jan. last. By the second he was adjudged to have been guilty of such contempt, and thereupon ordered to pay a fine of £250, and to be imprisoned in Holloway Gaol until it was paid. The orders with the affidavits and exhibits on which they were founded were printed in the appendix to the Committee's report. The committee had afforded to Mr. Whalley an opportunity of making such observations on the matter referred to them as he desired to offer, and he had put in a written statement, parts of which appeared to the Committee to be irrelevant to the specific objects of their inquiry, but they had not thought it expedient to omit any of the observations which that gentleman had deemed it essential to place before them. The Committee, in conclusion, having considered the matters referred to them, did not think they were such as to demand the further attention of the House; and they desired also to express their opinion that the Lord Chief Justice had fulfilled his duty in informing the House that one of its members had been committed by the Court of Queen's Bench. (Hear, hear.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

THE Attorneys and Solicitors Bill 1874, which has already been read a second time in the House of Lords, proposes to amend the 10th section of the Attorneys Act of 1860, by excepting from its operation articled clerks who are engaged in employment (otherwise than under their articles) with the written consent of their principals, together with the sanction of one of the Judges of the Superior Courts, and on certain other conditions. This Bill also requires that previous notice, together with copies of affidavits, &c., shall be given to the registrar of attorneys before any application shall be made to strike an attorney off the roll, and contains other important provisions on this subject. In another column we produce the substance of this measure.

THE resolution moved at an adjourned special general meeting of the Incorporated Law Society, held on the 11th June last, by Mr. Charles Ford, and seconded by Mr. Rose, to the effect that a general meeting of the members of the society should be held periodically, say every month, with certain exceptions, for the discussion of all matters affecting the interests of the Profession, though negatived without a division, would, we certainly think, be very desirable, for, besides giving to every member an opportunity of ventilating his ideas upon all subjects of interest to solicitors, it would clearly operate as discounting the chances of new societies coming into existence, which, however desirable and necessary their formation and establishment may be, yet tend to diminish the influence of the chief society. Let the policy of the council of that society be diametrically opposite to the policy which animates the benchers of the Inns of Court; let solicitors have every opportunity of discussing all questions affecting the Profession, and let us have a thorough system of representation and organisation. It is astonishing that while Universities and many professions are practically represented in the House of Commons, a powerful but disorganised body like solicitors enjoy no such privilege; but we hope the time is not far distant when steps will be taken to accomplish so desirable an object. There are questions innumerable which solicitors would be glad of an opportunity of considering; and if there is no other way open to them, we think it should be by general support of the Legal Practitioners' Society, the subscription to which is nominal, it being understood that general meetings should be constantly held, all resolutions come to at such meetings to be forwarded to the council of the Incorporated Law Society for their consideration, and, in case of no action being taken in the matter, the new society reserving to itself the alternative of taking independent steps.

THE Chambers of Commerce, by reason of their recent deliberations (a portion of the report of which has already appeared in our columns), may well set all lawyers by the ears. The following matters were brought to the notice of the commercial men so assembled: Bankruptcy Law Amendment, Public Prosecutors, Patent Law, Tribunals of Commerce, Unjust Operation of the Debtors' Act 1869, Married Women's Property Act, and other legal subjects. It is a matter for much congratulation that the commercial world is found so ready to deliberate on the subject of all statutory legislation, accomplished or contemplated.

THE Lord Chancellor, on introducing into the House of Lords his Land Transfer and Title Bill, was thus reported, when speaking of solicitors: "Although it was said that such a Bill would be opposed by the solicitors, he did not believe that that branch of the Legal Profession which was for the most part composed of enlightened and liberal-minded men would set themselves against a measure which was found to be beneficial to their clients, and would also conduce to their own interests by increasing the number of transactions in real property." We think we can take upon ourselves to say that his Lordship rightly understands the feelings of our branch of the profession in reference to this important measure. As to how far it will answer the expectations of its promoters, it would at present be unwise to venture a prediction, except that it, in conjunction with the two other measures introduced by his Lordship at the same time, will work a complete change in the whole system of conveyancing throughout the country. Some of the redeeming features in the measure to which we first refer are, that the registry is, in the first instance, at all events, to be in London only, as to which we feel sure that it will so continue, for a distribution of registries throughout the country would be almost sure to lead to expenses not contemplated by the measure in question. Again, the measure will not be compulsory for the first three years, but we are afraid the sanguine hope of his Lordship, that within this period a great deal of business will be done by virtue of the Act, will prove illusory; another recommendation is that even after the expiration of three years, if land was not registered, the sale of it is not to be void, but the purchaser is to obtain only an equitable title, and not a legal one until he does register. We fear any attempt to make the existing office of land registry in Middlesex capable of meeting the requirements of the Act are likely to prove abortive, and we regret that the measure in question does not provide for the establishment of a Landed Estates Court. One of the most important questions not touched upon by his Lordship is, who is to have the right to search the registry, and above all who is to have the right to act in the matter of registrations. It will be remembered that in a similar measure of the late Government the expression "agent" often appeared in relation to registration, &c. Solicitors will require a distinct understanding upon this important point. Already the Profession, which is heavily taxed, is beset on all sides by invaders, who indulge in their depredations to almost any extent, while no effort has been made to arrest their progress. The Bar of England is strongly represented in both Houses of Parliament, and unless such members of it show by their sympathy and support that solicitors belong to one and the same profession as themselves, the present Lord Chancellor, not less than any of his predecessors, must appeal in vain to our branch of the Profession to support any measure which so immediately affects their interests as does the Land Transfer and Titles Bill. The second Bill introduced by his Lordship dealt with the limitation of suits, the general tendency of the Bill being to shorten such period in all cases. The third Bill to amend the law of vendors and purchasers is of great importance to solicitors, and we feel sure that this measure, not less than the other two, will receive the most careful, and indeed laboured, consideration of the council of the Incorporated Law Society. We confess it seems to us that the reasonable construction that the Land Transfer and Title Bill, if it becomes law in its present shape, points to the conclusion that many of the provisions last introduced by his Lordship will be rendered nugatory. The general tendency of the measure, however, seems to be to relieve vendors and throw considerable burdens on purchasers, and in this sense it is opposed to the policy embodied in the more important measure first before referred to. The council of the Incorporated Law Society must feel that a great responsibility devolves upon them in having to represent our branch of the Profession in considering these three measures, the more so as any recommendations of theirs are certain to receive the most careful attention of the Government.

WE have received a report of the proceedings of the annual general meeting of the Incorporated Leeds Law Society. The meeting was held as long since as the 20th Feb. last, and from the report of the committee for the year 1873, which is of some length, we gather that the number of the members of the society has increased, that the funds of the society are in a satisfactory state; and the report included a consideration of the questions submitted to the society by the Judicature Commissioners; also the subject of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act; the subject of professional remuneration; the amalgamation of the Incorporated Law Society and the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association (since accomplished); registration of mortgages of tenants' fixtures; the Inns of Court and School of Law Bill, prepared by Lord Selborne; the subject of a Bill to amend the law relating to attorneys and solicitors, the principal object being to modify the 10th section of the Attorneys' Act 1860, by enabling articled clerks to hold offices or engage in employments other than the employment of clerks, provided before entering on the office they obtain the consent of the solicitor to whom they are bound and the sanction of one of the judges thereto. We are sorry we have never before been afforded the opportunity, as we might have months ago, of bringing this important subject to the notice of the Profession. It is, however, due to the council of the Incorporated Law Society to say that it is a measure prepared by them. We observe that the meeting was held at the offices of Mr. Thomas Marshall, M.A., solicitor, of Leeds, and registrar of the County Court there, and seeing that he is the honorary secretary and treasurer, we suppose we are not far from wrong in assuming that the greater burden of the work of the society falls upon his shoulders; and it is not surprising to observe from the report that he has again been elected to the office of honorary secretary. Mr. Marshall is one of the newly-elected members of the council of the Incorporated Law Society, in connection with which he promises to render valuable services to the Profession.

IN the midst of a louder complaint than has for some time past been made upon the subject of the encroachments of accountants, and agents of all kinds, who talk about their clients and the long vacation, &c., &c., comes to us a letter from a country solicitor, pointing out that large numbers of solicitors, to use his phrase, "work in with accountants," and that but for this practice, which largely obtains, accountants could never have got the hold they have on certain kinds of work which one would rather expect to find in solicitors' offices. We are afraid there is too much truth in the assertions of our correspondent to be reflected upon with anything like satisfaction; and such being the case, it is clear that solicitors have, in a measure, themselves to blame, by tempting others to step out of the groove of their regular calling.

A CASE has recently come to our knowledge in which a firm of accountants undertook, on behalf of a debtor, to arrange with his creditors by payment of 10s. in the pound, and to prepare the necessary documents for that purpose. An agreement was prepared, which was signed by creditors agreeing to take half the amount of their respective debts in discharge. One creditor who had signed it afterwards proceeded to recover the full amount by an action at law, when it was found that the agreement was not stamped, was not under seal, and was more than two months old in point of date. The accountants' client pays the penalty, of course, but ought not the public to be afforded some kind of protection against this kind of evil by a paternal Government?

NEXT week being Easter week the instruction for articled clerks at the Law Institution is confined to one lecture on equity, which will be delivered on Friday, the 10th April, between the hours of six and seven o'clock, being the first of the equity series for this year. Lecturer and reader Mr. C. W. Chute.

COMPLAINT having recently been made in our columns that some solicitors in certain parts of the country, as well as in London, are so forgetful of the duties they owe to our Profession, as to allow their names to be used by unqualified persons, thus practically enabling the latter to act as attorneys, we reproduce below the 32nd section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. We hope no time will be lost in measures being taken to bring such cases under the notice of the Incorporated Law Society. It should however be observed that it is open to any society or individual to apply to the court as provided by this section. "And be it enacted, that if any attorney or solicitor shall wilfully and knowingly act as agent in any action or suit in any court of law or equity, or matter in bankruptcy, for any person not duly qualified to act as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid, or permit or suffer his name to be anyways made use of in any such action, suit, or matter upon the account or for the profit of any unqualified person, or send any process to such unqualified person, or do any other act, thereby to enable such unqualified person to appear, act, or practise in any respect as an attorney or solicitor in any suit at law or in equity, knowing such person not to be duly qualified as aforesaid, and complaint shall be made thereof in a summary way to any of the said Superior Courts wherein such attorney or solicitor has been admitted, and proof made thereof upon oath to the satisfaction of the court that such attorney or solicitor hath wilfully and knowingly offended therein as aforesaid, then and in such case every such attorney or solicitor offending shall and may be struck off the roll, and for ever after disabled from practising as an attorney or solicitor: and in that case, and upon such complaint and proof made as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said court to commit such unqualified person so acting or practising as aforesaid to the prison of the said court, without bail or mainprize, for any term not exceeding one year."

(Before SULLIVAN, M.R.)

Re W., A SOLICITOR.

Attachment—Debtors' Act (Ireland), 1872, s. 5, sub-sect. 4—Non-payment of money due by a solicitor to client.

A solicitor who, acting under a power of attorney, receives money for a client, and neglects to pay it over, when ordered by the court to pay the same in his character of solicitor, is guilty of misconduct in respect of which an attachment may be issued against him within the 35 & 36 Vict., c. 65, s. 5, sub-sect. 4, although his default may be occasioned by inability to pay.

APPLICATION for an attachment against W., a solicitor, for non-payment of money ordered by the court to be paid. W. was solicitor for Mrs. Bird, and, acting under a power of attorney to to draw an annuity to which she was entitled, he had received a portion of the annuity, but not having paid it over to Mrs. Bird, a petition was, in consequence, filed by her against him as her solicitor. Upon the hearing of this petition January 1873, it was ordered by Sullivan, M.R., with the consent of W., that within ten days the gale due, amounting to £100, should be paid to Mrs. Bird; but an affidavit of credits due from Mrs. Bird to W. was to be furnished to her by W., and she was to pay the amount of the credits found due. On foot of this order W. paid over £40. In June 1873, a notice was served on him to pay the £60 still remaining due by him, or that an application would be made to the court for an attachment against him. As he did not comply with that notice, the application was made accordingly; and it then appeared to the court that he was entitled to credit for £1 13s. 4d., and it was ordered by the court (30th June, 1873), that he should pay the balance remaining due, £58 6s. 8d., within one month from the date of the order. That sum not having been paid, Carton, on behalf of Mrs. Bird, now moved for an attachment, referring to 35 & 36 Vict., c. 57, sect. 5, sub-sect. 4.

Walsh, Q.C., contra.—A sum of £22 10s. 5d. is due by Mrs. Bird personally to W. for costs, and should be set-off. There is also a sum of £81 due for costs incurred by her husband. Mrs. Bird, as executrix to the will of her husband, received £500 belonging to him, out of which the debt due to W. should have been paid. She has not paid the amount, and she has now left this country. Under this state of facts the court should not, in the exercise of its discretion, issue an attachment.

Carton, in reply.—At the time of making the former order, credit was given to W. for all sums that were fairly due. These costs were never presented to us till the present moment. Costs due in an executory capacity cannot be set-off against a sum due to the executrix in a personal capacity.

SULLIVAN, M.R.—This is a motion of a very serious character. The principles which govern the case are laid down by James, L.J.: "The meaning of the Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 5, sub-sect. 4) is clear, its object was to relieve from imprisonment any one, whose default in payment of a sum of money arose from poverty. Therefore, certain cases were exempted from the operation of the Act, in which imprisonment was a punishment for misconduct. It is not in every case in which a solicitor is ordered to pay a sum of money that he is liable to imprisonment for not paying it, but if he has received money of his client he is guilty of a breach of duty unless he has it ready when it is called for, and if he makes default the court always considers him liable to punishment. That was the case in Re Rush (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 147; Re Hope, 7 Ch. App. 523). There is no doubt there cannot be a more serious breach of duty than for a solicitor to receive money for a client and not pay it. This lady filed a petition, which came before me in Jan. 1873. It was ordered, with the consent of Mr. W., that within ten days the gale due should be paid. On that occasion it was ordered that a list of all credits due to Mr. W. should be furnished to the petitioner, and that the petitioner should undertake to pay the amount so found due. That order having been made on consent, Mr. W. cannot get out of it; but if the court sees there was some error, it has perfect power to say, "take the order, but you shall not have the attachment." £40 was offered to the petitioner on foot of that order, and accepted by her. I must say that great forbearance was shown to Mr. W., and there is no reason to think that undue pressure was put upon him. No farther payment having been made, a notice, in June, 1873, was served on Mr. W. by the petitioner, to pay the £60 remaining due, or that she would apply for an attachment. If there had been any hurry on the former occasion, there was now plenty of time. The only substantial matter, which turned out to be a matter of fair dispute, was an item of £10. I came to the conclusio that I should not allow that, but I gave hi credit for £1 13s. 4d. That left a balance of £58 6s. 8d. It was ordered that he should pay that sum within one month. It has not been paid, and that is a sum in respect of the non-payment of which, if rightly due, Mr. W. is answerable for misconduct. By misconduct I mean holding the money of a client, and not being able to pay it. It has been said that there are credits, but I cannot see it. The matter has been discussed here twice; he gave a consent once; every precaution was taken to do him justice. He never made an affidavit as to the credits, as he was required to do by the order. There is no excuse for a solicitor who applies to another purpose money which belongs to his client. It should be a golden rule to all solicitors, that the money of a client should be regarded as sacred. I will make an order for the attachment, but I will give Mr. W. a fair time. The attachment shall not issue, if within one month he pays half the money, and if within two months from that time he pays the rest. The costs of this motion are given, but do not form part of the money for which the attachment is ordered.

THOMAS AND ANOTHER v. COX.

Practice—Security for costs—Plaintiff resident out of the jurisdiction—Judgment Extension Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 54).

Motion to compel a plaintiff resident in England to give security for costs, granted, notwithstanding the passing of the Judgment Extension Act 1868.

Kenny, on behalf of the defendant, moved that the plaintiffs be restrained from taking any further proceedings in the cause until they should give security for costs, inasmuch as they resided out of the jurisdiction of the court. The action was for goods sold and delivered. The affidavit of the defendants, who were merchants, resident in the city of Waterford, stated that the plaintiffs resided at Cardiff, in Glamorganshire, in Wales, out of the jurisdiction of the court.

Foley, for plaintiffs, contra.—The right to security for costs, in cases where the plaintiff is resident out of the jurisdiction, is given, provided there be an affidavit of a good defence upon the merits, by the Common Law Procedure Act 1853, s. 52. By the passing of the Judgments Extension Act the foundation for this enactment has been removed. "When we look at the origin of the practice of calling on a plaintiff resident abroad to give security for costs, as established in Pray v. Edie (1 T. R. 237), the point becomes quite clear. In that case, the plaintiff being a foreigner residing abroad, the court stayed proceedings till he gave security for costs, and Buller, J., said: 'For this reason, that if a verdict be given against the plaintiff, he is not within the reach of our law to have process served upon him for costs.' The same point was afterwards, for the same reasons, decided in Fitzgerald v. Whitmore (1 T. R. 362), in the case of a plaintiff residing in Ireland, and the rule was afterwards extended to a plaintiff resident in Scotland. But since the passing of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 54), that reason has completely ceased. The effect of that enactment is that, when a judgment has been obtained in England, a certificate of such judgment can be registered in the proper office in Scotland, and the court in Scotland can issue process on such judgment. It is true that the process in Scotland, perhaps, may not be like the process of our courts, but we must take it that it is as effective as our own. In Ireland, if the writ of ca. sa. be not taken away, an execution under this Act would be more effective than in England. The reason, therefore, for compelling a plaintiff resident in Scotland having ceased, this rule must be refused."—Raeburn v. Andrews (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 120), per Blackburn, J. This decision was concurred in by the rest of the Court of Queen's Bench in England.

FITZGERALD, B.—I shall adhere to the practice that has been established here.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS BILL.

A BILL intituled an "Act to amend the Law relating to Attorneys and Solicitors:"

1. This Act may be cited as "The Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act 1874."

2. This Act shall extend only to England and Wales.

3. Interpretation.

4. The recited enactment (section 10) of the Act of 1860 shall not henceforth apply to cases in which any person bound by articles as therei mentioned shall, before he enters upon the office, or engages in the employment, have applied for and obtained—

(a) The consent thereto in writing of the attorney or solicitor to whom he is bound:

(b) The sanction thereto of one of the judges of one of the superior courts of law at Westminster, or the Master of the Rolls, or of the High Court of Justice to be evidenced by an order of such judge:

Provided that not less than fourteen days before any application is made for such sanction and order notice in writing of the application shall be given to the registrar, which notice shall state the names and residences of the applicant, and of the attorney or solicitor to whom he is bound, and the nature of the office or employment, and the time it is expected to occupy.

6. Where any terms or conditions shall be so imposed, and the person thereby authorised shall accept the office, or engage in the employment, he shall, before being admitted an attorney or solicitor, prove to the satisfaction of a judge of one of the superior courts of law at Westminster, or the master of the Rolls, or of the High Court of Justice, and of the examiners for the time being appointed under the provisions of the Act of 1860, or of any Act amending, to examine persons applying to be admitted as attorneys and solicitors, that he has duly observed and fulfilled those terms and conditions.

Where application is intended to be made to any court for an order or rule to strike the name of any attorney or solicitor (not being an attorney or solicitor making the application) off the roll of attorneys or solicitors of such court, or for an order or rule to compel him to answer the matters of an affidavit, notice in writing shall be given to the registrar of such intended application fourteen clear days at the least before such application shall be made.

Copies of all affidavits intended to be used in support of such application shall be delivered to the registrar with the notice.

Court not to entertain application, except on proof of notice.

The registrar may appear by counsel upon the hearing of any such application, and upon any other proceedings arising out of or in reference to the application, and may apply to the court to make absolute any rule nisi which may have been granted by the court in the matter of such application, or to make an order that the name of the attorney or solicitor be struck off the roll of attorneys or solicitors of the said court, or, as the case may be, to order the attorney or solicitor to answer the matters of the affidavit, or such other order as to the court may seem fit; and it shall be lawful for the court to order the costs, charges, and expenses of the registrar of or relating to any of the matters aforesaid, to be paid by the attorney or solicitor against whom any such application is made or was intended to be made, or by the person by or on whose behalf the application is made or was intended to be made, or partly by the one and partly by the other of them.

Where any court or any judge of any court shall, upon motion, have ordered or directed a rule (whether nisi or absolute) or order to be drawn up for striking the name of any attorney or solicitor off the roll of attorneys or solicitors of such court, or for compelling an attorney or solicitor to answer the matters of an affidavit, and such rule shall not have been drawn up by or on behalf of the person applying for the same within one week after the order or direction for drawing up the same shall have been made or given, it shall be lawful for the registrar to cause the rule or order to be drawn up, and all future proceedings thereupon shall be had and taken as if the application for the rule or order had in the first instance been made to the court by the registrar.

[The provisions of this Bill, in so far as it proposes to affect articled clerks, is important beyond the mere object of such provisions, in the sense that gentlemen now articled will, immediately on the measure becoming law, be entitled to make the applications specified by the Act, and avail themselves of the privileges thereby conferred.]

Correspondence.

ENCROACHMENTS ON THE PROFESSION.—The following letter has been addressed by a solicitor to a member of Parliament, under date 28th March 1874:—"Sir,—In reading my Law Times, I see you are a supporter of the Legal Practitioners' Society, and also an M.P. This Society's great object is to protect the Profession from encroachments by invaders. I will tell you how to confer the greatest boon upon our Profession ever conferred by one man, viz., in the House of Lords the Solicitors and Attorneys' Bill has now passed the second reading, if you would (when it comes down to the Commons) only introduce or have inserted the following clause in the same bill, viz., 'All deeds or indentures under seal shall be drawn or prepared by a serjeant-at-law, barrister, solicitor, attorney, notary, proctor, or conveyancer, and whose names shall appear in the Law List for the current year in which any such deed or indenture under seal shall be drawn or prepared, and all deeds or indentures under seal drawn or prepared by any other person than above named shall be invalid and of no effect whatever.' By the 44 Geo. 3, c. 98, s. 14, a penalty of £50 is imposed on any person who draws a deed for fee or reward; but that clause is useless to the Profession, because we cannot prove that the invaders receive any fee or reward. In this town every auctioneer and even their clerks prepare hundreds of bills of sale and leases of houses, &c., but we cannot sue them for the £50 penalty, because we cannot prove they have received any fee or reward, although we know they have and do receive it. If you could get the clause I suggest inserted in this new Bill now about to pass, I would, and every other country attorney would, readily pay double annual certificate duty to the government. Why should auctioneers and their clerks and village schoolmasters draw all the bills of sale and leases, and mortgage deeds also very frequently, and they pay no certificate duty? If you would only have my clause inserted, and make all their deeds invalid and of no effect whatever, this would stop their little encroachments altogether. I only refer to deeds under seal, not simple agreements, but all deeds under seal whatever. I wish you would in your place in the House of Commons take this matter up on the part of our Profession. R. B."

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Friday, March 27.

DEATH OF SIR WILLIAM BODKIN.

ON taking his seat at ten o'clock, the Assistant-Judge, Mr. Edlin, said the members of the Bar and every one present in the court who were acquainted with the learned and estimable Sir William Bodkin, would be sorry to hear that he died last evening, at half-past six o'clock.

SECOND COURT.

Mr. Serjt. Cox, on taking his seat in the Second Court, said, in reference to the death of Sir Wm. Bodkin:—It is my painful duty to announce to you the death of Sir William Bodkin. I cannot do so without expressing what, I am sure, will be the feeling of all who are connected with this court, that an admirable judge and a most excellent man has departed from among us. Sir Wm. Bodkin was unrivalled in all that is required by a criminal judge. He had almost by intuition the faculty of seeing at a glance into the heart of a case—discerning the very point at issue, estimating the various degrees of guilt, and properly apportioning punishment to crime. He tempered justice with mercy and combined kindness with firmness. During the five years that I was so intimately associated with him in the duties of this court, I found him always ready and pleased to give me the help of his long experience, and I am indebted to him for whatever knowledge I may have acquired of the duties of a judge. I witnessed the first approach of his terrible malady; he knew from the beginning the fatal end, but he spoke of it with resignation, and it scarcely seemed to affect his usual cheerfulness. I am informed that to the last he endured his fearful sufferings with the patience and resignation of a Christian as the will of God, and that he died, as he had lived, without an enemy and at peace with all the world. He was ever to me a kind and faithful friend, and I could not make the sad announcement of his death without giving this expression to the emotions that fill my mind.

Mr. Montague Williams, the senior member of the Bar who was present in this court, in a few well-chosen phrases, expressed the respect and admiration which the deceased assistant-judge had inspired in the minds those who, like himself, had known him long both as a judge and as a private friend.

THE death is announced of Mr. D. Maude, who recently retired from the office of chief magistrate of Greenwich Police-court.

Tuesday, March 31.

(Before H. J. STONOR, Esq., Judge.)

Re SYKES; Ex parte GOSNOLD.

Execution creditor under £50 who has levied and been restrained by court, and who has proved for his entire debt, permitted to reduce his proof and entitle himself to dissolution of injunction on receipt of proceeds of levy. Injunctions ought not to be granted as to execution debts under £50 after levy, except in special cases.

Jones for execution creditor.

Messrs. Lawrence, Plews, and Co. for the debtor.

On the 1st Jan. last an execution was levied on the debtor's goods by Frederick Gosnold, a creditor, upon a judgment for £36 8s. debt and costs recovered by him against the debtor. On the next day the debtor filed his petition for liquidation, and on the following day Gosnold was restrained from further proceeding on his execution. The debt and costs (£36 8s.) and costs of levy have been paid into the hands of the High Bailiff. Resolutions accepting a composition of 2s. in the pound were passed at the first meeting, and confirmed at the second meeting. Gosnold proved at the first meeting for £106 8s., and was a non-assenting creditor at that meeting, and also at the second meeting. In his proof for £106 8s. (which it is admitted includes the above debt and costs, £36 8s.) he made no mention of his judgment, but omitted to strike out the words at the end of the proof "save and except the following," which refer to any security the creditor might have. The proof is altogether filled up in a very hasty and illiterate manner. In the list of creditors the debtor returned him as a creditor for £115 "holding an agreement for £100 and a judgment for £30."

His HONOUR this day delivered judgment as follows: The debtor now applies under the composition to have the proceeds of the execution paid to him upon his paying the execution creditor the dividend of 2s. in the pound on his whole claim of £106 8s. The execution creditor opposes this application, and applies for the payment of the proceeds of the execution to himself offering to reduce his claim accordingly. It has always been held that a creditor may realise his security and prove for the deficiency, but that if he neglected to do this, and prove for his whole debt, he is bound to give up his security, and permission will not be given to a creditor who has proved his whole debt to withdraw his proof and set up his security, except under special circumstances. (See Robson's Bankruptcy, 2nd edition, 292, 5, and the cases there cited.) Now in the present case there can be no doubt that the execution levied by the creditor was practically a security, and ought to have been mentioned in the proof; but it is equally clear that being under £50 the creditor was "absolutely entitled" to it. (See the cases of Slater v. Pinder, 24 L. T. Rep. N.S. 475; Ex parte Lovering, re Peacock, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 897); that the injunction ought not to have been granted; and that the granting or not granting of an injunction cannot affect the rights of creditors inter se (Ex parte Rocke, re Hall, 25 L. T. Rep. N.S. 287, and Ex parte Tate and Co., re Keyworth, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 849.) The question which remains for my decision is, whether under all the circumstances of this case, the proof of the whole debt by the execution creditor, ought to be held absolutely to deprive him of the benefit of his judgment, and consequently of the proceeds of the execution thereunder, or whether he ought to be permitted to reduce his claim, and so entitle himself to the latter. Upon the whole, considering that there is no evidence of any real intention on the part of the execution creditor to waive his rights, that the proof is filled up very ignorantly and inaccurately, and ought to have been rejected by the chairman, that the vote of the execution creditor had no effect on the resolutions, and that the execution was known to the debtor and also to the receiver, who was afterwards appointed trustee. I think that the execution creditor ought to have an opportunity offered him of amending and reducing his proof by deducting the proceeds of the execution, and that upon his so amending and reducing his proof he will be entitled to receive the latter. The present application must, therefore, stand over until next court, when the creditor can apply in the usual manner to have the injunction dissolved, and for liberty to amend and reduce his proof, and for payment of the proceeds of the execution. I may add that as a rule, with few and special exceptions, no injunctions ought to be granted to restrain proceedings on executions levied for sums not exceeding £50.

Application adjourned to next court, the execution creditor to pay the debtor his costs thereof to the present time.

LEGAL NEWS.

IN the House of Commons on Tuesday, a petition was presented by Mr. Cavendish Bentinck from Mr. Serjeant Cox, praying for inquiry into the duties and emoluments of the Judges of the Middlesex Sessions, and for the amendment of the Bill for regulation of the same now before the House.

THE actual business of the Labour Commission will not commence until after Easter. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn is president. The sittings will not be public.

A NUMBER of new Bills which have been printed have been issued, and among them a Bill bearing the names of Mr. Lopes, Mr. Watkin Williams, and Mr. C. Lewis, proposes to amend the Bills of Sale Act, 1854, by providing that a second bill of sale as security for the same debt shall be null; and that under certain circumstances mortgages effected instead of bills of sale shall be null.

THE Education Codes for 1874 for England and Scotland; Return of the number of convictions under the Master and Servants' Act in each year since 1867; Return of all convictions under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, were printed and issued on Wednesday.

THE judge of the Bath County Court on Tuesday nonsuited Mr. W. L. Russell, a commercial traveller, who was the plaintiff in a suit to recover from the Great Western Railway Company the cost of a conveyance which he had taken from Didcot to Abingdon, in consequence of the unpunctuality of one of the defendants' trains. His Honour held that the plaintiff must prove wilful misconduct on the part of the defendants' servants.

APPOINTMENTS.—The Queen has been graciously pleased to make the following appointments: — Charles Rodgers Nesbitt, Frederick Duncombe, James Nibbs Brown, and William Gray Rattray, Esqrs., to be members of the Legislative Council of the Bahama Islands; Thomas Scott, Robert Little, M.D., and William Ramsay Scott, Esqrs., to be members of the Legislative Council of the Straits Settlements; John Cyprian Thompson, Esq., to be Attorney-General.

THE ANTIQUITY OF CLIFFORD'S INN.—The case of the King v. Allen, Igent., which was a contest in the shape of a suit in the King's Bench in 1684, between a barrister and an attorney-at-law, as to who should be principal of Clifford's Inn, throws little or no light upon the antiquity of the Society, as Mr. Allen who succeeded in retaining the office of principal, in his affidavit, merely stated "that he understood and believed the Society to be of earlier origin than the Society of the Inner Temple, and never to have been in any way subservient thereto."—St. Clement Danes Magazine.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS AND THE BOROUGH FUNDS ACT 1872.—On Friday a deputation of representatives of the principal corporations in the kingdom and members of Parliament had an interview with the Home Secretary in regard to operation of the Borough Funds Act, 1872, their object being to redress certain grievances, which were embodied in a memorial. The memorialists complained that the provisions of the Borough Funds Act were unreasonable and unjust in many respects, were in violation of the spirit as well as of the letter of the Municipal Corporations Reform Act, and were calculated to paralyze the efforts of governing bodies, and to discourage all attempts to provide water for the inhabitants, or to effect sanitary and other improvements which were at this time imperatively required. Among those present were the following members of Parliament: — Sir Thomas Bazley, Sir Charles Legard, Messrs. Ashbury, Turner, Torr, Rathbone, Monk, A. Grant, Jackson, Hick, J. K. Cross, Julian Goldsmid, Fielden, Dodson, Simon, and Callender; and the Mayors of Birmingham, Liverpool, York, Manchester, Bolton, &c.; and Mr. Bains, secretary. The Home Secretary said the deputation had placed their case very clearly before him, and in a very proper and straightforward way. No doubt there had been a great deal said about the increase of rates of late, and this, no doubt would frighten many of the ratepayers. He had to consider a great many other matters, but the whole of the subject should have his serious attention. He should see if anything could be done.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.—Referring to the correspondence which appeared in your last issue under this heading, will you allow me shortly to deal with it. The letter from a law stationer, who signs himself, "A Subscriber to the LAW TIMES," is substantially a complaint that the Bill of the society (the chief provisions of which, so far as they are at present determined upon, have been twice published in your columns) will render law stationers liable to be proceeded against under it, in case they write or engross, &c., any instrument, &c. Had you or your subscriber looked a little more carefully into the provisions of the Bill your columns would not have been burdened with his communication. Proviso 2 of sect. 3 excepts from the operation of the section in question any person employed merely to engross any instrument or proceeding. Then as to the letter of "A Disappointed Member," I am sorry he is so dissatisfied, and hope that he will communicate with me, and, above all, give the promoters of this society and of the measure now before Parliament, the benefit of his active assistance. It is to be hoped that action under sect. 3 of the Bill, if it becomes law, will usually be taken against unqualified persons by the various law societies throughout the kingdom. I myself incline to the opinion that process under the Act ought to be issuable in County Courts also, and perhaps that the court should have power to reduce the penalty and order payments by instalments or otherwise. I hope your correspondent will frame and forward to me a letter to a member of the House of Commons for introduction into our measure clauses dealing with the action of unqualified persons in connection with magistrates, bankruptcy, and County Courts. As regards the letter of your correspondent "A Lancashire Solicitor," which is more moderate and encouraging than our unfortunate friend "A Disappointed Member," the case referred to, of solicitors lending their names to unprofessional persons upon the terms of receiving a share of the profits is probably the most discreditable thing that happens in relation to the Profession. Much astonishing information upon this subject was furnished at a recent meeting of the society, but I must remind your correspondents that this matter is already specially dealt with in sect. 32 of the Attorneys Act of 1843, and I cannot but think that if the names of solicitors indulging in this nefarious practice, together with the necessary additional information, were forwarded to the council of the Incorporated Law Society, they would be found ready to move in the matter. Many of the other suggestions of your correspondent are valuable, but if the present measure is to deal with every grievance of which solicitors very properly complain, our Bill, instead of being a short one, dealing with a prominent evil, and which Bill I hope is destined without creating any sensation in the public mind, and subject perhaps to modification, shortly to become law, would be found to be a voluminous measure, creating a large amount of opposition, and probably delayed ad infinitum in its passage through Parliament. Finally, neither this or any other society can accomplish work, in a day or a year, which has been rendered necessary by the serious neglect which the great body of the Profession for years have shown of their own interests. We must proceed by degrees, and as quietly as possible, remembering that there is a certain class of the outside public, not altogether without influence, who regard with distaste a lawyer and a lawyer's bill. Let us work well together; let there be nothing like opposition to any society, especially none to the Incorporated Law Society, of which many of us are members which is possessed of considerable influence, and which in fact is the body representing the Profession. The Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, like country law societies, came into existence to supply some want. The first-named society is already amalgamated, and we all hope that a similar end awaits the country law societies, and no doubt in due course of time the Legal Practitioners' Society will disappear under similar circumstances. In the meantime let the Profession continue to support. X. Y. Z.

— I am very pleased to see that the Legal Practitioners' Society has already prepared the draft of a Bill which is calculated to afford some protection to the Profession. The house and land agents in my town prepare, as I am informed, and have every reason to believe, the large majority of leases of houses, &c. The practice is to charge 5 per cent. upon the rental for the entire business, including, of course, the preparation of the lease. The rent, as a rule, is paid annually to the agent, and he continues to get his commission of 5 per cent. on each year's rent. As these pseudo lawyers make no specific charge for preparing the lease, it has hitherto been impossible to do anything effectual towards stopping this encroachment upon the ordinary business of a solicitor. I trust that sect. 3 will meet this difficulty. Would it not be well to give the County Court of the district in which the person preparing the lease resides, jurisdiction as well as the Superior Courts? I fear that the expense of proceedings in the Superior Courts will act as a deterrent and so frustrate the object intended. Another class of a solicitor's practice which gets into the hands of many of these agents is the proving of wills, or, to speak more correctly, the preparation of the affidavits required for proving. I have repeatedly seen forms of affidavits for executors and Inland Revenue hanging in a conspicuous part of an agent's office in this town. I believe the modus operandi is to fill in these printed forms, get the executors sworn to the affidavits before a surrogate, accompany them to the registry, and instruct the executors how to apply in person for the probate. I know that this is a very common practice in Derbyshire. I have been asked and declined to swear executors to affidavits when accompanied by "an agent." I have taken the trouble to ascertain that the charge of the "agent" was by no means small, even including his fee for valuing for probate. I have heard of a registrar's clerk correcting defects in these affidavits, and so helping these agents in their practices. A clause to meet such cases would be a decided valuable addition to the Society's Bill. Another important grievance to grapple with is a comparatively novel encroachment, viz, that of a solicitor's clerk (who has become well acquainted with clients), starting an office under the protection of an unscrupulous member of our Profession, who lends his name in consideration of participating in the profits. A clerk, who was at one time in my employment, is doing this at the present time. So long as the London solicitor and the clerk in question keep their own counsel, I do not see any remedy. The solicitor's name is inscribed on one plate and underneath it that of the clerk in question. Smaller charges than that of Professional gentlemen in the town is the attraction.

A SOLICITOR OF TEN YEARS' STANDING.

— In writing last week suggesting that the word "writes" should be erased from the Bill, I must confess to the oversight at the time of not bearing in mind the saving words of the proviso of sect. 3 in favour of "any person employed merely to engross any instrument or proceedings," and this oversight was the more strange as I now remember on my first glance through the Bill looking for and finding the above quoted words. A SUBSCRIBER.

THE TAX ON SOLICITORS.—With an abundant surplus, and an exceedingly patient and courteous Chancellor of the Exchequer, an opportunity arises which I think should not be lost by solicitors, to endeavour to obtain a repeal or mitigation of the odious and unjust tax on their body. Without further delay should we not have our "deputation" to Sir Stafford Northcote on the subject? This might well be organised by the Legal Practitioners' Society, which indeed begins to be looked upon as the panacea of all our ills.

CERTIFICATE.

OUR INVADERS.—A client of mine has handed me this circular.

London, N., 9th March, 1874.

Dear Sir,—Excuse the liberty taken by me in thus addressing you, but having seen a bill of sale registered against you, and as it happens very frequently that persons entering into such engagements find they cannot meet them with that punctuality which has been agreed upon, hence the unfortunate debtor finds himself involved, and it often happens that a man is at once put into possession, and the whole of the home and effects sold off. The gentleman forwarding you this circular does not mean to intimate that such may be your case, but simply suggests should any unforseen occurrence happen if you will kindly give him a call, it will not be time wasted, as he would advise the best means and assist you at the same time of being relieved from such embarrassments. Trusting you will not consider me intruding in forwarding you this circular, should you require me or my services I will endeavour to fulfil those duties that devolve upon me both faithfully and efficiently.—I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,—A. B.

UNQUALIFIED PERSONS.—We send you at foot copy of a document received by a poor person in this town, who holds a receipt for all money owing in respect of the application. Is it not an attempt to obtain money by means of a threat? Cannot a member of the Legal Practitioners' Society secure an admission as to whether it was sent by the authority of the person whose name is lithographed at the foot of the note?

91. TENANTS IN COMMON—MARRIAGE—CONVEYANCE.—A. assigns to his two daughters two leasehold houses as tenants in common. The two daughters get married, and A. destroys the deed. There is nothing in existence to show that the property was vested in the daughters. The daughters now wish the houses to be vested in their husbands, in their own right. A. is willing to join in any deed. There was no settlement on the marriage. Will any of your correspondents inform me whether this can be done without the intervention of trustees, and how?

92. CLUB.—A. B., the secretary of a cricket club, ordered (it is assumed at the request of the committee) various articles for use by the members. The club eventually broke up without having paid A. 93. ADMISSION OF ATTORNEYS.—I am an articled clerk, and my articles will expire three or four days after the expiration of Trinity Term 1875. LAW UNION FIRE AND LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

The annual general meeting was held last week, at the offices, 126, Chancery-lane, E.C., James Cuddon, Esq., the deputy-chairman, presiding.

Mr. F. McGedy (the secretary) read the notice convening the meeting, and the minutes of the preceding meeting, which were confirmed. The directors' report and statement of accounts having been taken as read,

The Chairman said—Gentlemen, the accounts for the past year, now before you, exhibit a considerable improvement in the new business of the company in both departments. In the life department such improvement is manifest in three important particulars—namely, the amount of the new premiums, the average amount of the new policies, and the total sum assured thereby. The new premiums in the past year have reached the highest amount yet attained in this company, namely, £10,590 as against £8,500 in the preceding year. The average amount of the new policies has risen from £814 in 1872 to £1,023 in 1873, while the total amount thereby assured is £267,000 for the past year, as compared with £205,000 in the former year. (Hear, hear.) These are favourable features. The fluctuation in the amount of the life claims during the past year is obvious; but I may observe that a payment made in respect of a temporary excess in the rate of mortality is not all money lost, but is in a great measure a prepayment of claims, which would otherwise have to be met at some future time or times—either proximate or remote. And, further, it is in the very nature of a life business that there should be fluctuations. All life assurance calculations are founded on averages, and the very word "average" necessarily implies variation. This departure, therefore, from the even tenor of our way should surely be regarded as an incident in the chapter of accidents from which, however great the care, prudence, and vigilance in accepting or rejecting lives, no office, I venture to say, can rely on enjoying a perpetual exemption. By way of a little counterpoise to the excess of claims, I may state that during the past year several reversions purchased by the company have fallen in, which when realised may be expected, besides allowing £5 per cent. per annum interest on the cost of such reversions, to yield a profit on the capital of £5000 or £6000 at least. The average rate of interest on our investments shows a very satisfactory improvement, although we have not been less careful as to our securities. As to the claims in the fire department, we ought to be content, as the losses do not amount to more than the average per centage. I am happy to say that many of the insured are revising their fire policies, with a view to increasing the amount insured in due proportion with the enhanced cost of re-instating. The new fire premiums have increased 13 per cent. during the past year. We must all regret the loss of Mr. Marsh, who died last year, and who had been an active director of the company from the time of its formation. Since the report was printed we have had the misfortune to lose an old and valuable country director and a large shareholder, Mr. Dabbs, of Stamford. I take leave to remind you that this is the year for the quinquennial valuation. I trust that every shareholder will add something to the business of the company during the current year. Nothing else but the hearty co-operation of the shareholders is required to make our dividends not only permanently good, but also gradually progressive. (Hear, hear.) I shall be most happy, before moving the adoption of the report, to answer any question which any gentleman may wish to ask respecting the business of the company.

Mr. T. J. Hooper—There is, Sir, one question which I wish to ask upon a subject not mentioned in the report, and I do so for the information of the shareholders generally. It has reference to the action which occurred a short time ago in which this company contested the payment of a life policy. I am sure the directors have an explanation to give of it, and I think they will be only too glad to explain, because it appeared from the newspaper report that they contested the claim on purely technical grounds. I had nothing whatever to do with that action, and am in no way concerned in it, but, as a shareholder and an agent of the company, I think it would strengthen the hands of the agents generally, if you could, Sir, give us some few of the grounds on which you were led to resist the payment of the claim in question. (Hear, hear.)

The Chairman.—I am very much obliged to the honourable proprietor for asking this question, as it affords me an opportunity of giving an explanation, some of the newspapers having made a mistake in reporting the result. I can assure the meeting that under no circumstances would the directors have disputed a policy upon any technical ground, or upon any ground whatever, unless they had felt themselves compelled to do so in justice to the policyholders and shareholders. The policy in question was effected by a gentleman upon the life of a lady, and in the proposal for the insurance it was distinctly stated that the life had never been proposed for assurance to any other office, and I need not say how important it is that a correct answer should be given to that question. The policy having been completed on the 9th April 1872, and the death occurred on the 16th June following, and it came to the knowledge of the directors that a post mortem examination of the body had (at the instance of the lady's relatives) been made, and that it proved to be the fact that she had diseased lungs, and that forty-two gall stones had been found, from one of which (as large as a walnut) death had ensued; and you will readily understand that such a result in respect of a life which had been insured scarcely ten weeks, left the directors no alternative but to make further inquiry. (Hear, hear.) Upon inquiry being made it was found that the life had in fact been proposed previously to two other offices of standing, and declined by both. One of which proposals was made only about two or three months previous to the proposal to this company. Had the directors known of these prior proposals that would have led to inquiry and the knowledge of facts which would have induced them to refuse the insurance at any premium whatever It was proved at the trial that the lady had been an intense sufferer for some time previously. The result of the trial was that a verdict was given for the company upon the count which involved the untrue statements in the proposal. The insurer had lent no money, and insured the life only in anticipation of an intended marriage which death prevented. In conclusion, I may add that the directors took the advice of most eminent counsel, and acted upon it only. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Hooper.—I hope, sir, you will understand that I did not bring this forward in any spirit of complaint. [The Chairman.—"Oh, no."] I only wished for information, because I felt sure that you would not in this office resist the payment of any claim upon purely legal grounds. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. McGedy.—I may inform you, Mr. Hooper, that the reports in the newspapers, with the exception of the Times, were all wrong. The verdict on the principal count was for the company, whereas it appeared in the newspapers as against us.

The Chairman then formally moved that the directors' report be received and adopted.

Mr. H. Mason seconded the motion which was carried unanimously.

Mr. H. Mason said—I am sure, gentleman, you will all agree with me that we ought not to separate without passing a vote of thanks to the gentleman who occupies the chair on this occasion, and who is the deputy-chairman of the company. (Cheers.) I can assure you on the part of the directors that we esteem his services very highly indeed. (Hear, hear.) He is indefatigable in the performance of his duty, and I can only contemplate that his removal would be a very great detriment to the undertaking. (Hear, hear.) The time and attention he gives to the business of this office is something considerable, and if the shareholders only knew how much they were indebted to Mr. Cuddon for his services they would, I am sure, be much more eulogistic than I am. (Hear, hear.) I began to move that the best thanks of the meeting be given to the chairman, not only for his conduct in the chair this day, but for his valuable services to the company at all times. (Cheers.)

Mr. Maude seconded the motion, which was carried with applause.

The Chairman—I feel deeply indebted to to you, gentleman, for this kind recognition of the services which I am able to render to the company. It is not only an immense pleasure to me to find that my efforts on behalf of this office are so highly appreciated, but that in the discharge of my duty I am surrounded by so many gentlemen of great business experience, of great talent, and the highest possible integrity. (Hear, hear.) I have the able assistance of my friend Mr. McGedy (the secretary), Mr. Rogers of the fire department, and other officials in the office, without which, of course, the business would not be in its present prosperous condition. I thank you very much indeed for your kindness. (Cheers.)

Mr. F. R. Ward.—I hoped the chairman would have concluded his remarks by proposing a vote of thanks to the officers of whom he has spoken so highly. I concur in all Mr. Mason has said with reference to Mr. Cuddon's valuable services to the company. No one knows more about the business than he does. But we all know how exceedingly well he is supported by the officers, especially by Mr. McGedy, and by our friend Mr. Burges, whose legal assistance is also most valuable to us. (Hear, hear.) I beg leave to move that we present our cordial thanks to the secretary, the solicitor, and the other officers, for their efficient services on behalf of the company.—(Cheers.)

Mr. C. A. Swinburne seconded the motion, which was at once carried with unanimity.

Mr. McGedy—On behalf of myself, the solicitor, and the staff of the office, I return you my best thanks for the compliment you have paid us in passing this vote of thanks. We are all most anxious that the company should prosper; and we hope that during the current year, which is the last of the fourth quinquennial period, the shareholders will come forward and assist us by bringing a good many life proposals. (Hear, hear.) Last year, as the chairman has told you, we did the largest amount of new business we have ever transacted in any one year, amounting to £10,954 in new life premiums, and I should very much like to see it exceeded this year. With a little effort I think we might reach £11,000. (Hear, hear.) We shall make every exertion in the office, and I am sure that if you will kindly give us your support we shall succeed in obtaining that amount of new business. Again I beg to tender you my best thanks. (Cheers.)

The meeting then dispersed.

HUDDERSFIELD LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

The usual fortnightly meeting of this society was held on Monday evening last, at the County Court, Mr. A. H. J. Fletcher occupied the chair. Mr. B. Crook opened the debate in the affirmative of the following question: Is one solitary instance of recognized dealing on credit sufficient to create a general agency? (Chitty on Contracts, 7th edit., p. 198, note d.) Mr. Crook was supported by Mr. S. Stork, and opposed by Messrs. M. J. Burn and A. W. Preston. The meeting was attended by a large number of members, the greater portion of whom took an active part in the discussion. On the question being put by the chairman, it was carried in the negative by a majority of three.

LEGAL OBITUARY.

Note.—This department of the Law Times, is contributed by Edward Walford, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Genealogical and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the Law Times Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

W. REES, ESQ.

The late William Rees, Esq., of Scoveston, Pembrokeshire, formerly a solicitor at Haverfordwest, who died on the 22nd ult., at his residence, Spring-gardens, near that town, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late Mr. James Rees, of Haverfordwest, by Martha, daughter of the late Mr. Collins, of Marloes, in the county of Pembroke. He was born at Haverfordwest in the year 1799, and having been educated for the profession of the Law, was in due course admitted a solicitor, and practised for some years, with considerable success, in his native town. He was an alderman and magistrate for the borough of Haverfordwest, and served as mayor of that town in 1840, and again in 1856-7; he was also a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for Pembrokeshire, and served as high sheriff of that county in 1863. Mr. Rees was twice married; first, in 1822, to Mary, daughter of Mr. David Evans, of Haverfordwest; and, secondly, in 1858, to Mary, daughter of Mr. Thomas Dicker, of Lewes, Sussex, and widow of Mr. Samuel Salter, of Trowbridge, Wiltshire.

SIR W. H. BODKIN.

The late Sir William Henry Bodkin, many years Assistant Judge at the Middlesex Sessions, who died on the 26th ult., at his residence, West Hill, Highgate, in the eighty-third year of his age, was descended from a family of good standing in Ireland, many of whose members have been for some centuries magistrates for the county of Galway. He was the son of the late Peter Bodkin, Esq., of Galway, by Sarah, daughter of R. Gilbert, Esq., and he was born in Clerkenwell, in Middlesex, in the year 1791. Having received a good education at a private school at Islington, he in due time entered upon a course of study with the view of following the profession of the law. In Michaelmas Term 1826, he was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of Gray's-inn, of which he became a bencher in 1858. He was appointed Recorder of Dover whilst the Conservatives were in office in 1834, and in 1841 he entered Parliament in the Conservative interest, in conjunction with Capt. James Stoddart-Douglas, as member for the city of Rochester, of which he continued one of the representatives down to the general election in 1847, when he was defeated, the two seats being gained by Mr. Ralph Bernal and Mr. Thomas Twisden Hodges. Sir William Bodkin was for many years counsel to the Treasury, and having joined the Home Circuit, practised with considerable success at the Middlesex, Westminster, London, Kent, and Dover Sessions. In 1859 he was appointed Assistant Judge at the Middlesex Sessions, the duties of which office he fulfilled with marked ability down to the time of his recent retirement, consequent upon failing health. He received the honour of knighthood in 1867. He acted for many years as chairman of the General Assessment Sessions for the County of Middlesex; he was also a Vice-President of the Society of Arts, and a Deputy-Lieutenant for Middlesex. He was the author of some pamphlets "On Poor Laws," and he always took a deep interest in the welfare of the destitute and outcast of the metropolis, and was frequently present at meetings held for the purpose of alleviating their distress. He was also the originator of the statutes by which irremovable poor were made chargeable to the common fund of unions. Sir William's Act was passed for one year only, but has been continued and extended, and is, in fact, the foundation of the present system. Sir William Bodkin lived for many years, first on Hampstead-heath, and afterwards on Highgate-hill, nearly opposite the residence of Lady Burdett-Coutts. His house here was the constant rendezvous of legal and literary friends, who were always hospitably received and entertained. In fact, the late worthy judge was as popular in private circles as he was in his public capacity, and his loss will be extensively regretted at Highgate. Sir William Bodkin was twice married: first, in 1812, to Sarah Sophia, eldest daughter of Peter Raymond Poland, Esq., who died in 1848; and secondly, in 1865, to Sarah Constance, daughter of Joseph Johnson Miles, Esq., of Highgate; and he has left by his first wife a son, Mr. William Peter Bodkin, who is a magistrate for the county of Middlesex.

H. LLOYD, ESQ., Q.C.

The late Horace Lloyd Esq., Q.C., who died on the 30th ult., at his residence in Sussex-gardens, Hyde Park, in the forty-sixth year of his age, was the only surviving son of John Horatio Lloyd, Esq., barrister-at-law, of the Inner Temple, and formerly M. P. for Stockport; the personal friend of Lord Brougham, and of the leaders of the Liberal party forty years ago; his mother was Caroline, daughter of Holland Watson, Esq., and he was born in the year 1828. He was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, where he took his Bachelor's degree in 1850. Called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple in Trinity Term 1852, he joined the Home Circuit. He enjoyed a considerable practice at Nisi Prius, and also in private arbitration cases. He attained the honour of silk gown in 1868, and had been for some years a Bencher of his Inn.

T. B. BROWNE, ESQ.

The late Thomas Browne Browne, Esq., of Mellington Hall, Montgomeryshire, barrister-at-law, who died recently, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late Bryce Jones, Esq., of Cyfronydd, Montgomeryshire, by his first wife, Mary, daughter and heiress of the late Colonel Browne, of Mellington Hall, whose name he assumed by Royal licence. He was born in the year 1805, and was educated at Harrow and at Brasenose College, Oxford. He was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's-inn, in Trinity Term 1836, and since 1847 he held the appointment of one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools. Mr. Browne, who was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the county of Montgomery, married, in 1828, Marianna Kyffin, eldest daughter of Major Arthur Rowley Heyland, of Ballintemple, Londonderry, by whom he has left a family.

D. MACLEAN, ESQ.

The late Donald Maclean, Esq., barrister-at-law, and formerly M.P. for Oxford, who died at Rome, on the 21st inst., from an attack of bronchitis, was the youngest son of the late Lieut.-General Sir Fitzroy Jefferies Grafton Maclean, Bart., colonel of the 45th Regiment; his mother was the only child of Charles Kidd, Esq., and widow of John Bishop, Esq., of Barbados. He was born about the year 1801, and was educated at Eton, where he had amongst his schoolfellows the Marquis of Donegal, the Duke of Manchester, the present Lord Hampton, and the late Lords Kensington, Harborough, and Saye and Sele. From Eton he passed to Balliol College, Oxford, where he took his Bachelor's degree in 1823, obtaining first-class honours in the school of Literis Humanioribus; he proceeded M.A. in 1827, and was created D.C.L. in 1844. During his career at Oxford, Mr. Maclean took a prominent and leading part in the formation of the society known as the Oxford Union, the fiftieth anniversary of which institution was celebrated at Oxford last year. Called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn in Hilary Term, 1827, he practised for some time as a Chancery barrister. Mr. Maclean, who was a Conservative in politics, contested the city of Oxford in 1833 with Messrs. Townley and Hughes, on the vacancy caused by the unseating of Mr. Thomas Stonor (now Lord Camoys) on petition. At the general election in Jan. 1835, Mr. Maclean was returned to Parliament by the above constituency, in conjunction with Mr. Hughes, having defeated his Liberal opponent, Mr. Stonor. He was again returned at the two succeeding general elections, and retained his seat until the dissolution of Parliament in 1847, when he retired. Concerning his Parliamentary career, the author of "Random Recollections of the Lords and Commons" spoke of him as being "one of the most rising Tories in the House." He occasionally addressed the House on various questions of domestic policy, and on matters which particularly bore on our foreign relations. The affairs of Spain where to him a most fruitful theme, and he is stated to have been one of the ablest and most indefatigable advocates of Don Carlos in the English House of Commons. His speeches on the Spanish question, says the writer above referred to, generally displayed an intimate acquaintance with the subject in all its details. Since his retirement from Parliamentary life, the deceased gentleman had resided mostly abroad. Mr. Maclean, who was a deputy-lieutenant for the county of Durham, married in 1827 Harriet, daughter of General Frederick Maitland, a relative of the Earl of Lauderdale, and became a widower in 1850.

J. MACANDREW, ESQ.

The late John Macandrew, Esq., solicitor, of Edinburgh, who died at his residence in Randolph-crescent, in that city, on the 2nd inst., in the fifty-eighth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late John Macandrew, Esq., of Edinburgh, many years a solicitor before the Supreme Court of Scotland; his mother was Anne, daughter of James M'Lean, Esq., merchant, of Edinburgh, and he was born at Edinburgh in the year 1816. He was educated at the High School and University of Edinburgh, and was admitted a solicitor in 1840. Trained in the office of his father, Mr. Macandrew at an early age became a process-agent of rare tact and ability, and a conveyancer of no less repute. One who knew him well describes him as "candid and conscientious in all his dealings with clients, and as having earned an enviable reputation as a practitioner." In 1872 he was appointed president of the Society of Solicitors before the Supreme Court of Scotland, and during his year of office he took a thoughtful interest in all public measures calculated to simplify and cheapen litigation. In private life, says a writer in the Scotsman, "he was unostentatious, warm hearted, and sympathetic, and spared neither time nor means in assisting to promote social and moral reforms, and spreading the influence of Gospel truth." Mr. Macandrew married in 1855, Anne, daughter of the late Mr. John Macfie, merchant, of Edinburgh, by whom he has left a family of five children. The remains of the deceased gentleman were interred in Warriston Cemetery, near Edinburgh.

NOTICE.

THE present Editor of the LAW TIMES is desired to state that the learned gentleman who was for many years the editor of this journal entirely ceased to control its management on accepting judicial office. He then retired from the editorship, and has since been and is in no way cognisant of the contributions which are made to these columns.

The Law and the Lawyers.

IN the Court of Common Pleas in Philadelphia a case has arisen involving the question of an attorney's power to bind his client by an agreement for the sale of land. It seems that the authority of an attorney-at-law in Pennsylvania is more extensive than in most countries, on the ground that he acts in some degree as the agent as well as the lawyer of the client. This enlargement of power is founded on custom; it extends beyond the obtaining of judgment in an ordinary suit, and enables the attorney to control an execution, so that he may not only give time to a defendant, but he may give binding directions to the sheriff. In Wilson v. Young (9 Barr, 101) it was held that an attorney-at-law may refer his client's cause to arbitrators, with an agreement that the award shall be final. Judge ROGERS remarks that it would be difficult to point out anything in the conduct of a suit to judgment which he may not do. The limitations imposed on him relate generally to compromises which substitute one thing for another, as real estate for money, or to transactions after judgment. But it is decided that an attorney may not bind his client by an agreement by which land is taken instead of money—much less can he bind his client by an agreement for the sale of land; it requires a special delegation of authority in writing to enable him to do this.

THIS journal having been served with legal process at the suit of Dr. KENEALY, in respect of an article which appeared in our columns on the 7th March last, we might well desire to avoid reference to him in connection with the late trial, but the proceedings of the Oxford Circuit mess cannot be passed by without comment. Before we were aware of Dr. KENEALY'S hostile intentions towards ourselves, we expressed the opinion that the Profession should leave the settlement of all questions raised to the decision of the benchers of Gray's-inn. We still think this was the proper course, and undoubtedly the action of the circuit mess would appear to depart from it. Those, however, who have condemned the resolution of the circuit Bar as premature and unfair, can hardly have put to themselves the question—was there any alternative? What the members of a circuit under such circumstances have to decide is, whether they wish to continue to dine and to associate in all the familiarity of social intercourse with a particular individual. The cause of objection to this individual may vary in its nature. If it is in any way doubtful or obscure there should be an investigation; if palpable and beyond controversy, an investigation is idle, and gentlemen constituting what is in effect a club can at once determine that they will no longer tolerate the company of an objectionable member and expel him. The large majority of the Oxford Circuit Mess viewed Dr. KENEALY'S case as in the latter category, and if we were to investigate the grounds of the conclusion we should find probably that they were mainly composed of what the learned gentleman himself calls "generals." We make these observations in order to explain what might not unnaturally be regarded as the tyranny of a Bar mess. Exclusion from that mess has nothing more than a moral effect upon the excluded member, and at least one very successful Queen's Counsel at present travels circuit with great profit to himself although he has for years ceased to be a member of the mess. Had Dr. KENEALY been a less prominent personage nothing would have been heard of his exclusion, which is a purely personal matter between himself and his professional brethren. It is very much to be regretted that the operation of rules to which every man submits who enters the Profession and joins a circuit should be publicly canvassed in individual cases. Rules will exist in every society, and whether a man is universally "cut" or excluded from social intercourse by resolution is really of small consequence.

WE recently adverted to the extreme difficulty of any new licensing legislation arising from the existing complexities, and the numerous amendments called for by contending parties. We observe that last week two deputations on the same day presented themselves at the Home Office, one from the Grocers' Association, the other from the Church of England Temperance Society. The first tendered a set of proposed alterations, arranged in eleven paragraphs, some with and some without arguments to defend them. The second deputation, amongst whom were Lord SHAFTESBURY and Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY, presented statistics of undeniable interest. Circulars had been sent round to the superintendents of police and parochial clergy throughout the country. 118 chief police constables and 746 clergymen were in favour of the Act; 115 clergymen had suggested amendments for Sunday closing, and so on. So far so good. It is useful to know the opinions of chief constables and clergymen; they are in a manner semi-official, and we should imagine that the Home Office, before attempting fresh legislation upon a large scale, will come forward with something of the sort in the shape of a "parliamentary paper." But we read on with dismay, as we find an attack upon the facilities given to grocers. "The society," it is said, "felt that these grocers' shops ought not to be turned into licensed houses for drinking spirituous liquors." This is incorrect in point of law, for the grocers' licence extends to a sale for drinking off the premises only: (See 23 Vict. c. 27, ss. 1, 3; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 21, s. 2; Licensing Act 1872, ss. 68, 74). The demands of the society, taken together with the demands of the publicans for increased restrictions upon grocers, seem to threaten an unnatural combination, whether intended at present or not we cannot say, between the publicans and the teetotallers against the grocers, and we imagine that the interest of the public, ever too little considered in licensing squabbles, lies with the grocers. It may be useful to recall a little bit of history in illustration of our meaning. Many years ago spirits might not be sold by retail at all, except by publicans. The extreme inconvenience of this gave rise to a Bill enabling wholesale spirit dealers to sell spirits by retail. The publicans of that day put forward their strength, and the result was that the extension in favour of sale by retail was limited to liqueurs, by an Act called the Maraschino Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 121, see s. 9), and it was not till thirteen years afterwards that spirit dealers were enabled to sell spirits by retail (see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 21, s. 2). As for the present claims of the grocers, we leave them to the "serious consideration" of Mr. CROSS, who is at present engaged in the pleasant task of seeking how he may "do that which will be right to all parties." But we do hope that on the point we have just alluded to he will content himself with studying the statistics of the teetotallers, and will leave their inferences from them alone.

A CURIOUS case has been decided in the United States, as to the amount of prejudice which will disqualify a jurror on a criminal trial. This is a matter which is daily becoming more important, as public opinion is subjected to a greater variety of influences arising from the increase of periodical literature and freedom of communication. In the extremely interesting judgment in the case to which we refer, delivered by Chief Justice AGNEW, the opinions of the American jurists are reviewed. "At the present day," said the Chief Justice, "when newspapers, railroads and telegraphs have made intercommunication easy, and where reporters are alive to every occurrence, and the daily press eager to serve up the details of crime, the difficulty of obtaining jurors free from these wide spread influences, has made courts less ready to listen to this cause of challenge. In the contrariety of opinions prevailing, it is needless to look abroad for precedents, but rather to be guided by the reasons lying at the bottom of the right of challenge. The great purpose of this right is to secure a fair and impartial trial. Chief Justice MARSHALL said, in the trial of AARON BURR for treason, that 'the court has considered those who have deliberately formed and delivered an opinion on the guilt of the prisoner, as not being in a frame of mind to weigh the testimony, and therefore as being disqualified to sit as jurors in the case': (1 Burr's Trial, 367). Chief Justice TANEY laid down the following test, says Mr. WHARTON in his Crim. Law, §2981: 'If the juror has formed an opinion that the prisoners are guilty and entertains that opinion now, without waiting to hear the testimony, then he is incompetent. But if from reading newspapers or hearing reports, he has impressions on his mind unfavourable to the prisoners, but has no opinion or prejudice which will prevent him from doing impartial justice when he hears the testimony then he is competent.'" Having examined these authorities the Chief Justice proceeds to consider what amount of preconceived opinion will render a juror incompetent. "Wherever," he says, "the opinion of the juror has been formed upon the evidence given in the trial at a former time, or has been so deliberately entertained that it has become a fixed belief of the prisoner's guilt, it would be wrong to receive him. In such a case the bias must be too strong to be easily shaken off, and the prisoner ought not to be subjected to the chance of conviction it necessarily begets." This offers a field of challenge of great importance, and upon this ground the American court held that a challenge should have been allowed. It probably never occurred to the TICHBORNE defendant to inquire whether any of the jurors on his trial were unconquerably or seriously prejudiced by the evidence which had been given on the previous trial; but it is clear that the question may very easily arise in this country.

THE case of Caballero v. Hentz, which came up on appeal on the 11th March, from the MASTER of the ROLLS, before the LORDS JUSTICES, seems to establish a new principle in relation to the rights of that well protected person, the bonâ fide purchaser without notice. A brewer sent his agent to bid for property, described as in the possession of certain tenants, and producing £30 a year. At the sale, however, it appears that these tenants were under-tenants of a lessee of the vendor, who held the whole property for a lease, of which nine years were unexpired, at a rent of £20. The lease was read at the sale, but it was not referred to in the abstract sent to the purchaser. A bill was filed for specific performance, but it was held by the MASTER of the ROLLS, and his decision was affirmed, that the purchaser was not bound by the unauthorised act of his agent, and that he had not received constructive notice of the lease. The two cases most relied on by the plaintiff's counsel were those of Daniels v. Davidson (16 Vesey, 249) and James v. Litchfield (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 51; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 526); the former of which may be looked upon as much shaken in authority, and the latter overruled. The point decided in Daniels v. Davidson was, that the possession of a tenant is notice to a purchaser of the tenant's interest, created by an agreement to purchase from his landlord; and it was intimated in the judgment of Lord ELDON that generally notice of occupation was notice of the terms of occupation. And the case of James v. Litchfield lays down that rule to its full extent. It is true that in the present case complications existed which were absent from the earlier ones. The question of principal and agent was involved, and the statement in the particulars of sale that the property brought in a certain annual rental, whereas it produced, in fact, considerably less, had great influence upon the decision. But there are statements in the judgment of Lord Justice JAMES which go much further; so that, whereas under the older decision the usual rule was that notice of possession was notice of the terms under which the possession was held, the law may now be taken as settled, if the decision of the LORDS JUSTICES is maintained, that a purchaser may safely assume the tenancy of an occupant to be from year to year or at will, unless he is distinctly informed of the contrary. After stating his indisposition to follow the dicta in James v. Litchfield (ubi sup.), the LORD JUSTICE said: "If there is anything in the nature of the tenancies which affects the property sold, it is the vendor's duty to inform the purchaser of it, and he is not afterwards entitled to say, 'Oh, yes, but you ought to have gone and inquired.'" This decision seems to place the law upon a satisfactory basis, and while justly relaxing the stringency of the rule of caveat emptor, to discourage the fraudulent concealment of facts material to the property on the part of vendors.

OUR JURY SYSTEM.

THE amendment of the law relating to juries is a subject which undoubtedly ought to receive the immediate attention of the Government, the more so because the Judicature Commissioners have reported against the establishment of tribunals of commerce. There are only a few cardinal principles which have to be observed in framing the necessary measure, but we do not consider that a private member should be allowed the conduct of a Bill having so important an object as the remodelling of our jury system. These principles may be briefly stated. Liability to service should be carefully distributed, so that every person not exempted by statute should do duty in turn. There should be no distinction between special and common juries, jurymen all being educated up to a certain standard, and paid equally for their services. The verdict of a majority should be binding on the parties, and the illness or death of one or more of any jurymen should not affect the issue so long as the statutory majority remained.

These are, in our view, the leading principles which must ultimately be adopted; but we must observe that there is considerable difference of opinion upon the question whether anything short of an unanimous verdict of twelve men should be accepted. Different views may be taken with respect to civil and criminal trials. In civil cases we think it is beyond dispute that the verdict of a majority should be effectual; in criminal cases we are open to conviction that unanimity should still be insisted on. In the Orton trial the Lord Chief Justice told the jury that the great object of trial by jury was to obtain unanimity, and that each juryman was bound to use his utmost efforts, by argument and discussion with his fellows, to arrive at what was considered by all to be a right conclusion, treating his own opinions with diffidence and humility. Sir Alexander Cockburn was presiding at a great criminal trial, and his observations on the duties of jurymen were necessary and pertinent to the subject matter to be disposed of; but they do not apply with equal force to the trial of civil causes in which seven out of twelve men would in the great majority of cases almost certainly be in the right. Indeed our experience is that where juries disagree one or two jurymen are palpably obstinate, and having watched deliberations in the box we have seen more than once a single man besieged by his fellows, and at length induced to give way, although to all appearances unconvinced. It clearly ought not to be possible that in a civil cause a single obstinate or prejudiced juryman should be able to render perhaps a very expensive trial wholly abortive.

We are happy to see that Mr. Joseph Brown, Q.C., one of our most epergetic and enlightened law reformers, has considered the question of amending our jury system from the standpoint of the Orton imposture. He takes objection to the number twelve. "If the jury are really to form any opinion of their own," he says, "and not to throw all the business of deliberation on the Judge, twelve are too many to do it properly." How is it possible, he asks, for twelve men sitting in two rows in a couple of pews, and quite new to their work, to consult each other fully or freely as to the details of any long cause? . . . If they differ, and the evidence has to be reviewed by them to bring them to one mind, is this likely to be done better by five or twelve? And Mr. Brown boldly advocates the reduction of the number of jurymen to five. He, indeed, goes yet further, and evidently considers that in many cases trial by jury might be advantageously dispensed with. "It seems," he remarks, "as if the people of this country had been persuaded by the eloquent declamations of such men as Erskine and Brougham, who lived in times when the liberty of the press and of the subject found its best safeguard in a jury, that, therefore, we cannot have too much of it, and that because trial by jury is an excellent privilege when a man is indicted for a political offence, it is equally good when he has to try the validity of a patent or the title to an estate. But it is as great a piece of quackery to say that trial by jury is good for all causes, as to say that Morrison's pills cure all diseases. A knife is the best thing to cut bread, but would be very awkward to shave with. Would anyone ask a carpenter to repair his carriage when he could get a coachmaker to do it? Why, then, should we employ laymen to try a long and difficult cause, when we have got an expert Judge at hand, trained and paid for the work, who would do it much better, and in half the time." There is doubtless a great deal of good sense in this, but the view which the public take, and the view which practical lawyers take, is widely different. For example, the Saturday Review of last Saturday says that "jurymen are quite as much an essential part of the judicial establishment as the Judges themselves," and that "it is unnecessary to quote Blackstone in support of the proposition that the participation of the public in the administration of justice is of the utmost importance. Chief Justice Cockburn lately expressed the conclusion on which all authorities are agreed when he said that a jury assisted by a Judge is a far better tribunal for the elucidation of the truth than a Judge unassisted by a jury."

Mr. Brown, taking a shrewd lawyer's view of the Orton swindle, says that had it been left to Lord Chief Justice Bovill, or to the three Judges of the Queen's Bench to decide the matter, it would have been greatly shortened. To quote Mr. Brown's vigorous language, "In truth the case presented to every experienced lawyer such staring and unmistakeable marks of fraud and imposture from the very first, that if the civil case had been tried by the late Chief Justice Bovill instead of a jury, there is no doubt that that very acute and penetrating Judge, who had himself been counsel in the Smythe imposture, would have dismissed the case after the cross-examination of the ignorant impostor, who neither knew the native tongue of Roger Tichborne, nor the name of his mother, nor the situation of his estate, nor the books he read at school, nor the name of his favourite game, nor the face of his sweetheart. So it is pretty plain to those who watched the criminal trial, that if the Judges of the Queen's Bench had had to decide it, the evidence would have been greatly shortened by an intimation that a great deal of it did not weigh a feather, and no reply or summing up would have been called for."

We think that in advancing these arguments Mr. Brown has altogether forgotten that there are others besides lawyers to be satisfied, and that a finding which recommends itself to the logical intellect of a trained advocate may utterly fail in obtaining acceptation at the hands of the multitude. Some of the "fools and fanatics" referred to by the Lord Chief Justice are even now in the face of the verdict deliberating over some insane memorial to Government for the purpose of obtaining an inquiry into the conduct of the Judges at the late trial. How much wider would the clamour have been had no jury intervened between the Bench and the public!

It is to be regretted that there should be differences of opinion upon a subject which must be dealt with, but we are sanguine that a happy middle course may be taken. We do not consider that juries can be dispensed with or that less than seven jurymen should be allowed to give a verdict in any case whilst a larger number should be required to be unanimous in a criminal case. Mr. Brown says "one does not see why eight Englishmen should not be enough to convict a villain as well as eight Scotchmen." Convicting villains, however, is not the only function of juries in criminal cases: innocent people are occasionally arraigned, and the question is how best to secure the safe administration of justice. This is a subject for the careful deliberation of Parliament on a measure introduced by the Government.

THE THIRD REPORT OF THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION.

THIS report is by no means the least interesting of the series, dealing as it does with the question which was more agitated a short time ago than it is now, whether tribunals of commerce should be established in this country. The preface to the report must satisfy everyone that the subject has received the most thorough investigation. Inquiries have been made of authorities abroad and at home, with a view to ascertain how commercial courts work in foreign countries, and what the feeling on the subject is among commercial men in this country. While the Commissioners were prosecuting these inquiries we took occasion to publish the views of a gentleman familiar with the tribunals in France, and he was in the main decidedly of opinion that their operation is by no means satisfactory, even to commercial men, whilst the constant conflict between courts in different localities in matters of law, earned the well-merited contempt of the legal profession. The Judicature Commissioners have considered the question in all its bearings, and they have found that in those countries where hitherto the commercial element has predominated in the court, there is now a desire to give controlling, or at least, guiding power to a legal member. In the best models which have been examined the president of the court has been a lawyer, and the lay members of the court have acted more as assessors than as Judges, although having the power of Judges equally with the president. The Commissioners evidently consider that this is so near an approach to the courts of this country as constituted when assessors assist the Judge, that they recommend that special courts for the trial of commercial causes should not be established. We will go into their reasons more fully in a moment, but, before doing so, we will look at the views of the dissentient members of the Commission.

The lawyers upon the Commission are almost unanimous—Lord PENZANCE alone is unable to sign the report. "I am not satisfied," he says, "that tribunals might not be established consisting of commercial men, with adequate legal assistance, capable of settling commercial disputes in a satisfactory manner at greater speed and at much less cost than at present." His Lordship then refers to the "well-known fact" that in the large majority of commercial disputes the parties avoid the courts of law and resort to private arbitration, as strong to show the need of some such tribunals. We cannot agree with this. What the commercial community has to complain of is the delay attending the settlement of their disputes by the courts of law. It is, indeed, marvellous that they should have been so long suffering, and it is also surprising that lawyers themselves have not made some great effort to recommend the ordinary process to the public by obtaining an increased judicial staff, or rearrangement of the legal year, so as to make justice speedy, whilst the administration of the law was made profitable to its practitioners. Had tribunals of commerce, in which anybody could have conducted causes and had audience, been recommended and established, the legal profession would have suffered justly for their default in not taking steps to improve the machinery of which they indeed are a part. The great step, however, has been taken by Lord SELBORNE. As we have more than once pointed out, the Judicature Act has done all that is to be done to render justice speedy, and to give assessors and courts of arbitration so that technical matters and matters of account may be dealt with and decided by the light of more practical knowledge than can be obtained from the chance circumstance of a juror having special information—a circumstance which is far from common, although by no means infrequent.

Sir SYDNEY WATERLOW has taken the suitor's view of the question from the old standpoint. He complains that "those who support the present system of trying mercantile disputes seems to regard them all as hostile litigation. . . . The present system too frequently works a denial of justice, or inflicts on the suitor a long-pending worrying law suit, the solicitors on either side pleading in their client's interest every technical point, and thus engendering a bitterness which destroys all future confidence, and puts an end to further mercantile dealings." We hardly know what Sir SYDNEY expects to arrive at by Commercial Courts, but most certainly those cases which by their nature excite hostile feelings would continue to do so wherever disposed of. A vast number of actions are brought during the year in this country for breach of contract; the causes of the breach are to be found perhaps in the state of the markets, and where the construction of the contract would be bonâ fide questioned in one case, it would be raised malâ fide for the purpose of evading liability in fifty cases. Parties who are injured by the failure of other parties to perform their contracts are by no means disposed to regard the latter as friends, and when solicitors plead, as Sir SYDNEY ingenuously puts it, "in their client's interest," every technical point, they undoubtedly do so acting under instructions. We are confident that no respectable firm would care to load a client with the costs of arguing technical questions, if it was not the desire of such client to take every advantage of his opponent which the law allows. Probably Sir SYDNEY WATERLOW has formed his opinion from some individual case coming within his knowledge, but if he had consulted a lawyer in large practice like Mr. HOLLAMS he would have been told what we have said—it is only in the small minority of cases that commercial disputes do not arise out of a desire on the one side or the other to escape a liability or obtain an advantage. And we remember that one of the great objections to French tribunals, which was advanced in these columns was, that the merchant Judges are generally men with large connections and business relations, and that, consequently, their personal friendships and business interests are regarded as influencing their decisions, thus showing that commercial causes generally admit of sides being taken as in a hostile encounter.

With every respect for the judgment of Mr. AYRTON we cannot help thinking that he has taken an entirely erroneous view of the general question. He says, "It appears to me that when a dispute arises in the course of a commercial dealing the compulsory settlement of it by a tribunal may be regarded as only a continuance or a conclusion of the transaction, and that it is unreasonable to insist that the parties interested shall as a condition of having their dispute determined, be required at an enormous cost and inconvenience to themselves, to create a precedent for the benefit of society, and to add a rule of law to a commercial code." The passage which we have italicised shows how wrong a view may be taken of the ordinary litigation of our courts. Mr. AYRTON evidently thinks that every case which goes to trial raises some point which can be carried to a court sitting in banco, and that justice cannot be had in disputed questions of fact without payment of the penalty of settling a precedent. Of course it would be absurd in these columns to show at any length the utter absurdity of this idea. Very considerably more than two-thirds of the causes which come into court at nisi prius are settled by the verdict of the jury, and are never heard of again. Many others are heard of in banco only on motions for new trials, or to enter the verdict, which do not go beyond the first stage; and it is the small minority which go to make the law by forming precedents which are recorded in the law reports. Again Mr. AYRTON seems to us wholly wrong in considering that legal assistance is simply a necessity of the courts as at present constituted—to protect suitors against each other, and against the abuse of power by the Judge. If he imagines that before a tribunal of commerce suitors would not need protection against each other and against the caprices of the Judges, we think he is greatly in error; and in all probability with the power of appeal which would exist, as many cases would find their way into the ordinary courts of law as now go in their usual course into banc and up to the higher courts of appeal.

It is a relief to turn from these conjectures to the practical treatment of the subject by the Commissioners who assent to the report. They consider that all the advantages which could be gained by the establishment of tribunals of commerce will be obtained by giving mercantile assessors to the courts, and go as far as to recommend that in all cases heard with assessors in which appeals are allowed power should be given to the judge of the court of appeal to call in the assistance of like assessors. This is the solution of the whole difficulty. We do not believe that in cases in which private arbitration is had recourse to the result can be so satisfactory as a decision of a properly constituted legal tribunal. Speedy procedure and commercial assessors being given, such tribunal must hold its own against all competition.

We have stated the pith of the report and the objections to its recommendations. It will be found in extenso in another column.

BANKRUPTCY JURISDICTION.

THE decisions in Ellis v. Silber (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 156) and in Ex parte Motion, Maule v. Davis, (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 906; on appeal, 22 W. R. 225) are calculated to determine somewhat the limits of the jurisdiction in bankruptcy under sects. 66 and 72 of the last Act in questions between the trustee and third parties. To understand what Ellis v. Silber establishes, it must be premised that with every bankruptcy there devolve upon the trustee (1) a certain number of assets in the hands of the bankrupt, (2) a certain number of claims on persons connected before the bankruptcy with the bankrupt in business, (3) a certain number of liabilities to the same class of persons. In what forum or forums a trustee is to pursue the claims numbered (2) is a point of some importance, and the two cases cited above bear particularly upon it.

The case of Ellis v. Silber (ubi sup.) was this. A claim was made by the trustee of a bankrupt's estate upon a former partner of the bankrupt for compensation for improperly dissolving the partnership. This claim the trustee attempted to prosecute by a bill in Chancery, and a demurrer to the jurisdiction was filed, a course always adopted wherever the Bankruptcy Act gives jurisdiction to the Bankruptcy Court: (Stone v. Thomas, L. Rep. 5 Ch. App. 219; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 359). On the criterion adopted in Ex parte Anderson, re Anderson (L. Rep. 5 Ch. App. 481; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361), to determine whether the Bankruptcy Court had jurisdiction or not, viz., "Is or is not the question in the present case one which it is necessary to decide with a view to the distribution of the bankrupts' estate," it is quite clear, the matter in dispute in Ellis v. Silber was within the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court. In Anderson's case the trustee desired to recover some pictures which had got into the hands of a third party, and if that had to do with the distribution of the assets of a bankrupt pari ratione had the trustee's claim in Ellis v. Silber. In Ex parte Motion the same criterion of jurisdiction as in Ex parte Anderson (ubi sup.) was taken by the Chief Judge who held that a claim which, if successful, would produce assets was a question which had to do with their distribution. Clearly on the tests adopted in Ex parte Anderson and Ex parte Motion the claim made in Ellis v. Silber was within the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy. The decision of Lord Selborne that Ellis v. Silber was a proper case for the courts of equity (which amounts to a denial of bankruptcy jurisdiction: Stone v. Thomas, sup.) is, therefore, of considerable importance, because it displaces at once the tests by which, since Anderson's case, bankruptcy jurisdiction has been measured. In his decision the Lord Chancellor drew a distinction between questions which arise because a bankruptcy has happened, e.g., the payment of dividends, &c., and questions which arise from other sources than that event. Such a distinction the following extract from his judgment clearly defines: "There was no case cited and no clause quoted from any Act of Parliament to the effect that whenever the trustee of a deed or a trustee or assignee in bankruptcy has a demand against a third person which, but for the bankruptcy, would be proper to be prosecuted in a court of law or equity, the jurisdiction of the court of law or of the court of equity is, as against that third person, transferred to the Court of Bankruptcy. I apprehend that there is nothing whatever in the Acts relating to bankruptcy which in an ordinary case, not governed by the special clauses of the Act, has any such effect." The result of these words is clearly to except from Bankruptcy jurisdiction all claims and demands and questions which, if no bankruptcy had happened, would have been tried elsewhere. This seems to point to the test of bankruptcy jurisdiction as being this (creditors coming under special provisions), "Would the question have been tried with the debtor as plaintiff or defendant if the bankruptcy had not taken place?" This view of Lord Selborne's words is borne out by the remainder of his judgment.

"That which is to be done in bankruptcy is the administration in bankruptcy. The debtor and the creditors as the parties to the administration in bankruptcy are subject to that jurisdiction. The trustees or assignees, as the persons entrusted with the administration, are subject to that jurisdiction. The assets which come into their hands, and the mode of administering them, are subject to that jurisdiction, and there may be, and I believe are, some special classes of transactions which, under special clauses of the Acts of Parliament, may be specially dealt with as regards third parties. But the general proposition that whenever the assignees or trustees in bankruptcy, or the trustees under such deeds as these, have a demand at law or in equity as against a stranger to the bankruptcy, then that demand is to be prosecuted in a Court of Bankruptcy, appears to me to be a proposition entirely without the warrant of anything in the Acts of Parliament and wholly unsupported by any trace or vestige of authority."

Lord Selborne, it will be seen, takes as the subjects of bankruptcy control (a) the debtor, (b) the creditors, (c) the trustee, (d) the assets which come into the trustee's hands. He certainly excepts the second head of our classification of the bankrupt's effects—viz., a certain number of claims on persons connected in business with the bankrupt—from the bankruptcy jurisdiction. And this exception, which must have been made advisedly, is perfectly consonant with reason; for while creditors could, if unrestrained, absorb the assets and so defeat an administration in bankruptcy, it is very clear those on whom the trustee alone has claims can do nothing of the sort. The same rule of administration prevails with respect to estates in the hands of the Court of Chancery, against which the creditors prove, and against the debtors to which actions have to be brought.

So clearly does Ellis v. Silber displace the test laid down in Anderson's case as the test of jurisdiction, that Lord Selborne expressly shifts the ground on which Ex parte Anderson rested, and places it on the submission of the holder of what were claimed as assets to the bankruptcy, viz., on the ground that that person "had come in and made certain arrangements as to the pictures in dispute with creditors of the bankrupt, and therefore the matter was primâ facie brought by his own submission and his own acts under the administration in bankruptcy." Ellis v. Silber may therefore be considered (1) as setting aside the authority of Ex parte Anderson; (2) a demurrer to the jurisdiction being always entertained in a court of equity, where there is a concurrent jurisdiction in bankruptcy, as establishing that the trustee of a bankrupt estate, must, unless in some cases specially provided by the Act, pursue against debtors to the estate equitable and legal remedies. A similar claim was discussed in Ex parte Motion, Maule v. Davis. The object of the motion was to set aside a sale made by an assignee of a former bankruptcy under a decree in Chancery, and then to carry out the decree by another sale, on the allegation that the trustee of a second bankruptcy considered if the property were fairly sold a considerable sum would come to him and the creditors. The Chief Judge sitting in Bankruptcy granted the relief desired, but on appeal it was held that the Court of Bankruptcy had no power to entertain the cause, clearly one of the same nature as Ellis v. Silber and Ex parte Anderson, viz., a demand by the trustee against some third persons, which, if successful, must swell the assets. "Sect. 72," said Lord Selborne, the Lords Justices concurring, "gives the Court" (of Bankruptcy) "a very large authority to decide such questions as it may consider expedient and necessary to decide for the proper purposes of the administration in bankruptcy; but it does not, as we understand it, at all enable the Court of Bankruptcy to draw compulsorily within the sphere of its jurisdiction property or the owners of property not vested in the assignee, and not originally subject to the administration in bankruptcy." That the above case includes in its principle the simple one of a legal claim by the trustee on a person not a creditor as well as a complicated equitable claim on the same description of person, is very clear from the observations made during the argument. "If a bankrupt claimed to be the owner of an estate, you contend," asked Lord Justice James, "that the Court of Bankruptcy could not be the proper tribunal to try that question, but an action of ejectment must be brought or a bill filed?" Lord Selborne on this remarked, "Certainly I should hold that." After these two decisions it will be very difficult for the bankruptcy courts to absorb into themselves much of the jurisdiction they continually absorb by injunction. By a very strained construction of these cases bankruptcy courts may perhaps retain a concurrent jurisdiction in matters of the nature therein adjudicated upon; but in such a case, it ought clearly to be remembered, when injunctions are applied for, that one court cannot transfer a cause to itself from a court of concurrent jurisdiction.

AMERICAN CRITICISM ON THE ENGLISH BAR.

A new serial publication has just issued from the Baltimore press entitled "The Bench and Bar Review," and its first article is entitled "The Bar in England and France." Therein we find the following estimate of the present constitution of the English Bar, its capacity, and its work:—

We feel a great difficulty in speaking of the actual practitioners at the Bar of England. Never at any period within a century and a half was the Profession at so low an intellectual ebb as latterly. It is not that there is any deficiency of the day labourers, the plodding formalists of the Profession. These exists in greater numbers, and are probably as competent and well read in the lore of the blue books and practice cases as any of their predecessors. But superior intellects and brilliants talents are, in our day, altogether wanting. There is no Erskine, no Murray, no Law, no Romilly, no Brougham, no Copley, no Denman, no Follet; we have not even, in our time, a Best, a Garrow, or a Scarlett.

It will scarcely be credited by a lay reader—but the fact is not the less deplorably true—that with the exception of half a dozen men, we can scarcely name a barrister who can now address a jury, in an important cause, with average ability.—Sir Alexander Cockburn was among the best specimens, and among these there is only one who can be called eloquent, and Sir Alexander Cockburn's is the eloquence more of the rhetorician than of the man of fervid and impassioned feeling.

The present Attorney-General understands the practice of the courts well, is an excellent case lawyer, and is generally well-read in his profession. He is a man of subtle and acute intellect, not wanting in courage or self-possession, and not deficient in fluency, but, albeit most respectable as a lawyer, as an advocate he cannot be compared with the great lawyers.

A man of much more intellectual ability, was Mr. Mathew Hill. In any considerable cause, notwithstanding certain defects of manner, Mr. Hill was a really able and effective advocate. Occasionally, his efforts in this respect have been very masterly and vigorous, indicating a well-stored mind. and a greater degree of reading, research, and comprehensiveness than usually fall to the lot of practising barristers in our day. It may be said that Mr. Hill's efforts smelt of the lamp, that they were marked by the limæ labor. Granted that it is so, what does this prove but that no high degree of excellence can be obtained without labour? Men do not become painters, sculptors, or actors, without study, reflection, and perpetual labour. How can they hope, then, to to become advocates d'emblée, or at a bound.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, from the elevation of Sir Thomas Wilde until the beginning of 1849, had the pick of the best legal business, and always performed his work with consummate acumen, subtlety, and address. The style of speaking of Sir Fitzroy Kelly was eminently legal. His sentences short, clear, and symmetrical; he arranged his facts lucidly, he grasped his details with considerable artistic skill and effect. He was ever chaste, natural, and uninvolved; and without being an ad captandum speaker, or descending to colloquial phrases, could make himself thoroughly understood by a jury. He possessed great judgment and tact, an excellent pleader, a good mercantile lawyer, and generally well-read in the common law of the land, yet, though a clear and dexterous arguer of cases, was not a man of eloquence. To scholarship, Mr. Kelly made no pretensions whatever, though he possessed some knowledge of modern languages, and was tolerably read in English literature. Of a docile nature, and of flexible mind, he was, however, one of those men who can get up any subject on or for a particular occasion, so as to please and satisfy an attorney, if not to carry the court or lead captive the jury.

Sir Alexander Cockburn is certainly a more accomplished and elegant scholar, and much more a man of the world than any one of the gentlemen we have mentioned. Not a very profound lawyer, he is yet so well skilled in the principles of the science, and has so scholarly a knowledge of the civil law, that he can readily grasp any principle of jurisprudence. His intellect is so clear, his power of generalization so rapid and so sure, his felicity of expression so great, that he readily makes himself master of details. In dealing with the passions of men, Sir Alexander Cockburn possessed greater powers than any of his colleagues. To say, however, that he had been a great advocate, unless as great among smaller men, would be incorrect. When not very many years at the Bar he obtained considerable practice, and one of the largest practices before Committees of the House of Commons. In this branch of the law three times larger incomes have been made, than ever have been acquired in the regular pursuit of the Profession. In 1844, 1845, and 1846, Mr. Charles Austin is said to have made on an average more than £40,000 a year. The Hon. John Talbot is known to have made more than £12,000 a year; and juniors who have never attained £200 a year at Westminster Hall, have made their £3000 and £4000 a year, during those three years before committees. This is an exceptional state of things, it is true, owing altogether to the railway mania, but Mr. Austin, from 1832, had steadily risen into the first rank in this parliamentary practice, and therefore it is necessary to say something of such a man.

Unquestionably, Mr. Austin possessed great powers of exposition, and of lucid explanation—he has at command a copious flow of words and of ideas—he is ardent and cool at one and the same time—he possessed the reflective and the perceptive faculties in exceedingly well-balanced proportion, and he is a man, moreover, very well read in ancient and modern literature. But like most suddenly successful men—like men who from small beginnings have grown immensely and speedily wealthy, he was inordinately conceited—indeed, preposterously conceited for a man so generally capable and well-informed.

Of genius or imagination Mr. Austin possessed not a particle, and though a clear, and occasionally an ardent and impassioned speaker, he could not be called eloquent. But the besetting and eminent vice of Mr. Austin was an insatiable love of money. While Sir Alexander Cockburn, by no means a rich man, renounced a most lucrative parliamentary practice to enter the House of Commons, Mr. Austin was known as an immensely rich man, who stuck by his parliamentary practice, and preferred to count his gains, rather than to do the state some service as a senator or a politician.

Of the barristers who are considerable juniors, as it is called—i.e., men who take the burden of cases upon their shoulders, we have not spoken. Many of the most successful of this dull tribe is composed of men who have been bred up as attorneys, attorneys' clerks (not articled clerks), or who have commenced life as errand-boys in an attorney's firm, or as sweepers of offices or chambers, or servers of summonses. Nineteen out of twenty of the men doing second or third-rate business at the Bar, and making from £500 to £1500 a year, are persons who have either been attorneys a few years ago, or the sons, brothers, or cousins of attorneys—or who have married the sisters, daughters, or the female relatives of successful attorneys. A gentleman of scholarlike education, of liberal attainments, of guileless and unsuspecting nature, just escaped from the university, has no chance with such men as these. There is no fair start for the man of this sort, who desires to know his profession as a science. The smart tradesman who knows it mechanically as a craft, beats him hollow. On a considerable circuit in England, there is a gentleman of twelve years' standing at the Bar, making his £1200 or £1500 a year, who, thirteen or fourteen years ago, travelled the very circuit, which he now follows as a barrister, as a clerk to a great attorney agency house of Lincoln's-inn. In this guise he became acquainted with every attorney and every attorney's clerk through the whole circuit. When called to the Bar such acquaintances and friends were used in a double sense. Then what a knowledge of practice and routine must any man have gained who learned his profession in this manner? It is curious that, while regularly admitted and sworn attorneys must be off the roll for a certain time, before they are allowed to enter as students for the Bar, that an attorney's writing or copying clerk (we speak not of an articled clerk) or the sweeper of an attorney's office or chamber, may enter at once as a student, and may be sworn a barrister three days after he leaves the service of the lowest practitioner in Lyon's, Clement's, or Thavies Inn. If such a system produced Saunderses, or Pattesons, or Maules, or Parkes, or Vaughan Williamses, we could see the benefit of it—if it produced Erskines, or Currans, we might applaud it, but it produces excellence in no one way. It merely enables attorney's clerks, ex-attorneys, attorney's sons and brothers-in-law, brothers, and and cousins, to start with a handful of briefs from the commencement of their career, and to daily acquire, by doing some business of a tenth-rate kind, a certain species of mental and professional dexterity of the very lowest character. The men of this calibre, and there are at least one hundred and sixty or seventy of them in Westminster Hall, making from £300 to £2000 a year, are essentially neither more nor less than tradesmen—journeyman lawyers, who set about their work in the spirit of mechanics or handicraftsmen. Either this system should be put an end to, or it should be adopted for all. Compel every candidate for the Bar to pass one year in an attorney's office, and the evil—or, more properly to describe it, the unfair advantage—which a few very illiterate, and not very high-principled, yet well-dressed persons possess, would pass away.

In looking over what we have written, we feel obliged to confess that eloquence and high gifts, generally rare amongst the advocates of England, has now nearly perished from amongst us. It is well stated in a work of considerable research, that one reason of the decay of everything resembling eloquence is the excessive degree of technicality, which pervades every portion of English law. Though we do not deny that the principles of special pleading are based in rigid logic, yet we must admit—with Mr. John George Phillimore—who has published an admirable summary of the Roman law—that the wire-drawn distinctions of special pleading are the disgrace and the opprobrium of our age. To meander through such mazes would puzzle the subtlest intellect, and tax to the utmost the powers of a really robust, masculine understanding, and sometimes tax such powers altogether in vain. The involved phraseology, the expletives, the synonymes, the pleonasms, the obscure and barbarous verbiage of the modern system of pleading, are really the disgrace of our time and system. These abuses are excrescences of comparatively modern growth on the ancient body of English law, for in the earlier time pleadings were delivered ore tenus at the Bar, and not written. The evil has been much increased by a body of very ingenious and subtle gentlemen acting under the Bar as special pleaders, and it must be averred that for the last half century or more, our courts of justice in England have been far too prone to lend a willing ear to refined and technical points of objection which subtle pleaders below the Bar delight to raise, and pettifoggers at the Bar have a peculiar glory in sustaining in court.

The overgrown mass—the immense, shapeless, and unwieldy body of the English law is an impediment not less formidable to oratory than the technicality of pleading. The volumes of the Statutes at Large now amount, if we remember rightly, to about fifty-three volumes quarto, of about 850 pages each volume. On the construction of these statutes there are annually published about thirty volumes of Reports, containing, also, at an average, from 700 to 800 pages of matter, at a cost of about £2 a volume, or £60 a year to any one who subscribes to a complete set of Reports, beginning with the House of Lords, and ending with the Crown Cases Reserved. How can any one or any ten men master all this enormous or unwieldy mass, or properly digest and common-place it on his mind? Roger North, in his day, when the volumes of Reports were only sixty, spoke of them as innumerable. If he were to revisit the glimpses of the moon, what would he say, finding 600 volumes, containing, down to the end of 1849, 250,000 points of law, or more, as any man may see by a reference to Harrison's or Chitty's Index, or Jeremy's Digest? How can a man be eloquent, whose best days and hours are spent in learning to digest matter, and arrange in his mind, or to learn where to discover, and how to apply this vast mass of legislative verbiage, and the decisions upon it? Talents of a popular kind—the power of giving effect to large and comprehensive views, wither under such a discipline as this. All the fire, energy, and enthusiasm of a young man—all the genius and general principles he has acquired at college, and in the bosom of his family, die within him, smothered and overlaid by the forms and technicalities of a system, narrow, crabbed, and barbarous.

Independently of this, the practical workaday, money getting, and business-like spirit of our time, is against the theory and practice of eloquence. A man particularly gifted with grace of manner and affluence of expression, is despised by the prig and the formalist, who has thoroughly conned his Chitty and his Archbold, and is looked on with ineffable disdain by the successful railway speculator, or the man or woman who has (what is called within the precincts of the city of London) three stars in India Stock.

The multiplicity and detail of modern affairs, abounding in particulars and small items, also tends to stifle and suffocate everything like eloquence. Ours is an age of debtor and creditor—of profit and loss—of tare and tret—of free trade and barter—of buying and selling—of quick returns and small profits; and men have neither the time nor the taste to make fine phrases as of old. If we have perfected the steam-engine, and created railroads, we have also enthroned a servile, a crouching, and mammon-getting spirit in high places—we have deified dullness and formality, and worshipped mechanism, and drudgery, and cotton spinning, and knife grinding, as though they were things lofty, ethereal, spiritual, and immortal. With such feelings pervading the aristocracy of trade—ay, and the aristocracy of land, and of acres—is it any wonder that the mass of barristers are timid formalists—is it any wonder that they will not speak with decision, and fearlessness, and energetic eloquence, like Erskine—that they shrink from giving their better and nobler thoughts noble expressions—that they are dull and decorous, and dead to the most generous and loftiest impulses? No doubt the times in which we live or vegetate are flat, level, and insipid.

We are fallen on the cankers of a calm world and a long peace; yet we cannot but think that somewhat of the mediocrity of the Profession is owing to a man who was longer at the head of the Bar as Attorney and Solicitor-General than any man within a century. John Lord Campbell, though a sound and well-read lawyer, was neither a gifted nor a high-hearted man; neither a scholar nor an orator, nor a distinguished gentleman; and his leaden influence has operated in many ways most disastrously. When eloquence, or even a graceful and fluent elocution, is not prized, men will take no pains—will make no efforts to become successful speakers. Advocates will not labour earnestly to become eloquent when such barristers as the —— and the —— lead the Great Northern Circuit of England. We do not deny that there is great ingenuity and skill—a happy facility of dealing with entangled and complicated facts—that there are great judgment, quickness, tact, knowledge of practice and of cases now at the Bar of England; but of eloquence there is none, and of scientific or historic learning very little. Ours is an age of no flagrant wrongs—of no deeds of violence or of rapine—of no great political trials—and the occasion has not, perhaps, arisen to call forth the eloquence of the "coming man." In Ireland two eloquent advocates appeared at the State trials. One, a fine old gentleman of the name of Holmes, then in his 78th or 79th year, and a brother-in-law of Thomas Addis Emmett; the other Mr. Whiteside, the author of a book in three volumes on Italy.

It is possible that in the back rows of the Queen's Bench and Exchequer there are some undiscovered Erskines, Currans, and Broughams; but so long as the system prevails among attorneys of giving the leading causes to Queen's Counsel wearing silk gowns, or rather to those among them who have business in law and equity—the Erskines, the Currans, and Broughams are likely to remain undiscovered. Half a century ago, there were not above twenty silk gowns in the Profession, ten of whom were men of real ability, and the remainder of great professional learning; but now silk gowns are given to men neither of eloquence, of legal learning, nor of high scholarship. Among them there are not nine men capable of leading or conducting a cause better—many of them not so well—as the many astute and sensible men without a silk gown.

One might fancy that in the criminal branch of the Profession we might find eloquent, ingenious, and able men at the Central Criminal Court. But there is scarcely one man above mediocrity, excepting a very few.

The Bar of England is now a very numerous body. In the beginning of the past year it consisted of over 7000 individuals, and there were called in the previous year 300 gentlemen. The Bar of England at this moment probably consists, to reckon new members, about 8000 members, but the returns cannot be accurately ascertained at present.

In Ireland the Profession of the Bar is relatively greater than in England, and the Queen's Counsel also more numerous. We have no means of knowing the number of advocates in Scotland. No doubt there is much in success at the Bar to ennoble and gratify the mind, and to attract the eyes of those whose hopes outrun their judgment, but laymen and spectators perceive the spangles upon the robe of the advocate, profoundly unaware that all is not gold that glitters brightly. If the advocate has his triumphs he has also his troubles, and to the vast majority the troubles far exceed the triumphs. Crowds, says somebody whose name and book we forget, but who spoke truly—crowds admire the figures upon tapestry—the splendour of the colours, and the rich intertexture of its purple and gold; but who turns the array to contemplate the jagged ends of thread, rags of worsted and unsightly patchwork of the reversed side of the picture, and yet it is from this side the artificer sits and works—this is the picture as he sees it—the gay outside is for the spectator. Thus it is that we look upon life—ermine, lace, gold, jewels. Rank, station, ambition, glitter in our eyes, and we envy the good fortune of the possessors, and think they must be happy, seeing but the show side of their lives; yet not a life among them that has not, or has not had its rags and tags, and knotted ends, its wrong side, in that in which the artisan has been drudging all his days, until the splendour he has made becomes distasteful, and only serves to enrich the eyes of ignorant lookers-on.

LEGISLATION AND JURISPRUDENCE.

REAL PROPERTY LIMITATION BILL.

A Bill intituled An Act for the further Limitation of Actions and Suits relating to Real Property:—

WHEREAS it is expedient further to limit the times within which actions or suits may be brought for the recovery of land or rent, and of charges thereon:

Be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. No land or rent to be recovered but within twelve years after the right of action accrued.—After the commencement of this Act no person shall make an entry or distress, or bring an action or suit, to recover any land or rent, but within twelve years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action or suit, shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims; or if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twelve years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action or suit, shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same.

2. Provision for case of future estates—Time limited to six years when person entitled to—The particular estate of possession, &c.—A right to make an entry or distress, or to bring an action, to recover any land or rent, shall be deemed to have first accrued, in respect of an estate or interest in reversion or remainder, or other future estate or interest, at the time at which the same shall have become an estate or interest in possession, by the determination of any estate or estates in respect of which such land shall have been received, notwithstanding the person claiming such land or rent, or some person through whom he claims, shall at any time previously to the creation of the estate or estates which shall have determined, have been in the possession or receipt of the profits of such land, or in receipt of such rent. But if the person last entitled to any particular estate on which any future estate or interest was expectant shall not have been in the possession or receipt of the profits of such land, or in receipt of such rent, at the time when his interest determined, no such entry or distress shall be made, and no such action or suit shall be brought, by any person becoming entitled in possession to a future estate or interest, but within twelve years next after the time when the right to make an entry or distress, or to bring an action or suit, for the recovery of such land or rent, shall have first accrued to the person whose interest shall have so determined, or within six years next after the time when the estate of the person becoming entitled in possession shall have become vested in possession, whichever of those two periods shall be the longer; and if the right of any such person to make such entry or distress, or to bring any such action or suit, shall have been barred under this Act, no person afterwards claiming to be entitled to the same land or rent in respect of any subsequent estate or interest under any deed, will, or settlement, executed or taking effect after the time when a right to make an entry or distress, or to bring an action or suit, for the recovery of such land or rent, shall have first accrued to the owner of the particular estate whose interest shall have so determined as aforesaid, shall make any such entry or distress, or bring any such action or suit, to recover such land or rent.

3. In cases of infancy, coverture, or lunacy at the time when the right of action accrues, then six years to be allowed from the termination of the disability or previous death.—If at the time at which the right of any person to make an entry or distress, or to bring an action or suit, to recover any land or rent, shall have first accrued as aforesaid, such person shall have been under any of the disabilities hereinafter mentioned (that is to say), infancy, coverture, idiocy, lunacy, or unsoundness of mind, then such person, or the person claiming through him, may, notwithstanding the period of twelve years, or six years (as the case may be), hereinbefore limited shall have expired, make an entry of distress, or bring an action or suit, to recover such land or rent, at any time within six years next after the time at which the person to whom such right shall first have accrued shall have ceased to be under any such disability, or shall have died (whichever of those two events shall have first happened).

4. No time to be allowed for absence beyond seas.—The time within which any such entry may be made, or any such action or suit may be brought as aforesaid, shall not in any case after the commencement of this Act be extended or enlarged by reason of the absence beyond seas during all or any part of that time of the person having the right to make such entry, or to bring such action or suit, or of any person through whom he claims.

5. Thirty years utmost allowance for disabilities.—No entry, distress, or action shall be made or brought by any person who at the time at which his right to make any entry or distress, or to bring an action to recover any land or rent, shall have first accrued, shall be under any of the disabilities hereinbefore mentioned, or by any person claiming through him, but within thirty years next after the time at which such right shall have first accrued, although the person under disability at such time may have remained under one or more of such disabilities during the whole of such thirty years, or although the term of six years from the time at which he shall have ceased to be under any such disability, or have died, shall not have expired.

6. In case of possession under an assurance by a tenant in tail, which shall not bar the remainders, they shall be barred at the end of twelve years after that period, at which the assurance, if then executed, would have barred them.—When a tenant in tail of any land or rent shall have made an assurance thereof which shall not operate to bar an estate or estates to take effect after or in defeasance of his estate tail, and any person shall by virtue of such assurance at the time of the execution thereof, or at any time afterwards, be in possession or receipt of the profits of such land, or in the receipt of such rent, and the same person or any other person whomsoever (other than some person entitled to such possession or receipt in respect of an estate which shall have taken effect after or in defeasance of the estate tail) shall continue or be in such possession or receipt for the period of twelve years next after the commencement of the time at which such assurance, if it had then been executed by such tenant in tail, or the person who would have been entitled to his estate tail if such assurance had not been executed, would, without the consent of any other person, have operated to bar such estate or estates as aforesaid, then, at the expiration of such period of twelve years, such assurance shall be and be deemed to have been effectual as against any person claiming any estate, interest, or right to take effect after or in defeasance of such estate tail.

7. Mortgagor to be barred at end of twelve years from the time when the mortgagee took possession or from the last written acknowledgment.—When a mortgagee shall have obtained the possession or receipt of the profits of any land or the receipt of any rent comprised in his mortgage, the mortgagor, or any person claiming through him, shall not bring a suit to redeem the mortgage but within twelve years next after the time at which the mortgagee obtained such possession or receipt, unless in the meantime an acknowledgment in writing of the title of the mortgagor, or of his right to redemption, shall have been given to the mortgagor or some person claiming his estate, or to the agent of such mortgagor or person, signed by the mortgagee or the person claiming through him; and in such case no such suit shall be brought but within twelve years next after the time at which such acknowledgment, or the last of such acknowledgments, if more than one, was given; and when there shall be more than one mortgagor, or more than one person claiming through the mortgagor or mortgagors, such acknowledgment, if given to any of such mortgagors or persons, or his or their agents, shall be as effectual as if the same had been given to all such mortgagors or persons; but where there shall be more than one mortgagee, or more than one person claiming the estate or interest of the mortgagee or mortgagees, such acknowledgment, signed by one or more of such mortgagees or persons, shall be effectual only as against the party or parties signing as aforesaid, and the person or persons claiming any part of the mortgage money or land or rent by, from, or under him or them, and any person or persons entitled to any estate or estates, interest or interests, to take effect after or in defeasance of his or their estate or estates, interest or interests, and shall not operate to give to the mortgagor or mortgagors a right to redeem the mortgage as against the person or persons entitled to any other undivided or divided part of the money or land or rent; and where such of the mortgagees or persons aforesaid as shall have given such acknowledgment shall be entitled to a divided part of the land or rent comprised in the mortgage, or some estate or interest therein, and not to any ascertained part of the mortgage money, the mortgagor or mortgagors shall be entitled to redeem the same divided part of the land or rent on payment, with interest, of the part of the mortgage money which shall bear the same proportion to the whole of the mortgage money as the value of such divided part of the land or rent shall bear to the value of the whole of the land or rent comprised in the mortgage.

8. Money charged upon land and legacies to be deemed satisfied at the end of ten years if no interest paid nor acknowledgment given in writing in the meantime.—No action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twelve years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the meantime some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable, or his agent, to the person entitled thereto, or his agent; and in such case no such action or suit or proceeding shall be brought but within twelve years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments or acknowledgments if more than one, was given.

9. Act to be read with 3 & 4 W. 4 c. 27, of which certain parts are repealed, and other parts to be read in reference to alteration by this Act—7 W. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 28 to be read with this Act.—From and after the commencement of this Act all the provisions of the Act passed in the session of the third and fourth years of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, chapter twenty-seven, except those contained in the several sections thereof next hereinafter mentioned, shall remain in full force, and shall be construed together with this Act, and shall take effect as if the provisions hereinbefore contained were substituted in such Act for the provisions contained in the sections thereof numbered two, five, sixteen, seventeen, twenty-three, twenty-eight, and forty respectively (which several sections, from and after the commencement of this Act, shall be repealed), and as if the term of six years had been mentioned, instead of the term of ten years, in the section of the said Act numbered eighteen, and the period of twelve years had been mentioned in the said section eighteen instead of the period of twenty years; and the provisions of the Act passed in the session of the seventh year of the reign of His late Majesty King William the Fourth, and the first year of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter twenty-eight, shall remain in full force, and be construed together with this Act, as if the period of twelve years had been therein mentioned instead of the period of twenty years.

10. Time for recovering charges and arrears of interest not to be enlarged by express trusts for raising same.—After the commencement of this Act no action, suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money or legacy charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, and secured by an express trust of a term of years or other estate, or to recover any arrears of rent, or of interest in respect of any sum of money or legacy so charged or payable and so secured, or any damages in respect of such arrears, except within the time which would be limited by law for the recovery thereof, if there were not any such trust.

11. Short title.—This Act may be cited as the "Real Property Limitation Act 1873."

12. Commencement of Act.—This Act shall commence and come into operation on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

LAND TITLES AND TRANSFER BILL.

A Bill intituled an Act to simplify Titles and facilitate the Transfer of Land:

WHEREAS it is expedient to make further provision for the simplification of the title to land, and for facilitating the transfer of land in England:

"Oath" and "affidavit" shall include solemn affirmation and statutory declaration:

"Deed" or "instrument" shall include a private Act of Parliament.

PART I.—Registration of Fee Simple Estates.

5. Where to apply for Registration.—From and after the commencement of this Act any of the following persons (that is to say),

(1) Any person who has contracted to buy an estate in fee simple in land, whether subject or not to any prior estate for life or for years, or to any incumbrance:

(2) Any person enttiled for his own benefit at law or in equity to an estate tail, or to a base fee, or to an estate in fee simple in land, whether subject or not to any prior estate for life or for years, or to any incumbrance:

(3) Any person capable, either alone, or with, upon, or by the consent, request, or direction of another person, of disposing by way of absolute sale of an estate in fee simple in land, whether subject or not to any prior estate for life or for years, or to any incumbrance:

(4) Any person being registered proprietor of any land in respect whereof any land shall have been allotted under any enclosure, or for which other land shall have been allotted or given in exchange upon any enclosure, or by an order of the Enclosure Commissioners for England and Wales:

(5) Any person authorised by the court to make such application, or whose name the court shall have directed to be entered on the register as registered proprietor:

(6) In the case of sales taking place three years after the commencement of this Act, the person hereinafter in that behalf mentioned:

may apply to the registrar to be registered as proprietor of the land which he has contracted to buy, or to which he is entitled, or of which he is capable of disposing, or which has been allotted, or given in exchange, as aforesaid: Provided,

(a) That, in the case of a purchaser under a contract, not executed by conveyance, the vendor's consent in writing to the application be produced to the registrar:

(b) That no person having an estate in tail, or a base fee, and who cannot dispose of an estate in fee simple without the consent of a protector of the settlement, shall be entitled to be registered without the consent in writing of such protector:

(c) That in cases where the applicant is a trustee without a power of sale, or cannot dispose of the land without the consent, request, or direction of some other person, the person for whom he is a trustee, or whose consent, request, or direction is required, concurs in or consents in writing to the application, or the instrument declaring the trust, or an instrument signed by the person whose concurrence would otherwise be necessary, authorises the application:

(d) That no applicant having a power of sale only, without any estate of inheritance in the land, shall be entitled to be registered without the consent in writing of all persons, down to and including the person entitled to the first vested estate of inheritance, whose estates would be displaced by an exercise of the power, unless the settlement authorises the application:

(e) That a mortgagee shall not be entitled to be registered as proprietor without the consent in writing of the mortgagor unless the mortgage be executed after the commencement of this Act, and does not contain a provision that there shall not be such registration.

6. Registration may be with title absolute or limited, or as proprietor only.—Any such application, may be made, at the option of the applicant either for registration as proprietor with an absolute title, that is to say, a title good, without any other exception or reservation than those expressly mentioned on the register, or in this Act, or as proprietor with a limited title, that is to say, as good from a date to be mentioned on the register, which date shall in such case be taken as the commencement of the registered title for the purposes of this Act, or for registration as proprietor only, that is to say, without a title, either absolute or limited, in which case the date at which the land shall be registered pursuant to such application shall be taken as the commencement of the registered title for the purposes of this Act. If on any application for registration with an absolute or limited title the registrar shall be satisfied with the title, so as to register the applicant pursuant to his application, he shall register him accordingly; but if he shall not be so satisfied, he shall register him as proprietor only. If, however, the registrar, on an application for registration with an absolute title, shall be satisfied with the title as a limited title, or if the registrar, on an application for registration with a limited title, shall be satisfied with the title as from a more recent date than that applied for, he shall, upon the request of the applicant, register him as proprietor from the date with which the registrar shall be satisfied, instead of registering him as proprietor only. But nothing in this section contained shall entitle any person to be registered as proprietor only, unless entitled, as hereinafter appearing, to be so registered.

7. Particulars and statements to be furnished by all applicants, and to be settled by the registrar subject to appeal to the court.—Every applicant for registration shall furnish to the registrar, and the registrar shall examine and settle, for the purposes of registration:—

First. A correct description of the land to be registered, accompanied (except in the case of incorporeal hereditaments) by a map or plan thereof, and which description may be made by reference to such map or plan.

Secondly. A statement of the persons, or classes or descriptions of persons, who are or may become entitled to such land, and of the estates, powers, and interests which exist, or which may arise or become vested in such persons respectively.

Thirdly. A statement of the mortgages, charges, and incumbrances affecting such lands, or any part thereof.

Copies of such description and statements, when settled by the registrar, shall be delivered back to the applicant; any objection to the same, or to any part thereof, shall be made and proceeded with within such time and in such manner as the registrar shall direct, and the registrar shall decide on every such objection, subject to an appeal by the applicant, if the same be disallowed, to the court.

8. Registrar may require same to be verified on oath.—If required by the registrar, the description of the land furnished by the applicant, and any other particulars which the registrar may deem necessary, shall be verified by oath of the applicant or of persons having sufficient means of information.

9. What the registrar is to be satisfied of on application for registration as proprietor only.—Before an applicant for registration as proprietor only shall be so registered the registrar shall satisfy himself, by such evidence as he may think requisite, that the applicant is prima facie entitled to the land for the estate and interest claimed by him, and that the applicant, or some person entitled to a prior estate under the same common title is by himself, or by some person for whom he is a trustee, or that some incumbrancer upon the estate and interest so claimed, or upon such prior estate, is in possession or receipt of the profits of such land: Provided that, in cases of compulsory registration under the provision in that behalf hereinafter contained, the registrar shall be satisfied with and proceed upon the deed or instrument of conveyance,

10. Power to registrar to demand security for costs, and registrar and court may order applicant to pay same.—The registrar, before taking any proceeding on an application for registration with title absolute or limited, may require the applicant to give such security for costs as general orders shall direct; and it shall be lawful for the registrar and the court respectively to order the costs and expenses properly incurred of any person properly appearing upon any proceeding taken under this Act for the purpose of such registration to be paid by the applicant.

11. Further particulars to be furnished to registrar by applicant for absolute and limited titles.—Every application for registration with an absolute or limited title shall be accompanied by an abstract of the title of the applicant, and by such evidence as general orders may require, including (in all cases) such evidence as may prove, to the satisfaction of the registrar, that the applicant or his predecessor in title, or some person or person entitled to some estates or estate under the same common title has or have been in possession or in receipt of the profits of the land for a period of not less than five years immediately prior to the date of the application.

12. As to mines and minerals in case of applicants for absolute and limited titles and registration as proprietor only.—In the case of an application for registration with an absolute or limited title, mines and minerals shall be deemed not to be included in the application, unless expressly mentioned, and then shall be deemed to be included so far only as they shall be expressly mentioned therein; and if so expressly mentioned it shall be the duty of the registrar to have especial regard thereto in all subsequent inquiries to be made by him with respect to the land and in the investigation of the title thereto, and also in the service of notices as hereinafter mentioned, and the registrar shall specifically include in the register the mines and minerals included in the application if (but only to such extent as) he shall be satisfied with the title deduced thereto, registering the applicant as proprietor with an absolute title or a limited title as the case may be. Registration as proprietor only shall not include mines or minerals unless so stated on the register, but may include the same if such mines and minerals are expressly claimed by the applicant, and if (as regards opened mines) the evidence of possession and title or the deed or instrument of conveyance produced to the registrar in support of the application is in accordance with such claim, and if (as regards unopened mines) nothing appears inconsistent therewith. Registration may be effected of mines and minerals without the surface in like manner as of the surface with mines and minerals.

13. Registration not to be binding as regards boundaries on proprietors of adjoining land.—The registrar shall, as far as by means of the documents before him or otherwise he is enabled so to do, ascertain and state boundaries, but the persons interested in the adjoining land shall not be bound by the boundaries stated on the register.

14. Examination of title, in cases of registration with absolute or limited title.—Upon receiving any application for registration with an absolute or limited title, the title shall be examined by the registrar, and by one of the examiners of title hereinafter mentioned, in such manner as general orders shall direct. The registrar may at any time up to the registration require any further particulars to be furnished which he may deem necessary, and he may also require the identity of the land with the parcels or descriptions contained in the title deeds, and the accuracy of the description and quantities of the land, to be established by such inquiries and other evidence as he shall think sufficient for that purpose.

15. Security may be taken against contingent or uncertain claims.—If, upon an application for registration with an absolute or limited title, it shall appear upon the examination of the title that the land, or any part of it, is subject to any money charge or incumbrance, the ownership of which is not ascertained, or the right to which is doubtful or uncertain, or to any doubtful or uncertain right or claim which may be estimated in or compensated by money, and does not involve a right to the land itself otherwise than as a security for money, the case may, at the request of the applicant for registration be referred to the court, for the purpose of determining whether such right or claim, and the costs of any party entitled by virtue thereof can be justly provided for by the payment of money into court, and if so to fix the sum to be so paid in, and to order payment thereof accordingly, and to direct the investment and application of the interest thereof, and after such payment shall have been made, the land and the title thereto shall, upon the registration of such land with a title certified as absolute, or certified as limited with a commencement prior to such right, claim, charge, or incumbrance, be discharged from such right, claim, charge, or incumbrance as fully as if the same had never existed.

16. Titles not strictly marketable may be registered in certain cases with the court's sanction.—Forty years substituted for sixty years as the ordinary commencement of title.—The registrar may accept recitals of facts &c., twenty years old as sufficient evidence.—If the registrar shall, upon completion of the examination of the title, be of opinion that the title shown is, by reason of the loss of a covenant to produce a deed or instrument or deeds or instruments, or the want of such a covenant, or the possibility of a woman of advanced age having a child, or for some similar reason, not strictly marketable, but is nevertheless a title, the holding under which will not be disturbed, he may require the applicant to apply to the court upon a statement to be submitted to and approved of and signed by the registrar for its sanction to the registration, and in case of such sanction being given by the court, but not otherwise, the registrar shall register the applicant as proprietor, with an absolute or limited title, as the case may be; and the registrar shall not in examining into a title, require it to commence earlier than at least forty years previously to the time of registration unless he shall be of opinion that there is reason to suppose that some settlement or will prior to that period may have been executed which might prejudicially affect the title; and the registrar may also accept as sufficient evidence recitals, statements, and descriptions of facts, matters and parties in deeds, instruments or statutory declarations twenty years old.

17. Notice by advertisement of application for registration absolute or limited.—Notice of every application for registration with a title absolute or limited shall be given by the registrar by public advertisement, when and in such manner as general orders shall direct, and the registration shall not be completed until the expiration of a period not less than three months from the date of publication of the advertisement, or the first of the advertisements (if more than one), or such other time, if any, as may be by general order prescribed in that behalf.

18. Contents of such notice and other notices required.—Such notice shall contain a description of the land proposed to be registered, and the name and description of the applicant for registration, and a statement of the effect of the proposed registration, as excluding claims adverse to the title of the applicant, and shall state the place, time, and manner at and in which any person may be heard to show cause against the registration. A copy of such notice shall be posted on or near the land or otherwise, as the registrar may direct. Copies of such notice shall be served on such persons (if any) as, under the circumstances of the case, the registrar shall consider necessary, and shall direct to be served therewith.

19. Cause may be shown against registration. Either party may appeal from the registrar's decision.—At the time and place mentioned in the notice, or at such time and place as general orders shall direct, any person may, by himself, or his solicitor or agent, attend and show cause before the registrar, by affidavit or otherwise, against the registration, or may claim that the same be made subject to any limitation, condition, qualification, or reservation, and such hearing may be adjourned from time to time by the registrar. The registrar shall decide on such objection or claim, and either party may appeal to the court, from the registrar's decision.

20. Completion of registration.—If at the expiration of the time mentioned in the notice or directed by general orders there shall be no objection to the registration applied for, or none which has not been disallowed, and there shall be no such claim as aforesaid undisposed of, and no appeal shall be pending, or if, after the expiration of such time, every objection, if any, shall have been disallowed, and every claim, if any, shall have been disposed of, and any appeal shall have been finally disallowed by the court or withdrawn, and the time for appealing from the decision of the court shall have determined, or the appeal, if any, shall have been disallowed or withdrawn, the registrar shall complete the registration; but if the application be made after contract, and before conveyance, actual registration shall as hereinafter provided be postponed until after the conveyance.

21. Before registration, with title absolute or limited, applicant and solicitor, &c., to make oath that all deeds, &c., have been made known to registrar.—Before registration with title absolute or limited the applicant and his solicitor or agent, or certificated conveyancer, and such other person or persons, if any, as the registrar shall require, shall make affidavit that all deeds, wills, and writings relating to the title of the land, or any part thereof, and all facts material to the title thereto, and all charges, liens, incumbrances, contracts, and dealings affecting the same or any part thereof, or giving any right as against the applicant, have to the full extent of their respective knowledge, information, and belief been made known to the registrar; and such affidavit shall be filed in the office of land registry: Provided always, that the registrar may dispense with such affidavit, either from the applicant or from any other person, when he shall think it reasonable so to do, or may permit the terms thereof to be modified, as circumstances may require.

22. Registrar may dispense with notices, &c., as to allotments and lands taken in exchange.—Provided always, that in case of an application by a registered proprietor for registration as to land allotted on an enclosure, or taken in exchange upon an enclosure or under an order of exchange of the Enclosure Commissioners of England or Wales, the registrar may, so far as he shall think can properly be done, dispense with the notices, advertisements and preliminary proceedings before-mentioned, and may complete the registration as soon as he shall consider it can properly be done.

23. Mode of entering registration in every case.—Upon every registration under this Act, the registrar shall enter in a book to be called the "land register," the name of the proprietor and a description of the land with a reference, when necessary or convenient, to a map or plan thereof, and if the registration be with a title absolute or limited, he shall state thereon whether it is absolute or limited, and, if limited, what is the limit, and, whether absolute or limited, the particulars of all prior estates, leases, and incumbrances (other than such interests as are declared by this Act not to be incumbrances) to which the land or any part thereof is subject; but no trust, express, implied or constructive, shall be entered or referred to in the "land register," nor shall it be shown that the proprietor is mortgagee or has a security only.

24. Land, if subject to conditions, &c., to be so registered.—If land at the time of the registration of the first registered proprietor thereof shall be subject to a power of re-entry or shifting clause, or any restriction as to the user thereof or any legal condition, notice thereof shall be entered on the register.

25. Entry of cesser of estate, lease, or incumbrance.—When there shall be entered on the part of the register, in which the name of the proprietor for the time being of any land is entered, the particulars or notice of any estate, lease, or incumbrance affecting such land, and it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the registrar by the registered proprietor of such land, or by some person whose interest in such land shall in the opinion of the registrar be sufficiently established, that such estate, lease or incumbrance has ceased or been satisfied, the registrar shall note such cesser or satisfaction upon the register, and such estate, lease, or incumbrance shall no longer exist in or affect such land, and such other estates and interest shall exist in and affect such land as would have done so had such estate, lease, or incumbrance, and such particulars and notice, never existed. But the registrar may, before acting as aforesaid. give such notice (if any) as he may consider ought under the circumstances properly to be given, and shall give such (if any) notice as by any general order may be directed to be given.

26. Proprietors registered with limited titles, or as proprietors only, may apply afterwards for registration with absolute or titles less limited, or with limited titles.—In every case in which there shall have been a registration of land with a limited title, or in the name of any person as proprietor only, the registered proprietor may at any time afterwards apply as aforesaid to the registrar for registration with an absolute title, or a limited title, or with a title limited as of an earlier date than that entered in the register; and upon any such application being made the registrar shall proceed as nearly as may be in the same manner as if such lands had not been registered, save that he may dispense with such proceedings (if any) as, having regard to what was done with a view to the previous registration, he shall consider may properly be dispensed with, and may complete the registration so soon as he shall consider it can properly be done, and save that the register shall be conclusive as to the deduction of the registered title to such land from the proprietor first registered.

27. As to land being registered pendente lite.—If upon proceeding before the registrar for registration it shall appear that the title to such land or to any estate or interest therein is in question in any proceeding in any court, the registrar shall, if he shall consider it proper, defer the completion of the registration, unless all parties to such proceeding who claim any estate or interest in such land shall consent to the registration, or unless the court before which such proceeding may be depending shall think fit to sanction the registration; but the registrar may, if he consider it proper, proceed with the registration, entering on the register notice of such proceeding, in which case person claiming title under the registered proprietor shall, unless and until the registrar shall have entered on the register that the lis pendens has ceased, take subject to such proceeding and the result thereof.

28. Compulsory registration on sales after three years from commencement of Act.—When, after the expiration of three years from the commencement of this Act there shall be a sale of land in fee simple in possession, or subject to any prior estate for life or for years, and whether subject or not to any incumbrance, there not being already a registered proprietor, and the purchaser might apply for registration under this Act, some person shall be registered under this Act as proprietor thereof, with absolute or limited title, or as proprietor only, and any deed or instrument of conveyance of such land shall, until such registration, operate in equity only, and not be effectual at law to pass the legal estate in the land. This enactment shall comprise the sale of land out of which there is upon such sale made payable a perpetual rent, and shall also comprise the sale of an existing perpetual rent, and the sale, whether the vendor be or be not registered proprietor of the land, of a perpetual rent created upon such sale; and, if the vendor of any such rent be already such registered proprietor, shall apply although the said three years shall not have elapsed. The application for registration shall be made by some person interested, beneficially or otherwise, under such deed or instrument, and the registrar shall register as proprietor or proprietors the person or persons who may be expressly specified in such deed or instrument as to be the registered proprietor or proprietors; if no person be so specified in that behalf, then he shall register as proprietor or proprietors such person or persons entitled under such deed or instrument as is and are hereunder mentioned, that is to say:—

The persons entitled to such fee simple and perpetual rent respectively beneficially in possession and not for successive estates.

In case of there being persons entitled to such fee simple and perpetual rent respectively beneficially in succession, the person or persons, if any, in whom, were registration not required, the land or rent would be by such deed or instrument vested in fee as trustee or trustees, and if there shall be no such person, the person or persons having the first beneficial freehold estate under such deed or instrument, or at his or their request, any person or persons having a power of sale, whether with or without consent, request, or direction, over such land or perpetual rent.

Should the registrar consider any case not to be hereinbefore provided for, or that it is open to question who should be registered as proprietor, then such person or persons as the registrar shall consider and determine to be the most fit and proper person or persons under the circumstances, shall be registered as proprietor or proprietors.

Caveat against Entry on Register.

29. Caveats may be lodged with registrar, to the effect that cautioner is entitled to notice.—Any person having or claiming such an interest in land, before the registration thereof, as entitles him to object to any disposition thereof being made without his consent, may lodge a caveat with the registrar claiming to be entitled to notice of any application that may be made for registration of such land, with absolute or limited title, and appointing a place within Great Britain for the service of such notice.

30. Caveat to be supported by affidavit.—Every such caveat shall be supported by an affidavit, stating the nature of the interest of the cautioner, and such other matters as may be required by the registrar, or by general orders.

31. How notice to be served.—Notice may be served on the cautioner either personally or by sending it through the post to the address stated in the caveat.

32. After caveat, no registration to be made of lands till five days after personal service, or ten days after notice by post.—After any such caveat has been lodged no registration shall be made of any lands to which such caveat refers until notice has been served on the cautioner to appear and oppose such registration, and five days have expired since and exclusive of the date of the personal service of such notice, or ten days have expired since and exclusive of the date of posting, or until such other times as may be prescribed by general orders.

33. Compensation if caveat lodged without reasonable cause.—If any person wrongfully and without reasonable cause lodges a caveat with the registrar, he shall be liable to make to any person who may have sustained damage by the lodging of such caveat, such compensation as the court shall deem just.

34. Caveat not to prejudice title of any person.—A caveat so lodged shall not prejudice the claim or title of any person, and shall have no effect whatever, except to entitle the cautioner to receive such notice as is hereinbefore mentioned of any application for registration.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

THE Bills of Sale Act (1854) Amendment Bill, prepared and carried into the House of Commons by Mr. Lopes, Q.C., Mr. Watkin Williams, Q.C., and Mr. C. E. Lewis, solicitor, certainly promises to work a beneficial reform in reference to mortgage transactions in connection with personal chattels. We reproduce in another column the substance of this proposed measure. The Bill has not yet been read a second time; there is, therefore, yet time for solicitors to offer, through the medium of our columns, any suggestions which their experience may point to with a view to improving on the measure, the main provisions of which for the present are to put a stop to the fraudulent system by which a fresh bill of sale in relation to the same transaction is prepared every twentieth day from the date of the preceding bill of sale in order to avoid registration. Another provision that mortgages effected instead of bills of sale are to be rendered null and void where the only object in preparing documents in such form is to escape the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act. There appears to us to be two omissions in this measure—one that no reference is made in it to the Bills of Sale Amendment Act 29 & 30 Vict. c. 96, as to which we think it should be provided that that Act, together with the original statute and the present measure, should be construed as one Act. Another omission seems to be that the statement as set out in the schedule to the Bill with which we are now dealing is not to be verified by affidavit, neither does it appear that a copy of the mortgage, security, or charge referred to in the third section is to be filed in the Queen's Bench office, or that the original document is to be produced.

COMPLAINTS reach us from solicitors at Torquay that a practice obtains by attorneys, who do not take out annual certificates, of swearing affidavits and taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, &c., for which they receive the usual fees. This is, of course, very unfair towards certificated solicitors, and it is suggested that one of the two measures now before Parliament affecting solicitors should deal with this matter by the insertion of a clause to the effect that no attorney-at-law or solicitor shall, after the passing of this Act, be entitled to administer any oath or take any affidavit in relation to any business in any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts or otherwise, or take any declaration, or take the acknowledgment of any married woman to any deed, unless such attorney-at-law or solicitor shall, at the time of administering such an oath, or taking such an affidavit or declaration as aforesaid, be duly certificated. One objection to be urged against such a provision is that there may be localities in which it is convenient to the public that uncertificated solicitors should administer such oaths, &c., but this difficulty might be overcome by its being enacted that uncertificated attorneys might administer such oaths, &c., with the consent of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, sufficient cause for the exercise of such a privilege being first shown.

INQUIRIES have been made of us as to with whom the Bill intituled "An Act to amend the Law relating to Attorneys and Solicitors" originated. It was presented by Lord Chelmsford in the House of Lords, and will shortly come on for consideration in the House of Commons. We believe we are correct in stating that this measure owes its origin to the Vice-President of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society. As to the provisions affecting articled clerks, there can be but one opinion, and that is, that it will be most acceptable to the Profession, although care must be taken that articled clerks will not be allowed too great a latitude or obtain too general an order as provided by the measure. As to those clauses which relate to the subject of striking the names of solicitors off the roll, they will, we are afraid, create a considerable diversity of opinion. It has long been urged at times, no doubt with unnecessary bitterness, that the council has always shown an especial readiness to move with a view to striking off the roll the names of brethren of our Profession, while they have left undealt with those invaders of the Profession to whom, some contend, may be traced the cause of those transactions on the part of attorneys which will not bear the light of day. The Attorneys and Solicitors' Bill, it must be understood, is quite distinct from the Legal Practitioners' Bill. The former proposes legislation affecting articled clerks and in relation to striking the names of attorneys off the roll, the latter proposes by legislation to protect the Profession against the encroachments of unqualified persons. In our opinion it will prove an excellent illustration of that kind of legislative bungling which of late years the public have been so often pained by witnessing, if these two measures become law in one and the same session of Parliament. Not only may all the provisions to which we refer be fairly comprised in one Act of Parliament, but the measure might with propriety also embrace enactments securing other necessary reforms in relation to the Profession. It is to be hoped that those solicitors who are Members of the House of Commons will take carefully into consideration our suggestion that one Act is sufficient to deal with all the subjects above referred to in addition to others indicated by the Correspondence of the Profession, as published in our columns. If, however, we are to have two Acts of Parliament dealing with these simple but important matters, it is of course, quite open for the promoters of each to seek to obtain amendments and additions to both measures.

WE understand that the principal terms of the provisional arrangement on the amalgamation of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association with the Incorporated Law Society are that members of the former society who are not already members of the Incorporated Law Society are to be entitled to be admitted members of the latter society upon payment of the annual subscription, only, that is without any entrance fee. This arrangement, however, so far as the Incorporated Law Society is concerned, will not be operative until confirmed by the society in general meeting. We hope soon to hear that such a meeting is convened, an occasion of which members may well avail themselves in order to obtain the opinion of the society on other questions which have been much discussed of late in our columns. Amongst other things it is desirable that the opinion of the society should be taken as to whether pecuniary or what other support should be given by the society to the movement lately set on foot by the Legal Practitioners' Society to protect the Profession against the encroachments of unqualified persons, which movement we have felt it our duty to promote to the utmost, nor can we think that any serious opposition is likely to be offered to it in any quarter. Members of the medical profession long since devised means by which, through the agency of Parliament, they have ceased to be molested by quacks and such like characters, who by their malpractices work much harm amongst the public, and in some degree threatened to endanger that profession. Surely the legal profession is not without the means of doing likewise.

THE following, we believe, will be found a correct table of the statutes affecting solicitors:—6 & 7 V. c. 73; 14 & 15 V. c. 88; am., 23 & 24 V. c. 127. (I.) 29 & 30 V. c. 84. 7 & 8 V. c. 86. 7 & 8 V. c. 101, ss. 39-68; 9 & 10 V. c. 95, s. 91; 11 & 12 V. c. 43, s. 12; 14 & 15 V. c. 88; 15 & 16 V. c. 54, s. 10; 20 & 21 V. c. 39 (colonies); 20 & 21 V. c. 77; 21 & 22 V. c. 108 (probate); 22 & 23 V. c. 6 (admiralty); 35 & 36 V. c. 81; 33 & 34 V. c. 28 (remuneration); 33 & 34 V. cc. 97, 98, and 99.

A CORRESPONDENT, in a communication lately published in our columns, called attention to the fact that a very considerable proportion of the expense of dealing with real property, arises from the excessive stamp duty charged upon such transactions, and which duties at times amount to hundreds of pounds, in which case, of course, the solicitor's bill of costs shows a somewhat alarming total, the more alarming because these documents (to which we are so accustomed, and to be rid of the necessity of making out which, would be as acceptable to us as to the public), are seldom examined by the client to ascertain what portion of it consists of disbursements. We really thoroughly agree with our correspondent that one of the "serious obstacles to dealing with real property," observed upon by the Lord Chancellor when introducing into the House of Lords the present Land Transfer Bill, is the heavy stamp duty payable on conveyances. It is certainly difficult to discover the reason why the rate of duty in the case of conveyances should be so large in excess of that charge on mortgage transactions, and we hope that when the Lord Chancellor's measure comes down to the House of Commons, that the heavy impost in the shape of stamp duty charged in connection with the preparation of all documents affecting land, will not be lost sight of.

WE are asked to publish the following by a country solicitor with a view to their being incorporated in one or other of the bills now before Parliament affecting solicitors:

No affidavit or declaration whatever, or any acknowledgment by any married woman to any deed whatever, after the passing of this Act, shall be sworn to, or declared to, or be taken or acknowledged, before any attorney-at-law or solicitor, unless the name of such attorney-at-law or solicitor shall appear in the Law List for the same year in which such affidavit, or declaration, or acknowledgment was sworn to, declared to, or acknowledged.

No articled clerk or other person shall apply to be admitted as an attorney, or be admitted or practise as an attorney-at-law or solicitor in England, if he has been previously convicted of larceny or felony in any court of law in England.

THE following lectures and classes are appointed for the ensuing week at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, for the instruction of students seeking admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors: Monday, class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock, Equity; Tuesday, class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock, Equity; Wednesday, class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock, Equity; Friday, lecture, 6 to 7 o'clock, Equity. To prevent interruption at the lectures, subscribers are not admitted to the hall after a lecture has commenced.

JUDICATURE COMMISSION.—THIRD REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

THIRD REPORT.

To the Queen's most Excellent Majesty.

WE your Majesty's Commissioners, whose hands and seals are hereunto set, appointed by your Majesty, under Royal warrants annexed, to inquire (inter alia) whether it would be for the public advantage to establish tribunals of commerce for the cognizance of disputes relating to commercial transactions, or to any and what classes of such transactions, and if so, in what manner and with what jurisdiction, such tribunals ought to be constituted, and in what relations, if any, they ought to stand to the courts of ordinary civil jurisdiction, or any of them, do most humbly submit for your Majesty's most gracious consideration this our report upon the matter thus referred to us, which being connected with the subject of our second report already presented, we have thought it expedient to take into consideration before proceeding further with the other matters therein reserved.

Immediately on receiving your Majesty's commands, we proceeded to consider the best mode of obtaining information respecting the constitution and working of Tribunals of Commerce on the Continent, where such tribunals are established, and for this purpose we issued a series of questions addressed, through your Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to consuls, bankers, merchants, and members of the legal profession, and we also circulated extensively another series of questions among leading mercantile firms and associations in this country in order to ascertain their views upon the expediency of establishing these tribunals in England. Having obtained a considerable number of answers to these questions, we communicated with the gentlemen promoting legislation on the subject, and afterwards examined several of them, as well as other witnesses. We have had laid before us the respective reports of the select committees of the House of Commons of the 12th July 1858, and of the 3rd Aug. 1871, on Tribunals of Commerce, together with the evidence taken before those committees, and also two Parliamentary Bills, the one intituled "A Bill for establishing a Tribunal of Commerce for the City of London," and the other "A Bill to provide for the constitution of Tribunals of Commerce," which were introduced into the House of Commons during the last session of Parliament. The questions we issued, the most important of the answers we have received, and the evidence we have taken, are contained in the appendix which accompanies our report.

Having carefully considered the subject, together with the evidence and papers previously mentioned, we have come to the following conclusions:—

We find that those by whom legislation on this subject has been promoted (although generally desiring that some provision should be made for more summary proceedings in many commercial cases), are not agreed as to the character of the tribunals which they wish to establish or the class of cases that should come within their cognizance. Indeed there is no unanimity of opinion as to whether the judges should be wholly commercial, or partly commercial and partly legal; whether the commercial members of the tribunals should be judges having an equal voice in the decision, or assessors or advisers only to a legal judge, who would in that case be the president of the court; whether the commercial members should be paid or not paid for their services; whether the tribunals should observe the ordinary rules of evidence, or be at liberty to admit anything as evidence which they may consider material to the point in issue; whether they should be guided by the principles laid down by the superior courts of law, or decide irrespectively of precedent and according to their own views of what is just or proper in each particular case; whether the parties should be allowed to be represented by counsel or solicitors, whether there should be any appeal, and in what cases, and to what courts. Upon all these points there appears to be the greatest diversity of opinion.

We find moreover that, even in the countries in which tribunals of commerce are established, great diversity exists with regard to the constitution of these courts. Thus in France, in Belgium, and in some other countries, all the members of the court are merchants, except the greffier or registrar, and he has technically no voice in the decision. On the other hand, in many of the German states, the court is presided over by a lawyer. In Dantzic the tribunal consists of a legal president, four other legal judges, and four merchants, but the merchant judges do not attend unless required. In Königsberg the commercial members have no vote, only a deliberative voice, the decision resting entirely with the legal members of the court. In Prussia, generally, it is in contemplation to substitute a paid lawyer for an unpaid merchant as president. There is in fact no uniformity in the constitution of these tribunals; in some countries the mercantile, in others the legal element prevails, sometimes in the latter case to the exclusion of the commercial altogether.

We also find that, where the tribunal is composed entirely of mercantile judges, assisted by a greffier, who is a lawyer, the latter, although he has no vote, becomes of necessity the most important member of the court; and thence arises this anomaly, that the person who virtually decides the case is not clothed with the responsibilities of a judge.

Now, we think that it is of the utmost importance to the commercial community that the decisions of the courts of law should on all questions of principle be, as far as possible, uniform, thus affording precedents for the conduct of those engaged in the ordinary transactions of trade. With this view it is essential that the judges by whom commercial cases are determined, should be guided by the recognised rules of law and by the decisions of the superior courts in analogous cases; and only judges who have been trained in the principles and practice of law can be expected to be so guided. We fear that merchants would be too apt to decide questions that might come before them (as some of the witnesses we examined have suggested that they should do) according to their own views of what was just and proper in the particular case, a course which from the uncertainty attending their decisions would inevitably multiply litigation, and with the vast and intricate commercial business of this country would sooner or later lead to great confusion. Commercial questions, we think, ought not to be determined without law, or by men without special legal training. For these reasons, we are of opinion that it is not expedient to establish in this country Tribunals of Commerce, in which commercial men are to be the judges.

But while we are quite agreed that a court presided over by mercantile men, or in which mercantile men have a deciding vote, would lead to confusion and uncertainty in the administration of the law, we are fully alive to the inconveniences that do undoubtedly arise from the want of adequate technical knowledge in the court which has to adjudicate upon cases of a commercial character. We think there is ground for the complaint that cases are sometimes tried at Nisi Prius before a judge and jury who have not the practical knowledge of the trade or business which is necessary for their proper determination. We are of opinion that many cases involving for their comprehension a technical or special knowledge cannot be satisfactorily disposed of by the ordinary tribunal of a judge and jury, and that the proper tribunal for such cases would be a court presided over by a legal judge, assisted by two skilled assessors, who could advise the judge as to any technical or practical matters arising in the course of the inquiry, and who by their mere presence would frequently deter skilled witnesses from giving such professional evidence as is often a scandal to the administration of justice. This is the kind of assistance which we in our first report to your Majesty, contemplated should be given to the superior judges on the trial of cases of a scientific or technical character; and which has been provided for by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act. If the recommendations for the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the County Courts contained in our second report should be adopted by the Legislature, we think it would be expedient that similar assistance should be afforded in mercantile cases to the judges of these courts; and in this manner the principal advantages anticipated by the advocates of Tribunals of Commerce might, we think, be attained.

We are of opinion that there would be no practical difficulty in carrying such an arrangement into effect. We think that there might be for every place of sufficient importance a rota or a panel to be formed from time to time, composed of merchants, shipowners, or others conversant with the trade and business of the district, or other competent persons, from which rota the judge might, at the request of the parties, or, if he thought the circumstances of the case required it, at his discretion, select two persons who should sit with him, and advise him during the progress of the case on any point upon which their special knowledge would be of use. In special cases it might also be competent for the judge to call in the assistance of assessors who are not upon the local rota. But we are strongly of opinion that these mercantile or scientific assessors should not have any voice in the decision, and that the whole responsibility of the decision should rest with the judge.

We think that in cases in which an appeal is allowed there should be power for the judge or court to call in the assistance of like assessors.

Our opinion is that the assessors should be paid for their services in court, but not receiving any other remuneration. We think that for moderate fees the services of gentlemen possessing sufficient knowledge and independence to afford the requisite assistance to the judge could be obtained. Their fees should be costs in the cause.

These provisions, we venture to think, would supply the judge with the requisite practical or technical knowledge to enable him to do justice between the parties. We hope that the Legislature will always provide sufficient judicial strength to obviate the great complaint as to delay, and that under the new judicial system, of which the Judicature Act is the first fruit, effectual rules will be established to meet the other great grievance of expense.

We hope soon to be in a position to lay before Your Majesty our further report upon other matters included in our commission, which have not been already disposed of.

† In signing this report, I am unable to concur in the reasons assigned for deeming it inexpedient to place the mercantile members on a footing of equality with the legal judges of the tribunals proposed to be invested with power to decide commercial cases. The argument that the uniform administration of the law would be impaired has, I believe, been usually urged against proposals for withdrawing causes from the courts at Westminster, and remitting them to inferior tribunals. It was suggested that this evil would arise from the establishment of County Courts, and from the extension of their jurisdiction, but it is proved by experience that no such evil has arisen, nor does it arise from the exercise of the judicial functions of the courts of quarter sessions or petty sessions, or the stipendiary or unpaid magistrates, although their decisions in criminal cases, and in certain civil cases, affect the rights and liabilities of the public in as great a degree as the decisions of tribunals of commerce would affect the commercial community. It appears to me that when a dispute arises in the course of a commercial dealing, the compulsory settlement of it by a tribunal may be regarded as only a continuance or a conclusion of the transaction, and that it is unreasonable to insist that the parties interested shall, as a condition of having their dispute determined, be required, at an enormous cost and inconvenience to themselves, to create a precedent for the benefit of society, and to add a rule of law to a commercial code. I venture to think, that it is not necessary to regard the decisions of particular cases as such precedents, but where parties desire, as now sometimes happens, that a rule of law should be established, regardless of the trouble and expense of litigation, there would be no difficulty in carrying the case from a Tribunal of Commerce to the Supreme Court of Justice for that purpose. I consider that the advantages which would result from placing the legal and commercial elements of the tribunal on an equality, outweigh the objections. The legal judge could exercise sufficient influence over his commercial colleagues to prevent them from acting contrary to settled law, but the sagacity and experience of the commercial men would in general be of more service to the suitors in the decision of their disputes than the legal knowledge of the judge. The advantage of a tribunal of commerce does not, however, consist merely in the constitution of the court, but it is in the mode of procedure. It seems desirable to have a guarded formal and somewhat tardy procedure through legal agents where the judicial power is entrusted to a single state judge, not only for the protection of the suitors against each other, but against any abuse of power on the part of the judge. Nor does the ordinary litigation in these courts require a more summary mode of procedure. But commercial disputes frequently demand a very speedy decision, as well as special treatment whilst under adjudication, such as those arising out of dealings relating to the loading and despatch of vessels, the sale and resale, the warehousing, transfer, and stoppage of goods, the transactions of agents, and of others involving several liabilities. Tribunals of commerce, with the safeguard of mercantile members, are authorised to proceed in the most summary manner to adapt their procedure to the exigencies of each particular case, and to require the personal attendance of the parties who have been engaged in the dealing to afford such explanations as may be requisite, instead of being obliged to wait in order to have every representation to the court, it may be said, filtered, and perhaps mystified, through a single or even double legal agency. It seems to me to be no sufficient answer to the request of the mercantile community, that tribunals which have for so many years shown their usefulness abroad should be introduced into this country, to assert that individuals are not agreed upon the best mode of constituting such tribunals, or of regulating their procedure. The committee of the House of Commons, after considering a variety of opinions, arrived at conclusions indicating how tribunals of commerce might be established, and the commission has in very material points concurred in those conclusions. It may, therefore, be hoped that a measure may be framed which will meet with general acquiescence. ACTON S. AYRTON.

* (1) I have been unable to concur in this report because I am not satisfied that tribunals might not be established consisting of commercial men with adequate legal assistance, capable of settling commercial disputes in a satisfactory manner, at greater speed and at much less cost than at present. And I think the well-known fact that in the large majority of commercial disputes the parties avoid the courts of law and resort to private arbitration is strong to show the need of some such tribunals, and a cogent reason for making the experiment. PENZANCE.

* (2) I am unable to agree in all the recommendations of this report, and therefore do not sign it. I feel very strongly that in a great commercial country like England tribunals can and ought to be established where suitors might obtain a decision on their differences more promptly, and much less expensively, than in the superior courts as at present constituted and regulated. Those who support the present system of trying mercantile disputes seem to regard them all as hostile litigation, and lose sight of the fact that in the majority of cases when differences arise between merchants or traders, both parties would rejoice to obtain a prompt settlement, by a legal tribunal duly constituted, and to continue their friendly commercial relations. The present system too frequently works a denial of justice, or inflicts on the suitor a long-pending worrying law suit, the solicitors on either side pleading in their clients' interests every technical point, and thus engendering a bitterness which destroys all future confidence, and puts an end to further mercantile dealings. It is essential that the procedure of our mercantile courts (whether called tribunals of commerce or by any other name) should be of the simplest and most summary character, similar to that of the tribunals of commerce in Hamburg or in France, or before justices of the peace in this country, as recommended by the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1671. The liberty of the subject is, perhaps, more jealously guarded in this country than property. If the summary jurisdiction conferred on justices of the peace in criminal cases, when exercised by gentlemen who are not lawyers, gives satisfaction, it can scarcely be doubted that a similar jurisdiction in civil cases would be equally acceptable. SYDNEY H. WATERLOW.

BILLS OF SALE ACT (1854) AMENDMENT BILL.

WHEREAS the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, does not sufficiently prevent the mischief which it was intended to prevent, and it is desirable more effectually to prevent that mischief and other mischiefs of a like character:

Be it enacted:

1. Interpretation clause.

2. Whenever hereafter a bill of sale is executed in consideration of or to secure a debt, money, or money's worth, and afterwards another bill of sale is executed in consideration of or to secure the same debt, money, or money's worth, or any part thereof, the subsequent bill of sale, so far as regards the property in or right to the possession of any personal chattels comprised in or made subject to the former bill of sale, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes as against the same persons, and to the same extent as the former bill of sale shall, under the provisions of the said Act or of this Act, be null and void, notwithstanding that the requirements of the said Act or of this Act shall be complied with as to the subsequent bill of sale, or the twenty-one days allowed for complying therewith shall not have elapsed; provided that if in endeavouring to comply with the requirements of the said Act or of this Act as to the former bill of sale any error is committed, and the same is committed innocently, by mistake, and without any design to evade the said Act or this Act, a subsequent bill of sale shall not be rendered null and void by this Act, if the same is executed, and the requirements of the said Act or of this Act in respect of the same are duly complied with, within twenty-one days after it shall first come to the knowledge of the person claiming under the bill of sale, or, if there are more than one such person, to the knowledge of one of them, that the requirements of the said Act or of this Act have not been properly complied with.

3. When any mortgage of or security or charge on any personal chattel is hereafter effected without a bill of sale, and the same is of such a character as that it might have been effected by means of a bill of sale, the said mortgage, security, or charge shall, unless the requirements hereafter specified are complied with, be null and void as against the same persons and to the same extent as the bill of sale would have been null and void, if the mortgage, security, or charge had been effected by a bill of sale, and the requirements of the said Act or of this Act had not been complied with in respect of the same; and every such mortgage, security, or charge shall be deemed to be a bill of sale, and the effecting of it shall be deemed to be the execution of a bill of sale within the meaning of those expressions as used in the second section of this Act: Provided always, that this section shall not apply to any mortgage, charge, or security effected by the decree, judgment, or process of any court of law or equity.

The following are the requirements above referred to in the third section:

There shall be filed with the officer acting as clerk of the docquets and judgments in the Court of Queen Bench, within twenty-one days after such mortgage, security, or charge is effected, a statement which substantially shall be in the form and made according to the directions contained in the schedule thereto, which statement shall state—as in schedule.

UNQUALIFIED PRACTITIONERS.—It is a great pity that members of our profession, as a whole do not feel a little more for the honour of the profession, and endeavour to secure all their legitimate business. I fear the lukewarmness of those who are in a position to help their less fortunate brethren, is the chief cause of our misfortunes. Outsiders are easily turned into pirates, if there is no power sufficiently strong to punish. I think the Legal Practitioners' Society may do an immense amount of good, if it only gets fair and active support. The society's motto must be, "Esse quam videri malim," and I think that of "Vox et præterea nihil" would do for its august contemporary in Chancery-lane.

A SOLICITOR OF TEN YEARS' STANDING.

THE REFORM OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION.—I shall certainly join the society which has just been started, for whatever might be said about growling and complaining and dragging our grievances before the public, there are many urgent reforms which need to be dealt with, and if the society is well and properly supported it can do much good in the field of operations which lies before it, and the more unity we have in our profession the stronger will be our action.

A LONDON SOLICITOR.

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS BILL 1874—ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS BILL 1874.—As to the first Bill, I think that in the case of documents under seal the penalty proposed, or at all events some penalty, should attach even in the case of such documents being prepared gratuitously. The difficulty of proving payment is almost insurmountable, although a wholesale business is carried on by agents of all kinds. The medical profession protects itself against quacks. We must certainly do the same in regard to our invaders. As regards the second Bill, I think the provisions as to articled clerks still too stringent. As regards striking attorneys off the Roll, why give power to the registrar to do that which the applicant to the court may be presumed to be unwilling to do? Cannot these two Bills, after amendment, constitute one Act of Parliament? A COUNTRY ATTORNEY.

Carter into the death of Mr. John Hubbard, a solicitor, carrying on business at 15, Walbrook, E.C. On Saturday morning previous deceased was found in a watercloset attached to a bath-room, at his private residence, Worcester Park, with his throat cut, and quite lifeless. Evidence was given to prove that deceased was much depressed on account of the loss of his wife and favourite son, and also on account of his own ill-health, the result of anxiety and overwork. The jury found that deceased committed suicide while in a state of temporary insanity.

ELECTION LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

ELECTION PETITION—AGENCY—EVIDENCE OF—PREVIOUS ELECTION PETITION—TELEGRAMS—To establish agency for which a candidate would be responsible, he must be proved to have, by himself or by his authorised agent, employed the persons whose conduct is impugned, to act on his behalf, to have to some extent put himself in their hands, or made common cause with them for the purpose of promoting the election. Whether the relations so existing were sufficient to make the candidates responsible for their alleged illegal acts is a question of degree; and in order to enable the judge to decide it in the affirmative, the evidence of corrupt practices must establish affirmatively to his reasonable satisfaction that the acts complained of were done. Canvassing openly with the full knowledge of a candidate who does not interfere, but without his express authority, does not constitute a man an agent. The Post-office will not be ordered to produce for inspection telegrams sent by and to candidates and their agents unless strong grounds are shown why the judge should interpose his authority. It is not open to petitioners to show that persons employed by the respondent at the election which in the subject of the inquiry were charged with corrupt practices at a prior election to the knowledge of the respondent, the petition with reference to such prior election having been disposed of without any decision having been arrived at with reference to such charge: (Taunton Election Petition, 30 L. COUNTY COURTS.

BATH COUNTY COURT.

(Before C. F. D. CAILLARD, Esq., Judge.)

RUSSELL v. THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers of passengers—Delay—It is necessary, to render carriers responsible for delay in the running of trains, to show wilful misconduct.

Bartrum represented the plaintiff and Wightman Wood the defendants.

His HONOUR said: The plaintiff in this action seeks to recover from the defendants a sum of 9s. 4d., for breach of contract, by delay of train under the following circumstances: He is a commercial traveller, residing at Bath. On the morning of the 29th Oct. last he took a second-class ticket in the usual way at the defendants' Bath station for Abingdon. According to their time tables for that month, which were put in evidence on his behalf, the train for which he was booked was to start at seven minutes past eight, and to arrive at Swindon at five minutes to nine; and there was another train to leave Swindon at a quarter-past nine, and to be at Didcot at twenty minutes past ten a.m. Then there was again another train to leave Didcot at twenty-five minutes past ten and to be at Abingdon at fifty-five minutes past ten a.m. The plaintiff stated that the passengers for the north stations and Abingdon had to change at Swindon, and that he did so; that the train into which he changed does not go beyond Didcot; that he had often travelled by that train for a great many years; that the usual time at which for some while past he had arrrived at the latter place was twenty minutes past ten in the morning; that, according to his experience, the 10.25 train for Abingdon from Didcot waited for the train due at 10.20 at Didcot, and that he had never before the morning in question missed the 10.25 train. On that morning, however, there was a delay at Swindon in the starting of the train for Didcot. How long that delay was the plaintiff could not exactly tell, but I think it may be inferred it was some noticeable delay. He was informed at Swindon there had been a collision on the line, and he attributed his leaving late to that fact. He stated this in answer to a question from the defendants' counsel. There was, also, a delay in the progress of this train at some station before Wantage, between Swindon and Didcot; and the plaintiff saw that a damaged engine caused the obstruction. In the result the train arrived at Didcot at about 11 o'clock a.m., when he found that the 10.25 train for Abingdon had left. According to the time tables there was then no train for Abingdon until 1 o'clock p.m. Thereupon, having business engagements of an important nature at Abingdon that morning for the house which he represents, he posted thither from Didcot, the distance being seven posting miles. He paid 9s. for the fly and driver and 4d. for a turnpike—the 9s. 4d. sought to be recovered. On cross-examination he admitted most frankly and fairly that he was well acquainted with the paragraph headed "train bills," which is on the cover of the time tables, and to which I shall refer more at length, and he also said he was aware that the train he wished to catch comes from London to Didcot, and goes thence to the north. The ticket issued to the plaintiff had on it the words "Bath to Abingdon, second class, issued subject to the conditions stated on the company's time bills." The paragraph above-mentioned—so far as it is material for the present case—is in these words, "Train Bills. The published train bills of this company are only intended to fix the time at which passengers may be certain to obtain their tickets for any journey from the various stations, it being understood that the train shall not start from them before the appointed time; but the directors give notice that the company do not undertake that the trains shall start or arrive at the time specified in the bills; nor will they be accountable for any loss, inconvenience, or injury, which may arise from delays or detention, unless upon proof that such loss, inconvenience, injury, delay, or detention, arose in consequence of the wilful misconduct of the company's servants." This paragraph or conditional clause is printed on page 100, as well as on the cover of the time tables put in. The plaintiff alone gave evidence on his own behalf, and at the conclusion of his case it was pressed on me, with much ability, by Mr. Wightman Wood, the defendants' counsel, that there should be a nonsuit. It is obvious, that small as is the amount involved in this case, the principles upon which it is to be decided, one way or the other, are of the utmost importance to the railway companies, and to the innumerable travellers by rail; to the companies on account of the enormous cost which would be thrown upon them by the multiplicity of sums of more or less amount, which they would have to pay were they to be made liable in every instance for want of punctuality in their trains, and to travellers if they were to be without redress, and at the absolute mercy of the companies, however the delay might be occasioned, with all its many vexations and injurious consequences. For the plaintiff it was contended that there was a contract to convey him within a reasonable time of the hour named in the time table, and that if the collision at or near Wantage was caused by the negligence of the company's servants, then he ought to recover, but not if by a mere accident. For the defendants it was urged first that, if there was a contract at all it was upon the footing of the paragraph or clause on the cover of the time tables or book, and that, therefore, it was for the plaintiff to show there had been wilful misconduct on the part of the company's servants, but none had been shown. Secondly that there was no contract—the time book being a notice for the convenience of the public, and nothing more. From this latter proposition I entirely dissent. It is contrary to the principles laid down by the authorities bearing on the whole subject before me. With the defendant's first proposition, however, which is in strict accordance with those principles, I as entirely agree. In the absence of any special contract, there would be between travellers and the railway companies, who hold themselves out as carriers of passengers, an implied contract by the companies to convey within a reasonable time. And even supposing the time tables were not actually part of the contract, I think they might fairly be deemed primâ facie evidence of what is reasonable time in the particular instance. Then, further, the company would not be liable for delay arising from inevitable accident, but would be for delay proceeding from the negligence of their servants. But there is a special contract where the ticket issued to the passenger by a company, refers to bills or tables, which, besides indicating the hours of the departure and arrival of the trains, contain a clause for the protection of the company. These hours or times are then directly adopted into the contract, and this is so far in favour of the passenger; but then the protecting clause is also adopted into it, and that is, of course, for the benefit of the company. In the present case, the question whether the passenger had notice of the protecting clause does not arise. He admits that he had. It is well to observe, nevertheless, that his denial of it would have been of no avail. If notice be denied, and the train bills not put in, then where would be the evidence of the contract to convey within a reasonable time with reference to those bills? And if they are put in, then inevitably the clause protecting the company comes in also as part of them. On this point the case of Hurst v. The Great Western Railway Company directly applies, as does that of Von Toll v. The South-Eastern Railway Company, to show that notice would be inferred. It must be borne in mind that the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 does not apply to passengers, so that neither can the reasonableness of the protecting clause be questioned; nor is it necessary that the special contract should be signed by the passenger. The particular clause not only negatives any guarantee or undertaking by the company for the starting or arrival of the trains at the time specified in the bills, but throws upon passengers, and so upon the present plaintiff, in order to fix the company with liability for delay, the proof that it arose from the wilful misconduct of their servants. Thus the question is, has such proof been adduced? To this I am clearly of opinion there can only be a negative answer, and therefore that a nonsuit must be entered. To show want of punctuality is not enough, to show negligence is not enough; nor would the showing of either shift the burden of proof which is upon the plaintiff, who has to establish against the defendants that the delay was occasioned by the wilful misconduct of their servants. Whether, apart from what I hold to be the existing law, this be right, is another matter. If I am wrong in my view of the law, the error can be pointed out by a superior court; but if my opinion be correct, and there be any undue hardship on passengers, then this can be remedied only by legislative interference. The authorities from which my deductions are chiefly drawn are Denton v. The Great Northern Railway Company (25 L. J. 129, Q. B.), Van Toll v. The South Eastern Railway Company (31 L. J. 241, C. P.), Hurst v. The Great Western Railway Company (34 L. J. 264, C. P.), Zunz v. The South Eastern Railway Company (38 L. J. 209, Q. B.), Glenister v. The Great Western Railway Company, decided in the Queen's Bench 11th Nov. 1873, on appeal from the County Court at High Wycombe. My attention has been called to some decisions in the County Courts bearing upon the subject in question, and especially to the well-known case of Forsyth v. The Great Western Railway Company, which are apparently favourable to the plaintiff. I have only to observe that the circumstances in these several cases differ from the circumstances in the present one; and notably (as I was informed by the defendants' counsel) that since the decision in Forsyth v. The Great Western Railway Company the protecting clause in the time-tables of that company has been altered by the insertion of the words "Wilful misconduct."

Nonsuit with costs, accordingly.

Thursday, April 2.

(Before R. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, Esq., Judge.)

GILBERT AND OTHERS v. PICKERING AND ANOTHER.

Friendly societies—Indebted treasurer dying—Liability of executors and sureties.

THE plaintiffs, who are trustees of the court Defence, 938, of the Ancient Order of Foresters, which meets at the Crown inn, Four-Lane-Ends, Tarporley, sued the defendants, who are the executors of the late Mr. Parkinson, formerly the treasurer of the court, for £37 7s. 1d., balance of an account said to be due to them.

Hilton, barrister (instructed by Cawley), appeared for the plaintiffs.

Cartwright for the defendants.

The late Mr. Parkinson acted as treasurer to the court up to the 26th Feb. 1873, when he was indebted to the court in the sum of £83 1s. 1d. After his death the business of the Crown inn was carried on by his widow and his son Enoch Parkinson, and at the first meeting of the club after the death of his father, it was decided to appoint him treasurer on condition that he gave sufficient security. On the 29th March, the widow and son gave an undertaking to be responsible for the £81 1s. 1d. According to the Friendly Societies' Act, however, to make them responsible there should have been a bond and sureties, but instead their undertaking to pay was accepted, and they did pay up to the 21st June, a sum amounting to £43 4s., which reduced the balance in hand to the sum of £37 7s. 1d., the amount claimed. On that date they were applied to for payment, and they refused to pay any more.

Mr. Cawley was then instructed and wrote to them demanding payment, but was refused, and as they had taken no steps to prove the will of the deceased, it was proved on the 28th. They were again applied to for the residue of the money, when one of the executors told the secretary that there was nothing to prove for, and he should not prove it.

Hilton argued that as Mrs. Parkinson and her son were executors de son tort, they had taken upon themselves the liability to pay; and further according to the 23rd section of the Friendly Societies Act, the plaintiffs had a prior claim in the case of a person holding moneys, dying or becoming insolvent.

Thomas Green, of Eaton by Tarporley, proved that after the death of the deceased an agreement was made with the court by Mrs. Parkinson and her son to continue the office, and her word was accepted. On the Saturday prior to the 21st June, they gave notice to resign, and immediately after they refused to pay any more money.

Cross-examined—The deceased entered into a bond, signed by three sureties, but the court did not apply to them because Mrs. Parkinson undertook to pay.

His HONOUR considered the secretary was right in applying to the widow and son of the deceased before applying to the sureties.

Henry Challinor, clerk to Mr. Cawley, proved service of a notice to Mr. John Pickering to pay the money.

Cartwright, on behalf of the legal executors, said they were desirous of having the matter sifted before they could admit a claim of this description. The action was resisted by the creditors of the deceased, who had no sympathy with a society who had conducted their affairs so loosely as to make an arrangement with the executors de son tort at one time and with the legal executors at another.

His HONOUR—What could the parties do if there were no executors appointed under the will? All they could do was to proceed against the effects held by the widow and her son. I think they did the best they could under the circumstances.

Cartwright—That may be.

His HONOUR—What is the use of enlarging on it? Supposing that the will had not been proved. After the appointment of the legal executors, they could not go against the widow and son any longer.

Cartwright then called attention to the fact that the society not only went against the legal executors, but wanted a preference over the other creditors.

His HONOUR said upon this point he was against Mr. Cartwright, who then went on to argue that it was necessary to renew the bond of the treasurer every year, when he was elected.

His HONOUR, upon this, said that the bond was continuous so long as the treasurer held office, which he did till he died.

Cartwright then proceeded to argue that the estate of the deceased was relieved by the action of the widow and son taking upon them the duties of the office.

After a careful summing up, his HONOUR gave a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Tuesday, March 31.

(Before H. J. STONOR, Esq., Judge.)

MADDISON v. BROWN.

9 & 10 Vict. c. 93 (Lord Campbell's) Act—Measure of damages.

Croome for plaintiff.

Smythe for defendant.

His HONOUR.—The plaintiff in the present case (referred to this court from the Court of Exchequer) is the father or administrator of Sarah Maddison, who lost her life through the neglect of the defendant in leaving an excavation or area for a house in course of erection in a highway open and unprotected by any railing or fence. He has sued the defendant under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, commonly called "Lord Campbell's Act," for damages, such action being for the benefit of himself and wife, as parents of the deceased. There was no defence to the action, and the only question was as to the amount of damages. The plaintiff in his particulars claimed £200 for loss of an allowance made by deceased for support of her parents, for loss of goods and wearing apparel (presents received by her parents from time to time), and for funeral and other expenses. It appeared by the evidence that the deceased was a domestic servant, and out of her wages allowed her parents about 10s. a month, say £6 a year, and occasionally made them other presents of goods and wearing apparel. With regard to the allowance it was admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to damages for actual or probable pecuniary loss, but not according to annuity tables, although, after all, such tables must form the only basis of calculation in the present and in most cases subject to whatever deductions ought to be made in respect of the circumstances of each case. In the present case I think that the loss of the parents in respect of the allowance may be fairly estimated at £30. There was little evidence as to the nature or value of the presents made by the deceased to her parents, but I think that there should be some addition in respect of them, and I fix the sum at £5. The counsel for the plaintiff also contended that in estimating the damages the sufferings of the deceased ought also to be considered, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the same damages as the deceased herself could have done in this respect, and cited the case of Armsworth v. The South Western Railway Company (11 Jur. 758), but on reference to that case and the other numerous cases collected in Fisher's Digest, 6089, tit. "Negligence," I find no authority for such a proposition, and that it is, on the contrary, clearly laid down, that compensation can be given to the relatives named in the Act only for pecuniary losses, including reasonable expectations of pecuniary advantage from the relative remaining alive. As to the amount of damages which I have given, I observe that in the case Franklin v. South Eastern Railway Company (3 H. & N. 211) it was held, that £75 was excessive damages for the loss by a father, through the death of his son, of 3s. 6d. a week, say £9 a year; but the father appears to have been an old man, and the parents of the deceased in the present case are middle-aged. The claim for funeral expenses was properly withdrawn.

Verdict for the plaintiff for £35, with costs.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BANKRUPTCY — EXECUTION CREDITOR OF TRADER—SEIZURE AND SALE BY SHERIFF.—The 87th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, which requires the sheriff to retain in his hands for fourteen days the proceeds of sale of goods of a trader taken in execution in respect of a judgment for a sum exceeding £50, and provides that if no notice of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against the trader be served on him within such period of fourteen days, or if, such notice having been served, the trader is not adjudged bankrupt, "he may deal with the proceeds of such sale in the same manner as he would have done had no notice of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition been served on him," only protects the sheriff and the purchasers of the goods, and does not protect the execution creditor, who is liable to repay the money to the trustee in the event of the debtor becoming bankrupt within twelve months from the date of the sale by the sheriff: (Ex parte Villars; Re Rogers, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 104. Chan.)

BANKRUPTCY—RE-HEARING—CONTRARY DECISION BY COURT OF APPEAL SINCE ORIGINAL HEARING.—On the 15th March 1873, the Court of Bankruptcy made an order declaring, amongst other things, that the mortgagees of certain leaseholds had a valid charge on the trade fixtures comprised in their mortgage as against the trustee under the liquidation of the mortgagor, although the deed had not been registered under the Bills of Sale Act. On the 25th July 1873, the Court of Appeal in another case decided that an assignment of trade fixtures included in a mortgage of leaseholds to which they were attached, required to be registered under the Bills of Sale Act. The mortgagees became aware of this decision, on the 28th July 1873, and gave notice of motion for a re-hearing of their case on the 21st Nov. 1873: Held (reversing the decision of one of the Registrars) that they were not entitled to a re-hearing. Quære, whether a re-hearing would have been granted to them, if they had given notice within twenty-one days of the time when they became aware of the decision effecting a change in the law: (Ex parte Brown; Re Jeavons, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108. Chan.)

MARRIED WOMAN—DEBTS CONTRACTED BEFORE MARRIAGE — BANKRUPTCY — MARRIED WOMAN'S PROPERTY ACT 1870 (33 & 34 VICT. C. 93), S. 12.—A married woman who has no property belonging to her for her separate use is not liable, under the 12th section of the Married Woman's Property Act 1870, to be made bankrupt. Quære, whether a married woman who has property belonging to her for her separate use is so liable: (Ex parte Holland; Re Henage, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 106. Chan.)

BANKRUPTCY—"DEBTS DUE TO HIM IN THE COURSE OF HIS TRADE OR BUSINESS."—Bankers' "marginal notes" (which are contracts that the bankers giving them will pay the amounts represented by them whenever they receive intelligence that the bills, in respect of the discount of which they retain the amounts represented by the marginal notes, have been paid) are not "debts due" to the trader "in the course of his trade or business" within the order and disposition clause (s. 15 sub-sect. 5) of the Bankruptcy Act 1869: (Ex parte Kemp; Re Fastnedge, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 109. Chan.)

EXECUTION CREDITOR—PAYMENTS TO SHERIFF BEFORE LEVY—ACCEPTANCE BY CREDITORS IN PART PAYMENT BEFORE THE BANKRUPTCY—PRESSURE—BANKRUPTCY ACT 1869, SS. 6, 87.—A judgment debtor, to avoid execution, paid part of the judgment-debt to the sheriff's officer. Two days after making this payment, the debtor filed a petition for liquidation, and notice of this was at once served on the sheriff's officer. The day before the petition was filed, the execution creditor told the sheriff's officer that he consented to accept the money paid by the debtor in part payment of his debt, but the payment was not made by the sheriff's officer till two days after the filing of the petition: Held, that there had been no seizure by the sheriff within the meaning of the 5th sub-section of the 6th section, or of the 87th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869; that there was sufficient pressure by the creditor to support the payment, and that the creditor was entitled to retain the money paid to him by the sheriff's officer. Decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy reversed on fresh evidence, that the creditor had, before the filing of the petition, consented to accept the money paid to the sheriff's officer in part payment of his debt: (Ex parte Brooke; Re Hassall, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 103. Chan.)

DEBTOR'S SUMMONS — DEBT COVERED BY GARNISHEE ORDERS—ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—BANKRUPTCY ACT 1869, S. 6, SUB-SECT 6 AND SECT. 7.—The words in the 6th sub-section of the 6th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, which render neglect to "secure or compound for" a debt exceeding £50, for which a debtor's summons has been served, an act of bankruptcy, mean to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor. An adjudication of bankruptcy founded on neglect to comply with a debtor's summons issued in respect of a debt exceeding £50 is valid, although the creditor has obtained garnishee orders to an amount exceeding his debt: (Ex parte Tupper; Re Tupper, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 102. Chan.)

TUNBRIDGE COUNTY COURT.

Saturday, March 14.

(Before Mr. Registrar W. C. CRIPPS, sitting as Judge.)

Re J. EVEREST.

THIS was a case respecting a horse transaction, Mr. John Chantler, auctioneer of Southboro', and trustee, seeking to know whether the sale by the debtor of a certain horse to Mr. Edward Doust, corn factor of Tonbridge, shortly before the date and filing of the debtor's petition, was not a valid sale, and that it was fraudulent and void as against the trustee of the debtor. The trustee now moved that the said horse was his property as trustee, and that the purchase money retained by Mr. Doust, in part satisfaction of a debt to him from the debtor, belonged to and formed part of property of debtor, and that such purchase money should be paid by Mr. Doust to the claimant as trustee.

The trustee was represented by A. Lumley Smith, instructed by Stenning, of Tonbridge, and Mr. Doust, by his solicitor, Palmer.

Smith, in stating the circumstances, desired particular attention to be paid to dates, which were very material. On the 18th April 1873, an agreement was come to between the parties whereby this horse, the property of Mr. Everest, was transferred to Mr. Doust. He believed the horse had been offered to Mr. Doust previously, but the gentleman said he had no use for it, and would not have it. But on the 18th April he took it, and unless it could be shown that there was some pressure put by Mr. Doust upon Mr. Everest, it would be nothing more nor less than a fraudulent preference, and came within the 92nd section of the Act. He should prove that pressure had not been put on Mr. Everest by Mr. Doust, and he called the debtor, who said, that on the 26th April 1873, he filed a petition for liquidation. At the previous Christmas he was indebted to Mr. Doust in the sum of £14 odd, and further debts were incurred. Prior to the 18th April he had several letters written him by Mr. Doust, asking him for payment of the account, but those letters he had destroyed, because he did not like to have them about the house. On the 18th April an action was brought against him by Mr. Charlton for £130 odd; a writ was issued and served upon him. The same day he saw Mr. Doust, and arranged for the transfer of the horse in part payment of his claim. At first he said he did not want the horse. He knew Mr. Doust well as a friend. Mr. Doust wrote off £26 9s. 10d., and lent witness £10 the next day. When the horse was transferred no money was paid. He had been pressed by Messrs. Punnett for money previous to the 18th April. He owed them something like £60. At this stage of the proceedings Mr. Doust was called upon to produce his letter book, but he said he kept no copies of the notes he had sent to Mr. Everest by his man. In answer to Mr. Palmer, Everest said that all he had stated to the court he mentioned at the meeting of creditors, which was held in the month of May of last year. The last letter he had from Mr. Doust was pressing him for payment, telling him if he did not it would be put into other hands. When the horse was transferred he gave a receipt to Mr. Doust, and Mr. Doust gave him a receipt. At this time he had not the slightest intention of filing a petition, for he was then receiving help from friends with which he thought he should be able to carry on his business. The £10 was lent him to pay his men. In re-examination witness said Mr. Doust took no security for the £10. Mr. Palmer advised him to file a petition, and he did so at once. He had destroyed every letter pressing him for payment, but he had not destroyed the writ.

Palmer submitted that whatever might have been passing in the mind of Mr. Everest at the time of this transaction, it was quite certain Mr. Doust was an innocent party, and what he had done he was perfectly entitled to do under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. He had no notice of an act of bankruptcy at the time of this transaction, for the simple reason that no act of bankruptcy had been committed by Mr. Everest. According to sub-sect. 2 of the 194th section of the Bankruptcy Act, any transaction not attended with fraud from beginning to end, and where no notice had been given of an act of bankruptcy, was perfectly good and binding. In support of his argument he quoted Ex parte Topham; re Walker (L. J. Rep.), and read the whole of Mellish, J.'s judgment, which went to show, he said, that the transaction was a perfectly valid one, even had it been on the morning of the day on which the petition was filed.

Smith, in reply, submitted that the case quoted by Mr. Palmer did not apply, because here, he contended, there was no evidence of pressure, and a most remarkable fact was that Mr. Doust had not been called to support that part of the case. Was it likely that a man pressing another for payment would lend him £10 without security the next day.

The REGISTRAR, in delivering judgment, said he had no doubt whatever about the order which should be made. The dates were very important, when it came to be considered whether this was a bonâ fide transaction or not as between the debtor and Mr. Doust. It seemed a very odd thing that the debtor should have destroyed the letters for the reasons given, and it was equally odd that Mr. Doust did not keep copies of the letters sent to a person owing him money and threatening him with proceedings. Mr. Doust had not even ventured to go into the box, and he (the learned registrar), was clearly of opinion that the transaction was nothing more than an attempt to secure Mr. Doust, Everest, the debtor, contemplating at the time going into liquidation. There could have been no pressure, or Mr. Doust would not have lent the debtor £10 the next day. He was clearly of opinion the trustee was entitled to the money—the price of the horse—and also his costs as against Mr. Doust.

Palmer applied for an appeal, which was granted.

Re EVEREST (Second motion).

THIS was a motion supported by Meadows White, solicitor, instructed by Messrs. Gorham and Warner, to try the title of Mr. Hope Constable, a builder and brickmaker, of Penshurst, against Mr. Chantler, the trustee of a certain sum of money amounting to £202 17s. 10d., which was in the hands of Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., until the 1st Dec. 1873, and afterwards deposited in the bank by his solicitors, Messrs. Gorham and Warner. The trustee was again represented by A. L. Smith.

In stating the case, White said Mr. Morley, a well-known gentleman, determined upon building some schools at Leigh, and Mr. Everest, debtor, was employed to build them in July 1872. Of course Everest wanted bricks with which to build these schools, and he accordingly applied to Mr. Constable on the 2nd Aug. asking the price of kiln, clamp, and other bricks and sand, to which Mr. Constable replied on the 4th, giving the price, and stating that an arrangement would have to be made as to payment. An agreement was prepared by Mr. Constable, which Everest accepted, the terms being that Mr. Caley, who was Mr. Morley's agent, should always retain a sufficient balance to pay for these bricks, at the close of the works, Mr. Constable to give him notice every month how the account stood. To this arrangement Mr. Caley consented verbally and by letter. Bricks were supplied, and every month Mr. Constable wrote to Mr. Caley telling him how the account with Everest stood. On the 11th April it amounted to £202 17s. 10d. On the 26th of the same month Everest filed his petition for liquidation, and then the question came whether the debt was in the order and disposition of Mr. Everest, or, whether Mr. Constable should be paid. In equity Mr. Morley was prevented from disposing of the sum to Mr. Everest, and Mr Everest by his agreement was prevented from receiving it. In equity therefore it was not in the order and disposition of Everest, and both Mr. Morley and Mr. Caley would have failed under those circumstances in their duty had they paid it over, and were bound in equity to retain it. He did not think it necessary to cite authorities upon this point, for it was a principle so well understood, and it was perfectly clear that this was a bona fide case, for Mr. Constable would not part with a brick until he had the agreement, and the security. Mr. Morley had been examined on the subject, at a previous hearing, and he was again present to answer any question which might be put to him.

Smith said he had an objection to that agreement, and it was decided that before proceeding further the opinion of court should be taken upon that objection. It was perfectly clear that all parties were acting in a bona fide manner, and the only question was whether Mr. Constable was entitled to the £202, and be placed in a better position than the other creditors. The agreement of the 6th Aug. was nothing more nor less than an order by a creditor to a third party to pay the second party a debt—it was an order by Mr. Everest to Mr. Morley, through Mr. Caley, to pay a debt due to Mr. Constable. Assuming the order was not conditional and assented to by the debtor, of course that was irrevocable. In the case of Shellard, Re Adams (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 621), this point was discussed.

White said that the case referred to was with regard to a bill of exchange, and in no way applied to the one before the court.

The learned REGISTRAR said he also could see a great distinction, and he overruled the objection.

Mr. Constable was then called, and he corroborated in detail Mr. White's statement of facts.

Smith, in addressing the court on behalf of the trustee, said the true criterion in this case was to consider the position of parties on the 20th Nov. 1873. Supposing that the trustees had on the 21st Nov. sued Mr. Morley for the £202, Mr. Morley would have had no defence to the action. On that date Mr. Morley had the whole of this money in his hands, and it was beyond all doubt that on his behalf the work had been executed. The defence seemed to rest upon this—whether or not upon the documents there was such an irrevocable assignment of this debt by Everest to Constable. He was perfectly free to admit that an order had been given by Everest to Mr. Morley to pay over to the third party, Mr. Constable, and by the letter of the 14th Sept. Mr. Cayley, the agent, conditionally assented to that. This money had to be paid on or before Christmas 1872, the time in which it was contemplated the building would be finished. He contended that judgment should be entered for the trustee, so that Mr. Constable should go in pari passu with the other creditors, and not take the whole corpus, which he now sought to obtain. Supposing an action had been brought against Mr. Morley, he would have had no defence, and therefore the trustee would be entitled to the whole amount.

White submitted that supposing an action had been brought in the way mentioned, Mr. Morley would have had a perfectly good defence, for there was not only the agreement but the letters. Then the trustee would have no locus standi in such an action. Property equitably assigned would not pass under the bankruptcy at all.

The learned REGISTRAR said that to his mind this was a very clear case. The learned counsel for the trustee had argued the question as to whether Mr. Morley would have any answer to an action which might be brought by the trustee for the recovery of this money, but it was perfectly clear under the Bankruptcy Act that, supposing an action were brought against Mr. Morley, that gentleman might have come to this court and asked for the action to be restrained, and that the court would deal with the question entirely upon equitable principles. This the court would have an undoubted right to do, in order that complete justice should be done in all matters arising out of any bankruptcy. That being so, he thought Mr. Smith's argument fell to the ground. He had no doubt whatever but that the agreement, and the subsequent transactions, constituted a valid equitable assignment to Mr. Constable, who, subject to Mr. Morley's costs being provided for, was entitled to an order.

White applied for Mr. Constable's costs, and, after some argument, it was agreed that the costs should follow the event, and that Mr. Constable's costs should be costs as against the estate.

LEGAL NEWS.

THE new Assistant Judge has been early put to proof of his capacities. At the Middlesex Sessions, which ended last week, it was his task to try the longest case that has come before the court for twenty years. It occupied four days. After an elaborate and able summing up, the prisoner was convicted and sentenced to five years of penal servitude.

OF 700 male convicts once in state prison at Auburn, 600 were there for crimes committed under the influence of liquor; 500 of whom testified that using tobacco was the beginning of their intemperate habits.

CRIMINALS AS WITNESSES.—Under the criminal code, which has just passed the General Assembly of Chicago, and only wants the signature of the government to become a law, criminals are allowed to testify in their own behalf.

A Nevada judge, after the jury had been impaneled, and counsel ready to proceed, pulled out a revolver and judiciously remarked "If any man goes frolicking around the court-room during the trial of this case, I shall interrupt him in his career." The strictest decorum prevailed.

JUDGE FOX, judge of the 11th District of Arkansas, recently committed Mr. Aldridge, a lawyer, to gaol for contempt of court. He was imprisoned for ten days, and on his liberation he armed himself with a shot-gun, and went in search of the judge. Meeting him in the street, Aldridge exclaimed, "Now, Judge Fox," and fired. The judge fell dead. This is the second judge who has been assassinated in Arkansas within the last six months.

EASTER TERM.—On the re-opening of the common law office yesterday the lists of arrears in the three courts were exhibited for the ensuing term, commencing on Wednesday next. There are, in the Queen's Bench, as many as 71 rules in the new trial paper for argument, and 49 in the special paper, and one for judgment, and of enlarged rules only four. In the Common Pleas there are 27 new trial rules—six in the peremptory paper, three cases standing for judgment, and 32 matters in the special paper. In the Exchequer there are three rules in the peremptory paper, while of new trials there are three for judgment and 30 for argument. In the special paper there are three for judgment and 44 for argument, consisting of demurrers and special cases. The Chancery arrears, which have not been published, are somewhat considerable, and with the applications arising out of the recent circuit, Easter Term is likely to be one of activity.

MULTIFARIOUS LEGISLATION.—We extract from the Times of Monday last, the following letter from Mr. Charles Ford. "Sir,—As evidence that our present system of legislation is not complained of without reason, allow me to direct attention to the following:—A short Bill affecting solicitors and their articled clerks was recently introduced into the House of Lords. About the same time a still shorter Bill affecting solicitors, with one section relating to bills of sale, was introduced into the House of Commons. A third measure relating to bills of sale only was, about the same time, also introduced into the House of Commons. Surely these three short measures are not to become separate enactments when the whole subject-matter might with advantage be comprised in one statute."

MR. JAMES BROUN, of No. 3, Harcourt-buildings, Temple, who has been disclaimed by various other members of the Bar similarly titled, reappeared at Guildhall, charged with an unprovoked assault in Fleet-street. Medical certificates were put in from Dr. Gibson, of Newgate, stating that he was of unsound mind. Sir Thomas Dakin decided to send him to the union for safe custody, and the prisoner made no objection beyond asking if he could go before the Lunacy Commissioners.

THE NEW LAW COURTS OF JUSTICE.—The sum to be voted for the year ending 31st March 1875, for the new Law Courts is £78,800., being an excess of £10,000 on the preceding year voted.

CODE OR DIGEST.—"A Barrister," writing to the Times upon this subject, observes that "We seem to be as far now from obtaining a code, or even a digest, as ever. The Judicature Act has been passed, and a few workmen have even begun to appear on the site of the new law courts." "Surely," the writer observes, "it is time to begin the remaining great work which is so much wanted to free the law from obscurity, and to complete the fusion of law and equity." He trusts "the subject will not be allowed again to sleep, and that the work of codifying the law, or at least, of digesting it, may soon be seriously taken in hand." He adds, "I believe all are agreed that the difficulties and magnitude of the work are not insuperable, and all that is required is money and good workmen," and he warns us against resting satisfied "with the mere republication of the existing statutes, for however excellent the work may be done in itself, the main faults of our legal system will be left as rife as ever."

DR. KENEALY.—On Tuesday night a public meeting was held at Cambridge Hall, Newman-street, Oxford-street, "for the purpose of expressing sympathy with Dr. Kenealy in the persecution he was now suffering in connection with his defence of the Claimant at the late trial in the Court of Queen's Bench." The hall was densely crowded in every part. Mr. G. Skipworth occupied the chair, and was loudly cheered upon taking his position. The chairman, in opening the proceedings, having briefly referred to the treatment he had personally experienced from the Lord Chief Justice, said he felt great regret that no public effort had yet been made to obtain the release of that unfortunate man who was now unjustly languishing in prison, and whom he believed to be perfectly innocent of all that had been laid to his charge. Mr. Skipworth concluded a speech lasting more than one hour amid loud cheering, with a few expressions of dissent. The secretary of the Kenealy Fund read a list of contributions which have been received up to the present time. He also stated that the amount now owing to Dr. Kenealy for fees in connection with the late trial was 1300 guineas. Mr. Gibson moved the following resolution:—"That the thanks of this meeting be tendered to Dr. Kenealy, Q.C., for his eloquent, legal, able, and fearless assertion of his client's rights as displayed by him in conducting the defence in the late Tichborne trial; also that this meeting expresses its feelings of repugnance at the one-sided manner in which the late Government conducted the prosecution." Mr. Guildford Onslow, on rising to second the resolution, was greeted with loud cheering. He said he was now able to speak without having the fear of the Lord Chief Justice before him, and he would take this the first opportunity of expressing his firm conviction that the unfortunate man now languishing in prison was the real and veritable Sir Roger Tichborne. He said the prosecution was wicked, the trial a farce, and the verdict and sentence most unjust. The immediate object of this meeting was to do honour to Dr. Kenealy, one of the most able and honest men at the English Bar. He considered the Bar of the Oxford Circuit had disgraced itself by its recent treatment of Dr. Kenealy, especially pending the inquiry about to be instituted by the Benchers of Gray's Inn. He contended at some length that the Claimant had not received a fair trial, and that, as every unprejudiced person acknowledged, in face of the evidence, there was a reasonable doubt, the Claimant ought to have received the benefit of the doubt. Several other speakers having addressed the meeting the resolution was carried almost unanimously.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

THE LODGERS' GOODS PROTECTION ACT.—I beg leave to offer a few observations and remarks which perhaps, if made public, may be thought of sufficient importance to cause either an immediate amendment or repeal of the above Act. Rent may be defined to be a return of the profits which a lessor reserves to himself on parting with for a time, his estate or part of it, and which profits are payable to him by the lessee in respect thereof, according to the terms and nature of the tenure. As rent is a profit issuing out of the land or property leased for a time, and as distress is a remedy for its recovery, and originally substituted for an entry on and possession of the land or property by the lessor, it follows that in the application of the remedy it is to the land or property itself that the distrainor must look, and not to the person of the lessee, for his claim is not in respect of the person in possession of the premises, or owning the effects there, but in respect of the premises alone. It has therefore been considered, as a general rule, that the party entitled to the rent in arrear may distrain on the premises, out of which the rent issues in whosesover possession they may be at the time of distress, whether in that of the original lessee, assignee, undertenant, or lodger, or several tenants in common, and may take, subject to certain restrictions, whatever chattels or effects are found there, whether they belong to the lessee or to any other person. The necessity of this rule is obvious when it is properly considered by what varieties of fraud and collusion the rights of the lessor may otherwise be, and unfortunately are now generally known to be, defeated by being restricted in his remedy by distress, to the possession and goods of his immediate lessee only, goods, by the bye, which it is impossible for the lessor to know without the lessee points out the same to him, which he is not compelled to do. And it seems to have been forgotten that a lodger or sub-tenant is not only protected by a legal remedy against his immediate landlord for any damage, loss, or injury, he may sustain, through his property being distrained and sold to satisfy a claim for rent due to the superior landlord, and that he can also take the law into his own hands and set-off future rent due by him in discharge of such damage or loss. And if it be said that as most persons seized upon for rent are nearly insolvent, the remedy of a lodger or other under-tenant is therefore practically nil. Admitting such to be the case, it is respectfully asked, Is it right?—Is it just?—that the superior landlord, entirely an innocent party, should therefore be made the victim of pecuniary loss, and deprived of a remedy which, from time almost immemorial, the law, for the benefit of society, as much as for himself, has afforded him? In good faith a landlord lets his property even with a proviso that the same shall not be underlet, in defiance of which, however, it is not only wholly or partly let out by the tenant, but rents are received by him from the lodgers, and notwithstanding which he fails to pay the rent due from himself to his landlord. Surely in a case like this the law is at fault if the lodger or other under-tenant has not an immediate and summary remedy for such a deliberate act of dishonesty and injustice both to his lodger and his landlord by a summons before a magistrate. Surely the party guilty of such a two-fold wrong should suffer punishment, and not the superior landlord, who perhaps is not even aware his premises have been underlet. It is to be regretted that lodgers and others, generally speaking, are too negligent in making proper inquiries as to the respectability and solvency of the parties with whom they may be going to lodge, they have often only themselves to blame for the loss of their goods, which they so heedlessly place in jeopardy. But landlords, generally speaking, do not take advantage of this, nor have the goods of the lodgers been taken by landlords so frequently and to such an extent as many people imagine; in most cases there has been a special reason for taking them, one of which, perhaps the most frequent, is that the lodger himself is considerably in arrears, and the cause why his landlord cannot pay. It has been asked in what respect rent differs from any other debt. As before intimated, the landlord transfers or divests himself of his property for a certain time, upon agreed periodical future payments, called rent, to the tenant or hirer, who thus effectively has the entire use of the property for the time being, and upon default in making the payments agreed upon certain effects found upon the premises can be legally taken, first, as a pledge, and, after continued default, can be sold to satisfy such claims or rent. And it is here submitted that the lessor has properly no common law right of proceeding for the recovery of such payments or rent, as a debt, unless he has reserved to himself an additional right of doing so in the lease or agreement. He is bound to exhaust the legal remedy specially provided by Act of Parliament for the purpose before resorting to other remedies. In other cases whereby debts, properly speaking, are incurred, there is an absolute sale of the property for a certain sum, either for cash or upon credit, and whereby it entirely belongs to the purchaser, and in the event of that sum not being paid it becomes a debt, for which the debtor must first be personally sued, and it is only after and under a judgment his goods can be seized to satisfy such debt. It has also been asked why the landlord should be protected more than the butcher or the baker? The answer is easy. The landlord is not so well protected, from the nature of the case, as the tradesman. The latter can stop credit, and avoid further loss, at any time he pleases, whereas the former has to wait for the expiration of the tenancy, which may be for a long period, or to determine same by a notice to quit; his loss is, therefore, a continuing one. Again, complaints have been made that the law makes the landlord "judge, jury, and executioner in his own case." I answer the tenant is none the worse off for that, he is nevertheless well protected. The landlord must conform strictly to certain statutory enactments, constituting the law of distress; he is seriously liable for any wrong he may do, and if he appoints another person to act for him, he is prima facie liable for his acts in case of an irregularity or his illegally conducting the distress. At the same time, a great advantage to the tenant must not be overlooked, the landlord has the power to, and can be lenient; he can also allow further time to his tenant for payment, and he can also forego the whole or a portion of his rent, according to circumstances; whereas if the case is in the hands of the sheriff or the County Court broker, leniency, forbearance, and discretion are then out of the question, the law must be carried out to the very letter. Again, it is stated that the law of distress and brokers are both objectionable; but why? Look to the causes, and let persons requiring the attention of either broker or sheriff at least be decent and not speak unkindly of persons on whom society imposes unpleasant offices. And, again, how is it that lawyers so frequently employ brokers to act and distrain for them and their clients, notwithstanding they have, as they imagine, a common law right or remedy to sue for the rent as a debt? Are not the reasons obvious? Do not lawyers practically know that the process of recovery in either case is effectively the same, but that the remedy of distress is not only less oppressive and costly to the poor tenant, but attended with little or no expense to, it may be, the poor landlord? Of course, in cases with wealthy clients, a suit in the Superior Courts of law is recommended as a matter of business, and in nine cases out of ten justly preferred to the County courts, because in the former judges are learned in the law, are not above consulting, when necessary, the Acts of Parliament, and are most anxious to adjudicate in conformity therewith, whereas in some of the latter courts decisions are given not only contrary to law and equity, but apparently at the whim and fancy of the gentlemen presiding there. Again, if we occasionally read of cases in which the law of distress has been abused, it is principally the fault of landlords employing improper persons; but are not such to be found in all trades and professions? Is the law to be despised because some persons professing it exhibit a minimum of legal wisdom, want of professional skill, and sometimes misconduct in carrying it out, whereby their clients often lose their suits and are mulct in costs. But even for such errors of landlords, a remedy presents itself; there can be no reason why persons acting as brokers or agents for the recovery of rents, should not be compelled, like appraisers or auctioneers, to take out a licence or certificate and be liable to a penalty for acting without one. It would be more satisfactory to the public, and at the same time afford a check upon flagrant misconduct for which a renewal of the licence or certificate might be suspended, or altogether refused, according to circumstances. Upon perusal of the Lodgers' Goods Protection Bill (as amended in the Select Committee) I find it differs from the Act itself by the omission of the word "under-tenants." The Act is also without an interpretation clause which is to be regretted, because although the word lodger is very familiar, it is one which it appears is not generally understood, and our dictionaries afford us little or no assistance. For instance, is a servant a lodger within the meaning of the Act, no rent being paid for the rooms he occupies? Are persons living in model lodging houses lodgers or under tenants? A person takes a house, and lets it out in rooms or tenements, living elsewhere himself; are the several occupants, some of whom do and do not sleep there, all lodgers or under tenants within the meaning of the Act? Again, are tenants or holders of offices, let-out manufacturing business premises, stables, workshops, factories, &c., to be considered lodgers or under tenants, and does the Act apply to and protect such parties? Or does the Act only apply to lodgers properly so called, that is to say, to persons who for a time live and sleep in the part of the premises they occupy or hire, the other part being occupied by the landlord, and in which he also dwells and sleeps? It would appear from the omission in the Act of the 14th clause to be found in the Bill, namely, "This Act shall not apply to any lettings other than those of dwelling-houses, and of rooms let for the purpose of lodging," that the Act is therefore intended to and shall apply to any lettings other than those of dwelling-houses and of rooms let for the purposes of lodging. Is this so? Again, if the distress is for an amount above £15, can a magistrate deal with it under the Act (see 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 39). And in case of a tenant being in arrears of rent due to his landlord, has the superior landlord a claim on the lodger for the payment of his current and future rent, as it accrues due, on account of the arrears due to him by the lodger's landlord? And, if so, upon the refusal of the lodger to pay same, how is it to be recovered? A portion of the first section of the Act likewise creates a difficulty. The rent owing by the lodger, if sufficient, is to be taken by the broker in satisfaction and discharge of the entire claim upon the tenant by the superior landlord, and the distress being thus satisfied, is legally ended. But is a payment by the lodger amounting only to a part of the amount owing to the superior landlord to be taken by the broker on account of and in part payment of the amount distrained for and due to the superior landlord? If so, the distress will become void, for if the broker or landlord takes a part of the amount distrained for, he then upsets the distress, and must therefore withdraw, and the law will not allow him to enter again to distrain for the balance, he must also lose the costs which have attended the distress. Again, if the broker receives the amount, he must dispose of it under the Act, and thereby nullify the distress, and on the other hand if he refuses to take it, he is both liable to an action at the suit of the lodger and amenable to a magistrate. It seems that the observations made by Lord Salisbury at the passing of the Act were justifiable, namely, "that without in any way sympathising with the object or urging the necessity of any alteration in the present law, he objected to any change being made upon so hurried and imperfectly defined a plan which characterised private Bills generally," and which he described as small hour legislature. Upon the whole it seems the more the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act is investigated, the more unsatisfactory and partial it appears; it is altogether a fair specimen of legislative trifling, and the result of ignorance of practical experience upon the subject.

JAMES FERGUSON.

CLERKS OF THE PEACE AT PETTY SESSIONS.—SIR,—Enclosed I forward draft of two clauses which I should like to see inserted in the proposed new Act of Parliament. It is not unusual for one Clerk of the Peace, or his partner or his clerk, to appear for a prisoner, and if committed for trial, of course, afterwards to draw the indictments. You will easily perceive what an injustice might be occasioned.

A COUNTRY SOLICITOR.

The following are the clauses referred to:—

"That no attorney, or other person, acting as clerk to an attorney or firm of attorneys, shall be heard in any court of petty sessions, or in any county court, on behalf of any client of such last-named attorney or firm of attorneys."

"That no clerk of the peace, or his partner, or any clerk in his or their employ, or any clerk or partner of any justice's clerk shall be heard on a prosecution or in a defence at any petty sessions for the district for which he is such clerk of the peace or justice's clerk."

LAW SOCIETIES.

UNION SOCIETY OF LONDON.

AT a meeting of this society to be held on Tuesday next at the rooms of the Social Science Association at half past seven, Mr. Charles Ford will move a resolution to the effect that the rules of the Inns of Court affecting solicitors desiring to be called to the Bar require modification, and that greater facilities should be afforded to barristers desirous of becoming solicitors.

THE BIRMINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AT a meeting of this society held on Tuesday evening last, Mr. A. D. Bolton, barrister-at-law, presiding, the following question was discussed: "Is a mortgagee entitled to more than six years' arrears of interest upon a bill being filed by the mortgagor for redemption." Mr. A. Canning led in the affirmative, and was supported by Messrs.

David Hadley and W. H. Warlow; Mr. F. W. Lowe replied, and was followed by Messrs. Blakeway and F. Smith. After the chairman had summed up the votes were taken and found to be in favour of the affirmative.

LAW ASSOCIATION.

AT the usual monthly meeting of the directors, held at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane, on Thursday, the 2nd inst., the following being present, viz.:—Mr. Steward (chairman), Mr. Burges, Mr. Drew, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Masterman, Mr. Sidney Smith, Mr. Styan, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Tylee, Mr. H. Vallance, Mr. Williamson, and Mr. Boodle (secretary). A grant of £50 was made to the widow of a member, and two grants amounting to £17 were made to the daughters of two non-members. The annual general court was fixed for the 28th May.

The Company also undertakes the conduct of Funerals to other cemeteries, and to all parts of the United Kingdom. The Law and the Lawyers.

THE American idea of our manner of dealing with professional questions is somewhat amusing. The Albany Law Journal informs its readers that "a committee of the House of Commons having been appointed to investigate the charges preferred against Dr. KENEALY, counsel for the Tichborne claimant, Mr. WHALLEY, M.P.. demands that a similar committee be appointed to investigate charges against Mr. HAWKINS, Q.C., prosecuting attorney."

THE large proportion of professional opinion in the House of Commons was arrayed against Mr. BASS's Imprisonment for Debt Abolition Bill. We observe that whilst Mr. BUTT, Mr. HOPWOOD, Mr. W. M. JACKSON, Sir HENRY JAMES, Serjeant SIMON, and Serjeant SPINKS voted for the Bill, the majority against it included the ATTORNEY-GENERALS for England and for Ireland, the LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. GOLDNEY, Mr. GORDON, Mr. GRANTHAM, Mr. HOLKER, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. C. E. LEWIS, Mr. M. LLOYD, Mr. A. G. MARTEN, Mr. G. O. MORGAN, Mr. NORWOOD, Mr. ROEBUCK, Hon. E. STANHOPE, Mr. WATKIN WILLIAMS, and Mr. LOPES.

THE first annual report of the Barristers' Benevolent Association, which has just been issued, is decidedly satisfactory. Donations had been received and promised up to 31st Dec. 1873, to the amount of £2035 15s., and annual subscriptions amounting to £479. The committee, after careful examination of the cases submitted to them, have granted assistance to the extent of £170. The sum of £1000 has been placed on deposit receipt, and a balance of £299 remains in the hands of the treasurer.

TWO Bills have been introduced into the House of Commons during the past week which the authors admitted to be defective. Mr. BASS positively allowed that his Bill for abolishing imprisonment for debt was illogical, and on Wednesday Mr. MORLEY in bringing forward his Married Women's Property Act Amendment Bill, confessed that it had blemishes. It is really ridiculous that Parliament should allow public time to be wasted in this fashion, and it is certainly a scandal that we have no standing committee whose duty it should be to rid Bills of their conspicuous blots before they are submitted to the House. A Bill of some kind to amend the Married Women's Property Act 1870 is very much wanted; and what Mr. MARTEN means by doubting whether it is necessary to do anything in that direction we cannot understand. There cannot, we should think, be two opinions of the absurdity of the law as it stands at present. We have from time to time reported cases from the County Courts and elsewhere and commented upon them, so as to have made the defects of the law familiar to our readers, and the only question is how those defects shall be remedied. Sir RICHARD BAGGALLAY has taken the right view of the matter; and if he would undertake the measure, and amend it as required, we might hope to see this branch of the law of husband and wife placed upon a satisfactory footing.

WE perceive that the observations of Mr. Justice BLACKBURN, on the appeal from the decision of Mr. BEALES in the case of Taylor v. The Great Eastern Railway Company, reported in this journal on the 7th of last February have not unnaturally excited that learned gentleman's indignation. The learned Judge was rather more severe than usual in this particular instance, and we regret that we cannot in a measure appease Mr. BEALES by admitting any mistake or exaggeration in the report. As furnished to us, it was a transcript of a shorthand writer's notes, and we are not aware that there is any ground whatever for disputing its perfect accuracy. Whether the facts of the case and reasons of the decision were fully apprehended by the court is another matter, and we shall be very glad to hear an explanation favourable to Mr. BEALES' reputation. The testimony of the County Court Bar must be satisfactory to Mr. BEALES, and we ourselves have more than once had occasion to admire the care which the learned Judge devotes to cases which come before him, and his ability as a lawyer is generally considered to be respectable. With respect to the severity of Mr. Justice BLACKBURN's comments, we incline to the opinion that, as a matter of principle, glaring incapacity in an inferior Judge is quite as much a subject for the consideration of the LORD CHANCELLOR as misconduct; but, looking at Mr. BEALES' career on the Bench, it is open to question whether he should have been exposed to judicial criticism, even supposing Mr. Justice BLACKBURN justified by the facts and circumstances of the case. We shall welcome with much satisfaction any amende which may be made to Mr. BEALES.

THE argument advanced on behalf of the sitting members in the case of the Hackney Election Petition was perhaps as remarkable as any which has ever been addressed to an election tribunal. Assuming the learned counsel to have been correctly reported, he argued that inasmuch as there are precedents which justify an election which is pure being upheld in spite of some slight irregularity in the mode of taking the poll, therefore, an irregularity which amounts to an absolute exclusion of an unascertainable number of voters from the polling booths should not invalidate an election unless it can be clearly shown that the numbers excluded would have brought about a different result. This was to put before the judge a problem utterly impossible of solution, and to ask him, because he was unable to solve it, to determine that there was a mere irregularity which did not affect the return. We are not now dealing with the judgment of the learned Judge—which, however, has arrived at the only possible conclusion—but with the principle of the argument. It is quite new to us that where a corrupt practice affects a constituency, it must be shown that those influenced equal the majority obtained by the successful candidate. In the Galway case priestly intimidation was the ground on which Mr. Justice KEOGH upset the return, but the sitting member was many hundreds ahead of his opponent, and it was obviously impossible that this majority could be accounted for by any corrupt influence. But no one ever thought of suggesting that on such a ground the election should be sustained. It will of course be said that a failure of the machinery of polling is a different matter to corrupt influence. As regards the candidates it may be—as regards the public it is not. Every elector has a right to record his vote freely, whatever its effect on the return may be, and we think it would be decidedly dangerous if a public right of the highest importance were to be weighed in the balance of contending parties. Where the machinery breaks down, the question is not whether the same candidates would have been elected had it not broken down, but whether the electors have had an opportunity of recording their votes. This may be a question of degree; a substantial number of voters must doubtless be prevented from voting, but where exclusion to that extent is proved there must be a new election.

WE believe it is generally admitted that ORTON was a most extraordinary impostor, but the way in which he managed to delude respectable lawyers is perhaps the most astounding feature of his career. More than this; certain lawyers were not content with believing in him and writing professional opinions about his case. The infectious zeal of his partisans carried them out of the caution which usually hedges in members of the legal profession, and induced them to write letters for the purpose of being exhibited to supporters. These letters would have appeared to be sufficiently ill-judged and imprudent when everything was still open to conjecture, and their swift destruction would have been a mercy to their writers. But when the subject of the opinions expressed in those letters is condemned by all reasoning men as the hero of a story fatally blotted, as Mr. Justice BRETT has said, with a hundred improbabilities and impossibilities, it is simply cruel to drag them into the light. One of them, however, found its way into that highly respectable organ Reynolds's Newspaper, and was thence copied into a weekly production, which we refrain from characterising, called the Englishman. This was bad enough, but in order that no one who omitted to read the two publications which we have named should be uninformed of the folly of which a Queen's Counsel can be guilty, a letter to the Times from the learned gentleman himself proclaimed the circumstances to all the world. Is it possible after this to repel with any show of indignation the American assertion of the deterioration of the English Bar?

THE case of The Original Hartlepool Collieries Company v. Moon (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 193), is one of some practical importance on the subject of production of documents, the question being whether a defendant could be compelled to produce letters relating to the subject matter of the suit addressed by her solicitors to third parties. The Vice-Chancellor (BACON) pointed out the important fact that the privilege of non-production is the privilege of the client, and does not extend to communications by a solicitor to other persons. His Honour said: "The privilege contended for is her [i. e., the client's] privilege, and it is impossible to carry it any further, because, although in some of the cases that have been referred to, it might seem at first sight that it was the privilege of the solicitor, upon consideration there is no ground whatever for so treating it. A solicitor who is employed to conduct the suit and to collect evidence, to get up the case, as it is called, is acting on behalf of his client, and only on behalf of his client, and the privilege which he claims is not a privilege that he possesses, but a privilege that belongs to the client because of the employment of the solicitor." Consequently, letters written by the solicitor to a third party who was, in a certain sense, the agent of his client, were held not privileged. It must be added, however, that it was further said that "The case of a solicitor who employs a person to collect evidence for him in a foreign country, or who employs an accountant to make up a report from books, is a part of the proper business of the attorney; the client has retained him to do that business, and he has done it, and cannot be compelled to disclose the manner in which it has been done."

WE made no announcement last week of the pending changes in the law officerships, it being entirely uncertain who would be the incoming SOLICITOR-GENERAL. Sir JOHN KARSLAKE's retirement and its cause are the subjects of regret throughout the Profession. He has long been, in or out of office, emphatically the leader of the Bar, and it has never had a leader who knew better how to maintain its standard of purity and independence. We now know that Mr. JOHN HOLKER, Q.C. of the Northern Circuit, has been offered and has accepted the office of SOLICITOR-GENERAL, and the appointment is one which must commend itself to the approbation of everyone who knows anything of the recent history of our greatest circuit. As the leader of that circuit he has been exceedingly popular. He has the reputation of being an astute lawyer, and an advocate whose powers of lucid exposition have never been surpassed at the English Bar. He commenced his career like so many of our eminent men in the office of a solicitor. Having been called to the Bar at Gray's Inn in 1854 he commenced practice as a local barrister at Manchester. In a short time, however, he removed to London, rapidly obtained a large and lucrative practice, and received a silk gown in 1868. He first entered Parliament as member for Preston in 1872, and was again returned at the General Election of the present year. By his retirement from the Northern Circuit, where he appeared on one side or the other in almost every case, a vast amount of business will be released, but we believe we may confidently say that there will be less joy over this by the members of the circuit than will be excited by the promotion which raises him purely on his merits from the proud position which he has recently held to the responsible post of Solicitor-General.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT IN COUNTY COURTS.

MR. BASS's Bill for abolishing imprisonment for debt in the County Courts has been defeated by an overwhelming majority, but there is sufficient strength of opinion in support of its principle to justify the expectation that imprisonment as a punishment for not paying debts will be abolished altogether at no distant date. When we find converts such as Sir HENRY JAMES, who was on a committee which took evidence on the subject, there must be some very strong and cogent objections to the present system. If we fail to appreciate them the fault must be ours. But whatever they are, and whatever their force, we consider that a mistake is made in mixing up with the simple issue "grave social and economical questions," which, according to Sir HENRY JAMES, are involved. We look through his speech to discover such questions, and what do we find? First, that the power to enforce payment by imprisonment fosters an unhealthy system of credit. Secondly, that the opportunity of obtaining credit for necessaries induces the working man to get in debt to the draper and grocer whilst he spends his cash at the publican's, who cannot now recover for beer scores. Again, he says that men sent to prison are brought into contact with the worst characters. These, we suppose, are the grave social and economical questions, and we are free to admit that opinions may differ as to their gravity. We have heard them urged before, and they are supported by the testimony of one or two of the most eminent of our County Court Judges. Perhaps the difference of opinion prevailing among County Court Judges is the most remarkable circumstance in the history of the agitation. Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL and Mr. J. A. RUSSELL are gentlemen held in high esteem, and would not be likely to give opinions of a vague or ill-founded character. Forming their opinions upon their experience, they conclude that many of the small debts for which commitment orders are now made would never have been incurred if the power to enforce payment by imprisonment had not existed. That is to say, that if imprisonment for debt were abolished, the credit system as available to the working classes would collapse. And this they consider expedient. Many Judges, on the other hand, take a diametrically opposite view; they see no objection to the credit system properly regulated, or to the commitment of debtors with whose knowledge debts have been contracted, and who have the means to pay. Perhaps Mr. Commissioner KERR has had as large experience of the credit system as any Judge, and the operation of imprisonment for debt has been constantly before him for many years. It is only necessary to sit in his court for a few hours to hear his opinion of the expediency of abolishing the power of imprisonment for non-payment of debts. The view which he takes is probably stronger than that of many County Court Judges, as he looks upon a man who has voluntarily got into debt, and refuses to pay, as primâ facie dishonest. This is, we conceive, the correct view, and if imprisonment for nonpayment of debts, or, more correctly, for disobeying an order of the court for payment, were abolished, Mr. CROSS's suggestion that the principle of the legislation against fraudulent debtors should be extended, would have to be adopted.

It is a favourite argument against imprisonment for debt, that it is punishing criminally the incapacity or refusal to perform a civil contract. For the purposes of promoting healthy trade, we question whether this is the right way of looking at the matter. To procure on credit goods for which we have not the means to pay is virtually obtaining them by false pretences, and a false pretence is punishable by imprisonment. We freely admit, on the other hand, that where the debtor is not the author of his own liability—where, for example, the goods have been ordered without his knowledge, and the first demand for payment comes in the form of a County Court summons, the hardship of imprisonment may be very great. We also admit that every precaution should be taken that a debtor should be informed personally of the intended proceedings before matters are put in train for commitment. Here, indeed, we arrive at the true grievance, and Mr. CROSS deserves the greatest credit for being the only participator in the debate with sufficient sagacity or insight to perceive that it is in the administration of the law, and not in the law itself, that the evil is to be found. "If," he said, "County Court Judges would confer together and frame rules by which to act in a more uniform manner, much of the alleged evil would be removed." It is certainly extraordinary that there has not been more concerted action amongst those gentlemen with a view to settling the practice. Strict proof should always be required that the original summons has reached the debtor before a judgment summons is granted, and particular care should be taken to ascertain that the goods were supplied with the knowledge or consent of the debtor.

Some Judges have acted up to the extreme limit of Jolly v. Rees in relieving a husband from liability for goods supplied contrary to his orders. The liability being gone there is an end of all difficulty, but if the liability cannot be got rid of it is in the next place important that the debtor who has to bear a burden innocently contracted, so far as he is concerned, should not be sent to prison for non-payment, as the element of fraudulent intent or conduct is altogether wanting.

The whole subject has now at any rate been thoroughly thought out. It is very improbable that we shall obtain any better evidence than that which was extracted by the select committee. We know the opinion of County Court Judges, and we think it is the fact that a considerable majority are of opinion that the restricted power of imprisonment which now exists is most salutary, and should be preserved. We know that many Judges regret that abolition of imprisonment for debt has gone the length it has, and would gladly see it restored, whilst the commercial community must feel that it has considerably altered their relations with the public. This doubtless raises the question whether legislation should impose difficulties on trade by rendering debts impossible of recovery. We are decidedly of opinion that it should not, and we think that Sir HENRY JAMES's grave social and economical questions should not be taken into consideration in deliberating upon the operation of our legal machinery. There is ample evidence that impending imprisonment forces the settlement of claims which otherwise would be absolutely ignored in a very large number of cases. The few cases of hardship of which we hear are hardly a satisfactory set-off against such a result, and we conceive that debtor and creditor should be left to the difficulties and perils which each at present incurs; and even on a balance of disadvantages, we believe it would be more detrimental to a working man to be deprived of credit than to suffer occasional imprisonment.

LAND TITLES AND TRANSFER BILL.

WHEN a Lord Chancellor adopts a Bill previously introduced by his predecessor, who was opposed to himself in politics, it appears clear that the principle of the Bill must be taken as acknowledged to be correct by both political parties, and the main discussion upon the Bill can be upon questions of detail only. Lord Cairns has presented to the House of Lords what is, in effect, the Bill of Lord Selborne with Vice-Chancellor Sir Charles Hall's alterations.

As both the learned lords are agreed that "it is expedient to make further provisions for the simplification of the title to land, and for facilitating the transfer of land in England," it behoves all real property lawyers carefully to study the Bill and render their best assistance in making it as workable as possible.

We have not at present had time to consider the 171 sections of which the Bill consists sufficiently to make any suggestions, but we propose at an early date, when we have given the Bill more attention, to state our views upon its different parts. At present we must content ourselves with giving, in general terms, the objects proposed to be effected.

The Bill proposes to allow any person entitled, legally or equitably, to an estate in fee, whether in possession or reversion or charged or not, and whether it be an estate in tail or in fee simple, or a base fee, or any person authorised with or without the consent of another person, to dispose, by way of absolute sale, of an estate in fee simple, in possession or reversion or charged or not, or a purchaser of a similar estate in fee simple, to register himself as the proprietor of the land, but in some cases certain consents are required. Registration may be of three kinds—(a) of a title absolute that is good without any other exception or reservation than those mentioned in the register or in the Bill; (b) of a title limited as good from a certain date mentioned in the register, with the above exception and reservation; and (c) of the applicant, as proprietor only, without any title. In every case the registrar is to be furnished with a correct description of the land, accompanied (except in the case of incorporeal hereditaments) by a plan, and with statements of all interested persons, of their estates and powers, and of all charges and incumbrances. In cases of applications for registration, as proprietor only, the applicant is to satisfy the registrar that he, or some one entitled to a prior estate, or his mortgagee or beneficiary, is in possession or receipt of the rents; and in cases of compulsory registration, to which we shall presently refer, the registrar is to be satisfied with the deed of conveyance. In cases of application for registration with a title absolute or limited, an abstract of title, with such evidence as general orders may require, is to be furnished, and the registrar must be satisfied that the applicant, or his predecessors in title, or some person entitled to some estate under the same common title, has or have been in possession or in receipt of the rents for not less than five years immediately prior to the date of the application. The registrar and an examiner of title are to examine the title, and the former may require further particulars and evidence of the identity and correctness of the lands and their quantities, but the registrar is not to require a title to commence earlier than at least (sic) forty years previously to the time of registration, unless he is of opinion that there is reason to suppose that some settlement or will prior to that period may have been executed which might prejudicially affect the title; and the registrar may accept as sufficient evidence recitals, statements, and descriptions of facts, matters, and parties, in deeds, instruments, and statutory declarations twenty years old. When the application is for registration otherwise than as proprietor only, a notice of it, containing a description of the land, the name and description of the applicant, and a statement of the effect of the proposed registration, as excluding adverse claims, and a time and place for showing cause against it, is to be advertised in conformity with general orders, and a copy of the notice is to be posted on or near the land, and served upon such persons as the registrar shall direct. Before registration with title absolute or limited, the applicant and his solicitor, or agent, or certified conveyancer, and such other person or persons, if any, as the registrar shall require, are to make affidavit that all deeds, wills, and writings relating to the title of the land, or any part thereof, and all facts material to the title thereto, and all charges, liens, incumbrances, contracts, and dealings affecting the same, or any part thereof, or giving any right as against the applicant, have to the full extent of their respective knowledge, information, and belief been made known to the registrar; but the registrar is to be empowered to dispense with such affidavit, either from the applicant or from any other person, when he shall think it reasonable so to do, or to permit the terms of it to be so modified as circumstances might require. When, after the 1st Jan. 1879, a sale of land in fee simple, in possession, or reversion, and charged, or otherwise, takes place, there not being then a registered proprietor, and the purchaser might apply for registration, some person must be registered as proprietor, with absolute or limited title, or as proprietor only, and the instrument of conveyance is until such registration to operate in equity only, and is not to be effectual at law to pass the legal estate. A registered proprietor, whether owner or trustee only, is to be deemed to be owner in fee simple, with full powers of disposition, subject only to the charges and estates referred to in the bill or stated on the register; but such proprietor is to be able to deal with the land by the same modes as he now can, but except in the interval between the death of a proprietor and the entry on the register of another proprietor, there is always to be a registered proprietor in whom the legal estate, subject as aforesaid, is to be deemed vested. Leasehold estates, where more than twenty-one years are unexpired, or where two lives are still living, and estates in dower and by the courtesy may also be registered under similar conditions to those relating to estates in fee.

Upon registration an entry is to be made in a book, to be called "The Land Register," of the name of the proprietor, a description of the land, with a reference when necessary or convenient to a map, whether the title is absolute or limited, and, if so, the limit, and, if either, the particulars of all prior estates, leases, and incumbrances other than those referred to in the bill, but no trust of any kind is to be referred to, nor is it to be shown that the proprietor is mortgagee, or has a security only. The registrar is to give the proprietor "a land certificate," the form of which has yet to be prescribed, which is to contain a transcript of so much of the register as relates to the land or lease, and upon the registrar being satisfied of the loss or destruction of the certificate he may grant a new one. The deposit of the certificate with a memorandum endorsed at the time stating the date and purpose of the deposit, and bearing a proper mortgage stamp, is to create a lien on the land equivalent to that made under the powers of the Bill, so as to take precedence of all statutory charges not previously noted on the certificate. The proprietor may charge the land, and the instrument of charge may or may not confer a power of sale, and the owner of the charge may be registered. The registered charge will imply (unless the contrary be stated in the instrument of charge) a covenant by the registered proprietor for the time being of the land to pay the money and interest. If the instrument of charge confer a power of sale, the registered proprietor of the charge may exercise it, and transfer the land as if he were the registered proprietor thereof; if no power of sale be conferred he can only enter into possession or apply to the court for sale. As between themselves registered charges are to rank according to the order of their registration, and not of their creation, and upon the satisfaction of a charge, the registrar on proof, or on the requisition of the proprietor of the charge, is to enter a note thereof on the register upon which the land is to be deemed discharged.

The Bill makes provision for the entry of the new owner on the transfer of any land, but until that has been done the person on the register is to be deemed proprietor, and it also provides for alteration of the register in the case of marriage of a female proprietor or of the death or bankruptcy of a proprietor and of sales by the court or sheriff.

The Bill also creates a system of notices and caveats both as against registration and against the transfer by a registered proprietor, and also provides for an inspection of the register by a limited class of persons.

The Land Registry office is to be in London, and the business is to be conducted by the Registrar with the aid of such assistant registrars, whose acts are to be deemed the acts of the registrar, examiners of title, clerks, messengers, and servants, as the Lord Chancellor may fix, with the consent of the Treasury, and the fees to be taken for registration are to be settled by the registrar with the sanction of the Lord Chancellor, and the Lord Chancellor may from time to time fix a scale of fees to be paid to the examiners of title, and also of costs to be paid to solicitors or certificated conveyancers in respect of any service to be rendered by them in any matter relating to proceedings under the Act, and any scale of costs so fixed may, if the Lord Chancellor thinks fit, be based on an ad valorem principle.

The Bill contains forms of transfer and charge which are to be as effectual as any other form would have been. When it appears probable that the amount of business to be transacted in a particular district will be sufficient to pay the expenses of a registry there, the Lord Chancellor, with the consent of the Treasury, is to have power to form a district registry, with a proper staff.

The staff of the present registry office, with all papers, are to be transferred to the new office.

The above is a general sketch of the greater part, although, of course, not all, of the proposed objects of the Bill, and upon a future occasion we propose to carefully consider the Bill in detail.

FALSE REPRESENTATION BY AGENTS.

THERE has been a somewhat singular concurrence of cases lately on the extremely important question under what circumstances an agent binds his principal by a false representation. The case of Swift v. Winterbotham must be familiar to all our readers, and is an excellent illustration of the difficulties which surround the subject. There the manager of a branch bank had been applied to concerning the solvency of a gentleman well known in the locality of the bank, and had expressed a favourable opinion. This opinion was conveyed by letter, the applicant being the manager of another banking company. The form of the application was this:—"I shall be much obliged by the favour of your opinion in confidence of the respectability and standing of Sir William Russell, Bart., M.P. for Norwich, and whether you consider him responsible to the extent of £50,000." And the answer addressed to the bank was: "I am in receipt of your favour of the 8th inst., and beg to say in reply that Sir Wm. Russell, Bart., M.P. for Norwich, is the lord of the manor of Charlton Kings, near this town, with a rent roll, I am told, of over £7000 per annum, the receipt of which is in his own hands, and has large expectancies; and I do not believe he would incur the liability you name unless he was certain to meet the engagement." Goddard, one of the defendants, signed this as "manager," the representation was acted upon, and a heavy loss sustained, which it was sought to recover against the bank of which Goddard was manager, and himself personally.

All that we are are now concerned with is the law involved, and we may therefore say shortly that a verdict being obtained by the plaintiffs, it was attempted to set it aside, but the rules for this purpose were discharged by the Queen's Bench. That court considered that the bank was bound by the signature of its manager (within sect. 6 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 14), and thus liable for the false representation. The Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed this decision (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 31). The ruling of the court of appeal seems to us to be sound law, and moreover it is supported by a recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which we reported last week, namely, Mackay v. The Commercial Bank of New Brunswick (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 180).

The better plan in considering the effect of judicial decisions as making the law, is to take those emanating from the highest courts of appeal, and if they are not in conflict with other cases of similar authority to disregard decisions in the courts of first instance which are opposed to them. In Mackay's case, Swift v. Winterbotham (sub nom. Swift v. Jewesbury, ubi sup.) was noticed, and the whole subject fully discussed. We will make it our business now to consider what may now be taken as established beyond controversy.

In the first place, is the signature of the manager of a banking company a signature by the company as the party to be charged within the Act of Lord Tenterden? The decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Swift v. Jewesbury, is emphatically in the negative. Lord Coleridge, in delivering judgment, said, "Whether we look at the antecedent reason, or at the Parliamentary exposition contained in the statute, it seems to me that the true construction is, that in order to charge a person under Lord Tenterden's Act with a fraudulent misrepresentation as to the capacity of another, you must produce a written document containing the misrepresentation, and signed by the person sought to be charged." Turning to Mackay's case we find a common law representation—that is to say, a representation by an agent acting within the scope of his authority. There the facts were that the defendants' cashier, who discharged the duties of manager, sent a telegram to persons who were hesitating about accepting certain drafts, such telegram purporting to come from the drawer, that remittances required to meet previous drafts had been sent Upon this representation the plaintiffs accepted the subsequent drafts. The representation was that the remittance had been sent but when the manager sent the telegram in the name of the drawer the latter was insolvent and had absconded. The defendant bank had indorsed the subsequent drafts and it was consequently to their interest that they should be accepted. The main question was this—was the position of the manager such as to bring the representation which he made within the scope of his authority? The Committee recognised the difficulty of defining precisely the position of an agent which will confer the power to bind the principal by his fraud. Obviously circumstances may vary and it is almost an impossibility to state a principle which shall govern all cases. The nearest approach to such a principle which we can conceive is this: If an agent acting within the scope of his employment makes a representation in the ordinary course of business for the benefit of his principal and such representation is false, the principal is liable. That is to say, that no express authority to make the particular representation is necessary, and, moreover, it is not essential that the principal should actually benefit by the fraud. The distinction between cases of an agent making a representation which does not in any way affect the principal's interest and cases in which it does is well shown by Smith v. Jewesbury (sup.) and Barwick v. The English Joint Stock Bank (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461). In deciding that the representation of Goddard in the first-named case, was a representation by him only in his individual capacity, Lord Coleridge said: "This does not at all conflict with the case of Barwick v. The English Joint Stock Bank, and cases of that description, because there can be no doubt that where an agent of a corporation, or a joint stock company, in conducting its business, does something of which the joint stock company take advantage, and by which they profit, or by which they may profit, and it turns out that the act which is so done by their agent is a fraudulent act, justice points out, and authority supports justice in maintaining, that they cannot afterwards repudiate the agency, and say that the act which has been done by the agent is not an act for which they are liable."

In further illustration of this subject reference may be made to Addie v. The Western Bank of Scotland (L. Rep. 1 H. of L. Cas. Sc. 145), in which was laid down by Lord Cranworth that if by the frauds of the agents of an incorporated company third persons have been defrauded, the corporation may be made responsible to the extent to which its funds have profited by the frauds; and to Ranger v. The Great Western Railway Company (5 H. of L. Cas. 86), where the same noble Lord said, "strictly speaking, a corporation cannot of itself be guilty of a fraud. But where a corporation is formed for the purpose of carrying on a trading or other speculation for profit, such as forming a railway, these objects can only be accomplished by the agency of individuals; and there can be no doubt that if the agents employed conduct themselves fraudulently, so that if they had been acting for private employers, the persons for whom they were acting would have been affected by their frand, the same principles must prevail where the principal under whom the agent acts is a corporation." Therefore the same general principle applies whenever the nature of the business transacted by the agent gives him opportunities of fraudulent representation for the benefit of his employers—whether those employers be a corporation or individuals.

We said at the outset that where courts of appeal have given decisions which are uniform and consistent, the safest course is to disregard inconsistent decisions of courts of first instance. We must, however, take the liberty of observing that we found a difficulty in seeing how, in Swift v. Winterbotham, quite apart from the 6th section of Lord Tenterden's Act, the reply of Goddard to the application made by him in his individual capacity could bind the bank. We thoroughly agree with the counsel who argued for the bank, that it would be almost impossible for a bank to carry on business if banks were to be made responsible for every untrue representation of solvency of individuals made by branch managers, for no purpose connected with the business of the bank. Possible profit accruing to the bank was not an element in that case, as it was in all the other cases, and conspicuously in Mackay's case. Where there is the element of possible profit, that being the object of the representation, and the representation is made in the course of business, as Lord Coleridge says, it is but justice, and justice is supported by authority, that the principal should be liable.

LAW LIBRARY.

Rawlinson on Instructions for Wills. By JAMES RAWLINSON, Solicitor. London: Stevens and Sons.

THE object of the author of this little work is to furnish solicitors with a guide to taking instructions for wills, and we think it may fairly be said to come up to the standard aimed at by Mr. Rawlinson, and that it will be found of service to those whose practical professional experience is limited. We cannot, however, adopt the opinion expressed in the preface, that it is incumbent on a solicitor to explain to a client (giving instructions for the preparation of his will) the extent to which his will will be affected by the several statutes relating to such document. The work before us is certainly a useful one, consisting as it does for the most part of references to such enactments as particularly relate to the subject of wills. It will also be found of use to articled clerks.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL.

MR. CHARLEY moved the second reading of this bill. The object of the Bill was to throw a protection round young girls. It was founded upon the report of a select committee, and it had received the assent of the House of Commons on two occasions——SIR H. SELWIN IBBETSON said there was no opposition to the second reading of the Bill. The Home Secretary reserved to himself the right of proposing alterations if he should think fit in committee. The Bill was then read a second time.

INFANTICIDE BILL

Mr. CHARLEY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to check infanticide. The severity of punishment too frequently defeated the object of the present law, and the Bill aimed at carrying the law into effect by proposing to mitigate the severity of the punishment.——Mr. HOLKER supported the measure, because he believed it to be a good and useful one.——The HOME SECRETARY did not oppose the second reading, as the principle of the Bill had already been accepted by the commissioners on capital punishment. But the details of the measure would require considerable modification, and he now consented to the second reading of the Bill on the understanding that it should be referred to a select committee along with the Bill introduced by the Recorder of the City of London, in order that the whole subject might be carefully discussed. The Bill was then read a second time.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT BILL.

MR. BASS, in moving the second reading of his Bill to abolish imprisonment for debt by county courts for sums under £5., intimated that if the measure reached committee he should be willing to confine it to debts of £2.——The Bill was opposed by Mr. LOPES, who argued that the power of commitment vested in the county court judges was not a hardship, because in every case the judge must be satisfied that the debtor had the means of paying, but contumaciously refused to do so.——Sir H. JAMES described the county court system as a great debt-collecting machine kept up in the interest of small traders.——Mr. ROEBUCK contended that the alteration of the law contemplated by the Bill would inflict serious injury on the working classes themselves by depriving them of the power of obtaining credit.——After some discussion, in which Mr. HOLKER, Serjt. SIMON, Mr. S. LLOYD, and Mr. FORSYTH took part, Mr. Secretary CROSS said that if any evils existed they sprang from the manner in which the law was administered rather than from the law itself, and he recommended that the County Court Judges should lay their heads together and frame some rule by which they might arrive at an accurate test of a man's ability to pay the debt he had been adjudged to pay by the court. The real object of the Act of Parliament was that where proof was given to the satisfaction of the judge that the debtor who had the money to pay, and wilfully refused, or neglected to do so in such a way as to practically amount to fraud, deserved imprisonment. The proper remedy would, therefore, be that suggested by the Select Committee — namely, in the extension of the Fraudulent Debtors' Act of 1869.——The debate closed with a short speech by Colonel BERESFORD in favour of the Bill as an instalment of justice, after which the House divided and negatived the second reading by 215 to 72. The Bill was therefore lost.
