The Judge said that all the court fees out of pocket, with the usual other costs, would be allowed. He did not like to saddle the plaintiff with a law-suit; and suggested that Mr. Templar should next court day apply again, if before then the company had not changed their mind as to the expediency of appealing.

Templar, however, pressed his application, and His Honour acceded to it.

NORWICH COUNTY COURT.

(Before W. H. Cooke, Esq., Q.C., Judge.)

Watson v. The Great Eastern Railway Company.

Railway company—Unpunctuality—Negligence—Liability—Plaintiff acting as deputy registrar of the County Court district.

This was a most important action, involving as it did the twofold question of the liability of a railway company for loss of time occasioned in consequence of want of punctuality in running their trains as advertised, and the right of a gentleman who frequently represents the registrar to sue for damages in a court in the district. The plaintiff, Mr. George Anthony Watson, is a solicitor residing at Walsingham, but is commonly believed to be a partner in the legal firm of Kent, Watson, and Watson, of Fakenham. During a somewhat protracted absence from illness of Mr. George Watson, registrar of this court, his son, Mr. G. A. Watson, has for a considerable period almost invariably occupied his seat at the public sitting of the court, which has led to a wide-spread impression that he was the regularly-appointed deputy-registrar. From the moment it became known that Mr. Watson had resolved upon taking proceedings against the defendants in a court where his presence is so familiar, an unusual degree of anxiety was manifested as to how a case so singular in all respects would be dealt with by the learned judge; and the interest was intensified on its oozing out that an application was likely to be made for having the case transferred to a court out of the district.

Watson (whose claim was for £4 4s.) conducted his own case; and, instead of occupying his accustomed chair below his Honour, took his seat at the solicitors' table.

E. Moore (from the office of W. Shaw, the solicitor to the company), appeared for the defendants.

On the usual proclamation by the high bailiff,

Moore rose to move the court under sect. 20 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, which is as follows: "If an action be brought by an officer of a County Court in the court of which he is an officer, except in the case of the registrar suing as official assignee, the judge shall, at the request of the defendant, order that the venue be changed, and that the cause be sent for hearing to the court of some convenient district of which he is not the judge; and the registrar of the first-mentioned court shall forthwith transmit by post to the registrar of such last-mentioned court a certified copy of the order for changing the venue as entered in the minute book; and the judge of such last-mentioned court shall appoint a day for the hearing, notice whereof shall be sent by post or otherwise by the registrar of such last-mentioned court to both parties."

Moore was proceeding to say that he understood that the plaintiff was deputy-registrar of the court when

His Honour remarked that he (Mr. Moore) understood what was not the fact. The plaintiff occasionally acts for his father for about the space of two hours once a month. There was only one deputy-registrar in his entire district. It was perhaps unfortunate to have an invalid registrar; but there could be no depuputy-registrar who was not legally appointed by him (his Honour) in writing, and certified by the Lord Chancellor, which the plaintiff was not—only acting as he did from month to month when his father did not come.

Moore asked that a note might be taken of his application, which, however, was refused. He then begged his Honour's attention to the fact that the plaintiff's claim was for loss of time, owing to delay of trains on the defendants' railway, and he contended at the outset that no such action could be maintained.

His Honour observed that that could be seen after the plaintiff had stated his case, when Mr. Moore would have an opportunity of cross-examination. However, he might remark that the plaintiff's particulars contained three separate charges of complaint for loss of time, for which he had put down a lump sum of £4 4s.; and he wished to know how much the plaintiff claimed for each.

The plaintiff said that the first paragraph in his particulars referred to the 6th Nov., when he was a passenger from Fakenham to Norwich. The time-table for that month announced a train to leave Fakenham at 5.55 p.m., and to arrive at Norwich at 7.30 p.m.; but it did not reach its destination until 9.30 p.m.; two hours later than it would have done. For this detention, however, he would only claim the nominal damages of 6d.

His Honour suggested whether it would not be better to strike out the first item altogether, and confine their attention to the second and third items.

The plaintiff assenting, proceeded to state that the second loss of time of which he complained occurred on the 11th of the same month, when he had arranged for leaving Walsingham by the train published to start at 7.11 a.m., and to arrive at Norwich at 9 a.m.; but that train did not run at all.

His Honour.—Did not run at all?

The plaintiff said it did not. The train stated to leave Walsingham at 9.21 a.m., and to reach Norwich at 11.25 a.m., did not arrive from Wells until after 12 noon on the day in question, by which he was detained at Walsingham three hours. The consequence was that he did not get to Norwich until 1.42 p.m. He expected to reach Homersfield, where he had some business, at 3 8 p.m.; but when he found the train did not run, he took a horse and trap from Norwich, at which he arrived back again to take the last train to Walsingham; but as he had to see some people in Norwich, that was impossible, and he remained there all night, but for which he made no charge for expenses. He charged, however, £1 1s. for horse hire from Norwich to Homersfield; and as a professional man, he claimed £2 2s. for loss of time, which he did not think would be considered too much. On the following day, he took a ticket from Norwich to Fakenham by the 12 noon train; but on arriving at Kimberley it was found that two or three trucks in a goods train had blocked the main line, and there was a detention of two hours till another train came from Dereham to carry the passengers forward. For this he claimed £1 1s. for loss of time. This was his third complaint; and with regard to it he would add that he made a personal examination of the line at Kimberley, where he found the metals in a dilapidated condition.

In cross-examination, the plaintiff said that he used his season ticket from Walsingham to Fakenham on the 11th Nov., and that he did not take a through ticket at Fakenham to Homersfield, but only a ticket to Norwich. He had read the conditions prefixed to the company's tables, which state that all that can be done will be done to secure punctuality in the departure and arrival of the trains, but that these are not guaranteed. He was neither an architect nor an engineer, but he had no hesitation in saying that the rails at Kimberley were in bad condition when he saw them on the 12th Nov.

This was the plaintiff's case.

Moore, for the defendants, said that his answer to the action was that the train did not run from Wells on the morning of the 11th Nov. in consequence of an accident which could not by any possibility have been foreseen; that a railway company was not liable for an accident unless it was shown to have taken place through gross negligence; that under no circumstances could the plaintiff recover damages for loss of time; and that he had adduced no evidence to show that the non-departure of the train on the morning in question was not a pure accident.

His Honour asked what could be greater negligence than a train which was advertised to run and did not run?

Moore submitted that it rested upon the plaintiff to prove that it could have been run.

His Honour was of a different opinion, and thought the onus probandi lay upon the defendants.

Moore essayed to fortify his contention by quoting several decisions in railway districts; but as this failed to convince his Honour that the plaintiff had no case, he proceeded to call evidence as to the cause of the non-running of the train from Wells on the morning of the 11th Nov., and the delays arising out of this. The first witness was John Phillips, who said that he was the driver of the train which was appointed to start from Wells at 7 a.m., on the day alluded to, but which did not run in consequence of the bursting of a tube in the boiler about a quarter of an hour previously. It was a pure accident, such as no care could have prevented. In other respects, the engine was in good order. There was no other engine at Wells to take on the train, which could not be started until an engine arrived from Norwich. He had been twenty-three years in the defendants' service. The engine spoken of was taken by himself out of the factory at Stratford new in 1862.

Thomas Stevenson, district superintendent at Norwich, narrated the steps which were had recourse to by him on receiving information by telegraph of the bursting of the tube, so as to prevent inconvenience to the public. The engine which took the train from Wells was the one which left Norwich at 7 a.m.

William Ward, sub-inspector of permanent way on the Great Eastern Railway, said that he was at Kimberley station immediately after the trucks went off the siding on the 12th Nov. He examined the metals, and found them in very good condition, observing neither defect in the road or rail. The main line was cleared about 2.35 p.m.

Samuel Long, platelayer, gave corroborative evidence as to the state of the line at Kimberley, but in cross-examination admitted that a portion of it was out of gauge, caused by the trucks, in coming off the metals, slightly forcing it from its exact position.

William Smith, driver of the goods train at Kimberley on the 12th Nov., also ascribed the trucks getting off the siding there as purely accidental, such as no foresight could have prevented, and which could not be accounted for.

This being the defendants' case,

The plaintiff, on the invitation of the court, briefly commented on the whole facts, contending that the published time tables of a railway company were a promise that the trains would run; and that if they did not, the company was liable for the breach of faith. With reference to the episode of the 11th Nov., his complaint was that the defendants were guilty of negligence in not being able to run a train from Wells, which was a terminal station, from the fact that they had no second engine there, which they ought to have had. He had only to say in conclusion, that he would not have minded much if he had been but delayed once in a week; but seeing that this occurred no fewer than three times in one week, he submitted that he had sustained such special and substantial damage as entitled him to the judgment of the court.

Moore followed, per contra, arguing that all the evidence went to show that the delays in question were ascribable to pure accident, and therefore that the company could not be held liable.

His Honour said that the case was a most important one—so important, indeed, that he should like to give a decision in it which might be looked upon as a precedent—not only for the Great Eastern Railway, but for every railway in the kingdom. As at present advised, he was against the defendants on both points which had been raised by their advocate, in which he contended that the delays could not have been helped, and that damages could not be recovered for loss of time. He was disposed to think that there was negligence, gross negligence, in having only one engine at a place like Wells, the terminal station for two lines of railway. There was nothing to take a railway company out of the law of responsibility which attached to the mode of travelling in the old coaching days, by which, if one horse broke down, the proprietor of the coach ought to be in a position immediately to supply its place with another, or be held liable for the delay. With regard to the contention that the plaintiff could not recover for loss of time, he (his Honour) was ready to admit that had the plaintiff been a traveller for pleasure, he could not have recovered, but he hardly thought this could apply to a professional man, the nature of whose business called him to different places. However, he should carefully weigh the whole facts before giving his judgment; and if either side could submit anything fresh to him bearing upon the points which had been raised, he would be glad to receive it. If, when he gave his judgment, it was considered on either side of a nature which it was desirable to have reviewed in the court above, he would not be indisposed, on proper cause shown, to grant a case; for, as he had previously observed, the points which had been raised were of the greatest importance alike to railway companies themselves, and the whole travelling community.

READING COUNTY COURT.

Wednesday, Dec. 17.

(Before H. J. Stonor, Esq., Judge.)

Prentis v. Mortimore.

Agreement between solicitor and client—Set-off—Bill of costs in liquidation to be taxed by registrar, although liquidation fell through—5 B. R. 1871.

His Honour now delivered judgment as follows: In these two actions brought by the same plaintiff against the same defendant, the facts and circumstances are nearly identical, although the causes of action are certainly distinct. The plaintiff, a grocer in Reading, being in difficulties, instructed the defendant, a solicitor in London, to appear and defend several actions brought against him at the end of last year and beginning of the present year, and during that period and up to April last, paid defendant's clerk large sums of money, amounting, as the plaintiff deposes, to £60 or £70; but as the defendant's clerk deposes to less than £50, on account of instalments and costs payable to the plaintiff in such actions, and the charges and expenses of the defendant Mortimore in defending such actions for the present plaintiff. No account of such payments to the defendant's clerk was kept by the defendant or his clerk, but vouchers for about £35, paid in various sums for instalments and costs, were produced by the defendant's clerk, and the defendant's clerk further deposed that he had sent several other vouchers to the plaintiff, and that except about £2 or £3 for incidental expenses of journeys, messages, &c., the whole of the money advanced by the plaintiff was applied in payment of instalments and costs. The plaintiff denies that he ever received any vouchers from the defendant, and never saw the vouchers produced in court previously to such production. It is quite clear that the defendant was guilty of gross neglect in permitting his clerk to receive moneys from the defendant without keeping proper accounts and giving proper receipts, and although it is perhaps not absolutely necessary for me to express an opinion on this part of the case, I think that it will be convenient and proper for me to say that on the balance of the evidence before me, I am of opinion that the plaintiff advanced at least £65 to the defendant's clerk, and that the discrepancy between their evidence on this point may possibly be accounted for by a particular sum of £18, which the plaintiff positively swore to have paid to the defendant's clerk under special circumstances, and which the defendant's clerk did not venture positively to deny, although he stated that he believed he had never received it. At the end of March in the present year, according to the defendant's evidence, the defendant advised the plaintiff to present a petition for liquidation and free himself from his liabilities, and thereupon the plaintiff asked the defendant if he could do it for £50, but ultimately offered and promised to pay the defendant £60 for the expenses of liquidation, viz.: £10 in cash, and £50 by a promissory note of Mr. F. Halliday, dated the 25th March 1870, for the above amount, with interest at £5 per cent. per month, payable on demand. On the 9th of April, the defendant filed the petition for liquidation by the plaintiff in this court, and on the same day the defendant obtained the promissory note of £50 from the plaintiff, but only upon his, the defendant's, varying his agreement as to the costs of the liquidation and undertaking to carry him through for £40 instead of £60; and the defendant, on cross-examination, stated that he did so because he would never have obtained the promissory note without. The defendant then signed the following memorandum:—"Received of Mr. Thomas Prentis a promissory note of Mr. Frank Halliday for £50, and I undertake in the event of the said note being duly paid to return to Mr. Prentis the sum of £20 thereout. (Signed) T. H. MORTIMORE, 9th April 1873." The £10 cash had previously been paid to the defendant but no mention of it was made in this memorandum; and in the petition for liquidation the promissory note for £50 was returned as part of the debtor's estate, but no mention was made of the £10 paid to the defendant, nor of the £20 agreed to be repaid by him, which I regret to say has very much the appearance of a fraud upon the plaintiff's creditors, but may have happened through inadvertence, and I trust that such was the case. So far the plaintiff and defendant are substantially agreed, except that the plaintiff states that no other sum than £40 was ever mentioned as the costs of the liquidation. The plaintiff and defendant are further agreed that previously to the filing of the petition a conversation took place between them as to the costs of defending the action at the beginning of the year. The defendant deposes that it merely amounted to this, that such costs should be put into the list of debts at a lump sum of £25. The plaintiff deposes that nothing was said to this effect and that he never read the list of creditors, but that previously to filing the petition, and handing over the promissory note, and taking the defendant's undertaking to repay the £20, he said to the defendant "I suppose we are square up to this time," and the defendant said, in reply, "certainly." Upon this part of the transaction, I think, on the balance of evidence before me, that the real agreement between the parties must be held to have come to this: That if the liquidation was carried out the defendant was to limit his claim to £25 against the estate and look to obtain his costs of the liquidation, not exceeding £40, out of the £50 promissory note returned as an asset, but if the liquidation fell through he was to limit his claim against the plaintiff to such last-mentioned costs not exceeding £40, payable out of the promissory note for £50. In the latter case the defendant would also have had to repay the £20 according to his undertaking, but in the former case it is difficult to say what the parties contemplated, as £10 part of the balance or sum of £20 would have passed to the trustee in liquidation, and the remaining £10 ought certainly also to have been paid to such trustee, and both would have been divisible amongst the creditors. The £50 promissory note, together with £2 10s. for interest, was duly paid to the defendant by the drawer. The petition for liquidation fell through for want of a sufficient number of creditors at the first meeting, when no resolution was proposed nor any adjournment moved. The plaintiff then brought his action in this court to recover back the £20 on the undertaking. The defendant pleaded as a set-off the amount of a bill of costs (£34 17s. 9d.) for defending the actions already mentioned, which, although it had never been delivered, he had a right to do, according to the case of Brown v. Tibbits (11 C.B., N. S., 855); but as he had delivered no bill of costs, neither had he delivered any particulars of his set-off within the time required by the County Courts Acts, and consequently there was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the set-off was disallowed. Under the circumstances, however, I allowed a new trial, with liberty to plead the set-off, on payment of costs by defendant, and on his bringing the money into court, and after hearing it, I am still of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and that the defendant is not entitled to the claim which he has made as a set-off in that action, as I think the same was released by him on obtaining the promissory note, and further that it was previously satisfied substantially, if not fully, by the payments made on account to his clerk. The plaintiff subsequently brought the second action to recover £42 10s., the balance of the promissory note of £50, £10 cash and £2 10s. interest on the note (after deducting the £20 sued for in the first action on the undertaking) as money had and received by defendant to the use of the plaintiff, and the defendant has pleaded as a set-off his untaxed bill of costs in the liquidation, amounting to £38 8s. 9d., and also a further set-off of £14 17s. 9d., the unsatisfied balance of his bill of costs for defending the actions already mentioned, after deducting the £20 due on his undertaking and claimed in the first action. On the grounds which I have already mentioned, and particularly the view which I take of the real agreement between the parties, I disallow the second item of the set-off, but I allow the first item of the bill of costs in liquidation, subject to taxation by the proper officer, whom I think to be the registrar of this court in bankruptcy, under the fifth rule of the Bankruptcy Rules 1871. There will be a verdict for the plaintiff in the first action for £20 with costs, on the higher scale, payable in fourteen days, and there will be a verdict for the plaintiff in the second action for £42 10s., subject to the defendant's set-off of £38 8s. 9d., or so much as the proper taxing officer may have found or may find to be due, with costs according to the amount ultimately recovered by the plaintiff, payable in a month; costs of application for new trial to be included.

The plaintiff and defendant agreed that the costs of liquidation should be taxed by the registrar, without prejudice to the defendant's right to appeal in both actions.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PARTNERSHIP—SEPARATE ESTATE—PROFITS OF SEPARATE ESTATE SET TO PROFIT AND LOSS ACCOUNT—JOINT ESTATE.—C. and M., who carried on business as ship chandlers, each applied in his own name for certain shares in a shipowners' company. Each paid the application and allotment money on the shares allotted to him, and the shares were registered in the names of the partners severally. Each partner drew upon the partnership funds for the payment of calls upon the shares, and the amounts so drawn were debited in the books of the firm to the individual partners, and opposite to these entries in the books of the firm each partner signed his initials in red ink. The dividends on the shares were, however, carried to the profit and loss account of the firm. The holding of ships or shares in shipowning companies formed no part of the business of the firm, but it appeared that the partners had purchased the shares under the impression that the possession of them would be the means of introducing custom and business to the partnership. C. became bankrupt and M. claimed the shares standing in C.'s name, as joint estate of the firm: Held (reversing the decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, that the entries in the books of the firm amounted to a statement in writing signed by the partner that the shares were to be separate and not joint estate, and that the mode of dealing with the dividend was not contradictory of that statement, inasmuch as the effect of it was the same as if the partners (who each held an equal number of the shares) had been separately credited with the dividends: (Ex parte Bolland; re Clint, 29 L. ANTENUPTIAL SETTLEMENT BY A TRADER—COVENANT TO SETTLE ALL AFTER ACQUIRED PROPERTY OF HUSBAND—BANKRUPTCY—INVALIDITY OF COVENANT.—A covenant in an antenuptial settlement by the husband to settle upon such trusts as the trustees should require all the real and personal estate of or to which he should become possessed or entitled during the coverture, is void as against his trustee in bankruptcy as being against public policy, and an attempt to withdraw the whole of his property from the just claims of his creditors: (Ex parte Bolland; re Clint, 29 L. COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Tuesday, Dec. 16.

Re MOTION; MAULE v. DAVIS.

Partnership—Sale of bankrupt's property—Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 72—Jurisdiction.

THIS appeal occupied the whole of yesterday, and this morning the judgment of the court was delivered.

The appeal was from an order made by the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy on the 28th July last. This order was made upon the application of Messrs. Davis and Wigginton, the present assignees in bankruptcy of Mr. George Motion, who was formerly in partnership with Messrs. John Hay and E. N. Briggs in the distillery business of Grimble and Co., in Albany-street, and the order declared void a sale made in 1869 by Mr. Staunton, the then assignee of the bankrupt's estate, of the bankrupt's interest in the business to his partners, Messrs. Hay and Briggs, for £13,025., on the ground that the sale was improperly made and at an undervalue. The sale was made under an agreement dated the 15th April 1869, and was afterwards sanctioned by an order of the Court of Chancery on the 15th July 1869, made in two partnership suits of Hay v. Motion and Motion v. Hay, in which a decree had been made on the 30th of April 1864, for the dissolution of the partnership, and the sale of the whole business as a going concern. After the sale of the bankrupt's interest to his partners, they sold and assigned the whole business to Mr. George Maule. The order of the Chief Judge declared this sale also to be void, and directed the whole business to be sold as a going concern, as originally provided by the decree in the partnership suits, and gave Mr. Maule liberty to bid at the sale. The sale was afterwards advertised to be held on the 19th inst. The suit of Maule v. Davis was instituted by Mr. Maule in Vice-Chancellor Bacon's Court against Messrs. Davis and Wittington, and was, by special leave, heard originally before the Court of Appeal. By the bill Maule expressed his readiness to have it declared that the sale of the bankrupt's interest in the business was not binding on his estate, but Mr. Maule sought to have it also declared that he is entitled to a charge on the business, or on the bankrupt's interest in it, for the £13,025, which he advanced to Hay and Briggs to enable them to pay for the bankrupt's interest, which they purchased.

Swanston, Q.C. and Sterling were for Mr. Maule.

J. W. Chitty and Romer appeared for the assignees.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that in their Lordships' opinion the respondents had failed to prove any such fraudulent scheme as they alleged on the part of the bankrupt's partners to obtain his share in the business at an under value. Nothing which occurred before the agreement of the 15th April 1869, appeared to require or to warrant the inference of a fraudulent purpose. The provisions of that agreement were prima facie fair and proper, and upon the whole evidence their Lordships did not doubt that Mr. Staunton and his solicitor, in entering into the agreement, acted with an honest purpose. The objection to this agreement, which was mainly relied on by the Chief Judge, was founded upon the construction of sect. 137 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, which gives the assignees of a bankrupt power, with the sanction of the court, to sell by private contract the bankrupt's book debts and the goodwill of his trade or business. Their Lordships thought that section did not apply to a sale by the assignee of a bankrupt's share in the goodwill of the business, and his interest in the book debts of a dissolved partnership, especially in the case of a sale to the bankrupt's partners, who were generally the most advantageous purchasers of his interest. Nor did their Lordships think that there was any force in the objection founded upon the existence of the previous order of the Court of Chancery for the sale of the whole business as a going concern. Notwithstanding that order, the Court of Chancery had power to give effect to the agreement, and that which would be no objection to the agreement in the court which made the original order, could be no objection to it in another court. But, though their Lordships were satisfied that no case of fraud had been made out by the respondents, they were by no means satisfied that there had not been material error in the mode in which the value of the bankrupt's interest had been ascertained. They were relieved from any difficulty as to this part of the case by the submission of the appellant to pay, in addition to what he had already paid for the bankrupt's interest, such sum as, upon inquiry, might prove requisite to make up the full value of the bankrupt's interest. Their Lordships did not think that the whole sale ought to be set aside, upon the ground of error, in the absence of fraud, but an inquiry would be directed to be made by one of the registrars in bankruptcy as to what additional sum ought to be paid by Mr. Maule for the bankrupt's interest. His Lordship said it was his duty to add that if their Lordships had agreed with the Chief Judge in his view of the facts of the case they would have been unable to concur in the propriety of his decision that it was competent to the Court of Bankruptcy to work out the original decree of the Court of Chancery in the partnership suits. With the interpretation put by the Chief Judge upon sect. 72 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, their Lordships could not agree. That section gave to the Court of Bankruptcy very large powers to decide all questions necessary for the proper administration of a bankrupt's estate; but it did not enable the assignees to draw within the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy the owners of property which was not vested in the assignees, and who were not originally subject to the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and still less did it enable the Court of Bankruptcy to work out a decree for the dissolution of a partnership previously made by the Court of Chancery. No doubt the Court of Bankruptcy would be able to compel a purchaser to reconvey property of a bankrupt which he had fraudulently acquired, and a prior order of the Court of Chancery made by consent would not stand in the way of this being done; but in such a case as the present, where the purchase money had been already paid and distributed among the creditors, who had received 20s. in the pound, such an order would only be made upon the ordinary equitable terms of refunding the purchase money, and assignees in bankruptcy were as much bound as any other plaintiffs to return the purchase money in such a case. With regard to the suit of Maule v. Davis, their Lordships thought the plaintiff could not sustain it, and the bill must be dismissed with costs. Mr. Maule would, however, be entitled to receive his costs in the bankruptcy motion, so far as they had been increased by reason of the charges of fraud, and he might set-off those costs against the costs in the suit.

The Lords Justices concurred.

LIVERPOOL COUNTY COURT.

Thursday, Dec. 4.

(Before Mr. Registrar Watson.)

Re John Ellis.

Bankruptcy Act 1869—Liquidator's right to prove and vote—Resolutions—Practice.

Held, that a liquidator of a joint stock company being voluntarily wound-up is entitled to prove and vote at meetings of creditors. Bills of exchange held by a creditor, but not produced at meeting, should be produced on registration to cure objection to their non production at the meeting.

This was an application to register certain resolutions of creditors, whereby they determined to liquidate the affairs of the debtor, by arrangement, and to appoint Mr. Bolland trustee. The question at issue involved an important point of practice. It appeared that the debtor was a shareholder in the County Palatine Loan Company, now in liquidation, and held twenty £10 shares. He became a director, and introduced many of his friends who were desirous of obtaining loans from the company, and in some cases he became guarantee for repayment of the loans. In respect of three such loans he was surety to the extent of £107, and on default of the original borrowers he became liable for principal as well as interest, the latter computed at the rate of 216 per cent., and making £528. He also borrowed on his own account £30, of which he repaid £10, and the claim of the company in respect of this loan was £409 13s. 2d. He was also liable on unpaid calls on his shares of £4 each, amounting to £80. At the first meeting of his creditors trade debts were proved which amounted to £684, and a proof of debt was tendered by the liquidator of the loan company for £1066. That proof was objected to by the chairman, on the ground that the rate of interest was exorbitant, and could not in equity be enforced. The trade creditors thereupon resolved to ignore the claim and liquidate the estate by arrangement, and appoint their own trustee.

Alsop, for the liquidator, insisted upon his right to vote, notwithstanding the objection to his proof.

Sampson, for several of the trade creditors, admitted the right of a creditor to whose proof objection had been raised to vote, but in this instance he submitted that a liquidator had no such right in competition with the rest of the creditors.

Alsop submitted that by virtue of the 95th and 133rd section of the Joint Stock Companies Act the official liquidator had full power to vote, and he accordingly signed a resolution to liquidate and to appoint the liquidator trustee. Both those resolutions were tendered for registration, and the matter came before the registrar on the question of registration.

Sampson and Alsop, solicitors, appeared for the parties concerned.

The Registrar said the first question before him was the consideration of the objections to the proofs of debt. The first referred to was marked "objected to" on the ground of the bill of exchange given to the creditor not having been produced at the meeting.

Sampson now produced the bill, and the registrar held it sufficient to cure the defect of its non-production at the meeting. The next objection taken was to the right of the liquidator to vote at the meeting.

Sampson contended that the Joint Stock Companies Act only conferred power upon a liquidator to prove and rank for dividend, and that in the absence of any authority the liquidator could not vote. Assuming he could vote, he had no power to accept a composition. The debtor's petition was for either composition or liquidation; and, as the liquidator could not accept the former, he had no right to vote for the latter, as one of the principles of the Act was that all creditors should be on an equality.

Alsop argued that by the 80th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, a company might vote by an agent duly authorised, and in the present instance the company, although in liquidation, did, by virtue of one of the sections of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, continue in existence for the purpose of winding-up, and the liquidator became its agent for that purpose, and as such agent had a right to vote. The registrar assented to the latter argument, and held that the liquidator, as the agent of the company, was entitled to vote.

Sampson then took exception to the claim of the company in respect of interest, but the registrar held that the debtor being a party to the promissory note, on which the company claimed, and the amount of interest to be paid being specifically stated on the face of the document, he was liable for the amount claimed. The parties then came to an agreement to nominate the liquidator as trustee, and tendered a resolution signed by the creditors to that effect, but it was refused registration on the ground that it was not the resolution passed at the meeting.

A new meeting of creditors was ordered.

Re Fernie Brothers and Co.

A. entered into a guarantee to meet bills drawn by B. and accepted by C. for £50,000 to the same extent as if endorsed. The bank parted with the bills, and they were discounted by A. without indorsement, and all the parties thereto failed.

Held, that the bank which accepted the guarantee having parted with the bills without indorsement by A., deprived themselves of the right of proving against the estate of A. A.'s name not being on the bills, there was no right of proof against his estate. The true test of right of proof was this, could the bank which accepted the guarantee have sued successfully on the guarantee without having the bills in their hands?

This was an application for the admission of a proof of debt for £50,000, against the estate of the debtors, shipowners in Liverpool, who executed a deed of inspectorship in 1866. The facts of the case are fully set forth in the judgment of the court.

Wheeler and Bigham, instructed by Freshfields, of London, supported the proof.

Gully, instructed by Hull, Stone, and Fletcher, opposed.

His Honour, in giving judgment, said: In this case I am asked to allow the official liquidators of Barned's Banking Company to rank as creditors against the estate of Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co., for a sum of £50,000 under a certain letter of guarantee hereafter referred to. The facts of the case are these. In the early part of the year 1866, Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co., of Liverpool; Messrs. W. H. Daunt and Co., of Liverpool; Messrs. M'Ewen, Bryson, and Co., of Glasgow; and Messrs. James Watson and Co., of Glasgow, desired to raise £50,000 for operations on the Stock Exchange. Arrangements were made with Barned's Banking Company for the advance of the money. Barned's bank, however, not being in a position to provide ready money to such an amount, entered into negotiations with the Agra and Masterman's Bank in London, the ultimate result of which was that on the 6th March four bills of exchange for £5000 each, and on the 15th March six bills for £5000 each, were drawn by Messrs. W. H. Daunt and Co., the first four on Messrs. M'Ewen, Bryson, and Co., and the last six on Messrs. James Watson and Co. These bills were on or about the dates on which they were drawn paid into Barned's Bank, and were immediately passed on by them without endorsement, but with a guarantee of payment at maturity to the Agra and Masterman's Bank, to be held by them as security, they allowing Barneds to draw upon them in separate bills for £50,000. This sum of £50,000, less discount and charges, passed to the credit of Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co. at Barned's, and was drawn out by them. On the 8th March, the day on which the first batch of bills was drawn, Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co. gave to Barned's Banking Company a guarantee in the following terms:—

48, Brown's-buildings, Exchange,
Liverpool, 6th March, 1866.

To Barned's Banking Company (limited).

Gentlemen,—We hereby guarantee to you the due payment of the undermentioned drafts the same as if they came endorsed by us:—

W. H. Daunt and Co., on M'Ewen Bryson, and Co., £5000 at six months' date, dated 6th March.
W. H. Daunt and Co., on M'Ewen, Bryson, and Co., £5000 at six months' date, dated 6th March.
W. H. Daunt and Co., on M'Ewen, Bryson, and Co., £5000 at six months' date, dated 6th March.
W. H. Daunt and Co., on M'Ewen, Bryson, and Co., £5000 at six months' date, dated 6th March.

All due 9th September next.—We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants, FERNIE BROS. & CO.

On the 9th April, Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co, gave Barned's Banking Company a further letter of guarantee in the following terms:—

Liverpool, 9th April, 1866.

To Barned's Banking Company (limited).

Gentlemen,—In reference to the operation of the advance of £50,000 in the acceptances of the Agra and Masterman Bank at three months' date against deposits of certain bills of exchange drawn at six months' date by Messrs. W. H. Daunt and Co., as follows:—

£20,000 on M'Ewen, Bryson, and Co., due 9th Sept.
£30,000 on James Watson and Co., due 18th Sept.

In consideration of your giving your guarantee to the Agra and Masterman Bank for the transaction, we hereby guarantee due payment of the above acceptances of Messrs. M'Ewen, Bryson, and Co., and James Watson and Co., to the same extent as though we were endorsers thereon.—We remain, gentlemen, yours faithfully, FERNIE BROS. and CO.

All the parties engaged in the transaction failed, and none of the bills were paid at maturity. I am of opinion that there was good consideration for both the guarantees. But by the language of the guarantees, the liability of Fernie Brothers and Co., is expressly limited to their liability as endorsers; all that they undertake to do is to place themselves with regard to Barneds in the same position as endorsers. If it had been intended that the guarantee should be one simply of due payment of the bills at maturity, it would have been easy to have so framed it, as was, in fact, done in the guarantee which Barned's gave the Agra and Masterman's in respect of these very bills. I cannot suppose that the managers of Barned's Bank were ignorant of the effect of this limitation. They, therefore, knowing of the limitation and of its effect in the case of the first batch of bills, parted with the bills, after having received the first guarantee, and in the case of the second batch accepted a guarantee in the same terms, after having parted with the bills, in both cases without endorsement. Nor is there, in my opinion, anything extraordinary or unreasonable in their so doing, or any reason to think that a full knowledge of the meaning and effect of the limitation was not in their minds; for if they had remained solvent, and the bills had not been paid at maturity, they would, in the natural course of business, have again become the holders, they would have had to pay the Agra and Masterman's Bank, and would then have been entitled to have their bills back—indeed, at any time by securing the Agra and Masterman's, they could have again made themselves the holders. In my opinion, by parting with the bills they deprived themselves of their remedy as holders, and, as a matter of fact, the Agra and Masterman's Bank have proved as the holders against the estates of M'Ewen, Bryson, and Co., and James Watson and Co. The test is, could Barneds have sued successfully on this guarantee without having the bills in their hands? I think not. I am therefore of opinion that they have no claim to rank as creditors in respect of the sum claimed under it.

Gully asked that the costs should follow the result.

His Honour assented.

Wheeler said that as there was no necessity to give notice of appeal, except for the purpose of reducing the amount of deposit below £20, he had nothing to say until he had consulted with his clients.

LEGAL NEWS.

Solicitor elected Mayor. — Blackburn — John Pickop, Esq.

The Baldacchino Case.—There will be no appeal in this case, recently decided by Dr. Tristram, as to the erection of a baldacchino at St. Barnabas, Pimlico. The Chancellor, it will be recollected, held that such ornaments were unlawful in the Church of England.

CHURCH LECTURES.—A correspondent in the Times of the 22nd Dec., suggests, that by 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 4, ss. 17, 19, 20, 21, and 22, it is decidedly illegal for a layman to lecture in any church without the license of the primate or diocesan, first obtained in all cases. This statute subjects the offender to an imprisonment of three months.

THE JUDICATURE ACT.—The Globe alludes to the "possibility of a short Bill being introduced next Session to postpone the operation of this Act for another year." But "at present there appears no need of such a measure." It is suggested that "it would be better to postpone the initiation of a new state of affairs than to begin it with a half finished or ill-considered mode of procedure."

BURCH V. THE REV. JOHN REID.—On Saturday, Mr. G. H. Brooks, the Proctor, on the part of the Bishop of Exeter, received a petition of appeal in this case, recently heard in the Arches Court, and in which the defendant, the vicar of Tregony, Cornwall, was suspended for three years on a charge of immorality. The appeal will to-day be lodged at the Judicial Committee.

THE directors of the Law Union Insurance Company have issued a notice in which they say that they think it desirable to direct the attention of their insured to the great increase in wages and in cost of materials, which in numerous cases renders reinstatement of premises destroyed by fire for the amount insured out of the question. It therefore becomes important that policy-holders should revise their insurances, with the view of satisfying themselves that their property is insured for a proper amount.

HIS HONOUR, the Vice-Chancellor Malins, has sanctioned the payment of a second dividend of 3s. 6d. in the pound to the creditors of the International Life Assurance Society, payable at the offices of Mr. Maynard, 55, Old Broad-street, on Wednesday next and the two following Wednesdays. It is announced that any of the creditors who have not received the first dividend can receive it with the second, provided there be nothing due from them in respect of loans on policies, and that they produce what is required of them in support of their title.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.—The will of the late Lord Chief Justice Bovill has been proved by his relict and eldest son. The document bears date the 20th Jan. 1870, and is wholly in the handwriting of the testator, whose personalty has been sworn under £70,000. The testator bequeaths certain personalty to his widow absolutely, and the income of the residue to her use for life, with remainder to his descendants as she may appoint. The testator's shares in the County and Borough Hall Guildford Company (Limited), are bequeathed to the Mayor and Corporation of Guildford, the income and votes in respect thereof to be used and applied for the benefit of the Guildford Working Man's Institution, of which the testator was formerly the president.

THE TEMPLE FIRE, A.D. 1737.—On the 4th Jan. (Old Style) about seven o'clock, p.m. "a dreadful fire broke out in the Inner Temple, adjoining to the Hall, and continued to burn with great fury until five o'clock next morning, which entire consumed the Inner Temple, kitchen, buttery, and the great stairs that lead to the hall; but the hall was with great difficulty preserved, which was owing to the party-wall. It likewise consumed upwards of thirty chambers. At its breaking out there was a great scarcity of water, otherwise 'tis thought it would have been extinguished without doing any considerable damage. 'Tis said that several writings of great consequence were consumed in the flames. H.R.H. the Prince of Wales came there about eleven o'clock p.m., and by his presence he animated the people, gave money to the firemen, &c., and staid until it was quite over. A party of the Foot Guards were placed in the Temple Gardens, to take care of the valuable goods, writings, &c., that were carried thither." In the Gentleman's Magazine, vol 7, p. 59, it is stated that this was a considerable fire, and that it caused much loss of property.

THE NEW LEGAL KNIGHTS.—Sir Archibald Paull Burt, who received the honour of knighthood last week from Her Majesty, at Windsor Castle, is the second son of the late Mr. George Henry Burt, and was born in the year 1810. He was educated at a private school at Richmond, and was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple, in Michaelmas Term 1845, and practised at St. Christopher's. In 1849 he was appointed Attorney-General of the Island of St. Christopher, in 1860 Commissioner of the Civil Court in Western Australia, and in the following year Chief Justice of that colony. He has been a Speaker of the House of Assembly in St. Christopher, a member of the Legislative and Executive Council there, and a member of the Administrative Committee, and Chancellor of the Diocese of Antigua and the Leeward Islands. Sir Archibald married, in 1836, Louisa, daughter of Mr. John Bryan, M.D., of St Christopher's. Sir William Henry Doyle, who was knighted on the same occasion, is the only son of the late Mr. Edward Doyle, and was born in the year 1823. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in Easter Term, 1846, and in 1858 was appointed Assistant Justice of the General Court of the Bahamas. In 1865 he was promoted to the Chief Justiceship. He is also Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, and President of the Legislative Council of the Bahamas. Sir William H. Doyle is married to Miss Sarah Johnson, daughter of Mr. Samuel Johnson, of Nassau, in the Bahamas.

MUNICIPAL ELECTION PETITIONS. — Baron Martin and Mr. Justice Mellor, two of the judges on the rota for the trial of parliamentary election petitions, have appointed Tuesday, the 13th Jan., for the trial of the municipal petitions from Nottingham and Hereford, and Tuesday, the 20th proximo, for the hearing of the petitions from Liverpool and Manchester. On the first day of trial the barristers appointed—namely, Mr. Dowdeswell, Q.C., Mr. T. W. Saunders, and Mr. Biron—will sit at 11 o'clock; on the subsequent days at 10 o'clock.

ON Wednesday the Chancery vacation commenced and lasts until the 6th Jan., inclusive. The law offices will be closed until Tuesday morning. The Master of the Rolls is the vacation judge during the Christmas recess, and, according to a notice just issued, will, if required, sit at the Rolls' House, on Wednesday, the 31st Dec., and on Wednesday, the 7th Jan. "Any person desirous of making any application on either of those days must give notice at the Rolls' House before four o'clock on the previous Monday." The judge will take applications of an urgent nature, and his address can be obtained at the Rolls' House. The chambers of the Master of the Rolls will be open on the 24th, on the 30th, and 31st inst., and on the 1st, 2nd, and 6th Jan. from eleven to one o'clock. The Courts of Common Pleas and the Exchequer will sit at Nisi Prius in and after Hilary Term on the same days. The first sittings on Tuesday, the 13th Jan.; second sittings, Monday, the 19th Jan.; and third sittings, on Monday, the 26th Jan., at Westminster. The courts will not sit in London during Term. After Term, in Middlesex, the sittings are appointed for 2nd Feb., and in London on Monday, the 16th Feb.

BARON COLERIDGE.—The Right Hon. Sir John Duke Coleridge, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, who is to be raised to the Peerage as Baron Coleridge, of Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, is the elder son of the Right Hon. Sir John Taylor Coleridge, of Heath's Court, Ottery St. Mary (many years a Puisne Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench), by a daughter of the late Rev. Gilbert Buchanan, LL.D. He was born in the year 1821, was educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford, where he obtained a Scholarship, and graduating B.A. in 1842, was afterwards elected to a Fellowship at Exeter College. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1847, and went the Western Circuit, of which he was for some years the "leader." He held the Recordership of Portsmouth from 1855 to 1866, and was made a Queen's Counsel and elected a bencher of his inn in 1861. He sat in the House of Commons as M.P. for Exeter from 1865 down to last month, when he accepted the Lord Chief Justiceship. He held the Solicitor-Generalship from 1868 down to 1871, and succeeded Sir Robert P. Collier in the Attorney-Generalship in the latter year. He was sworn a Privy Councillor a week or two ago. Sir John Coleridge married in 1846 or 1847 Miss Jane Fortescue Seymour, daughter of the Rev. George T. Seymour, of Farringford, in the Isle of Wight, by whom he has with other issue an eldest son, Bernard John Seymour, now of Trinity College, Oxford.

DEATH OF CHIEF BARON PIGOT.—Lord Chief Baron Pigot died on Monday morning, at his residence in Merrion-square, Dublin, after a protracted illness. He had been in very delicate health for some months, and had been unable to preside in his court since the commencement of Term; but no serious fears were felt until the last few days, and up to Saturday evening he himself expected that he would recover. His illness then assumed an alarming aspect, and, in fact, a report of his death was current in the city. He made a slight rally, however, and survived the attack of the disease until four o'clock on Monday morning. He was born at Kilworth, County Cork, in 1805, and was the son of a physician. In 1826 he was called to the Bar, after graduating in Trinity College; in 1835 he received a silk gown; in 1839 he was made a Bencher of the King's Inns, and was appointed to the office of Solicitor-General under the Melbourne Administration. Next year he succeeded to the office of Attorney-General, and was made a Privy Councillor; and in 1846 the late Sir Maziere Brady, who then presided in the Court of Exchequer, having been elevated to the rank of Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Mr. Pigot was appointed first Roman Catholic Chief Baron, with a general recognition of his fitness. From 1839 to 1846 he represented the borough of Clonmel. The Lord Chief Baron was a visitor of the College of Maynooth, and a member of the Senate of the Queen's University, a Commissioner of National Education, and also connected with other public bodies.

The examiners will continue the practice of proposing questions in Bankruptcy and the Criminal and Proceedings before Justices of the Peace, in order that candidates who have given their attention to these subjects may have the advantage of answering such questions, and having the correctness of their answers in those departments taken into consideration in summing up the merit of their general examination.

I am, Sir, your very obedient servant,
E. W. WILLIAMSON, Secretary.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it

A CHRISTMAS APPEAL.—I shall feel obliged by your kindly inserting the following letter in the LAW TIMES. I am widow of the late Henry Eldon George Bankes, who is the son of the late Rev. Edward Bankes, canon of Bristol and Gloucester, and Chaplain to Her Majesty, and grandson to the late Earl of Eldon, late Lord Chancellor of England. Acting under the advice of counsel, I have filed a bill in Chancery against Mr. John Scott Bankes, The Rev. Eldon Surtees Bankes, and Mr. Frances Serrell, to pray the court to declare that I am entitled to a share in the estate of the late Lord Eldon, but I am informed by my solicitor that it may be eighteen months before my case can be heard. In the meantime I have no means of subsistence. I have been in the workhouse, but owing to the kindness of friends have been able to escape from it for a few weeks. My friends can no longer support me, and I must return. Only those who have lived amongst the higher classes can appreciate the horrors of that dreadful place, and I do beg you to allow me to appeal to the legal Profession to save me from spending my Christmas week separated from my child, amongst the lowest of the low, in the Union. Doing my utmost I cannot earn more than 8d. a day at needlework, but my child and I cannot live upon this in the winter weather. The Rev. Thomas Pigott, 16, Belgrave-road, Upper Holloway, has kindly consented to receive donations on my behalf.

LOUISA BANKES,
Widow of the late Henry Eldon Bankes.

ARTICLED CLERK.—With reference to Greville's case reported on p. 70 of your issue of 29th Nov. last, can any of your readers inform me of any case in which it has been held that Sunday service in a choir (on salary) is an office or employment contrary to 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127. A. B.

BEALL v. SMITH.—The letter which appears in your issue of to-day, signed "A Solicitor," calls upon us to state the facts of this case, and we have no objection whatever to the position your correspondent takes up, and are content to stand or fall on the issue raised by him. Let us, therefore, briefly say that every fact was brought directly under the notice of the chief clerk and the court, and that no step was taken clandestinely, and that no fact, or part of any fact, was withheld from the knowledge of the court, and that the decree, and every order, was made in full knowledge of every circumstance of the case, although our leader, Mr. Greene, Q.C., had to explain to his Honour, Wickens, V.C., what took place on obtaining the order on further consideration. We are perfectly ready to lay the facts of the case before your readers in our own way, but as you have already received from us copy of our affidavits, we prefer to leave the matter in your hands for the present.

Dec. 20. MERRIMAN, POWELL, AND CO.

RED TAPE IN THE CHANCERY PAY OFFICE.—The following case may interest your readers: A power of attorney for the purpose of receiving dividend lately bespoken by me at the Paymaster-General's, purported to be given by S. B. and M. B. the younger, to myself, and was duly executed by the said persons, the latter, however, signing his usual signature, i.e., "M. B.," without adding the words "the younger." The signatures were duly verified by affidavit annexed to the power, which stated in distinct terms that the signature "M. B." was the signature of "M. B. the younger." On applying for the cheque the Paymaster-General refused to act under this power unless I got M. B. to add the words "the younger" to his signature. This I declined to do, seeing no good reason why he should be asked to sign in any manner other than with his usual signature. I argued with the Paymaster-General, that if a person named in a power as John Jones were to sign his name "J. Jones," payment under such power might with equal reason be refused on the ground that the person signing "J. Jones" might be one James Jones, notwithstanding the affidavit might declare that the signature was that of John Jones; but, failing to convince him, I sent the power and affidavit to the Lord Chancellor, with a statement of the fact, and his Lordship, through his secretary, having intimated to the Paymaster-General that, in his opinion, the power was sufficiently executed to be acted upon, I have, after considerable delay, numerous attendances, and correspondence, arrived at the position I should have been at the outset, and received the cheque. I make no complaint against individuals, having received perfect courtesy from all parties. I opposed the requirements of the Paymaster-General because it seemed to me that a system was vexatious which required a man to sign his name contrary to his usual practice, and I hope I have thereby succeeded in preventing this vexation reaching others.

JOHN NICHOLAS MASON.

ARTICLES OF CLERKSHIP.—Your correspondents, "Harvey and Addison," have either misread or failed to perceive the obvious meaning of the words in sect. 43 of the Stamp Act 1870. "Save as hereinbefore provided articles of clerkship are not to be stamped at any time after the expiration of six months from the date thereof, except upon payment of penalties as follows," &c. They clearly relate to clause 41, sub-sect. 2, and clause 42, sub-sect. 2, empowering the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to stamp articles of clerkship on which a lesser duty than £80 has been paid, as in the cases of clerks to solicitors in any of the counties Palatine of Lancaster, &c., to the full sum, qualifying, in that respect, for admission in the Superior Courts at Westminster. I cannot see that the Profession has been led into any error by the wording of the Stamp Act 1870. It was only requisite to investigate the subject with ordinary care and attention. By 34 Geo. 3, c. 44, articles of clerkship were required to be stamped before being executed. By 7 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were prohibited from stamping articles of clerkship after six months from date under any pretence whatever, this limit of time being identical with that within which the articles were to be enrolled. By the 9 Geo. 4, c. 49, the commissioners were empowered to stamp between 15th July 1828, and the last day of Hillary Term 1829; any articles of clerkship dated prior to 22nd June 1825, not stamped before execution on payment of the duty, and of £5 penalty. By the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81, articles of clerkship (notwithstanding the Act 34 Geo. 3) could be stamped under the direction of the Lords of the Treasury at any time after execution on payment of the penalties therein enumerated. By the Stamp Act 1870, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were empowered to stamp articles of clerkship after execution without the intervention of the Treasury on payment of the duty, and the under-mentioned penalties, viz., if within one year, £10; if subsequently, £10 for each year, and for the fractional part of a year. The key to the mystery is as follows: By the 15th section of the Stamp Act 1870, a penalty of £10 is made payable on any instrument taken to be stamped after its execution, but by sub-sect. 2 of that clause, the commissioners are empowered to remit or reduce such penalty within twelve months, but by the 43rd section of this Act, the time within which they can exercise that power in the case of Articles of Clerkship is reduced to six months, thus if Articles of Clerkship be tendered for stamping within six months after execution the commissioners may in the exercise of their discretion reduce the penalty (though in practice they do not); if subsequently taken for stamping, the penalties prescribed by the Act are peremptorily enforced.—E. C.

LAW SOCIETIES.

THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY OF IRELAND.

WE take the following extracts from the Report of the Council of this Society, at the late general half-yearly meeting:

ATTORNEYS' CERTIFICATE DUTY.

In January last your council wrote to the council of the Incorporated Law Society, London, requesting to know, in view of the (then) approaching session of Parliament, whether they thought that any and what steps could be taken, with reasonable prospects of success, to obtain the reduction of this duty, and your council received an answer from that society, dated 5th Feb. 1873, saying that their council were of opinion that the reasons given by them, in answer to a similar communication made by your society at the commencement of the previous session of Parliament, still applied with equal, if not greater, force; also that their council had recently had an interview with the Lord Chancellor on the subject of solicitors' remuneration, and had been assured that a measure would be introduced into Parliament by the Government for the purpose of facilitating the transfer of land, and that should same become law, it would, of course, be most desirable that some corresponding change should be made in the mode in which solicitors were to be remunerated, and that their council, therefore, considered that it would not be wise to attempt any agitation for the reduction of the Certificate Duty pending the consideration of the more important matter to which they referred. Upon receiving that communication, your council immediately forwarded a copy of it to the Provincial Law Societies at Belfast, Cork, and Waterford, and it seemed to be considered inexpedient to go forward in the matter without having the assistance and co-operation of the Profession in England, for which, under the circumstances stated, your council could not hope.

AN ACT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW OF BANKRUPTCY IN IRELAND (35 & 36 VICT. c. 58.)

During the session of Parliament of 1872, an Act, bearing the above title, became law, not to come into operation until Jan. 1, 1873.

By the first section of said Act it is enacted that the Act shall be construed, together with so much of "The Irish Bankrupt and Insolvent Act 1857, as is not by said Act altered or repealed, as one Act, and may be cited for all purposes as the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1872."

In connection with this subject your council have to inform you that they received a letter from the chief registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency, transmitting, by desire of the judges of that court, the draft of a revised scale of solicitors' fees and charges in proceedings therein, in view of the altered procedure, and by said letter your council were requested to depute some of their number to confer with the chief registrar and chief clerk, in order that any suggestions or alterations they might deem desirable in proposed schedule should be submitted to the judges.

This the council accordingly did, and the members of their body who attended to confer reported that nothing could exceed the courtesy shown to them by the chief and other registrars and chief clerk, and by every official connected with that court. Your council allude to this subject with peculiar pleasure, as a further evidence of the kindly and considerate desire which the present judges of the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency have uniformly manifested to consult the wishes of your council in every matter having for its object the upholding of the status and well-being of your Profession, and to evince the anxiety of these judges at all times to receive and give due weight to any suggestions which might be offered by your council tending towards that object; and the result of the conference has been that a much more liberal scale of solicitors' fees and charges has since been adopted and promulgated by that court.

COMMON LAW SCHEDULE OF FEES.

It appearing to your council that the schedule of law fees, settled by the judges in 1854, was not sufficiently comprehensive in its terms, nor liberal enough in the fees allowed, to afford to your Profession an adequate remuneration for the labour and responsible duties imposed upon them in the transaction of common law business, your council felt it necessary to endeavour, on behalf of the Profession, to obtain an increased scale of fees for their services more in accordance with the exigencies of the times; and having accordingly devoted much time, care, and attention to the matter, they prepared a revised schedule of fees, copies of which they sent in June last to all the common law judges, with letters representing the necessity of having a new scale of fees settled, and requesting their lordships' attention to the matter as early as possible.

Your council brought this matter again before the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland previously to the commencement of the Michaelmas Term just ended, but they have not yet been favoured with any reply.

COSTS OF ACCOUNTING BY RECEIVERS IN CHANCERY.

In January last your council received a communication from Master Coffey, the senior Taxing Master in Chancery, transmitting a draft of a new form of costs of passing receiver's accounts for consideration of your council, and inviting such suggestions as they might see fit to make in reference to the proposed scale of charges; and your council having carefully examined same, had an interview subsequently with the taxing masters, who received all their suggestions with much courtesy, and having fully discussed same, promised to consider how far they could adopt them. Your council afterwards received a revised draft form of costs from the taxing masters, by which it appeared that nearly all the suggestions of your council had been adopted; and the result has been the production of a more liberal scale of fees for this particular class of business than had previously been allowed.

ATTORNEYS' AND SOLICITORS' ACT (IRELAND), 1866 (29 & 30 VICT. c. 84.)

In December last the Council of the Cork Law Society brought under the notice of your council a case which had occurred before the police magistrates in that city in the previous month of August, in which a constable who took upon himself to state the case against an accused party was allowed by the magistrate so to do, although the attorney for the accused interposed to make a preliminary objection, on behalf of this Profession, to such a proceeding; the magistrate, nevertheless, prevented the attorney from making his objection pending the statement of the constable, and ruled that the constable should be heard, in conformity with a circular issued from Dublin Castle, dated 29th August 1870, addressed to the magistrates of petty sessions for their guidance and instruction.

The council of the Cork Law Society also informed your council that they had subsequently brought the facts of this case before the authorities at Dublin Castle, and had requested to be informed by what authority any constable was invested with the power, as not only his right, but his duty, of conducting cases, and examining and cross-examining witnesses, without the intervention of any professional man, as stated in the circular of 29th August 1870, but that their council had been informed by the Under-Secretary that the grounds or reasons upon which the law officers arrived at the opinion expressed in the circular referred to could not be inquired into. Under these circumstances the council of Cork Law Society requested the intervention of your council on behalf of this Profession, and your council accordingly submitted a statement of the whole case (including the correspondence with the Under-Secretary) to Gerald Fitzgibbon, junior, Esq., Q.C., for his opinion, a copy of which opinion is as follows:—

"In all cases of summary proceedings before Justices, it is provided by the Petty Sessions Act (14 & 15 Vict. c. 93), s. 9, that the parties by and against whom any complaint or information shall there be heard, shall be admitted to conduct or make their full answer and defence thereto respectively, and to have the witnesses examined and cross-examined by themselves, or by counsel or attorney on their behalf.

"In all such summary proceedings, therefore, no constable can be admitted to conduct any case, unless he be the party complaining.

"In all cases of proceedings for indictable offences of a public nature, every member of the constabulary is, by the Act 6 Will. 4, c. 13, charged with all the powers and duties of a constable at common law or by statute, and these include the arrest of offenders on warrant, information, or suspicion of felony, the preservation of the peace, and protection of property from crime; and in every case of arrest it is the duty of the constable to bring his prisoner before a justice, in order that he may be committed for trial or discharged.

"In such proceedings the Crown is the prosecutor; the constable, as a public peace officer, is charged wth the duty of explaining and proving to the justice the cause of the arrest; and, as incident to this duty, he is, in my opinion, entitled to state the facts, and examine and cross-examine witnesses.

"The Attorneys' Act imposes penalties only for 'acting as attorney or solicitor,' and no one can so act except on behalf of a party. It appears to me that in offences the subject of indictment the constable, who, to use the common phrase, 'has charge of the case,' is acting as a public peace officer, having no client except the Queen, representing the public, but not as a party, and that he does not incur any penalty by so doing.

"I am, therefore, of opinion that the circular of 29th August 1870, correctly states the law.

"(Signed) GERALD FITZGIBBON, Jun.,
10, Merrion-square, North.

"Dec. 21, 1872."

A copy of this opinion was subsequently furnished to the Cork Law Society, but it did not seem to your council that any beneficial result would be obtained by further action in the matter.

LEGAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

AT a meeting held on the 19th instant of the executive committee of the council of the association (Mr. Amphlett, Q.C., M.P., in the chair), the report of the interview which took place on the 12th instant between the Lord Chancellor and a deputation from the association, was read, and ordered to be printed and circulated with the report of the proceedings at the annual meeting of the association held in Lincoln's-inn Hall in January last.

The finance committee were requested to take such steps as they might think expedient for obtaining donations in aid of the funds of the association for the purpose of meeting the heavy expenses which must necessarily be incurred during the ensuing year in holding public meetings and for printing, and other similar purposes.

It was further requested that the attention of members of the association might be called by the finance committee to the moderate expense at which the work of the association had been carried on up to the present time, owing to it having had the advantage of the use of offices rent free, and of being able to dispense with any paid assistance.

On the motion of Mr. Osborne Morgan, Q.C., M.P., seconded by Mr. Gedge, Mr. Ralph Charlton Palmer, of 8, New-square, Lincoln's-inn, who has kindly consented to assist the present honorary secretaries, was unanimously elected an honorary secretary of the association.

JOHN V. LONGBOURNE, Hon. Sec.

20th Dec., 1873.

Donations in aid of the funds of the association should be sent to the treasurer, J. M. Clabon, Esq., 21, Great George-street, Westminster, S.W.

THE LAWYER'S ALMANAC for 1874 will be presented to our Subscribers with our next number.

The Law and the Lawyers.

THE number of cases which may be, and often are, cited upon the construction of wills, is absolutely appalling, and it is a relief to find the vigorous mind of the MASTER of the ROLLS developing all the energies characteristic of new brooms, and attacking the practice which has so long prevailed. In the case of Waring v. Currey, before him on the 10th ult., Sir GEORGE observed "with reference to a case cited in argument, that the rules as to the construction of wills had often been departed from, and that he should adhere to the principles laid down by Lord WENSLEYDALE in Grey v. Pearson (6 H. of L. Cas. 61, 108), and should in such cases always endeavour to prevent counsel citing authorities on the construction of other wills, except where some principle was laid down or where some technical terms were defined or explained." The inconvenient habit which is thus to receive a check prevails also in the United States, and we met with a case recently in which counsel on each side cited authorities which would have filled one of these columns printed in small type. Several hours must have been occupied in mere citation, and the mental condition of the Bench at the close of the argument may perhaps be imagined. It is an evil that our law is so largely made up of cases, but nothing tends so much to make the law uncertain as the unnecessary introduction of decisions and dicta into arguments intended to instruct the court and facilitate their labours.

A CONTRIBUTOR sends us the following with reference to a matter arising in his practice: "A question of considerable difficulty arose a short time ago, and one upon which there seems to be some conflict in the decided cases. A testator devised real estate to his daughter "for the term of her natural life, and for her separate use, without power of anticipation;" and, "if she shall die before attaining the age of twenty-one years, or without leaving lawful issue," he devised the property to another daughter. Is this devise to be construed as a fee to the first-named daughter, determinable upon her decease under the age of twenty-one years, or without leaving issue; or as raising by necessary implication an estate tail in her, or as simply an estate for life? If we adopt the first construction, the words limiting the estate to her life must be taken in strict connection with the clause for the separate use as indicating the period during which the restriction upon alienation and anticipation is to operate, and not as words of limitation confining the estate to the life of the devisee. And by such a construction the absurdity is removed of making a life estate determinable on death without issue or under twenty-one; and probably the testator's intention would be best effectuated thereby. The case of Ex parte Rogers (2 Madd. 449) is an authority in favour of the second view, though that was a cause of personalty. That case, however, seems now to be of doubtful authority, though it has never been expressly overruled: (See Sparkes v. Restall, before Lord ROMILLY; Doe d. Bamfield v. Wetton, 2 Bos. & Pul. 324; Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, 12 Beav. 200; and in Lee v. Bask, 2 De G. M. & G.) CRANWORTH, L.J., expressed doubt as to whether Ex parte Rogers was law. It would probably not be followed unless the circumstances were precisely similar. But the very peculiarity of these cases is that the same circumstances scarcely ever repeat themselves without some slight variation. And in later cases the courts have shown great reluctance to modify the words of wills: (See Grey v. Pearson, 6 H. of L. 61.) It is difficult to see how the rigid interpretation in some of the above cited cases can be reconciled with the general indulgence shown to testators, and the words of Jarman (3rd edit. p. 527) "when the language of the will necessarily confines the interest of the parent to his life, the courts will lay hold of slight circumstances to raise a gift in the children." And if, as in so many other cases, the word "or" be construed as "and," further difficulties may arise—the daughter might attain twenty-one and die, without leaving issue, or she might die under twenty-one, and leave issue; in either of these cases the gift over to the second daughter would be defeated.

THE Times seems to have taken a somewhat unusual course with regard to the vacancy created on the Irish Bench by the death of Chief Baron PIGOT. The manner in which the Judges of Ireland who can be considered to have any chance of promotion are weighed, and their merits discussed, is about as singular as anything which we remember; and the conclusion of the writer puts the Government in a position which must prove uncomfortable if the influence of the Times is worth anything. In the first place rightly enough it is suggested that the Government may save £4000 a year by promoting a puisne Judge; which, then, shall be promoted? The Times discovers that although Baron FITZGERALD is a most able Judge, he was "unluckily, during his political career, a Conservative," whilst "his juniors, Barons DEASY and DOWSE, were both Liberals." We trust that it is not meant to suggest that changes in the positions of men already on the Bench—changes of no political aspect whatever—are to be governed by considerations of the political creeds of individuals years ago. The Times evidently thinks that they are, for it goes on to observe that "the pretentions of Mr. Justice FITZGERALD—a Liberal well known during his party career, and no relative of his Conservative namesake in the Exchequer" (as if even relationship with a Conservative might operate prejudicially!)—"are commanding." Our contemporary, however, concludes thus: "Upon the whole it may be said that the competition for the vacant place lies between the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Mr. Justice FITZGERALD, and Baron FITZGERALD. If the Ministry decide upon taking into consideration official pretensions only, and decline to introduce those economies which are plainly needed into the Irish judicial expenditure, they will promote Mr. PALLES. If, still regarding party claims as paramount they incline to economy and efficiency combined, they will promote Mr. Justice FITZGERALD. If they can persuade themselves to set aside political prejudices altogether, and to be guided only by the interests of suitors and the wishes of the Profession, by a regard for long services and eminent ability, they will promote Baron FITZGERALD, than whom no worthier successor of the late CHIEF BARON could be chosen from the ranks of the Irish Bench or Bar." How can Mr. GLADSTONE possibly appoint anybody but Baron FITZGERALD after that? The feeling in Ireland is nevertheless very strong that the judicial strength of the country ought not to be weakened. On the whole the Government is placed in an awkward difficulty by the death of the CHIEF BARON.

A SOMEWHAT novel application was made to the County Court Judge of Birmingham on the 18th ult. An action being brought upon a dishonoured bill, the defendant gave notice of a special defence, which was that he had filed a petition for liquidation, and that his creditors had had a first meeting and passed the usual resolution, and appointed a trustee. No notice of the meeting had been given to the plaintiff, and he had not attended, and he claimed to be entitled to go behind the resolution. His Honour intimated that he had power under 289 of the Bankruptcy Rules to restrain the plaintiff from proceeding with the action, and he seemed disposed to make an order there and then. It was suggested, however, that an application to him sitting in Bankruptcy was necessary, and he thereupon adjourned the case to enable such application to be made. The position of the creditor in the County Courts is even more disadvantageous than it is in the Superior Courts. County Court Judges being Judges in Bankruptcy, and adjourning causes from court day to court day, frequently upon slender pretexts, it becomes a matter of impossibility for a creditor to reap the fruits of his diligence if before he gets to trial the debtor liquidates. In the case at Birmingham the resolution was clearly irregular, but the plaintiff was delayed to enable the debtor to call another meeting and pass a proper resolution and obtain a restraining order. This is carrying the power of restraint very far.

THE YEAR 1873.

THE year which has just closed was a remarkable year from a legal point of view. The judicial system which has been the growth of centuries—the great division between equity, the offspring in its recent developments of the power arrogated to themselves by successive Lord Chancellors, and law, the creature of custom and statute extended and explained by judicial decision—has been swept away by the strong hand and overwhelming influence of a Lord Chancellor who accomplished his reform while still a novice in his high office. The Profession and the public during the last twenty years had welcomed small innovations in the respective jurisdictions, the introduction of common law remedies into Chancery, and of equitable defences into common law, without venturing to contemplate the fusion of equity and law. And perhaps the most remarkable circumstance connected with the great measure of reform which will render ever memorable in our legal history the year 1873, is that it does not on its face enact a fusion of two branches of jurisprudence. Its noble and learned author foresaw that if he were to propose to merge the courts and shuffle the Judges together, and submit all questions upon our different laws to courts so merged, there would be an outcry based on reason which might imperil the success of the measure. With a prudence which many Chancellors of perhaps a higher order of genius than Lord Selborne have lacked, he preserved existing courts and their Judges, keeping the courts distinct even in their nomenclature, and providing for the business to run almost precisely in the grooves in which it has run hitherto.

We feel that when the magnitude of the Judicature Act is regarded, all other measures sink into comparative insignificance. At any other time the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, which took away an important jurisdiction from a common law court, and gave it to commissioners, would have been looked upon as a very important measure—much as the Election Petitions Act of 1868 was considered, seeing that it took from the House of Commons the exercise of important judicial functions, and transferred it to the common law Judges. And the Act of this year is undoubtedly one of great moment, as it seems to facilitate the redress of grievances alleged by and against the great carrying companies of this country. The general legislation of the session we have already noticed in these columns, and we do not propose to carry our readers over the ground again.

Next in importance to the great change in the judicial system of this country is the operation of death and promotion in the ranks of the Judges and the Bar. The death roll for this year exhibits the names of men who could ill be spared. One of the greatest lawyers England ever saw was lost to our court of ultimate appeal in the person of Lord Westbury. The Court of Chancery had scarcely been adorned by the elevation of Sir John Wickens, one of the most scholarly, accomplished, and able men of his generation, before illness incapacitated him to perform the duties of his office, and in a short time terminated fatally. The Court of Common Pleas lost its Chief Justice, who, while more distinguished at the Bar than on the Bench, was a painstaking and conscientious Judge, and particularly capable in presiding over his Court at Guildhall, which at the time of his appointment was a favourite tribunal for the trial of heavy commercial causes. The Court of Exchequer sustained a serious loss in the retirement of Baron Channell, who died shortly after. An Irish Judge of eminence, Chief Baron Pigot, died at the close of the year; and this completes the list of our judicial losses. Dr. Lushington, for a long period Judge of the Court of Admiralty, died during the year, but he had previously retired from all judicial duties. The other lawyers of position or note abroad and at home, who must be named as having been lost to us, are: Chief Justice Chase (of the United States), Mr. T. Chisholm Anstey, the Hon. Sir George Rose (ex-Judge of the Court of Review), Mr. Thomas Tomlinson, Q.C., Mr. James R. Hope-Scott, Q.C., Mr. T. H. Haddon, Sir Wm. Alexander, attorney-general to the Prince of Wales, Mr. Serjeant Bellasis, Mr. Serjeant O'Brien, Mr. Edward Masson (formerly Attorney-General for Greece), Mr. Dominick M'Causland, Q.C., Mr. Edmund FitzMoore, Q.C., and the Hon. William Jardine, Judge of the High Court of the North-Western Provinces of India.

The changes in the Bench and Bar by promotion have been gradual, but in one sense remarkable. When we say gradual, we intend to indicate that Government has not made any appointment until the very last moment. By the retirement of Lord Romilly from the Mastership of the Rolls it became necessary to appoint a successor. With some motive, never thoroughly comprehended by the Profession and the public, Lord Selborne assumed the functions of a Judge of first instance, and transacted for a considerable period the business of the court. At length Sir George Jessel was appointed, thereby, although not necessarily, removing from the House of Commons a politician having little influence as a law officer, and who had particularly distinguished himself as the uncompromising opponent of reform in legal education. The Rolls Court proved to be for him a congenial sphere, and the appointment was universally acknowledged the only one which could properly be made. On the retirement of Baron Channell, Mr. Pollock, Q.C., was raised to the Bench in the Court of Exchequer; and the death of Vice-Chancellor Wickens made an opening on the Equity Bench to which the stuffgownsman in the largest practice at the Equity Bar was promoted, and Sir Charles Hall has proved himself to be a capable Judge.

The promotion of Sir George Jessel vacated the office of Solicitor-General, to which, after considerable delay, as usual, a member of the Bar and the House of Commons who had distinguished himself for his ability and independence, was selected, in the person of Mr. Henry James. The Government having sustained a succession of reverses in the constituencies, the re-election of their Solicitor became a matter of vital importance, and rarely has the contest on the re-election of a law officer proved so exciting. The solicitor was re-elected, but when the year closed the return was still threatened by petition. Within a few weeks of Mr. James's appointment and re-election, the Attorney-General (Sir John Coleridge) was raised to the vacancy created by the death of Chief Justice Bovill, and Mr. James became Attorney-General. This rapid rise of one whose reputation at the Bar had not been of the highest order, but who had been known as a shrewd lawyer and clever speaker, is perhaps unparalleled, and deserves a prominent position in the facts of the year. The Solicitor-Generalship vacated by him was filled by the appointment of Mr. Vernon Harcourt, an accomplished debater but not a practical lawyer. Sir John Coleridge, soon after his elevation to the Bench, was further elevated to the House of Lords, to which assembly he will add judicial strength for the remaining period that it will be required, and debating power of an essentially aristocratic order.

The business transacted in our courts has been such as to call for little observation. In the Queen's Bench a trial at bar has been in progress for more than half the year, keeping at work all the long vacation three learned Judges and a strong Bar. The case which has occupied the attention of the court is in itself extraordinary, but it has been embellished with forensic asperity and impudence which will make it a subject of curiosity and wonder to coming generations. The case will further be considered as proving the extremely useful purpose which is served by our system of trial by jury, for twelve men have evinced an amount of intelligence and practical knowledge which has done much to facilitate the just determination of the most gigantic prosecution which has ever encumbered a court of law.

It must be considered that speaking generally the legal business in the country has declined, whilst, we believe, both branches of the Profession have considerably added to their numbers. Vigorous measures have been taken during the year by the solicitors to improve the Incorporated Law Society and to bring within it, or into action with it, the important law societies of the provinces. The agitation for improved legal education, which lay dormant during the passage of the Judicature Act, was revived by a deputation to the Lord Chancellor at the close of the year, and promises to lead to legislative action with reference to the Inns of Court.

Here we think we may close the review of the year. The wisdom of the great change which that year inaugurated will be tested in the immediate future, and to that future it is impossible to look without some anxiety, but nevertheless with great interest and confidence in the power and efficiency of our tribunals.

DUTIES PAYABLE BY REASON OF DEATH.

THE fourth case to which we shall refer, viz., Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society, relates to the Succession Duty Act, and the facts of which as reported are as follows: A testatrix by will dated in 1839, devised her real estates to trustees upon trust for her cousin T. for life, with remainder for T.'s children, and in default of children, for W. in fee. W. was a cousin of the testatrix; or, if we may be excused for using the phrase, a 5 per cent. relation. W. first mortgaged his reversion to the defendants, and subsequently conveyed his equity of redemption to trustees for them. W. died in 1870, and T. died, without issue, in 1872, whereupon the defendants became entitled to the possession of the real estate. The Crown claimed the payment from the defendants of succession duty upon the capital value of the property at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the ground that they were successors, and being a body corporate, were liable to have the duty assessed upon the capital in pursuance of sect. 27, the rate being settled by sect. 15. The defendants contended that the 27th section applied to those cases only in which they took real property "as successors," and not as purchasers, that they were not successors within the meaning of the second, the defining section, that the 15th, 20th, 42nd, and 44th sections clearly referred to successors as persons who could not be purchasers, and that as W. was, therefore, the successor, and he had died, no duty was payable by them, as W. would never have been liable to any duty, or at all events that they were only liable to the payment of such duty as would have been payable by the heir at law of the alienor, and upon the basis of his life under sect. 21, but that the Crown had not pointed out the heir at law, so that the rate could not possibly be fixed, as that must be decided by his relationship to W., from whom he would have taken the property by devolution. The court decided that the defendants must pay the duty as claimed by the Crown, as they were within the meaning of the 27th section of the Act, having had a succession vested in them by alienation.

We consider the decision in the last-mentioned case to have been erroneously given. We cannot agree that a purchaser is a successor, nor can we conceive that a purchaser should have to pay any duty to which his vendor, the person originally entitled, would not have been liable. Under sect. 2, to make a person a successor, he must become entitled to the property "either originally or by way of substitutive limitation," and to show that the framers of the Act did not consider that a purchaser came within sect. 2, we have only to refer to the first part of sect. 15, which provides that in case at the time appointed for the commencement of the Act any reversionary property expectant on death shall be vested by alienation or other derivative title in any person other than the person who shall have been originally entitled thereto under any such disposition or devolution as is mentioned in the 2nd section of this Act, then the person in whom such property shall be so vested shall be chargeable with duty in respect thereof as a succession at the same time and at the same rate as the person so originally entitled would have been chargeable with if no such alienation had been made or derivative title created. The above, we think, clearly explains what person was intended to be pointed at by the use of the word "successor," viz., the person originally entitled, and it further shows that a purchaser was not considered a successor, as it was thought necessary to make him chargeable with duty which would clearly have been unnecessary if he had been within the 2nd section. We have no hesitation, therefore, in saying that in cases of alienation of reversionary property before the commencement of the Act, no duty would have been payable by the purchaser but for the 15th section, as he is not a successor, because he was not originally entitled, and his vendor was not a successor, because at the commencement of the Act he was not beneficially entitled. Where reversionary property has been sold by the original owner since the commencement of the Act the case is somewhat different. So soon as the Act began the original owner became a successor, and his property became a succession, and in referring to such original owner and his property the second part of the 15th section uses the words successor and succession, but such part speaks of the purchaser as "any other person," not any other successor; the 20th section speaks of "the successor or any person claiming in his right or on his behalf," "in his right" clearly referring to purchasers, and the 42nd and 43rd sections speak in a similar manner; the 44th section speaks of the person in whom the property shall be vested by alienation as someone beside the successor; and the 45th section requires the persons made accountable for duty to send to the Commissioners a true account of the property "together with the names of the successor and predecessor, and their relation to each other." There is no doubt that a purchaser has to pay the same rate of duty as would have been payable had no alienation have taken place. That rate is fixed by sect. 10 according to the degree of consanguinity of the successor to the predecessor; unless, therefore, the names and relationship of the predecessor and the original owner are sent to the commissioners, they cannot find out the rate; but if the word successor referred to any person other than the original owner the rate could not be arrived at. The several sections to which we have referred appear to us clearly and unmistakably to refer to the original owner and not the purchaser when the word successor is used, and we therefore cannot agree that the 27th section had any reference to the question at issue, such section only operating when the defendants became entitled as successors, which it appears to us they had not done in the case before the court. If, therefore, the defendants were not liable upon the basis of the capital value, they could only be liable upon the basis of the life estate of some person who could be brought within the meaning of the word successor as used in the 21st section.

That a purchaser is not a successor appears to have been the view of Martin, B., who, in his judgment in Attorney-General v. Cecil (page 272), referring to sect. 15, says it refers "to an alienation in the ordinary sense, as if, for instance, the late Lord C. had sold the whole of his interest to some third person before it came into possession. In such a case the words of the 2nd section would not be apt to describe the condition of things at the time when the interest fell into possession and the duty became payable, and this clause was therefore inserted in order to prevent the Crown from being deprived of the duty by a transaction of that nature."

Neither can we agree with the decision of the court upon the question of the rate of duty. Our strong impression is that a purchaser is only liable to the payment of the exact amount of duty, neither more nor less, which the original owner would have paid had he not sold his reversion; and this view seems strongly confirmed by the note to sect. 44 in Mr. Hanson's valuable book upon the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties, which is as follows: "Beside the successor.—The successor himself continues to be personally accountable for the duty, although he has sold his succession." The word successor cannot refer to the purchaser, and the word "continue" appears to us to have been appropriately used and implies a previous liability. It cannot be said that a reversioner would be liable to pay duty upon the capital value where it is clearly laid down by sect. 21 that his life estate is to be the basis of the calculation. Previously to the sale there is no doubt he was only liable to the payment of duty at a rate fixed by his degree of relationship to his predecessor, and upon the basis of his own age, and in the event of his death previously to that of the tenant for life, neither he nor his heir-at-law or devisee would have been liable to any duty by reason of his succession. Can it be said that his liability was increased by the fact of his selling the reversion? If so, the word "continue" is inappropriate.

Assuming, however, that a purchaser is liable to duty to which his vendor would not have been liable, how is that duty to be fixed? The 15th section states that "the duty payable in respect thereof," i.e., the succession of the successor "shall be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no such alienation had been made." Assuming, as we before said, that any duty is payable where the reversioner predeceases the tenant for life, which we do not admit, the duty payable can only be that which would have been payable if no alienation had taken place, viz., that which would have been payable by the heir-at-law or devisee of the reversioner. That such duty should be fixed by the relationship of the heir or devisee and the reversioner seems clear from the words of the 2nd section, and from the remarks of Kelly, C. B. and Cleasby, B. in De Lancy's case, and from the decision in Attorney-General v. Cecil. The court in the case under consideration decided that the words "as if no alienation had been made," should be read as equivalent to "as if the alienor had succeeded and had to pay the duty," although they admitted "that taken literally the words would rather point to the real position of things at the death of the tenant for life." That the court acted under the impression, clearly erroneous and contrary to their own decisions in the above-mentioned cases, that the rate of duty payable by the heir of a reversioner who had predeceased the tenant for life was fixed by the heir's relationship to the original settlor, that is the predecessor of the reversioner, and not by the heir's relationship to the reversioner, which was settled by the above cases, appears clear from what is said in their judgment, viz.: "If the remainderman outlived the tenant for life there could be no difficulty; but, if he died before then it would be necessary to find out who would have been his heir, and thus from his relationship to the predecessor get at the rate of duty under sect. 10. It was said by the learned Solicitor-General that the rate payable by the alienor himself would almost always be less, or at all events not greater than the rate payable by his heir, and that the Crown was content to adopt the construction which in general imposes the lower duty." If the predecessor of the reversioner be considered the predecessor of the reversioner's heir we admit that what was said by the Solicitor-General would be correct; but as the previous decided cases, which are not referred to in the judgment and therefore must still be considered law, declare that the reversioner shall be his heir's predecessor, the statement of the Solicitor-General appears to be without foundation and incorrect.

That the court adopted the view expressed by the Solicitor-General is further confirmed by their decision "that the Crown at all events made out a primâ facie case to be paid the duty which would be payable by the alienor, as they need not prove the death of the alienor, and that if events have happened by which the duty would be less the defendants must prove them." It appears, however, from the report that the fact of the reversioner's death was stated in the information, so that it seems to us the Crown showed no title to duty at all, for they did not state who would have been the reversioner's heir-at-law, and unless that individual were pointed out the rate of duty could not possibly be fixed, as that entirely depends upon his degree of relationship to his predecessor, the reversioner. We have always understood that it was the business of the plaintiff to prove his own case, and we have always considered that in matters at variance between the Crown and the subject the latter was to have the benefit of any doubt which might be raised. That such, however, is not always the case appears to have been the opinion of the late Vice-Chancellor Wickens, who, during the course of his extensive practice at the bar, had occasion upon many occasions to study the Act and decisions. In a case before him, Ring v. Jarman (L. Rep. 14 Eq. 363), he stated his opinion to be entirely in favour of the contention on behalf of the subject, "but," added he, "the case appears to me to be covered by authority," referring to the case of Attorney-General v. Gell (3 H. & C. 615) decided by the Court of Exchequer; and he significantly continued: "The Succession Duty Act has in some cases received an interpretation which seems not very consistent with the old canons of construction as applied to statutes laying burthens on the subject."

HUSBAND AND WIFE AS CONTRACTING PARTIES.

WE have before us two County Court decisions, which introduce a new element of uncertainty into contracts entered into between married persons and the public. To one of these cases we have referred on previous occasions, and shall advert to again presently. The second turns upon the construction of the first section of the Married Women's Property Act, being a decision of Mr. Stonor upon a case presenting a peculiar state of facts. Before criticising this judgment we must confess to a certain amount of diffidence. The cause was twice tried, and on both trials the learned Judge came to the same conclusion. His Honour recognised the difficulty of the case, but he laid down a broad proposition of law which is open to criticism, apart from the surrounding facts of the case. That proposition of law was this: that it is not necessary to the separate carrying on of an employment, occupation, or trade by a married woman, within the meaning of the Married Women's Property Act 1870, sect. 1, that she should live apart from her husband, but only that her husband should not interfere or take part in carrying on such business.

It is clearly impossible to say that this is unsound in point of law; but, looking to the object with which the Act was passed, can it be taken to have been the intention of Parliament to protect married women living with their husbands? As some evidence that it was, the County Court Judge cites the 13th section, by which a married woman is made liable to maintain her husband. For such a purpose, however, this section is, we think, of no weight, but rather, on the contrary, contemplates a husband who, living apart from a wife having separate property, becomes chargeable to the parish. And what are the words of the first section? "The wages and earnings of any married woman acquired or gained by her in any employment, occupation, or trade in which she is engaged, or which she carries on separately from her husband," shall be taken to be her separate property. There is nothing in these words to indicate a necessity for the wife to be residing separately from the husband, and the little light which decided cases throw upon the question seems to support the view of the County Court Judge, and to make the question one of evidence on the facts of each particular case. In Reg. v. Harrald (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 361; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 616), wherein it was sought to establish that the Married Women's Property Act had got rid of the political disabilities of married women, the Lord Chief Justice spoke of the Act as recognising and establishing the power of married women "to hold property." And Mr. Justice Hannen said, "The Married Women's Property Act was intended to protect married women in the enjoyment of the rights of property." These expressions, wide and general as they are, do not leave room, as it appears to us, for the suggestion that it is contrary to the intention of the Act that a married woman living with her husband should be incapable of holding or enjoying the rights of property.

But in a previous issue we observed that we considered that the decision of the learned Judge opened a wide door to fraud, because nothing can be easier than for a man to set his wife up in business in a house rented and occupied by him, and whilst she earns money by the separate carrying on of this trade, for him to obtain all the credit of being the owner of the business. Before dwelling upon this aspect of the questions, and the protection which creditors may throw round their transactions with a married woman, we will look at two cases which are cited in text books as throwing some light upon the construction of the first section of the Married Women's Property Act. Petty v. Anderson (3 Bing. 170) was an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. The wife had carried on business on her own account during the imprisonment of her husband, and he having returned to live with her after his discharge, it was held that he was liable for articles furnished in this business with his knowledge, after his return, though the invoice and receipts were in the name of the wife, and she was rated to and paid the poor's and paving rates. At the trial Chief Justice Best, in summing up the case to the jury, made a point of the circumstance of the husband being in the house where the business was carried on, assisting in the business, and subsisting on the profits. He directed the jury to find for the plaintiff, on the ground that obviously the wife was the agent of the husband. On the argument of the rule for a new trial the same learned Judge said "the husband took advantage of the trade that was carried on by living on the profits, and a legal presumption arises from that circumstance that the wife conducted the trade as his agent." He added, however, "undoubtedly the presumption arising from his presence might have been rebutted, but there were no facts in the present case to repel the presumption." The other judges, Mr. Justice Park and Mr. Justice Burrough considered the circumstance of the husband cohabiting with the wife conclusive, Mr. Justice Park citing Langford v. Tilor (1 Salk. 113), which went directly to that effect. Mr. Justice Burrough said "the husband was present and assisting in the business, and therefore clearly liable to the plaintiff's claim." The other case to which we refer is Smallpiece v. Dawes 7 (C. & P. 40), where the evidence fell short of establishing the agency of the wife, and an action against the husband for goods supplied to the wife in her business, carried on in his absence, failed. For nine years the husband was absent, avoiding a bankruptcy commission. During that period the wife carried on the business, and the husband was seen at the shop on only two or three occasions, and had been present at the marriage of two of his daughters in the neighbourhood. Baron Parke said that this evidence was insufficient, and that the defendant coming to his wife's house could only make him liable for necessaries supplied to her.

We think it may be fairly argued that if before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act it was a question in actions against the husband for supplies to a wife carrying on trade, whether the fact of his cohabiting with her fixed him with liability, it must arise with greater force, and so as to weaken the presumption of law against him since the passing of that Act. Before that Act as Chief Justice Best said in Petty v. Anderson, the presumption arising from the circumstance of the husband cohabiting with his wife might be rebutted. The Act of 1870 almost disposes of the presumption of law. A married woman may hold and enjoy the rights of property. If she is trading in her own name, can it be said that there is any presumption of law at all that she is acting as the agent of her husband? We feel driven to the conclusion that the presumption is perhaps stronger that she is trading "separately," and that the onus lies upon the creditor of the husband seizing the goods claimed by the wife to show that she is trading as the agent of her husband. We candidly confess that we have arrived at this conclusion against our first convictions, and strongly against our inclinations, and in opposition to our idea of what is expedient.

Now the business carried on in the Croydon case was that of a lodging-house, and the case really set up on the part of the claimant was that whenever the husband interfered in the business he was acting as her agent. He paid money to one of the creditors, and requested him to give credit for it to his wife. The invoices of the tradesmen were also made out to the wife. This latter fact we do not think of much importance, as it is a common thing for tradesmen supplying necessaries to a household to send in the invoices to the wife. The rate collector had been told that the husband was tenant of the house, and had so entered it in his rate book, but the landlord was dead. The facts will be found more fully detailed and discussed in the judgment of the learned Judge; but we think that we have said enough to show that there was a pretty even balance of evidence on the one side and the other—in favour of the presumption of the wife acting as the agent of her husband, and of the wife's separate trading. To which side under such circumstances ought the law to lean? We think clearly against the separate trading of the wife. A married woman has it in her power to make it plain and unmistakeable that she is trading separately, so as to secure the protection of the Married Women's Property Act. Cohabiting with her husband, the law implies a liability on his part for necessaries supplied to her order; and the Married Women's Property Act does not render the wife liable to an action upon her contracts. It is hardly possible to conceive a state of things in which creditors could be more easily defrauded; and although we feel constrained to agree that the learned County Court Judge has taken an accurate view of the Act, we think the facts of each case should be narrowly watched, and the onus thrown heavily on the wife of establishing a separate trading.

The second County Court case to which we have referred was reported by us on the 20th ult., and carried the right of the hushand to relieve himself from liability for necessaries supplied to his wife to limits which, supposing them to be reached by any existing authority, places persons dealing with married women in a position of peril. Notwithstanding Jolly v. Rees, it is considered an open question whether a husband by private prohibition can relieve himself from liability for necessaries supplied to the wife, more particularly where those necessaries are not personal to the wife but peculiar to the household. Contemplate for a moment this position of things:—A married woman living with her husband unable to pledge his credit for bread. A married woman carrying on business in a house occupied by her husband, the rent of which he pays, and to which he is rated; neither husband nor wife liable for goods supplied to the wife in such business. What an absolutely monstrous state of the law! We say, therefore, that it behoves judges to apply it with as much caution as possible, and to presume as much as they can against a state of circumstances which in effect is calculated to operate to the prejudice of those who have dealings with married women.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LAW RELATING TO STIPULATIONS BY CARRIERS.

A VERY exhaustive judgment was delivered in the United States Supreme Court by Mr. Justice Bradley in last October Term. After fully going through the American authorities the learned Judge concluded as follows:

It is argued that a common carrier, by entering into a special contract with a party for carrying his goods or person on modified terms, drops his character and becomes an ordinary bailee for hire, and, therefore, may make any contract he pleases, that is, he may make any contract whatever, because he is an ordinary bailee; and he is an ordinary bailee because he has made the contract.

We are unable to see the soundness of this reasoning. It seems to us more accurate to say that common carriers are such by virtue of their occupation, not by virtue of the responsibilities under which they rest. Those responsibilities may vary in different countries, and at different times, without changing the character of the employment. The common law subjects the common carrier to insurance of the goods carried, except as against the act of God or public enemies. The civil law excepts, also, losses by means of any superior force, and any inevitable accident. Yet the employment is the same in both cases. And if by special agreement the carrier is exempted from still other responsibilities, it does not follow that his employment is changed, but only that his responsibilities are changed. The theory occasionally announced, that a special contract as to the terms and responsibilities of carriage changes the nature of the employment, is calculated to mislead. The responsibilities of a common carrier may be reduced to those of an ordinary bailee for hire, whilst the nature of his business renders him a common carrier still. Is there any good sense in holding that a railroad company, whose only business is to carry passengers and goods, and which was created and established for that purpose alone, is changed to a private carrier for hire by a mere contract with a customer, whereby the latter assumes the risk of inevitable accidents in the carriage of his goods? Suppose the contract relates to a single crate of glass or crockery, whilst at the same time the carrier receives from the same person twenty other parcels, respecting which no such contract is made. Is the company a public carrier as to the twenty parcels and a private carrier as to the one?

On this point there are several authorities which support our view, some of which are noted in the margin.(a)

A common carrier may, undoubtedly, become a private carrier, or a bailee for hire, when, as a matter of accommodation or special engagement, he undertakes to carry something which it is not his business to carry. For example, if a carrier of produce, running a truck boat between New York city and Norfolk, should be requested to carry a keg of specie, or a load of expensive furniture, which he could justly refuse to take, such agreement might be made in reference to his taking and carrying the same as the parties chose to make, not involving any stipulation contrary to law or public policy. But when a carrier has a regularly established business for carrying all or certain articles, and especially if that carrier be a corporation created for the purpose of the carrying trade, and the carriage of the articles is embraced within the scope of its chartered powers, it is a common carrier, and a special contract about its responsibility does not divest it of the character.

But it is contended that, though a carrier may not stipulate for his own negligence, there is no good reason why he should not be permitted to stipulate for immunity for the negligence of his servants, over whose actions, in his absence, he can exercise no control. If we advert for a moment to the fundamental principles on which the law of common carriers is founded, it will be seen that this objection is inadmissible. In regulating the public establishment of common carriers, the great object of the law was to secure the utmost care and diligence in the performance of their important duties—an object essential to the welfare of every civilised community. Hence the common law rule which charged the common carrier as an insurer. Why charge him as such? Plainly for the purpose of raising the most stringent motive for the exercise of carefulness and fidelity in his trust. In regard to passengers, the highest degree of carefulness and diligence is expressly exacted. In the one case the securing of the most exact diligence and fidelity underlies the law, and is the reason for it; in the other it is directly and absolutely prescribed by the law. It is obvious, therefore, that if a carrier stipulate not to be bound to the exercise of care and diligence, but to be at liberty to indulge in the contrary, he seeks to put off the essential duties of his employment. And to assert that he may do so seems almost a contradiction in terms.

Now, to what avail does the law attach these essential duties to the employment of the common carrier, if they may be waived in respect to his agents and servants, especially where the carrier is an artificial being, incapable of acting except by agents and servants? It is carefulness and diligence in performing the service which the law demands, not an abstract carefulness and diligence in proprietors and stockholders who take no active part in the business. To admit such a distinction in the law of common carriers, as the business is now carried on, would be subversive of the very object of the law.

It is a favourite argument in the cases which favour the extension of the carrier's right to contract for exemption from liability, that men must be permitted to make their own agreements, and that it is no concern of the public on what terms an individual chooses to have his goods carried. Thus, in Dorr v. The N. J. Steam Navigation Company (1 Kern. 485) the court sums up its judgment thus: "To say the parties have not a right to make their own contract, and to limit the precise extent of their own respective risks and liabilities, in a matter no way affecting the public morals, or conflicting with the public interests, would, in my judgment, be an unwarrantable restriction upon trade and commerce, and a most palpable invasion of personal right."

Is it true that the public interest is not affected by individual contracts of the kind referred to? Is not the whole business community affected by holding such contracts valid? If held valid, the advantageous position of the companies exercising the business of common carriers is such that it places it in their power to change the law of common carriers in effect, by introducing new rules of obligation.

The carrier and his customer do not stand on a footing of equality. The latter is only one individual of a million. He cannot afford to higgle or stand out and seek redress in the courts. His business will not admit such a course. He prefers rather to accept any bill of lading, or sign any paper the carrier presents; often, indeed, without knowing what the one or the other contains. In most cases he has no alternative but to do this, or abandon his business. In the present case, for example, the freight agent of the company testified that though they made forty or fifty contracts every week like that under consideration, and had carried on the business for years, no other arrangement than this was ever made with any drover. And the reason is obvious enough—if they did not accept this they must pay tariff rates. These rates were 70 cents. per 100lb. for carrying from Buffalo to Albany, and each horned animal was rated at 2000lb., making a charge of 14dols. for every animal carried, instead of the usual charge of 70dols. for a car load; being a difference of three to one. Of course no drover could afford to pay such tariff rates. This fact is adverted to for the purpose of illustrating how completely in the power of the railroad companies parties are; and how necessary it is to stand firmly by those principles of law by which the public interests are protected.

If the customer had any real freedom of choice, if he had a reasonable and practicable alternative, and if the employment of the carrier were not a public one, charging him with the duty of accommodating the public in the line of his employment; then, if the customer chose to assume the risk of negligence, it could with more reason be said to be his private affair, and no concern of the public. But the condition of things is entirely different, and especially so under the modified arrangements which the carrying trade has assumed. The business is mostly concentrated in a few powerful corporations, whose position in the body politic enables them to control it. They do, in fact, control it, and impose such conditions upon travel and transportation as they see fit, which the public is compelled to accept. These circumstances furnish an additional argument, if any were needed, to show that the conditions imposed by common carriers ought not to be adverse (to say the least) to the dictates of public policy and morality. The status and relative position of the parties render any such conditions void. Contracts of common carriers, like those of persons occupying a fiduciary character, giving them a position in which they can take undue advantage of the persons with whom they contract, must rest upon their fairness and reasonableness. It was for the reason that the limitations of liability first introduced by common carriers into their notices and bills of lading were just and reasonable that the courts sustained them. It was just and reasonable that they should not be responsible for losses happening by sheer accident, or dangers of navigation that no human skill or vigilance could guard against; it was just and reasonable that they should not be chargeable for money or other valuable articles liable to be stolen or damaged, unless apprised of their character or value; it was just and reasonable that they should not be responsible for articles liable to rapid decay, or for live animals liable to get unruly from fright and to injure themselves in that state, when such articles or live animals became injured without their fault or negligence. And when any of these just and reasonable excuses were incorporated into notices or special contracts assented to by their customers, the law might well give effect to them without the violation of any important principle, although modifying the strict rules of responsibility imposed by the common law. The improved state of society and the better administration of the laws, had diminished the opportunities of collusion and bad faith on the part of the carrier and rendered less imperative the application of the iron rule, that he must be responsible at all events. Hence the exemptions referred to were deemed reasonable and proper to be allowed. But the proposition to allow a public carrier to abandon altogether his obligations to the public, and stipulate for exemptions that are unreasonable and improper, amounting to an abdication of the essential duties of his employment, would never have been entertained by the sages of the law.

Hence, as before remarked, we regard the English statute called the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, passed in 1854, which declared void all notices and conditions made by common carriers except such as the Judge, at the trial, or the courts should hold just and reasonable, as substantially a return to the rules of the common law. It would have been more strictly so, perhaps, had the reasonableness of the contract been referred to the law instead of the individual Judges. The decisions made for more than half a century before the courts commenced the abnormal course which led to the necessity of that statute, giving effect to certain classes of exemptions stipulated for by the carrier, may be regarded as authorities on the question as to what exemptions are just and reasonable. So the decisions of our own courts are entitled to like effect when not made under the fallacious notion that every special contract imposed by the common carrier on his customers must be carried into effect, for the simple reason that it was entered into without regard to the character of the contract and the relative situation of the parties.

Conceding, therefore, that special contracts, made by common carriers with their customers, limiting their liability, are good and valid, so far as they are just and reasonable; to the extent, for example, of excusing them for all losses happening by accident, without any negligence or fraud on their part; when they ask to go still further, and to be excused for negligence—an excuse so repugnant to the law of their foundation and to the public good—they have no longer any plea of justice or reason to support such a stipulation, but the contrary. And then, the inequality of the parties, the compulsion under which the customer is placed, and the obligations of the carrier to the public, operate with full force to divest the transaction of validity.

On this subject the remarks of Chief Justice Redfield, in his recent collection of American railway cases, seem to us eminently just. "It being clearly established, then," says he, "that common carriers have public duties which they are bound to discharge with impartiality, we must conclude that they cannot, either by notice or special contracts, release themselves from the performance of these public duties, even by the consent of those who employ them; for all extortion is done by the apparent consent of the victim. A public officer or servant, who has a monopoly in his department, has no just right to impose onerous and unreasonable conditions upon those who are compelled to employ him." And his conclusion is that, notwithstanding some exceptional decisions, the law of to-day stands substantially as follows: "1. That the exemption claimed by carriers must be reasonable and just, otherwise it will be regarded as extorted from the owners of the goods by duress of circumstances, and, therefore, not binding. 2. That every attempt of carriers, by general notices or special contract, to excuse themselves from responsibility for losses or damages resulting in any degree from their own want of care and faithfulness, is against that good faith which the law requires as the basis of all contracts or employments, and, therefore, based upon principles and a policy which the law will not uphold."

The defendants endeavour to make a distinction between gross and ordinary negligence, and insist that the Judge ought to have charged that the contract was at least effective for excusing the latter.

We have already adverted to the tendency of judicial opinion adverse to the distinction between gross and ordinary negligence. Strictly speaking, these expressions are indicative rather of the degree of care and diligence which is due from a party, and which he fails to perform, than of the amount of inattention, carelessness, or stupidity which he exhibits. If very little care is due from him, and he fails to bestow that little, it is called gross negligence. If very great care is due, and he fails to come up to the mark required, it is called slight negligence, and if ordinary care is due, such as a prudent man would exercise in his own affairs, failure to bestow that amount of care is called ordinary negligence. In each case the negligence, whatever epithet we give it, is failure to bestow the care and skill which the situation demands; and hence it is more strictly accurate perhaps to call it simply "negligence" And this seems to be the tendency of modern authorities.(a) If they mean more than this, and seek to abolish the distinction of degrees of care, skill, and diligence required in the performance of various duties and the fulfilment of various contracts, we think they go too far, since the requirement of different degrees of care in different situations is too firmly settled and fixed in the law to be ignored or changed. The compilers of the French Civil Code undertook to abolish these distinctions by enacting that "every act whatever of man that causes damage to another, obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it."(b) Toulier, in his commentary on the code, regards this as a happy thought, and a return to the law of nature. (c) But such an iron rule is too regardless of the foundation principles of human duty, and must often operate with great severity and injustice.

In the case before us, the law, in the absence of special contract, fixes the degree of care and diligence due from the railroad company to the persons carried on its trains. A failure to exercise such care and diligence is negligence. It needs no epithet properly and legally to describe it. If it is against the policy of the law to allow stipulations which will relieve the company from the exercise of that care and diligence, or which, in other words, will excuse them for negligence in the performance of that duty, then the company remains liable for such negligence. The question whether the company was guilty of negligence in this case, which caused the injury sustained by the plaintiff, was fairly left to the jury. It was unnecessary to tell them whether, in the language of law writers, such negligence would be called gross or ordinary.

The conclusions to which we have come are—First, that a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law. Secondly, that it is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants. Thirdly, that these rules apply both to carriers of goods and carriers of passengers for hire, and with special force to the latter. Fourthly, that a drover travelling on a pass, such as was given in this case, for the purpose of taking care of his stock on the train, is a passenger for hire.

These conclusions decide the present case, and require a judgment of affirmance. We purposely abstain from expressing any opinion as to what would have been the result of our judgment had we considered the plaintiff a free passenger instead of a passenger for hire.

PATENT LAW.

COMPLETE SPECIFICATION.

Elliott v. Turner. Ex. Ch. 1845. In covenant on an indenture by which B. was licensed to make and sell buttons according to A.'s patent, the issue was whether certain buttons made by B. were made under the licence. The specification described the invention to consist in the application to the covering of buttons, of such figured woven fabrics "wherein the ground, or the face of the ground thereof, is produced by a warp of soft or organzine silk, such as is used in weaving satin and the classes of fabrics produced therefrom." The jury asked how they were to understand the word "or" in the specification; whether it was used disjunctively, or, whether "organzine" was the construction of the word "soft." The judge told them, that, in his opinion, unless the silk was organzine, it was not within the patent. Held, that this direction was erroneous; for, that the judge should not have told the jury, absolutely, that soft and organzine silk were the same, but that the words were capable of being so construed, if the jury were satisfied that, at the date of the patent, there was only one description of soft silk,—and that organzine,—used in satin weaving; but, otherwise, that the proper and ordinary sense of the word "or" was to be adopted, and the patent held to apply to every species of soft silk, as well as to organzine silk. (2 C. B. 446; 15 L. J. 49, C. P.)

McAlpine v. Mangnall. 1846.—If, taking the whole specification together, and giving its words a fair and reasonable interpretation, the court can see that the specification only claims an improvement on an old machine, it will be sufficient. (3 C. B. 182.)

Stevens v. Keating. 1848.—Patent for "a process or method of combining various materials so as to form stuccoes, plasters, and cements, and for the manufacture of artificial stones, marbles, &c. used in buildings." The specification, after stating the invention to consist in producing certain hard cements of the combination of the powder of gypsum, powder of limestone, and chalk, with other materials, such combinations being (subsequent to their mixing) submitted to heat, described the method or process of making a cement from gypsum to consist in mixing with powdered gypsum, strong alkali (ex. gr. best American pearlash) dissolved in a certain proportion of water, this solution to be neutralized with acid (sulphuric acid being the best), the mass to be kept in agitation, and the acid to be added gradually till the effervescence should cease; and then a certain proportion of water to be added (if other alkali were used, the quantity to be varied in proportion to its strength); and the mixture having been brought to a proper consistence by the further addition of powdered gypsum, to be dried in moulds, and finally subjected to a furnace capable of producing a red heat. The specification concluded by stating that other alkalies and acids beside those before mentioned would answer the purposes of the invention, though not so well, and that the inventor claimed the method or process thereinbefore described: Held, that the specification was bad. "It must either be a claim of all acids and alkalies, or of all acids and alkalies that will answer the purpose. If it be a claim of all acids and alkalies, it is clearly bad, as there are some which will not answer the purpose. If it be a claim of those only which will answer the purpose, it is as clearly bad, in consequence of not stating those which will answer the purpose, and distinguishing them from those which will not, and so preventing the public from being under the necessity of making experiments to ascertain which of them will succeed and which will not." (2 Ex. 772; 19 L. J., N. S. 57, Ex.)

Beard v. Egerton. 1849.—In the construction of a specification, the whole instrument must be taken together, and a fair and reasonable interpretation given to the words used in it. A specification of a patent for "a new and improved method of obtaining the spontaneous reproduction of all the images received on the focus of the camera obscura," in describing the process, stated it is to be divided into five operations." The first consists in polishing and cleaning the silver surface of the plate, in order to properly prepare or qualify it for receiving the sensitive layer or coating (iodine), upon which the action of the light traces the design; the second operation, is the applying that sensitive layer or coating to the silver surface; the third, in submitting, in the camera obscura, the prepared surface or plate to the action of light, so that it may receive the images; the fourth, in bringing out or making appear the image, picture, or representation, which is not visible when the plate is first taken out of the camera obscura; the fifth, and last operation is, that of removing the sensitive layer or coating, which would continue to be affected and undergo different changes from the action of light; this would necessarily tend to destroy the design or tracing so obtained in the camera obscura." It then proceeded to give a description of the first operation,—preparing the silver surface of the plate; the concluding part of which directed that nitric acid dissolved in water should be applied three different times, the plate being each time sprinkled with pounce, and lightly rubbed with cotton; adding, "When the plate is not intended for immediate use or operation, the acid may be used only twice upon its surface after being exposed to heat; the first part of the operation, that is, the preparation as far as the second application of the acid, may be done at any time; this will allow of a number of plates being kept prepared up to the last slight operation; it is, however, considered indispensable, that, just before the moment of using the plates in the camera, or the reproducing the design, to put at least once more some acid on the plate, and to rub it lightly with pounce, as before stated; finally, the plate must be cleaned with cotton from all pounce dust which may be on the surface, or its edges." In a subsequent part of the specification, having described the second operation, viz., the application of the iodine, the inventor observed: "After this second operation is completed, the plate is to be passed to the third operation, or that of the camera obscura; whenever it is possible, the one operation should immediately follow the other." Held, that, taking the whole specification together, the direction as to the third application of acid, was not to be understood to be a direction to apply the acid after the second operation, viz., the coating the plate with iodine,—which, it was proved, would render the whole process abortive, —but to apply it as part of the first operation; and that the specification gave sufficient information to an operator of reasonable skill. (8 C. B. 165; 13 Jur. 1004; 19 L. J., N. S., 36 C. P.)

R. v. Cutler. 1849.—The specification of a patent for "improvements in the construction of the tubular flues of steam boilers," described two modes of performing one part of the invention, either of which it was stated would produce the effect. At the trial the judge told the jury that, if either mode succeeded, the patent might be good, notwithstanding the imperfection of the others. Held, that this was a misdirection. Denman, C. J., delivering the judgment of the court, said: "I told the jury that if either of those methods were proved satisfactorily to do the work, the patent might be good, notwithstanding the imperfection of the other. The case of Lewis v. Marling had been quoted as establishing that doctrine, but on examination we find that the court then only said that the claim of some part of the machine, which turned out to be useless, did not vitiate the patent. This is certainly a very different thing from describing a part of the machine as capable of co-operating in the work, when in fact it is incapable, even though, at the same time, other means are described which might be effectually employed. The reader of the specification, relying upon it, might attempt to use the former mode in constructing the machinery, which would fail of its purpose from being too accurately made according to the patentee's instructions." (Macrory's P. C. 137; 14 Q.B. 372n.)

The Electric Telegraph Company v. Brett. 1851.—Patent "for improvements in giving signals and sounding alarums in distant places, by means of electric currents transmitted through metallic circuits. Subsequently to the patent, it was discovered that the return current could be conducted back to the battery through the earth as effectually as through a continuous metallic circuit. The defendant contended that, by using this method, they did not infringe the plaintiff's patent. Cresswell, J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, said: "With regard to the specification, it is to be observed, that, the claim of the patentees being for improvements not all immediately connected with, or dependent on, each other, but all applicable to giving signals, &c., by means of electric currents, the plan adopted in the specification was, to give an account of the whole system or mode of transmission of electric currents for the purpose of giving signals, and the modes of giving those signals, specifying afterwards the parts claimed as improvements, and either expressly disclaiming or leaving unclaimed all that was not expressly claimed. It is obvious, that in such a specification, that part which describes the matter claimed is to be much more strictly construed than that which, though necessarily mentioned, is not spoken of as a new matter, or as the subject of a grant, but only as something known, and necessary to be referred to, for the purpose of explaining the claim. Considered in this view, we think, the specification, in speaking of metallic circuits, may properly be considered as comprehending all circuits which are metallic, as far as it is material to the improvements claimed that they should be so, and that the expression in question, is not to be construed with more strictness and precision than is necessary to enable it to fulfil that purpose of explanation for which it was introduced." (10 Com. B. 838; 20 L. J., N.S., 123, C.P.; 15 Jur. 579.)

Holmes v. The London and North Western Railway Company. 1852.—The plaintiff obtained a patent for "an improved turning table," all the component parts of which, except one, were comprised in a prior patent, the specification of which was not enrolled until after the date of the plaintiff's patent. The plaintiff, in his specification, claimed "the improved turning table hereinbefore described," without showing that any part of it was old. The jury found that the introduction of certain suspending rods made the table a new instrument. Held, that the specification was bad, as it did not distinguish what was new from what was old. Jervis, C. J., in the course of the argument, said: "The object of the condition in the patent requiring a specification is twofold; first, that useful novelties should be given to the public, of which, at the end of the term granted to the patentee, they should have the full benefit; and, secondly, that no person should inadvertently infringe the rights of the patentee during the term for which the patent has been granted. In delivering judgment his Lordship said: "It is admitted as a general proposition that every patentee must, in his specification, describe the nature of his invention either directly or in such a way as that those who read the specification with common ordinary understanding, and fairly read it, may see and understand what is new and what is old. . . . . The claim in substance is this 'for an improved turning table.' Now, that will not have the effect of making everything that follows a combination, merely because he claims the turning table." Maule, J., after pointing out that the patentee had not distinguished what was new from what was old, said: "If it be impliedly said in the specification, that the suspension rods are new, and an improvement on what existed before, the same implication arises as to every other part." (Macrory's P. C. 1.)

Tetley v. Easton. 1852.—Pollock, C.B. held at Nisi Prius that (1) The question as to the identity of two inventions described in the specifications is for the court. (2) The patentee can only claim that which he can give the public a convenient means and facility to use. (3) Specifications are to be construed in a candid and fair spirit; and if any mistake in one part can be corrected by other parts of the specification, such correction should be made. (4) A patentee is bound to give to the public the full benefit of his knowledge on the subject of his invention. The Court of Queen's Bench held, that if a specification includes what is old as well as what is new, the patentee must be taken to claim all, unless he clearly makes it appear that he does not claim as his invention that which is old. Coleridge, J., added: "This rule may, perhaps, admit of some modification in favour of the patentee, in respect of things incidentally mentioned, which are old and universally known to be so; for, if he had occasion to introduce a hinge into his machinery, it would be absurd to expect that he should point out that the hinge was not new." (Macrory's P. C. 33.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

WE have received from the Town Clerk of the Borough of Sheffield a copy of the report of the committee appointed by the Town Council to prepare a new table of fees to be taken by the clerk to the borough justices, together with the table of fees thereto attached, and which we are not able to produce at present owing to pressure on our space, but which we hope to be able to print in our next issue, as well with a view the better to explain the differences of opinion existing between the council and the justices upon the subject, as for the information of justices' clerks and the Profession generally. There is, no doubt, a strong feeling in many towns where justices' clerks are paid by fees that the system of payment by salary should be substituted for the former; and provided the salary is adequate to the duties and responsibility, we certainly think it is much to be preferred to payment by fees.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to us suggesting a meeting between those members of the council of the Incorporated Law Society, known to be in favour of certain reforms affecting solicitors, and those other solicitors (members of the society with some few exceptions), who devote themselves to the accomplishment of similar objects; so that early in this year combined action may be taken with a view to inducing the society to direct their representatives to take action in such matters.

WE understand that it is in contemplation, by certain members of the Legal Practitioners Society, to bring (on behalf of solicitors), the subject of the exclusive rules of the Inns of Court as affecting the lower branch, formally under the notice of the First Lord of the Treasury, with a view to legislation on the subject. Any such step will have the entire approval of solicitors throughout the country, and it is certain that such a movement will not only have the support of the most eminent members of the higher branch, but also that Mr. Gladstone will lend a willing ear to any such proposal as that which we understand is in contemplation, always provided that for our accustomed apathy is substituted on such an occasion a determined and unanimous demand for a relaxation of the present rules.

A LAY contemporary, addressing itself recently to the subject of "The Inns of Court," and the proposals of the Legal Education Association, observed in reference to the admission of those seeking to become solicitors, and the proposed new school of law, that "it rarely dawns on the six and eightpenny paying public that attorneys are a long-suffering race, but if we consider the meekness with which they have endured their exclusion from judicial offices, their subordination to the other branch, and their exile from the most solid pudding, as well as the dignity of the Profession, the fact will appear undeniable." We confess we do not quite agree with our contemporary. We believe there is a strong feeling in the public mind where it is free from the influences of the other branch, a feeling growing annually stronger, identical with the expression of opinion indulged in so frankly and so justly by the writer of the article in question. That barristers and solicitors belong to one and the same profession cannot be doubted, yet the rules of the Inns of Court present to solicitors a barrier, in the majority of cases impassable, to their being called to the Bar, and not content with this exclusion, which cannot be justified either by public policy or the exigencies of the Profession, the Bar is accorded every public or quasi-public post or office, for very many of which solicitors are frequently equally well fitted. Unfortunately the influence of the higher branch in the House of Commons is very great, and there is no organisation among solicitors. This latter necessity, we hope, will soon be met. Then, we venture to think, solicitors will be able to make their own terms with the Bar, which, however will not be advanced in any hostile spirit, but will be the embodiment of a policy which has first in view the interests of the public, and the mutual interests of both branches of the common Profession. A policy of exclusion will be found as foreign to our purpose in those times (which may be nearer than many imagine) as the policy of the Bar in impeding the admission of solicitors to their body has always been foreign to public interests.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "The recent adoption at the Rolls of a rule to cast on the losing party costs in a large class of cases in which they had usually hitherto come out of the estate, increases much the embarrassment of solicitors in advising at the outset of cases, as they are pretty sure to get all the blame in the event of failure, notwithstanding the impossibility of their obtaining, when called on to advise at such an early stage, and on ex parte statements and obscurely worded wills and other documents, the same clear view of the facts, and the law applicable to them, which subsequently becomes developed and presented to the judge after hearing the evidence on both sides and the fullest exposition of the law by the ablest counsel—to say nothing of the further difficulty arising from the uncertainty in the law created by the numerous reversals of the decisions of the Judges by the Courts of Appeal. Neither can solicitors find entire safety in adopting the other alternative, of recommending clients never to proceed in doubtful cases; as they get equal blame if it turns out, after the opportunity is lost, that the client would have succeeded had he ventured to proceed. The adoption of a hard and inflexible rule as to costs is scarcely fair or suitable in the majority of the cases which come before courts of equity; and though it may possibly be entitled to the appellation of summum jus, it will often prove in practice to be summa injuria."

We have already had occasion lately to refer to the unsatisfactory position of matters as regards the swearing of affidavits in England for use in the Irish courts and offices, and it seems from a communication which we have just received from Mr. Henry Oldham, of Dublin, who is an Irish commissioner for all the English courts, that we have in some respects under-estimated the evils in this respect, so much so indeed, that we shall feel it our duty, on a future occasion, again to refer to, and deal more fully with, this subject; the more so because legislation, arising out of exigencies occasioned by the operation of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, may be looked for upon the subject of commissions for oaths generally. We propose now shortly to call attention to certain statutory provisions affecting this question as regards affidavits sworn in Ireland for use in the English and Scotch courts and offices and vice versâ. As regards affidavits for use in the Irish Court of Chancery, the Chancery (Ireland) Act 1867, provides that "affidavits, &c., in all causes, &c., pending in the court, shall and may be sworn and taken in England before any judge or person authorised to administer oaths in England," (see 30 & 31 Vict. c. 44, s. 81). This is an important provision the nature of which is, we believe, not known to many English commissioners for oaths in Chancery in England. Upon this subject our correspondent observes, "affidavits so sworn are constantly filed here and should, when sworn according to our practice, be enclosed by the commissioner in an envelope, sealed and endorsed by him with the title of the cause or matter and subscribed with his signature." In the case of proofs of debt in the Irish Bankruptcy Court, similar facilities for swearing the necessary affidavits exist both in England and Scotland. As regards the Irish Courts of Common Law and Probate our correspondent says, "There is frequently the utmost delay, trouble, and expense, in having sworn in England affidavits for use in these courts." And he adds upon this subject, "debts are often lost to English creditors in provincial towns from want of an authority to take the most ordinary routine affidavits. As regards the English Court of Probate, the English Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 95, s. 32) provides "that in Scotland and Ireland affidavits" for use in this court "may be sworn before any person," &c., "authorised to administer oaths," while as regards the Irish Court of Probate, the Irish Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 31, s. 28) affords no such facilities for swearing affidavits in England and Scotland for use in that court, the section in question providing that such affidavits can be sworn only before such commissioners as are directly authorised by the Irish Court of Chancery or Probate to administer oaths in such courts. The wording of this section is such that there is no room for doubt but that the framers of it purposely omitted to provide as is provided in the corresponding section of the English Act. The entire question requires readjustment, and, in our opinion, no measure dealing with it will be complete unless it provides that a commissioner for oaths can take affidavits in all courts in Her Majesty's dominions.

NOTES OF NEW DECISONS.

ATTACHMENT FOR DISOBEDIENCE OF ORDER TO PRODUCE DOCUMENTS—SERVANT FORBIDDEN TO PRODUCE BY MASTER — CORPORATION — COMMON PLEAS AT LANCASTER.—In obedience to the instructions of his directors, and in disobedience of the order of the district prothonotary of the Common Pleas at Lancaster, and of the order of an arbitrator, the secretary of a railway company refused to produce before the arbitrator numerous books and papers of the company, which the attorney of the plaintiff in the cause referred swore to be material to the plaintiff's case: Held, that the secretary, being in the position of a servant, was justified in obeying the orders of his masters not to produce the documents, and a rule to attach him for contempt discharged. Whether an action would lie in such a case, quære: (Crowther v. Appleby; Re Sharpley, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580. C. P.)

PRACTICE — AFFIDAVIT OF DOCUMENTS—SUFFICIENCY—FURTHER AFFIDAVIT—REASONABLE SUSPICION.—The schedule to an affidavit of documents made by the defendants comprised a letter dated the 19th Oct. from U. and Co. (whom the defendants by their answer admitted to have acted as their solicitors in the cause down to the 17th Oct.) to their agents in Paris, and letters in reply dated the 20th and 21st Oct., which referred to certain documents alleged by the plaintiffs to be material to the questions at issue in the cause. The defendants' affidavit concluded with the usual denial of their having or having had in their possession any other documents relating to the questions at issue in the cause. Held (reversing the decision of Malins, V.C.) that the affidavit was sufficient, inasmuch as there was nothing in the schedule to raise a reasonable suspicion that anything had been inadvertently or otherwise omitted from the affidavit, it being clear from the letters themselves that they were written and received when U. and Co. were not acting as solicitors for the defendants: (The Imperial Land Company of Marseilles v. Masterman, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 559. Chan.)

PRACTICE—CREDITOR'S BILL FOR ADMINISTRATION—DECREE, BY CONSENT, ON MOTION.—The court will by consent, make an immediate decree, on motion, in a cause not in the paper, for the administration of the real and personal estate of a testator at the suit of a creditor, after a summons in chambers for the administration of the estate had been taken out by another creditor, which was returnable before the first day on which the cause could be heard as a short cause: (Scaffold v. Hampton, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 575. V.C. M.)

SHORT NOTICE OF TRIAL—"IF NECESSARY"—MEANING OF—REASONABLE DILIGENCE ON THE PART OF THE PLAINTIFF.—When a defendant is under terms of taking "short notice of trial if necessary," he is still entitled to full notice of trial if the plaintiff can give it, using reasonable diligence. What amounts to reasonable diligence, depends upon the facts of each particular case. The defendant having from time to time obtained time to plead, and being under terms to take "short notice of trial if necessary," delivered his pleas on the 7th July; the plaintiff's attorney thereupon, on the same day, gave his pleader instructions to reply, but (as he stated in his affidavit) he did not receive the replication from his pleader in time to deliver same and give notice of trial before the 14th. The cause was a country one, and the commission day was the 21st of the same month. The defendant having treated the notice of trial as a nullity, the cause was tried as undefended, and a verdict was returned for the plaintiff. Upon a rule to set aside the verdict upon the ground that the plaintiff, by delivering his replication and notice of trial within four days after receiving the defendant's pleas, would have been enabled to give full notice of trial, and that short notice was therefore bad: Held, that the plaintiff was not bound to do more than use reasonable diligence in replying and giving notice of trial, and that having, in the opinion of the court, used reasonable diligence, the defendants were bound to have accepted the short notice of trial. Held, however, that on the merits a new trial should be granted on payment of costs: (Pretty v. Boscawen and another, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 579. Ex.)

V. C. BACON'S COURT.

Thursday, Dec. 18, 1873.

MITCHELL v. CONDY.

Contempt of court—Fictitious document—Removal of receiver.

PLAINTIFF and defendant, partners, having disagreed, a bill for dissolution was filed, and a receiver appointed. Before the decree the plaintiff caused to be circulated amongst the customers of the firm a paper, headed as follows:—"1873. M. No. 156. Filed 30th June, 1873. In Chancery. Lord Chancellor.—Vice-Chancellor Bacon. Mitchell v. Condy. Dollman, Condy, & Co. Receiver's Interim Report;" printed so as to resemble the commencement of a bill or answer in Chancery. The paper purported to be signed by "Lambton Young, Receiver," and began as follows:—"On being appointed manager and receiver to the above estate on the 9th Aug. last, I went carefully over the books of the firm, and made a rough analysis of the accounts." Then followed a statement respecting the moneys due to and owing by the firm, in terms which the defendant argued were hostile to him, and towards the end appeared this: "The accounts contained in the annexed list would seem to me to require the adoption of law proceedings for their recovery, the indebtedness in each case being most clear." The receiver said that this paper was prepared for the purpose of its being submitted to the chief clerk, and denied all knowledge of the circulation. The plaintiff said that one day calling at the receiver's office when he was not in he found the paper lying on the desk, and made a copy of it without the receiver's knowledge. He said he had it printed and circulated without taking time to reflect that he might be doing wrong. Amongst the charges against the receiver were, that though he had assets in his hands he had allowed the rent of the partnership premises to fall into arrear, so that the landlord distrained; and that he had attempted to remove the business from London to Battersea, to the injury of the defendant and advantage of the plaintiff. The defendant moved to commit the plaintiff for contempt, and to discharge the receiver.

Eddis, Q.C. and Bradford, for the motion.—The contempt is of a double kind. The paper was not a genuine document, it was a mere fabrication; and it was plainly intended to prejudice the course of justice. As to the receiver, there was a manifest bias in favour of the plaintiff, who was his personal friend.

Hay, Q.C. and Woodroffe for the plaintiff.—We do not justify the circulation; but it does not amount to contempt, as it could not possibly affect the judgment of the court. Against the receiver there is no case.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said there was not a shadow of excuse for the conduct of the plaintiff, and, as might be expected, he submitted, and declared himself ready to apologise, saying that he did not know that he had done anything wrong. But there could be no doubt that the object of the issue of the circular was to impede the undisturbed and impartial course of justice. The receiver also had forfeited the confidence of the court. There being a clear contempt, the defendant and the receiver must pay the costs of the motion; and the receiver must be discharged.

SOLICITORS AND THE JUDICATURE ACT.—With reference to the second paragraph, p. 144, of your issue in Saturday's LAW TIMES, I think, instead of Field and Co., Norwich, you should substitute "J. B. Coaks," of this city. Mr. Edward Field is a shrewd man, and a member of the Incorporated Law Society, and one of the examiners, but Mr. Coaks has more practice in common law, Chancery, bankruptcy, and general commercial business than, I should think, any other three firms in the eastern counties, and he is generally admitted to be the shrewdest and sharpest man in the profession hereabout.—WARNER WRIGHT.

IRISH AFFIDAVITS.—I think from the articles in your numbers of the 20th and 27th inst., you are not aware that our Chancery Commissioners can take Irish Chancery affidavits—(see 30 & 31 Vict. c. 44, s. 81)—and also Irish Bankruptcy affidavits. (See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 60, s. 366.) My Dublin agent informs me that affidavits so sworn are accepted both in Chancery and Bankruptcy.—A LONDON COMMISSIONER.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE—AGREEMENT TO EXECUTE LEGAL MORTGAGE—MARRIAGE ARTICLES — SETTLEMENT — CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE — PRIORITY.—In 1866 L. deposited with a bank the title deeds of certain real estate to secure the balance of his account, and at the same time he executed a memorandum by which he agreed to execute a deed for legally carrying out the security. In 1871, two days before his marriage, articles were executed by which he agreed to settle the same property, stating, in answer to inquiries by the solicitor of the intended wife who prepared the articles, that the property was unencumbered, and that the title deeds were at his banker's for safe custody. Shortly after the marriage a settlement was executed by which he conveyed the legal estate in the property to the trustee of the settlement. On a bill by the bank for foreclosure. Held, that it was the duty of the solicitor to have made further inquiries of the bank; that the intended wife must be taken to have had constructive notice of the equitable charge in favour of the bank, and that the plaintiff was entitled to a foreclosure: (Maxfield v. Burton, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 571. Rolls.)

SETTLEMENT — CONSTRUCTION — SHIFTING CLAUSE—POWER OF CROWN TO LIMIT DIGNITIES.—A testatrix, by her will, devised certain estates to trustees upon trust to settle the same in a course of entail to correspond as nearly as might be with the limitations of the Barony of B., and the provisos affecting the same. By a clause in the letters patent creating the Barony of B., it was provided that if any person taking under such letters patent should succeed to the Earldom of D., then, and so often as the same should happen, the succession to the honours and dignities thereby created, should devolve upon the person who would be entitled thereto if the person so succeeding to the Earldom of D. was dead without issue male. A settlement was executed under the direction of the court, which contained a clause following, mutatis mutandis, the words of the shifting clause in the letters patent. Lord B. (the person taking under the letters patent) succeeded to the Earldom of D. Held (affirming the decision of Bacon, V.C.), that immediately upon the succession of Lord B. to the Earldom of D., his next brother became entitled in possession to the settled estates, under the shifting clause in the settlement. Semble, that the Crown has not an unlimited power of limiting dignities in any way that it pleases, and that it cannot create a mode of succession to a title totally unknown to the law: (Cope v. Earl De La Warr, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 565. Ch.)

WILL—CODICIL—REPUBLICATION — SPECIFIC OR GENERAL BEQUEST.—By the will of a testator which recited that there was due to him from his son the aggregate sum of £1440, or thereabouts, secured to him by bills, notes, or otherwise, he released his son from the payment of any interest up to the time of his death, and directed that the same sum should be payable over a period of six years by equal yearly payments. At the date of the will the son was indebted to the testator in the sum of £1400, secured by a bill and notes, which was subsequently paid off. Afterwards the testator advanced his son other sums, amounting altogether to £1291, partly secured by promissory notes. The testator then made a codicil by which he confirmed his will. The sum of £1291 was owing at the time of the testator's death. On a bill by the son to restrain the executors of the testator from proceeding with an action against him to recover the sum of £1291, and interest on the amounts of the notes from their respective dates, on the ground that under the provisions of the will, as confirmed by the codicil, he was released from the payment of any interest thereon up to the time of the testator's death, and that he was entitled to pay the debt by six yearly instalments. Held, that the will referred to a specific sum, and was not affected by the codicil, and the bill was dismissed: (Sidney v. Sidney, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 569. Rolls.)

POWER OF APPOINTMENT—EXECUTION—DOCTRINE OF CY-PRÈS.—The donee of a power of appointment of an estate to one or more of the children of A., by his will devised the estate to B., the son of A., for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of B. (who were not objects of the power) in tail male. Held, that the cy-près doctrine was applicable, and that B. took an estate tail: (Line v. Hall, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 568. Rolls.)

LAND TRANSFER IN IRELAND.

The Recommendations of the Land Transfer Commission of 1869, considered with especial reference to their applicability to transfer of Land in Ireland. By R. DENNY URLIN, M.R.I.A., Barrister-at-Law.

[Read Tuesday, 16th Dec. 1873, before the Statistical Society of Ireland.]

One of the last letters written by Richard Cobden contains these remarkable words:

"The land question has a wider bearing than has yet been given it in our public discussions; and it will not be seriously entertained by the people until it has been presented in its full significance."

If the lamented writer of these words had lived, and if his friend, Mr. Bright, had enjoyed health and vigour in the interval, the question of "free trade in land" would have made more rapid progress. It is unnecessary in this society to explain the true meaning of a phrase, in which some persons profess to see foreshadowed the forcible depriving of one class of the community of some of their property. "Free trade in land" simply means the removal of artificial obstructions to the sale and transfer of land—the rendering of transfers and transmissions of estates and charges as easy as possible—the approximation of dealings with land to dealings with government stock and railway shares.

The best, because the latest, summary of facts and arguments bearing on this somewhat obstruse question is that contained in the report of the commissioners by the Crown in 1868.(a)

The chairman of the commission was Lord Romilly, then Master of the Rolls, and who, before becoming an equity judge, had, as Law Officer of the Crown, gained the distinction of preparing and of passing through the House of Commons that most important and successful measure, the Incumbered Estates Act 1849. Mr. Secretary Lowe, whether popular in Ireland or not, is known to be one of the most acute and accomplished men of our time. Mr. Hobhouse, Q.C., formerly a leading Chancery barrister, now holds the important post of legal member of the Supreme Council of India. Mr. Waley, one of the conveyancing counsel of the Court of Chancery, died this year, just as he attained the highest place in his own branch of the Profession. Sir H. Thring is known to fame as the first of parliamentary draftsmen, and as specially versed in the mysteries of land transfer. Mr. Wolstenholme is the learned editor of the latest editions of that best of text-books, Jarman on Wills. Two of the most eminent of these commissioners, the Right Hon. S. H. Walpole, who practised in equity for many years before becoming a Cabinet Minister, and Lord Justice Giffard—whose premature death was justly regarded as a public calamity—declined to sign the report. But their reasons for so declining are altogether in favour, not only of the principle of registration of title, but of the working out of such a system under the orders of a Landed Estates Court. In short, they preferred such a system as we find actually established in Ireland to that "Land Registry Office" which their brother commissioners deemed sufficient for England. The other commissioners, one of them a solicitor in large practice, the others, though not lawyers, men of high general attainments, were selected for their fitness for the task committed to them—an inquiry of vast importance, especially if we look at the probability that so careful and elaborate an inquiry will be regarded as conclusive—at least for many years to come. Although there was not unanimity on many points, the general drift of the report is clear. There was a commission of a somewhat similar character in 1857(a)—resulting in a very large blue book which may be deemed to have settled in the affirmative the once vexed question—whether registration of title is better than registration of deeds. Several years then passed away. Registration of title was introduced in the meantime into most of the Australian colonies, under circumstances which have been brought before this society by Sir R. R. Torrens and others. Lord Westbury, whose capacity and boldness as a law reformer none will question, framed and carried his experimental act for England. The line so traced out was followed in Ireland, still in the spirit of mere experiment. Practical lawyers began to be doubtful whether a merely optional system would ever work largely and advantageously; and the inconvenience of two opposite and mutually exclusive systems began to be felt, when this royal commission of 1868 was appointed.

The report was very carefully prepared; and some of the commissioners appended their own statements, showing minute study of the subject. The evidence was, for the most part, that of practising solicitors who had observed the working of Lord Westbury's Act. The registrars under that Act also gave full details of its working; and Sir R. R. Torrens contributed the results of his large experience in the Australian colonies.

The report enters largely into the merits of the Middlesex registry, which (it is hardly necessary to add) is founded on an Act of Queen Anne, and in all essential points resembles the registry of deeds in Ireland.

Owing to the enormous amount of building in the suburbs of London, the Middlesex registry office has become a very important one; and in it are registered as many as 28,000 deeds in the course of a single year. The indexing appears to be correctly and punctually attended to; yet the report recommends without qualification the repeal of the Registry Act, and the shutting up (as regards future transactions) of the Middlesex Registry Office. Not a single lawyer or non-lawyer on the commission but was convinced that a mere registry of deeds, without commensurate gain, adds delay and expense to every transaction; and that the only useful mode of registration is registration of title or ownership.

It is, therefore, on the assumption that the system of registration of title must ultimately prevail and supersede all other systems, that the report proceeds. It first deals with the partial application of that system made under the Act of 1862, which it may be convenient to designate as Lord Westbury's Act. Three years later—in 1865—the Irish Record of Title Act was passed; and, as might be expected, it was framed after the model of the English Act. Apart from the desirability of bringing the legal systems of England and Ireland as far as may be into harmony, and, therefore, of following as near as possible the legislative example already set, there was a practical consideration—Lord Westbury could hardly have been expected to interest himself in, and carry through the House of Lords, a Bill which materially varied from his own measure of 1862. This is the sufficient answer to critics who say that a better model might have been chosen than Lord Westbury's Act.

Some inconveniences have followed from the too close imitation of the English Act; but one result of the assimilation referred to is very evident as we open the Commissioners' Report of 1869. A large portion both of the evidence and of the report itself is applicable to Ireland. With regard to the slow progress made on both sides of the channel in registering indefeasible titles, and the necessity of enlarging the scope and increasing the efficiency of the machinery, many of the suggestions are extremely applicable. For this reason, therefore, the Commissioners' Report of 1869 deserves far closer attention here than it has hitherto received—especially if the conclusion be a right one that we shall, for a long time at least, witness no more Royal Commissions of Inquiry—with resulting blue books—on transfer of land and registration of title.

Let us glance for a moment at the registration of title in Ireland. No title can be placed on the new record or register except such as have passed through the Landed Estates' Court. On an average two hundred estates, large and small, pass through that court yearly; and although the calculation is disturbed by an enormous estate like that of Lord Waterford's, it may roughly be stated that property of the value of about one million sterling passes through the court annually. Now the estimated value of all the landed property in Ireland, at twenty years' purchase, amounts to about £350,000,000 sterling. Therefore even if all the landed estates' titles passed (as they ought to pass) on to a register or record of ownership, instead of being left to drift towards entanglement and confusion, a whole century would elapse before the country at large would appreciably derive benefit from the system.

In fact, not the entire, but only a small proportion of these titles are now preserved from deterioration by the new record. On it there is prescribed property slightly exceeding in aggregate value two millions sterling. With these limitations it cannot be said that the system is effectively at work. It rather suggests the idea of a model farm, or a model of a new machine—of an experiment set on foot for the purpose, not of effecting much, but rather of showing what it is possible to effect under a much improved system.

In the face of many discouraging circumstances,(a) there is demonstration that the transfer of land can be worked out simply and rapidly.

The Duke of Leinster, who was chairman of the registration of Title Association in this city, and who manifested great interest in the question, unwillingly gave up the idea of registering his title when he found that it would involve an outlay of some £6000: (Report p. 29; Evidence of Sir R. R. Torrens.)

I propose now briefly to advert to some of the more important of these recommendations.

1. Citing and adopting the language of the report of 1857, the commissioners recommend that the record or register of title shall "manifest only the actual and existing ownership of the land for the time being, without laying open the history or past deduction of it."(b)

2. The report recommends that a title when once registered shall not be removed from the register. (Report sect. 93.) Heretofore the system has been so completely optional that on the application of all persons interested the record as to any particular estate can be closed. This works unfavourably towards the owner, who is at a disadvantage when he seeks to borrow money; for the legal adviser of a proposed lender, not being acquainted with the system, or having a dislike to it, sometimes decline to proceed with the loan, unless the property be at once removed from the record. There is, however, the broader reason—that if the Legislature deliberately prefers and adopts a certain system, it is unstatesmanlike to allow the option of having recourse to a worse system; and it imposes an unfair and unusual responsibility on individuals.

3. The report recommends that provincial registries shall be opened, inasmuch as the delay and expense caused by transacting the whole business of registry in the metropolis becomes an appreciable evil in the case of small properties. (Report sect. 93; and evidence of Messrs. Sewell.) From this it would seem that large estates are not considered to require any local arrangements, and a line should therefore be drawn at some estimated value, distinguishing the cases in which local registration should be provided for. The report expresses no opinion as to details. The Government Bill for England proposes to commit all the details of local registry to a board of registry, of which the Lord Chancellor is to be the head. It may be premature to speculate upon the best local centres of registration which might be devised for Ireland: the most feasible plans which have been suggested are as follows:

To improve the offices of clerks of the peace, and to make these officers local registrars; or else

To commit the work to the clerks of the poor law unions, who, being 163 in number, are found even in the remotest parts of Ireland.

4. The question of settled estates is largely entered into by the report, and it is shown that where there is a power of sale the trustees should alone be inscribed on the register as owners, having in that capacity power to transfer. To meet the case of an estate in settlement, where there is no power of sale, the report recommends (Rep. s. 92) that extended powers of ordering a sale should be vested in the Court of Chancery. In Ireland any such extension of power would of course be shared by the Landed Estates' Court, which tribunal would occupy, with regard to any comprehensive system of land transfer, exactly the position which in England is occupied (for want of an estates court) by the Court of Chancery. There would also be (under the control of the court) a system of caveats to check improper dealings, or to give notice of adverse claims where such exist.

5. It follows from the recommendation that "absolute ownership only should appear on the register" (Rep. s. 66), that trusts and equitable interests of all kinds must be protected by caveats. The conveyancing forms would be necessarily simple, and none but the prescribed forms would be accepted or used. Under the present Acts, both in England and Ireland the use of simple forms of transfer, &c., is optional, and frequently very long and complicated instruments are brought in—a practice absolutely incompatible with the rapid transaction of a large quantity of registration business. The transfer of stock at the bank evidently could not proceed unless the forms in use were simple and uniform.

6. The last point to be adverted to is the most important. So far as we have proceeded the recommendations of this report are not aimed at any great increase in the quantity of land inscribed on the register. Let us now regard, and rather less hurriedly, the portion of the report which is aimed at comprehending all the land in the country sooner or later within the register of title. Under Lord Westbury's Act a tedious and costly investigation of the title was absolutely required in every case before any landowner could take advantage of the measure. This was found such a discouragement, that comparatively few persons were willing to submit to an expensive and vexatious process for the sake of ulterior and (it might be) distant advantages. A great mass of evidence before the commissioners tended to convince them that an absolutely good and indefeasable, or Parliamentary title, may not after all be worth the enormous trouble and cost of obtaining it. Where an estate must be judicially sold, it is doubtless advisable that a purchaser in open court shall be guaranteed against every risk. But many a vendor and purchaser are quite satisfied to conclude a bargain without the safeguards of a Parliamentary title and an ordnance map. A moderately safe holding title, based on possession for twenty years or more, is in practice found to be accepted with little hesitation; and property so held is even found to bring as high a price as an indefeasable or Parliamentary title. This is the sum of the evidence brought before the commissioners on this point; and although evidence and report are too much limited to the English aspect of the question, yet it is possible that light may be thrown by them on one of the most difficult problems connected with the Irish land question.

How is a title to be registered without being first investigated? This will be the inquiry to arise in the mind of every one accustomed to look on a Parliamentary title as the necessary basis on which the superstructure is to stand.

First, let it be admitted here, as it is fully admitted by the report, that Parliamentary titles are superior to any other. But, like all other expensive commodities, they are often dispensed with. Estates, freehold and leasehold, where the value is not large, change hands every day in Ireland, without any guarantee of indefeasable title. The purchaser in such cases has confidence in the vendor—he knows the property—and he has all reasons for believing that the transaction is unstained by fraud or by error. And these cases of small purchases where it is certain that the long delay and considerable expense involved in obtaining a Parliamentary title will not be incurred—these small transactions are precisely those which most stand in need of registration. The report, therefore, proposes to leave all existing facilities for such as desire to obtain a perfect or indefeasable title, while opening a new branch of the register for defeasable or unguaranteed titles.

The Estates Court in Ireland confers a Parliamentary Title on the estates judicially sold by it, the value of which (as we have seen) averages in the year about 1·350th of the aggregate value of the land in Ireland. Contracts for the sale of large estates are also carried out by the court, and evidently they will continue to be so carried out. But it is not a common thing for a proprietor to apply, for his own satisfaction, to have his title examined and judicially declared. The expectation that these applications would be numerous has been signally disappointed (a). The system, as the Report declares, is "too highly wrought," and too expensive for general adoption.

The very limited success of Part II. of the Land Act of 1870 illustrates this position in a remarkable manner. The process of sale by landlord to tenant was somewhat simplified by the reservation of rights and easements, thus obviating the necessity of inquiry into them; but with this exception, the procedure (as finally settled) was but slightly modified; and the scale of fees and costs, applicable to landed estates' proceedings was adopted in omnibus. Therefore, a small purchase of a holding, if accomplished through this act, is liable to the tariff of professional charges which is followed when some vast estate is sold in one lot to a millionaire. If the tenant-farmers of Ireland are really to be encouraged to withdraw their savings from the banks, and to invest them in the purchase of their farms, several changes must be made in the system, and chiefly these:—

(1.) The loan of public money, which the Act led them to expect, must be easily obtained on defined and intelligible terms.

(2.) The payment of purchase money, and the completion and registration of the sale must be effected locally where the tenant can see it completed.

(3) This must be done without the formalities of a suit in a Court of Equity located in Dublin.

The purchases of farms by their tenants seems peculiarly to call for some such system as that which forms the most novel and important feature in the report before us.

The tenant knows exactly the boundaries of his own farm, and whether there are rights of way over it. Knowing these details, there is the less need to inquire into them, or to make a special survey.

He knows to whom his rent is paid, and during what space of time that payment has been made; therefore, where the relation of landlord and tenant has existed for a series of years, the preliminaries of registration are reduced to a minimum; and it is almost certain that the tenant might be registered as owner without risk of serious error.

This is, however, thrown out merely as a suggestion. In my opinion every purchasing tenant should have the option of obtaining a parliamentary title at a moderate cost. Mr. Heron, Q.C., M.P., during the past session, brought in a bill which would, if passed, confer this immense benefit on the purchasing tenant, viz., by enabling him, on payment of a sum of money adjudged to be an ample price by the local judge (chairman of the county), to lodge his purchase money in court, obtaining from the local court an order placing him in the position of proprietor of his holding. The expense of this procedure would be trifling compared with that to which a purchasing tenant is now subjected; and to tenants who may prefer a strictly indefeasible or Parliamentary title, this course should be open.

It must occur to any one acquainted with the legal history of Ireland that there is a large class of titles especially calling for registration—the bye-gone conveyances granted since 1850 by the Incumbered and Landed Estates' Court. These conveyances can hardly be short of 15,000 in number, and the property comprised in them can hardly be of less value than forty millions sterling. These were all perfectly clear titles, which, year by year, are now deteriorating. The benefit so obtained is slowly fading away, as complicating facts arise; and in a few years more these titles will be little better than others. The original grantee or his immediate representative would, under such a system as that recommended by the report, bring in the conveyance to the land registry, with an affidavit, a map, and evidence of possession, and register himself de bene esse. The process of dilapidation and decay in title is then arrested, and the process of improvement begins; and this with so large an amount of property to operate upon, would be no trifling matter. From the date of registration no searches elsewhere would be necessary, and year by year the title would improve by mere lapse of time.

The last point to be adverted to is the existing registry of deeds. No advocate of registration of title can admit that simplification of title is helped forward by depositing in any office (however well managed) memorials of deeds and instruments. But the office may be useful for many other purposes. For example, if the trustees of a settled estate, with power of sale, are (a) The first and heaviest blow was the sudden death, at an early age, of the eminent judge of the court (Hargreave), who took an interest in the new machinery, and was prepared to superintend its working.

(b) The commissioners are not unanimous as to whether there ought to be a similar record of the existing incumbrances, and of leases (Rep., ss. 66—70), but such a record exists under the system now existing in Ireland, and it is found useful.

(a) The declarations of title applied for average only twelve in each year.

recorded as owners, the trusts will not be regarded in registration of title, the very object of which is to secure that a transfer by persons on the register is sufficient. But it is desirable that deeds relating to the beneficial interest should find some place of safe custody; nor would it be difficult to enumerate other good reasons for the continuance of a registry of deeds. Some confusion already exists between the two systems. This would increase if a registration of title were operating largely. Therefore it seems necessary that the two systems should be worked in concert. For example, every instrument presented for registration should be examined by an official, and handed over to the particular department to which it relates. When I say that this is a mere difficulty of detail, I mean not that the difficulties of detail in this inquiry are not both numerous and important, but that they might all, by care and forethought, be surmounted. The remedy is suggested by Lord Chancellor Selborne's Bill. Confusion and difficulty might be avoided if the existing registry of deeds, and the enlarged and more comprehensive register or record of title, were both placed in the fullest sense under the control of one Board of Registry, on which the Executive Government would be represented, and over which the Lord Chancellor would preside.

MARITIME LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PRACTICE—COSTS — SHIP UNDER ARREST—POSSESSION—FEES.—Where a ship, already under the arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, is arrested in an admiralty cause instituted in a County Court, the plaintiffs knowing of the previous arrest, and that cause is afterwards transferred to the High Court, the possession fees charged by the high bailiff in respect of the County Court arrest will not be allowed by the High Court upon taxation of plaintiff's costs: (The Rio Lima, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517. Adm.)

BOTTOMRY — PRIORITY — NON-LIABILITY OF MASTER.—In the absence of any special agreement to that effect, the master of a ship does not incur any personal liability to repay to a bottomry lender the sum borrowed by him on bottomry, where the bottomry bond becomes due by the safe arrival of the ship, and the ship and freight prove insufficient to discharge it in full. The implied contract of the master, arising under the general rule of the maritime law, out of an advance of money for the ship, is extinguished when a lawful contract of bottomry has been made and the debt has been put at risk. The contract of bottomry, which is not only a contract of great sanctity, but also of great peculiarity, is not a mere agreement for security. The reasons for the presumption of liability on the part of the master to seamen and to material-men, fail in case of bottomry. The master of a ship, although an agent of the owner, is also, in a certain sense, a public officer: (The Bark Irma, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 549. United States Court.)

SPECIMENS OF A CODE OF MARINE INSURANCE LAW.

By F. O. CRUMP, Barrister-at-Law.

Definition.

WHERE, in reference to a negotiation for insurance, one party suppresses or neglects to communicate to the other a material fact which, if communicated, would tend directly to prevent the other from entering into the contract, or induce him to demand terms more favourable to himself, and which is known, or presumed to be so, to the party not disclosing it, and is not known, or presumed to be so, to the other:

Phillips, sect. 531; Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr. 1909.

NOTE.—It is immaterial that the circumstances concealed prove actually not to affect the risk.

Ibid. 532; Arn. 4th edit. 512. It is also immaterial that they were once known to the underwriter, unless it can be proved that they were present to his mind when he executed the policy.

Bates v. Hewitt, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 595.

Scope of the Doctrine.

The doctrine applies to both contracting parties.

A policy may be avoided by concealment:

(1) Where an agent has knowledge of a material fact which it was his duty to communicate, the principal insurer being in ignorance:

Proudfoot v. Montefiore, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 511.

(2) Where a principal having knowledge of a material fact insures through an agent to whom he does not communicate it:

4 Valin liv. 3, t. 6, art. 40, p. 95.; Arn. 4th edit. 509, 510.

(3) Where an underwriter subscribes a policy knowing that the ship has arrived safe. The premium may be recovered back:

Arn. 511, n. 1.

If an agent, in ignorance of a loss, effect insurance for his principal, who knew of the loss, but not in time to countermand the policy, it is not void:

Arn. 4th edit. 510.

The utmost degree of reasonable diligence should be used in communicating knowledge acquired after the order to insure has been given:

Arn. 4th edit. 527; Ph. s. 561.

Time of Sailing.

The assured is not bound to communicate the time of the sailing of a ship, unless at the time of effecting the policy the ship has been so long on the voyage that the owner has reason to suspect she has met with some casualty:

Elton v. Larkins, 5 C. & P. 392; Ratcliffe v. Shoolbred, 1 Marsh on Ins. 466; Arn. 4th edit. 513.

If the facts withheld at the time of sailing have no tendency to show that the ship was a missing ship at the time of effecting the policy, their concealment will not be fatal:

Foley v. Moline, 5 Taunt. 430; Arn. 4th edit. 516.

NOTE.—See also as to evidence of what constitutes a missing ship: (Littledale v. Dixon, 1 B. & P., N. R., 151; Elkin v. Janson, 13 M. & W. 655; Rickards v. Murdock 10 B. & Cr. 527.)

If there be not merely concealment, but positive or virtual misrepresentation of the time of the ship's sailing, that vitiates the policy where a true and full disclosure would have led the underwriter to infer that the ship was a missing ship:

Kirby v. Smith, 1 B. & Ald, 672; Macintosh v. Marshall, 11 M. & W. 116.

National Character.

Any circumstance within the knowledge of the assured, and not equally within the knowledge or means of knowledge of the underwriter, which affects the national character of the subject insured, and therefore exposes it to capture or detention, must be disclosed to the underwriters.

Mayne v. Walter, 1 Park Ins., 431; Arn. 4th edit. 521. Campbell v. Innes, 4 B. & Ald. 423; Phillips, sect. 627.

If the underwriter knows of a foreign law likely to affect the subject of insurance, he should make inquiries of the assured. Both parties being ignorant, the underwriter runs all risks.

Ibid. 1 Park Ins. 432.

American Law.—The private knowledge of the assured concerning the shifting regulations of foreign states, by which the subject assured is exposed to seizure, ought to be communicated.

Phillips, sect. 596.

Liability to Capture, &c.

All facts, lying peculiarly within the knowledge of the assured, which may expose the property to belligerent risks, ought to be disclosed to the underwriters.

Examples:

That the interest assured is belligerent.

That other goods by the same ship are belligerent.

That the goods insured are contraband of war.

That the assured or other shipper has shipped goods which are contraband of war.

That it is intended to violate a blockade.

That the property belongs to a house established in a belligerent country.

Phillips, sect. 624.

The fact that a ship has sailed without convoy ought to be disclosed.

Sawtell v. Lowdon, 5 Taunt. 359.

Condition and Position of the Ship.

All material information, although uncertain, and amounting to rumours only(1), and proving ultimately to be unfounded(2), communicated to the assured with regard to the state and position of the ship, in the course of the voyage, ought to be disclosed.

NOTE.—In the case of a voyage policy, matters covered by the warranty of seaworthiness need not, of course, be communicated. There being no such warranty in time policies, everything material must be communicated.

Arn. 4th edit. 524;

(1) Da Costa v. Scanderet, 2 P. Wms. 179; Nicholson v. Power, 20 L. T. Rep., N.S., 580.

(2) Seaman v. Fonnereau, 2 Str. 1183; Lynch v. Hamilton, 3 Taunt. 37; Lynch v. Dunsford, 14 East, 494.

If a violent storm has prevailed at a foreign sailing port at a time when the ship sailed, the fact should be communicated to the underwriter:

Arn. 525-6 (n. 1.)

The actual port of loading:

Hodgson v. Richardson, 1 W. Bl. 463; Harrower v. Hutchinson, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 584, the employment of the ship in service of peculiar dangor:

1 Emerig. 172; 2 Valin, liv. 3, tit. 6, Art. 40, pp. 127, 128, the happening of an accident likely to result in damage:

Gladstone v. King, 1 M. & S. 35; Proudfoot v. Montefiore, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 511, should be communicated.

Unless inquired for, the previous history of the ship need not be stated:

Freeland v. Glover, 7 East, 457.

Matters not necessary to be communicated.

1. The general usages of trade.

2. The general and established restrictions imposed on trade by municipal laws.

3. A state of war.

4. Facts of public notoriety; or where they are matters of inference and the materials for informing the judgment of the underwriter are common to both.

Bates v. Hewitt, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. per Cockburn, C.J., p. 605.

5. Information which is waived by the underwriter.

Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr. 1909.

6. The insurance being on "all lawful goods," the assured need not disclose that the goods are contraband.

Phillips, sect. 628.

COMPANY LAW

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

AMALGAMATION—INCREASE OF CAPITAL—RESOLUTION ADOPTED AND CONFIRMED—ACQUIESCENCE—ESTOPPEL.—By an agreement made in Aug. 1864, the H. bank and the I. bank (under the powers contained in their respective articles of association) agreed to amalgamate, the business of the latter company being transferred to the former, and the shareholders in the I. bank having the option of taking newly-created shares in the H. bank at a premium, part of which was to be paid out of the funds of the I. bank. The arrangement between the two banks was made subject to a proviso that if any shareholder of the I. bank should express his dissent in writing within a period mentioned, he could be paid off. The directors of the H. bank (having already exhausted the power to increase their capital, given by their articles of association) caused a resolution to be duly passed at one meeting, and confirmed at another, whereby it was resolved to create and issue 20,000 new shares of £100 each, for the purpose of carrying out the proposed amalgamation. Held, that the directors having duly acquired power in accordance with the 12th and 50th sections of the Companies Act 1862, to increase the capital of the company beyond the amount authorised by the articles of association, the new shares were validly created, and that it was not necessary for the H. bank, under sect. 12 of the Companies Act 1862, to have previously by a special resolution altered in express terms the articles of association of the company so as to give the power to create additional capital, the substantial effect of the resolution actually passed having been to alter the articles of association by giving such power. After they had entered into the agreement for the amalgamation, the directors issued circulars, informing the shareholders of the I. bank of the arrangement which had been made, and intimating to them that they had an option to take such new shares in exchange for their shares in the I. bank, on the terms specified. C. and H., who were shareholders in the I. bank, applied in writing for and obtained shares in the H. bank in exchange for their shares in the I. bank, and they paid premiums and certain calls on these shares. In May 1866, a dissentient minority of the shareholders of the I bank filed a bill to set aside the amalgamation, and after obtaining in 1868 a decision in their favour, a compromise was made, and they were paid off. In Nov. 1866 the H. bank was ordered to be wound-up. In Jan. 1871, C. paid, but under protest, moneys demanded under a balance order in respect of his shares in the H. bank. On applications by C. and H. to have their names removed from the list of contributories, and to have the moneys which they had paid on their shares in the H. bank repaid with interest, on the ground that it had been decided at common law that the issue of the new shares was void. Held, that the decision of the common law court having been arrived at without a knowledge of the compromise with the dissentient shareholders, was not binding, and that C. and H. were liable as contributories in respect of the shares allotted to them in the H. bank in exchange for their shares in the I. bank. Decision of Wickens, V.C., reversed: (Campbell's case, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519. L. C. and L.JJ.)

STOCK EXCHANGE—SALE OF SHARES—LIABILITY OF JOBBER—INFANT TRANSFEREE.—The plaintiff, through his broker, sold to the defendant, a stock jobber, a number of shares in a bank. On the same day the jobber gave to the plaintiff's broker a ticket with the name of G. E. upon it, as the intended purchaser, and which name had been passed to him from another jobber in the usual manner according to the course of business on the Stock Exchange. The plaintiff executed a transfer to G. E., whose name was registered as a shareholder. The bank being wound-up it was discovered that at the time G. E.'s name was passed to the plaintiff as the transferee of the shares he was an infant, and by order of the Court of Chancery the plaintiff's name was placed upon the list of contributories in his stead. To an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to indemnify him for the amount of calls paid, in consequence of being replaced on the list of contributories, the defendant pleaded that he was discharged from his liability by the usages of the Stock Exchange. The jury found that it was not part of the usage of the Stock Exchange that, if there be several intermediate sales between the first seller and the last buyer, and the first seller receive the price of the shares and transfer them to the last buyer, the intermediate buyers are irresponsible when the name of the transferee which was passed was that of a person legally incapable of being registered. Held, that the judge was right in leaving the jury to say what was the usage of the Stock Exchange, for it is not so universal an usage as to be binding upon all persons dealing there. Held also, that the jobber, until he has passed to the purchaser the name of a person who is legally capable of contracting, and who has given authority for the use of his name as transferee, is not discharged, notwithstanding the rules and usages of Stock Exchange to the contrary: (Dent v. Nickalls, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536. C. P.)

WINDING-UP — CONTRIBUTORY — QUALIFICATION OF A DIRECTOR BOUND TO HOLD SHARES — TRANSFER TO A DIRECTOR OF SHARES ALLOTTED TO A PROMOTER OR PAID IN FULL.—When the holding of a certain number of shares is a necessary qualification for a director of a company, the acceptance by a man of the office of director is a most material fact in determining whether he shall or shall not be permitted to repudiate, as unauthorised by himself, shares which have got into his name, and which were needful for his qualification, but the mere fact of a man having accepted the office of director in a company, in which the holding of a certain number of shares is a necessary qualification, does not necessarily raise the inference that he has entered into a contract with the company to be the allottee from them of the number of shares necessary to his qualification: (Brown's case, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S 562. L. C. & L.JJ.)

WINDING-UP—COMPANY INCORPORATED BY SPECIAL ACT TO CONSTRUCT DOCK AND RAILWAY—JURISDICTION.—The court has jurisdiction, under the Companies Act 1862, s. 199, to wind-up a docks company incorporated by special Act of Parliament for the purpose of constructing docks and a branch railway, where the railway is only a subordinate part of the works authorised by the Act, as such a company does not fall within the exception contained in the section of being a "railway company incorporated by Act of Parliament:" (Re Exmouth Docks Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 573. V.C. M.)

RAILWAY—USE OF BY OTHER PERSONS—USE OF SIGNALS—APPROVAL OF ENGINES.—A colliery company having railways from their collieries, with junctions with the line of a railway company, claimed the right, under sect. 92 of the Railway Clauses Act 1845, to use the railway. After some correspondence as to the engines to be used for that purpose, the railway company protested against the plaintiffs using the railway with engines belonging to another railway company, and also without an examination of them under sect. 115 of the same Act. The plaintiffs then attempted to run a train on to the line, but found the gates at the junction locked. They were likewise told that the signals and points would not be worked for them. The bill was then filed, alleging that the engines had been approved for another purpose in 1857, and praying for an injunction to restrain the defendants from obstructing the plaintiffs in the use of their line. On motion the injunction had been refused, on the ground that the defendants could not be ordered to work the signals. The bill was then amended, alleging the right of the plaintiffs to such an order, and extending the injunction prayed for that purpose. Held, that though the word "railway," in the interpretation clause, includes "signals" as "works," still there was no obligation under that or the 92nd clause upon the railway company to work the signals for the persons using the railway. That the 12th section of the Railway Clauses Act 1863 provides that where junctions are authorised to be made, proper regulations as to signals, &c., are to be made, and that that shows that such regulations should be settled before any user can be claimed. That although the 92nd section gives a distinct right to use the line on certain terms, still the court will not enforce it by an injunction, as it cannot see to the performance of an obligation to work signals, &c., from time to time. The absence of a proper method of enforcing the provisions of sect. 92, is no reason for extending the jurisdiction of the court. It is not a reason for interference that the times proposed for running trains are convenient. Approval, under sect 115, of the engines to be used, is a condition precedent to the user of the line under sect. 92: (Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company v. The Taff Vale Railway Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 575. V.C. H.)

SECRETARY TO A RAILWAY—PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS BY.—In obedience to the instructions of his directors, and in disobedience of the order of the district prothonotary of the Common Pleas at Lancaster, and of the order of an arbitrator, the secretary of a railway company refused to produce, before the arbitrator, numerous books and papers of the company, which the attorney of the plaintiff in the cause referred swore to be material to the plaintiff's case. Held, that the secretary, being in the position of a servant, was justified in obeying the orders of his masters not to produce the documents, and a rule to attach him for contempt discharged. Whether an action would lie in such a case, quære: (Re Sharpley, 29 L. Rep. N. S. 580. C. P.)

ELECTION LAW.

THE LIVERPOOL MUNICIPAL PETITION.

THE Liverpool Mercury of Dec. 20 says: "In conformity with the order made by Mr. J. T. Collier, one of the judges of the Liverpool County Court, the inspection of the voting lists, papers, and documents, connected with the Pitt-street ward election took place yesterday, at the Municipal-offices, Dale-street. The return of Lieut.-Col. Hamilton, the Tory candidate, is questioned by the Liberals, who took steps to petition against it. The preliminary to this was the investigation of the papers, as ordered by the County Court judge, and this took place yesterday in the presence of Mr. Joseph Rayner, town-clerk; Mr. Billson representing the Liberals; and Mr. John Hughes, the agent for Lieut.-Col. Hamilton. The result of the investigation has disclosed a state of affairs in connection with the management of the election for which both parties have a right to complain. In Pitt-street ward there are 774 voters, and at the late election 608 voted—305 for Col. Hamilton, and 303 for Mr. James Steel. On the day of election the returning officer rejected several voting papers in consequence of the stamp required by the Ballot Act not being upon them. We understand that the investigation yesterday disclosed that there were seven other papers which had been counted although they did not bear the official stamp, and which consequently, upon a scrutiny must be disallowed. Five of the seven votes were given for Mr. Steel, and the other two for Col. Hamilton. It has also been discovered that about twenty persons receiving parochial relief, and who were consequently disqualified, voted; but whether for the Liberal or Tory candidate will not be ascertained until a scrutiny takes place, should the proceedings ever reach that stage. Considerable dissatisfaction is expressed at the fact that there should have been so many unstamped voting papers received. The Ballot Act contains some stringent provisions in regard to the conducting of municipal elections. One is to the effect that should a defeated candidate be in a position to prove that the election had been lost owing to the negligence of the presiding officer, he shall have the right of action against that official. Whether the petition in the case of Pitt-street ward will be further proceeded with is doubtful. Several of the leading Liberals in the ward are desirous of going on with the matter to the end. That there was a strong prima facie case for an inquiry, the proceedings so far as they have gone have abundantly proved. That the election was conducted in a somewhat loose manner is beyond doubt; but whether the Liberals have anything to gain by pursuing the matter further is open to question. They have demonstrated the necessity of care and vigilance being exercised at elections under the Ballot Act; and as it is problematical that the seat can be now gained for Mr. Steel, it has been suggested that it would be the gracious thing to do to let the matter drop."

[The petition has been since abandoned.—ED. L. T.]

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PROHIBITION—COMMISSION UNDER CHURCH DISCIPLINE ACT.—DISCRETION OF BISHOPS.—An application made to the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery out of term, for a prohibition to prevent the Bishop of Gloucester from issuing a commission under the Church Discipline Act, to inquire into certain offences alleged to have been committed by the vicar of a parish, until the vicar had been heard by counsel before the bishop as to certain preliminary objections, and especially as to the fitness of the promoter, was refused, the court holding that there was nothing in the Act to fetter the discretion of the bishop: (Ex parte Edwards, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 529. V.C. B.)

TITHES—MODUS—CONVERSION INTO TILLAGE ORCHARD. — Before the Tithe Commission Act 1836, an award was made under certain Inclosure Acts, by which the tithes of the land, in which the respondent was a landowner and the appellant the rector, were commuted. By this award a yearly modus payable for hay and agistment tithe payments, and also larger sums to be paid yearly for the same lands, when occupied by non-residents or converted into tillage, were fixed by the commissioner. A house had since been built upon a portion of a field of the respondent mentioned in the award, and a further portion to the extent of twenty-two perches was converted into garden ground, and the remainder of the field made into an orchard. The appellant put in a distress for the larger sum fixed by the award to be paid for this field, on the ground that part of it had been converted into "tillage." Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber) that, as to the orchard, there had been no conversion into tillage: (Dudman v. Vigar, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552. H. of L.)

BIRMINGHAM COUNTY COURT.

Thursday, Dec. 18, 1873.

(Before H. W. COLE, Q.C., Judge.)

HADDON v. WILDE.

Action—Defence of liquidation—Informal resolution—Application to restrain—Rule 289, B. R.

Eaden appeared for the plaintiff.

Fallows for the defendant.

The action was to recover the sum of £13 2s. 1d. on a returned bill, but a point arose of some interest to creditors in connection with liquidation proceedings. The defendant had given notice that at the time appointed for the hearing of the summons he intended to rely upon the following ground of special defence: That on the 31st July 1872, he filed in that court a petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition with his creditors; and that at the first meeting of creditors, held under such petition on the 26th Aug. in the same year, a resolution, which was duly registered on the 27th Aug. was passed for liquidation of his estate by arrangement, and not in bankruptcy; and Mr. John Harrison was appointed trustee.

Fallows now submitted that the plaintiff who was one of his client's creditors, could not maintain the present action under the circumstances of the case, as he had not been prejudiced in any way.

Eaden said the plaintiff had not notice of the meeting of creditors and the proceedings, and he was therefore entitled to institute the present proceedings to recover the amount owing to him.

Fallows remarked that the plaintiff was represented at the creditors' meeting, and Mr. Eaden signed the proceedings.

Eaden was prepared to show that the plaintiff had no notice of the proceedings, and was not represented as suggested. Had his client had notice of the meeting, he would have attended. Nobody attended for him, and he (Eaden) was prepared to show that he had been in many ways prejudiced. It was absolutely necessary that he should have had notice, if not at the creditors' meeting, at a future time. Mr. Haddon did not have notice, and the practice was established, as he could show by reference to authorities, that where a creditor's name was not inserted on the first list filed, under the 256th section, the debtor was not in a position to ask to have the resolution registered without giving the creditor who had not had notice the opportunity of attending to be heard on the question of registration.

His HONOUR was aware that when the petition was filed a list of all the creditors was taken into court. When the resolution was taken for registration a statement of affairs was handed in. In the present case the statement of affairs did happen to contain the name of the plaintiff, and it was apparent that there was a name short in the first list of creditors. If the other side had given them notice to attend the registration of the resolution they would have been acting rightly. Not having done so, he said they were bound to call another creditors' meeting, and as the debtor had been guilty of an omission to point out to the registrar that one creditor's name was absent, it was his fault and he must be answerable for the consequences. His Honour questioned whether he was not bound by the resolution registered.

Eaden contended that he was entitled to maintain the present action, official notice not having been given to the plaintiff or his debt proved; this being the case, they were entitled to go behind the resolution, and then the debtor ought to protect himself by calling another meeting of his creditors. In support of his argument he relied upon the case Cadiot v. Johnstone (22 Solicitors' Journal, 47).

His HONOUR.—It is quite clear I have power given under rule 289 to restrain the plaintiff from enforcing any proceedings.

Eaden.—The other side have had the opportunity of making application for a restraining order, and they have failed to do it.

His HONOUR.—Then I can adjourn the case for that purpose.

Eaden said if the court would give plaintiff a verdict for the amount claimed, and stay execution until application had been made for a restraining order, he (Eaden) could appeal against that, and the matter could be settled in the Bankruptcy Court.

His HONOUR.—The question is whether I ought not to adjourn this action, with liberty for the defendant to move in Bankruptcy to restrain further proceedings. I will consider whether what has been done is a bar to the action going on.

Ultimately His HONOUR adjourned the case until the 26th Jan., in order that the defendant might make a motion in bankruptcy to restrain the action, under the 289th rule.

MOSCROP v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers Act (11 Geo. 4, & 1 Will. 4), c. 68, s. 1—The value of the contents of a parcel is the value of the goods to the owner, not the value to a tradesman to buy and sell again.

Hutchinson for plaintiff.

Terry (Terry and Robinson) for the defendants.

This action was brought to recover the sum of £9 10s., as demages for the loss of a parcel sent by the defendants' railway, and not delivered. The parcel consisted of a small box containing a lady's gold lever watch. The defendants relied upon the Carriers Act (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4. c. 11), s. 1, alleging that the parcel exceeded £10 in value, and the value was not declared. There was no suggestion that the parcel had been lost through the felonious act of any of the defendants servants. The only question is one of fact, namely, did the contents of the parcel exceed £10 in value, and the affirmative of that issue must be established by the defendant. It appeared in evidence that the watch had been purchased five or six years ago of Messrs. Rhodes and Son, the well known jewellers, of Bradford, as a present to the plaintiff's wife. Its actual cost did not appear, but the manager of Messrs. Rhodes and Mr. Rhodes, the son, proved that the actual price of such a watch was £15 15s. The watch had been sent by the lady to Messrs. Rhodes to be cleaned and repaired, and then returned to her at Rochdale where she lived. It was so cleaned and repaired and then returned by railway carefully packed up in a box about the size of a cigar box, properly addressed, but without any indication of the nature of its contents, or declaration of value. The sum of £9 10s., the amount claimed in the action, was arrived at thus: Mr. Rhodes and his manager treated it as a second-hand watch, and stated that, if offered to them for sale they would have given £8 10s. or £8 15s. for it and no more, and would have sold it again for £9 10s. I do not think this a proper test of the value of the watch. The test is, what was its fair value to the lady, disregarding altogether any value she might attribute to it as a present, pretium affectionis. The watch when cleaned and repaired by Messrs. Rhodes and returned to the lady, which was the state in which it was when delivered to the defendants as carriers, was, so to speak, as good as new to her, and in answer to a question from me the lady said, speaking as a lady might be expected, very fairly, she thought the watch would be worth £12 or £13, but of course she could not tell. I think, however, that evidence is more reliable than the evidence of what the watch would be worth in a tradesman's shop to buy and sell again, and that any jury would be bound to find that the contents of the parcel did exceed £10 in value. The defendants are, therefore, entitled to the protection given them by the statute, for this is the very sort of case to which the statute was meant to apply, and it would be most unfair towards common carriers to allow the public, whose goods they are bound to carry, to deprive them of the protection of the statute by undervaluing, though without any improper intention, the goods sent, and thereby bring the value below the statutory limits. The judgment will, therefore be entered for the defendants with costs.

Married Women's Property Act 1870, s. 1—Husband tenant of, and resident in, house in which his wife carries on business—Wife's separate property.

H. Parry, Croydon, appeared for the claimant.

Thomas A. Goodman, Brighton, for the three judgment creditors.

Dec. 19.—His HONOUR.—The claimant is the wife of the defendant in three actions (respondents, Cosstick, Nash, and Wells), and claims the goods taken in execution therein as her property, in which her earnings have been invested by her, and to which she is entitled for her separate use under the Married Women's Property Act 1870, s. 1. The amount of the judgments has been paid into court. The claims were heard by me on the 4th Nov., and decided in the claimant's favour, except as to £20, representing goods purchased by her with moneys received from her sisters, which clearly did not fall within the Act. At the hearing the claimant and her husband deposed that the claimant was living with her husband, who was a confirmed invalid, in a house at Brighton, taken by her and in her name, and in which she carried on the business of a lodging-house keeper, also in her name and by herself alone, without any interference or assistance from her husband, except that on a few occasions he wrote letters at her request chiefly as to repairs to the house. The respondents, the execution creditors, were not aware till the hearing of the nature of the employment in which the claimant alleged her earnings had been made, and supposed that it was some professional employment, and they were therefore unprepared to meet the case. After the trial they became informed that the house had been taken by the husband and in his name, and also that the husband had in various ways interfered and assisted in the conduct of the business carried on there, and even to the internal management of the house, and they applied upon affidavits for a new trial, which I felt bound to grant. I have now re-heard the case and consider it to be one of much greater difficulty than it appeared to be on the first hearing. I still adhere most firmly to the opinion which I then expressed, that it is not necessary to the separate carrying on of an employment, occupation, or trade, by a married woman within the meaning of the Married Women's Property Act 1870, sect. 1, that she should live apart from her husband (whom she is bound by the 13th section to maintain) but only that her husband should not interfere or take part in carrying on such business, and I still think that on the evidence then before me, the claimant proved herself to have carried on the business of a lodging house keeper separately from her husband, and the question for my decision to-day is whether upon the contradictory evidence as to the tenancy of the house, and the additional evidence as to the husband's interference with the business carried on in it since adduced before me, the claimant is still entitled to her verdicts. I will consider, first, the contradictory evidence as to the tenancy of the house. It consists of the admission made on cross-examination by the claimant and her husband, that although the house was taken for the purpose of being let as a lodging-house by the claimant, and this fact was communicated to the landlord, the husband as well as the claimant, saw the landlord about the letting, and nothing was said as to the house being let to the wife or taken in her name, and of several letters by the husband to the landlord or his agent, relative to the payment of rent and repairs of the house, and finally of a notice to quit by the husband as tenant of the house. It also appeared that the husband was rated for the house, and receipts for the rates and taxes were given in his name, and that he was registered as a voter, but never voted. A previous tenancy of another house by the husband was also proved, but I do not consider that any evidence of the letting now in question, although it is evidence of the mode in which the claimant carried on the business of a lodging-house keeper. Upon this point of the case, I think that it is clear that the claimant's husband was the tenant of the house in question, and that it was not taken by her in her name as she deposed, although no doubt it was taken by her husband with her personal assistance, for the purpose of enabling her to carry on the business of a lodging-house keeper, which seems to have caused the confusion in her mind on this point. The question then arises whether the fact of her husband having been the tenant of this house is sufficient in itself to disable her from claiming the earnings of the business carried on there as her separate property under the 1st section of the above Act. At first I was strongly inclined to think this was so on the ground that the business of a lodging-house keeper evidently consists in the letting of the rooms themselves, as much as in the providing furniture and attendance. But since the last hearing it has occurred to me that a married woman, even if living separate from her husband, could scarcely obtain a house in which to carry on the business of a lodging-house keeper, without the same being taken in the name of her husband or a trustee; for a married woman is wholly unable to execute a deed or enter into any contract at law, and therefore a landlord who lets a house to a married woman would be entirely at the mercy of the tenant, and could not even distrain for the rent at law, although he might in equity obtain relief against any separate estate of hers. And I am therefore not prepared to say that if a married woman carried on the business of a lodging-house keeper in a house taken in the name of her husband or a trustee, that she could not still carry on the business separately from either of them, indemnifying him against the rent and taxes out of her earnings. I however think that the circumstance of the house being let to the husband, militates very much against the separate trading by the wife, and renders necessary a very close inquiry into the subsequent action of the husband, with reference to the business carried on in it. The payment of the rates and taxes by the husband, and the insertion of his name on the register, were, of course, incidental to his tenancy, and, according to my views, are immaterial. It remains for me to consider the additional evidence now before the court, as to the husband's interference in the business in question. It appears that previous to the husband taking the house he had taken the upper part of the adjoining house for the same purpose of letting lodgings, and had paid the rent, corresponded with the landlord, and given notice to quit. In both houses the claimant issued cards in her name alone, with a notice of "apartments to let" at the top, and circulated them among the tradesmen in the neighbourhood and others. She also had accounts with tradesmen in the neighbourhood in her own name, and the judgment creditors in two of the actions had debited her in their books with the goods in respect of which they sued her husband, or with part of them. On the other hand, some of the tradesmen, and I believe all, or some of the judgment creditors, had debited her husband with some of the goods supplied. The tradesmen thus appear to have charged their goods indiscriminately to the claimant and her husband; but the majority, perhaps, appear to have charged them to the claimant. It was stated that it was common at Brighton to open accounts in the name of the lady who gave orders, whether married or not, on account of the tradesmen not knowing the christian names or condition of the husband and the frequent change of occupation of house and lodgings, but this scarcely seems to apply to the case of a yearly tenant of an unfurnished house, a householder and ratepayer. Evidence was also given that the husband had on some few occasions ordered goods and paid bills without any objection to their having been made out in his name. The claimant contends that her husband did so as her agent at her request and with her money. With regard to the husband's interference in the internal management of the house, the evidence consists of three receipts given by him to a lodger (the Hon. Miss Kerr), as he deposes, at her special request, and a letter which he wrote to her as to letters left for her after her departure. The claimant contends that her husband did so at her request, and as her agent. This appears to exhaust the evidence before the court material to the issue which I have to decide, viz., whether the business of a lodging house keeper was carried on by the claimant separately from her husband or not. It is to be observed that this is not the ordinary question as to whom credit was given in any particular transactions, nor is it the question whether any particular creditor or creditors knew that the claimant was carrying on this business separately from her husband, but the simple question whether or not she was in fact so carrying on this business within the meaning of the "Married Women's Property Act 1860," and after great consideration I am of opinion on this very difficult mixed question of fact and law that notwithstanding the house was taken in the husband's name, that he occasionally ordered and paid for goods in his own name, and in the instance of one lodger acted as if he were carrying on business himself, still as the business was carried on in the name of the wife, and this was made known in the usual manner, and as it was by her personal exertions that it was so carried on, the claimant did carry on this business separately from her husband within the meaning of the Act. The claimant is, therefore, entitled to the verdict, but the judgment creditors may have their remedy in Chancery as I pointed out before, against the claimant for such of the goods as were supplied whilst she carried on the business of a lodging house keeper at the house in question. The verdicts to stand, but the money to remain in court for one month, with liberty for all parties to appeal, and no costs,

SHREWSBURY COUNTY COURT.

(Before J. W. SMITH, Q.C., Judge.)

Monday, Dec. 15, 1873.

HULTON v. JOINT COMMITTEE OF MANAGEMENT OF THE SHREWSBURY RAILWAY STATION.

Passengers' luggage—Lost at station—Liability.

THIS was an action to recover £23, the value of a bag and contents lost at the Shrewsbury Railway Station on November 16th last.

Chandler appeared for the plaintiff.

F. Adcock for the defendants.

Mr. Harrington Hulton stated that he was a barrister. On the 16th November he took a first-class ticket from Manchester to Shrewsbury by the London and North-Western Railway. The train was a quarter of an hour behind time. At five o'clock he arrived at the middle platform at Shrewsbury. He told a porter he was going on to Pontesbury, but wished to meet the London train. A porter volunteered to take charge of a bag until the 6.25 train arrived. He refused to let the porter have it. The porter said the London train had arrived, and pointed him to one on the refreshment side of the platform. He told the porter to bring his bag there, and to wait with it until he had met the London train. He ran to the train pointed out, but found it was not the right one. The London train immediately succeeded it. After he found that he had made a mistake the porter followed and asked if he should collect the luggage, and he told him to do so, and label it "Pontesbury." The London train arrived, but went to a different platform to the one he was on. There was a great crowd. He met his brother, and the porter came up and told him his bag was gone; and his brother said, "Had you charge of it?" and the porter answered, "I had." His brother then said, "Come along to the station-master." They all went to Mr. Hankey, and his brother told Mr. Hankey that the luggage was lost. Mr. Hankey asked the porter who had charge of the luggage, and the porter replied, "The gentleman had charge of it himself." Witness's brother said to the porter, "Why, only a minute or two ago, you said you had charge of it." Mr. Hankey supported the porter. A day or two after he applied to Mr. Hankey, who told him he had better apply to the company. [A letter was here put in, written to the superintendent of the company, describing the manner in which the luggage had been lost, and also the nature of the contents. A letter was also put in from Mr. Patchett, and read; and also one from Mr. T. M. How, saying that the plaintiff would take proceedings to recover the value if not amicably settled. He considered the value of the bag and its contents at £23.]

Frank Adcock cross-examined the witness as to the value of the contents of the bag. When the witness arrived at Shrewsbury he instructed the porter to label his luggage for Pontesbury. He had only booked to Shrewsbury. He could book to Pontesbury, but a passenger has to point out where the tickets are kept to the clerk before he can get booked. He was standing about five yards from the barrow on which the luggage was, when the porter came up to him and asked him if he had got his bag.

Mr. William Edward Montague Hulton Harrop, brother of the plaintiff, deposed to the porter stating that he had charge of the luggage, and after as to the interview with Mr. Hankey. Mr. Hankey ultimately told him he was talking nonsense, and the interview terminated. He (witness) was not surprised at that remark, because some officials were so nice in their ways. There was a great deal of confusion, and he had never seen the gates kept worse than they were on that occasion.

Mr. Henry Robinson, jeweller, &c., High-street, deposed to the value of the articles in the bag and the bag, which roughly he should estimate at a little over £20.

Adcock, in defence, contended that there was no liability on the part of the company after the porter had placed them on the spot pointed out by the plaintiff. If there was any liability the company was liable as gratuitous bailees. He contended that as the plaintiff's ticket was only from Manchester to Shrewsbury the company were not liable.

His HONOUR, however, ruled that it was the fault of the company, and a great inconvenience to the plaintiff that he was not furnished, at Manchester, with a ticket for Pontesbury after he had asked for it.

Adcock said he would not press that point, and went on to contend that it was the duty of the plaintiff to look after his own luggage when he saw the porter going to get labels. The articles, he urged, would come under the Carriers' Act, as some of them were of more value than £10. He then called Owen Hughes, a porter in the employ of the joint company. He stated that the plaintiff instructed him to get the luggage from the train, and take them to the platform on the refreshment side of the station. He told him that he was going to Pontesbury, and instructed him to fetch labels for them, and he would stand by the luggage till he came back. When he came back with the labels the plaintiff was standing by. He missed the bag, and told the plaintiff, who said, "There are a lot of —— thieves about." He denied being in charge of it, but admitted bringing it across and putting it down as directed. The platform was very crowded.

Chandler having replied,

His HONOUR gave judgment for the plaintiff for £15.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

INSPECTORSHIP DEED — AFTER ACQUIRED PROPERTY — MONEY ARISING FROM MORAL CLAIM.—On the sale by a railway company of its undertaking to another company, an agreement under seal was executed, whereby the purchasing company covenanted to give the contract for the construction of the not yet constructed lines of the selling company to P. (who was not a party to the deed) or his nominees. P. subsequently executed a deed of inspectorship for the benefit of his creditors, which provided that "all the estate and effects of the debtor" should be administered as in bankruptcy. Before P.'s estate was wound-up, the purchasing company, in accordance with their covenant in that behalf, gave the contract for the construction of the lines to nominees of P., who paid him £3500 for the nomination, and the inspectors claimed the amount: Held (reversing the decision of one of the registrars) that inasmuch as P.'s right, under the covenant in the agreement between the two companies, to which he was not a party, was a mere moral claim, unenforceable at law or in equity, it was not part of "the estate and effects" of P. at the date of the deed of inspectorship; that the deed of inspectorship did not pass after-acquired property, and that the inspectors were not entitled to the sum of £3500: (Ex parte Piercy; Re Piercy, 29 L. COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Friday. Dec. 19.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne) and Lord Justice MELLISH.)

Ex parte JAY; Re POWIS.

Bankruptcy—Debtor summons—Petition for adjudication—Receiver—Withdrawal of petition.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Spring Rice, sitting as Chief Judge.

On the 3rd Oct. 1872, G. H. Jay took out a debtor summons against H. Powis for a debt owed to him; and the debt not having been satisfied, he presented a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy against Powis on the 12th Oct. On the same day Jay applied for and obtained the appointment of receiver of the debtor's property under the 13th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869. On the 15th Oct., Powis, with the consent of the receiver, paid Jay £1050, and Jay then withdrew his petition. Powis was afterwards adjudicated a bankrupt on another creditor's petition, and a trustee was appointed. On the application of the trustee the registrar ordered Jay to refund the sum of £1050, and Jay appealed from this order.

Little, Q. C. and Winslow, appeared for Jay.

De Gex, Q. C. and Finlay Knight, for the trustee, were not called on.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that no greater mischief could be done by those who had the administration of bankruptcy than to permit such a transaction as this to stand. A receiver was an officer of the court, and it was his duty not to part with any property except under the direction of the court, and he had to account to the court for all that he received. So great a power as that of appointing a receiver immediately on the presentation of a petition for adjudication could only be given with a view to the benefit of all the creditors. No doubt it was in the power of the creditor in the present case to apply to the court to dismiss his petition and to discharge the receiver, and to direct him to pay over any money which he had received to the creditor, and the court might have made the order if no other creditor had in the meantime presented a petition. But nothing of the kind was done here. On the contrary, without any authority from the court, the money which the receiver ought to have got in and retained was applied for the benefit of this particular creditor. His Lordship agreed with the decision of the registrar, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

The Lord Justice MELLISH concurred.

MANCHESTER COUNTY COURT.

Dec. 1873.

Re BOOTHROYD; CROSS v. BUTCHER.

Mortgage obtained by fraud—Claim to follow money in hands of mortgagor and to preserve lien on mortgaged estate.

Held that the claim could not be sustained.

Small v. Attwood discussed

S. Hall (barrister-at-law), for Mr. Cross.

Cobbett (solicitor), for the trustee in the bankruptcy.

This was a motion on behalf of Mr. Cross, that certain bank notes and other moneys in the possession of the bankrupt, might be declared to belong to, and might be directed to be delivered by the trustee to Mr. Cross.

The case was peculiar. Boothroyd had purchased an estate at Whitby, in the county of Chester for £9000, and he took the conveyance to himself in the fictitious name of Jackson. He then purported to convey nearly the whole of the estate to one Smith, Smith being another alias of Boothroyd, and the last conveyance contained covenants by Jackson with Smith for production of the earlier deeds. Boothroyd then executed a number of duplicates of that deed, and a mortgage in the name of Smith with certain parties, giving them one of the duplicates, and the earlier deeds were produced by Boothroyd himself, who explained that he had borrowed the deeds for that purpose from Jackson, whom he described as his uncle. After the completion of that mortgage he then registered a mortgage upon the same property with Mr. Cross for £6000, covenanting that the property was free from incumbrances, and giving him another duplicate, and producing the earlier deeds as before. Boothroyd unsuccessfully attempted to obtain a third mortgage in the same way upon the same property, when the fraud was discovered, and Boothroyd was arrested. It was afterwards found that numerous frauds of the same character had been committed by Boothroyd. He was made bankrupt, and it was arranged that the Whitby estates, including the small portion retained by Boothroyd, should be sold by the mortgagees and the trustee. The mortgage upon the Whitby estate being insufficient to pay both mortgages in full, and Mr. Cross being able to trace a portion of the money advanced by him to Boothroyd into his possession, Mr. Cross, on the 14th Nov. 1863, moved for an order to the effect above stated, and asked that the order might be made without prejudice to his right to have the balance of the proceeds of the sale of the Whitby estate remaining after satisfaction of the prior mortgage applied in payment of the residue of his mortgage debt. On the same day Mr. Cross had obtained the usual order of inquiry into the amount owing on his security.

Hall, for Mr. Cross, argued that Mr. Cross had been induced to enter into the contract for the loan by means of the fraudulent misrepresentations of the bankrupt, and was entitled to rescind the contract. Taylor v. Plummer (3 M. & S. 562), and Gladstone v. Hadwen (1 M. & S. 526) which have been frequently followed both at law and in equity, are clear authorities for the right of the party defrauded to follow his money or goods if it or they can be traced, notwithstanding bankruptcy. The general equity is laid down by Lord Hardwick in Barnesley v. Powell (1 Vesey 289). But we go further and say that although the contract is rescinded, the court will not deprive us of our charge upon the mortgaged estate till the debt is fully satisfied. In Small v. Attwood (1 Younge 211), the only case on the subject, the plaintiffs, who had obtained a decree for the rescission of a contract of sale obtained by the fraud of the defendant, prayed that they might follow part of the purchase money into certain stock, and that the order might be made without prejudice to their lien upon the estate, and for an injunction to restrain any dealing with the stock. Although no decree was ever made Lord Lyndhurst granted an injunction, and did not require the lien to be abandoned. The cases are analogous. A mortgagee is a purchaser pro tanto. What equity has Boothroyd to require us to abandon our charge? We only ask to be let alone. Hall also argued that Mr. Cross had a right to rescind the contract as to such portion of his money as he could trace, and might treat his mortgage as a subsisting security as to the residue, because he was unable by rescinding the contract in toto to place himself in his original position in consequence of Boothroyd's dealings with the loan; and quoted Kerr on Fraud, p. 269, and cases there quoted on partial rescission of contracts. He urged that as the estate had been agreed to be sold there was no practical inconsistency in the relief asked for upon whichever ground the order was made.

Cobbett.—This is not the case of a trust. You cannot partially rescind a contract. It is a mere case of a loan, and you cannot "Blow hot and cold."

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5.—After stating the facts, HIS HONOUR said that the case struck him on hearing the arguments as one primæ impressionis; and that if Mr. Hall's contention were correct, it was surprising that such an easy remedy had not been frequently made use of. He had, however, considered the authorities, and examined the original records of the case of Small v. Attwood. That case, even as an authority for following purchase money, had been questioned by Sir E. Sugden and Mr. Dart, in their works on Vendors and Purchasers, and had never been followed. It was, moreover, a case of vendor and purchaser, and if necessary he should distinguish the present case, as being one of mortgagor and mortgagee; and in Small v. Attwood it was necessary for the purpose of deciding the right to an injunction to enter into the question of the lien. Now what did the plaintiff seek to do in this case? He was seeking to get back the money out of which he said he had been defrauded—that was, to set aside the mortgage so as to get back money on a contract which never existed. He was seeking likewise to come in on the estate for the balance of money he lent, which he could not recover in specie; so that while on the one hand he was upsetting the mortgage, on the other he was maintaining it, because it was only by so doing that he would get 20s. in the pound. That seemed to him (the learned Judge), as far as his judgment went, to be entirely against the principle laid down in Kerr on Fraud, p. 11, where it is said that a contract cannot be rescinded unless both parties can be placed in their original position. Besides, in this case the plaintiff has taken the usual order for an enquiry into his security, and by so doing he has treated the mortgage as subsisting, and cannot now rescind. This principle of election is more specifically laid down in the case of Clough v. the London and North Western Railway Company, which was argued in the Court of Exchequer Chamber. That being so, and there being no authority, as he held, for the payment of such money, and there being this distinct authority in the highest court of the realm save one, and what was now sought to be done being entirely in the teeth of the principle laid down, he held the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief prayed for, and the motion, therefore, would be dismissed, and the verdict in the issue must be entered for the defendant. Costs were allowed against the mortgagee.

LEGAL NEWS.

IT is proposed to place busts of the late Chief Justices Taney and Chase in the room of the United States Supreme Court.

MR. HENRY DEANE, a local solicitor, has been elected without opposition coroner for the northern division of Leicestershire.

RUGBY SCHOOL.—It is stated that Dr. Hayman intends to apply immediately for a writ of mandamus from the Court of Queen's Bench, to compel the trustees of the school to reinstate him as the head-master.

THE justices of the Howdenshire petty sessional division have decided that a contract of service or hiring for a period exceeding a year was not binding unless in writing. This decision (the Leeds Mercury says) has naturally given rise to no little uneasiness in the minds of agriculturists, and yesterday the Howdenshire Chamber of Agriculture resolved to test the soundness of the decision by submitting a special case to the Court of Queen's Bench.

BIRKBECK LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION, Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.—The evening classes for ladies and gentlemen at this institution will re-commence for the Winter Term on Monday next. In addition to those which have already been formed for languages, mathematics, natural, applied, and mental science, law, history, literature, drawing, music, &c., a French Literary Society, and a class for the study of microscopy, will be commenced. The list of prizes has been augmented through the generosity of Douglas Straight, Esq., M.P., who has offered for competition two English Essay Prizes of the value of £5 each.

A DUBLIN correspondent writes:—The Irish papers have begun to discuss the propriety of appointing a new judge in place of the Chief Baron (Pigot) lately deceased. The Evening Mail says that the work of the judges is ill distributed rather than the working power too great. It proposes that less work should be thrown upon the chiefs by employing the puisne judges regularly in performing a share of the work of the after-sittings. It also suggests that the present constitution of the Court for Land Cases Reserved should be changed, and that "a rota of judges should be formed to supply one to sit regularly in the Court of Appeal in Chancery, so as to provide against the evil consequences of the frequent divisions between the ordinary judges of that court."

ANOTHER BLUNDER WITH THE BALLOT.—The ballot for a new School Board at Oldham has been followed by the discovery of an extraordinary blunder. During the process of recasting the figures yesterday morning the officials found that the number of ballot papers did not correspond with the parcels of twenties formed before the counting of the votes commenced. A careful investigation revealed the circumstance that as many as 720 uncounted ballot papers from one of the wards had been placed in the ballot boxes by mistake, and taken away without being counted. All the parties concerned were summoned to attend at the town hall yesterday, and the additional counting was proceeded with after a protest from the representatives of the Church candidates, who demanded that the whole of the ballot papers should be recounted. The final numbers declared last night do not alter the result arrived at on Monday evening.

IN correction of some misstatements we may mention that Mr. H. Cadman Jones, Mr. Josiah W. Smith, Q.C., Mr. Arthur Wilson, and Dr. Tristram, to draft the rules of procedure under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act.

MR. EDWIN JAMES.—This ex-counsel has announced himself publicly as a legal adviser in London, to persons who contemplate taking legal proceedings in England or in America, or who require advice.—City Press.

TREATY OF COPYRIGHT.—The Globe, alluding to the system of registration adopted at Stationers' Hall as a standing menace to authors, and, as being most inconvenient, states that it has been decided formally to abandon the obnoxious system in favour of "a more liberal Treaty of Copyright" by Great Britain.

PERJURY.—The Pall Mall Gazette, in an article upon the Tichborne trial, suggests that, although the subject is not free from difficulty, it merits notice whether persons convicted of petty lying, as witnesses, should not be liable to a week's imprisonment, or a fine subject to the right of appeal, as the presiding judge may decide.

IRISH PAUPERISM.—In the third quarter of 1873 the average number of inmates of workhouses on Saturdays was 42,607, an increase of 1187 over the average for the three quarters of 1872. The average weekly number of persons who received out-door relief was 29,171, an increase of 3092.

LUNACY STATISTICS.—The census of 1861 in England showed 1 insane person in 824. In 1871 there was 1 in 403 persons. France showed a larger increase—namely, in 1856, 1 in 1128, and in 1866 1 in 418. In 1861 Denmark contained 1 lunatic in 507 persons, Austria 1 in 4043, Italy 1 in 2962, and Piedmont 1 in 2006 persons. Hanover has 1 in 301 persons, New South Wales 1 in 1454. Indian statistics are required.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.—The Rev. W. Du Boulay has been fined 5s., with 23s. costs, at the Hammersmith Police Court, for striking a boy named Fuller, for alleged impertinence, until he was "bruised and bleeding." The assault was committed with a stick, and it appeared the defendant had no jurisdiction, as the complainant had ceased to attend the defendant's school.

THE HOWARD MEDAL.—The council of the Statistical Society have given effect to the views of the president, Dr. Guy, F.R.S., regarding John Howard, and his claim to be considered at least as much a statist as a philanthropist, by establishing a Howard medal. This medal is to be given every year to the author of the best essay on some subject in social statistics, giving a preference to those in which Howard himself was most interested. The subject of the essay for which the medal will be given in 1874 (the year in which Howard achieved his Parliamentary triumph) is, "The State of Prisons, and the condition and treatment of Prisoners, in the Prisons of England and Wales during the last half of the Eighteenth Century, as set forth in Howard's 'State of Prisons,' and his work on 'Lazarettos.'" Full particulars may be obtained on application to the assistant secretary of the Statistical Society, 12, St. James's-square, S.W.

AMERICAN LEGISLATION.—Up to Monday the 8th inst., nearly 500 bills had been introduced into Congress. As that body commenced operations only the Wednesday previous, its members cannot be said to be deficient in energy, at least, in the direction of law-making. How much of the proposed legislation is in the interest of the country it is impossible to say, but we think that there will be reason to be thankful if such part of it as becomes law does no harm. Among the bills introduced into Congress are a dozen or more looking to a modification of the law of the last session, repealing the franking privilege. The country newspapers are clamorous for free postage for themselves, although we cannot see what justice there is, or ever has been, in the Government affording to the publishers of those sheets, favours which the rest of the people do not enjoy. The feeling of our people and the tendency of the age, is against class privileges, and we trust that a step backward will not be taken in the matter of postal legislation.—Albany Law Journal, Dec. 13.

CRIMINAL RECORDS OF 1873.—The criminal records of the year have been in many ways remarkable. Early in January Dr. Hessell, a Lutheran clergyman, was arrested, and positively identified by several witnesses as the suspected murderer of Harriett Boswell, and the rev. gentleman was regarded as a monster of licentiousness and barbarity until he established a complete alibi by overwhelmingly powerful proof. His release was followed by a lively discussion upon his experiences in the House of Detention, which led to considerable improvement in the mode of dealing with unconvicted prisoners. All attempts to discover the actual perpetrator of this atrocious crime signally failed, as did also those made with reference to the murder of the female whose mangled remains were recently found in different portions of the Thames. The trial of Mary Ann Cotton, the Bishop Auckland poisoner, revealed a course of cold-blooded crime, which had continued for years before its author was visited with the punishment she so richly merited. Montgomery, the Irish police inspector, was convicted, after two abortive trials, of murdering his friend the bank cashier at Newtonstewart. To all outward seeming the prisoners charged with the murder of Miss Kerr and her servant at Belfast, and of Wood, the Pickering farmer, were guilty of cruel murders. They were, however, convicted of manslaughter only, and sentenced to protracted periods of penal servitude. The many crimes of violence which formed the subject of inquiry at the recent winter assizes will be fresh in the memories of our readers. While larceny of what may be called the vulgar sort has shown a gratifying tendency to decrease of offences incidental to a great commercial community have alarmingly increased. Early in the year the mercantile world was astounded by the intelligence that a series of forgeries, singularly daring in conception, and wonderfully skilful in execution, had been committed upon the Bank of England by a gang of American adventurers, who, having obtained possession of more than £100,000 were just preparing to decamp with their plunder when their frauds were detected by one of those accidental mistakes which rogues so often commit, and by which their best concerted schemes are brought to nought. After investigations extending over many months they were all convicted and sentenced to penal servitude for life. Scarcely inferior in turpitude to the Bidwells and their associates, we regret to have to mention the Rev. Vyvyan Moyle, a clergyman highly esteemed at Middlesborough, convicted of having elaborately forged some joint-stock company securities. In the same category must be included Yates, the secretary to the Great Eastern Steamship Company, who obtained £34,000 by similar means; Smyth and Rodgers, just committed for trial for frauds on the Belfast Bank; Lizardi, a merchant in extensive business, who absconded while under remand, leaving the friends who became his bail to pay £12,000 for their belief in his assurance that he had a complete answer to the charge; Christian and Roberts, the stockbrokers, convicted of criminal misappropriation of funds entrusted to them; and the Goldsmith family, who had obtained £15,000 worth of valuables from goldsmiths and jewellers. To this long list must be added Williamson, the confederate colonel convicted of endeavouring to extort money by sending from ten to a hundred persons daily to his victim's house on various fools' errands, till the prosecutor was almost driven out of his senses. Huguet, a French banker, resisted his rendition under the Extradition Treaty, on the ground that the legal was only a cover for a political prosecution. His allegations of indirect motive derived some colour from the fact that he has since been sentenced to ten years' travaux forcés for an offence of a not very aggravated character. Metropolitan and other magistrates have had their labours largely increased by the Adulteration Act, under which grocers, bakers, and other tradesmen have been heavily fined, in spite of naïve protests that "it was the usual thing." Milkmen have vainly pleaded that "watering" milk is not adulteration, and the Coal Acts have been found so effectual against dealers who advertise slag and slate as "Best Wall's End" that this "form of competition" is likely to go out of favour. Raids on betting men have been frequent, and have generally been followed by the wholesale infliction of heavy penalties. Summonses against workmen under the Masters' and Servants' Act have been much more frequent than the friends of either class could wish. The release of the gas stokers after the expiration of one-third of the sentence passed on them by Mr. Justice Brett, has, naturally enough, stimulated the agitation for a repeal of the Criminal Law Amendment Act. Complaints of the police have been unpleasantly numerous, the acquittal of the men against whom Mr. Belt preferred charges of misconduct and ill-treatment notwithstanding.—Standard.

IRELAND—EXPECTED LEGAL APPOINTMENTS.—The death of the Right Hon. Richard Pigot has placed at the disposal of Her Majesty's Government the great office of Chief Baron of the Irish Court of Exchequer—a post worth £4600 a year. We need scarcely say that for the last two days the Library of the Four Courts and the other places where lawyers most do congregate have been enlivened by all kinds of rumours as to the manner in which the vacant office, or we should say vacant offices, will be disposed of. As to the Lord Chief Baronry itself the general belief is that Mr. Attorney-General Palles will be raised to the dignity. The position is one of the high offices which, "of right," belongs to the Attorney-General, and the three predecessors of Chief Baron Pigot, Chief Barons Brady, Wolfe, and Joy, all passed from the office of Attorney-General to the Presidency of the Court of Exchequer. Other "authorities," however, have it that the claims of Mr. Palles will be satisfied with a puisne judgeship, and that Mr. Baron Dowse, or, perhaps, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, will succeed to the Chief Baronry. A third solution remains. It is just possible that the Government may suffer from a fit of economy, and take this opportunity of bringing to an issue the long-threatened diminution of the Irish judicial staff. Such a course should be resisted by the unanimous voice of the country. The cost of the judicial establishment is almost the only branch of the Imperial expenditure by which Ireland benefits, and any diminution of the number of judges would throw out of joint the legal system of the country. Supposing, however, that in the ordinary course the Attorney-General is raised to the Bench, Mr. Law becomes Attorney-General, and then arises the question of questions—who will be the new Solicitor-General? First in rank, first on the lips of his professional brethren, is the name of Sergeant Armstrong, on whose vast practice, great legal acquirements, and eminent professional position it is unnecessary to dilate.—Freeman.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS.—In 1850, Lord Campbell suggested the propriety of amalgamating these officials, according to Lord Selborne's plan in the Court of Judicature Bill. Sir W. Blackstone deemed an attorney at law as equivalent to the procurator or proctor of the civilians and canonists, being an officer of a court of record and a person put in the stead, turn, or place of another to manage his legal matters. The original enabling statute relative to attorneys is the 13 Edw. 1, c. 10, whereby they were allowed to appear in all pleas at Westminster, &c. Subsequent statutes extended this right to various writs and plaints: (See 7 R. 2, c. 14; 12 Edw. 2, st. 1, c. 1, 3 Hen. 7, c. 1; 7 Hen. 4, c. 13; 23 Hen. 8, c. 8; 29 Eliz. c. 5, s. 21; and 31 Eliz. c. 10, s. 20; 4 & 5 W. M. c. 18, s. 3; 18 Eliz. c. 5, s. 1. Thus, in all actions the demandant, plaintiff, tenant or defendant, might appear by attorney, originally, as he or she might, previous to 13 Edw. 1, c. 10, after appearance, by his or her responsalis or officially authorised advocate at law. In West's Symbolœography, A.D. 1590, s. 352, attorneys are described as honest and learned. Chief Justice Mansfield described them as liberal, respectable, and useful. In the case of Hatch v. Hatch, Lord Eldon pronounced an attorney to be not inferior in importance to a clergyman; and upon one occasion Lord Tenterden stated that he would have caused room to be made in his court for a person who described himself as a solicitor, if he had used the term attorney instead. By 33 Hen. 6, c. 7, repealed by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, the number of attorneys in Norfolk and Suffolk was limited to six, and in Norwich to two only. By 2 Hen. 6, c. 3, the Duke of Bedford was entitled to appoint his attorneys. The 3 Edw. 1, c. 29; 15 Edw. 2, st. 1; 4 Hen. 4, c. 18, and 3 Jac. 1, c. 7, apply to the conduct and business of attorneys. The latter statute names also solicitors-at-law, persons employed to follow and take care of suits. According to an ancient authority, they should be "free and voluble in tongue." Various rules of court and statutes made and enacted since the 13 Edw. 1, c. 10, define and regulate the duties of attorneys and solicitors. In Maugham's Law of Attorneys, it is stated that no statute affecting attorneys and solicitors was passed after 3 Jac. c. 7, until 2 Geo. 2, c. 23. This Act regulated their conduct and provided for their registration, also enabling each attorney to take two articled clerks for five years, one of which years, by rule of court, 31 Geo. 3, might be passed with the attorney's London agent. By 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 48, the period of clerkship was shortened to three years, in the case of a clerk who has taken his degree at Oxford, Cambridge, or Dublin. By subsequent statutes this benefit was extended to the Queen's University in Ireland; and the London and Durham Universities: See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 88. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 5, the period of articled clerkship is limited to four years, where a clerk has passed any regular examination in any of these colleges, whether he is a graduate or not; and by sect. 7 writers to the signet, solicitors before the Supreme Courts of Scotland, or procurator before any sheriff's court in Scotland, may be admitted and enrolled as an attorney or solicitor in England on three years' articles; and by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 81, s. 1, a similar privilege is conferred on members of the Faculties of Advocates in Scotland. The articled clerk's privilege of passing one year of his clerkship with a pleader or barrister was conferred by 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 48, and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 6, which latter statute repealed thirty-one statutes relative to attorneys, according to Mr. Foss. Rules of courts as to attorneys were made A.D. 1457 and 1510 (35 Hen. 6 and 7), A.D. 1573-82, 1615-17, A.D. 1633 (8 Car, 1). It was ruled that each attorney should be articled for six years. A.D. 1645 a rule was made as to attorneys attending court; and the same in 1654, when five years' service as an articled clerk was only required, and legal examiners were appointed, which practice became obsolete before 1730, when 2 Geo. 2, c. 23 was passed for the regulation of attorneys, &c., followed by c. 46 for the registration of articles of clerkship, &c., with five years' service. By 4 Hen. 4, c. 19, and 1 Hen. 5, c. 4, repealed by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, special persons, including sheriffs, and by 22 Geo. 2, c. 46, clerks of the peace, and by 30 Geo. 2, c. 3, land-tax commissioners with less than £100 a year were precluded from practising as attorneys. By 5 Geo. 2, c. 18, recently repealed, A.D. 1871, practising attorneys, solicitors, and proctors could not act legally as county magistrates. The rule of court (31 Geo. 3), whereby one year might be passed by an articled clerk in an agency office, is continued by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 6, and 23 and 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 6, which statutes confer a similar salutary privilege.

LITERARY QUOTATIONS.—Why do lawyers ignore poor Alexander Pope? In a pending trial, the lines from his Essay on Man—

What can ennoble sots, or slaves, or cowards?
Alas! not all the blood of all the Howards, were attributed to Byron. In last week's LAW TIMES you give Swift the credit of the couplet—

To rest, the cushion and soft dean invite,
Who never mentions hell to ears polite,

which is to be found in Pope's Moral Essays.

Queries.

50. CASE IN BANKRUPTCY WANTED.—Can you refer me to a case that was decided a short time since upon the 8th General Rule, under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, in which it was decided, I think, that the higher scale of costs applied where the debts exceeded £750, although the costs were below £200? R. T.

51. PROCEDURE.—Will any of your readers have the goodness to answer in your next issue, and give any rule or authorities on the point, as to whether a Judge of a County Court, having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, can hear any application or act in any other court other than that in which the proceedings in bankruptcy are carried on? X.

52. PARTNERSHIP.—Smith and Howell enter into partnership under the style or firm of "Smith and Howell." This partnership is subsequently dissolved by mutual consent, Howell being paid a sum of money for his share. He thereupon established a business of his own, placing over his shop door "William Howell," but in the directories he describes himself as "William Howell (late Smith and Howell), dealer in antiquities)." Has he any right so to describe himself, seeing that this would lead people to suppose that his was the original firm? A reference to cases will oblige. STELLA.

53. RIGHT OF ACTION.—Mr. Tibbs, having more dogs than he required, desired his keeper (Jinks) to kill one (a setter). Jinks, however, instead of killing the dog, sold it to Mr. Poucher for £5. Can Mr. Tibbs recover the dog from Mr. Poucher, or its value? or can he sue Jinks for the £5, or bring any other action against him in respect of the dog? DON.

54. MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT.—A. some years ago gave his wife B. a sum of money to invest in his name in the Post Office Savings Bank, instead of which B. invested same in her own name, and afterwards deserted her husband. It is now desired to obtain an order under the 9th section of the Married Women's Property Act 1870, to enable A. to have the fund invested in his own name, and I shall be glad of the opinion of any of your readers what course it is best to adopt to obtain the desired object at the least expense? Answers.

(Q. 42.) CONVEYANCE—STAMP.—I consider a 30s. stamp sufficient in this case, as only one indenture is used. See Rushbrooke v. Hood (11 Jur. 931, 17 L. J., N. S., 58, C. P.; 5 M. G. & S. 131), cited in Tilsley on Stamps, 3rd edit. p. 207, 208, where various covenants were included in the deed—"one indenture, relating to one subject matter, although embracing a variety of covenants." Their release appears "incident to the sale and conveyance of the property sold," as in "Doe d. Phillipps v. Phillipps (3 Per. & D. 603)," cited in Bythewood Conv., 3rd edit., Prec. 56. It does not appear to be a distinct matter, so as to be included in the Stamp Act 1870, s. 8, as a deed liable to separate duties.

C. C.

(Q. 44.) LEGATEE—DUTY.—The question whether C. D.'s legacy is liable to duty at 10 per cent. depends on the further question, whether the legacy was one of which C. D. could have had, if he had been so disposed, the beneficial enjoyment. If he could have retained the legacy as against the residuary legatee, duty must be paid by him, otherwise not. Did he accept the £100 on an understanding, binding on his conscience, that he would release the legacy? If so, as in the case of a secret trust, legacy duty would not be payable: (See the judgment of Wickens, V.C., in Taylor v. Cartwright, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 571.) Z. Y.

(Q. 46.) ALLOTMENT OF STOCK.—The new stock, or the benefit derived from the sale of it, or of the allotment letters, is unquestionably capital, and as such, must be invested in some of the securities in which the trustees, by the powers of the settlement or by the general law, are authorised to invest it. It would be a clear breach of trust to treat it as income: (See Rowley v. Unwin, 2 K. & J.). The law is clear, though the practice in such cases is, probably, fluctuating. Z. Y.

(Q. 47.) EASEMENT.—Under 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71, s. 2, uninterrupted enjoyment of an easement as of right for twenty years gives a prima facie right to it. And by sect. 4 the only interruption within the meaning of the statute is action or suit brought by the owner of the tenement over which the easement extends, or such acts on the part of the party enjoying the easement as show that he did not consider the easement to be his of right. In this case A. and his predecessors have not, as I understand it, enjoyed the easement of nailing their trees to the house for twenty years, and therefore A. is liable to be disturbed by B. in an action on the case, or of trespass brought within the limited time. But if A. continues to insist on the right, and B. does not bring action till the twenty years have run out, A. can then plead the statute. See Bright v. Walker (1 C. M. & R. 211, 219; 4 Tyrw. 502), and Wright v. Williams (3 C. M. & R. 77; 1 Tyr. & Granger 375). In most cases of this sort it is found best to resort to arbitration. OWL.

— Under the circumstances, I do not think that the servitude of allowing the annexation of trees was imposed on the neighbour's wall. I do not see how the presumption of negligence and patience could be raised against the owner of the wall. The trifling character of the annexation, the possible ignorance of the owner, and the difficulty of resisting the encroachment would all have to be considered. Generally speaking, an easement cannot be acquired by user vi, clam, or precario, or otherwise than of right. Tacit sufferance is not sufficient: (Tickle v. Brown, 4 Ad. & El. 369). Z. Y.

AT the usual monthly meeting of the directors, held at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane, on Thursday, the 1st inst., the following being present, viz.: Mr. Desborough (chairman), Mr. Steward, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Kelly, Mr. W. S. Masterman, Mr. Sawtell, Mr. Sidney Smith, Mr. Styan, and Mr. Boodle (secretary), a donation of £30 was made to the daughter of a member, grants amounting to £33 were made to the widow and daughters of four non-members, and two new members were elected.

NOTE.—This department of the LAW TIMES, is contributed by EDWARD WALFORD, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Geneaiogical and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the LAW TIMES Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

THE O'GRADY.

THE death is announced of William De Courcy O'Grady, Esq., "The O'Grady," of Kilballyowen, county Limerick, barrister-at-law; he died recently, at his residence near Bruff, in the county of Limerick, in the 58th year of his age. The deceased was the eldest son of "The O'Grady," of Kilballyowen, a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant, and formerly high sheriff of the county of Limerick, who died in 1862. His mother was Anne, only daughter of William Wise, Esq., of Cork, and he was born in the year 1816. He was educated at Winchester, and at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took his B.A. degree in 1837, and proceeded M.A. in 1840; he was called to the Irish Bar in 1840. The Milesian family of O'Grady, of which the deceased gentleman was the representative, is, says Sir Bernard Burke, one of the most ancient in the far west of Ireland; and Dr. O'Brien, the late Roman Catholic Bishop of Cloyne, in his "Irish and English Dictionary," assigns Conal-Eachluath, King of Munster, A.D. 366, and sixth in descent from Oiliol-Olum (of the race of Heber, eldest son of Milesius, King of Spain, who colonized Ireland), as the common ancestor of the O'Gradies and the O'Briens, the latter of whom is now represented by Lord Inchiquin, of Dromoland, county Clare. The same authority tells us that "when the latter house, subsequently, in the person of Brian or Brien Boroimhe, the renowned monarch of Ireland, established an ascendancy of power in north Munster or Thomond, of which they became hereditary rulers, the O'Gradies came to acknowledge their paramount sway, and were arrayed as dynasts, or chiefs of a 'sept,' under the banners of these provincial princes." Sir Bernard Burke, however, traces their actual descent no further back than the interval between A.D. 1276 and 1309, when the "chieftainship of the sept vested in Donald O'Grady, who fell in battle in the latter year, leaving a son Hugh O'Grady, who acquired the property of Kilballyowen (which has ever since been vested in the family) by his marriage with the daughter and heiress of a local chief, named O'Kerssick." The O'Grady married, in 1841, Anne Grogan, daughter of Thomas De Rinzi, Esq., of Clobemon Hall, county Wexford, by whom he has left, besides other children, a son Thomas De Courcy, born in 1844, who now becomes "The O'Grady."

J. VEITCH, ESQ.

THE late James Veitch, Esq., of Eliock, Dumfriesshire, barrister-at-law, who died at Edinburgh, on the 15th ult., in the seventy-fifth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late Henry Veitch, Esq., of Eliock (who died in 1838). His mother was Zepherina, daughter of Thomas Loughnan, Esq., of Madeira, and he was born in the year 1799. He was educated at Edinburgh, and was called to the Scottish Bar in 1821. He had been a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant since 1829, and in 1833 he was appointed sheriff-substitute for the county of Lanark. Mr. Veitch married in 1831 Hannah Charlotte, daughter of the late James Hay, Esq., of Hopes, Haddingtonshire.

RICHARD HARRISON, ESQ.

THE late Richard Harrison, Esq., solicitor, of Holywell, Flintshire, who died at his residence at Castlehill, on the 15th ult., in the sixty-ninth year of his age, was born in 1805, and admitted a solicitor in 1829. Upon the establishment of County Courts he was appointed Treasurer of the whole of the courts in Circuit No. 29, and a portion of Circuit Nos. 7, 27, and 28, in all about twenty-three courts, which appointment he retained until the time of his decease. He was afterwards appointed a perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgements of married women, and was also for some time a member of the Holywell Local Board. It may be truly said that he was a gentleman, firm of purpose, of unimpeachable honour, and strove always to preserve the dignity of his profession. The deceased gentleman was universally respected and esteemed by all the officials of the courts with which he was connected, as well as by all with whom he came in contact.

F. WOODTHORPE, ESQ.

THE late Mr. Frederick Woodthorpe, barrister-at-law, and town clerk of the city of London, who died on the 19th ult., at his residence upon Haverstock-hill, at the age of fifty-nine, was a member of a family whose connection with the city is as old as the century itself; his grandfather having held the same office before him from 1801 to 1825, and his father from that date down to 1842, Mr. F. Woodthorpe succeeding the late Mr. Serjeant Merewether in 1859 in the post, after having for some years been deputy town clerk. Mr. F. Woodthorpe was born in the year 1814, and was educated under Dr. Valpy at the Reading Grammar School. He was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in Michaelmas Term 1844; but he never followed the usual business of his profession, his whole official life having been devoted to the service of the Corporation of London. He entered the office of his father as a clerk in 1836, and retired from the duties of town clerk in the early part of last year, upon a well-earned pension of £1000 a year. This, however, he did not live to enjoy for many months. He was buried on the Wednesday succeeding his death at the Highgate Cemetery.

CHIEF BARON PIGOT.

THE late Right Hon. David Richard Pigot, Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, who died on Monday, Dec. 22, 1873, at his residence in Merrion-square, Dublin, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late David Pigot, Esq., M.D., of Kilworth, in the county of Cork, and was born in the year 1805. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took his Bachelor's degree in 1825, and proceeded M.A. in 1832. He was called to the Irish Bar in Michaelmas Term 1826, and was admitted a Bencher of the King's Inn, Dublin, in 1839. He was appointed Solicitor-General for Ireland in 1839, and was Attorney-General from 1840 to Sept. 1841; he was sworn a member of the Privy Council on being appointed to this latter office, and he sat in Parliament in the Liberal interest as representative of Clonmel from 1839 until his elevation to the Bench as Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland in 1846. The judge was a member of the Senate of the Queen's University in Ireland, a Visitor of Maynooth College, a Commissioner of National Education, and was created an Honorary LL.D. of Dublin in 1870. He was married, but became a widower in 1869. The Irish Law Times says:—He will long be remembered by the legal profession for having been instrumental in passing the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 105, which extended to Ireland most of the provisions of the English Acts, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. And by both the public and the lawyers he will be remembered for his eloquence, patience, and unimpeachable character. Men of all parties and creeds deplore his loss and recognize his worth while in Parliament and on the Bench. As a judge he was animated by the most earnest desire to do justice, full and exhaustive, to every suitor. No case, however intricate or perplexing, could exhaust his patience. He searched out every detail with unwearied assiduity, and in his charges and decisions laboured to give every point, however minute, its due weight. This anxiety to be just led him of late years to protract the trials at which he presided to what some considered an unreasonable length, but the fault was universally acknowledged to have its origin in a high conscientiousness; and, though the parties might chafe for the moment, it was excused on account of the high motives which prompted it. As an equity lawyer he had few equals and no superior, while as a criminal judge—in which capacity it fell to his lot to preside over some of the most important trials of the present century—he was equally excellent.

H. L. ANDERTON, ESQ.

THE late Henry Lyon Anderton, Esq., barrister-at-law, who died at Cleckheaton, near Normanton, Yorkshire, on the 23rd ult., was the eldest son of William Anderton, Esq., of Cleckheaton, and was born about the year 1840. He was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1864; he was subsequently made LL.B., and was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple, in 1871. He went the Midland Circuit, and attended the West Riding of Yorkshire, and Leeds borough sessions, and he also practised as a special pleader and conveyancer.

The Law and the Lawyers.

ONE of the points under the Married Women's Property Act which we referred to last week, namely, the liability of a married woman carrying on separate trade to be sued, has arisen and been decided in the Manchester County Court. The case will be found reported in another column, and the law is laid down as we stated it. Although a married woman is empowered by the Act to hold property altogether freed from the control of her husband, and may sue on contracts made with her, yet when sued by those with whom she has incurred a liability, she may plead her coverture and defeat the action. It was urged on behalf of the plaintiff that a liability to be sued was by implication imposed by the Act on married women carrying on separate trade, and that even independently of the Act a woman trading alone was impliedly authorised to do so by her husband, and could make her separate estate liable by her contracts. We have recently pointed out that even at common law a wife having a separate property may affect it by her general engagements, and we cited cases in equity where the doctrine was recognised, and where eminent Judges said that they considered the same rule would prevail at law if the question were raised. The learned County Court Judge did not give his attention to this argument, but considering that by the Married Women's Property Act no liability to be sued was imposed on the wife, he treated her as an ordinary married woman. We should like to see this question thoroughly argued.

WE think it is highly desirable, quite irrespective of any proceedings in Reg. v. Castro, that the law of contempt of court should be thrown into a statute. County Court Judges can only commit or fine "if any person shall wilfully insult the judge or any juror, or any officer of the court. . . . or wilfully interrupt the proceedings in court, or otherwise misbehave in court. . . ." (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 113, and see R. v. Jolliffe, L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 136). But the powers of the superior courts have never been touched by statute, and are practically unlimited at common law. They may even commit for "speaking or writing contemptuously of the court or judges acting in their judicial capacity;" and, in short, for anything which demonstrates a gross want of respect for the court. The evidence is on affidavit; there is no jury; the accused party may be called upon to answer on oath (a course, says Blackstone, not agreeable to the genius of the common law in any other instance), and the court may fine and imprison ad infinitum. Large powers, and larger than County Court powers, may well be entrusted to the superior Judges; but we think the very fact that their present powers emanate from the aula regia of immemorial antiquity is the strongest reason why they should be defined by a modern Act of Parliament. Apropos, what are the powers in this respect of a County Court judge sitting in Bankruptcy? By sect. 66 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, he has all the powers of a Judge of the High Court of Chancery, in addition to his ordinary powers as a County Court Judge. It would seem, therefore, that his powers to commit for contempt are not limited by the County Court Act, but are as wide as those of the superior courts; which result was not, we think, intended.

THE secretary of a railway company, ordered by a court of law to produce documents upon a subpœna duces tecum, and ordered by his directors to withhold them, and so disobey the subpœna, has been happily extricated from his dilemma by the Court of Common Pleas, in the late case of Crowther v. Appleby (reported last week) in which the court refused to attach the secretary for disobedience to the subpœna. There was, we think, quite sufficient authority for the decision, and we would refer those of our readers who take an interest in the subject to the case of Amery v. Long (9 East, 470) in which the whole history of the writ of subpœna will be found reviewed by Lord ELLENBOROUGH, it having been argued in that case that the subpœna duces tecum had no compulsory obligation in law. But the practical inconvenience which is exemplified by Crowther v. Appleby, and which was adverted to by Mr. Justice DENMAN in the course of the argument, is so great that it seems almost to need a Legislative remedy. If a corporation is unwilling to produce documents, how can it be compelled to do so? The secretary or any other servant in whose custody the required documents may be, if served with the subpœna, may, it appears, be effectually ordered by his masters to disobey it. By sect. 16 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, every writ of summons issued against a corporation aggregate may be served upon one of its officers, and there would seem to be no reason in principle why a writ of subpœna duces tecum should not be served also. With regard to the point left doubtful by the court, viz., whether an action would lie for refusing to produce papers, although an attachment would not be granted, it may be noticed that by stat. 5 Eliz. c. 9, s. 12, which gives the right of action in affirmance of the common law, a "reasonable or lawful impediment" is expressly mentioned as an excuse for not appearing "according to the tenor of the process."

IN more than one of the recent registration appeals in the Common Pleas the respondents were not represented by counsel, and Mr. Justice DENMAN remarked upon the inconvenience of this practice, which is calculated to act prejudicially on the interpretation of the law. Whilst we cannot go with the learned Judge this length, we agree that it is to be desired that both sides of a question of law should be argued before it is decided. The evil is one, however, for which there is no remedy, and respondents are quite right, if they think a point doubtful, and particularly if they are the objectors and not the voters, to incur no expense in supporting the decision of the revising barrister. In other cases the omission to support decisions obtained below may have serious consequences, and an instance of this comes to us from Margate. The members of a club called the Union Club were convicted, under the Licensing Act, of keeping open during prohibited hours. They appealed to the borough quarter sessions, but no counsel was retained to support the conviction. The Recorder thereupon allowed the appeal with costs. The licensed victuallers of Margate are, not unnaturally, very indignant, and believe that, had the case been that of an ordinary publican, a different measure of justice would have been meted out. It is dangerous to criticise a decision without having seen a full report of it, but we conceive that if the conviction was quashed simply because it was appealed against and not supported, such a course of proceeding is not that usually prevailing with reference to appeals. As pointed out above, it is not only at quarter sessions that decisions are not supported on appeal, but the court considers the grounds of the decision appealed against, and gives judgment after fully considering the case. We certainly think that magistrates ought to take care that their decisions, deliberately arrived at, should be properly supported when appealed against. In the Margate case the borough has to pay the costs of the appeal without the satisfaction of having the question argued, which, we think, justifies the outcry which has been raised.

THE dashing speech of the SOLICITOR-GENERAL at the dinner of the Oxford Druids was probably read by the members of the legal Profession with the attention which it deserved. It will, therefore, have been remarked that in his attitude towards lawyers generally, he presents a striking contrast to his predecessor, the present MASTER of the ROLLS. We may briefly mention the two occasions in the course of his speech on which he expresses his opinion about his own profession. Speaking of the manner in which his own college had employed its endowments, he said: "When I think of the foundation of Trinity College and the use she has made of it, and contrast her conduct with that of another foundation of about equal wealth, administered, I am sorry to say by my own Profession, the Inns of Court—when I think how much the one and how little the other has done for those with whose education they are equally charged, I confess it is a subject on which I do not care to dwell, for it is only an additional example of that, which I have had too often occasion to observe—that of all classes of men, lawyers are those who most obstinately cherish abuses and most successfully resist reform." This is a sweeping condemnation which we certainly think recent events do not justify. The obstructiveness of the governing bodies of the Inns of Court everybody acknowledges; but they form a small minority of English "lawyers," the great majority of whom are anxious to see the revenues of the Inns of Court properly employed. Again, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT expresses his belief that any measure for simplifying the transfer of land will find its most energetic opponents among solicitors. "I know," he said, "I am treading on dangerous ground; but still I will venture to affirm that if a reform of this character is opposed, it will not be by the landed interest, but by a class of men far more influential than Solicitors-General—I mean solicitors in particular." Did Sir WILLIAM observe the demeanour of the "solicitors in particular" when Lord SELBORNE'S Land Title and Transfer Bill was before the House last session? What evidence was there of the opposition coming mainly or at all from solicitors? We addressed ourselves with care and, we hope, intelligent industry to the details of the measure, and pointed out its defects. But we were surprised at the apparent indifference of solicitors on a subject so closely affecting their interests. No one doubts the learned SOLICITOR-GENERAL'S independence of everybody and everything, but we think that he ought not to indulge in sweeping assertions based on mere speculation, and unsupported by any evidence whatever. We believe the time for organised resistance on the part of any class or profession to reforms calculated to benefit the country is gone by. The great monopolies which support half the members of the House of Commons can alone successfully influence legislation to the prejudice of the public, and lawyers are rapidly becoming a persecuted instead of a persecuting race.

WE recently had occasion to refer to a case before Vice-Chancellor MALINS, in which an application was made for a commission to issue to a foreign court to examine witnesses. The comity which facilitates such process is of great utility, and a case in the District Court of Philadelphia illustrates the principles upon which the procedure in such cases should rest. Letters rogatory were issued by the Philadelphia Court to the Royal Circuit Court at Schweinfurt, in Bavaria. When they had been executed by that court, with great solemnity, it was objected to the legality of the execution, among other things, that the attorney and counsellor of the plaintiff was present at the taking of the depositions of witnesses. In delivering judgment on the exceptions, Justice THAYER observed on the broad distinction between the execution of a commission and the procuring of testimony by the instrumentality of letters rogatory or letters requisatory as they are sometimes called. The learned Judge said: "In the former case the rules of procedure are established by the court issuing the commission, and are entirely under its control. In the latter, the methods of procedure must, from the nature of the case, be altogether under the control of the foreign tribunal which is appealed to for assistance in the administration of justice. We cannot execute our own laws in a foreign country, nor can we prescribe conditions for the performance of a request which is based entirely upon the comity of nations, and which, if granted, is altogether ex gratia. 'We therefore request you that, in furtherance of justice, you will, by the proper and usual process of your court, cause such witnesses to appear before you, and there to answer, &c., &c.' This is the formula in which the letters are couched. We cannot dictate the methods to be pursued by the court whose assistance we invoke. The rules and practice of the foreign court must be the law of procedure in such cases. Letters rogatory were unknown to the common law. They came to us from the civil law, though the admiralty courts and the civilians seem to agree that in all that concerns the forms of procedure in such cases, the Judge ought to observe the laws of his own country. We may therefore adopt, in the present case, the language of Judge WASHINGTON, in Nelson v. The United States (1 Peters C. C. R. 237): "Where the business is taken out of the hands of persons appointed by this court, the ends of justice seem to require a departure, in some degree, from the ordinary rules of evidence. To what extent this departure would go has never yet been decided in this court, and it is not necessary at present to lay down the limitation.' Doubtless, if it should appear that any of the substantial requisites of justice, as we administer it, had been omitted, or any unfair advantage given to either party, we would reject the depositions, no matter what solemnities of form had attended the taking of them. But under the circumstances attending the execution of these letters rogatory by the Royal Circuit Court at Schweinfurt, we cannot regard the attendance of the plaintiffs' attorney as a circumstance of that character. He appears to have attended in pursuance of a notification of the Judge who took the depositions, and was required by him to verify them by his signature. It thus very plainly appears that his attendance was altogether in conformity with the rules of procedure in the foreign tribunal, and the character of the court which executed our request affords ample assurance that his presence was not permitted in any degree to prejudice the defendants' rights." We think this is a very correct and useful statement of the view to be taken of the proceedings of foreign courts.

BARON MARTIN.

A JUDGE who has been on the Bench for twenty-three years, who during that period has been hard at work administering the law with temper, judgment, and ability, retires into private life carrying with him the gratitude of the public and the respect and esteem of the legal profession. Of no one can this be said more emphatically than of Baron MARTIN. For some period the learned Judge has been suffering from an infirmity of hearing which has seriously inconvenienced him in the discharge of his judicial duties, but up to the last he has manifested that kindness and consideration towards his brother Judges which has always distinguished him, he having within the last week sat at chambers for a member of his own court.

It is not accorded to every Judge to occupy a large amount of public attention; the qualifications which make a useful puisne Judge are not as a rule consistent with brilliant oratorical powers, and other gifts which excite public admiration. We have in our chiefs of the common law courts, specimens of the men more fitted to adorn the Bench than to do the mill-horse routine of a common law Judge; and when the chief seats are occupied by the first orators of our day, the subordinate positions should be filled by Judges who, by experience and learning and industry, are prepared to deal with the ordinary matters of court practice with care, patience, and sagacity. No two men probably were better representatives of this class of Judges than the late Baron CHANNELL and Baron MARTIN, who, with Baron BRAMWELL and the late Chief Baron, formed an exceptionally strong court. They took their rise in the days of special demurrers. There is little doubt that strict pleading is a most useful training for the lawyer; and it is quite plain that the abolition of severe accuracy has tended to produce lawyers accustomed to looser modes of thought and argument. The present year will see the last of the old system to which we are largely indebted for such judges as Baron MARTIN.

We have only to say on the present occasion, in conclusion, that there have been few Judges more generally liked by the Profession, and more thoroughly appreciated, than the learned Judge who now retires from the Bench.

CONTRACTS BY CORPORATIONS AND THEIR AGENTS.

VERY many cases have been decided upon the operation of the seal of a corporate body, in giving validity to its contracts, and the subject is one of considerable importance. In the case of The Mayor and Corporation of Kidderminster v. Hardwick (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 611) the corporation let its market and tolls by auction. The defendant was the highest bidder. The conditions of letting were signed by the defendant and by the town clerk on behalf of the corporation. A month's rent in advance, according to the conditions, was paid by the defendant, and the keys of the markets were handed over to him, but he did not otherwise enter into possession. By a resolution of the corporation under their seal they approved the letting to the defendant. He, however, failed to complete by finding the necessary sureties, and the corporation brought an action against him to recover damages for breach of contract. We may say at once that the case was decided against the corporation on two grounds (1) that there was no such part performance as would entitle the defendant to specific performance and the contract was void for want of mutuality; and (2) that the contract was not enforceable as not having been entered into by the corporation under seal, or by an agent expressly authorised under seal. The resolution was passed after the breach, and thus too late to operate as a ratification.

The point to be considered, and which this case so admirably illustrates, is this. As a bare proposition a corporation must contract by its corporate seal, or by its agent duly authorised under seal. This being wanting, under what circumstances will a corporation be entitled to the benefit of its contracts and to sue for the breach of them? The case under notice does not give us any new law, for we consider that the principle was fully established by the Court of Common Pleas in the Fishmongers' Company v. Robertson (5 M. & G. 131), where Chief Justice Tindal said that wherever there is a part performance, where the corporation have acted upon the contract and the other party has had the benefit of it, it does not lie in the mouth of either to deny it; the corporation cannot set up the want of a corporate seal, nor can the other side take advantage of it. The case of The Corporation of Kidderminster v. Hardwick is chiefly valuable in showing what is necessary to make a contract binding in the absence of the corporate seal.

In deciding the case, however, a dictum of Lord Chief Justice Tindal's was commented upon—a dictum which caused the Chief Baron to hesitate for a while in his decision. That dictum was expressed in the case which we have already cited, and was to the effect that by suing upon a contract made without the corporate seal, a corporation admits that it is binding upon them, and is estopped from disputing it, or setting up the objection in a cross action. We quite agree with the learned Chief Baron that merely suing upon a contract in itself void cannot estop a corporation from disputing its validity in a cross action, and the authority upon which Chief Justice Tindal based his dictum was a case in which the corporation had clearly estopped itself by a return to a mandamus, which was a matter of record. But even supposing Chief Justice Tindal's dictum to be good law, we do not see that it would make a contract void in its inception binding upon the other contracting parties, otherwise most assuredly ratification under seal after breach would have the same effect.

The judgment delivered by Baron Pollock puts the matter as clearly and as distinctly as it can be put. He regards the want of a seal in contracts by corporations (not being trading corporations) as something more than a technical objection, and that the rule by which the seal is required is one which it would not be at all safe to relax—adopting what fell from the court in The Mayor of Ludlow v. Charlton (6 M. & W. 815.) And it is plain from the views expressed in all the cases decided upon this point that where corporations neither use their own corporate seal nor authorise agents under seal to act for them, the law will imply nothing in their favour, but will look strictly to the facts to ascertain whether the party with whom they contract has so far performed his contract as to entitle the corporation to specific performance.

SEPARATION DEEDS AND DIVORCE.

THE law seems to be pressing with almost extreme severity upon husbands, and with a view to instruct those who may be engaged in preparing deeds of separation between husband and wife, we direct particular attention to a case from the Exchequer which we report to-day, Charlesworth and another v. Holt. The defendant in that case had covenanted by deed to pay to trustees for his wife a certain yearly sum during the joint lives of himself and his wife, and "during so long time as they should live separate and apart." He also agreed that in case his wife pre-deceased him he would pay so much for her funeral expenses. Forgetful of the frailty of women, or perhaps not wishing to suggest what he thought could not occur, he inserted in the agreement no clause releasing him in the event of her unchastity. As a matter of fact she committed adultery, and the husband obtained a divorce. Nevertheless, he was sued by the trustees for arrears of the annuity, and the Court of Exchequer gave judgment in their favour.

Separation deeds have been frequently called in question by learned judges as being altogether opposed to morality. But they have been on successive occasions solemnly upheld. Whilst they continue to be recognized as lawful contracts, it would occur to the uninformed mind that they should be construed so as to carry out what must be taken to be intention of all parties entering into them, namely that they should be binding so long as the tie of matrimony remains:—Let the beneficiary violate the marriage contract, and thereupon all contracts depending upon it should be dissolved also. Looking at the matter by the light of our great model, the Roman Civil Law, it is perfectly plain that no such covenant by a husband should be held binding upon him after divorce. The Romans recognised the greatest laxity as regarded marriage; divorce was obtained with the greatest possible ease. The Roman principle was that the consent of the parties was required not only for contracting marriage, but for maintaining it when contracted. Any act of either party by which this consent was explicitly withdrawn was sufficient to terminate the relation. And once the wife was severed from her husband, all his engagements concerning her ceased—her dowry was returned and she became an independent woman. If the divorce was occasioned by the fault of the wife, she forfeited a portion of her dowry and was also punished by the law. Of course, under the Roman system no such covenant as that in Charlesworth v. Holt could have been thought of, and the necessity for deeds of separation, which form, indeed, almost a portion of our divorce jurisprudence, arises from the peculiarities of our common law which, whilst tending more and more to make married women independent of their husbands, carefully holds husbands to their contracts to supply their wives with necessaries. But our divorce law refuses to give any alimony to a wife who has been guilty of misconduct; and when the spiritual courts had jurisdiction, and had decreed divorce à mensâ et thoro a common law court could not entertain the question of the husband's liability for necessaries. And, of course, it is perfectly plain law now that a husband is not liable for necessaries supplied to a woman who was his wife, but who is divorced from him on his petition.

Consequently everything turns on Charlesworth v. Holt upon the covenant in a deed executed when the wife was innocent, and when neither contracting party could have contemplated the events which happened, and which, but for decided cases, we should have imagined, followed as they were by a decree of divorce, would have released the husband not only from his common law liability, but also from any liability voluntarily assumed by deed. It must be confessed, however, that the case law is almost uniform in favour of the claim of the plaintiffs. We will briefly consider what the cases are. In Serres v. Serres (1 N. Rep. 121), which was an action brought on the covenants in a deed of separation, the Court of Common Pleas refused to allow the defendant to withdraw the general issue and plead the adultery of the wife, on the ground that it would not be an answer to the action. Then in Jee v. Thurlow (2 B. & C. 547), a decree of a spiritual court for divorce à mensâ et thoro, on the ground of adultery, was held no answer to an action on a covenant to pay an annuity to the wife. There Chief Justice Abbot used the same words as the court adopted in Charlesworth v. Holt. Had the husband wished, he said, to make the non-commission of adultery a condition of paying the annuity to his wife he should have covenanted to pay it quamdiu casta viverit. He added that the judgment in the Ecclesiastical Court, but not alleging the fact of adultery, was not at all more favourable for the defendant. The only point left open by these cases, and made, indeed, by subsequent legislation, is whether the decree of the Divorce Court on the ground of the wife's adultery is to have an effect which the judgment of the Ecclsiastical Court, not alleging adultery, had not. On this point plaintiff's counsel in Charlesworth v. Holt relied upon Goslin v. Clark (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 824). There, at the time of the execution of the deed, the husband knew that his wife had committed adultery; he covenanted by his deed to allow her an amount annually so long as she conducted herself as a chaste and modest woman. He obtained a divorce, under the Divorce Act, which passed after the execution of the deed, upon the adultery already mentioned. An action was brought upon the deed, and it was held that inasmuch as the defendant knew of the adultery of his wife at the time of executing the deed, and the wife having conducted herself properly subsequently, he could not by his own act of procuring a divorce upset the validity of the deed. That case can hardly be accepted as an authority upon the point under discussion; the facts were altogether different; the wife had been chaste since the execution of the deed, and nothing had occurred since its execution but the proceedings in the Divorce Court, at the instigation of the husband, and on a ground with which he was familiar before the separation.

It is clear, however, as the Lord Chief Baron said, that all the authorities are one way, and all that the defendant's counsel could do was to urge the court to import into the deed the condition upon which alone he could be taken to have agreed to pay the annuity. On the operation of the decree for divorce his Lordship said the argument of expediency was very much weakened by the operation of the Divorce Act, by which power is given to the court to make all such orders relating to settlements between husband and wife as it shall see fit to do. And, undoubtedly Worsley v. Worsley and Wignall (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546), shows that the Divorce Court will deal with an ordinary separation deed, but in making the arrangement as to cutting down the allowance, an application was made for an insertion of a dum casta clause in the deed, and it was intimated that this might be done in chambers. On the interpretation of sect. 5, which gives the power in question to the court, Lord Penzance said, "If one looks at the substance of the thing one may say that the Legislature, in giving this power to the court, intended to arm the court with power to make fresh arrangements in the case of a woman committing adultery in respect to the pecuniary settlements which have been made at any time upon her in her character as a wife. I think the substantial feature of this settlement which brings it within the clause is, that it is a sum of money covenanted to be paid to the wife in her character as a wife, and upon the fair supposition that she was and would continue to be a wife . . . But the wife has committed adultery, the marriage has been dissolved, and she is no longer a wife, and the court would be acting in concert with the intentions of the Legislature in dealing with that settlement." Baron Bramwell, in Charlesworth v. Holt, doubted whether the above case could be accepted as any authority, inasmuch as the deed there under consideration was executed in 1865, after the passing of the Divorce Act, whilst that in Charlesworth v. Holt was executed before. If Worsley v. Worsley is not taken as an authority, then Charlesworth v. Holt becomes stronger, because the defendant had no opportunity of having his settlement reviewed by the Divorce Court.

On the whole the Court of Exchequer have proceeded in the straight groove of precedent, and upon principles which are strict law. The Divorce Act makes matters somewhat less intolerable for husbands who have made settlements on their wives, and have not inserted a dum casta clause; but even then, under that Act, an adulterous wife will probably receive a portion of the annuity, whereas, according to the most ancient principles of justice, and under the wisest divorce law, the husband retained part of her dowry, and was absolutely relieved from all liability concerning her. The law, however, is perfectly clear, and those practitioners who have to advise on the subject can have no excuse for want of knowledge.

RELEVANCY OF EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

THE Indian Evidence Act of 1872 contains the following provisions:—"When there is a question whether an act was accidental or intentional, the fact that such act formed part of a series of similar occurrences, in each of which the person doing the act was concerned, is relevant." (Sect. 15.)

In illustration of this section the following cases are put:—

(a) A. is accused of burning down his house, in order to obtain money for which it is insured. The facts that A. lived in several house successsively, each of which he insured, in each of which a fire occurred, and after each of which fires A. received payment from a different insurance office, are relevant, as tending to show that the fires were not accidental.

(b) A. is employed to receive money from the debtors of B. It is A's duty to make entries in a book, showing the amounts received by him. He makes an entry, showing that on a particular occasion he received less than he really did receive. The question is, whether this false entry was accidental or intentional. The facts that other entries made by A. in the same book are false, and that the false entry is in each case in favour of A. are relevant.

(c) A. is accused of fraudulently delivering to B. a counterfeit rupee. The question is whether the delivery of the rupee was accidental. The facts that soon before, or soon after the delivery to B., A. delivered counterfeit rupees to C., D., and E., are relevant, as showing that the delivery to A. was not accidental.

Thus it appears that the Indian legislators have found it necessary to admit proof of previous and subsequent offences without regard to whether they were committed against the party in respect of whom the proceedings are being instituted.

In Wills on Circumstantial Evidence, p. 47, it is said that "all such relevant acts of the party as may reasonably be considered explanatory of his motives and purposes, even though they may severally constitute distinct felonies, are clearly admissable in evidence."

It is thought that this passage contains the true principle on which the admission or rejection of such evidence should depend, viz., that where it is material to ascertain quo animo a particular act was committed, any collateral facts affording a presumption or bearing reasonably on the question of guilty knowledge or intent may be given in evidence. This is indeed the rule laid down in Taylor on Evidence (vol. 1, p. 357, 6th edit.), where the admission of evidence of collateral facts for this purpose is said to be grounded on reasons similar to those governing the relevancy of such evidence in civil actions where knowledge, good faith, or intent is material.

There is, indeed, one case which is opposed to the admission of the collateral evidence we are considering; it is that of R. v. Winslow (8 Cox. C. C. 397), the facts of which are as follows:—The prisoner was indicted for causing the death of Ann James, who was proved to have died from the effects of antimony. The prisoner was manager to the deceased, who kept an eating-house, and it was proved that in 1859, while the prisoner was her manager, there were staying in the house with the deceased, four of her relatives. Between Sept. 1859 and the following February three of these relations sickened and died after short illnesses, in which each exhibited exactly similar symptoms. In February Mrs. James, who had long been ill, became worse, and in the following June died. Martin, B. (after consulting Wilde, B.) held that evidence of the three other members of the same family having died of similar poison, and of the prisoner having been present at all the deaths and having administered something to two of the parties, was admissible. It is, however, submitted that this decision can no longer be supported against the above authorities to the contrary.

An enactment in the recent Prevention of Crimes Act of 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112) appears to favour the above views. It enacts that "where proceedings are taken against any person for having received goods, knowing them to be stolen, or for having in his possession stolen property, evidence may be given at any stage of the proceedings that there was found in the possession of such person other property stolen within the preceeding period of twelve months, and such evidence may be taken into consideration for the purpose of proving that such person knew the property to be stolen, which forms the subject of the proceedings taken against him: (sect. 19.)

Upon the whole we think it may fairly be laid down that in all cases, where it is material to determine malice, knowledge, motive, or intent, evidence of collateral facts should be admitted, though antecedent or subsequent to the principal act; and that it should make no difference whether the previous offences were committed against the same or another person since the sole ground on which its admission can be supported is that, from the frequency of certain occurrences, it tends to show whether the offence in question was intentional or not, or, in other words, to lead to the inference that each act has been too often an accident to be always an accident. That it is an exception to the general rules, which govern our law of evidence must be conceded, but it is submitted that it is a necessary one for the obvious reason that it would, in the great majority of cases, be impossible to prove such psychological facts without admitting evidence of collateral matters. It is difficult to see, moreover, how testimony which goes to prove the very gist of a charge can be said to be disconnected with the matter in issue, and how facts which give a quality to the principal fact can be considered irrelevant. As to the objection that a prisouer is thus taken by surprise, it is conceived that a person who is charged with a crime of the nature we are considering, cannot suppose that the evidence against him will be confined to the mere circumstances of the act for which he is on his trial, and which would generally furnish insufficient material from which the jury could presume a guilty knowledge or intent, and that he should come to trial prepared to explain any actions connected with the charge of which he has direct notice.

With regard to the inconvenience arising from raising different issues, it is to be remarked that the admission of such evidence in cases of the felonious receiving of stolen goods and of knowingly uttering forged documents is open to precisely the same objection; but in those cases the inconvenience is tolerated in order that justice may not be defeated, and it is thought that this reason applies with at least equal force to those charges which form the immediate subject of this article.

The only other point to which it will be necessary for us to refer is as to what should be the proximity, in point of time between the offence charged, and the previous ones offered in evidence.

It would appear, on principle, that the fact of the offences of which evidence is tendered being divided by considerable intervals of time, either from the one charged or from each other, should form no objection to the reception of such evidence, though of course, it would materially affect its weight; for it is impossible to say at what distance of time a particular act will cease to have any effect on the minds of the jury in assisting them to arrive at a correct conclusion as to the matter in issue. The language of Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough in Whiley's case (2 Leach, 983), strongly favours the above proposition; for though that was a case of felonious uttering, the reasoning seems equally applicable to other charges. To prove the guilty knowledge of the prisoner, evidence of three previous utterings of forged notes within the course of the month preceding was tendered, and on the authority of the former case of R. v. Tattershall was admitted, Lord Ellenborough saying, "True it is, that the more detached the previous utterings are in point of time, the less relation they will bear to the particular uttering stated in the indictment; and when they are so distant the only question that can be made is whether they are sufficient to warrant the jury in making any inference from them as to the guilty knowledge of the prisoner, but it would not render the evidence inadmissible. Circumstances of this kind may produce such strong evidence as to leave no doubt as to the prisoner's knowledge that these notes were forged."

Undoubtedly lapse of time between the principal and evidentiary matters is an infirmative fact; it renders the evidence less conclusive, but this should merely affect its weight and not its admissibility. Mr. Beatham, in his learned treatise on Judicial Evidence (Book ix.), discusses this question at great length, and the conclusion at which he arrives with regard to circumstantial evidence is that it should never be excluded on the ground of its apparent want of probative force, unless its admission would be more productive of delay, expense, or vexation than conducive to the certainty of the decision.

We have already treated of the objections to the admission of this evidence, and shown that the advantage to the cause of justice outweighs the inconvenience occasioned by it, and where this is so we think that the hearing should be in favour of receiving proof of collateral facts, though detached by long intervals of time, since they may assist the jury in coming to a correct conclusion, in which case the evidence is relevant; and, if they are so disconnected as to furnish no presumption, no injustice is done by its admission.

THE BENCH AND BAR IN IRELAND.

THE Irish Bench, as we pointed out last week, stands at the present moment in the most unfortunate position as regards the Government, the Bar, and the public of Ireland. Whilst a Chief Baron must be appointed, it is perfectly clear that the staff of Judges may be very safely reduced. The reduction, however, cannot be founded upon any decrease in the amount of business during the past year; but it appears that for a considerable time past the courts in Ireland have not been worked up to their powers. It would, of course, be unfair to compare the business transacted in the Irish with that transacted in the English courts, and we shall not do so, but we have looked at the returns so as to enable us to say that the work of the Irish courts cannot possibly keep the present staff fully occupied if it is done with due diligence and a proper application of judicial power.

The Times correspondent informs us that the last tables computed by Dr. HANCOCK show that in 1872 the number of proceedings other than writs of execution in the three Common Law Courts was 18,338, or 2089 more than in 1871, and of these 5728 were summonses and plaints returnable to the Queen's Bench, an increase of 695 over the preceding year. It should be observed, however, that the largest number was for sums under £20, which might very properly be disposed of by the Civil Bill Courts. The total number of writs of execution was 4883, an increase of 79 over the year 1871. The returns from the Masters' offices show an increase of 1371 in the number of writs of summons and plaints filed in 1872 as compared with 1871, the total for the three courts being 13,144, of which 4453 were in the Queen's Bench, against 4369 in the previous year. The return of the business in banco shows a decrease in 1872 of 53 in the proceedings (1184) before the full courts as compared with an increase of 163 in 1871. This is partly explained by the increase in the number of records, which have to some extent thrown the business in banco into arrear. The total number of cases heard at Nisi Prius was 555 in 1872, against 547 in 1871, There has been a decrease of 22 in the number of cases on circuit, and an increase of 14 in the number heard in Dublin. There are, however, attached to the courts in Ireland other duties, such as the courts in England are unacquainted with, and they absorb a certain small proportion of the time devoted to business.

But the aspect of the question which has struck us most forcibly is that which bears upon the relation of the Bench to the public. Mr. GLADSTONE is told by the Pall Mall Gazette that if he ventures to save £4000 a year by making no new appointment, he will "assuredly sacrifice the last fragment of his Irish popularity." That journal then refers to the argument in favour of keeping up the judicial staff, that "Irish judgeships are the only great professional prizes attainable by Roman Catholics, and are the only posts in the country which render their incumbents independent of the Roman Catholic clergy." This argument our contemporary acknowledges is "wholly out of harmony with the commonplaces current on this side of the channel." Not only so, but it is wholly out of harmony with the objects for which Judges are made; and it seems a truly absurd idea that we should overload a bench in order to allow Roman Catholics to jump into positions in which they can snap their fingers at the priests. The Gazette acknowledges that the number of judges is "exorbitant and indefensible," and yet says that it would be a great misfortune if that number was curtailed by one person only. We consider it to be a calamity to the Bench to have more men upon it than the business will fully employ; and it would be still more calamitous if Irish barristers were taught to look forward to promotion to judicial sinecures on the single ground of the necessity for keeping up an independent body of well-paid officials in Ireland.

If we are to credit our contemporary, the position of the legal profession in Ireland is deplorable. "It is the fact," we are told, "that the priesthood can make or mar any layman in Ireland. It is they who can, in the first instance, determine whether an attorney shall have clients, and whether a barrister shall have briefs." But "at present, it is a matter of every-day observation that the nearer a Catholic barrister is to a judgeship the greater is his independence of spiritual control, which, indeed, when he is once on the bench, he throws off altogether." To apply this to the reduction of the number of Judges, the writer adds,—"if the occupants of the bench were greatly reduced the chances are that he would think it wiser to maintain an understanding with the powerful body which, if it chose, probably could destroy the most eminent man who depended solely on his profession." This is a wretched state of things, and very humiliating to the Profession, but we sincerely trust that Irish judges will not be created for purely political purposes, to officiate as checks on the arrogance of the priesthood. It is essential to the efficiency of the Bench that the Judges should be employed. If Ireland can substantiate her claim to the number of Judges hitherto existing, as her journals attempt to do, we should not for a moment attempt to limit the strength of the Bench. We fail to see how an overloaded judiciary can serve any useful purpose, and if it is maintained as a political institution it will become a professional evil.

LAW LIBRARY.

Lincoln's Inn, its Ancient and Modern Buildings and Library. By WILLIAM HOLDEN SPILSBURY, Librarian. London: Reeves and Turner.

THIS brochure is a second edition, and shows that Mr. Spilsbury has been a diligent and intelligent student of the antiquities of the Inn. He does not, however, confine himself to the buildings; he gives us a history of the old lawyers and old laws. But the library is naturally the principal subject of his attention, and it certainly contains a wonderful collection of valuable works. Mr. Spilsbury's book is a small one, and we will encroach upon him only to the extent of a short extract descriptive of the creation of the library:—

The original foundation of the Library of Lincoln's Inn is of earlier date than that of any now existing in the metropolis. In the thirteenth year of the reign of Henry VII. A.D 1497, "John Nethersale, late one of this society, bequeathed forty marks, partly towards the building of a library here for the benefit of the students of the laws of England, and partly that every priest of this house, in the celebration of divine service every Friday, should sing a mass of requiem, &c. for the soul of the said John." This building, the site of which is not now known, was finished in the 24th Henry VII. Previously to their removal to the edifice in which they are now commodiously arranged, the books occupied a suite of rooms in the Stone Building, to which they had been transferred in the year 1787 from the Old Square. There are various entries in the records of the society relating to the library in the reign of Elizabeth. It seems, however, that little progress was made in the accumulation of books; for at a Council held in 6th James I. A.D. 1608, "because the library was not well furnished with books, it was ordered that for the more speedy doing thereof, every one that should thenceforth be called to the Bench in this society should give twenty shillings towards the buying of books for the same library; and every one thenceforth called to the Bar, thirteen shillings and fourpence, all which sums to be paid to Mr. Matthew Hadde, who, for the better ordering of the said library was then made master thereof." Three years afterwards it was ordered that Mr. Hadde, thus constituted the first Master of the Library, an office now held in annual rotation by each bencher, "should buy and provide for the library 'Fleta' and such other old books and manuscripts of the law, and to cause those that be ill bound to be new bound." At a subsequent meeting it was ordered "that ten pounds should be paid by Mr. Hadde out of the money received from Sir William Sedley for copies of 'Corpus Juris Civilis,' in six volumes, and 'Corpus Juris Canonici,' in three volumes, and that he should cause them to be bound with bosses without chains, and pay the charges of binding out of that money. . . . The books are arranged on the shelves in classes, and on taking a survey of the library from the entrance near the east oriel window, the eye of the visitor may range over a vast collection of Treatises on every branch of English jurisprudence from the earliest period to the present day; then over the Reports of Cases argued in all the courts of law; and then over the voluminous collections of the Journals of the Houses of Parliament, and the Cases heard on Appeal before the House of Lords and the Privy Council, passing on to the volumes containing the Statutes of the Realm, Public, Local, and Private. On the opposite side of the room the observer may notice a goodly assemblage of the works of English and foreign divines, with editions of the Bible in various languages: the poets, historians, philosophers, and orators of Greece and Rome; dictionaries of various languages, and other philological works; the principal writers, ancient and modern, on English history and topography; foreign history; and a selection of works on civil and foreign law. In the upper gallery is ranged a collection of books on civil and foreign law, occupying nearly the whole of one side of the room; and on the opposite side of the gallery may be observed the more voluminous historical works, such as Grævius and Gronovius, Muratori, &c., with the Mémoires de l'Academie, and that monument of the wondrous extension of the Papal power and dominion, the Bullarium Romanum.

The Law Magazine. January 1874. Reeve and Turner.

THIS monthly publication has come out under the editorship of perhaps the most voluminous writer the Bar has ever known—Mr. W. F. Finlason. If we mistake not he is the author of every contribution to this number, which is equivalent to saying that it is full of interesting and instructive matter. His first article is introductory to his editorship, and treats of the Function and Influence of Legal Journalism. It is replete with the opinions of eminent men on the advantages of the study of the law, and the narrowing influences of practice. We are glad to see that our author has a high sense of the functions of legal journalism, but as we think, rather an exaggerated notion of the influence of legal literature. We extract some passages which are of general interest:—

A great concurrence of opinion, among lawyers and laymen, philosophers and statesmen, attest the fact that the mere practice of the law, apart from such general views and philosophic ideas, which belong to its study as a science, tends to narrow and dwarf, if not degrade the mind. Lord Bolingbroke observed this in one of the finest passages of his works, quoted by Lord Kames in one of those elegant and enlightened essays, in which he sought to stimulate to the philosophic study of law. The great commentator was fully aware of the truth of the remark, and made it the basis of his great work, destined to achieve in this country what had been effected in Scotland. And Blackstone pointed out that the mere practice of the law will not suffice even to qualify for the pursuit of the law as a profession; a great truth, which lies at the basis of all the generous efforts made in our own time for the promotion of legal education. Speaking of the practitioner, he says: "If practice be the whole he is taught, practice must also be the whole he will ever know; if he be uninstructed in the elements and first principles upon which the rule of practice is founded, the least variation from established precedents will only distract and bewilder him. Ità scripta est is the utmost his knowledge will arrive at; he must never aspire to form, and seldom expect to comprehend, any arguments drawn à priori from the spirit of laws and the natural foundations of Justice:" Comm. 1, 32. This description, unhappily, as Lord Mansfield had occasion to observe, has applied to judges as well as practitioners; and, indeed, it could not be otherwise, in a country in which the judicature are taken entirely from the ranks of the practitioners.

Mr. Finlason expresses the opinion, with which we cannot agree, that the jurisprudence of America, which in many respects is superior to our own, is due to legal journalism. He says (having quoted Story):—

It is impossible not to imagine that one great reason for this may have been the greater degree to which the discussion of legal questions in legal journals was carried on in America. There is this great advantage in discussions of this kind over forensic arguments that they are not one-sided, nor framed merely to obtain a particular decision, but entirely for the elucidation of a legal question without any other object in view, and without being biased by considerations of its result with reference to a particular case.

He goes on to say:—

The discussion of legal questions in the press is of the more importance from the character of our judiciary law, which, until affirmed by a supreme court, is not law, but only evidence of it, and open to argument. Mr. Burke observes of text books:—"With us doctrinal books had little or no authority, other than as they are supported by adjudged cases and reasons given from the Bench." But the same observation applies to judgments of the courts until confirmed by the highest tribunal. Until then they are themselves open to discussion, and if the particular case is not appealed, it is only in the press they can receive such discussion. In this country there is not a power in the court itself to appeal to the supreme tribunal, and if the suitor does not do so, the law may be in doubt for many years, especially in the case of a division of judicial opinion and fresh applications of it to important questions as they arise. And no one can fail to observe that from time to time such questions do arise, which greatly interest the community at large, and are fully within the scope of ordinary intelligence, especially of educated and thinking men. It would be easy to find immediate illustrations of this within the last few years, or even months, or weeks. The publication of law reports in the Times reports, by barristers competent to understand and to make intelligible legal questions, brings home daily to the minds of men the constant application of law to their affairs and their interest in civil and criminal law is, in consequence, constantly augmenting.

Further, he considers discussions in the legal press calculated to dissipate fallacies. He observes:—

There are, again, many fallacies current among the Profession which can only be dissipated by discussion in legal journals. For men much occupied in practice have not time to enter into these questions, and have a gregarious tendency to fall into grooves of thought, and follow each other in the use of received terms and phrases, which often embody the grossest fallacies. Such, for instance, is the common phrase as to "fusion of law and equity." Most members of the profession fancy that law and equity are somehow, because separate, opposed, and that somehow this opposition may be removed by fusion. Yet, as Lord Brougham pointed out long ago, law and equity are no more opposed than civil and criminal law, and can as little be fused. For, as Lord Brougham explained, on the same state of facts, and the same question, law and equity are identical. It must be so, for it is a fundamental principle of equity to follow law. Hence the equity can only differ from the law on a different state of facts or a different question from the legal one, and as a difference never can be obviated, therefore they can never be fused. . . . Innumerable other instances might be adduced of common fallacies among members of the profession, only to be dissipated by discussion in legal journals. There is a strange tendency in men to blind acceptance of current ideas, even though opposed to actual facts, daily within their observation, and yet not observed. So little, as Dugald Stewart says, do the mass of men observe out of the scope of their own daily avocations and ideas. Thus, most members of the profession suppose that all matters of fact are determined in courts of law by juries on oral evidence, and in courts of equity by judges upon written evidence. Yet in the same classes of cases, that is, cases relating to property, it is not too much to say that the matters of fact are rarely determined by a jury, and are generally, in courts of law as in courts of equity, determined by the judges upon written notes, or statements, of the evidence, either in the form of applications to review the verdict, or on reservations of the evidence, with power to the courts to draw inferences of fact; in other words, to decide questions of fact. And in courts of law, as in courts of equity, points of law are always, of necessity, decided on written notes of the evidence or statements of the facts, either upon points reserved or on special cases. It is only, for the most part, in classes of cases which arise out of torts, especially personal torts, which do not come into equity, that cases are really determined by the verdict of juries, and even in those cases the verdicts are reviewed by the judges on notes of the evidence. Innumerable other instances might be adduced, but these will suffice to show how questions may be elucidated and fallacies dissipated by discussion in legal journals.

And he concludes thus:—

If indeed the writer were asked more particularly to describe his object, he would say it would be to show the operation of a judicial system, in the administration of justice, and the formation of law, a subject of special importance at this time, when the attention of the country is likely for some years to be fixed on the gradual tranformation and reconstruction of our judicial system. The writer says "gradual," for it is the opinion of the most thoughtful and reflective minds that it will probably be twenty years before the great work is consummated. More than one of our most experienced statesmen have thrown out this prediction, and in all probability it is destined to be realized. During many years, at all events, the new judicial system will be in course of development, and it will be of paramount interest to watch its progress, operation, and results. And for this work the writer ventures to think he may have some special qualification. Thirty years in the profession—during the greater part of that period constantly in the courts—he has been for more than twenty years engaged in the study of our judicial system. It is twenty-one years ago since he first projected a work on the subject, and since he edited the first of the Common Law Procedure Acts. He also edited, in 1855 and 1860, the second and third of those Acts, and since then he has been continually in the courts, watching their operation, and engaged in preparing his work on the subject. Another way in which legal journalism may be of use in aiding both the students and practitioners of the profession is in the exposition of new statutes. There used to be an office in our Inns of Court, that of the Reader, which now exists only in name, but which used to be of some practical utility in giving readings of new statutes. Such were Callis's Readings on the Statutes of Trusts, and Bacon's Readings on the Statute of Uses. These readings were of course carefully prepared, and probably written; and they were originally read, because in ages anterior to the invention of printing, the oral lecture was the only possible mode of instructing students. But when lectures could be printed, it is manifest that they would be far more available and valuable for purposes of study and instruction in a printed form, and then they could be studied at leisure, with far more effect than by being once heard. Hence, probably it is, that the readings became obsolete, and though in our own day they have been revived by Bowyer and Phillimore, yet their learned productions had a permanent value only when printed and published.

This is a bold scheme, which we venture to think, to be carried out successfully, requires varied co-operation. Legal journalism may become too ambitious, and when it is more ambitious than the everyday wants of a profession require, it is apt to become useless. We shall look forward with some interest to see Mr. Finlason carry out his project.

There are four other papers on (1) recent changes in the Judicature; (2) illustrations of our judicial system; (3) Michaelmas Term and sittings; and (4) the case of the Virginius. For the benefit of the magazine we must repeat that we distinctly trace the same hand and style throughout, and we think this should not be made the rule.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

THE meeting of the Legal Practitioners' Society on Wednesday last, a report of which appears in another column, is certainly not without importance to the Profession, and indeed the public, and we feel sure that many statements made by members of both branches of the Profession present on the occasion will be read with some astonishment. Whatever may be the ultimate condition of this new law society, as we may call it, already it has somewhat altered its tactics. As we have before pointed out, if the course proposed to be adopted at the meeting on Wednesday is carried to a successful issue, it will certainly have rendered to the Profession and the public signal service, and we cannot but think that it will have the hearty support of all high-minded men in the Profession. The work which it proposes to undertake is, at all events in part, not the most agreeable; such, for instance, as enforcing payment of penalties, which are no doubt daily incurred by unqualified persons. Yet, while these statutory provisions, and no others, exist, they should be enforced; and those who contend that, as this is properly the work of the Incorporated Law Society, therefore this new society should not be formed to undertake it, should take the trouble to learn whether the council of the former society ever institute proceedings against unqualified persons. The letters from country solicitors read at the meeting are also interesting, as showing the feeling existing among them upon the subject of the relations between the two branches of the Profession. Some are for an amalgamation, whilst the majority—with whom we certainly agree—desire a modification of the present rules of the several Inns of Court affecting solicitors who desire to go to the Bar; and we are of opinion that if the deputation of members of the Legal Practitioners' Society, who it is proposed should wait on the Lord Chancellor, properly represent this and other questions intended to be submitted to his Lordship, they will receive from him a very favourable consideration, for his Lordship will be influenced especially by the merits of the case submitted to him rather than by the standing of the society. Too frequently those representative bodies who should be the first to move with a view to reform are often the last. As an illustration of which we may mention that, notwithstanding the oft-expressed views of the Lord Chancellor on the subject of legal education, and notwithstanding moreover the continued and continuing efforts of the Legal Education Association in the same direction, the Inns of Court have done very little with a view to meeting the demands of the public. We are glad to gather from the report of the meeting that the society is not established in any hostility to existing societies, but rather with a view of aiding them in their work and duties. We may say at once that if we thought for a moment there existed any spirit of hostility to the present governing bodies of the Profession, we should not give to the new society that support which, in so far as it has proceeded at present, it has a right to expect from us. There are hundreds of solicitors, both in town and country, who are not members of any law society; and surely if they are interested in the welfare of their Profession they should join the new society, if not, the more important, the older and more expensive one, the Incorporated Law Society.

WE extract the following from Gun's Index to Advertisements: "Having been frequently asked by correspondents abroad to furnish them with the name and address of a reliable firm of attorneys and counsellors at law in London, we have much pleasure in giving the following." (Here follows the name of a firm of solicitors in Gray's-inn.) "Who are also well acquainted with American law," says the paragraph in question. For the present we withhold the name of the firm, as we cannot think this quasi advertisement is consented to by the firm in question. From the same printed matter we extract the following in another part of the publication: "The fee to search for a will is 10 dollars, if the date of the testator's death can be given within two years, if not 20 dollars. These fees apply only to England," &c. This printed matter also has the following: "Richard Holt, Syracuse, N.Y. In cases where the assistance of a lawyer is necessary, I employ Messrs. ——, Gray's-inn, London, a well-known firm of high standing."

FRESH information comes to us which satisfies us that the use of spurious notices purporting to be issued from County Courts is largely on the increase by tradesmen, especially in the districts of the Metropolitan Courts, and we have received from a solicitor in Marlborough-street one of these forms, which is headed with the Royal coat of arms, and in large type with the words, "County Court. For the recovery of debts under £50 as per 20 & 21 Vict. c. 25, form No. 1 to C. Final notice." At the bottom of this notice in small type are printed numerous sections of County Court Acts, and finally as follows: "Rule 120 enacts that when a defendant makes default in payment of the whole amount awarded, execution may issue against his goods without leave of the court, and such execution shall be for the whole amount of the judgment and costs." Our correspondent assures us that many poor people are by means of such notices often induced to pay more than they really owe. This matter to which it is, and always will be until rectified, our duty to direct attention, does not fall short of a scandal on the administration of justice in the County Courts, and the legal societies will render signal service if they can secure legislation which will prevent a continuance of such an objectionable, if not a nefarious, practice.

THE Profession will be interested to observe that the Admiralty have in the Navy List for the current quarter distinguished (by printing in italics in the seniority, but not in the alphabetical list) the names of such naval officers of all ranks who have commuted their pensions. This step has no doubt been taken by their Lordships in the interests of the public, but it will also be of much assistance to solicitors who, when instructed by clients to proceed for the recovery of debts against naval officers have always had difficulty and trouble in ascertaining whether such officers had commuted or were in the receipt of pensions. Cases are within our knowledge in which clients of solicitors have been induced to give credit owing to the debtor's name appearing in the Navy List, while in fact such officer was not in receipt of any pay or pension, and, as far as any security to the creditor went, may just as well not have appeared in the list at all. This is a salutary measure of reform, which, whilst benefiting the general public, will be of much assistance to solicitors, especially those in seaport towns.

WE understand that the MASTER of the ROLLS has signified his intention to facilitate in every way in his power the transaction of business in his chambers. This is most important, for, no doubt, many ex parte applications are made in the Chancery Courts which can be as well and less expensively made in the Judges' chambers. We hope the VICE-CHANCELLORS will follow the good example of Sir GEORGE JESSEL.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

CONSTRUCTION OF AGREEMENT—EASEMENT—EXPRESS WORDS.—By an agreement made between J. G. and P. C. (under whom the respondent and appellent respectively claimed), it was agreed "that the dock between the wharves, on the eastern side of the line of separation, shall for ever remain open as it now stands; that is to say, that neither of them shall fill it up with wharves or other incumbrances, whereby the convenience of the same may be damaged to either party." Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the effect of this agreement was to create an easement that the dock should remain open as it then stood for the convenience of either party to use it as a dock; and that if it was intended that one party should have a more limited right therein than the other, such limited easement should have been created by express words: (Morton v. Snow, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 591. Priv. Co.)

PAYMENT OUT COURT—LAND TAX ACTS—REPAIR OF VICARAGE.—By s. 100 of 42 Geo. 3, c. 116, surplus stock in court arising from the sale of land for the redemption of land tax may be laid out in manors, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, to be settled and conveyed to like uses to those upon which the lands taken were settled. A petition by a vicar for the repayment to him out of the fund in court of money disbursed by him for repairs to the vicarage house, was dismissed as an unauthorised investment under the Act, decisions allowing such an investmnent under the Lands Clauses Act, not being held binding on the court in a case of this Act: (Re Vicar of Nether Stowey, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 604. Rolls.)

PRACTICE—TRANSFER OF CAUSE—CONCURRENT SUITS IN TWO BRANCHES OF THE COURT.—Where a bill was filed by the trustees of a deed, praying that the trusts of the deed might be carried into execution, and that they might be discharged and new trustees appointed if necessary, and another bill was filed in another branch of the court by the cestui que trust against the trustees, praying that the deed might be set aside or rectified, and that the trustees might be removed and the trusts of the deed might be carried into execution, if and so far as necessary, it was ordered that the second suit should be transferred to that branch of the court in which the first bill was filed: (Sayers v. Corrie; Corrie v. Sayers, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602. Chan.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—GRANT NOT VOID FOR UNCERTAINTY—PRESUMPTION.—Possession is adverse for the purpose of limitation when an actual possession is found to exist under circumstances which evince its incompatibility with a freehold in the claimant. A grant from the Crown of undefined and unascertained shares in land will not be held void for uncertainty after long modern possession, for in such a case a supplementary and confirmatory grant may be presumed. Doe dem. Devine v. Wilson (10 Moo. P. C. 502), followed. In a case in which the facts and law appear to be one way, their Lordships will make the presumptions which should properly be made by a jury, without sending the case down for a new trial: (Des Barres and another v. Shey, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 592. Priv. Co.)

CREDITORS' SUIT—DELAY IN PROVING WILL—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—A simple contract creditor of a testator, who died in 1857, filed a bill on the 1st Dec. 1870, for administration of the testator's estate. The testator, by his will, gave all his real and personal estate to his widow during widowhood, and appointed two of his children his executors. The will was retained by the widow, who refused to produce it, until compelled to do so by proceedings being taken against her in the Court of Probate, but she entered into possession of the testator's property, and regularly paid the interest on the amount due to the plaintiff until the 1st Feb. 1864, after which time no interest was paid. The will was not proved until the 27th Sept. 1870. Held, that the plaintiff's claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations: (Boatwright v. Boatwright, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603. Rolls.)

WILL—DIRECTION TO PAY DEBTS—NOTICE.—A testator by his will directed all his just debts to be paid, and in a subsequent part of his will devised certain freehold estates subject to the payment of all his just debts, &c. The devisee mortgaged the freehold estates, and applied the mortgage money for his own purposes, and afterwards became bankrupt. The executors of the will were not parties to the mortgage, but the mortgagee had no notice that the money was to be applied otherwise than for the payment of debts: Held (reversing the decision of Lord Romilly, M.R.), that the devise of the freehold estates charged with the payment of debts controlled the prior general charge of debts; that the devisee, and not the executor, was the proper person to raise the money to pay the debts, and that the mortgagee, having had no notice of the breach of trust, and being under no obligation to see to the application of the mortgage money, had a good title, and was entitled to priority over the testator's creditors: (Corser v. Cartwright, 29 L. T. Rep., N.S., 596. Chan.)

OBSTRUCTION TO TIDAL RIVER—NOTICE OF ACTION.—By a local Act the defendants were authorised to construct in conformity with certain deposited plans, "and upon the lands delineated upon the said plans," a pier or landing stage, "together with such other works and conveniences in connection therewith," as they should from time to time think fit. Before the landing stage was commenced plans of the proposed works were to be deposited at the Admiralty for approval. The local Act was to be executed "subject to the powers and provisions" of the Public Health Act 1848, sect. 139 of which requires notice of action "for anything done or intended to be done" under the provisions. The defendants deposited plans (differing in extension from the plans under the Act) which received the approval of the conservators of the river, representing the Admiralty, and constructed the landing stage in conformity therewith. The landing stage was a floating one, and was moored by anchors lying in the bed of the river. The position of the anchors was indicated by a buoy, which, being carried down by the tide, became concealed from view. One of the anchors becoming displaced, stove in and swamped a vessel of the plaintiffs which was lawfully navigating the river. Held (1), that the anchor, although placed where it was for the benefit of the public, was an obstruction which the defendants could not have created without statutory authority, and was a nuisance to the river; (2) that the defendants were guilty of negligence in their management of the buoy, but (3) that inasmuch as the plans had received the approval of the Admiralty, such approval was tantamount to the sanction of the Act, so as to entitle the defendants to statutory notice of action. Notice of action must be given in a case of nonfeasance, just as much as in a case of misfeasance. Per Denman J., Reg. v. Russell (6 B. & C. 566) is overruled by Reg. v. Ward (4 Ad. & E. 384.): Jolliffe and another v. Wallasey Local Board (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 582. C. P.

GUARANTEE—AGREEMENT BETWEEN GUARANTORS FOR EQUALITY OF LIABILITY—INSOLVENCY OF ONE GUARANTOR.—Five directors of a company gave their joint and several bond to a bank to secure repayment with interest of a loan made by the bank to a company. By an agreement made between five persons interested in the company of the first part, and the five directors of the second part, after reciting the bond, it was agreed that, in pursuance of an agreement made upon the treaty for the loan by the bank, the liability of the several persons, parties thereto of the second part, under the bond, should be borne and discharged by the ten several persons parties thereto respectively in equal shares and proportions, and that each of the several persons parties thereto, would indemnify the other nine against all actions, &c., in respect of the loan by the bank or in respect of the bond. The company was ordered to be wound-up, and the bank recovered judgment against the obligees of the bond for the whole amount of principal and interest due thereunder. One of the guarantors had become insolvent. On a bill by two of the guarantors, who had under the judgment paid more than their proportion of the sum secured by the bond against the other eight guarantors to enforce a rateable contribution from them in respect of the principal, interest, and costs recovered under the bond: Held (affirming the decision of Lord Romilly, M.R.) that all the solvent guarantors were liable to contribute rateably in respect of the whole amount recovered under the bond, and that the extra liability arising from the insolvency of one of the guaranrors was not to fall upon the defendants to the action at law. The bank made a further advance to the company upon the personal security of three of the directors. Five of the guarantors for the amount secured by the bond signed an agreement that they would join the three directors in guaranteeing repayment to the bank of the further advance in equal proportions with the three directors. One of the five who signed this agreement stated by his affidavit that his signature (if he did sign) was obtained "on the express engagement and understanding" that the agreement should be signed by all the guarantors for the sum secured by the bond: Held, that the words "express understanding" were utterly unmeaning, and that the court would never pay any attention to a statement that something was done on an express engagement, unless the engagement was spoken to in a manner which was admissible in evidence: (Dallas v. Walls, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599. Chan.)

OUR INVADERS.—The inclosed circular has recently been handed to me by a client in the country. If your attention has not been already called to it, I think its character will cause you and your readers some astonishment. For my own part I have not met with anything more impudent for a long time.—ADVISER.

29, Craven-street, Charing-cross, London.
Dec. 19th, 1873.

SIR,—We trust you will excuse us taking the liberty of forwarding you this letter, but having observed that a bill of sale is registered against you, and as such things are very often the commencement of trouble and inability to meet your creditors, we beg to suggest that if it should so occur that you are under any apprehension of being unable to meet your liabilities, that it will be well for you to consult a respectable solicitor, who will advise you as to the course to be pursued, and it is better to do this, before you get so far into difficulties as to render your case very difficult to arrange. A personal interview will not cost you anything, and our long practice with persons in embarrassed circumstances, enables us to suggest immediate relief and assistance and under the Act of 1869, without publicity and suspension of business.

Yours faithfully,
CARPENTER and VERNEUIL.

MAGISTRATES' LAW.

MAGISTRATES' CLERK'S FEES.

THE following is a report of a committee appointed by the Town Council of the Borough of Sheffield to prepare a new Table of Fees.

Your committee report that in pursuance of a resolution passed by the council on the 29th Oct., 1873, appointing them to prepare a New Table of Fees, to be taken by the clerk to the justices for this borough, for adoption by the council and confirmation by the Secretary of State, they have considered the table of fees submitted by the Home Office, and after carefully examining the same, and comparing it with the table of fees at present in force, beg to recommend the council to adopt the same, and to take the necessary steps for obtaining the approval of the Secretary of State for the Home Department thereto. A copy of the table of fees is annexed to this report.

Your committee think it their duty further to state that on the 9th day of January, 1850, a committee was appointed by the council to report upon the subject of the fees payable to the clerk to the justices, and on the 26th March, 1850, the council adopted the table of fees now in force, which were then considered to be on a more reduced scale, as a whole, than had been sanctioned in any other borough.

Afterwards the council considered it desirable that the clerk to the justices should be paid by salary in lieu of fees, and on the 14th January, 1852, they passed the following resolution :—

"Resolved: That in the opinion of this council it would be desirable, and they hereby, in pursuance of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, recommend to Her Majesty's Secretary of State, that the clerk to the justices of the peace for this borough be paid by salary in lieu of fees and other payments, and that a salary of £800 per year should be paid to Mr. Albert Smith, the present clerk (he thereout defraying the expenses of clerks, printing, stationery, and all other expenses incidental to the office.)"

Mr. Albert Smith was requested to make a return of receipts and expenditure for the years 1850 and 1851, and the following results were obtained from the return furnished by Mr. Smith in compliance with such request :—

Upon the resolution of the council being submitted to the magistrates, they declined to approve of the recommendation.

The question although at that time apparently settled was not really so, for complaints were from time to time made in the council and other public places of the excessive amount the clerk was receiving for the work done.

Sheffield was not the only place where this system was found to exist. The question had for some years been agitated in other large towns in England.

A Parliamentary Commission was appointed in 1858, and evidence taken upon the subject, the whole tenor of which was that it was desirable to pay magistrates' clerks by salary rather than by fees. Since that time most of the large towns have adopted the principle of payment by salary instead of fees: Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Leeds, Bristol, and Newcastle being amongst the earliest to carry out that improvement, and Sheffield is about the only large town that has not done so.

On the 12th February, 1873, the council passed a resolution recommending that the clerk to the borough justices should be paid by salary, in lieu of fees. The following is a copy of the resolution:—

"Resolved—That in the opinion of this council, the clerk to the justices of the borough of Sheffield should be paid by salary, in lieu of fees and other payments, and that a salary of £2000 per annum be paid to Mr. Albert Smith, the present clerk, he thereout defraying the expenses of clerks, printing, stationery, and all other expenses incidental to the office. That a copy of this resolution be laid by the mayor before the justices of the borough of Sheffield, for their consideration and approval, and that subject thereto another copy of the said resolution be forwarded by the mayor to Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, for his approval."

The above resolution was laid before the borough justices on the 13th March 1873, and the following resolution was passed by them approving of the recommendation:—

"Resolved: That this meeting, after mature consideration, approves of the recommendations contained in the resolution of the town council now read, and that the mayor be requested to certify the same to the Secretary of State, and inform the council of the approval by this meeting."

The resolutions also received the approval of Mr. Albert Smith.

The mayor forwarded the resolutions of the council and the justices to the Home Secretary, who requested that a statement showing the average amount of fees received by the clerk during the last five years should be furnished to him, and Mr. Smith made the following return:

Your committee find that the average net income of Mr. Smith for that period has been at least £2000 per annum.

On the 6th May 1873, the Home Secretary transmitted to the council a new table of fees, which had been prepared by the Examiners of Criminal Law Accounts, and recommended the same for adoption by the council, in the place of the table of fees in force, a copy of which had been forwarded to him at his request.

Unfortunately, Mr. Smith was taken ill, and Mr. Thorpe, his chief clerk, having died, Mr. Smith resigned the office of magistrates' clerk, and the council were compelled to begin again de novo.

On the 13th Oct. last the council appointed a deputation to confer with the Home Secretary in reference to the correspondence which had taken place relative to the new table of fees, and that deputation had an interview with Mr. Winterbotham, the Under Secretary of State, and conferred with him on the subject of the resolution passed by the council on the 12th Feb. last, and also to the new table of fees to be made by the council and as to the salary to be paid to the clerk to be appointed in the place of Mr. Albert Smith, who had resigned the office; when Mr. Winterbotham informed them that he should be glad to receive and suggestion from the council as to the proposed new table of fees, and would be prepared to consider and sanction any reasonable recommendation which the council might make as to the amount of salary to be paid to the clerk. Mr. Winterbotham considered that £1800 per annum would be ample remuneration for the duties the clerk had to perform, including payment of clerks and office expenses, and he had no hesitation in saying that the Home Office would sanction such remuneration.

On the 29th Oct. 1873, the council passed the following resolution:—

"Resolved: That in pursuance of the 14 and 15 Vict. cap. 55, this council recommends to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, that the clerk to the justices of the peace for this borough be paid by salary in lieu of fees and other payments, and that a salary of £1800 per annum be paid to the clerk to be appointed in the place of Mr. Albert Smith, who has resigned such office, provided that the clerk devotes his whole time to the duties of his office, and defrays the expenses of clerks, printing, stationery, and all other expenses incidental to his office."

The resolution was forwarded to the Home Secretary, who stated that finding, from communications which had been made to him from the Sheffield borough justices, that they and the town council were not agreed upon the recommendation of the town council, and considering all the circumstances of the case, he was of opinion that he would not be giving effect to the provisions of the 9th section of the Act 14 and 15 Vict. cap. 55, if he made an order upon such recommendation, until he had been satisfied that the justices approved of it.

The mayor laid before a meeting of the borough justices, convened for that purpose, and held on the 21st Nov. last, a copy of the resolution passed by the council on the 29th Oct. 1873.

The justices present were: Joseph Hallam, Esq., mayor; John Fairburn, Esq., ex-mayor; J. E. Davis, Esq, Sir John Brown, Henry E. Hoole, Esq., William Fisher, Esq., Edward Vickers, Esq., Mark Firth, Esq., and W. K. Peace, Esq.

The resolution having been read, it was proposed by Sir John Brown, and seconded by Mr. H. E. Hoole, and resolved—

"That the justices of the said borough at this meeting disapprove of the recommendation contained in the said resolution of the said town council."

Proposed by Sir John Brown, seconded by Mr. William Fisher, and resolved—

"That the justices present at this meeting wish to place upon record the following summary of the grounds of their disapproval of the resolution of the town council. First: That none of the evils which under some circumstances attend upon and outweigh the advantages of payment of magistrates clerks by fees have hitherto existed in Sheffield, and the only reason avowed by the town council for effecting a change is the desire to appropriate a portion of the fees for the purpose of increasing the borough fund. To sanction any such attempt appears to the justices to involve a direct infringement of the doctrine emphatically laid down by the present and late Secretaries of State that such an application of fees involves a public scandal; and that if the fees are more than sufficient for the purpose of remunerating the clerk, they should be reduced. Further, the justices, for whose assistance the clerk is appointed, have no means of increasing a salary once fixed, in case they should find that the duties or expenses of his office are increased (and with an increasing population they must increase); so also a fixed salary must operate as a bar to the advancement of subordinate clerks—a point of very considerable importance in the efficience of all administrative duties; moreover, the payment of a fixed salary instead of fees leaves unprovided for a considerable amount of labour and expenditure connected with the police office, heretofore defrayed by the clerk, although not incidental to the discharge of his strict duties. Secondly, that the amount of salary recommended by the council is inadequate, considering the numerous staff of skilled and experienced clerks required to attend on two courts, and in the clerk's office concurrently, and the large expenditure for payment of printers, stationery, books, and other matters. Thirdly, that apart from the above reasons influencing the justices in withholding their approval, the resolution of the town council is in its terms objectionable if not bad on its face. The town council have no power to make any recommendation conditional on the clerk devoting the whole of his time to the performance of the duties of his office, that being a matter entirely for the justices to determine. Neither can the town council make any stipulation as to what expenses shall be defrayed by the clerk. All that a town council can do is simply to recommend that a certain sum shall be paid instead of fees. If that recommendation is adopted by the justices and by the Secretary of State, the Act of Parliament defines for what duties the salary is to be received. It cannot be for anything more or for anything less."

Your committee deeply regret that the magistrates should have thought it necessary to retire from the principle they had laid down, as to the desirability of paying their clerk by salary rather than by fees, as it must be admitted by all that the remuneration which the new clerk will receive will be out of all proportion to the work he has to do. In order that the council and the public may be properly informed upon this head, Mr. Jackson, the chief constable, at the request of your committee, has carefully prepared an estimate of the fees that would be received by a clerk, assuming that the clerk took all the fees to which he is entitled—that estimate is based upon the quantity of business actually done in 1871; and from it your committee find that the total amount of fees that would be received under the table of fees now in force will be £3616 10s. 6d., and under the new table £3123 16s., showing a difference of £492 14s. 6d.

The fees increase year by year, and it may be estimated that in twenty years time the income from fees will amount to £5000 per annum, at the least.

Your committee have ascertained that at Birmingham the two clerks to the magistrates are paid by salary, and are allowed £2100 per annum, which sum includes the cost of clerks, stationery, &c. At Leeds, the clerk is also paid by salary and receives £1500 per annum, which sum includes the cost of clerks; the corporation provides stationery, &c.

The fees in those boroughs are paid into the borough fund, and the surplus of the amount of fees over the salary of the justices' clerk relieves the rates to that extent; and it is, in the judgment of your committee, far more to the interest of the public, and much less of a scandal, that funds should fructify in the pockets of the ratepayers, than be handed over to public servants in amounts greatly out of proportion to the value of their services.

But this excessive remuneration is not the only evil attendant upon payment by fees, for such system has a very serious effect on the administration of justice; it frequently happens that the merits of a case would be met by a nominal fine, but then the consideration of the clerk's perquisites in the shape of fees obtrudes itself. The magistrate is often influenced by that consideration, and the general good is perverted by the question of fees or costs in which the interest of the clerk predominates. "Discharged on payment of costs" is naturally a conclusion which would relieve the defendant from any liability but for the clerk's vested right; but its real reading is "discharged so far as the interest of order, justice, and morality are concerned, but you must settle with the clerk, whose interests and those of public policy are conflicting and incompatible."

Your committee can only express again their great regret that such a favourable opportunity of effecting so desirable a change should be lost. It is continuing a practice that has been universally condemned and abandoned whenever an opportunity presented itself: however, the council and the public will see from this report that the entire responsibility of perpetuating this most pernicious state of things rests solely upon the borough justices and not upon the council.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

THE LANDS CLAUSES ACT.

AT a meeting of the Institution of Surveyors, held last Monday evening at its rooms, Great George-street, Westminster, Mr. F. A. Philbrick, read an important paper on "The Lands' Clauses Consolidation Act, with some suggestions for their amendment."

In the course of his remarks he said that the Lands' Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, with the amended Acts of 1860 and 1869, presented a tolerably complete code of law on the subject. It was formerly held that no subject could be compelled to part with his property; but as the wealth of the country increased, and the population also, the wants of the community became greater, and hence it was necessary for Parliament to grant compulsory powers for the taking of land for building, railway, and other purposes. The earliest Act of this character was the New River Act of 1605, which was framed for the purpose of bringing a free stream of running water to the northern part of London. The necessities arising for the making of streets, roadways, docks, and other works of an important public nature, specifics for these objects were sought for and obtained through Parliament; and these applications had been of late years very numerous, especially towards the latter part of the last century. The Lands Clauses Act was pretty general in its provisions. The power of purchase by agreement was expressly limited to those lands which were authorised to be taken. The taking of land involved the purchase, though the purchase of the land might involve damage or injury to the former owner of the land who required compensation. The Act had to deal with various intricate and involved points; they had to consider positive law, or law laid down by enactment. Obviously, therefore, they should know exactly what they intended to effect, so as to be clearly understood, and to devise proper machinery to the results desired to be attained. It was very necessary that the principles of compensation should be clearly laid down. The purchase of the real estate involved, amongst other things, (1) parties able and competent to contract, and (2) the price to be paid. With regard to the fixing of the price, there were lands of such value that it was impossible to fix a price so as to tempt the owner; but the law was a fixed principle in all cases, though it should be borne in mind that hard cases made bad law. With regard to the Statute of 1845, he objected to the careless manner in which the Legislature had framed the Act, giving rise as it did to so many contentions. Speaking of the question of arbitrations, he thought that it was a useless formality for an arbitrator to make a declaration before proceeding to award. The question, too, of the taxation of costs involved many difficulties which, he trusted, would be taken into account, causing as it did great inconvenience. But when the different clauses were framed, they were not so well understood as they were at present. He would suggest the amendment of the 47th section of the Act, which referred to the jury proceedings. He would also advocate the creation of a court which should be presided over by judges and subject to a high court of appeal, which court should be charged with the duty of deciding all things arising out of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; the funds would, he thought, be easily obtainable by all claimants paying a certain percentage towards it, which money, he was of opinion, would be well spent and would effect a great saving. In conclusion, he said that the Act had now been in operation for many years, and under it property to the value of millions had changed hands under compensation for damages, and he trusted that while venturing to suggest some amendments of the Act, the main principles of it would receive the consideration which their practical utility and good work demanded.

Mr. Clark briefly proposed a vote of thanks to the reader of the paper.

Mr. Ryde, in seconding the proposition, said that with regard to the amendment of the Lands Clauses Act two important suggestions had been thrown out by Mr. Philbrick. In the first place he advocated that the law should be amended, so as to give the opportunity of first contesting the right of the land to compensation before proceeding to the amount of compensation. To any such view he (the speaker) would have the greatest objection; and whether in the interest of companies or not, nothing should be done to increase the hardship upon the claimant. If the law were amended, it would give to the company, not prepared to pay the money, opportunity for delay, which some companies would be certain to avail themselves of. This was one question, of which the judgment of the institution would be serviceable. The other important alteration was that there should be a court of appeal. It was very desirable that mistakes of all kinds should be corrected, but were there after all many mistakes made? They must not cavil at the judgment; and taking a broad view, when the companies took a proper course, were there any mistakes made, and did many companies pay on the whole very much more than they ought to pay? The great objection would be that more litigation than was necessary would consequently take place; and a company, not liking a decision, would appeal against it, and the matter would go on till all the money would be spent in litigation. One of the clauses of the amended Act of 1869, which dealt with the question of costs, did nobody any good, he thought, and injured companies more than anybody else. Arbitrators considered, according to this clause, that their clients would have to pay the costs of the action if they did not recover from the company, and so the objectionable clause was bad in principle, and was a miserable failure, and it urgently required amendment.

Mr. Philbrick explained that it was never his intention to suggest that any alteration of the system should be effected when once the amount of compensation was fixed, but as to errors of principle he intended his remarks to apply.

On the motion of Mr. Ryde, the further discussion of the paper was adjourned till the 19th inst., and the proceedings then terminated.

EUROPEAN ASSURANCE ARBITRATION.

(Before LORD ROMILLY.)

THE ANGLO-AUSTRALIAN COMPANY'S CASE.

Rights of Companies inter se—Liability to indemnify—Limitation—Deed of Settlement.

THE question in this case was whether the liability of the British Provident Life and Fire Assurance Society to indemnify the Anglo-Australian and Universal Family Life Assurance Company was limited or unlimited. These two companies were registered and incorporated under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. In 1858 the Anglo-Australian Company transferred its business to the British Provident Society. This transfer was carried out by means of an amalgamation deed, dated the 1st June 1858, and another deed of the 28th Oct. 1858, whereby the whole of the property of the Anglo-Australian Company was assigned to the British Provident Society. The former deed contained a covenant by the British Provident Society that the shareholders of the Anglo-Australian Company should, out of the funds and property of the British Provident Society, be absolutely held harmless, and indemnified against all liabilities in respect of the Anglo-Australian Company by reason of their execution, as shareholders, of that company's deed of settlement. Some time after a shareholder of the Anglo-Australian Company presented a petition to the Court of Chancery for winding-up the company, but Kindersley, V.C. dismissed the petition with costs on the 20th Jan. 1860, one of the grounds for his decision being that the British Provident Society would, under the deed of the 1st June 1858, have to pay all the debts of the Anglo-Australian Company in exoneration of the shareholders of that company. In June 1860, the Anglo-Australian Company filed a bill against the British Provident Society, praying that that society might be compelled to perform specifically their contract of indemnity contained in the deed of the 1st

June 1858, and to pay the debts of the Anglo-Australian Company. In June 1861, the British Provident Society filed a cross bill against the Anglo-Australian Company, praying that it might be declared that the deed was obtained by fraud and misrepresentation, and that it should be delivered up to be cancelled. On the 13th Jan. 1862, Stuart, V.C. made a decree that the British Provident Society was bound, according to the terms of the deed of the 1st June 1858, out of the funds and property of the British Provident Society, absolutely to hold harmless and to indemnify the Anglo-Australian Company against all liabilities. The decision was subsequently confirmed on appeal by Lord Chancellor Westbury. On the 22nd April 1864, on the petition of persons claiming to be creditors of the British Provident Society, Kindersley, V.C. declared that the Anglo-Australian Company was entitled to stand as a creditor of the British Provident Society in respect of the debts undertaken by the deed of the 1st June 1858. In pursuance of this order, the whole of the liabilities of the Anglo-Australian Company were paid by the British Provident Society, except those on certain policies contained in the schedule of the deed of amalgamation. Mr. Harman and Mr. Pratt held two of these policies and were declared by Lord Westbury in June last to be entitled to prove on their policies against the Anglo-Australian Company. This company now applied that the British Provident Society might be ordered to pay Messrs. Harman and Pratt the claims they had on the Anglo-Australian Company. The case was heard on the 3rd Dec. In the argument, Shebbeare appeared for the Anglo-Australian Company and contended that these claims must be paid in full by the British Provident Society, inasmuch as they had in express terms covenanted to indemnify the Anglo-Australian Company absolately.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Montague Cookson appeared for the official liquidator of the British Provident Society. They did not dispute the liability under the covenant, but contended that the terms of the British Provident Society's deed of settlement were such as to limit the liability of the shareholders to the subscribed capital of the company; and that, consequently, it was not competent for the directors to cast upon the shareholders an unlimited liability in respect of the indemnity of the deed of the 1st June 1858. Reference was made to the following cases, in which the liability was held to be limited: Re Indemnity Claims (Reilly's Alb. Rep., p. 17; 15 L. J. 141); Re British Nation Indemnity Claims (Reilly's Europ. Rep. 3; Law Times' European Reports, p. 4).

Lord ROMILLY delivered judgment. After stating the facts of the case, his Lordship said that Lord Cairns's decision in the former of these two cases turned upon the terms of the contract, and all his argument tended to show that in this case his decision would have compelled the British Provident Society to pay the liabilities on the policies of Messrs. Harman and Pratt. Moreover, there was an express decision to this effect by Stuart, V.C., and confirmed on appeal by Lord Chancellor Westbury. Lord Cairns's decision was grounded on the fact that there was not in the case before him any power to amalgamate, and that the directors acted ultra vires when they attempted to alter the fundamental principle of the original deed of settlement by giving to the directors a new authority to cast on the shareholders a liability exceeding that which would arise from the amount subscribed on the original shares. The cases before Sir John Stuart, Sir Richard Kindersley, Lord Cairns, and Lord Westbury all substantially pointed in the same direction, and tended to show that the liability of the British Provident Society under the deed of the 1st June, 1858, was an unconditional liability not limited to the subscribed capital of the company.

CHATTERIS'S CASE.

Contributory—Amalgamated companies—Release of shareholder of amalgamated company.

THIS case involves the curious question as to whether, in the British Commercial Insurance Company, which has been ordered to be wound-up, there shall be more than one contributory—viz., one of the amalgamated companies, the British Nation Life Assurance Association. The British Commercial Company was established under a deed of settlement, dated the 1st May 1821. This deed contained no provision enabling the company to transfer its business to, or to amalgamate with another company. It contained various provisions prescribing the method of transferring shares from one proprietor to another. Subsequently an Act of Parliament was passed enabling individual partners in the company to transfer their shares, and providing that on every transfer of shares a memorial thereof should be enrolled in Chancery within three months, and that until such memorial were enrolled the transferor should continue liable to all judgments and executions. In 1859 negotiations were commenced for transferring the business of the British Commercial Company to the British Nation Life Assurance Association. This association had power to take a transfer of, or to purchase, or to acquire the business of any other companies of a similar nature, upon such terms as might be thought fit. The negotiations for the transfer were commenced by a letter sent by the secretary of the British Nation Association to the directors of the British Commercial Company, proposing a "union of the business" of the two companies upon certain terms, one of which was "that the shareholders of the British Commercial should be paid off at the rate of 25s. per share, and their shares transferred." This proposal was subsequently approved by extraordinary general meetings of both companies. The arrangement was carried out in this way: By a deed dated the 8th Feb. 1860, a large number of the shareholders covenanted with Messrs. Bemingham and Lake to transfer their shares into their names or into the names of their nominees, and in the meantime to hold the shares in trust for Messrs. Bemingham and Lake. A very large number of shareholders executed this deed, and subsequently transferred their shares. A few neither executed the deed nor transferred their shares. By a deed dated the 7th June 1860 Messrs. Bemingham and Lake declared themselves to be trustees of all shares transferred to them for the British Nation Association. Finally, by a deed dated the 31st Dec. 1864, after reciting inter alia that the shares transferred into the names of Messrs. Bemingham and Lake were all the shares of the British Commercial Company except some few shares, the owners of which were unknown, it was witnessed that the holders of 11,880 shares (out of 12,000 shares) transferred them to the British Nation Association "to the intent that the British Commercial Company and the capital and business thereof might thenceforth be amalgamated and merged in the British Nation Association." Mr. Chatteris held five shares in the British Commercial Company, and on the 7th March 1860 he executed the deed of the 8th Feb. 1860 in respect of his shares. Nothing further was done by him. He never received any consideration in respect of his shares. In 1872 an order was made to wind-up the British Commercial Company, and the official liquidators now applied to have Mr. Chatteris's name placed on the list of contributories.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., contended at some length that to free Mr. Chatteris from all liability would be in effect to undo the decision of Lord Westbury in Blundell's Case (L. T. Eur. Rep. 39). It was true that Mr. Rivington had been freed from all liability (Rivington's Case, L. T. Eur. Rep. 57), but that case differed from this in several important particulars. Here there was no transfer of the shares, and consequently no enrolment. Mr. Chatteris still appears as a shareholder in the last enrolled memorial. Moreover he never received any consideration in respect of his shares. All he did was to execute the deed.

F. C. J. Millar appeared for Mr. Chatteris, and contended that the case was governed by Rivington's case, where Lord Westbury laid it down that the formalities of transfer were necessary only in the case of a going company, and that the transaction between the two companies was not ultra vires, and after this lapse of time could only be disturbed as a whole, not by fragments.

After hearing Higgins in reply,

Lord ROMILLY reserved judgment.

COUNTY COURTS.

MANCHESTER COUNTY COURT.

Tuesday, Jan. 6, 1874.

(Before J. A. RUSSELL, Q.C., Judge.)

M'GOVERN v. HINKEY.

Married Women's Property Act—Liability of married woman to be sued.

H., a married woman, carried on business at S., apart from her husband, and received no assistance from him. The property acquired in the business so carried on was admitted to be her separate property, under the first section of the Married Women's Property Act. She was sued for a balance of money due for goods supplied to her in the way of her trade.

Held, that the 11th section of the Act does not impose a liability to be sued, but only enables a married woman to maintain an action in her own name to recover earnings or other property declared by the Act to be her separate property.

W. Mann, solicitor for the plaintiff.

Smith, solicitor for the defendant.

The plaintiff, John M'Govern, haberdasher, Union-street, Manchester, sued the defendant, Margaret Hinkey, draper, 95, Lord-street, Southport, for a sum of £15 12s., the balance of a debt of £35, which she had contracted with the plaintiff, and the remainder of which she had paid in instalments.

W. Mann, who appeared for the plaintiff, said the defendant was a married women, living apart from her husband, supporting and maintaining herself by her own industry, and receiving no assistance from her husband, whom she had not seen for five years. The question which would arise in the case was whether she was liable for debts apart from her husband. She was carrying on a separate business of her own in Southport, and he might take it that she was carrying on that business in accordance with the first section of the Married Women's Property Act, and that all the property which she had become entitled to since she had been carrying on the business separately would be her separate property, held for her separate use, independently of her husband. She was therefore, clearly possessed of property independently of her husband, and the 11th section of the Married Woman's Property Act gave her the power to sue for any debts that might be owing to her in respect of that property. There was certainly no section in the Act imposing on a wife a liability to be sued in her own name, but he suggested that the fact of the Act having vested property separately in her and given her the exclusive control over it, implied a liability in her to pay debts in respect of that property or the business by which she acquired it. Taking it as a matter of contract, he contended that the fact of a husband allowing a wife to carry on business separate and apart from him impliedly conferred upon her a power to contract debts in her own name. It was clear that in equity a married woman might bind her separate estate by a contract, and it was a question whether she had not power to do so by law. This property in her business was vested in the defendant, and it was only a reasonable inference that a wife should be enabled to bind her separate estate by a contract.

Smith (of the firm of Smith and Boyer) argued that as far as the Married Women's Property Act was concerned, there was no implied liability such as that contended for, because if there had been any intention to set aside a long-established principle of law, there would have been an expressed provision to that effect. There was no question of separate estate in this case, and no pretence that the wife had pledged her separate estate.

His HONOUR said he was not aware that this question had ever been raised before. The defendant was a married woman, living separately from her husband and carrying on business separately from him, and the goods in respect of which she was sued were goods supplied to her in the way of her trade. Certain payments had been made on account of those goods, and she was now sued for the balance remaining due. In answer to the claim the defendant set up the plea of coverture, and the question was whether that plea was a good defence. It was perfectly clear that in common law it would be a good defence for a married woman had no power to contract such a debt as that in question by the common law. But it was suggested that under the Married Women's Property Act, sects. 1 and 11, the liability contended for in the present case was imposed upon a married women, not expressly, but by implication. From the language of the 1st section it struck him that it was clearly enabling. It gave a married woman the power to acquire property for her separate use, and it did not impose any liability on her that she was not subject to before. By the 11th section a married woman was empowered to maintain an action in her own name to recover earnings or other property declared by the Act to be her separate property. That was clearly an enabling enactment, and such being the case the question was whether he was to infer that not only had this ability been created, but that a liability had been likewise imposed. Inasmuch as the statute did not impose any liability in respect to the property mentioned in sects. 1 and 11, the liability of the woman stood just as it did at common law. But did not the statute itself show that, in expressly making her, in sect. 12, liable in respect to debts contracted before marriage. He could not, therefore, go beyond the letter or the spirit of the Act, which was clearly enabling to a woman, but not rendering her subject to any liability except such as was expressly imposed upon her. He thought the liability of the defendant stood just as it did in common law, and she was not, therefore, liable in this action. He dismissed the case.

Smith, on behalf of the defendant, applied for costs, which were granted.

MIDDLE TEMPLE HALL.—Mr. Watts, R.A., has been engaged by the Benchers to paint the portrait of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, which is to be placed in the Hall, with the consent of the Prince, who has complied with the request of the Benchers that his portrait should be painted for this ancient society.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

EVIDENCE—UNSTAMPED LETTER, OR ORDER FOR PAYMENT OF MONEY—WHETHER ADMISSIBLE—THE STAMP ACT 1870, ss. 16, 48, 54.—A letter or order directing the payment of a sum of money out of a particular fund is a bill of exchange within the meaning of ss. 16 and 48 of the Stamp Act 1870, and as such will not be received in evidence unless it has been properly stamped at the time of the making thereof: (Ex parte Shellard; Re Adams and Kirby, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 621. Bank.)

SHARES—ASSIGNMENT OF—DECLARATION OF TRUST—ORDER AND DISPOSITION—CHOSE IN ACTION—THE BANKRUPTCY ACT 1869, s. 15, SUBSECT. 5.—A. was the registered owner of certain railway shares, which had been deposited with him by B. as security for advances. B. assigned the shares, subject to A.'s charge, by way of declaration of trust to C. for value. On B.'s bankruptcy, C. claimed the shares as his property, subject to the lien of A., but the registrar of the County Court decided against him. On appeal: Held (reversing the decision of the registrar) that the shares were not in the order and disposition of B., and that he held them in trust for C.: (Ex parte Barry; Re Fox, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 620. Bank.)

BILL OF EXCHANGE—POSTING IN LETTER ADDRESSED TO INDORSEE—ATTEMPTED STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU—RULES OF FRENCH POST OFFICE.—The rules of the French post office allow a person who has posted a letter to have it returned to him at any time before it has been dispatched from the office where it was posted, upon satisfying the functionaries that he is the person who posted the letter. C. posted at Lyons a letter, addressed to D. of London, containing certain bills of exchange on London, indorsed to D. On the same day C. received a telegram from D., stating that a foreign bill in exchange for which the bills on London were sent would be dishonoured, and requesting him not to remit. C. thereupon sent his clerk to the Lyons post office, from which the letter had not yet been dispatched, to reclaim the letter, but through the clerk's mistake the requisite formalities were not complied with, and the letter was dispatched and reached D. in due course. The day after he received the letter D. filed a petition for liquidation, and the bills of exchange contained in the letter came into the hands of the trustee in the liquidation. Held, that owing to the rules of the French post office, the property in the bills would not pass till the letter containing them was dispatched from the office where it was posted; and that as C. had with D.'s assent made a bonâ fide attempt to recover possession of the bills before the letter was dispatched from the post office, the property in the bills did not pass to D., and C. was entitled to have them delivered up to him: (Ex parte Cote; Re Devese, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 598. Ch.)

LEGAL NEWS.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL ON PRIMOGENITURE, ENTAIL, AND LAND LAW REFORM.

IN the course of his speech at the Oxford Druids' dinner, last week, Sir Wm. Harcourt said: Before going to the main question, let me dispose of a few minor points. First, there is what is called the Law of Primogeniture. (Hear.) That is a big word, but it is not a large affair. To alter it would neither effect such changes as some fear, nor would it operate at all to the extent which some hope. I don't know that any one wishes—I am sure I do not—to prevent any man from disposing of his own property at his death as he pleases. The right to do this is one of the greatest stimulants to industry and prudence—things in which society is deeply interested. (Hear, hear.) As you will presently see, what I desire is to make the right still more absolute than it already is. But when a man is unwise enough to die intestate the law, in the case of his goods, makes for him such a will as a just and fair man might be expected to make. In the case of land, on the contrary, the law makes a will which no conscientious man in his sound mind would make. It accumulates on one child the whole of the estate, without regard to the interests of those for whom any good man would feel bound to provide. Surely, to reform such a state of the law would be a just and a wise policy. (Cheers.) It need not lead to subdivision, for in the case of small properties the estate might be sold for the benefit of all. Well, then, as to the transfer of land, every one agrees that the present system of conveyancing and charging is costly, dilatory, and vexatious. (Cheers.) Who objects to an amendment of that state of things? (Cheers.) Not, I suppose, the proprietary class. (Hear, hear.) Every one who buys or sells, I imagine, wishes to get as much as he can, and to pay as little as he can help. (Hear, hear.) I imagine that there are few vendors or purchasers actuated by the laudable desire to give a larger slice than they can help to their legal advisers. (A laugh.) If there be any such benevolent people, I fear they are already in Littlemore Asylum, or are soon going there. (A laugh.) I know I am treading on dangerous ground; but still I will venture to affirm that if a reform of this character is opposed, it will not be by the landed interest, but by a class of man far more influential than Solicitors-General — I mean solicitors in particular. (Hear, and a laugh.) But these things are only the fringes of a great question; there remains behind a far more material topic. I hear very frequent denunciations of what is called the feudalism of the land laws. I am bound to tell you that that is not an accurate description. With a few exceptions, to some of which I have adverted, the laws which govern the devolution of land are very much the same as those which affect other kinds of property. But that does not settle the question. If a man misuses a large personal estate, he alone is the worse for it. If he ruins a great landed estate, he damages hundreds of people who reside upon and are dependent upon it. That is in itself a reason why the law which allows the limitation of the one should not allow the same extent of limitation in the other. Every one, I imagine, is agreed that the great want in the case of land is the want of more capital applied to the cultivation of the soil. (Hear.) In the present state of agricultural science capital can be applied with far more advantage than formerly. In order to its proper development a capital twice or perhaps three times greater than that usually invested is necessary and profitable. It is only by an increase of capital that we can increase that fund which will yield a larger rent to the owner, a larger profit to the farmer, larger wages to the labourer, and which at the same time will give more abundant and cheaper food to the public. (Cheers.) Surely that is not a dangerous or mischievous object! (Cheers.) Now, is there anything in the present state of the law which discourages the application of such an increased capital to the soil? It cannot be disputed for a moment that the law of entail, in spite of all the measures that have been taken to mitigate its effect, is still a hindrance to the application of capital to the land. Nobody knows that better than the members of the House of Lords. Their report states the case very fairly. They say, "The case for parliamentary consideration lies in this, that the improvement of land in its effect on the price of food and on the dwellings of the poor is a matter of public interest, but as an investment it is not sufficiently lucrative to offer much attraction to capital, and that, therefore, even slight difficulties have a powerful influence in arresting it." What are the slight difficulties which have this powerful and baneful influence? Why, the Lords admit that it is the limited ownership created by the law of entail, and they proceed to deal with it on that footing. My only wonder is that, having understood so clearly the evil, the remedy they offer is so little adequate to the disease. It is quite true that in great families, like the Devonshires, the Sutherlands, the Bedfords, and the Leicesters, the margin is so large that the pinch is not felt. It is in the moderate estates, which form the bulk of the land in England, that the evil reveals itself. (Hear hear.) A tenant for life is in possession of an estate say of £5000 a year, his income is little more than sufficient for the wants of his station; the entailed land must go to his eldest son. How is he to provide for his younger children, the power of charging being, as it often is, either insufficient or already exhausted? Why, by saving for them the money which ought to go to the land. Or, suppose a man has a eldest son who has involved himself irretrievably in debt — why should he spend his savings on the estate only to benefit the usurers who will absorb it by and by? Or suppose he is childless, will he spend his money on the land for the benefit of the heir of entail, or will he keep it for those whom he desires to benefit by his will? Why should he spend £20,000 to-day on necessary farm buildings or drainage when the benefit of the whole may go to-morrow to a man he does not care sixpence about? Take another case. A man has several daughters and no son. The property is to go to some distant kinsman whom for that very reason he probably does not love—what will he do with his money? Will he expend it on the estate for the benefit of the heir, or will he save it for his children? Now, here are four cases—I could give you fifty more—where the law of entail beyond dispute diverts capital from the land. It is said men desire to make settlements for the benefit of their families. Of course they do, but it is not necessary to make an entail for that. You may charge your estate without entailing it (hear, hear); and an estate so charged may be freely dealt with subject to the charge. I wish the system of charging were made, as it might easily be made, simple, and less cumbrous than it is. You might, perhaps, if you please, without abolishing entail altogether, suspend its action so far only as it operates as a restriction upon the improvement of land—that is to say, as regards expenditure for such purposes and such purposes alone—you might with proper protection open the entail and allow a man to act as freely as if he were owner in fee. There would not be much danger in that, for men are not apt to be spendthrifts in improvement. They are much more likely too spend too little than too much. Some such intermediate course as this would appear to have been the adequate conclusion from the premises established by the House of Lords' report; but this is only a partial and imperfect remedy. What is really wanted is to unite the actual dominion more completely with the nominal possession—to give to each generation a fuller control, and therefore a greater interest in the improvements it may make to emancipate land from the restraints incident to a too limited ownership. (Hear, hear.) You need not fear for "the inheritance." The unlimited energy of the English people will do enough and to spare for the "protection of the inheritance." To make men more completely masters of their own property, having due regard to rights already vested—to give them a more direct and personal interest in the improvement of the soil—that is not confiscation. (Cheers.) I do not desire any coercive legislation—all I wish is that the law should not afford special facilities and direct encouragement to arrangements which are injurious to the community. The law which alone gives the power to a man to do anything at all after his death, may and ought to prescribe the limits within which that power shall be exercised. It has already done so to a great degree, and it may do so with advantage yet more. Much, perhaps the greater part, of what is wanted, must be accomplished not so much by legislation, as by convincing settlers that such entails are not desirable. But if the law did not offer the facilities, they would not be made. I do not wish to exaggerate the matter. I do not tell you this will do everything; but in my judgment it will do much. If we can effect this, then the land of England will be like a rich mine of wealth under our feet, capable of being developed for the advantage of the present and the coming generations of a great and a growing people. (Cheers.) It is not really a question at all of large or of small estates. A man may be poor on a large estate and rich with a small one. What is wanted for the good of the community is that land should not be artificially kept in the hands of persons who are so impoverished that they cannot do justice to the soil or to those who live upon it. Any law which helps to prevent land passing freely from those who cannot to those who can do well by it is economically a bad law. (Hear.) You cannot hinder this happening in all cases, it is true. You cannot make a man sell an encumbered estate if he does not choose, but you can enable him to do so. You can prevent the law being employed to make it impossible for him to do that which is for the good of the community. I know there are those who, admitting that the economical results of the law of entail, are injurious, maintain it from social considerations. They think it tends to keep up old families. I have no aversion myself to old families. If they are made of good stuff, like old wine, they grow better by keeping. If they come of a bad vintage, the longer you bottle them the worse they grow. (Cheers.) If a man is fit to support a great name, he will not want the law of entail to sustain him in the station to which he is born. If he is not fit, the worst thing that can happen to his race is that he should be bolstered up in a position which he discredits. (Cheers.) I have known more families ruined by the law of entail than ever were saved by it. (Hear.) To me the ordinary settlement of a strict entail seems the most unnatural domestic arrangement that ever was conceived. A man has a son whom he has begotten, whom he has educated, whom he knows, whom he loves, whom he trusts; but it is not to him that he confides the real dominion over that estate which is his pride. It is the unborn grandchild, of whom he knows nothing, who may be an idiot or something worse, who is made the real master both of the father and the son. (Hear.) What is the consequence of this state of things? It is the cause of more domestic misery and dissension than anything else in the world. It inverts the relation of father and son, it makes the son the proprietor and the father the tenant of the estate. (Hear, hear.) It destroys parental influence, it subverts filial respect, it makes the son the natural antagonist of the father, it makes the father too often the enemy of the son. Why is it that we see fine boys, hardly out of their teens, who might have been a credit to their race, an honour to their name, doomed to early bankruptcy and premature ruin? Why is it that they fall a prey to the gambler, the blackleg, and the moneylender? Why, because they have got an indefeasible reversion to sell; because from their cradles they have been made their own masters; because, by a fatal entail of ruinous independence, they have been emancipated from that wholesome control which might have saved their inexperienced youth from becoming the slave of its own passions, the victim of its own vices. To me, at least, the law of entail seems to be not only an economical error, but a social mistake, too often a domestic calamity. If a man has a worthy eldest son let him by all means leave him his estate; but if he is not worthy why should the law lend its aid to arrangements which compel such a destination? What father would not desire himself to have control of his estate, however willing some fathers may be that their sons should be limited? (Cheers.) I speak as a father myself. If I were the possessor of a great estate I should like to have the power to leave it at my death to a child who was worthy of it. I should like to be able to provide for those for whom I ought to provide. What I should most deplore would be to see the home I had cherished pass against my will into the hands of those who would discredit it (cheers) —to be compelled to consign a tenantry and a peasantry I had loved to the charge of one whom I knew would neglect them both. Believe me, this is a reform which ought not and which cannot be long delayed. (Cheers.) It is not an invasion of the rights of property, it is an enfranchisement, an enlargement of those rights. The French writer, to whom I have already referred, and who is a great admirer of the English character, who contrasts with mournful envy the stability of our institutions with the political fortunes of France, makes the following observations. Alluding to this very subject of the law of entail, which he regards as the one great blot upon the rural economy of England, the speedy removal of which he confidently anticipates from his study of English political habits—says, "It must not be supposed that the English make no revolutions; on the contrary, they revolutionize to a great extent. They are always at it, but in their own quiet way. Thus, they attempt only what is possible and really useful, and one may be sure that at the close there will be complete satisfaction without the entire destruction of the past." (Cheers.) Don't be frightened by the word revolution. There are good revolutions and there are bad revolutions. A bad revolution is the worst, and a good revolution is the best thing in the world. (Hear, hear.) The constitution of this country is founded on a good revolution—a revolution which rejected everything that was bad, and maintained everything that was good. That is the sort of revolution which England loves. (Cheers.) I believe that such a revolution is possible in your land laws. (Cheers.) By freeing the land from the impediments which hinder its development you would greatly increase the produce of the soil—you would improve the condition of the people by procuring for them cheaper food—you would raise the wages of the agricultural labourer —you would enlarge the profit of the farmer—you would enhance the rent of the proprietor—you would augment the national fund from which the taxation of the State is fed—and the statesman who shall accomplish such a task by a just, an enlightened, a conciliatory policy, will consult the universal interests of the nation which shall confide to his prudence and his patriotism so great and beneficent a work. (Loud cheers.)

THE IRISH BENCH.

THE economic question which has been raised with respect to the appointment of a successor to the late Chief Baron Pigot is still the chief subject of discussion in the journals and in professional circles. Various arguments, some of them rather plausible, but having little substantial weight in them, others possessing greater force, are urged against the proposed reduction of the judicial bench. The national sentiment is appealed to, and an effort is made to stir up popular feeling against the measure as part of a general policy of centralisation, the effect of which, it is apprehended, would be to dismantle the Irish capital of all that gives it official dignity and social influence, and reduce the country still more into the position of an inferior province. It is not to be inferred that there is not an independent public opinion in favour of retrenchment of the national expenditure, but there is an unwillingness that Ireland should be singled out for the trial of financial experiments. It is asserted that the time is not opportune for making such a change, and that if any reform be needed it should be carried out, not impulsively or with precipitation, but deliberately and after full inquiry. The Freeman returns to the subject to day, and writes in an anxious tone about the "ominous rumour." It suggests that the city members should address a direct query to the Government as to the course which it intends to take, and that should the reply point to an intention not to fill up the vacancy "a requisition protesting against the decision should at once be set on foot." It observes that "the people of Ireland behaved with a fatal apathy when the Landed Estates Court judgeship fell vacant," but trusts they "will adopt a prompt and manly course on the present question. It recalls the fact that in 1862 a Royal Commission reported strongly against the proposed reduction, and states that since that time the business of the courts has increased. Summing up its objections, it says that "lopping off an Irish judgeship would be a crucial instance of false economy. It would injure a great institution, be unpopular with a whole nation, be regarded with disfavour by an entire Profession, and save—one penny in every eighty pounds of the national expenditure." The Daily Express admits the public are anxious that efficiency should be combined with economy, but protests against the proposal that there should be only three judges in each of the common law courts. It points out practical difficulties in the way. The extent of the circuits should be enlarged and the number of them diminished, and the effect would be that for seven months in the year suitors would be left without a judge in town to transact the necessary business. In the Assize Courts the judges have duties to perform which do not devolve upon the judicial bench in England, such as the fiating of presentments from the grand juries and the hearing of appeals from the decisions of the chairmen of quarter sessions, to which a new class has been added since the passing of the Land Act. They already spend from two to three months on the circuits, and if these periods were extended the inconvenience arising from their absence from town would be proportionately increased. Besides this, the reduction in their number would create a difficulty in supplying the materials for an appellate jurisdiction in the event of the Act of last Session being extended to this country; and the present constitution of the Courts of Appeal, not only that in Chancery, but also the Exchequer Chamber, is so unsatisfactory that the interests of the public require that it should be remodelled and placed upon a basis which would give general confidence. Besides the difficulty of providing for the circuits as they are now managed, there would be another arising from the demand for a winter assize on the part of the people of Belfast and other districts of the North, who complain of the inconvenience of having their cases left in suspense during the long interval between July and March, unless they adopt the costly alternative of sending them to Dublin. The Express argues that, although the business of the Courts of Exchequer and Common Pleas might be transacted by three judges, it would be quite impracticable for the Court of Queen's Bench to dispense with the assistance of one of its members. So far from having too little to do, it has had more than it could accomplish. This argument is strengthened by the authority of the judicial statistics and the records of the business. During the Nisi Prius sittings it has been found necessary to obtain the aid of one of the puisne judges to get through the list of cases for trial, although the Chief Justice has been unremitting in his attention, and performs his judicial duties with average rapidity. It is enough to state, in confirmation of the assertion as to the pressure of business, that last year Mr. Justice Barry sat 205 days, and in the preceding year 230 days, while it cannot be alleged that Mr. Justice O'Brien or Mr. Justice Fitzgerald was wanting in diligence or ability. It should be remembered that, as the Daily Express intimates, the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland has a distinct and peculiar jurisdiction in addition to that which ordinarily attaches to a common law court or the Queen's Bench in England. It has to fiat, and therefore to examine, the presentments from the grand jury of the county and the corporation of the city of Dublin; it has to try railway traverses under the Irish Railways Act of 1851, and there are other special matters of minor interest with which it has to deal."—Times Correspondent, Jan. 3.

A Scotch member of the House of Commons, Mr. M'Laren, has just been looking over the statistics of the Irish legal establishment, with the object of getting his countrymen to raise a cry of "justice to Scotland," or rather to attempt to reduce the public expenditure in Ireland. The worthy Scot finds that in Ireland there are twenty judges in the Supreme Court; there are seventeen of them who get from £3600 to £8000. There is one Probate judge at £3500, and two in the Landed Estates Court get £3000 each. There are twenty judges, therefore, in Ireland, in what might be called the Supreme Courts, and they get £80,600. In Scotland there are thirteen judges, who receive from £3000 to £4000 each, and they get £41,300 among them. Our censor finds that the Irish judges get about twice the amount of public money which the Scotch judges get, and his opinion is that there is far less law and justice required to be dispensed in Dublin than there is in Edinburgh. It is rather inopportune, we confess, to have to meet this statement, but the difference in the number of the population, 3,500,000 against 5,500,000, and particularly the different social conditions arising out of the history of the country since the Revolution, or, indeed, since the Cromwellian settlement, fully account for the necessity. In Scotland there are few judges, but sufficient in proportion to the legal business and population. In England there are not sufficient judges for the work, nor are they sufficiently paid, as is amply proved by the fact that in a late instance an English judge actually lost his reason from overwork; others have lost their health and lives from the same cause. Secondly, the business is much in arrear; and, lastly, the leaders of the Bar are not willing to accept the dignity with its emolument, in exchange for their professional income with its attendant exertion. We shall return to this subject next week in reference to the vacancy on the Bench created by the lamented death of the late Chief Baron.—Irish Law Times.

SUICIDE OF A BARRISTER.—Mr. Gilmore Evans, who has received, recently, a valuable Government appointment, committed suicide on the 2nd inst., at his chambers, in London. On Saturday afternoon Mr. W. J. Payne held an inquest at 3, Serjeant's-inn, Chancery-lane. Mr. Goodman, solicitor, of 89, Chancery-lane, having identified the body, Mrs. Wright, the housekeeper of 3, Serjeant's-inn, deposed that the deceased had been in ill-health for some weeks past, but on Thursday evening appeared more cheerful than usual, when she took him his dinner at a quarter-past 6. The next morning she went upstairs to call him about 8 o'clock, but getting no answer to her repeated knocks at the door, and being fearful that he might have become ill, she sent for Mr. Hall, the locksmith, of Fetter-lane, who broke open the door. Witness then went into the bed room, and discovered Mr. Evans lying dead in bed, with a small revolver grasped in his left hand, and a large pool of blood upon the floor, which had flowed from a wound in his head. She at once sent for a doctor and the police, but the services of the former were of course unavailing, for the poor gentleman had been dead for some six or seven hours. Mr. Hall, the locksmith, and Police-constable Woodman having given confirmatory evidence, and the surgeon having deposed that death had resulted from a pistol shot, Mr. M'Namara and Mr. Price, two of Her Majesty's Railway Commissioners, gave testimony that left little doubt upon the minds of the jury that the deceased had been suffering from extreme nervous depression and morbid agitation for some time past, and that his duties as Registrar of the Commission, although not very arduous, were somewhat novel to him, and very probably increased the agitation and depression to such an extent that his mind gave way under the unwonted strain, and he committed suicide. The jury, upon hearing this evidence, at once returned a verdict of "Suicide while of unsound mind."

THE NEW LAW COURTS AT WINCHESTER.—The new law courts at Winchester are now virtually completed, and the restoration of the old gothic hall of Winchester Castle to its former design is nearly finished. The designs of the new courts and restoration were furnished by Mr. Digby Wyatt, architect, and the total cost of the whole work has probably been over £30,000. At the Epiphany Sessions on Monday, Lord Eversley presiding, Mr. Melville Portal, chairman of the Public Works Committee, announced that they could not yet present a complete financial report, but they hoped to be able to do so at the next sessions. The committee contemplated—and they hoped to have the support of the magistrates of the county in the matter—the filling the windows of the old hall with painted glass. This was not a kind of work which they would be justified in throwing upon the county rates, but they hoped the undertaking was one that would commend itself to the magistrates at large throughout the county, and that no difficulty would be experienced in obtaining funds sufficient to fill the whole of the windows. The committee proposed to illustrate by this means the history of the county from its earliest period, by displaying the names, arms, and deeds of those persons who were either natives of Hampshire or immediately connected with the county in a remarkable manner. These would be chronologically arranged, and the windows from one end of the hall to the other would form so many pages of county history, which well-informed persons would be able to understand easily. They had consulted Mr. Hardman, who had furnished the designs now in the room, and the windows were estimated to cost 100 guineas each. The first was already promised, the noble chairman, the Earl of Carnarvon, Sir William Heathcote, and himself having agreed to defray its cost. Two benches of magistrates had also signified their desire to help in the matter, and their architect, Mr. Digby Wyatt, had promised a donation of £25. Lord Henry Scott, M.P., said the scheme deserved the greatest possible encouragement, and he hoped all the support possible would be accorded to it, for no one could visit that noble hall without seeing that painted glass, supposing the colouring was not so deep as to obscure the light, would be a great ornament. At the same time, however, while he should be glad to support the suggestions by all the means in his power, he thought they should not forget that the new courts and the restoration of the old hall were completed during the chairmanship of Lord Eversley, and he trusted, therefore, that his portrait, to be hung in that chamber, would form part of the scheme suggested by Mr. Portal. He was not prepared with a motion on the subject now, but, with the permission of the court, he hoped to bring it forward again next sessions. The matter then dropped, but with a more advanced condition of the restoration a county committee will probably be formed to carry out the object in view.

THE IRISH LAW COURTS.—The Dublin Evening Mail suggests that the puisne judges should be employed regularly in performing their share of the work of the after-sittings. It is suggested, also, that the constitution of the Court for Land Cases Reserved should be altered, and that a rota of judges should be formed to supply one to sit regularly in the Court of Appeal in Chancery to provide against the evil consequences of the frequent divisions between the ordinary judges, a suggestion which seems to merit consideration.

THE Town Council of Liverpool have just decided to raise the salaries of their officers, from the deputy town clerk downwards; the total increase in salaries amounts to £2000 annually. This is a step in the right direction, and we commend this decision to the consideration of other municipal authorities with a view to an increase of the salary of town clerks.

MESSRS. HENRY KIMBER and Charles Cydwellyn Ellis, of 79, Lombard-street, announce that they have dissolved partnership, and in future each gentleman will conduct business on his own account. The papers and documents of their respective clients will remain with the partner under whose care the particular business has been carried on, unless they receive an intimation from the client to the contrary.

THE Supreme Court of Massachusetts has again declared that by the statutes of the State all wagers are void. The action was one for money had and received against the party winning the wager, which had, in good faith, been paid to him by the stakeholder. The presiding judge refused to admit evidence offered by the defendant tending to show that he had won the wager, which, singularly enough, was upon the position of certain graves in a cemetery.

COPYRIGHT LAW.—A correspondent in the Athenæum suggests that to prevent disputes and uncertainty, the registration of titles of books should be effected prior to publication, and that the registration fee shall be reduced to one half. Also that an alphabetical register of titles, with the date of registration and name of the publisher, should be kept open to an applicant upon payment of 1s.; the entry to be null and void at the end of a year, to prevent any "phantom" title from incumbering the register.

A NEW CLAIMANT.—A claim to the title and estates of the Earl of Eglinton came before the Sheriff Court of Chancery, Edinburgh, on Monday. The claimant, Mr. Foulton, maintains that he is the great grandson of James Foulton, who was younger brother to the eleventh Earl of Eglinton. Having eloped with one of his father's domestics, named Mary Wallace, whom he married, he was disowned by the family, enlisted as a soldier, and died in the service. His son, James Foulton, served in the navy, and the son of the latter, Thomas Foulton, who was the father of the present claimant, again became a soldier. His son, the claimant also entered the army, and was present with the Light Brigade in the Balaklava charge. Since he left the army he has lived in Edinburgh, and has occupied himself in getting up evidence in support of his case. He says that his great-grandmother had documentary evidence in her possession which would have proved him the heir to the title and estates. These documents were obtained from her by Robert, sixth Baron of Skelmorlie, whose son Hugh became the twelfth Earl of Eglinton, under a promise that he would look after the interests of her son, who was then a minor. It is alleged, however, that he used the papers to obtain possession of the estates for his own family. At any rate, his son married the daughter of the eleventh Earl, who had no heirs male, and from him the present Earl of Eglinton is lineally descended. The case came before the court on an application for a commission and diligence to examine certain title deeds. Mr. Blair, who appeared for the present earl, said there was no such deed in existence. Mr. Menzies, who appeared for the claimant, said he found there was such a deed by date and designation in a Crown charter in the Register House, and if such deed were not now in existence it must have been at one time. He would take his chance of recovering it after diligence. The sheriff ordered answers to be lodged in fourteen days.

A MANCHESTER paper states that the borough of Stockport has twenty-six magistrates and twenty-eight policemen.

THE post of high constable of the City of Westminster has become vacant by the death, at the age of seventy-five, of Mr. Foster Owen, who held it many years.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it

THE PROFESSION.—I observe in your impression of Saturday last some remarks relative to the wished for amalgamation of the two branches of the Legal Profession. It happens that this subject has been much discussed of late years elsewhere, and as I know something of the actual working of the proposed system, where it has been adopted, a few observations on the subject will not be out of place. The question referred to, has in fact been under discussion in several of the colonies, and very recently an endeavour was made in New South Wales and Queensland to bring about the desired change. The attempt failed in both instances, the measure, as might have been expected, meeting with considerable opposition from many of the members of the Colonial Bar. In New Zealand, however, the contemplated reform was actually accomplished some years since, and I need hardly say that the alteration has been found to work well enough—in fact, gentlemen admitted in this country as solicitors have, after examination, been admitted as barristers and solicitors in New Zealand, and have been quite as successful as English barristers going to that colony. As a general rule, the only practical result of this state of things is that, as all legal practitioners can be admitted as barristers and solicitors, a certain number of gentlemen, feeling themselves qualified to do so, devote themselves to advocacy, and the rest pursue the ordinary business of solicitors. Partnerships have, of course, been formed on this basis. To those acquainted with colonial affairs, it must be somewhat surprising to find that English solicitors have so long submitted to the existing monopoly. It is difficult indeed to see why a branch of the Profession, the qualification for membership in which until recently consisted in the eating of dinners, and the expenditure of so much cash, should be entitled to such privileges and pecuniary advantages as barristers possess over solicitors in this country. And the curious part of the case is this—that whereas the barrister pays no annual fee for the right to practise, the solicitor is burdened with the charge of £9 or £6 as the case may be. Legal reforms are made, and the solicitor's profits cut down, but still he remains in the same position, whilst the "gentlemen of the long robe" preserve their profits and privileges intact. The Profession in this country would do well to follow the example of New Zealand in this respect. In that colony the courts of law and equity are amalgamated, as well as the two branches of the Profession. Why should not the same be done here? Should this happen, we should, I think, very soon see what are the relative merits of the members of the two distinct branches. There can be little doubt but that the places of many of our "junior counsel" would soon be supplied by members of legal firms. We should see cases properly brought before the court, briefs not left unread, but the advocates fully in possession of all the facts of the cases in which they are concerned, and thereby enabled to do justice to the clients they represent.

55. LANDLORD AND TENANT—RENT.—A. lately sold some property, the rent of which is payable yearly at Michaelmas. The day of settlement was by the contract fixed for the 26th December last. Is not A. entitled to the quarter's rent accruing from Michaelmas to the day of settlement? As the purchaser objects to pay the proportion, will not the course be for the vendor to wait till next Michaelmas; and then, if the purchaser receives the whole year's rent, sue him for the proportion? Does not The Apportionment Act 1870 apply to cases between vendor and purchaser?

AN ARTICLED CLERK.

56. COPYHOLD PRACTICE. — A. by will devised real estate, part of which was copyhold fine certain, to his wife B. absolutely. After his death, B., by her will, devised such copyholds to a trustee for immediate sale, with the usual power of appointment, in order to dispense with the trustee's admission. On B.'s death the estate has been sold, and as I am acting both for the vendor and purchaser, I shall be glad to be informed if it is necessary to take any and what steps to perfect the trustee's title before passing the estate by bargain and sale, and as to the rights of the lord and steward of the manor under the circumstances.

Answers.

(Q. 44.) LEGATEE—DUTY.—On re-consideration, I think that C. D., whether beneficially entitled or not, may disclaim. "If one gives goods or chattels to another, and the devisee refuse it, by this means the devise is become void, and any waiver or refusal will suffice in this case, for a man shall not be compelled nolens volens to take anything devised to him." See Sheppard's Touchstone, 452; also 3 Preston's Abstracts, 104. Of course, if there be a valid disclaimer, C. D. would not pay duty.

(Q. 48.) PRACTICE—COVENANT FOR PRODUCTION OF DEEDS.—A. is entitled to a covenant of indemnity from C. Lord St. Leonards' opinion to this effect is re-stated without dissent, Dart, V. & P. 618, 4th edit.

(Q. 52.) PARTNERSHIP.—Smith's ground of complaint (if any) is much slighter than that of the plaintiff in Banks v Gibson (34 Beav. 566), where, on a dissolution, each partner was held entitled to use the style of the firm. In that case, as pointed out by Mr. Lindley (Partnership, 888, note p. 3rd edit.), it might perhaps have been argued that the use of the name of the firm by one member of the dissolved partnership would expose the other member to some risk. Here the description "late Smith and Howell" entirely obviates any such difficulty. If Smith have any claim, it must be a claim to have the goodwill sold and the money divided.

Z. Y.

— On the dissolution of a partnership each partner has a right, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, to use the name of the old firm. Vide Williams' Personal Property, 6th edit. p. 238; Banks v. Gibson (M. R. 11 Jur. N. S. 680; 34 L. J. 179, Chan.; 13 W. R. 1012).

SOCIUS.

(Q. 53.) RIGHT OF ACTION.—Tibbs could maintain an action against Jinks for money had and received. If Jinks had killed the dog he would have been under no liability, having simply obeyed his master's orders, but having gone out of his way to convert the dog into money, he is clearly liable to refund the £5 he received.

CLIFFORD.

— The sale being entirely wrongful, Tibbs cannot maintain any action for the £5. He may, however, obtain trover for the setter dog against Jinks; or detinue (Jones v. Dowle, 9 M. & W. 19.) He may also maintain trover or detinue against Poucher, unless the dog was purchased bonâ fide and in market overt.

(Q. 54.) MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT.—It appears to me that a deposit in a savings' bank in the name of a married woman, if made prior to the 9th Aug. 1870, is not even primâ facie her separate estate. In such a case sects. 2 and 9 have no application.

Z. Y.

(Q. 51.) PROCEDURE.—Gen. Rule 204 provides as follows: "The place of sitting of each County Court in matters of bankruptcy shall be the town in which the court now holds, or may hereafter hold, its sittings for the common law business of the court, under the provisions of the County Courts Act 1846." I have never heard of County Court judges hearing applications in a court other than where the proceedings are carried on, except in matters of arrest, when the bankrupt intends leaving the country. This matter is of such urgency that the warrant is signed by the judge whenever the application is made.

LAW SOCIETIES.

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.

THE adjourned meeting of this new society, the object of which is the reform of abuses in connection with the legal profession, was held last Wednesday evening at the rooms of the Social Science Association, 1, Adam-street, Adelphi.

Mr. W. T. Charley, D.C.L., M.P., was called to the chair, and there was a large attendance of members.

Mr. Charles Ford (hon. secretary), read the minutes of the last meeting, which were confirmed. He then stated that he had received numerous letters from all parts of the kingdom from members of the legal profession, in which they fully sympathised with the objects of the new society, and wished it every success. As an instance of this he read the following extracts:

Mr. Copp (Essex-street, Strand): "I wish the society every success, and shall be happy to co-operate with you and other members of the Profession who have taken such a warm interest in the subject, in seeking to weed out from our ranks those who by their unprofessional, and in some cases even nefarious practices, would seek to bring the Profession into disrepute."

Mr. Charles E. Lewis, M.P. (Old Jewry): "The objects of your proposed society appear to be to do the work which ought to be done by the existing bodies. I fear that there is but little prospect of rousing our profession into anything like real activity; and I have recently, as you know, given a great deal of time and energy, without much result, to try and accomplish this. I must leave others to do what they can in the same direction, but can only give my best wishes for success."

Mr. J. T. Shapland (South Malton): "Will you kindly give me some information respecting it (the society), as it appears to me from the little I have seen, that it is just such a society as we attorneys and solicitors require."

Mr. W. J. Wheatcroft (Eastbourne).—"My fear is that the objects of the society are not sufficiently extensive. The legal profession must use the influence in their own behalf, which, at general elections, they have so often used on behalf of their clients, if any great good is to be done. Our branch of the Profession must have a share of the plums which the higher branch at present monopolise, and this, I believe, can only be done through combined influence at the time of a general election. There is much however, for the proposed society to accomplish, and I will do what I can to aid it."

Mr. C. R. Gibson (Dartford).—"I thank you for the printed circular. I am very willing to do anything I can to advance the interests of our Profession, and if I can I will attend your meeting, and learn whether the present movement at all embraces the objects which I venture to think are so essential for the welfare of the Profession at large."

Mr. Wm. Gresham (High Bailiff of Southwark).—"I vastly approve of your circular just come to hand. Pray put me down as an annual subscriber. I shall be happy in any other mode to support the views of the society. My son, Thos. Gresham, who is my partner here, desires to do the same."

Mr. E. James (Eastbourne).—"I have perused the circular you were kind enough to hand me respecting the formation of a new society, under the title of the 'Legal Practitioners' Society,' and beg to say, that as a gentleman who has passed and is about to be admitted, I consider such a society very much needed in order to protect the interests of the Profession, which at the present time are so much trespassed upon by mere outsiders."

Mr. W. Cheesman (Eastbourne).—"I shall be glad if you will kindly add my name as a member of the 'Legal Practitioners' Society,' of whose utility there cannot be a second opinion."

Mr. C. Matthews (Eastbourne).—"My attention having been called to a new society, called the Legal Practitioners' Society, and having read over the prospectus, I cordially approve of its objects. In the course of my twelve years' experience in the Profession, I have frequently known great misery and hardship inflicted upon the poorer classes, who have entrusted small matters to agents, and who have invariably managed, somehow or another, to plunder their victims more or less. I shall be happy to become a member, and I wish the society every success in its praiseworthy efforts."

Mr. T. Marshall (Leeds.)—"I have received the circulars of the Legal Practitioners' Society, which you have kindly sent me. I should be obliged by your answering the following queries: 1. By what authority the proposed code of etiquette is to be enforced. 2. Whether the rights and liabilities of the two branches of the legal profession sought to be defined are the existing rights and liabilities, and no others. 3. Whether placing the government of the legal profession on a sound representative basis implies that the authority of the Benchers of the various Inns of Court to disbar members of the Bar, and of the judges to strike off the rolls attorneys and solicitors, is to be taken from them and vested in a governing body elected by the Profession at large, or what else the prospectus does mean. 4. Whether the protection of the legal profession from the depredations of unqualified men means further restrictive legislation, or merely the establishment of a means for reforming the existing laws which protect us."

Mr. W. Duignan (Walsall).—"I do not feel interested in any question except the amalgamation of barristers and solicitors, and I think it idle to redress small grievances, leaving the great ones untouched. I do not think, therefore, that I can take any interest in the objects of the Society. I am, nevertheless, exceedingly obliged for your courteous note."

Mr. J. E. Mason (Alford).—"I shall be glad if you will add my name to the list of members. The vis inertiæ of the 'Incorporated' and the 'Inland Revenue' to be overcome, in forcing either to deal with unqualified persons, I found to be almost past belief during three years' service as secretary to the Plymouth Law Society, since incorporated. I trust the projected society may be more successful than I was."

Mr. W. Merrick (Old Jewry).—"In common with many others I approve the objects of this society; and if you will kindly forward me a couple of sets of the notices which have been issued, and any other printed matter you may have, I will canvass my friends with the view of getting them to join the society. You must of course be aware it is a difficult matter for solicitors as a body to attend meetings; but I think if a canvass by some of those interested were organised, much good might be done, and perhaps one of the principal objects of meetings accomplished."

Mr. H. L. Turner (Newcastle-upon-Tyne).—"From what I have heard of the society it seems to me to be far more likely than any other to benefit the Profession and look after the interests of of its members, which the Incorporated Law Society does not seem to trouble much about."

Mr. E. A. Ward (Maidenhead).—"I highly approve of your Legal Practitioners' Society. I am desirous of joining the society, and if you can send me any prospectuses should canvas my professional brethren."

Mr. H. Symonds (Dorchester).—"Please to enrol me as a member of Legal Practitioners' Society. I hope something may be done towards facilitating the change from solicitor to barrister. It is unfair to have to pass a preliminary and read for three years after having been in the legal Profession for some years."

Mr. J. Borough (Derby),—"One of the main grievances of my branch of the Profession which I hope to see removed is our exclusion from the Inns of Court. Though not objecting to a certain interval (say two or three terms) between removal from the Rolls and being called to the Bar, I think it unjust and unwise on the part of those venerable societies to refuse us permission to enter as students or members. I feel sure that the removal of this restriction would tend as much to the benefit of the Bar as of ourselves, and would greatly increase the incomes of the Inns. A powerful body, supporters of the present privileges of the Inns, would also be created. I should be very sorry to see the constitution of the Inns of Court altered, or their powers over the Profession interfered with in any way, and I advocate the slight relaxation of the rules which I have mentioned as a truly conservative measure. The revival and extension of the Inns of Chancery might also be taken in hand by your society with advantage to the general body of attorneys and solicitors. I should say that I am strongly opposed to any amalgamation of the two branches of the Profession."

The hon. secretary also read numerous other extracts from the letters of solicitors who had joined the society,

The Chairman said that this meeting, as they were aware, was an adjourned meeting of the Legal Practitioners' Society. At the last meeting it was decided that this society should be established. They were now met to frame the rules for the society and to start it on its career of usefulness to the Profession, and, he trusted, to the public at large. Draft rules would be placed before them and they would be discussed seriatim. The next point would be to make one or two appointments under those rules. About sixty gentlemen had signified their intention of joining the society; but he thought they would agree that they had not as yet sufficient material from which to select their governing body. Correspondence, however, must be carried on, and receipts given for subscriptions, and it was therefore necessary that an honorary treasurer, &c., and honorary secretary should be appointed. The next point was the consideration of the most suitable subject for legislation next session. It would be remembered that at the last meeting there was a general concurrence of opinion that the subject, which was the most pressing and the most ripe for legislation, was the protection of the legal Profession against the encroachments of unqualified persons. (Hear, hear.) He gathered from the manner in which they received that statement that they would agree in thinking that the time had come when legislation upon that question should be initiated. The next thing would be the appointment of a sub-committee to frame a Bill upon the subject. Since they last met a very important speech had been delivered by the Lord Chancellor to a deputation of the Legal Education Association, in the course of which his Lordship announced that he was prepared to introduce a bill into Parliament to re-organise the Inns of Court. This re-organisation was a subject-matter of which they could very well take cognizance and tender to the Lord Chancellor their support to the Bill, provided it was a fair and reasonable one and one which the legal Profession had a right to expect from so eminent a man as Lord Selborne. There were several points in connection with the Inns of Court which required legislating upon. It was very important that the Bar should be governed by a representative body. The Benchers were practically the nominees of the Lord Chancellor for the time being. In Paris the advocates were governed by a representative body, and their discipline was most exact; in England the Bar was governed by an irresponsible body, and its discipline was most lax. He thought that it might be desirable to organise a deputation to the Lord Chancellor to tender to him their desire to support in every way in their power his Bill (Hear), and to bring under his notice the importance of re-organising the Inns of Court on the basis of having a representative body to govern the Bar. There were many grievances which attorneys and solicitors complained in connection with the Inns of Court. These could be mentioned to Lord Selborne. It was all the more necessary that they should tender their support to the Lord Chancellor, because, in the course of his speech, he said that he was afraid that if he introduced his Bill next session it would be made the groundwork of a party attack against the Government, but they could assure him that such would not be the case. The question about the representative body for the government of the Bar would involve their consulting its members upon the subject. A memorial to the Lord Chancellor should be submitted to the Bar, especially to its junior members. Thus, by means of their Bill, their memorial, and their deputation, they would bring the society very prominently under the notice of the Profession and the public, and would acquire both moral and numerical strength. (Loud cheers.)

The hon. secretary (Mr. Ford) then read a draft of the proposed rules which he had prepared.

Mr. Holroyd Chaplin proposed that the rules be referred to a sub-committee of five, three to form a quorum, comprised of members of the society, and that those rules be presented, with the suggested alterations, at the next meeting, to be fully discussed, which was carried unanimously.

It was then proposed and carried that the following gentlemen should serve on this committee: Messrs. Charley, Jencken, Chaplin, Ford, and Delamar.

Mr. F. A. Rowland moved and Mr. Gresham seconded a motion to the effect that Mr. Charley should be appointed treasurer, which was also carried.

A like resolution was adopted requesting Mr. Charles Ford to continue his duties as hon. secretary.

The chairman then brought forward the subject of the desirability of protecting the public against the money lenders, quacks, and agents of all kinds which were the bane of the Profession.

Mr. Gresham, in speaking to this subject, said it was a matter of common notoriety in the Profession that many men were in the habit of lending their names. The Incorporated Law Society had undertaken to remedy many of the evils complained of, but without much good resulting. It was not, he thought, so much the result of legislative power as the way of checking the practice in some way which would do the most good.

Mr. Lowe said that he came constantly in contact with those persons who assumed the liberty to practise who had not the ability or the right so to do. Personally he had never taken objection to any man who had appeared from a bonâ fide office; but there were men who had been clerks to auctioneers who frequently conducted cases, armed with a letter duly signed by some solicitor, this occurring time after time. He himself could name twenty persons whose certificates were taken out by subscription (laughter), who were either bedridden or what not, whose names were kept upon the Law List simply for the purpose of enabling robbers (if he might use the word), to prey upon the public, and the testimony of various metropolitan magistrates would, he was assured, fully bear him out in his assertion. The thing was perfectly scandalous. As a remedy, he proposed that when a practitioner found a person who was perfectly unknown to him, conducting a case, he would suggest that the magistrate's clerk should inquire into his antecedents, and if they were not satisfactory the magistrate should refuse to hear him.

Mr. J. Seymour Salaman said that, being a member of the Incorporated Law Society, he had long seen considerable apathy in many questions affecting the legal Profession, and there was no doubt but that the Incorporated Law Society had failed to do its duty. With regard to the Legal Practitioners' Society many of its objects he fully concurred in, and it would be, he was of opinion, instrumental in doing good to the Profession; and he would give it every support in his power.

Mr. Webster thought that the question of dealing with the quacks of the Profession was a very important one. He suggested that an amendment of the Stamp Act would be serviceable, so as to punish them. Auctioneers and accountants to the Court of Chancery being the worst of these quacks. For an infringement of laws of this description, every unqualified person should be sent to prison; and this matter should he thought, have the attention of the society directed to it.

Dr. Tompkins, D.C.L., was of opinion that, in dealing with matters of the description urged by previous speakers, it was necessary to take a broad view of the question. They were on the eve of great changes, and that in regard to the administration of justice the time had come when the two branches of the Profession were proposed to be amalgamated, and it was necessary to know whether this fusion would be for the public good. The better course, he thought, was to have an appointed committee to inquire into the matter; and if they could get annual committees of the Bar, appointed by the different Inns of Court, and composed of attorneys and solicitors, they might hold a conference wherein the questions with regard to the duties and relations of the two branches of the Profession might be discussed. In the duty they owed to society and to the Profession, he thought that the matter should be taken up.

Mr. Holroyd Chaplin said that they did not know what the feeling in the House of Commons would be regarding their proposed course of action, nor did they know what feeling the press had towards them. He thought that there would be a great outcry about free trade in law, and he would recommend that they should endeavour to enforce the existing acts before legislating further.

Mr. Jencken, barrister, considered that in the absence of any knowledge on the subject, it was difficult to discuss the question, the principal point being the repression of outsiders. The most important question was to find out how the law stood in relation to this subject, so that they should know properly how they stood.

Mr. J. S. Salaman was fully aware of the enormous number of quacks in the Profession, complaints of them having frequently been made in the LAW TIMES; but, whilst being aware of this, he thought that in a society so young as the present one, it was a little too premature to prepare a Bill to Parliament, having for its object the dealing with these outsiders. With regard to the practitioners in the Court of Bankruptcy, the members of this society should first read the existing law on the subject, and then act accordingly. They were not quite prepared that evening, he thought, to discuss what form the proposed Bill should take, and he would suggest that the matter for the present be deferred. If such a Bill was proved to be absolutely necessary, he did not think it could be placed in better hands than the chairman's. (Applause.)

The Chairman said that there must be something definite done if they wanted to be practical, and they must not be content with only talking over these matters.

Mr. Wingfield referred at length to what he called old grievances of the law stationers taking the bread from the mouth of the legal practitioner. There was, he considered, quite sufficient law to prevent this if it were put into force.

Mr. F. A. A. Rowland then proposed, and Mr. Webster seconded, a resolution to the effect that a sub-committee be appointed, with the view of considering whether it was necessary to initiate legislation upon the subject of quacks and other banes of the Profession; the sub-committee being Dr. Tompkins, Messrs. Charley Mantell, Rowland, Salaman, Webster, and C. Ford.

The Chairman, in bringing forward the subject of the representative governing body of the Bar, said that it would be as well to have a memorial prepared, to be signed by the junior members of the Bar. The proposed representative body would be one in whom the Bar had confidence. He was sure that Sir William Harcourt would help them, and he had no doubt but that Lord Selborne would also. The object would be the formation of a body to whom the calling of the Bar would be entrusted, and who would have the general management of the Inns of Court.

Mr. Wingfield moved, Mr. Maloney seconded, and a proposition was carried to this effect.

Mr. C. Ford said it was a most important matter that a deputation should be formed without delay, to wait on the Lord Chancellor. Indeed, he thought that it was of the first importance, and that there could not be any possible evil, but much good likely to arise from this course. Relative to the question of the modification of the present rules, practically preventing solicitors from changing to the other branch, the Lord Chancellor, he said, had written him a letter, from which he gathered that he was favourable to a modification of the consolidated regulations upon the subject, and Sir George Jessel and the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and other eminent men were also interested in the question; and he trusted that the worthy chairman would too, interest himself in it. Mr. Ford said he had received many letters from distinguished members of the Bar on the subject.

It was then arranged that the secretary should be authorised to communicate with the Lord Chancellor relative to the reception of the deputation on the several points which had engaged the attention of the meeting; and that a circular should be sent round to the Profession, setting forth the objects of the society.

A cordial vote of thanks was then passed to Mr. Charley for presiding, which terminated the proceedings.

[We are requested by Mr. Charles Ford, the honorary secretary of the Legal Practitioners Society, to say that numerous communications on the subject of the society which he has received from solicitors since the commencement of the present year, he has been obliged to leave unanswered owing to pressure, and the number of such letters, and we are requested to add that the information in most cases asked for can be fully ascertained by a perusal of the above report of the meeting of the society.—ED.]

The Law and the Lawyers.

RUMOURS affecting the law have been unusually prevalent during the week, and the most important turns out to have been unfounded. It was stated confidently that Mr. AMPHLETT, Q.C., of the Chancery Bar, had been appointed to the vacancy in the Court of Exchequer. Whether this may ultimately be the case it is impossible to conjecture, but we can say positively that the appointment had not been made when we went to press. Some surprise, and a little consternation was produced in Westminster Hall when this rumour spread, for, the Judicature Act notwithstanding, it is considered that Judgeships in the Common Law Courts ought to be given to members of the Common Law Bar. We certainly agree in this, and Mr. AMPHLETT's appointment would be regarded simply as a reward to a political supporter.

IT is stated that the LORD CHANCELLOR does not intend to create the new batch of silks until after the spring circuits. His Lordship, we hear, was prepared to make an exception in favour of Mr. COHEN, but that learned gentleman declined to accept the invidious distinction.

The development of dramatic incidents in legal proceedings must be considered as somewhat alarming. Two matters are now before the public which are of great interest and importance—the Tichborne case and the Taunton petition, and in both the audience has forgotten itself, and the presiding judge has intimated that a court of law is not a theatre. But applause and immoderate laughter are contingencies which cannot always be provided against, and surprise would hardly be excited by both being indulged in at reasonable intervals. The licence accorded to the Tichborne defendant has, however, clearly demoralized him, for at the close of his counsel's address he delivered himself as follows:—"Doctor, I tender you my very sincere thanks for the very able manner in which you have defended me; and I hope I shall soon be able to clear off some of the 600*l*. I am still indebted to you." The learned counsel bowed his acknowledgments, but the extraordinary compliment thus publicly tendered was unhappily spoiled by the reference to pecuniary matters. The honoraria upon which a barrister is supposed to keep up a gentleman's establishment should never be paraded before the public eye in the prosaic form of £ s. d, and the defendant certainly shewed himself anything but a consummate actor. The incident is altogether shocking to professional feelings and to our sense of decorum. but we do not see our way to suggesting any plan for preventing the recurrence of similar manifestations.

AN important practical question was decided in Elmer v. Creasy (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 632), in which it was held that a mortgagee in possession, defendant in a redemption suit, who admits himself to be redeemable, cannot decline answering interrogatories as to the state and particulars of the account. The LORD CHANCELLOR pointed out that the rule as settled by Lord ELDON was that a defendant, submitting to answer (even when he altogether denied the plaintiff's title) must answer fully even as to consequential matters of account. In Elmer v. Creasy one of the objects of the suit was to obtain accounts before the decree. Lord SELBORNE reviewed the authorities which seem to have thrown some haze over the practice, and said finally, "We are not now called upon to determine whether the defendant must, in answer to these interrogatories, set forth as full and detailed a statement of all the items of the account as he might be obliged to give under a decree of redemption. The court may be trusted to exercise a proper control over any attempt on the plaintiff's part to press for any such minuteness of account as would be either vexatious or unreasonable, as indeed, it can do in any case in which it is satisfied that any kind of discovery is required vexatiously or oppressively: (Reade v. Woodrooffe, 24 Beav. 425). But the present question is whether the defendant is entitled to refuse to answer at all, before decree, as to these matters. The VICE-CHANCELLOR has decided that he is not, and with that decision we agree."

THERE are unconscionable people who think that magistrates have already as large a jurisdiction as it is advisable to confer upon them, and indeed a certain section of the public is so wanting in appreciation of the gratuitous services of these judges that to a certain extent justices' justice has become a proverb. We can easily understand therefore that the proposition of a Somersetshire magistrate that magistrates should preside over Courts of Conciliation in aid of the County Courts will be regarded with a certain amount of consternation. One half of the business entered in a Somersetshire County Court is, it appears, settled out of court. For some incomprehensible reason, the Somersetshire magistrate considers that this is a serious evil. The proposal to deal with disputes by means of a paternal Court of Conciliation is thus put forward by the magistrate in a local paper: "People take their little disputes to the County Court, and, after having spent much hard-earned money and wasted much valuable time, after having publicly exposed their secret affairs, and given provocation to the gossip of friends, and the malice of the ill-natured, they learn to their mortification that there was really nothing to fight about. A few questions by an intelligent, patient, and sympathising magistrate, would, at the outset, before the difference had been deepened by long delays, and by exasperating formalities into a bitter quarrel, have thrown much needed light upon the difficulty, and perhaps facilitated a reconciliation on the spot." We thought from the first portion of the letter that the grievance was that so many cases were settled out of court. But it appears from the above that it is the public contention affording gossip to the neighbourhood which is the evil to be got rid of. In short, the proposal is to substitute Courts of Conciliation for the County Courts. Such a proposition cannot be listened to. We venture to think that "little disputes" in County Courts do not involve the expenditure of "much hard-earned money" or "much valuable time." The tribunals are cheap and speedy, and we should be very sorry to see the great unpaid substituted for our County Court Judges. Magistrates would do wisely in attending to the work given them by the Legislature, without endeavouring to find new fields of labour.

THE administration of the law has lost a very faithful and most able servant in Mr. GEORGE C. OKE, the Chief Clerk to the LORD MAYOR. The office which he filled is one of considerable responsibility and difficulty, because every year the chief clerk at the Mansion House has to guide a new chief magistrate. Mr. OKE was in effect, the legal assessor of the Mansion House, and was probably as powerful on matters of law as Her MAJESTY'S Judges sitting with aldermen at the Old Bailey. Probably also he was not surpassed by any living lawyer in his knowledge of criminal law and the practice of magistrates courts. He long since made a literary reputation by his "Magisterial Synopsis," the eleventh edition of which was published in 1872. His "Magisterial Formulist" has reached a fourth edition, and in addition to these works, he published treatises on the Laws of Turnpike Roads, the Game and Fishery Laws—both of which are in their second edition—and on the Licensing of Inns, &c. Mr. OKE must have led a life of severe labour, and he died at a comparatively early age. We estimate his works so highly that we considered we owed to his memory something more than the ordinary tribute of our obituary column. The office vacated by Mr. OKE will doubtless be the object of severe competition. Among the first to announce his candidature is Mr. THOMAS COUSINS, at present magistrates' clerk at Portsmouth, a gentleman admitted in 1854, and who, judging from contributions which he has furnished to these columns, has a very extensive knowledge of criminal law and practice.

LORD ROMILLY held another sitting in the European Assurance Arbitration last week. One of the cases heard belonged to a class in which there has been some conflict of authority—namely, the validity of the transfer of shares to a pauper transferee. The transferee was found by a share-broker, and due notice was given of the intention to transfer to "GEORGE GILBERT, gentleman," and the consideration was stated as £29 10*s.* paid to the transferee. The transferee was approved of by the directors, and the transfer registered. It turned but that GILBERT was a pauper coach-driver, and that he had received £7 only, the remainder of the £29 10*s.* going partly to a transfer clerk of the company and partly to the sharebroker. Lord ROMILLY indicated his intention of placing the transferor on the list of contributories in the winding-up, on the ground, it would seem, that the directors were not aware that the whole of the consideration was not actually received by the transferee. In the Anglo-Australian Company's case his Lordship has decided that the covenant to indemnify given by the British Provident Life and Fire Assurance Society to the Anglo-Australian and Universal Family Life Assurance Company, on the amalgamation of the two companies, is not limited to the subscribed capital of the society. The grounds of two previous decisions were relied on—viz., one of Lord CAIRNS in the Albert Arbitration (Re Indemnity Claims, Reilly's Alb. Rep. p. 17) and one of Lord WESTBURY in the European Arbitration (Re British Nation Indemnity Claims, L. T. European Rep. p. 4), but a different result was arrived at. The sitting is now adjourned until the end of this term.

SIR CHARLES DILKE has mounted a hobby which, for the sake of his reputation, he must ride to death. The reduction of the Civil Service estimates is a subject to which he appears to have devoted an amount of attention which ought to qualify him to inaugurate reforms. He began with the Royal Family, and he has at length reached—sublime consummation!—judges' clerks. Referring to the evidence given before the Select Committee, Sir CHARLES said, "In the course of the examination it was shown that the higher clerks of the judges are paid at so extravagant a rate for duties almost non-existent, that the practical effect was to enable men high up at the Bar to have their work done for them in the anticipation of those sinecures at a lower rate than they would otherwise have it done for, on the assumption that the leading men at the Bar would subsequently be Judges, and that therefore those clerks would be paid out of the public pocket." Has Sir CHARLES DILKE any notion of the manner in which barristers' clerks are paid? When we inform him that before their employers are made Judges, clerks are paid out of the public pocket quite as much, and sometimes more than they get from their "sinecures" as Judges' clerks, he may possibly be surprised. A barrister "high up in his profession" does not pay his clerk anything, and certainly no bargain is made between them with a view to the possibility—remote in all cases save those of the law officers of the Crown—of the barrister being promoted to the Bench. The suitor pays the clerk's fee independently of the fee to the barrister, and thus it will be seen that Sir CHARLES DILKE's quibble is based upon a mistaken hypothesis. The hon. baronet is altogether wrong in supposing that Judges' clerks have nothing to do, and the excuse for any outcry is completely taken away by the Judicature Act, which has revised the remuneration to be given to officials connected with the Judges. The leading journal has described Sir CHARLES DILKE as ransacking the contents of a forgotten chest discovered in a neglected hay loft. Not only so, but it would seem that he has no leisure to discover that the abuses which he embellishes and holds up to our eyes, are either in course of abolition or of no public moment or interest whatever.

WHEN the Judicature Act was, as a Bill, passing through the House of Commons, we predicted determined opposition to sects. 64 and 65. They are what we termed the "district registry" clauses of the measure, and they transfer to offices scattered over the face of the country a large amount of business which has hitherto been done in London in connection more particularly with common law actions. Why action was not taken to amend or expunge these sections when they were only clauses in a Bill we do not understand—we urged it strenuously enough. We thought it more particularly to the interest of London agents that the transfer of preliminary steps in common law actions to the country should not take place, but it will appear by a circular, which we reproduce elsewhere, that country solicitors see that the operation of the Act will be very inconvenient. The signitaries of that circular dislike the prospect of being compelled to employ casual agents in cases where their clients are defendants. They would much prefer to employ their well-known London agents, and if the work is to be done at a distance they would prefer that it should be done in London. The proposal made is that the operation of sect. 64 should be so modified that a defendant residing three miles from the district registry, who swears that he has a good defence, may, as of course, transfer the proceedings to the principal registry. Under the Act such transfer can only be made upon the order of a Judge. There is a rumour that the operation of the Judicature Act will be postponed for twelve months. Defects are showing themselves which seem to render this desirable, apart from the probability that the rules could not be prepared with thoroughness in the limited time now at the disposal of the draftsmen.

A SOMEWHAT important question with reference to the operation of the bankruptcy of a prisoner upon an order of a criminal court for the payment out of the prisoner's moneys of the costs of the prosecution, was raised in Reg v. Roberts before the Queen's Bench last Michaelmas Term, and reported by us to-day. A fraudulent stockbroker having become bankrupt, all his property, of course, became vested in his trustee. The bankruptcy took place between the date of his apprehension and conviction. Sect. 3 of the Act to abolish forfeitures for treason and felony (33 & 34 Vict. c. 23), provides that it shall be lawful for any court by which judgment shall be pronounced or recorded upon the conviction of any person for treason or felony in addition to such sentence as may otherwise by law be passed to condemn such person to the payment of the whole or any part of the costs or expenses incurred in or about the prosecution and conviction for the offence of which he shall be convicted. The order was rightly made, and the question was whether the trustee under the bankruptcy was entitled to the money in the possession of the prisonor at the time of his arrest. The court intimated that if the bankruptcy had taken place before the apprehension, there might be some doubt; but as it took place afterwards, the order of the court operated upon the money in the prisoner's possession at the time of his arrest. Mr. Justice BLACKBURN, however, was careful to guard himself against saying that money not the prisoner's own found in his possession would be affected by such an order. He said, "I wish to guard against being supposed to say that simply because money is found on the person of a prisoner at the time of his apprehension, the Criminal Court may make an order for the payment of the costs of the prosecution out of it. I am inclined to think that if moneys belonging to someone else are found in his possession, e.g., if the person arrested is a banker's clerk carrying a bag of gold to the bank, the banker who is the owner of the money would have a right to interfere in such a case against any order being made. I also wish to guard myself against being supposed to decide that if the prisoner was adjudicated bankrupt by reason of an act of bankruptcy committed before his arrest, the trustee might not have a right to intervene. Nothing appears in the present case to raise this point. So far as appears the prisoner at the time of his arrest was in possession of moneys which he might have disposed of in any way he pleased."

SALES BY TRUSTEES.

THE question what protection trustees are entitled to claim from their character as such in acting as vendors of property, is one of general importance, which is usefully illustrated by a recent case in which Vice-Chancellor Malins and the Lords Justices differed in their views—as unfortunately too frequently happens. In the court below the case of Dance v. Goldingham is reported 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 391, and in the Lords Justices Court, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 166. We may mention that the case is additionally interesting by reason of some observations of Lord Justice James on the costs incurred in consequence of reckless allegations of fraud which were made but abandoned.

There was a sale of land by trustees, and amongst the conditions of sale were the following: "(4.) All recitals and statements in abstracted instruments, and in the particulars of sale shall be accepted as conclusive evidence of the matters recited, stated, or referred to. (5.) The title to the several lots shall commence with an indenture dated the 12th March 1858, under which the premises became vested in the vendors as trustees for sale, and no earlier or other title shall be called for or required except at the purchaser's expense in all things, and as the vendors are trustees for sale, they shall not be called upon to enter into any other covenant than that they have done no act to encumber."

In the indenture of 1858 a settlement of 1819 was recited which conveyed a certain estate to trustees for the term of 500 years upon trust in the events which happened to raise the sum of 3000*l.* for the portions of the children of the marriage as therein mentioned and subject thereto the estate stood limited to the use of the husband and wife for their respective lives, with remainder to their first and other sons in tail. The trustees were unable to discover this settlement of 1819, and therefore inserted the fifth condition in the conditions of sale. By the deed of 1858, in the events which happened, the plaintiff in the suit became entitled to one thirty-fifth share of a residue of the proceeds of the estate, which was a very small amount. A person became the purchaser of the estate who knew of the existence of the deed of 1819.

The principal ground relied upon by the bill was that the fifth condition of sale was unnecessarily depreciatory, as a good marketable title could be deduced by the vendors from a date anterior to the year 1858, and that the conditions had materially prejudiced the sale, and prevented various persons from bidding, and that in consequence the property had been sold at less than its market value. The sale was also impugned on the ground of fraud, and also on the ground of insufficient advertisements, but neither of these grounds was sustained.

The Vice-Chancellor came to the conclusion that by the exercise of ordinary diligence the deed of 1819 might have been found, and disapproved of the condition inserted in the conditions of sale. But going thus far he hesitated to decide that the sale was to be set aside as against an innocent purchaser. "With regard to the duties of trustees," his Honour said, "there is very considerable difficulty in this case; because, although there may be a remedy against the trustees, a man who attends a public auction bids for property under certain conditions to which he is not party or privy, the motive for introducing which he knows nothing of, and it is very difficult to say, that if the conditions are unduly restrictive, the purchaser who attends the auction must necessarily lose the advantage of his purchase. I do not think the doctrines of this court go to that extent."

The Vice-Chancellor fully recognised that where the purchaser had been mixed up with the irregularity of the trustees he could not receive the benefit of his purchase; but he held that the fact of his knowledge of the existence of the deed of 1819—knowledge which others might have acquired by due diligence—did not affect his purchase. The right of the cestui que trust to file a bill in such a case was clearly upheld by the Judges in both courts; and the Lords Justices were particularly emphatic in saying that, however small the interest of the cestui que trust, the right would still exist. Consequently, the point was reduced to this—was the sale so conducted as to bind the cestui que trust?

As we have said already, the Vice-Chancellor recognised the negligence of the trustees in not discovering the deed of 1819, but he considered that the condition of sale objected to was not so prejudicial to the property as to call for the exercise of the power of the court to deprive an innocent purchaser of his purchase. Some cardinal doctrines were laid down in the judgment of Lord Justice James which should be carefully considered—(1) The cestuis que trust have a right to have their property sold without anything being done which is calculated to depreciate it. (2) The purchaser under a mere contract of purchase is not entitled to insist upon a transaction being completed which, as between the cestui que trust and the trustees, is a breach of trust. If, the Lord Justice reasoned, the contract of purchase was one which could not be enforced against the purchaser as having its origin in a breach of trust, neither could he claim the performance of it.

The Lords Justices were most particular in the protection which they threw around the plaintiff, holding that it would be pessimi exempli to say that where a breach of trust has been committed against a cestui que trust interested in a very small share of the trust property, the loss sustained by him by reason of the breach of trust is so small that it is not sufficient to justify a Chancery suit. Upon this point there can hardly fail to be general concurrence; but the position of a purchaser under such circumstances seems to be one of considerable hardship. True, he was reminded that he had a remedy against the trustees, but what remedy the court did not proceed to say.

TRUSTEES AND THE COMMUTATION OF EAST INDIA STOCK.

HALF or nearly half of the City article of the Times of the 14th inst. consists of criticisms and correspondence in relation to the conditions offered by the India Office to the proprietors of East India Stock for the commutation of their holdings. This stock, amounting to £6,000,000, bears, under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 85, a ten and a half per cent. dividend, and is made liable to redemption at the rate of £200 sterling for £100 stock on or after the 30th April 1874, on twelve months' notice in writing signified by the Speaker of the House of Commons by the order of the House given to the East India Company. Such notice having, as we presume, been duly given for the 30th April next, the Secretary of State for India, acting, or assuming to act, under the powers conferred by the 36 Vict. c. 17, by a circular or advertisement of the 3rd inst. offered in lieu of £2,350,000 of the said stock £3,000,000 Reduced £3 per cent. Annuities at the rate of £220 Reduced £3 per cent. Annuities for £100 East India Stock, and £2,000,000 India Four per Cent. Stock redeemable in 1888 at par, being at the rate of £200 of such stock for £100 East India Stock. It was announced in the same circular that the applications of proprietors for either of the above stocks would receive attention in the order in which such applications should be received at the India Office; and that so much of the East India Stock as exceeded the £2,350,000, and so much of that amount as did not come in for commutation under the circular, would be paid off in cash on the 30th April. The 31st of the present month was fixed as the last day for receiving assents.

East India Stock being one of the stocks in which trustees have been by law empowered to invest, the issuing of the circular would in many cases put trustees on an inquiry whether they would be safe in accepting it. There can be no question that both the stocks offered by way of commutation are stocks which trustees (unless expressly forbidden by the language of their trusts) might have purchased in the open market with funds under their control. In the case of the India £4 per Cent. Stock the point is expressly provided for by 36 Vict. c. 32, s. 16. Purchase, however, differs from commutation, and the 36 Vict. c. 17, s. 12, expressly requires a trustee, executor, or administrator to obtain the direction of a Judge of the Court of Chancery in England or Ireland, or of the Court of Session in Scotland, before assenting to a commutation in cases where all persons beneficially interested, do not consent in writing, or are under legal disability, or if the trust be such that persons yet unborn may become interested. As has been pointed out in the money article of the Times, this section will operate as a trap for unwary trustees; and as to cautious trustees desirous of commuting, but unwilling to do so without the sanction of the court, the delay incident to an application to the court, even if an order should be obtainable before the end of the present month, will so far prejudice them in the race for priority that the sanction of the court after all the trouble and cost of obtaining it, will probably be altogether nugatory. To what extent however is a trustee who disregards the requirements of the 12th section and commutes without the direction of a Judge liable as for a breach of trust? The answer to this question we apprehend must depend on the price of the stock accepted in commutation on the 30th April next. If the stock so accepted be then less in amount than the redemption value of the East India Stock (£200 per centum) would suffice to purchase in the market, for the difference in value a trustee would, we think, be clearly accountable. If, however, at that date the difference in value were in favour of the stock accepted in commutation, but the price of the stock afterwards fell, and the difference were the other way, the question of the liability of the trustee would, it might fairly be argued, depend on whether the fact of the stock accepted in commutation being a stock which a trustee would be justified in purchasing and holding would exonerate him from a fall in price occurring subsequent to the 30th April. Unless on the ground that the original breach of trust had not been purged, we think a trustee would not be liable for a fall in price; and we think also that the doctrine of non-purgation of a breach of trust would be carried to an extreme and unreasonable extent, if applied to such a case.

Since writing the above we observe that it has been notified by the India Office that applications for the full amount of £2,000,000 India Four per Cent. Stock have already been received.

THE fifth case to which we shall refer, viz., The Executors of Perry v. The Queen, relates to probate duty, and the facts of which were as follows:—R. P., by his will made in 1857, in effect gave all his real and personal property to his son, C. P., and appointed him sole executor. C. P., by his will made in 1864, gave all his real and personal estates to the suppliants and another upon certain trusts for the benefit of his children and others, and the suppliants were appointed executors. C. P. died in 1864 and R. P. in January 1865, and at the death of the latter the children of C. P. were all living. The suppliants proved the will of C. P. in March 1865, swearing the value of the personal estate under 60,000*l.*, and they paid a stamp duty of 750*l*. The suppliants also obtained a grant of letters of administration with the will annexed to the estate of R. P., swearing his estate under 70,000*l*., and they paid a stamp duty of 900*l*. It was subsequently, however, ascertained that the estate of R. P. was under the value of 60,000*l*. The personal estate proper of C. P. was of the value of 900*l*. only, and his debts exceeded that sum. The suppliants had, however, treated the residuary personal estate of R. P. as part of the estate of C. P., but afterwards considering they had improperly included it in their estimate for probate as it was not the property of C. P. at the time of his death, they presented a petition for a return of the duty.

The case turned upon the construction of the 33rd section of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), which enacts that where any person, being a child or other issue of the testator, to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed for any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person, shall die in the lifetime of the testator, leaving issue, and any such issue of such person shall be living at the time of the death of the testator, such devise and bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of the such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention appear by the will.

The court considered that the bequest to C. P. was to take effect as if he had survived his father, and that if he had actually survived probate duty would have been payable, and therefore it was payable.

Although perhaps the decision of the court is legally and technically correct, it cannot for a moment be assumed that the framers of the Act contemplated such a liability when they framed the section. Previously to the passing of the Wills Act if a legatee or devisee died in the testator's lifetime, the gift to such legatee or devisee absolutely lapsed. It was, however, considered hard that grandchildren should not take the interest given to their parents by their grandfather's will, and the clause in question was inserted in the Wills Act. Upon its face it bears evidence that it was drawn with a view of benefiting the children of the deceased child, and the children alone, for the legacy is only to take effect in the double event of the children surviving the testator as well as their parent. We presume at the time it was considered best to leave the mode of distribution to the child, but whether wisely or not is doubtful. The effect of the section is to give a deceased child, who leaves a child who survives his grandfather, absolute power of disposition over the property, so that it not only becomes liable to the payment of his debts, but may be left by his will so that his child may never obtain any part of it, and it appears from the case under consideration that others besides the children were beneficially interested under the will. It appears to us that it would have been better to have provided that the issue who survived the child should take the benefits intended for him.

So far as regards the question of duty the effect of the section appears preposterous, as it causes probate and legacy duties, and probably succession duty to be payable in respect of property to no interest in which a man was entitled at the time of his death. Let us suppose a simple case: A. has two sons, B. and C., equally between whom he leaves the whole of his property. B. dies intestate in his father's lifetime, leaving an only son, D., who survives A. But for the Wills Act, D., as the son of the eldest son of B., and consequently A.'s heir-at-law, would have taken the share of the realty given to B., and D. would also have taken one-fourth of A.'s personal estate. Probate duty would have been payable under A.'s will, and D. would have paid succession and legacy duty at one per cent., upon the real and personal property passing to him. By the operation, however, of the Wills Act, D. takes one-half of the real and personal estate of A., subject however to the payment of the following duties, viz., probate duty under A.'s will, and legacy duty at 1 per cent., under A's will, and succession duty at 1 per cent., calculated upon the basis of the age at which B. would then have been, the fiction making B. survive the testator, and sect. 21 of the Succession Duty Act by the aid of the fiction making the duty payable as if B. had been in existence, and if he had then been in existence his death would not have caused a cesser of the duty so all the instalments must be paid. In addition to which there would be probate duty, and legacy, and succession duties under the intestacy of B.

Doubtless the proposed effect of sect. 33 was a boon to a portion of the public, but why should they pay so dearly for it? Why should the public in doing what was simply an act of natural justice fetter the gift with such heavy conditions? We think the matter only requires to be properly stated and an alteration will take place in the law. As the issue of the deceased child are the only objects considered worthy of notice, it seems to us that the desired end would best be attained by providing that where any person, being a child or other issue of the testator to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed for any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person shall die in the lifetime of the testator leaving issue, and any such issue of such person shall be living at the death of the testator, the lapse of such devise or bequest shall operate in favour of such surviving issue in such and the same manner as it would have done had such issue been the only lineal issue of the testator, unless a contrary intention appear by the will.

The sixth case to which we shall refer, viz., Attorney-General v. Lemas, has also reference to probate duty. We have not yet received our report of this case, but we gather from that given by the Times of the 21st Nov. last that the facts were as follows: B. by will devised and bequeathed his real and personal estates upon trust for conversion and investment of the proceeds to be held upon trust, after payment of certain legacies and annuities, for B.'s children on their attaining the age of twenty-one years with a gift over in case of their all dying under that age. B. left an only child, a daughter, C., who died, unmarried, under twenty-one, and the gift over failed to take effect as, we presume, at the death of B., so that at B.'s death C was, as his heiress-at-law and next of kin, absolutely entitled to his real and personal estate, subject to the payment of debts, and the legacies and annuities. At the death of C. the real estate had not been sold, but the Crown claimed probate duty upon its value upon the ground that the direction for sale had caused an absolute conversion in equity for all purposes, and that view was entirely adopted by the court.

As we before remarked, there is at least one instance in which a direction to sell real estate does not effect an out and out conversion even as regards the beneficiaries themselves. The instance to which we refer is in case one of such beneficiaries is a married woman. It is perfectly well known that where a married woman is entitled, under wills and other instruments, dated previously to 1857, to a reversionary interest in personal property, she cannot in any manner (except by fraud: Lush's Trusts, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 591) dispose of such interest so as to deprive herself of her equity to a settlement out of the fund upon its falling into possession, or of her right to the fund in case she survive her husband. If, however, the reversionary property consist of realty directed to be sold, a married woman can, with her husband's concurrence, and by deed acknowledged by her, effectually dispose of her interest in the money to arise by the sale: (Briggs v. Chamberlaine, 23 L. J., N. S., 635, Ch., decided by Lord Hatherley, then Wood, V.C.; and Tuer v. Turner, 24 L. J., N. S., 663, Ch., decided by Lord Romilly.)

The true principle of conversion seems to us to have been stated by Lord Cranworth in Taylor v. Taylor (22 L. J., N. S., 743, Ch.), where, after dissenting from the decision in Phillips v. Phillips, he said: "The result of the authorites is, that where there is a direction to sell real estate, and that the proceeds shall form part of the personal estate, the true construction is that the conversion takes effect so far as is necessary to carry out the objects and intentions of the testator, but when the object fails the direction does not take effect. In case of lapse the personal estate goes to the next of kin, not because the testator intended it, but because the law carries it to them. So as to the real estate, the law gives it to the heir, and the law would do the same if the testator said that his real estate should not go to his heir but omitted to make a valid devise of it." In that case Lord Cranworth decided by reason of the death in the testator's lifetime of one of the legatees of a mixed fund, arising from the conversion of the real and personal estate, that the share of such legatee in the proceeds of the real estate of the testator was to be deemed real estate, and had lapsed for the benefit of the co-heiresses of the testator.

In the case before us, C. obtained the real estate, because she was B.'s heiress at law, and as she could not, being an infant, alter the actual state of the property when it passed to her, and as it was in fact real estate at the time of her death it must, we should think, pass in its actual condition. The conversion did not affect the real nature of C.'s estate, although the trust for sale would, had it been exercised in C.'s lifetime, have changed the property coming to her from realty to personalty. As, however, no change had taken place at her death, the property would pass as real estate to the person who would then be the heir at law of B. if he were the last purchaser.

THE LIABILITIES OF HUSBANDS FOR DEBTS CONTRACTED BY THEIR WIVES.

THE subject of a husband's liability for debts contracted by his wife, having recently attracted much attention, we reproduce a portion of a pamphlet published two years ago by Mr. Falconer, a Judge of Welsh County Courts. This pamphlet contains his Honour's exposition of the law applicable to the case then before him. He said:

The law presumes that contracts made by the wife for the supply of articles necessary for the use of the family are made with the authority of the husband, that is, that they are made by her as his agent. As a rule, other contracts made by her must be shown to be made by his express authority; that is, his authority is not implied, and his assent must be distinctly given or obtained. So far back as the year 1703, in the case, Etherington v. Parrot (Raymond's Reports, 1006), Lord Chief Justice Holt said: "If a husband turn away his wife (that is, without sufficient cause) he gives her credit wherever she goes, and must pay for necessaries for her; but if she run away from him he shall not be liable to any of her contracts, for it is the cohabitation that is the evidence of the husband's assents to contracts made with his wife for necessaries. But if the husband has solemnly declared his dissent that she shall not be trusted, any person that has notice of this dissent trusts her at his peril after, for the husband is only liable upon account of his own assent to the contracts of his wife, of which assent, cohabitation causes a presumption —for the wife has no power originally to charge her husband, but is absolutely under his power and government, and must be content with what he provides. Here were sufficient necessaries provided, and also the husband had forbidden anyone trusting her, and the notice to the defendant's servant, usually employed by him in his trade, was a good notice to his master the plaintiff—and he, the plaintiff, cannot charge the defendant." In that case the wife was described to be an extravagant woman, who used to pawn her clothes to buy drink, and used to be drunk, and the husband gave notice to the defendant's servant to trust her no more. On that occasion, also, Chief Justice Holt added, what may show the necessity of giving notice to the husband of the dealings of the wife—that if a wife take up silks and pawn them, before they are made into clothes, the husband shall not be liable for the silks, because they never came to his use. (See Comyn's Dig: Tit: Baron and Feme: [Q]:—If a wife buy necessary apparel for herself, the assent of the husband shall generally be intended, but, in these days, a tradesman is only safe when he informs the husband that the wife proposes to charge his credit. Lord Abinger, in the case of Emmett v. Norton (8 C. & P. 510), said, "Where the wife is living with the husband, and in the ordinary arrangement of her husband's household she gives orders to tradesmen for the benefit of her husband and family, and these orders are proper and not extravagant, it is presumed she has the authority of the husband for so doing. This rule is founded on common sense, for a wife would be of little use to her husband in domestic arrangements if she could not order such things as are proper for the use of a house, and for her own use, without the interference of the husband." In another case, Freestone v. Butcher (9 C. & P. 643), that learned Judge said, "The general rule is that the wife cannot bind her husband by her contract, except as his agent. There are, however, cases in which the juries may infer such agency. In the case of orders given by the wife in those departments of her husband's household which she has under her control, the jury may infer that the wife was the agent of her husband until the contrary appear. So for such articles as are necessary for the wife—such as clothes—if the order is given by the wife, and she is living with her husband, and nothing appear to the contrary, the jury do right to infer agency; but if the order is excessive in point of extent, or, if when the husband has a small income, the wife gives extravagant orders, these are circumstances from which the jury will infer there was no agency on the part of the wife. The tradesman who supplies the goods takes the risk; and, if the bill is of an extravagant nature, such as the husband would never have authorised, that alone would be sufficient to repel the inference of agency. Where a gentleman of the legal profession had a limited income, and his wife incurred debts for millinery to an extravagant amount, the jury found, and they were quite right in so finding, there was no authority on the part of the wife to contract the debt."

The plaintiff in such cases has the burden of proof cast on him, and he is bound to prove that the goods were supplied on the credit and by the authority of the husband. If the thing is out of the ordinary course the jury ought to insist on strict proof. In this last case the jury found for the defendant, under the direction of the Judge. The fact of the husband having sold some of the goods supplied to the wife and received money for them, did not in itself, in point of law, make the husband liable for them—it was only a circumstance for consideration in determining the question, whether, in buying the goods the wife were acting by the authority of the husband or not. The question is, whether the goods were supplied on the credit of the husband, and if the wife were acting as the agent of her husband in the purchase of such things which were necessary for herself and family, her implied authority as such agent being unchecked by the act of the husband.

The inference of non-agency may be presumed when the circumstances under which the debt was contracted are such as the assent of the husband to the contract cannot be presumed: (Montague v. Benedict, 3 B. & C. 631; Seaton v. Benedict, 5 Bingh. 28.) In Montague v. Espinasse (1 C. & P. 359), Lord Chief Justice Abbot said: "Persons parting with goods ought to take some care—for if tradesmen are allowed to trust rashly, any man may be ruined. If the tradesman who wishes to run no risk on the question, whether the purchase is made by the authority of the husband or not, it is his duty, in all cases where the order is large, to ask the husband before the goods are supplied—whether the order was given by his authority or not? In short, the question is, were the goods supplied by the authority of the husband or not? If they were, then, and then only, is the plaintiff entitled to a verdict." In another case (1 C. & P. 505), against the same defendant, that most eminent Judge, Sir J. Holroyd, said: "I am clearly of opinion that a husband can only be liable even for necessaries furnished to his wife when the wife is not supplied by him; and, therefore, if a tradesman supplies her, without first ascertaining that she is not supplied by her husband, or that she has authority from her husband, such tradesman supplies the goods at his own risk. If she is supplied with necessaries by her husband, a tradesman can only recover for such goods as he supplied to her with her husband's assent; and, that the husband did assent must be proved, on the part of the plaintiff, in every action founded on such supply of goods. And to charge the husband, it is not enough that the wife should have asserted that she had her husband's authority; for, if it were, a wife might go to many tradesmen and pretend she had her husband's authority for the orders she gave, and any man might be utterly ruined in a few days by the imprudence of his wife. And Lord Tenterden added, that their decision in this case would be sometimes beneficial to husbands, fathers, and friends; but it would be most beneficial to those who have goods to sell, as it will make them more cautious of letting their goods go from their hands without knowing who will pay for them; and, he added, that the experience of courts of justice shows us, that persons very frequently indeed have sold their goods without the slightest chance of ever getting paid the price for them."

In the case of Atkins v. Curwood (7 C. & P. 756), it was held that if a married lady, who has sufficient clothes, go contrary to her husband's wish to a watering-place, and go to balls, and for that purpose orders dresses, some of them of an expensive kind, and unsuitable to her husband's circumstances, the husband is not bound to pay for any of them, and in an action for the price of the dresses it is immaterial whether the plaintiff knew these facts or not, and whether the clothes the lady had before were paid for or not, and the fact that the husband afterwards saw some of the dresses does not vary the case, if it be shown that he disapproved of the conduct of his wife in ordering them. Lord Abinger told the jury, "It was the duty of the wife to have lived with the greatest economy, instead of that she ordered expensive dresses to go to balls. If you believe on your oaths these things were necessary for this lady, considering the situation and circumstances of her husband, and that she had no supply from any other place, give your verdict for such amount as you think proper; but, if I were in your place, I should not hold out such an example—an example, the consequence of which may be that any man may be consigned to a prison by the extravagance of his wife." Again, in the case of Spreadman v. Chapman (8 C. & P. 371) Lord Denman said: "The defendant in this case is only liable on an implied contract, and it is not for him to prove having given notice to the plaintiff not to supply goods to his wife, but for the plaintiff to satisfy you that the defendant's wife contracted this debt by the authority of her husband." And in the case of Misen v. Pick (8 C. & P. 373) Alderson, B., said, "The question does not turn on want of notice, but the agency of the wife. Did the wife contract the debt by the authority of her husband?" "If the husband leaves the wife without support, the law says, he gives to her authority within reasonable limits to pledge his credit for things necessary for her support. If he makes her a reasonable allowance, she has no authority to contract debts in his name at all; but that the plaintiff had notice of the reasonable allowance is immaterial. He trusts a married woman at his own risk." When a husband living with his wife makes her sufficient allowance for dress, he is not liable for dresses which have been supplied to her without necessity, and without his knowledge, and the fact of the wife having, within a particular period, purchased various articles of dress from different tradesmen, is admissible in evidence to rebut the presumption of implied authority which arises from the marriage: (Renaux v. Teakle, 8 Ex. 680.) The proper question for the jury, even when the husband is living with his wife, is not merely whether the goods, in respect of which the action was brought, were necessaries suitable to her station, but whether upon the facts proved she had any authority, express or implied, to bind her husband by the contract, and when the former question alone was put, the court granted a new trial: (Reid v. Teakle, 13 C. B. 627; 2 Smith's L. C. 422.)

The logical conclusion from these cases is well expressed in the decision of the well-known case of Jolly v. Rees (33 L. J. 177; 15 C. B. 628) made in the month of February 1864. It was argued in that case, that, unless notice to the contrary were given, the wife, during cohabitation, was the accredited agent of her husband, and had a right to pledge his credit for necessaries, though he ordered her not to do so, and although he had not supplied her with an adequate sum of money in order to purchase necessaries. The defendant (Rees), prior to the year 1861, had told his wife not to pledge his credit with anyone, and desired her, if she wanted any necessaries, to come to him, and he would give her an order on a tradesman for them, and he would supply her with money. All the household affairs were managed by the defendant, and he gave orders to the tradesmen for things required in the house, but the goods in question were supplied to the wife without his knowledge. The goods supplied consisted of drapery and millinery goods suitable for persons in the position of Mrs. Rees, and the prices were fair and reasonable. The defendant allowed £50 a year to his wife to dress herself and daughters, but this sum was not paid with regularity. The defendant did not know of these goods, some of which had been ordered by letter—others by orders given to the plaintiff's traveller—and finally, a large order having been given by the wife, the plaintiff very properly wrote to the defendant and asked "if it had his concurrence." The defendant replied that it had not, and that he did not intend to be answerable for the goods already supplied. Chief Justice Erle said the plaintiff raised a presumption of the defendant's liability, by showing that the goods were ordered by defendant's wife for the use of herself and children, while living with him. The defendant rebutted this presumption by showing that he had forbidden his wife to take goods on his credit, and had told her if she wanted money to buy goods she was to apply to him for it, and there was no evidence that she had so applied and had been refused. The plaintiff proved in reply that the goods were necessaries suitable to the estate and degree of the defendant; that the wife had £65 a-year, and that the defendant had promised to allow £50 a year in addition, but had not paid it regularly, and had not supplied her with such necessaries, or with money sufficient for the purchase thereof. The plaintiff also showed that he had received no notice of the defendant's prohibition to his wife to take up goods on his credit. These facts were in effect found by the jury, and the question was raised: Whether the wife had authority to make a contract binding on the husband for necessaries suitable to his estate and degree, against his will, and contrary to his order to her, although without notice of such order to the tradesmen? My answer, said the Chief Justice, is in the negative. The wife cannot make a contract binding on the husband unless he gives her authority, as his agent, to do so. . . . Taking the law, he said, to be that the power of the wife to charge the husband is in the capacity of being his agent, it is a solecism in reasoning to say that she derived her authority from his will, and at the same time to say, that the relation of the wife creates the authority against his will, by a presumptio juris et de jure from marriage; and, if it be expedient that the wife should have greater rights, it is certainly inexpedient that she should have to exercise them by a process tending to disunion at home and pecuniary distress from without. The husband sustains the liability for all debts; he should, therefore, have the power to regulate the expenditure for which he is to be responsible, by his own discretion, and according to his own means; but if the wife, taking up goods from a tradesman, can make her husband's liability depend on the estimate by a jury of his estate and degree, the law would, practically, regulate his expenses by a standard to be set up by that jury—a standard depending upon appearances—perhaps assumed for a temporary purpose with intention of change. Moreover, if the law is clear, that the husband is protected from the debts incurred by the wife without his authority, not only in the ranks where wealth abounds would speculations on the imprudence of a thoughtless wife be less frequent than they are, because less profitable—but also in the ranks where the support of the household is from the labour of the man, and where the home must be habitually left in the care of the wife during his absence at his work—more painful evils from debts which the husband never intended to contract, would be avoided. Mr. Justice Byles did not agree with the majority of the court. "The husband," he said, "seems to me to represent her to tradesmen as being, within certain limits, his domestic manager, and, therefore, responsible for her contracts within the margin of the apparent authority. No private reservation of authority, or private agreement between husband and wife, not communicated to a tradesman honestly dealing with the wife by supplying necessaries for the family, in the ordinary course of domestic affairs, can affect the tradesman's right to rely upon the apparent authority of the wife."

Ruddock v. Marsh (1 H. & N. 601; 28 L. T. Rep. 290) was a case where an action was brought to recover £10 for groceries. The defendant was an engine-fitter, and his business frequently took him away from home for a fortnight or three weeks, and sometimes for a month at a time. By arrangement, his master paid his wife, during his absence, 25s. per week. This was paid regularly, but the wife, nevertheless, incurred the debt of £10 for grocery, which was sued for. Chief Baron Pollock delivered the judgment of the Court of Exchequer (Nov. 1856) and said: "That the wife was the agent of the husband to bind him with respect to those matters which are usually under the control and management of the wife," and sustained a judgment against the husband." In Holt v. Brian (4 B. & Ald. 252), it was held that where a husband not separated from his wife makes an allowance to her for the supply of herself and family with necessaries, during his temporary absence, and a tradesman with notice of this, supplies her with goods, the husband is not liable for the debt.

So again, in the case of Jewsbury v. Newbold (26 L. J. 247; 29 L. T. Rep. 128) (May 1857, Ex.), it was said, "to establish credit being given to the wife, it must be shown that there was a distinct private transaction. When you say, 'credit was given to the wife,' you mean credit was given to her to the exclusion of him—not affirmatively to her, but negatively to to him." The verdict against the husband was therefore upheld: (See Bentley v. Griffin, 5 Taun. 356.)

Even when the authority of the wife is unrevoked, the question still may be—what are necessaries? (2 Smith's L. Cas. 430 (1862) and Ryder v. Wombwell, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 609; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491.)

In the case of Schoolbred v. Baker (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 359) (Nisi Prius, before Willes, J.), the action was for the price of two silk dresses and a silk mantle, amounting in value to £28 19s. 10d. The plaintiffs were drapers, and the defendant was lessee of the "restaurant department" of a first-class hotel. The delivery of the goods, and that the prices were fair and reasonable, were admitted on the part of the defendant. The defence was—(1) That the wife was not entitled to pledge the credit of her husband, as by arrangement with him she received £100 a year to supply her personal wants, and on condition that she was not to pledge his credit. (2) That the goods were not necessaries, being unsuitable to the station in life of the defendant. On cross-examination the defendant said: "My wife lives with me; I have seen the mantle and dress on my wife, and I have been out walking with her whilst she wore them." Willes, J., told the jury: "The husband had a right to be master in his own house, and to determine what his expenses are to be. A man may have £10,000 a year, and yet his wife may not be entitled to live in a manner proportionate to that income. He may, if he wish, spend only £100 a year, and if he tells his wife so, she must conform to his wishes on the subject. The wife, if not restrained by the husband, would be the person to give orders for the ordinary clothing of the family, and in the absence of express stipulations on the part of the husband, it would be presumed the wife had authority to order things suitable to the condition in which the husband may choose to live. That raises the question as to the suitability of the articles, supplied to the wife, to their station in life. The other question is a very important one, as it affects the peace and happiness of many families. Most serious and lamentable results would follow, if when the husband says to the wife "You must not pledge my credit," the wife were allowed, nevertheless, to run up large bills, which the husband would be compelled to pay. The law has been laid down in this court that the husband has a right to control his wife in this respect and that if it is made out that he has told her so, he will not be responsible. In a case where the husband says that he has really put a check to extravagance which might lead to his ruin there is no remedy against him. But a jury, in order to come to this conclusion, must be satisfied that the husband's objection did not consist in mere grumbling at the wife's expenditure, but that he really restrained her from pledging his credit. I think the real question for a jury in such cases is whether it is made out to their satisfaction that the husband did put a check on his wife beyond a sort of grumbling which is said to be the privilege of every man in the country. Whether that has been done in the present case depends on the evidence of the husband himself; his act in paying the former bill which his wife owed to the plaintiff seems inconsistent with his statement. I am obliged to be very distinct in laying down the law on this subject, on account of a case alluded to, and an observation made in a case in the Court of Queen's Bench. Verdict for the plaintiff.

In the case of Phillipson v. Hayter (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 556), the plaintiff carried on business as a stationer in a town in which the defendant lived. The defendant was a man of about £400 a year, rented a house of £70 a year, and kept three servants. The wife had purchased goods on credit from the plaintiff, in respect of which he claimed £20 4s. 2d. Among the articles purchased were a gold pen, a pencil case, guitar, music, &c. They were bought without the husband's knowledge. Byles, J. left it to the jury to say "whether the articles were necessaries suitable to the degree of the defendant, and whether the plaintiff had ever countermanded his wife's authority to pledge his credit. The jury found for the full amount. The Court of Common Pleas set aside the verdict. Willes, J. said: "The defendant's wife eloped, and he then, for the first time, found that she had professed to pledge his credit for things which he never saw or heard of, and which he never authorised her to order, but which he is nevertheless expected to pay for. If he is to pay, it must be because the law infers from the relation of man and wife an authority from the husband to the wife to pledge his credit for such things. The wife, no doubt, has authority to order what seems necessary for the style in which the husband chooses to live, so long as the article belongs to the domestic department, which is ordinarily under her control. That such and such an article does fall within that department must be shown affirmatively by the person who seeks to make the husband liable. It is not sufficient for the plaintiff to prove that an article which was ordered by the wife, which may or may not be suitable to the condition which the husband chooses his wife to assume, or which may or may not fall within the wife's department, but he must show so strong a probability that the articles were within the wife's department, and were suitable to the condition of the husband, that a reasonable mind may conclude that she was authorised by the husband to pledge his credit for them. It will not do in this or any other case, when the burthen of proof is on the plaintiff, to prove a state of facts which are equally consistent with the affirmative or negative, and which only show there may or may not have been authority." But in the case of Burton v. Scott (23 L. T. Rep. N.S. 566) it was admitted that the defendant and his wife in 1864 went to the plaintiff's shop, sometimes together and sometimes separately, and ordered goods, and goods ordered by her were paid for. In 1866 there was a deed of separation, but no part of the supplies related to the period of separation. In 1867 the wife again lived with the husband, under a second deed, which gave her £400 a year for household expenses, which was paid to her. There was no covenant to apply it for that purpose, and it was not stipulated that it was to be the only fund for this purpose, though it was to be all which was to be paid to her, and she was told not to pledge her husband's credit. The goods for which payment was claimed were ordered by her from Oct. 1866 to Dec. 1869. The husband had given no notice to the plaintiff or to other creditors not to give credit on his account. The jury were told that if the husband had so acted as to lead tradesmen to believe the wife had authority, and the tradesmen had honestly so believed, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, otherwise not. The jury found for the plaintiff, and leave to move against the verdict was refused.

The opinion of that most able Judge, Sir William Erle, the late Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas who concurred with him, in the case of Jolly v. Rees (15 C. B. 628), there can be little doubt, will be treated as the truest exposition of the law as it is of morals. This latter case does not disturb the general rule, that the wife may bind the husband in the purchase of necessaries; but it does limit the operation of the rule, in case the husband has refused to her permission, as his agent, to purchase on his credit, even though the refusal is unknown to the tradesman. I can only repeat what I said on a former occasion, namely, the only safe course in dealing with the wife is to inform the husband that his wife has proposed to pledge his credit for goods, and to ascertain from him that he assents to his wife purchasing goods in his name, and pledging his credit for the payment of the same. I have also constantly given this general rule of dealing to plaintiffs—"If one person purchases goods, and another person is represented as the person who is to pay, apply to such other person without delay, and ask if he assents to pay." So, in order to be safe, this rule of virtue, of safety, of prudence, and of morals, may be extended to all cases, and it should be especially acted on, by directly asking the husband if he approves of his credit being pledged by his wife. There is nothing but what is fair, and just and proper in such a course. It should also be remembered that the wife has only the authority of an agent for her husband, and it is in the power of the husband expressly to revoke that authority at any time. He is the master of his own household, and of his own purse, but he would not be master of his own purse, or of the liberty of his own person, if, when he permits one dealer of goods to supply necessaries to his wife, the law enabled four or five other persons at the same time, engaged in a similar branch of trade, to supply, as is frequently done, what they may call "necessaries" without his consent. Any person, however, who has recognised the "dealing" on credit of his wife with a particular tradesman, must give express notice to such tradesmen when the authority of his wife to charge his credit is to be revoked by him. Those persons who desire a new law "to protect poor people," should understand that poor people have, at this time, the most perfect protection. By their own act they can revoke the authority of wives to pledge their credit. If the husband has never authorised any dealings with a particular tradesman, he can revoke his wife's authority without notice, though some public notice shows the bona fides of the revocation. When he has sanctioned any such dealings, then notice of the revocation of the wife's authority to continue to deal with such tradesman on credit, must be expressly given to the tradesman. The husband has perfect power to protect himself, and no tradesman is safe in dealing on credit with any married woman unless he informs the husband that his wife has asked to pledge his credit.

Credit is more important to working men than very many persons believe. The old small debt courts afforded sufficient evidence of this fact. Imprisonment formerly for the non-payment of a debt satisfied the debt, and judgments were for the early payment of the whole amount which few could pay in one sum. Now, orders to pay are made according to the means and ability of the defendant to pay, and if he cannot pay he ought not, by law, to be committed to gaol. But this is the real difficulty, namely, what is to be done when there are old and recent judgments, and new debts are inevitable? Who is to have priority? The effect of the accumulation of debts, and the necessity of some limitation of time within which judgments which current wages cannot discharge may be extinguished, are disregarded, but these important facts also ought not to be forgotten, namely,

1. That the wages for a week or a fortnight of workmen are in many occupations kept in hand by the masters, in order to secure the performance of contracts, and that the shopkeepers supply food and clothing to the workmen during the days the payment of wages is thus suspended.

2. That in the case of a retail dealer, the wholesale merchant expects to be paid out of the profits on the sale of the goods he supplies. When that fund is wasted the source out of which payment was expected is gone. Bankruptcy is then inevitable. When, however, credit is given in respect of income, salary for services, or wages, so long as a portion of these sources of income is applicable to the payment of debts the fund which authorised the credit exists.

It may be advisable if when debts under £6 remain unacknowledged for one or two years, the remedy to sue were suspended; and that judgment for debts under this amount should cease to be operative in two or three years.

LAW LIBRARY.

The Income Tax Laws. By STEPHEN DOWALL, M.A., Assistant-Solicitor of Inland Revenue. London: Butterworths.

THIS is simply a collection of the Income Tax Statutes made easy of reference by a copious index. There are foot-notes, but they are necessarily few, there having been scarcely any decisions on the Acts. The Acts are connected together by cross-references, and for practical purposes the compilation must prove very useful.

A Manual of Public Health. By W. H. MICHAEL, Barrister-at-Law, W. H. CORFIELD, M.A., M.D., and J. A. WANKLYN, M.R.C.S. Edited by ERNEST HART. London: Smith, Elder, and Co.

IF in the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom, this ought to be a reliable work. It was called forth by the Public Health Act of 1872, and contains directions for carrying that enactment into operation. The subject is one not generally interesting to lawyers, therefore we notice the book shortly. A most curious and interesting feature is the Index to Statutes Pertaining to Public Health—of which there are no less than eighty-one, all passed in the present reign—and the Index to powers under the Sanitary Acts, covering sixteen octavo pages. These indices are followed by an Index to Penalties under the Sanitary Acts, occupying nearly fifteen pages. These indices indicate the nature of the labour imposed upon those who have to apply our sanitary laws, and prove the value of a good manual. We have looked through this manual, and it appears to be carefully done, and the style is clear. We think it may be safely adopted as a guide.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

FREQUENT complaints reach us from country solicitors upon the subject of the jurisdiction exercised by the Lord Mayor's Court of London, whereby process is served all over the country, and the clients of country solicitors, being defendants, are put to the great expense and inconvenience of defending actions for small amounts, the proceedings in which are conducted often at the greatest possible distance from their place of business and residence. As to pleading to the jurisdiction, solicitors are quite right in advising their clients not, as a rule, to venture on such a course. Nothing can well be more unsatisfactory than the present system of service out of the jurisdiction.

THE Times has published a letter from a non-professional correspondent upon the subject of curtailing the length of deeds and documents of all kinds, under the heading "Legal Conveyance of Land." The writer ignores the important fact that the length of deeds and documents is owing simply to the complex relations between different members of society which have gradually grown up since the "fourteenth century," referred to by the writer in question. The prolixity of which he complains is due, in a great measure, to efforts on the part of lawyers to meet the requirements of the age in which they have lived. Solicitors, in whose hands the conveyancing business of the country is, would be only too delighted to reduce the length of deeds, but this can only be done by altering the present system of remuneration.

WE are not in possession of full particulars of the system of education adopted by the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, but we may call the attention of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society in Chancery-lane to the fact that in Ireland it is not sufficient to attend lectures before examination, but those who attend them must receive from the Professor of Law, for the Profession of attorneys and solicitors, a certificate that they have attended at least three-fourths of each course of lectures before such attendance is allowed to avail the student in any way. We do not think it wise to leave students to attend lectures or not, as they please; moderate compulsion is very beneficial. Perhaps lectures are not the best mode of imparting knowledge of the law; but making attendance at them while they are in vogue compulsory, ensures to most students a better knowledge of the matter lectured on than they would probably have otherwise.

A CORRESPONDENT asks to be allowed to complain through our columns of the practice by which a successful defendant in a common law action in the Superior Courts is called upon to pay the court and jury fees. He urges that the plaintiff, whether successful or not, should be called upon to bear this expense, on the ground that it often happens that cases are taken to trial when the plaintiff has little chance of success, is poorly off, and the defendant, if successful, can get nothing from the plaintiff, and has in fact after all to pay his own costs. Our correspondent contends that the practice should be assimilated to the practice which prevails in County Courts, where, except under certain circumstances, the plaintiff is obliged to pay the hearing fee before his case is allowed to go before the court, and so also in case a jury is empannelled to try his cause. Although we do not altogether agree with the contentions of our correspondent, we think that the suggestion is one which, if adopted, might work some improvement on the present system.

A SOLICITOR writes to us inquiring whether solicitors will have an audience in the Exchequer division of the High Court in Bankruptcy business by virtue of the section of the Act which transfers to that division the business of the London Bankruptcy Court. We refer our correspondent and our readers to the following Acts and sections of Acts of Parliament upon the subject: Sect. 70 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, gives solicitors audience in the London Bankruptcy Court; sect. 3 of the Judicature Act constitutes the London Bankruptcy Court part of the Supreme Court; sect. 34 of the Judicature Act transfers Bankruptcy business to the Exchequer division of the court; sect. 87 of this Act operates as a saving clause to the right of audience to which solicitors were entitled before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act came into operation. We are, however, at present, in great doubt as to the intended operation of this last provision, but will only say that we are most decidedly of opinion that solicitors ought in bankruptcy business—from the very nature of that business—to have an equal audience with the Bar in the Exchequer division of the High Court, and we must add the expression of a hope that proper accommodation will be afforded them in court. The present accommodation in the London Bankruptcy Court for solicitors is simply shameful—in truth, a corner is appropriated to them. Wherever attorneys have audience their convenience and comfort should be considered.

THE next preliminary examination will take place on Wednesday, the 11th Feb. next, and the following day.

NOTICES for the intermediate examination in Easter Term next must be left with the Secretary of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, on or before the 14th March next. Renewed notices for examination in Easter Term next must be given between the 2nd and 7th of Feb. next. Renewed notices for admission in the same term must be left at the Master's Office, in the Queen's Bench, and also be entered in the books kept for that purpose at Judge's Chambers between the 2nd and 7th Feb. next.

THE Town Council of Edinburgh have unanimously appointed Mr. William Skinner, an eminent writer to the Signet, who was admitted in 1848, to the office of town clerk, at a salary of £500 a year.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PRACTICE — DISCOVERY — REDEMPTION SUIT AGAINST MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION—ANSWER —ACCOUNT OF RENTS.—A redemption suit against a mortgagee in possession forms no exception to the general rule that a defendant who answers must answer fully. A defendant to such bill, who by his answer admits himself to be redeemable, cannot decline answering interrogatories as to the state and particulars of the account, which it is one of the objects of the suit to take, but the court will prevent the plaintiff from pressing for any such minuteness of discovery as would be either vexatious or unreasonable. Decision of Malins, V.C., affirmed: (Elmer v. Creasy, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 632. Chan.)

CORPORATION — PAROL CONTRACT — MUTUALITY — CORPORATE SEAL — TOWN CLERK — AUTHORITY OF.—In pursuance of a resolution of the town council of K., passed on the 17th July 1872, and entered in the corporation books, and sealed with the corporate seal, a market, and the tolls thereof, belonging to the corporation, were, on the 18th July 1872, put up to lease by auction for the term of one year, with an option to the lessee to extend the term to three years. By the conditions of auction a lease was to be granted on or before the 17th Aug. 1872, the rent to be paid by equal monthly payments, the first payment to be made to the clerk of the lessors "immediately on the fall of the hammer," and the lessee to be always one month's rent in advance; and in case of failure by the lessee to perform any of the conditions, the rent then already paid was to be absolutely forfeited, and the lease to be null and void. The lessee was also, "at the fall of the hammer," to produce two sureties, to be approved of by the lessors or their clerk, for the payment of rent and performance of covenants, and who were also forthwith to sign the conditions and lease. The defendant, as the highest bidder, became the purchaser or renter of the said market and tolls for one year, and thereupon the contract at the foot of the conditions was signed by him, and also by the town clerk, although the latter was not authorised by the corporation under seal so to do. The defendant also paid one month's rent in advance to the town clerk; but, not being prepared with the required sureties, a week's time was given to him by the town clerk to produce them, which period was subsequently further extended. A report of the above lettings to the defendant, and his payment of the month's rent, was made to the corporation, and was adopted by them by a resolution of the 7th Aug. 1872, entered in the corporation books, and sealed with the corporation seal. By some mistake the keys of the market buildings were, without the authority of the corporation, and contrary to the instructions of the town clerk, handed by the market keeper to the defendant, who retained them for some days, but who never otherwise obtained possession of the market, and never received any tolls. The defendant finally failed to produce his sureties, the corporation relet the premises to another person, and brought an action against the defendant to recover damages for his breach of contract. Held by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B. and Pigott and Pollock, BB.). that as the contract was not under the corporation seal, or signed by an agent of the corporation duly and expressly authorised by them under seal for that purpose, and as the resolution of the 7th Aug. was after the breach, and so too late to operate as a ratification, and there was no such part performance as to entitle the defendant in equity to a specific performance on the part of the plaintiffs, the contract was void for want of mutuality, and the plaintiffs' action thereon was not sustainable. Per Kelly, C.B.—The town clerk, although he is the agent and representative of the corporation for many purposes, is not their agent to make any contract for the sale or letting of lands, or the leasing of any incorporeal hereditaments, unless he is duly and expresly authorised under the seal of the corporation for that purpose: (The Mayor and Corporation of Kidderminster v. Hardwick, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 611. Ex.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—AGREEMENT "FOR TWELVE MONTHS CERTAIN, AFTER WHICH TIME EITHER PARTY TO BE AT LIBERTY TO TERMINATE AGREEMENT BY THREE MONTHS' NOTICE" —CONSTRUCTION.—By an agreement in writing, made the 23rd Jan. 1871, under which it was agreed that the defendant should, so long as the agreement was in force, serve the plaintiff in the capacity of commercial traveller, at a specified salary per annum, payable fortnightly, it was stipulated that the agreement between the parties should be "for twelve months certain, after which time either party should be at liberty to terminate the said agreement by giving to the other a three months' notice," &c. But if the said plaintiff should be desirous of terminating this agreement without notice, after twelve months, or before any notice has expired, he may do so on paying the said defendant the sum of £50. The defendant entered the plaintiff's service accordingly, and on the 7th Dec. 1871 received a letter from the plaintiff, informing him that his services would not be required after the 23rd Jan. 1872, when the employment consequently ceased. An action being shortly afterwards commenced by the plaintiff, to recover a debt alleged to be due from the defendant under the above agreement, the defendant pleaded, by way of set-off, a sum of £50, which he alleged was due to him as liquidated damages, in lieu of notice, as provided by the agreement; and, on a special case stated for the opinion of the court thereon, it was held, by the majority of the Court of Exchequer (Bramwell and Pigott, BB., dissentiente Kelly, C.B.), that the agreement was for twelve months certain, determinable at the expiration of that period, at the option of either party, without any notice at all; that the stipulation for a three months' notice applied only to the possible continuance of the service after the twelve months, which possibility was contemplated by the agreement; and that, therefore, the defendant was not entitled to the set-off claimed, and judgment must be given for the plaintiff: (Langton v. Carleton, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 651. Ex.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—DEED OF SEPARATION —COVENANT TO PAY ANNUALLY TO WIFE "DURING JOINT LIVES AND SO LONG AS THEY SHALL LIVE SEPARATE AND APART"—SUBSEQUENT ADULTERY OF WIFE—DIVORCE AND DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE.—Where a husband, by a deed of separation between himself and his wife, covenants to pay an annuity to trustees for her use and benefit, "during the joint lives of (the husband) and the said L. H. (the wife), and during so long time as they shall live separate and apart," the facts of the wife's subsequent adultery, and her divorce, and the consequent dissolution of the marriage by a decree of the Divorce Court, are no answer to an action by the trustees for the arrears of the annuity, and a plea setting forth these facts, forms, in the absence of an express proviso to that effect in the deed, no bar to such action, the covenant being absolute and unconditional to pay the annuity so long as the two individuals "should live separate and apart." So held, on demurrer to a plea by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell and Pigott, BB.): (Charlesworth and another v. Holt, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 647. Ex.)

LUNACY — JURISDICTION — COURT OF CHANCERY — IMPROPER CONDUCT OF SOLICITORS. — Unsoundness of mind gives the Court of Chancery no jurisdiction, and a person who institutes a suit in chancery on behalf of a person of unsound mind does so at his own risk, and must bear the consequences of any unnecessary and improper proceedings. Orders of the Court of Chancery obtained by a solicitor who has officiously instituted such a suit give him no protection, and he will have to pay the costs of unnecessary inquiries made under such orders. But if, on the person of unsound mind being found lunatic by inquisition, the solicitor can satisfy the court in lunacy that he has acted bona fide for the benefit of the lunatic, that court will reimburse him out of the lunatic's estate.—A suit instituted on behalf of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition abates immediately upon his being found lunatic by inquisition, and all proceedings taken in the suit after the inquisition are irregular and void. Decision of Wickens, V.C., reversed: (Beall v. Smith, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 625. Chan.)

Correction.—In the report in our last issue of a meeting of the Legal Practitioners' Society, Mr. Webster is made to say, "Accountants to the Court of Chancery being the worst of these quacks." For "Chancery" substitute "Bankruptcy."

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Monday, Jan. 12.

(Before BLACKBURN, QUAIN, and ARCHIBALD, JJ.)

Re AN ARTICLED CLERK.

ALTHOUGH this was merely an application to allow Thomas Robert Oakley, an articled clerk, to be discharged from his articles and to enter into fresh articles, it raised a question of some importance of its kind. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 10, articled clerks are prohibited from holding any office while serving their articles. The applicant in the present case, on the 19th April in last year, obtained a commission as lieutenant in the Royal Monmouthshire Militia, and he went out with his regiment for twenty-seven days, from the 19th May to the 14th June. On the 9th Dec. he resigned his commission. Fearing that his twenty-seven days' service might bring him within the provisions of the Act, he now applied to be allowed to be discharged from his present articles, and to enter into fresh articles for a time which would cover the twenty-seven days.

Bosanquet appeared for the applicant.

Attorney for the applicant: Raw, agent for Oakley, of Monmouth.

PROCEDURE IN FOREIGN COURTS—COMMISSIONS AND LETTERS ROGATORY.

IN the Philadelphia District Court the following case has occurred:—

Exceptions to execution of letters rogatory.

The defendant, by his attorney, excepts to the form and execution of letters rogatory issued out of this court in above case on behalf of plaintiffs, and filed September 15th, 1873, and now makes the following specifications of such exception:

1. The execution of the said letters rogatory is illegal and void in that it appears that the attorney and counsellor of the plaintiffs was present at the taking of the depositions of witnesses.

2. The form and execution of said letters rogatory are illegal and void, inasmuch as the exhibits or papers directed to be shown to the witnesses in the interrogatories exhibited by plaintiffs did not form part, nor were they attached to the letters rogatory by this court.

3. The form and execution of the said letters rogatory are illegal and void because there are attached to the execution of the said letters rogatory different papers, purporting to contain copies of orders, minutes, directions, and other matters not forming part of or belonging to the execution of the said letters rogatory.

Argument of plaintiffs against the exceptions.

First exception. The proceedings are in a foreign court, and as a court does not proceed of its own motion, an attorney must appear to represent a party exactly as if the case had not been sent to another court for its co-operation; the defendant had the right to appoint an attorney in the foreign court to represent him, and see that his interests were guarded.

The attorney followed the practice of his country, the only practice known to the foreign court. We cannot dictate the method to be pursued by a court which we beg to act for us out of courtesy, but the presence of an agent who took no part in putting questions would be no ground of objection even to a commission: (1 T. R. & H. 525; Otis v. Clark, 2 Miles, 272.)

As this is a question of practice, it comes under the general head of objection raised by the third exception.

Third exception. The practice of the foreign court is the law of procedure. Letters rogatory, unknown to common law, are derived through admiralty from the civil law. They promise to reciprocate the courtesy which they ask, and our statutory provisions assimilate the course of procedure in the execution of letters rogatory addressed to us, to the ordinary practice of our courts: Act of 8th April 1833, sects. 18, 19, 20, and 21; Pamphlet Laws, 308; Purdon, 623. This establishes our recognition of the principle that the law of the country to which the letters are addressed governs the procedure to be adopted in executing them; this is the civil law. Fœlix says: "In that which concerns the provisions ordinatoriæ litis, that is to say, the mode of calling the witnesses and parties before him, the forms of making up the report, &c., the judge ought to observe the laws of his country:" 1 Traité du Droit International Prive, 476, s. 276, ad finem et seq. The civilians make a distinction, which corresponds to our division of form and substance between the forms and regulation and the merits, "between ea quae litis formam concernunt ac ordinationem and ea quae spectant decisoria causae et litis decisionem." There are, says Merlin, two sorts of judicial formalities, some which pertain only to the trial (l'instruction) and are relative only to the procedure, for which reason the jurists call them ordinatoria litis; the others, which pertain to the merits of the case, the omission or absence of which neutralises or destroys the action, and which the jurists designate by the words decisoria litis:" (1 Fœlix, 453, s. 233). The admiralty practice is stated in all the text-books to be the same as above indicated in the civil law. "If these letters rogatory are received by any inferior judge he proceeds to call the witnesses before him by the process commonly employed within his jurisdiction, examines them on interrogatories, or takes their depositions, as the case may be; and the proceedings being filed in the registry of his court, authentic copies thereof, duly certified, are transmitted to the court a quo, and are legal evidence in the cause": (Conkling's U. S. Admiralty, 294, citing Hall's Admiralty Practice, Conkling's Treatise, 601; verbatim in Benedick's Admiralty, s. 533: Return in same manner prescribed by U. S. in Admiralty, 1 Abbott's U. S. C, Practice, 84). There has been so little doubt upon the point that but one case has arisen under letters rogatory in the United States, and in that, Judge Washington clearly indicates the distinction which separates commissions from letters rogatory, though the case did not require him to define its extent: (Nelson v. U. S., 1 Peters, C. C. R. 237).

Second exception. The instructions are not attached, nor need other documents be attached by the court. The reference to the original judgment did make it a part of the letters as completely as if it had been attached physically, and if the attorney for defendant had thought it not properly a part of the document he should have moved to strike it out: (1 Tr. & H. 521). The doctrine of relation by reference needs no authority; it is too well established. The identity of the document is sufficient: (Dodge v. Israel, 4 W. C. C. R., p. 323.) The sentences could not be attached, for they had not become a part of the record, and were only referred to as judicial proceedings in Germany, which might become part of the case if the witnesses should show any connection between this suit and the sentences of Meyer Leberman and his sons. No exhibits or documents are mentioned, and if the question had been irrelevant, the defendant's attorney might have moved to strike it out: (1 Tr. & H. 521). Now that the connection has been proved, it is too late for any objection: (Hill v. Canfield, 13 Smith, 77).

Dec. 20, 1873. Opinion by THAYER, J.—In Hollister v. Hollister (6 Barr, 449), the Supreme Court, adopting the rule of the English Chancery Courts, which prohibits the attorneys of the parties from being present at the taking of depositions under a commission, affirmed the ruling of the court below which had rejected depositions taken by commissioners where it appeared that the attorney of one of the parties had been present that no notice of the time and place of the taking of the depositions had been given to the other party. The principal exception in the present case is, that the plaintiffs' attorney was present when the letters rogatory were executed. These letters were issued by this court, and addressed to any judge or tribunal having jurisdiction of civil causes at the city of Schweinfurt, in the Kingdom of Bavaria, and Empire of Germany. They were executed with great ceremony and solemnity by the Royal Circuit Court at Schweinfurt, in Bavaria. By the minutes of the proceedings, duly certified, which have been returned to us, it appears that on a certain day the royal atterney, Wolfsthal, acting on behalf of the plaintiffs, filed an information and motion in the Royal Circuit Court, at Schweinfurt, in Bavaria, praying them to execute the letters rogatory. Thereupon the court ordered the depositions to be taken by the commissioned Judge Craemer, who appointed a day for that purpose, and notified the plaintiffs' attorney, Mr. Wolfsthal, to attend at the time and place stated. Mr. Wolfsthal appeared accordingly, and produced before the judge commissioned to take the depositions a decree of the Royal Bavarian Court of Appeals for Lower Franconia and Aschaffenburg, dispensing with the oath of secrecy on the part of the witnesses (who were Royal Counsellors of the Circuit Court), a dispensation which appears from the papers to have necessary before the witnesses could be permitted to answer the plaintiffs' sixth interrogatory. The commissioned judge then proceeded to administer the interrogatories and to receive the answers of witnesses; at the conclusion of which he adds: "Whereas, the legal representatives of the plaintiffs, the royal attorney, Wolfsthal, after reading these present minutes for himself, had not any further motion to offer, the above proceedings have been closed, and the same caused to be signed by him for confirmation." Whereupon the attorney, Wolfsthal, signed the papers in obedience to the requisition of the judge. I have thus noted, with some particularity, the proceedings of the foreign tribunal, in order that the precise extent of the participation of the plaintiffs' attorney in those proceedings might appear. It is to be observed that there is a very broad distinction between the execution of a commission and the procuring of testimony by the instrumentality of letters rogatory or letters requisatory, as they are sometimes called. In the former case the rules of procedure are established by the court issuing the commission, and are entirely under its control. In the latter, the methods of procedure must, from the nature of the case, be altogether under the control of the foreign tribunal which is appealed to for assistance in the administration of justice. We cannot execute our own laws in a foreign country, nor can we prescribe conditions for the performance of a request which is based entirely upon the comity of nations, and which, if granted, is altogether ex gratia. "We therefore request you that, in furtherance of justice, you will, by the proper and usual process of your court, cause such witnesses to appear before you, and there to answer, &c., &c." This is the formula in which the letters are couched. We cannot dictate the methods to be pursued by the court whose assistance we invoke. The rules and practice of the foreign court must be the law of procedure in such cases. Letters rogatory were unknown to the common law. They came to us from the civil law, though the Admiralty Courts, and the civilians seem to agree that in all that concerns the forms of procedure in such cases, the Judge ought to observe the laws of his own country. We may therefore adopt, in the present case, the language of Washington, J., in Nelson v. The United States (1 Peters C. C. R. 237): "Where the business is taken out of the hands of persons appointed by this court the ends of justice seem to require a departure, in some degree, from the ordinary rules of evidence. To what extent this departure would go has never yet been decided in this court, and it is not necessary at present to lay down the limitation." Doubtless, if it should appear that any of the substantial requisites of justice, as we administer it, had been omitted, or any unfair advantage given to either party, we would reject the depositions, no matter what solemnities of form had attended the taking of them. But under the circumstances attending the execution of these letters rogatory by the Royal Circuit Court at Schweinfurt, we cannot regard the attendance of the plaintiffs' attorney as a circumstance of that character. He appears to have attended in pursuance of a notification of the judge who took the depositions, and was required by him to verify them by his signature. It thus very plainly appears that his attendance was altogether in conformity with the rules of procedure in the foreign tribunal, and the character of the court which executed our request affords ample assurance that his presence was not permitted in any degree to prejudice the defendants' rights. The other exceptions require no discussion.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT, SECTIONS 64, 65.

The following circular has been issued by the undersigned:—

Dear Sir,—By these sections as they stand, a plaintiff is at liberty to issue his writ where he pleases; but a defendant in an action commenced by writ issued at a district registry office, must enter an appearance there, and all subsequent proceedings, down to and including entry for trial, must be taken there, unless a judge's order can be obtained to transfer to London.—(See the sections printed below.)

The consequence will be, in cases where the defendant's solicitor resides away from the district registry town, that he must employ an agent in that town. This will apply not only to what are now called common law actions, but to every description of suit.

While we are ready to believe that in certain parts of the country these sections will work beneficially, we dislike the prospect of being compelled to employ casual agents in cases where our clients are defendants. We had much rather be at liberty to employ our well-known London agents (and we have freely told them so), and if the business is to be done at a distance, we much prefer London to any other place. We object to being obliged in every case to incur the expense of applying to a judge. Moreover, we believe that our clients' interest agrees herein with our own convenience.

We believe that very many country solicitors, not hostile to the establishment of district registries, agree with us in this matter. We think it would be well that before the rules of procedure are finally settled, they should have an opportunity of expressing their sentiments, so that an effort may be made, if the result of the inquiry warrants it, to secure freedom of action. Time being of importance, we take this preliminary step on our own responsibility.

We assume that local opinion is in favour of retaining in Lancashire regulations like those already in force there, and we have no desire to interfere with the convenience of others, but only to provide fairly for our own.

The question we ask is, whether you had rather

A.—Keep section 64 as it stands.

B.—Have its operation modified (elsewhere than in Lancashire) to this extent—that where a defendant in any action can swear that he believes he has a good defence on the merits, he may enter his appearance in the principal registry (or in some other way remove the proceedings thither) as of course, or

C.—Give the defendant such right only where he resides three miles from the district registry office in which the writ was issued.

We request the favour of your reply, addressed to any one of the undersigned, whose name is distinguished thus.*

You can reply with the least trouble to yourself, by simply returning the circular with your name and address written at foot, and a cross placed against A., B., or C., according to your opinion. It will be convenient to mark the envelope, "J. Act."—We are, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

Sec. 64. Subject to the rules of court in force for the time being, writs of summons for the commencement of actions in the High Court of Justice shall be issued by the district registrars when thereunto required; and unless any order to the contrary shall be made by the High Court of Justice, or by any judge thereof, all such further proceedings, including proceedings for the arrest or detention of a ship, her tackle, apparel, furniture, cargo, or freight, as may and ought to be taken by the respective parties to such action in the said High Court down to and including entry for trial, or (if the plaintiff is entitled to sign final judgment or to obtain an order for an account by reason of the non-appearance of the defendant) down to and including final judgment or an order for an account, may be taken before the district registrar, and recorded in the district registry, in such manner as may be prescribed by rules of court; and all such other proceedings in any such action as may be prescribed by rules of court shall be taken, and, if necessary, may be recorded in the same district registry.

Sec. 65. Any party to an action in which a writ of summons shall have been issued from any such district registry shall be at liberty at any time to apply, in such manner as shall be prescribed by rules of court, to the said High Court, or to a judgment chambers of the division of the said High Court to which the action may be assigned, to remove the proceedings from such district registry into the proper office of the said High Court; and the court or judge may, if it be thought fit, grant such application, and in such case the proceedings and such original documents, if any; as may be filed therein shall, upon receipt of such order, be transmitted by the district registrar to the proper office of the said High Court, and the said action shall thenceforth proceed in the said High Court in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced by a Writ of Summons issued out of the proper Office in London; or the court or judge, if it be thought right, may thereupon direct that the proceedings may continue to be taken in such district registry.

THE TWO BRANCHES.—I am pleased to see such a society as the Legal Practitioners Society started, and I hope it may go seriously to work in ameliorating the position of both barristers and lawyers and in bringing about any legislative enactments which may be necessary in regard to them. I cannot say that I advocate a fusion of the two branches of the legal Profession. I do not see that it is necessary, or that the present system is to be complained of. But what I do wish is, that there may not be any unreasonable barriers kept up which prevent any member of one branch migrating into the other. Supposing, for instance, an admitted man finds he has a peculiar aptitude for advocacy, or for any other reason, desires to be called to the Bar, I consider it unreasonable that he should be called upon to undergo another preliminary examination previously to being admitted a student of an Inn of Court, and still more that when, perhaps, he is a thoroughly efficient lawyer for all practical purposes connected with a junior barrister, he should be kept inactive for three years. At the most he should not be called upon to do more than undergo an additional examination in legal subjects. The regulations I complain of may have been all very well before the examinations for articled clerks at the Incorporated Law Society's Hall were initiated, but surely now there is a sufficient guarantee that admitted men have some legal knowledge, and do not require to be treated in the same manner as persons who have never studied law at all. I should like to hear the opinion of others upon this matter, and hope this may elicit some. I look upon the society just started as the very one which is wanted, if the good intentions already expressed are carried out. H. S.

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.—I see by the report in your journal that this is a society for the purpose of protecting solicitors and attorneys in their Profession from the intrusion of accountants and others. It is high time such a society was formed if the legal Profession, particularly the younger branch thereof, is to reap the legitimate fruits to which it is entitled. If energy is shown, to put a stop to the proceedings of unqualified persons I am sure every junior solicitor and attorney will join the society, if only asked. I, for one, feel that much credit is due to Mr. Ford for his trouble in undertaking the office of honorary secretary. A SOLICITOR.

CLERKS AS ADVOCATES.—In reading provincial and London reports of cases, I see continually the following: "Mr. A. B., from the office of Mr. C. D., appeared in the case." Would you kindly inform me in your next issue, assuming "A. B." to be admitted and certificated, by what authority he had audience. I have searched but without finding out. INQUIRER.

[The matter is entirely in the hands of the judges of the courts. Managing clerks are not entitled to appear as advocates for clients of firms, and may properly be objected to. But judges are disinclined to enforce the strict rule, and it is always an invidious and difficult task to insist upon it as against an opponent.—ED. SOLS'. DEP.]

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

FRAUDULENT CONVERSION OF MONEY BY AN AGENT—DIRECTION TO APPLY TO A GIVEN PURPOSE.—A stock and share dealer was in the habit of buying for S. gratuitonsly, and receiving cheques on account. On the 27th Nov. he wrote informing S. that £300 Japanese bonds had been offered to him in one lot, and that he had secured them for her, and that he had no doubt of her ratifying what he had done, and inclosing her a sold note for £336, signed in his own name. S. wrote in reply, "that she had received the contract note for Japan shares, and inclosing a cheque for £336 in payment, and that she was perfectly satisfied that he had purchased the shares for her." In fact, the bonds had not been offered to the dealer in one lot, but he applied to a stock jobber and agreed to buy three at £112 each, but never completed the purchase. Held, that S.'s letter was a sufficient written direction within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75, to apply the cheque to a particular purpose, viz., in payment for the bonds: (Reg v. Christian, 29 L. MONTGOMERYSHIRE QUARTER SESSIONS.

Thursday, Jan. 8.

(Before Earl POWIS (Chairman), Mr. C. W. WYNN, M.P., and other magistrates.)

REG. v. ESGAIRGEILIOG.

Inclosure — Commissioners award — Evidence.— Certificates as to making of road.

THIS was an indictment for non-repair of a road laid out some seventy years ago in the township of Esgairgeiliog, under a special Inclosure Act passed in 1797, the defendants being the inhabitants of the township. There was a similar prosecution twelve months ago, which failed for want of a duly attested copy of the commissioner's award, the township, however, being condemned in the costs, as the indictment was prepared under a justice's order, and the defendants did not show that the road was not a public highway. The present was an indictment at common law.

Marshall appeared for the prosecution, and Swetenham (specially retained), with J. M. Lloyd, for the defence.

The case having been opened, the Act of Parliament was put in, followed by a copy of the commissioner's award, produced from the custody of the lord of the manor (Earl Powis), which was made primary evidence by the Act. The Act specified that on the roads being completed, they should be certified to be "well and effectually made" by a surveyor appointed by the commissioner, and that on the certificate being filed with the court of quarter sessions, they should become repairable as other public roads on the manor (Kerry) were repairable by law. A certificate had been duly filed at the Easter sessions, 1810, by William Pugh, the surveyor so appointed, and was now produced by the deputy clerk of the peace; but upon his being sworn, Swetenham objected to its reception until the appointment of the surveyor and his taking of the oath of office had been proved, relying upon the case of R. v. Haslingfield. At any rate, on the authority of that case, it would be necessary to show by independent evidence that subsequent usage had been consistent with the award, before proof of the appointment and oath could be dispensed with.

Marshall said he had abundant evidence to prove the usage, but he relied first upon the well-known rule that documents thirty years old, produced from the proper custody, proved themselves; and then upon the other rule of evidence that where persons had acted in an official capacity it was necesary to prove their appointment, even where it had been under seal or was put in issue by the pleadings. He quoted the case of Williams v. Eyton in support of his argument.

The Court decided to admit the certificate without further evidence.

Mr. Evan Powell, the prosecutor, and Mr. Mickleburgh, a surveyor, were then called to speak to the condition of the road, and were examined at some length. On a question being put to the last witness as to his opinion upon its original formation, the court said they held the surveyor's certificate to be conclusive upon that point.

Swetenham said if that was so, the only course for him would be to abandon the defence and ask for a special case, as he had a number of witnesses to show that the road never was properly made at all. Before the court came to that decision, however, he should like to be allowed to give his reasons for holding that the certificate could not be conclusive.

The COURT said they were perfectly prepared to hear him.

The learned counsel then, in a speech of some length, argued that the expression in the Act that the roads should be well and effectually made, and certified so to be," showed that the certificate was not intended to shut out other evidence; that by the cases of Reg. v. Cumberworth, Reg. v. Edge Lane, and Bateman v. Glamorganshire Canal Company, it was decided that a road must be shown to be completely formed throughout before it becomes a charge upon the public, which he was prepared to prove was not the case here; that Reg. v. East Hagbourne indicated the same thing; and that the point was made perfectly clear in Cumitt v. Lady Maxse, decided last June, in which that doctrine was emphatically laid down.

Marshall, in reply, referring to the phrase "taken to by the public" used in the judgment in the last-named case, remarked that the doctrine of a voluntary adoption of a road by the parish being necessary before it became chargeable upon the public, had been abandoned many years, because, ever since the passing of the General Inclosure Act of 1801 (41 Geo. 3), there had been the security of an order of justices founded upon the report of a surveyor—a provision substantially continued and strengthened by the 23rd section of the Highway Act of Will 4. That security was provided by the Kerry Inclosure Act in this very certificate of the surveyor now contested, for it was not until that had been filed that the road became chargeable upon the public. In Rex v. Cumberworth, the judgment was founded upon this very want of a particular point of time determined by the Act at which the chargeability should commence; and not only so, but all the cases cited upon that point were those of turnpike roads or canals, the judgments being based upon the fact that concessions of land had been obtained from private landowners as one of the inducements for the passing of the respective Acts—a feature wholly wanting in this case. The great distinction of Lady Maxse's case was that the Inclosure Act there was passed in 1802, after the General Inclosure Act, and therefore subject to its provisions; while the Kerry Act was passed four years before it. Rex v. East Hagbourne, he submitted, had no application. As to the use of the copulative "and" in the phrase quoted from the Act, the necessity for using it would become apparent from the absurdity that would follow if the disjunctive "or" were substituted for it. The certificate was the proper legal evidence of the completion of the road; and if such testimony as that suggested by the learned counsel were admitted it would be adducing unofficial evidence to contradict that specially appointed by law.

The COURT intimated that it still held the certificate conclusive, and a verdict of guilty was then returned, subject to a special case upon that point. The penalty was fixed at £90.

MARITIME LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

OBSTRUCTION TO A TIDAL RIVER—OMISSION TO INDICATE OBSTRUCTION BY A SUFFICIENT BUOY.—By a local Act the defendants were authorised to construct in conformity with certain deposited plans, "and upon the lands delineated upon the said plans," a pier or landing stage, "together with such other works and conveniences in connection therewith," as they should from time to time think fit. Before the landing stage was commenced plans of the proposed works were to be deposited at the Admiralty for approval. The local Act was to be executed "subject to the powers and provisions" of the Public Health Act 1848, sect. 139 of which requires notice of action "for anything done or intended to be done" under the provisions. The defendants deposited plans (differing in extension from the plans under the Act) which received the approval of the conservators of the river, representing the Admiralty, and constructed the landing stage in conformity therewith. The landing stage was a floating one, and was moored by anchors lying in the bed of the river. The position of the anchors was indicated by a buoy, which, being carried down by the tide, became concealed from view. One of the anchors becoming displaced, stove in and swamped a vessel of the plaintiffs which was lawfully navigating the river. Held (1), that the anchor, although placed where it was for the benefit of the public, was an obstruction which the defendants could not have created without statutory authority, and was a nuisance to the river; (2) that the defendants were guilty of negligence in their management of the buoy, but (3) that inasmuch as the plans had received the approval of the Admiralty, such approval was tantamount to the sanction of the Act, so as to entitle the defendants to statutory notice of action. Notice of action must be given in a case of nonfeasance, just as much as in a case of misfeasance. Per Denman, J., Reg. v. Russell (6 B. &. C. 566) is overruled by Reg. v. Ward (4 Ad. & E. 384.): (Jolliffe v. the Wallasey Local Board, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 582. C.P.).

DAMAGE TO CARGO—BURDEN OF PROOF—BILL OF LADING—EFFECT OF TERM "QUANTITY AND QUALITY UNKNOWN."—In a suit against shipowners for damage to cargo the onus is upon the plaintiffs to show in the first instance that the goods were shipped in good order and condition before they can call upon the shipowners to show excuse for the injury done to the goods. A bill of lading stating that goods were shipped in good order and condition, but also containing an indorsement by the master, "quantity and quality unknown," does not admit, as against the shipowners, that the goods were shipped in good order and condition. Evidence of the condition of goods on delivery tending to show that the damage sustained could not be accounted for by any damage existing at the time of shipment, and that such damage, had it existed, must have been noticed by the master or officer in charge of the ship at the time of shipment, will not, where goods are shipped under a bill of lading endorsed "quantity and quality unknown" satisfy the onus cast upon plaintiffs seeking to recover against shipowners for damage to the goods. Positive evidence of the condition of the goods when shipped must be given: (The Prosperino Palasso, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622. Adm.)

CHARTER-PARTY—LIEN FOR FREIGHT—PART PAYABLE ON SIGNING OF BILLS OF LADING—BANKRUPTCY OF CHARTERERS—DISCLAIMER OF CONTRACT.—By a charter-party, after providing that the freight was to be at certain specified rates, it was agreed that £250 should be advanced in cash on signing bills of lading and clearing at the custom house of the port of shipment, and the remainder on a true and faithful delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge; and that for the security and payment of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and other charges, the master or owners should have an absolute lien and charge on the cargo. The loading of the ship was completed, and the ship was cleared, but she never started on her voyage, nor were the bills of lading signed. The charterer filed a liquidation petition, and the trustee under the liquidation disclaimed all interest under the charter-party. Held (affirming the decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy), that the shipowner was not entitled to a lien in respect of the £250 agreed to be paid in advance, inasmuch as the ship had never earned freight; the compensation to which the shipowner was entitled for the loss sustained by reason of the charterer's default was not freight, and the £250 did not come within the lien given by the charter-party: (Ex parte Nyholm, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 634. L. C. and L.JJ.)

REGISTRY OF SHIP—CERTIFICATE OF MERIT—LACHES.—The defendants were an association for the registry of iron ships, and classed the ships in a register of merit according to the reports of their own surveyors. A list from the register might be obtained by anyone. The plaintiffs were members of the association and the owners of a ship which in 1870 was ranked in the highest class in the register. The plaintiffs in 1870 made an alteration in the ship, and submitted her to the defendants' inspection, who, not approving of the alteration, entered in the registrar, "class suspended 1871," and refused to restore the previous first-class entry unless some further alteration was made. The advisability of the alteration was a matter of opinion, as since the alteration the vessel was classed in the highest rank at "Lloyd's" (London). The plaintiffs continued to use the vessel, but it was proved that her value had been depreciated in consequence of the entry in the defendants' register. On a bill being filed by the plaintiffs in Nov. 1873 to restrain the defendants from disposing of any copies of their list containing the words "Class suspended 1871," Held, on motion, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to relief, first, because the entry was the bona fide opinion without malice of the society to whose judgment the plaintiff had submitted the vessel; secondly, because of their laches in applying to the court for relief: (Glover v. Roydon, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 639. V.C. M.)

SPECIMENS OF A CODE OF MARINE INSURANCE LAW.

By F. O. CRUMP, Barrister-at-Law.

Definitions.

The communication of a fact, or the making of a statement by one party to the other tending to influence his estimate of the character and degree of risk to be insured against.

NOTE.—A representation is construed according to the fair and obvious import of words, and is equivalent to an express statement of all the inferences naturally and necessarily arising from it.

Phillips, sect. 550.

If ambiguous from design, the underwriter, if deceived, is discharged. If there be no design, and the underwriter might fairly have entertained a doubt as to the meaning, he is not discharged if he misunderstand it.

Brine v. Featherstone, 4 Taunt. 867; Freeland v. Glover, 7 East, 462.

If the representation is expressed in technical language, it may be interpreted by reference to the usage.

Chaurand v. Angerstein, Peake's N. P. 43.

A misrepresentation is a false representation of a material fact, by one of the parties to the other, tending directly to induce the other to enter into the contract, or to agree to terms exceptionally favourable to the former.

A misrepresentation may be made on a matter upon which no representation at all is necessary.

Phillips, sect. 529-30.

A material mis-statement by the assured through misconstruction of his information is a misrepresentation.

Macdonell v. Fraser, Dougl. 247.

Materiality.

Material facts are those which when stated may reasonably be supposed to have an influence on the judgment of the underwriter calculated to diminish the estimate of the risk which he otherwise would have formed:

Sibbald v. Hill, 2 Dow's P. C. 263.

If the fact be material, but do not affect the judgment of the underwriter, the false representation does not avoid the policy:

Flinn v. Headlam, 9 B. & Cr. 690.

A statement which ceases to be material before the risk commences need not be verified:

Phillips, s. 666.

The premium being lower than would have been the case had no representation been made, the presumption is that the subject matter of the representation is material to the risk:

Arn. 4th edit. 495; Court v. Martineau, 3 Dougl. 161: Bridges v. Hunter, 1 M. & S. 13; Phillips, s. 539.

Immaterial facts misstated by a party do not affect the contract unless made in answer to a specific inquiry; or being made fraudulently influence the other party; if so made and so operating the policy is void:

Phillips, s. 539, 540; Arn. 4th edit. 482.

NOTE.—A specific inquiry imports that the subject matter of the inquiry is considered material: (Phillips, s. 542.)

How made.

A representation may be by a mere implication by the policy itself, by a separate writing, or by words spoken:

Phillips, ss. 524-27; Stewart v. Morrison, Millar on Ins. 59; 2 Duer, 721-738; Arn. 4th edit. 481.

Binding Effect.

A representation being once made in reference to a proposed insurance, continues to be binding unless it is subsequently revoked or modified before the policy is executed:

Edwards v. Footner, 1 Camp. 530; Phillips, s. 547.

Representations are generally to be taken in relation to the time of underwriting the policy:

Arn. 4th edit. 504.

Consequences.

If either party, whether purposely or through negligence, mistake, inadvertence or oversight, misrepresents a fact which he is bound to represent truly, the other is wholly or partially exonerated from the contract.

Phillips, sect. 537.

But in the absence of moral fraud a substantial compliance with the terms of a representation is all that is required.

De Hahn v. Hartley, 1 T. R. 346; Pawson v. Watson, 2 Cowp. 785.

Exception.*—A representation that a ship is or was to sail on a particular day, must be strictly complied with:

Phillips, sect. 672; Arn. 4th edit. 498.

Where it is a reasonable conclusion from all the circumstances that the failure to comply with the strict terms of the representation has not substantially altered the nature of the risk as described in the policy, such non-compliance will not discharge the underwriter's contract:

Bize v. Fletcher, 1 Dougl. 234; Arn. 4th edit. 499.

A false representation of a fact necessarily preceding the commencement of the risk avoids the policy.

A representation having reference to the continuance of an existing state of things, non-compliance with it subsequent to the commencement of the risk avoids the policy ab initio.

Duer Ins. 696.

The transitory breach of a promissory representation does not exonerate the underwriter from subsequent losses.

2 Duer Ins. 697-8; Arn. 4th edit. 500-1.

Expectation, Opinion, and Belief.

An honest statement of an expectation, opinion, or belief, which turns out to be unfounded, will not affect the contract.

Phillips, sect. 551; Arn. 487, 4th edit.

Nor will a statement of expectation or belief as to a fact material to the risk by a person having no interest in the subject matter of the contract.

Bowden v. Vaughan, 10 East, 415; Arn. 488, 4th edit.

But if, with the intention to deceive, an expectation or belief is expressed of the possible truth of which the party expressing it knows nothing, the policy is void.

Arn. 486, 487, 4th edit.; Maule, J., in Evans v. Edmunds, 13 C. B. 777, 785.

A positive affirmative representation of material facts in respect to the future is, in effect, a stipulation that they shall be substantially as stated.

Ibid. s. 553; 2 Duer. Mar. Ins. 657.

A non-fulfilment of such a representation will defeat the policy if it occurs prior to or simultaneously with the commencement of the risk, or be a ground of forfeiture if it occurs afterwards.

Ib. Arn. 486, 4th edit.

Communicating Information received.

A statement relating merely to information received from others and communicated as such, the person making it is not bound to any substantial compliance with it, but he must show that he repeated truthfully such information:

Arn. 4th edit. 490.

Exception.—If the information be communicated by an agent to his principal, it being the duty of the agent to give such information, the latter repeating it, is bound by it as by a positive representation.

Ib., citing Gladstone v. King (1 M. & S. 35), which however was a case of concealment where the damage claimed for as an average loss was by reason of the concealment of the accident which had happened, held excepted out of the policy. The principle stated doubtless follows from it:

Phillips, s. 564; Fitzherbert v. Mather (1 T. Rep. 12) is quite to the point.

Knowledge of the Insurer.

To relieve the assured from the consequences of a misrepresentation on the ground that the underwriter has the means of learning the truth of the facts represented, it must be shown that he actually did obtain the information.

Mackintosh v. Marshall, 11 M. & W. 116; Bates v. Hewitt, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 595; Proudfoot v. Montefiore, Ib. 511; Nicholson v. Power, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580.

Waiver and Revocation.

A representation is waived by the underwriter who executes a policy inconsistent in terms with such representation.

Bize v. Fletcher, 1 Dougl. 284.

The operation of a representation may be neutralised by the assured confessing his mistake before the policy is executed, or stating that he will not hold himself bound by it, or by controlling or qualifying it by a subsequent statement.

Arn. 4th edit. 499, 500.

Representation to first Underwriter.

A misrepresentation made to the first of several underwriters may (semble, it does) affect the contract with all.

Arn, 4th edit. 506 (see Ellenborough, C. J., Foster v. Pigou, 1 M. & S. 13.

Essentials.—The representation must be pertinent, of material facts, must relate only to the policy in question, and be made to the first name, and is confined in its operation to the one policy.

Ib.; Duer Ins. 667, 678.

If one name is put first on a policy as a decoy, and the policy is exhibited to other underwriters who subscribe it, it is void as against them.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

WINDING-UP.—CONTRIBUTORY—SUBSCRIBER TO MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION.—SALE OF LAND TO COMPANY—PURCHASE-MONEY—SET-OFF.—By a parol agreement entered into in May 1865, between the promoters of a company and M., it was agreed that M. should sell a certain piece of land to the company, and should accept 100 fully paid-up shares in part payment of the purchase money. In Nov. 1865 the company was registered under the Companies Act 1862, and M. subscribed the memorandum of association for 100 shares of £10 each. The company at once entered into possession of the piece of land, and in March 1866 a written agreement was executed whereby M. agreed to sell the piece of land to the company for £1000. A conveyance of the land was subsequently executed, and M. signed a receipt for £1000. No money was, however, paid to him, but 100 fully paid-up shares were allotted to him in respect of the £1000 purchase money. The prospectus of the company stated that a satisfactory arrangement had been made for the purchase of the land in question, the vendor taking £1000 of the purchase money in paid-up shares. And in a report made by the directors to the shareholders in March 1866 it was stated that the vendor had agreed to accept £1000, part of the purchase money, in paid-up shares; and in a board minute of the same date it was stated that 100 paid-up shares had been issued to M. in part payment of the purchase-money. Held (reversing the decision of Bacon, V.C.), that the contract by M. to take the 100 shares for which he subscribed the memorandum of association was satisfied by the allotment to him of the 100 shares in part payment of the purchase money for the land sold by him to the company, and that he was not liable as a contributory in respect of 100 shares: (Maynard's case, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 630. L.C. and L.JJ.)

CONTRIBUTORY—SUBSCRIBER TO MEMORANDUM—PAYMENT OTHERWISE THAN IN CASH.—The L. Company was formed to purchase the business of C., the capital to be £7500, in 7500 shares of £1 each. The memorandum was signed for 6265 shares, C. subscribing for 2500. The articles dated the same day recited and adopted an agreement already prepared with C. for the purchase by the company of his business and premises for £5000, half to be paid in cash and half in 2500 fully paid-up shares. The memorandum did not state that the 2500 shares subscribed for by C. were fully paid-up. The memorandum and articles were registered on the 27th Sept. 1870. The agreement with C. was executed on the 30th September, and registered on the 6th October following. This agreement did not state that the shares to be allotted to C. as fully paid-up were the same as those for which he had subscribed the memorandum. On the 10th October 1870, 2500 fully paid-up shares were allotted to C., "the said shares being the same for which the said C. subscribed the memorandum and articles of association." The court being satisfied that it was the understanding of all parties that the 2500 paid-up shares allotted to C. were the same as those referred to in the agreement, and that it was in respect of those that C. had signed the memorandum. Held, that C. could not be placed on the list of contributories in respect of the shares: (Coates's Case, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 637. V.C. M.)

PURCHASER OF SHARES ON STOCK EXCHANGE—INFANT TRANSFEREE—MISREPRESENTATION—INDEMNITY TO VENDOR.—E., the defendant, instructed his brokers to purchase shares in a limited company, who accordingly purchased 100 shares from the plaintiff M. E. subsequently instructed his brokers to pass the name of his son as the transferee, describing him as "My son G. E., drysalter." The shares were transferred into the name of G. E., who executed the deed of transfer. On the company being shortly afterwards wound-up it was discovered that G. E. was an infant, and steps were taken to substitute the plaintiff's name on the register and list of contributories. Neither the defendant's brokers nor the plaintiff knew at the time of the purchase that G. E. was an infant. G. E., through the defendant as his next friend, brought an action at law against the plaintiff to recover the purchase money for the shares, charging the plaintiff with fraud and misrepresentation as to the value of the shares. The action was compromised by the plaintiff (the defendant at law) returning the purchase money, the charges of fraud being withdrawn, he being still unaware of G. E.'s infancy. Defendant's answer stated that the shares were purchased as an investment for money advanced by the defendant to his son. Held (1), that the defendant was the true owner of the shares; (2) that the compromise of the action at law was not binding upon the plaintiff, as the fact of G. E.'s infancy was concealed from him; and that the defendant was bound to indemnify the plaintiff in respect of the shares: (Maynard v. Eaton, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 637. V. C. M.)

COUNTY COURTS.

MALDON COUNTY COURT.

Friday, Dec. 19, 1873.

(Before T. ABDY, Esq., Judge.)

THE REV. C. G. G. TOWNSEND v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Liability to maintain fences.

C. Gepp, of Chelmsford, appeared for plaintiff.

Moore appeared for the company.

Gepp said the action was brought to recover 50s. damages sustained by the plaintiff through the company neglecting to provide a sufficient fence between plaintiff's land and their line of railway at Hatfield Peverel; in consequence of which a sheep breaking through the fence was killed on the line by a passing train. Mr. Townsend had thought it proper to bring this action to establish his rights in the matter. He might mention that had not Mr. Townsend's man visited the field from which the sheep had escaped soon after the accident, a great many sheep would probably have been killed, as there was then a flock of 105 sheep on the railway; and the consequences might have been very serious.

Isaac Harvey, a man in the plaintiff's employ, went about five o'clock on the morning of the 17th Aug. to a field adjoining the railway, in which he had left 105 sheep the night before. Not seeing the sheep, he had discovered a gap in the hedge through which the sheep had passed on to the railway; with the assistance of the bailiff he got the sheep off the line, but one had been run over and killed by a train, the driver pulling up the engine as quick as possible after the accident. The fence was a quick hedge.

Gepp.—Was it sufficiently thick to keep the sheep in?

Witness.—If it had been they would not have got through, sir.

In answer to Moore, witness said the fence had been there since the formation of the railway, thirty-two years ago, and it had been the habit to turn sheep in the field year after year; there were no gaps in the fence the previous evening.

John Tyler, bailiff, corroborated, and Mr. Upson, manager of the farm, said the railway company always trimmed and kept the hedge in order, and they had repaired it since the accident; the hedge was not in sufficient repair to keep the sheep in.

Moore contended that as the evidence showed the fence was in good repair just prior to the accident, there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the company. If he showed that the hedge was in good repair at the time, the plaintiff could not say it was not a sufficient hedge, as by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 68, it was laid down that if after the lapse of five years no complaint is made of a fence, it was deemed a sufficient fence, and thirty-two years had elapsed before any complaint was made of this hedge.

Gepp urged that the Act quoted by Mr Moore was not applicable to that line of railway, as the line was formed before that Act was passed. The action was taken upon the Eastern Counties Railway Act 1846, which in the 107th section, after providing as to the erection of fences, says such fences shall be kept in proper repair.

In the course of a conversation, his HONOUR said railway companies had great statutory powers, and it was very necessary for the protection of property and lives of persons travelling by the rail that they should keep the fences in proper order.

For the defence, Moore called Thomas Mead, platelayer, who saw the hedge the day before the accident, when it was in good repair, and in conversation, Tyler, plaintiff's bailiff, told him he saw nothing amiss with the fence. A gap was made by the violence of the sheep through the bottom of the hedge; he had noticed that the sheep lay alongside the hedge in a flock, and they had forced themselves under the hedge to escape from the sun. A ditch interposed between the field and the hedge.

Gepp said the sheep being found on the line at five in the morning, they must have broken through during the night, and would not then have been seeking shade from the sun.

Mr. Kemp, inspector of platelayers, said that the fence seemed to him to be an unusually good one.

His HONOUR did not think the Company had done all they ought to have done in looking out for weak places. The sheep seeking shade at this particular spot, it was very probable the fence would be weakened thereby. His HONOUR gave judgment for the amount claimed with costs.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

EXECUTION—PAYMENT TO SHERIFF BEFORE LEVY—LIQUIDATION—NOTICE—PAYMENT BY SHERIFF AFTER—THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, ss. 6, 87.—If a judgment debtor voluntarily, and to avoid execution, pay to the sheriff the amount of the judgment debt and costs, he does not thereby constitute the sheriff his agent, and the sheriff cannot, if he receive notice of a bankruptcy petition, within fourteen days, pay over the amount of the debt to the creditor. Consequently, if before paying over the money to the judgment creditor, the sheriff have notice of the filing of a bankruptcy petition within the time prescribed by the 87th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, the creditor must refund: (Ex parte Brooke, re Hassall, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 653. Bank.)

WORKMEN'S WAGES—ORDER FOR PAYMENT OF—PROSPECTIVE COSTS—DUTY OF TRUSTEE.—The effect of an order directing a trustee to set apart a certain sum for the payment of certain preferential claims, is to sever that amount from the debtor's estate, and the trustee cannot delay the payment thereof merely upon the ground that the balance in his hands will be insufficient to meet prospective costs: (Ex parte Powis, re Bowen, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 655. Bank.)

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Monday, Jan. 12.

(Before Mr. Registrar HAZLITT).

Re MURE.

Discharge—Examination not passed, but good dividend paid.

THIS was an application by William Thomas Henry Strange Mure, distiller and spirit merchant, of the Three Mills Distillery, West Ham, trading under the firms of Metcalf and Co., and Mure and Co., for an order of discharge.

Finlay Knight appeared in support of the application.

Layton (Nash, Field, and Co.) for the trustee.

It would seem that, in the autumn of 1871, the bankrupt left this country and proceeded to Australia, where he is now living. An adjudication having been obtained, the trustee administered the property, and dividends amounting to 15s. 6d. in the pound were paid. At a meeting of the creditors, recently held, it was resolved to accept a proposal made by Col. W. R. Strange, the father of the bankrupt, for the purchase from the trustee, at the price of £700, of the debt due from Mr. G. S. Elliott under a contract dated Jan. 31, 1868, and for the payment of the sum of £300 for the purpose of replacing the £300 taken by the bankrupt with him when he left England; and the creditors assented to the bankrupt applying to the court for an order of discharge. A difficulty arose, however, in carrying out the wishes of the bankrupt and his creditors, in consequence of the bankrupt's absence, and the fact that that he had not passed his examination.

Knight contended that there was nothing in the statute which placed any limitation upon the mode of applying for an order of discharge, and that the rules were directory merely and not imperative. The case stood upon an entirely different basis under the old law. The Chief Judge in the matter of Hine v. Anthony (14 S. J., 656), where application was made for the appointment of a sitting for discharge before the examination had been passed, said there seemed to be no objection to the appointment of a sitting, and if the examination should be passed, the discharge would stand upon its own merits.

In answer to the court,

Layton said that after the bankrupt's departure an approximate statement of affairs was made out, and the creditors were satisfied they had obtained the necessary information in reference to his transactions; and they desired the bankrupt should receive his discharge if the court thought it could be granted.

His HONOUR said the court was desirous of affording every facility in a case where a handsome dividend had been paid, but in the face of the 19th section and the 140th rule it was impossible to grant the discharge until the bankrupt had produced a statement of his affairs and attended the court for public examination. The matter would be adjourned sine die, with liberty to the bankrupt to apply when he had conformed to the law.

MANCHESTER COUNTY COURT.

Saturday Jan. 10, 1874.

(Before J. A. RUSSELL, Q.C., Judge.)

HAND v. KAUFMANN.

Bankruptcy Act 1869—Issue tried by consent.

H. sought to recover on two bills of exchange, drawn by N. and Co., accepted by K., the defendant, and endorsed by N. and Co. to H. the plaintiff, a solicitor, as security for a sum agreed upon as consideration for H.'s acting in the affairs of N. and Co., who were in difficulties.

Held, that this was a legitimate transaction, the agreement for H. to act in winding-up N. and Co.'s affairs being a good consideration, and that H. was entitled to recover on the bills from K. irrespective of the consideration as between K. and N. and Co., whatever might be his position with regard to the estate of N. and Co.

S. Taylor, barrister, for the plaintiff.

Storer, solicitor, for the defendant.

THIS was an issue directed to be tried, under a trader debtor summons, between Lewis Hand, solicitor, 22, Coleman-street, London, and Louis Kaufmann, of 15, Market-street, Manchester, with reference to certain bills of exchange, which, having been accepted by the defendant, were now overdue. The bills, in respect of which the defendant was alleged to be liable were drawn on the 14th March 1873, by Messrs. Neumann, Gingold, and Co. merchants, London, for the sums of £155 and £164, being directed to and accepted by Kaufmann, payable to the order of the said Neumann, Gingold, and Co. five months and six months respectively after date, and indorsed ty them to the plaintiff.

Taylor stated the facts, from which it appeared that the plaintiff was, on the 25th April, 1873, consulted by Messrs. Neumann, Gingold, and Co. who were in difficulties, with reference to their affairs. He told them that before he could consent to act for them he should require as security a sum of £300. The liabilities of the firm were heavy, amounting, he believed, to over £300,000. Mr. Neumann and Mr. Gingold both said that they were without ready money, but were prepared to hand over "good bills" to the amount required if he would take them. To this he consented, and undertook the winding-up of their affairs. They endorsed to him the bills in question, one of which—that for £155—he paid to his bankers, but it was dishonoured. He did not, knowing what had been the fate of the first, tender them the second. At the time when the bills were endorsed to witness, he knew nothing of the circumstances under which it was said they had been accepted. The plaintiff had incurred liabilities on account of Messrs. Neumann and Co. in reliance on the security of these bills. Kaufmann had suspended payment in November 1872, being indebted to Neumann and Co., and had paid 2s. 6d. in the pound, having promised to pay Neumann and Co. in full, according to the plaintiff's contention which promise was the consideration for these bills, but according to the defendant's contention the consideration for them was the supply of goods to Kaufmann, which goods had never really been supplied. A part of Kaufmann's composition amounting to £154 had been paid to Neumann, for which the latter gave an I. O. U., to be returned when the balance of the composition was paid.

Storer, addressing his Honour for the defence, argued that Kaufmann's indebtedness to Messrs. Neumann, Gingold, and Co, at the time of his filing his petition was satisfied by the payment of the £154, being part of the composition, and the promise of extended time for payment of the balance. The bills were not paid in any sense in satisfaction of that balance, therefore it followed that Kaufmann stood indebted to Messrs. Neumann, Gingold, and Co., and he was still indebted to the trustee of the estate, in the amount which would make up the difference between the £154 and the composition arranged to be paid. Mr. Neumann said that the only consideration for giving these bills on the part of Kaufmann on the 14th March 1873, was the promise made previously to the filing of the petition, and renewed subsequently, to pay in full. That he (Storer) submitted, was no consideration at all.

His HONOUR.—If the debt was satisfied by payment of the composition there was, of course, no consideration.

Storer.—Starting from that point—and it is my standpoint—I say that that was not the arrangement. The bills were given upon the faith of the defendant Kaufmann's representation that he was in a good position. Mr. Neumann, who thought he was only fettered for a short time, said, "I'll send you a stock of cigars if you will let me have some bills." Upon that the bills were given. Whether, therefore, we accept the statement of Mr. Neumann or that of the defendant, clearly there was no consideration made for these bills, because, on Mr. Neumann's testimony, no goods were sent to Kaufmann in return for the bills.

His HONOUR.—I have said that if the composition was paid there was no consideration for the bills. The original debt was gone.

Storer.—Then is the plaintiff in a different position, with regard to these bills, than Messrs. Neumann, Gingold, and Co. and their trustee were? He continued: The material part of this case was, what, as a matter of fact, was due to Mr. Hand at the time the bills were given to him? In fact, nothing. He received the bills in anticipation of charges that were to be incurred in liquidating the affairs of Messrs. Neumann, Gingold, and Co. Up to the 13th May, when the petition was presented to the London Bankruptcy Court, all that he was in a position to claim was the costs then incurred—namely, £21. He had no right to take into his custody property belonging to the debtors' estate and say, "I have a lien upon this in respect of charges to be incurred in this bankruptcy." By rule 31 of the rules of 1870, it was provided that in all cases of bankruptcy the solicitor should be entitled to receive his costs, charges and expenses, out of the estate, from the trustee; and that is one of the first payments to be made by the trustee.

His HONOUR—The question here is whether a person under liquidation is not entitled to employ and bound to pay the solicitor whom he and his trustee think it necessary to consult for the purpose of aiding the winding-up of the estate. It is a question between Mr. Hand and the firm who employed him, Messrs, Neumann, Gingold, and Co., for the purpose of protecting their interests.

Storer submitted that Mr. Hand could only claim as against these bills for the amount of his costs incurred prior to the filing of the petition. Mr. Dubois's claim, however, might be added to the amount, Mr. Hand having made himself responsible for it; but with regard to all subsequent legitimate charges, the estate of Neumann, Gingold, and Co. was liable. Their trustee was the person to sue upon these bills, and not Mr. Hand.

His HONOUR (who did not call upon Mr. Taylor for a reply), in giving judgment, said it appeared from the evidence that £154 was received by Mr. Neumann from the defendant in part payment of the composition due to his firm under the latter's liquidation; and the I O U given by Mr. Neumann for the amount was by arrangement to have been returned on payment of the balance. That bills of exchange were given there could be no question; the only question was, in respect of what were they given? Were they given in respect of the balance of the original debt, or in respect of some fresh consideration in the way of sending goods, which consideration was never complied with? Mr. Storer had argued that, by reason of the composition having been paid as it was, by the giving of the I O U, and the promise to pay the balance between £154 and £212, the matter stood precisely as it would have done supposing the original arrangement to have been carried out. He (the judge) was entirely of a contrary opinion. The balance in question never was paid; and the effect of the nonfulfilment of the agreement was to revive the original debt. If it were material to the issue, he should hold, on the evidence, that there was a perfectly good consideration as between Neumann, Gingold, and Co., and Kaufmann in respect of these bills of exchange; but now came the question, even assuming that there was no consideration at all, in what position did Mr. Hand stand? Was he the holder of the bills without consideration? Mr. Storer appeared to have confounded the question as it arose between Mr. Hand and Kaufmann with the question that would have presented itself supposing Mr. Hand to have been going against Neumann's estate. That was not the position of matters. Mr. Hand came forward as the holder of two bills of exchange, which bills were handed to him before an act of bankruptcy was committed, and therefore, of course, before he could have had notice of an act of bankruptcy, and the question was, was he a holder for value in respect of those bills? The facts were that, some days prior to the filing of their petition, Messrs. Neumann, Gingold, and Co., consulted him with reference to their affairs. Mr.

Hand said, "Your estate is large, and as the expense of winding-up will be considerable, I cannot undertake it unless I have cash in hand." Having no cash, they gave him the bills in question, saying, "You will be able to raise upon them all the money you want." Was that, or was it not, a legitimate transaction? Was it contrary to the policy of the bankrupt laws? Surely not; it was a bona fide and lawful agreement; and the consideration—namely, that he was to manage their affairs under the liquidation—given for the bills was a perfectly good and valid consideration. Then, had he any further liabilities? He had. He was liable to Mr. Dubois, the accountant, for £148; and he had likewise incurred with other parties liabilities to the extent of something like £70 or £80; and if he had to continue acting for Mr. Neumann, in consultation with the trustee and other parties interested in the estate, he would incur still further liabilities. He (the judge) held that, under all the circumstances, Mr. Hand was, in the strictest terms, a holder for value of these bills; and, whatever his position as regarded the estate of Mr. Neumann, the simple question was, had he or had he not, being such holder for value, any good claim against Kaufmann, the acceptor of the bills? Most clearly he had. He had a perfectly good title to recover upon them; and judgment would therefore be for the amount claimed—namely, £315, with costs.

SWANSEA COUNTY COURT.

(Before T. FALCONER, Esq., Judge.)

Re PERKINS.

Liquidation—Receiver's costs—Subsequent bankruptcy—Liability of trustee—Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 103.

IN this case a bankruptcy petition was presented against one F. Perkins, and he was adjudicated bankrupt. The bankrupt was in partnership with R. W. Perkins, and subsequently to the bankruptcy of the former, the firm presented a petition for liquidation by arrangement (sects. 125 and 126). Resolutions were passed, but his Honour on motion refused to register them. A bankruptcy petition was then presented against R. W. Perkins, and he was also adjudicated bankrupt. While liquidation proceedings (partnership) were pending, one Warwick was appointed receiver. The question now to be debated was, whether the costs of this gentleman were to be paid out of the bankruptcy assets in priority, or whether he was to prove as a creditor in the bankruptcy, and receive dividend pro rata with other creditors.

Clifton for Warwick, receiver in liquidation.

Glascodine, solicitor, trustee under two bankruptcies opposing.

Clifton made the application, and read the notice.

Glascodine.—I object to the application being made on account of informality. It does not appertain to one of the two bankruptcies of which I am trustee.

Clifton.—A day has been named by the registrar for the hearing of the motion, and the costs have been taxed by him.

Glascodine.—There are two bankruptcies and one liquidation. The other side mixed them up.

His HONOUR.—I should like to have all the facts before me.

Clifton.—I shall read you the affidavit that is on the file. The costs have been taxed by the registrar. The liquidation is quite regular upon the face of it. The costs have been taxed in that matter. The liquidation proceedings become abortive, and two bankruptcy proceedings are now subsisting. Mr. Glascodine is trustee under both those bankruptcies. The court has to inquire whether these costs are properly payable. If no bankruptcy had supervened there would be no doubt that these costs are payable. I shall, therefore, refer you to the last rules (1871) on the subject of liquidation and composition. "Where in bankruptcy or liquidation a receiver or manager is continued as trustee, the remuneration of trustee at the rate determined on shall commence as from the date of his appointment as receiver or manager, and shall be assessed accordingly; and no other than the aforesaid remuneration shall be made to the trustee for his services as receiver or manager." (Rule 6.) The next rule (7) provides for a state of things where the receiver is not continued as trustee: "Where the receiver or manager is not continued as trustee, or is continued as trustee, but without remuneration, he shall be allowed out of the estate such sum for his services as receiver or manager as the taxing officer of the court shall, having regard to the views of the trustee and committee of inspection (if any), thereon think fit." Upon those two rules I base my claim. Mr. Glascodine wishes Warwick to come in as a creditor. I beg to draw your attention to the cases decided on the subject, and to the 292nd rule: "Where bankruptcy occurs pending proceedings for or towards liquidation by arrangement or composition with creditors, the proper costs incurred in relation to such proceedings shall be paid by the trustees under the bankruptcy out of the debtor's estate, unless the court shall otherwise order." Should be paid without application to the court, unless the court otherwise orders: (Re Stow, LAW TIMES, vol. li., p. 52.) I have also to refer you to Ex parte Tomlynson, re Boyce (3 D. F. & J. 745); and Ex parte Shaw, (1 De G. 242). Since the Bankruptcy Act 1869 has been passed an important case has been decided, which bears a strong analogy to the present one: (Ex parte Page, re Springall, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 716.) The Chief Judge there said, "Where petition for liquidation and two petitions for bankruptcy costs to be paid in following order:—1, receiver in liquidation; 2, receiver in bankruptcy; 3, solicitor in liquidation; 4, solicitor to first petitioning creditor; 5, solicitor of trustee in bankruptcy; 6, solicitor of second petitioning creditor." And Rule 113 provides that "in case any joint estate of any bankrupts shall be insufficient to pay any costs or charges necessarily incurred in respect of the same the court, on application of the trustee, may order such costs to be paid out of the separate estates of such bankrupts, or one or any of them; and vice versa may order costs necessarily incurred from any separate estate, if the same were incurred with reasonable probability of benefit to the joint estate, to be paid out of such joint estate." The liquidation charges should be paid out of either of the estates—joint or several. I ask in the terms of the notice filed that the costs and charges of Mr. Warwick, as certified by the allocatur of the registrar, be paid out of the bankruptcy estates.

Glascodine.—The liquidation proceedings were quite irregular.

His HONOUR.—Mr. Clifton's contention is that the liquidation proceedings were quite regular.

Glascodine.—Your Honour has already decided that the liquidation proceedings were wrong ab initio. A petition in bankruptcy was presented against F. Perkins, and he was adjudicated bankrupt on 12th Oct. 1871. That bankruptcy is still subsisting. Some time in that month or November, the two Perkins (F. and R. W.) filed a petition for liquidation—after the first meeting of creditors in F. Perkins's bankruptcy and trustee appointed. By this proceeding the two Perkins hoped to throw aside the bankruptcy proceeding against F. Perkins, and supersede it by joint action. Bankruptcy may be turned into liquidation, but bankruptcy is not to be superseded by liquidation on action of debtor. Your Honour has already decided in Jan. 1872, that the liquidation was simply void. It was never intended that proceedings should be superseded in this way.

Clifton.—I see no reason why it could not be done by the partner.

Glascodine.—Yes by the partner, but not jointly. Your Honour decided that the resolutions in liquidation should not be registered on my objection—8th Feb. 1872. The two Perkins employ Warwick, and Warwick's costs incurred by them were due from them. If F. Perkins employed him he was bankrupt at the time. It cannot be payable out of his bankruptcy. He could not allow a debt to be contracted, even above all to have such priority. Suppose R. Perkins had done it. R. Perkins might well have gone to Warwick and ask him to do these things. R. Perkins then owes the money to Warwick. Warwick's claim is good as against R. Perkins, and a debt due from him must be proved against his estate in the ordinary way. If it be payable in moieties each estate must bear a share. I refer to General Rule 33, which is a rule in bankruptcy, and there is no corresponding rule in liquidation. The affidavit leading to the appointment of receiver was read by the registrar.

Glascodine.—I do not comment upon the appointment, but upon the affidavit leading to that appointment—the means by which he was appointed. I contend that the other side must prove their debt against the bankruptcies.
allow it, then let the question be discussed again. It is not a proceeding in one of the bankruptcies as to entitle your Honour to make the order.

His HONOUR, recapitulating all the facts adduced before him, proceeded to state that as far as R. Perkins was concerned, it was a personal expense against the persons affected by the liquidation. R. Perkins was a party to it, and if there was any account it was between Warwick and R. Perkins. On his becoming bankrupt Warwick's debt became a provable debt against his estate. It must be proved in the second bankruptcy. It cannot be charged in priority. Costs of the day allowed to trustee.

LEGAL NEWS.

LITIGATION IN 1873.

A WRITER in the Standard says:—The only election petition heard during the year was that against the return of Mr. Wait, the Conservative member for Gloucester, against whom bribery, personation, and other offences were alleged, only to be completely disproved and ignominiously dismissed at the trial before Mr. Justice Blackburn, who commented severely upon the groundlessness of the charges, and ordered the petitioners to pay the costs. Several municipal election petitions were tried before barristers specially appointed under the recent Act, with varying results. At Birmingham the petitioner failed because the judge refused to invalidate twenty-nine voting papers as to which the returning officer had made a mistake somewhat analogous to that which gave Mr. Rylands his seat for Warrington. At Blackburn the returning officer's counting of the votes was held conclusive, the result being to put the petitioner in a majority of two, which the respondent contended was due to miscalculation. At Barnstaple the successful candidates were unseated for their agents' misconduct, but at Blackburn the charges failed, and the respondents held their own. Parliamentary petitions are pending against the return of Sir Henry James for Taunton, and Mr. Mills for Exeter, while Mr. Gladstone's right to sit for Greenwich after accepting a fresh office of profit has yet to be determined. Mr. Mikles, a magistrate at Cork, was sentenced to a week's imprisonment for the newly created offence of violating the secrecy of the ballot-box. Next in order, as of political as well as legal interest, may be mentioned the failure of the prosecutions of the Roman Catholic priests inculpated by Mr. Justice Keogh's famous judgment on the Galway petition. The trials of Fathers Loftus and Quinn proved abortive through the jurors' disagreement, and Bishop Durgan, the third defendant, was triumphantly acquitted, whereupon the remaining prosecutions were precipitately abandoned. With much difficulty, and after more than one unsuccessful effort, O'Kelly, a Fenian, was convicted of shooting with intent to murder in the streets of Dublin. But against this must be set the verdicts obtained by the plaintiffs in the actions against the Marquis of Hartington and other officials for assaults committed during the Phœnix Park riots, and the application of Redding, one of the liberated Fenian convicts, who moved the English Court of Queen's Bench for a criminal information against the medical officers of Chatham Convict Prison, whom he accused of gross and wanton cruelty. As might have been expected, the charge proved utterly groundless, and the rule was discharged with costs. The judges of assize who inflicted well-merited punishment on the Belfast rioters were so roughly assailed in the columns of the Ulster Examiner, that the editor was visited with a fine of £250 and three months' imprisonment for gross contempt of court. And though Father O'Keefe has not entirely failed in his stalwart contest with Cardinal Cullen and the Irish Education Commissioners, he recovered only nominal damages against the Cardinal, while his controversy with the Commissioners is still undetermined. The year has not been wanting in proofs of the law's glorious uncertainty. The suit brought by Mr. Peek to make the directors of Overend and Gurney (Limited) responsible for heavy losses sustained through the failure of the company was dismissed by Lord Romilly because, though the plaintiff had once had a complete case, he had lost his right to redress by delay. On appeal, the House of Lords held that the delay was of no consequence, but that Mr. Peek was wrong in suing the directors in equity instead of at law, and moreover, that he had no case in either forum, as he had failed to connect his taking of shares with the issue of the prospectus which contained the misrepresentations he complained of. In Parker v. Lewis, Malins, V.C., following his own decision in Gray v. Lewis, held certain directors of the National Bank answerable for a quarter of a million, lost through the manner in which Lafitte and Co. (Limited), had been promoted. The National Bank had accepted the first decision, and had paid this enormous sum to the parties interested. On appeal, the full court reversed both decrees, holding that as both plaintiffs and defendants had lent themselves to "a trilateral arrangement to deceive the Stock Exchange Committee," neither had any claim against the others, nor had the bank any right to recover money which it had voluntarily paid. In Re The Bank of Hindustan, &c., Wickens, held an amalgamation with another bank to have been ultra vires and void, so that shareholders in the one institution were entitled to escape scot free, leaving those in the other to bear the burdens falling on both. On appeal, this decision was reversed, except as to a very small minority of proprietors, whose shares were forfeited before their acceptance of shares in the amalgamated concern. In Re Andrews the Court of Queen's Bench unwillingly followed its own precedents, and refused to order the infant child of a mixed marriage to be given up to the Protestant mother, in opposition to the wish of a testamentary guardian appointed by a Catholic father. In the Court of Chancery a different decision was arrived at after a very patient hearing, before Vice-Chancellor Malins. In the famous Mordaunt case, the House of Lords has taken time to consider the effect of the respondent's insanity upon the petitioner's right to proceed, so long as that insanity continues. And their Lordships' have, in like manner, postponed their decision as to what constitutes an invitation to alight from a railway carriage—a moot point, raised in the long-pending suit of Bridges v. North London Railway Company.

Among other noticeable examples of litigation we may notice the cases of Dent v. Nicholls, and Maynard v. Eaton, which may be taken to have finally established the rule that a purchaser of shares, whether jobber or investor, is answerable to his vendor if he gives, as transferee, an infant, an idiot, or other person under legal disability. In Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, the Court of Exchequer Chamber decided that no action will lie against a military officer for a report as to the conduct of a subordinate, made in the course of his duty to higher authorities, even if the defamatory statements complained of were made maliciously, unreasonably, and causelessly. It should be remembered that this is simply an annunciation of the law, not a decision upon the merits of the particular controversy by which it was evoked.

The maritime trials of the year have included an inquiry at Liverpool—instituted at the request, and resulting in the complete vindication of, Messrs. Ismay, Imrie, and Co.—with reference to the equipment of the Atlantic, a fine vessel, which went down when near her destination, causing a loss of several hundred lives. Re The Northfleet, Board of Trade and Admiralty proceedings alike have proved that the original accounts of the catastrophe were pretty nearly correct, and have ended in the seizure, condemnation, and sale of the Murillo. The Judge of the Admiralty Court refused to recognise the Khedive of Egypt as a Sovereign Prince who could not be sued before ordinary tribunals. Mr. Plimsoll defeated Mr. Norwood's attempt to obtain a criminal information for libels contained in his celebrated pamphlet on "Our Seamen," but civil actions are understood to be still pending at the instance of Messrs. Norwood and Gourley. The agitation which Mr. Plimsoll set on foot has caused, or been followed by, the detention and condemnation of many vessels as unseaworthy, and magistrates have so often held sailors justified in refusing to sail in unsafe vessels, that their champion's labours have not been altogether in vain.

THE IRISH COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

IT is not our custom to canvass the merits and claims of candidates for positions, judicial or otherwise, in Ireland. When appointments have been made we criticise them honestly, and express our opinion of the choice of the Government. But within the last few weeks a strange controversy has arisen concerning the vacancy in the Court of Exchequer. The lamented death of the Chief Baron Pigot took place at a time when no appointment could possibly be made, and when it was not necessary that there should be any haste in the matter. Some of our contemporaries, however, inferred that the Government have determined not to appoint another judge, but to promote an existing one, and thus to diminish the judicial staff of the Bench. This inference was strongly supported by a certain article in the Times, which, whether inspired or not, was probably intended to try the feelings of the public on the subject; and we trust that the response it elicited from all quarters in Ireland, and from the most influential and (which is more important) independent papers in London, will show that if the Government ever intended to act in the manner shadowed forth above, they would not receive the support of any section in Ireland, and would be strongly opposed even in England. For ourselves we have not hitherto noticed the subject, because we do not believe that any Government would attempt, during the Parliamentary recess, of its own motion, to make such a change as to permanently reduce the number of judges in a Superior Court from four to three judges. This would be clearly unconstitutional, in the best sense of that term, clearly inexpedient in the present state of business, and we had almost said impossible, from the duties to be performed by each member of the court. It is unnecessary to add that it would in some sense be a breach of faith with those who by custom have a right to consider themselves entitled to promotion. When we say that to reduce the number of judges from four to three in each court would be unconstitutional, we do not mean that it would be illegal or impossible—the prerogative is doubtless strong enough for greater interference—but we do say that without a radical change in the circuits, and in the method of transacting business, suitors would be prevented from enforcing their rights and remedying their wrongs, and so the great charter itself would be broken—"We will not deny or delay to any man justice or right." That it would be inexpedient, even in a political sense, no one can deny who is acquainted with the state of business and society in this country. We have six circuits, on each of which two judges go twice a year (and we shall probably soon require a winter assize in Belfast and Cork), and thus the circuit arrangements should be modified; but, in addition, the Exchequer, and indeed, each of the Common Law Courts, has an exclusive jurisdiction which precludes judges of one court from discharging the functions of another. Thus it sometimes happens that we have to wait out of term for some time to obtain an order in a bail motion from a judge of the Queen's Bench, or an order under the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 92, from a Common Pleas Justice. The absolute as well as relative duties of the judges of all the Superior Courts are considerable, and each year increasing. Several late Acts have vastly increased their duties—for instance, the Act which transferred the trial of election petitions from committees of the House of Commons to the courts of law—the Land Act of 1870, which has given rise to much circuit business, and requires the attendance of a majority of the judges in the Court for Land Cases Reserved, and which indirectly, by its influence in increasing the available wealth of the country and in discouraging emigration, is each year increasing the amount of litigation. We need hardly refer to the report of the commissioners in 1862, who reported against diminishing the number of judges. But we venture to say that in anticipation of a Judicature Bill for Ireland in a few years, and the necessary changes to be then introduced, it would be a piece of wanton extravagance to alter and re-model the present system to found one which could necessarily only exist for two or three years. The Profession and the public showed a fatal apathy in the matter of the vacancy in the Landed Estates' Court; but yet the Government did not proceed with their proposed Bill to render a further appointment unnecessary, and we trust they may yet, by a combined effort, be induced to fill up the vacancies, and thus preserve for Ireland the complete advantages of, perhaps, the most excellent institutions we owe to the English connection. Economy is most wise when wisely pursued, and this limitation, we think, would be broken through if anything were done to impair the strength and symmetry of our legal system, or to alienate the feelings of the most enlightened and influential members of the community.—Irish Law Times.

TAUNTON ELECTION PETITION.—The inquiry into the petition against the return of the Attorney-General (Sir Henry James) was commenced on Tuesday morning by Mr. Justice Grove, at the Shire Hall, amid manifestations of great interest. Mr. Charles Russell, Q.C., Mr. W. G. Harrison, and Mr. Collins appeared for the petitioners; Mr. Sergeant Ballantine, Mr. Hardinge Giffard, Q.C., and Mr. J. O. Griffits for the respondent.—Mr. Charles Russell opened the case for the petitioners, stating that the petition derived great importance from the fact of the Attorney-General being the respondent. He alleged that the return was brought about by corrupt means, and that the petition charged bribery, corrupt treating, and general bribery and treating by and on behalf of the respondent such as to void the election. With regard to past elections at Taunton, he stated that before the the late Reform Act the constituency was 900, and after it 1900, and though there was a large Conservative element in the county of Somersetshire, yet, as a rule, Liberal members had been generally returned for the borough. After referring to the frequent petitions at Taunton, and the large number of persons alleged to have been treated and bribed at former elections, he called attention to the fact that those persons who at the last trial at Taunton had been acting in the interests of the then respondent—Serjeant Cox—were now partisans of the respondent, and how the change had been brought about was a question which the learned judge would have to consider—viz., whether it was conversion or corruption. At the former petition, when recriminatory charges were made by Serjeant Cox against the then petitioner, and now respondent, they were not gone into, and although Serjeant Cox was ordered to pay the costs of the petition, yet they never were paid, and the order of Mr. Justice Blackburn to that effect had never been acted on, and the petitioner never claimed them. The learned counsel then suggested that this occurred in consequence of an agreement between Serjeant Cox and the now respondent that if the former were not obliged to pay the costs he should not pursue the recriminatory charges against the latter. After alluding to the respondent's canvass in September of last year, Mr. Russell stated that there was a strong feeling in the borough against Sir H. James at that time, inasmuch as he was supposed to have gained his seat in 1868 not by votes, but by a legal contrivance, and that, in addition, he had to combat some change of feeling on the part of many voters because of the Conservative reaction. He then stated that the number of votes in the constituency was about 1852, and that of these Sir Alfred Slade had 989 promises, while Sir Henry James had 970, the class of voters which comprised the former number being in the higher class of life, while those of the latter were of the lower. It was, he stated, a fact that though the last election was conducted under the provisions of the Ballot Act, yet there was far more drunkenness than had ever previously existed in the borough. He then said that he should be able to prove that there had been a great amount of bribery and corrupt treating in No. 3 district, which could be traced to Thomas Burman, a saddler, who had been appointed the respondent's expenses agent, through James Rollings, jun., who acted under Burman's directions. Rollings was one of the secret committee men, and was in the habit of addressing each evening during the canvass the lowest class of voters in the borough in order to obtain their interest for the respondent. He should be able to prove that a Mr. H. Poole, who had been described by Serjeant Ballantime in the 1868 inquiry, as "a corrupt agent of the worst kind," and that men named Toogood, Gorier, and Taylor, the latter being the secretary of the Liberal Association, who acted in the interest and with the knowledge of the respondent, had been guilty of bribery and treating. Between 2 and 3 o'clock on the day of the polling—the 13th Oct.—it was believed by Sir A. Slade's supporters that he had polled seventy-five votes more than the respondent, and the latter even considered that his opponent was at the head of the poll, although by a smaller number of votes. Soon after that time both the candidates were seen going about the borough to bring up voters who remained unpolled, and it was a remarkable fact that many who had adopted rosettes and ribands in the morning—buff being the Liberal and blue the Conservative colour — were seen mixed together and voting for the respondent. Between two and three o'clock a man named Small appeared on the scene, and from that time it was alleged that money was flying about and drink freely dispensed at the instance of the respondent's agents and supporters. At the close of the poll there appeared 899 votes for the respondent and 812 for Sir A. Slade. The learned counsel then criticised the expenses account, its amount being about £850, and said that its importance depended not upon the items included in it, but upon those which did not appear, and that no mention was made of Burman's expenses, who consequently must have looked to some other reward for his services, and took exception to the omission in the account of the respondent's hotel expenses. The personation agents—four of whom were paid ten guineas each, and two eight guineas—it appeared, did not personally know the voters as they ought to have done, and were attorneys from a distance, and it was alleged, therefore, that their employment was colourable. The learned counsel then intimated that he should call William Smith, who would prove that he was in difficulties in the early part of 1873, and that he received assistance from Rollings on condition of his supporting Mr. James, and that he further received money from Small and another person, and that he bribed several voters with it. The respondent's agents had endeavoured to get a declaration from Smith that he had never received any money for his own vote or for any other purpose, and had ultimately succeeded under pressure. Mr. Russell gave the names of several voters, among many others who were alleged to have been bribed and treated, and said that he should be able to trace some of the payments to Burman, the respondent's agent; others to Rollings, who was acting under Burman's directions; and that to some voters small payments had been made for distributing bills, and promises of 10s. if they voted for the respondent. The names of nine gentlemen were given as examples of those who were alleged to have bribed and treated many voters. After stating that he exonerated the respondent from all charges of personal bribery, treating, or undue influence, the learned counsel for the petitioners resumed his seat, having spoken for three hours.

THE LATE MR. OKE.—At the Mansion House on Saturday last the Lord Mayor, on taking his seat, addressing Mr. Gore, the assistant clerk of the justice-room, took occasion to refer to the sudden death on the previous day of Mr. Oke, who had long filled the office of Chief Clerk there. He could not, he said, help publicly expressing his deep regret at the sad and sudden event. So recently as the previous Monday the deceased was discharging his duties in the justice-room, and now he was no more. He felt bound to say that he and his predecessors in the mayoralty had from time to time received very great assistance on the bench from the legal knowledge and advice of Mr. Oke, and probably great difficulty would be experienced in finding one worthy to fill his place. He was a man of considerable ability, and his many published works on legal subjects and their large circulation testified not only to his great industry and capacity, but also to the respect in which his name was held by the legal Profession. Great confidence had been reposed in him as their legal adviser both by previous Lord Mayors and himself, in consideration of his experience and sound judgment. Personally, he felt his loss very acutely, and he availed himself of that opportunity of publicly referring to the event.

DEATH OF THE CROWN SOLICITOR FOR COUNTY DOWN.—Mr. Ross Tod, Crown Solicitor for County Down, died suddenly on Tuesday night.

MERIONETHSHIRE QUARTER SESSIONS.—The Marquis of Londonderry has been elected the chairman in succession to the late Mr. Meredith Richards, deceased.

THE NEW SHERIFF FOR LANARKSHIRE.—A telegraphic dispatch from Glasgow states that a communication was received yesterday by Sheriff-substitute William Gillespie Dickson, from the Home Office, appointing him sheriff principal of the county, in the room of the late Henry Glassford Bell, Esq. Mr. Dickson was senior sheriff-substitute, and is the author of a work, entitled "The Law of Evidence."

LAND TRANSFER.—"A Victim" complains in the Times as follows: "A plot of land was lately given for the erection of a class room in connection with a national school. The site, according to the requirements of the Committee of Council on Education, was valued at £15; the cost of conveyance, &c., was nearly £25, that is £10 more than the value of the land conveyed; surveyor's fees, £2 2s.; solicitor's fees for obtaining signatures of patrons, £5; stamps and parchment, and parchment for copy, 5s.; fee for bishop's signature, £2 2s.; fees and stamps on indenture, £3 5s. 6d.; agent's charges, £2 13s.; postage and parcels, 5s.; solicitor's fees (returned as donation), £8 8s.—total, £24 15s. 6d."

LEGAL PROSPECTS.—In less than nine months the Judicature Act, according to existing arrangements, comes into operation. The public and the legal Profession are anxious to know what has been done to meet the exigencies of the new order of things. The Judicature Commission has taken evidence and issued reports more or less useful in the preparation of the Bill on which the Act was founded. The Legal Offices Commission is now sitting, and has taken a large mass of evidence, and procured the nomination by the Chancellor of a committee of officials of the Court of Chancery to assist its labours. We do not believe, however, that the report of this commission will be of much value to the Chancellor and the judges. Almost every witness who has been examined has been unable to explain to the commissioners the nature and exact value of the several Chancery offices under review. The laborious painstaking of the commissioners is highly praiseworthy. It will at least be a satisfaction to the Government which appointed them to know that they have hitherto done their best to arrive at a knowledge of legal and technical phrases which in the mouths of the witnesses are as household words, but to the uninitiated misleading, or perhaps wholly want meaning. Baron Bramwell, with the most honest intentions, cannot expect to overrule and direct the views of his colleagues in every instance. Lord Lisgar, the able chairman, does his best to understand the technical evidence brought before him. Mr. Law is too much imbued with the spirit of "retrenchment" to appreciate anything beyond the fact that salaries are high, and that he must endeavour to reduce them by at least one-half. Mr. Trevelyan, who knows a little of everything, and expects speedy preferment, has a "cut and slash" manner of interrogating a witness by means of a sort of indictment with several counts, ending in an invitation to the witness to plead guilty or not guilty. Mr. West, elegant and seemingly careless of most things, and Mr. Rowsell, bland and precise, endeavour, but without avail, to exhibit to witnesses a knowledge they do not possess. Three or four practical lawyers, with a like number of business men, would have come to the work knowing more than half the technical facts as yet ascertained by the commission, and would by this time have been in a position to report to Parliament early in the session. Though the commissioners' report cannot be expected to prove of any great value for the purposes of the Judicature Act, it will serve to inform the Treasury on a very large subject which has only recently come under its jurisdiction. It will enable the First Lord of the Treasury to impose upon those newly appointed to legal offices the most galling and humiliating conditions, while keeping within the letter of his powers and taking credit for doing all for the public benefit. What, then, we ask, has been done to prepare for the operation of the Judicature Act in November next? What progress has been made by those intrusted with the compilation of the new rules of procedure? Is the legal profession as yet acquainted with the nature of those rules? Has the draft been printed and circulated? Is such a draft in existence? Is it even sketched out? Much has to be done, and the public await the reply to these questions with a vague anxiety.—Globe.

TITHE RENTCHARGES.—The average value of £100 tithe rentcharge for the thirty-eight years elapsed, since the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act, is 16s. 5½d. For the year 1874, each £100 of tithe rentcharge will amount to the sum of £112 7s. 3d.

EDUCATION.—At the recent Middlesex Sessions for this month, the calendar contained the names of 112 prisoners, 19 of whom were committed for misdemeanor, and 93 for felony. Of these 112 prisoners, 20 cannot read nor write, 15 can read, 70 can read and write imperfectly, and one only possesses a superior education.

IT is announced from Washington that President Grant has withdrawn his nomination of Mr. Caleb Cushing for the Chief Justiceship of the Supreme Court, in consequence of the discovery in the "rebel" archives of a letter proving his intimate connection with the Government of Jefferson Davis.

LICENSING PRACTICE.—At the Surrey Quarter Sessions, Mr. M. D. Scott, on Monday last, succeeded in carrying a motion that "No applicant shall be required to attend before the court of confirmation unless the confirmation of licence be opposed." The attendance, unless the confirmation was opposed, was not only perfectly useless, but involved much expense and great loss of time.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—The January Session which opened on Monday, the 12th inst. was presided over by Baron Pigott and Mr. Justice Honyman. The calendar included one charge of murder, namely, that of William Parker, charged with wilfully killing two of his children at Wapping. Six persons were charged with feloniously wounding, and there were eleven cases of robbery with violence.

SCOTCH LAW OFFICES.—Mr. Henry Glassford Bell, Sheriff of Lanarkshire for the last thirty-four years, became in the early part of November last temporarily incapacitated by illness from performing his duties. A painful disease from which he had long been suffering had at last assumed so aggravated a shape as to render an operation necessary, and after this had been performed his medical attendants recommended an interval of two or three months' rest, but certified that at the expiration of that time he would be able to resume efficiently the discharge of his duties. Under these circumstances Mr. Bell applied to the Court of Session to appoint a substitute to undertake the performance of his functions during this period. The court showed no disinclination to comply with his request, but the Crown, which, as patron of the office, had been duly informed of it, craved delay to consider it during the vacation. In the meantime it was suggested that Mr. Bell should apply to the Home Secretary for three months' leave of absence, which he accordingly did. His application set forth in full the whole details of the case, pointed out that his medical advisers had certified that the three months' leave of absence would restore his capacity for his post, and himself offered to "make suitable provision for the remuneration" of such qualified persons as the court might think proper to appoint to exercise the office of sheriff in the interim. On Tuesday, the 6th Jan. Mr. Lowe's reply came back. It was to the effect that while the Home Secretary "fully appreciated" the great value of Mr. Bell's long services, he is "compelled to say that the interests of the public service require his immediate resignation of his appointment." The result of his application was, perhaps, fortunately never known to Mr. Bell, as the reply only reached his house on the morning of his sudden and unexpected death from a paralytic stroke. The Pall-Mall Gazette says: "Were this all that was known or suspected in reference to the case, it would be sufficient to account for the general indignation which the conduct of the Home Office has aroused. The Glasgow Herald, a Liberal journal, well describes the situation—'A public officer who had discharged with unexampled fidelity the most onerous duties for thirty-four years, who had never missed a day, who had no arrears (though there was no court in the kingdom in which arrears would have been more excusable), is suddenly laid aside from duty by a severe and unexpected illness. In the first moments of his recovery he suggests the appointment of a substitute; he promises to provide for him to the full amount of his own salary, so that his appointment could cost the public nothing; he produces the highest testimony that he is likely to be fully competent to discharge his duties at the end of the three months; and he has the universal witness of Lanarkshire to the efficiency with which he has discharged them. He is summarily dismissed because the public service requires it, or, because his office is wanted.' The last words contain the sting of the whole business; for it is commonly said in Glasgow that Mr. Bell was to have been removed to secure the patronage for the superior law officer of the Government of Scotland. But, as though it were not enough that a meritorious public servant should be driven from his post under circumstances of unexampled harshness, and from motives of doubtful disinterestedness, the step must also be defended upon grounds not only untenable, but, one cannot but believe, untenable to the knowledge of those who pretended them. But the transaction would not have been thoroughly Ministerial unless disingenuousness has been added to its demerits. The Lord Advocate, who advised the course taken by Mr. Lowe in the matter, and upon whom a large share of the discredit must devolve, based his advice principally on the allegation that the Court of Session had no power to appoint a substitute under the circumstances in question, but that an Act of Parliament would be necessary legally to effect the substitution; and this statement again was supported by the alleged precedent of Sir Walter Scott and the shrievalty of Selkirkshire, in whose such an Act was passed. The argument was inconclusive at best; for there was no reason why an Act of Parliament should not have been passed, and it would have been only graceful in Mr. Young, under the circumstances, to have suggested it. But, such as the argument was, Mr. Lowe relied upon it in his answer to Mr. Bell's application. Will it be believed that the very preamble of the Act declares its irrelevance as a precedent that it actually recites that 'the sheriff of the county of Selkirk is incapacitated by disease from performing any of the functions of his office or appointing any substitute for their performance,' implying plainly that it was only Sir Walter Scott's then condition of mental aberration that precluded an alternative which would have rendered legislation unnecessary, and glaringly distinguishing the case from that of Mr. Bell, who was able, and had declared himself willing, to appoint a substitute? If Mr. Lowe had read this statute before he quoted it against Mr. Bell what are we to think of his candour? If he had not read it, and refused an application on the strength of a statute which he had not consulted, what are we to think of his sense of duty and responsibility? But enough; the thing is now done, and the Ministry have refuted our former assertion that there was no blunder left for them to commit. There was one—to alienate the people of Scotland—and they have committed it."

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it

COUNTY COURT JUSTICE.—Having occasion to attend at the Bloomsbury County Court on the 6th instant upon some important business, I was astonished to find that I could not transact the business I was upon, the only reason given being that the returns of the past year were being made up, and until they were completed my business, or that of any other suitor of a similar kind, could not be entertained for the next few days, the office of that particular department having already been entirely closed for the transaction of business for some days past. The business I had to transact was to issue an execution, and it was most important that the execution should have been issued, as it was feared that any delay would be the means of the debt being lost, and as a natural consequence the costs must then fall upon the suitor. I complained to the officials of the injustice, but without receiving any redress whatever; my only appeal therefore is to make the matter public through your valuable columns, as to me it is a most shameful and inexcusable injustice and ought not to exist in any court of law as defendants have already quite sufficient advantages held out to them. Another object I have in addressing this letter to you is to draw the attention of those in whom rests the power of removing such difficulties now in the way of facilitating justice, and to assimilate the practice between the Superior Courts of law and that of the County Courts. In the Superior Courts the officials have to make similar returns to the Government, the same as the County Courts, and yet no delay of this kind is allowed to take place. The Profession are allowed to transact their business—no matter what kind—pending the making up of the annual returns in the Superior Courts of law, while in the County Court at any rate the most important branch of the County Court is entirely closed for business for nearly ten days while the officials make out their returns, and it is clear the County Court returns cannot be near so heavy as those of the Superior Courts, yet the suitors are delayed prosecuting their judgments for about ten days. Surely this delay must often be the cause of allowing many defendants to escape, and consequently of plaintiffs losing their debts entirely, without having any redress. In the case of a solicitor neglecting his client's business, the client has his remedy for negligence against the solicitor: but apparently in the County Courts delay such as I have mentioned no redress whatever can be obtained against the County Court authorities. I trust, therefore, that you will consider the matter sufficiently important, and be good enough to give this letter publicity, as I hope it may be the means of removing the delay that now exists, and of compelling the County Court officials to make up their returns upon the same principle as the Superior Courts—viz., without any interference in obtaining that redress which every suitor is entitled to. A SOLICITOR'S CLERK.

P.S.—I may mention that pending the preparation of the returns in the County Court not even a common search as to payment of money into court can be made, and what influence that can have upon the result of the returns I am at a loss to conceive.

HATS OFF!—Do you consider it right and fitting for magistrates at quarter sessions to wear their hats when trying prisoners? At the Northamptonshire sessions one gentleman invariably does so, not in the chairman's court, for Mr. Hunt, I am sure, would never permit such a thing; and it does seem to me the height of impropriety, not to say bad manners, to act in such a way. G.

OUR INVADERS.—Will you permit me to add one or two to the many suggestions on this subject which have been lately made in your columns? First, I would suggest that the office of trustee in bankruptcy should be held by a solicitor, wherever practicable. The present very general practice of allowing an accountant to be appointed trustee in these cases, appears to me to be one of the means by which the legitimate emoluments of the legal profession are diverted into other hands. The sums received by these accountants for their services as trustees (as distinguished from their remuneration as accountants) is in the aggregate very considerable, and may fairly be said to be gratuitously thrown into their hands through the unfortunate habit of adhering to routine, so common in the Profession. There seems no good reason why the duties of a trustee in bankruptcy cannot be discharged quite as efficiently by a solicitor as by an accountant, though perhaps the position might seem somewhat novel at first. Where the services of an accountant are really necessary, or the solicitor engaged has not a clerk competent to draw up the accounts, the accountant employed should be confined to his proper sphere of preparing the requisite statements. There is, I think, no doubt that in the great majority of cases the appointment of trustee is altogether in the hands of solicitors, but how seldom do we see one of our own body appointed, though such appointment is clearly contemplated in the Bankruptcy Act 1869 (see sect. 29), and it would often be a considerable saving of expense to the estate. There are no doubt many solicitors who would be willing to act as trustees, but who at present hesitate to accept the appointment because it is so seldom filled by a solicitor, and so, as no one sets the example, the entire benefit derived from this office falls into the hands of accountants and others of a similar class, who are thereby enabled to further encroach on the Profession by a semi-legal character they acquired in the public eye through the prominent position they are allowed to occupy in bankruptcy proceedings. I venture to think that an authoritative suggestion on this point from someone or other of our law societies would have the effect of checking the evil, and would lead to the more frequent appointment of solicitors as trustees. Such a change would hardly fail to benefit the general body of creditors, and the Profession at large. Secondly, I would suggest that means be taken for the systematic prosecution of all persons bringing themselves under the stamp law penalties, by illegally acting as solicitors or attorneys. I think much might be done in this way if a fund were raised and placed under the control of some responsible body who would take proceedings to enforce the penalties in all suitable cases without regard to the locality where the offence was committed. At present very many such cases come under the notice of solicitors but they seldom or never take action in the matter not feeling disposed to interfere personally, whereas they would gladly give information to any society which would take up the case for the general good. H. J. L.

NOTES AND QUERIES ON POINTS OF PRACTICE.

NOTICE.—We must remind our correspondents that this column is not open to questions involving points of law such as a solicitor should be consulted upon. Queries will be excluded which go beyond our limits.

N.B.—None are inserted unless the name and address of the writers are sent, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for bona fides.

Queries.

57. MORTGAGEE SUING MORTGAGOR'S TENANT FOR RENT.—Will some of your readers give me the names of some cases in addition to Moss v. Gallimore and Rawson v. Eicke which shows the right of a mortgagee to sue mortgagor's tenant for rent of premises held under tenancy prior to indenture of mortgage assigning all the mortgagor's legal estate in the premises to the mortgagee. J. McD.

Answers.

(Q. 50.) CASE IN BANKRUPTCY WANTED.—I take it "R. T.," when he speaks of the costs being below £200, means assets. If so, a case in point is Ex parte Hodge, re Lemon, quoted in p. 492 of Roche and Hazlitt on Bankruptcy. There on an appeal it was decided that where the estate is worth less than £200 the costs must be taxed upon the lower scale. H. S.

(Q. 55.) LANDLORD AND TENANT—RENT.—The question whether the Apportionment Act 1870 applies between vendor and purchaser seems to be yet unsettled. An article on this subject will be found 53 LAW TIMES, 313. Z. Y.

(Q. 56.) COPYHOLD PRACTICE.—If B., the testatrix, was not admitted or did not surrender to the use of her will, fees and fines must be paid as if she had been admitted and had surrendered. See 1 Vict. c. 26 s. 4. Such fees and fines would primâ facie be borne by the vendor. The purchaser will only pay one fine and one set of fees. The lord of the manor cannot compel the trustee to be admitted: (Glass v. Richardson, 9 Hare 698; Reg. v. Wilson, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 326). Z. Y.

— If B. was admitted, her trustee (as donee of the power of appointment), could appoint the copyholds to the purchaser without being admitted, and therefore without incurring the costs of the fines and fees for admission. The appointee is considered as coming in immediately under the will: (Flack v. Downing College, 17 Jur. 697; Holder v. Preston, 2 Wills 400; Beal v. Shepherd, Cro. Jac. 199; Rex v. Lord of the Manor of Oundle, 1 A. & E. 283; Glass v. Richardson, 2 D. M. & G. 660; Reg. v. Sir T. Wilson, 3 B. & S. 201.) If B. was not admitted, her trustee or donee still does not require to be admitted, but the purchaser is not entitled to be admitted until after payment of the fine and fees due on his admission, as well as of the fine and fees which would have been paid if B. had taken admission, which last will be paid by the vendor in absence of express stipulation: (1 Vict. c. 26, s. 4; also Hayes and Jarman's Forms of Wills, 6th edit., pages 6 and 12*n*.) LEGAL OBITUARY.

NOTE.—This department of the LAW TIMES, is contributed by EDWARD WALFORD, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Genealogical and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the LAW TIMES Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

R. H. RICKARDS, ESQ.

THE late Robert Hillier Rickards, Esq., barrister-at-law, formerly of Llantrissant, Glamorganshire, who died on the 29th ult., at his residence in Caledonia-place, Clifton, Bristol, in the seventieth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late Richard Fowler Rickards, Esq., of Llantrissant (who died in 1848), by Charlotte, daughter of Isaac Hillier, Esq., of Holt, in the county of Wiltshire. He was born in the year 1804, and was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple, in Hilary Term, 1835. Mr. Rickards, who was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the county of Glamorgan, married in 1831 Caroline Octavia, daughter of Andrew Knox, Esq., of Prehen, county Londonderry, Ireland, by whom he has left a family to lament his loss.

G. C. OKE, ESQ.

THE late George Colwell Oke, Esq., chief clerk to the Lord Mayor, at the Mansion House, who died on the 9th inst., after only three days' illness, at his residence, Rosedale, St. Mary's-road, Peckham, in the fifty-second year of his age, was born in 1822, and for some time acted as clerk to the Newmarket bench of justices. In 1855 he was appointed assistant clerk to the Lord Mayor; and upon the retirement of Mr. Goodman, in 1865, he succeeded that gentleman in the chief clerkship. Mr. Oke had a high reputation for his intimate knowledge of criminal law, and its practical application, and was well known and highly esteemed, not only among members of the corporation and of the legal profession, but throughout the City generally; and the able manner in which he conducted the protracted proceedings in the justice room of the Mansion House in the Bank forgery case, and the prosecution in the Overend-Gurney affair, besides other important commercial cases, will be fresh in the recollection of our readers. Mr. Oke was the author of many standard legal works, including The Magisterial Synopsis (which has passed through several editions), The Magisterial Formalist, The Law of Turnpike Roads, a Handy-book of the Game and Fishery Laws, and The Licensing Laws.

J. HARGREAVES, ESQ.

THE late John Hargreaves, Esq., solicitor, and ex-coroner for the borough of Blackburn, who died on the 21st ult., at his residence in that town, in the ninety-first year of his age, was the eldest son of the late Mr. Henry Hargreaves, of Newchurch-in-Rossendale, Lancashire, where he was born in October 1783. He was educated at Clitheroe Grammar School, and was articled to Mr. Shuttleworth, solicitor, of Preston. He was admitted an attorney and solicitor in 1806, and commenced the practice of his profession immediately afterwards at Colne, in Lancashire, being taken into partnership by Mr. John Bolton, of that place; and on the death of that gentleman a few months afterwards, Mr. Hargreaves was left in charge of a very widely extended practice. In 1810, on the office of Coroner for the Hundred of Blackburn becoming vacant, Mr. Hargreaves became a candidate and was duly elected, the condition being attached to the appointment that he should remove his residence to Blackburn, which is situate in a more central part of the Hundred. The duties of this important office Mr. Hargreaves fulfilled for a period of upwards half a century, resigning in 1854, upon which his son, Mr. Henry Unsworth Hargreaves, the present coroner, was elected in his place. Besides filling the office of coroner, Mr. Hargreaves took a leading and accountable part in the local government of the town of Blackburn for many years: first, as clerk to the Police Commissioners; then, on the supercession by the Improvement Commissioners, under the Local Act of 1847 (which Mr. Hargreaves took the means to procure), as clerk and legal adviser to the latter commissioners; and, eventually as first town clerk of Blackburn on the incorporation of the borough in 1851. During the course of his extended practice in the law, says the Blackburn Times, Mr. Hargreaves had numerous private presentations of plate and other memorials made to him by his clients and other friends; and it may be added that he was always foremost in lending his services to the formation of the numerous voluntary institutions and charitable movements set on foot in Blackburn during the last sixty years. Mr. Hargreaves married, in 1812, Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. Robert Hargreaves, of Bury, by whom (who died in 1862), he had eight children, one son, Henry Unsworth, above mentioned, and seven daughters. The remains of the deceased gentleman, which were honoured with a public funeral, were interred in the family vault at Newchurch-in-Rossendale, the mayor and corporation of Blackburn, together with the borough and county justices, and many others, being present.

The Law and the Lawyers.

THE Universities are sending some distinguished scholars up to the Inns of Court, and we are glad to add that the appointment to the vacancy in the Court of Exchequer adds a University man to the Bench. Baron AMPHLETT makes the sixth Cambridge graduate on the Common Law Bench, the others being the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE of ENGLAND, Mr. Justice BLACKBURN, Mr. Justice BRETT, Mr. Justice DENMAN, and Baron CLEASBY.

SIX hundred guineas have been distributed between four students of the Inns of Court for proficiency in Roman Civil Law and Jurisprudence. By this liberality the study of Roman law is necessarily raised in the estimation of students above the study of any other branch of knowledge forming a portion of the education of an English lawyer. It is not politic, in our opinion, to give special pecuniary advantages to students engaged in one particular study; the large prizes should be given to the candidate who displays an intimate acquaintance with law generally. But it is the characteristic weakness of the government of the Inns of Court to be led into extremes. Either nothing is done or new paths are struck out and pursued with that vigour which novelty is calculated to excite. We do not deprecate high rewards for proficiency in Roman law, but we urge that English law should be placed upon the same footing.

AN important case under the Apportionment Act was before Vice Chancellor MALINS in Capron v. Capron on Wednesday. It was this, viz.: whether in all cases where a testator seised in fee devises a particular estate and dies between the half yearly and quarterly days for the payment of his rents, there should be an apportionment of those rents between his own personal estate and his devisee. The testator in the cause had made his will before the passing of the Act of 1870, but he added a codicil afterwards, and his Honour held that he had a discretion to apply the Act to a will thus executed, and made a declaration that there must be an apportionment of the rents, and that such portion of them as accrued before the death of the testator belonged to his general personal estate. This decision is the more important, as Lord SELBORNE in Jones v. Ogle (L. Rep. 8 Ch. 192; 28 L. T. Rep. N.S. 245) doubted whether the Act could affect the construction of a will previously made.

WE unwittingly did the LORD CHANCELLOR an injustice in our last impression by suggesting that if Mr. AMPHLETT were appointed to the vacancy in the Exchequer a political supporter would be rewarded. Mr. AMPHLETT, according to DOD, was not a Liberal, but a Liberal-Conservative; but although not a political ally, on all professional matters he was a sincere coadjutor of the LORD CHANCELLOR, and quite as eager and liberal a law reformer. The new Judge was born in the year 1809, and was educated at a grammar school in Staffordshire, and subsequently at St. Peter's College, Cambridge, where he took his Bachelor's degree in 1831, coming out in the mathematical tripos as sixth Wrangler. He was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in Trinity Term 1834, and was for some time one of the acknowledged leaders in Lincoln's Inn. He received a silk gown in 1858. He is a magistrate and a deputy-lieutenant for Worcestershire, and has been for several years a deputy-chairman of the Quarter Sessions for that county. When Sir ROUNDELL PALMER became Lord Chancellor, Mr. AMPHLETT was chosen his successor in the presidency of the Legal Education Association. It is interesting to know what the solicitors think of the appointment, and we have received an expression of opinion which we reproduce. A correspondent writes: "Having in view the jurisdiction in bankruptcy matters which the Judicature Act throws upon the Court of Exchequer, it appears to me that the appointment of an equity counsel was very judicious. I am pleased to know that there is some prospect of law and equity working together in the common law courts, as the trial of a similar working in the courts of equity has proved a success. If the Judicature Act is to be properly worked, common law and equity Judges must sit side by side. The presence of a Judge who has had a training in equity principles, will prove of vast use in duty questions which are practically left solely to the decision of the Court of Exchequer."

THE question which has been in a certain sense decided in the Taunton Election Petition with reference to the production of telegrams, is undoubtedly one of considerable importance. Before noticing the strictly legal aspect of the question, we may observe that an objection to the inspection of post office telegrams has been put forward on very broad general grounds. The Times asks, "ought the department to be considered as standing in any different relation to telegraphic messages than that which it holds in respect to letters. . . . The general principle has in great measure been recognised that in respect to telegrams as well as to letters, the post office is in the mere position of a carrier." The position of the Post-office is doubtless that of a carrier, and its duty to the public in the transmission of letters and telegrams is plainly to deliver them to the persons to whom they are addressed, and to no one else. So soon as letters or telegrams are delivered to the Post-office the property in them is vested in the intended receiver, and the sender has no right of stoppage in transitu. But the receiver's rights with reference to letters transmitted to him are distinctly limited—he cannot publish the contents without the permission of the sender. The case of the carrier is certainly à fortiori. But the receiver may be ordered to produce letters, even at the suit of a stranger. Lord Justice CAIRNS said in Hopkinson v. Lord Burghley, "The writer is supposed to intend that the receiver may use it for any lawful purpose, and it has been held that publication is not such a lawful purpose. But if there is a lawful purpose for which a letter can be used, it is the production of it in a court of justice for the furtherance of the ends of justice." Moreover, the sender cannot protect letters from production by marking them "private and confidential." If the Post-office were the ultimate receiver of a letter or telegram, therefore, there could be no doubt about its liability, and if telegrams are to be got at, it must be upon the ground that the Post-office retains copies in its possession, and to a limited extent is a receiver. Supposing, however, that this were allowed to prevail, we do not see how it is possible to compel the office to produce all telegrams addressed to and from a particular town on a particular day. In Lee v. Angus (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 324) a subpœna duces tecum was served upon a witness, calling upon him in very wide and general terms to produce all deeds, documents, &c. in his possession relating to the dealings and transactions between two firms for a period of thirty-three years. Vice-Chancellor WOOD said the terms of the subpœna were much too vague, and did not sufficiently specify the documents to be produced, and that a witness ought not to be asked to ransack a large collection of papers for such a period of time to ascertain the precise documents wanted by the party. This reasoning applies when the papers are numerous, either on account of the long period over which they extend or the nature of the business to which they relate. Nevertheless, the VICE-CHANCELLOR held, that having got the documents in court, the witness was bound to produce them. On the whole, Mr. Justice GROVE exercised a wise discretion in not ordering the Post-office to submit the telegrams to the proposed examination, but whether under such circumstances the Post-office should be altogether exempted is a question of the first importance upon which we should not like to express any opinion.

ON the 6th inst. judgment was delivered by Mr. Justice FITZGERALD in Re Marshall, which was an application by a prisoner in custody for a writ of habeas corpus, in order that she should be in attendance at an inquest held on the body of a soldier whom it is alleged she murdered by poison. When the prisoner was taken before the magistrate, application to him was made on her behalf that she might be allowed to attend the inquest then being held, but the magistrate decided that he had no power to grant the application. The argument in support of the application for a writ of habeas corpus was that the Court of Queen's Bench had discretionary jurisdiction, and that even though the prisoner might not be required as a witness before the coroner, she was entitled to be present. It was pointed out that a coroner had power to exclude from the inquest both attorney and counsel, and that if the prisoner were not allowed to be present, any irregularities of which she might be entitled to take advantage for the purpose of quashing the inquisition would pass unchallenged;—and further, that the prisoner should be entitled to cross-examine the witnesses, some of whom might die between the inquest and the trial, but whose depositions might possibly still be used, and no cross-examination take place at all. Solicitor-General LAW, on behalf of the Crown, urged that uniformity should prevail in the English and Irish practice, and that the settled practice in England is that a writ of habeas corpus will not be issued unless it appears to be substantially necessary to the ends of justice. That may be a general principle, but there is no English decided case which goes the length of saying that a prisoner ought not to get his writ for the purpose of attending the coroner's court. It occurs to us that the argument with reference to the admissibility of the depositions in evidence—the doubt whether they would be admissible at the trial if the accused were not present at the inquest—is of itself sufficient ground for allowing the writ to go. ARCHBOLD in his Criminal Evidence says (p. 232), "Although the former statutes relating to the examination of witnesses against a prisoner before justices and coroners (1 & 2 Ph. & Mc. 13; 2 & 3 Ph. & M. c. 10; 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, ss. 2 and 5) did not contain any express enactment like that contained in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 17, it was yet determined in many cases, and recognised as a rule of law, that, where the examination of witnesses in cases of felony under these statutes was taken in the presence of the accused, and he had the opportunity of cross-examining them, the deposition of any such witness might be read in evidence against the accused on his trial, in case the person who made the deposition were dead." We have not looked at the authorities cited by the counsel for the application in Re Marshall, but it is obvious that any judge would hesitate considerably to admit the depositions of a witness before the coroner on the trial of the accused, if the accused had not been present at the examination. Whereas it is equally clear that there could be no objection to the reception of such evidence the accused having been present. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL contended that the writ ought not to go merely to gratify the desire of the accused to be present, but only where the accused wished to give evidence. In this argument we do not for a moment concur, but we entirely agree with Mr. Justice FITZGERALD, who said that he always considered that the more latitude allowed in preliminary courts the better for the course of justice; and again, "Is the coroner's court to exist? If it is I ought to assist its inquiries in every way." "I know," his Lordship added, "of no case in which the application of an accused person, saying by her attorney that she desires to be present, has been refused." In delivering his judgment, Mr. Justice FITZGERALD made some general observations concerning the examination of prisoners on their trial. "I for one," he said, "have long entertained the opinion, and have repeatedly expressed it from the Bench, that, at the final trial before the judge and petty jury, prisoners should be allowed to tender themselves and be received as witnesses, if they so desired it. I believe that there is a great defect in the law as it stands at present, and I think that an alteration in the law to that effect should be made, as it would be most conducive to the due administration of criminal justice. The adviser of the prisoner has sworn that it would be necessary for the prisoner to be present at the inquest before the coroner, in order that she might be tendered as a witness, and I must treat the application with that view, as bonâ fide. That course, if adopted, will be taken at the peril of the party, and if I were sitting as a coroner, although I would not call upon her to be examined, I should be very slow to refuse to receive her evidence, if it were offered,"

MEANS OF KNOWLEDGE AND REPRESENTATIONS AS AFFECTING CONTRACTS.

IT is frequently important that contracting parties should be careful to inform themselves not only of the character of the person with whom they contract, but of all the circumstances existing at the time of the making of the contract. The law of agency in this country has in course of time assumed rather complicated proportions, and it is now abundantly clear that different principles apply to dealings with factors and with brokers, and with agents generally of disclosed and undisclosed principals. When an action is brought by undisclosed principals for goods sold, a question is very likely to arise whether the defendants have any right to set-off against the claim a debt due to them by the agent. And in considering this claim to a right of set-off, it must be asked as a preliminary question, had the defendant means of knowing that the other contracting party was an agent? If he had not, and the principal enabled his agent to hold himself out as owner of the goods, the agent's debt may be set-off against the principal. If, on the other hand, the defendant, with due diligence, could have ascertained that the vendor was an agent, no set-off of the debt of the agent can be pleaded to an action by the principal.

The effect of knowledge upon the defendant's right of set-off was discussed in the case of Borries and others v. The Imperial Ottoman Bank (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 689), where in an action by the real owners of goods for the price of such goods, the defendants pleaded that they had bought them of certain persons whom they believed to be the owners, and that they did not know that the plaintiffs were interested therein or that the vendors were the plaintiffs' agents. On a demurrer to this plea it was held that the plea was good without any allegation negativing the means of knowledge on the part of the defendants that the vendors were agents. The objection to the plea just escapes being a technicality, and appears to us to have been satisfactorily met by Mr. Justice Keating, who said "what are means of knowledge but evidence of knowledge, and evidence must not be pleaded." We are not, however, interested in discussing here whether technically the averment of want of means of knowledge ought to have been inserted in the plea, but the principle involved is one of importance.

The law of agency in this country has become somewhat complicated by the existence of agents having different functions, such as factors and brokers; but the law is now, we think, tolerably clear. First, a vendee of goods cannot in an action for the price by the true owner, set-off a debt due by the vendor's agent to the vendee unless he dealt with the agent as a principal and had no knowledge that he was an agent. If he can be affected with knowledge that the seller was an agent, then the rule does not apply, and he cannot set-off the debt of the agent against the claim of the owner of the goods. To enable us to understand this doctrine, it is only necessary to look at one or two of the principal cases, and the best illustration is furnished by Baring v. Corrie (2 B. & A. 137). There Coles and Co., who were brokers, and also merchants, sold to Corrie and Co. in their own names sugars belonging to Baring, Brothers, and Co., who brought an action for the price. The true nature of the contract was entered by Coles and Co. in their brokers' book, which the defendants might, if they pleased, have seen. Coles and Co. had not the possession of the sugars which were lying in the West India Docks where, by the usage of the docks, they could not have been taken without the order of the plaintiffs, whose principal clerk signed the delivery order. Under these circumstances the court held that the defendants had no right to set-off against the demand of the plaintiffs for the price of the goods a debt due to them from Coles and Co. The plaintiffs there had not even given to the selling brokers the muniments of title, and with ordinary diligence the vendees might have known that Coles and Co. were acting as agents for Baring Brothers. As Mr. Justice Bayley put it, "I think that the plaintiffs did not by their conduct enable Coles and Co. to hold themselves out as the proprietors of these goods so as to impose on the defendants; that the defendants were not imposed on; and even supposing that they were, they must have been guilty of gross negligence." That is a strong case, and we may take it that if we substitute for gross negligence, bare negligence, the case would remain the same.

This leads us straight up to the distinction between factors and brokers, thus referred to by Smith in his Mercantile Law: "Though if a factor sells goods in his own name, the buyer may avail himself of a right of set-off against the factor, yet, if a broker do so, the rule will, except under extraordinary circumstances, be different; for" (quoting Baring v. Corrie) "a factor who has the possession of goods differs materially from a broker; the factor is a person to whom goods are consigned, and when he sells in his own name it is within the scope of his authority; and it is right, therefore, that his principal should be bound by the consequences of such sale, one of which is the right of setting-off a debt due from the factor; but the case of a broker is different—he has not the possession of the goods, and so the vendee cannot be deceived by that circumstance . . . If, therefore, he sells in his own name, he acts beyond the scope of his authority, and his principal will not be bound." It may be remarked, however, that something more than the description of a broker, as such, is necessary to raise the right of set-off, and if the broker so describe himself in conditions of sale, yet if he sell goods as principal, being enabled by possession to deceive the vendee, the true owner will be liable to be met by a set-off. This was the case in Blackburn v. Scholes (2 Camp. 341). There the marginal note at p. 343 says: "The circumstance of persons selling goods being described in the catalogue as sworn brokers is not sufficient notice to the purchaser that they are only agents, to prevent him from dealing with them as principals."

Analogous to the subject which we have been discussing is the doctrine of representation. As in the case of a broker dealing as principal, a person would contract with him the more readily if there were mutual credits between them, so representations of circumstances alleged to exist, although not the consideration for a contract, may induce it, and alter the position of the other side. The doctrine was considered in the case of The Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank of New Orleans (L. Rep. 6 E. & I. App. 352) where bills of exchange were sold on the representation that there were ample funds in the hands of third persons to meet them. That representation was held not to amount to an appropriation of the funds referred to, or an equitable assignment. Representations have been divided by the authorities into two classes, (1) representations of facts, and (2) representations of intentions. Lord Cranworth said in Jorden v. Money (5 H. of L. Cas. 213) "I think that the doctrine does not apply to the case where the representation is not of a fact, but a statement of something which the party intends or does not intend to do. In the former case it is a contract, in the latter it is not." And Lord Selborne said in the recent case, "I apprehend that nothing can be more certain than this, that the doctrine of equitable estoppel by representation is a wholly different thing from contract, or promise, or equitable assignment, or anything of that sort. The foundation of that doctrine—which is a very important one, and certainly not one likely to be departed from—is this, that if a man dealing with another for value makes statements to him as to existing facts, which being stated would affect the contract, and without reliance upon which, or without the statement of which, the party would not enter into the contract, and which being otherwise than as they were stated, would leave the situation after the contract different from what it would have been if the representations had not been made: then the person making those representations shall, so far as the powers of a court of equity extend, be treated as if the representations were true, and shall be compelled to make them good. But those must be representations concerning existing facts.

We shall not further enter into that case, which is a very interesting one. It may be read with advantage, and well illustrates the necessity for correct knowledge on the part of parties to contracts to render contracts binding.

ON THE VALUATION OF ANNUITIES AND FUTURE AND CONTINGENT DEBTS AND LIABILITIES IN BANKRUPTCY.

ARE annuities debts? On the one hand an "annuity creditor" is generally described, eo nomine, as in the repealed Bankruptcy Act 1849, sect. 172—the word "creditor" alone, therefore, appearing insufficient to include him—and annuities partake of the character of descendibility (e.g., a personal annuity to A. and his heirs), while debts do not; and do not partake of the attribute of non-assignability (which characterises debts), and "are not strictly choses in action," as is observed by Mr. Joshua Williams, who accordingly classifies them separately: (Personal Property, 3rd edit., 160). On the other hand, the Bankruptcy Act 1869, nowhere speaks of these annuities, eo nomine, and defines "debts provable in bankruptcy" as including liabilities by the Act made provable in bankruptcy (sect. 4). Are they then "liabilities?" which word is now a legal and legally defined one, at least for the purposes of bankruptcy, which definition, we presume, the Judicature Act adopts when it uses the word in the sub-section before us, since it nowhere itself defines it. A "liability" then, includes, for the purposes of the bankruptcy, "any compensation for work or labour done, any obligation or possibility of an obligation to pay money or money's worth on the breach of any express or implied covenant, contract, agreement, or undertaking, whether such breach does or does not occur, or is or is not likely to occur, or capable of occurring before the close of the bankruptcy; and, generally, any express or implied engagement, agreement, or undertaking to pay, or capable of resulting in the payment of, money or money's worth, whether such payment be, in respect of amount, fixed or unliquidated, as respects time present or future, certain or dependent on any one contingency, or on two or more contingencies; as to mode of valuation capable of being ascertained by fixed rules, or assessable only by a jury, or as matter of opinion" (Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 31)—words so comprehensive, that it would seem hopeless to contend that they do not extend to "annuities."

The matter then stands thus: All debts and liabilities (except demands in the nature of unliquidated damages), present or future, certain or contingent, are debts provable in bankruptcy, and may be proved in the manner prescribed (i.e., prescribed by general rules of court, s. 4) before the trustee in bankruptcy. An estimate shall be made, according to the rules of the court for the time being in force, so far as the same may be applicable, and, where they are not applicable, at the discretion of the trustee, of the value of any debt or liability, which by reason of its being subject to any contingency or contingencies, or for any other reason, does not bear a certain value;" and then follows a right of appeal by the party aggrieved by any estimate of value made by the trustee, to the court. Then the Lord Chancellor with the advice of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, is empowered to make general rules for (inter alia) "the valuing of any debts" (not, observe, "liabilities") "proveable in bankruptcy;" and "until such rules have been made" (and, none such have yet been made, and if made, they would hardly catch "annuities," unless they are "debts")—"the principles, practice, and rules on which courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy have hitherto acted, shall be observed:" (Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 78.) Now, these "principles, practice, and rules" are those prescribed in the Bankruptcy Act 1849, viz., the court was "to ascertain the value by whatever assurance the annuity might be secured, regard being had to the original price given for it, deducting therefrom such diminution in the value thereof as may have been caused by the lapse of time from the grant to the date of the fiat or filing the petition for adjudication." Mr. Robson thinks that these principles of valuation are still applicable (Law of Bankruptcy, 1st edit. 173), and such would seem to be the case with regard to annuities, certain and absolute, unless, under sect. 31 of the Act of 1869, the discretion of the trustee extends to all annuities (as being "debts or liabilities which do not bear a certain value"), which, however, it is too much to contend. He appears to us, however, hardly correct in remitting us to the Act of 1849 for the valuation of contingent annuities.

"Rules of the court" (i.e., of "the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy as by the Act of 1869 provided," see sect. 4), "for the time being applicable" to the making of an estimate of contingent annuities within sect. 31 there are none, simply because the Lord Chancellor has not yet made any, and therefore such annuities (if "liabilities") must be valued by the trustee. But annuities certain and absolute, may still be valued under sect. 173 of the Bankruptcy Act 1849, because the principle of valuation there laid down is a "principle on which courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy have hitherto acted" (sect. 78), and is therefore preserved.

And yet, if this be a correct representation of the law in bankruptcy, what can be more unsatisfactory than to be obliged, as the Judicature Act appears to oblige us, to have recourse, in the valuation of annuities, to the section of an Act which is no longer on the statute book (it having been wholly and expressly repealed by the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83), and which cannot therefore with truth be said to contain any "rules which are in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy," within the meaning of those words in the sub-section of the Judicature Act under consideration.

Had the Judicature Act defined "debt" as including "annuity," and had the sub-section used the words "valuation of debts and liabilities," instead of its present words "valuation of annuities and future or contingent liabilities," things would have been plainer, although even then there would have remained perhaps the question whether all annuities are within sect. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869.

The sub-section, though it declares the rules in bankruptcy "shall prevail and be observed," as to debts and liabilities proveable, omits the valuation of future or contingent debts, and confines itself to the valuation of "annuities" and "liabilities." Is there, then, to be no adoption of the rules of bankruptcy in the valuation of such debts? A future or contingent "liability," assuming, as we have said, that the Judicature Act adopts the new definition of "liability" given in the Bankruptcy Act, will be valued according to sect. 31, i.e., according to the rules of the Court of Bankruptcy in force where applicable, and if none apply, then at the trustee's discretion. Future or contingent "debts"—a much more numerous and probable class of cases—will, unless debt and liability are synonymous terms, remain to be estimated as best they may. The scope of the Bankruptcy Act has been enlarged, so as to admit proof of "liabilities" which were inadmissible before. The scope of the Judicature Act is to be narrowed, if we are right in our interpretation of it, by excluding the valuation of "debts" from it, for even if all "annuities" be "debts," all "debts" are clearly not "annuities."

The latter part of the sub-section, beginning with the words, "And all persons," seems superfluous; and the sub-section would end much better with the words "adjudged bankrupt;" but, if it be retained, it should surely stand thus: "And all persons who, in any such case, would be entitled to prove for and receive dividend out of the estate of any such person, if a bankrupt" (not "any such deceased person") "may come in under the decree or order for the administration of such estate, and make such claim against or receive such payments out of the same". (making a claim alone would be no remedy) "as they would be entitled to under the law of bankruptcy" (not "by virtue of this Act").

THE decisions and the dicta of the judges go to the following extent: The estate of a person dying entitled to the proceeds of unsold real estate is liable to the payment of probate duty, because the sale ought and in equity is considered to have actually taken place. The estate of a person dying entitled to real estate, to be purchased with personal estate, is liable to the payment of probate duty, because at his death the property which actually passes upon his death is of a personal nature. A voluntary transferee of real estate from a reversioner who predeceases the tenant for life is subject only to duty by reason of the gift to him, and at a rate to be determined by the relationship between the transferor and transferee; but such transferee is not liable to the duty to which the transferor, had he survived the tenant for life, would have been subject, it being tacitly admitted by the Crown that the death of the reversioner puts an end to any claim for duty by reason of the original estate taken by him. A transferee for value from a reversioner, who predeceases the tenant for life is, however, liable to the payment of duty at the same rate to which the reversioner himself would have been liable had he survived the tenant for life, but upon a basis which may according to circumstances be either less or very much greater than that upon which the duty would have been calculated had the reversioner retained his property and survived the tenant for life.

We first propose to consider the question of probate duty. Is it right that real estate should or should not be liable to probate duty? The law does not make such a charge when a man dies seised of real estate. For what reasons? Because, we suppose, it is considered that real estate already otherwise bears its full share of public burdens. We are not aware of any other sufficient reason; and assuming that reason to be valid, upon what grounds can the charge of probate duty upon leasehold property be defended? Surely land in the holding of a leaseholder bears exactly the same burdens as it would were it in the hands of the freeholder. A. is a freeholder, and, in common language, is called the holder of a freehold ground rent. B. is his immediate lessee, and by reason of his having sub-let the propery is, in common language, called the holder of a leasehold ground rent. Both A. and B. receive their ground rents free of deduction except for property tax, yet upon the death of B. his estate has to pay probate duty upon the value of his ground rent, whereas upon A.'s death his estate altogether escapes probate duty in respect of his ground rent, which is more valuable than that of B. As the law stands, however, real estate upon the death of its owner contributes nothing in the shape of probate duty, and the only duty to which it is liable is succession duty, to which we shall presently refer. If, then, it is considered fit that real estate should altogether escape probate duty because of the other charges upon it, or for any other reason, we are at quite a loss to understand by what process of reasoning it can be considered fair that the fact of such real estate being held subject to such a power as in equity would for certain purposes confer upon such real estate the incidents of personalty, should make it liable to taxation, when but for such power it would wholly escape. If such power were to have the effect of freeing the land, whilst held subject thereto, from all or any of its other public burdens, which would clearly work an injustice to other landowners, we could understand the fairness of such a proposal, but to treat it as land for the purpose of one kind of taxation, which were it money it would altogether escape, and at the same time to treat it as money for the purpose of another kind of taxation to which land is not subject appears to us to be not only inequitable but simply unjust. Admitting, however, that real estate directed to be sold should for the purpose of probate duty be considered as personalty, there appears to us to be no answer to the converse proposition that money directed to be invested in real estate should be considered real estate. It appears, however, to be the opinion of the court that such is not the law, which seems to us to be doing what is usually called blowing hot and cold.

The most glaring injustice seems to be worked when real estate is held for partnership purposes. In equity such real estate is, but solely for the partners' benefit, considered personalty, but why should such doctrine be carried further than its legitimate ends? Why should one house be chargeable with the payment of probate duty because it is used by two persons for the purpose of the trade in which they are partners, whereas the adjoining house, although it may be used for exactly the same kind of trade, is not so chargeable because the owner does not happen to have a partner? Can anything be more absurd? Why should the public be partly relieved of taxation in consequence solely of the private relations of the owners of the houses?

We will now consider the question of legacy and succession duty. If real estate be by will directed to be sold and the proceeds paid to A., he has to pay legacy duty upon the whole of the proceeds, whereas if the estate were given direct to him he would only have to pay succession duty at exactly the same rate, but calculated upon the basis of the value of his own life only. If the real estate were given to A. for life the amount of succession duty payable by him would be just the same as if the fee simple were given to him, with this exception, that if he died within four years and a half of his testator's death he would escape so many equal eighth-parts of the duty as there remained half years to complete that term. Why should a tenant for life and a tenant in fee have to pay exactly the same amount of duty when the estate of the latter is of a far greater saleable value than that of the former? and why should a tenant in fee who has full powers of disposition which he subsequently exercises have to pay a far less amount of duty because his testator happened to give the property direct to him instead of directing it to be sold and giving him the proceeds? Again, why should a purchaser from a reversioner have to pay succession duty upon a different basis from that upon which his vendor would have paid it, and why should such purchaser have to pay duty when by reason of the death of his vendor it would but for the sale never have been payable, or if such purchaser is to pay such duty as would have been paid by the representatives of the vendor who would have taken the property if no sale had taken place, why should those representatives have to pay duty, both probate and legacy, upon the purchase moneys which but for the sale would never have passed to them, and would never have become liable to the duty?

We can see no reason why probate duty should not be paid in respect of freeholds as well as upon leaseholds and money, and it would seem but right if the Government is entitled to a percentage of any dead man's property, that the real estate of A. should contribute as well as the personal property of B. Until 1853, unless the real estate were directed to be sold, no duty of any kind was payable by reason of its passing upon a death from one owner to another, but in that year it was made liable to succession duty, reckoned upon the value of the taker's life, whether such taker were absolutely entitled or not.

In cases of reversionary legacies passing by the death of the original legatee, two duties are payable, one under the will of the original testator and the other under the will of the original legatee. It does seem manifestly unfair that personal estate passing under wills should be subject to such accumulative duties. Assume a testator gave his personal property, amounting to 1000*l.*, to his wife, a young woman, for life, and after her death to A., a stranger, and before the wife's death A. and three successive legatees, all strangers to each other, had bequeathed such legacy, the Crown would, irrespective of probate duty, be entitled to 344*l.*, and the last legatee to 656*l.* By the Succession Duty Act provision is made for the payment of one duty only in respect of personal estate which passes from one successor to another by reason of death, so that in no case can the Crown become entitled to more than 10 per cent., and that only from the person who becomes entitled to the actual enjoyment of the property. If it be considered unfair to charge double duty when the interest passes, by reason of death, under settlements, why should it be otherwise when a similar interest passes by the same reason under wills? No intelligible reason can be given.

Another thing strikes us as improper. Probate Duty and Probate Court fees are payable upon a scale according to the value of the testator's personal property. In estimating such value no deduction is allowed on account of debts, and until very recently no deduction was even allowed for debts secured upon mortgage of leaseholds, the result being that when a man in a large way of business happens to die, his executors have to pay a very large sum for duty and fees, whereas perhaps the estate is of small actual value, or perhaps insolvent. It is true that a return of the duty can be obtained, but the process is by no means an easy or inexpensive one, and no return can be had of the court fees.

It appears to us that probate duty should be payable upon the net value of a testator's or intestate's property, whether such property be freehold, leasehold, pure personalty, or otherwise, that in the case of reversionary property the payment of such duty should be postponed until the actual falling in of the reversion; and if such reversion did not fall in during the life of the legatee, no duty should be payable except under the will of the testator or administrator of the intestate, to whose estate the actual possession accrued. To ensure the proper estimate of the estate and no improper deduction, the residuary account (which should contain a statement of all the property whether in possession or reversion) might be required to be verified by the oath of the executors or administrators.

The succession and legacy duties should be amalgamated into one duty and should be payable upon all property passing by reason of death other than upon reversionary property upon which duty should be payable as it now is, under the Succession Duty Act, upon reversionary personal property, viz., by the person who actually obtains possession of it, the rate to be the highest which he or either of his predecessors would have paid had all been liable to duty. In all cases the duty should be calculated upon the actual value of the interest passing to the beneficiary. Provision should, however, be made for allowing time for payment of duty in respect of land, but interest should be paid upon every instalment calculated as from the death of the deceased, otherwise the legatee of money would, in consequence of immediate payment of duty being required, have to bear a larger amount of duty than the devisee of land, whereas both are equally beneficiaries and should rateably contribute towards the expenses of the country.

Provision will have to be made for the payment of the duty where reversions are dealt with or pass otherwise than by death. The present system of charging duty under the Succession Duty Act is clearly unfair. The proper thing would, we should think, be to charge the reversioner with duty, at the time of sale, upon the actual proceeds of the sale in exactly the same manner as if the reversion had fallen in and such proceeds had been its value. It should, however, be further provided that in case the reversion did not actually fall into possession during the reversioner's life, no probate duty should be paid upon so much of his estate as should be equal in amount to the proceeds of the sale of the reversion, and that other duty should only be payable upon such amount in case the reversioner's representatives would have been liable, in respect of the reversion, to a higher rate of duty than the reversioner himself, and then only at the difference between the rates.

LAW LIBRARY.

WE have received from Messrs. Knight and Co. (90, Fleet-street), The Local Government Directory for 1874. This work is in its thirty-third year, and it contains an useful summary of Local Government Legislation of the session of 1873, by Mr. CUNNINGHAM GLEN. The Directory is too well known to require description. It is to local authorities what the Law List is to the legal Profession. We notice that it contains a list of the School Boards of England and Wales.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

WE are able to state, on the highest authority, that solicitors will have an equal right of audience with the Bar in cases of bankruptcy, in the Exchequer division of the High Court as constituted under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, unless the contrary is provided for under the rules of court to be framed in conformity with that Act. We remind solicitors that the drafting of these rules has been intrusted to members of the Bar, and it is important that nothing in these rules contained should be allowed to abridge or affect the right in question, and which has been so properly conceded in the Act in the interests of the public and the Profession. This important point will, no doubt, receive the careful consideration of the council of the Incorporated Law Society, although the majority of the members of that body are not, perhaps, likely to avail themselves of the right of audience referred to.

THE following appeared in the Globe a few days since, the correspondent in question being, we understand, a London solicitor: "In the law reports of the Times counsel engaged in each case is always scrupulously mentioned. A correspondent suggests that the names of the solicitors should also be published. This is obviously fair. The public go to solicitors, and the latter to the higher branch of the Profession. The majority of people, therefore, are more interested in knowing the names of solicitors than those of barristers. It is due to solicitors that their services should be recognised; but the present demand is made on public, not professional grounds. In reporting a case either no reference should be made to legal officials, or the names of all concerned should be made known." It is enough for us to say that we quite agree with the above. It is contended by some that the names of the solicitors in the case cannot often be ascertained by the reporters. Our readers will agree with us that such a contention will not as a rule hold water.

WE understand that an impression exists at Woodbridge that the circular recently issued by the Lord Chancellor, directing that, upon any vacancy occurring in the office of registrar of the County Courts, that his Lordship may be acquainted with the fact, "in order that the circumstances of the court, and the propriety of discontinuing it, may be considered," will lead to the abolition of that County Court, the registrar of which, Mr. Reeve, a local solicitor, has just died. We understand, however, that the learned judge of the County Court in question, has replied that it would be highly inexpedient to abolish the court. We hope that the vacant registrarship will be filled by a London or local solicitor, and not, as has lately been the case on such vacancies occurring, by a member of the Bar.

"LEGAL process issued in Ireland and Scotland may be served in England," writes a solicitor, "but the same process issued in England may not be served in those parts of the United Kingdom; how the Incorporated Law Society can for so long a time have left matters in this position is difficult to explain." We do not quite see that the Incorporated Law Society is answerable for this rather unjust provision in the Common Law Procedure Act 1852. It was, we believe, inserted in the Bill in the House of Lords at the eleventh hour, at the instigation of certain Scotch and Irish peers. English solicitors, and indeed the English public, may fairly demand legislation on the subject.

BARRISTERS are called solicitors to some of the public departments of the State. A barrister has just been appointed to the office of Registrar to the Railway Commissioners, and another member of the higher branch has been appointed to the office of Registrar of the Preston County Court; in short, barristers are being appointed to all those posts usually, in former times, bestowed upon attorneys at law. Solicitors who have laboured for years in the active exercise of their profession, are constantly overlooked in favour of members of the Bar often admittedly without practice or experience. We wonder to what length this unjust practice, which is obtaining, will go before solicitors show any sign of discomfiture, if they ever will show it at all.

REFERRING to the observations in our last issue upon the subject of the inconvenience arising from the service out of the jurisdiction of process issued out of the Lord Mayor's Court of the City of London, a solicitor in the City writes to us that he considers that of which we and our correspondents complain so often not so objectionable as contended, "because countrymen trade within the city and so give jurisdiction." "It would be much worse to compel the City houses to go to remote courts to sue people dealing with them," says our correspondent. Whilst we gladly print this expression of opinion we are compelled to differ from the view of the question which he advances. The County Courts exercise no such extensive jurisdiction.

WE are pleased to notice a tendency on the part of solicitors to conduct the cases of their clients on the hearing of municipal petitions. Three country solicitors have lately particularly distinguished themselves by the able manner in which they have conducted such cases, in two of which they were successful, as has no doubt been observed in the reports in the London daily papers of the past week. If this practice obtains, as we hope it will, no doubt many petitions will be presented and disposed of which otherwise would not, owing to the expense which would necessarily arise under other circumstances. Much just and legitimate litigation is nipped in the bud owing to the enormous expense which in these modern times often attends it.

THE following lectures and classes are appointed for the ensuing week, at the Law Institution, for the instruction of students seeking admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors: Monday 26, Tuesday 27, and Wednesday 28, class, Common Law, 4.30 to 6; Friday 30, lecture, Conveyancing, 6 to 7, p.m. To prevent interruption at the lectures, subscribers cannot be admitted to the hall after a lecture has commenced.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

FRAUD—ACTION AT LAW ON POLICY OF INSURANCE—RELIEF IN EQUITY—CANCELLATION.—The defendants brought an action at law against the plaintiffs on a policy which, with another policy, had been effected by gross fraud. There being several actions arising out of the same transaction, all the actions but that of the defendants were stayed, and a special case was agreed upon, and judgment was to be delivered at law upon the facts stated and found. The facts showed gross fraud on the part of the plaintiffs at law, and judgment was given against them. Held, that the defendants at law were entitled to a decree in equity for cancellation of both the policies: (London and Provincial Marine Insurance Company v. Seymour, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 641. V.C.B.)

MATRIMONIAL SUIT—COUNTERCHARGE BY WIFE—PETITION DISMISSED—WIFE'S COSTS.—In a husband's suit for dissolution on the ground of adultery, the wife charged the husband with adultery, and with conduct conducing to her adultery. The jury found both parties guilty, and the petition was dismissed. The court held that the respondent had succeeded in her litigation, and ordered her all the costs of her defence beyond the sum for which security had been given in the registry: (Chaldecott v. Chaldecott, and Cartwright, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 699. Div.)

MATRIMONIAL SUIT—HUSBAND RESIDENT IN AUSTRALIA—PROOF OF PRELIMINARY FACTS OF AFFIDAVIT—PRACTICE.—In a husband's suit for dissolution, where the petitioner was resident in Australia, the court allowed the preliminary facts of the cohabitation and separation to be proved by affidavit: (Adams v. Adams and Guest, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 699. Div.)

WILL—UNEXECUTED TESTAMENTARY PAPER—INCORPORATION.—A testatrix left a will by which a certain portion of her property was to be disposed of according to instructions contained in "any document or documents accompanying this my will." Three letters were found along with the will, one dated anterior to the will, another bearing date before the will, but evidently altered after, and the third written after the execution of the will: the court held, that none of the documents were sufficiently identified as being in existence when the will was executed, and refused probate of all three: (In the Goods of Matilda Zockey, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 699. Prob.)

THE APPORTIONMENT ACT—CONSTRUCTION OF WILL MADE BEFORE.

Capron v. Capron, before Malins, V.C., on Wednesday, was a special case to obtain the opinion of the court upon an important question as to the construction of the Apportionment Act 1870, under the following circumstances:—The late Mr. George Capron, of Southwick Hall, in the county of Northampton, by his will, drted the 2nd April 1866, after bequeathing certain life annuities, payable quarterly, and charging them upon his estate in the county of Northampton (of which he was seised in fee), devised that estate (in effect) to his eldest son for life, with remainder in strict settlement. By a codicil, dated the 1st July 1871, he made certain trifling alterations in, and subject thereto ratified and confirmed, his will, and he died on the 24th April 1872. The rents of such parts of the testator's Northampton estate as were let on lease were payable at Lady-day and Michaelmas, and the question then arose whether the persons who were interested in his residuary personal estate were not under the recent Apportionment Act of 1870 (which came into operation on the 1st Aug. 1870) entitled, as against the devisee of the estate, to have the rents apportioned and such part of them as accrued before the day of the testator's death paid to them.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said the point which had arisen in this case as to the construction of the Apportionment Act of 1870 (the construction of which had already caused some difficulty) was one of very great and general importance. In this case the testator, who was seised in fee, had devised his estates in strict settlement; but, in considering the question, there was no difference in principle between that and an absolute devise, and the question was in effect the simple one—whether in all cases where a testator seised in fee devised a particular estate, and died between the half-yearly or quarterly days for the payment of his rents, there should be an apportionment of those rents between his own personal estate and his devisee. The state of the law before the recent Apportionment Act was clear; in all cases of money lent the interest was considered as accruing from day to day, and the personal representative of the testator was entitled to an apportionment, but where an estate was devised the devisee was entitled to the whole rents from the last day of payment, and the representative of the devisor was not entitled to any apportionment. This was felt to be a defective state of things, and in August 1870, was passed the Act now under consideration, which, after reciting "whereas rents and some other periodical payments are not at common law apportionable (like interest or money lent) in respect of time, and for remedy of some of the mischiefs and inconveniences thereby arising divers statutes had been passed," by its 2nd section enacted that after the passing of the Act "all rents, annuities, dividends, and other periodical payments in the nature of income (whether received or made payable under an instrument under seal or otherwise) shall, like interest on money lent, be considered as accruing from day to day, and be apportionable in respect of time accordingly." This his Honour read as a general provision applying to this very case, and, according to it, every day a fresh sum of rent was to be considered as falling due, and the rent of every day which fell due before the death of the testator must go to this estate. Such would have been his decision if there had been no authority upon the case, but in the case of Roseingrave v. Burks (Ir. Rep. 7, Eq. 186), the Vice-Chancellor of Ireland, in a carefully considered judgment, had arrived at the same conclusion. It had been said that that case was decided in chambers, but it had been argued by counsel, and he presumed reported by the sanction of the judge, and his Honour did not consider that it was entitled to less consideration because it was delivered in one room rather than in another. The case of Jones v. Ogle (L. Rep. 8 Ch. 192), had been cited as an authority the other way. In that case, however, the dividend and income of the testator's share in the Lillishall Iron Company were the actual subject of the bequest, and the decision of the Court of Appeal entirely turned upon the effect of the terms of the testator's will. A testator could do what he pleased with his property, and if in this case he had chosen to say, "I give my lands and all the rents accruing in respect thereof," that would have made the case more like Jones v. Ogle. There were, it was true, certain expressions used by one of the learned judges who had decided Jones v. Ogle, which rather seemed to imply a doubt whether the Act should apply to an instrument already executed. There was, however, no decision to fetter his Honour's discretion, and moreover, if the Legislature had intended such an exception they would probably have expressed it. No doubt every testator while making his will must be supposed to have in view the state of the law at the time; but in this case the testator, though he made his will before the passing of the Act, made a codicil after the passing of the Act, whereby, subject to certain alterations not affecting the present question, he ratified and confirmed his will. This amounted to a repetition and republication of every word so confirmed, and, in fact, rendered the will a will made after the Act. It was also very material to observe that the old Act directed an apportionment of the periodical payments therein mentioned, "under any instrument that shall be executed after the passing of this Act, or (being a will or testamentary disposition) that shall come into operation after the passing of this Act." So that as the former Act applied to a will executed before, but taking effect after the Act, it was in the last degree improbable that the Legislature should have intended the recent Act, which was expressed in very general terms, to have this limited operation. There must be a declaration that there must be an apportionment of the rents in the special case mentioned, and that such portion of them as accrued before the death of the testator belonged to his general personal estate.

SALE OF PRACTICES.—Is it too much to hope that the Legal Practitioners' Society will take speedy steps to remedy the abuses now perpetrated by law accountants and agents in connection with the disposal of legal practices? SOLICITOR.

[We think the sale of solicitors' businesses may well be taken in hand by the Profession in some way, but, as we understand, the object of the Legal Practitioners' Society, the above is hardly a subject with which they can deal.—ED. SOLS'. DEP.]

UNQUALIFIED PERSONS.—In your impression of Saturday last I notice a letter upon "Our Invaders," C. and V. I have seen several of their circulars during the last few months, I wish I had known as much twelve months ago, for then I answered their advertisement, which appears daily in the Standard and Telegraph. I wanted a divorce, and was without money, as I am still; they said the case was very simple, and undertook it on spec. Week after week during the year they promised me the case would come on, but they never even had it registered for hearing. Now I am in a dilemma. The witnesses then on the spot, are now some distance out of London, and I am without means. VICTIM.

MAGISTRATES' LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

COUNTY BRIDGE—DAMAGE BY LOCOMOTIVE—REPAIR.—The Locomotive Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 70, s. 7), enacts that where any bridge on a turnpike or other road, carried across any stream, watercourse, or navigable river, canal, or railway, shall be damaged by reason of any locomotive passing over the same, or coming into contact therewith, none of the proprietors, undertakers, directors, conservators, trustees, commissioners, or other persons interested in, or having charge of, such navigable river, canal, or railway, or of such bridge, shall be liable to repair the damage, &c., but the same shall be repaired to the satisfaction of such proprietors, &c., by the owners or persons having charge of the locomotive at the time of the happening of the damage. Held, that this provision does not apply to bridges repairable by the inhabitants of a county: (Reg v. Kitchener, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697. C. Cas. R.).

LOCAL GOVERNMENT—NEW BUILDING—BYE-LAWS.—21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 34, empowers every local board to make bye-laws (inter alia) "with respect to the structure of walls of new buildings for securing stability and the prevention of fires," and to "provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein such provisions as they think necessary as to the giving of notices." The appellants, a local board, acting under the above section, passed a bye-law requiring notice to be given to them before the commencement of any new building. The respondent possessed a stable within the district of the local board. The back of the stable was formed by a wall of the yard in which it stood; the other three sides were of wood. Without giving notice to the appellants, he pulled the stable down and rebuilt it in another part of the yard, so that two of the yard walls formed two sides of the erection, and the other two sides were reconstructed with the old materials. He put on a fresh roof. The respondent having been summoned before justices for the breach of the above-mentioned bye-law, they stated a case, under 20 and 21 Vict. c. 43, wherein they minutely decribed the nature of the restored stable, and decided that the building was not a "new building" within the meaning of the first-mentioned statute and bye-law, but reserved the question as one of law upon which they desired the opinion of the court. Held, that the stable in question was a "new building," and the justices were wrong in their judgment, but were right in remitting the question for the court: (Hobbs v. Dance, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 687. C. P.)

KENT GENERAL SESSION.

Tuesday, Jan. 13.

(Chairman: Col. J. T. LENNARD).

Alehouse Licenses.

THE quarter session for the county was held at Maidstone.

A letter was read from Mr. T. F. Walker, clerk to the justices of the Tunbridge Division, relative to the fee for serving the notices required by Geo. 4, c. 61, p. 15, which enacts that it shall be lawful for the clerk to the justices to receive from each person to whom an alehouse licence is granted (amongst other sums) the sum of 1s. for the constable or other peace officer for serving the notices, &c., required by the Act to be served. Mr. Walker goes on to say, "Since the parish constables have ceased to be appointed the county police have served the notices, and the question arises whether the fee should now be charged. I hear that in some divisions it was not taken at the recent annual licensing meeting, and that in those divisions in which it was taken it was proposed by the clerks to the justices to apply it to the police superannuation fund. In this division the fees were received, and the amount (£8 15s.) is still in my hands. Under these circumstances I thought it well to mention the matter to the magistrates at the petty sessions, and I was directed by them to request you to be good enough to bring the subject before the next court of general sessions, with the view of obtaining its opinion as to the propriety or otherwise of charging the fee and the mode of its appropriation in case the court should be of opinion that it should still be charged."

The Clerk of the Peace read a lengthy opinion on the subject, the substance of which was that there was no statute relieving the applicant from the necessity of paying the fee; and the justices would, he thought, best comply with the law if they directed the clerks to the justices to continue to demand the 1s. fee, and to pay it over to the treasurer to be applied by him in aid of the police rates, and that it should not be applied to the police superannuation fund. After some discussion, the committee was requested to renew communications with the Canterbury Town Council relative to the use of the police station.

ELECTION LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

RIGHT OF AN IRISH PEER TO VOTE.—An Irish peer, who is not a member of the House of Commons, is not entitled to have his name kept on the register so as to be able to vote, in the event of his being elected to the House of Commons at a future time: (Lord Rendlesham v. Tabor, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679. C. P.)

BOROUGH FRANCHISE — OCCUPATION — ABSENCE.—A clergyman who goes abroad, having placed a curate in his house, and having locked up three rooms for his own use, without an animus revertendi, for six months previous to the 31st July, is not entitled to vote under either 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45, or the Representation of the People Act 1870 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102): (Durant v. Carter, 29 L. T. Rep, N. S. 681. C. P.)

BOROUGH FRANCHISE — OCCUPATION — EXCHANGE OF HOUSE.—A man has not resided within the borough for six calendar months previous to the last day of July, within the 27th section of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, when he has for a portion of that time exchanged houses with a friend in another part of England, and had no intention of returning, and does not return until the expiration of the time agreed upon between them: (Penn v. Pye, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 684. C. P.)

UNAUTHORISED ALTERATION OF LISTS—NOTICE OF OBJECTION.—In the copy of the register of voters for the county, sent by the clerk of the peace to the overseers, the appellant, a voter, was described as of a particular place. The overseers, knowing that he had ceased to reside there, struck out the name of the place, inserted that of the place where the voter actually did reside, and published the list so altered. Previously to the annual revision of the lists, a notice of objection was sent by post to the voter, directed to his true address, as described in the list when altered. The revising barrister deemed the notice sufficient, and expunged the voter's name. Held, that the alteration of the list being beyond the powers given to the overseers by 6 Vict. c. 8, s. 5, the list so altered could not be "deemed to be the list of voters," within sect. 6, and, therefore, that the notice, not having been directed to the appellant, "at his place of abode, as described in the said list of voters," according to the provisions of sect. 100, was improperly served, and the barrister's decision erroneous: (Nosworthy v. The Overseers of Rutland, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 675. C.P.).

TAUNTON ELECTION PETITION.

Jan. 17 and 20.

(Before GROVE, J.)

Evidence—Telegrams—Inspection.

Russell, Q.C. said he wished to have the inspection of certain telegrams concerning the election which had passed between Taunton and other places, and a subpœna had been served on the proper parties to produce them. He understood that an official from the Telegraph Department was present, but the authorities were unwilling to produce the telegrams without judicial authority. What he would propose was, not that the telegrams should be put in and inspected by anybody, but that they should be looked at by one of the counsel on either side.

Collins said he was counsel in the Bridgwater case, and there the telegraph clerk was called into the box, ordered to produce the telegrams, and he was allowed to examine them upon the table of the court.

GROVE, J.—It is a somewhat awkward thing to allow telegrams to be examined without a rather strong case for this course being shown. It is most important that the privacy of the telegraph should be kept up.

Russell said the course he pursued would insure privacy.

GROVE, J.—But the inspection is of no use to you unless you can make some use of the telegrams before me.

Russell.—We intend to make some use of them.

Ballantine, Serjt. said he would leave his learned friend to take his own course; he would neither conceal nor admit anything, nor would he propose any modus operandi.

GROVE, J. thought that at all events there should be some limit laid down as to the examination.

Russell.—That cannot be; that cannot be done.

Ballantine, Serjt.—This is a Government concern, and not a private matter. It is like opening a letter from the Post-office.

GROVE, J. said it was very like calling a postman to say what were the contents of a letter passing through his hands.

Harrison said there were three cases in which it had been held that telegrams were not privileged.

GROVE, J. said it was rather a formidable thing to say that a counsel, simply because he represented a party in a suit, could ask to have telegrams examined. The Bridgwater case was before the telegraphs had passed into the hands of the Government. It was a point of extreme importance, and before deciding it he should like to ask the opinion of the other election judges upon the matter. It was a point upon which much would depend, and it was very desirable that there should be a general opinion.

Russell.—It is clear that they are not privileged.

GROVE, J.—Where do you find that point? Was it so held before, or has it been ruled since the telegraphs came into the hands of the Government?

Russell.—I apprehend that does not make any difference at all.

GROVE, J.—I am not sure of that.

Russell.—There is no case on the subject since Government has had the telegraphs; but I can hardly conceive any reason why there should be a difference.

GROVE, J.—I can see there is some distinction. A message is handed to the Post-office, and the Government is trusted to take certain measures with regard to it.

Russell said when the private companies had the telegraphs they were bound in honour to keep telegrams private, unless a judicial emergency required their disclosure. There was no higher duty laid on the Government than this. They had merely consolidated the companies. As to letters, those that passed to and from candidates and their agents, let them be ever so private, they were bound to be produced when called for.

Jan. 20.—GROVE, J., on taking his seat this morning, said: I have received answers from my learned brothers whom I consulted about the application for the production of the telegrams which passed during the election, and their opinion is very strong, coinciding with that which I rather intimated, without giving an absolute decision upon, on Saturday. Their opinion is that I decidedly ought not to interfere to compel, or even to say anything to the post-office officer, to induce him to produce these telegrams. I do not wish to go into the reasons of this decision, because I do not desire to say that cases may not arise where strong specific grounds may justify the interposition of the election judge. I take it that the witness from the post-office declines to produce the telegrams on his own authority. I do not propose to interfere with the post-office in the matter. I neither compel nor invite them to produce the telegrams.

Russell.—There were one or two particular telegrams as to which we desired to make a specific inquiry, but I may at once say that unless we got a full examination of the telegrams which passed between certain persons during the election, it would be perfectly useless to go further into the matter, and I shall make no further application to your Lordship.

GROVE, J.—Not letters of third parties?

Russell.—To and from candidates and agents.

GROVE, J.—Well, there is the very beginning of the case. You must prove agency.

Russell.—We do not ask for this merely as a fishing examination.

GROVE, J. said that might not be, but there was a wider question involved. It was a matter on which he now felt more than ever that the opinion of all the election judges should be taken, so that there should be a general ruling. On public grounds there was a good deal of difficulty in assenting to the request, and though it might not be of much moment here, yet on some future occasion it might be of the greatest importance.

Jan. 22.—Ballantine, Serjt., at the sitting of the court to-day, said he had carefully considered the suggestion made last night by his Lordship as to the calling of Rollings; but, whatever his own opinion n ight have been, he found that he had no alternative in the matter, seeing that his learned friend the Attorney-General insisted upon every witness who could throw any light upon the inquiry being placed in the box. Under these circumstances he should reserve any further comments upon the evidence until after the witnesses were called. The first witness he proposed to call was the Attorney-General himself.

Sir Henry James, examined by Giffard, explained the circumstances under which he first undertook to contest the borough in 1868. He was invited by some of the constituents to come down, and undertook to do so on the distinct understanding that no corrupt practices would be resorted to, that he should not be required to attend a meeting at any public-house, and that no committee-room should be held at a public-house. These conditions were complied with, and he came down to Taunton. He was seated on petition. Mr. Lane acted as his agent, but was since dead. Mr. Burman, a tradesman, was then appointed, and acted for him in 1873. There was very little drunkenness during the contest, and only on two occasions was he asked for drink—each time by a woman. One voter wrote a letter to him asking for £5. His canvass was purely a personal one. He was not accompanied in it by Mr. Burman. His canvass was highly successful, and throughout the polling he had no reason to believe that he was ever at the bottom of the poll. One of his agents told him after the polling that he was beaten, and that was the first time he had any reason to suppose that his opponent had a chance of success. It turned out, however, to be a mistake on the part of his agent, and was soon rectified. In regard to Rollings, he knew nothing of him further than as an active member of the Land and Labour League, and never employed him as an agent or canvasser.

After some further evidence, the court adjourned.

MANCHESTER SESSIONS COURT.

Tuesday, Jan. 20.

(Before T. W. SAUNDERS, Esq., Recorder of Bath, Commissioner.)

Re BATTY (A Councillor of Exchange Ward.)

Municipal petition—Technical objection—Lists not delivered.

At the election for Exchange Ward, in November 1873, B. and N. received an equal number of votes, and the returning officer gave his casting vote in favour of B. N. presented a petition against B.'s return, on various grounds, and claimed the office on the ground that he had a majority of lawful votes. In accordance with the Act of 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), the petitioner prepared a list of the votes objected to, which had to be delivered to the Master, and the respondent, six days before the day appointed for trial. The trial was appointed for the 20th January, and on the 13th the list was taken to the Rule Office, when the clerk there said it was too late, and advised an application to the Court of Common Pleas for leave to file the list. The list was not pressed upon him, but it was delivered on the 14th, and an application was made to the court as suggested, and a rule nisi was granted. The court discharged the rule on the hearing, on the ground that the list had not been delivered six days before the day appointed for trial, but did not decide whether the list would have been delivered in time if delivered on the 13th.

The case now came on for hearing before the commissioner appointed under the Act. The petitioner's counsel offered no evidence, as the list was excluded.

The commissioner refused to dismiss the petition under the circumstances, and determined simply to certify that B. was duly elected. He refused to grant costs to the respondent, on the ground that the petition was bona fide, and was simply defeated by a technical objection, but granted the costs of the returning officer.

Ambrose, barrister, for the petitioner.

Cottingham, barrister, for the respondent.

Grundy (of Grundy and Kershaw), for the mayor, the returning officer.

In this case a petition had been lodged by Mr. Nield against the return of Mr. Batty for Exchange Ward in November last, at which election there had been a tie between these two candidates, and the mayor, who was the returning officer, gave his casting vote in favour of Mr. Batty. The petition declared that the respondent was not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes, and therefore a scrutiny was prayed for. A rule nisi had been applied for and obtained by Mr. Ambrose in the Court of Common Pleas, calling upon the respondent, Mr. Batty, to show cause why the petitioner should not be at liberty to give evidence against the list of voters tendered at the rule office, and why the said list should not be filed. It appeared that the petitioners had deferred the filing of the list to the last moment, and it was a question whether it was filed within the six days required by the rules of the court. On the matter being argued, Lord Coleridge discharged the rule, thereby deciding in favour of the respondent, that the list could not be received. The question now arose how far that decision would affect the proceedings at the hearing of the petition. Mr. Ambrose reviewed the history of the election, and explained how the order had been obtained from the County Court judge to inspect the documents. There had been some delay in inspecting the documents, owing to the illness of the town clerk, and it was not till near Christmas that the documents were inspected. This delay had arisen from the laudable desire of the town clerk, as custodian of the documents, to be present. It was, therefore, not till Christmas that the marked registers were inspected. Then followed the New Year holidays, and then the petitioners addressed themselves to the getting up of the case. By the 7th rule, which had been issued by the judges, it was enjoined that six days before the trial a list of votes objected to, with heads of objections, should be handed to the master and the respondent. This had been driven to the last moment, and a question had arisen as to the construction of the rule. By the 25th section of the Corrupt Practices Act, it was provided that in reckoning the time for the purposes of the Act, Sunday Christmas Day, or any day set apart for fast or public thanksgiving should be excluded, and the judges were authorised to make rules, which should be of the same force as if they were enacted in the body of the Act.

Cottingham wished the court to take note of recent judgment of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

Ambrose contended that the court had decided on the simple question that they had not left the notice at the rule office on the sixth day. The question whether the six "clear" days was not touched upon, because it was a custom with the court never to decide upon a point which did not arise. The trial was to be on the 20th. The list was tendered on the 13th, but not left till the 14th. For his part, if it had been left on the 13th, he was convinced that it would have been in time. When the list was tendered on the 13th, the legal agents of the petitioner in London considered it was in time, but he was told by the clerk it should have been delivered on the 12th. Unfortunately, in pursuance of that suggestion, the clerk did not press the matter; and if the rule clerk had refused to accept the list, he (Mr. Ambrose) should have felt in a different position. As it was, the rule clerk simply gave advice, which was accepted, namely, that a summons should be taken out, which was done. No order was made on this summons, and application was then made to the Court of Common Pleas with the result above stated. He had offered in the Court of Common Pleas, and before the judge, and was now prepared to offer to pay the costs of the adjournment if the respondents would waive the objection taken in respect of the lists not being delivered in time, and he was prepared with evidence of the most reliable character in support of his list of objections; and he ventured to think that he should lay such evidence before the judge as would entitle him to a verdict in his favour.

Cottingham refused to accede to the suggestion. He argued that the petitioners tried, by the ruse of keeping back the information as long as they could, to put the respondent to a disadvantage, and as they had not complied with the law, they must abide by the consequences.

A long discussion then ensued on the question of costs, Cottingham contending that the costs should fall on the defeated party.

Ambrose said that all precedents tended to show that the costs in a case under these peculiar circumstances should not fall on the petitioner, who was ready to go on with his case, but was met by a frivolous technical objection.

Cottingham said if the petition had been withdrawn altogether no court would have refused to give the respondent costs, and the petitioner said he would have withdrawn if he had had time to do so.

Ambrose contended that the commissioner had a discretion in the matter of costs, and that there were special circumstances in this case calling for the exercise of that discretion in favour of the petitioner. The petitioner had offered long ago to pay the costs of a postponement, and the offer had been renewed that morning, but it was not accepted, and this was a case of an inquiry being defeated on a purely technical objection. At all events, it was a case in which the respondent was entitled to no indulgence from the court; on the contrary, it was a case having special circumstances which would justify the commissioner in depriving him of his costs.

Cottingham having briefly replied.

The COMMISSIONER said this was a peculiar case, and he was sorry it fell to his lot to adjudicate upon it in the first instance. The earnestness of the petitioner was shown by the deposit of £500. He had shown that he was animated by a desire honestly to go on with and have the petition tried. He (the Commissioner) did not, therefore, look upon his conduct as being in any way tinctured by frivolity or insincerity. The 7th rule provided that the list of objections should be filed six days before the day of trial. That meant that one day should be included, and another excluded, and therefore if the particulars had been filed on the 13th they would have been in time. The clerk who tendered them voluntarily took them away again, but if he had insisted upon their being received, the question would have arisen whether the tender was not in fact a filing. No doubt the petitioner drove the thing to the last moment. It was a pity that he was not more liberal in his views, and did not file his particulars in ample time, but he did nothing more than he was lawfully justified in doing. The particulars, however, were not strictly filed, and the respondent had a right to rely upon that, and so far he had the advantage of retaining his seat. He could not shut his eyes to the fact that this was a bona fide petition. There were on both sides a great many questionable matters for the consideration of the court, but it was impossible for him to suggest which side would have been victorious. Here, however, was a bona fide petition, honestly presented, and he could not look upon it as being in any way frivolous. It failed to some extent on a technicality. He thought the petitioner had the moral merits of the case, and did not think that he was called upon to visit him with the costs, he therefore made no order as to costs, and should certify that Mr. Batty had been duly elected.

Cottingham thought the Commissioner had power to reserve a point of law, and he wished the point in reference to the construction of the Act of Parliament on the question of the time of notice to be reserved.

The COMMISSIONER said his discretion as to costs was unfettered, and Mr. Cottingham could hardly go to the Court of Common Pleas with a case as to how he exercised his discretion.

Grundy (who represented the Mayor).—I understand you to dismiss the question of costs with regard to Mr. Batty and to grant costs to the Mayor?

Ambrose said he must consent to an order that the returning officer should have his costs. He must also consent to the costs of the town clerk being allowed.

The COMMISSIONER remarked that a number of objections were made to votes upon which the register was conclusive. For instance, voters were objected to because they had not resided in the ward sufficiently long, or because they were not duly rated to the poor. The court had nothing to do with these questions.

Ambrose said these objections were made on both sides, and a question would have arisen as to them.

The proceedings then terminated.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BILL OF SALE—COVENANT TO PAY "IMMEDIATELY ON DEMAND"—REASONABLE TIME FOR PAYMENT—CONSTRUCTION.—By a bill of sale dated the 15th April 1873, the plaintiff assigned all his goods, &c., to the defendant to secure a sum of £100, upon the express condition that if the plaintiff did not "immediately upon demand thereof in writing," delivered to the plaintiff or left for him at his home, pay the money due, it shall be lawful for the defendant to seize and sell the goods comprised in the bill of sale. On the 27th April 1873, the defendants went with bailiffs to the plaintiff's house and there saw the plaintiff's wife and son, who told him that the plaintiff was from home, they knew not where, and that he might be gone to America for aught they knew. The defendant then read and delivered to the wife and son a written demand for payment, which not being complied with, he at once put the bailiffs in possession, and after an interval of eight days sold the goods. The plaintiff returned to his home on the 8th May, and said he had started with the £100 to go to S. on business, but had gone to R., had got drunk, and remained away "on a spree." In an action against the defendant for so seizing and selling the plaintiff's goods, it was held by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell and Pollock, BB.) that the defendant was under the circumstances perfectly justified by the terms of the bill of sale in seizing the goods as he did, immediately upon the demand having been made as above stated. Toms v. Wilson and another in the Q.B. and Ex. Chamber (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 421, 8 ib. 799; 3 B. & S. 423 and 455; 30 L. J. 32 and 382, Q.B.), and Massey v. Sladen and others in the Exchequer (L. Rep. 4 Ex.

13; 38 L. J. 34, Ex.), discussed and distinguished: (Wharlton v. Kirkwood, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644. Ex.)

VOLUNTARY SETTLEMENT—WORDS OF LIMITATION IN GRANT—LIFE ESTATE.—A., by a voluntary settlement, in 1838 conveyed freeholds to trustees upon trust (together with a sum of stock already transferred) for himself for life, and after his death in trust for his reputed son, W., when and in case he attained twenty-one, with a trust for maintenance if W. should be under twenty-one at the settlor's death. And in case W. should die under twenty-one, or die in the settlor's lifetime, without leaving issue living at his decease, then over. There were no words of limitation in the trust for W. There was a power of sale in the settlement, but no trust to invest the proceeds in land. A. died in 1849, having made his will in 1843, which recited the settlement and confirmed it, except as to the stock which had been sold. W. attained twenty-one, and died in 1872. Held, that W. took a life estate only in the freeholds under the settlement, and that there was a resulting trust for the settlor: (Middleton v. Barker, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 643. V.C. B.)

MINES EXCEPTED OUT OF GRANT OF SURFACE—RIGHT OF OWNER TO SUBTERRANEAN WATER.—In a case in which mines were altogether excepted out of a demise of the surface, held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the rights of the owner of the surface, and the owner of the mines did not in any way differ from those of the owners of adjoining closes, who are strangers in title, each of whom is entitled to the water found upon his land, but neither of whom is entitled to complain of the loss of that water by natural percolation set in motion by his neighbour's excavations; for it makes no difference whether the respective closes are adjacent vertically or laterally, and the grant of the surface cannot carry with it more than the ownership of the entire soil would: (The Ballacorkish &c., Mining Company v. Dumbell, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 658. Priv. Co.)

RIGHT OF WAY—SUBSTITUTED WAY.—The grantor of a right of way over a towing path along a private canal built a bridge over the canal, which entirely blocked up the towing path, and obliged the grantee to go through the grantor's land around the foot of the bridge in order to rejoin the towing path. Purchasers from the grantor of the land over which this right of way existed, attempted to prevent the grantee from using the substituted way which the building of the bridge had obliged him to use. Held, that the grantee was entitled to an injunction restraining the purchasers from interfering with his use of the substituted way: but that the injunction must be limited to the period during which the obstruction of the towing path by the bridge might continue, and was not to extend so as to authorise the grantee to use the substituted way for any other purpose than towing barges. Order of Bacon, V.C., varied: (Selby v. Nettlefold, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 661. L.C. and L.JJ.).

TESTAMENTARY SUIT—MARRIED WOMAN'S WILL — SETTLEMENTS — COSTS. — A married woman executed a will by virtue of a power, by which she appointed A., her husband, her universal legatee. A. did not prove the will, but dealt with the estate, which was all included in the marriage settlement. On the intermarriage with B., his adopted daughter, with C., he settled on her a sum of £5000, in which he included a certain portion of his wife's estate. B. and C. proved the will of the testatrix, which was opposed by her next of kin, and the court, in decreeing costs out of her estate, held, that no portion of the fund settled at the marriage of B. and C. was liable to the costs of the litigation: (Adamson v. Adamson and Hammond, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 700. Prob.)

EJECTMENT FOR FORFEITURE—NONPAYMENT OF RENT—CONSTRUCTION OF COMMON FORM—MEANING OF "BEING DEMANDED."—The defendant was tenant to the plaintiff under an agreement containing a condition for re-entry if defendant should "make default in payment of the rent within twenty-one days after it should have become due being demanded." The defendant made default on the 25th March, and the plaintiff made demand on the 9th April, but the defendant failed to pay. The plaintiff waited twenty-one days, and then brought ejectment: Held, that the demand being made before the expiration of twenty-one days, was not a good demand within the meaning of the agreemet, and a rule to set aside a verdict for the plaintiff in ejectment made absolute: (Phillips v. Bridge, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 792. C. P.)

BANKRUPTCY — COMPOSITION — SUBSEQUENT RESOLUTION TO REDUCE—WHEN PERMISSIBLE—ACTION BY DISSENTING CREDITOR—INJUNCTION—POWERS OF CREDITORS—32 & 33 VICT. c. 71, s. 126, CLAUSES 1, 5, AND 6.—Under sect. 126 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, creditors have power by an extraordinary resolution to reduce the amount of a composition previously accepted by them when the circumstances require it, and it will be for the benefit of the debtor and the creditors generally. A dissentient creditor is as much bound by such extraordinary resolution as he was by the resolution accepting the original composition. The word "persons" in clause 5 of sect. 126 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 does not mean "creditors," but "persons" other than creditors, whose interests may be affected by the proceedings: (Ex parte The Liquidators of the Radcliffe Inves'ment Company (Limited); Re W. H. Glover and Co., 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 694. Bank.)

WILL — ADEMPTION — BEQUEST OF LEASEHOLDS — NOTICE TO TREAT FOR SERVED ON TESTATOR — NO WRITTEN AGREEMENT—CONVEYANCE BY EXECUTRIX—MESNE RENTS.—A testator bequeathed two leasehold houses to A., and appointed B. his executrix and residuary legatee. Previously to his death the testator was served, by a railway company with notice to treat for the sale of the leaseholds. No written agreement was executed, but surveyors assessed the amount of the purchase money, and it was arranged that the testator should continue to receive the rents until the completion of the purchase. Nothing more was done until after the death of the testator, when B., as executrix, conveyed the property to the company. Held, that the bequest was adeemed, but that A. was entitled to the rents received from the testator's death to the date of the conveyance: (Watts v. Watts, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 671. V.C. H.).

DOMICIL OF ORIGIN—ABANDONMENT OF—WILL—GIFT OF RESIDUE—ADEMPTION.—In 1858, the testator, a native of Montreal, where, up to that time he had carried on the business of a merchant, sold his house, and also a piece of ground that he had there purchased in the burial ground, and accompanied by his family went to Paris for the education of his children, where he resided until 1868, when he came to England and purchased the lease, having thirteen years unexpired, of a house, which he furnished, and in which he lived until his death in May 1871. Testator on several occasions returned to Canada for the transaction of business, and on one of such occasions made his will in the French language, and in the form usual in Lower Canada, describing himself as of Montreal, merchant, and appointed four executors, of whom three were resident in Canada; and on another such occasion made a codicil to his will, describing himself in the same manner. While residing in England, testator's daughter married an Englishman, and he also established his son in business in England. Held, that the testator had acquired an English domicil. Testator, by his will made in 1853, gave all his property, subject to an annuity, to his wife (who predeceased him) for life, to be divided equally between his two children. In 1869 testator, on the occasion of the marriage of his daughter, covenanted to pay to the trustees of her marriage settlement the sum of £8500, and in the meantime to pay to them the annual sum of £525, upon trust for his daughter for life for her sole and inalienable use, with remainder to her children as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for all her children who should attain 21 or marry. Testator also advanced to his son a sum of £2000 for the purpose of placing him in business. Held, that the sums settled by the testator on the marriage of his daughter and advanced in his lifetime to his son, must respectively be taken into account in estimating the shares to which they respectively were entitled under the testator's will: (Stevenson v. Masson, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 666. V.C. B.)

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

RAILWAY—COMPULSORY POWERS—NOTICE TO TREAT—DELAY — EVIDENCE.—A railway company, incorporated by an Act of Parliament, which passed on the 29th July 1869, limiting the time for the exercise of the compulsory powers to three years, and the time for the completion of the railway to five years, served a notice to treat for certain lands belonging to the plaintiff company on the 21st April 1866. By an Act of Parliament of the 26th July 1869 (against which the plaintiff company petitioned), the railway company was dissolved, and its undertaking was amalgamated with that of the defendant company, and by the same Act the time for completing the works was extended for three years; but the period within which the compulsory powers given by the first Act were to be exercised was not extended. On the 18th Aug. 1871, the defendant company took possession of the lands, whereupon the landowners filed a bill to restrain them from continuing in possession. Held, that the time for completion of the works having been extended by the Act of 1869 (of which the plaintiff company had notice) to the 29th July 1872, the notice to treat was not invalidated by lapse of time. Held also, that the magistrate's certificate under ss. 16 & 17 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 must, in the absence of fraud, be taken as conclusive evidence that the capital has been subscribed: (Ystalyfera Iron Company v. The Neath and Brecon Railway Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 662. M. R.)

UNREGISTERED ASSOCIATION—WINDING-UP.—In reply to a circular issued by M. and D., setting forth a project for acquiring and remodelling a theatre at the cost of £12,000, with the intention of selling it to a company, to be formed for the purpose, for £40,000, which would enable a return to be made of £300 for every £100 subscribed, several persons, exceeding seven in number, subscribed to the project. The theatre was at first carried on by M. and D., and afterwards by three of the subscribers. A creditor, on the grounds that the subscription to the project constituted the subscribers partners, presented a petition to wind-up the partnership under the 199th section of the Companies Act 1862. Held, that the subscribers were partners, and being more than seven in number, came within the Act, and the order was accordingly made: (The Royal Victoria Palace Theatre, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 668. V.C. B.)

VOLUNTARY WINDING-UP — CONTINUATION UNDER SUPERVISION — PRACTICE.—The 147th section of the Companies Act 1862, empowers the court, notwithstanding the opposition of unpaid creditors to order a voluntary winding-up to be continued under supervision. Where, therefore, the creditors of a company, in the course of voluntary liquidation, presented petitions for winding-up the company, the court declined to make a compulsory order, but directed the voluntary winding-up to be continued under supervision. Where successive petitions were presented for winding-up a company, in ignorance of prior petitions, the court, in making the order, allowed one set of costs on all petitions: (Re Owen's Patent Wheel, &c. Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 672. V.C. H.)

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Ex parte THE NEATH AND BRECON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Lands Clauses Act—Money deposited by company — Purchase money paid — Payment out of deposit.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Vice-Chancellor Bacon. The above railway company in 1865, being desirous of entering on some lands belonging to Mr. John Lloyd Vaughan Watkins, which they required to take for the purposes of their railway, before any agreement for purchase was come to, paid into the bank, under the provisions of sect. 85 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the sum of £1544 7s. 4d., and entered into the usual bond. The sum was afterwards invested in Consols. The sum of £1700 was subsequently awarded for the purchase-money of the land, and another sum of £1700 for compensation for severance. These sums, with interest, were paid by the company, and on the 10th June, 1873, a conveyance of the lands to the company was executed. The company then petitioned for payment to them of the sum deposited in court. The Vice-Chancellor ordered the vendor's costs and expenses of the purchase to be paid out of this sum, and the balance to be paid to the company. The company appealed.

Eddis, Q.C. and W. D. Gardiner were for the company.

Kay, Q.C., Cracknall, and Whately, were for the landowners and others interested.

Lord Justice JAMES was of opinion that the Vice-Chancellor's order was not in accordance with the Act. The money was paid into the bank to answer a particular purpose—viz., to secure the payment of the purchase-money with interest; that purpose having been answered the Legislature had said that the money was to be paid out to the company. It would be unlawful for the court to do anything else with it. The Vice-Chancellor's order must be discharged.

Lord Justice MELLISH was of the same opinion. The money was deposited as security for the performance of the condition of the bond. If the matter stopped there, it would be a strange thing to apply the money to any other purpose. But the Act went on to say, in sect. 87, that on the condition of the bond being fully performed it should be lawful for the Court of Chancery to order the money to be repaid to the promoters of the undertaking. The court was bound in that case ex debito justitiæ to make an order for payment to the company. If any of the costs claimed were costs under sect. 80 of the Act, that section only said that it should be lawful for the court to order them to be paid to the promoters: it did not say that they were to be paid out of the money deposited.

A discussion then arose as to the costs of the petition, and

Lord Justice JAMES said that if the respondents had simply appeared, they would have been entitled to their costs; but as they had chosen to raise a litigation, no costs would be given.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

DAMAGE TO CARGO—GOODS CARRIED INTO ANY PORT OF ENGLAND AND WALES—SHIP CALLING FOR ORDERS—GOODS DETAINED AT A FOREIGN PORT.—When a foreign ship carrying cargo, acting in pursuance of the contract of affreightment, which gives the option of several ports of call, English and foreign, puts into an English port of call for orders, she carries her cargo into the English port within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 6; and, though she be ordered to a foreign port, and there discharge her cargo, the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to entertain against her a suit by the assignees of the bills of lading of the cargo, for damage to cargo, and to arrest her on her return to this country: (The Pieve Superiore, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 702. Adm.)

SPECIMENS OF A CODE OF MARINE INSURANCE LAW.

By F. O. CRUMP, Barrister-at-Law.

WARRANTIES are:

I. Express; and

II. Implied.

I. EXPRESS.

An agreement expressed in the policy whereby the assured stipulates that certain facts are or shall be true, or certain acts shall be done relative to the risk.

Phillips, sect. 754.

It may relate to an existing or past fact, or be promissory and relate to the future.

Phillips, sect. 754.

The fact or act warranted need not be material to the risk.

Ibid.

The effect of a warranty may be restricted by providing that it shall be construed as a representation.

2 Duer, 645.

Form.

The warranty may be written in any manner on the face of the policy or be contained in documents expressly referred to in the policy.

A formal expression is not necessary. Any direct or even incidental allegation of a fact relating to the risk may constitute a warranty.

Phillips, sect. 757.

But every recital of a fact is not necessarily a warranty, particularly if it be evident that it cannot have any relation to the risk.

Ibid. sect. 758.

The rule of a mutual insurance society merely directory to its committee is not an express warranty:

Harrison v. Douglas, 5 Nev. & M. 180; 3 Ad. & E. 396.

The warranties in the memorandum are simply agreements relieving the underwriter from liability for loss or damage under a certain percentage.

Construction.

Warranties are strictly construed.

NOTE.—The English courts have required literal compliance. American opinion is in favour of a construction which gives the assured the benefit of substantial compliance: (Phillips, sect. 762; see Emerig, c. 6, s. 3; Pothier, n 106.)

The construction of the language is determined by usage and common acceptation.

A warranty will not be extended by construction to include anything not necessarily implied in its terms.

Non-compliance: Its operation.

Non-compliance with an express warranty is excused only

(1) When the state of things contemplated by the warranty ceases; and

(2) When a subsequent law makes compliance illegal.

Failure even temporarily to comply with the warranty at any stage of the risk is fatal to the policy.

American Law.—It relieves the underwriter from liability for subsequent loss.

The breach of warranty need not be connected with the loss:

Hibbert v. Pigou, 1 Marshall Ins. 375.

When the warranty relates to a period antecedent to the risk insured, the breach of it, although remedied before the ship sails on the voyage insured, is fatal:

De Hahn v. Hartley, 1 T. R. 343.

Illustrations.

"All well," &c.:

A warranty that a ship is all well or all safe on a particular day is satisfied if she is safe or well at any time of such day:

Blackhurst v. Cokell, 3 T. R. 360.

"In port":

Under time policies the warranty is complied with if the ship is any port:

Kenyon v. Berthon, 1 Dougl. 12, n.

The port being named, she must be in it, but may be moved about in it:

Clark v. Westmore, Selw. N. P. 1008.

In policies at and from, the general words "in port" refer to the port where the voyage is to commence. The ship must be in that port on the specified day:

Colby v. Hunter, 1 Mood. & Malk. 81.

"Lawful trade:"

Relates to the employment of the ship by the owners. A loss by barratry is recoverable under a policy containing this warranty:

Havelock v. Hancill, 3 T. R. 277.

"Sailed":

Means unmoored and got under way in complete preparation for the voyage, with the intention of proceeding to sea without further delay at the port of departure.

The warranty to sail is not complied with by leaving harbour imperfectly equipped.

Graham v. Barras, 3 Nev. & Man. 125; Pettegrew v. Pringle, 3 Barn. & Ad. 514.

The risk under the policy having commenced before the time fixed for the sailing, the warranty is complied with if the ship is ready to sail, and is only prevented by a peril insured against by the policy:

1 Phillips, p. 427, s. 772.

But if the risk is to commence only at the sailing of the ship, the warranty is not complied with unless the vessel actually sails within the time warranted.

Ibid.

An involuntary detention after sailing does not affect the policy:

Bond v. Nutt, 2 Cowp. 607; Horr v. Whitmore, 2 Cowp. 784; Thellusson v. Fergusson, Doug. 346; Earle v. Harris, Doug. 357.

"To depart:"

Means to leave a port: not merely to get under way without leaving it:

Moir v. Roy. Ex. Ass. Co. 1 Marsh, 576; 6 Taunt. 241; 3 M. & S. 461; 4 Camp. 84.

"To sail with convoy":

The convoy must be the regular convoy provided by the Goverment for vessels bound on the voyage insured.

The vessel insured must sail with the convoy and continue with it until the end of the voyage unless separated by necessity.

The captain must have sailing orders to keep with convoy:

Arn. 4th edit. 563; Phillips, ss. 780, 781.

NEUTRALITY.

An engagement on the part of the assured that the property is owned by persons resident in a country at peace when the risk begins, and who have the commercial character of subjects of such country, and that it shall be accompanied with such documents, and shall be so managed and conducted by the assured and their agents, as to be entitled as far as depends on them to all the protection and privileges of property belonging to the subjects of such country:

Phillips, sect. 783.

Extent of warranty.

The warranty is that the subject is neutral at the commencement of the risk, and that it shall continue to be neutral so far as depends upon the assured, or he is responsible:

Ib. sect. 784; Arn. 4 edit. 565.

Part owners insuring their interest with a warranty as to neutrality the warranty extends to their interest only:

Phillips, sect. 789.

Belligerent ownership of a part of the property insured at the outset will defeat the policy as to the whole:

Phillips, sect. 788.

Character of the Property.

The character of the subject is fixed by the domicil of the owner:

Tabbs v. Bandstack, 3 B. & P. 207 n.; 4 Esp. 109; Arn. 565, 4th edit.

If the subject of a belligerent state reside and carry on business at the time of insurance in a neutral country, his property will be considered neutral owned.

McConnell v. Hector, 3 B. & P. 113.

American Law.—A neutral character cannot be acquired by migration flagrante bello. [This is obviously good law.]

2 Wheaton, 76.

Property connected with a commercial establishment in a hostile country by whomsoever owned cannot be neutral so as to be within the warranty.

Arn. 4th edit. 566.

But the property of a resident in a neutral country carrying on business also in a belligerent country is within the warranty, whatever his national character by birth.

Arn. 4th edit. 567.

Neutral goods shipped with a hostile destination and enemy owned goods shipped with a neutral destination, are not within the warranty.

Arn. 4th edit. 568.

The produce of a hostile country the property of a neutral resident in a neutral country is not within the warranty. A fortiori if contracted for by a neutral in contemplation of war, unless delivered before the declaration of war.

Ibid. Phillips, sect. 792.

NOTE.—But if imported into a neutral country it is neutral during its subsequent passage by re-exportation to a belligerent country.

Arn. 4th edit. 568.

The shipment of goods after notice of the breaking out of a war which makes them contraband, although in pursuance of a prior contract, is not within the warranty:

Phillips, sect. 793.

Good shipped by a belligerent, to be delivered to a neutral only on conditions and contingencies other than the general right to stop in transitu, are not within the warranty:

Phillips, sect. 794.

But a declaration of war after the policy is made does not change the character of the subject from neutral to belligerent, so as to take it out of the warranty:

Eden v. Parkinson, Dougl. 732; Tyson v. Gurney, 3 Term. 477; Salonica v. Johnson, Park, 8th edit., 716.

But where goods are shipped by a belligerent, conditionally to become those of a neutral, and the latter complies with the condition before a capture, they thereby from that time are within the warranty:

Phillips, sect. 795.

If a consignor becomes a belligerent by the breaking out of war during the transit, he cannot by assignment to a neutral screen them from capture, and they will not therefore thereby be within the warranty.

NOTE.—Whether such is the object of the transfer is to be gathered from the circumstances.

Phillips, sect. 796, and n. 5.

[Doubtful.]

If an owner changes his national character during transit of the goods, the national character of his property in transit does not change:

Phillips, sect. 797; 1 Duer, Mar. Ins. 437.

Proofs of neutrality.

In order to be neutral within the meaning of the warranty the ship must be furnished with all those documents and proofs of the neutral character of herself and her cargo required to be on board either by the law of nations or by the regulations of international treaties:

Arn. 569, 4th edit; Phillips, sect. 802.

NOTE.—These should comprise the flag, the passport, sea-brief, sea-letter, or pass; the register, or certificate of registry; the muster-roll, the charter-party, the log book, the bill of health; proofs of the national character of the cargo; ex. gr. invoices, bills of lading, certificates of origin:

Arn. 570, 571, 4th edit; Phillips, sect. 802, et seq.

A master forfeits the neutral character of his ship by covering belligerent goods on board as neutral, even though without the knowledge or consent of the shipowner:

Phillips, sect. 810.

The forfeiture of neutrality by the shipowner or captain does not forfeit the neutral character of goods shipped by another neutral, and duly documented as such:

Phillips, sect. 811.

In general the concealment of papers amounts to a breach of warranty:

Marshall, C.J., in Livingstone v. Maryland Ins. Co., 7 Cranch, 536.

Semble, also, carrying a material paper written in sympathetic ink:

Phillips, sect. 809.

Throwing papers overboard is not of itself a breach of the warranty, although raising a strong presumption of enemy's property:

Bernardi v. Motteux, Dougl. 581; The Pizaro, 2 Wheaton 227.

Breaches of the warranty.

All voluntary illegal acts forfeiting the character of a neutral are breaches of the warranty.

Ex. gr.—Resisting the right of search when properly exercised(a). Rescuing, or attempting to rescue, a neutral vessel sent in for examination by an authorised belligerent captor. Violating blockade(b). Carrying hostile despatches(c).

Phillips, s. 819, 820; Arn. 580, 4th edit.; The Maria, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 340.

(b) Blockade must be effective, and neutral nations must have had notice of it.

(c) "A distinction has been made between carrying despatches of the enemy between different parts of his dominions and carrying despatches of an ambassador from a neutral country to his own sovereign. The effect of the former despatches is presumed to be hostile; but the neutral country has a right to preserve its relations with the enemy, and it does not necessarily follow that the communications are of a hostile nature."

Kent 1, s. 153.

Attempting to disguise belligerent goods as neutral, and carrying them as such with the neutral part of the cargo, is a breach of the warranty of neutrality, and will avoid the policy as to the whole of the neutral cargo:

Arn. 576, 4th edit.

Goods may be put on board the merchant ship of a belligerent without any breach of the warranty:
Ph. s. 824.

Nor is it a breach of the warranty of the neutrality of the ship that she carries a belligerent cargo:
Ibid.

If during war neutral property be engaged in any branch of the colonial or coasting trade of the enemy that is open to foreigners in time of peace, such property loses its character of neutrality:
1 Kent, Comm. 81—86; The Immanuel, 2 C. Rob. Ad. R. 186.

NOTE.—This rule is confined to trade between the enemy's colony and the mother country, and is not applicable where the produce of a hostile colony is bonâ fide imported into a neutral country, and thence re-exported into the mother country: (Arn. 574, 4th edit.)

Property despatched to a neutral in pursuance of a contract with a belligerent government, or employed by him in a trade for which a privilege is given by a belligerent, does not answer to a warranty of neutrality:
The Anna Catherina, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 107.

A warranty that a vessel is neutral is not forfeited merely by the supercargo being a belligerent:
Mayne v. Walker, 3 Dougl. 79.

The employment of a neutral vessel in a service auxiliary to the hostile operations of a belligerent forfeits its neutral character:
Phillips, sect. 825.

NOTE.—This is so, although the master be not aware of the belligerent character of the service: (Ibid.)

Blockade.

To be binding a blockade must be:
(1) Effectual.
(2) Notified to neutral nations.

Violation.

To constitute a violation of a blockade there must be:
(1) Actual or constructive knowledge of its existence on the part of the assured; and
(2) An intention to violate it, and some act done in pursuance of such intention.

Observations.

Sailing for a blockaded port after notice is primâ facie evidence of an intention to violate the blockade:
See 1 Kent., s. 148.

If the assured has actual or constructive notice of a blockade, declared upon sufficient authority and maintained by an adequate force, an attempt on his part to carry property warranted neutral to or from the blockaded port is a violation of the blockade and a breach of the warranty.

A neutral vessel having entered the port before the blockade, may come out in ballast, or with a cargo taken on board before the blockade began, but not with one taken on board after notice of the blockade:
Phillips, s. 830.

So she may bring away from a blockaded port the cargo imported in her before the declaration of blockade and still remaining on board:
Ibid.

It is a violation of blockade to sail with intent to proceed to the mouth of the harbour for the purpose of inquiring whether the blockade is raised.
Ph. s. 822; 1 Kent, s. 149.

NOTE.—Kent says, "It is a presumption almost de jure that the neutral, if found on the interdicted waters, goes there with an intention to break the blockade."

A master being informed during a voyage to a port that it is blockaded, violates the blockade if he continues his voyage.

NOTE.—The pursuit of the voyage is, however, open to explanation.
Phillips, s. 838.

Sailing to a port with a design to enter, if the blockading squadron should be blown off by the winds is a violation of the blockade.

II. IMPLIED.

An implied warranty is that which necessarily results from the nature of the contract.

Examples:

(1) That the ship shall be seaworthy when she sails.

(2) That she shall be navigated with reasonable skill and care.

(3) That the voyage is lawful, and shall be performed according to law, and in the usual course and without wilful deviation.

(1) Seaworthiness.

This term expresses the relation between the state of the ship and the perils it has to meet in the situation in which it is.

Seaworthiness is implied only in voyage policies.

In time policies the utmost that can be said is that there is an implied condition that the ship is in existence, capable of navigation, and has not sustained actual damage.

NOTE.—This is a doctrine established by an American authority (Capen v. Washington Ins. Co., 12 Cush. Mass. 517; 2 Phillips, p. 397, s. 727), and seems to be supported by the English cases, in which it was decided, after much conflict, that there was no warranty of seaworthiness in a time policy.

Essentials.

The materials of which the ship is made;
Its construction;
The qualifications of the captain;
The number and description of the crew;
The tackle, sails, and rigging;
The stores, equipment, and outfit generally, must be such as to render the ship in every respect fit for the proposed voyage or service:
Phillips, s. 695.
The cargo must be properly stowed;
There must be sufficient ballast.

If the existing state of things does not comply with the warranty, the policy is void, although the owners have acted honestly and fairly and in ignorance of any defect.

The warranty requires seaworthiness in conformity with the standard at the time for the contemplated service at the port to which the vessel belongs, unless some other standard is referred to expressly or by implication:
Phillips, sect. 719.

A vessel seaworthy for one stage of the voyage may be unseaworthy for another, and unless she is fit for each stage of the voyage when she enters upon it, the warranty is not complied with.

[Ex. gr., a boiler efficient in fresh water, cracked in salt water—case cited infra.]

The enumeration as excepted from the policy of some losses of the same kind as those resulting from defects which constitute unseaworthiness, does not exclude the general implied warranty:
The Quebec Mar. Ins. Co. v. The Commercial Bank of Canada, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 234.

Unseaworthiness arising after the commencement of the voyage, and produced by a peril insured against, does not of itself discharge the underwriter. It imposes upon the assured the duty of using reasonable diligence to repair it, and negligence in that respect may discharge the insurer from any loss arising from the want of such due diligence:
Kent. Comm., sect. 288.

If the vessel proves to be leaky or defective, or becomes disabled soon after the time to which the warranty has reference, when there can evidently have been no intervening injury, it is inferred that the unseaworthiness existed previously:
Phillips, sect. 725.

Unseaworthiness produced after the commencement of the voyage by the mistakes or negligence of the master and crew, without fraud, is at the risk of the underwriters:
Phillips, sect. 733.

The risk is suspended by temporary unseaworthiness imputable to the assured, whereby the perils insured against are greatly affected. The risk revives on the navigability of the vessel being restored:
Phillips, sect. 734.

The remedy of a defect after sailing—unless with the consent of the underwriters—does not aid owners of a ship unseaworthy at the time of sailing:
Forshaw v. Chabert, 3 Br. & B. 158: The Quebec Marine Ins. Co. v. The Commercial Bank of Canada, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 234 [in which Lord Tenterden's dictum to the contrary (in Weir v. Aberdeen, 2 B. & Ald. 320) is dissented from].

"At and from a port:"

A ship would appear to answer the warranty if capable of being moved about in port:
Parmeter v. Cousins, 2 Camp. 257; Annen v. Woodman, 3 Taunt. 259.

If the ship arrives at the port so shattered as to be a mere wreck, or in such a state as to be unable to lie there in reasonable security till she is properly repaired and equipped for the voyage, the policy does not attach:
Arn. 604, 4th edit.

As to Freight and Cargo.

A ship whose condition complies with the warranty in a policy on ship may yet fail to comply with the warranty in a policy on cargo and freight.

The policy being on cargo and freight the warranty of seaworthiness is not complied with if the cargo is put on board for the voyage when the ship is in so defective a state that the cargo must be relanded in order to make the necessary repairs, and the policy therefore does not attach on the cargo if the risk is to commence at the time of loading.
Phillips, sect. 723, vol. 1, p. 391.

Lighters.

The doctrine of seaworthiness does not apply to lighters engaged in loading or unloading the cargo.
Lane v. Nixon, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 412.

(2.) Navigation.

The captain must be competent to conduct the vessel in safety through all the ordinary perils of the voyage, and in long voyages—not in all voyages—there should be a competent mate:
Arn. 615, 4th edit.; 3 Kent. Com. p. 337, n. e.

When pilotage is compulsory or customary, a pilot should be on board (a):
Phillips, sect. 717.
Phillips v. Headlam, 2 B. & Ad. 380; Law v. Hollingsworth, 7 T. R. 160.
(a) It appears that failure in this respect would not per se discharge the underwriters.

The person engaged in navigating the vessel need not be an authorised pilot if he possesses a competent knowledge of the ground:
Phillips, sect. 713.

NOTE.—If a pilot cannot be procured, and it is prudent to enter the port rather than wait, the underwriter will not be discharged if the master enters without a pilot.
Arn. 617, 4th edit.

The crew must be adequate and of sufficient skill when the vessel sails:
Hicks v. Thornton, Holt's N. P. 30; Forshaw v. Chabert, 3 Br. & B. 158.

If the master takes on board a person representing himself to be a qualified pilot, although in fact he is not so, the warranty is satisfied:
Phillips, sect. 374, citing Law v. Hollingsworth, 7 T. Rep. 160.

A sufficient crew being shipped originally, an occasional disability or absence of the men does not violate the warranty:
Busk v. Roy. Ex. Ass. 2 B. & Ald. 73, per Bayley, J.

(3) Legal Conduct.

An illegal act committed by the assured, or on his behalf, is a violation of this implied warranty.

The illegality must induce loss by a peril insured against to violate the warranty.

But if the act arise out of negligence or mistake the insurers are not exonerated from consequent loss by perils insured against.

The vessel must be furnished with all proper evidence of her national character, for want of which she might be condemned if taken by a belligerent:
Phillips, sect. 745; Arn. 619, 4th edit.

NOTE.—This is necessary, although there is no warranty of neutrality in the policy:
Steel v. Lacy, 3 Taunt. 285.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—BILLS OF LADING—ACCEPTANCE — MISREPRESENTATION. — The U. Bank presented a bill of exchange to B. and Co., the drawees, for their acceptance, accompanied by a ticket representing that the bank held bills of lading to cover it. B. and Co. thereupon accepted the bill, relying on the statement that the bank held bills of lading which both parties thought to be genuine. The bills of lading had been forged by the drawer of the bill of exchange. Held, that B. and Co. were not entitled to demand from the bank genuine bills of lading before paying the amount of the bill of exchange: (Baxter v. Chapman, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 642. V.C. B.)

FACTOR—SALE BY—SET-OFF AGAINST PRINCIPAL—"MEANS OF KNOWLEDGE" OF BUYER THAT HE DEALT WITH AN AGENT—PLEADING. —To a declaration for goods sold and delivered, the defendants pleaded, that the goods were sold and delivered to the defendants by S. and Co., agents of the plaintiffs in that behalf, and entrusted by the plaintiffs with the possession of the said goods, as apparent owners thereof, and that S. and Co. sold and delivered the goods to the defendants as their own, with the consent of the plaintiffs, and at the time of the said sale and delivery of the said goods, the defendants believed the said S. and Co. to be the owners of the said goods, and did not know that the plaintiffs were the owners of the said goods, or of any of them, or were interested therein, or that S. and Co. were agents in that behalf; and the plea averred a set-off against S. and Co. First replication, that before, &c., the defendants had the means of knowing that S. and Co. were merely the apparent owners of the goods, and sold them as agents for the plaintiffs; secondly, the like, but averring means of knowledge that S. and Co. were agents generally. On demurrer to the plea and replications: Held, that the plea was good, without any allegation negativing "means of knowledge" on the part of the defendants that S. and Co. were agents; and that the replications, being therefore immaterial, were bad: (Borries and others v. The Imperial Ottoman Bank, 29 L. T. Rep. 689. C. P.).

THE will of Mr. Thomas Wontner, late of No. 3, Cloak-lane, solicitor, who died on the 19th ult., at Weston-green, Thames Ditton, was proved on the 3rd inst. by Mr. Russell Wontner, the son, the sole executor, the personalty being sworn under £5000. The provisions of the will are in favour of testator's wife and four sons.

Bankruptcy.

Liability on an accommodation acceptance and unliquidated damages for breach of contract on sale of goods, are items to be allowed in taking a mutual credit account under bankruptcy of drawer and vendor.

A surety for the debtor upon a bill of exchange deposited as security for a larger debt, if he pay the amount for which he is liable is entitled to the benefit, pro tanto, of the creditor's proof, if made for the whole debt: (Ex parte Holmes, 8 L. J., N. S., 44, Bank; see also Hobson v. Bass, L. Rep. 6 Ch. App. 792.)

HIS HONOUR.—This is an application made in the bankruptcy of William Moore, of Pudsey, in the parish of Calverley, in the county of York, stuff manufacturer, bankrupt, by Sylvester Emil Sichel and John Groves, of Bradford, stuff merchants, trading as S. E. Sichel and Co., for an order directing that the proof made by Charles Joseph Buckley upon this estate may be reduced to the extent of £780, the amount of the bill of exchange accepted by the said S. E. Sichel and Co., and set out in each of the proofs made by him. And for an order that the decision of the trustee in this matter, rejecting the proof of the said S. E. Sichel and John Groves, upon the estate of the said bankrupt, may be reversed or varied; and that the trustee may be directed to admit the said S. E. Sichel and John Groves as persons entitled to prove upon the estate of the said bankrupt for £628 17s., or such other sum as the court shall direct, or for an order declaring that the said Charles Joseph Buckley is a trustee for and on behalf of Mr. S. E. Sichel and John Groves, in respect of the dividend or dividends to be received by him upon so much of the amount proved by him as is equal to or represents the said sum of £628 17s., or such other sum as the court shall direct; and for an order that the trustee of the property of the said bankrupt do pay it out of the estate of the said bankrupt, and that the said C. J. Buckley do personally pay, the costs of the said S. E. Sichel and John Groves of and incidental to this application, and the orders to be made thereon. The application arises out of the following circumstances: Wm. Moore, the bankrupt, in Feb. last, presented a petition to this court for liquidation under the 125th section of Bankruptcy Act 1869, and at the first meeting of creditors, held on the 4th March last, resolutions were passed for liquidating his affairs by arrangement and not in bankruptcy, and Buckley was appointed trustee. These resolutions were duly registered, and Buckley's appointment duly certified. Shortly afterwards the debtor Moore made an offer to Buckley to repurchase his estate upon the terms of paying the trustee's costs, charges, and expenses, all the debtor's preferential creditors in full, and a composition of 6s. in the pound to all his other creditors by three equal instalments, at three, six, and nine months from the acceptance of said offer, the second of such instalments to be secured by the acceptance by the firm of S. E. Sichel and Co. of the debtor's draft for £780 at six months, and the third of such instalments to be secured in like manner by the acceptance by Wm. Sharp of the debtor's draft for the further sum of £780 at nine months. And on the 7th March last the said firm of S. E. Sichel and Co. addressed and sent to the trustee under the liquidation the following offer: "We hereby offer to become surety for the payment of any composition which the creditors may accept to the extent of £780, such security to be our acceptance of the debtor's draft for £780, dated on the day of the acceptance of the composition by the creditors, and payable six months after date. This bill to be deposited with the person who may be appointed trustee for the receipt and distribution of the composition." On the 24th March last, at a meeting of creditors duly held under the liquidation by a special resolution then passed, the trustee was duly authorised to accept the offer of the debtor on the terms and conditions contained in an agreement produced at the meeting, and executed and signed by the chairman and trustee, and the committee of inspection are thereby authorised to sign the same as a general scheme of settlement of the affairs of the debtor. And at the same meeting resolutions were duly passed whereby the immediate discharge of the debtor was granted; the liquidation was closed, and Buckley as trustee was released as from the 24th March last. And Buckley was appointed trustee for the receipt and distribution of the composition. On the 1st April last the agreement referred to in the said resolutions was duly approved, and such approval certified by this court as a scheme of settlement of the debtor's affairs under the 28th sect. Bankruptcy Act 1869. The acceptances for £780 and £780 at six and nine months from the 24th March last, were duly delivered to Buckley, indorsed by the debtor, and the arrangements provided for by the agreement were duly completed. The estate was in effect retransferred to the debtor, Buckley, as trustee for the receipt and distribution of the composition, taking from the debtor his personal covenant for payment of the costs, charges, and expenses, preferential debts, and the composition by the three several instalments before-mentioned, collaterally secured as to the second and third instalments by the two acceptances of £780 and £780. The legal and equitable effect of this transaction was to rehabilitate the debtor as a trader discharged from all his provable debts at the time of his liquidation, and he accordingly forthwith resumed business as a stuff merchant. On the 24th June last the first instalment of the composition became due, and was not paid. And the trustee, therefore, applied to and obtained from this court an order for payment by Moore, which was duly served on him, and payment not being made, an execution was issued against his goods under which they were seized; but upon sale Moore filed a declaration of insolvency, and thereupon a petition for adjudication was presented by a creditor in respect of a debt incurred since the previous liquidation, and the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt by consent on the 4th July. Buckley was afterwards appointed trustee under the bankruptcy, thus filling the two characters of trustee for receipt and distribution of the composition, and trustee under the bankruptcy. At the date of the bankruptcy there was an open account between the bankrupt and S. E. Sichel and Co. for goods manufactured and delivered by the bankrupt to them, upon which a balance was due from S. E. Sichel and Co. This balance, after some interchange of accounts, was agreed by the trustee at £384 0s. 6d., and the trustee applied to this court by motion for an order on S. E. Sichel and Co. for payment, which was resisted by them on the ground that under the 39th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 they were entitled to set-off, among other items, as a mutual credit, their liability upon the acceptance for £780, treating it as an accommodation acceptance not yet due. It being quite clear upon the authorities that such an acceptance is a credit within the meaning of the statute (see Robson on Bankruptcy, p. 312, note x.), the motion was dismissed. S. E. Sichel and Co., having paid to Buckley, as trustee for receipt of the composition, the sum of £780 upon the acceptance when it arrived at maturity, afterwards carried in a proof for £628 17s. as the balance due upon an account as stated by them, claiming on the one side the £780 as money paid for the use of the bankrupt, the sum of £70 as a premium agreed to be paid by the bankrupt to S. E. Sichel and Co. for the accommodation given by them to him by the acceptance, and the sum of £162 17s. 6d. for damages in respect of inferiority of goods sold by the bankrupt to them, making a total of £1012 17s. 6d. Against this sum credit was given for the aforesaid balance in the goods account, £384 0s. 6d., leaving the sum of £628 17s. as due. The trustee rejected the proof altogether, as to the £780, because it had already been proved upon the estate, and S. E. Sichel and Co. were not entitled to receive dividends thereon until the full amount of the composition, for which the same was part security, was paid; as to the £70, that there was no such agreement to pay that sum as alleged; and as to the £162 17s. 6d., that there were no such damages as alleged. As to the last item it has been arranged that, subject to the question of S. E. Sichel and Co. being entitled by law to set-off unliquidated damages, the amount due shall be ascertained by reference to a skilled person mutually agreed upon. Upon the question of the right to set-off such damages, I am clearly of opinion that such right has been created by the Bankruptcy Act 1869, as the necessary consequence of making unliquidated damages proveable debts. These damages will, therefore, be assessed by the referee, but the inquiry before him will be limited to damages in respect of goods delivered subsequently to the date of the petition for liquidation. Damages in respect of any goods delivered previously, would constitute a proveable debt under the liquidation, and be barred by the order of discharge. As regards the £70, that is a question of fact depending upon the evidence, and having considered the evidence I have come to the conclusion that the fact is established, and the £70 will therefore be allowed. As to the other ground of objection by the trustee, that the £780 have already been proved upon the estate, and that S. E. Sichel and Co. are not entitled to recover dividends thereon until the full amount of the composition for which the acceptance as part security has been paid, that depends upon the question what was the nature and extent of S. E. Sichel and Co.'s engagement with the creditors under the liquidation, upon the faith of which the composition was accepted by them. Buckley, as trustee for receipt of the composition, has proved for the whole amount of the composition against the bankrupt's estate, and that amount includes the two acceptances for £780 and £780. There can, therefore, be no further proof in respect of either of those sums—the only question is how is the trustee's proof to be dealt with? S. E. Sichel and Co.'s liability depends entirely upon the effect of their written engagement of the 7th March, and I am of opinion that it extended no further than the payment of £780 towards any composition the creditors might accept, and that payment having been made, S. E. Sichel and Co.'s engagement towards the creditors under the liquidation has been performed, and their liability towards them discharged. The respective rights and liabilities of S. E. Sichel and Co. and the bankrupt, and those of Buckley as trustee, for receipt of the composition, and the bankrupt are wholly separate and independent of each other, and are unaffected as between themselves by the bankruptcy. If Moore had remained solvent, S. E. Sichel and Co. having paid the acceptance, would have become creditors of Moore for the amount of £780 as money paid by them at his request and for his use. And if Buckley had sued Moore upon the covenant for payment of the instalments contained in the composition agreement, Moore could have pleaded payment of the £780 as a payment pro tanto in satisfaction of the covenant. Now what is the effect of the bankruptcy upon these rights? They are plainly these: S. E. Sichel and Co., having paid the £780 as security for the bankrupt would be entitled to prove for that sum against his estate, if proof had not been already made by the holder of the acceptance; that proof has been already made by Buckley, as trustee, for receipt of the composition, and he, having already received the full amount of the acceptance, must be deemed to be a trustee of such proof to the extent of the debt (not exceeding £780), due upon the balance of the mutual credit account to be taken between S. E. Sichel and Co. and the bankrupt's estate, the £780 forming an item in that account. The case of Ex parte Holmes (8 L. J., N. S., 44 Bank.), afterwards affirmed on appeal by Lord Cottenham, relied upon by Mr. Killick, is an authority expressly in point; and the recent case of Hobson v. Bass (L. Rep. 6 Ch. App. 792), recognises and supplies the principle. In the present case no dividend has been received, and the order will therefore be as follows: Declare that though C. J. Buckley is a trustee for and on behalf of S. E. Sichel and John Groves, in respect of the dividend or dividends to be received by him upon so much of the amount proved by him as his equal to represent the sum of £628 17s., or such other sum as shall be agreed to be the balance due upon the mutual credit account between S. E. Sichel and Co. and the bankrupt's estate, after ascertaining the sum to be allowed for damages in respect of goods supplied by the bankrupt to S. E. Sichel and Co. since the date of his petition for liquidation, such balance to be ascertained and settled by the registrar in case the parties shall be unable to agree upon and to offer the same. Buckley to pay the costs of the said S. E. Sichel and John Groves of and incident to this application, and to be allowed the same, and to restrain his own costs out of the funds on his hand as trustee for receipt of the composition. The costs to be taxed by the registrar.

BRISTOL COUNTY COURT.

Tuesday, Jan. 15.

(Before E. J. LLOYD, Q.C., Judge.)

ARTHUR v. BRISTOL AND EXETER RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway Company—Delay—Damage—Liability.

HIS HONOUR gave judgment in this case, which was a claim for £40 odd for damages sustained by the plaintiff, a hop merchant living at Portishead, in consequence of his being unable to attend a hop market in the Borough, London, through the delay of a train on the defendants' line. The plaintiff had a yearly ticket over the Bristol and Portishead Railway, which is worked by the defendants; and in September last he was desirous of proceeding to London by the express which leaves Bristol at 7.50 a.m. The first train from Portishead departs at 6.50 in the morning, and it arrives at Bristol, according to the time-tables, at 7.40; and the plaintiff sent to the station master at Portishead to inquire whether the 6.50 train would reach Bristol in time for the 7.50 express to London. He was informed it would unless there were some coal trucks to be picked up on the line. The plaintiff went by the 6.50 train, but on the way the train was stopped at Ashton to pick up some coal trucks, and was detained twenty or thirty minutes. In consequence of this delay the plaintiff failed to catch the express, and had to wait until the 12.9 train to Paddington; and instead of reaching London at quarter to 11 o'clock a.m., he did not get to Paddington until 2.45 p.m. By the time he got across to the hop market in Southwark the market was closed, and he could not transact his business. He stopped the night in the metropolis, and went to the market the next day, but the price of hops had risen, and he had to buy at a higher rate than had he been at the market the previous day. The plaintiff sought to recover £41 odd for the loss he had sustained through the company breaking their contract to convey him to Bristol in time for the 7.50 express.

His HONOUR first considered whether any contract had been made between the parties, and observed that on the time-tables issued by the defendants it was stated, "The public time-tables of this company are only intended to fix the time at which passengers may be certain to obtain their tickets for any journey from the various stations, it being understood that the trains shall not start from them before the appointed time. Every attention will be paid to ensure punctuality as far as is practicable, but the directors give notice that the company do not undertake that the trains shall start or leave at the time specified in the bills, nor will they be accountable for any loss, inconvenience, or injury which may arise from delays or detention." What the notice stated as to the company not being responsible was mere moonshine, because they must be responsible if they entered into a contract, but what they said was that the time-tables issued by them were only intended to fix the time by which passengers would be certain to obtain their tickets for any journey from the various stations, it being understood that the trains should not start from them before the appointed time. He held that the expressions in the notice only applied to the Portishead and intermediate stations, and not to Bristol; and pointing out that it was stated in the body of the time bill that the train "departed" from Portishead at 6.50 and "arrived" at 7.40, he held these words formed part of the contract in giving notice to the passengers to that effect, and on the notice to that effect the contract arose. If there had been any unavoidable cause of delay the defendants would not be liable for the breach of their contract, but the picking up of the coal trucks was a voluntary act, and the delay caused by it was not an unavoidable one, and therefore he thought the company had committed a breach of their contract in their train not arriving at 7.40 a.m. as announced. With respect to the question of damages, he held that Mr. Arthur was entitled to two guineas for the loss of time incurred in waiting for the second express train, but he held he could not recover damages for the loss he sustained in London through the rise in the market because he had not communicated to the company his special purpose in going to London, and they could not have contemplated loss arising from the breach of their contract. He gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £2 2s.

GUILDFORD AND GODALMING COUNTY COURT.

Tuesday, Jan. 15.

(Before W. J. STONOR, Esq., Judge.)

Ejectment—Estoppel.

Folkard, instructed by Albery and Lucas, of Midhurst, for plaintiff.

Lascelles, instructed by G. Hull, of Godalming, for the defendant.

Lascelles said that he had given notice of an application to have the order for the payment of rescinded costs at the last hearing for a new trial. He had consulted his client, Mr. Luff, and come to the conclusion that he would withdraw the application, which he thought his Honour had no power to grant.

Folkard said he had something to say before the application was withdrawn. He would read the notice which he had received. The learned counsel accordingly did so. The ground of the application was that the order had been fraudulently procured on the part of the plaintiff. The condition on which the application for a new trial was that the costs should be taxed wtihin a week and paid within a fortnight, otherwise the plaintiff was to have judgment and possession. His Honour said at that time that the costs of the last trial were to be allowed. He now had to complain that only the costs of the day were allowed, and not the costs of the first trial.

His HONOUR said that should be the ground of an application against the registrar to review his taxation.

Folkard.—I apply now.

His HONOUR (after consulting the registrar) said the defendant had paid the taxed costs, and was, therefore, entitled to a new trial. In the course of further conversation his Honour said he had looked with great suspicion on the case from the first.

Folkard said he wished to know if the registrar had power to review and alter his Honour's judgment.

His HONOUR said Mr. Folkard was too pertinacious, if he choose to make an application after the trial it should be heard, although no notice had been given.

Mr. Folkard read from the shorthand writers notes taken at the application, where his Honour said that the costs of the application and the last trial should be paid by the defendant within a fortnight, if not judgment to be given for the plaintiff and possession. Mr. Folkard argued that till the requirements of his Honour's judgment had been complied with a new trial could not be had.

His HONOUR (to Folkard)—If you talk till tomorrow, I will have this case tried over again.

In answer to his Honour, the Registrar said the costs had been paid into court as taxed.

His HONOUR said that they must, therefore, be considered as paid.

Folkard said that the Registrar had cut down the costs of the plaintiff from £43 to about £19, and he had done this contrary to his Honour's judgment. He (Folkard) wanted to know, and many attorneys in that court wanted to know, if the Registrar had power to alter or review his Honour's judgment. He (Folkard) said that they were entitled to the costs of the former trial, and until they were paid he did not propose to proceed with the new trial.

His HONOUR said he would hear the application against the Registrar after the new trial.

Folkard—We have had no costs, and until we are paid your Honour has no power to go on with a new trial. I have well considered this matter, and I do not propose to go on with it till your judgment has been fulfilled strictly to the letter.

His HONOUR—I consider that the conditions have been complied with. The case will come on in due course, and if the plaintiff does not appear I shall give a verdict for the defendant.

The application was then adjourned, and some cases disposed of, and after a short time, Folkard said. that the Registrar had paid the costs as far as they had been taxed, but of course the amount paid was only on account. He was now prepared to go on with the new trial.

His HONOUR remarked that as Mr. Lascelles had withdrawnhis application, Mr. Folkard was entitled to the costs of the first trial irrespective of the result of the new trial.

Folkard applied for the costs of the application which had been made and withdrawn by Mr. Lascelles.

Lascelles said he left the matter in the hands of his Honour.

His HONOUR granted the costs.

A jury of five was then sworn.

Folkard objected to Mr. John Ellis, who accordingly left the box.

We have previously reported the case at some length. The action was for the ejectment of the defendant from a cottage and garden at Haslemere. The case turned upon the ownership of the house which is in the possession of the defendant. Both parties claim the ownership of it. A verdict for the plaintiff was given at the first trial. At the next court an application was made on behalf of the defendant for a new trial. This application was granted, and the new trial came on for hearing.

Folkard opened his case at some length.

Lascelles called forth the question from Mr. Folkard, "Do you accuse me of putting in a fraudulent deed?"

Lascelles.—I do.

Folkard went on to say that they knew what the issue would be. Referring to a deed executed in 1870, Mr. Folkard said a recital contained in it was most extraordinary, and proceeded to read it. The recital set forth that £50 shown by a deed executed in 1862 to have been paid to Mr. Charles John Woods, since deceased, by Mr. J. Hoad, and had never been so paid, and that Mr. Hoad, the grantee in the deed, had always repudiated it.

Lascelles said that at the last hearing he, to save time, accepted the documents of the plaintiff in good faith. He had no idea that the deed in question contained anything like that which had been read.

His HONOUR (to Folkard). — I consider you behaved in a most improper manner in not calling attention to this recital at the last trial. It is the first time since I have been on the bench that I have had occasion to say such a thing, and I am very sorry to say it now. I consider that it is a deception and fraud upon the court.

Folkard.—I have never had such a thing said——

His HONOUR.—I am much surprised to find such a recital in this deed, and in acting in the way you have done I consider it was a very improper deception on the court.

Folkard (emphatically).—I have practised before every judge, and never had such a thing said to me before. I have yet to learn that it is the duty of counsel for a plaintiff, in producing the title deeds of an estate, to point out any flaw in those deeds. I have yet to learn that it is the duty of counsel on the part of the plaintiff, to pick out flaws and state them to the court and jury. I have always understood that it is the duty of the counsel for the defendant to discover any flaw that there may be in the title of his adversary who claims the property. That is the universal rule. I have always understood that that is so, and as long as I wear these robes, I shall always adopt that rule, whatever may be the opinions of those who preside or practise in this court.

Folkard then proceeded to put in a large amount of documentary evidence, which was attested by witnesses. A deed executed in 1862, set forth that £50 interest and principal was then paid on a mortgage on the property in question. On this deed he (Folkard) secured a verdict on the first trial, as it proved ownership within twenty years, the term required by law. The recital of the deed of 1870 (which drew forth the strong remarks of his Honour as reported above) set forth that this £50 had not been paid, and accordingly the plaintiff failed to prove ownership within twenty years, this being the only evidence on the point. At the conclusion of Folkard's case, Lascelles said he should submit to his Honour that there was no case to go to the jury, as the recital of the deed of 1870 destroyed any prima facie case which his learned friend's documentary evidence might have raised, and cited Roscoe and Taylor on Evidence.

Folkard argued at great length in support of the view that the evidence in the recital was not conclusive. It ought not, he said, to operate as an estoppel. He earnestly besought his Honour to let the case go to the jury.

His HONOUR said he should very much like the case to go to the jury; but if Mr. Lascelles pressed his point, he should certainly feel bound to decide it.

After some further argument by Folkard.

His HONOUR, addressing the jury, said,—In this case the plaintiff has to show that he, or the persons under whom he claims, has had the receipt of the rents and profits of the property within twenty years; or else that there has been a payment either of interest or principal upon a mortgage within that time. He has not proved the receipt of rents and profits, but he has made out a prima facie case as to the payment of a portion of principal and interest within twenty years. The deed of 1862 contains an admission by a party, since deceased, against his own interest. It is an admission by Charles John Woods that principal and interest had been paid to him, and that is a sufficient prima facie case to put the defendant to proof that it had not been paid. In the document of 1870 there is, however, as distinct and clear a recital and statement as could be framed that the money was never paid, and that Mr. Wood, the grantee, always repudiated the transaction. That deed was executed by the trustees of Mr. Hoad's will, and under that deed the present plaintiff claims. He is, in my opinion, bound by that deed, and the defendant is entitled to a nonsuit.

A nonsuit was then ordered.

Folkard then made his application with regard to the taxation of costs by the registrar. He complained that the registrar had improperly reduced the costs, and had neglected to allow the costs of the first trial.

His HONOUR, after looking into the bill of costs, ordered certain additions to be made.

At the conclusion of the case

His HONOUR said that it was with very great pain and regret that he adverted to a question to which he had previously alluded. When he gave an order for a new trial he considered that the plaintiff had a perfectly fair title unless evidence to the contrary could be shown by the defendant at the new trial. He now found that this was not so, from the recital in the deed of 1870, which ought to have been laid before the court.

Folkard.—I did not know your Honour was going to open that again.

His HONOUR went on to say that no doubt in these courts the greatest pressure in respect of time existed, and often the judge had to act as counsel and to examine and cross-examine witnesses for hours and then hear cases argued by counsel. The only way in which justice could be done was by counsel dealing fairly with the court. If they did not, mishaps would arise necessitating a new trial, as in this case, which ought to have been settled at the previous court. [At this stage his Honour, addressing Mr. Folkard said, I see you are standing, Mr. Folkard. I desire you to sit. Mr. Folkard accordingly sat down.] If the application of which Mr. Lascelles had given notice, and which he had withdrawn, had been pressed, as he certainly thought it ought to have been pressed, he should have thought it worthy of much consideration. He thought that in this case great injury had been done to the defendant, and great damage would be done to suitors if counsel and solicitors did not act with complete frankness and fairness towards each other. To call a deed at one moment a conveyance and at another moment a reconveyance, when after all it was a release and a disclaimer, and not to draw attention to its real character, was not dealing fairly with the court.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PAYMENT OF COSTS OF PROSECUTION OUT OF MONEY FOUND ON PRISONER—PRISONER ADJUDICATED BANKRUPT BEFORE CONVICTION.—After the conviction of a prisoner for felony the Central Criminal Court made an order, under sect. 3 of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, for the payment of the costs of the prosecution out of the moneys found on the prisoner at the time of his apprehension. The validity of this order being questioned by the trustee in bankruptcy of the prisoner's estate on the ground that the prisoner had been adjudicated a bankrupt between the dates of his apprehension and conviction, and that on such adjudication all his property vested in the trustee. Held, that the order was rightly made, the trustee on adjudication of bankruptcy, taking the property of the bankrupt prisoner, subject to the possibility of the criminal court making the order in question. Quære, whether such an order would be valid if the prisoner were adjudicated bankrupt in respect of an act of bankruptcy committed before his apprehension. (Reg. v. Roberts, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 674. Q. B.)

Ex parte BOWERS v. OGDENS.

Debtor's summons—Application to dismiss—Claim arisng out of partnership disputes—Staying proceedings on summons without security.

G. Rhodes for summoding creditor.

England for debtors, in support of application to dismiss.

The main facts appeared in an affidavit filed by the debtors, admitted to be substantially correct, and were shortly these: Messrs. Ogden (the debtors), had advertised for a managing partner in a brewery, requiring a premium of £200, and Mr. Bowers agreed to join them; but there were no written articles. If the whole premium should not be paid down at once Bowers was not to become "a full partner," until it should be so paid, but was to be allowed interest on any portions of the premium paid by him, and was to have a salary for management. Bowers managed the business on these terms for about six months, and paid about £75 on account of the premium which, the Ogdens say, was put into the business. Disputes then arose, and the partnership was dissolved. The Ogdens complained that Bowers was incompetent, and had damaged the concern by bad brewing. Bowers alleged that the Ogdens had deceived him as to the value of the business. Cross actions at law for damages were commenced by the parties; but Bowers, as a distinct matter, issued the present debtor's summons, claiming about £93, in respect of the part of premium paid and salary. The debtors in their affidavit denied the debt. In a correspondence the debtors' solicitors had offered to pay £75 to await an award, if Bowers would refer the whole case.

G. Rhodes claimed to proceed on the summons under the authority of Ex parte Ellis Re Kain (24 L. T. Rep. 819).

England reminded the Registrar of his own dictum (reprobating issuing summonses in disputed cases instead of proceeding by action at law) in Verity v. Thompson (LAW TIMES, vol. lii., p. 466) — but there the evidence before the registrar showed there was no debt owing—and argued that the debtors were at least entitled to have the case tried by a jury, the debt being disputed and a good defence alleged, and questions as to partnership arising.

The REGISTRAR.—Ex parte Ellis v. Kain, cited by Mr. Rhodes, does not apply. In that case the debt was a judgment debt, not to be set aside on such an occasion, and the question was merely as to some alleged cross claims. In the present instance, it is denied that there is any debt; at the same time the offer of the debtors to pay £75 into a bank to await a reference, though not eqvivalent to an admission by payment into court, savours of a consciousness on the part of the part of the debtors that something might be found to be owing from them. But in my view of the case, as one arising out of partnership disputes, I have grave doubts whether MR. Bowers can succeed in a common law action, and on the whole, the evidence to my mind being inconclusive, I consider I have an option either to dismiss the summons or to stay proceedings: Ex parte Rowbotham (25 L. T. Rep. 921). It is true that in Ex parte Ellis v. Kain, Lord Justice James appears to give the preference to letting the summons go on, and deciding the point at a further stage, viz., the hearing of the petition frr adjudication. I should at all times feel bound implicitly to obey any decision of that learned judge, but as I have before observed, there was an established debt in that case but none in this. It appears to me that the case in point is Ex parte Weir re Weir (26 L. T. Rep. 333), where questions of partnership arose, and their lordships not only allowed a stay of proceedings on the summons, but considered that security for trying the question should not have been required. I propose to follow that decision, and I therefore order that the proceedings on this summons be stayed (without security being given), until proceedings in a court of law shall have been taken by the summoning creditor against the summoning debtors for the recovery of the demand mentioned in the summons, and until such court shall have come to a decision thereon. At present I make no order as to costs.

LINCOLN COUNTY COURT.

Tuesday, Jan. 13.

(Before JAMES STEPHEN, LL.D., Judge.)

Liquidation — No discharge—Stock-in-trade acquired by debtor after filing petition, the property of the trustee.

AT the last court Page, on behalf of the trustees under the liquidation of Charles Lowe, tobacconist, Lincoln (Mr. Jay, of Lincoln, and Mr. Chatterton, of London), applied for directions as to the course they should pursue in reference to the stock-in-trade acquired by the debtor since the liquidation, he not having applied for or obtained his discharge.

His HONOUR was about to deliver his judgment, when

Rex interposed, and said he appeared for the debtor, and also for one of the creditors.

His HONOUR said he could not see that Mr. Rex had any locus standi.

Rex.—I appear for a creditor.

His HONOUR.—I would rather hear nothing. This was an ex parte application for certain directions of the court, which I am now prepared to give. There is no special matter before the court. I think your best plan will be to listen to my judgment, and then it will be open for you to take any course you may think fit.

Rex said he would rather first call his Honour's attention to a case, which might not have been under his notice. Lord Eldon had decided that where an uncertificated bankrupt—

His HONOUR (interposing): I am quite aware of that. You had better hear what I have to say. In this case application was made last court on the part of the trustees for directions to seize the stock-in-trade acquired by the debtor since he filed his petition. He had not obtained or applied for his discharge, but carries on his business as he used to do, it is believed, with money advanced by a bill of sale creditor, who, having established his priority, diverted the whole of the debtor's property from the rest of the creditors. I have no doubt that with regard to future property the status of an undischarged liquidating debtor is the same as that of an undischarged bankrupt. In either case, all the property which he acquires until his discharge is obtained belongs to the estate, and it is the duty of the trustees to collect it for the benefit of the creditors. The only exception to this is the personal labour of the debtor, which does not pass to his creditors, the assignees (or trustees) not being allowed, as it has sometimes been expressed, to let out the bankrupt to hire. But with regard to any stock-in-trade, or profit which he derives from its sale, and the like, the case is different, and anyone who advances him the money for purchasing such stock, or allows him to contract fresh debts, does so at his peril. If, indeed, the trustees should allow him, without interference, to continue his business as if he were a free man, subsequent creditors, if they could show that they were deceived as to his real position, might possibly set up an equitable right to have priority over the original creditors. But this, I apprehend, is not the case here, and in any event would not give the debtor himself any right as against his trustee. I have not found, nor should I expect to find, any express authority to the effect that an undischarged debtor cannot retain future property as against his trustee; but in a very recent case it was held that a creditor who had advanced money to a liquidating debtor on his resuming business under the sanction and superintendence of the trustee after he had obtained his discharge, on the condition of his executing a bond for the payment of a certain sum to the trustees, was not entitled to a lien on the price paid afterwards for the business, on its being sold under a resolution of the creditors. A fortiori, therefore, would no such lien have existed had the debtor not obtained his discharge. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the trustees are bound to follow up Mr. Lowe in his new business, and if they should fail to do so, they would become amenable, not only to the censure of this court but to the Comptroller of Bankruptcy, as neglecting their duties. It is not, however, a case for any formal order of this court, which would, indeed, be merely directing them to perform the duties cast upon them by the Legislature on their accepting the office of trustees. If any person sets up a claim to any property which they may seize, of course that claim will come before the court in the usual way, and be dealt with according to its merits. It is possible that the debtor may have given securities to fresh creditors, not having sent notice of the liquidation, which might be valued as against the original creditors, but such a case can scarcely arise unless the trustees have been remiss, and it will be time enough to deal with it when it is brought before the court.

LEGAL NEWS.

THE ATTACK ON MR. HAWKINS, Q.C.

AT Westminster police court on Tuesday Robert Booty, a painter, and Joseph Ryan, a general dealer, surrendered to their bail, charged with being riotous and disorderly in Westminster, and John Donovan, a lithographic printer, and Thomas Ennis, a hawker of prints, were similarly charged, with the addition that they used obscene language.

W. Doveton Smyth appeared for the defendant Booty.

The court was much crowded.

Mr. Pinhey, the chief inspector of the A division, was cross-examined by Smyth. He said: Considering the crowd and its size, there was not so much hissing and shouting; the crowd was a large one and ran; the defendant Booty was in the foremost rank of the crowd, others were in front of him; he pushed persons—two or three—and directly witness saw him he "collared" him. It was not the way to get out of the crowd, at least what he was doing, and was quite sure that both Ryan and Booty were hooting and hissing, and hundreds of others.

The roughs in court here began to make a noise, and Mr. ARNOLD said he would have the court cleared if there was a repetition of it.

Mr. Pinhey went on to say he took the defendant Booty in the act of shouting and hissing. He said, "What have I done?" and said he had gone to see something of the people connected with the trial, Sir Roger Tichborne, &c. He did did not say he was going to see his doctor over the water. On this occasion Dr. Kenealy was not there; the crowd went to see him.

Mr. ARNOLD: So they got hold of Mr. Hawkins instead.

Edward Shaw, a detective, who apprehended Donovan, was cross-examined, and said the man Donovan was close to the shaft of the cab; it was a Hansom, and Mr. Hawkins was inside; lots of people were shouting; lots of people shouted out "Here's b— Hawkins." A great number of people said that; it was all they could do to get out of the crowd with the prisoners; he was certain Donovan used the words "Here's b— old Hawkins, let's turn the cab over." When witness took him he had hold of the shaft of the cab.

Detective Marsh, E Division, cross-examined: Was close to Mr. Pinhey at the time of the rush. First saw Booty after we got hold of Ryan. He was a little bit in advance of the rush. There were some people in front of him and behind him. he was not trying to get out of the crowd. He was hallooing, and hissing, and pushing people.

Smyth, in defence of Booty and Donovan, said: Booty went to see the counsel for the defence, having occasion to go to his medical man in the Westminster-bridge-road. There was a rush, and while he was trying to get out of the crowd he pushed persons. Anybody would do so to get out of a large crowd. He denied that the prisoner had the slightest feeling in the matter, and he would show by evidence that he was a man of good character; he was sure the inspector and Marsh were mistaken in the confusion that ensued; the last witness had either made a gross mistake or had committed gross perjury. Donovan, he said, was an honest, industrious young man; he had no work to do, and he went out of curiosity to see the claimant and Dr. Kenealy. He may have been near the cab, but he totally denied the use of the language, and attributed the charge to a mistake on the part of the police.

After the adjournment to the court, Mr. Arnold asked if this conduct had been repeated, and upon being answered in the negative, said he was very glad to hear it; he characterised the conduct of the crowd as perfectly monstrous; of the merits and demerits of the case they knew about as much as the stones under their feet; that a gentleman should be hooted and hounded by a disorderly rabble was not to be tolerated, and means must be taken to repress it. He was satisfied that all the defendants had taken part in it, and had they been proved to have been acting in concert he should have committed them for a riot, but as that was not so, he should deal with them under his power as a magistrate. He trusted the view he took of the matter would be a warning to others, for the next time this sort of thing occurred he should deal with the offenders very severely. At present, he ordered Booty to find bail in £50 to keep the peace for three months; Ryan to find bail in £30 for a like term; and the other two, Donovan and Ennis, to find bail in £5 each. Booty's bail was at once tendered and accepted, and the others were removed to the cells.

MIDDLE TEMPLE.—Mr. Torr, Q.C., and Mr. Lindley, Q.C., have been appointed benchers of the Middle Temple.

THE EXETER ELECTION PETITION.—Baron Bramwell has appointed Tuesday, Feb. 3, for the hearing of the Exeter Election Petition—Carter and another v. Mills, M.P.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—The next session of the Central Criminal Court will be held on Monday, Feb. 2. The judge on the rota is Baron Pigott, appointed to the North Wales Circuit.

WE understand that in the event of a vacancy occurring in the office of clerks to the magistrates at Portsmouth, Mr. R. W. Ford, a well known solicitor in the borough, would probably be elected to the office without opposition.

MR. COMMISSIONER KERR has, through his solicitors, threatened the common council of the City of London with proceedings, in reference to the payment of fees levied under the Admiralty Jurisdiction Act in his court during the past five years, and which the learned commissioner contends belong to him.

THE IRISH BENCH.—The Lord Lieutenant has stated to a deputation from the corporation of Dublin, with reference to the subject of the vacant judgeship in the Irish Court of Exchequer, that the appointment is deferred until the Government has decided whether the Judicature Act shall extend to Ireland.

THE Times, in an article upon Irish grievances, alleges "that the Irish Bench is overmanned in proportion to the work that is to be done. A very simple sum in the rule of three will show that whether we consider the amount of business or the number of the population, an Irish judge has nothing like the same amount of work to do, nor work by any means so important as that which falls to the share of every English judge."

EXCUTIONS FOR MURDER.—The Standard observes: "The continued interference of the Home Secretary to prevent the carrying out of capital sentences has in times past introduced an unsatisfactory element of change into trials for murder. If the law is that men convicted of murder shall be hanged, the exceptions to this rule ought to be very few. If the laws concerning capital punishment are unsatisfactory, let them be altered, but do not let us have them occasionally suspended, according to the caprice or tenderness of a Home Secretary."

COUNTY COURTS.—The following circular has been issued to County Court judges: "30, Portland-place, W., Jan. 14, 1874.—Sir,—I am directed by the Lord Chancellor to request that upon a vacancy occurring in the office of registrar of any court of which you are the judge, you will, before filling up such vacancy, acquaint his Lordship with the fact, in order that the circumstances of the court and the propriety of discontinuing it may be considered. When the registrar shall have died without having appointed a deputy, his Lordship will be obliged if you will be good enough to provisionally appoint a person to discharge the duties of registrar (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 12, 13). Where a registrar is desirous of resigning, I am to request that you will ask him to be good enough not to do so until you shall have communicated his wish to his Lordship, and received his decision as to the propriety of continuing the court.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant, HENRY NICOL."

A BENCH of country magistrates sitting at Colchester, having committed a parish sexton and clerk for trial on a charge of petty theft, value a penny, which on Tuesday last, by the way, brought down condign judgment upon the worthy justices in the shape of a leader in the Daily Telegraph, condemning them for their severity, the defendant's attorney, Mr. H. Goody, is reported to have offered himself as bail. This is no doubt an unusual proceeding on the part of a professional man, and although perhaps it is to be deprecated as a rule, yet it is certainly evidence that lawyers are not, after all as hard-hearted as they are usually considered to be by the public. We commend the facts of this case to the Somersetshire magistrate whose proposition that magistrates should preside over courts of conciliation in aid of the County Courts we noticed in our last issue. In the case to which we refer, "a few questions by an intelligent, patient, and sympathising magistrate" do not seem even to have been asked, or, if asked, were productive of no good apparently.

THE BALLOT ACT.—The Irish Court of Queen's Bench has confirmed the conviction of Mr. Unkles the Cork magistrate, for the offence of violating the Ballot Act, by his disclosure of the nature of a vote given at the late election.

THE post of Registrar to the Railway Commission, vacant by the death of Mr. Gilmore Evans, has been filled up by the appointment of Mr. Balfour Browne, barrister-at-law, of the Middle Temple and Midland Circuit.

THE LAW OF CONSPIRACY.—Mr. Rupert Kettle will read a paper at a meeting of the Social Science Association, to be held on the 26th inst., at their rooms in the Adelphi, on "The Law of Conspiracy as effecting employers and employed." The chair will be taken at eight o'clock by Fitzjames Stephen, Esq., Q.C.

58. THE BANKRUPTCY ACT 1869.—Where, at a first general meeting of creditors duly held under the 125th and 126th sections of the above Act, liquidation by arrangement is resolved upon, the discharge of the debtor to be granted upon the happening of a certain contingency, is it necessary for the trustee, upon the happening of this event, to memorialize the court and obtain from the registrar a certificate of discharge under his hand and seal, or is the resolution itself, or a certified copy thereof, sufficient? If necessary to be by way of memorial, what form must be used, and what (if any) is the stamp duty? Form 123 hardly seems to apply in the above case. CURIA.

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.—In consequence of a report which has been circulated and published that the rules of this society have not yet been framed, and that the Lord Chancellor has already been asked to receive a deputation from the society, and that "the members of this new society utterly condemn the Incorporated Law Society" for their inaction on the subject of suppressing unqualified persons who defraud the Profession, will you afford me space to say, as the honorary secretary of the society, that the rules were weeks ago drafted, and are now being considered by a committee composed of barristers and solicitors; that no application has as yet been made to the Lord Chancellor to receive a deputation, and that there is no hostility to the Incorporated Law Society, the council of which I hope and believe will lend us a ready hand in our efforts to protect the public against the depredations of unqualified persons who poach upon the Profession. CHARLES FORD.

BEALL v. SMITH.—My attention has been called to an article in the LAW TIMES of 27th Dec., which appeared a fortnight before the judgment was published on the 10th inst.; and as there are many errors in that article, perhaps you will permit me, as the Mr. Heather referred to, to correct them. You speak of me as "a Mr. Heather." I have been admitted nearly twenty-eight years—Mr. Merriman eight; and I believe I am much better known in the Profession than he is. It is not true that Beall became a client of Merriman and Co. in Nov. 1870, or ceased to employ me, as in the first six months of 1871 he consulted me on many fresh businesses, and had about eighty attendances on me. He never consulted Mr. Merriman about undertaking some complicated matters on which I was engaged, and therefore Mr. Merriman could not have declined them. In fact, there was only one complicated matter, and in respect of that I have got his estate £8000. His wife did not consult me about her differences, nor was Mr. Beall advised by Merriman and Powell about them, nor did they effect any reconciliation. On the contrary, Beall consulted me, and I brought about a voluntary separation, and he gave me instructions to prepare a settlement on his wife and children, and handed me a great many policies of insurance on his life to take care of for him. This was in July 1871. Being concerned for him in all matters relative to his property and business (although Mr. Merriman appeared thrice before the magistrates for him), and he having been confined as a lunatic, I applied to defendant Smith, Beall's clerk, for an account of his receipts and payments from June 1871. Merriman, Albert Turner, and White then concocted the suit. The bill was filed on 15th Aug. by a next friend, who had been found by Merriman, had been a bankrupt, and became shortly afterwards insolvent, being a debtor to Merriman. This next friend was totally unknown to Beall or any of his family, and the bill was filed without any communication with me, or Beall, or any member of his family. The Vice-Chancellor stated in writing that the case was a very peculiar one; but he was willing to make the order for the appointment of a receiver in the terms assented to by me. It can scarcely be believed that the decree was obtained, the clerk's and receiver's accounts taken and passed, and the order for further consideration obtained, without the slightest communication with me as representing the family and the committee of the estate or any member of the family. Merriman, White, and A. Turner, all knew of the lunacy and inquisition, and studiously and wilfully concealed all the proceedings in the suit after the appointment of a receiver, except one summons, which was addressed to me before the decree. If any solicitor and accountant can concoct and carry on a suit in reference to the property of a lunatic, after his confinement, without having the sanction or the knowledge of any member of his family, or the lunatic's former solicitor, and pass the accounts, showing, after the suit was instituted, payments out of his estate to the defendant's own solicitors for charges not in the suit (no account having, I believe, been delivered) to the accountant, and receiver of about £400, and the costs of the suit about £300, and to the defendant for salary about £60, months after he was discharged, and with other improper items amount to nearly £1000, out of property which produced about £3000. it is surely but right that a court of equity should express its disapproval of such conduct, and make the principal parties refund to the estate what they have most improperly deprived it of, and pay the costs of making them refund. All these statements can be verified by documents in my own office. JAMES HEATHER.

OUR INVADERS—BANKRUPTCY ACCOUNTANTS.—I cordially concur in the remarks made on this important subject by your correspondent "H. J. L." in last week's LAW TIMES. Let me, however, explain why it has come about that the accountants have monopolised the lucrative branch of business referred to, that of the office of trustee in bankruptcy and liquidation proceedings, under the Act of 1869. In the first place, it must be observed that before that Act the bankruptcy branch of practice was in very few hands, and of a limited character. In London it was mostly in two or three offices, who also acted as agents for other solicitors, too important or too lazy to acquire the practice. Before the Act of 1869 assignees were not remunerated, and consequently there was no contest for the office, and in many cases the difficulty was to induce a creditor to undetake the nominal and gratuitous duties. Accountants then sought from solicitors the work, or solicitors employed accountants, to perform the duties properly appertaining to their profession. In the country districts I suppose the same practice maintained. All this was changed by the Act of 1869, and far-seeing people must have known that it would be so. When the Scotch system was introduced, and the office of trustee became a paid office, for which solicitors, accountants, and others, as well as the creditors, became eligible, of course it was natural that the accountants, those who had been accustomed to act in bankruptcy business, and others who determined to make it a portion of their business, saw that a great field was open to them. Indeed, this was foreseen by those who introduced the Bill into the House, and I recollect that the Attorney-General in his opening speech said with reference to the office of trustee, that in all probability, a race of bankruptcy accountants would spring up, who would make this an especial branch of their business, as in Scotland. They have done so, and there is no reason why they should not. I will also say that many of them ably, admirably, and conscientiously perform their duties, performing them in the manner and for the purposes the Legislature intended. acting within the scope of those duties, and not trenching upon those of their legal advisers. Now, what is the reason that solicitors have been apparently content to see accountants take the position for which they are themselves eligible, and when solicitors could perform the work in an equally satisfactory manner, and with a considerable saving of expense? There are many reasons; one reason may be that respectable solicitors have a natural disinclination to canvas, or to do anything which bears the aspect of touting for business. In order to obtain the appointment of trustee in bankruptcy or liquidation, a solicitor who puts himself forward for the office, must, previously to the first meeting, personally see, or send some one to see, or communicate in some way with, the creditors, and propose himself for an office of profit. If being a perfectly capable man in all respects, and knowing that by his appointment a double set of costs, and double remuneration would be saved to the creditors, having got over this natural disinclination to canvas, he would find in all probability he would fail to convince the creditors that such a result would follow. Unless the votes of the creditors were obtained in his favour, does any one acquainted with these matters believe, that a solicitor nominating himself at a meeting, would stand a chance against an accountant who had adopted the usual course, or against a member of his own Profession, in both cases his adversary, being stimulated to fresh exertion by the knowledge that a solicitor was seeking the appointment. We all know the connections and alliances between certain bankruptcy accountants and certain solicitors, who as a rule always act with each other when they can. These solicitors find it to their advantage to put forward as trustee the accountant with whom they act. I am sure "H. J. L." does not require me to enter more into detail. As to the advantage which would accrue to the creditors by the appointment of a solicitor able and willing to perform the duties of a trustee, acting for a fixed remuneration, as the creditors might determine, thus saving the remuneration of a lay trustee and the taxed or untaxed costs of his solicitor in addition, there can be no doubt; but I am afraid the difficulties are great, although they may yet be surmounted. The remedy, if the Profession desire it, is in their own hands, let them co-operate in an effectual manner, throw off that apathy where their own interests are concerned, which distinguishes them above all professions. Individually there is no remedy—it must be the work of a society. "The Legal Practitioners' Society" has lately been formed; I have joined it, and believe it is destined to do good work, if the Profession support it as extensively as they should do; great changes will take place in the Profession,—mere talking and writing will do no good. I shall be glad to communicate with "H. J. L.," and show him how the remedy he seeks can be attained, in the particular instance he has properly brought before us; the other matter he refers to is now under the active consideration of the society I have referred to.—J. SEYMOUR SALAMAN.

LEGAL EXTRACTS.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL AND THE LAW OF ENTAIL, &c.

THE second topic to which the Solicitor-General addressed himself was the law of entail and generally the reform of the law relating to land. It is to be hoped that he will be more successful, to borrow a phrase of his own, than other Solicitors-General in dealing with the suspicions and contradictions of the powerful body of solicitors in particular, but the knot is a terribly hard one to untie, and it is practically impossible to cut it. We believe in the possibility of a reform of the laws relating to land, if any one were patriotic and studious enough to devote several years of unpaid labour to it, but we do not believe that under the present system of things there is much real chance of it. It would be necessary for one thing to recast the whole of the language which is at present used upon the subject, to sweep away the whole learning of tenures, to repeal the Statute of Uses, and to put into a different form the theory of trusts. It would also be necessary to translate the rights which are at present clothed in this worn-out language into simple modern English, and to apply the new phraseology to the existing state of things. This would be an enormous undertaking. It might be done if the nation understood its importance and would employ the necessary amount of labour and time, but hardly any one as yet appears to have anything like an adequate notion of its real nature or magnitude.

In the mean time, Sir William Harcourt proposes, or at least suggests, modifications, the exact nature of which he cannot, of course, state, in the law of entail. After some little snorts at philosophers, which compel us to remark that he has really much more in common with the philosophers whom he despises than with the Oxford tradesmen whom he flatters, he proceeded to a good round denunciation of the evils of entails. He says of a strict settlement: "It destroys parental influence, it subverts filial respect, it makes the son the natural antagonist of the father, it makes the father too often the enemy of the son." It encourages extravagance in reversioners, and above all it discourages tenants for life from improving their land, and it gives them an artificial motive for spending its surplus produce in other ways. A man who has £5000 a year in land settled on his eldest son will not put his surplus income into buildings, drains, and the like, which would go to enrich his heir-at-law, but will save it up for his personal representatives or legatees. Prevent strict settlements, and the motives for improving land will be greatly strengthened. Sir William does not, as we understand him, propose to prevent a man from leaving his land by will as he pleases; but we suppose he would restrict him to living persons, and would not permit him to give an estate tail to unborn children. All this, of course, has often been said, and has a good deal of force, but it ought to be coupled with other matters, to some of which Sir William refers, not, as it appears to us, very consistently, though he is silent as to others. He has learned, he says, from a second reading of M. Lavergne, that the agricultural condition of England is much better than that of France, that English labourers are better off than French peasants, that the equal distribution of land is economically unwise. Be it so; but why not explain how, if this is the case, the laws which produce this state of things can be economically bad? If it is true that lands held under English law are better cultivated than lands held under French law, why assimilate English law to French law with a view to the promotion of agriculture? Another point which must suggest itself to every one is that if the law of entail involves the consequences which he ascribes to it in a majority of cases, or even in any considerable number of cases, it is difficult to understand why entails are so common. If their common effect is to set fathers against children, and to emancipate children at an unduly early age from their fathers, why do people put their lands into strict settlement? Whatever may be the weight of the Solicitor-General's argument, it is an argument which ought to be addressed to the owners of property rather than to legislators. It shows cause why A. B. should not settle his land, but it hardly shows cause why A. B. should be forbidden by law to settle his land. Thus the argument as to the economical effect of strict settlement is met by the facts which the Solicitor-General extracts from the work of M. Lavergne. The argument as to its social effects is met by the fact that the custom prevails amongst a class of people who are certainly not remarkable for want of family affection.

One point connected with this subject is that settlements of personal property are now even more common than settlements of real property, which shows their convenience; nor have we ever heard them objected to. No doubt an ordinary settlement of personalty gives the parents the power of dividing the settled funds as they please among the children of the marriage, and so leaves them more power than an ordinary settlement of realty. We do not quite understand why settlements of real estate should not follow the same form if it were more convenient. It is, indeed, common, as every one knows, to insert in settlements of personalty a clause to say that any land in which the settled funds are invested shall be treated as personalty; and perhaps a similar course might be taken in the settlement of real estate. This, however, requires no legislation. It could be done now if such was the wish of the owners of real property.—Pall Mall Gazette.

LAW SOCIETIES.

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' SOCIETY.

THE first meeting of the committee appointed to consider whether Parliamentary action was necessary in order to deal with the subject of arresting the encroachments of the Profession by unqualified persons, met on Monday last. Mr. H. Seymour Salaman having been called to the chair, he reviewed at length the present statutory provisions dealing with this important subject, directing attention to 23 & 25 Vict. c. 27, s. 26; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 2; the Stamp Act of 1870, sect. 60; also to the case of Reg. v. Buchanan (16 L. J. 227 Q. B.), referred to in the 1866 edition of Archbold. The right to sue for penalties as at present provided for by statute was discussed and considered. The operation of sect. 26 of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 9 was also considered. After much discussion and argument, the following resolution was adopted: "That this committee is of opinion after full consideration of the subject, that the existing law is insufficient for the effectual protection of the legal profession and the public against the encroachments of unqualified persons, and recommend to the Society that further legislation be initiated without delay."

UNION SOCIETY OF LONDON.

AT a meeting of the Union Society of London, at 1, Adam-street, Adelphi, held on Tuesday evening, the 20th inst., the following subject was submitted to discussion, and negatived, "That the Established Churches are inconsistent with Civil Liberty, and irreconcileable with the principles already recognised by Parliament."

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at Clement's Inn Hall, on Wednesday 21st inst., Mr. E. F. Stanway, solicitor, in the chair. Mr. E. J. Davis opened the subject for the evening's debate, viz.: "That the working of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, assists and induces fraud." The motion was lost by a majority of one.

NORWICH LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AT a meeting of this society, held at the Law Library, on Tuesday evening, the 20th inst., Mr. G. W. G. Barnard in the chair. Mr. S. Cozens Hardy opened the subject for the evening's debate, viz.: "Ought Copyhold Tenure to be abolished?" The question was decided in the negative by a considerable majority.

LEGAL OBITUARY.

NOTE.—This department of the LAW TIMES, is contributed by EDWARD WALFORD, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Genealogical and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the LAW TIMES Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

H. G. BELL, ESQ.

THE late Henry Glassford Bell, Esq., advocate, and sheriff of Lanarkshire, who died on the 7th inst., at his residence in Glasgow, at the age of sixty-eight, was the son of the late Mr. Bell, some time town clerk of Greenock. He was born in the year 1805 and being destined from the first for his father's profession, he was, after acquiring the rudiments of education at the Glasgow High School, transferred to the University of Edinburgh, where he passed through the regular curriculum. He was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates of Scotland in 1832, and in 1839 he was appointed one of the sheriff's substitute of Glasgow. Having once fairly settled down to legal business, says the Scotsman, Mr. Bell soon approved himself a singularly able and efficient judge. That his merits in this capacity were duly recognised by the profession, was significantly indicated by an incident which occurred in 1852. At that time a rumour got afloat to the effect that Sir A. Alison was about to be promoted to the Bench, and straightway a memorial was addressed to the Lord Advocate, craving that in such case Mr. Bell should be appointed his successor. Another flattering compliment was paid him some years later, when strong inducements were held out to him to remove to Edinburgh and practise as a consulting counsel in regard to questions of mercantile law. On the death of Sir Archibald Alison in 1867, Mr. Bell was appointed to succeed him in the office of sheriff principal. The friend and frequent companion of Professor Wilson, who speaks of him with respect and affection in the "Noctes," where he appears under the name of "Tallboys," Mr. Bell acquired in early life a task for literary pursuits, and in 1828, being as yet only in his twenty-third year, he became editor of the Edinburgh Literary Journal, a weekly periodical devoted to criticism and the belles lettres. With James Hogg, too, he was on terms of intimate friendship, and in 1860 Mr. Bell took part in inaugurating a monument to the memory of the gifted shepherd. Besides editing and largely contributing to the Edinburgh Literary Journal, Mr. Bell published in 1831 a volume of poems, entitled "Summer and Winter Hours," and later in life he published a volume of occasional productions, under the title of "Romances and Ballads." His literary fame will rest, however, on his well-known poem, "Mary, Queen of Scots," written in his early days. Mr. Bell was twice married, first to a daughter of Captain Stuart, of Sheerglass, Glengarry, by whom he had one son and four daughters, one of whom is the wife of Professor Nichol, of Glasgow University. He married secondly in 1872 to Marian, daughter of Mr. Sandeman, of Glasgow, who survives him. The remains of the deceased gentleman, which were honoured with a public funeral, were interred in Glasgow Cathedral.

G. C. OKE, ESQ.

(ADDENDUM.)

THE late George Colwell Oke, Esq., Chief Clerk at the Mansion House, of whom we gave a short biographical notice in our last impression, was the second son of the late William Oke, Esq., of Truro, in the county of Cornwall. He was born at St. Columb, in that county, on the 8th Feb. 1821, and was educated at Truro. Mr. Oke was married, and has left a family to lament his loss. His present widow, to whom he was married very recently, is the step-daughter of G. M. Harvey, Esq., of The Pines, Streatham-hill, Surrey. The remains of the deceased gentleman were interred at Nunhead Cemetery, on the 15th inst.

B. J. ARMSTRONG, ESQ.

THE late Benjamin John Armstrong, Esq., many years an active magistrate for the county of Middlesex, whose death was recently announced, at the age of seventy-six, was a son of the late Benjamin Armstrong, Esq., of the parish of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and was born in the year 1796 or 1797. The deceased gentleman, who was one of the oldest magistrates for Middlesex and Westminster, took an active part in the administration of justice at the Clerkenwell Sessions, where he for many years proposed or seconded the re-election of Mr. H. Pownall, as chairman of the Middlesex Bench. He also was constant in his attendance as a visiting justice at the Feltham Reformatory School, and other like public institutions. Mr. Armstrong married in 1818, Ann, daughter of John Bailey, Esq., of Kew, Surrey, by whom, who died in 1869, he has left a family. His only son is the Rev. Benjamin J. Armstrong, vicar of East Dereham, Norfolk, who was born in 1819, and is married to the eldest daughter of William Duncombe, Esq., of Langley, Great Berkhampstead, Herts. The late Mr. Armstrong was buried at the cemetery, Highgate.

THE HON. J. W. JOHNSTONE.

THE late Hon. James W. Johnstone, Judge in Equity of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, who death at Cheltenham, at the age of eighty-one, was recently announced, was born in Kingston, Jamaica, in the year 1792, his grandfather was a Scotchman of the Annandale line, who married a Miss Peyton, a lady of French Huguenot descent, he had been Governor of the Province of Georgia while the United States were still a colony of Great Britain. On the breaking out of the revolutionary war, his sons all entered the British army to aid in the suppression of the rebellion, one of them raised and commanded a troop of horse known as Johnstone's Horse, at its head he was killed in a successful skirmish against rebels. On the declaration of the independence of the States of America, Governor Johnstone with his family left the Southern States and returned to Scotland, having in common with all the loyalists lost his whole fortune. The father of the subject of this memoir, who had been a captain in the New York Volunteers during the war, at its close, studied medicine at the Edinburgh University, where he obtained his degree. He afterwards removed to Jamaica, having previously married the only daughter of Captain Leichenstein, of Austrian extraction. His children were all sent to Scotland for their education, the subject of the present sketch being placed with a private tutor, the late Mr. Duncan of Ruthwell, the originator of savings banks in Scotland. His connection with Nova Scotia, where most of his life was passed, arose from the fortuitous circumstance of a temporary visit made to Halifax with his mother, whose health required change to a northern climate. He then studied for the Bar, and was admitted in or about the year 1813. Mr. Johnstone quickly rose to the head of his profession, and at about the age of forty-five he entered the arena of politics. He was elected a member for the county of Annapolis, U. S., Canada, one of the largest constituencies of the province, which he represented without a break, having run nine or ten successful elections, till his elevation to the Bench. During his whole political career he was the leader of the Conservative party, and Attorney-General and leader of the Government whenever that party was in power. He was created honourable by the British Government. In 1857 he, together with Mr. Adams Archibald, was sent on a delegation to England on behalf of the province of Nova Scotia to adjust the respective claims of the Mining Association and the Province in regard to opening the mines and minerals and to free them from the royalty of the Duke of York. He was one of the earliest advocates of the confederation of the Canadian provinces, which he warmly supported throughout his whole career. In 1863 he was appointed judge in equity of the Supreme Court, an office which he was the first to fill. In 1872, his health being very delicate, he left Canada to seek a more southern climate. In the following year he was offered the governorship of the province of Nova Scotia, which he at first accepted, and the appointment was hailed with acclamation through the length and breadth of the country. The newspapers of the Conservative and Liberal parties vied with each other in welcoming it, and in bearing testimony to the high talent, the chivalrous honour, and the unswerving rectitude of Judge Johnstone. His failing health, however, obliged him most reluctantly to renounce all idea of returning to the home of his adoption, where he had left so many warm friends, and he was compelled to decline the appointment.

The Law and the Lawyers.

A CASE which will be of service to County Court Judges in conducting the equity business of their courts was decided by Vice-Chancellor MALINS on Monday last. A plaint had been filed in the Lambeth County Court, and there was the usual allegation that the value of the property did not exceed £500. An objection was raised when the cause came on for hearing that the value of the property was over £500, and a valuer was called who so deposed. The learned County Court Judge found as a fact that the value was over £500, and thereupon, instead of ordering the cause to be transferred to the Court of Chancery, dismissed the plaint with costs. The question turned on sect. 9 of the Act of 1865 and sect. 14 of the Act of 1867. These two sections, the VICE-CHANCELLOR said, must be taken as standing together, and it was clearly, therefore, the duty of the County Court Judge to transfer the cause to the Court of Chancery. His HONOUR considered the case similor to that of Birks v. Silverwood (L. Rep. 14 Eq. 101; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 18), and the appeal against the decision of the County Court Judge was allowed, but as no application had been made at the hearing to transfer the cause, no costs of the appeal were given.

ONE or two of the Judges make a practice of receiving citations from the LAW TIMES Reports with hesitation, and Mr. Justice BLACKBURN has more than once objected that they are not "of the highest authority." No ground has been alleged, to our knowledge, for such an aspersion, whereas the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE of ENGLAND has on one occasion at least commended the ability with which cases, to be found in those reports only, are reported. We think it only due to as able a staff of reporters as the Bar of England can furnish, to say that editorially we have constantly occasion to admire the extraordinary care and skill employed in the service of the LAW TIMES Reports. We make no invidious distinctions, but from the nature of things we believe that in bankruptcy these reports are simply indispensable, and are received as authority—as they certainly are in all the courts throughout the provinces. With regard to speed, coupled with fulness, the LAW TIMES Reports are without a rival. We have the testimony of large numbers of members of the Bar to the great usefulness and value of our reports, and the objection that they are not "of the highest authority" ought not to be advanced without specific grounds. From the excessive care which is devoted to revision, we believe we may say that the reports are as absolutely perfect as they can be made consistently with the rapidity with which they are produced, and moreover that this rapidity of production detracts very slightly from the accuracy which is, of course, essential.

ADVOCATES who have been retained in any way connected with the Tichborne Defence would appear to have been seized with an extraordinary mania for being irregular and insulting dignitaries. The Albany Law Journal, quoting a scene between Dr. Kenealy and the Court, which we published sometime since, taunts us with our boasted regard for decorum, and observes that had counsel in America ventured to be equally insolent, he would have received something more than a lecture. Our contemporary, we think, overlooks the difficulty of doing anything more than lecture under the circumstances. To have committed counsel for the defence in the middle of his address, or indeed at any period of his progress in the case, would have had a most unfortunate effect. The disposition to make inopportune and insolent observations has, however, shown itself outside the Court of Queen's Bench, and at Bow-street we have seen the extraordinary spectacle of an attorney addressing a magistrate, but extending his remarks to "the body of men from which English juries are drawn" in anticipation of the commitment of his client. The Luie prosecution going on concurrently with the prosecution of the Claimant has encouraged the attempt to rebut the rebutting evidence of the Crown, and has tended to complicate the already extraordinary conditions under which great efforts are being made to administer the law of the country.

AN interesting question of bankruptcy law was raised in the cross actions of Megrath v. Gray and Gray v. Megrath in the Common Pleas on the 12th instant, namely, whether the liquidation and discharge of one of two joint debtors releases his co-debtor. In the first action it appeared that GRAY was indebted to MEGRATH in a balance of 64*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.* for goods sold; that MEGRATH and H., who traded in partnership down to May 1870, had bought goods of GRAY, for which they had given him two acceptances of 249*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* and 167*l.* 7*s.*, which GRAY had discounted with the Adelphi Bank of Liverpool; that H. (who upon the dissolution of the partnership had undertaken to pay the debts of the firm) filed a petition under sect. 126 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and paid 10*s.* in the pound; that GRAY afterwards filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement under sect. 125, and under a resolution paid his creditors 9*s.* in the pound, and got an assignment of the debts and effects from the trustee; and that the Adelphi Bank received both dividends, and in January 1872, gave up the two bills to GRAY. The first question was whether the discharge of H. in his liquidation by arrangement was a release of MEGRATH, his solvent co-debtor, or whether such discharge released only H., leaving MEGRATH to be the sole debtor; secondly, if the latter, whether the interest of GRAY in the right of action against MEGRATH was re-transferred to GRAY under his liquidation by arrangement, or was still in his trustee, or had lapsed, or was legally in his trustee but held by him as trustee for GRAY.

The Court held that the general enactments in sects. 49 and 50 of the Bankruptcy Act 1849, apply to the discharges under sects. 125 and 126, and the rules and forms applicable to them; that the word "bankrupt" in sects. 49 and 50 is to be read as applicable to any debtor obtaining an order of discharge under the statute; that an order of discharge, whether in pure bankruptcy, or under a liquidation by arrangement under sect. 125, or under a composition under sect. 126, releases only the debtor in whose favour it is given, and leaves his solvent co-debtor liable to be sued separately by a joint creditor who had been a party to the release of the insolvent debtor; and, consequently, that the discharge of H. did not release MEGRATH, but left him liable to a separate suit by GRAY.

THE Bar will be strongly represented in the coming elections. We shall probably omit some names which we have not recognised, but we already notice the following, which are familiar: Mr. Joseph Napier Higgins, Q.C. (Evesham), Mr. C. P. Butt, Q.C. THE doctrine of constructive notice is one which is not to be extended, and the limit of its operation has again been defined in Cavander v. Bulteel (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710). There two persons purchased a piece of land which was conveyed to them as tenants in common, subject to a joint power of appointment in the two purchasers. They erected thereon premises for the purposes of a business which they carried on in partnership, and the articles of partnership made the premises partnership property. In 1866 one of the partners mortgaged one undivided moiety of the premises to the bankers of the firm to secure repayment of an advance made to him. In 1870 the partnership was dissolved. The other partner filed a bill against the bankers claiming priority over their mortgage in respect of sums advanced by him to his firm. Vice-Chancellor WICKENS, being of opinion that it was not proved that the bankers knew that the premises were in the joint occupation of the two partners, decided against the plaintiff. But on appeal this decision was reversed, one of the bankers being examined in court, and admitting that they knew that the premises were in the joint occupation of the plaintiff and his partner for the purposes of their business. This knowledge, the LORDS JUSTICES considered, brought the case within the doctrine of Daniels v. Davison (16 Ves. 249). There Lord ELDON held that the purchaser of a property which was in possession of a lessee was bound by constructive notice of an agreement by the latter to purchase the reversion. Mr. ROBINSON, in his Law of Priority, regards this as an extreme case, but adds "The decision would, however, seem to come within the general principle of constructive notice—namely, that a person who makes no inquiry whatever shall be deemed to have notice of what, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, he would presumably have learned." Lord Justice JAMES considered that Cavander v. Bulteel was a stronger case than Daniels v. Davison, "for it would be much more reasonable to expect a mortgagee or purchaser to make inquiries in a case like this, than that he should inquire into the interest of every tenant on the estate in the case of an ordinary mortgage or sale."

WHEN an Election Judge gives a decision, setting forth all his reasons, it is perhaps more unreasonable to take exception to it than it is to differ from the finding of a jury. In declaring Sir HENRY JAMES duly elected for Taunton, Mr. Justice GROVE will receive universally the credit of having weighed with scrupulous care the evidence laid before him, and to have performed with careful impartiality the functions of a juryman. His Lordship found, as many Judges have found before, the difficulty of defining agency, and he even anticipated that objection might be taken to the approximate limitation which he expressed. At this particular juncture—when time is short and many acts may be done in haste which would not be done if there were more time for deliberation—the judgment of Mr. Justice GROVE is of large importance. He goes to this extent—that the question of agency is one to be determined by the evidence in each particular case; that the candidate must have placed himself in the hands of persons authorised by his agents to canvass; and that mere non-interference with persons who, feeling interested in the success of a candidate, may act in support of his canvass, is not sufficient to saddle the candidate with any unlawful act of theirs of which the tribunal is satisfied he or his authorised agent is ignorant. It is extremely difficult to follow the learned Judge in his examination of the evidence on this basis, because if we differed from him in his method of argument, we might possibly arrive at a conclusion different from that at which he has arrived, and it is no part of a journalist's duty to consider decided issues of fact. The doctrine of partisanship is, however, in our opinion a dangerous one, and if it is to prevail it will be very easy for candidates to reap all the advantages of corrupt agency without the inconveniences. A candidate has only to employ a single agent and shut his eyes to all the acts of self-appointed canvassers, whilst, however, adopting and ratifying all their work, and he will escape. And further than this, according to Mr. Justice GROVE, if it plainly appear that by someone or other a great deal that is prohibited by statute has been committed, the acts must be proved. Under this ruling a constituency might be demoralised and tainted to the core, but if specific acts are not proved the election stands. We confess that we prefer the broader definitions of Baron MARTIN, and we anticipate that if the law of agency is narrowed to suit the evidence in each particular case, it will be very easy to fritter away the doctrines which have been established and make bribery under the Ballot almost impossible of punishment.

THE end of the speech of Mr. HAWKINS in the Tichborne case, and the opening of the summing up of the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, furnish us with perhaps the most scathing denunciation of a member of the English Bar which is to be found in the records of forensic oratory. Mr. HAWKINS has risen to a height which his greatest admirers did not consider him capable of attaining to. The patience on the part of the Judges which he took occasion to commend and to wonder at, would appear, however, to represent an amount of suppressed indignation which language is really inadequate to convey. This has now burst forth, and let those who, in the future, may deem it courageous to insult the English Bench, read the following, and, we say again, as we have said before, take warning:

This has been a painful case, among others, by reason of the course that has been pursued in the conduct of the defence. It is most distressing for a Judge who presides over a trial to find himself in frequent conflict with the learned counsel engaged in the case. That has been the case, unfortunately, over and over again in the course of this inquiry, and the Judge cannot fail to be conscious that to a bystander, who only sees the case on the surface, it may have the effect of creating a suspicion of partiality and prejudice pervading the Judge's mind. When point after point, either of attack or defence, is taken of a most frivolous and untenable character, the Judge has no alternative but to overrule them, and when they are multiplied, either through ignorance of the law, or, as was the case here, from a desire to produce an effect on the outside world, and lead them to think that the counsel was unfairly treated, the Judge in such cases must do his duty regardless of the consequences. In this case we have had to interfere to correct the misstatements or misrepresentations which we could not allow to pass unnoticed. When witnesses are misrepresented and their statements are distorted; when facts are perverted, and when dates are set at nought, not for the purpose of argument, but in order to lay the foundation for foul imputations and unjust accusations against parties and witnesses, and to send forth invective and foul slime wherewith to blacken the character of men whose reputations have hitherto been without reproach, it is impossible for the Judge to remain silent. It is not enough to say that a Judge should wait and set counsel right at the end of his address, but in a case like this it was impossible for the Judge to remain silent until the end in order to correct the impression that must have gone forth fatal to the honour and character of persons thus assailed, and which must have inflicted wounds which possibly never could have been healed. In ordinary cases, in the heat of argument, in the fervour of oratory, or in the zeal with which learned counsel engage in a case, the strict bounds of propriety will occasionally be overstepped, but for the honour of the Bar of England they are very rare indeed, and then a word or a hint from the Judge is sufficient to restrain overflowing zeal within its proper and legitimate bounds. Here the Judges have been assailed by continual disrespect and insult, and by covert allusions to Scroggs and Jeffreys, Judges of infamous repute, but if the spirit of those Judges had animated the present administrators of justice, the learned counsel would have speedily been laid by their heels. We have also been charged with interfering with the liberties and privileges of the Bar, but I will undertake to say there are no three Judges on the Bench to whom the liberty of the Bar is more dear and sacred than to my learned brothers and myself. We know full well that the freedom of the Bar is essential to the administration of justice, and it will be an evil day indeed for this country whenever it is interfered with. It might be argued that this single case is the single exception which, perhaps, would prove the rule—but is that so? What, interfere with the liberties of the Bar in checking the licence of unscrupulous abuse, in restraining remarks which amounted to misstatement and slander! The Bar is the most noble-minded and generous-spirited body in the world, and has never claimed the right to slander as one of their privileges or considered the restraint of undue licence an interference with their rights. Never, I trust, will slander be considered a weapon in their armoury to be used in their advocacy. Here unfortunately the living and the dead have been equally aspersed, and there never was, in the history of jurisprudence, a case in which so much invective and abuse have been used. I trust it will never occur again.

ASSIGNMENTS OF CHOSES IN ACTION BEFORE AND AFTER INSOLVENCY.

THERE has been some conflict of decision in recent years as to the claims of mortgagees and transferees of an insolvent before and after insolvency as against assignees, and the cases were reviewed in a decision given by Vice-Chancellor Hall last term in the case of Semphill v. The Queensland Sheep Investment Company (Limited). There the facts were these: Hickey, a domiciled Australian, agreed to sell an estate to the Queensland Company, but previously to the execution of the agreement he assigned half his interest under it to one Wright. Hickey became insolvent in Australia, and an official assignee was appointed there. Subsequently Wright gave notice to the company of his assignment, and afterwards the official assignee gave the company notice of the insolvency. The notice given by Wright was held to be inoperative as against the official assignee (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 737.) The position there will be seen to have been this: Notice given by Wright after the insolvency of Hickey, but before the official assignee had given notice of the insolvency. Notice having been given by Wright after the insolvency, could he be in as good a position as if he had given notice before the insolvency, simply because the official assignee delayed giving his notice until after Wright had given his? We shall briefly consider the authorities presently. Upon principle and the balance of authority the Vice-Chancellor came to the conclusion that notice after bankruptcy or insolvency is inoperative as against the bankrupt or insolvent, in the case of the party giving notice claiming under a title acquired previously to the bankruptcy or insolvency. His Honour said, "It would certainly be strange if such a person having omitted to give notice and thus left the property in the order and disposition of the bankrupt or insolvent, should be able immediately after the insolvency and bankruptcy to perfect his title and take from the general creditors that which he had led them to believe was the insolvent's or bankrupt's property and upon the faith of which the general creditors had dealt with him."

We quite agree with the learned Vice-Chancellor that "this would be against the spirit of the law, which is that persons who have unconscientiously intrusted the bankrupt with personal property under circumstances in which a false credit might be acquired in respect of such intrusting should, upon the bankruptcy, lose their their right to the property."

A word here about notice to assignees, which, in a collateral manner, affects the general question. Is there any necessity for an assignee of a bankrupt's interest, or a mortgagee of his property, to give notice to his trustee? Mr. Justice Willes pointed out in Cooke v. Hemming (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 772), what indeed, we think, has always been clear as a legal principle, that notice to assignees or trustees in bankruptcy is necessary only to defeat the reputed ownership clause in the Bankruptcy Act. Assignees or trustees are not in the position of subsequent purchasers for value without notice.

A prominent case on the general question is Stuart v. Cockerell (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442), where the tenant for life of a fund in court mortgaged his interest, and afterwards became bankrupt. After the bankruptcy the mortgagee obtained a stop order on the dividends; the assignee in bankruptcy did not obtain a stop order, and the mortgagee was held entitled to priority over the assignee in bankruptcy. Vice-Chancellor Malins, in giving judgment in that case, said: "It is clearly settled by a line of authorities ending with Bartlett v. Bartlett (1 De G. & J. 127), that if the assignee of a chose in action omits to give notice of the assignment to the debtor or trustee, or, in the case of a fund in court, to obtain a stop order, and the assignor becomes bankrupt, the chose in action remains in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the assignee, and passes to the assignee in bankruptcy. The Vice-Chancellor had previously decided Re Brown's Trusts (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 241), where one Brocklebank, in 1838, being entitled in right of his wife to a reversionary interest in a sum of stock standing in the names of trustees, became insolvent, and in the schedule of his assets filed under his insolvency he inserted such reversionary interest. No formal notice of the insolvency was ever given by the provisional assignee to the trustees of the fund, and no creditors' assignee was appointed until shortly before the hearing of the cause. In 1844 Brocklebank and his wife assigned the reversionary interest to a Mr. Burkitt to secure an annuity, and in 1849 mortgaged it to one Boston. Formal notice of these deeds was given to the trustees of the fund. Mrs. Brocklebank died in 1861, and the fund representing the reversionary interest being in court, a petition was presented by Boston for payment out. The Vice-Chancellor there said: "The true priuciple on which questions of priority depend is, that it is incumbent on all persons dealing with choses in action to do all that is in their power to perfect their title, and they do not do so unless they give notice to the persons in whose hands such property is." His Honour, said, moreover, "I think these questions of notice should not be left open to speculation, but that formal notice should be required," and he held that the mere fact of the trustees' solicitors knowing of the insolvency was not sufficient notice to the trustees to take the fund out of the disposition of the insolvent. The assignee was therefore postponed to the two mortgagees.

We may here mention that Vice-Chancellor Malins, in Re Russell's Policy Trusts (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 706) declined to follow an earlier case of Re Webb's Policy (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 529), and acted on Stuart v. Cockerell. In Webb's case it was decided that no act of an assignee for value of a chose in action done after the bankruptcy of the assignor can give effect to his assignment as against the assignees in bankruptcy, unless his title is perfected before the bankruptcy by notice to the legal holders of such chose in action. Stuart v. Cockerell, as we have seen, supports the proposition that by notice or a stop order subsequent to the bankruptcy the operation of the law as to reputed ownership may be prevented. In Re Russell's Policy Trusts a policy effected by A. on his life was mortgaged in 1860 without notice to the office. A. became bankrupt in 1862, and in 1868 joined in a transfer of the mortgage to B., who had no notice of the bankruptcy. After the death of A., B.'s solicitor gave notice to the office that this and other policies were mortgaged, and that he acted for the mortgagees, not naming them. Subsequently notice of the bankruptcy was given to the office. "The question is not," said his Honour, "between the assignee in bankruptcy and a general assignee, but between him and an assignee of the particular thing; and I can see no grounds for thinking that there is any difference between an assignee in bankruptcy and a particular assignee. The particular assignee loses priority by not giving notice, and the assignee in bankruptcy does the same thing."

Now as to these cases, Vice-Chancellor Hall points out that in Re Webb's Policy and in Stuart v. Cockerell, the assignments preceded the bankruptcy, and in Brown's Trusts and Russell's Policy Trusts, the assignment took place after the insolvency or bankruptcy, and His Honour said: "I apprehend a great distinction exists between a case in which the bankrupt or insolvent has made an assignment after the bankruptcy or insolvency, and a case in which he has done so previously to bankruptcy or insolvency. In the former case it may be that the bankrupt's or insolvent's assignee, having neglected to give notice, his title will be postponed. His omission to give notice enabled the bankrupt or insolvent to deal with the fund." There doubtless ought to be this distinction, and in Re Tichener (35 Beav. 317), where the assignment (which was by way of mortgage), preceded the bankruptcy, Lord Romilly held that the title of the bankrupt's assignee prevailed over the title of the mortgagee, although he gave notice, and in Bartlett v. Bartlett (1 De G. & J. 127), the assignee before bankruptcy who had given notice, was held not entitled as against the assignee in bankruptcy, although it does not appear that the assignee in bankruptcy had given notice.

Having thus considered all the cases, the conclusion of Vice-Chancellor Hall seems sound, as we have already given it, that notice after bankruptcy or insolvency is inoperative against the bankrupt or insolvent in the case of the party giving notice claiming under a title acquired previous to the bankruptcy or insolvency. And this is the view which in our issue of Feb. 1873 we expressed in opposition to the decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins in Stuart v. Cockerell.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—DAMAGE TO CARGO.

A RECENT decision of the High Court of Admiralty has reopened the question of the jurisdiction of that court under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6, over foreign vessels carrying goods into English ports. By that Act the court has "jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods or any part thereof by the negligence or misconduct of or for breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship." The only limitation to the jurisdiction expressly provided by the Act is, that if any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales the jurisdiction does not attach; otherwise the court may proceed in any such suit either in rem or in personam. It will be noticed that to confer the jurisdiction it is requisite that the goods should be "carried into any port in England or Wales," but as far as the plain meaning of the words is concerned, it is sufficient that the goods should be so carried; the Act does not in any way say that they are to be carried into such a port in pursuance of any contract, nor for the purpose of being there discharged. In spite, however, of the wideness of expression in the Act, various attempts have been made to limit the effect of the words just noticed.

In The Bahia (Bro. & Lush. 61), a foreign ship under charter to load goods abroad and deliver them abroad was forced into Ramsgate Harbour by stress of weather, and once there the master refused either to proceed to his destination or to deliver the cargo to the consignees at Ramsgate. The consignees thereupon instituted a suit in rem against the ship under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act. The shipowners entered an appearance under protest, and in the argument contended that the words "carried into any port" must mean "carried into any port under a contract by which the consignees were to finally discharge in that port." Dr. Lushington held, however, that as the master had brought the cargo into an English port and, whilst there was guilty of a breach of contract in refusing to proceed to his destination, the court had jurisdiction over the suit. The effect of this decision, it will be noticed, was to pronounce that the court had jurisdiction over a ship whose contract of carriage did not in any way require the performance in English territory or within the jurisdiction of the court; but at the same time the jurisdiction was conferred by a breach of the contract committed within the jurisdiction, viz., the refusal to proceed. Another case on the subject was The Kasan (Bro. & Lush. 1), in which it was held, that a ship, which had loaded in an English port under a charter-party by which she was to carry and deliver an outward cargo for the charterers and on her arrival outwards ship and carry another cargo for the charterers, to an English port, was not within the meaning of the Act in respect of the outward cargo, and that the charterers could not on her return to this country proceed against her in respect of that cargo, because the words of the section could not be held to apply to goods exported from this country. The reason of this decision is not very obvious, because if the section was intended to give a remedy against foreign shipowners, non-resident here, it can scarcely be said that an owner of goods suffering from a breach of contract in respect of a charter-party covering both an outward and a homeward voyage, is not entitled to the same remedy when the whole contract is completed, as another whose goods are carried between two foreign ports, and who comes within the jurisdiction by accident. In The Ironsides (Lush. 458), the goods had been transshipped abroad, and were brought home by another ship, and the original ship, with whose owners the contract was made, was subsequently arrested on her arrival in this country on another voyage. It was there held that to give the court jurisdiction the goods must have been carried into the English port by the ship against which proceedings were taken. This ruling, with a modification introduced by a subsequent decision, seems to follow necessarily on the wording of the statute, for the suit lies for breach of contract, &c. on the part of the owner of "the ship," that is to say the ship mentioned in the earlier part of the section, which carried the goods into port. It is to be regretted that the jurisdiction is so restricted for the reason already mentioned, but the correctness of the ruling can scarcely be disputed. Not long after the above case the question again arose in The Danzig (Bro. & Lush. 107). There the master had in the course of his voyage thrown overboard part of the cargo, and it was objected that as the breach of contract alleged was in respect of this jettison, the goods could not be said to have been "carried into" port. Dr. Lushington, however, held that the words "carried into" must be read "carried or to be carried into" port. This decision, it would seem, was based entirely upon the fact that there was a contract by which the owner was bound to carry the goods into port, and that he broke this contract. It is true that part of the goods were carried into port under the contract, but still this case seems somewhat inconsistent with the last cited, because if the section covers goods "to be carried into" an English port, it ought to have covered the goods that were "to be carried into" port in the Ironsides, but were not. However, it may be said that there is a distinction between a case where a ship performs its contract in part by bringing the rest of the cargo to its destination, and the other where the contract is completed by a totally different vessel, and the delinquent ship never comes within the jurisdiction of the court at all in the performance of its contract. The decision in the Bahia was followed by the present learned Judge of the Admiralty Court in one of the cases arising out of the late Franco-German war (The Patria, 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 849), where a master bound from America to Hamburgh put into Falmouth, and refused to proceed or to deliver at Falmouth.

From these decisions the following deductions are to be made: First, that for the purpose of giving jurisdiction it is not necessary that there should be a contract to deliver in England, provided that there is a carrying into an English port and a breach of contract there; secondly, that the carrying into port must be from a foreign (that is, not an English or Welsh) port; thirdly, that the ship, with whose owners the contract was made, must carry the goods or part thereof into port.

This being the state of the decided cases, the Court of Admiralty has recently had before it the question whether a carrying into an English port, the breach of contract charged not having occurred in that port, and the ship not being arrested at that time, but on its return on a subsequent voyage, would confer jurisdiction. In The Pieve Superiore (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 702) it appeared that a shipowner had entered into a charter-party, by which he contracted to carry a cargo from Rangoon to any port in Great Britain or on the Continent, between Havre and Hamburg, as ordered, at one of several ports of call named, and to be selected by the master. Some of these ports of call were within the jurisdiction, others without. The master called at Falmouth for orders, and was duly sent to Hamburg, where he sent and delivered his cargo. On his return to Cardiff to load under another contract, the ship was arrested for breach of the former charter-party. It was objected that there was no carrying into an English port within the meaning of the Act; it was said that Falmouth, not being the port of destination, and there having been no breach of contract there, no jurisdiction accrued to the Court of Admiralty. Sir R. Phillimore held, however, that within the plain and ordinary meaning of the words of the Act, there was a carrying into an English port in pursuance of the charter-party, and that hence the court had jurisdiction. From this decision, there is now pending an appeal to the Privy Council, but as it is a pure question of law there can be no impropriety in calling attention to it.

The object of the statute is plain: it was intended to give a remedy to owners and consignees of goods brought here by ships whose owners did not reside in England. Formerly when a ship arrived in this country and discharged her cargo, in whatever condition it might be, and by whosever negligence it had got into that condition, she might leave the country without the unfortunate consignee having any remedy. It was useless to sue the master, and to attack the owners it would have been necessary to seek them out in their own place of residence. To remedy this evil the right of arresting the ship was conferred on the consignee, and this, of course, had the effect of compelling the shipowner to enter an appearance in a court here. Consignees no doubt have the right of bringing an action at common law in such cases, but then they cannot make the process of the court touch the delinquents. The arrest of the ship was necessary to give a full and complete remedy. The reason and good sense of this is obvious when applied to cases where the ship discharges or commits a breach of contract within the jurisdiction, and a little consideration will show it to be no less so when the ship comes during the performance of her contract in any way within the jurisdiction. In the first place it should be remembered that it is only consignees resident in England who are likely to take the benefit of the operation of the Act; secondly, any contract by virtue of which a master puts into an English port for orders, will be generally, if not always, an English contract; thirdly, the trade between England and the northern ports, is so great that for the purposes of commerce and the tribunals regulating that commerce, there ought to be equal facility of obtaining redress in any place where the consignee is able to sue; fifthly, the mere coming into port with the cargo is a submission to the English jurisdiction, which clearly ought, by the principle of reciprocity to give jurisdiction, on the ground that almost every nation in the world would, under similar circumstances, exercise the jurisdiction. It must be remembered that the procedure, in maritime matters at least, of all other nations than our own, is founded upon the civil law, which allows the proceeding in rem; hence in any continental or American port the ship would be arrested for breach of contract. This is a sufficient reason why, so long as the words of the statute allow it, the jurisdiction should be upheld. English consignees ought to have their remedy, even if they order their goods to be delivered abroad, and foreign shipowners ought not to be exempt from a process to which English ships are liable abroad. We can only express our hope that the Court of Appeal may see fit to confirm the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty.

GIFTS TO ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN.

THE limits of the application of the rule or maxim of law, "Qui damnato coitu nascuntur inter liberos non computentur," have been defined, and to a great extent settled by a long series of recent cases, the general tendency of which, undoubtedly, is to admit illegitimate children to participate in the bounty of a donor or testator under expressions in a deed or will, or under extrinsic circumstances, which formerly would have been deemed inadequate for the purpose. From the decisions in Wilkinson v. Adam (1 Ves. & B. 422), and Beachcroft v. Beachcroft (1 Mad. 430)—to go back no further—down to that in Occleston v. Fullalove, decided during the present week, this general tendency may be clearly traced. By the case of Crook v. Hill (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 488), one of the most valuable of the series, and subsequent to our remarks (LAW TIMES, vol. l. p. 495) on the decision therein by the Lords Justices, affirmed by the House of Lords, two points were made clear: First, that though the intention to include illegitimate children must be inferrable with certainty, by that expression is meant only moral as distinguished from mathematical or metaphysical certainty, i.e., in point of fact a certainty appearing as such to a judicial mind; and secondly, that though future illegitimate children might be capable of taking as a class under the gift, that circumstance would not, per se, be conclusive against the admission of existing illegitimate children to participation.

The recent case of Occleston v. Fullalove, decided by the Lords Justices in opposition to the Lord Chancellor, carries this tendency in favour of illegitimate children to a length which we believe will be a surprise in the Profession. Occleston v. Fullalove was an appeal from a decision of the late Vice-Chancellor Wickens, which will be found reported 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 615. It was elaborately argued before the full Court of Appeal in December last and judgment, which had been reserved, was delivered on the 26th inst. The facts briefly stated were these: James Occleston, by his will of the 9th July 1868, directed his trustees to pay a moiety of the rents and profits of his real and personal estate to his sister-in-law, Margaret Lewis, for life, and after her decease to stand possessed of a moiety of his said estates "for his reputed children, C. Occleston and E. Occleston, and all other the children which he might have, or be reported to have, by the said Margaret Lewis, then born, or thereafter to be born," at twenty-one or marriage. Margaret Lewis, with whom James Occleston had gone through the ceremony of marriage, was the sister of James Occleston's deceased wife. At the date of the will the two children named were living, and a third child, with whom Margaret Lewis was then pregnant, was born afterwards in the testator's lifetime. The Vice-Chancellor, following the view taken by Lord Romilly in Pratt v. Matthew (22 Beav. 328), held that the child born after the date of the will was not entitled to participate.

On the appeal the Lord Chancellor, while fully recognising that an illegitimate child en ventre sa mère at the date of the will might have taken, if aptly described, considered that, as in the case of Pratt v. Matthew, the child in question was only described as one of the class of future reputed children, and was not a persona designata at all. That also, as far as we can gather, was the view of the Lords Justices. The real difficulty and the real importance of the case, therefore, centred on the question whether all the reputed illegitimate children of the testator who might have come into existence prior to the testator's death could be allowed to participate. In other words, whether the date of the will or the death of the testator was the point of time to be regarded. The Lord Chancellor asserts that for the purpose of determining whether a devise or bequest in favour of illegitimate children contravenes public policy, the date of the will must be regarded. The Lords Justices say that the will being totally inoperative during the life of the testator, and its contents possibly or probably known to himself alone, no rule of public policy can be infringed, and that the will is of precisely the same force and effect as if it had been re-executed and re-attested at the last moment of the testator's life, and that all the children who had then acquired the reputation of being the testator's would be entitled. They admit agreeing with the Lord Chancellor that a provision by deed in favour of future illegitimate children would be void, as tending to facilitate concubinage and the procreation of bastards, but deny that a provision by will would have a similar tendency. They do not, however, appear to be able to adduce a single authority in which such a distinction has been acted on or even hinted at, which the decision of Lord Macclesfield in Metham v. The Duke of Devon (1 P. W. 529) seems entirely adverse.

The conflicting judgments of the Lord Chancellor and his coadjutors will be read with great interest. That of the Lord Chancellor strikes us as being a clear, calm, and altogether admirable statement of the law on the subject. We say of the law, for we believe that the question raised in Occleston v. Fullalove, if carried before the ultimate Court of Appeal, will be decided in accordance with the views of Lord Romilly, Vice-Chancellor Wickens, and Lord Selborne. We hold that the law will not contemplate the procreation of future illegitimate children, or allow them as such, to be the objects of bounty.

We hold that on the expressions of the particular will and the surrounding circumstances, the testator intended a gift to illegitimate children who were reputably his; that, as Lord Colonsay says, it is impossible to provide for future illegitimate children as such "by any form of words," that the testator made the gift to his "reputed children," because of his paternity, and because he was assured that they would not gain the reputation of being his children without being so in reality—such children being by reason of the affinity between himself and Margaret Lewis necessarily illegitimate; that a provision for such children by will differs only in degree and not in its essential nature from a gift by deed; that a testator sitting down to provide for future concubinage and its probable results, must be considered as doing so turpi animo, and contemplating—perhaps to some extent compounding with his own conscience for—a course of conduct which if he chooses to contemplate, the law will not, but will do all in its power to discountenance. We hold, however, that where a will is made in favour of a class of future children, it is a perverse mode of construction to take the death of the testator as a standpoint, and then to read the will as if it had been re-executed or confirmed by codicil at the testator's death, and by this process, ingenious, but as we think wholly unwarranted, to convert a gift to a class of future illegitimate children who as such cannot take, into a gift to existing individuals who can. For certain purposes no doubt a will is read as if executed at the death of the testator; this, however, is not one of them. In order to ascertain the intention of the testator as to the objects of his bounty, and the mode in which they are to receive it, the court has not merely to sit in the testator's chair for the purpose of ascertaining his intention, but in so sitting must take its survey at the same point of time as the testator took his—i. e., at the date of his will, and not at any other time, before or after. The opinion of the Lord Chancellor is fortified by the opinions of Lords Chelmsford and Colonsay in Crook v. Hill. No doubt as Lord Justice James remarks, the opinions were obiter dicta, but those learned lords would in all probability act on them if ever Occleston v. Fullalove or a similar case presents itself for their decision.

LAW LIBRARY.

Shelford's Real Property Statutes. Eighth edition. By THOMAS H. CARSON, M.A., of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law. London: Sweet, Maxwell and Son, and Stevens and Sons.

MR. CARSON exercised a wise discretion when he determined not to increase the bulk of this very useful standard work. Whilst adding new material which was absolutely essential, he has either entirely got rid of what was old and of little use, or reduced it so as to give him space for the additions which the growth of case law and statute law render necessary.

On more than one occasion when we have had to review works which are similar in their plan to the one before us, we have remarked how little there is to be said. No work can call for less ability of a high order than annotating Acts of Parliament: industry and a capacity to express concisely what cases have decided are all that is required. An excellent specimen of Mr. Carson's work is the Partition Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 40), p. 746; but when we say that the case law is intelligently noted up, we can give Mr. Carson no higher praise. Throughout the volume we trace the hand of a careful editor, and whilst it is quite out of our power to say whether he had gleaned all the learning which the reports furnish, we think it may be taken on trust that the work is perfect. Lawyers owe to conscientious editors a very great deal, and if Mr. Carson cannot lay claim to the rewards of an original writer, he may console himself with the reflection that he has rendered a considerable service to the profession, and probably stored up for application in practice a fund of learning on real property law. At the opening of the work is a table of contents, and the volume is closed by a clear and full index.

Stephen's New Commentaries on the Laws of England. Seventh edition. By JAMES STEPHEN, Esq., LL.D., Judge of County Courts. London: Butterworths.

WE have in this work an old and valued friend. For years we have had the last (sixth) edition upon our shelves, and we can state as a fact that when our text books on particular branches of the law have failed us, we have always found that Stephen's Commentaries have supplied us with the key to what we sought, if not the actual thing we required. We think that these Commentaries establish one important proposition—that to be of thorough practical utility a treatise on English law cannot be reduced within a small compass. The subject is one which must be dealt with comprehensively, and abridgment, except merely for the purposes of elementary study, is a decided blunder.

Serjeant Stephen gives us as heretofore four goodly volumes, and when we say that, aided by an industrious son, he has devoted the leisure, which is not inconsiderable in the life of a County Court Judge, to the labour of bringing down his authorities to the present year, incorporating as far as possible the provisions of the Judicature Act, it will be understood that the work is one of great present value. We are glad to see a County Court Judge employed in keeping the world well informed on English law, on the two-fold ground that a Judge will probably take more pains with his work than members of the Bar, and that his own decisions will benefit by his familiarity with the progress of our jurisprudence.

Of the scope of the Commentaries we need say nothing. To all who profess acquaintance with the English law their plan and execution must be thoroughly familiar. The learned author has made one conspicuous alteration, confining "Civil Injuries" within the compass of one volume, and commencing the last volume with "Crimes"—and in that volume he has placed a table of statutes. In every respect the work is improved, and the present writer can say, from practical experience, that for the student and the practitioner there is no better work published than Stephen's Commentaries.

PATENT LAW.

Sellers v. Dickinson. 1850.—Per Pollock, C.J.: The specification should be met with candour and indulgence. Per Rolfe, B.: The court should read a specification as a person of ordinary understanding would do, not loosely conjecturing anything, but, at the same time, not scanning it as if it were a special plea. (5 Ex. 312.)

Wallington v. Dale. 1852.—The sufficiency of the description of an invention contained in a specification is a question for the jury. (7 Ex. 888.)

Heath v. Unwin, Ex. Ch. 1852.—Coleridge, C.J., in the course of his judgment, said: "The specification, to be perfect, must be taken to specify impliedly all the chemical equivalents of those chemical means expressly stated for producing the promised result, which were at the time of specifying known to ordinarily skilled chemists or to the patentee himself; the latter of these seems to me to be as necessary as the former. If the inventor of an alleged discovery, knowing of two equivalent agents for effecting the end, could by the disclosure of one preclude the public from the benefit of the other, he might for his own profit force upon the public an expensive and difficult process, keeping back the simple and cheap one, which would be directly contrary to the good faith required from every patentee in his communication with the public." Alderson, B., said: "Every specification is to be read as if by persons acquainted with the general facts of the mechanical or chemical sciences involved in such invention. Thus, if a particular mechanical process is specified, and there are for some parts of it as specified, other well-known mechanical equivalents, the specification of those parts is in truth a specification of the well-known equivalent also, to those to whose general knowledge we refer, namely, mechanics, and readers of specifications; and so it is with chemical equivalents also in a specification which is to be read by chemists. But it may be that there are equivalents, mechanical and chemical, existing, but previously unknown to ordinary skilful mechanics and chemists. These are not included in the specification, but must be expressly stated there. (2 Web. P. C. 243, 245.)

Crogsley v. Potter. N. P. 1853.—Pollock, C.B. said: "This patent is taken out for the making of coach lace, carpets, velvets, and velveteens of all sorts, and it must be competent to do all and every part of that work, by the means stated in the specification, otherwise the patent is not good. . . . . A patent for an invention which is merely to obstruct every subsequent improvement, which is to step in and prevent the exercise of the ingenuity of mankind and the introduction of other inventions adapted to the particular subject to which the invention may be applicable—a patent which has for its object to snatch and grasp at everything in all directions which may possibly come within the general language the patentee may choose to adopt in his specification—a patent, the object of which is, not to benefit the world by its communication, but to obstruct, by the very general character of the claims made for conferring peculiar privileges on the patentee; such a patent as that, in my judgment, cannot be supported. . . . . The safest course for patentees to adopt in framing their specifications is, instead of including everything, to confine themselves specifically to one good thing, and a jury will always take care that if that be a real invention, no man, under colour of improvement, shall be allowed to interfere with that which is the offspring of their genius." (Macrory's P. C. 239.)

Hastings v. Brown. 1853.—A specification in a patent, for a particular construction of windlasses, stated that the object was "to hold, without slipping, a chain cable of any size." Before the date of the patent constructions were known by which a windlass might be made to hold a single chain cable of any assigned size. Held, that the specification did not unequivocally show that the object was to construct a single windlass which might hold different chain cables, whatever their size, and that such a windlass was therefore not protected by the patent. (1 E. & B. 450; 22 L. J. Q. B. 161.)

Bush v. Fox, H. L. 1856.—In an action for an alleged infringement of a patent, where the defence is that the supposed invention is not new, the judge may compare the plaintiff's specification with the specification of a previous patent, and may on such comparison direct the jury to find a verdict. (5 H. L. C. 707; Macrory's P. C. 183.)

Bovill v. Pimen. 1856.—Pollock, C.B., in the course of delivering the judgment of the court in this case, said: It appears to us that where a subject is not new, as this certainly was not, viz., "the cooling of substances undergoing the process of grinding" (which had been long known to be a desideratum in grinding, and to effect which various contrivances had been adopted, and several, if not many, patents taken out), any patent taken out for a method of performing the operation is substantially confined to that method, and cannot be extended to other methods obviously different, because they involve some common principle applied to the common object, and may apparently be described by the same general phrase. (11 Ex. 739.)

Booth v. Kennard. 1857.—Action for the infringement of a patent for "Improvements in the Manufacture of Gas." The specification stated the invention to "consist in the direct use of seeds, leaves, flowers, branches, nuts, fruit, and other substances and matters containing oil, or oily or resinous matter." The specification also stated "that the mode of using seed and constructing the apparatus used under this my patent in preparing gas may be the same as the apparatus used in the ordinary mode of making gas with coal." The claim was as follows: "I claim for making gas direct from seeds and matter herein named for practical illuminations or other useful purposes, instead of making it from the oils, resins, or gums, previously extracted from such substances." A previous patentee had, by his specification, proposed, for the manufacture of gas, to use fatty substances, such as greaves or graves; also the residuum after the oil had been expressed from seeds, such as oil cake; also beech nuts, mast, cocoa nuts, and other matters abounding in oil, and he proposed to use these substances separately and in combination. Held, first, upon the authority of Bush v. Fox, that as the want of novelty in the plaintiff's invention appeared clearly from the two specifications in evidence, it was for the court, and not for the jury, to determine the identity of the two supposed inventions. Secondly, that the claim, being merely for making gas direct from seeds and matter stated in the specification, without reference to any method of doing it, was too large and general, and could not be supported. (2 H. & N. 84; 26 L. J. N.S., Ex. 305.)

Thomas v. Foxwell. 1858.—Lord Campbell, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, said: "We by no means lay down, as a general rule, that upon a question of novelty of invention such as this, raised by the comparison of two specifications, it must necessarily be a pure question of law for the court. The specifications may contain expressions of art and commerce, upon which experts must be examined, and there may be conflicting evidence raising a question of fact to be determined by the jury. But it is quite clear that there may be cases in which the court would be bound to decide the question of novelty exclusively; for the two specifications might be, in ipsissimis verbis, the same; and if they be in such plain and common language that the judge is sure he understands their meaning, he is bound to construe them as he does other written documents. (5 Jur. N.S. 38.).

Lister v. Leather. 1858.—A patent for a combination is not a claim that each part thereof is new: (8 E. & B. 1004; 3 Jur. N. S. 811.) Affirmed on appeal to the Exchequer Chamber. Held, also, that a patent is a patent for a combination, if a combination is distinctly stated in the specification to be a part of the invention, although the combination is not expressly claimed; for a claim is not an essential to a specification, or necessary for the protection of the invention. Nor is it necessary to disclaim those matters which manifestly form no part of the invention: (8 E. & B. 1004; 27 L. J., N. S., 295, Q. B..).

The Patent Type Founding Company v. Richards. Ch. 1859.—The specification of an invention, which consists in the use of known materials in new proportions, is not necessarily bad for uncertainty, though the patentee does not limit himself to the precise proportions recommended. The patentee is bound, according to the authorities, to state what he considers the best proportions. A specification stated in substance, that the usual practice in the manufacture of type was to employ lead and antimony, and in some cases to add a small per centage of tin; that the object of the invention was to obtain tougher metal by employing tin in large proportions with antimony, greatly reducing or wholly omitting the use of lead; that the best proportions were seventy-five of tin and twenty-five of antimony, but that this might be, to some extent, varied; and that, if lead were used, it must not exceed fifty per cent. of the whole, one part of antimony to three of tin, or tin and lead, being the best. Held, on demurrer, that the specification was not bad on the face of it for uncertainty, and that the evidence of persons acquainted with the usual modes of manufacture was necessary to determine whether the invention was stated with sufficient precision. (1 John Rep. 381; 6 Jur. N. S. 39.)

Thomas v. Foxwell. Ex. Ch. 1859.—The patentee of a sewing machine, in his specification, claimed "the application of a shuttle in combination with a needle, as shown in sheet 1, for forming and sewing loops of thread or other substance, for the purpose of producing stitches either to unite or ornament fabrics, whatever may be the means employed for working such shuttle and needle when employed together." By a disclaimer he stated, "I do not claim the use in a machine of several needles and shuttles, nor do I claim any of the mechanical parts separately of which the machinery shown in the drawing is composed." Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench), that the claim was not confined to the single application of a shuttle in combination with a needle, as shown in sheet 1, but extended generally to the application of a shuttle with a needle, for attaining the object therein stated. (6 Jur. N. S. 271.)

Hills v. The London Gas Light Company. 1860.—In a patent for an improved mode of manufacturing gas the plaintiff claimed a mode of purifying gas by means of "hydrated or precipitated oxides of iron." Held, that this included only precipitated hydrates. Bramwell, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, said: "The next objection was that the plaintiff's specification was insufficient on this ground. He says: 'I use the hydrated or precipitated oxides.' It was said that included all hydrated oxides, and inasmuch as some of the natural hydrated oxides would not do, the plaintiff's specification was bad. Now, that question turns upon this: If the plaintiff in his specification means all the hydrated oxides, it is open to that objection; but if he means only those hydrated oxides which are also precipitated,—that is, the artificial hydrated oxides—it is not open to that objection. It may be said that the language is in any sense ungrammatical, and that hydrated or precipitated—the whole or the part—cannot be right. To say, 'The works of Shakespeare, or Hamlet and King Lear,' would obviously be an inaccuracy, which cannot be judged by the ordinary rules of grammar, and therefore we must endeavour to find out the proper meaning of this inaccurate expression. It appears to us, upon looking at the specification, that the plaintiff uses those equivalent expressions, because he says 'hydrated or precipitated,' and that oxide of iron may be conveniently prepared for these purposes, and so on; and therefore it is obvious that when he uses that word hydrated, he uses it as synonymous with precipitated; and consequently, when he speaks of using hydrated or precipitated oxides, he means such hydrated oxides as are precipitated." Upon the comparison of two specifications, the same learned judge says: "We hold that there are certain cases in which, upon the mere collocation of the two specifications, or the specification of a patent and a previous written document, the court may say that the patentee has been anticipated. Undoubtedly that is so; the process may be described in identically the same words, or, if there be a variety in the words, there may be no variety in the process. Probably it will be found that in the case of what are called mechanical patents, the court can do so more readily than in the case of chemical patents, or in other cases where the invention depends on what may be called the occult qualities of matter, those in fact which are not the subject of popular knowledge." (5 H. & N. 363, 368; 29 L. J., N. S., 421, 424., Ex.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

WE are very glad to notice that in addition to those solicitors who sat in the Commons House of Parliament last session, and who again seek re-election, two others are seeking election at the approaching Parliamentary contests. Even now it is not too late for others to take the field in some of those small constituencies in which a candidate appearing upon the scene at the eleventh hour has, almost as much to his own surprise as that of his supporters, found himself successful. None better than solicitors know that if they can only secure a fair representation in the House of Commons, the many ills that their branch of the Profession is heir to will speedily cease to be, and we shall hear no more of the meekness with which they have endured their exclusion from judicial offices, their subordination to the other branch, and their exile from the dignity of and the most solid rewards in connection with the legal profession.

THE following lectures and classes are appointed for the ensuing week, at the Law Institution, for the instruction of students seeking admission on the Roll of Attorneys and Solicitors: Monday, 2nd Feb., class, 4.30 to 6 p.m., Conveyancing; Tuesday and Wednesday, ditto; Friday, 6th Feb., lecture, 6 to 7 p.m. To prevent interruption at lectures, subscribers are not admitted to the hall after lectures have commenced.

ON Wednesday, the President and Council of the Incorporated Law Society dined at their hall in Chancery-lane. Among the guests present were Sir Barnes Peacock, Baron Pollock, Baron Amphlett, Mr. Sheriff Johnson, Mr. Joseph Brown, Q.C., and Mr. G. Little, Q.C. The Lord Mayor, and Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Whetham, who had accepted invitations were prevented from attending by engagements connected with the pending election.

A LONDON solicitor, writing to us on the subject of the improper advertisements (in relation to the legal Profession) which find their way into newspapers which it might fairly be expected would not insert them, observes, "There was a certain class of advertisement of quack doctors which used to appear, but which respectable papers refuse to insert. They were physically dirty Those invitations to the Profession which you so often and properly expose are morally nearly as bad." The following seems to indicate that this kind of thing is beyond all question on the increase. We take the advertisement from a Surrey newspaper:—

LEGAL ASSISTANCE.—Messrs. P. and V., land agents and accountants, are prepared to carry out and conduct liquidations and arrangements with creditors upon reasonable terms, without publicity; bankruptcy, or suspension of business, also all actions and executions, whether in the Superior or County Courts, immediately stayed by injunction. Chancery, divorce, probate suits, and common law actions, conducted with dispatch, and County Coutrs attended; wills, leases, assignments, and agreements prepared; money advanced on mortgage, reversions, bills of sale, &c., and debts collected at five per cent.—Apply to P. and V., W.C.

For the credit of the Profession some means ought to be devised for checking the practices of such persons as the advertisers.

BEALL v. SMITH.

WE regret that in a letter from Mr. Heather which appeared in our last issue on the subject of this case, some intemperate expressions were used, casting serious reflection upon professional gentlemen who had been opposed to him. We inserted the letter as emanating from a solicitor of twenty-eight years' standing, with less regard to the phraseology than we should have given to ordinary correspondence, and the objectionable passages certainly escaped our observation. Mr. Albert Turner and Mr. White, who are mentioned by Mr. Heather, are entitled at our hands to the explanation that no reflection was cast upon them by either Vice-Chancellor Wickens or the Lords Justices. We certainly concur with Mr. Turner that under these circumstances the strictures which were inadvertently admitted into our columns under Mr. Heather's signature may be treated with that indifference which sweeping accusations inconsistent with recorded judgments deserve. Considering the case of decided importance to the Profession, we treated it elaborately, and found no cause for casting injurious reflections upon Messrs. Merriman or Mr. A. Turner and Mr. White, who were concerned with them. Mr. Heather's letter must be taken, therefore, to be the heated production of an irritated opponent, and, for our part, we should have been glad had the strong expressions which he used not appeared in our columns.

We have received the following communication from Messrs. Merriman and Powell, which we trust may, so far as the Profession is concerned, close this correspondence:

SIR,—Although nothing is further from our wish than to have any personal controversy with Mr. Heather, we cannot allow the letter which appeared in your last issue to remain unanswered, as there is no single statement which is entirely accurate, and several of them are directly opposite to the sworn testimony filed in the Court of Chancery, upon which perjury might be assigned, but which had not even met with responsible contradiction, that is, by counter affidavit.

The first allegations of Mr. Heather are a denial that we were employed by Mr. Beall in November 1870, and that he never consulted us about undertaking some complicated matters in which he (Mr. Heather) was engaged. Our call book, letter books, and cheques show that we did act for him at and from that time. The affidavit of Mr. Dunfee, a friend, who had known him twenty years, and a former client of ours, shows that Mr. Beall came to us because he was dissatisfied with Mr. Heather. Mr. Merriman's affidavit states that Mr. Beall did propose to remove his general business from Mr. Heather, but from a general dislike to take business away from another solicitor's office, he declined to do so. We may add that letters addressed to us by our unfortunate client since his incarceration up to a very recent date, betray a strong aversion to Mr. Heather, and a belief rightly or wrongly that that gentleman had not acted properly by him.

The statement that we were not instructed with reference to his unhappy family differences is further contradicted by the affidavit of Mr. Powell, who during Mr. Merriman's absence on business in Paris went down in obedience to an urgent message, to Mr. Beall's residence, at Sydenham, one evening to meet Mr. Heather, and arrange an amicable adjustment of family differences. Mr. Heather is, however, welcome to the admission of the fact that by this time the domestic troubles of this unfortunate gentleman, with his wife and two sons, were so bitter that he may be said to have moved between our office and that of Mr. Heather in bewilderment and agony — desiring above all things to recover the affections of his wife, and that an end might be put to serious personal conflicts between himself and his sons. We say again, emphatically, that more in the capacity of friend than solicitor (for, as several persons knew, Mr. Merriman deeply sympathised with Mr. Beall) he spent many anxious hours with him, listening to sad and distressing details of family feuds. Mr. Merriman uniformly advised Mr. Beall not to concur in a separation by his wife, as there appeared to be no real or sufficient ground for it, and it was only in the absence of Mr. Merriman, who chiefly attended to Mr. Beall's affairs, that Mr. Powell took his positive instructions touching a deed of separation.

Mr. Heather makes in his letter, as well as in his affidavit and in the petition, slight and passing, not to say contemptuous reference to Mr. Merriman's appearance "thrice before the magistrate" for Mr. Beall. Your readers will be able to put a fair construction upon the surrounding and underlying circumstances of these three appearances. Mr. Heather was there also. Mr. Beall dreaded the presence of Mr. Heather, and it is not to be denied that Mr. Heather procured the doctors to give medical testimony for locking him up in an asylum; while, on the contrary, Mr. Beall's confidence and reliance were placed in Mr. Merriman, who struggled hard to prevent his being sent to the asylum. Mr. Maude, the magistrate, and the two doctors are aware Mr. Merriman contended to the last that Mr. Beall's case was one of temporary mental aberration, or insanity in its initial, acute, and easily curable stages. Mr. Beall was removed to Dr. Wood's Asylum, Mr. Merriman giving in the end only a reluctant consent, when Dr. Wood said that he was far from thinking that Beall's case was an incurable one. Whose visits after that were the sole indications of human sympathy available to this poor man? Mr. Merriman, on Mr. Beall's invitations, was the only person who visited him until these visits were prohibited by the doctor, with the concurrence of Mr. Heather and the person who had officiously made himself responsible for his maintenance in the asylum—the eldest son and present committee to his estate. Neither wife, child (nor of course Mr. Heather), called upon him for some time, and this gentleman of considerable property was left without simple luxuries and some common necessaries.

We may next refer to the charge that "Merriman, Albert Turner, and White then concocted the suit." What truth there is in this mendacious assertion is shown in an uncontradicted affidavit. Mr. White knew nothing of the suit until the bill had been filed. It is fair to Mr. Albert Turner to say that he conferred with us as to what was best to be done, and what is called the "concoction" of the suit, was the result of the best thoughts of two conscientious solicitors, after advice upon a full and clear statement of the facts by two equity counsel.

We do not think it worth while to overlay your columns by any reference to the statements about the next friend. The next friend would have been Mr. Dunfee, a friend of twenty years' standing, who had, more than any other living being, the confidence of Mr. Beall, but that gentleman's health was at the time not good, and he suggested that we should find somebody else. We, however, fully accept the moral responsibility of the action taken in this matter, and have all along avowed that the next friend was asked by us to accept that post. His circumstances are, however, extravagantly misstated by Mr. Heather, and the contradiction of this matter, as on others, is also embodied in two affidavits which remain unanswered.

It is a remarkable thing that Mr. White was appointed receiver, with the concurrence of Mr. Heather, and that Mr. Heather's son and partner who attended the sale of the stock, admitted, as was the fact, that an unusually good sale had been effected.

Mr. Heather is just as inaccurate in his figures as other things. The sum which we have temporarily to find, is a heavy one, but it does not nearly reach £1000, as he states. Whatever the costs of winding-up the estate may have been, we are at all events not property responsible for their amount. The suit has been held by the Vice-Chancellor and Lords Justices to have been properly commenced, and it was indeed the only mode in which the property of Mr. Beall could be protected from utter waste. Our own costs, for which we are willing to be held accountable, were £207 6s. 5d. But again what need, on this account, of an appeal from the late Wickens, V.C.'s decision? If the manager or clerk of Mr. Beall's business received £50 more than he ought to have done, and the accountant and receiver's charges which had been allowed by the court upon affidavit and full information had been improperly paid, the order of the Vice-Chancellor, which gave leave to falsify accounts, would have rectified such mistake or wrong; but we must still add the mistake, or the wrong, cannot in any way be laid to our door, as we fully informed the chief clerk, and that officer satisfied himself by evidence as to the charges and the need for the accountant's work.

We close this letter, which is made longer than it otherwise would be, because, unlike Mr. Heather, we do not indulge in round statements, but prefer to appeal to fact and evidence in every instance.

One other circumstance must weigh with all reasoning men. The bill was filed 15th Aug. 1871, Mr. Beall was found lunatic 25th March 1872. We always expected, and do now hope, that Mr. Beall may regain his liberty, and call upon us for the justification of the course we adopted on his behalf. We have no fear of meeting our real client.

Perhaps Mr. Heather would also like the admission from us that after the proceedings before the police magistrate, when Mr. Beall was sent to the asylum at the instance of his family, Mr. Heather was regarded in the light of an adverse party; that we did not consider his firm were persons to be taken into our confidence, and that we did not look upon them as people having a right to control our actions.—Yours obediently,

MERRIMAN AND POWELL.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Monday, Jan. 26.

THOMSON v. FLYNN.

County Court Equity Jurisdiction—Value of Property Exceeding £500—Plaint Dismissed—Cause should have been transferred to the Court of Chancery.

THIS case, which was an appeal from the Lambeth County Court, had a bearing of some importance upon a point of County Court practice. The suit was instituted by plaint in the County Court for the partition of a house, 22, Camberwell Park. the plaint containing an allegation that the value of the house was under 500*l.* On the case coming on for hearing, the defendant's counsel raised a preliminary objection to its being heard on the ground that the property to which it related exceeded the statutable value, and in support of the objection a surveyor was examined and cross-examined who swore that the value was over 500*l.* Thereupon the County Court judge found as a fact that the property exceeded in value 500*l.*, and, acting under sect. 14 of the County Court Act, 1867, dismissed the plaint with costs. No application was made on the part of the plaintiff to have the cause transferred to the Court of Chancery. The plaintiff now appealed. The question for the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor was whether the County Court judge was at liberty to make the order dismissing the plaint, or whether he was bound, by the prior Act of 1865, sect. 9, "to direct the said suit to be transferred to the Court of Chancery," it having been ascertained, "during the progress of the suit," that the subject matter exceeded 500*l.* in value.

Cotton, Q.C., and P. L. Wilkinson, for the appellant, contended that, as the value of the property exceeded 500*l.*, it was the duty of the County Court judge, instead of dismissing the suit, to have transferred the matter to the Court of Chancery. The 14th section of the Act of 1867, which provided that, "whenever an action or suit is brought in a County Court which the court has no jurisdiction to try, the judge shall order the cause to be struck out," was controlled by sect. 9 of the Act of 1865, which made it imperative on the judge to direct the cause to be transferred.

Glasse, Q.C., and Cozens Hardy appeared in support of the order of the court below.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he had heard nothing to raise any doubt that the statement in the plaint that the value of the property was below 500*l.* was believed by the plaintiff to be true; but on the plaint coming on for hearing a witness was called who swore that the value was above 500*l.*, and on that evidence the learned County Court judge came to the conclusion that it was in fact worth more than 500*l.* It was therefore clear that his jurisdiction was at an end. Then the question arose, What was his proper course to take? The Vice-Chancellor was clearly of opinion that an application ought to have been made on the part of the plaintiff to the County Court judge, under sect. 9 of the Act of 1865, to transfer the suit to this court; but that was not done. The case was similar to that of Birks v. Silverwood, before him in 1872 (L. Rep. 14, Eq. 101), when he decided that the County Court judge, having, during the progress of the suit, ascertained that the value of the property was over £500, and having, accordingly, directed the suit to be transferred to this court, had performed his duty in so doing. But it had been contended by Mr. Glasse that the 14th sect. of the Act of 1867 was not referred to in that case, and that, if it had been, he would have come to a different conclusion. It was true that he was not referred to that section, and if, on now referring to it, he thought that that decision was wrong, he should not hesitate to say so. Now, what was the object of the Act of 1867? The 34th section enacted that that Act, and the several Acts there mentioned, including the Act of 1865, should be construed together as one Act. What was the meaning of the words in sect. 14—"Whenever an action or suit is brought in a County Court which the court has no jurisdiction to try"? They referred to actions for distress, assault, seduction, and others, which might be brought in the superior courts, but not in the County Court. If an action of that class were brought in the County Court, the judge would order the proceedings to be stayed, and the person filing the plaint would have to pay the costs of them. If he were to say that in any case where a person, in the absence of any mala fides, filed a plaint stating that he verily believed that the property the subject of it was worth less than £500, the County Court judge was at liberty to dismiss the plaint because some person came forward to say, perhaps, that the property was worth £501, it would be inflicting a great hardship on the poorer class of persons, for whose benefit the County Court Acts were passed. The 9th section of the Act of 1865, and the 14th section of the Act of 1867, must be taken as standing together, and he read the 9th section in the same way as he did in Birks v. Silverwood, and just as if he had then been referred to the 14th section—namely, that though it did not appear in the plaint, yet it did appear upon the suit coming on for hearing that the value of the property was over £500, it would thus appear "during the progress of the suit" within the meaning of the 9th section. He was therefore of opinion that the County Court judge, instead of dismissing the suit, ought to have transferred it to this court; and if Birks v. Silverwood had been cited to him, no doubt he would have so transferred it. There must, therefore, be an order discharging the order of the court below, and substituting for it an order transferring the cause to this court. As the miscarriage had occurred through the attention of the County Court judge not having been called to the case of Birks v. Silverwood, he should give no costs of the appeal.

ELECTION LAW.

THE TAUNTON ELECTION PETITION.

In giving judgment on this case on Monday last, Grove, J., having stated that the respondent was charged with bribery and treating by himself and his agents, and that there was also an imputation of general bribery and treating, proceeded to give the following judgment:—In so far as relates to bribery and treating by the respondent himself, the learned counsel for the petitioners, at the close of his opening speech, admitted that there were no proper grounds for making any personal imputation. On this head I may at once say that nothing has transpired in this inquiry to derogate in the slightest degree from the high character the respondent has always borne, and which her Majesty's Attorney-General ought to bear. With regard to general bribery and treating, and corruption, so as to taint the whole constituency, and thus render the election void, the point was scarcely pressed in the reply of the counsel for the petitioners, and I am of opinion that no such general corruption was proved in this case. Undoubtedly painful disclosures were made, applying to a portion of the constituency, small with reference to the whole body, but not absolutely inconsiderable, which showed by the mere exhibition of the witnesses themselves, that there was a certain number of voters, who, for a small bribe or a small supply of drink, would promise their votes to either candidate—whether they would keep their promise is another question—and some of whom had reached the lowest stage of degradation, that they gloried in their shame. I see no reason, however for coming to the conclusion that extensive bribery or corruption prevailed at the election. I come now to the point upon which the great contest in this case arose. Did the respondent not by himself or by any conscious authority, but by the hands of an agent or agents for whom he is responsible, so bribe or treat that this election must be declared void? The law of agency, as applied to election petitions, has been sufficiently expressed by different learned judges, some of whom have likened it to the relation of master and servant, and another to the employer of persons to run a race for him; but no exact definition, meeting all cases, has, as far as I am aware, been given. Two learned judges—the late Mr. Justice Willes and Mr. Justice Blackburn—have pointed out the difficulties of arriving at one. All agree that the relation is not the common law one of principal and agent, but that the candidate may be responsible for the acts of one acting on his behalf, though the acts be beyond the scope of the authority given, or, indeed, in violation of express injunction. So far as regards the present case, I am of opinion that to establish agency for which the candidate would be responsible he must be proved by himself or by his authorised agent, to have employed the persons whose conduct is impugned, to act on his behalf, or to have to some extent put himself in their hands, or to have made common cause with them for the purpose of promoting his election. To what extent such relation may be sufficient to fix the candidate must, it seems to me, be a question of degree and of evidence to be judged of by the election petition tribunal. Mere non-interference with persons who, feeling interested in the success of the candidate, may act in support of his canvass, is not sufficient, in my judgment, to saddle the candidate with any unlawful acts of theirs of which the tribunal is satisfied he or his authorised agent is ignorant. It would be vain to attempt an exhaustive definition, and possibly exception may be taken to the approximate limitation which I have endeavoured to express. It must also be borne in mind in these cases that, although the object of the statute by which the tribunal of election judges was created was to prevent corrupt practices, still the tribunal is a judicial and not an inquisitorial one. It is a court to hear and determine according to law, and not a commission armed with powers to inquire into and suppress corruption. Without expressing myself in equally strong terms with Baron Martin in the Wigan case, I am of opinion that the evidence of corrupt practice must establish affirmatively to the reasonable satisfaction of the judge that the acts complained of were done. I now proceed to consider the evidence in this case. And, having do so, his Lordship held Sir Henry James duly elected, and ordered the petitioners to pay the costs.

MAGISTRATES' LAW.

ACCUSED PERSONS IN CORONERS' COURTS.

THE following is the judgment of Mr. Fitzgerald, in the Irish case of Re Marshall, which we referred to in our leading columns last week:—

FITZGERALD, J.—I quite concur in the statement of the Solicitor-General that, if there is to be a change in the law, it should be made by the Legislature. I confess, I think that the present mode of proceeding presents to the public rather an unseemly aspect, and is liable to be misrepresented; and therefore I have not any hesitation in saying that, in my judgment, some alteration of the law is required, in order to render unnecessary such applications as the present. If the coroner's court is to exist as it stood originally, we are all bound to give it every assistance. It is not for me to say whether it should be abolished or amended, or subjected to any or what regulations. Up to a very recent period, a course had been adopted which, no doubt, was unlawful. The magistrates made an order to take an accused person before the coroner. The law officers of the Crown expressed the opinion that the proceeding was contrary to law, and no doubt it was so; and, in consequence, the case of Ex parte Reardon (7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 193) came before me. The coroner's is a very ancient court. I believe I may say that it existed before such officers as an Attorney-General or Solicitor-General were known. So long as this ancient court exists, it must hold its inquiries. Its sitting is not merely optional with the coroner; and the proceedings before police magistrates do not interfere with nor suspend the inquiry of the coroner. No matter whether the magistrate committed for trial or not, it is the duty of the coroner to hold an inquest whenever a case of suspicious death occurs, and to inquire whether any person or persons were chargeable with the death of the deceased. If a crime is committed, and the party by whom it was alleged to have been committed flies from justice, the police are informed by the authorities of the transaction, a warrant is issued, the police are properly called into requisition, and the accused is intercepted and made amenable to justice. The real question is, whether a short, summary mode should not be adopted, either with the consent of the Attorney-General, or by a warrant issued by the magistrates, or otherwise, by which an accused person, when it happens that he or she is in custody on a magistrate's warrant, could be conveyed before the coroner's court, where such a course is proper and desirable. One of the grounds on which the present application has been made is similar to that which was relied on in Reardon's case, upon which I have explained my views. In dealing with this application, I must entirely exclude from consideration what took place before the magistrate. If I were to determine that the jurisdiction of the coroner could, in the slightest degree, be affected by the proceedings before the magistrate, it would have a tendency to raise an unseemly conflict, and to cause, as it were, a rush between two jurisdictions to determine which of them should have the charge of a case. Besides, I cannot in this case hold that the inquiry of the magistrates has closed. The magistrate has remanded the prisoner, but, though he might have been prepared to pronounce judgment on the last day, it is still quite open to him, on the next day, to hear fresh evidence on the part either of the prosecution or of the accused, and to alter the opinion he had entertained. It is not for me to say, should the prisoner be tendered as a witness before the coroner, whether he should or should not refuse to receive her evidence, nor is it for me to inquire with what object she might be tendered as a witness before the coroner. It is open to her advisers, should they think fit, to tender her before the coroner as a witness, and I cannot say, if her evidence is offered, that it will not be material. I, for one, have long entertained the opinion, and have repeatedly expressed it from the bench, that, at the final trial before the judge and petty jury, prisoners should be allowed to tender themselves and be received as witnesses, if they so desired it. I believe that there is a great defect in the law as it stands at present, and I think that an alteration in the law to that effect should be made, as it would be most conducive to the due administration of criminal justice. The adviser of the prisoner has sworn that it would be necessary for the prisoner to be present at the inquest before the coroner, in order that she might be tendered as a witness; and I must treat the application with that view as bona fide. That course, if adopted, will be taken at the peril of the party; and if I were sitting as a coroner, although I would not call upon her to be examined, I should be very slow to refuse to receive her evidence if it were offered. It might affect her prejudicially, or it might have a contrary effect. I do not know anything of the general facts of the case except what I have seen in the newspapers, but I understand it to be a case of what is called circumstantial evidence. The charge is one of administering poison. The evidence went to to show that the accused purchased the poison—that the deceased met his death by poison of the same description as that which had been purchased—that she had been in his company shortly before the alleged murder, and that she made some misrepresentations when inquiries were made to her. This is a strong circumstantial case, but it is just of such a character that it might be desirable that the prisoner should be present at the investigation before the coroner, though it might be considered by her legal adviser inexpedient to tender her for examination. Therefore, if the application rested alone on the ground of the prisoner's desire or that of her advisers that she should be tendered as a witness, I should feel very great difficulty in refusing a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum. But the application here is made, also, on other grounds. In Reardon's case I expressed an opinion, to which I still adhere, that it was desirable on all grounds that the prisoner should be brought before the coroner's court, and that I was bound to assist an application for that purpose, if, in point of law, it was competent for me to do so. In the course of the argument in that case, it was admitted by Mr. Johnson, as counsel for the Crown, that the court could, under special circumstances, issue the writ in aid of the defective powers of an inferior court. This I regard as a case coming within the principle there admitted. I am of opinion that, in a case where the party accused claims the right to be present at the coroner's inquiry in order to hear the evidence received against himself or herself, and to assist his or her counsel and attorney, I am bound to grant the application for that purpose. The Solicitor-General has argued that the decision would apply to every case throughout the country—I quite agree with him, and I am not afraid to take that view of it. I have not any doubt that, in every proper case in which the law officers of the Crown should think it right to do so, they would, themselves, take measures to have a prisoner brought before the coroners' courts. I am quite sure that, in this particular case, if the Solicitor-General considered it right, he would have advised that the present application should be made at the expense of the Crown. In cases in which the Crown would not make such an application, it would have to be made at the risk and expense of the prisoner, and if I should order the writ in the present case it would be issued at the expense of the party accused. Generally speaking, the very last place in which persons desire to be is in a coroner's court—it is the place they most wish to avoid, and if the police would allow them they would keep out of it altogether. So that I do not think it likely to be a matter of frequent occurrence that persons would incur the expense of an application for a habeas corpus for the mere pleasure of being present at a coroner's inquiry. In country cases the expense of transmission, also, would have to be borne by the party seeking the writ. Therefore, I do not think that there could be any danger of abuse resulting from the decision which I am about pronouncing. It appears to me, upon two grounds, that the present case comes within Reardon's case. First, it is a case where the attorney swears in his affidavit that he is advised to tender this woman as a witness.

The Solicitor-General.—He does not swear that, or that he intends to examine her. He says, "I am advised, and myself verily believe, that the presence of the said Anne Wyndfor Marshall will be necessary at the coroner's inquest."

Byrne.—In order that the prisoner may be tendered as a witness.

FITZGERALD, J.—Even upon the statement contained in the affidavit, I would feel great difficulty in refusing the application; and I have already expressed the opinion, in this and other criminal cases, that it would be the proper course to enable a prisoner to have the option of tendering herself or himself to be examined; and I also think that the special circumstances of this case render it advisable that the prisoner should be present. Her presence might aid in the administration of justice, in enabling the coroner's jury to find not merely a verdict—for I do not narrow the administration of justice in the coroner's court to that—but a true verdict, whatever that verdict might be. It is not a case resting upon direct evidence of the crime having been actually seen committed; the evidence is circumstantial, and it is one of those cases in which it is desirable that the party accused should be present at the inquest. I therefore feel bound to grant the writ (to be of the same form and nature as in Reardon's case), again expressing the opinion that some alteration in the law is desirable, so as to render unnecessary this very expensive kind of application. Some short and summary process might be devised to meet such cases as the present, and in order to aid in the administration of justice.

MANCHESTER CITY POLICE COURT.

Wednesday, Jan. 21.

(Before Mr. HEADLAM, the Stipendiary.)

Bona fide travellers—Licensing Act.

S., a licensed victualler, was summoned for having his house open for the sale of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours, on Sunday. The only persons proved to have been served were omnibus drivers and guards travelling from Manchester to considerable distances and back.

Held, that they were bona fide travellers.

Jordan, barrister, appeared for the defence.

THIS was a case involving the question as to who is a bona fide traveller under the Licensing Act. The defendant was Mr. Walter Stopford, of the Old Boar's Head Hotel, Withy-grove, and he was summoned for having his house open for the sale of liquors during prohibited hours on a Sunday.

Police-constable Enoch Wilkinson stated that last Sunday but one he entered the defendant's house by the back door, and found five men inside, one of whom was drinking a glass of rum. Under cross-examination the witness said the man who had the rum was the guard of the Bury omnibus.

There was no other evidence for the prosecution.

Jordan said that the question involved in this case was a very important one, viz., whether his client was or was not bound to treat as travellers omnibus drivers and guards, who were constantly on a Sunday travelling to and from places a considerable distance from Manchester. The defendant was extremely desirous that by the magistrate's decision so important a question might be settled, and he was very willing to conform to the law. Jordan said he would prove that the men seen in the house by the policeman were all known to the defendant's manager as being of the class he had mentioned. He argued that such men were bona fide travellers within the meaning of the law, and entitled as such to demand refreshment from a publican, the refusal of the publican rendering him liable to an indictment. This view of the matter was supported by the decision of Erle, C.J., in the case of Taylor, app., v. Humphreys, resp. The learned counsel submitted that omnibus guards, drivers, and the like, were travellers by profession, and if they were to be refused necessary refreshment while pursuing what was in some respects a difficult and dangerous business a great injustice would be done.

Witnesses were then called who proved that of the men seen by the policeman when he visited the defendant's house two were drivers of omnibuses which had, shortly before, come into Manchester from Bury and Pendleton; one was a guard, and the other two were drivers who had travelled from Swinton.

On the conclusion of the evidence, Mr. HEADLAM said there was no doubt that men of the class referred to by Mr. Jordan were bona fide travellers, and entitled to refreshments at any time during Sunday; but it was necessary for public-house keepers to look very carefully after the men who accompanied the guards and drivers, for it might happen that they would bring in their friends who were not travellers at all.

Jordan said that it was the custom at his client's house to be very careful in that respect.

Mr. HEADLAM went on to say that there had been considerable difficulty about this question, because men often obtained drink by falsely representing that they were travellers, and a publican was liable to a penalty for refusing refreshment to a bona fide traveller. In this case the summons would be dismissed.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

WILL—CHILD EN VENTRE.—A testator by his will directed a fund to be set apart to answer an annuity for his wife, and after her death he directed his trustees to hold the fund upon trust for the child or children of his married daughter, with a gift over in case there should be no such child or children. By a codicil, the testator directed that in case his daughter should be living at the expiration of five years from the death of his wife, and should not then have had any child or children, the gift over should then at once take effect, as if his daughter were dead without children. The daughter was enceinte of her first child at the expiration of five years after the death of the testator's wife, and the child was born within six months after the expiration of that period. Held (affirming the decision of Wickens, V.C.), that the gift over did not take effect: (Pearce v. Carrington, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 706. L.JJ.).

MORTGAGE BY ONE OF TWO TENANTS IN COMMON OF PROPERTY IN JOINT OCCUPATION—CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE.—Two persons purchased a piece of land which was conveyed to them as tenants in common, subject to a joint power of appointment in the two purchasers. They erected thereon premises for the purpose of a business which they carried on in partnership, and the articles of partnership made the premises partnership property. In 1866 one of the partners mortgaged one undivided moiety of the premises to the bankers of the firm to secure repayment of an advance made to him. In 1870 the partnership was dissolved. The other partner filed a bill against the bankers claiming priority over their mortgage in respect of sums advanced by him to his firm. The Vice-Chancellor being of opinion that it was not proved that the bankers knew that the premises were in the joint occupation of the two partners, decided against the plaintiff. On the hearing of an appeal from that decision, one of the bankers was examined in court, and admitted that they knew that the premises were in the joint occupation of the plaintiff and his partner for the purposes of their business. Held, that this knowledge brought the case within the doctrine of Daniels v. Davidson (16 Ves. 249), that the bankers must be taken to have had notice of the plaintiff's interest, and that the plaintiff's claim was therefore entitled to rank in priority to the banker's mortgage. Decision of Wickens, V.C. accordingly reversed: (Cavander v. Bultcel, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710. L.JJ.)

SETTLEMENT—COVENANT TO SETTLE WIFE'S AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.—In a marriage settlement, a covenant by husband and wife to settle after-acquired property of the wife does not extend to property to which the wife becomes entitled after the death of her husband, but only to property acquired during the coverture, although there be no words in the covenant restricting it to property acquired during the coverture. Dickinson v. Dillwyn (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 546), and Carter v. Carter (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 194; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 551), followed. Stevens v. Van Voorst (17 Beav. 305), overruled: (Re Edwards, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 712. L.JJ.).

TRUST FUNDS—INVESTMENT—DISCRETION OF TRUSTEES.—After an administration suit has been instituted the discretion given to the trustees of the will as to the investment of the trust funds is subject to the control of the court; and the court will not allow any investment to be made unless it is satisfied of the propriety of it: (Bethell v. Abraham, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715. M.R.).

WILL—LEGAL PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE—NEXT OF KIN.—A fund was settled upon a married woman for life, with remainder to her husband for life, with remainder to her children, with remainder, in default of children, to the person or persons who should happen to be her legal personal representative or representatives at the time of her death. Held, that "legal personal representative or representatives" meant next of kin according to the Statute of Distributions: (Robinson v. Evans, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715. M.R.)

ANNUITY GRANTED AND TENANT FOR LIFE—APPORTIONMENT—ARREARS—ENTRY.—In order to obtain a right to recover the arrears of an annuity, or of an apportioned part of it, upon the death of a tenant for life who has granted it during his life, with a power of entry, the right of entry must have been actually exercised; and a petition claiming against the estate of the tenant for life, payment of the arrears, and an apportioned part from the date of the death, was, in the absence of such entry, dismissed: (Ex parte Watkins, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721. M.R.)

WILL—LEASEHOLDS—CONTRARY INTENTION.—A testator, by will made in 1861, devised all his "messuages, lands, and hereditaments in the county of Middlesex, and all other lands and hereditaments in England belonging to him," to the use of his eldest son G. for life, with remainder to his issue in tail male . . . with an ultimate remainder to his own right heirs. He also bequeathed "all his money, securities for money, goods, chattels, and personal estate," to trustees upon trusts corresponding with the trusts of "the hereditaments thereinbefore devised in strict settlement," but so that the same "should not vest absolutely in any person thereby made tenant in tail by purchase, unless such person should attain twenty-one. As to the devised realty, the will contained a power of sale, empowering the trustees to invest the sale moneys in the purchase of freeholds or leaseholds "convenient to be held therewith." The will also contained a bequest of chattels and heirlooms in strict settlement. The testator, both as to any leaseholds to be purchased under the power, and as to the chattels, repeated the above provisions as to their not vesting in any infant tenant in tail. The testator, at the time of his death, was possessed of both freehold and leasehold estates in the county of Middlesex. Held, that the leaseholds did not pass under the devise of real estate, by virtue of the 26th section of 1 Vict. c. 26, as there was sufficient indication of a contrary intention appearing on the face of the will; but passed under the residuary bequest: (Prescott v. Barker, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 727. V.C.M.)

WILL—GIFT TO ILLEGITIMATE CHILD.—Testator married, in 1864, his second wife, by whom he had already two illegitimate children, but having no children surviving of his former marriage. By his will, executed shortly after his second marriage, he gave all his property to his wife for life, with liberty to "direct the disposal of the property amongst our children by will," and should she make no will the property to be divided "equally between my children by her." Testator died in 1872, leaving his widow and the two children surviving him, but having had no other children by her. The testator had treated the children as his own. Held, that the illegitimate children were the objects of the power: (Dorin v. Dorin, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 731. V.C.M.)

MARRIED WOMAN—EXECUTION OF CONVEYANCE BY — HUSBAND'S DESERTION — LIVING APART.—Where a woman having been deserted by her husband has been living apart from him for upwards of two years, and has maintained herself and her children without any assistance from him during that time, the court will, although the husband and wife are in communication with each other, grant an order to dispense with the concurrence of the husband in the execution of a conveyance by the wife of some property to which she is entitled apart from him, he having refused when applied to for the purpose to concur: (Ex parte Sutcliffe, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 747. C. P.)

LEGACY AND PROBATE DUTY—DIRECTION BY WILL TO SELL PROPERTY.—Where real property is by will expressly directed to be sold, and the produce and the testator's personalty all are to constitute one fund applicable to the purposes of the will, the land, though unsold, and though, in consequence of the happening of certain events, it might, for the purposes of devolution, go to the heir, is nevertheless, for fiscal purposes, to be treated as personal property. Williamson v. The Lord Advocate (10 Clk. & Fin. 1) followed: (Attorney-General v. Lomas, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 749. EX.)

COMPANY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

CONTRIBUTORY—CANCELLATION OF SHARES—ALTERATION OF ARTICLES OF ASSOCIATION.—In 1865 the capital of a company consisted of 2000 shares of £10 each, one moiety of which (hereinafter called the A shares) were fully paid, while on the other moiety (hereinafter called the B shares) only £2 10s. was paid up. In February of that year two resolutions were duly passed, and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the company, whereby it was provided that all the A shares should be cancelled, and that two new shares of £10 each, with £5 per share credited as paid up, should be issued in lieu of each A share: and that all the B shares should also be cancelled, and that one share of £10., with £5 credited as paid up, should be issued in lieu of every two of the B. shares. And these resolutions, the result of which was on the whole to increase the uncalled capital of the company, were duly registered with the registrar of joint-stock compaies. T., who at that time was the holder of ten B shares, exchanged them for five new shares of £10 each, with £5 per share credited as paid up, and in the following August he sold these shares, but his name was by neglect still left in one of the books of the company as the holder of the ten B shares. In 1873, the company having been ordered to be wound-up, the liquidator sought to place T. on the list of contributories in respect of the ten shares: Held, that the cancellation of the B shares, and the issue of new shares with diminished liability in lieu thereof, was valid, there having been no mala fides in the transaction, and that the fact of T.'s name having been left on the books by mistake or neglect, would not render him liable as a contritory. Decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court of the Duchy of Lancaster affirmed: (Teasdale's case, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 707. L. JJ.)

WINDING-UP—PRACTICE.—There is no jurisdiction to depart from the terms of the General Orders, and therefore where a winding-up petition had been advertised in the matter of the Companies Act 1862, and not also of that of 1867, as directed by the 1st rule of the Gen. Order, March 1868, it was ordered to be re-advertised: (Re Marezzo Marble Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 720. M. R.)

RAILWAY—PETITION—TRANSFER TO CREDIT OF CAUSE.—When money has been paid into court by a railway company, and invested in stock standing to the proper account ex parte the company, but the stock has been subsequently transferred to the credit of a cause to a separate account of a person interested for life, the company will not have to pay any costs subsequent to such transfer, as, for instance, the costs of a petition for payment out to parties absolutely entitled: (Fisher v. Fisher, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 720. M. R.)

COUNTY COURTS.

Thursday, Jan. 22.

(Before H. W. COLE, Q.C. Judge.)

LOVERIDGE v. HAGLEY.

Liability of a minor.

THIS was an action brought by Mr. George Loveridge, silversmith and jeweller, Birmingham, against a workman named Hagley, to recover the sum of £19 1s. 3d., money overdrawn on account of work unfinished.

Piercy Wilkinson appeared for the plaintiff.

Burton for the defendant.—The defendant had pleaded infancy.

Wilkinson said that was a plea which covered a great quantity of charges, but there were certain exceptions, and he thought his Honour would be of opinion that this was one in which the defendant had rendered himself personally liable. In March 1872 the defendant went to Mr. Loveridge and offered himself to do certain work in the trade of jeweller. Mr. Loveridge accepted him under certain conditions. In answer to questions put to him by Mr. Loveridge, he stated that he was twenty-two years of age, and had been in the employment of other persons, mentioning their names and the length of time he had been employed. It was agreed that Hagley should serve as a journeyman for Mr. Loveridge for a weekly sum of 30s. He did so serve until from March 1872 to October of the same year, when there was a further agreement come to between them, whereby the defendant was to go on piecework. He worked on these conditions until March 1873, when he complained to Mr. Loveridge that he was ill, and said that he wanted to go into the country to recruit his health. At that time a statement was drawn up between them, and from that statement it appeared that the defendant had overdrawn on account of piecework the sum of £22 6s. 2d. The plaintiff alleged that the excuse of ill-health was a fabrication, for within a few days of the defendant leaving him, he entered into another person's employment Before this, the defendant had told Mr. Loveridge that he had a chance of a better situation in the coloured gold trade, and that when his health was restored he should be able to pay the balance due. The case was brought before the magistrates, and the defendant was ordered to return to his work; but by an agreement between the parties the defendant gave a promissory note for the amount due, and engaged to pay £1 per month. Some payments had been made, which reduced the amount to the sum now sought to be recovered.

After the examination of the plaintiff and of a witness who had frequently heard the defendant say he was twenty-two years old,

Burton submitted that the defendant was not liable, as the contract was not beneficial to the infant, which it was clearly laid down it must be before the plaintiff could recover.

After hearing Wilkinson on the other side,

HIS HONOUR quoted several cases bearing on the question, and said it was quite clear that if upon the settling of the amount due between the parties there had been a balance due to the infant, the infant could have recovered. He had done the work, and could recover from the master upon the contract the wages due to him. What the court had to consider was whether, under circumstances like these, the plaintiff could recover the balance of the money the defendant had received, and whether, in point of fact, the agreement was a beneficial one to the defendant. The object of the defendant in entering into the agreement was to earn his own subsistence, and under that agreement he actually did earn in the first instance 30s. a week, which for a youth of that age, seemed to be very good wages. Then, from October to March 1873, he drew between £50 and £60. He could not but consider it was a very beneficial agreement for the infant. He might in time do better, and he appeared to have done so. It seemed to him that the defendant was bound by the contract, which was a beneficial one at the time it was made, and he should find a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed.

CARLESS v. WATHEN.

Agreement—Stamp—Sufficiency.

AN action was brought by Mr. George Carless, paper-box manufacturer, Regent-street, against Mr. William Wathen, landlord of the Queen's Arms, Bradford-street, to recover £50 deposit on the sale of the defendant's licensed house and business.

Rosher (instructed by Crowther Davies) appeared for the plaintiff.

Parry for the defendant.

Rosher in opening the case, stated that in June last the plaintiff, being desirous of entering into business, as a licensed victualler, instructed Mr. John Binns, of the Plough and Harrow inn Highgate, to negotiate with the defendant for the purchase of the Queen's Arms. On the 12th of the same month an agreement was signed for the sale of the property, and the sum of £50 was paid as a deposit. Mr. Seal and Mr. James Lowe, of Temple-street, auctioneers and valuers, were employed to make an inventory and valuation of the property, which valuation was to be completed and the purchase effected by the 1st July. The contention on behalf of the plaintiff was that the defendant had impeded the valuers in their work, so that the valuation was not completed by the date specified. Rosher contended that the plaintiff had done his best to complete the purchase, and that the defendant had no claim whatever in law or equity to keep possession of the £50. The learned counsel then called Mr. Lowe and Mr. Seal, the auctioneers, and a son of Mr. Lowe, to prove that the agreement had been duly signed. Their evidence was contradictory as to the time when the date was affixed on the stamp, and it did not appear certain whether the date had been written at the same time as the signatures or at some subsequent period.

Upon this point Parry took a legal objection, and urged that the document could not be received as evidence, as the date had not been inserted on the stamp at the proper time. He submitted that no satisfactory proof had been laid before them to show when the date was affixed, and who had inserted it.

After Rosher had replied to the arguments of Parry,

HIS HONOUR said: This case involves a question of considerable importance. A document had been tendered to him as an agreement, and the objection taken to it was that it could not be received, because it had not been duly stamped. It appeared that the agreement had an adhesive stamp affixed to it, on or across which were the signatures of the defendant and of John Binns, as the agent of the plaintiff. At the foot of the stamp was written, "June 12th, '73." The question was whether, under the recent Stamp Act, that instrument was properly stamped. The statute enacted that the instrument was not to be deemed duly signed unless the person or persons required by law to cancel it did so by writing on or across the stamp his name or the name and initials of his firm. On the document produced they had the name of both parties to the contract written upon the stamp. The section further required that the true date should be given so that the stamp might be effectually cancelled and rendered incapable of being used for any other instrument. The object of the Act of Parliament was to protect the Government from being defrauded of the stamp duties, and for that purpose it required that the effectual cancellation of the stamp should be made, not merely by writing the name or names of the parties across the stamp only, but that the date also should be written upon it. But the Legislature, anticipating the frequent occurrence of mistakes in the cancelling of the stamp without any intent to defraud, provided an alternative expressed thus: "unless it is proved that the date appearing on the instrument is affixed at the proper time." Supposing the stamp was not duly cancelled, then the persons whose duty it was to see to the cancellation were liable to forfeit the sum of £10. The only question, therefore, that he had to consider was not whether the date had been affixed at the proper time, but whether the person whose duty it was to cancel the stamp had done so by writing the date upon it. The evidence was clear that the stamp had been affixed at the proper time, though it was not proved that the cancellation of it was effected at the same time. Whether it was so or not he should give no opinion, but he ruled that the instrument was admissible, notwithstanding the objection that had been raised.—The case was then discussed upon the general facts, but it was eventually adjourned.

THE ERMINIA FOSCOLA.

Necessaries.

H. D. Warr, instructed by Bateson and Co., appeared for the plaintiffs.

The facts of the case may be gathered from the judgment: HIS HONOUR.—This is an undefended suit against the Italian barque Erminia Foscola and her owners for necessaries. The facts, as they appear from the evidence, are these: The vessel sailed from Akyab to Falmouth for orders, arrived at the latter port on 3rd Oct. last. The captain applied to Messrs. Fox and Co. for £15, stating through their Italian clerk that the money was wanted for necessaries for the ship. The money was advanced and laid out in this way—viz., £3 for provisions, and the remainder in paying the wages of a seaman who had shipped at Akyab for the first port in England, and who claimed his discharge, and was discharged at Falmouth. Messrs. Fox now seek to recover this £15 in the present suit. There is ample authority to show that money advanced for, and bona fide laid out in necessaries, differs in no respect from necessaries themselves. The only question is, whether in the present case what the money was expended on comes within the definition of necessaries. I have no doubt about the provisions—I think it is clear that they were necessaries. The case of the wages of the seaman presents more difficulty, and is, I believe, novel. The definition of necessaries in the older cases has received a wider interpretation in the recent case of The Riga (L. Rep. 4 Ad. & Ecc. p. 516), Sir Robert Phillimore in that case adopted the doctrine laid down by Lord Tenterden in Webster v. Seekamp (4 B. & Ald. 352), viz., that "whatever is fit and proper for the service in which a vessel is engaged, whatever the owner of that vessel as a prudent man would have ordered, if present at the time, comes within the meaning of the term 'necessaries,' as applied to those repairs done or things provided for the ship by order of the master, for which the owners are liable." The seaman's wages were not repairs done or things provided, but I think the same reasoning may be applied to them, and I am of opinion that the owner, if on no other ground, on the ground of prudence would, if present, have paid them, for if he had not his ship would have been liable to arrest. The same consideration operates in inquiring whether or not they come within the meaning of the word necessaries. The primary and obvious meaning of a necessary is something without which the ship would be unable to continue her voyage. The seaman is entitled to his wages, and he is entitled to institute a suit and arrest the ship unless they are paid. The captain is not bound, I think, to wait to see if the ship is arrested; on the contrary, he is bound to fulfil his contract, the probable alternative being the arrest of the ship, and he swears that without the £15 he had not enough to pay the wages. I have come to the conclusion that they were under these circumstances necessaries. Although, as far as I can discover, there is no case in the books exactly like the present, still there are two which I think may be quoted as fortifying my opinion. The case of Robinson v. Lyall (7 Price 592), in which the plaintiff, a ship chandler at Portsmouth, brought an action against the owners of a vessel for money advanced to the captain to pay seamen's wages, Portsmouth being the port of discharging, and it was held that he could recover on the ground that the money was necessary for the use of the ship, and the case of the Henry Reid (32 L. T. Rep. 166), in which money advanced for the payment of seamen's wages was allowed to be recovered in the Admiralty Court; but it is only right to state that, in deciding the latter, Dr. Lushington said that he was extending the law, and that this case was not to constitute a precedent. One ground for that decision seems to have been that the case was unopposed. In that respect, at any rate, it is a precedent for this one. For the foregoing reasons I hold that Messrs. Fox are entitled to recover the sum claimed in this suit with costs.

POTTER v. HILLING.

Husband and wife living apart—Revocation of wife's authority.

JOHN WM. POTTER, shopkeeper, Pulham Market, sued Noah Hilling, labourer, a person residing in the same place, for the recovery of £1 9s. 7d. for necessaries supplied to his wife at various times during three years in which they lived separate.

Mrs. Potter represented her husband, and gave her evidence with obvious candour, freedom from hesitation, and undoubted honesty.

In reply to the learned judge, she said that she was not aware of the reasons which had induced the defendant to leave his wife, nor where he went to; but while he was away Mrs. Hilling made the remark that she must not allow herself to get into debt more than she was able to get out of, for she had no husband to pay it. His Honour inquired of Mrs. Potter whether she did not think that this was an intimation to her that she must not look to the defendant to be answerable for any goods supplied to his wife, and whether in fact the defendant himself had not cautioned her against letting Mrs. Hilling have anything on credit? Mrs. Potter acknowledged that on one occasion the defendant requested her not to serve his wife with any goods, but he was drunk at the time.

HIS HONOUR.—But even if he was drunk, did it not look as if he knew was he was about?

Mrs. Potter replied that she did not think he did, for he was so drunk that his violence to his wife made her interfere between them. She added that a son of the defendant's would have settled the amount now sued for, but his father would not allow him.

In resisting the claim, the defendant said that not only had he cautioned Mrs. Potter against trusting his wife, but he had distinctly forbidden her from dealing at the plaintiff's shop at all. The reason why he left his wife was to go after work; but while absent he used to send her as much money as he could spare.

HIS HONOUR having expressed a desire to hear what Mrs. Hilling had to say in the matter, she stepped into the witness box, and admitted it was quite true that Mrs. Potter had let her have goods during her husband's absence, for two years of which he never sent her any money whatever. It was also true that her husband had forbidden her to deal with the plaintiff; but Mrs. Potter had always been so kind to her that she wished to put as much as she could in her way, in the hope that it would one day or other be paid for.

HIS HONOUR observed that there were two reasons why the defendant could not be held liable in the action. The first was, that he had cautioned Mrs. Potter not to trust his wife; and the second was, that he had expressly forbidden his wife to deal at the plaintiff's. In the leading case on the subject as decided in the Court of Common Pleas, Lord Chief Justice Erle, who delivered the judgment, laid it down that a husband had a right to be master in his own house; and that where a husband had forbidden his wife to deal with a tradesman, the creditor could not recover. Mr. Justice Byles was of a different opinion, and thought a tradesman who supplied necessaries to a wife had a right to recover unless he knew that her husband had prohibited her from dealing with him; but the other judges concurred with Lord Chief Justice Erle in the ruling that it was not necessary, in order to free the husband from liability, that the creditor should know that he had forbidden his wife to deal with him. Upon the authority of the decision referred to, he must hold that the defendant was not liable, and that judgment, therefore, must be entered in his favour.

SWANSEA COUNTY COURT.

GEORGE SHADRICK AND J. H. BURGESS v. CHARLES PEEK, ABERDARE.

Sale of goods—17th section of Statute of Frauds—Post office card addressed to seller of potatoes, but no name of the sellers or vendors in the written memorandum, and no reference to the written memorandum on the post office card. The 17th section held not to have been complied with.

Plews for the plaintiff, and Phillips for the defendant.

The plaintiff sues for £21 8s. 11d.

HIS HONOUR said: Mr. W. Siderfin, living at Neath, sold to the plaintiff certain potatoes by sample. The defendant boiled them and tried them before his purchase. Siderfin wrote out a memorandum of sale on these terms:—"April 25th, 1873. Charles Peek takes ten tons of potatoes, and will send sacks next week, price £5 7s. 6d. a ton, on the rail at Swansea;" and it was signed by the defendant, "C. Peek." There is no name of the seller in the book, or on the memorandum thus signed. There was put in evidence a post office card addressed to "Messrs. Burgess, Shaddrick, and Co., Shipbrokers, Swansea." The post mark is dated, "Aberdare, May 7th, 1876." The card is endorsed—"From C. Peek, Aberdare. Dear Sirs,—I could do nothing with your potatoes at the price your agent told me, for I am overstocked, and the market so much down." The defendant did not sent sacks, and they were obtained for him by Siderfin from the Sack Loan Society. Notice was given to him that if he did not take the potatoes they would be resold, and that the defendant would be sued. They were re-sold at £4 10s. a ton. The railway freight was 5s. a ton. The carriage and demurrage came to £7 3s. 6d., and the hire of sacks to 10s. I come to the conclusion that though these potatoes were small they were marketable, and that their quality was good, and that if they were not so it was observable that the objections on the post card only relate to the price, and state that the market was set down, and that he (the defendant) was "overstocked." The single question really is, whether or not there is sufficient evidence of the contract under the Statute of Frauds? It is remarkable how many cases arise of ordinary contracts made by trade agents on the sale of goods in which the rules of evidence required by the Statute of Frauds are neglected, though in order to enforce the remembrance of them on this circuit I have on account of Sir Leoline Jenkins, the founder of the Grammar School at Cowbridge, being one of the supposed authors of the statute, constantly called it "The Glamorganshire Statute." No man ought to call himself a commercial traveller, or to be a commercial agent, who cannot write down the necessary particulars of a written contract. There should be stated the name of the seller; the name of the person who buys; the description or name of the goods sold; the quantity of what is sold, and the price; adding any special terms of payment, or any special terms of delivery; and the purchaser or person charged must sign the memorandum. If the seller is to be sued on the contract, and to be thus charged, he must have signed it. Failing a written memorandum on the sale of the goods, wares, or merchandise, for the price of £10 sterling, the contract is not to be allowed to be good, except the buyer accept part of the goods so sold and actually receives the same, or gives something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment. These are the rules of the celebrated 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, which ought to be taught to the children of every tradesman when they are at school, and to be taught in our common schools without being put down as something so remarkable as to be charged for as an extra. Now it is to be remembered that all sales of goods above £10, and at this time all sales of goods under the price of £10 could, and, in the latter case, can still be made by mere word of mouth, at common law. The object of the statute was to prevent fraud, and to check affirmations of contracts which might otherwise be erroneous or false. They were not made to favour fraud or to assist contracting parties to avoid engagements, when the evidence required by the statute can be obtained through either party to the contract. Therefore it has been held that the written contract need not be in one piece of paper, and that what is omitted in one paper may be supplied by another, provided they can be connected in their reference to the same contract, or to the parties to the contract. The note or writing, however, must be signed by the party who is charged. This has been done in the present memorandum, so far as the defendant is chargeable, namely, it was signed by "Charles Peek." "But the authorities have equally established that the name, or a sufficient description of the other party, is indispensable, because without it no contract is shown, inasmuch as the stipulation or promise of one does not bind him otherwise than to the person to whom the promise was made, and until that person's name is shown it is impossible to say that the writing contains a memorandum of the bargain:" (Benjamin on Sales, p. 169, 2nd edit.) The memorandum signed by Peek is not sufficient. There is no name of the seller or vendor of the goods mentioned. Does the post card sufficiently supply this defect? The card very properly is not addressed to Siderfin, the agent who sold the potatoes, but to the plaintiffs, by name, for whom Siderfin negotiated the sale. The latest case on this subject is that of Buxton v. Rust, L. Rep. 1, Ex. 279; 41 L. J. 173; 27 L. T. Rep. 210. The memorandum in that case was binding on the plaintiff, for he had signed it, but it was not binding on the defendant, for he had not signed it. Then came a correspondence, ending with a letter from the defendant in reply to a request from the plaintiff to have a copy of the contract which had been given to him (the defendant) on the 11th Jan. 1871. The defendant, on the 9th Feb., replied—"I beg to inclose a copy of your letter of the 11th Jan. 1871." This copy of the letter, containing the terms of the contract, was sent in the defendant's handwriting, and was signed by him. Though the defendant did sign this copy of the contract, he did not sign it with a view to give to it validity so as to charge himself. Byles, Brett, and Blackburn, JJ., considered that it had that effect. Willes, J., argued that the terms of the other letters sufficiently referred to a contract to connect them with the written contract signed by the plaintiff only, on the 11th Jan. 1871. Lord Westbury, in Peek v. North Staffordshire Railway Company (10 H. of L. 472,569), "In order to embody in the letter any other document or memorandum, or instrument in writing, so as to make it part of a special contract contained in that letter, the letter must either set out the writing referred to, or so clearly and definitely refer to the writing, that by force of the reference the writing itself becomes part of the instrument." And it is in the interests of trade that such should be the rule. Equivocal words do not express definite terms. Attempt to define that which is equivocal, and the interests of both parties may be held in suspense to the end of a protracted contest. The two papers, in all cases, must be connected by definite internal expressions. Do the expressions on the post card refer to any writing, or even any contract? I cannot come to this conclusion.

Judgment for the defendant.

Friday, Jan. 23.

(Before Mr. Registrar PEPYS, sitting as Chief Judge.)

Re WEHNER.

Balance in hands of bankers—Claim of vendors of goods pledged by agent of vendee with the bank—Costs of the bank on application by trustee of bankrupt agent for payment over of the balance.

THIS was an application by the trustee for an order for the payment to him of a balance of £300 held by the bank on the hypothecation of certain securities by the bankrupt. A parcel of woollen goods had been consigned through the bankrupt to a firm in Bombay, and he had accepted a draft of the consignors against them. He thereupon drew upon the consignees in Bombay, and pledged that draft, with bill of lading of the woollen goods, with the London and Delhi Bank. The draft was not accepted by the Bombay house, and the bankrupt failed before his acceptance of the draft of the consignors became due. The bank realised, and on the account current between the bank and the bankrupt there appeared a balance of £300. The consignors of the woollen goods and the trustee both claimed this amount. The bank did not pay the money into court.

Horace Davey and F. O. Crump appeared for the trustee.

Bagley for the consignors; and Daniel Jones for the bank.

Bagley abandoned the claim of the consignors on the trustee agreeing not to ask for costs.

Jones, for the bank, asked for their costs as between attorney and client. Although mere stakeholders, he contended that the bank had a right to constitute themselves trustees, and although they had not paid the money into court, they were, nevertheless, entitled to costs as trustees would be.

For the trustee it was urged that this proceeding was similar to an interpleader at common law, and that the bank could not claim costs except as between party and party.

The learned REGISTRAR adopted this view, and made his order accordingly.

DERBY COUNTY COURT.

Saturday, Jan. 17.

(Before G. RUSSELL, Esq., Judge.)

Re W. HOLLAND (in Liquidation).

The appointment of creditor's solicitor.

THREE applications came before the court in this matter—first, to confirm an interim appointment of Mr. Samuel Leech as solicitor to the trustees; secondly, for an order directing the sheriff to pay to Holland's trustees a sum of £132, which had been received from the debtor under an execution levied shortly before he filed his petition; and, lastly, to restrain the sheriff from proceeding further in an interpleader summons issued at his instance in London.

Upon the first being called upon,

Dr. Evans, instructed by Winn, took a preliminary objection to all that had been done, on the ground that the application upon which Mr. Leech had been temporarily appointed was defective, inasmuch as it was made by Mr. Evans only. Mr. Evans was but half a trustee, and Mr. Winn was the other half; they must act jointly, and as they had not done so, the appointment of Mr. Leech was invalid, and all he had done was void.

Hextall, who appeared in the absence of Mr. Leech, said that as a matter of fact, and so far as general practice was concerned, Mr. Evans was the sole trustee, Mr. Winn never having taken up his appointment. A form had been sent to him for signature, but he had not had the courtesy to acknowledge it, and now, Mr. Hextall contended, he had no locus standi. His Honour would find, upon referring to the file of proceedings, that what he stated was correct. On the other hand, Mr. Evans had very properly signed his acceptance of the appointment, and had actively exerted himself in the interest of the creditors; and it was unreasonable that a person who had neglected his own duty should now come here and complain of the zeal of his co-trustee. The creditors had omitted to appoint a committee of inspection; the trustee had no power to appoint a solicitor to the estate, but was bound in case of emergency to apply to the court for instructions. This Mr. Evans had done. Upon being served with an interpleader summons he was at the trouble of going over to Birmingham to consult with his co-trustee; but failing to meet with him, and the case being urgent, he made affidavit of the facts to the court, which thereupon appointed Mr. Leech the solicitor to the trustees.

His HONOUR overruled both objections, holding that although Mr. Winn had not in writing, and according to the very proper requirement of the court, signified his acceptance of the appointment, he had virtually and practically accepted it. Acting was the best test of his acceptance, and it was admitted that he had acted as trustee. He must therefore hold that he was duly appointed. Dr. Evans had urged that the action of one trustee did not bind the other; but he must at once say that the course adopted by Mr. Samuel Evans was in all respects right and proper, and that he would have failed in his duty if he had not applied to the court for instructions. The interim appointment of Mr. Leech was perfectly valid, and the only question for Dr. Evans to address himself to was whether that appointment should be confirmed and continued.

Dr. Evans then said that on behalf of Mr. Winn he altogether opposed the appointment of Mr. Leech. That gentleman was the debtor's solicitor, and he could not, therefore, do justice to the interests of the creditors. Mr. Winn, and other Birmingham creditors, had throughout opposed his appointment; they did so now, and preferred that Mr. James, of Birmingham, should act for them.

Hextall said he was at a loss to understand Mr. Winn's antipathy to Mr. Leech, and his great fondness for Mr. James. The statement made by Dr. Evans was totally incorrect, for Mr. Winn, in a letter written to his co-trustee three days after the meeting of creditors, said, "I have this morning received a letter from Mr. Leech, copy of which I inclose. I think it would be wise for you to endeavour to get the £132 out of the hands of the sheriff as soon as possible, and I am glad to see that Mr. Leech has already given him notice to pay the money over. Be good enough not to let the matter sleep." He did not let it sleep, but laying the case before the court, Mr. Leech was appointed to conduct it, and it would be most unfair now to oust him at the caprice of a small section of the creditors.

His HONOUR said that not the shadow of a suggestion had been thrown out that the steps taken by Mr. Leech had been improper or prejudicial to the interests of the creditors. It was not for him to conjecture the motives which now animated Mr. Wynn; certainly, his letter which had been read was conclusive evidence that he had not only not opposed the appointment of Mr. Leech, but that he had expressly approved of it. His present opposition was manifestly an afterthought, and, if he was only anxious for the best interests of the creditors, he was at a loss to understand why he opposed Mr. Leech's appointment. No reason whatever had been adduced why he should adopt the extremely harsh course of removing Mr. Leech from his position as solicitor to the trustees, and in his judgment any opposition to him was ill-founded and groundless. The appointment would, therefore, be confirmed and continued.

Hextall then said that on behalf of Mr. Leech he had fought the matter on principle, and because insinuations such as had been thrown out should be at once repelled. At the same time, having fought and won, he might now add that, from a conversation he had just had with Mr. Harrison, he felt warranted in stating that the appointment itself was to Mr. Leech a matter of perfect indifference, and that having carried his point, he would now give place to some other gentleman who might be selected. The details were purely for Mr. Leech to arrange, and must be settled by him upon his return. All that was cared for was that the creditors' property should not be squandered in costs, which would be the result if a solicitor from a distance was retained in the case.

His HONOUR said the feeling of antagonism which had been needlessly imported into this case was most objectionable and painful. Contests created friction, friction created delay, and delay created expense. Mr. Leech was fully justified in repelling the insinuations which had been made, and to which no one who knew him would give credence; and, having successfully done this, the intimation given by Mr. Hextall was wise, graceful, and liberal, and was just what he should have expected from Mr. Leech had he himself been present.

HOLLAND'S TRUSTEES v. STORK BROTHERS AND TAYLOR.

Seizure by execution creditor—Power of court over sheriff—Fraudulent conveyance.

THIS was the second application, and was for an order directing the sheriff to pay over to the trustees of Holland a sum of £132, which he had received under an execution issued at the instance of Storks, of Birmingham.

Hextall said the facts were very simple and undisputed, but great importance attached to the dates. A writ was issued by Storks on the 21st of last October, to recover £205 16s. 1d. Judgment was signed by default on Nov. 13; a fi. fa. was issued, and the sheriff's bailiff levied on the 14th. On the 18th the debtor paid the bailiff £100, and on the 21st a further sum of £32. On the 24th he filed a petition for the liquidation of his affairs; Mr. Harrison, the accountant, was appointed receiver, and the bailiff went out of possession. The meeting of creditors was held at Mr. Leech's office on the 20th Dec., when Mr. Samuel Evans, of Derby, and Mr. Winn, of Birmingham, were appointed the trustees, and Mr. Harrison the accountant to the estate. On the 23rd Dec. an interpleader summons was issued, at the instance of the sheriff, in the Court of Exchequer; but the hearing had been adjourned until the 21st of this month, so that meantime his Honour might have an opportunity of hearing and deciding upon the case. Hextall quoted authorities to prove that the provisions of the Court of Bankruptcy enable it to do complete justice in all cases arising before it, and contended that when interpleader proceedings are necessary they should be taken in the courts within whose jurisdiction they arise. Upon the question whether the £132 belonged to the execution creditor or to the trustees, he referred to the case of Woodhouse v. Murray (16 L. T. Rep. N.S.); of Pearson v. Mortimer (28 L. T. Rep. N. S.), and to the more recent case of Brooker v. Hassall (29 L. T. Rep. N. S.). He also contended that it was an Act of Bankruptcy which came within sect. 6, sub-sect. 2; and further, that the whole circumstances were equivalent in point of law as if a seizure and sale had actually taken place, which under the 87th section of the Act—the petition having been filed within fourteen days—would cause the property to revert to the debtor's trustees. He also held that it was a fraudulent conveyance and preference, under 92nd section.

Briggs, who appeared for the sheriff, said it did not matter to him who received the money, but he was in this fix—both parties claimed it, and if it was paid to the trustees the execution creditor had threatened to sue for the amount. The sheriff was therefore bound, in order to protect himself, to issue the interpleader summons, and he (Briggs) very much doubted whether this court had the power to restrain him.

His HONOUR said it was ridiculous to suppose the court could restrain the execution creditor and not be able to restrain the sheriff, who was merely his agent. He should not trouble Mr. Hextall to reply, but he should hold beyond question that the court was armed with plenary powers, and could restrain not only the sheriff, but the Court of Exchequer, from proceeding further.

Briggs then asked the court to restrain the execution creditor from proceeding against the sheriff, who had received intimation that an action would be brought against him.

Hextall objected that this was not before the court. It was quite possible that an action might lie against the sheriff for neglecting to sell within a reasonable period, and then the court neither could nor would protect him; but for anything done in obedience to the order of the court he would no doubt be amply protected.

After a long discussion,

His HONOUR said that the greater do not always like to be restrained by the lesser; and although it was competent for him to restrain Baron Bramwell from proceeding further, he thought, with all the facts before him, that as the proceedings had been commenced in the Court of Exchequer, and the execution creditor had intimated that he should not be satisfied with the judgment of this court, the least expensive and most satisfactory course for him to adopt would be to leave the case to be decided by Baron Bramwell.

LEGAL NEWS.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Monday, Jan. 26.

THE RETIREMENT OF BARON MARTIN.

THE court was occupied with cases in the special paper, and in the afternoon the Attorney-General came into court, as the head of the English Bar, to say a few words of farewell to Sir Samuel Martin on his retirement from his judicial position. The court was densely crowded, there being present many of the more eminent of the Queen's Counsel, and a great assemblage of barristers and ladies.

Sir Samuel came into court supported by the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Lord Chief Baron, Baron Pigott, Mr. Justice Mellor, Mr. Justice Lush, and Baron Cleasby.

When the Attorney-General rose the whole assembage did the like, and remained standing during the delivery of his speech and Sir Samuel's reply.

The Attorney-General said:—My Lords,—I have to ask your permission to address a few words to Mr. Baron Martin. Baron Martin, my brethren of the Bar have gathered here to-day; they have come, not because a Baron of this court is about to quit it—not because the senior member of the Judicial Bench is about to leave it—they are here to bear testimony to a public life of great value and virtue, and to show their estimation of much personal worth. A quarter of a century has passed and gone since you first sat upon the Bench. Those who were your associates at the Bar have for the most part passed away. Some there are who still remain. They are here to-day mingling with the junior of this Term's creation, and from one and all, from all within that range, comes the concurrent testimony I now place before you. My Lord, they have recognised in you a Judge who has so read and administered the law that justice has ever been done. They have seen you guided by a single-minded purpose, which caused you, careless alike of who was suitor or who was advocate, ever to be led to a right determination. Whether we have guided or reflected public opinion, our profession and the public have united with us in a sure and certain confidence that no object or end was yours but to administer true and substantial justice. My Lord, it would be false flattery to say that you were a judge without faults; but when we saw them we ever traced them to the cause that you were too prone to lead mercy to that seat on which justice alone should be seen, and thus knowing as we did the goodness of your heart, believe me, my Lord, that with us, if ever error there has been in our bearing towards you, it was because in the appreciation of the man we almost forgot our consideration for the judge. Years, my Lord, have brought the time of retirement to you. We are told that time has come upon you with regret, and that with memory and mind still unimpaired you would seek to linger in public life. Believe me, my Lord, that we fully share that regret with you. The choice has been your own, and we can do no more than follow you into that retirement with earnest hopes and wishes. My Lord, these are our words of farewell to you. We earnestly trust that in that retirement you will be sustained by being able to reflect upon a long life of public service and of private good, and may you also have secured to you that happiness which good men earn, and which we pray, my Lord, may be given to you, and now, my Lord, farewell.

Baron MARTIN said in reply, with a voice tremulous with emotion, — Mr. Attorney-General, I should be more or less than a man if I did not feel most deeply grateful for the very great honour you have done me. I have been for upwards of forty years publicly engaged in the practice and administration of the law, and open to the observation of all. The remembrance that the Bar of England should have done me the honour upon my retirement—a retirement which has been forced upon me by a visitation of Providence—which you have just done me, will remain to the last hour of my life a source of pride and gratification to me, and should be a source of pride and gratification to my descendants to the most remote posterity, for it is an honour which the wealth of the world could not purchase. [His Lordship here was perfectly overcome by emotion] And I have only to wish you all success and happiness, and bid you farewell.

His learned brothers on the bench took a kind and affectionate farewell of him, and Sir Samuel Martin retired, but many years must pass away before his name will cease to be spoken and remembered in Westminster Hall.

POLICE MAGISTRATES.—Mr. Maude, who has been a magistrate at the Woolwich and Greenwich police court for twelve years past, has sent in his resignation of the office.

MR. AUBIN, senior judge of the Royal Court in Jersey, died on Wednesday morning, at the age of 78. The death of Judge Raines, of the Malton County Court, is also announced, having occurred with some degree of suddenness at Hull.

THE SPRING CIRCUITS OF THE JUDGES.—The Norfolk circuit (Mr. Justice Blackburn and Mr. Justice Brett) was fixed on Thursday morning as follows, viz.: Oakham, Monday, March 2; Lincoln, Tuesday, March 3; Northampton, Saturday, March 7; Aylesbury, Thursday, March 12: Bedford, Monday, March 16; Huntingdon, Thursday, March 19; Cambridge, Saturday, March 21; Norwich, Thursday, March 26; and Ipswich, Wednesday, April 1.

RITUALISM.—The Chancellor of the Diocese of York, in the case of Roughton v. Parnell, has commenced legal proceedings against the vicar of St. Margaret's, Prince's-road, Liverpool.

TAXATION OF COSTS.—A "Firm of Solicitors" complain to the Times that they are to wait for nearly two months to tax a bill of costs in Chancery. They suggest that to abate this detriment more taxing masters should be appointed.

THE SWINEY PRIZE.—The Society of Arts have awarded this prize, a silver goblet, valued at £100, and containing gold coins to the same amount, to Sir Robert J. Phillimore, D.C.R., Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, for his work, entitled, "Commentaries on International Law."

CHURCH LAW.—In the case of Blake v. The Churchwardens of Wetherall, which raises the question of the legality of "Christmas decorations" in churches, the Chancellor has ordered the libel to be filed forthwith in the Consistory Court of Carlisle.

THE NEW JUDGE.—In the Court of Exchequer on Tuesday, Baron Amphlett, the new judge, took his seat. He was accompanied by the Lord Chief Baron and Barons Pigott and Cleasby. There was no form or ceremony observed on the occasion. The court sat in banco.

THE STAMP ACT.—A "Conveyancer" in the Times complains that the stamp laws generally require to be simplified and amended, and "that a decided case on the stamp laws means usually a case in which an honest transaction is invalidated, or at least impugned, on the ground of non-compliance with a fiscal regulation."

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.—The Judge of the Westminster County Court has declined to commit the Earl of Winchilsea, although an unsatisfied judgment affects his lordship personally. It was contended for the judgment creditor that the Bankruptcy Act has abolished the privilege of peerage, and the Debtors Act that of debtors.

IT is announced in the Gazette that the Queen has been pleased to appoint Mr. Julian Pauncefote to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the Leeward Islands; Mr. John Rawlins Semper to be first Puisne Judge; and Mr. Sholto Thomas Pemberton to be second Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of the Leeward Islands.

MAKING A JUDGE.—The short and simple ceremonial usually gone through when a member of the bar is called up to join his brethren on the bench, was viewed with some interest on Saturday, when the new judge-elect took his seat as Junior Baron of the Exchequer. If the Judicature Act comes into operation in November, this may be the last instance of a judge being first received amongst the brotherhood of the coif. The old rank "antient and honourable in degree, with form, splendour, and profits attending it," as Blackstone describes it, will no longer be amongst the formal qualifications for the Bench. The Lord Chancellor could not retain it amongst those "concessions to prejudice," by which he permitted certain of the members of her Majesty's High Court of Justice to preserve the old distinctions of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer. And yet the degree of serjeant-at-law had many points to recommend it. It distinctly partook of that mediævalism which throws a sombre colour over the early proceedings in the King's Chancery. In the famous statute of 3 Edw. 1, c. 29, we meet probably the first official mention of the serjeants, although in the life of John II., Abbot of St. Alban's, written by Matthew Paris, in 1255, they are spoken of as an order of men well known in the country. The same writer in a history of England, published a few years later, gives us the explanation of the use and origin of the coif. A celebrated serjeant-at-law, by name William de Busoy, had acquired such a notoriety for extortion and malpractices that he was brought up to account for them. He thereupon claimed his benefit of clergy, to which body it had not been known that he belonged. In order to substantiate his claim, he directed that the threads of his coif should be opened, so that his judges might see whether he possessed the clerical tonsure. Spelman, on the authority of this passage, lays down that coifs were introduced to hide the tonsure of such renegade clerks as were still tempted to remain in the secular courts in the quality of advocates, notwithstanding their prohibition by canon. Even in our days much of the pomp and state connected with the creation of serjeants has passed away, and has declined into the observance of a few forms that might well have remained. The Bar will remember the circumstances of the present Lord Chief Justice of England's creation, and contrast them with the extreme simplicity of the ceremony in conforming to which Lord Coleridge dined in the hall of his old inn, and left for the last time as a bencher, while the bell tolled mournfully for his exclusion. But even that much formality will become a mere matter of tradition, and the future editor of the "Pickwick Papers" will have to explain by a foot note how it is that Mr. Justice Stareleigh addressed the plaintiff's counsel as Brother Buzfuz.—Globe.

MIDDLESEX MAGISTRATES.—Messrs. Philip Hardwick and H. D. Phillips were sworn in as Justices of the Peace on the 20th inst.

THE EUROPEAN ASSURANCE ARBITRATION.—Lord Romilly has appointed Monday, the 2nd Feb., for the commencement of a sitting in this arbitration.

THE honour of knighthood has been conferred on Mr. Julian Pauncefote, Chief Justice of the Leeward Islands, and late Attorney-General of Hong Kong.

THE Telegraph states that Sir Samuel Martin will be raised to the dignity of a Privy Councillor.

SIR JAMES COLVILE, the Senior Judge of the Judicial Committee, is suffering from an attack of measles.

MR. HAWKINS'S SPEECH.—The conclusion of Mr. Hawkins' great speech was, we read, greeted with "a burst of applause," which was immediately suppressed, the Lord Chief Justice remarking that "there was nothing so offensive to the administration of justice as such demonstrations in a court of law." This is, of course, true, and however brilliant an advocate's speech, it ought always to be received in silence. But possibly part of the applause may not have been one-sided in its nature, but may have sprung from a feeling of joy that the last speech in this long case had at length been made. In saying this we do not in the least desire to diminish the glory with which Mr. Hawkins has covered himself. Whatever may be a man's feelings in regard to the issue before the jury, he must admit Mr. Hawkins' speech to be one of the greatest forensic efforts upon record. Everybody who had ever listened to Mr. Hawkins knew that his speech would be lucid and humorous, wherever humour could be made to tell; but we think few can have expected that there would have been so much genuine eloquence. In his previous speeches Mr. Hawkins has made little attempt to work upon the feelings. He has always been witty, but very seldom solemn or impassioned. He has now shown that in this department of oratory he is almost as distinguished as in that which has been considered pre-eminently his own, and his speech which ended yesterday will be admired, in addition to its other merits, for the many passages of simple, manly, impressive eloquence, disfigured by no false clap-trap or barbaric ornamentation.—Echo, Jan. 29.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editor is not responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS.—The examination of attorneys was ordered by Parliament (4 Hen. 4, c. 18), and in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James I. attempts were made to increase their legal knowledge. During the Commonwealth, A.D. 1654, examiners were appointed by rule of court, and the statutes (2 Geo. 2, c. 22, and 22 Geo. 2, c. 46), were designed to improve the education of attorneys and solicitors. But Lord Ellenborough, when Chief Justice, complained that the statute 4 Geo. 2, c. 26, by making it necessary to render legal proceedings in the English language, had caused attorneys to recede in knowledge; and in 1825 the late Mr. Robert Maugham lamented "that students and junior legal practitioners had neither opportunity nor incitement to extend their knowledge and to cultivate their talents." A few years later, the Incorporated Law Society's periodical examination of articled clerks inaugurated a new era as to solicitors and attorneys. More recently, this ordeal has been made more comprehensive and stricter than it was, consequently it is now more salutary and useful. Since the year 1785, to increase the respectability of attorneys and solicitors, and the public revenue during the war, annual stamped certificates have been required to enable them to practise legally. By rule of court 8 Geo. 3 their places of residence were ordered to be published. The ancient practice relative to their membership of some inn of court, has been obsolete for many years. The original certificate duty (see 25 Geo. 3, c. 80, and 37 Geo. 3, c. 90) was £5 for a London attorney, and £3 for a provincial attorney. By 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, these sums were increased to £12 and £8 respectively, as to practitioners of three years' standing, until which period £6 and £4 were paid respectively. A similar law prevailed with reference to Irish and Scotch attorneys. In 1854 the stamp on the indenture of clerkship, fixed by this statute at £120, was reduced to £80, as to English, Welsh and Irish attorneys, and to £60 as to those in Scotland. The annual certificate was reduced to £9, £4 10s., £6, and £3 respectively (see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 63). The £25 stamp on their admission, imposed by 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, in the year 1815, was retained, and by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 19, the place of business has been substituted for that of residence of the attorney. The duties are now charged by the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97. Mr. Tilsley, in his work upon the Stamp Duties, refers to 5 Will. & M. c. 21; 9 Will. 3, c. 25; 12 Anne, stat. 2, c. 9; 2 Geo. 2, c. 46; 23 Geo. 2, c. 26; 23 Geo. 3, c. 58; 44 Geo. 3, c. 98; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 63—all repealed by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73—and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 99, as statutes affecting attorneys and solicitors; containing also regulations as to their admission. By 34 Geo. 3, c. 14, the duty on the articles of clerkship was fixed at £100, this indenture having been required by 2 Geo. 2, c. 23, and 30 Geo. 2, c. 19. The annual certificate duty should be abolished, as was suggested by me (LAW TIMES, No. 1413), or regulated according to profits, and all solicitors should be charged accordingly. The stamps on admission and on the articles, seem to be more fair, and less liable to objection. I have paid, at least, £250 as an articled clerk and solicitor, in stamps, since my signature of articles in 1838, and yet I am not entitled to have my name inserted in the Law List without making an annual payment, irrespective of profits! The question deserves the notice of all law societies, and of the Government. CHR. COOKE.

LEGAL EDUCATION—GRAY'S INN—CALLS TO THE BAR.—I do not find your usual report of the Calls to the Bar during the present Hilary Term. This society on Monday last called four members to the Bar. In the sixteen previous terms the society called only thirteen members. The income of the society during the same period was £33,372 18s. 8d (thirty-three thousand three hundred and seventy-two pounds eighteen shillings and eight pence). Attorneys and solicitors are now arbitrarily excluded from being members. Your insertion of this will greatly oblige

59. TRUSTS—EXECUTION BY DEVISEE.—In the note to Lord Braybroke v. Inskip, in Tudor's Leading Real Property Cases (3rd edit., p. 893), it is stated that "where property is vested in trustees upon trusts to be executed by them, or the survivor of them, or the heirs of the survivor, the trusts cannot be executed by the devisee of the survivor," and several cases in point are cited. But would not a devise by the surviving trustee be equivalent to an appointment of the devisee as trustee, and consequently effectual as such, under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, sect. 272? LL.B.

LAW SOCIETIES.

THE ASSOCIATED LAW CLERKS OF IRELAND.

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

IN rendering an account of their stewardship for the past year, your committee consider that a correct estimate of their actions cannot be arrived at without taking a retrospective view of the social position of the law clerk prior to the formal inauguration of this association two years ago. At that time the law clerks had no organisation to carry out any of the views they entertained; no means of placing their wants and the numerous questions affecting them before the public; no way of obtaining, by the irresistible force of public opinion, that recognition which their position and services deserved; no way of making a demand for any concession or any advantage with the smallest effect. This state of things is gradually being removed by the action of your association. The law clerks have now an association which is daily increasing in strength and influence. Your committee, however, have to repeat the regret mentioned in the report issued by their predecessors, of the apathy still manifested by many of their order. Instead of supporting a society like yours, they are scattered about amongst the various bodies in the city. They are Foresters, Odd Fellows, Members of Debating, literary, and musical associations—members of every kind of society but one having for its object the advancement of their own order. There is no reason why all the advantages to be obtained from such societies should not be available within or in connection with your association.

Your committee are glad to state that during the year the association has been joined by a number of the leading law clerks in the city; and from the feeling that is now pervading the minds of many who have not formally joined it, your committee are confident that before the close of another year no law clerk of any standing will be found outside its ranks. The spread of the movement throughout the provinces is naturally slow, owing to the distances which separate law clerks from each other; but, nevertheless, some of the most regular of the paying members to the association belong to the provinces.

Your committee have, however, to complain of the want of interest manifested in the affairs of the association by many of its best paying members. It is not enough to become mere subscribers. Members should supervise the acts of the committee, and from time to time give directions for the management of the association. Your committee would also desire to impress upon the members the necessity of making punctual payments of their subscriptions. The amount is so small that there really is no excuse for irregularity.

Your association, while protecting the rights of its members, also aims at elevating their social and educational position; and taking into account the means afforded with that view, and the fact that the association was not fully formed until January 1872, your committee think that the success attendant upon such efforts is highly gratifying. The annexed balance sheet will show that the financial position of the association is most prosperous.

It being the unanimous opinion of the committee that some effectual check should be put upon the dangerous facility with which persons totally disqualified by utter want of training, character, or knowledge, can now assume the name of law clerk, a proposition was brought forward at one of the general meetings of the association, recommending that the system of registering law clerks—already existing in the Landed Estates' Court—should be extended to all the courts. The question was very fully discussed at a numerously attended meeting, and was affirmed by an overwhelming majority. Your committee earnestly recommend this subject to the consideration of their successors and the association at large, as they are of opinion until some such system of registration shall be adopted, the respectable and properly qualified law clerk will never obtain that due recognition of his position and services which it is one of the fundamental objects of the association to secure for him. It is suggested that a general roll of law clerks should be prepared under the sanction of the proper authorities, upon which none but qualified law clerks should be placed, and from which clerks who bring discredit upon their order should be struck off and prevented from transacting business. In our present unprotected state there is nothing to prevent persons destitute alike of character and competency from assuming the name of "law clerk," and thus lowering the status of the properly qualified assistant.

In any such system of registration the interests of junior clerks should be carefully provided for.

The inconvenience imposed by the new Juries

Act, under which law clerks are liable to serve on juries, was prominently brought under the notice of your committee. It happened that a member of the association was actually summoned to attend on a jury in an action in which he had prepared the case for proofs, the pleadings, and served the notice of trial. The Parliamentary Committee appointed to inquire into the working of the Act was communicated with by the secretary, with a view of having law clerks exempted from its operation, and replies promising attention to the subject were received from the Marquis of Hartington, chairman of the committee, Lord Crichton, and Colonel Wilson Patten, late chief Secretary for Ireland. The letters received during this correspondence assured the committee that in future legislation law clerks would be exempted from this unsuitable duty.

A well-supported movement to form a Provident and Benevolent Institute in connection with the present association, but distinct as far as management and finance were concerned, was made at an advanced period of the year, and an undertaking to aid in the formation of such an institute has been signed by about forty of the most influential members of the association. Your committee urgently recommend that this movement be encouraged by the association. Every properly organized body should have in connection with it a means of assisting its members when out of employment by sickness or otherwise, and of relieving the orphans and widows of members when their bread-winners have been removed by the hand of death.

The question of the Saturday half-holiday is still in an unsettled state. During the vacation your committee are happy to say the half-holiday was granted by the solicitors who signed the undertaking in 1872. Its enjoyment, however, during the entire year cannot be had until the offices of the courts shall be closed at an early hour on Saturday. A memorial to the judges, praying for this, was forwarded to them by your committee in Easter Term, and your secretary has since been in correspondence with a number of the individual members of the Irish Bench on the subject. No formal reply has as yet been received to the memorial, but the Lord Chancellor, as head of the legal authorities in this country, has caused inquries to be instituted in the offices of the different courts as to the effect which early closing would have on the business; and your committee have ascertained, from authentic sources, that the chiefs of some of the most important departments have reported that the early closing on Saturdays would be beneficial. Unofficial replies to the memorial, expressing sympathy with the movement, have been received from the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, Mr. Justice Keogh, Mr. Justice Lawson, Barons Deasy and Dowse, Judge Harrison, Judge Flanagan, and Judge Townsend. Your committee recommend their successors to strain every nerve to bring this important question to a successful issue.

The registrar of situations reports that he has received numerous applications from solicitors seeking for clerks from amongst your body, but as few of the members were out of employment, only a small body number of the vacancies were filled. This is a striking evidence of the growing importance of your association, and shows that the careful selection of members, and the educational advantages afforded by the association, is gradually convincing the Profession that the best employés are to be found within the association.

WORCESTER LAW SOCIETY.

THE general annual meeting of the Worcester and Worcestershire Law Society was held in the library on Thursday, the 22nd January 1874. Present, Mr. R. P. Hill, president; Messrs. Bentley, Hyde, Hughes, Corbett, Crisp, Abell; Allen, hon. sec. The accounts having been audited, showed a balance of £75 8s. 3d. in favour of the society. The report of the committee showed that two members, Mr. Hyla Holden and Mr. Knipe, had resigned upon their retirement from the Profession. Three new members—namely, Messrs. Henry Corbett and John Thompson, of Worcester, and Mr. George Coventry, of Upton-on-Severn, had been elected members. The total number of present members and subscribers being seventy-six as against seventy-four in the preceding year.

The number of books taken out of the library up to the 31st December last, exclusive of periodicals, was 1084, being a decrease of 108 upon those taken out in 1872.

The report set out at some length the action of the society in reference to the Land Transfer Bill, the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill, and other legal measures of the past session.

A memorial to the Lord Chancellor, praying that the city of Worcester might be made one of the registries under the provisions of the Judicature Act, was read and adopted, and sent to Baron Amphlett for presentation.

A vote of congratulation to Baron Amphlett on his recent judicial appointment, was passed.

Mr. Martin Curtler was elected president, Mr. Samuel M. Beale vice-president, and Mr. William Allen re-elected hon. secretary and treasurer, who, with Messrs. Bentley, Southall, Hyde, Hughes, and Corbett, form the committee for the present year.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at Clement's Inn Hall, on Wednesday, the 28th Jan., Mr. I. Rubenstein in the chair. Mr. Baber opened the subject for the evening's debate, viz.: "That it is desirable to assimilate the county with the borough franchise, and to have a re-distribution of seats." The motion was lost by a majority of one.

NOTE.—This department of the LAW TIMES, is contributed by EDWARD WALFORD, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Geneaiogical and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the LAW TIMES Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

J. BAMFORTH, ESQ.

THE late Joseph Bamforth, Esq., solicitor, and alderman of Rotherham, who died on the 18th inst., at his residence, Southbourne House, in that town, in the sixty-third year of his age, was born in 1810, and admitted a solicitor in Easter Term, 1836, and had been in practice at Rotherham for a period of nearly forty years. For some fifteen or sixteen years he was a most useful and energetic member and a regular attendant at the meetings of the old Local Board of Health of Rotherham, and took a very prominent part in the advocacy of the purchase of the Rotherham Gas Works, and was present before the Parliamentary Committee in London to assist in the consummation of the objects the local board had in view. On the incorporation of Rotherham as a municipal borough in 1871, Mr. Bamforth was one of the gentlemen elected a councillor to represent the West Ward in the council, and at its first meeting, when the mayor and aldermen were to be elected, he was chosen as one to sit on the aldermanic bench. That position, says the Sheffield Daily Telegraph, he faithfully held, and he was present at the last general meeting of the council, which was held on the 7th of the present month. Mr. Bamforth took great interest in the welfare of the town of Rotherham, and was a strong supporter of friendly societies, to more than one of which he had acted as secretary for many years. The deceased gentleman has left a family of six children to lament his loss.

H. LINGEN, ESQ.

THE late Henry Lingen, Esq., barrister-at-law, of Penlanole, Radnorshire, who died on the 22nd inst., at his residence, near Rhayader, in the seventy-second year of his age, was the second son of the late William Lingen, Esq., formerly of Burghill Lodge, Herefordshire, by Anne, daughter of John Barrett, Esq., of Hollins Hill, Worcestershire. He was born in the year 1803, and was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple, in Michaelmas Term 1838. He was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for Radnorshire, for which county he served the office of high sheriff in 1839. Mr. Lingen married in 1837 Priscilla, daughter of Joseph Jones, Esq., of Aberystwith, Cardiganshire, by whom he has left surviving issue Charles Nelson, who is a magistrate for the county of Radnor, and in holy orders.

W. T. HALY, ESQ.

THE late William Taylor Haly, Esq., barrister-at-law, who died on the 10th inst., at Queensborough-terrace, Bayswater, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late Lieutenant Richard Standish Haly, R.N. (a distinguished officer who served in Egypt under Lord Keith), and was born at Poole, Dorsetshire, in the year 1818. In early life he accompanied his father to the West Indies, and subsequently made an extended tour through the United States. On his return he devoted himself to literary pursuits, and was for some time connected with the press, notably with the Times and Daily News. He was called to the Bar by the honourable society of the Middle Temple in Easter Term 1849, and practised for some years at the Parliamentary Bar with considerable success. His first retainer, immediately after his call, was for the Corporation of the City of London in opposition to the Smithfield Cattle Market Bill, and he continued through life to enjoy the confidence of the Corporation, having been specially retained only last session in their great contest with the Endowed Schools Commission. Mr. Haly was an advanced Liberal in politics, and in 1852 he became a candidate for the representation of Paisley, when, after a severe and exciting contest, he was defeated by a very small majority. In recognition of Mr. Haly's services in the Liberal cause, the inhabitants of the town subsequently raised a large sum of money by subscription to present him with a testimonial, which took the form of a handsome silver epergne, bearing a suitable inscription, together with the arms of the borough. In 1856, and again in 1859, Mr. Haly was a candidate for the representation of his native town, Poole, but was defeated on each occasion. It should be mentioned that Mr. Haly was the head of a very ancient and loyal Irish family, branches of which were settled for many generations at Towryne, co. Limerick, and at Bally-Haly, co. Cork. Sir Nicholas Haly of Tremaine, an attached adherent of Charles I., was, for important services rendered to the royal cause, created a baronet and subsequently raised to the peerage by that unfortunate monarch. The letters of the king, dated Newcastle 1647, conferring these dignities, are extant, but the troubles of the times prevented the completion of the patents, and Cromwell, on the capitulation of Limerick, confiscated the property in that county. The family remained settled at Bally-Haly, co. Cork, until the close of the last century, when Mr. Haly's grandfather, on his marriage with Miss Bowker, of Lightbourn Hall, Lancashire, took up his residence in England. The Earl of Donoughmore is a branch of this family, which, according to Lavoisne and other genealogists, trace back to a remote period in Irish history, having been established in that country long before Strongbow's invasion. Mr. Haly's remains were interred at the cemetery, near Poole, Dorset, on Saturday, the 17th inst. The funeral, by express desire, was strictly private, but it was attended by several devoted friends.

The Law and the Lawyers.

THE House of Commons has lost a useful legal member in Mr. HINDE PALMER, Q.C., who appears to be one of the victims of the altered sentiments of some of the constituencies. The learned gentleman was beaten by a Conservative Colonel in the contest for Lincoln City. Mr. PALMER's principal work was a Bill for the removal of the existing disabilities of married women with reference to property, and in this respect he was certainly the most advanced reformer. He was a speaker of some force, and took a prominent part in the debate on the Judicature Bill. Although we did not agree with his views on the subject of married women, we regret that he has lost his seat.

IT occurs to us as somewhat remarkable that the election speeches of the last ten days have been almost entirely devoid of reference to a subject which was lately supposed to be of paramount importance—the amendment of the land laws. The financial mania appears to have seized everybody, from Baron ROTHSCHILD to Mr. ODGER, and amidst the exultation of the Liberal party over a surplus of five millions, and the scoffs of the Conservatives, the land question has disappeared. When our politicians are driven for subjects to quarrel about so far back as the Crimean War, and so far away as the Straits of Malacca, it leads to the belief that reform, in dealing with land tenure and land transfer, is not one of the "burning questions" of the day. We indeed incline to the opinion that the public are not altogether discontented with the existing state of charges, and that they do not grudge payment for what they know will render them as secure in their titles as the law permits. And we know for a fact that in many districts it is becoming a practice for an agreed sum to be paid for conveyancing business according to the nature of the work. If this course were generally pursued, much of the complaint which occasionally finds expression would entirely disappear. At any rate it is clear that there are many more pressing and difficult questions to be solved before the land laws occupy a front place in the political programme.

IN the list of new Queen's Counsel, just created by the LORD CHANCELLOR, one name occurs which the other able men on whom this dignity has been conferred would probably be first to acknowledge as the most widely and familiarly known among their number. Both in the Colonies and in America "Clark's House of Lords' Cases" are cited as the authoritative record of the decisions of the highest Court of Appeal in Great Britain, whilst the value of these reports to lawyers in this country for a legal generation has been admitted. In other branches of professional pursuits Mr. CLARK'S name is also to be met with. In nearly all the recent Peerage cases he has held a brief; he has acted for many years as Revising Barrister for the County of Hertford; was one of the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the criminal laws of the Channel Islands; and is the author, among other legal essays, of a standard work, entitled "Summary of Colonial Law," referred to with approval by Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN in the course of his charge to the grand jury in the case of The Queen v. Nelson and Brand. The mark of recognition by the Lord Chancellor has, in this instance, clearly followed the voice of the Profession, for, in Hilary Term 1872, whilst still a stuff gownsman, the high compliment was paid to Mr. CHARLES CLARK of electing him a Bencher of the Middle Temple, at the same time that a similar tribute was paid to the standing and qualities of Mr. CHARLES HALL, since promoted to be one of the Vice-Chancellors.

AN important question, affecting the right of habeas corpus in civil cases, was raised in a case recently before the Irish Court of Queen's Bench. A civil bill process was brought against a defendant, not specifying the date when the debt accrued, for a debt which in fact accrued after the passing of the Debtors' Act (Ireland) 1872; and the defendant not appearing, a decree was granted for the amount. The entry of the decree in the book of the clerk of the peace did not specify the date when the debt accrued, or whether execution was to be against the person or goods of the defendant. The decree was filled up by the clerk of the plaintiff's attorney with an award of execution against the goods; but afterwards the attorney, without any fraudulent intention, inserted in the decree the words "in the year 1871," as being the date when the debt accrued, and induced the clerk of the peace to alter the award of execution, making same against the body. The chairman, misled by the decree as altered, signed same; and the defendant was arrested on the decree after the coming into operation of the Debtors' Act. The question was whether he was entitled to be discharged from custody on a writ of habeas corpus. It was argued by the counsel for the plaintiff that the civil bill decree was only issued irregularly, and that if so, a habeas corpus would not lie. The court did not assent to this proposition, and having examined several cases, which will be found in a report which appears in another column, decided that there was perfect authority for liberating the prisoner, not derived alone from statute, but fortified also by the common law. It would have been startling indeed if an irregular arrest could have deprived a debtor of his liberty until he paid the debt.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL has been somewhat facetious concerning the "writ of pains and penalties" with which Mr. GLADSTONE was said to have been threatened. The instigator of this mysterious process turns out to be a cork leg manufacturer, and Sir HENRY JAMES suggests that no one but a cork leg manufacturer could have invented it. Humour has not been superabundant during the elections, and even this dreary flash of fun is not to be despised, although it would be somewhat unfair were the merits of a quo warranto information to be judged of by the trade or business of the relator; and if the cork leg manufacturer has misnamed his legal process, the slip is one which an Attorney-General might have allowed to pass. This fringe being taken off we have the fact that before the dissolution Mr. GLADSTONE had notice that a quo warranto information would be applied for calling upon him to show by what authority he claimed to sit for Greenwich. We noticed the Acts, out of which the question arises, when the Premier combined his two offices in his own person, and doubted whether he could hold them without re-election. There was no authority upon the subject, and we therefore now put it on record, as the opinion of eminent persons, such as Lord COLERIDGE and Sir GEORGE JESSEL, Sir HENRY JAMES and Sir VERNON HARCOURT, that the First Lord of the Treasury, by accepting the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, is not required to seek re-election. This opinion was given by law officers, and the question arose on the construction of particular statutes. Consequently it cannot be inferred as an absolute certainty that judicial decision would be in accordance with such opinion, and it would be desirable to make the matter clear by further legislation.

THE elevation of Baron AMPHLETT from the Equity Bar to the Common Law Bench was doubtless in pursuance of the scheme for the fusion of Law and Equity which the Judicature Act has already initiated, and therefore much to be commended. But we hope this process of amalgamation will be carried out with strict impartiality. If equity lawyers are to be promoted to the Common Law Bench, the Common Law Bar should occupy some of the seats upon the Equity Bench, and we wish to protest by anticipation against a large extension of the design which has been exhibited in the unexceptionable selection of Baron AMPHLETT. The Equity Bar will not, we hope, be often preferred to the Common Law Bar for the judgeships which must for a long time be looked upon as forming a Bench of Common lawyers. The Common Law Bar has no lack of men entitled to promotion. The name of Mr. HAWKINS, whose clear and logical mind pre-eminently fits him for the duties of Nisi Prius and criminal courts, will at once suggest itself. Serjeant SIMON has proved in the House of Commons his capacity for dealing with legal reforms, and his promotion would be approved by the Profession by whom he is held in great esteem. Mr. GIFFARD is an excellent lawyer, and as the present Chancellor does not permit judicial patronage to be governed by party considerations, the selection would doubtless recommend itself. His purpose is manifestly to prefer the best man, and we might name a dozen other eminent men at the Common Law Bar from whom selection might be worthily made. Our present purpose is, however, merely to support their claim to the possession of at least the majority of the seats in the courts to which they have been led to look for promotion.

THE rumours that the operation of the Judicature Act is to be postponed have taken definite shape, and we have little doubt that they are well founded. The council of Judges and their very limited number of assistants, we should imagine, have had little time as yet to get the practice rules into anything like shape, even supposing that they have arrived at clear and definite ideas on the subject. That every endeavour will be made to avoid delay we feel convinced, and we are very greatly surprised to observe that a journal which has always been characterised by remarkable appreciation of the higher intelligence of the legal Profession (the Pall Mall Gazette), should suggest that the lawyers will, if they can, put obstacles in the way of the reform inaugurated by the passing of the Act. Speaking of the Act our contemporary says, "Its leading conception is, that there is to be one mode of proceeding, and one only, for every civil case which can come before a court of justice, however simple or however complicated it may happen to be. Though this is unfamiliar to the minds of English lawyers, it is a task which both can and ought to be performed, and any sort of excuse for not performing it ought to be regarded with the utmost possible suspicion." It is something quite new to us that English lawyers having assented almost unanimously to the great principle of the measure, any excuse is open to them for defeating the practical operation of the principle, or that there is a shadow of a pretence for regarding anything done or proposed to be done or omitted by those engaged in framing the rules under the Act with "the utmost possible suspicion." Our contemporary however is apparently better informed, for he does not close his remarks with our quotations, but goes on to observe:—"One of the besetting sins of lawyers, especially of successful lawyers who with grief and pain have acquainted themselves with an old and intricate system of whatever kind, is the sin of making difficulties. It is their profession to magnify the importance of trifles, and to regard every question which may be raised and debated as a possible bar to the application of the most useful principles. The excuses which they may devise for not doing what is required of them are so various, it is so difficult for the outside world to judge of their real importance, and their importance depends so much, when all is said and done, upon the goodwill of the persons who make them, that there is no doubt of the power of the Judges and their advisers practically to compel Parliament to postpone the Bill." This is an extremely grave charge—for charge we take it to be. If there be a desire to exercise extreme care, and to pay attention to trifles, and if the result is inevitable delay, we should consider that the ultimate saving of expense to the public would far outweigh any advantage to be gained by hastening the Act into operation. To this, however, the Pall Mall Gazette seems to shut its eyes, for it is evidently not ignorant of the amount of case law which has been generated by the technical difficulties which have arisen for decision out of even modern pleading. It observes that the amount of case law which will be superseded by the change introduced by the Act can hardly be imagined by anyone who is not a professional lawyer. The amount of case law which may be originated by the hasty drafting of forms of pleading and rules of practice is also probably beyond the comprehension of a person who is not a professional lawyer, if not of the Pall Mall Gazette itself. We repeat that it will be a decided public economy to delay the operation of the measure if the alteration is to hurry it into operation supplemented by a body of crude rules. But whatever the actual state of the case may be, we are persuaded that it is from no ill will to the measure, and from no desire to throw obstacles in the way of its operation, that lawyers are (if such be the fact) raising difficulties. Lawyers are rather anxious to make the plunge into the new practice, and to adjust their business to the altered circumstances.

THE NON-REGISTRATION OF MORTGAGES INCLUDING FIXTURES.

ONCE more a decision has been given upon the question of the necessity for registering as a bill of sale a mortgage of premises, including the trade fixtures; but the Judge who decided it was able to hold that the case was governed by the recent decision of Ex parte Daglish, re Wilde (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 168; L. Rep. 8 Ch. 1072). The last decision was Meux v. Allen, before the Master of the Rolls, on the 22nd ult., and the facts were these:—The defendant, W. Allen, being entitled to the possession of a public house, and to certain fixtures and fittings upon the premises for the residue of a term, applied to the plaintiffs for an advance of £800, which was made to him on the security of the house upon the terms of a deed-poll of the 11th Aug. 1869, whereby Allen agreed to execute a legal mortgage when required, and the lease was at the same time deposited with the plaintiffs. By an indenture of the 7th Dec. 1873, the defendant Allen mortgaged, by way of demise, the premises comprised in the lease to the plaintiffs for the residue of the term. Neither the equitable deposit, nor the mortgage, was registered under the Bills of Sale Act. Allen subsequently executed two registered bills of sale to the other defendants of the fixtures and fittings of the house, some of which had been placed there before the date of the deed-poll, and some subsequently, and the plaintiffs filed their bill alleging that such fixtures formed part of their security, and praying an injunction to restrain the defendants from removing them. And, as we have said, the Master of the Rolls held that the case was governed by Ex parte Daglish, and dismissed the bill.

We may here remind our readers shortly of what Ex parte Daglish decided and the decisions which it affected. There was a mortgage of premises by way of demise, and the mortgage included trade fixtures—the premises being a mill, and the fixtures machinery and in the deed there was a power of sale of the machinery; fixed and moveable, either with the mill or separately. And the decision was that so far as the deed dealt with the fixtures it required registration under the Bills of Sale Act, and therefore that the fixtures were the property of the trustee on the bankruptcy of the mortgagor. This decision is in confirmation of Begbie v. Fenwick (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58) and Hawtrey v. Butlin (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 532; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 290), but is not in accordance with Boyd v. Shorrock (L. Rep. 5 Eq. 72; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 197). The latter case turned in the main upon the nature of the fixtures, being looms fastened by nails to the floors of a cotton mill. Vice-Chancellor Wood there followed the principle which was laid down in Ex parte Barclay (5 De G. M. & G. 403), and which he himself followed in Mather v. Fraser (2 K. & J. 536), namely, that if the tenant has affixed to the freehold during his tenancy articles in such a manner as to make it appear that during the term they are not to be removed, and that he regards them as attached to the property, according to his interest in the property, then, on any dealing by him with the property to which these articles are affixed, the court would presume that he meant to deal with the property as it stood, with all these things so attached, and to pass the property in its then condition. In Mather v. Fraser the Vice-Chancellor had applied to the fixtures which would pass to a mortgagee of the leasehold the term "quasi-permanent"—those articles which are affixed in a quasi-permanent manner. And this term was approved and adopted by the Court of Queen's Bench in Longbottom v. Berry (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 123; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 385), all the machinery in that case which was annexed to the floor, ceilings, or sides of the building in a "quasi-permanent manner" by means of bolts and screws, being held to pass to the equitable mortgagee of the fee.

In judging of these cases attention must be directed to the distinction between mortgages by owners of the freehold and by lessees of a term, pointed out by Lord Justice Mellish in Ex parte Daglish. "The cases," his Lordship said, "where the mortgagors have been freeholders, are plainly distinguishable, because a freeholder cannot be said to be in possession of fixtures which he has put up, although the same things, if put up by a lessee, would be trade fixtures; for in point of law the machinery affixed to the premises is just as much part of the premises as the bricks." On this ground Boyd v. Shorrock has been dissented from, the looms having heen put up temporarily by a lessee of a term for his convenience, and being detachable without damage to themselves or the freehold; and although such fixtures put up by a freeholder would pass under a mortgage of the freehold, they are nevertheless "in the possession" of a leaseholder, so that a pledge of them must be registered under the Bills of Sale Act. In Begbie v. Fenwick (24 L. T. Rep. N.S. 58) Vice-Chancellor Malins said he was unable to understand the grounds of Vice-Chancellor Wood's decision in Boyd v. Shorrock; and in Hawtrey v. Butlin (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 290; 28 L. T. Rep. N.S. 532) both Mr. Justice Blackburn and Mr. Justice Mellor preferred the decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins in Begbie v. Fenwick to that of Vice-Chancellor Wood in Boyd v. Shorrock. Mr. Justice Mellor thought that Vice-Chancellor Wood's attention could not have been called to the interpretation clause of the Bills of Sale Act, and we may remind our readers that "personal chattels" are interpreted to mean "goods, furniture, fixtures, and other articles capable of complete delivery," and as between landlord and tenant, lessor and lessee, looms fixed by nails to a wall for the convenience of the tenant or lessee, are clearly fixtures, and are in the apparent possession of a tenant or lessee. The true construction of the Bills of Sale Act, acccording to Lord Justice Mellish, is that "if a person is in possession of fixtures, then he cannot pledge those fixtures so as to give a title to the mortgagee, except by an instrument which is to be registered as a bill of sale." This passage precedes that which we have already quoted as to the distinction between mortgages by freeholders and by tenants or leaseholders, the freeholder not being merely in possession of the fixtures, but they being a part of his freehold; and Lord Justice James said, "When you once arrive at the fact that a person has the property in fixtures as distinct from their connection with and adhesion to the freehold, then they are, in my opinion, the very class of things which which were intended to be provided for by the Bills of Sale Act."

The law is made quite clear by the cases which we have referred to, and it is plain that the Master of the Rolls could not, had he desired it, have come to a conclusion other than he did in Meux v. Allen without upsetting a string of consistent cases.

ADJUSTMENTS BETWEEN TENANTS FOR LIFE AND REMAINDERMEN.

THE mutual rights of successive takers of settled property, and the corresponding duties of trustees in respect to the conversion and investment of property so situated, form a subject whose main outlines may be considered settled, but the details of which and their application to particular cases frequently leave room for painful embarrassment. We do not at present refer to cases of apportionment, using that term in its narrow sense, but to those larger questions which arise from non-conversion of property which by the terms of the instrument or by the general law ought to be converted. The leading rules deducible from the cases are well stated (1 Jarm. Wills 571 et seq., 3rd edit.), and we propose to notice some of the principal decisions by which those rules have since been illustrated, supplemented, or modified.

The five rules which the learned author lays down relate to the case of a residuary bequest containing a trust for sale and conversion—the case under which the questions we are considering most generally arise.

The first rule, to the effect that the residuary legatee for life is entitled to the income during the first year of property duly invested, was firmly established by the case of Macpherson v. Macpherson in the House of Lords (1 Macq. H. of L. Cas. 243). This rule must be read with the important qualifications introduced by the cases of Allhusen v. Whittell (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 695; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 295), followed by Sir J. Bacon, V.C. in Lambert v. Lambert (43 L. J. Rep. N. S. 106). These decisions will be sufficiently explained by the head note in Allhusen v. Whittell, which is as follows: "Where a testator has bequeathed legacies and given his residue to a tenant for life with remainder over; executors, though as between themselves and the persons interested in the residue, they are at liberty to have recourse to any funds they please in order to pay debts and legacies, yet will be treated by the court, in adjusting the accounts between tenant for life and remainderman, as having paid the debts and legacies not out of capital only, nor out of income only, but with such portion of the capital as, together with the income of that portion for one year, was sufficient for the purpose."

The second rule, which relates to the destination during the first year of the income of the unconverted property, rests on the view taken by Lord Lyndhurst in Dimes v. Scott (4 Russ. 195), viz., that the legatee for life was entitled during the year in lieu of the actual income to the dividends on so much Three per Cent. Consolidated Stock as the proceeds of the property, if converted, would have purchased at the end of the year, followed by decisions of Sir James Wigram and Lord Romilly, and approved apparently by Lord St. Leonards. This rule has been confirmed by the decision of Lord Cairns in Brown v. Gellatly (L. Rep. 2 Ch. Ap. 751). In that case trustees retained certain investments, which by the will they were expressly directed to convert, and Lord Cairns, affirming the decision of Lord Romilly on this point, and without meaning to say that the trustees were by any means open to censure for not having converted them within the year, held that the rights of the parties must be regulated as if they had been so converted, and that the proper order to make was that in Dimes v. Scott.

The third and fourth rules do not appear to call for any remark.

The 5th Rule relates to the income of property which can be, but is not, converted within the year—under which Mr. Jarman in the notes discusses whether the principle of Dimes v. Scott applies where trustees have an option to invest in government or real or other securities, so as to give to the tenant for life the income of a supposititious sum of Consols, or whether, as in the much discussed case of Robinson v. Robinson, 4 per cent. on the value should be allowed, where such an option is given to the trustees. We regret to observe that although the case of Robinson v. Robinson was pressed on Lord Cairns in Brown v. Gellatly, he refused to adopt the 4 per cent. rule, although the trustees had a wide option as to investment. We think it is much to be regretted that any doubt should be cast on the considered judgment of Lord Cranworth and Sir J. K. Knight Bruce, L.JJ. in Robinson v. Robinson, and especially so, as there can be little doubt, as Mr. Jarman points out, that in the earlier case of Dimes v. Scott, on which Lord Cairns founds his judgment, the fact of the trustees having an option was not adverted to and was probably overlooked.

By adopting this rule in all cases where the trustees have a choice of investments, much difficulty will be avoided by assimilating the law to that which under the fifth rule laid down by Mr. Jarman exists when the property ought to be, but from its nature cannot be, converted immediately, at least, without great loss to the estate. Here the principle adopted is that of valuation at the testator's death, £4 per cent being allowed to the tenant for life. We should think that this ought to be established as the rule in all cases where trustees are not bound to invest in Consols. The case of Meyer v. Simonsen (5 De G. & Sm. 723), where the rule in question was much discussed by the late Sir James Parker, has been repeatedly followed. The cases of Cox v. Cox (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 343), and Farley v. Hyder (42 L. J. Rep. N. S. 626, Ch.), may be mentioned as recent examples of this equitable mode of adjustment between tenant for life and remainderman. Before parting with this subject we may note a decision of Lord Romilly in Re Peyton's Settlement (L. Rep. 7 Eq. 463), in which, as it appears to us, the scrupulous care with which in general the courts hold an even hand between successive takers is not distinctly visible; at all events the naked statement which has been put forward as the principle of the decision is, to our notions, not maintainable. That case has been said to decide "that the purchase of freehold ground rents is within a power to purchase lands in fee simple in possession:" (3 Davidson Conv. 61, 3rd edit.). The case was this: the trustees of a settlement and the tenant for life were desirous to invest £8866, part of the moneys arising from the sale of a portion of the settled lands in the purchase of several plots of land at Kensington, on which fifty-five dwelling-houses had been erected, and of which leases had been granted for terms of ninety-nine years, at rents amounting in the whole to £403. The trustees petitioned the court for an opinion whether such purchase was within a power in the settlement to purchase "hereditaments in fee simple in possession." Lord Romilly had no doubt that it was. We cannot accept such a decision, in an unopposed case, presenting a state of facts under which the particular purchase was clearly desirable for all parties, as being of much value on the general question. We should have thought that a purchase of the so-called ground rents was a purchase both in the letter and in the spirit of a fee simple in "reversion," and that the words "in possession" were added in order that the purchase money might bear a fair relation to the income to be enjoyed by each of the successive tenants. A "ground rent" is a vague term, and trustees, where the consent of the tenant for life was not required, by buying land of which the leases granted at low ground rents had only a few years to run, could prejudice the tenant for life to the advantage of those in remainder to any extent, producing precisely the same effect upon him as by granting leases themselves of the settled lands, and accepting a low rent in consideration of a premium. We feel some surprise at the decision, but much greater surprise that it should have been allowed to pass unquestioned. We should have thought an estate subject to leases at low rents as compared with the value of the fee simple, was not, either in letter or spirit, an estate "in possession," within the meaning of the power in question.

THE RESCISSION OF CONTRACTS OF SALE OF GOODS.

THE principle of law to be laid down as to the right to rescind a contract for the sale of goods, and as to what amounts to a rescission is one which has not been altogether plain hitherto, and the recent case of Freeth v. Burr (29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 773) shows that the courts have not always dealt with the subject on grounds entirely satisfactory. It may be useful if we state shortly the position of the question.

In the first place, when there is a condition to be performed by one party to a contract, before he can call upon the other to perform his part, no right against the latter arises until the performance of his precedent condition. This leads up to the difficulty which has arisen in connection with contracts of sale with reference to rescission, and we shall here quote some clear remarks of Mr. Benjamin in his work on the Sale of Personal Property, on the rule as to the operation of conditions precedent. He says (p. 422, 1st edit.): "Although a man may refuse to perform his promise till the other party has complied with a condition precedent, yet if he has received and accepted a substantial part of that which was to be performed in his favour, the condition precedent changes its character and becomes a warranty or independent agreement, affording no defence to an action, but giving right to a cross action for damages. The reason is, that it would be unjust under such circumstances, that a party who has received a part of the consideration for which he bargained, should keep it and pay nothing, because he did not receive the whole. The law, therefore, obliges him to perform his part of the agreement, and leaves him to his action of damages against the other side, for the imperfect performance of the condition. It is in the application of this rule that the cases have not been harmonious, and the practitioner is often embarrassed in advising, for the courts draw a distinction between what is and what is not a substantial part of the contract, in determining whether the original condition precedent has become converted ex post facto into an independent agreement."

The difficulty here pointed out arises more particularly in contracts comprising deliveries at periods of time of lots of one entire quantity, and the point raised in Freeth v. Burr, and preceding cases of an analogous character, has been whether a contracting party to whom one of a series of lots is not delivered at the time fixed is entitled to rescind the contract, and whether a refusal to receive any more of the contract goods is a rescission of the contract. A case which has rendered the law somewhat uncertain is Hoare v. Rennie (29 L. J. 73, Ex.), some of the Judges having been unable to understand the grounds of the decision. There the defendants bought of the plaintiffs 667 tons of Swedish iron, the iron to be shipped from Sweden in the months of June, July, August and September, in about equal portions each month, at £15 10s. per ton, delivered in London. The plaintiffs shipped only twenty-one tons in June, which arrived in London after the expiration of the month. It was held that the defendants were not bound to accept the smaller quantity, or any subsequent quantity tendered, and that, therefore, a plea showing the non-shipment of any larger quantity within the specified time, was an answer to an action for not accepting the iron or any part of it. The quotation which we have made from Benjamin on Sale supports the interrogatory of Justice Blackburn in Simpson v. Crippin (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546) why damages would not be a compensation for breach of the contract to deliver a specific lot of an entire quantity, the party damnified still being bound by his contract to accept subsequent deliveries.

The short ground upon which Chief Baron Pollock based his judgment in Hoare v. Rennie was, "that a man has no right to consider the breach of a contract a performance of it;" and his Lordship considered that the performance of conditions precedent had nothing whatever to do with the case. Baron Watson had not the slightest doubt about the case from the beginning to the end. "I am of opinion," he said, "that the defendants are not obliged to take this portion of the first shipment, because the contract is not performed on the part of the plaintiffs; and," he added, "if it were necessary to express any opinion, I think that by that means they have rescinded the contract, which they had a right to do, and that the plaintiffs not having performed their contract, the defendants are entitled to our judgment." In Jonassohn v. Young (4 B. & S. 296), Mr. Justice Crompton justified Hoare v. Rennie on the ground that it belonged to a class of cases in which time is of the essence of the contract; and Lord Coleridge, in Freeth v. Burr, placed all the cases cited before the court on the same footing as based upon the consideration whether there has been an abandonment or intention to abandon the contract. As this case will have to be taken as setting a doubt at rest, we cite his Lordship's observations: "I think it important," he said, "to express my own view, and I believe also that of the court, that in cases of this kind, where the question is, whether one party to a contract is set free from performance of it by the course of action of the other, the real point to be looked at is, whether, under all the circumstances, the act or conduct of the party which is relied on as setting the other party free, does or does not amount to an abandonment, or intention of abandonment, and altogether to a refusal to perform his part of the contract. I say this for the purpose of explaining the true ground on which I think the decisions of those cases must rest and the principle of the decisions. There have been cases apparently somewhat conflicting in principle brought before us in argument, but I think it can be gathered that the true question in all of them is as I have stated. Now non-performance or non-delivery may, under certain circumstances, or in particular cases, amount to such an act, or may be evidence of such conduct as would justify the judge in holding, or the jury in finding, either that an act of non-delivery or non-payment was in its nature, and unqualified by the circumstances which took place, such an act as indicated an intention to refuse to perform the contract, and to set the other party free from performing his part. That seems to me the principle on which Hoare v. Rennie was decided, and without presuming to say that the court who decided that case were right or wrong, the principle laid down was that where time was of the essence of the contract, as the Court of Exchequer said it was there, and there had been a failure to deliver part of the goods, and the whole object of the contract was frustrated, the non-delivery under the circumstances was an act by which the party renounced all intention to perform his part of the contract, and thereby set free the other party."

This view, we apprehend, leaves the decision of such cases entirely to the jury, and we think that it is highly desirable that they should be so left. Without considering any of the judicial decisions and dicta in other cases—and there are several—we think it ought to be established that the intention of a party committing a breach of contract should be judged of by a jury, and that whenever it is possible the contract should be enforced, the party damnified by partial breach or a breach of part being left to his remedy by action to recover damages. The result would probably in all cases be more just and satisfactory.

AMERICAN OPINION UPON THE OPERATION OF THE JUDICATURE ACT.

THE American Law Review has an interesting article on the Judicature Act, with reference to English and American jurisprudence, and the conclusions arrived at are very sensible, and quite in accordance with views already expressed by us. Our contemporary says:

Such are some of the principal provisions of the Act which is intended to remedy the defects in the existing procedure; it is confessedly the most sweeping measure that has ever been passed in regard to the department which it affects. Of course, there will be great differences of opinion as to its chances of success, and, until it has come into successful operation, many will think that it is an attempt to remove distinctions and forms which are necessary and essential parts of the law, and that the attempt will only result in endless confusion, entailing evils far greater than those belonging to the present system. But it must be remembered that it is not a hurried measure, accomplished by ardent reformers imperfectly acquainted with the subject which they were handling, and bent only upon destroying the existing institutions. It is an Act passed with the recommendation and approval of the most conservative class in England; it was brought in by the Lord Chancellor, and was criticised and discussed most carefully in every part by the, eminent lawyers in the House of Lords, and, after it left them with their assent, it was again criticised and discussed by the Commons. The public discussion in the newspapers indicated the feeling of the Profession and the educated classes in regard to it. From the first there seemed to be the most unusual agreement that the Act, or something like it, must pass. All seemed to be at one on the general question; almost the only controversy was whether it should not be made still more comprehensive. It would be useless, as well as difficult, to consider now how it will work in practice. It will undoubtedly cause great expense before it can work easily, and it will probably affect injuriously the interests of some branches of the legal Profession; but whether it will confer on the country the benefits which are expected, remains to be seen. The chances, at least, are in its favour; and it must be admitted that the Act itself bears in every part the marks of an honest intention to free the courts from antiquated technicalities and forms, and make legal procedure as simple and direct as may be permitted by the subjects with which it has to deal, and that it keeps constantly in view the idea that the object of the courts and their forms is the administration of justice, without unnecessary delay or burdensome expense.

It remains to consider, in a very general way, whether there are in this country any of the evils which the Judicature Act aims at reforming in England, and whether it suggests any remedies which are applicable to our situation. It will be noticed, in reading it, how large a part of the Act is taken up with provisions which relate entirely to the constitution of the new court, and the assignment to it of the Judges and jurisdiction of the old. It seems as if it were intended to blot out all their traditions and prejudices which might embarrass the working of the new system. The distinctions and conflict between common law and equity had come to be so marked, partly because they had grown up in courts wholly unconnected with one another. This cause of difference it was determined to destroy in a more effectual way than by giving to each court full jurisdiction in both branches, and allowing them to administer it in their own way. Hence the old courts have been swept entirely away, with very little sentimental regard for them or their antiquity. Whatever changes and reforms we have occasion to make, this task will probably be spared us. In those states where there have at any time been separate courts of common law and of equity, the separation has generally ceased to exist. In others, there was originally no equity jurisdiction, and it has been conferred from time to time, by statute, on the existing common law courts, and they have now, as a general thing, pretty full equity jurisdiction. This mode of conferring jurisdiction in equity has not been very favourable to the growth of equitable doctrines, but, at all events, we have the two jurisdictions exercised by the same courts, which seems to have been considered in England the first step towards reform.

This fact of their administration by one court, however, makes the distinction and conflict between them seem all the more anomalous, because the chief reason for the distinction and conflict has ceased to exist. To illustrate this, take the case of equitable defences to actions. If a defendant should set up such a defence to an action at common law, he would be told that it constituted no defence, though the court might suggest that perhaps he might have some relief in equity. If he should then file a bill, stating the same matters which had been adjudged to constitute no defence, and praying an injunction against the maintenance of the action, the same court would probably grant it, and enjoin the prosecution of the proceeding which it had before decided could be legally maintained. Now it is difficult to see whether from the legal or the popular standpoint, why this should not have been done at first. If the facts of the defendant's case are such as would entitle him to a perpetual injunction in equity, it is because those facts constitute an equitable defence to the action, and an equitable defence is as meritorious as a legal one, and frequently more so; if it were allowed in the action at common law, the same result as that which is accomplished by an injunction in a second suit might be as well accomplished by a judgment for the defendant in the first. If the facts upon which he relies are sufficient to entitle him only to an injunction for a limited period of time, the equitable relief might be given by staying the proceedings. In each of these cases the same thing would be effected by one proceeding, which now requires two. Circuity and multiplicity of action, at least, would be avoided, and the advantage would be gained of treating things as they really are, instead of as they are not.

It is not difficult to show that the change just suggested would not be a dangerous innovation, for instances may be taken from the existing practice where a similar jurisdiction is exercised by our courts in actions at common law. It is a familiar rule that a chose in action cannot be assigned at law, and that, if it be assigned, the assignee acquires only an equitable interest, which, however, entitles him to bring an action in the name of the assignor, and this action is conducted as if the assignor were really the plaintiff. Yet, if the defendant attempts to set up, by way of defence, a discharge or release by the plaintiff, or a payment to him, made after notice of the assignment, the other party may then show what the facts really are, and that the real plaintiff is not the person that he seems to be; if this is shown, the defendant will not be allowed to avail himself of his legal defence. Here is an instance in which a court administering common law deprives a defendant of a defence which is a perfect legal answer to their action, because the defence is inequitable. How this practice arose may be doubtful, but it probably originated in the necessity of the case, equity jurisdiction being extremely limited. Another common instance of equitable relief being given in an action at common law, is that of judgments upon bonds and recognisances, upon which the amount due, according to the principles of equity, is ascertained, and that amount only is the plaintiff allowed to collect. It would be only an extension of the principle of these cases if the court were allowed in every cause to give the relief to which the parties are really entitled. The distinction and conflict between the two jurisdictions would then soon cease to exist. In the English Act, the clause providing that in all matters in which there is any conflict or variance between their rules, the rules of equity shall prevail, is superfluous, except to indicate the spirit of the Act. For wherever equity has established a different rule from that of the common law, the rule of equity is the law.

The great difficulty at present arises from thinking of the law as consisting of the common law alone, whereas it consists of equity and the common law together, and the former requires attention more, if anything, than the latter. No one can safely be advised as to any matter which is within the jurisdiction of both, by the light of the common law alone; if he should be so advised, he would be in a condition like that of one who was correctly informed of some rules of common law which had been done away with by statute. Practically, then, when any equitable matter appears in an action at common law, whether as a defence or otherwise, the court says, in effect, What you bring forward may afford very good ground for relief, but it is a matter which this court entirely ignores, and we shall proceed in the present action and give judgment just as if that ground did not exist; if, however, you will commence a proceeding for the purpose, on the same ground, and call it a bill in equity, we will then render of no effect our judgment and all our proceedings. There is no necessity for this circuity, and there can be no practical difficulty in doing away with it, and giving in each action all the relief, whether legal or equitable, to which the parties are entitled. As we accustom ourselves to the recognition of the fact that equity and common law are but parts of one system, the anomaly of the existing mode of administering them becomes more and more apparent.

What has been said about the concurrent administration of equity and common law in the same action, applies, of course, only to a small part of their jurisdictions. There are, besides, the cases where their jurisdictions are exclusive. But, as we regard them more carefully, the difference between them seems the more to be one of procedure and nomenclature only. They cannot well be fused further than the administering them concurrently and the use of similar procedure. In cases where the jurisdiction is exclusive, great hardship arises from its being doubtful to which of them it belongs; and the person seeking relief incurs the risk, if he mistakes it, of being put to great expense, and, perhaps, of losing his remedy altogether. In proceedings in equity, it is usual to pray not only for the specific relief to which a plaintiff considers himself entitled, but also for general relief, and the court gives him such equitable relief as he may be entitled to, although different from that specially prayed for. Suppose that in every case the court, as before suggested, should have power to give all the relief to which the parties may be entitled, it would then give the plaintiff the proper remedy, although it might be a legal one, as they now give him any equitable remedy. It would then be impossible for courts to say of the plaintiff, as under the pretent practice they are sometimes bound to say,—What remedies at law or in equity he may now have, we need not consider.

The perusal of the Judicature Act will suggest many other instances in which the present procedure is defective, and in which the defects might be remedied without great innovations or changes, things which no one believes more firmly than the writer to be great evils in themselves, and only to be justified by much greater benefits being derived from them. Most of these instances arise from its being necessary to make use of more than one jurisdiction to dispose finally of a single matter, or what is analogous to it, to make use of more than one action or proceeding. For an example may be taken the case where a defendant is liable for an injury and has a remedy over against someone else. In such cases it would often be an improvement to dispose of the whole matter in one action, by making the person who is liable over, a party, and deciding the question as between him and the defendant, as well as between the defendant and the plaintiff. Attempts are now made to do this in a roundabout way, by giving notice of the action to the person liable, but, it is still necessary to prove his liability in a second action. It is not hard to conceive of a case in which a defendant might be found liable, solely on the ground of the wrong-doing of someone else (a servant for example), for whose acts he was responsible, and yet might fail to prove the same facts in an action against the wrongdoer. These instances are only selected to show how great a reform might be effected by a little change in procedure, and a result which is now indirectly or partly attained, might be attained directly and completely.

The great evil which exists, and which excludes many others, is delay; an evil which must to some extent, always be incidental to the administration of the law. Still, it is an universally acknowledged evil, and every means should be used to overcome it. The most famous English charter contained a prohibition, not only of the sale and denial, but also of delay of justice. The two first prohibitions are scrupulously observed, but little attention is given to the last. It may even be said that there is a general feeling in the Profession that delay is a right to which lawyers are by etiquette entitled, and that they are discourteously treated if their opponnent pushes forward the case as fast as the rules of law allow. For those who keep in mind the interests of their clients, when those interests require that there should be no delay, the great accumulation of arrears, the times fixed for certain steps, and the dilatory proceedings which can be taken by the other side, present great obstacles to rapid progress. It is easy to see the reasons which excite among business men a disgust for legal proceedings, and make them prefer to lose whatever might be gained from them, to being subjected to their necessary annoyance and wearisome delay. Many who commmence proceedings abandon them, or submit to disadvantageous compromises; many others think it prudent to stay away altogether. Justice would require, if it were possible, that, whenever any person, entitled to a legal remedy, asked for it, he should instantly receive it; the necessity of ascertaining whether he is entitled to it requires certain legal forms and proceedings to be gone through, which cause delay. These forms and proceedings ought not to be more dilatory than are necessary to determine the rights of the parties, nor offer to either party any inducement to prolong the litigation, except for this one object.

First of all, it must be acknowledged that our courts and judges are greatly overworked, and that they are unable promptly to dispose of all the business which comes before them; it is a matter of surprise that they do so much work, and do it so well — an amount of work much greater than that which comes before any English court. In Massachusetts it has been attempted to remedy this evil from time to time by increasing the number of Judges, and the number of Judges of the Supreme Judicial Court, which was four in 1847, is now seven. There are also ten Judges of the Supreme Court, which has generally concurrent jurisdiction with the former in matters of common law, besides other jurisdiction; and there is a desire on the part of some to increase this number, owing to the arrears constantly accumulating. There is something suggestive about this. The number of Judges of the existing courts, and the new court to be established, in England, is thirty-one, and these Judges dispose of substantially all the litigation of England and Wales; (there are, besides, County Courts, and some others, but of a very limited jurisdiction, which, in the County Courts, does not extend above £50.) By the last census, the population of England and Wales exceeded twenty-two millions and a half. The population of Massachusetts is less than one million and a half, which is less than one-fifteenth part of the former? It will readily be seen, therefore, that there are, even in the Supreme Judicial Court alone, a larger number of Judges in proportion to the population than in England. Of the English Judges eighteen belong to the courts of common law, and it is considered that this is a larger force than is necessary, and it is proposed in consequence to reduce the number to fifteen. Yet in Massachusetts the arrears are constantly increasing, even with an additional court of ten common law Judges to dispose of them. These matters deserve consideration, at least, before the number of Judges is increased, for possibly there exists some other remedy which it will also be necessary at some time to apply.

LAW LIBRARY.

WE have received the twenty-fourth edition of the Cabinet Lawyer (London: Longmans, Green and Co.) The success which has been attained by this publication is the best guarantee of its utility. During the day or two that it has been upon our table we have had occasion to refer to it, and found it extremely serviceable. We believe it will be a useful addition to the practical works which should be in the library of every lawyer.

Bushby's Manual of the Practice of Elections. Fourth Edition. By HENRY HARDCASTLE, Barrister-at-Law.—London: Stevens and Haynes.

WE regret that we were unable to notice this volume last week, so as to recommend it to those who have been busy in the practical conduct of elections during the last few days. Doubtless, however, it has found its way into many hands, and by its practical utility has been its own recommendation. Mr. Hardcastle, who prepares this edition of Mr. Bushby's handbook, has developed it into a respectable treatise. He has been engaged in preparing reports of the trial of election petitions, and gives considerable prominence to the subject of corrupt practices. We suppose we must anticipate that this part of his work will be of more use than any other now that the general election is over, but we cannot say that the law will be found treated so clearly as is desirable. For example, the position of the law respecting conveyance of voters to the poll is by no means satisfactorily explained (see p. 129), the difficulties raised in the Salford case being noticed in a manner scarcely intelligible.

Mr. Bushby's original treatise formed an excellent ground work upon which to build up a dissertation on the new law, and the way to work the ballot is well described. Half the volume is composed of statutes, therefore the practitioner will have in this work the text of all the law which he wants.

PATENT LAW.

Seed v. Higgins. H. L. 1860.—The plaintiff took out a patent for an improvement in machinery used for roving cotton. His specification claimed the discovery of the application of the principle of centrifugal force for such purpose, but he filed a disclaimer, declaring that he intended to claim only the application of centrifugal force in the particular manner represented in drawings attached to the specification. Held, that, taking the specification and disclaimer together, they sustained the patent for the invention of the particular machine described in the drawings. (8 E. & B. 755; 27 L. J., N. S., 148, Q. B.) Affirmed by a majority of the judges on appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber (8 E. & B. 771; 27 L. J., N. S., 411, Q. B.). Affirmed in the House of Lords (8 H. of L. Cas. 550). Campbell, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, said: "It is quite clear that if the specification and the disclaimer being taken together, anything is claimed which was not comprised in the original specification, the whole is bad; and on the issue that the plaintiff has not duly specified his invention, the verdict ought to be entered for the defendant." As to the construction of a specification, his Lordship said: "Where novelty or infringement depends merely on the construction of the specification, it is a pure question of law for the judge; but where the consideration arises how far one machine imitates or resembles another in that which is the alleged invention, it generally becomes a mixed question of law and fact which must be left to the jury." Lord Chelmsford, in delivering his judgment in the House of Lords, said: "Assuming that the specification had been originally bad, on account of the generality of the claim, I see nothing in the Act of Parliament which prevents such an objection as this being removed, the only limitation to a disclaimer of any part of a specification being that it shall not extend the exclusive right granted by the letters patent."

Oxley v. Holden. 1860.—Patent for "certain improvements in the doors and sashes of carriages." One part of the invention was described as "a novel arrangement and mode of fitting and working sliding sashes, glass frames, blinds, and shutters for railway and other carriages," which consisted of a metal plate, with a slot and a stud or pin working in a groove on each side of the sash or frame; and the patentee claimed "the metal fittings and the mode of applying the same, described herein as the second part of my invention. The description of the metal fittings was inseparably interwoven, throughout the specification, with the mode of applying them. Held, that this was a claim, not for the metal fittings themselves, but for the mode of applying them, and, consequently, that the patent was sustained by proof that the application was new, though the stud and plate themselves were old. (8 C. B., N. S., 666; 30 L. J., N. S., 68, C. P.)

Betts v. Menzies. H. L. 1861.—As specifications describe external objects, though the language in two specifications be identically the same, it would be impossible to predicate of the two that they described exactly the same identical external object, unless the terms of art used in both the specifications could be ascertained to have been the same at the date of both the patents. The question of identity of signification belongs to the province of evidence, and not to the province of construction. Wilde, B., in the course of his answers to the questions put to the judges by the House of Lords, said: "If the terms of the two specifications are identical, and if it is not disputed that the terms of art used in the one have the same meaning as the same terms used in the other, which, from the lapse of time between the dates of the two patents may not always be the case, the court ought to determine that the first publication anticipated the second without evidence, and without any proof that either the first or second was practicable. If, though not identical, the language used in the two, when construed by the court, describes identically the same process, machine, or manufacture, the court may, subject to the same remark as to the term of art, decide at once upon the question of anticipation. But if after construction, and after the meaning of the parties in the two documents has been ascertained by the court, there be any difference between the two things described, which may be essential or material to the invention, and which is contended by either of the parties to be essential or material to the invention, the court cannot decide such a controversy; it has neither materials nor means for so doing, and it must go to a jury. In a word, the court can pronounce two identical descriptions to portray two identical inventions; but when the descriptions are different the identity in substance of the two inventions is a matter to be established by extrinsic evidence." Blackburn, J., said: "If the general claim to the use of an invention were cut down and limited to the use of the invention in the particular way pointed out by reason of the words 'as herein described,' it would be a narrow rule of construction, generally working to the detriment of patentees, and, what weighs more with me, generally giving an effect to specifications different from what the persons drawing them intended, or those reading them understand." (10 H. of L. Cas. 117; 31 L. J., N. S. 233, Q. B.; 9 Jur. N. S. 29.)

Hills v. Evans. Ch. 1862.—The construction of a specification, as the construction of all other written instruments, belongs to the court; but the explanation of the words or technical terms of art, the phrases used in commerce, and the proof and results of the processes which are described (and in a chemical patent the ascertainment of chemical equivalents) are matters of fact upon which evidence may be given, contradictory testimony may be adduced, and upon which it is the province and right of a jury to decide. But when those portions of a specification are made the subject of evidence, the direction to be given to the jury with regard to the construction of the rest of the patent, which is conceived in ordinary language, must be a direction upon the hypothesis of the jury arriving at a certain conclusion with regard to the meaning of those terms, the signification of those phrases, the truth of those processes, and the result of the technical procedure described in the specification. In the comparison of two specifications, each of which is filled with terms of art, and with the description of technical processes, the duty of the court is confined to giving the legal construction of such documents taken independently, but the comparison of the two instruments, and ascertaining whether the words, as interpreted by the court, and contained in one specification, do or do not denote the same external matter as the words, as interpreted and explained by the court, contained in the other specification, is a matter of fact, and within the province of a jury. (31 L. J., N. S., Ch. 457; 8 Jur., N. S., 525.)

Mackelcan v. Rennie. 1862.—In construing a specification, it is not competent to the inventor to pray in aid the provisional specification in order to explain or enlarge the meaning of the complete specification. (13 C. B., N. S., 52.)

Newall v. Elliott. 1864.—Pollock, C. B.: "The patentee of a combination is bound to state what parts of the combination he claims to be new, or what parts of the combination he has taken from that general stock of knowledge which is common to all the public." (10 Jur., N. S., 954; 13 W. R. 11; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 792.)

Renard v. Levinstein. 1864.—Lord Justice Knight Bruce: "Considering the different consequences that may arise as to the part of an invention communicated from a foreign country, and as to the part of the same invention, or set of inventions, which may be deemed to be in every respect new, I consider it to be a serious and very arguable question, whether it is or is not incumbent on the patentee to distinguish, to define, and to particularise what is new and what is old." (3 N. R. 546; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 177.)

Foxwell v. Bostock. Ch. 1864.—In a patent for an improved arrangement or new combination of machinery, the specification must describe the improvement and define the novelty, otherwise, and in a more specific form, than by the general description of the entire machine. It is not sufficient that a person possessed of all the knowledge existing at the time of the patent, on the subject matter of the patent, will discern the improvement; or, that it may be discovered upon a minute comparison and collation of all existing combinations with the new combination that is claimed. The term "combination of machinery" is nothing but an extended expression of the word "machine." (10 L. T. Rep. N. S., 144; 3 N. R. 546.)

Jordan v. Moore. 1866.—A. obtained a patent for "certain improvements in the construction of ships and other vessels navigating on water." By his specification the patentee claimed as his invention, amongst others, (1) the construction of ships "with an iron frame, combined with an external covering of timber planking for the sides, bilges, and bottoms; (6) the construction of iron frames adapted to an external covering of timber for the sides, bilges, and bottoms, as described:" Held, that the expression "iron frame" in the first claim was not confined to an iron frame, such as that specified in the sixth claim, but comprehended whatever might, according to the ordinary use of language, be called "an iron frame." (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 624; 35 L. J., N. S., 268, C. P.)

Daw v. Eley. 1867.—Where a specification in the first instance describes the invention in too general terms but afterwards, in describing the method of performing the invention, refers to certain figures in drawings annexed thereto, and the claim made is for the manufacture of the invention described with reference to those figures, the specification is sufficient. The patent was for improvements in central-fire breech-loading cartridges. The specification, describing the method of performing the invention, referred to certain figures in drawings annexed thereto, but did not distinguish between what was new and what was old. The patentee claimed "the manufacture of cartridges described with reference figs. 1, 2, and 1*; and I also claim the manufacture of cartridges described with reference to figs. 3, 4, and 3*." Held, that the patent might be upheld by limiting the claim (as in Seed v. Higgins) for the manufacture of cartridges described with reference to the above-mentioned figures. (L. Rep. 3 Eq. 500n, 513; 14 W. R. 126; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399.)

Thomas v. Welch. 1866.—Any part of the provisional specification of a patent may be omitted in the complete specification, if there is no fraud, and no one can be prejudiced or misled thereby, and the effect of the remainder is not altered by the omission. All the claiming clauses may be struck out of the specification of a patent by a disclaimer, if there remain in the body of the specification words sufficiently distinguishing what the invention is which the patentee claims. (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 192; 35 L. J., N. S., C. P., 200.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

WE have received from several country solicitors prints of addresses recently issued by candidates for Parliamentary honours, among them some emanating from members of the Bar, who have during the past week sought election. The object, of course, in bringing these specimens of patriotic composition to our notice, is the fact that they contain direct and deliberate attacks on the vested interests of our Profession. In one of these baits to country electors we find "The costs of transferring and otherwise dealing with land must be greatly modified;" and a well-known member of the Bar, seeking election this very day in the southern division of a southern county, says, in his address: "I shall vote for simplifying the mode of dealing with real property, and a consequent reduction in legal charges." When the emoluments of the proctors were in a great measure taken from them, they were compensated, and we can only say that if chattels real are to be dealt with as near as can be, in the same way as chattels personal, solicitors (those whose business consists for most part of conveyancing, and the work necessarily arising therefrom) will clearly be entitled to a most liberal compensation. As to whether the change will come, and whether, if seriously thought of by those in power, it should be opposed by the Profession, we offer no opinion, but it is to be regretted that members of our own Profession should use such a question for political purposes.

WE are asked to call attention to the fact that a considerable portion of the business before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in relation to appeals from India, is conducted by non-professional gentlemen. This probably is not generally known. We shall, therefore, feel it our duty to refer to this matter again, after making certain inquiries which we think will further enlighten the Profession on this subject.

A COUNTRY solicitor, who has just conducted a borough election as political agent for one of the candidates, informs us that while the cause which he advocated, and for which he worked before the revising barrister, and, indeed, every other way, was successful, the organisation being almost perfect; that of his opponent was so defective that their defeat was partly attributed to it. Our correspondent adds that he was assisted in his work by several active solicitors in the town, while the work of his opponents was undertaken by non-professional men. We are asked to conclude from this, and we are quite prepared to do so, that election work generally should be entrusted only to solicitors. Their business habits and professional knowledge especially fit them for this kind of work, and those candidates who know how especially useful solicitors are at this work, as well for the reason above named as for their influence and tact, are usually found to lose no opportunity of turning such valuable material to the best advantage.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

OFFICER OF PARISH—SALARIED SOLICITOR—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION—METROPOLITAN POOR ACT 1867 (30 & 31 VICT. c. 6, s. 76).—In 1857 the trustees of a parish who, under a local Act, managed the relief of the poor, appointed a solicitor to assist their clerk in the arrangement of legal matters, at £100 per annum. By the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867, the management of the poor in this parish was transferred to guardians; and officers and persons appointed, or acting under any local Act for any purpose of the relief of the poor, or otherwise in the service of the guardians, were entitled to continue in office, provided that in case any officer of a union or a parish should be deprived of his office by reason of the operation of this Act, the Poor Law Board might award to him compensation for the loss of his office and its emoluments. The Poor Law Board refused to sanction the continuance of the solicitor's appointment, or to allow him compensation, on the ground that the appointment was not authorised by this enactment. Held, upon a rule obtained by the solicitor for a mandamus to the defendants, to whom the Poor Law Board's duties had been transferred, that he was an officer of a parish within the meaning of the Act; that he was deprived of his office by reason of the operation of the Act; and that he was entitled to compensation: (Reg v. Local Government Board, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 769. Q. B.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—AGREEMENT TO PAY COMPENSATION FOR DAMAGE DONE BY GAME—ARBITRATION.—Declaration that the plaintiffs demised lands, &c., to the defendant upon the terms that he would keep upon the demised premises such a number only of hares and rabbits as would do no injury to the trees and plantations, &c., belonging to the plaintiffs, or to their growing crops, or the growing crops of any of their tenants, and that in case the defendant should keep such a number of hares and rabbits as should injure the trees, &c., or the growing crops, &c., the defendant should and would pay to the plaintiffs or their tenants, a fair and reasonable compensation for such injury. Breach assigned, that the tenant kept such a number of hares and rabbits as did great injury to such trees, &c., respectively, and although frequently requested so to do, had not paid a fair and reasonable or any compensation. Plea, that "one of the terms of the said tenancy was that, in case any such injury should be done by the defendant, he would pay a fair and reasonable compensation for the same, the amount of such compensation, in case of difference, to be referred to the arbitration of two arbitrators, or an umpire, to be chosen respectively as therein mentioned; that a difference arose, and that no arbitrators had been appointed, nor had an award ever been made deciding the amount of such compensation according to the terms of the said tenancy." On demurrer it was held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Pigott, B., dubitante, Bramwell, B.), that the plea was a good plea, inasmuch as the covenant was one and indivisible to pay such amount of compensation as should be settled by arbitration and not otherwise, and was not two separate and independent covenants, the one to pay a compensation, and the other to refer the amount of it to arbitration: (Dawson v. Lord Otho Fitzgerald, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 776. Ex.)

V.C. HALL'S COURT.

TUETON v. BARBER.

Privilege—Bill of costs—Facts ante litem motam. MATTHEW TILDESLEY brought in a claim in the cause for damage sustained by the testator's inability to grant a lease of certain mines. In his affidavit he deposed that in consequence of obstacles arising the lease was not granted. He was then asked on cross-examination before the special examiner "whether the obstacles were suggested by him to his solicitor, or by his solicitor to him," and he refused to answer the question, or to produce the bill of costs in respect of the same matter.

Digby Seymour, Q.C. and W. W. Karslake now moved that the witness should answer the question or be committed, as the question referred to a mere matter of fact ante litem motam.

Powell, Q.C. and Grosvenor Wood, contra.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR held that the question could not be put, and also that the witness was not bound to produce the bill of costs; and he refused the motion with costs.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH (IRELAND).

(Before the FULL COURT.)

Re KEARSE.

Debtors' Act (Ireland) 1872—Arrest on civil bill decree for debt contracted after the passing of the Act—Decree mis-stating date when debt occurred—Alteration of decree without sanction of chairman—Habeas corpus—Jurisdiction—Discharge of debtor from custody.

MOTION on behalf of Timothy Kearse, a prisoner in the gaol of Ennis, to make absolute a conditional order obtained for the issuing of a writ of habeas corpus to have him discharged. In support of the application, affidavits were made by the prisoner and his attorney, in reply to which an affidavit was made by T. Bunton, the attorney for the plaintiffs in the civil bill proceedings next referred to. It appeared that a decree was obtained before the chairman of the county of Clare, J. O'Hagan, Q.C., at the Quarter Sessions at Killaloe, on the 25th June 1873, against T. Kearse, for the sum of £14 14s., on a civil bill process, for goods sold and delivered, and on an account stated; and the defendant, who did not appear, was arrested on the 20th August 1873, under the decree, and remained since then in custody—the plaintiffs on the civil bill, Trousdell and O'Brien, although required by notice, refusing to have him discharged. The civil bill process did not contain any statement when the debt had accrued, and the bills sent by the plaintiffs showed that the goods had been supplied in September 1872. But, on the decree signed by the chairman there was a statement (inserted by the plaintiff's attorney, in the presence of the clerk of the peace) that the goods were sold in the year 1871. The decree was drawn up against the body of the debtor, and it was thus signed by the chairman. The further facts of the case sufficiently appear in the judgments delivered.

P. O'Brien, in support of the motion, cited Cop. Co. Court, Pr. Johns. edit., pp. 147, 201; Add. Torts, edit. 1870, 714; Re Everard (7 Ir. Jur. N. S. 346); Govern v. Rowland (7 Ir. Com. WHITESIDE, C.J.—This case is an important one. It has been ably argued, and arose upon a motion to make absolute a conditional order, for a writ of habeas corpus, in order to discharge Timothy Kearse from prison. The facts shortly stated are as follows: The civil bill process, which had been originally served upon him at the suit of Messrs. Trousdell and O'Brien, was brought to recover the sum of £14 14s., for goods sold and delivered and for the balance of an account stated, but it did not appear by it in what year the debt had been incurred. Kearse, the defendant, did not appear at the hearing of the case, so that we have to look closely at the actual facts, and consider what occurred on the occasion. It appears from an inspection of the books of the clerk of the peace—who by the statute law is bound to make the entry made in such cases, and to set out the process correctly (and this entry he has properly made)—that he has entered a sum of £14 14s. for shop goods sold and delivered. Having stated the substance of the decree and the heads of it in due form, he has certified it to be a true copy of the decree—which certificate is itself evidence of the fact. But turning to the decree itself, we find that it improves on the note in the book of the clerk of the peace. It appears from the book of the clerk of the peace that the proceedings were for goods sold and delivered, and for the balance of an account stated, exactly following the process as it should according to law; but the words "in the year 1871" are added in the decree. The question is, how came these words into the decree? There is not a trace of the record "in the year 1871" in any of the papers or proceedings antecedent to this document. The date of the process was the 24th May 1873, and the date of the decree the 25th of June 1873. There happens to be an Act of Parliament restraining arrest for debt, which was passed on the 6th of August 1872, and if the shop goods, as the clerk of the peace expresses it, were sold after the Act had passed, there was not any jurisdiction in any inferior or superior court, after that Act came into operation, to arrest, or issue a decree against the body of any man for goods which had been sold after Aug. 1872; and if this appeared upon the face of the decree it would be utterly void, having been without any authority, and an excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and, therefore, it would be the duty of this court to redress the wrong by discharging from custody the person who had been thus illegally imprisoned. It is obvious why the change was made in the decree. If the goods had been sold in the year 1871, that would have been before the passing of the Act for the abolition of arrest for debt. Before that Act came into operation the body of a debtor might be taken in execution, but after the Act came into operation it would be impossible to do this legally in respect of a debt contracted after the passing of the Act; therefore, we find an entry on the face of the decree itself, for which there is not any foundation in the original entry of that decree in the book of the clerk of the peace. How did this occur? On the facts it is clear that the goods in respect of which the decree was granted were sold and delivered in Sept. 1873; the amount, £14 14s., is made up of three several items, for goods sold and delivered in Sept., 1872, stated in the bill furnished by the plaintiffs. The Act for the abolition of imprisonment for debt having passed one month before this, somebody had an interest in putting this untrue entry upon the face of the decree, the object being to seize the body of the debtor for a debt for which he could not be arrested under the Act that had not been passed until Aug. 1872. The plaintiffs here allowed to pass "the next assizes," mentioned in the Civil Bill Act, at which the defendant might have appealed, but to which, knowing nothing of what was done, he did not appeal; and the defendant now applies to us to be discharged, and his counsel have produced several documents which establish as clear as light that in point of fact there was no authority whatever to grant a decree against the body. The original entry on the book of the clerk of the peace—which is made by the Act of Parliament evidence of the decree, and no one else has authority to take it down—shows that no decree was given against the body of the defendant, a decree which it would have been illegal to make. It is said that the decree was altered. If it is meant that in the alteration there has been any moral fraud, it does not appear to us that there has been any such. The papers came into the hands of the attorney, who conducted the case for the plaintiffs, and what he says in his affidavit is, that "it is utterly untrue that the word 'body' in the decree, and the words 'in the year 1871' were written after the decree had been signed by the chairman." I have no doubt, since the gentleman has stated it, that he was under the impression that he was justified in what he had done, and that it was not after the decree was pronounced that the alteration was made. But the failure in his affidavit is in not showing what decree was pronounced, and we have no evidence what it was save the entry in the book of the clerk of the peace. No doubt, the attorney made a memorandum on the original civil bill, as he states—"Decree against body." But what authority had he for doing so? He was not the officer of the court, nor the chairman, and he has cautiously abstained from stating that any such decree had been pronounced by the chairman. I can easily understand that an attorney in large practice might naturally fall into such an error, but how is this to preclude the matter from being taken into consideration by this court, or to stand explanatory of a decree, when neither the officer of the court nor the chairman adopts it, nor is it warranted by the facts. He proceeds in his affidavit to show how the document was altered. As originally drawn, it does appear that it was a correct decree against the goods of the defendant. How, then, comes it to be changed? "My clerk, through mistake, drew it as a decree against the goods, instead of against the body." This is the way in which the matter stood, and the sagacious clerk who drew the decree against the goods is to be commended. The attorney goes on to say: "In checking over my decrees before handing them in to John Henry Harvey, the deputy clerk of the peace, I discovered said mistake, and having called his attention thereto, he, in my presence, erased the word 'goods,' and inserted the word 'body,' in his own handwriting, and the alteration was made before the decree was signed by him or by the chairman." I do not understand what authority this gentleman had to make the erasure. He does not state that it was pointed out to the chairman. What power he had to change the decree, from one against the goods into one for the arrest of the body, I cannot comprehend. He does not state by what authority he inserted the words "in the year 1871." In point of fact, the goods were sold in the autumn of 1872. The thing was innocently done, but the attorney put into the decree what was not in the process, nor on the book of the clerk of the peace, and I cannot discern by whose authority, or upon what evidence this was done. A statement is then made which is wholly immaterial—that the chairman was applied to for the purpose of liberating the defendant at a subsequent sessions, but that he had held (and correctly so) that he had not any authority to do so; and the defendant still continuing in prison, the question is, whether this court has any jurisdiction to interfere in the matter. In point of fact and law, this is a clear case to sustain the allegation that the arrest is illegal. The decree is against the body of a person for goods sold and delivered to him after the passing of the Act of Parliament. It is said by the counsel for the plaintiff that the civil bill decree was only issued irregularly, and that if so a habeas corpus would not lie in this case. That may be so, though I am not prepared to consent to it, nor do I find that the discharging of the prisoner would be conflicting with the principal case referred to. We are told that we should not meddle in a case in which a party is in gaol under civil process. The matter was brought before the Court of Exchequer in the case of Page v. Williams (1 Ir. C. L. 527). With the profoundest respect for that court, it must be borne in mind that it is not the Court of Queen's Bench; and in that case the authority of the court was correctly expounded as derived from the Habeas Corpus Act only, and it was said that the words of that Act did not give them any authority to interfere with a person who had been arrested under civil process. The court, having no original authority, very properly refused to grant the writ of habeas corpus, although the Chief Baron differed on a very important point. I do not by any means criticise what judges of so much learning have enunciated, when they held that though the person was arrested under an irregular process, yet as there was a subsequent valid detainer, in which the person was properly named, he could not be discharged from custody. The question here is, whether, independently of a distinction as to the facts, we have jurisdiction to liberate this prisoner? Our jurisdiction, unlike the modified jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer, is not derived merely from the Act of Parliament, and we have authority to give redress, although the custody be under civil process. The case of Re Everard (7 Ir. Jur., N. S., 346), which has been referred to, was not a hasty decision, and it is one that it is impossible to distinguish in principle from the case now before us. In that case my brother Fitzgerald, before whom the motion was made, said: "The question is, whether the Court of Queen's Bench, or a single judge of that court, has in vacation, at common law, jurisdiction to order a writ of habeas corpus to issue, to be made returnable before himself, for the purpose of discharging from arrest a party confined under civil process." And he then points out the all-important provision which distinguishes this case from the case that came before the Court of Exchequer, Page v. Williams (1 Ir. C. L. 527), namely, that the power of that court was solely derived from statute 56 Geo. 3, c. 100, which did not include the power of issuing a writ of habeas corpus in the case of persons in custody under civil or criminal process. It appeared that before my brother Fitzgerald pronounced the decision in Re Everard, discharging the prisoner, he had directed a search to be made for precedents in this country, and he found that Lord Chief Justice Blackburne had, in December 1846, liberated a prisoner who was in custody under civil process. The prisoner claimed exemption from arrest as a soldier in the East India Company's service, inasmuch as he could not be arrested for a debt less than £30. How does the present case differ in principle from that case, for there the prisoner was exempt by statute from arrest if the debt were less than £30? In this case there could not be any legal arrest whatever. There were similar orders made in vacation—one by Judge Crampton, another by Chief Justice Lefroy. The latter case was that of a married woman, who had been induced to join her husband in accepting bills, and a decree had been obtained by some means against her, under which she was arrested, but she was discharged in vacation. There is another case, that of Peter M'Dona, who was under arrest in Enniskillen, under a civil bill decree, and my brother O'Brien, in all the plenitude of conscious authority, discharged the prisoner. Those authorities cited in support of a motion for a habeas corpus are satisfactory; they in principle apply to the present case, which is an application made in term time to the Court of Queen's Bench, to declare that one of her Majesty's subjects being illegally incarcerated, should be discharged under a writ of habeas corpus. We have perfect authority for liberating the prisoner, not derived alone from statute, but fortified also by the common law. And, therefore, in accordance with the justice of the case, we shall make the order absolute for the issuing of the writ of habeas corpus, in order that the prisoner may be discharged.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Jan. 28 and 29.

(Before Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Keating and Denman, JJ.)

Skinner v. Wallis.

Action against an attorney—Award—Moving to set aside — Showing cause at chambers — Practice.

Bullen said that in this case a rule was obtained on the 25th Nov. last, which was to be returnable before a judge at chambers, at a time to be fixed by the said judge, and his application now was to vary that order by making it returnable before the full court. The action was brought by Mr. Vincent against Mr. Wallis, an attorney, formerly practising at Portsmouth, but now resident in London, and he (the learned counsel) could well understand why Mr. Wallis did not wish the matter to come before this court, as Mr. Skinner had been bail for him on a criminal charge tried at the Winchester Assizes. When the action was originally brought, it was referred to Master Kaye by an order of Honyman, J. It was gone into before the master, who gave his award on the 29th July last, against Mr. Wallis, the defendant. The Common Law Procedure Act, under which the action was brought, provided that unless the court were moved to set aside the award within seven days, or the first seven days of the following term, it should be final, and execution should issue. Within those first seven days, as he understood, Mr. Wallis did move here for a rule to show cause why the award should not be set aside, and the rule was refused by the court. He came here again on the 25th Nov., and upon a voluminous affidavit (which the plaintiff had another affidavit to contradict) he obtained a rule, which ordered that the plaintiff should show cause at chambers, on a day to be appointed by the judge, why the master's certificate should not be set aside as not being final, through his not having gone into all the matters. The grounds were thus miscarriage of reference and error. He (Bullen) was in the first instance instructed to apply for a rule to set aside this very rule, but as he could not find any precedent, he asked for a rule making the former rule returnable before the full court. He was quite content that he should simply obtain a rule in this form, although he had been instructed to move to set aside the other rule, on the ground that the affidavits were false.

Denman, J. said that, in the absence of any explanation, it appeared as if there had been an attempt to entrap the court.

Keating, J. thought the rule must have been granted as a matter of course, as he had nothing about it on his notes for that day.

Bullen said that, although the rule was granted, on the 25th Nov., the plaintiff had only been served with it on the 20th Jan., with notice that it would be heard at chambers to-morrow (Thursday.)

Denman, J. could not understand how the rule could have been granted without it being stated that the motion had before been refused.

Keating, J. could not understand how it could have been done, except by counsel saying that the affidavits had been amended.

Lord Coleridge.—We think, Mr. Bullen, that this rule ought to be returnable here to-morrow, instead of at chambers, and that you should show cause at once. We also order Mr. Wallis personally to attend here.

Keating, J.—You should give notice as soon as possible.

Bullen promised that it should be done at once.

Jan. 29.—Grantham said that in this case the court had ordered Mr. Wallis to be present at ten o'clock. He was now here in pursuance of that order, which was only served upon him in the country at seven o'clock last night, and he had had no time to get up his case. He therefore asked that the matter be allowed to stand over until Saturday. He himself knew nothing about the matter until he heard the application made by Mr. Bullen on Wednesday. His client had not been able to see Mr. Philbrick, who made the former application to the court.

Lord Coleridge, C.J., said the matter was extremely simple, and it was for Mr. Wallis to explain, if he could, whether the instructions to Mr. Philbrick made any mention of the facts brought before the court yesterday. None of the judges on the bench had any note of the case, nor had the Master more than a brief note; and it must have been the very last thing in the day, on the last day of term, and asked of the court quite as a matter of course. They were certainly led to believe that it was an ordinary motion, of course, to correct a mistake in an affidavit.

Grantham said he was told by Mr. Wallis, so far as he remembered, that he had been waiting for some three days for an opportunity of moving, and Mr. Philbrick mentioned the case as one that had been before the court before, but as it was so late he did not propose to weary the court by going into details at that time, the court being on the point of rising.

Lord Coleridge.—If the facts brought before us yesterday cannot be contradicted directly in point of fact, I must say they require some very strong explanation.

Grantham said he was instructed that they could be contradicted; but he did not know what the facts were.

Their Lordships having consulted the Master,

Lord Coleridge said it seemed to have been stated that there had been an earlier application, which had been refused, but there was not a word about the execution having been levied.

Grantham did not think it had been levied then.

Bullen said the fact was that the execution was levied after the rule had been refused.

Lord Coleridge said they must be ready to show cause after luncheon.

In the afternoon Grantham said his client had made an affidavit of what took place on the occasion referred to, and what instructions were given to Mr. Philbrick. Mr. Philbrick was now here, and might, perhaps, say what took place before the judges, who were the same as were now on the bench, with the exception of the Lord Chief Justice.

Philbrick said he understood there was some doubt in the minds of some members of the court as to how it was that the rule was granted in the way it was.

Keating, J.—Having been refused.

Philbrick said that he moved in the first place, upon some affidavits, that the award was not final, and those affidavits, he thought, showed sufficient reason for a rule. Master Kaye, who had made the award, made a communication to the court, and one of the judges said: "If the matter be susceptible of this explanation, would it be worth while to take a rule?" He (Philbrick) said he thought not, but his client was not in court, and he had no instructions. He afterwards communicated with his client, and further affidavits were placed in the hands of Sir John Karslake and himself, for the purpose of moving. Sir John not being able to move, he attended for that purpose, and on the last day of term he came into court to move the rule just as the Lord Chief Justice was leaving the bench. He (Philbrick) said it was in substance a renewal of the motion, and he had affidavits in explanation of the matters referred to by Master Kaye. The court suggested that it should go to Chambers, and he acquiesced, and heard no more about it.

Keating, J.—Did you tell the court the nature of these affidavits?

Philbrick—Oh no, my lord; I never went into them.

Brett, J.—Did you suppose it was to go before a judge at chambers, to say whether there should be a rule or not?

Philbrick was certainly under that impression. The court did not go into the matter at all. The order of Master Kaye was a certificate finding that the defendant was indebted in £58 to the plaintiff, and an indorsement was that that order did not embrace the £50 advanced upon mortgage by the defendant and left untouched his rights therefor. It did not appear to be a final award upon the face of it; but the Master explained that, although the sum referred to was due, it was not payable at the time when the action commenced, and he put this note in in order to make it quite clear that the defendant's rights, although it was pleaded as a set-off, should not be prejudiced.

Brett, J.—The note in the rule book is that "upon explanation given to the Master, rule refused."

Philbrick—It was put in this way—"If susceptible of that explanation, is it worth while taking a rule?"

Lord Coleridge said the rule must have been taken to be refused, and asked what the new materials were on which it was moved again.

Philbrick said it was an affidavit showing the circumstances under which the set-off arose; and the point, so far as his memory went, was the question whether the £50 was then payable back or not. That was not the point in controversy before the Master. It was not gone into, as the point was not raised.

Brett, J. thought Mr. Philbrick must have forgotten a little. He could scarcely be correct in saying that it was to go to chambers to know whether the rule should be granted or not. The endorsement on his own brief was that it was to go to chambers to show cause.

Philbrick said at any rate it was to go to chambers to be disposed of.

Grantham said he knew nothing about the matters in dispute until the brief was handed to him the other day to go before the Master; but, after looking at it and the affidavits now, he was bound to say that it appeared to him their Lordships would not disturb an award where there were different views as to what took place at that time. Looking at these affidavits, he did not think the court would interfere with the award, and certainly his client would not be wise in occupying their time when the Master had made his award.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—That is all very well, so far as it concerns yourself personally; but does your client offer any explanation as to not putting in his affidavit that the money had been paid on execution?

Grantham was instructed that his client told Mr. Philbrick of the money having been paid, and asked if it made any difference, he having paid it under protest, upon which Mr. Philbrick told him it would make no difference, but if the award was given in his favour he would get his money back. There was also notice given to the other side that it was paid under protest.

Philbrick said the facts were scarcely so, according to his remembrance. It was an agent on the other side who said the money had been paid, and when he asked Mr. Wallis he was informed it was true.

Brett, J. asked if it was not stated in the affidavit?

Philbrick said it was not. He only heard it verbally.

Their Lordships having consulted, Lord Coleridge, C.J. said.—We are of opinion there was no pretence for making this application to the court, and the rule must be discharged, and with costs.

Rule discharged, with costs.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

ERECTION OF PILES IN BED OF A NAVIGABLE RIVER — OBSTRUCTION — NUISANCE — INJUNCTION.—An information was filed by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Mayor and Corporation of Sandwich to restrain by injunction the defendant, who was the owner of a wharf abutting on the river Stour, a public navigable river forming the harbour of Sandwich, from erecting a structure, having its foundation in the bed of the river, which interfered with the navigation. Held, that no person has a right to put an obstruction in the bed of a navigable river, although at the time it may not be a nuisance. Held, also, that the erection of the structure was a nuisance to persons using and navigating the river; that, the erection being for the purposes of the defendant's trade, it was too remote a benefit to the public to say that the encouragement of the trade of a single individual was a benefit to the public; and that the injunction must be granted. The question whether erections made in a harbour are a nuisance or not depends on whether, upon the whole, they produce public benefit, not giving to the words "public benefit" too extended a sense, but applying them to the public frequenting the port. The benefit to the public must be a direct benefit: (Attorney-General v. Perry, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 716. M. R.)

CANAL—POWER TO SUPPLY WATER FROM ALL SOURCES—RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS—DIVERSION OF STREAMS.—By an Act of Parliament passed in 1821 for amalgamating two canal companies, the united company were empowered to maintain and keep navigable the united canal; and "for that purpose to supply the said united canal at all times for ever thereafter with water from all springs and streams which had been or should be found within 2000yds." of the same canal. Held, that the Act did not confer on the company powers over such springs or streams equal to those of a riparian proprietor, but only empowered them to take such water within the prescribed limits for the purposes of the canal, as was not required for the ordinary purposes for which the riparian proprietors might require it: (Wilts Canal Company v. The Swindon Waterworks Company, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 722. V.C. Malins).

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

CONTRACT—SALE OF GOODS—DELIVERY BY PARCELS—NON-PAYMENT FOR FIRST PARCEL—RESCISSION. — By contract of 28th Nov. 1871, plaintiffs bought of the defendants 250 tons of iron at 50s. a ton, half to be delivered in two weeks, remainder in four weeks, payment, net cash, fourteen days after delivery of each parcel. No iron was delivered within the periods specified, but the time was extended by arrangement, and a quantity of iron was delivered on different days between the 19th Feb. and the 18th May 1873, under constant pressure from the plaintiffs for a continuous delivery. On the last-mentioned day the delivery of the first parcel of 125 tons was completed, and fourteen days afterwards the defendants demanded payment for that parcel; no payment was however made. When, therefore, the plaintiffs requested further deliveries of iron, the defendants absolutely refused to deliver any more. To an action for non delivery of the second parcel, the defendants pleaded rescission of the contract. Held, that the non-payment for the first parcel by the plaintiffs was not such an abandonment or refusal to perform their part of the contract as to amount to a rescission which freed the defendants from their liability to deliver the rest of the iron: (Freeth and another v. Burr and another, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S, 773. C. P.)

THE LAW OF RE-INSURANCE.

THE subject of re-insurance has been surrounded with additional interest by the fact that several important suits have lately been brought, in which the principles of this subject are to be applied, and consequently an expression of the law as it now stands will not be unprofitable.

Re-insurance has been practised for several hundred years, and in marine insurance has become quite thoroughly defined, and there can hardly be found any sufficient reason why these same rules should not be applied to fire insurance. When insurance was carried on by individual underwriters, such persons might wish to change their business, or become bankrupt, or as companies now, might find they have tno much at risk in a particular neighbourhood, and thus desire to relieve themselves from a portion of the risk.

Re-insurance is defined by Arnold to be a contract by which, for a certain consideration, the original insurer throws upon another the risk, (or according to Marshall, part of it) for which he has made himself responsible to the original assured, to whom, however, he remains liable on the original insurance.

The contract of re-insurance was valid at common law, but in England it was made a gambling device, and was suppressed by Act of Parliament (19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 4), which declares that re-assurance is void unless the assured be insolvent, become a bankrupt, or die: (Andrse v. Fletcher, 2 T. R. 161.) The contract is valid in most of the maritime states of Europe (Marsh. Insurance, 143; Beawes Lex. Mercatoria), and is held good in the United States. In Mercy v. Prince (2 Mass. 176) it was held that the Act of Parliament did not extend to the colonies; also Hastie v. De Peyster (3 Caines, 190).

As early as Lucena v. Crawford (3 Bos. & P. 75), it was held that an insurable interest may spring from a prior insurance. Insurable interest is sufficiently shown, if it is shown that the plaintiffs were insurer or reinsurer: (Yonkers Fire Insurance Company v. Hoffman Fire Insurance Company, 6 Robts. 316; New York Bowery Insurance Company v. New York Fire Insurance Company, 17 Wend. 359.)

The contract is not a wagering contract, but one of indemnity, and companies which are authorised to make insurance contracts are, by implication, authorised to make reinsurance contracts: (Bowery Fire Insurance Company v. New York Fire Insurance Company (sup.) The contract being one of indemnity, the re-assured should only recover for actual loss sustained: (Eagle Insurance Company v. Lafayette Insurance Company, 9 Ind. 443; Mutual Safety Insurance Company v. Hone, 2 Comst. 235.) This actual loss will include costs incurred in defending suits, and if the reinsurer is notified of the suit, and does not appear and see that the costs are reasonable, he will be supposed to have approved of them by his silence: (New York State Insurance Company v. Protection Insurance Company, 1 Story, 458; Hastie v. De Peyster, 3 Caines, 190; New York Central Insurance Company v. Protection Insurance Company, 20 Barb. 468.)

Re-insurance is not the retaking of the specific risk. It may be on a risk equal or less than the original, but not greater; for then there would cease to be an insurable interest: (Philadelphia Insurance Company v. Washington Insurance Company, 11 Harris, 256.) It has also been held that the insurer may insure his entire risk, and include the premium.

The old authorities hold that, in case of loss, the re-insurer is bound to pay the amount for which he is re-insurer, without any regard to the circumstance that the re-assured may have procured an abatement from the first insured, or may be unable, because of bankruptcy, to pay in full: (Emerigon, tome 1, ch. 8, s. 14.) The insurer may at once proceed against the re-insurer, or he may await a suit, and recover the judgment obtained against him, with costs, from the reinsurer. He need not pay the judgment against him first, but may recover all the re-insurer is liable to pay: (Hone v. Mutual Safety Insurance Company, 1 Sandf. 137.) Chancellor Walworth, in Herckenrath v. American Insurance Company (3 Barb. ch. 63), considers that the authorities required the re-insurer to pay the amount the insurer becomes liable to pay, not what he has paid. In Eagle Insurance Company v. Lafayette Insurance Company (9 Ind. 443), the suit against the insurer had been dismissed, and not renewed in six months, which was the limitation for suits in the Lafayette Insurance Company. The court held that, although the re-insurer can make any defence which the original insurer might make, yet the limitation not being a good defence for the Lafayette Insurance Company, could not be invoked in favour of the Eagle Insurance Company, the Lafayette, in fact, being yet liable to the first insured.

The insurer, in seeking his remedy against the re-insurer, is obliged to prove up the character and extent of his loss: (Hastie v. De Peyster, 3 Caines, 190; Yonkers Fire Insurance Company v. Hoffman Fire Insurance Company, 6 Robts. 316.) The custom in France is for payment on proof of payment of loss by the insurer. But when there is no special contract, the re-insurer will be obliged to pay all that the first insurer ought himself to pay, and consequently must prove the existence and extent of the loss. The preliminary proofs ordinarily furnished are not sufficient, as the burden of proof is upon the re-insured to prove the extent of the loss in the original insurer must have proved it against him. There is no distinction between insurance and re-insurance policies as to the amount of proof required: (Yonkers Fire Insurance Company v. Hoffmann Fire Insurance Company, 6 Robts., 316.)

The insurer is bound to perform all the conditions of his re-insurance policy, and a failure to give notice of loss within a reasonable time will preclude recovery. Five days after the insurer was notified, the re-insurer was notified, and the court held it to be a sufficient compliance: (New York Central Insurance Company v. National Protection Insurance Company, 20 Barb. 468.) Any misrepresentation on the part of the insurer as to the character of the risk will avoid the policy, as when the insurer knew of the bad character of the insured, and did not disclose the fact: (New York Bowery Fire Insurance Company v. New York Fire Insurance Company, 17 Wend. 359.) And when the insurer reinsured the entire risk which was on goods, and stated that they had buildings in addition, which was false, the reinsurance could not be recovered, there being a custom among New Orleans underwriters to divide the risk and to consider it divided, unless the application stated otherwise: (Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company v. New Orleans Insurance Company, 13 La. An., 246.) If the insurer, on payment of loss, receives any benefit from salvage, this will accrue to the re-insurer; and if the salvage be improperly sold, the re-insurer is entitled to deduct the damage whibh can be proved up: (Delaware Insurance Company v. Quaker City Insurance Company, 3 Grant's Cases, 71.)

An ordinary fire policy may be used with the substitution of the word re-insure for insure (New York Bowery Fire Insurance Company v. New York Fire Insurance Company, 17 Wend. 359; Mutual Safety Insurance Company v. Hone, 2 Comst. 235); and if the loss is in terms made payable to the "assured" this can only mean the insurer, and not the original insured (Carrington v. Commercial Fire Insurance Company (1 Bosw. 152).

The same good faith must be observed between insurer and re-insurer as between insured and insurer, and consequently the same person cannot be agent of both parties, and insure in one company for which he is agent, and then reinsure in another for which he is also agent: (Utica Insurance Company v. Toledo Insurance Company, 17 Barb. 132); also when the same person was agent of one company and secretary of the other: (New York Central Insurance Company v. National Protection Insurance Company, 4 Kernan, 85.)

The contract of re-insurance is totally distinct from the primitive insurance, and the re-insurer has nothing to contest or settle with the primitive insurer (Hastie v. De Peyster, 3 Caines 190), not even if specific policies were reinsured (Carrington v. Commercial Insurance Company, 1 Bosw. 152). The amount received by the insurer from the re-insured is a general fund to be equitably distributed among the creditors of the insurer, and the original insured has no privity with the reinsurer, and, consequently, cannot come under the rule that the principal creditor is entitled to the benefit of all counter bonds and collateral securities: (Herckenrath v. American Mutual Insurance Company, 3 Barb. c. 63).—Western Insurance Review.

COMPANY LAW.

(Before Lord ROMILLY.)

LINES'S CASE.

THIS is the first case in the arbitration in which Lord Romilly has been concerned with the question of "novation." On the amalgamation of the Waterloo Company with the British Nation Association in 1862, Mr. Lines, a policyholder in the Waterloo, had received a circular announcing it, and stating that the "terms and conditions contained in the policies will remain unaltered by this arrangement." He thereafter paid his premiums to the British Nation, and after 1865 to the European Society. In 1867 a reversionary bonus was announced to him by the European, but he took no notice of the announcement. In 1862-3 the Waterloo had been ordered to be wound-up, and advertisements had been inserted in various newspapers, calling on creditors to come in and prove their claims; but Mr. Lines now alleged he knew nothing about the winding-up.

Lord ROMILLY now delivered judgment, and held that the subsequent dealings with the British Nation and the European were not sufficient by themselves to constitute a novation. Yet Mr. Lines must be deemed to have had notice of the winding-up of the Waterloo, and inasmuch as he had omitted to prove on his policy against that company in pursuance of the advertisements duly issued, he must be taken to have abandoned his rights against the Waterloo Company, and consequently could not now prove against them.

This being a representative case, costs were allowed to Mr. Lines.

Napier Higgins, Q.C. and Cookson were for the official liquidator.

De Gex. Q.C. and Horton Smith for Mr. Lines.

STEVENS'S CASE; NUTTALL'S CASE.

THESE cases were complicated cases with regard to the arrangements made on the amalgamation of the Professional Company with the European Society.

Lord ROMILLY now held that the society was entitled to recover the balance of the sum charged upon Stevens's policy, with interest at 4 per cent., after giving credit for the dividends received by the society from the Professional, and that the debt might be set off against any dividend payable to him by the society on his proof for his policy. And that the society was entitled to recover from Nuttall the amount of the dividends received by him from the Professional.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., Roxburgh, Q.C., Pearson, Q.C., Waller, and Cookson appeared for the parties.

PHILLIP'S CASE.

JUDGMENT was delivered to-day in this case. The question was as to the validity of a transfer of European Society's shares, which Mr. Phillips had made to a pauper transferee, whose name had been furnished to Mr. Phillips's solicitors by a share dealer called Bensusan. In the notice of the wish to transfer, the consideration had been described as £29 10s. paid by the transferor. A cheque for that amount was sent to the transferee and indorsed by him; but it appeared that £7 15s. only had been kept by him, £10 of it going to one Bermingham, a transfer clerk of the society, and the remainder to Bensusan and his clerk.

Lord ROMILLY held that, if all the facts had been stated to the directors, and they had, in the bona fide discharge of their office, though fit to pass the transfer, no complaint could have been made, but under the circumstances of the case the transaction could not be allowed to stand, and the transferor must be placed on the list of contributories. His Lordship further stated: Though I disapprove the practice of throwing the debts of the company on the remaining shareholders, yet I do not mean to lay down that, where a person seeks to speculate in shares that are worth less than nothing in the market in the hope that something may ultimately come out of them, he may not do so. However, I repeat that, in all such transactions, in order to make a valid transfer which shall bind the shareholders of the company, who trust their affairs entirely to the directors, it is essential that the full transaction shall be laid before the directors in all its details, and that no officer of the company, particularly one so important as the transfer clerk, who has the care of the books, shall have any pecuniary advantage arising from it. These transactions are very complicated, and the object of the persons who are engaged in them is to mix them up in such a manner that it is very difficult to unravel them. It is for this reason that I have stated the burden of proof—and in this I have followed Lord Westbury—lies upon the transferor, and that it is his duty to show that everything that is material for the decision of the directors has been brought carefully to their attention.

Napier Higgins, Q.C. and Cookson were for the official liquidators.

CHATTERIS'S CASE—LAWSON'S CASE.

IN these cases the amalgamation of the British Commercial Insurance Company with the British Nation Assurance Association had been carried into effect by means of a deed, whereby several of the British Commercial shareholders covenanted to transfer their shares to trustees for the Association. The greater part of the shareholders executed this deed, and also transferred their shares to trustees. Mr. Chatteris was one who executed the deed, but did not transfer his shares. The official liquidators sought to place him on the list of contributories, but Lord ROMILLY now delivered judgment and held that the question was governed by Lord Westbury's decisions in Blundell's case (Law Times European Reports, p. 39) and Rivington's case (Law Times European Reports, p. 57). The trustees, Messrs. Bermingham and Lake, would be placed on the list of contributories, and would be left to compel their cestuis que trustent to pay the calls made on them.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Cookson were for the official liquidators.

Millar and Bevir for the respondents.

EQUITY IN COUNTY COURTS.

EQUITY suits apparently are increasing in the County Courts, but unfortunately the decisions are very generally reversed on appeal. We noticed last week an appeal against the dismissal of a plaint on the ground of want of jurisdiction when the case ought properly to have been transferred. We now extract the following from the Weekly Notes of the Law Reports for Jan. 31:

V.C. MALINS' COURT.

Monday, Jan. 26.

NOKES v. GANDY.

County Court appeal—Administration suit—Restraining creditor's action—Injunction before decree and ex parte.

COUNTY Court appeal.

William Gandy the younger died on the 4th Aug. 1873, being at the time indebted to Thomas Richardson in the sum of £75 9s. 9d.

Alfred Darby took possession of William Gandy junior's estate as executor de son tort, and Thomas Richardson brought an action against him as such executor in the Court of Exchequer for his debt. Letters of administration to William Gandy junior were then granted to William Gandy senior.

On the 22nd Oct. 1873 Albert Nokes, another creditor of William Gandy junior, filed an administration plaint against William Gandy senior and Alfred Darby in the County Court of Chelmsford.

By rule 8 of the first of the County Court Orders no decree in an equitable suit can be made till one month after plaint filed.

Before decree, on the application of the plaintiff, an order was made ex parte restraining Thomas Richardson from continuing his action. The latter moved in the County Court to discharge the order, but the judge refused to dissolve the injunction.

Thomas Richardson appealed.

Glasse, Q.C. and Nalder, in support of the appeal.

Cotton, Q.C. and Begg, for the respondents.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR held that the power of the County Courts in administration suits did not go beyond that of the Court of Chancery, and an action by a creditor could not be restrained in an administration suit before decree, or on an ex parte application. The appeal was therefore allowed with costs.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Tuesday, Jan. 27.

TAYLOR v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

A County Court appeal.

THIS was an action brought in the Haverhil County Court of Suffolk, before Edmond Beales Esq., M. A., judge, to recover the sum of £2 17s. 10d. for damages sustained by the plaintiff, through the alleged negligence of the defendants, to certain articles of furniture. At the trial the following facts were admitted.

That the furniture in question was sent from London to Haverhill by the detendants' railway. That the person who delivered the goods to the defendants, for the purpose of being carried, and who was a servant of the consignor, signed a contract, the material part of which was as follows: "In consideration of the company accepting the goods to be forwarded at the lower rate it is agreed that the goods are to be forwarded solely at the risk of the owner, with the exception that the company shall be responsible for any wilful act or wilful default of the company or their servants, if proved, for fraud or theft by their servants, and for collision of trains conveying the goods within the company's limits." During the transit the damage complained of was done to the goods.

Upon these facts the defendants contended that they were protected by the contract note.

The plaintiffs contended that as consignee had not authorised the signature of the contract note, he was not bound by the signature of the consignor's servant.

The defendants were allowed to appeal on the condition that they paid the costs of the appeal.

Mayd now appeared for the respondent.

BLACKBURN, J., asked what he had to say in support of the ruling, as he was loth to believe that the County Court judge could so have ruled.

Mayd said that with all submission he did not think he could support such ruling.

BLACKBURN.—I should be surprised if you could.

Mayd.—The next point is, whether or not the condition is a reasonable one.

BLACKBURN, J.—There is still a further step, in which I think you will find still greater difficulty, there being no evidence the judge ruled "That supposing the contract note is to be binding on the plaintiff the injury must be presumed to have been caused by the wilful act or default of the company or their servants." That is what I confess I cannot help thinking must be a forgery, and if so it is a gross libel upon the judge; but if he did really rule it, and is in the habit of making such rulings, I own I think the Lord Chancellor should be made aware of it.

Mayd.—As to forgery, I can say the judge certainly had a month to consider the judgment.

BLACKBURN, J.—Really, how can you support such ruling?

Mayd.—As there was no evidence, and as your Lordship entertains such a strong opinion, I will add nothing further.

BLACKBURN, J.—Then I simply say we must reverse the judgment.

Douglas Walker, for the appellants, as to costs.—We made the condition that we should pay the costs of the appeal. Those were the only terms upon which my clients were allowed to appeal from the judge's decision, and we had no means of bringing it to the attention of the court except by stating it in this way.

BLACKBURN, J.—If you have bound yourself in honour not to ask for the costs, and you are to pay the costs, well and good. It may be that the conditions he seeks to impose upon you are in excess of his jurisdiction, but that is not a matter before us. Nobody on one side or the other is asking us to enforce this condition or to quash it, but I think probably after the strong expressions that have fallen from the court as to the absurdity of the decision of the court below, it will hardly be insisted upon. Judgment reversed.

BIGGLESWADE COUNTY COURT.

(Before EDMOND BEALES, Esq., Judge.)

Tuesday, Dec. 2, 1873.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. SWAFFIELD.

Carriers—Horse—Consignee not ready to receive—Right of company to recover livery charges.

THIS was an action brought by the Great Northern Railway Company to recover certain charges paid by them for the keep of the defendant's horse, under the circumstances stated in the judgment.

James P. Aspinall (barrister) instructed by Johnstone, Farquhar, and Leech, appeared for the plaintiffs.

Stimson for the defendant.

His HONOUR gave judgment as follows.—In this case the plaintiff claimed the sum of £17 from the defendant under the following circumstances, as admitted or proved by evidence. On the 5th July of last year (1872) the defendant sent a horse by the plaintiff's 8.40 p.m. train from King's Cross to Sandy, consigned to himself at the latter place. On the arrival of the train at Sandy at 10.8 p.m. there was no one on the part of the defendant to receive the horse, and the defendant being unknown to the station master there, who also did not know where the defendant lived, he directed the horse to be taken to Bennett's livery stables for safe custody. The defendant lives at Wootton, near Bedford, between fifteen and sixteen miles from Sandy, and a man in his employ, who had been directed to meet the horse at Sandy, arrived there by the London and North Western train from Bedford at between 10.35 and 10.40, some short time only after the horse had been placed at the livery stables. He produced the ticket for the horse, and was informed by the railway porter that it was at the livery stables, and the station master being applied to told the defendant's man he could have the horse on payment of the livery stables charge, and Bennett's man happening at that moment to come up was asked what the charge would be, and replied 6d. This the defendant's man refused to pay, although he had 1s. 6d. in his pocket. He and the railway porter and Bennett's man then went together to the stables, and the defendant's man demanded the horse, which Bennett, the livery stable keeper, said he might have on payment of 1s. 6d. This he refused to pay, and further refused to pay anything, accompanying such refusal with insolent language; upon which Bennett said he should not have the horse except upon payment of 2s. 6d., being the full and usual charge for a horse's keep for a night. On the following morning, the 6th July, the defendant himself came to the station and asked Mason, the station master, why his man had not been allowed to take the horse away, to which Mason replied he supposed it was because his man had refused to pay the stable charges. Mason, in his evidence in chief, stated further as follows: "I tried to persuade the defendant to take the horse away, and pay Bennett's charge. He declined, and said he would not recognise Bennett at all, but offered to pay any demand of the company if I would give him a proper receipt. I said the company's demands had been met by payment in London, and we had no further demand to make. He still declined to pay Bennett, and I, thinking it would be a pity for him to go away without the horse, after coming some sixteen miles for it, said rather than he should go away without the horse, I would pay the charges out of my own pocket. He then declared he would have nothing to do with it, and went away." Mason, in his cross-examination said, "I told him (the defendant) if he would pay Bennett, Bennett would give him a receipt, and if he left the receipt with me I would represent the case to our superintendent. This was with a view to get the money from the company which the defendant should pay Bennett." On his re-examination Mason stated that his offer to pay Bennett's charge out of his own pocket was to avoid trouble, and was not made on the part of the company, as likewise his offer to represent the case to the superintendent. Afterwards, on the same day, the 6th July, the defendant wrote to the general manager of the plaintiffs at King's-cross, and, after referring to what had taken place that morning and the previous evening, stated that he left the horse on the company's hands, and claimed £21 for the price of the horse, his own and man's loss of time and expenses to Sandy £1 10s., altogether £22 10s. To this Mason, the station master at Sandy, replied on the 8th July as follows:

The Great Northern Railway, Sandy, July 8, 1872.

Sir,—I am instructed by our superintendent to deliver the horse consigned to you from London, on Friday last, without payment of the livery charges, but at the same time to inform you that we shall look to you for payment of the same. You can therefore have the horse for sending for, and perhaps you will inform me, per bearer, at what time you will come or send for it.—Yours obediently, J. MASON.

Mr. Swaffield, Wootton, near Bedford.

This led to the three following letters:—

Wootton, July 8, 1872.

Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of to-day's date respecting the delay in delivery of my horse, and beg to say I will not come to Sandy any more after him, but if you choose to deliver him at my farm, at Wootton, by 1 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, free of expense, also pay my expenses, 30s., for loss of time and delay in delivery of horse. Under these circumstances, and no other, will I receive him. I am leaving home to-morrow for three days, and if you accept my terms he must be delivered before I leave.—Yours obediently, S. J. SWAFFIELD.

Mr. Mason, Sandy.

The Great Northern Railway, Sandy Station, 9th July 1872.

SIR,—In reply to yours of last evening, I am further instructed by our superintendent to inform you that the horse will remain at the stables entirely at your risk and expense, and that we disclaim any liability whatever.—I am, Sir, yours truly J. MASON.

Mr. S. J. Swaffield, Wootton, near Bedford.

Wootton, 12th July, 1872.

SIR,—I am in receipt of yours of the 10th inst., and as the company refuse the conditions on which I agreed to accept the horse, I have now placed the matter in the hands of my solicitor.—Yours, obediently, S. J. SWAFFIELD.

Mr. Mason, Sandy.

This last letter was followed up by the defendant commencing an action in the Exchequer on the 30th of the same month against the company for non-delivery, conversion, and wrongful detainer of his horse, and by his declaration, filed the 26th Oct. 1872, he claimed, besides return of the horse, or its value, £10 for its detention, and £100 damages.

On the 18th of the following month, November, the company delivered up the horse to the defendant without any further demand on his part, sending it by one of their porters to his residence at Wootton, and the defendant received it, telling the porter he would take to it, and the company, on so voluntarily delivering the horse to the defendant, made no claim for payment of any livery charges.

On the 17th Feb. last, they also voluntarily paid these charges to Bennett amounting to £17, for livery of the horse from the 5th July to the 18th Nov. 1872, at 17s. 6d. per week, and this is the sum they now seek to recover from the defendant.

Meanwhile they pleaded to his action in the Exchequer, and paid £3 10s. into court in respect of his claim for damages, and the action came on to be heard at the assizes at Bedford, on the 22nd July last, before Mr. Baron Bramwell and a common jury, when a verdict was found for the company, which Mr. Baron Bramwell declared to be a capital verdict, adding that if the jury had found the other way, he should have directed a verdict for the company, because he was quite clear that after that offer on the next day, meaning the offer by Mason, the station master, to pay the livery charges to enable the defendant to take the horse away, they did not detain.

In the course of his summing up, the learned judge animadverted somewhat strongly on the conduct of the defendant, the plaintiff in the action against the company, and intimated that it was the duty of the owner of the horse to have somebody there to receive it when it arrived, and that if he had no one there, the company not only had a right, but were bound to conduct themselves in a reasonable way towards the horse, and that it was reasonable to put it in the livery stable; and also that the livery stable keeper's demand of 2s. 6d. was reasonable, and if those two things were reasonable, then in his opinion the action was not maintainable. He likewise observed that the station master seemed to be the only reasonable person in the case, and showed his good sense when he offered to pay the money, but he would, he further observed, have done better if he had said, "I will give you any receipt you like" (although he could not properly give one), and better still, if he had put the messenger on the horse and sent it to the plaintiff's door, and let him make the best of it.

I also cannot but say that it is very lamentable that all this litigation should have arisen out of a refusal by the defendant's man to pay the sum of 6d. on the evening of the 5th July, and a further refusal by the defendant himself the following morning to take the horse away, and accept the station master's offer of payment of the livery charge out of his own pocket; nor do I think such a litigation very creditable to our system of law, but such considerations cannot absolve me from deciding upon the strict rights of the parties according to the best of my ability and my views of the principles of our law.

The question, therefore, is whether the plaintiffs, the company, are after what has occurred, entitled to recover from the defendant the money, £17 they of their own accord paid to Bennett for the livery of the horse, which they also voluntarily delivered to the defendant; and I am, although very desirous of deciding in their favour, unable to arrive at the conclusion that they are legally so entitled. They seem to me to have precluded themselves from the recovery of this money by their own acts.

The pleader appears to have felt the difficulty of the case, for the plaint is not framed in any ordinary form, for the recovery of money paid at the defendant's request, or to his use, but bases the claim on the peculiar ground of the verdict of the jury in the action at the assizes having proved that the horse had been wrongfully refused to be received by the defendant. That verdict does not in my opinion prove this, supposing even that any one of the company's pleas includes such wrongful refusal, which I much doubt. That verdict proves that there was no conversion or wrongful detainer by the company in accordance with the opinion expressed by the very learned judge who tried the action, but it leaves, as seems to me, the question of wrongful refusal by the defendant wholly untouched, and I am at a loss to understand how it could prove that the defendant wrongfully refused to receive what he ultimately did receive on the voluntary delivery of the company. It is true that he at first refused to receive the horse on the terms proposed by the station-master verbally, and I think with Baron Bramwell, with much good sense on the 6th July, and afterwards in writing by his letter of the 8th July; but the company did not act on that letter, they neither then delivered nor tendered the delivery of the horse, and they afterwards delivered it without insisting on those terms, and the defendant received it as so delivered. After this the company cannot, I think, treat that delivery and receipt as nullities, and fall back on the defendant's former refusal—a refusal when their claim against him, supposing they could establish it, was a mere trifle, and, on the ground of that refusal being wrongful, establish against him a claim of the present large amount, running over several months and up to the time of his receiving the horse on their own voluntary delivery without making any such claim. Whether his former refusal to receive the horse was in strict law wrongful depends upon whether he was liable to Bennett, he having refused to receive the horse if required to pay the livery charges. Here, again, the company appear to me to have of themselves decided the question in the defendant's favour. They voluntarily paid the charges after having allowed them to accumulate over several months, if they were Bennett's debtors and legally bound to pay him, they cannot under the circumstances sue the defendant for the money as paid at his request, express or implied, or to his use. Neither can they do so if the defendant could be considered legally Bennett's debtor (and I cannot understand how he could be, for he neither placed the horse at livery nor came under any undertaking to pay for it), inasmuch as it is quite clear that the debt was not paid at his request, express or implied; and it is an established principle of law that no assumpsit will be raised by the mere voluntary payment of the debt of another person, and no man can become the creditor without his knowledge or consent. But then Mr. Aspinall, who argued the case with much ability on the part of the company, contended as to the first of these points that the defendant by not being at the station to receive the horse obliged the company to incur the expenses of its keep, and as those expenses were only reasonable, they were entitled to recover them as properly incurred. Upon the authority of the cases Brown v. Gaudet, cargo ex Argos before the Privy Council reported in 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 745, where a shipowner was held entitled to recover the expense of bringing back to London a cargo of petroleum shipped with him at London for Havre, but which he was forbidden by the French authorities to deliver at that port. But that case seems to me to be very distinguishable from the present. The shipowner had done nothing to invalidate his claim, and there is nothing in the present case in the nature of the compensation there claimed and allowed for bringing back the goods, whilst the goods were only delivered up to the owner of them on payment of the wharf charges and expenses consequent on their deposit when brought back to Plaistow Wharf. According to that case, so far as it at all affects the present, the company should not have delivered up the horse but upon payment of the livery charges, instead of first delivering it and then seeking to recover the charges. Supposing them entitled to recover them at all, and that such a case as the present falls within the principle of shipowners being bound in cases of emergency and accident to act in the best manner, for the safety of the cargo, and, as a correlative right, are entitled to charge its owner with the expenses properly incurred in so doing, I think that even upon that supposition the company in this case have, by their own acts, rendered that principle inapplicable to them and that they cannot now maintain this suit.

Judgment for the defendant but no costs.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PARTNERSHIP—BANKRUPTCY OF ONE PARTNER—SALE OF BOOK DEBTS AND GOODWILL BY PRIVATE CONTRACT.—The 72nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 gives the Court of Bankruptcy a very large authority to decide such questions as it may be found necessary or convenient to determine for the proper purpose of administration in bankruptcy, but it does not enable the Court of Bankruptcy to draw compulsorily within the sphere of its jurisdiction property, or the owners of property, not vested in the assignee, and not originally subject to the administration in bankruptcy. In 1864 a decree was made in a suit for the dissolution of a partnership, by which it was ordered that the partnership business should be sold by public auction. In the following year one of the partners was adjudicated bankrupt. In 1869, no sale having been made under the decree, the assignee of the bankrupt partner agreed to sell his share in the business to the other partners, and the agreement was carried into effect under an order of the Court of Chancery. On application to the Court of Bankruptcy by newly appointed assignees of the bankrupt partner to set aside the sale on the ground of alleged fraud: Held (reversing the decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy), that the alleged fraud was not proved, but that if the sale of the bankrupt's share of the partnership assets was set aside, the Court of Bankruptcy would have no power under the 72nd section of the Act of 1869 to work out the decree in the Chancery suit for the sale of the whole partnership business, including the shares of the solvent partners. Held, also, that the book debts and goodwill of a dissolved partnership, of which only one partner is bankrupt and the others continue solvent, are not assets distributable in the bankruptcy, and that the sale of the bankrupt's share in such property is not a sale of "book debts or goodwill" within the meaning of the 137th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and that there is nothing in that provision to prevent the assignee, of the bankrupt partner from selling the bankrupt's share by private contract without the sanction of the Court of Bankruptcy: (Maule v. Davis, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 757. Chan.)

PARTNERSHIP—SEPARATE ADJUDICATION IN ENGLAND—SUBSEQUENT JOINT ADJUDICATION IN IRELAND—JOINT ASSETS IN ENGLAND.—Two partners carried on business in England and Ireland. One of the partners executed an assignment in England for the benefit of his creditors, and was afterwards adjudicated a bankrupt in England. Some of the joint estate of the partners came into the hands of the trustees of the deed, who sold it, and the proceeds of sale were, under the order of the court, deposited in a bank in the joint names of the trustees of the deed and the trustee in the bankruptcy. Before this was done, a joint adjudication of bankruptcy had been made against the two partners in Ireland. On an application by the Irish assignees of the joint estate to have the proceeds of sale paid over to them: Held, that the trustee under the separate adjudication in England, and the assignees under the joint adjudication in Ireland, were tenants in common of the joint assets, and that the latter had no better title to the proceeds of the sale in question than the former. And the application was refused on that ground, and also on the ground of convenience, as the greater number of the joint creditors lived in England and wished the fund in question to remain in this country: (Ex parte James; re O'Rearden, 29 L. T. Rep. N S. 761. Chan.)

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Saturday, Jan. 31.

(Before Mr. Registrar SPRING RICE, sitting as Chief Judge).

Ex parte NICOLL; Re NICOLL.

Solicitor's costs—Right to prove for.

THIS was an appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Keene, whereby he refused to register a resolution of creditors.

De Gex, Q.C., and Bagley appeared for the appellant; Brough for Messrs. Frege and Co.; and Finlay Knight for other creditors.

The debtor, Mr. Donald Nicoll, carried on business at 58 and 59, Paternoster-row, as a wholesale clothier and warehouseman. Some weeks since he filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement, his debts and liabilities being stated at £58,453, with assets, inclusive of a surplus from securities in the hands of creditors fully secured, £20,391. At the first meeting of creditors, held on the 28th Nov. a resolution was passed for the acceptance of a composition of 7s. in the pound, payable by instalments, and at the adjourned meeting, which was held shortly afterwards, the resolution was confirmed; but, upon the matter being brought before the registrar, he upheld objections made to certain of the proofs, and declined to register the resolution on the ground that the necessary majority in number of the creditors had not assented thereto. The debtor appealed, and the material points involved seemed to be whether a solicitor was entitled to prove and vote in respect of an untaxed but admitted debt for costs, and whether a creditor who had appointed a proxy could, after the meeting of creditors, sign a resolution in favour of a composition, his proxy having, at the meeting, signed a "protest" against its acceptance.

His HONOUR, at the close of the arguments, held that a solicitor was entitled to prove and vote under liquidation proceedings in respect of costs, although the bill might not have been taxed at the time, and that the signature of the "protest" by the proxy did not operate so as to prevent the creditor from signing the resolution before registration.

The result of the order will be to render the resolution effectual.

LEGAL NEWS.

PRIVATE BILLS.—The dissolution of Parliament does not affect the preliminary proceedings of private Bills, for the introduction of which notices have been duly given. The examiners will proceed to examine these bills regularly, and no additional fees will be required.

FRENCH CRIMINAL LAW.—Two prisoners in France, a man and woman, having been convicted of forging notes of the Bank of France, have been sentenced, respectively, to ten years' imprisonment, and penal servitude for life. There were extenuating facts in the case of the male prisoner.

SANITARY LAW.—The Lords of the Council have ordered that the provisions for the prevention of diseases contained in part 3 of the Act, 30 & 31 Vict. cap. 101, be continued in force in Scotland for the space of three calendar months, after the 29th Jan. 1874, as the United Kingdom appears to be threatened with cholera.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR SAMUEL MARTIN.—The ex-Baron of the Exchequer, Sir Samuel Martin, having been sworn in a Privy Councillor, will forthwith take his seat on the Judicial Committee.

HON. REVERDY JOHNSON has been retained by Attorney-General Williams as special assistant to the Attorney-General in controversies between the Government and the various telegraph companies.

THE JUDICATURE ACT.—Mr. G. M. Dowdeswell, Q.C., will read a paper on Monday evening next, the 9th inst., at a meeting of the Law Amendment Society, to be held at their rooms in Adam-street, Adelphi, on "The Rules of Practice and Procedure to be framed under the Judicature Act 1873."

THE NEW QUEEN'S COUNSEL.—The following is the list of barristers to whose applications for the silk gown a favourable reply has, we understand, been returned by the Lord Chancellor:—Mr. Charles Clark, of the House of Lords; Mr. Arthur Cohen, Mr. Murphy, and Mr. S. Joyce, of the Home Circuit; Mr. Waddy, of the Midland Circuit; and Mr. R. G. Williams and Mr. Charles H. Hopwood, of the Northern Circuit; and Mr. T. E. Winslow, Mr. T. Waller. Mr. W. R. G. Bagshawe, Mr. W. Pearson, Mr. John Westlake, Mr. Joseph Chitty, and Mr. A. G. Marten, of the Equity Bar.

THE STAMP ACT.—An "Ex-Conveyancer" in the Times observes as to the cancelling of stamps, that out of more than fifty stamped receipts, examined by him, only sixteen out of them were cancelled legally, so that thirty-four penalties of £10 had been incurred, and at least £64 had been without legal evidence of payment! An adhesive stamp is not cancelled legally unless "the person required by law to cancel such adhesive stamp cancels the same by writing on or across the stamp his name or initials, or the name or initials of his firm, together with the true date of his so writing." An easy process which should be observed. In reply to this a "Solicitor" in the Times, citing as his authority, the 24th section of the Stamp Act (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), alleges that, it is unnecessary that adhesive stamped receipts should bear the date of cancellation. He submits that the signing of the name to a receipt over an adhesive stamp is sufficient to satisfy this statute, although the case may be otherwise where the stamp is placed at the corner or any part of the receipt except that where the receipt is signed.

THE UNITED STATES' SUPREME COURT.—The nomination of Morrison R. Waite, of Ohio, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States was confirmed by the Senate on the 21st Jan. without any opposition, the Democrats as well as the Republicans voting for him. This is an agreeable ending to a political difficulty which it was at one time feared might result in a quarrel between the President and the Senate. The new Chief Justice is a native of Lyme, Connecticut, and was born in 1816. He graduated at Yale College in 1837, in the same class with William M. Evarts and Edwards Pierrepoint, receiving equal class honours with them. He removed to Ohio, and began the practice of law in 1839, ultimately making Toledo his home. It appears that he was first brought into public life by Secretary Delano, of President Grant's cabinet, at whose suggestion he was appointed one of the American counsel before the Geneva Arbitrators. His course of conduct at Geneva was generally commended, and on returning home he was elected a member of the Convention which is revising the Ohio State Constitution, of which body he is the president. There is no doubt of his legal abilities or of his fitness to hold the first judicial position in the United States. The Hon. Caleb Cushing, after some little hesitation, has finally decided to accept the post of American Minister to Madrid, and is preparing for his departure.—Times correspondent.

THE CHIEF JUSTICESHIP OF THE UNITED STATES.—The unfortunate muddle with regard to the Chief Justiceship continues. In compliance with a letter from Mr. Williams, in which that gentleman talked about "the flood-gates of calumny" and like nonsense, the President withdrew his nomination. On Friday week he sent to the Senate the name of Mr. Caleb Cushing. This nomination created, if anything, more astonishment than that of Mr. Williams. It seemed likely at first that Mr. Cushing would be confirmed without delay and without serious opposition, and the Judiciary Committee were nearly unanimous in favour of it. But very soon a strong opposition began to manifest itself both among members of Congress and throughout the country. Prominent administration papers denounced the nomination, and the New York Times declared that in case of its confirmation "a great danger will menace the nation and a lasting disgrace will be attached to President Grant's second term." The intellectual and professional qualifications of Mr. Cushing are conceded, but the objections urged were, first, his advanced age; second, his alleged deficiency in what is termed "moral force, elevation of tone, sincerity of principle, and consistency;" third, his political record and "questionable position respecting constitutional questions growing out of the war." The first two were but slightly pressed, and were undoubtedly thrown in for relief. The third was the one that came most strongly home to the bosoms of his opponents. It was gravely asserted that his accession to the high office "would imperil the nation," would lead to an "overthrow of all the good results brought about by the war," and "would defeat the very objects to accomplish which the Republican party was formed." This was conceding to a Chief Justice a power which he never has had in this country, and which he is never likely to have. The Chief Justice is but one of nine, and in the determination of any question presented to the court of no greater influence than any of his associates. The present Supreme Bench is largely Republican, and entirely committed to the great constitutional reforms which that party inaugurated, and there is scarcely a possibility that the complexion of the court on these questions will be changed during the few years that remain to Mr. Cushing. So that any cry of danger either to the nation or to universal liberty and civil rights was nothing but a ridiculous bugbear.—Albany Law Journal.

BANQUET TO SIR SAMUEL MARTIN.—The old and present members of the Northern Circuit entertained Sir Samuel Martin at dinner at the Albion on Saturday evening last. There was a large gathering of "Northerners" to do honour to their old chief, and among those assembled were Lord Justice Mellish, Mr. Justice Blackburn, Mr. Justice Brett, Baron Cleasby, Mr. Justice Quain, Sir Lawrence Peel, Sir Frederick Pollock, the Hon. A. Liddell, Q.C., Sir Thomas Henry, Sir Henry Holland, Mr. Holker, Q.C., Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., Mr. J. A. Russell, Q.C., Mr. Vernon Lushington, Q.C., Mr. Kemplay, Q.C., Mr. Temple, Q.C., Mr. Herschell, Q.C., Mr. Pope, Q.C., Mr. Aston, Q.C., Mr. Torr, Q.C., Mr. Littler, Q.C., Dr. Spinks, Q.C., Mr. Serjeant Wheeler, Master G. F. Pollock, Mr. Corrie, Mr. Ingham, Mr. Arnold, Mr. Bigg, Mr. Hannay, Mr. Blair, Mr. Whigham, Mr. Barstow, Mr. Foard, Mr. Hugh Shield, Mr. R. G. Williams, Mr. Edwards, Mr. J. Shiel, Mr. J. E. Hill, Mr. Baxter, Mr. C. Coleman, Mr. Wood, Mr. M'Connell, Mr. Tredfall, &c. The coming elections caused the absence of several members of the circuit who were desirous of being present, but of all those who had acquired judicial rank on the circuit Lord Penzance was the only absentee. The chair was taken by Mr. Pickering, Q.C., and the toast of the evening, "Health and Long Life to Sir Samuel Martin," was enthusiastically drunk. Nearly ninety gentlemen sat down to the dinner, which was worthy the occasion.

61. APPARENT POSSESSION.—A considerable quantity of furniture and valuable plate is purchased by a lady married previously to the 9th August 1870 (without any marriage settlement), with her money. Her husband, who is in a large way of business, and at present perfectly solvent, without these effects, wishes this furniture and plate to be settled upon her so as to protect it against the sheriff or assignees in Bankruptcy in case of any unlucky contingency. How can this be done without registering the settlement under the Bills of Sale Act, which would injure his credit, seeing that the husband living with his wife would be in apparent possession of the furniture? It is apprehended that delivery of an article of furniture to the settlement trustees in the name of the whole would not be a sufficient delivery. Cases will oblige. W.

62. PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION AND DISPENSING ORDER.—A gentleman has obtained an order dispensing with the preliminary examination under the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 8. He proposes to be articled in about two years' time. Will you or any of your readers say whether this order will operate as a complete dispensation of the examination at any time hereafter?

(Q. 59.) TRUSTS—EXECUTION BY DEVISE.—The 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, s. 27, contains a general provision for the appointment of new trustees, but I do not see that it authorises or even permits a devise by the surviving trustee to be construed as an appointment of the devisee as trustee. It is expressly laid down by able writers, and supported by numerous cases, that a naked power given to trustees or the survivors of them cannot be exercised by a devisee of the surviving trustee. If the property had been vested in the heirs and assigns of the survivor, then a devisee by will, but not an assign by deed, could execute the trust. T. E. H.

LEGAL EXTRACTS.

THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION AND THE IRISH COUNTY COURTS.

Report on the Application of the Principles recommended by the Judicature Commission to the Irish County Courts, by Mr. CONSTANTINE MOLLOY.

[Read before the Statistical Society of Ireland.]

SINCE the subject of this report was entrusted to me, the principles recommended by the Judicature Commission have received the sanction of the Legislature and become law; and the year that has just now closed will always form a memorable epoch in the legal history of the empire, signalised as it has been by the accomplishment, in a single session of Parliament, of one of the most beneficial legal reforms ever effected. The fusion of legal and equitable principles, the simplification of law, and the preference for equitable principles over ancient statutes and harsh rules, secured for England by the Judicature Act of 1873, must produce an improvement in the administration of justice, the importance of which it would be difficult to over-estimate.

In this great legal reform Ireland is not, as yet, entitled to participate. Her right, as an integral portion of the United Kingdom, to have extended to her every beneficial reform effected for the sister kingdom is unquestionable, and is especially so in whatever requires the due administration of justice, and the prompt and efficacious enforcement of civil rights, so that the extension to this country of the great legal reform of 1873 may be regarded as a mere matter of time. Desirable as it is in the case of the superior courts, the importance and urgency of extending it to the inferior courts, are still more manifest, for the humbler the suitor is, and the less aided he is by legal assistance in his dealings, the more necessary it is that he should be able to obtain full and complete justice in one court; and the greater is the benefit conferred when law is freed from unnecessary complications and framed in accordance with principles of natural equity, which are intelligible to all.

In Scotland, when in the middle of the eighteenth century, nearly all the hereditary jurisdictions were abolished, it became necessary to substitute some power of administering justice in each district, and, accordingly, a local tribunal, known as the Sheriff's Court, was established. This court has now civil jurisdiction of a very complete and extensive nature. It can entertain all questions relating to removables, and all questions of possession, even although these may involve the consideration of titles to real property, and questions between landlord and tenant. Its jurisdiction also embraces admiralty questions, and those relating to wills and bankruptcy. In a word, it affords to all a ready, local, and complete remedy, under forms which make it easy of access, economical, and satisfactory.

The Irish County Court was first established by a statute of the Irish Parliament towards the close of the last century, long before a similar court was instituted for England; and from the first establishment of these local tribunals in Ireland and in England, various measures have been, from time to time, passed for their improvement; but although the Irish County Court was first started, the English County Court has been suffered to outstep in the race of improvement its Irish prototype. Unfavourable as the contrast at present is between the Irish and the English County Courts, as means of administering justice, that contrast will become still more marked after the 2nd of next Nov., when the time will arrive for applying to all matters within the cognisance of the English County Court, the new and enlightened rules of law enacted by the Judicature Act of last session.

The English County Court has power to try all actions of contract or tort, where the debt, whether on a balance or otherwise, or the damage claimed does not exceed £50, except actions of libel, slander, seduction, malicious prosecution, breach of promise of marriage. It can also try any claim for the recovery of any demand not exceeding £50, which is the whole or part of the unliquidated balance of a partnership account, or the amount of a distributive share under an intestacy, or of any legacy under a will. It has also jurisdiction in any action of ejectment on the title, where the value of the lands, or the rent payable in respect thereof, does not exceed £20 by the year, and also in any action in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments is in question, where neither the value of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in dispute, nor the rent payable in respect thereof exceeds the sum of £20 by the year; and also in case of any easements or license, where neither the value or the reserved rent of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in respect of which the license or easement is claimed, or on, through, or over which, easement or licence is claimed, exceeds £20 by the year.

In 1865 jurisdiction in equity was conferred on the English County Court, and it was enabled to try suits in equity to the extent of £500. Its equitable jurisdiction is comprised under ten heads.

1. The administrations of estates of testators and intestates.
2. The execution of trusts.
3. The foreclosure or redemption of, or enforcing mortgages, charges, or liens.
4. The specific performance of, or reforming, delivering up, or cancelling agreements.
5. The relief of trustees.
6. Proceedings under the Trustee Act.
7. Proceedings relating to the maintenance or advancement of infants.
8. The dissolution of partnership.
9. Accounts.
10. Partition.

In the suits or matters within its equity jurisdiction, the County Court has and can exercise all the powers and authority of the Court of Chancery.

While the English County Court was thus from time to time improved—its authority extended to classes of cases that were not originally within its province, while it was made a court of equity, with all the powers of the High Court of Chancery, and thus enabled to do full and complete justice between the parties in any matter within its jurisdiction—the Irish County Court has made but little advance in the way of improvement. True it is that the statute under which it is at present constituted declares that it shall be lawful for the chairman "to hear and determine all disputes and differences between party and party for any sum, damages or penalty, not exceeding £40 sterling (slander, libel, breach of promise of marriage, and criminal conversation excepted), and for any unascertained and unpaid balance not exceeding £40 of a partnership account;" and also to decree payment of any pecuniary legacy not exceeding £20, payable out of any personal estate, whatever may be the amount of such personal estate; and also to decree the payment of any legacies or distributive shares, payable out of the assets of any deceased person, where the assets shall not exceed £200; and the chairman has also jurisdiction in ejectments between landlord and tenant, where the rent of the holding does not exceed £100; and in cases of ejectment on the title, his jurisdiction is confined to cases where the parties claim under a common title, and the rent of the lands sought to be recovered does not exceed £20 a year, and are held under a yearly tenancy, or under a lease, the duration of which, when originally granted, did not exceed three lives, without any provision for the renewal thereof; or for a term of sixty-one years, and in respect of which no fine exceeding £20 shall appear on the face of such lease to have been paid on the granting or execution thereof. The statute, while it confers in these cases jurisdiction in ejectments on the title, declares expressly that in other cases the title to lands, tenements, and hereditaments, shall not be drawn into question in any proceeding in the court.

It is unnecessary to enter into further detail for the purpose of contrasting the power and authority of the local courts in the three kingdoms as tribunals for administering justice. The foregoing brief and necessarily incomplete summary is sufficient to show how far the Irish County Court has been permitted to lag behind in the progress of improvement. Scarcely a sitting of the court is held in any part of the country at which one or more cases do not occur where some suitor applies to the court for relief, to redress some wrong or enforce some right, and after expense, which to the humble suitor is considerable, has been incurred, and the time of the court has been, it may be for hours, occupied in ascertaining the exact nature of the matter in dispute, it is then discovered that all this expense, time, and trouble have been merely wasted—that the case is not within their jurisdiction, and the court is unable to enforce the right or redress the wrong.

The matter in dispute may be about an obstruction of a watercourse or a right of way, or an interference with a right of turbary, or some one of those questions that commonly arise between the occupiers of small holdings; but if the rent of the holdings in respect of which the dispute arises, or the value of the right disputed be great or small, once a question of title is found to be involved, the jurisdiction of the court is ousted, and the suitor learns, to his surprise, that the court is powerless to afford him redress, and that if he wishes to obtain it he must seek it in the superior court, where the matter will be decided, after delay and at an expense that will most probably be ruinous to one, if not to both of the litigants. Every day experience shows what is frequently the result of the Irish County Court not having jurisdiction to deal with this class of cases. Men of humble means, seeing the expense with which the defence of their rights is attended in the superior courts, will not have recourse to the law to vindicate them, but will either altogether abandon their right and submit to wrong, or they will seek to maintain them by a recourse to force; and then, if a breach of the peace ensues, the same judge who explained to the parties that he was unable by law to determine the dispute, out of which the breach of the peace arose, is the judge delegated to preside in the court which has full power to deal with the criminal part of the case. The trial of this part of the case is conducted at the public expense, and although the breach of the peace is dealt with, yet the civil question out of which it arose is left in exactly the same position as before, or, it may be, in a worse position—for if the man whose right is unjustly invaded happens not to be a man of cool temper, able to restrain himself under the infliction of wrong, advantage may be taken of this by the wrongdoer to provoke him, and so get him involved in a breach of the peace, and then have him punished, it may be by imprisonment; and when this happens, things not unfrequently go from bad to worse; evil passions are aroused, and what was originally a dispute about some small matter, sometimes ends in the perpetration of a fearful crime.

Where the question in dispute is too small to bear the cost and delay of a resort to the superior courts, justice and sound policy alike require that jurisdiction in such cases should be conferred on the local court. In such cases, resort is seldom had to the superior courts; parties are deterred by the expense, and, as already observed, rights are either abandoned or attempted to be maintained by force; and one of the most salutary reforms that can be effected for the benefit of the humbler classes of the community is to confer on the Irish County Court the same power which the English County Court now possesses—of hearing and determining disputes where small questions of title are involved.

Even before the Judicature Act of 1873 gave effect to the principles recommended by the Judicature Commissioners in their reports, the English County Courts, as has been already shown, were far in advance of the Irish. But the Judicature Act of 1873 does not confine the application of those enlightened principles to the superior courts, but at once extends them to every court.

The 91st section of the statute declares that "The several rules of law enacted and declared by this Act shall be in force and receive effect in all courts whatsoever in England, so far as the matters to which such rules relate shall be respectively cognizable by such courts;" and the 89th enacts that "Every inferior court which now has, or which may, after the passing of this Act have, jurisdiction in equity or at law, and in equity and in admiralty, respectively, shall, as regards all causes of action within its jurisdiction for the time being, have power to grant, and shall grant in any proceeding before such court such relief, redress, or remedy, or combination of remedies, either absolute or conditional, and shall in every such proceeding give such and the like effect to every ground of defence or counterclaim, equitable or legal, in as full and ample a manner as might and ought to be done in the like case by the high court of justice."

The rules of law declared by the Judicature Act are contained in the 24th and 25th sections of the statute, and may be thus briefly stated, viz., that law and equity shall be concurrently administered, and that whenever there is any conflict or variance between the rules of equity and the rules of the common law, with reference to the same matter, the rules of equity shall prevail.

The English law was introduced into Ireland, and courts of justice in conformity with the laws of England were established, as early as the reign of King John—upwards of 650 years ago—and close upon three centuries afterwards all the then existing statute law of England was extended to Ireland by Poyning's Act; and in 1782, when the Irish Parliament asserted its legislative independence and repealed Poyning's Act, the Irish Parliament, in passing statute known as Yelverton's Act, recorded its opinion on the question of the assimilation of the laws of the two countries. The preamble to Yelverton's Act, recites that "a similarity of laws, measures, and customs must necessarily conduce to strengthen and perpetuate that affection and harmony which do and at all times ought to subsist between the people of Great Britain and Ireland;" and accordingly, by that statute, in pursuance of the policy of assimilating the laws of the two countries, the provisions of a considerable portion of the statute law of England were extended to Ireland.

In 1862 the English and Irish Law and Chancery Commission was appointed, consisting of Lord Romilly, Lord Cairns, Lord O'Hagan, Lord Selborne, Chief Justice Monahan, Sir Joseph Napier, Mr. Justice Lawson and others, upon the question of assimilating the details of Irish and English law. The commissioners, after noting the fact that the practice and procedure in equity of the two countries, which were originally similar, had by modern legislation become almost entirely different, and that this difference had been caused by separate attempts at carrying out Chancery reform in each of the two countries, expressed the unanimous opinion that "it was of paramount importance to restore and preserve, as far as possible, a uniformity of system in the equity jurisprudence of the two countries," and that "the practice and procedure of the superior courts of common law in England and Ireland should, as far as practicable, be assimilated."

Parliament, so far as the courts of equity were concerned, adopted the opinion of the commissioners, by passing the Irish Chancery Act of 1867; and bills were brought in by successive law officers to carry out the assimilation of the practice and procedure of the courts of common law, which were finally postponed for the report of the Judicature Commission.

When the Judicature Act declares that certain enlightened and just rules shall be observed for the future as part of the law of England, in every court whatsoever in England, it is of paramount importance that the same salutary principles should be extended to this country, and in like manner be observed in every court whatsoever in Ireland. Thus will be best carried out that policy of assimilating the laws of the two countries, which was originated centuries ago, in the reign of King John—sanctioned and acted upon by the Irish Parliament, and approved of by the high authority of the commissioners already referred to.

While the Irish County Court possesses the public confidence, nevertheless, year after year, the demand for its improvement is becoming more urgent, as the defect in its power to decide completely various questions that arise, in cases where some humble suitors seek its intervention, becomes more manifest. The Irish Land Act has brought under legal cognizance tenant interests of great value. Formerly claims arising of such interests, and disputes between small tenants about rights of way, turbary fences, and other matters—fruitful sources of contention between neighbours, and which the Irish County Court has not jurisdiction to hear and determine—were settled by the agent and landlord, who exercised in such cases a species of unauthorised, but yet beneficial, jurisdiction. Their interference was quite optional. In some cases they declined to interfere; while in others, by their kindly interference, bitter disputes were settled, and injustice in many instances prevented. But all this is now changed, with the altered position of the parties, consequent on the passing of the Land Act. Landlords and agents will be very slow to interfere in disputes between tenant and tenant, but will rather leave such matters to be settled as best they can by the tribunals of the country; and hence it has latterly become a matter of paramount importance and urgency that the Irish County Court should now be enabled to deal with cases of this kind, which, owing to the smallness of the interest involved, are but rarely submitted to the superior courts, as they cannot bear the expense of a recourse to the latter courts.

While the Land Act recognises the necessity of a guardian ad litem being appointed in the cases of idiots, lunatics, and minors, it only provides for the appointment of such guardians for the purpose of any proceedings under that Act; but the permanent protection of the interest of tenants under leases and tenant-right usages requires a cheap machinery for appointing guardians of idiots, lunatics, and minors, and for making such guardians account.

In 1870, Mr. Henry Dix Hutton, in his Report on Admiralty jurisdiction, read before the society, called attention to complaints made by foreign traders, that while the Court of Admiralty in Ireland possessed jurisdiction to proceed against the masters of ships at the suit of merchants employing their vessels, it had no corresponding power of entertaining complaints by captains in respect of freight and demurrage—a state of things which caused delay, involving hardship, and not unfrequently a practical denial of justice. Strong representations on this unsatisfactory state of the law were made by some of the foreign consuls resident in Dublin to the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland, who sat in 1864; and while the commissioners, in their report, state that they do not think it expedient to extend the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court to cases of freight and demurrage, because the effect would be to give the Irish Court a wider jurisdiction than that possessed by the English Admiralty Court, they are, at the same time, of opinion that the object should be to assimilate the jurisdiction of both courts, and that if such a jurisdiction were given to the English court, a corresponding jurisdiction should be also given to the Irish court.

Following out the recommendations of the commissioners in favour of assimilating the law of both countries as to Admiralty jurisdiction, the Court of Admiralty (Ireland) Act of 1867 was passed, assimilating the Irish to the English jurisdiction; but it did not make any provision for trying cases of demurrage or freight.

By this Act of 1867 the Lord Lieutenant was empowered by order in council to confer a limited jurisdiction in Admiralty cases on the Irish local courts; but this power has not as yet been exercised. In 1868 the English County Courts' Admiralty Jurisdiction Act was passed, enabling Her Majesty in Council to confer a limited Admiralty jurisdiction upon the English County Courts; and both in 1868 and 1869 orders in council were issued conferring this Admiralty jurisdiction upon thirty-six of the English County Courts. The English Act of 1868 did not provide for cases of freight and demurrage; but in 1869 this omission was supplied by the statute 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, which conferred in those cases a limited Admiralty jurisdiction upon the English County Courts. It is to be regretted that the policy of assimilation recommended by the Admiralty Commissioners in 1864, carried out by the Admiralty Act of 1867, was not acted upon in 1868 and 1869 when the English County Courts obtained their limited Admiralty jurisdiction, and the Irish County Court thereby enabled to afford the same redress to the foreign trader as he would be able to obtain in an English port, if business had brought his vessel to that country instead of to Ireland.

Under the English Bankruptcy Act of 1867 the County Courts in England have a bankruptcy jurisdiction. The Irish County Courts up to 1873, had jurisdiction in insolvency; but that jurisdiction, except as to pending matters, ceased on the 1st Jan. 1873, when the Irish Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1872, came into operation. And even no matter how small the value of the bankrupt estate may happen to be, the Irish County Court has no jurisdiction in bankruptcy unless in cases which, after being proceeded with to a certain extent in the Court of Bankruptcy, are then remitted to the County Court, to be there dealt with, and after being so dealt with there is a right of appeal back to the Court of Bankruptcy. A great boon would be conferred both on small debtors and those who may have dealings with them, by conferring directly upon the Irish County Court a limited jurisdiction in bankruptcy.

LEGAL OBITUARY.

W. RAINES, ESQ.

THE late William Raines, Esq., of Wyton Hall, Yorkshire, Judge of the Hull and East Yorkshire County Courts, who died on the 28th ult., at his residence near Hull, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late William Raines, Esq., of Wyton, by Fanny, only daughter of Marmaduke Browne, Esq. He was born in the year 1808, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, but did not graduate. He was called to the Bar by the hon. society of Lincoln's-inn in Trinity Term 1833, and went the Northern Circuit, having previously practised as a special pleader. He was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the East Riding of Yorkshire, and also a magistrate for the North Riding of Yorkshire, and for the parts of Holland in the county of Lincoln. In March, 1847, he was appointed Judge of Circuit, No. 16, which holds its courts at Beverley, Bridlington, Great Driffield, Heden, Howdon, Kingston-upon-Hull, New Malton, Pocklington, Scarborough, Selby, and Whitby. In 1860 Mr. Raines raised a company of rifle volunteers, of which he acted as captain. He was the author of "A Letter to the late Right Hon. Lord Tenterden, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, on the Bill for Establishing Courts of Local Jurisdiction," published as far back as the year 1830; "Observations on the Bill, intituled, The Act for Establishing Local Courts of Jurisdiction," published in 1833; and "Observations on the Highway Act of 1861, and the Management of Highways, addressed to the ratepayers of Middle Holderness," published in 1864.

R. W. BLENCOWE, ESQ.

THE late Richard Willis Blencowe, Esq., Chairman of the East Sussex Sessions, who died on the 23rd ult., at his residence, The Hooke, Chailey, near Lewes, in the eighty-third year of his age, was the eldest surviving son of the late Robert Willis Blencowe, Esq., by Penelope, youngest daughter of the late Sir George Robinson, Bart. He was born in the year 1791, and was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1814, and proceeded M.A. in due course. He was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for Kent, a deputy-lieutenant for Northamptonshire, and a magistrate for Sussex, and had for many years presided as Chairman of the Quarter Sessions for the eastern division of the latter county. He married, in 1815, Charlotte, youngest daughter and coheir of the late Sir Henry Poole, Bart., of Poole Hall, Cheshire, and The Hooke, Sussex, and by her, who died in 1867, he has left an only son, Mr. John George Blencowe, a deputy-lieutenant for Sussex, and formerly M.P. for Lewes, who is married to the eldest daughter of the late William J. Campion, Esq., of Danny Park, Sussex.

LORD COLONSAY.

THE late Right Hon. Duncan McNeill, Lord Colonsay, sometime Lord Justice General and President of the Court of Session of Scotland, the intelligence of whose death at Pau, in the Basses Pyrenees, has just been announced as having taken place on the 31st ult., was the eldest surviving son of the late John McNeill, Esq., of Colonsay, in the county of Argyll; his mother was Hester, eldest daughter of Duncan McNeill, Esq., of Dunmore, Argyllshire, and he was born at Colonsay in the year 1794, so that now he was in the eightieth year of his age. He received his University education at St. Andrew's, where he highly distinguished himself, and he afterwards studied at Edinburgh. In 1816 he became a member of the Scottish Bar, and soon made himself remarkable for the strict logic with which he analyzed, and not seldom demolished, the indictments in the Courts of Justiciary. This led to his being taken into the public service in the administration of criminal law, as an advocate-depute, in 1820, and after holding that office for about four years he was, in 1824, appointed Sheriff of Perthshire. In that capacity he acted for ten years, and he vacated the sheriffship on being appointed, in 1834, Solicitor-General for Scotland, under Sir Robert Peels first Administration. Losing that office on the resignation of the Ministry, he conducted business with great success as a leading counsel until again, in 1841, he became Solicitor-General under Sir Robert Peel. In the following year he was promoted to be Lord Advocate, and he continued to exercise that high function until the fall of Sir Robert Peel's Administration in 1846, when he once more resumed his stuff gown, but on this occasion with the added dignity of Dean of the Faculty of Advocates—to which he had been elected in 1843—and of member for the county of Argyll, which had been conferred on him in the same year. Five years more of great leading practice found him in 1851 incontestably the fittest man to be raised, at the same time as Lord Rutherford, to the Bench, on which there happened then to be two vacant seats. and he accordingly received that appointment from Lord Russell's Administration, taking his seat as an ordinary Lord of Session, with the title of Lord Colonsay. In the following year Lord Derby was in office, and on the retirement of Lord Justice-General Boyle, on account of age and infirmity, Lord Colonsay became the head of the court, and soon afterwards was sworn a member of Her Majesty's Honourable Privy Council. In 1867 his Lordship was elevated to the peerage, with a view of taking part in the judicial business of the House of Lords, with the title of Baron Colonsay, of Colonsay and Oronsay, in the county of Argyll, a title which, as his Lordship has died unmarried, now becomes extinct. During the fourteen years and more his Lordship presided over the Court of Session, his history was very simple. He devoted his energies without reserve to the duties of his high office, and his retirement produced very mingled feelings in the mind of the public and of the legal profession; it was felt that in vacating that presidential seat, where he had secured such almost unexampled respect and confidence, the court would sustain a very severe loss, and one not easily reparable.

THOMAS LEADBITTER, ESQ.

THE late Mr. Thomas Leadbitter, solicitor, who died at his residence in Kensington-gardens-square, on the 7th of last month, at the age eighty-six, was born in the year 1787 or 1788. He was one of the oldest members of the Profession. He was the second son of the late Nicolas Leadbitter, Esq., of Warden, near Hexham, one of the old Roman Catholic families of Northumberland. He was articled to the late Mr. Saul of Carlisle, and originally commenced practice in Bucklersbury, from whence he moved to Staple-inn, where he continued until his retirement in the year 1868. He married in 1827 Frances, daughter of John Graham, Esq., of Low House, near Carlisle, by whom, among other children, he has left a son Graham, a captain in the 97th Regiment, and Thomas Francis, a solicitor in Leadenhall-street. Mr. Leadbitter, who was one of the original members of the Law Institution, was a man of high honour and strict integrity, and enjoyed in an eminent degree the esteem of his Professional brethren.

J. RAW, ESQ.

THE late Joseph Raw, Esq., solicitor, of Furnival's Inn, who died at his residence in Stoke Newington-road. on the 21st ult., in the 59th year of his age, was the youngest son of the late John Raw, Esq., of Leaming House, Watermillock, in the county of Cumberland, where he was born in the year 1815. He was admitted a solicitor in Trinity Term 1838, and was for many years a commissioner for the administration of oaths in Chancery, and also in the Courts of Common Pleas, Queen's Bench, and Exchequer; he was likewise a commissioner for taking affidavits in the Vice-Warden's Court of the Stannaries of Cornwall. Mr. Raw, in the words of one who knew him well, was "of an industrious and retiring disposition, and hence not much known to the general public, but by those of his acquaintance his sterling qualities were highly esteemed." He has left a family of four sons, the eldest of whom continues his late father's practice. The remains of the deceased gentleman were interred at Norwood in the presence of his sons and a few of his intimate friends.

JOHN MONK, ESQ., Q.C.

WE regret to have to record the death of John Monk, Esq., Q.C., which took place on the 29th Jan., at his residence, 80, Harley-street, Cavendish-square, in his seventy-second year. Previous to his call to the bar (in 1839) Mr. Monk resided at Manchester, in which town he practised for some years as a solicitor and afterwards as a barrister. He came to London in 1852, was made Q.C. in 1857, and until within a few years of his death had a large practice in the Northern Circuit. The deceased also fulfilled the duties of Deputy Recorder of Manchester for a considerable time, but resigned the office on the appointment of Mr. H. W. West, Q.C. to the recordership. Subsequently, in consequence of declining health, Mr. Monk relinquished the more active duties of his professional life. Mr. Monk was a bencher of the Middle Temple, and was treasurer the year in which the Prince of Wales opened the new library. The deceased was a sound lawyer and a successful advocate. He was also held in deserved respect for the goodness and integrity of his private character, and his loss is mourned by a large circle friends.

The Law and the Lawyers.

RUMOURS will be rife for some time to come as to the probable holders of the legal appointments which will fall to the new Conservative Government. It has been thought that the delicacy of Lord CAIRNS' health will deter him from again accepting the Chancellorship, and Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN is generally spoken of as the successor of Lord SELBORNE. As regards the office of Attorney-General in that event—Sir JOHN KARSLAKE becoming, as a matter of course, Lord Chief Justice—Sir RICHARD BAGGALLAY would have the best claim, and either Mr. HOLKER, Q.C., or Mr. FORSYTH, Q.C., will, we imagine, be Solicitor-General.

VOL. LVI.—No. 1611.

BARON AMPHLETT has resigned the office of President of the Legal Education Association. A sub-committee, including some eminent members of the Profession, has been appointed to consider and report upon the draft of a Bill having for its object the incorporation of a General School of Law.

WE report from the Bath County Court a novel point under liquidation proceedings. A receiver of a debtor's estate having been appointed when a sheriff was in possession by virtue of a judgment obtained and execution issued by a creditor, an interim injunction was granted. The receiver claiming to be entitled to possession required the sheriff to withdraw; the sheriff did not withdraw, and the application made to the Judge of the Bath County Court was to commit him for contempt. It was contended on behalf of the sheriff that he was bound to remain in possession until he received instructions from the execution creditor to withdraw. It was asked, if the proceedings fell through what would be his position? Would he not be liable to the execution creditor for any action which he might bring. The Judge found that a contempt had been committed, but as the breach of the injunction was not substantial, and the sheriff was not personally a party to it, simply ordered him to pay his own costs.

THREE decisions of importance with reference to costs, have been given within the last few days. In one case it was held that plaintiffs resident in Scotland and Ireland cannot be compelled to give security for costs, the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 54, having provided a process of enforcing an English judgment in those countries. This was the case of Raeburn v. Andrews, in the Queen's Bench on the 29th ult. In the same court on the 30th ult. in Ayres v. Lovelock it was decided that the undersheriff is not a Judge with power to certify for costs under the County Courts Act 1867. Consequently, where on a writ of inquiry in an action of slander less than £10 was recovered, and the undersheriff certified for costs, the master was held right in refusing to tax. The third case to which we refer is Brown v. Rye, before the MASTER of the ROLLS on the 31st ult. That was a foreclosure suit, the mortgage being to secure £50, and £5 per cent interest. It was contended by the defendant that the plaintiff was entitled only to such costs as he would have obtained in the County Court. Sir GEORGE JESSEL said that the Legislature had created a concurrent jurisdiction in the County Courts, but had placed no restriction on the jurisdiction of this Court similar to that which it had placed on the jurisdiction of the courts of law, and held that the plaintiff was entitled to his ordinary costs.

THE career of few law officers has been so eventful as that of Sir HENRY JAMES. Lifted by his own ability and the favouring gales of fortune from the ranks of Nisi Prius advocates to a prominent position in Parliament—after obtaining a seat on a scrutiny—he passed rapidly from the subordinate law officership to the high position of official leader of the English Bar, as Attorney-General. Opposed on his re-election, he was successful only to find his seat threatened by a petition, the trial of which lasted a fortnight, to terminate in another success for Sir HENRY JAMES. Securely seated once more, the Government of which he is a member dissolves Parliament. Again he is threatened with opposition, but ultimately walks over, only to find that by the verdict of the country his party is condemned to the cold shade of opposition. To have been Solicitor-General and Attorney-General and yet never to have faced Parliament in either capacity is a hard fate, and every member of the Profession must sympathise with the ATTORNEY-GENERAL in this misfortune. It must also be matter for regret that Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT will have no opportunity at present of showing his capacity as a law officer. The extraordinary majority obtained by the Conservative party promises a long tenure of office, and it is impossible to make even a guess as to the period when Sir HENRY JAMES and Sir W. HARCOURT will again assume the offices which they must soon surrender to others.

THE representation of the Profession in the House of Commons has been changed by the results of the general election. We mentioned last week that Mr. Hinde Palmer, Q.C., had lost his seat. He has been followed by Mr. Henry Matthews, Q.C., Mr. West, Q.C., and Mr. Douglas Straight. Mr. Palmer and Mr. Matthews will prove a decided loss, and perhaps Mr. Matthews could least be spared. He is a cultivated lawyer and a keen debater, and he certainly made his mark in the House. Several other lawyers failed to obtain seats—the two leaders of the Admiralty Court, Mr. Millward, Q.C. and Mr. Butt, Q.C., Mr. Swanston, Q.C. and Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. Morgan Howard and Mr. Biron. On the other hand Mr. Bulwer, Q.C., has supplanted Mr. West, Q.C., at Ipswich; Mr. Morgan Lloyd, Q.C., has obtained a seat at Beaumaris; Mr. Huddleston, Q.C., at Norwich; Mr. H. T. Cole, Q.C., at Penryn; Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., at Marylebone; Mr. C. Hopwood, Q.C., at Stockport; Hon. E. Stanhope at Mid Lincolnshire; Mr. Waddy, Q.C., at Barnstaple; Mr. Serjeant

Spinks at Oldham, Mr. A. G. Marten, Q.C., at Cambridge; and Mr. W. Grantham ejected Mr. Locke King in East Surrey. Literary barristers have lost a representative in Mr. T. Hughes, but Mr. Jenkins, the author of "Ginx's Baby," has been elected. The Conservative member for Chelsea, Mr. Gordon, is a solicitor in large practice in the City of London. We have to record a loss of five barristers, but a gain of twelve. Of these twelve, seven are on the winning side in politics. Mr. Huddleston has been in Parliament before; the others are new men, the most promising for political purposes being, we believe, the new member for Cambridge, Mr. A. G. Marten.

IN the lengthy complicated case of Jolliffe v. Wallasey Local Board (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 582), the Court of Common Pleas has done that which we could wish to see a little more often done by our courts. It pronounced an elaborate judgment upon a point where no judgment was necessary for the decision of the case. We therefore regret all the more that we are not able to agree with that judgment. The point was that an Act of Parliament had authorised the construction of a pier and landing stage upon the bed of the river Mersey, and upon "the lands delineated in certain plans." Previously to commencing the works, the defendants were to send in plans to the Admiralty. The plans sent in to the Admiralty showed a much larger space occupied by the works proposed than did the plans deposited mentioned in the Act. However, the Admiralty approved them, and the court has held that this approval of the Admiralty "drew with it," in the words of KEATING, J., "the sanction of the Legislature." We cannot but think that the approval of the Admiralty was ultra vires, and that such approval of the second series of plans was intended to be used as a check, to limit the operations of the defendants if necessary, but in no case to extend them. The first series of plans deposited with the Bill, would no doubt be somewhat rough, and in order to provide for this natural defect, limits of deviation "as regards the pier and landing-stage not exceeding 5ft.," were expressly prescribed by the Act. We may notice that an incorrect reading of an Act of Parliament by a public office has lately been set right by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of R. v. Overseers of Haslingfield, in which the court confirmed the disallowance of certain fees to justices' clerks which the Home Office, presuming them to be legally due, had sanctioned under Jervis's Act, s. 30, so long back as 1854.

THE office of returning officer at parliamentary elections is generally filled by a solicitor. The post is one of great responsibility, as is abundantly shown by many of the provisions in the Ballot Act of 1872, affecting these officers, and we are therefore glad to be able to state that, with one exception, the arrangements made in the metropolis last week were most complete. The one exception was Hackney, where there was a collapse, several polling stations not being opened until considerably after the appointed hour. The excuse is that there was not sufficient time between the nomination and the polling for the necessary arrangements to be made. The returning officer made every possible effort to repair the mischief when it was discovered. At Chelsea there seemed to be some likelihood of a petition on the score of irregularity, a presiding officer having, it was alleged, gone out of his way to destroy the secrecy of the ballot, by writing the registered number of the voters on the backs of the ballot papers; but this suggestion has not been substantiated. It may be invidious to name the returning officers who appear to have carried out the Ballot Act most efficiently, but Mr. CARR in Finsbury, Mr. FARRER in Westminster, Mr. GRESHAM in Southwark, and Mr. RATCLIFF in the Tower Hamlets were exceptionally successful, and conducted the polling with marked ability and care. When, however, the onerous nature of the work at short notice in a metropolitan constituency is considered, we think a partial failure in one instance should be leniently regarded. Presiding officers ought undoubtedly to be lawyers, and considering how many there are of both branches ready and willing to undertake the work, returning officers have no excuse if they appoint other persons less efficient. There can be no doubt that the polling was most satisfactorily conducted at those stations which were presided over by barristers or solicitors.

IT is perfectly plain that if the Ballot is to be properly worked adequate time must be given to the returning officers in large constituencies to make their arrangements. At present the time is regulated thus: In the case of an election for a borough the election must be fixed by the returning officer not later than the fourth day after the day on which he receives the writ, with an interval of not less than two clear days between the day on which he gives notice and the day of nomination. So that taking the receipt of the writ on the 1st February, the last possible day for notice would be the 2nd; the 5th would be the last possible day for nomination, and the 9th would be the last possible day for the poll in ordinary boroughs. Where it is not known (as in Hackney), until the day of nomination, whether there will be a contest, and the returning officer makes no speculative arrangements beforehand, he is limited to four days for preparing to poll possibly between 20,000 and 30,000 voters. Mr. RATCLIFF, the returning officer of the Tower Hamlets, points out that this is utterly inadequate. He says, in a letter to the Times, "The metropolitan returning officers have from the passing of the Act been fully alive to the important and multifarious duties cast upon them, and to the intricate details to be observed if the provisions of the Act are carefully and fully carried out. They have held several meetings thereon, and the question of the limited time allowed between the day of nomination and the day for polling has always been a great source of discomfort, as they knew it amounted almost to an impossibility to make preparation, but they felt it would be useless to attempt to procure an amendment in the law until it could be proved to demonstration that a distinction should be made between boroughs having a small number of electors on the register and those having a large number." Opinion being thus unamimous it is to be hoped that before another election the Act will be amended, as a failure of the machinery of polling must be intensely unsatisfactory to everyone concerned.

A PAPER particularly interesting at the present time was read by Mr. RUPERT KETTLE, before the Law Amendment Society on the 26th ult., on the Law of Conspiracy. He makes some broad propositions—First, that in all cases where the interests of the public are directly affected by the wrong done it is a crime, and the agreement to do the wrong is therefore a conspiracy; secondly, that withholding labour merely for the purpose of increasing its market value by producing an artificial scarcity, is not withholding it upon a criminal motive; but, that if it is withheld in order to stop public communication, or the public supply of water, or of light, so that wages may be raised, as the only means of averting a great public mischief, then the intent would be criminal. Speaking of trades unions Mr. KETTLE makes a remark which is frequently forgotten, namely—"Although modern trades unions are, according to the preponderance of legal authority, no longer criminal combinations, they are still illegal—that is outside the pale of the law. Their rules do not form a binding contract; nor can these societies enter into contracts capable of legal enforcement. Trades union funds are protected from fraud, and certain privileges are conferred upon them by a recent statute; but this only alters the legal status of a trades union to the limit of the enactment, and does not further or otherwise bring these combinations within the legal pale." A third conclusion which Mr. KETTLE draws is that, as it is beyond dispute that agreeing to commit a crime is itself, substantively, the crime of conspiracy, it follows that if any person, although not a servant, agrees with, or counsels a servant to do any act punishable as a crime under the Master and Servant Act, he who so agrees or counsels is guilty of conspiracy. And his practical suggestions for consideration are (1) Whether it is not better, having regard to the position and permanent interest of master and servant, to declare, or, if necessary, repeal so much of our ancient common law as relates to acts in restraint of trade, and to repeal the penal provisions of the Master and Servant Act, instead of incurring the danger of disturbing our criminal polity by attempting to alter the fundamental principles of the law against conspiracy; and (2) whether, as a matter of administration, it is not just that all defendants indicted for conspiracy should have of right all the advantages they can already obtain by removing indictments into the Superior Courts.

GIFTS TO ILLEGITIMATE OR REPUTED CHILDREN.

Re GOODWIN'S TRUSTS.

FOLLOWING close upon the decision of the full Court of Appeal in Occleston v. Fullalove (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 785), we have that of Sir George Jessel, M. R., in Re Goodwin's Trusts (L. Rep Weekly Notes, 7th inst.). The latter case is of importance, as defining the precise principle on which, in Occleston v. Fullalove, the Lords Justices overruled the decision of the late Vice-Chancellor Wickens and the opinion of Lord Selborne. The facts of the latter case were these: One Mary Goodwin, by will made in July 1850, bequeathed her residuary personal estate upon trust for Richard Perkins for life, and after his decease upon trust to pay and divide the trust fund unto and between all and every her children by the said Richard Perkins, share and share alike, to be vested interests in sons at twenty-one, and in daughters at that age or marriage. Mary Goodwin was the sister of a deceased wife of Richard Perkins, and had in the year 1849 gone through the ceremony of marriage with him. Mary Goodwin died in May 1860, leaving four children, John Goodwin Perkins, born on the 15th June 1850, two sons who died in infancy, and William Henry Perkins, born in March 1860. The birth of William Henry Perkins was registered by Richard Perkins in April 1860, and the child was described as the son of Richard Perkins and Mary Perkins, late Goodwin. Part of Mary Goodwin's estate having been paid into court, a petition was presented by John Goodwin Perkins, praying that the fund might be paid out on the joint receipt of himself and Richard Perkins. The Master of the Rolls, however, held that the principle of Occleston v. Fullalove was that a gift by a testator or testatrix to one of his or her children by a particular person was good if the child had acquired the reputation of being such before the death of the testator or testatrix: and that, therefore, the petitioner was only entitled to payment of half the fund.

It will be noticed that Re Goodwin's Trusts was uncomplicated by two circumstances which, it was possible to argue, affected the decision in Occleston v. Fullalove. In Occleston v. Fullalove the person in whose favour the decision was made was an existent person, through en ventre at the date of the will, and the form of the gift was not merely to the children which the testator might have by his deceased wife's sister, but to those which he might be reputed to have. Sir George Jessel is, however, a Judge who may be relied on not to take hair splitting distinctions when there is no substantial difference, and we are pleased to see that whatever may have been his opinion as to the intrinsic soundness of the principle in Occleston v. Fullalove, he has loyally carried it out in its integrity, as the rule laid down by superior authority. With regard to the principal case we observe that a contemporary has expressed an opinion "that the Judges of Appeal expended an amount of eloquence which would have done credit to any pulpit, or to any writer on the ethics of the sexes, but which with much respect" our contemporary thinks "was altogether out of place in a court of justice." The writer, while admitting that the subject probably could not have been avoided, proceeds to "find fault with the whole course of judicial decisions which have compelled judges to go into these matters at all," and to tell us "that an interesting book might be written on the dogmas—political, social, moral, commercial, even religious, which have at various periods of legal history been pronounced, doubted, and abandoned by the Bench," and that "infallibility in ethics and questions of public policy is not, and never can be, one of the attributes of courts of justice."

We concede to our contemporary all that he could urge as to the fluctuating and uncertain character attaching to the determination of questions which involve considerations of ethics or public policy, and we concede also that in cases where the law or its application to any given state of facts is settled by authority, any reference to the remote causes in the region of ethics through which the law may have originated, or any disquisition on the reasons by which the continuance or maintenance of the law may be defended in a court of morals, would be entirely out of place in a court of law. We affirm, however, at the same time that the period has not arrived, and never will, when considerations of ethics and public policy can be eliminated from among the factors in judicial decisions.

No code or system of positive law can provide for the new developments and infinitely varied combinations of human affairs in such a way as to exclude the necessity for the exercise of the moral faculties of the living interpreters of the law; and as to the "infallibility" which our contemporary speaks of, we all know that it is not to be looked for either in courts of justice or under any condition of human affairs. We deprecate as much as anyone can the substitution of any ratio decidendi proceeding on the basis of the judicial conscience for the settled rules of law, and are firmly convinced that the certainty and uniformity enforced by an adhesion to authority are of far more importance in judicial decisions than their intrinsic reasonableness. It must, however, be perfectly obvious that numberless cases occur in which the law is unsettled, and where the only possible standard is the conscience of the judge. That standard, idiosyncratic though it be, and therefore necessarily fluctuating and uncertain, it seems to us as idle to complain of, as it would be to complain that all men are not endowed alike by nature, or that they do not, through education or circumstances, attain precisely the same level. In regard to morals or public policy, no code can do more than prescribe very general rules—the application of those rules must be left to the intelligence and moral sense of the tribunal. Take for example the great Bridgwater case (Egerton v. Lord Brownlow, 21 L. T. Rep. O. S. 306), and we ask could any code be expected to anticipate the limitations and conditions contained in the Earl of Bridgwater's will, by laying down rules which would have obviated the long discussions and conflicting opinions in that case as to whether the conditions there in dispute did or did not contravene public policy? The objection of our contemporary is in substance that of Bentham to judge-made law. We incline rather to agree with the late Mr. Austin when he says (1 Jurisprudence, 224): "I by no means disapprove of what Mr. Bentham has chosen to call by the disrespectful, and therefore, as I consider, injudicious, name of judge-made law. For I consider it injudicious to call by any name indicative of disrespect what appears to me highly beneficial and even absolutely necessary. I cannot understand how any person who has considered the subject can suppose that society could possibly have gone on, if judges had not legislated, or that there is any danger whatever in allowing them that power which they have in fact exercised, to make up for the negligence or incapacity of the avowed legislator. That part of the law of every country which was made by Judges has been far better made than that part which consists of statutes enacted by the Legislature. Notwithstanding my great admiration for Mr. Bentham, I cannot but think that instead of blaming Judges for having legislated, we should blame them for the timid, narrow, and piecemeal manner in which they have legislated, and for legislating under cover of vague and indeterminate phrases."

THE WORKING OF THE BALLOT.

VERY many letters have been written to the newspapers upon the mode adopted by returning officers in taking the ballot during the recent elections, and there appear to be some points upon which doubt exists. To remove those doubts is a matter of considerable importance.

Before we notice the practical matters which are regulated by the Ballot Act, we must make a preliminary observation upon the part which is played by the public in this new process of voting, and we must say, judging from actual experience at the polling booth, that it is extraordinary how stupid the most "highly educated" classes of the population seem to be in carrying out a plan of voting which in itself is so admirably simple and so much less troublesome than the old system of open voting. In two cases brought to our attention clergymen of the Church of England actually signed their names to the ballot paper. Many other well-to-do and aristocratic personages tendered their open papers to the presiding officer and wanted to know what they were to do next; whilst others loudly demanded papers for the purpose of voting for particular candidates. In the majority of cases, where great simplicity was manifested, there was evident amusement at the easy and completely secret mode of recording a vote, whilst many persons appeared to regret that there was not more to be done or said, and some shouting to be gone through. On this head it is our opinion that presiding officers are apt to be too reticient. There can be no possible harm in giving oral information to puzzled electors, and it is surely better to run a little risk than allow votes to be thrown away for want of a timely suggestion. Our experience is that an attentive officer can facilitate the voting considerably and save many a ballot paper from being rejected if he has the courage and tact to deal with all alike, and that the agents of the candidates are officials of whom there is not the slightest reason to be afraid.

Now as regards the actual working of the ballot. There ought to be no necessity for instructions such as has been suggested by correspondents of the newspapers on the opening and closing of the polls. Ballot papers should be obtainable at eight o'clock; no ballot papers should be issued after four. A person signing himself "Lex" inquires whether all voters in the room at the hour of closing are entitled to vote. This is an absurd suggestion. By stopping the issue of ballot papers at the hour of closing the ballot is closed—those papers which are already issued should of course be marked and put in the ballot box. We agree indeed that it may seem hard that the voters are excluded because all persons in the room cannot obtain a paper instantly; but the conditions of polling are known, and those who choose to delay until the clock is about to strike the last hour, must be aware that they imperil their vote, and the construction of the Act is not to be strained to meet such cases. "Lex" says that he has asked "half-a-dozen presiding officers" the question, "What is to be considered the closing of the poll?" and none could answer him. He must have been extremely unfortunate in his acquaintance. Any officer who had thought at all about the subject—and no one should have undertaken the duty without thinking over every detail—would have had the obvious answer ready; and every returning officer up to his work would have issued the necessary instructions to his deputies, so as to secure uniformity of practice.

A more important question is, What is an irregularity in the mode of filling up the ballot papers sufficient to entitle the returning officer to reject the votes. The cardinal rule established by the Act, as pointed out by a gentleman writing from Lincoln's Inn is, that where the returning officer has no reasonable doubt for whom the votes are intended, and there is nothing on the paper to identify the voter, he is bound to allow the paper as good. It is perfectly clear that if the voter signs his name, or put his number on the register on his paper, or votes for more candidates than there are vacancies, or makes his mark across a dividing line, the paper is absolutely bad. But if he puts his mark anywhere opposite to a name, or by any symbol unmistakeably indicating for whom he intends to vote, the paper must be accepted.

These are matters of detail which should be agreed upon or definitely settled by authority. A more important matter, in our opinion, is the condition of the registers. Our experience is that the registers by which the balloting is checked are too frequently grossly defective. Several correspondents have declared in the newspapers that being on the register twice for properties or premises situated in different parts of the same borough they might have voted for the same candidates twice at different polling stations. Too much care cannot be given to this matter—and all that is wanted is care on the part of those entrusted with the revision of the register. Some persons having property sufficient to give several votes are apt to entertain the idea that they may vote more than once, and many electors would do so in ignorance and without any intention to violate the law. Double voting, however, would be a serious evil and the greatest vigilance should be exercised to render it impossible.

The great and serious drawback to the ballot appears to be the delay entailed by the tedious process of counting the ballot papers. That the result of an election should not be known for twenty-four hours after the close of the poll is a decided defect in the system and we doubt very much whether it will be tolerated. We do not see why there should be any objection to the papers being counted and examined by the presiding officers at the respective polling stations. The agents of the candidates would be present, and with an efficient staff of clerks the work might be got through very rapidly, and the returns with the ballot papers sent to head quarters. The Town Clerk of Bath counted 4865 ballot papers in three hours, so that the result was announced by seven o'clock, and only eight officials were employed in counting. Mr. John Stone, the town clerk in question, should make known his system. It is certainly a reproach to a city like London that the result of a contest should not be known for certain until nearly thirty hours after the close of the poll.

There is no intelligible reason why the ballot should not be worked expeditiously and with perfect success. There ought to be no doubt what the closing of the poll means—supposing there to be any at present—nor should it be open to returning officers to take fanciful objections to ballot papers. We have learnt our first lesson in a general election. In several constituencies more voters have polled than ever polled before, which is a decided recommendation of the system, and on the whole there is every reason to anticipate that Parliament will make it a permanent institution.

THE COMING ELECTION PETITIONS.

MANY of the misdeeds of the past fortnight connected with the general election will doubtless soon be arraigned before the election Judges, and it will not be amiss, perhaps, if we remind the Profession of the nature of the case which has to be established before an election can be invalidated.

Anything which actually interferes with the freedom of election is a ground for declaring it void. Thus we remember in the Nottingham case, before a committee of the House of Commons, it was a question whether the "lambs" had actually prevented voters from going to the poll by the terror which they excited. This is a form of intimidation more likely to come into prominence as the working population begin to take greater interest in politics under the ballot; it is indeed the only certain mode of ensuring that undue influence has its effect upon the result of the election. The enactment on this subject is that every person who shall directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make use of or threaten to make use of any force, violence or restraint, or threaten the infliction by himself, or by or through any other person, any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any other manner practise intimidation upon or against any person in order to induce or compel such person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting at any election, or who shall by abduction or duress, or any fraudulent device or contrivance, impede, prevent, or otherwise interfere, with the free exercise of the franchise of any voter, or shall thereby compel, induce, or prevail upon any voter to give or refrain from giving his vote at any election, shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence. And it has been held that though no damage, harm, or loss, be sustained by the voter, if the doing of the act inflicts loss on the other side it is within the statute. Therefore as to

Undue Influence

We may say that an election will be vitiated

By mob violence.

By the violence of individual partisans.

By spiritual intimidation.

By threatening withdrawal of or withdrawing of custom.

By threat of eviction by landlord.

By threats by fellow workmen of ill-treatment or expulsion from place of employment.

By dismissal from employment.

As to withdrawing custom it has been a subject of judicial doubt whether a lady looking at a box of ribbons, and on learning the politics of the tradesman refusing to purchase, would be undue influence. We need hardly say that in the case of the intimidation of single voters, the agency of the person exercising the influence must be proved; but in the case of general riot or violence it is a question of degree, and it must appear that the result was affected. Where the majority is a large one, and the rioting has not been extensive, the return would not be avoided.

It would seem hardly necessary to say very much about Bribery.

But it has taken so many forms that some questions may arise as even to the limits which kindness and benevolence may reach before offending against the law for securing free elections.

The act must be corrupt.

[Which means that the man who does it knows that he is doing what is wrong, and doing it with an evil object.]

The Judges have cast upon them the difficult duty of judging of intention, and very great difficulty has been experienced in deciding upon the motive with which hospitality has been dispensed or employment given. One good illustration is furnished by the request of a candidate to an elector to come some distance to vote. There is no implied promise to pay travelling expenses. The payment of travelling expenses has been held to be bribery, but a request to come and vote simply, holds out no inducement. Promises must be intended to influence the vote.

The prominent instance in which a corrupt intent will be implied is where money or its equivalent is given to a voter without any consideration. But even here the mere fact of the recipient being a voter will not be conclusive; it will be open to the candidate or his agent to show that the payment was innocent.

Bribery by strangers has assumed an important position under recent decisions. By receiving a bribe a voter loses his status, just as a candidate loses his by giving one. The vote of the corrupt voter may be struck off on a scrutiny, and although the candidate and his agents knew nothing of any corrupt practice, the majority may melt away before a petition which the respondent defends as being in his opinion wholly groundless. The evidence to impeach the return in this way, however, must be cogent. Bribery, therefore, may take the form of:

Payment to induce the voter to vote.

Offering money to induce a voter to vote.

Employing electors for reward.

Payment of voters for loss of time.

Corrupt payment of rates.

Corrupt payment of barristers' court money.

Buying the influence of another candidate.

Payment of travelling expenses.

Charitable gifts (a question of degree).

Payment to induce personation.

It is immaterial how long before an election the consideration for the vote was given. It will be regarded as having influenced the voter.

There is nearly as much difficulty in deciding upon what amounts to Treating.

The statute speaks of corruptly giving, or providing, or causing to be given or provided, or paying expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment or provision, in order to be elected, or to induce a voter to refrain from voting. Treating may be either before or after the election—if treating subsequent is relied upon, a previous understanding must have existed. The mere giving refreshment is not in itself a corrupt act, although punishable under the statute, but if it be given to influence votes, or to gain popularity, it is corrupt, and a single act of this kind done corruptly by an agent avoids the election.

General treating is the supply of refreshments in such excessive quantities with reference to the election as to produce a general corruption of the constituency. In this case the election would be void at common law, even if no agency were proved.

A question of the first magnitude with reference to corrupt practices, is of course that of Agency.

Very concise and clear expositions of the law as far as it can be considered to be established on any plain principles will be found in the work of Messrs. Leigh and Le Marchant, which we review to-day (in chap. 2), and also in a treatise by Mr. F. O. Crump, in Cox and Grady's Election Law. From the former we take the following passages:—

An agent is a person authorised by the candidate to act on his behalf in affairs connected with the election, and the candidate, as regards his seat, is as liable for acts committed by his agent as if he himself had been personally concerned therein; although the agent may not only have exceeded the authority committed to him, but have acted in opposition to the express commands of the candidate. So extreme, in fact, is the liability of the candidate for his agent, that the relation between them is not analogous to that existing at common law between principal and agent.

The candidate is answerable for the acts of his agent in the same way as a master is answerable for the acts of his servant done in the course of his employment, whether lawful or not, notwithstanding a prohibition may have been given to him by his master.

A candidate has been held answerable for acts committed by a person employed in a subordinate capacity by the agent for the purposes of the election on his own responsibility to the same extent as if those acts had been committed by the superior agent himself.

Besides the agent for election expenses, there are other paid persons whose names would appear in the detailed statement of election expenses under 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, s. 4.

The mere fact of their names appearing in that statement as paid by the candidate for the purposes of the election would probably be held as sufficient evidence of their agency, unless they were merely employed and paid in some subordinate capacity such as that of a messenger or bill-sticker, &c. The candidate may be bound also by acts committed in the course of the election by other persons on his behalf, though not named in the election accounts and unpaid.

A man's wife, if she interfere in the election, is ipso facto his agent. Hastings, Judgments, 235.

Any act, however trifling, is evidence of agency, and an aggregate of isolated acts will by their cumulative force constitute agency; though no one of them alone, if severed from the others, might be conclusive.

Exempli gratiâ:—

1. Being a member of the committee.
2. Canvassing alone, and with or without a canvassing-book.

3. Canvassing in company with the candidate.
4. Attending meetings and speaking on behalf of the candidate.
5. Bringing up voters to the poll.

From the latter work we extract the following:—

The words used in the Corrupt Practices Act to denote acts which are to affect a member's return are these, "by himself or by any other person on his behalf." In one of the first petitions tried before a Judge (the Norwich Petition, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 615), the effect of these words was considered, and Baron Martin held that they included any person for whom in law the member was responsible, whether he be an agent directly appointed by the member, or whether he be an agent by reason of the construction which has been placed upon the Act of Parliament—a construction which, his Lordship remarked, is to some extent binding on the Judges. The contention of counsel for the respondent in that case was that the respondent could not be held responsible for an act to which he was not privy. This contention was at once disposed of, and without citing further authority—and every petition tried is an authority on this point—it is to be taken that the candidate must suffer the consequences of the acts of every person for whom he is legally responsible.

The important question which we have now to consider is what constitutes an agent. And in the first place it should be observed that it was held by Mr. Justice Willes, in the Windsor Petition (19 L. T. Rep. N.S. 613), that mere employment does not constitute agency, and that therefore bribery by a messenger unauthorised to canvass did not affect the election. Payment for services, indeed, is not an element in the matter at all, for it was held by Mr. Justice Blackburn, in the Bewdley Petition (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 676), that it is not necessary that an agent should be paid in order that his act should affect a member's seat. But agency is not established by the mere fact of a person's name being on the published list of the committee (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 24). Mr. Justice Willes there said, however, "If I find a person's name on a committee from the beginning, that he attended meetings of the committee; that he also canvassed, and that his canvass was recognised so far as it went, I must require considerable argument to satisfy me that he was not an agent within the meaning of the Act of Parliament."

So much for negative decisions. Now, as to affirmative, we have the high authority of Mr. Justice Willes for saying that no distinction is to be drawn, as regards agency, in cases of bribery, treating, and undue influence (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 990). His Lordship was at first disposed to exclude treating from the acts done by an agent which should avoid the election, but his conclusion was that the 36th section of the Act must be read literally. Therefore all the corrupt practices stand upon the same footing as regards agency. In the Norwich Petition (sup.) we have the strongest evidence of agency, for there the learned Judge held that the agency of a particular individual had been proved "up to the hilt." Three persons stated him to be a canvasser. It was proved that he canvassed in the company of the son of the sitting member, and that on the afternoon of the day of polling he went to a publichouse and bought votes. Further, as to canvassing, Mr. Justice Willes, in the Guildford Petition (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 729), said (p. 732) "as a rule agency to bind the member would be agency to canvass or to procure votes on his behalf."

Now arises the question what is authority to canvass?

In the Windsor Petition (sup.) Mr. Justice Willes said, "an authority for the general management of an election would involve an authority to canvass." And in making that observation his Lordship remarks that he purposely used the word "authority" and not "employment," because he intended to refer to persons who were not paid for their services. It is quite clear, of course, as remarked by Mr. Justice O'Brien in the Londonderry Petition (Printed Judgments, Part II., p. 252), that no mere supporter of a candidate who chooses to ask for votes, and to make speeches in his favour, can force himself upon the candidate as an agent. In the Westbury Petition, Mr. Justice Willes said the act done to affect the candidate must be done by his procurement, and held it immaterial whether a desire that a person should canvass be expressed or implied, by words or by actions. And the learned Judge, in that case, gave a definition of canvassing. "Canvassing," he said, "may be either by asking a man to vote for the candidate for whom you are canvassing, or by begging him not to go to the poll, but to remain neutral and not vote for the adversary. No distinction can be drawn, except in the amount of favour, between voting for a man and abstaining from voting for his adversary. That such is the law appears from the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, which places on the same footing inducing a man to vote at an election and inducing a man to abstain from voting."

The question What is agency? was much discussed in the Staleybridge Petition (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. at pp. 76, 77), especially with reference to the acts of volunteers. One of the counsel there urged that the responsibility of the candidate should be limited in the case of volunteers,—that the petitioners should be bound to show some authorising on the part of the candidate to the persons whose acts are sought to be made available against him. In his judgment, Mr. Justice Blackburn considered the arguments addressed to him, and went fully into the matter. And first he noticed a mode of constituting a person an agent, which he had held in the Bewdley case to be most effective, that is, so as to make the candidate responsible not only for the acts of the person so appointed, but for the acts of those whom that person might employ as his agents. Sir R. Glass put money into the hands of a person at Bewdley, and exercised no supervision as to how it was to be expended, simply giving directions that it should not be expended illegally. The Judge came to the conclusion that there was such an agency established as to make the candidate responsible to the fullest extent. The evidence did not go so far as this in the Staleybridge case, but the learned Judge held that the mere act of taking the committee rooms by the volunteer committee amounted to evidence that the sitting member and his people did request those committees to bring up voters when they could, and consequently that the persons who, joining those volunteer committees, went and fetched voters, were in one sense employed by the sitting member to bring up voters.

In this same case, Mr. Justice Blackburn takes occasion to say that he does not think the principle that a person employed to canvass makes the candidate responsible for his acts, laid down by Mr. Justice Willes in the Windsor case, can be accepted as a hard and fast rule. "As a general proposition," he said, "that would go a great way towards saying who is an agent, but I don't think we can take it as an absolute hard and fast rule, on which we can say that wherever a case of corruption has been brought home to a person who was within the limit, the seat should be vacated. The effect of that would be to say that wherever there were volunteers who were acting at all, and whose voluntary acting was not repudiated by the candidate or his agents; wherever, in fact, a person came forward and said, 'I will act for you and endeavour to assist you,' and the candidate or his agent said, 'I am very much obliged to you, sir;' any corrupt or improper acts done by the volunteer, although unconnected with the member, would render the election void. At present," his Lordship added, "I cannot go further than to say that each case must be considered upon the whole facts taken together, and it must be determined in that way whether the relation between the person guilty of the corrupt practice and the member was such as to make the latter fairly responsible for it." This is equivalent to saying that no general rule can be laid down on the question of authority by implication; but his Lordship said, later on, that in drawing the inference the reason of the rule which makes a candidate responsible for the unauthorised acts of his agents should be borne in mind.

It seems to be agreed by all the Judges that in considering the question of agency the nature of the acts done by the alleged agents are most material. In the Staleybridge judgment, from which we have been quoting, Mr. Justice Blackburn said that "whenever it appears that the things are numerously done it would go very far to show that the agents did come within that principle upon which the law is founded, viz., that they were persons, the benefit of whose foul play the member was to get, and therefore it would be right that he should forfeit his seat in consequence." The same learned Judge further considered this question in the Hastings Petition (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 234). His Lordship there says: "I have frequently had it in my mind that there is great difficulty, in strict logic, in making the agency of a person dependent upon the extent of the corrupt practices committed by him. It does seem that in strict logic, if a man would be an agent if he was shown to have corrupted one hundred people by paying them £5 a-piece, then if he corrupts only a single man by giving him a single glass of beer, he ought to be regarded as an agent equally. There is no doubt, in strict logical language, you will find a difficulty in making the distinction, yet I cannot but feel that, in administering justice and in administering the law in such a way that it would be tolerable, one must make some distinction of that sort. There is the same thing that constitutes a man an agent in the one case present also in the other case; but I cannot but feel that where the case is a small isolated solitary case, it requires much more evidence to satisfy one of agency than would otherwise be necessary. If a small thing is done by the head agent .... the agent for the election expenses, I think that would have upset the election; and if small things to a considerable extent were done by a subordinate person, comparatively slight evidence of agency would probably have induced one to find that he was an agent."

This may be taken to be the view adopted by the election Judges, and having disposed of the mode in which an individual agent may be constituted, we will proceed to the question of the agency of associated supporters.

In the Westminster Petition, at page 246 of 20 L. T. Rep. N. S., Baron Martin deals with the point, observing that he could not suppose that where an association of persons numbering 600 or 700 members chooses to call itself a committee, therefore they become the agents of a candidate for the purpose of making him responsible for a wrong act or an illegal act done by them. And subsequently he defined a committeeman. "The committeeman," he said, "whom I mean, and for whom I would hold Mr. Smith responsible, is a committeeman in the ordinary intelligible sense of the word, that is to say, a person in whom faith is put, and for whose acts he is responsible." Nothing more need be said as regards this, we having noticed the subject of the agency of political associations incidentally in discussing the Wigan and Taunton cases under "Candidate and Agent." Suffice it to say that it must be taken as established that there is no partnership privity between the parties subscribing to a political association; nor does the fact of subscribing confer any authority upon the person who manages it to make them responsible for an illegal act done by him.

We have now to consider at what point an agent ceases to be an agent, so as to make a candidate responsible for his acts. And, in the first place, it is to be noticed that treachery will deprive an agent of his capacity as such. This was expressly pointed out by Mr. Justice Blackburn in the Stafford Borough Petition (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 212). He said, referring to the proceedings of one Machin, "If the evidence was to the effect that Machin, though he was then a paid agent of Colonel Meller, was at that time planning to betray Colonel Meller, that it was what is called a plant, then I do not think that Machin could any longer be considered an agent of Colonel Meller, so that his acts would vacate the election. I wish to point out the distinction which I make, that according as the law stands at present, if a member employs an agent, and that agent, contrary to his wish, and contrary to his directions, commit a corrupt act, the sitting member is responsible for it; but when he employs an agent, and the agent treacherously or traitorously agrees with the other side, then if he does a corrupt act it would not vacate the seat, unless it is proved that the corrupt act was at the special request of the member himself or some untainted and unauthorised agent of the member who directed the act to be done." His Lordship was very particular upon the point, for he added, "The distinction is pretty obvious, and I mention it to avoid any difficulty or doubt that there might be hereafter, from its being supposed that I have said anything more than I do say; I say if Machin was a treacherous agent he loses the power of upsetting the seat by reason of his unauthorised acts of corruption; it would require actual proof of authority in order to make it so. It is a very different affair if a man being an agent has been tricked by the other party into committing a corrupt act, he himself honestly still intending to act as an agent."

Express authority will, of course, recreate an agency which has lapsed or been annihilated. As above, it will do away with the effect of treachery; and in the case of corrupt acts done after the election, the agency, having ceased with the close of the election, may be revived by express authority, so as to constitute the person an agent, and thus to affect the return. "The agency at the election," said Mr. Justice Blackburn, in the Norfolk Petition, "which was solely from the canvassing before the election, expires with the election. Whether or no a person who had been requested to canvass would be an agent whose misconduct would avoid the election, would depend upon the evidence; but unless there is something to show continuing authority, that person could not, if he had given a feast ten days after the election, by that act upset the election."

Further, and lastly, it is perfectly clear that where there is a coalition between candidates, each becomes the agent of the other. The limit of this agency is shown in the Norfolk Petition before referred to. Here we conclude the consideration of the very difficult question of agency. Notwithstanding the diffidence expressed by all the Judges in dealing with it, and their doubts concerning the various attempts which have been made to define it, we do not conceive that there will be much difficulty in dealing with the next batch of petitions by the light of the judgments which we have been examining.

LAW LIBRARY.

The Election Manual: a Concise Digest of the Law of Parliamentary Elections. By L. P. BRICKWOOD, M.A., and HERBERT CROFT, M.A., Barristers-at-Law. London: Virtue, Spalding, and Daldy.

The Law of Elections and Election Petitions. By Hon. CHANDOS LEIGH, M.A., and HENRY LE MARCHANT, M.A., Barristers-at-Law. Second edition. London: Davis and Son, Carey-street, Lincoln's-inn.

IT is most unfortunate when an unexpected event causes a number of books on a legal subject to be hurriedly pushed through the press. We last week noticed Mr. Hardcastle's edition of "Bushby," which bore evident traces of haste. The authors of the first of the two above-mentioned manuals admit that their "endeavour to comply with the exigency of the moment leaves them with too little time at their disposal for satisfactory revision and correction." The second on our list, being a second edition, was less liable to errors arising from hasty execution or publication.

Had Messrs. Brickwood and Croft thought over the matter, we do not think they would have given their work the title which it now bears. It is most decidedly not a digest of the law of Parliamentary elections. It is a digest, but by no means a concise digest, of the law relating to corrupt practices at parliamentary elections. According to the table of contents, which is perfectly accurate, the work treats of corrupt practices only—the position of a candidate and his agent, of bribery, treating and intimidation, dealing separately with "conduct money—conveyance," the meaning of "corruptly," and "costs."

However, disregarding the misnomer, we have to recognise in Messrs. Brickwood and Croft careful and intelligent students of the judgments of the election judges. These judgments furnish material for a treatise easy to be moulded and capable of being made into a systematic and scientific code of principles. We should have been glad had our authors attempted such a code, instead of heaping up quotations from the judgments; but it would have been a task of some difficulty, and would certainly not have been completed so as to be available in the trial of the petitions which are certain to be presented before the end of the month. We will notice, however, a few of the conclusions at which our authors arrive.

Agency: "Thus we may take it that the doctrine of the liability for the unauthorised and even for the expressly prohibited acts of his agent has received the approbation of the present tribunal for the trial of election petitions after full and deliberate consideration, and may be considered definitely settled:" (p. 11).

The authors cite a great many dicta as to to what constitutes an agent, but wisely refrain from attempting any general definition.

Conduct money: Conveyance.—Here again we have pages of judgment, but no clue to the prevailing principle.

The same remark applies to the question when costs should be given to the successful party.

Undue Influence: Our authors give us the intention of the Legislature in enacting the 5th section of the Corrupt Practices Act 1854. It was "obviously to secure, as far as human agency can do so, absolute freedom on the part of electors from all improper influences which might operate upon their minds in the exercise of the franchise; and where it can be proved that this 'vital principle' has not been maintained by reason of some vis major operating to any considerable extent, it will follow as a necessary consequence that the election cannot be upheld." The expression "operating to any considerable extent" is rather vague, and is hardly in accordance with the views of Mr. Justices Willes and Mr. Justice Blackburn. Any undue influence by an agent which causes a vote to be given in a way other than that in which it would have been given invalidates the return.

Treating is dealt with by citation of judgments, and no attempt is made to deduce principles or classify cases. We do not see, therefore, that we can say very much in favour of the work. The extracts are undoubtedly correct, but they will be found difficult to handle in practice, notwithstanding the index. Had there been sub-headings or side notes, or anything in the way of subdivision or classification, the work might have been useful. We very much doubt its practical value in its present shape, and we trust that, should it reach a second edition, its form will be altered.

Messrs. Leigh and Le Marchant have erred if at all on the right side. In a work of smaller dimensions than that of Messrs. Brickwood and Croft, they have combined with definitions of corrupt practices practical directions as to presenting, conducting, and withdrawing petitions, and they give in addition all the statute law. A very important chapter is devoted to the subject of "Scrutiny," dealing with the various grounds upon which votes may be struck off, making great use of the Oldham case before Mr. Justice Blackburn, which is an excellent precedent. This work is arranged in such a way as to give the established principles in lucid order, and so as to be understood almost at a glance, being deeply indented with italic side heads and marginal notes.

We observe that the authors of both these works avail themselves largely of the reports of the election petitions in the LAW TIMES Reports; and without any partiality we believe that those reports will be found the only reports to be used with advantage, as they set out the full statements of fact in each case. The reports commence in vol. xix., and end with vol. xxii.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

WE are glad to be able to inform our readers that the negotiations which have for some time past been going on between the governing bodies of the Incorporated Law Society and the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, will in all probability be shortly closed in a manner that will be satisfactory to the societies, and, indeed, we may say to the Profession at large. The accomplishment of so desirable an object as their amalgamation will not only lead to a very considerable strengthening of the older society in point of numbers, but it will involve that which is of the greatest importance, namely, the holding of occasional provincial meetings. The Profession will be glad to hear that steps were some time since taken with a view to the election of extraordinary members of the council under the supplemental charter, and it is to be regretted that while the presidents of ten country societies were nominated, two only were found to possess the necessary qualification. As regards the proposed amalgamation, we are sorry that we cannot inform our readers of the names of the prime movers in the negotiations which have taken place on this important subject.

A QUEER little paper called the Criterion which is published at Hull announces that an application is to be made that Hull may be created a legal centre, under the Judicature Act. The operation of the Act is thus sketched: "The advantages to be gained from such a step are numerous both to the local members of the legal profession and to the general public, the only sufferers under such a reform being the London attorneys, who act as agents to our country practitioners. Briefly summarising the proposed changes, we shall find the following results: a large portion of legal business now necessarily carried on in London can be transacted in Hull; legal proceedings will be considerably facilitated and cheapened, a great deal of time and money saved, and poor Hamlet's 'law's delay and insolence of office' (?) may become, if not things of the past, at any rate mere figures of speech serving only to remind us of the unsatisfactory condition of things from which we have happily escaped. District Registrars are promised in such places as shall be constituted 'centres,' from whom writs of summonses for the commencement of actions in the High Court of Judicature can be obtained, and before whom all necessary proceedings may be taken and recorded until the case is ripe for trial. Our registrar will rejoice in a seal, and have, besides, sundry powers to administer oaths and such other duties in respect of proceedings awaiting trial in the High Court. From the writ of summons, the very commencement of an action, down to, and including, entry for trial, every step may be taken before him. Every Hull lawyer will be his own agent; and every man's business expedited—'A consummation devoutly to be wished.' Earnestly we trust that our town's petition may be granted."

So far as we have been able to ascertain, the following solicitors have been elected to serve as members of Parliament in the new House of Commons:

Mr. Freshfield	Dover.
Mr. G. B. Gregory	East Sussex.
Mr. C. E. Lewis	Londonderry City.
Mr. G. Leeman	York City.
Mr. G. Golding	Chippenham.
Mr. W. Gordon	Chelsea.
Mr. J. Dodds	Stockton.
Mr. McCarthy Downing	Cork County.

And there are some others still in the field as well for Ireland as England. We think, in view of recent legislation that Mr. Disraeli with his large surplus may well relieve solicitors from the payment of the annual certificate duty, and the claim ought to be advanced by our representatives in the House.

MR. JOSHUA WILLIAMS addressed some very sensible observations to the Birmingham Law Students' Society last week. In the first place he disposed of the notion that a lawyer's education can ever terminate. "A man," said Mr. Williams, "would go on studying to the end of his days if he were worthy of the name of a lawyer," therefore he advised them to study on; "but let not the work be too hard." Too many gentlemen imagine that when they are out of their articles, and have passed their final examination, they have attained all that should be attained by a solicitor in the way of education. Doubtless, as Mr. Farrer very properly observed when one of the spokesmen of the deputation of the Legal Education Association to Lord Selborne in 1873, solicitors have not the time for studying the refinements of the law—for these they must go to the barrister, who has the time and opportunity for such study. But the broad general principles of the law should be known to solicitors, and, whenever possible, studies should be kept up. We don't for a moment underrate the difficulty in the way of a practising solicitor desiring to retain and keep fresh his knowledge of law, but in proportion as these difficulties do not arise study should increase. Under the Judicature Act it will be more than ever essential that solicitors should have a good general knowledge of law. Mr. Williams also made some observations on the administration of law and equity which are somewhat novel and may startle the uninitiated. "Common law," he said, "which originated in a system of harsh dry hard rules, was administered in a much more liberal spirit than were the rules of equity which originated in liberal principles. The popular notions of equity are quite mistaken —technicalities prevail even more than at common law; consequently the fusion of the two jurisdictions, and the removal of the many anomalies which are born of rigid technical rules must prove of enormous advantage." But whilst approving of this fusion Mr. Williams was careful to say that the great principle of division of labour should not be lost sight of. "His opinion was that the law was far too great for any man to be acquainted with the whole of it." He would like to have things arranged so that "every man's suit should be relegated to that court which was best qualified to deal with the points involved." The difficulty about this is that there would not be enough work of each kind to keep separate courts occupied, and it would be almost impossible to break up the High Court into sections according to the nature of the causes in the list. Finally, Mr. Williams warned lawyers against communism, and as regards taxation, he said, "it would be a bad thing for lawyers if all the taxes were paid by those who had property, and all the laws made for those who had none." So probably most lawyers thought who voted for the "safe party" in the recent elections.

THE Birmingham Law Society's Report for the past year, recently issued, is one of some interest. It deals, amongst other things, with the Judicature Act, remarking that its beneficial operation will depend upon the rules of practice and procedure now in course of preparation. The committee, however, are not unanimous in opinion as to the practical value of the District Registry Clauses, but they agree that for some time to come large powers of removing proceedings to the London or other registries, at the instance of defendants must be accorded, to prevent delay, inconvenience and, in many instances, expense. The report also deals with Tribunals of Commerce, and remarks that the committee considers it undesirable to establish any special tribunal for the trial of commercial cases, being of opinion that if the ordinary tribunals are not competent for the work, their procedure should be improved. On the subject of legal education, the committee, whilst fully recognising the existing defects of the system, do not assent to the proposition that the only remedy is to be found in a system of lectures, there being a difficulty in obtaining competent lecturers, and paying them properly. The committee look forward to legal sanction being soon given to the principle of remuneration to solicitors by commission, and finally, as to the organisation of the Profession, urge country solicitors to join the Incorporated Law Society.

A COUNTRY firm of solicitors write to us alleging that their London agents account for delay in taxing a bill of costs arising out of a suit in Chancery, on the ground that there are only six taxing masters, the amount of whose work is so great that there is a perfect block of business in these offices, and asking us to call attention to the matter. We can only say that we have discussed the subject over and over again in our columns, and urged the necessity of appointing additional masters, who should be solicitors of long standing in the Profession, specially qualified by a long experience of Chancery business. It is idle to suppose that the present staff in the Chancery taxing offices can either with credit to themselves or satisfaction to the Profession, cope with the enormously increased amount of business which is now being daily taken into these chambers. Nothing is more in the interests of the Profession in these days than that every kind of legal business should be dealt with expeditiously, and we should indeed be glad to hear that, for the convenience of solicitors and in the interest of the public, two additional masters are to be appointed.

THE following lectures and classes are appointed for the ensuing week, at the Law Institution, for the instruction of students seeking admission on the Roll of Attorneys and Solicitors: Monday, 16th Feb., class, 4.30 to 6 p.m., Conveyancing; Tuesday and Wednesday, ditto; Friday, 20th Feb., lecture, 6 to 7 p.m., Common Law.

RULES OF PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE TO BE FRAMED UNDER THE JUDICATURE ACT 1873.

MR. G. M. DOWDESWELL read a paper on this subject at the Law Amendment Society's meeting on Monday last. Mr. Joseph Brown, Q.C., was in the chair.

Mr. Dowdeswell said: "I do not think it is incumbent on me to offer any apology for addressing you on a subject so dull, dry, and technical as the course to be pursued, and the principles to be observed in framing the rules under the provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act. I did not select it myself, but was requested to undertake the task, and, considering its great importance, and with a view to stimulate discussion, I somewhat reluctantly undertook it. No person from choice would resort for entertainment to the pages of Archbold's Practice, or seek for exhilaration even in a little Lush. To every one who will take the trouble attentively to read the Judicature Act, it will become quite manifest that the successful working of that measure will depend, in a great degree, upon the regulations which may be made, and remain to be made, for carrying its provisions into effect. It ordains tribunals; it declares their functions; it lays down broad principles for the administration by them of law and equity indifferently; it constitutes offices and officers; and then, after declaring that the rules contained in the schedule to the Act shall, for the present, regulate all proceedings, substantially leaves all other matters to be governed by rules which are yet to be framed. The schedule contains a very meagre and imperfect set of ordinances called "Rules of Procedure." The principal of these—that all suits shall be instituted by a proceeding called an action; that this shall be commenced by writ; that the pleadings shall contain a brief statement of the matters in controversy; that judgment may be signed thereupon; that the evidence shall be oral; and all costs shall be in the discretion of the court; these are, for the present, to prevail; but in the main all other procedure, as well as the forms of these matters mentioned in the schedule, are to be governed by rules to be framed. Hence it will be obvious that, to a very great extent, this is amenable to the same objection as proved fatal to the measure introduced by Lord Hatherley. Very probably this was found to be a matter of necessity, and the objection has been sought to be obviated by ordaining that her Majesty may cause the rules to be framed with the advice of the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice, and the judges, and giving to those rules a kind of semi-legislative authority. With this view, they are to be laid before each House of Parliament, and any of them may be annulled by the Queen upon an address presented by either House. The interval of time allowed for the presentation of this address is only forty days, and when this, as well as the nature of the matter, and the constitution of the body thus to revise them, is considered—unless there be some flagrant error or gross injustice would manifestly ensue, which is not probable—the rules, as laid before Parliament, will no doubt prevail. Hence the timely discussion and consideration of several questions become most important. The first of these is, what are the substantive provisions of the statute they are intended to supplement, which they cannot alter or contravene? secondly, what are the broad general principles which ought to form the paramount consideration in framing them? and lastly, what they should be in detail. The first two of these questions can easily be discussed in a paper like this, but the last it is impossible to deal with, save by a few remarks upon the more important and prominent topics. What, then, are the provisions of the Act which are paramount, and cannot be altered by the rules? In the earlier sections of the statute power is conferred on the High Court of Judicature and of Appeal, to make rules as to the method and times in which the business shall be conducted. These rules are matters rather of convenience and order than of the substance of litigation. The principal section which requires consideration is the 68th, taken in conjunction with the 69th and 74th, and the schedule to the Act. The 68th section enacts that, subject to the provisions of the Act, her Majesty may at any time, before the commencement of the Act, with the advice of the majority of the judges, cause to be prepared rules of court regulating the holding of the courts; and, thirdly,

"For the regulation of all matters consistent with, or not expressly determined by, the rules contained in the schedule hereto, which under and for the purposes of such last-mentioned rules require to be, or conveniently may be, defined or regulated by further rules of court. And generally for the regulation of any matters relating to the practice and procedure of the said courts respectively, or to the duties of the officers thereof, or to the costs of the proceedings therein, or to the conduct of civil or criminal business coming within the cognisance of the said courts respectively, for which provision is not expressly made by this Act or by the rules contained in the schedule thereto."

These are the rules which are to be laid before Parliament, and may be annulled upon an address.

The express provisions of the statute with which rules of practice or procedure could conflict are, indeed, very few, if we except those contained in the schedule. These, therefore, become the most important to consider when the framing of rules is under consideration; and the 69th section points this out more clearly, for it enacts that—

"The rules contained in the schedule to this Act (which shall be read and taken as part of this Act) shall come into operation immediately on the commencement of this Act, and as to all matters to which they extend shall thenceforth regulate the proceedings of the High Court of Judicature and the Court of Appeal respectively, unless and until, by the authority hereinafter in that behalf provided, any of them may be altered or varied."

Clearly, therefore, the rules in the schedule must prevail over any rules made under the preceding section; and, therefore, these latter rules should be made to harmonise, and not conflict in any way with them. These latter rules are the matters which form the subject of the present discussion; but it may not be inexpedient to observe the vast power conferred by the Act on the judges, for although the rules in the schedule are at present paramount, yet their operation is limited, "until, by the authority hereinafter in that behalf provided," they are altered or varied. This authority is found in the 74th section, which ordains that the Supreme Court, with the concurrence of the majority of the judges, of whom the Lord Chancellor shall be one, assembled at a special meeting for the purpose, may alter or annul any rules of court; and the concluding part of the 69th section expressly declares that the rules in the schedule shall be considered such. Hence it is, perhaps, well it should be understood that henceforth the Supreme Court, with such concurrence, has entire control over everything connected with actions, and, subject only to an address from Parliament, may entirely change the process, the pleadings the mode of trial, and the entire system of procedure, with very few exceptions, in our courts. This is a vast new power thus vested in a court, for which there is no precedent in the history of this country. It is certainly a power, the exercise of which should be carefully watched by the assemblies who are entrusted with a control over it.

I now pass to the consideration of some of the broad general principles which ought to form the paramount consideration in framing the rules under the 68th section. In the first place the grand objects should be steadily kept in view—viz., the ascertainment of the matters really in controversy between the parties, the righteous, speedy, and cheap decision of them, and finally the effectual enforcement of the decrees of the tribunal. That rules the compliance with which will necessarily, to a great extent, devolve on persons in subordinate station, or young men learning the Profession should be simple and plain in their language, is so obvious a remark, that it seems almost unnecessary to make it.

They should be couched in the fewest possible words, and the verbiage, which has hitherto unfortunately characterised many of our legal proceedings should be avoided.

If there be a course of procedure or rules relating to any matter, the operation of which has been settled and found convenient, and their carrying out is well understood, they should be adopted in preference to new, and any defects in them, which time has developed, should be obviated by amendments. Many of the rules established in the courts of law, under the Common Law Procedure Acts, have worked extremely well, and most practitioners are thoroughly conversant with them, and very little difficulty will be experienced in adapting them to the new state of the law. It seems to me, therefore, expedient that what is really useful in the old system should not be disregarded, but wherever it conveniently can be done, should be moulded for use in future.

As far as possible the parties—by communications and requirements between themselves—should conduct the business, and recourse should only be had to the aid of the court when they fail. The delivery, for instance, of pleadings by the one party to the other without depositing them, by filing, or otherwise, in court, has been found to work well, and simple demands and notices have been found, in many instances, to afford the parties all they require equally well with rules or orders. The multiplication of summonses and orders has become a very heavy tax upon suitors; there is a great temptation for this, and those who have had occasion to analyse attorneys' bills in actions cannot fail to have observed how serious was the charge in this respect.

The suitor requires protection, not so much against the person whom he may select as his legal adviser, but against a person chosen adversely to him, who too frequently is determined to make the most he can out of the transaction.

Power should be given to a party to dispense with anything which is provided simply for his benefit, and this will be only in furtherance of the spirit of the Act, evinced by the provision that a defendant may dispense with a statement of the complaint against him.

No proceeding or formality should be required which is not absolutely necessary for the orderly and effectual conduct of the proceedings. Hitherto in many cases things have been required to be done from which the suitors derived no benefit whatever, and with which they were willing to dispense, simply for the purpose of exacting fees of court. In a recent case, for instance, a man was required to pay several pounds for copies of affidavits which he or his antagonist did not require, simply in order that a few shillings might be paid for fees. If we cannot have free courts, at all events let the scandal of exacting fees for useless purposes be avoided. Formerly, too, superfluous or unnecessarily expensive formalities were required with a view to the emoluments of the practitioners, and this vice still, to a certain extent, prevails. I am not insensible to the interests of the bar or the solicitors—if they are not properly remunerated for what is necessary to be done by them, let their remuneration for it be increased to a just degree; but this, I think, is not the case, and I fully believe that the interest of the client, the solicitor, and the barrister, are identical, and that there would be a large increase of business to be done if it were not made unduly costly, and the interests and dignity of our Profession would be promoted by the extinction of such a source of emolument. Many of these things have been abolished, but let all these now become utterly extinct.

Lastly, in the case of irregularity, or informality in complying with the rules, hitherto the practice has been to set aside proceedings with costs, in order to enforce strict observance of them. In a vast number of cases, the objecting party was not damnified at all, in others to only a very slight extent. The course thus vindictively adopted seems to me unreasonable; and I would suggest that in all such cases the party, if he be prejudiced in any way, should be at liberty to desire his opponent to remedy the defect at the latter's cost, and only in the event of this being refused, that he should have recourse to the aid of the court. This course, I am sure, will get rid of a vast amount of sharp practice, and conduce far better to the proper conduct of litigation. Let an action no longer be regarded as a gambling transaction to be carried on, as judges have sometimes offensively expressed it, "according to the rules of the game," in which chance may prevail, but as a solemn, straightforward proceeding in which men's rights are to be adjusted and wrongs redressed.

These are some of the main principles which, it seems to me, should be regarded. I could dilate much more fully upon various other points, but I am apprehensive lest I should be tedious, and I think I have said enough on this head to lay the foundation for, and stimulate the discussion.

I will add a few remarks as to what the rules should be upon particular matters mentioned in the schedule, the principal of these being Process, Pleading, and Discovery.

The preliminary process of citation, the form of which is to be settled by the rules, should be brief and plain; and while allowing the party summoned sufficient time to comply with its terms should admit of no unnecessary delay. It should convey a general notion of the claim, but except in the case of the money demands for which judgment may be signed where the statement should be full, a very general description ought to suffice. The consequence of non-compliance with the summons should not be the entering of an appearance, for that is an idle formality, but the right of the party to proceed by filing his pleading.

The general nature of the pleadings is described by the schedule, but it would be well if, as under former statutes, some models or examples of these in ordinary cases were given. Without such a guide very great uncertainty and confusion will prevail. The best extant model whereon to frame the pleadings with which I am acquainted, is presented by the pleadings in the Probate and Matrimonial Court. Technical accuracy should not be required, though it is obvious from the reservation of the right to demur, the pleading must disclose in law a right to the remedy sought or a defence to it. There is one point on which some rule will certainly be required, or great embarrasment will ensue; at the time of his appearance the defendant may state that he does not require a statement of the complaint, but the statute is wholly silent as to what he is to do as to pleading under such circumstances. It would be a singular thing to have an answer to a complaint of which there is no sort of record, and one would almost surmise that this was an oversight, or else it was intended that the defendant should make no statement also. The sentence, "Unless the defendant at the time of his appearance shall state that he does not require the delivery of a statement of complaint," may apply to the succeeding sentence as well as the first.

In equity the plaintiff was always entitled to interrogate the defendant, but at law that right has only recently obtained, and subject to great restrictions. The practice in equity is preferable, and the unnecessary expense of a summons and order should not be required. Either party should be at liberty to propose to the other any question relevant to the matters in dispute, and the other should be bound to answer. If there be questions which he may properly object to answer, he should be at liberty to leave them unanswered, and no detriment should arise to him from pursuing that course. It will then be time for the party requiring the information to take the opinion of the judge upon his right to an answer. The few instances in which I have known any advantage derived from this proceeding, and the very heavy expense incidental to the present mode of procedure at common law, have induced me to say this.

I would, in conclusion, suggest that very grave questions will arise as to the course and rules which are to prevail on ejectment.

The discussion was continued by, among others, Mr. Kimber, Mr. A. E. Miller, Q.C., Mr. Webster, Q.C., Mr. White, and Mr. Ryalls, the last expressing, amid applause, the opinion that the more speedy and cheap the remedy given the greater would be the resort to lawyers. Mr. Joseph Brown, before leaving the chair, which was afterwards taken by Mr. Webster, expressed the utter absence of regret with which he, an old special pleader, saw the whole system of pleading abolished. As to the practice in Chancery, a great deal had been said about the expense to which a litigant might drive his opponent by articulating his whole bill into interrogatories, to which the opponent replied with as many salvoes and qualifications as possible, to avoid admitting anything of use; and he himself could never see the shelves in Fetter-lane groaning under the affidavits and other documents filed without a painful consciousness, fond as he was of old parchments, of the absolute waste of money there represented. He thought the Judicature Act would have one good effect: it would give more work to special pleaders and junior counsel. Mr. Anderson Rose, on the other hand, denounced the word "fusion," the disastrous character of which, he said, was only exceeded by the disastrous nature of its practical application by Act of Parliament. The proceedings concluded with a vote of thanks, proposed by Mr. Miller, to Mr. Dowdeswell for his suggestive paper.

GOING TO THE BAR.—I am now an articled clerk, but have determined to go to the Bar. Before I can be entered as a student it is necessary that my articles should be cancelled, but I cannot ascertain with certainty by what means that object is to be effected. Will some of your readers who have been similarly situated inform me how they cancelled their articles, and whether anything, and if so what, has to be done at the Law Institution and Queen's Bench Office? A. C.

ASSIGNMENT OF ARTICLES.—I wish to ask the advice and assistance of any of your readers in the following case: Two years ago a friend of mine was articled to an attorney, paying a premium of £100, the articles, of course, containing the usual covenants on the attorney's part as to instruction, &c. At that time there were in the attorney's office a managing clerk of twenty years' experience, an articled clerk of four years' service, and a copying clerk. A satisfactory general business was done at the office, though not well attended to by the principal, until about twelve months afterwards, when the principal gave way to intemperate habits, and fell very much into debt, insomuch that the whole of the office furniture and effects on one occasion were seized and removed, and the office closed. Since the managing clerk left, the principal has attended very little to his business, being sometimes absent for weeks at a time, and seldom attending more than an hour or two per day. The other clerks having left, the articled clerk is therefore left entirely by himself, without any instructions in his profession. Executions in the office are frequent, and applications for debts incessant. Under these circumstances the articled clerk, unwilling to lose any more of his time, wishes to have his articles assigned to some other attorney, and a return of part of the premium; and he wishes one of your many readers to inform him through the means of your valuable paper what steps he should take to have this done. loans to such other metropolitan bodies as are empowered, by statute, to borrow from the Metropolitan Board.

MESSRS. MORTON, ROSE, and Co. are prepared to receive subscriptions for £1,000,000 five per cent. sterling sinking fund bonds of the Illinois Central Railroad Company of £200 each, payable 1st April 1903, if not previously redeemed by the action of the sinking fund, which are issued under the provisions of an Act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, dated 12th Feb. 1855, entitled "An Act to enable railroad companies to enter into operative contracts, and to borrow money." The loan is raised for the purchase of an equal amount of New Orleans, Jackson, and Great Northern Railroad and Mississippi Central Railroad Seven per Cent. Bonds, by which means the Illinois Company will gain two per cent. annually, thereby providing a sinking fund sufficient to redeem the whole of this issue in about twenty-six years. The bonds of the above railroads so purchased are to be held by the Illinois Company as security for the payment of this loan.

ELECTION LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS—CORRUPT PRACTICES—DELIVERY OF LIST OF OBJECTIONS—POWER OF COURT.—Where the parties required by No. 7 of the Regulæ Generales of Michaelmas Term 1868 to deliver a list of objections six days before the day appointed for the hearing of a petition under 35 & 36 Vict. c. 60, have failed to do so within that time, the court has no power to allow the list to be delivered subsequently, the discretionary power given by the rule having reference only to the amendment of a list that has been duly delivered: (Nield v. Batty, 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 747. C.P.).

THE WORKING OF THE BALLOT.

COUNTING VOTES.—Mr. E. G. L. Anderson writes:—"The system of calling over the votes for the purpose of ascertaining the number given for each candidate is not only tedious, but involves the necessity of more checking than is, I think, desirable. Will you, therefore, allow me to suggest the following plan as an improvement? namely, that as the voting papers are scrutinized to ascertain their validity, they should be sorted into as many heaps as the names on them admit of variations in voting, each heap being then counted in the same manner as a bank clerk runs through a bundle of notes. The working of the plan can be followed by taking, say, the East Surrey election. There are four candidates, and the variations possible are 10, with an additional heap for bad votes, these heaps would be as follows:—1, Plumpers for Gassiot; 2, for Grantham; 3, for Locke King; 4, for Watney; 5, split votes for Gassiot and Locke King; 6, for Grantham and Watney; 7, for Gassiot and Watney; 8, for Locke King and Watney; 9, for Grantham and Gassiot; 10, for Grantham and Locke King; 11, rejected votes. The papers being thus divided, the time occupied in counting would be reduced to a minimum, while the chance of error would be almost nil. Moreover, this plan would give reliable figures as to the number of electors who actually voted, the plumpers and split votes, and in the latter the proportion of the various combinations."

Mr. John Stone, town clerk of Bath, writes in reply:—"Referring to Mr. Anderson's suggestion in The Times of Saturday as to making up the poll by sorting the voting papers, I beg to say that so simple, effective, and rapid a plan was the first that presented itself, and has been used here in four Parliamentary elections (within one year) and in several municipal elections, each of the latter being similar in almost every respect to a Parliamentary election. Taking the Parliamentary election of last Tuesday as an instance of its efficiency, we had 4865 voting papers, which classed themselves (there being four candidates) into ten combinations. At the close of the poll (4 o'clock p.m.), after about one hour occupied in verifying the ballot boxes (19 in number), two hours sufficed to classify and count the papers, so that soon after 7 o'clock the Mayor was able to declare the numbers from the steps of the Guildhall. I may add that there were eight official counters employed."

REJECTED BALLOT PAPERS.—Mr. Gerald A. R. Fitzgerald, writes to the editor of the Times: "Some doubt and confusion seem to exist in the minds of returning officers as to the construction of the provisions of the Ballot Act relating to the validity of ballot papers. I observe, for instance, in the Times of Saturday that the returning officer for Finsbury rejected no fewer than 474.(a) Of these, many are stated to have been rejected because the voters had put figures on them, or had placed two or more crosses opposite a candidate's name, or had placed the crosses in the wrong place. Will you allow me to point out the true state of the law. First, "the directions for the guidance of the voter" in Schedule II. of the Ballot Act which are placarded in the polling stations are directory merely and not imperative. Secondly, the only grounds assigned by the Act for rejecting a paper on the score of the mode of marking are—(1), Writing a mark by which a voter could be identified; (2), Uncertainty (Schedule II. and Rule 36). The true construction, then, of the Act is that where the returning officer has no reasonable doubt for whom the votes are intended, and there is nothing on the paper to identify the voter, he is bound to allow the paper as good. To reject papers because, e.g., two crosses or a tick are employed instead of a single cross, is contrary alike to common sense and to the policy of the Legislature, which certainly never intended to disfranchise electors by the minutest of technicalities."

In reply to Mr. Fitzgerald, "A Chancery Barrister" writes:—"Before the law on voting by ballot is absolutely settled by Mr. Fitzgerald, may I be allowed to point out what I cannot presume to call 'the true state of the law,' but what I venture to say would be the probable decision of a court of competent jurisdiction upon the questions treated in Mr. Fitzgerald's letter in the Times of this morning? In the first place, with regard to 'the directions for the guidance of the voter,' which Mr. Fitzgerald describes as directory merely, the 28th section of the Ballot Act is as follows:—'The schedules to this Act and the notes thereto and directions therein shall be construed and have effect as part of this Act.' And the directions referred to are contained in the second schedule. It is true that the direction uses the word 'will' and not the word 'shall,' but if I say to my clerk 'you will wait in till I come back,' most people will admit that my directions are not only 'directory,' but are intended to be imperative. With regard to the grounds upon which papers may be rejected, the Act says (sect. 2) that any ballot paper 'on which anything is written or marked by which the voter can be identified shall be void and not counted.' Now, suppose an agent instructs a voter with whom he contemplates pecuniary relations—I am, of course, putting a purely supposititious case—to mark against the candidate to be voted for two crosses instead of one cross, or a tick instead of one cross, or to place the cross on the left hand side instead of the right, would not the result be a mark by which the voter could be identified? Perhaps Mr. Fitzgerald is not aware that the examination of the ballot papers is carried on in the presence and under the supervision of the agents of the candidates. No doubt, the Ballot Act does not aim at actual uniformity in the shape or size of the cross to be made, which must depend upon the taste or capacity of the voter; but the difference between a cross on the right and a cross on the left, between two crosses and one cross, or between a cross and the tick, is certainly not to described as a minute technicality."

And Mr. Richard A. Essery, town clerk of Swansea, also says: "On the subject of the voter's 'mark' I very fully agree with the opinion of Mr. Fitzgerald, for the body of the Ballot Act refers simply to a 'mark,' and not to a ×. The form in the schedule doubtless indicates the latter, but it is, in my opinion, a mere example, and I think a tick, or dash, or any other mark not for identification, is a sufficient 'mark' within the statute. On the recent contest here I advised the returning officer to reject all marks and figures except a ×, but this was in accordance with counsel's opinion previously obtained, and which, for obvious reasons, I adhered to, contrary to my own and to that of many other town clerks. On the question of counting the votes, the process of sorting is clearly the most expeditious and safest, inasmuch as there is not so much calling out of names, and possible interference between one set of counters and another. As to the point raised by 'Lex,' namely the hour of closing the poll—the question is capable of being brought within sufficiently narrow limits. A presiding officer cannot poll more than about 100 votes per hour, with illiterates and all; and it is found that each compartment in the booth having by the statute to accommodate 150 persons per day, five compartments only represent as near as need be that officer's complement. He (the presiding officer), therefore, having the power to regulate the number to be admitted at a time, may stop the poll at any time within five votes (i.e., he may, as he should do, prevent the admission of voters five minutes before the hour of closing—four o'clock, or five, as the case may be. If these last five voters should happen to be illiterate, the presiding officer could not complete their declarations, certificates, &c., under ten minutes. It is a fine point undoubtedly."

DOUBLE VOTING BY BALLOT.—A "Fair Voter" writes: "However desirable voting by ballot may be, there seems a great laxity in the present mode of procedure amounting to a grave defect in the system. I am a freeholder in the Strand district, occupying business premises, and duly received my voting cards as such; and having a private residence in St. George's-road, Eccleston-square, I also there received my voting cards, with a different number, entitling me to vote again, had I been so disposed, for my private residence. The votes for the Strand district were recorded by me at the school-room, Russell-street, Covent-garden, and the votes required by me to be given for the same election were to be recorded at the Pimlico voting-rooms, thus showing that, had I been so disposed, I could have voted twice over for the same candidates.

Another "Fair Voter" writes:—"The defects in the system of voting complained of by "A Fair Voter" in his letter in the Times of Saturday prevailed also in Southwark. I also received voting cards for two different polling-places in the borough, with a different number, being for different properties I have long held in different parishes, and I know of others who received the same. Thinking it could not be right that I should vote twice for the same candidates, I asked a friend well acquainted with the subject, and in consequence voted at the one place and did not go near the other. How many, similarly situated, may have voted twice, in ignorance, there is, I suppose, no means of ascertaining.

CLOSE OF THE POLL.—"Lex" writes:—"What does the 'close of the poll' under the Ballot Act mean? Does it mean—(1) That all voters who are in the room at 4 (or 5) o'clock are entitled to vote? (2) That no voting papers are to be delivered out after these hours? or (3) That no papers are to be put into the ballot box after those hours? I have asked half-a-dozen late 'presiding officers,' but none of them can tell me, and they said they had no instructions thereon when they were appointed. You will see that where, as at Bath, there was only a difference of six votes between the successful and unsuccessful candidates, the meaning of the words 'close of the poll' may make all the difference."

PREPARATIONS FOR POLLING.—Messrs. Knight and Co., of 90, Fleet-street, write:—"May we venture to give you our experience in providing the largest metropolitan constituency with the necessary apparatus for voting by Ballot? We refer to that of Lambeth, which contains upwards of 40,000 registered electors. We submit, and have no doubt that all Returning Officers will endorse our opinion, that for such large constituencies the time allowed between the nomination day and the polling day should be extended. The nomination for Lambeth was held on Saturday, leaving (exclusive of the Sunday) three clear days in which to provide the ballot papers and all other requisite forms of papers for conducting the election. The numbering of the ballot papers alone occupied six of our staff without cessation from Monday noon till Wednesday morning. These, together with stamping instruments and ballot boxes for 78 polling stations, had, of course, to be assorted and distributed to the 78 presiding officers before the opening of the poll on Thursday morning. This could not be completed until a late hour on Wednesday evening, and, after the anxiety and responsibility devolving upon the Returning Officer in reference to this, in settling the situation and preparations of the polling stations, in securing and duly instructing something like 150 responsible men to act as presiding officers and poll clerks, it is no wonder that at the close of the poll he should take some hours' rest, instead of at once superintending the counting of the votes. We are clearly of opinion that, to prevent a repetition of the Hackney collapse, in all constituencies numbering over 25,000 voters a week should intervene between the nomination day and the day of poll."

REGULATIONS UNDER THE BALLOT ACT.—After the election and transmission of the documents to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, it is provided that, unless otherwise directed by an order of the House of Commons or of one of Her Majesty's Superior Courts, he shall cause the same to be destroyed, after being retained for one year. No rejected ballot-paper is to be inspected without such an order as already mentioned, to be granted on evidence that the inspection is necessary for a prosecution in relation to ballot papers, or for the purpose of an election or return, and the power given may be executed by a Judge at Chambers. Further, no person, except by order of the House of Commons, or any tribunal having cognizance of petitions, complaining of undue returns or undue elections, shall open the sealed packet of counterfoils after the same has been once sealed up, or be allowed to inspect any counted ballot paper in the custody of the clerk of the Crown in Chancery; such order to be made subject to conditions; and care is to be taken, in carrying out such order, that the mode in which any particular elector has voted shall not be discovered until it has been proved that he has voted, and his vote, by a competent tribunal, has been declared to be invalid. All documents forwarded by a returning-officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery other than ballot papers and counterfoils shall be open to public inspection at such times and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, with the consent of the Speaker of the House of Commons, and extracts may be furnished on the payment of fees sanctioned by the Treasury. When an order is made for the production by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of any document relating to any specified election, the production by such clerk or his agent, as ordered, shall be conclusive evidence that such document is the one specified, and any endorsement appearing in any packet of ballot papers produced shall be evidence of being such papers as they are by the indorsement stated to be. The production from proper custody of a ballot paper purporting to have been used at any election, and of a counterfoil marked with the same printed number, shall be prima facie evidence that the person who voted by such ballot paper was the person who had affixed to his name the number written on the counterfoil.

Election Petitions.—Arising out of the present general election, it is expected that a number of election petitions will be filed within the time prescribed by the Parliamentary Elections Act which was passed in the year 1868, and continued by subsequent statutes. After the general election in 1868, the number filed in that year was sixty-nine, and five in the following year. By the Ballot Act, which has now been tested by a general election, the offence of "personation" can be added to the charges of bribery, treating, and undue influence. The mode of procedure is by filing a petition in the Rule Office of the Court of Common Pleas, containing the allegations charged. A seat can be claimed or not on the part of an unsuccessful candidate. Before a petition is at issue a recognisance in a sum of £1000 must be lodged, or a sum to that amount deposited in the Bank of England. The next proceeding is to appoint the trial, after which the sitting member can obtain "particulars" of the offences alleged, and within a few days of the trial the names can be procured of the parties implicated in the bribery, &c. The Ballot Act was passed on the 18th July, 1872; it is to continue in force until the 31st December 1880, and no longer, unless Parliament otherwise determine. Several statutes were repealed during the operation of the Act. It was proposed to make it an offence to induce an elector to disclose for whom he voted, but the provision was struck out. In the present election "secrecy" was not observed, and cards were forwarded on behalf of candidates and returned after voting. It will be for consideration in the new Parliament whether amendments are not needed in the statute. By the 24th section of the Ballot Act (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33) it is provided that if on the trial of any election petition any candidate is found by the judge, by himself or his agents, to have been guilty of personation, or to have aided or procured such personation, at an election, such candidate shall be incapable of sitting in Parliament for a county or borough during the Parliament then in existence; and by the following section, on a petition claiming the seat, if it is proved that the candidate or his agents have been guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence, there shall, on a scrutiny of the number of votes, be struck off from the number of votes appearing to have been given to such candidate one vote for every person who voted at such election and is proved to have been so bribed, treated, unduly influenced, or retained or employed for reward. Already notices of election petitions have been given, but up to the present time not one has been filed. A petition must be lodged within a specified period after each election. The Election Petition Judges for the current year are Mr. Justice Mellor, Mr. Justice Grove, and Baron Bramwell.

MAGISTRATES' LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

Justices' Clerks' Fees—Verification of Jury Lists—Overseers' Accounts—Disallowance of Auditor.—A poor law auditor disallowed from overseers' accounts a sum of 4s. 6d. charged to the poor rates for fees paid to a justices' clerk for notices and oath upon verification of the jury lists. These fees were allowed in the table of justices' clerks' fees sanctioned for the county by the Home Secretary under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 30. Held that the overseers' duties in respect of the jury lists under 6 Geo. 4, c. 50, and 25 and 26 Vict. c. 107, were concluded upon the production at petty sessions; that these fees for the subsequent verification were not costs properly incurred by the officers of the parish in preparing and collecting the lists under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 60; that the justices' clerk was not entitled to demand this amount; and that the disallowance was right: (Reg. v. Haslingfield, 29 L.T. Rep. N. S., 801. Q.B.)

Metropolis Commons Act—Right to Renew a Tavern Signpost.—By the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, the respondents are empowered to make a scheme for managing Blackheath, but no right of a profitable or beneficial nature in, over, or affecting the heath shall, except with the consent of the person entitled thereto, be taken away or injuriously affected by any scheme without compensation being made or provided for the same. By a scheme thus made by the respondents, and confirmed by the Metropolitan Commons Supplemental Act 1871, no posts shall be maintained, fixed, or erected on the heath without the consent in writing of the respondents. One clause of the scheme saves to all persons all such rights of a profitable or beneficial nature in, over, or affecting the heath, or any part thereof as they before enjoyed. By the bye laws, made in pursuance of this scheme and the said Acts of Parliament, a penalty is imposed for erecting on the heath, unless with the consent of the respondents in writing, any posts. The appellant, the owner of a tavern fronting the heath, was convicted and fined for erecting a new signpost on the heath opposite the tavern, in place of an old one which had been blown down. The occupiers of this tavern had, for more than forty years as of right, without interruption, and for the more profitable and beneficial occupation of the same, kept erected on and fixed into the soil of the heath at this spot a signpost of this kind, and had from time to time replaced it when desirable. The appellant had no knowledge of the above-mentioned scheme, and had received no compensation for the right to have this post. Held, upon a case stated by the convicting magistrate, that the appellant's right to renew the signpost was a right in, over, or affecting the heath; that it was therefore saved by the scheme; and that the conviction must be quashed: (Hoare v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 804. Q. B.

Appointment of Servant by Board of Guardians—Corporation—Appointment not under Seal—Inferior Servant.—The appointment of a clerk to the master of a workhouse by the guardians of a union must, to bind them, be under the seal of the corporation. A clerk to the master of a workhouse is not such an inferior servant as that his appointment comes within the recognised exceptions to the general rule of law that a corporation can only bind itself by seal. The sanction of the Local Government Board, required by No. 153 of the Poor Law Orders to be given to certain appointments by the guardians of assistants that they think necessary is a sanction of the office, and not of the individual nominated to fill it: (Austin v. The Board of Guardians of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 807. C. P.)

THE LICENSING ACT 1872.

Criminal Responsibility of Licensed Persons for Offences committed in their Absence, by Servants, Agents, &c.

[By Thomas Cousins, Esq., Clerk to the Justices of Portsmouth.]

As a general rule it may be laid down that criminal liability does not arise in the absence of a guilty knowledge or intention. To this rule, however, there are some exceptions, amongst which may be classed the various offences against the licensing laws, committed upon the premises, but in the absence, of persons licensed to sell intoxicating liquors.

There are several decisions bearing upon the subject.

The case of Harrison v. Leaper (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 640) was one under the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), by sect. 50 of which statute, a penalty is imposed for sinking a pit or shaft, or erecting a steam engine, &c., within twenty-five yards from a carriage way, &c. The defendant was the owner of a steam thrashing machine, which he let on hire to a farmer, and sent his servant with it, who superintended it. The machine was erected within a distance of twenty-five yards from the highway; but there was no evidence to show that the defendant directed it to be so erected, and he was not present at the time. Being convicted by justices he appealed, and the Court of Queen's Bench held that the conviction was bad. Cockburn, C.J. said, "The master was not present, and there is nothing to show that the engine was placed in that particular spot by his directions."

The case of Wilson v. Stewart (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 277) involved the liability of a servant in a house of public resort, who harboured prostitutes there in the absence of his master. A metropolitan police magistrate refused to convict the servant as an aider and abettor, on the ground that the mere relationship of master and servant was not enough to justify a conviction. The Court of Queen's Bench upheld the decision, on the ground that in the case stated to them it was not found as a fact that the servant was acting in the management of the house, in his master's absence. Crompton, J., observed, "There is no doubt that a man may be an aider and abettor though he is only in the capacity of a servant, for if, as in this case, the master goes away, and the servant manages the house in his absence, that would do to make him liable."

In Reg. v. Handley (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 827), the decision of the court turned upon the amount of acquiescence by the defendant in the act complained of. The contractor for working a mine had been convicted by justices of allowing females to have charge of the machinery, a tackle by means of which persons were brought up or passed down a vertical shaft of a mine, in contravention of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 99, ss. 8 and 9. The court of quarter sessions, to which an appeal was made by the defendant, confirmed the conviction subject to a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench. It was not found that females were usually employed, or that they were employed upon any other occasion than that which was the subject of the information, or that they were employed with the knowledge of the contractor. It was held by the Court of Queen's Bench that there was not sufficient evidence that the employment of the females was with the knowledge or tacit acquiescence of the defendant to make him responsible, and the conviction was quashed.

In the case of Searle v. Reynolds (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 518), the members of the court came to the conclusion that a conviction should be affirmed, but arrived at that decision on different grounds. The facts were these: By an order of the Privy Council, issued in pursuance of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 107, every owner or occupier of premises in which animals labouring under the cattle plague had been, was to obey any order given by the district inspector as to the cleansing and disinfecting, subject to a penalty of £20 for disobedience. The inspector gave an order to the foreman of the appellant (who was not himself present, and resided at a distance) to disinfect the premises by a certain hour, which order was not obeyed. The justices found as a fact that the order was communicated to the appellant, and convicted him, and the court affirmed the conviction, but, as before stated, on different grounds. Cockburn, C.J. and Shee, J. based their judgments on the ground that knowledge of the order had been brought home to the appellant, without which he would not have been liable. But Mellor, J. was of opinion that it was a case in which the act of the servant was to be considered as an act done in the master's business and within the scope of the authority probably given to him by the master, and that there was no necessity for the mens rea, as it was simply a penalty for "a breach of a sanitary regulation."

The case of Core v. James (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 593) may be noticed in passing. Here it was held that a person could not be convicted under sect. 8 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, for using prohibited mixtures or ingredients in the making of bread for sale, unless there be knowledge, either in himself or in the person employed by him, of the presence of the mixture or ingredient.

The above cases show that at the time of the passing of the Licensing Act 1872, the law relating to the criminal responsibility of masters for offences committed by servants was open to some doubt, and it might therefore have been anticipated that all questions would have been set at rest by that statute. On the contrary, however, the Act further mystified the matter by using the word "knowingly" in some of its penal clauses, and omitting it in others, and by expressly making a licensed person answerable for the acts of his servant in sect. 35, relating to the entry by constables, and by implication in sect. 62 respecting the evidence of a sale of intoxicating liquor.

However, the most logical and reasonable solution of the question, even prior to the recently decided case (Mullins v. Collins), and the opinion very generally acted upon by justices, was that a licensed person was liable for an offence against the licensing laws committed in his house, notwithstanding the act was not brought home to his personal knowledge. It was generally considered to be sufficient if the act constituting the offence was committed with the knowledge, permission, or connivance of his wife, servant, or other person employed in the business. If it were otherwise a licensed person has only to absent himself in order perpetually to evade responsibility. On the other hand, he would not be liable if an offence, gaming for example, were committed by his guests, clandestinely and without his knowledge or that of his servants. The question under discussion is now virtually set at rest by the recent case, Mullins (app.) v. Collins (resp.) (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 838). The appellant, a licensed victualler, was charged under sect. 16 of the Licensing Act 1872, with supplying liquour to a constable on duty, without the authority of the superior officer of such constable. It was proved that the constable was on duty and in uniform, and was served in the appellant's house with some brandy by a female (whether the wife or servant of the appellant was not shown), and that he had no such authority as above-mentioned. The appellant admitted the facts, but contended that before he could be convicted it must be proved that the offence was committed either by himself personally or with his knowledge, and that he must have been present, or the liquor must have been supplied by his express authority. The justices, however, convicted him, and the Court of Queen's Bench supported their decision. Blackburn, J., said that the construction contended for by the appellant would render the Act a dead letter, for any person could escape liability by simply keeping out of the way while his servant was supplying the liquor.

DISCRETIONARY POWER OF FIXING PUNISHMENT IN CRIMINAL CASES.

THE message of Governor Noyes to the Ohio Legislature contains the following suggestions of a reform in the laws with reference to the quantum of punishment in criminal cases:

"Another year's experience in the matter of hearing and deciding applications for pardon has confirmed me in the opinion that the law should be so modified as to leave less discretion with the courts in passing sentence for criminal offences. It often happens that two prisoners work side by side in the penitentiary, both sent there for precisely the same crime, one for one year and the other for ten. In such case it is impossible to convince the convict incarcerated for the longer time that he has been fairly dealt with. And so long as he is stung with a sense of this injustice he is not likely to reform. There is nothing approaching uniformity in the length of sentences pronounced by different judges for similar offences. I earnestly recommend that the criminal law be so changed as to secure more exact justice; so amended as to leave results affecting the lives and liberties of men less dependent upon the judgment, the temperament, or the caprice of those who administer the law."

Undoubtedly, there must in most cases be a discretion reposed somewhere, and within certain prescribed limits, as to the quantum of punishment which a given offence shall carry with it. In some states, as at common law, this discretion resides in the judge; in others it is reposed in the jury. Evidently the policy of the law should be to limit this discretion as much as possible. It would seem worth while to consider whether, in larceny, embezzlement, false pretences, and other like offences affecting property, the punishment might not be gauged more nearly by the value of the property affected by the crime. This might to some extent do away with what is now a reproach to the administration of justice, that the small thieves are punished more severely than the great ones. But in cases of homicide, and assaults to kill, wound or beat, where the defendant frequently acts upon strong provocation or from a principle of self-preservation, and where no two cases stand on the same footing with reference to the quality of the act committed, a provision of law which leaves a large discretion in the court or jury with reference to the quantum of the punishment would seem to be conceived in a spirit of justice and mercy. At all events, the question deserves of more extended investigation and patient thought than the average legislator will find time to bestow upon it; and the wise course would seem to be to submit it to a commission, to report to another session.—Central Law Journal.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PURCHASER FOR VALUE WITHOUT NOTICE—MORTGAGE—TRUSTEE ADVANCING MONEY ON JOINT ACCOUNT—RECONVEYANCE OBTAINED BY FRAUD—ESTOPPEL.—In 1856 H. and C., who were trustees of a certain indenture of settlement, lent £7700 of the trust money to S. upon the security of a mortgage in fee simple of certain hereditaments. C., who was a solicitor, acted on this occasion as solicitor for both S. and the trustees, and took possession of the title deeds on behalf of the trustees. C. and S. had various pecuniary dealings, in respect of which an account current was established between them, and to this account the £7700 was carried, and the interest was paid by C. on behalf of S. to the persons entitled. In 1859 S., concealing the fact of the mortgage, and representing himself as being seised in fee simple, sold part of the mortgaged property for £3080. On this occasion, also, C. acted as solicitor for S., and on the completion of the sale delivered such of the title deeds as related exclusively to the property sold to the purchasers. The purchase-money was paid to C., who gave S. a receipt for the amount signed by him on behalf of himself and co-trustee. In 1870 S. contracted to sell another portion of the mortgaged property to P. for £1500 and on that occasion C. represented to H., who then heard of it for the first time, that S. had then sold part of the mortgaged property for £3080 and had contracted for the sale of another part for £1500, and was desirous of having such parts reconveyed to him upon payment of those sums in part discharge of the mortgage debt. Two deeds were accordingly executed by H. and C., the one being a conveyance by H. and C., by the direction of S., to P., in consideration of £1500, the other a reconveyance to S. in consideration of £3080, of several small portions of the mortgaged property, so as to enable him to convey them to the respective purchasers. At this time S. was aware that C. had misapplied the £3080. P. completed his purchase, paying the £1500 to C., and receiving from him the conveyance, and at the same time the reconveyance was delivered to S. Shortly afterwards C. absconded, taking with him all the deeds relating to the trust. Upon a bill filed by H. against C., S., and the several purchasers, held, that the deed of reconveyance must be delivered up to be cancelled, that an account must be taken of what was due in respect of the mortgage, and that upon the failure of S. or the purchasers (other than P., against whom the bill was dismissed) to pay the amount so found due, the mortgaged premises (other than the part conveyed to P.) must be sold, and that, for the purposes of the sale, the purchasers must produce the title deeds in their respective possessions, and deliver them up to the new purchasers. Secondary evidence of the mortgage deed under the circumstances admitted. The doctrine of estoppel by deed remarked upon: (Heath v. Crealock, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 763. V.C. B.)

LIGHT AND AIR—ANCIENT LIGHTS—EFFECT OF THE PRESCRIPTION ACT (2 & 3 WILL. 4, C. 71)—LATERAL OR OBLIQUE CONSTRUCTION—SCIENTIFIC EVIDENCE.—The Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71) has made a material alteration in the way in which a right to the access of light and air may be acquired, but it has not in any way altered the nature or extent of the right itself. In a suit to restrain an interference with the access of light and air to the plaintiff's house, the question for the court to determine is (just as it was before the passing of the Prescription Act) whether the interference complained of would substantially affect the comfortable occupation and enjoyment of the plaintiff's house, according to the ordinary notions of mankind. The court has power to award damages although the buildings complained of should have been completed before the filing of a bill. A greater amount of evidence is needed to support a material injury by lateral or oblique buildings than that which is necessary where the obstruction to access of light is direct: (The City of London Brewery Company v, Tennant, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 755. Chan.).

WILL — BEQUEST TO AFTERBORN REPUTED CHILDREN—CHILD EN VENTRE SA MÈRE AT DATE OF WILL—BIRTH BEFORE TESTATOR'S DEATH—REPUTATION—PUBLIC POLICY.—A testator, who had gone through the ceremony of marriage with his deceased wife's sister, and had two children by her, by his will directed his trustees to pay the rents and profits of his real and personal estate to M. L. (his deceased wife's sister), for life, and, after her death, to stand possessed of the said estates "upon trust for my reputed children Catherine and Edith, and all other the children which I may have, or be reputed to have by the said M. L. now born, or hereafter to be born," in equal shares as tenants in common. At the date of the will M. L. was enceinte of a child, which was born six months afterwards, in the testator's lifetime, and acknowledged by him as his child. Held (Lord Selborne, L.C., dissentiente), that the afterborn child was entitled to share with her sisters under the gift in the will. Decision of Wickens, V.C., reversed: (Occlestone v. Fullalove, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 785. Chan.)

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—WASTING SECURITIES—ROYALTIES—TENANT FOR LIFE—CONVERSION—Testator gave his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to receive the "rents, dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof," and pay the same to his wife for life, and after her decease to convert the said residuary real and personal estate. The will also contained a proviso that it should be lawful for the trustees during the life of his wife to convert and invest the residuary real and personal estate, the investments to be held both as to capital and income upon the same trusts as the real and personal estate from which they should have arisen. Part of the residuary estate consisted of freehold and leasehold lands, stock and plant, which were formerly occupied and used by the testator and his partner, in trade as quarriers and brick and tile makers, the partnership paying him rent for the lands, stock, and plant, and royalties for the stone raised and bricks and tiles manufactured. Under the articles of partnership the partnership was continued after the testator's death by his former partner and the testator's nephew, further leases being granted and rents and royalties reserved to the executors. Held, that the tenant for life was entitled to the rents and royalties absolutely during her life: (Greaves v. Smith, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 798. V.C. B.)

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—LEGACIES, WHETHER SPECIFIC.—Testator gave to his trustees £700 £3 per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities, "part of a larger sum of like annuities standing in my name," upon trust to pay a weekly sum to J. He also bequeathed various other sums for the benefit of some of his children, designating the sums as "£3 per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities further part of the said larger sum," and bequeathed to others of his children various legacies of "like annuities, further part of such larger sum." The legacies amounted to a sum far beyond the amount of Three per Cent. Consols possessed by the testator at the date of his will and death, but he had at the date of his will and death, besides Three per Cent. Consols, a large amount of "New Three per Cent. Annuities," and "Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities." Held, that the legacies were not specific: (Bumpus v. Bumpus, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800. V.C. B.)

LETTER OF HYPOTHECATION—CONSTRUCTION—WHETHER POLICY OF INSURANCE REPRESENTS GOODS INSURED.—V., a merchant in Bombay, consigned cotton to C. and Co., at Liverpool, per the Aurora, and drew a bill against it on C. and Co., which, before acceptance, was sold to a bank. V. insured the cotton, and deposited the bills of lading and policy with the bank, with a letter of hypothecation, authorising the bank in case that bill or any other bills of his held by the bank should not be accepted or paid, to sell the cotton and recoup themselves. The letter of hypothecation made no mention of the policy. V. shipped cotton on other vessels to W. and Co., and drew bills against it upon W. and Co., which were accepted by them and sold to the bank. The bank, at W. and Co.'s request (for value), deferred presenting their bills for payment at maturity. The ship Aurora with her cargo was burnt at sea, and the bank received from the insurance company the whole amount of the insurance money. C. and Co. failed before their acceptance matured. V. and also W. and Co. failed, and the bills accepted by W. and Co. were not presented to them for payment. Held, first, on the construction of the letter of hypothecation, that the bank had no claim on the policy moneys beyond the amount of C. and Co.'s acceptance, so as to apply the balance towards payment of the bills on W. and Co. Secondly, that independently of that, they had, by agreeing not to present the bills accepted by W. and Co. for their payment at maturity, released the estate of V., the drawer: (Latham v. The Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795. V.C. B.).

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BILLS OF LADING — MATE'S RECEIPT — BROKER'S LIEN—HYPOTHECATION.—C. and Co. were cotton brokers in Bombay, who used to buy and ship cotton for H. and Co., retaining the mate's receipts for the cotton until the payment of their charges. C. and Co. having purchased and shipped for H. and Co. a quantity of cotton, took receipts from the mate in the name of H. and Co., which were indorsed to them by H. and Co. H. and Co. obtained from the captain of the ship, to whom C. and Co. gave no notice of their lien, bills of lading for the cotton which were hypothecated to a firm of bankers who also had no notice of C. and Co.'s claim. Held, that C. and Co.'s lien was gone when they had shipped the cotton; that the bankers' security was not affected, nor the captain chargeable with default: (Hathering v. Laing, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 736. V.C. B.).

COLLISION — SPEED — LIGHTS OBSCURED BY SMOKE—DUTY TO STOP.—It is negligence on the part of a steamer to go at full speed under steam and sail before the wind whilst her smoke is blown over her bows so as to obscure her lights, and to prevent her from seeing and from being seen by other ships approaching from an opposite direction. Where a steamship is approaching another, whose exact course cannot be at once ascertained by reason of her lights being obscured by her own smoke, it is the duty of the former to slacken speed and to wait till that course is ascer-ained before taking any decided step to avoid the other vessel; if before having ascertained the exact course of the other, she, without slackening speed, executes a manœuvre, although appearing to be right at the time, contributes to the collision, she will be to blame: (The Rona, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 781. Priv. Co.)

CHARTER-PARTY—LUMP FREIGHT—LOSS OF PART OF CARGO BY PERILS OF SEA.—A charter-party provided that the ship should load a full cargo at Colombo or Cochin, and proceed to London and there discharge (fire, and all other dangers of the seas, rivers and navigations excepted); "a lump sum freight of £5000 to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House." The cargo having taken fire on the homeward journey, it was found necessary to scuttle the ship in Table Bay, and a large part of the cargo which had been injured by the fire and water was there sold. The voyage was then resumed, and the remainder of the cargo was delivered in London. The charterers having refused to pay the whole of the lump sum of £5000. Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench), that the shipowners were entitled, notwithstanding the non-delivery of the entire cargo, to the payment of the lump sum of £5000.: (Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 809. Ex. Ch.)

COLLISION — PILOT'S DUTIES — SHIP AT ANCHOR—LOOK-OUT— COMPULSORY PILOTAGE. —Where a ship in charge of a licensed pilot is anchored within pilotage waters, the pilot determines and is responsible for the length of cable at which the ship rides, and it is the duty of the pilot, when the ship swings to the tide, to superintend that manœuvre, and to regulate the helm, and it is negligence on his part to go below before the ship is fully swung, leaving the helm amidships without orders as to its regulation; and if, through want of length of cable and of regulation of the helm, the ship sheers and so parts from her anchor in swinging during his absence, the pilot will be alone responsible, provided that the watch on deck take the right manœuvre to counteract the sheering. Semble, that where the look-out has once roported to the pilot or officer of the watch a light on board another ship, and the report has been answered, there is no further duty on the look-out to report that light a second time on nearing the ship. The Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), providing for the pilotage of the river Mersey, and enacting (sect. 139), inter alia, that if the master of any vessel (with certain exceptions), being outward bound, "shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, he shall pay to the pilot who shall first offer himself to pilot the same, the full pilotage rate," as if the pilot had piloted the ship, and, further, that (sect. 138) if a master requires the services of a pilot whilst his ship is lying at anchor in the Mersey, the pilot shall be paid for every day or portion of a day he shall attend, the sum of 5s.; but no such charge shall be made for the day on which such vessel being outward bound, shall leave the river Mersey to commence her voyage," compels a master so proceeding to sea to take a pilot. Where a ship fully equipped and ready for sea leaves one of the Liverpool docks at night, with the intention of proceeding straight to sea, but her master, on getting into the river Mersey, determines, on account of the weather, to anchor for the night, he is proceeding to sea within the meaning of the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Acts 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), sect. 139, and is compelled by that section to take on board a licensed Liverpool pilot on leaving dock; and if the ship break from her anchor during the night, and a collision ensues through the sole negligence of the pilot, the owners are exempted from liability. Semble, that in such circumstances the right of the pilot, under sect. 138, to an extra payment of 5s. a day whilst employed on the ship, at the requirement of the master, during the time she is anchored in the river, except on the day when the ship leaves the Mersey to commence her voyage, does not alter he character of the employment during that time, so as to make it a voluntary employment: (The City of Cambridge, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 816. Adm.)

COUNTY COURTS.

CLERKENWELL COUNTY COURT.

(Before GORDON WHITBREAD, Esq., Judge.)

Thursday, Jan. 29.

TURNER AND TURNER v. GENTLE.

Setting aside judgment obtained by default under County Court Act 1867, s. 2.

THIS was an application by the defendant to set aside a judgment obtained by the plaintiffs under the County Court Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), s. 2, for £17 0s. 5d. debt and costs, and execution issued thereon. The facts were set forth in an affidavit by the defendant, and were substantially admitted by the plaintiff's attorney. The defendant was sued in this court by the plaintiffs for £15 0s. 5d., and the summons being under sect. 2 of the above Act, notice of intention to defend was necessary. Upon receiving the summons the defendant saw one of the plaintiffs and disputed the account, and finally proposed to pay £10 1s. 5d. at a certain date. This agreement was agreed to by the said plaintiff, who promised to abandon the action, and accordingly the defendant (who had still the five days' time) did not give notice of intention to defend, and did not defend the action. The plaintiffs subsequently signed judgment, and issued execution contrary, as the defendant said, to the agreement, and for a larger amount than agreed upon.

Whale appeared for the defendant.

Popham appeared for the plaintiff, and without disputing the affidavit, raised the objection that judgment being given under the above Act, the matter could not be reopened. The County Court Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 80, did not apply, since there had been no hearing or trial.

His HONOUR.—This court has entire control over its own judgments, and therefore, upon good cause shown, I have power to set this judgment aside. His Honour afterwards suggested as a compromise that the plaintiffs should allow part of the money paid into court under the execution to be returned to the defendant, and both parties agreed to this.

LONDON COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Monday, Feb. 9.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Re PEACOCK.

Execution creditor—Executions for sums over and under £50—Subsequent act of bankruptcy—Respective rights of execution creditors and trustees.

IN this case, which had been referred by Mr. Registrar Pepys to the Chief Judge, the liquidating debtor was a licensed victualler. On the 25th Nov. 1873, an execution was levied upon his goods for £191 4s. 6d. On the 1st Dec. 1873, another execution was put in for £37 19s. 6d. by another creditor; on the 12th Dec. another execution by another creditor for £201 13s.; on the same day another execution by another creditor for £148 16s. 6d.; on the 16th Dec. another execution by another creditor (Messrs. Greenless and Son) for £37 15s. 6d.; on the 24th Dec. another execution by another creditor for £22 13s. On the 30th Dec. the debtor filed a petition for liquidation; and on the 22nd Jan. 1874 a trustee was appointed. No sale having taken place under any of the executions, the court was now moved for an order to restrain the execution creditors from selling or otherwise dealing with the goods seized, and a declaration that the goods are the property of the trustee, and that the sheriff should be ordered to withdraw from possession. This was opposed on behalf of Messrs. Greenless and Son.

Shortt (instructed by Fallows and Whitehead), for the trustee, acknowledged that if the execution of Messrs. Greenless and Son, being under £50, had been prior to the execution for £191 4s. 6d., levied on the 25th Nov. 1873, the title of the execution creditor should prevail as against that of the trustee, on the authority of Slater v. Pinder (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 482; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 95), and other cases; but contended that the levy of the previous execution for more than £50 distinguished the present case, and relied on the provisions of sect. 87 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869.

Rose (instructed by H. Smith), on behalf of Messrs. Greenless, relied on Slater v Pinder (ubi sup.) and other cases, which decided that where an execution for less than £50 was levied before an act of bankruptcy was committed, a subsequent act of bankruptcy would not take away the right of the execution creditor; and here no act of bankruptcy had been committed at the time of the levy of Messrs. Greenless' execution, there having been no sale under the prior execution.

The CHIEF JUDGE was of opinion that he was bound by the authority of the cases cited to hold that the rights of the creditors whose executions were for sums under £50, was not affected by the subsequent bankruptcy of the execution debtor before the sale of the goods seized, notwithstanding the levy of a previous execution for a greater amount; and as to them the injunction already granted must be dissolved. As to the creditors whose executions were for over £50, the order and declaration as prayed for on behalf of the trustee would be made.

BATH COUNTY COURT.

Thursday, Jan. 29, 1874.

(Before C. F. D. CAILLARD, Esq., Judge.)

Petition for liquidation—Appointment of receiver—Interim injunction—Refusal of high sheriff to withdraw—Motion to commit for contempt.

J. Horton Dyer, for the receiver.

J. K. Bartrum, for the sheriff.

Dyer, in opening the case, said it had been partially heard before his Honour's deputy, Mr. Lister, some time ago. It was then in the form of an order to commit the high sheriff, but in consequence of his having withdrawn immediately after the order calling upon him to show cause why he should not be committed was issued, it resolved itself into a question of costs. He then proceeded: At the outset I may as well say the sheriff is beyond all possible doubt connected with the acts complained of, because in the affidavits filed on his behalf it is admitted those acts were done by his officers and agents in the course of the execution of the warrants which he gave them. He then read the affidavits filed, which show, first, that of the debtor, that a receiver was appointed by order of the court on the 6th Dec., after his filing his petition; that by an order of the court made on the 6th Dec., W. S. Kirby and his wife and the sheriff of Wilts and his officers, were restrained from proceeding in the matter of an execution levied by them upon the debtor's effects; that a copy of such order sealed with the seal of this court, was served on the 6th Dec. on Samuel Hinder and Charles Hinder, the officers of the sheriff in possession; and he was informed that a like copy was served on Ezekiel Charles Petgrave, the execution creditor's attorney; that the said officers, Samuel Hinder and Charles Hinder, notwithstanding, refused to withdraw from possession, and proceeded in the matter of the execution; that the said Samuel Hinder and Charles Hinder said they should take no notice of the order; that Mr. West Awdry, of Chippenham, the under sheriff, read the order and was asked to direct the officers to withdraw from possession, which he refused to do; that by an order of this court made on the 12th Dec. the said Kirby and his wife, and the sheriff and his officers, were absolutely restrained from proceeding in the said execution until the 31st Dec.; that the debtor thereupon sent for the manager of the sheriff, who called upon him, and the order was handed to him, but he refused to withdraw; that about three o'clock on the 13th Dec. the said Samuel Hinder came to his (the debtor's) hotel and was informed by Charles Hinder of the order that had been made, but he refused to comply, and placed another man in possession. Dyer said that was a distinct proceeding in the execution, and he is proceeding in the execution. He was informed by his wife that Charles Hinder told her he should place another man in the bar to receive the moneys from the customers, and to maintain himself out of the same. On the same affidavit an order was made by the registrar calling upon the sheriff to show cause why he should not be committed, and why such other order as your Honour saw fit should not be made. The matter came before your learned deputy and was partially heard. Mr. Lister adjourned the matter, leave being given to both sides to file further affidavits. The first further affidavit to which I will refer is one by Charles Howse, sworn on the 25th Jan. It shows that the said Samuel Hinder and Cornelius Hinder told him they were the officers of the said sheriff, and had been directed to levy the said sum and costs, and had a warrant given them so to do, which was produced and read to him. They took possession and proceeded with the said execution. He was well acquainted with the said Cornelius Hinder and Samuel Hinder, and knew them to be officers of the sheriff; [the under sheriff admitted that they were]; that Henry Collett duly entered on his office on the 6th December, and duly informed the said Samuel and Cornelius Hinder that he had been appointed receiver, and they were required to withdraw from possession. On the 10th December the said Henry Collett came to the hotel for the express purpose of taking possession thereof. In his (debtor's) presence the officers were informed that Collett had been appointed receiver by the court, and was entitled to possession of such goods and effects. The officers were requested to withdraw, but they refused. A like request had been made on previous occasions. The under sheriff, Mr. West Awdrry, on the 16th December, instructed them to withdraw, which they did. The affidavit of the receiver made on the 28th Jan. was to this effect: That he was duly appointed receiver on the 6th Dec.; that the said Cornelius and Samuel Hinder were then and are officers of the high sheriff, and that they had levied an execution upon the goods of Mr. Howse; that he went to the hotel on the 12th Dec. to take possession, and found them in possession, and proceeding with the execution; that they continued proceeding under the sheriff's warrant until he took proceedings against the sheriff for contempt of court; that he acted bona fide in endeavouring to obtain possession, but was not allowed by the said officer so to do. Your Honour sees that the weight and result of the evidence is this: On the 6th Dec. there was an injunction; that was served personally on the proper person, the man in possession. The first act of contempt with which he treats it is to say distinctly that he takes no notice of it. The agent sees Mr. West Awdry, the direct agent of the sheriff; he read the injunction and was required to withdraw the men, but refused to do so. The second order was treated in the same manner. It was served personally on the man in possession, who said he should take no more notice of it than of the other. Mr. Bradbury was then seen, and he directed the man to remain even after reading the order. That was another step, another proceeding with the execution. Any word spoken by any officer of the high sheriff is an act and a proceeding with the execution if it tends to carry it on. A much more important proceeding was taken on the 13th Dec. Your Honour sees that, after the service of the injunction, that act was actually to place another man in possession. Hinder, the man who makes this affidavit, comes on the 13th, the day after the second injunction has been made. This was a distinct proceeding. On the very day of the first injunction they were told the receiver had been appointed, and that he was the person who should have had possession of the estate. These facts are brought home in the clearest way. They do not deny any of these statements, but confine themselves to saying they did not proceed with the execution. On the 10th Dec. the receiver went himself to take possession.

His HONOUR read from an affidavit to the effect that the receiver had not taken possession.

Dyer.—The receiver says in his affidavit that he went on the 10th to take possession. These men were told he was entitled to possession. Your honour will see that he was entitled to absolute possession of the premises. Now, my friend will say that they remained because they were not asked for possession.

His HONOUR.—Yes; that is what it seems to be. What is the present state of circumstances?

Dyer.—Immediately the registrar issued this order calling upon the sheriff to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt they vanished like a vapour. The following morning Mr. F. West Awdry comes down and says, "I have received this order threatening a committal. You withdraw." This was four days after the second injunction, and one day after notice to show cause. The very next day after that notice, at the earliest possible moment the men are told to withdraw. My friend will say the sheriff and his officers acted bona fide in retaining possession until the receiver came. I take it they put it in that way because the receiver did not sooner distinctly (that is what they allege) come and ask for possession. I have two answers to that. In the first place the receiver says, "I did go, and should have taken possession, but these officers prevented me." In the next place it is apparent from these affidavits that the sheriff had notice over and over again. If it be true they only remained in possession till the receiver came, why was it they withdrew their men when the notice to show cause had been served, but before the receiver came? In Hinder's affidavit he says, "Even when I did withdraw, the receiver was not in possession." It seems to me that single admission cuts away all ground of that kind.

His HONOUR.—The question is what is the restraining order?

Dyer.—The words of the order of the 12th Dec. are that the "sheriff and his officers were absolutely restrained from proceeding in the matter of the said execution until the 31st day of" the same month. It is not for me to contend whether the word "absolutely" is rightly inserted or not, I say it was an injunction of this court. He then cited Ex parte Page (17 Ves. 59); Doria's Bankruptcy, 230-32; Cooper v. Asprey (11 W. R.); Ex parte Rayner, re Johnson, (L. Rep. 7 Ch. 325); Re Davis (Fisher's Digest, 1872, p. 36); General Rules 299, 260, 264; Re Dickenson, (50 LAW TIMES); Ex parte Paine, re Bernardat (14 Sols. Journ., cited Doria 235); Joyce on Injunctions, 1325, etseq.

Bartrum contended that there had been no breach of the injunction, and that the sheriff was bound to remain in possession until he received instructions from the execution creditor to withdraw. If the proceedings in liquidation fell through, what would be his position? Would he not be liable to the execution creditor in any action he might bring? Moreover, the receiver did not demand possession as he ought to have done, and there was no contempt on the part of the sheriff, because he had no knowledge whatever of the matter. He quoted several authorities in support of his contention.

His HONOUR.—I think there has been a breach of the injunction, but not a substantial breach. It was a formal rather than an avowed contempt. No injury whatever has occurred to the creditors, and the sheriff not being personally a party to the breach, I think he must bear his own costs, but all other costs must be paid out of the estate.

MANCHESTER COUNTY COURT.

Wednesday, Feb. 4.

TAYLOR v. BOWKER; Re FIELDING.

Bankruptcy Act 1869—Injunction.

Application for injunction to stay proceedings in a Chancery suit, and for an order for the examination of the plaintiff in that suit before answer filed, under the following circumstances:

T. filed a bill in the Chancery Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster for specific performance of an agreement for sale of certain property by B. Meanwhile, B. had conveyed the property to F., who became bankrupt. F. and his trustee were then made parties to the bill, F. having had notice of T.'s prior claim. F. having conveyed the property to A. T., the latter was also made a party to the bill.

Application was now made on behalf of the trustee in the bankruptcy for an injunction, under the Bankruptcy Act, to restrain the proceedings in the Chancery suit against the defendant F. and his trustee and A. T., they not having filed their answers, and also for an order for the examination of F., the plaintiff in the suit.

Held, on the authority of Ex parte Isaacs (L. Rep. 6 Ch. App. 58), that the injunction could not be granted, but that the order for examination could be made, and it was made accordingly.

S. Taylor and T. A. Hulme, barristers, instructed by Vaughan, for Taylor, the plaintiff in the Chancery Court.

The facts in this case were as follows:—On the 23rd May 1873, Samuel Bowker entered into an agreement with George Taylor for the sale to him of certain property in Manchester, which agreement he refused to carry out. On the 21st July Taylor filed a bill for the specific performance of this agreement in the Chancery Court of the County Palatine. Several interviews between the parties took place in the interval that elapsed from the date of the agreement to the filing of the bill, at nearly all of which George Fielding was present, and took part in all the transactions relating to the purchase. On the 10th July, one of the interviews referred to having taken place on the 30th June, Bowker conveyed the property to Fielding. Attempts were then made to come to an arrangement, and on the 30th Aug. a compromise was agreed to upon certain terms, one of which was that Fielding should convey the property to Taylor. This compromise, however, was not carried out, and on the 29th Sept. Fielding filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement in the Manchester County Court. The bill in Chancery was amended by adding to it the names of Fielding and Trevor, the trustees under the liquidation as defendants, and the bill, as amended, sought a declaration that the property did not pass to the trustee under the liquidation by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869, as Fielding, having had notice of Taylor's prior claim, only held the property as trustee for Taylor. On the 7th Nov., or thereabouts, Fielding conveyed the property to Alfred Turner, for whom Fielding stated in his examination under the liquidation that he had bought it. The bill in Chancery was again amended by adding Turner as a defendant. Fielding the trustee, and Alfred Turner, had not filed their answers in the Chancery suit, and the time for doing so had expired. The registrar had granted an interim injunction to restrain proceedings in the Chancery suit against these defendants till the sitting of the court, and had left the question of examining Taylor to be also decided by the judge. It was contended, on behalf of Fielding's trustee, that the fact of Fielding being within the jurisdiction of the court under his liquidation proceedings gave the court power to grant the injunction asked for, although the other parties to the suit were not included in such proceedings, and that they were entitled to examine Taylor under the Bankruptcy Act, although even granting that such examination was of a fishing nature with regard to the Chancery proceedings.

In support of the motion for the injunction were cited Ex parte Cohen (L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 20); Morley v. White (L. Rep. 8 Ch. 214) On the other side the case of Ex parte Isaacs (L. Rep. 6 Ch. App. 58) was quoted.

His HONOUR held that that was conclusive as to the injunction, and he refused it accordingly.

As to the examination of Taylor it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff in the Chancery suit, that this was an attempt on the part of the defendants in the Chancery suit who had not put in their answers to make a catspaw of the Court of Bankruptcy to evade and override the practice and rules of procedure of the Court of Chancery which will not allow a defendant to interrogate a plaintiff before putting in his answer.

His HONOUR decided in favour of the trustee, and granted an order for the examination in bankrupcy of Taylor, the plaintiff in the Chancery suit.

VOTING FOR GUARDIANS OF THE POOR.—Will you or some of your correspondents be good enough to furnish me through the medium of your paper with answers to the following questions:—First. In calculating the number of votes in the election for guardians of the poor of a parish, are the qualifications which a man has to vote as owner and occupier treated as separate and distinct, and as giving each of them the right of voting according to the respective rateable values? For example, A. is owner of property rated at £150, and occupies property rated at £200; will he be entitled to four votes for his ownership and five for his occupation, viz., altogether nine votes, or will the total rateable value of all property occupied and owned by him be added together, and he be allowed the maximum number of six votes? or B. owns and occupies property of the value of £10 per annum, will he be entitled to one or two votes? Second. Two persons being trustees and executors under a will are on the rate book as A.'s executors, how will they be able to vote? will each have a separate right of voting in respect of one moiety, or must they exercise their power jointly? An early answer to this letter will oblige.

LEGAL NEWS.

MR. MANISTY, Q.C. wishes us to state that he was present at the dinner given to Sir Samuel Martin, on his retirement, by the late and present members of the Northern Circuit.

ATTORNEYS' CERTIFICATES.—By a return just printed it appears that in the year ended the 31st March last, the number of attorneys' certificates in the United Kingdom was 14,053, and the duty charged £92,635.

NEW POLLING DISTRICTS.—As to Middlesex, there are seventeen polling districts comprising the several parishes in this county. In the borough of Marylebone there are twenty polling districts, and ten in Finsbury; in Lambeth three, in Greenwich and Woolwich nineteen, in the city of London twenty districts divided into the wards. In Southwark are six, and in Westminster ten polling districts.

WE regret to state that a telegram has been received at the Colonial Office announcing that the Attorney-General of Jamaica, Mr. Alexander Schalch, died of the yellow fever on Jan. 31. Mr. Schalch, who left England about three years ago, had already acquired a high reputation in the colony for learning, intelligence, and unwearied industry, and his loss will be severely felt, coming as it does close upon the departure of the late Governor.

AN ECCENTRIC ATTORNEY.—Mr. Robert Dover, who resided at Barton-on-the-Heath, in Warwickshire, in the reign of King James the First, and who was much esteemed for his congenial conduct and legal knowledge, instituted an annual meeting for the practice of rustic games. Mr. Dover conducted these pastimes personally, habited in a suit of this King's clothes. Prizes were given, and the spectators attended from various parts. Anthony Wood, the author, stated that these games were continued until the rebellion was commenced by the Presbyterians. In a poem, published A.D. 1836, called Annalia Dulvensia, these games and their patron are described by some of the poets of the day.

RAILROAD LAW.—A Bill is now before Congress for the establishment of a bureau of transportation in the United States of America, similar to the railway board of commissioners which has been appointed in England, under the recent Act of Parliament. The Bill proposes to appoint five commissioners to hold office for five years, who are to enforce all the laws relating to the transportation of freight and passengers over railways. The bureau, by the proposed Bill, are to arrange the rates, if, when charged at the maximum, they yield a dividend of 10 to 15 per cent., estimated from the business of the preceding year; and other useful clauses are contemplated.

THE FIRST PETITION UNDER 36 & 27 VICT. c. 69.—Within the last few days a "summons and plaint" has been issued in the Court of Queen's Bench, in which even the illustrious rank and character of the defendant make the proceeding one worthy of some notice in the press. The plaintiff—or, as we believe we ought to call him, the "suppliant"—is Mr. James O'Grady, a contractor for some repairs to the barracks at Athlone. The defendant is no less a personage than Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen. This is the first time that Her Majesty, or any English Sovereign, has ever referred a claim made against the wearer of the Crown to the adjudication of an Irish court. Up to last session any inhabitant of Ireland who made such a claim could only obtain an adjudication upon it in one of the English courts. This has been the case in all periods of our history. The only mode of obtaining redress in any case in which the Sovereign was concerned was by a "petition of right" addressed to the Sovereign, and stating the grievance of which the subject complained. The Sovereign endorsed on the petition the words, "Let right be done," and with this authority the tribunals proceeded to deal with the complaint as they would do if it were a case between subject and subject. But all these matters were only cognisable in the English courts. No Irish court ever entertained a "petition of right." Even when the grievance complained of originated in Ireland, the petition of right could only be prosecuted in an English court. This state of the law suggests questions of interest in a constitutional point of view. Even when Ireland was a separate kingdom, and after her legislative independence was established, petitions of right from Ireland could only be heard in the English courts, and this continued to be the law up to the 5th of last August, the day upon which Parliament was prorogued. Upon that day, and among the last Acts of the session, Her Majesty gave her assent to a statute under which petitions of right from Ireland are in future to be tried in the Irish courts. The case of Mr. O'Grady supplies a strong illustration of the necessity of the recent statute. As we have already said, Mr. O'Grady was a contractor for some repairs to the barracks at Athlone, and for some claim arising out of that contract he brought an action against Mr. Cardwell, the Secretary at War, with whom, in terms, the contract was made. Mr. Cardwell defended himself by saying that, although the contract was, in terms, made with him, yet he only entered into it as the agent of Her Majesty, and that, therefore, the remedy was not by action against him, but by petition of right against the Queen. The Court of Exchequer (7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 15) ruled that the defence was a good one, and Mr. O'Grady was left without any means of trying his case, unless he could bear the expense of bringing all his witnesses to London, and trying in Westminster whether he was entitled to the payment he claimed in respect of work done in the town of Athlone. The matter attracted considerable attention both in England and Ireland, and one of the English legal periodicals suggested that some Irish member should bring in a Bill to enable the trial of a petition of right to take place in an Irish court. The same course was previously urged in the Irish Law Times, our only legal periodical. Mr. Butt acted on this hint, and prepared and brought in The Petitions of Right (Ireland) Act 1873. With the aid of Sir Colman O'Loghlen, he succeeded in passing it into a law; and under the provisions of that statute, and in accordance with the decision of the Court of Exchequer, Mr. O'Grady will now try in Dublin his action against the War Office under the form of a petition of right against the Queen. It would be impossible in an article like this to review that most interesting portion of legal history and constitutional jurisprudence which is connected with the remedy by petition of right. In old times the remedy was encumbered by forms of procedure which, even when they had become antiquated, it was necessary to observe. In 1860 the late Sir William Bovill succeeded in passing an Act which substituted for these ancient forms a simple and intelligible procedure, which made the remedy against the Sovereign just as accessible to all persons as that against any of her subjects. In the Act passed by Mr. Butt the provisions of Sir William Bovill's Act are adopted, and applied to petitions of right which are prosecuted in Ireland under its provisions. This enactment is one of great importance, both in a practical and constitutional point of view. If other departments thought proper to avail themselves of the precedent established by the War Office in that case, no Government contractor in Ireland could have recovered compensation in any Irish court for any breach of his contract on the part of the officials. His only remedy was by a petition of right against Her Majesty, which could be prosecuted only in the Westminster courts. It is something to have given to every Irish contractor a mode of redress against injustice, which cannot be defeated by a department throwing the legal responsibility on the Queen. One memorable petition of right from Ireland was prosecuted some years ago in the English Court of Queen's Bench. It was that of Mr. Stephen Fox Dickson, who sought to recover from the Queen duties which he alleged had been illegally exacted from the spirit grocers of Ireland. The petition was founded on a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber of Ireland, which decided that the duties exacted were not warranted by law. The officers who had levied them protected themselves by a plea that they had paid them over to the Exchequer. Mr. Dickson's only remedy was by a petition of right in the English courts. Five judges in the English Court of Exchequer Chamber overruled the decision of the Irish court. In future the complaints of Irishmen arising out of Irish transactions will be tried where they ought to—before the Irish tribunals—who are now, strange to say, for the first time empowered to decide upon all Irish cases, without the reservation of any portion of their jurisdiction to the English courts.—Freeman's Journal.

LEGAL EXTRACTS.

THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION AND THE IRISH COUNTY COURTS.

Report on the Application of the Principles recommended by the Judicature Commission to the Irish County Courts, by Mr. CONSTANTINE MOLLOY.

[Read before the Statistical Society of Ireland.]

SUFFICIENT, I think, has now been said to indicate how defective the Irish County Court is as a means for administering ready and efficacious justice between parties of humble means, and how much this tribunal requires, in small cases, that complete and effective jurisdiction possessed by the corresponding tribunal in the sister kingdom. Many legal reforms from time to time, usually applied to the English County, Court, have rendered that tribunal what it now is; but these reforms have not been applied to the Irish tribunal, and hence it is that the Irish County Court, originally established to supply a great public requirement, has been suffered to fall behind in the progress of improvement. This is much to be regretted on many grounds. To repeat what I said four years ago, when bringing the subject of the Irish County Courts under the notice of this society: "The cause of law and government in Ireland has suffered great loss of prestige from the delay that has occurred in the extension to Ireland of the most obvious reforms, till long after they have been introduced in England; and one of the most effectual means of restoring that prestige and imparting confidence in the law, would be found in the prompt carrying out of practical legal reforms, in which large and especially the humbler classes of the people are deeply interested."

The suggested improvement of the County Court raises questions that concern the constitution of the court—first, as regards the judge; and, secondly, as regards the chief administrative officer of the court.

Upon the first of these questions it is right to bear in mind that the institution of the County Courts in Ireland was borrowed from Scotland, where, upwards of a century and a half ago, analogous tribunals were established. The Scotch Court is presided over by a lawyer, whose official name as sheriff is likely to mislead in Ireland, and cause him to be confounded with the officer in this country who bears that title. The Scotch sheriff is the judge of what may be called the Scotch County Court. He has both a civil and criminal jurisdiction; but in trying criminal cases he has not any of the justice of the peace associated with him. He alone is the judge of the court; just like the case of a recorder of a borough in this country.

It has been suggested that with the proposed improvement of the Irish County Court it will be necessary and desirable to prohibit the Irish County Court Judges from practising, and also to oblige them to reside in their counties. In that suggestion I cannot agree, for I fail to perceive the necessity or expediency of making in the constitution of the Irish County Court so great a change. In my humble judgment, such an alteration will not tend to promote the efficiency of the tribunal or secure it public confidence; but may, on the contrary, be attended, I greatly fear, with results the reverse of beneficial.

The same suggestion has been from time to time made as regards the Scotch County Court; and I beg to call attention to this fact, not merely because it fortifies the opinion which I have expressed, but especially because it shows how the proposed alteration in the constitution of the Scotch court was regarded and dealt with in the case of a people who are so keenly alive to their true interests, and who know how so well to promote them.

The commissioners appointed to inquire into the courts of law in Scotland had amongst them such men as Lord Colonsay, Lord Selborne, Lord Moncreiff, the late Mr. Justice Willes, the present Lord Advocate, the Lord Advocate of Mr. Disraeli's Administration, and Mr. Sclater Booth. In their fourth report, made in 1870, these commissioners, when dealing with the subject of the proposed changes in the constitution of the sheriff's court, say:

"The most important general question in regard to the constitution of these courts which we had to consider, was a proposal, by no means new, to prohibit the sheriff from practising before the Supreme Court; to compel him to reside in his county. On this and other proposed changes there was submitted to us a very large body of evidence, which we have considered very anxiously, along with the views of the Law Commission, presided over by Sir Ilay Caulfield, which reported in 1818, and also the report of the Law Commission in 1834. That report, which is signed by very eminent names, including Professor G. J. Bell, Andrew Skene, Robert Jameson, Andrew Rutherford, and Adam Anderson, very elaborately discussed this question, and stated the result of their opinion in the following terms:

"Upon this subject it has been strongly pressed upon us that if resident sheriffs were appointed in all the larger and more populous counties, and if the other districts were enlarged so as to afford full employment to the principal sheriffs, a salary might be attached to the office sufficient to induce men in high practice and repute at the bar to accept of the situation. But, after much consideration, we are unanimously of opinion that this change would be highly prejudicial to the administration of the law in the local courts."

When giving the grounds of their unanimous opinion, the Commissioners of 1818 remarked:

"There is great risk of evil in the provincial residence of a judge, even when persons can be obtained confessedly competent to discharge the duties. An individual in that situation is exposed to all the influences, attachments, prejudices and local feelings disadvantageous to his character and authority, and even if he be supposed free from the operation of such bad influence, the mere circumstance that he has already reached the summit of his ambition, will tend to diminish his industry and utility as a judge, while his remote insulated situation excludes the salutary and counteracting effect of public opinion, by which the exertions of those who fill the highest judicial station are animated and controlled."

"Nor is this mere speculation. We have ascertained it to be a matter of fact that, notwithstanding the well-known talent and integrity of the sheriff's substitute, there is in Scotland a strong feeling of confidence in the decision of a judge who is remote from all local influences, and independently of any superior qualifications for the office. The mere circumstance that the principal sheriff is not resident in the county is considered both by litigants and practitioners as a practical advantage."

"Many of the witnesses examined by us concur in this opinion; but if the feeling thus expressed is less marked than it was in 1834, it must be recollected that our predecessors reported under circumstances to which the Act of 1838 has practically put an end. At that time the practitioners and the public had witnessed before them the evils of an uncontrolled resident sheriff."

The Commissioners of 1834 thus state the conclusion at which they had arrived:

"We are decidedly of opinion, therefore, that such a change in the existing system of the local jurisdiction in Scotland is not only uncalled for, and unlikely to afford any solid advantage which we do not at present possess, but that it would be attended with the most injurious consequences to the administration of justice in our local court."

Following on this report of the Commissioners of 1834, the statute of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 17, was passed in 1838. It contains the following provision in clause 3: "Every person who shall be hereafter appointed to the office of sheriff's depute, shall be an advocate of three years' standing at least, and shall have been at the time of his appointment in practice before, and in political attendance upon the court of session, or acting as sheriff's substitute; and after such appointment every such sheriff, with the exception of the sheriffs of the counties of Edinburgh and Lanark, shall be in habitual attendance upon the said court of session during the sitting thereof."

In 1853 the bill for the Act of that year, which at present regulates the procedure in the sheriff's court, was submitted to a select committee of the House of Commons; and this question in regard to the residence of the sheriff in his county was, we are aware, very fully brought before them, and it was resolved to adhere to the present constitution of those courts :—

"We (the commissioners of 1870) see no reason for disturbing the system thus deliberately and repeatedly approved of. The evidence before us proves that, as regards the functions of the judges, these courts are in thorough working order. Not a trace of the evils alluded to in the report of 1834 is to be found in the testimony of the witnesses we have examined. So complete, although imperceptible and silent, has been the executive control of the sheriffs, that the community have forgotten that there ever was a time when a resident sheriff was suspected of local partiality."

It will be thus seen that the suggestion of making the County Court judges reside in their counties, and cease practising before the Superior Courts, has been repeatedly considered, as regards Scotland, by the eminent men who formed the commissions of 1818 and of 1834; by the Legislature itself in 1838, when the 1st and 2nd of the Queen was passed; again, in 1853, by a select committee of the House of Commons, when the statute which at present regulates the procedure of the Scotch County Court was passed; and finally by the commissioners of 1870. And on each of these occasions we see that the suggestion was strongly disapproved; and in 1838 the Legislature, so far from adopting the suggestion, passed a statute requiring all future appointed County Court judges to be in habitual attendance on the Superior Court during its sittings.

For the proper and effective carrying out of the administrative duties that will arise when jurisdiction in equity is conferred on the Irish County Courts, the judge will require and should have the assistance of an efficient and competent officer to assist him in discharging these duties. To secure this object it will not be necessary to create any new office. It will be only requisite to apply to the office of clerk of the peace the same principles for the regulation of the office as exist in England. In this country the clerk of the peace is registrar by statute of the County Court (14 & 15 Vict. c. 57, s. 10). In England the patronage of those who appoint to the office of registrar of the County Court is restricted by an Act passed in 1846, by which the registrar of the County Court is required to be an attorney of one of the Superior Courts, and be approved of by the Lord Chancellor. The registrar in England is not enabled to appoint a deputy, except in cases of illness or unavoidable absence—and then only an attorney approved of by the judge. Had a similar restriction been adopted in 1851, when the present Irish County Court Act (the Civil Bill Act) was passed, the majority of the present clerks of the peace would all be qualified, as the corresponding officers are in England. It is unnecessary to disturb the existing patronage; it is only necessary to restrict it as in England.

The office of clerk to the Crown has been long since recommended to be consolidated with that of clerk of the peace. For the diminution of crime in Ireland, and the large amount of criminal business disposed of at the quarter sessions, the duties of clerk of the Crown have been very considerably lessened from what they were formerly. As the clerks of the Crown and of the peace are each of them required to keep an office open every day in the county town, there would be a great economy in having only one office, and the consolidation of the two offices would enable the new officer to have an effective assistant to attend in his office, or assist him when the clerk of the Crown and peace would be elsewhere employed, or engaged in one or other of the courts at the assizes.

Both the clerk of the crown and the clerk of the peace are paid upon a novel complicated system. By some statutes they were allowed expenses only; by others they were allowed both expenses and remuneration; some duties are covered by salary, and others are paid for by fees —the latter being of a most complicated nature under numerous statutes. This should all be terminated by the fees being converted into stamps, as has been done in the case of the petty sessions' clerks. The stamps should be under the regulation of the registrar of petty sessions' clerks, who should thenceforward be called the registrar of local court officers—all cases where expenses have been allowed to clerks of the peace, being provided for out of the stamps, and the balance handed over in aid of local rates, upon which salaries and superannuations are charged. This regulation of the office would enable the principle of superannuation, already applied to other county officers, to be extended to clerks of the peace. The consolidation of the offices of clerk of the Crown and clerk of the peace would be accelerated by extending to these cases the principles of superannuation applied in 1866 to the case of case of county treasurers, in order to facilitate the transfer of their duties to the county banks and secretaries of grand juries.

The report of 1870 already referred to, upon the Scotch court, contains a valuable suggestion for consolidating the office of clerk of the commissary court and that of the registrar of the Scotch County Court. The clerkship of the Commissary Court is an office corresponding with our district registrarship of the Probate Court. In order to make the consolidation of the offices of clerk of the peace and clerk of the Crown as effective as possible, and also to secure an adequate salary, without creating unnecessary charges upon the taxpayers, and, further, to provide for more local means of proving wills and obtaining administration in the cases within the jurisdiction of the County Court, I would suggest that whenever the office of a district registrar under the Probate Court should become vacant, the duties of the office should thenceforward be transferred to and discharged by the clerks of the peace in each of the counties included in such district.

In order to effect the improvement of the Irish county courts above recommended, I beg to submit the following summary, or heads of suggestions :

1. That the Irish County Courts should have, as in England, jurisdiction in any case where the title to any land, hereditaments, easement, or licence is in question, provided the value or rent of the land or hereditament in dispute, or affected by the easement or licence, does not exceed £20.

2. That the Irish County Court should have completed jurisdiction in all cases in equity limited in value and amount to the same extent as its probate jurisdiction is now limited—viz., where personalty is affected up to £200, and so far as realty is affected up to £300.

3. That the County Courts of Meath, Kildare, Wicklow, and Dublin, should have the same jurisdiction in probate cases as the other county courts in Ireland.

4. That whenever the office of district registrar becomes vacant, the duties of such office in each county within the district should thenceforward be performed by the clerk of the peace.

5. That the clerk of the peace in the counties of Meath, Kildare, Wicklow, and Dublin, repectively, should perform the duties of a district registrar for these counties.

6. That the Irish County Courts in all maritime counties should have the same jurisdiction in cases of freight and demurrage and Admiralty cases as the English County Court has.

7. That the Irish County Court should have jurisdiction in bankruptcy to the same limit as it now has in cases of wills already referred to.

8. That the rules of law for fusing law and equity, and for giving preference to equitable principles, and all the rules of law enacted and declared by the Judicature Act, 1873, should be in force and have effect in the Irish County Court, so far as the matters to which such rules relate shall be respectively cognisable by such court, to the same extent as such rules will, after the 2nd Nov. 1874, be in force and receive effect in the English County Courts.

9. That the principles of the law enacted by the 1 & 2 Queen, c. 119, requiring the judge of the Scotch County Court, when not discharging the duties of his office, to be in "habitual attendance upon the Superior Courts during their sittings, should be extended to Ireland, and apply to all future County Court judges in this country."

10. That the power of appointing to the office of clerk of the peace should continue as at present, but subject to the same restriction as in England, so that every future clerk of the peace shall be a solicitor approved of by the Lord Chancellor, or one of the existing deputies who has discharged the duties of his office to the satisfaction of the County Court judge.

11. That the right of appointing a deputy by any future clerk of the peace should, as in England, be limited to cases of illness or unavoidable absence, and to a person who may be qualified to be a clerk of the peace, and approved of by the judge.

12. That all fees received by the clerk of the peace should be converted into stamps, and be accounted for with the registrar of petty sessions' clerks, to be thenceforward called the registrar of local officers, and the surplus, after payment of salaries, to be applied in relief of the local taxes.

13. That the salaries of all future clerks of the peace, and of such existing clerks of the peace as submit their emoluments to regulation, shall be fixed by the Lord Lieutenant, who shall also have power to apply the rules of the General Superannuation Act to their superannuation.

14. That in any county where, from its size or other cause, the Lord Lieutenant shall approve of an assistant to the clerk of the peace being employed, the salary and superannuation of such assistant shall be subject to the like regulation, and an assistant shall be provided in every case where the offices of clerk of the Crown and clerk of the peace are consolidated.

LAW SOCIETIES.

BIRMINGHAM LAW SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting was held at the Queen's Hotel, on Friday last; Mr. W. S. Harding (vice-president) in the chair.

The report, which was taken as read, stated that the number of members was 163 as against 160 for the year 1872. The committee had sought to maintain the efficiency of the library by purchasing the principal legal works published during the year, and in addition to the Inclosure Acts referred to in the report of the committee for the year 1872, the committee had now been able to acquire, as they believed, all the local and personal Acts relating to the counties of Warwick, Worcester, and Stafford, from the 1st Geo. 2. to the present time, with a very large collection of canal, railway, and road Acts, affecting the midland counties. The expectation the committee had of being able to commence the liquidation of the large balance due from the society to the honorary treasurer had not been realised, the whole of the income for the year having been absorbed in further additions to the library which it appeared most expedient to make before the publication of the new catalogue, which was now in the hands of members. The number and value of the additions would be seen by a cursory inspection of the catalogue, which had grown from a mere pamphlet into a volume. During the year four examinations had been held in Birmingham, and Mr. C. T. Saunders had supplied the following statistics of the results :—Number of candidates presented, 60; passed, 42; postponed, 7; absent, 11. The report dealt also with the following subjects :—

Supreme Court of Judicature Act.

Your committee do not propose to discuss in detail the provisions of this important measure, which received at their hands in conjunction with the associated law societies, the closest consideration. Mr. W. Evans and Mr. C. T. Saunders, as a deputation from your committee, attended a meeting of deputations from the associated provincial law societies at Manchester, upon the provisions of the Bill, and a sub-committee at such meeting was appointed to bring under the notice of the Lord Chancellor the suggestions then agreed upon, and action in support of the district registries clauses was afterwards taken, upon such clauses being threatened with opposition in the interest of the London practitioners. The beneficial working of this all-important measure will, in the main, depend upon the Rules and Orders now in course of preparation, and with reference to which it is hoped the provincial law societies will be consulted before the same are issued for adoption as a code of practice. Your committee are not unanimous in opinion as to the practical value of the district registry clauses, but they agree that for some time to come large powers of removing proceedings to the London or other registries, at the instance of defendants, must be accorded, to prevent delay, inconvenience, and, in many instances, useless expense.

Land Transfer Bill.

Upon this Bill being issued, its provisions were at once considered by your committee, and an elaborate analysis made by Mr. G. J. Johnson, afterwards enlarged into the paper read by that gentleman at the meeting, in this town, of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, a copy of which paper has been sent to each member of your society. Your committee refer to that paper as containing an exhaustive summary of the principles of the proposed measure, and for such summary the Profession generally are, in the opinion of your committee, much indebted to the author.

Married Women's Property Bills.

These Bills, upon their introduction, received the consideration of your committee, and a report thereon, afterwards embodied into a petition to the Legislature, was prepared by Mr. C. E. Mathews. The provisions of the Act of 1870, if continued, unquestionably require to be supplemented in many respects, to bring the law of husband and wife, as regards property, into a satisfactory condition; but the crude and ill-digested proposals of the last session were far from accomplishing this result, and would have worked an entire revolution in the social and legal relationship of husband and wife; and neither Bill effectually grappled with the serious questions arising upon the Act of 1870 between married people and their creditors.

Tribunals of Commerce.

The Judicature Commissioners having issued a series of questions with reference to the desirability of the establishment of tribunals of commerce, and requested the answers of your committee thereto, your committee unanimously concurred in replying—that it was undesirable to establish tribunals of commerce or any special tribunal for the trial of commercial cases, the reasons for such opinions being that all cases, whether commercial or otherwise, ought to be decided according to law and by the ordinary tribunals, unless the parties by mutual consent choose to substitute an arbitrator with unlimited discretion—in fact, a friendly mediator; and that if the existing tribunals were not competent or convenient tribunals for the decision of commercial questions of any complexity (and it was conceded that in some instances they are not), they conceived the true remedy to be not to create a new or nondescript tribunal, which would combine the defects of a judicial tribunal and a non-judicial arbitrator without the benefits of either, but to improve the procedure of ordinary tribunals.

Legal Education and Law Lectures.

These important questions have received considerable attention from your committee, and they have, after an interview upon the subject with a deputation from the Law Students' Society, sent to the latter society a paper of suggestions for their consideration.

Your committee, while fully admitting the defects in the existing system of legal education, are not prepared to assent to the proposition that the only remedy is to be found in a system of lectures. Law lectures, at the present time, to be of any practical value to students seeking admission on the roll of solicitors, should be of an elementary, tutorial character, rather lessons than professional lectures, and the difficulty of providing competent tutors will readily occur to all; nor must the financial obligations arising upon undertaking such an obligation by the society be overlooked.

The last report of the Liverpool Law Society records a great falling off in the number of subscribers and in the attendance at the law lectures, established there under professors of acknowledged eminence, and the probable necessity of recourse to the guarantee fund to supplement the fees paid by students.

Remuneration by Commission.

A revised scale of charges by commission was submitted to your committee for consideration by the council of the Incorporated Law Society. Your committee approving, as they do, of the principle of charging by commission, urged in reply that action should be taken to obtain legal sanction to the principle before settling the details. This sanction cannot now be long withheld, and your committee are glad to find the scale adopted by them in conjunction with other provincial law societies in such general use, and with, so far as their information goes, satisfaction to the client as well as the practitioner.

Requirement of written Authorisation for Payment of Money to Solicitors.

The attention of your committee has been directed to the lax practice, now so general in this neighbourhood, of paying money to the solicitor concerned without the written authority of the client. This practice, involving such serious responsibility to practitioners, should, we think, be abandoned, and a written authority required and given in all cases, and no question of distrust or doubt should be implied from the requirement. A resolution upon this subject will be submitted to the meeting.

Organisation of the Profession.

The increase of the number of country members of the council of the Incorporated Law Society, under the new charter, was welcomed by your committee as an important point gained in improving the organisation of the Profession; and, with a view to secure a proper representation of the Midland Counties, they caused Mr. C. T. Saunders to be nominated as a candidate for the council, and they report his election thereon.

Your committee while noticing that of all the provincial towns Birmingham has by far the greatest number of practitioners members of the Incorporatad Society, would still urge upon their constituents that as the Incorporated Society is now the recognised centre of the organisation of the Profession. the desirability of further increasing the roll of country members.

Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

The annual meeting of this society was held here on the 21st and 22nd Oct. last, and was well attended. Several papers of considerable importance were read and discussed, and your committee have received from nearly all the visitors acknowledgments of the attention and hospitality shown them.

Mr. G. J. Johnson moved the adoption of the report. He said he did not think it contained anything calling for remark except the question of finance. The fact of the committee coming before them with outstanding liabilities amounting to £635 called for their serious consideration. Every member, however, should understand that the expense incurred had not been unauthorised. It had been contracted in pursuance of a resolution passed at previous annual meetings, and with the full authority of the committee. When the question of extending the library came up they found they must either run into debt or do half the work they wanted to do. The right way of dealing with the matter would be to enter into a subscription for the purpose of liquidating the debt; and with that in view, he would move the following addition to the resolution: "And that this meeting is of opinion that the balance of debt and liability should be forthwith cleared off by a subscription among the members of the society." He reminded them that, with the passing of the Judicature Act, they would all have to go to school again; and, such being the case, more books would be required, so that the library would be more valuable than ever.

Mr. Lewis seconded the motion, which was carried.

A subscription list was handed round among the members present, and donations to the amount of £320 promised towards the liquidation of the library debt.

Mr. Rowley proposed, and Mr. Crompton seconded, that the members of the committee be increased from fifteen to twenty-one, which was carried; and on the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Horton, thanks were voted to the retiring auditors, and Messrs. Jelf and Griffin were appointed auditors for the ensuing year.

Mr. Allen moved: "That in the opinion of this meeting the practice of paying money to the solicitor concerned, without the written authority of his client, should, from the serious responsibilities resulting therefrom to practitioners, be abandoned, and the written authority of the client given and required in every instance without the least idea of doubt or distrust being implied from such requirement." He said the chief difficulty would arise from purchase moneys and mortgage moneys. He had heard that there were practitioners of high respectability who felt that a sort of distrust was thrown upon them when they were asked for the written authority of their clients on occasions when money was paid, and the intention of the resolution was to meet that difficulty.

After some discussion the resolution was amended as follows: "That, in the opinion of this meeting, the practice of paying money to a solicitor concerned, without the written authority of his client, should, from the serious responsibilities resulting therefrom to practitioners, be abandoned, and the written authority of the client given and required in every instance where the receipt of the solicitor himself would not be a legal discharge, without any idea of doubt or distrust being implied from such requirement."

Mr. Lee seconded the motion, and it was carried.

A proposition that the Profession should observe as general holidays the days appointed as bank holidays was withdrawn, several members contending that it would be very inconvenient to close their offices on those days.

The retiring members of the committee were re-elected.

BIRMINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

THE annual dinner of the Birmingham Law Students' Society took place on Wednesday night, the 5th inst., at the Great Western Hotel, Monmouth-street.

Mr. Joshua Williams, Q.C., presided; and amongst those present were—Dr. Sebastian Evans, Messrs. W. H. B. Rosher, Loxdale Warren, F. Williams, C. T. Saunders, Jacob Rowlands, E. L. Tyndall, W. Lowe, E. B. Rawlings, G. H. Hickman, T. H. Gem, T. Spencer, C. Davies, &c.

After dinner the Chairman proposed the health of the Queen, which was duly honoured.

The statement of accounts showed that the receipts for the year amounted to £61 11s.: disbursements, £53 13s. 4d.; showing a balance of receipts in excess of expenditure of £7 7s. 8d. This sum, with the balance in hand at the end of 1872—£13 8s. 6d.—amounted to £20 16s. 2d.; £15 of which has been expended in books.

On the motion of Dr. Evans, seconded by Mr. Rawlings, the report and statement of accounts were unanimously adopted.

The annual report of the committee was then read by the secretary (Mr. W. H. Warlow). The committee congratulated the members on the marked improvement which had taken place in the state of the society, numerically and financially, and on the increasing importance and usefulness of the society. The number of members had increased from 168 honorary members last year to 172 this year, and from fifty-one to sixty-two ordinary members, five of the latter having been admitted, and sixteen new members having been elected. Of those who had passed the first examination, Mr. R. A. Pinsent obtained the distinction of a certificate of merit from the London Incorporated Law Society. There had been twenty ordinary meetings, the attendance at which had doubled itself within the last two years. Legal and jurisprudential subjects had been debated; and lectures had been delivered upon subjects most serviceable to articled clerks by Mr. W. H. B. Rosher and Mr. G. J. Johnson.

The President then proposed, "Prosperity, to the Birmingham Law Students' Society." He believed he was expected to give them a little advice, and also to address them to some extent upon the question of law reform. He was a fellow student of theirs, and he said no man who was worth anything ever ceased to study. (Hear, hear). A man would go on studying to the end of his days if he were worthy the name of a lawyer, therefore he advised them to study on, but let them not work too hard. They had a very long race to run, and it would be well not to run too fast at first. There was another thing which he scarcely needed to remind them of, and that was that a lawyer ought to be an honest man. (Laughter.) It was said by an eminent judge, and he agreed with his Lordship, that a man might be an honest man who was not a lawyer. (Laughter.) He (the Chairman) was quite sure that a man who was not honest did not deserve the name of a lawyer. (Hear, hear.) The man who began by deceiving others generally ended by deceiving himself. (Hear, hear.) As to law reform, he might say that those who were young had the advantage of the older students of the law, because all would have to go to school again. He had been anxious for law reforms for many years, and, according to the best of his opportunities and abilities, in many different ways, he had advocated changes, some of which, he was happy to say, had come to pass, and he hoped that more would come to pass. (Hear, hear.) In many respects nothing could be more unfortunate than our present system, and, he was almost going to say, that almost any change would have been for the better. The system of law and the system of equity were a wonderful anomaly. The most extraordinary part of the thing was that they had equity, which originated in a liberal system, and which was intended to control the harshness and rigidity of the common law, freezing into a system of dry and hard technicalities. (Hear, hear.) Common law, which originated in a system of harsh, dry, hard, rules, was administered in a much more liberal spirit than were the rules of equity, which originated in liberal principles. It was high time that such a state of things should come to an end. (Hear, hear.) What was wanted was a fusion of law and equity, and he would like to see equity administered in the same liberal spirit in which common law was now administered. He would also like to see the same principles of law carried out without the necessity of beginning, as one must now, in one court, and then, if they were wrong, or turned out, having to go to another court. He did not think it desirable that the success of a suitor should be made to depend upon the door through which he entered, as was the case at present. In theory, the doors of the temple of justice were open to all, but in practice it was not so. He thought that in carrying out the reforms contemplated the great principle of the division of labour should not be lost sight of. His opinion was that the law was far too great for any man to be acquainted with the whole of it. He would like to have things arranged so that every man's suit should be relegated to that court which was best qualified to deal with the points involved. He would like to see a mercantile court presided over by a judge thoroughly acquainted with mercantile law—(hear, hear)—and he would like to see the same principle adopted with regard to real property, criminal, and other cases. In conclusion, he said their great aim should be to improve and advance the civilisation of the country—to lead people, as far as they could, to amass wealth; and, having obtained wealth, to take care that they should have the enjoyment of it. The worst thing that could happen to the legal Profession would be a state of communism, when the whole framework of society would be dissolved. He had heard of some wonderful promises made in Birmingham about free land. Being one of the timid class—(laughter)—he feared the time would never come when every man should have as much land as he liked—(laughter). It would be a bad thing for lawyers if all the taxes were paid by those who had property, and all the laws made for those who had none. (Laughter and applause.) He thanked them heartily for the cordial manner in which they had received him. (Applause.)

Mr. H. Johnson responded.

Mr. Saunders proposed "Health and prosperity to the Bench and Bar," to which Mr. Loxdale Warren responded.

Several other toasts followed.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at Clement's Inn Hall on Wednesday, the 11th Feb., Mr. H. H. Crawford in the chair. Mr. Castle opened the subject for the evening's debate, viz., "That the Criminal Law Amendment Act should be abolished." The motion was lost by a majority of eight.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

THE question appointed for discussion on Tuesday evening last was No. CCXXV., Jurisprudential:—Would the establishment of Home Rule in Ireland be beneficial for the United Kingdom? There was a fair attendance of members; Mr. Nicholls presided. After a good debate the question was decided in the negative, by a large majority.

HUDDERSFIELD LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

THE first meeting for the present year took place on Monday evening last at the County Court, Mr. J. W. Piercey in the chair. The subject for discussion was, "Should all disputes between employers and employed, respecting breaches of contract, be tried in the Civil Courts?" Messrs. R. Welsh and E. F. Brook conducted the affirmative and Messrs. G. L. Batley and J. H. Dransfield the negative side of the argument. The question having been thoroughly discussed in its political and social bearings, was decided in the negative by the chairman's casting vote.

LEGAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

AT a meeting of the executive committee, held on the 6th Feb., present Baron Amphlett (in the chair), Mr. Justice Quain, Professor Sheldon Amos, Mr. Westlake, Mr. Freshfield, Mr. Burton, Mr. C. Harrison, jun., and several other members of both branches of the Profession. Baron Amphlett resigned the office of president of the association. Mr. A. G. Marten, Q.C., M.P., and Mr. F. T. Bircham were elected members of the executive committee; and the following members of the association were appointed a sub-committee to consider and report upon the draft of a Bill having for its object the incorporation of a general school of law:—Baron Amphlett, Mr. Justice Quain, Professor Sheldon Amos, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Burton, Mr. Clabon, Mr. Farrer, Mr. Freshfield, Mr. Janson, Mr. Jevons, Mr. Longbourne, Mr. J. C. Mathew, Mr. Ralph Palmer, Mr. Ryland, Mr. Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C., Mr. Westlake, Q.C., Mr. Arthur Williams.

The following circular has been issued:—

Dear Sir,—When the Legal Education Association was formed more than four years ago, contributions to the amount of nearly £1000 were sent in by its supporters; and many of the contributors expressed a wish to make their contributions annual subscriptions.

The executive committee, however, declined to receive at that time any annual subscriptions. They considered that the sum already contributed would be sufficient to meet the expenses of the association for some time, and they thought it desirable to postpone any further appeal for money until it was actually required.

That time has now arrived. During four years the committee have printed the statements, circulars, and reports of the association, the speeches of their president, and the reports of their annual meetings. They have circulated them widely amongst both branches of the Profession, and sent them to the members of both Houses of Parliament. They have distributed forms of petition in favour of the motion, twice brought forward in the House of Commons by the present Lord Chancellor, all over the kingdom.

All this work has been done by the association at a very moderate expense, owing to its having had the use of offices rent free, and to its having been able to dispense with paid assistance.

It will be seen, from the accompanying papers, that steps will probably be taken next session for giving legislative effect to the objects of the association; and the committee consider it desirable that they should be prepared with the funds which will be required to meet the heavy expenses which, on the introduction of a Bill, must be incurred in holding public meetings, and for printing and other similar purposes. They feel that it is only necessary to make known the fact in order to obtain the necessary contributions.

Contributions should be sent to the treasurer of the association, J. M. Clabon, Esq., 21, Great George-street, Westminster, or they may be paid in to the account of the association at the Temple Bar Branch of the London and Westminster Bank.—We are, Dear Sir, yours truly,

RALPH PALMER. WILLIAM A. JEVONS.
ARTHUR J. WILLIAMS. JOHN V. LONGBORNE.
Hon. Secs.

The Law and the Lawyers.

ANY evidence concerning the probable working of district registries is of interest, and we notice in a pamphlet entitled "A Plea for the entire suppression of Patronage" it is stated that "The district registries of the Probate Court cost annually, in salaries, about £41,000, and issue about 18,000 probates, and between 6000 and 7000 administrations. The principal registry costs annually, in salaries, about £41,000, and issues about 10,000 probates, and rather over 5000 administrations." The author adds, "If it can be shown that every grant issued in the country entails a large amount of work in London, then we have an additional argument in favour of the abolition of district registries, and the personnel of the London Probate Registry would in the future bear a still greater reduction."

IT is considered certain that the new Government will ask the House of Commons to postpone the operation of the Judicature Act. We hear also that an effort will be made to restore the jurisdiction of the House of Lords.

WE understand that a special return to the writ has been made by the returning officer for Hackney, acting under the advice of counsel, but, nevertheless, a petition has been filed impugning the return. The better opinion is that Parliament has not parted with all its jurisdiction over the election of its members, and that on the special return being made a new writ may be ordered to issue without the formality of a petition being filed in the Court of Common Pleas for the purpose of obtaining a judicial decision that the election was void. Under present circumstances, ho wever, Parliament will probably leave the matter in the hands of the election petition tribunal.

WE are glad to see that so high an authority as Mr. MCIVER has drawn attention to the extremely unsatisfactory nature of the tribunals which are at present entrusted with inquiries into maritime disasters. In a memorandum recently issued he says: "That the system of courts of inquiry into maritime disasters is so bad that hardly any change could be made for the worse; and therefore that it is high time the question were entrusted to competent legal authority with a view to practical suggestions for improving the mode of procedure in such manner as would be likely to best elicit information, while giving shipmasters reasonable opportunities for defence—which at present is not always the case. There are many instances where substantial injustice has been done to unfortunate shipmasters; and also where the owner has been prejudiced in a court of law by the allegation that his master had been adjudged in default—and that, perhaps, by a tribunal not very competent." We recently pointed out that before these Marine Courts of Inquiry the captain and crew of a ship in collision are not entitled to be professionally represented, and the Board of Trade is really dominus litis, and controls the proceedings in a way which, as Mr. MCIVER says, is apt to be most prejudicial to owners. We thoroughly agree that the ordinary legal tribunals of the country should alone have cognizance of these inquiries.

AN important and interesting paper on some statistics of the courts of justice and of legal procedure in England, was read before the Statistical Society, on Tuesday evening last, by Mr. F. H. JANSON, President of the Incorporated Law Society. It is principally interesting as bearing upon the probable operation of the rules to be framed under the Judicature Act. Mr. JANSON appears to anticipate that these rules when framed will present difficulties of construction and application which will for some time prevent any great increase in the dispatch of business. He mentions, on the authority of one of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the Rules of the Common Law Courts published in 1832, with a view to simplify the system of pleading, and thus to shorten proceedings, rendered it far more technical than before, and it was not until the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act in 1852, that an effectual remedy was applied. We shall have to grapple with a new body of rules evolved from the intelligence of three gentlemen, all of whom are barristers of varied but not large practical experience, and we fear that there is too much reason to expect that there will be a great deal of trouble before the Act works properly. Another important subject dealt with by Mr. JANSON is the judicial power available for the dispatch of the business of the courts. He at once declares that our present staff is not strong enough, and he does not appear to think that the distribution of business under the Judicature Act will diminish the labour of individual Judges, and thus enable them to get through a larger amount of work in the aggregate. He points out that the equity Judges will have more work in taking evidence vivâ voce, whilst the MASTER of the ROLLS will have new duties as an ex officio member of the Court of Appeal. The remedy which Mr. JANSON proposes is that the chief clerks should have nothing to do but administrative business, and that the Judges should work out their own decrees in chambers—sitting in chambers three days a week. "From the limited number of the chief clerks," Mr. JANSON says, "and the multiplicity of matters referred to them, great delays are often experienced in obtaining appointments to proceed. . . . I recollect a case in which I was engaged, one in which expedition was important, where the Chief Clerk, eminent in his class for industry and capacity, was unable to give successive appointments at intervals of less than two months." Mr. JANSON next turned his attention to the proposed tribunals of commerce, or Courts of Conciliation. "The experience of arbitration," he says, "is not favourable to the withdrawal of contentions proceedings from the legal tribunals," and he anticipates that even in the Referees' Courts, under the Judicature Act, "from the courtesy which is always shown to the Bar, and by solicitors to each other, arrangements for meetings will be made to bend largely to suit the convenience of the practitioners, whenever the presiding functionary holds any position short of the dignity of a Judge." Mr. JANSON'S conclusions on the question of delay is that it is owing first to the want of a sufficient judicial staff in the Court of Chancery, and secondly to the occurrence of vacations. He does not see that vacations will necessarily be abridged under the new Act. We agree with him that there ought to be no cessation of legal business throughout the year. It will be seen from the above that important as Mr. JANSON'S paper is for the purpose of enforcing the lessons of practical experience, he states nothing new—for the simple reason that nothing new is to be said. The arrears in our courts are a scandal to the country. No one anticipates that they will be swept away by the new Act, and we trust that the more generous Government which has now entered upon office will see the wisdom of augumenting the judicial strength of the courts, so that the law's delay may cease to be a proverb.

A VERY singular case was heard at Nisi Prius recently in Philadelphia. The headnote of the report appearing in the Legal Intelligencer is this: (1) "A civil action for damages can be maintained against an infant himself for injuries done by him while under the age of seven years. (2) Whether a woman undertaking to perform the duties of a nurse assumes the risk of being injured by the follies of a child, not decided." The defendant, it seems, at the dangerous age of six, assaulted his nurse and knocked an eye out, and she sought to recover from him damages for the injury. So very soberly and very elaborately did "SHARSWOOD, J.," charge the jury, telling them that although a child of such tender years could not have the malus animus to render him liable to criminal proceedings, he was not on that ground exempt from liability in a civil action, "though," said the learned Judge, "of course it enters very materally into the question of the amount of damages to be recovered in the case." An important point raised was whether it must not be an unavoidable conclusion that damage inflicted by a child of six is an inevitable accident. The court thought that it was a question for the jury. "Where," said SHARSWOOD, J., "infants are the actors, that may probably be considered, however, an unavoidable accident, which would not be so considered where the actors are adults; but such a distinction, if it exists at all, does not apply to this case; for if the evidence of the plaintiff be believed, here was a blow voluntarily inflicted by the defendant, and not an accident resulting from mere negligence, which might not be imputable to so young an infant. If this had been an injury arising from negligence, I suppose the law to be very clear that no negligence could be imputed to so young an infant; but this blow, if the testimony of the plaintiff is to be believed, was voluntarily given, and was not the result of negligence, although it may have been and was the mere act of a foolish child, the thoughtless act of a foolish child, ignorant of the consequences." The main question for the jury was, therefore, whether this pugnacious infant struck the blow. A second legal question was, as we have stated, whether the employment was not undertaken with all its risks. Upon this the learned Judge said that there were some analogies in the law which would bear out such a contention, but being unable to find that the question had ever been expressly decided, he expressed his intention to reserve it. We are not furnished with the finding of the jury, and without expressing any opinion upon the merits, we quite agree with the learned Judge that the case is novel and interesting.

Apropos of the strenuous exertions about to be made by the railway interest to obtain the abolition of the passenger duty, it will be well to trace the progress of the duty through the various statutes which affected it. "One halfpenny per mile for every four passengers" was the first tax levied. This was in 1832, by 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 120, which may be said to have consolidated the taxes on locomotion (payable in respect of coaches and post horses long before that period), and which imposed a mileage as well as a licence duty upon "stage carriages." The present duty of five per cent. "upon all sums received" for the conveyance of railway passengers was created in 1842 by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, which at the same time much reduced and simplified the duties on stage carriages. In 1844, by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 9, the duty was taken off in respect of passengers conveyed "at fares not exceeding one penny for each mile by any such cheap train" as that mentined in sect. 6 of the same Act—i.e., a train travelling not less than twelve miles an hour, and taking up and setting down, if required, at every passenger station on the line. The companies claiming exemption under this Act for excursion trains, the exemption was confined in 1863, by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, s. 14, to trains running six days a week. From that time to this the railway passenger duty has remained untouched, whereas the duty on stage carriages, reduced in 1855 by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 78, was finally and entirely abolished in 1869, by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14. Hinc illæ lacrymæ. The London and North-Western Railway Company, which figures for the large sum of £41,428 7s. 6d. paid for "Government duty" in the past half year, requests "the active co-operation of proprietors in impressing upon members of Parliament the injustice of continuing to levy this tax, from which all other carriers are free, upon railway companies." We should imagine that the duty on stage carriages was taken off somewhat for the same reason as that which extinguished the duty on hair powder—because they were so rapidly becoming obsolete as to render the duty no longer worth the trouble of collection. It is because the railway companies are monopolists that so large and exceptional a duty as the passenger duty is in any way justifiable. However, there is, we believe, good authority for saying that all taxes on locomotion are bad, and we think a mileage tax would be better than a percentage on passenger receipts, which presses unequally on different companies, and leads to disputes with the Inland Revenue in respect of third class traffic.

A POINT of bankruptcy law of some importance was before Mr. STONOR, County Court Judge at Wandsworth, on the 12th inst. The debtor, an infant, had been sued in the Superior Court for false imprisonment, and a verdict for more than £300 was recovered. Upon this judgment debt a petition in bankruptcy was presented in the Wandsworth County Court, and the learned Judge adjourned the hearing in order to ascertain whether the debtor had appeared in the action by his next friend, expressing his determination, if the debtor did so appear, to make the adjudication. This raises the question of the liability of an infant to be made a bankrupt. The learned County Court Judge rested his judgment upon Re Smedley (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 432), and Re Purser (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 23). In Smedley's case the petition was by a debtor in gaol for adjudication against himself, and Mr. Serjt. WHEELER held that an infant was within the operation of the Act of 1861. Purser's case also was an adjudication on a debtor's own petition, and Mr. Commissioner WINSLOW relied upon the words of the 86th section of the Act 1861—"Any debtor may petition for adjudication against himself"—as being sufficiently general to include an infant. But a debtor adjudicating himself a bankrupt and being adjudicated a bankrupt on the petition of a creditor are surely two different things. Under the present law a debtor cannot make himself a bankrupt. He may, however, file a petition for liquidation; and we apprehend there can be no doubt that an infant could resort to this process. But can an infant be made a bankrupt? In Maclean v. Dummet (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710) it was held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, after an argument in which Re Smedley was cited, that an infant could not be adjudicated insolvent. In argument in Maclean v. Dummet the present LORD CHANCELLOR said, "That an infant cannot be made a bankrupt has been well settled since Lord HARDWICKE'S time. (See Ex parte Henderson, 4 Ves. 163.) . . . . And it is clear that a commission of bankruptcy against an infant is void, and not voidable merely." The cases cited on the other side were thus dealt with by the Judicial Committee: "These cases proceed on this, that the infant has fraudulently asserted himself to be of age when he was not of age, and that he has, by that fraudulent assertion induced persons to give him credit, and thereby has contracted debts in the trade." The adjudication of insolvency was set aside and annulled with costs. Mr. STONOR has decided that he could adjudicate an infant bankrupt on a creditor's petition upon the authority of two cases which decided that an infant could make himself a bankrupt. They, therefore, only go half way in supporting him in his conclusion, which is met directly by Maclean v. Dummett. The soundness of his decision must therefore be doubted if not positively disputed.

THAT it is not an universal rule that the mens rea is essential to an offence under a penal enactment has been well exemplified by the recent case of Mullins (app.) v. Collins (resp.) (29 T. T. Rep. N. S. 839). By sect. 16 of the Licensing Act "if any licensed person (1) knowingly harbours or knowingly suffers to remain on his premises any constable . . . . or (2) supplies any liquor . . . to any constable on duty," he is liable to a certain penalty. A barmaid of the defendant had supplied liquor to a constable in uniform without the knowledge of the defendant, and the simple point was whether the defendant, contrary to the usual rule, was to be held criminally responsible for the act of his servant. The Court of Queen's Bench has pronounced against the "licensed person," partly because public-house business being carried on so much by the aid of servants, a contrary decision would have rendered the clause practically inoperative, and partly because the word "knowingly," repeated twice in the first sub-section, is omitted in the second. Inference from the actual language used in a statute may often justify a departure from the ordinary rules of construction, but it is not quite easy to see where exceptions determined by a reference to the subject matter are to stop short of making instead of declaring the law. And the argument from the omission of "knowingly" might, perhaps, be met by a reference to sect. 35, which imposes a penalty on "every person who by himself, or by any person in his employ, or acting by his direction or with his consent," refuses to admit a constable demanding entrance; a probable inference being, that the Legislature had before it the question of the criminal responsibility of the master for the servant, and knew how to make provision for it when necessary. We will not, however, go so far as to question the correctness of the decision in Mullins v. Collins, though it would, perhaps, have been more satisfactory if the point had been raised before the Court of Common Pleas, which in the late case of Dickinson v. Fletcher (43 L. J. 25, M. C.) is reported to have laid down that "a mens rea is essential to an offence under a penal enactment, unless a contrary intention appears by express language or necessary inference." We notice that two subsidiary points were raised but not determined in the case. One was, whether it would have been a good defence for the master to prove that he had given an express order to his servant not to admit the constable. We should imagine that Limpus v. The London General Omnibus Company (32 L. J. 34, Ex.) is an authority in point against the master, for in this particular we can see no difference between a civil and a criminal case. The order would have been merely the presumable one to obey the law, and if the master be liable at all, he is liable whether he may have given such an order or not. On the other question, whether the master would have been liable if he could prove that the servant had been tricked into admitting a constable when he had every reason to believe that he was admitting a private person, we can only say that however it might be decided by the court which heard Roberts v. Humphreys (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 483; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 387) it would in all probability be decided in favour of the master by the court which heard Dickinson v. Fletcher. Upon the general question we would remark in conclusion that in Reg. v. Stephens (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 702; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 593) BLACKBURN, J., expressly guarded himself "against it being supposed that the general rule that a principal is not criminally answerable for the act of his agent is infringed," and that it would seem to be highly desirable that the rule when reversed by statute should be reversed in express words.

LIABILITY UNDER THE MINES REGULATION ACT 1872.

THE case of Dickenson v. Fletcher (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 540), is an important case as throwing light upon the penal liability of the owners, agents, and managers of coal and metalliferous mines, under the Mines Regulation Acts, 1872. The colliery offence in that case arose through the non-compliance with one of the rules laid down by the Regulation and Inspection of Mines Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 151), an Act which is repealed, so far as the sections in question go, by the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872.

By the 10th section of the above Act it was provided that certain general rules should be observed in every coal mine by the owner and agent thereof; and among those rules was one providing that, whenever safety lamps were required to be used, they should be first examined and safely locked by a person or persons duly authorised for that purpose. The 22nd section provided that "if through the default of the owner or agent thereof," any of such rules, the provisions of which ought to be observed by the owner and principal agent, or viewer of such mine, be neglected or wilfully violated by any such owner, agent, or viewer, such person shall be liable to a certain penalty. In the case of Dickenson v. Fletcher, the owner of a mine appointed a competent person to examine and lock the safety lamps required for use in the mine, but such person delivered out certain safety lamps to miners for use in the mine unlocked. The question before the court, therefore, was whether the owner was liable to a penalty in respect of the neglect or default of the person whom he appointed, and was entitled to appoint, no accident having occurred. It was contended for the appellants that if, in fact, the lamp was not locked in pursuance of the rule, the owner was liable in virtue of that mere fact, and that it was quite immaterial whether he knew of it, and what amount of precaution he took to prevent it. The general principle that penal consequences only follow a personal act of omission, neglect, or default, was not disputed; but it was contended that the enactment in question carried the case out of the general principle. The court held, not however without considerable doubt on the part of Mr. Justice Brett, that in the absence of any personal default on the part of the owner, he was not liable to a penalty in respect of the act of the person so employed by him. Thus it is seen that, under the Act of 1860, it was necessary for the prosecution to prove some personal default on the part of the owner, agent, or manager of a mine.

This is all changed under the new Acts, which, primâ facie, make the owner, agent, and manager liable for any contravention or non-compliance of their provisions, and throw upon them the burden of proving that they personally have taken all reasonable means of publishing and enforcing its provisions. Thus it is provided by the 15th section of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, that "If any person contravenes or fails to comply with, or permits any person to contravene or fail to comply with, any provision of this Act with respect to the employment of women, girls, &c. . . . he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act; and in case of such contravention or non-compliance by any person whatsoever, the owner, agent, and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he prove that he had taken all reasonable means by publishing, and to the best of his power enforcing the provisions of this Act to prevent such contravention or non-compliance."

A strange distinction is made between this and the corresponding section of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, the reason of which is not very obvious. The words of the two sections are exactly the same, with the exception that the words printed above in italics in sect. 15 are omitted in sect. 8 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act. After laying down general rules to be observed in mines, it is enacted that "Every person who contravenes or does not comply with any of the general rules in this section shall be guilty of an offence against this Act; and in the event of any contravention of or non-compliance with any of the said general rules in the case of any mine to which this Act applies, by any person whomsoever, being proved, the owner, agent, and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the said rules as regulations for the working of the mine, to prevent such contravention or non-compliance."

And as to special rules to be observed in particular mines it is provided by the 52nd section that, "If any person who is bound to observe the special rules established for any mine acts in contravention of or fails to comply with any of such special rules, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and also the owner, agent, and manager of such mine, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the said rules as regulations for the working of the mine, so as to prevent such contravention or non-compliance, shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act."

Similar sections also occur in the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act. From a consideration of these sections it appears that the penal liability of the owners, agents, and managers of mines, practically remains where it was before the passing of the recent Acts, with this exception, that the burden of proof will shift from the shoulders of the prosecutor to those of the prosecuted. A personal omission, neglect, or default on his part will be assumed in the first place, and will have to be rebutted by him.

The real question to be decided is what are to be considered "all reasonable means" of enforcing the provisions of these Acts. This is a question yet to be decided, and Judges will do well, in our opinion, to demand something more than general rebutting evidence on the part of mine owners. If proof of the hanging up in mines of the general and special rules, and of the appointment of agents or managers of ordinary ability and care, is held to be sufficient to relieve mine owners of penal liability, these sections will have done but little towards the protection of the lives of our miners, and the law upon this subject will remain very much as it was before the passing of these Acts, and as it is laid down in Dickenson v. Fletcher.

INDORSEMENTS OF SALES, &c., UPON DEEDS.

IN October last a discussion took place in our "Notes and Queries upon Points of Practice" column, as to the right of a purchaser of a portion of an estate to insist upon a memorandum of his conveyance being indorsed upon the principal title deeds retained by the vendor.

We do not think that a purchaser can insist upon such an indorsement, nor does it appear to us that if he could it would in any manner improve his title. Of course the purchaser must ascertain that the vendor has a right to sell the property, and that the legal estate can be conveyed to him, but if he get a conveyance of the legal estate his title must prevail against that of any person to whom the vendor might subsequently attempt to sell or mortgage the property. A person who purchases under a condition that the vendor shall retain the deeds in consequence of their relating to his unsold property, cannot be considered guilty of gross negligence in leaving the deeds in the vendor's hands, and consequently such person's legal title must prevail.

There are very few properties which can be sold a second time, if we may be allowed to use such an expression, for in most districts the ownership of property is pretty generally known, or can be easily ascertained by inquiry. There are, however, some kinds of property as to which the ownership is not so well known, as, for instance, unripe and unoccupied building land near large towns, and barren land, purchased for the sake of the minerals under it. The writer has himself recently met with a case in which a piece of unoccupied land was conveyed to a person who afterwards conveyed away a small portion of it, and, subsequently, by mistake, sold and conveyed the whole piece to a third person. The fact of the previous conveyance was not discovered for some time, but when it was the matter was fortunately amicably arranged. Such a mistake, which might have been attended with much litigation and serious loss, could have been prevented, had it been incumbent on the first purchaser to have indorsed a memorandum of his conveyance upon the vendor's leading title deeds.

The assignment of a chose in action is incomplete until notice has been given to the debtor or holder of the fund an interest in which is dealt with.

If trustees were careful to annex to the settlement or other trust instrument any notices which might be given to them, or if they never retired nor died, and never forgot the fact of notice having been given to them, the present system might be considered to answer pretty well; but as trustees are but of human material, it often happens that a notice is forgotten or mislaid.

In the recent cases of Phipps v. Lovegrove and Prosser v. Phipps (L. Rep. 16 Eq. 80) it appeared that the beneficiaries had mortgaged their interests in a sum of stock due notice whereof was given to the trustees. In course of time, however, the trustees died, and new trustees were appointed who knew nothing of the mortgage or notice, and not being aware that any dealing had taken place, the new trustees sold out part of the stock, and paid the proceeds to the beneficiaries. The mortgagees filed a bill against the trustees to compel them to refund the money, and in giving his judgment James, L.J. who was then sitting for the late Vice-Chancellor Wickens, said (p. 89), "I am of opinion that the charge against the trustees must fail. It is one of the infirmities which always attach to securities of this kind. It was pressed upon me that if I held this I should be destroying entirely these assignments of equitable interests, that it would be making them wholly valueless if they are liable to be destroyed in this way. Even if that should be the result, still it appears to me it would be far more injurious to hold that trustees could not deal in this way by consent of the only cestui que trust of whom they had notice. But the result which has been represented as so alarming does not follow; because, after all, the trustees of the deed of 1843 (the mortgagees) might have saved themselves all this risk, and all this loss, by the simple process of putting a distringas on the funds; or they might have had an indorsement of their security upon the deed of 1834 (the original settlement), or they might have resorted to the course of filing a bill for the execution of the trusts, and bringing the trusts into court. Therefore, if either of these precautions had been taken the loss could not have happened, and in like cases lenders may have recourse to any of these precautions, if they wish to prevent that happening which of course they are liable to, from the fact that trust funds are liable to changes of trustees, and non-transmission of notice given to one set of trustees to the succeeding set of trustees."

The third suggestion is one which, on account of the attendant expenses, a client would, in the very great majority of cases, neither wish for nor allow, and may therefore be fairly dismissed from consideration. The first and second suggestions are more practicable, but so far as regards the first suggestion, a distringas is not infallible, for the trustees may, in the exercise of their powers, sell out the stock and invest the proceeds upon mortgage; and so far as regards the second suggestion it may be impracticable on account of the funds being held by the trustees of a will who are not also the executors, and therefore have no document in their possession upon which notice could be endorsed. And in cases where trustees of a will, who were not also the executors, had lent the trust funds upon a mortgage security, a purchaser from a beneficiary could not avail himself of either suggestion. In the great majority of cases, however, the trustees have some document relating to the trust upon which an endorsement could be made.

It is the duty of everyone not only to prevent fraud and mistakes, but to do all in his power to prevent the possibility of their happening. Some vendors and some trustees will not allow notices of conveyances and assignments to be endorsed upon the documents in their possession, with the possible result we have above shown. It seems to us that a system by which purchasers and mortgagees were obliged, in order to complete their title (with, of course, exceptions for proper exceptional cases), to endorse upon the leading documents retained by the vendor or trustee, a notice of the conveyance, assignment, or other dealing, and by which vendors and trustees were compelled to allow such endorsements, would prove of service to all persons—to the vendor and purchaser, because the former could thus easily show that he had not previously dealt with the property, and to the purchaser, because he could thus ascertain whether the property purchased by him was the whole of that in respect of which the vendor retained the title deeds, and he could so avoid any possible risk to which he might be liable by allowing the deeds to remain in the vendor's possession after the latter's interest in them had ceased; to persons about to deal with the property, particularly equitable mortgagees, such as bankers, who would thus see at a glance of what their security consisted; to trustees, because their trust deeds and notices would thus be always together, and, as exemplified by the cases decided by the Lord Justice, to persons who, having obtained a proper charge or assignment, run the risk of losing their property through a change of trustees and loss of the notice; and, lastly, to solicitors, particularly those to "vagrant" owners, who could then easily ascertain what dealings had taken place and what stipulations should be made in conditions of sale as to covenants for the production of the deeds.

If some such system were law trustees might not be quite so shy as they now are in replying to inquiries by intending purchasers or mortgagees of equitable interests, and purchasers and mortgagees of reversionary interests would feel themselves placed in a better position than they are at present, for, by reason of forgetfulness or otherwise a trustee may now reply that there is no prior charge, upon which assurance the matter is completed, but upon the distribution it may turn out that the trustee was wrong. It is true in such a case that the trustee and his estate would be responsible for his misstatement, but by reason of his having been dead for years, or of his impecuniosity, or other reasons, the unfortunate purchaser or mortgagee may be practically without a remedy. Even if the purchaser or mortgagee have a remedy it is sometimes difficult to enforce. A trusteeship is an unthankful and unprofitable office, and every possible means should be adopted of freeing trustees from unnecessary exposure to risk.

SEARCHES, INQUIRIES, AND NOTICES.

BEFORE stating what particular searches, inquiries, and notices should be made and given with reference to each particular class of property, we must say a few words upon inquiries and notices generally.

It is a general principle that a purchaser must use due diligence in his inquiries, and that when he has such knowledge as would lead an honest man to make further inquiry and neglects to do so, he will be bound by whatever he could reasonably have been expected to ascertain had such further inquiry been made. The doctrine under which the purchaser is bound is commonly known by the name of constructive notice, as to which Vice-Chancellor Wigram, in Jones v. Smith (11 L. J. Rep., N. S., 83 Eq.), stated that "the cases of constructive notice may be divided into two classes—first, those in which the party charged has had notice that the property in dispute is charged or incumbered in some way, and the court has fixed him with notice of the particular charge; the second class, those in which the court is satisfied from evidence that the party to be charged had dishonestly abstained from inquiry. The proposition of law upon which the former class proceeds is not that the party charged had notice of a fact which in truth related to the subject in dispute, but actual notice of something that would have led him to the fact. The proposition of law as to the second class is not that the party charged had abstained from inquiry incautiously, but for fraudulent purposes."

If a purchaser be aware that a tenant is in possession of the property he will be considered to take, subject to whatever rights and interests such tenant has—for instance, a right of purchasing the property—and both as regards the tenant himself (Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 249), and also as regards the vendor, from whom he is not entitled to compensation: (James v. Lichfield, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 526; L. Rep. 9 Eq. 51). If a purchaser from a tenant in common of property used for the purposes of the partnership is aware of such user, he will be bound by any claim the other partner may have in respect of the partnership (Cavander v. Bulteel, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710). A purchaser, without knowledge, however, will not be affected by the interest of any person other than the tenant in possession (Hanbury v. Lichfield, 3 L. J. Rep. N. S. 49, Ch.); but if he is aware that some person other than the vendor receives the rent he will take subject to such person's interest (Knight v. Bowyer, 26 L. J. Rep. N. S. 769, Ch.). A purchaser from a person who had previously made a post-nuptial and therefore presumptively voidable settlement, should inquire whether it was made in pursuance of an antenuptial agreement (Ferrars v. Cherry, 2 Vern. 384), unless the deed is expressly represented as not affecting the property (Jones v. Smith, ubi sup., and on appeal 12 L. J. Rep. N. S. 381, Eq.), a purchaser with notice of a deed is affected not only with notice of its contents, but also with notice of the contents of all the deeds referred to therein (Davies v. Thomas, 7 L. J. Rep. N. S. 21, Ex. Eq.), so that if such deed contained a reference to an agreement which contained a covenant by the vendor relating to the land, the purchaser would be bound to observe the covenant: (Whatman v. Gibson, 7 L. J. Rep. N. S. 160, Eq.) In Steadman v. Poole (16 L. J. Rep. N. S. 348), a married woman entitled to leaseholds for her separate use without power of anticipation, concurred with her husband in mortgaging them by way of demise to P., who subsequently underlet them to the other defendants, who had no other notice of the interest of the married woman than the circumstance that she was a demising party, and it was held that such circumstance was sufficient to put them upon inquiry as to her interest. A lessee who takes an underlease without making inquiry into his lessor's title will be restrained by the court from committing what would have been a breach of covenant by the original lessee: (Parker v. Whyte, 32 L. J. Rep. N. S. 520.)

A purchaser or mortgagee should always be careful to obtain the title deeds relating to the property or ascertain that they are in proper custody, and that the holder has no claim against the property. If the deeds are not in the possession of the vendor or mortgagor, proper inquiry must be made for them, or the purchaser or mortgagee will be affected with constructive notice of any claim the holder of them may have against the property (Dryden v. Frost, 8 L. J. Rep. N. S. 235, Eq.), but if a bonâ fide inquiry has been made for the deeds and a reasonable excuse given for their non-delivery, a legal purchaser or mortgagee will not be postponed to the claim of a prior equitable mortgagee (Hewitt v. Loosemore, 21 L. J. Rep. N. S. 69, Eq.). If the purchaser or mortgagee leave the deeds, in the vendor or mortgagor's possession, the former may be liable to have his conveyance or security postponed to a subsequent charge or interest created by the latter, but it is necessary that in so leaving the deeds the purchaser or mortgagee should be guilty of gross negligence (Perry-Herrick v. Attwood, 27 L. J. Rep. N. S. 121, Eq.), but the fact of some of the deeds having been left in the hands of the vendor or mortgagor does not necessarily imply gross negligence on the part of the purchaser or mortgagor (Colyer v. Finch, 26 L. J. Rep. N. S. 65, H. L.).

A great objection to the purchaser or mortgagee employing the same solicitor as the vendor or mortgagor is that thereby the purchaser or mortgagee is deemed to have constructive notice of whatever the solicitor knew in relation to the matter. In Espin v. Pemberton (28 L. J. Rep. N.S. 311, Eq.) Lord Chelmsford laid it down that if a person employs a solicitor who either knows or has intimated to him in the course of his employment a fact that is hostile to his interest, he is bound by it, whether the fact is communicated to or is concealed from him; where the mortgagor, however, is a solicitor, and the mortgagee has no other solicitor, it does not follow that the mortgagor is the solicitor to the mortgagee. A solicitor, however, who simply gets the deeds executed, is not the solicitor of the parties so as to bind them with constructive notice of a charge of which he is aware: (Wyllie v. Pollen, 32 L. J. Rep. N. S. 782, Eq.).

THE LAW OF ALLUVION IN ENGLAND AND IN INDIA.

By LAWRENCE BIALE, Barrister-at-Law.

THE law on the subject of alluvion is perhaps one of the most constant branches of the law which the courts of justice in India are called upon to apply, disputed claims to alluvial lands by rival landowners having property on the banks of the great navigable rivers of the country, forming a frequent subject of litigation in the courts. For this reason we propose to discuss the law of alluvion of India, taking into our consideration the law as it was applied: First, prior to Regulation XI of 1825; and, next, as it has been understood since the passing of that Regulation. We shall see when considering the cases decided both before and since the Regulation that the English law of alluvion, derived from the civil law, had been made part of the municipal law of India by the courts previous to the regulation and that the effect of the regulation was merely to embody the same as part of the positive written law of the country. The law of alluvion was thus in no way altered by the Act of 1825, but was only determined and recognised by a written enactment.

Alluvion is defined to be the insensible increase of the earth, made to land by the force of the waters of the sea or a river by a current or by waves. The characteristic of alluvion is that it is imperceptible, so that no one can judge how much is added at each moment of time. In the Code Napoleon (sect. 556) the word is defined thus: "The accumulations and increments which form themselves successively and imperceptibly against the riparian lands of a river or stream, are called alluvion." It appears that the rule of the common law is the same as that of the civil law. The latter is thus translated: "That ground which a river has added to your estate by alluvion becomes your own by the law of nations; and that is said to be alluvion which is added so gradually that no one can judge how much is added in each moment:"(Just. Inst., lib. 2, tit. 1, sect. 20). Fleta writes: "We acquire a right to things according to the law of nations by accession. That which a stream has added to our land by alluvion, for instance, belongs to us by virtue of the same law (Lib. 3, c, 2, sect. 61.) The reason of the indifference on the part of the Crown of England to alluvial soil is said by Blackstone to be, either because de minimis non curat lex, or because owners of land, being often losers by the breaking in of the sea, or being at charges to keep it out, have thus a possible gain as a reciprocal consideration for their charge or loss: (2 Black. Com. 262.) This principle of alluvion, namely that where there is an acquisition of land from the sea or a river by gradual, slow, and imperceptible means, then such acquisition is held to belong to the owner of the adjoining land, was recognised in the great case of Rex v. Lord Yarborough (5 Bligh, N. S. 163), and also in Chapman v. Hoskins (2 Md. Ch. Decis. 485); and the converse of that rule was, in the year 1839, held by the English courts to apply to the case of a similar wearing away of the banks of a navigable river, so that there the owner of the river gained from the land in the same way as the owner of the land had in the above cases gained from the sea: (Re the Hull and Selby Railway, 5 M. & W. 327.) But if the new land be formed suddenly and perceptibly, of course the old line continues to be the boundary between the territory of the Crown or State and that of the adjoining proprietors: (Phear on Rights of Water, p. 43.) The reason why this belongs to the Crown is because, since the sea or navigable rivers belong to the State, the land, when deserted by the sea or rivers, will necessarily continue in the same proprietor. And thus even the accretion of land by alluvion belongs as of right to the Crown, and only as a perquisite to the owner of the land adjacent: (See Hale's De Jure Maris.) It is to be remembered that alluvion or the imperceptible increase of land means the land above ordinary high-water mark; for the land between high and low water mark, though it increase to a vast extent, belongs primâ facie to the Crown. And the shore of the sea, says De Jure Maris, doth primâ facie belong to the King, viz., between ordinary high water and low-water mark. The civil law differs from the common law, as laid down in this great work, in this, that, under the civil law, the waters of the sea and the shores are subject to be used in common by all the people; every person being equally entitled to the benefit to be derived from fishing, drawing, and drying nets, and navigation. They are expressly denominated by Roman jurists res communes, and considered as omnium, in respect to their use and benefit, but in respect to their property as res nullius. By the common law, the waters of the sea, and the shores of the same, are as much subject to public use as by the civil law; but while under the civil law the property of such water, and the shores, is in no one, under the common law, the ownership is in the Sovereign: (See Taylor's Summary of Roman Law, 246; Bract. lib. 3, c. 5, s. 120; 2 Bac. Abr. 177.) And these shores embrace all the land between ordinary high-water and low-water mark. The soil between high and low-water mark may, however, be granted to private individuals or a corporation: (Attorney-General v. Burridge 10 Price Ex. R., 350; Sir John Constable's Case, 16 Vin. Abr. 576.) And any claim to Royal fish between the points where the sea ebbs and flows, must be by prescription, which pre-supposes a grant: (Case of Swans, 7 Rep. 15.) When, however, the Crown conveys to private individuals the legal title to the shore, they become enabled to exercise only such acts of ownership there as the Crown itself could have done and no more; and the proprietary rights acquired are therefore subordinate to the general interests of the public: (See Phear on Rights of Water, p. 46.) While considering the principles of alluvion, we must not forget to notice the doctrine of what has been called "avulsion." Blackstone's definition of avulsion is, where, by the immediate and manifest power of a stream, the soil is taken suddenly from one man's estate and carried to another's; or, again, we might define it as the carrying away of one portion of the bank of a river, and its deposit upon another part of the river side. The owner of such land does not lose his right of soil thereby: (Bract. 221; 2 Black. Com. 202.) The civil law says: "If the impetuosity of a river should sever a part of your estate, and adjoin it to that of your neighbour, it is certain that such part would still continue yours: (Just. lib. 2, tit. 1.) This is consonant with the rule of law which says, in the words of De Jure Maris, p. 15, 'If a subject hath land adjoining the sea, and the violence of the sea swallow it up, but so that yet there be reasonable marks to continue the notice of it; or, though the marks be defaced, yet if by situation and extent of quantity and bounding upon the firm land, the same can be known, or it be by art or industry regained, the subject does not lose his property.' 'If the mark remain or continue, or the extent can reasonably be certain, the case is clear.' And at p. 17, Sir Matthew Hale says: 'But if it be freely left again by the reflux and recess of the sea, the owner may have his land as before, if he can make out where and what it was; for he cannot lose his propriety of the soil, although it for a time becomes part of the sea, and within the admiral's jurisdiction while it so continues.' This principle is one not merely of English law, but is a principle founded in universal law and justice; that is to say, that whoever has land, wherever it is, whatever may be the accident to which it has been exposed, whether it be a vineyard which is covered by lava or ashes from a volcano, or a field covered by the sea or by a river, or a parcel of the soil taken suddenly away from one man's estate, and joined to another's, in each case the ground, the site, the property remains in the original owner. Where, however, there has been an accretion or accession of soil to a person's estate, the primâ facie presumption of law is that such accretion has been made by alluvion and not by avulsion, and the burden is thrown upon the party claiming by avulsion of showing that such soil so joined has been suddenly severed from his own estate and been transferred to such other estate. And the reason of this is clear. A forcible and sudden breaking away of land is an unusual phenomenon, and, therefore, the presumption from nature is, that every accession of land is an alluvion until the contrary is established.

LAW LIBRARY.

WE have received from the office of the City Press a copy of the "City of London" Directory for the present year. We observe that all business changes and removals have been recorded to within a fortnight of publication, and as these are far more numerous at the end of the year than at any other period, this forms an important feature of the work.

PATENT LAW.

COMPLETE SPECIFICATION.

Simpson v. Holliday. 1866.—A patent for "improvements in the preparation of red and purple dyes," thus described the process: "I mix aniline with dry arsenic acid, and allow the mixture to stand for some time, or I accelerate the operation by heating it to, or near to, its boiling point, until it assumes a rich purple colour." It was proved (and not denied by the patentee) that it was necessary to apply heat in order to produce the colour; but evidence was given that a competent workman would apply heat. Held, however, that this description in the specification was bad, and the patent founded thereon was invalid. (13 W. R. 577; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 99; affirmed in the House of Lords, L. Rep. 1 H. L. 315; 35 L. J., N.S., Ch., 811.) Westbury, L.C., hearing the case on appeal from Wood, V.C., in the course of his judgment, said: "If the true construction of the specification be, that two distinct processes are described as being both efficient, and are both claimed as part of the invention, but one is found upon trial to be inefficient and useless, it is plain that the patent has been granted on a false suggestion, and is, therefore, invalid and bad at law. . . . When it is stated that an error in a specification which any workman of ordinary skill and experience would perceive and correct, will not vitiate a patent, it must be understood of errors which appear on the face of the specification, or the drawings it refers to; or which would be at once discovered and corrected in following out the instructions given for any process or manufacture; and the reason is, because such errors cannot possibly mislead. But the proposition is not a correct statement of the law, if applied to errors which are discoverable only by experiment and further inquiry. Neither is the proposition true of an erroneous statement in a specification amounting to a false suggestion, even though the error would be at once observed by a workman possessed of ordinary knowledge of the subject. . . . . With respect to the rules that govern the construction of specifications, they are the ordinary rules for the interpretation of written instruments, having regard especially to the fact that the specification must clearly fulfil the obligation imposed on the patentee by the proviso contained in all letters patent, viz., that the grant shall be void if the patentee shall not particularly describe and ascertain the nature of his invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed. It is therefore made a settled rule, that the specification must be so expressed as to be perfectly intelligible to a workman of ordinary knowledge, and it must follow that if there be any obscurity or ambiguity in the specification which is likely to mislead, this defect ought not to be helped by any refined or secondary interpretation of the language. It was contended before me, and the Vice-Chancellor is reported to have said, that it has been settled by authority that the most liberal construction is to be given to the patent that will sustain it, especially in those cases where the court is satisfied that the invention is really new and useful. If the words, 'the most liberal construction' are intended to denote some principle of interpretation different from the ordinary rules for the construction of written instruments, I am not aware of any such authority."

Parkes v. Stevens. 1869.—The sufficiency of a specification is not a question of law, but a question of fact in each particular case. Where a patentee has taken out a fresh patent for improvements on his original invention it is sufficient if, reading his second specification with the first, an artisan would have no substantial difficulty in ascertaining what was claimed. Sir W. M. James, V.C., in the course of his judgment, said: "It is obvious that a patentee does not comply, as he ought to do, with the condition of his grant, if the improvement is only to be found, like a piece of gold, mixed up with a great quantity of alloy, and if a person desiring to find out what was new and what was claimed as new, would have to get rid of a large portion of the specification by eliminating from it all that was old and common-place, all that was the subject of other patents, or of other improvements, bringing to the subject not only the knowledge of an ordinarily skilled artisan, but of a patent lawyer or agent," (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 358; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 635; judgment affirmed L. Rep. 5 Ch. 36).

Wright v. Hitchcock. 1870.—A patent was taken out for "Improvements in the manufacture of frills or ruffles, and in the machinery or apparatus employed therein." The specification described a process of plaiting fabrics by means of a reciprocating knife in combination with a sewing machine. The first claim was for the general construction, arrangement, and combination of machinery for producing plaited frills or trimmings in a sewing machine; the second was for the application and use of a reciprocating knife for crimping fabrics in a sewing machine; and the third, for the peculiar manufacture of crimped or plaited frills or trimmings "as hereinbefore described" and illustrated by a drawing. Held, first, that the patent was not for the manufactured product, but for the process of manufacturing it; secondly, that the patent was not limited to the manufacture of plaited fabrics by the knife in combination with a sewing machine. The title of the patent being for improvements in the manufacture of frills or ruffles, and the provisional specification describing the invention as relating to a particular manufacture of frills and ruffles, the complete specification described the invention as relating to a particular manufacture of frills, ruffles, or trimmings. Held, that this was no such material variation as to render the patent invalid. Kelly, C.B., said: "A third point made is that there is an inconsistency between the provisional and the final specification, the word 'trimming' not being added in the latter. But by whatever name it is described, the thing is in itself identical; it is something attached to any part of the dress, either of men or women, whether it is called the frill of a sleeve, or the ruffle of a shirt, or the trimming of a lady's dress. These are all ejusdem generis, and the description is only important for the purpose of showing for what purpose the product may be ultimately used when it has been manufactured by means of the plaintiff's invention." Channell, B.—"One of the objections turns on the form of the specification, the final specification going, it is said, beyond the provisional. I do not think it necessary to discuss in general the relation of the provisional and complete specifications. In the view which I take of the circumstances of the case that question does not arise, for there being no proof or suggestion of fraud, I do not think that there is any such extension of the claim in the final specification as disables the plaintiff from claiming this as a good patent." (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 37; 39 L. J. Ex. 97.)

Arnold v. Bradbury. Ch. 1871.—Where a patentee, in his specification, professes to do by machinery what has never been done before by machinery, and describes the machinery by which he does it, his claim is not too large on the face of it, because it claims generally to perform the operation "by machinery." A patentee in his specification described an improved ruffle or frill, and the machinery by which he proposed to make such improved ruffle, and to fasten it to a plain fabric by a single series of stitches. By his claim he claimed "the production by machinery of ruffles, and the simultaneous attachment of them to a plain fabric by a single series of stitches. Held, that the claim was not, on the face of it, too large. (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613; L. Rep. 6 Ch. 706.)

Neilson v. Betts. H. L. 1871.—After a patent has stood inquiry and the test of time, courts do not encourage verbal objections to the form of the specification. (L. Rep. 5 H. L. Cas. 1; 40 L. J. Ch. 317; 19 W. R. 1121.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

IN addition to those solicitors named by us in our last issue as having been elected to serve in Parliament, we have to record the name of Mr. P. E. Eyton, elected for Flint. This gentleman, admitted in Michaelmas Term 1853, has held most of the public appointments in that town usually bestowed upon solicitors, and it may be expected of him that he will be firm in his determination to co-operate with the other solicitors in the House to advance and protect our general interests. In our last issue the name of Mr. G. Goldney, M.P. for Chippenham, was misprinted "Golding."

WE publish in another column the thirty-fifth annual report of the committee of the Manchester Incorporated Law Association for the past year, which was read at a meeting of the members of the association recently held. We are glad to notice its prosperous condition, both in regard to the number of its members and the state of its finances. As may be expected, the first question dealt with in the report is the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, the provisions of which are regarded by the committee as an improvement on the present system; "but," says the report, "the necessity for securing district registries in Lancashire (before the suitors were deprived of the benefits afforded by the Common Pleas at Lancaster), and of granting greater facilities for the trial of causes in Manchester and Liverpool should be urged on the Legislature." We are very glad to notice from the report that combined action was taken by the committee of this association and the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool with a view to extending and improving the district registry clauses so as to provide for the continuance of the Lancashire registries. It seems also that the attention of many other law societies was called to the Bill by means of united action of the Associated Northern Provincial Law Societies after it had passed the Upper House. The disposition thus shown to discuss matters affecting the Profession which it is proposed to deal with by legislation, cannot be too strongly commended, and we congratulate the association on their energy in the matter. Among the other subjects referred to in the report are The Custody of Infants Act (36 Vict. c. 12), The Intestates' Widows and Children Act (36 & 37 Vict. c. 52); the question of professional remuneration, which has attracted the attention of most country societies; the subject of the organisation of the Profession; reference being made to the valuable paper on this subject, read by Mr. Marshall, of Leeds, at Birmingham, in October last; and also to Mr. Saunders's paper on the subject of the amalgamation of the two London societies. The committee direct attention to the Bills of Sale Act as regards trade fixtures, especially referring to the case of Begbie v. Fenwick (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58) upon this subject. The report in many respects proceeds in the same groove as that of the Birmingham Law Society, whose annual report we dealt with last week. It is worthy of observation that Mr. Samuel Unwin has discharged the laborious duties of honorary secretary of this association since 1864. If every member of the Profession would bestow a tithe of the time given by this gentleman in endeavouring to advance the interests of solicitors in a similar way, our position would undoubtedly be far more consistent with the power and influence which, as a body, we undoubtedly possess.

THE office of President of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom is fortunately at present filled by one of the most competent as well as energetic members of our Profession. Mr. F. H. Janson, on Tuesday last, read before the Statistical Society a paper of equal value with others that he has already contributed. The title is, "Some Statistics of the Courts of Justice and of Legal Procedure in England," and the author has appended tables containing valuable information, amongst other things, a return of the proceedings in the Court of Chancery for the year ending 1st November last, and similar returns as regards chamber business. Although Mr. Janson has not supplied any information except that contained in the appendix which is not generally known, yet it is clear, from the exhaustive way in which he has dealt with his subject, that he is thoroughly alive to the great responsibilities which devolve upon him in connection with the office which he fills. One of the most interesting features of the paper, which will, no doubt, be shortly published in extenso by the Statistical Society, is the reference to our own profession, "whose remuneration," says Mr. Janson, "is regulated to some extent by a scale fixed at the beginning of the present century." The author of the paper refers to the power of the judges to strike attorneys off the roll, and wisely suggests that this power might be safely entrusted to the council of the Incorporated Law Society. Although pressure on our space prevents our referring in our present issue to other subjects named in the paper, we hope to do so on a future occasion.

THE Secretary of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland (Mr. J. H. Goddard) has found time, notwithstanding the onerous duties devolving upon him, owing to the unceasing action of the council of that society, to protect and advance the interests of solicitors, to edit a work entitled "Oaths in Chancery (Ireland)," being a very useful guide for commissioners in that court; containing numerous forms of jurats and oaths, together with instructions and observations.

A DUBLIN solicitor informs us that applications by English solicitors to be appointed commissioners for oaths in the Irish courts have been several times lately made without success, with one exception, in the case of a London solicitor, who received such an appointment from the Irish Court of Chancery—while, in fact, there is no utility in such an appointment since the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 44, sect. 81, came into operation, by which English Chancery Commissioners can take Irish Chancery affidavits. Not content with refusing such applications, which as regards common law, and, indeed, all legal business in Ireland, ought, we think, to be granted for the convenience of suitors and others living in England and Wales, and who are, in one way or another, interested in legal business in the Irish courts—the courts actually condemn the unsuccessful applicant in the payment of the costs of those who in their own interest think fit to oppose applications. Moreover the application, even if not opposed, is most formal, as we have pointed out before, and it is necessary to have both counsel and attorney present in open court to support an application which ought—following the mode in which similar commissions are issued by English judges to English applicants—to be granted, as of course where the applicant satisfies the judge that he is fitted, by good reputation and by practical experience, for the office. We say advisedly that much inconvenience and pecuniary loss is occasioned to the public and the Profession in this country by the formal and expensive process required by the antiquated rules still in vogue in Ireland relating to such appointments as those to which we again direct attention. In comparison with larger questions of interest to the Profession, this is no doubt of small import; but that is the very reason why it should only be necessary to direct attention to it in order to insure a speedy rectification. The Irish judges have only to issue fresh rules on the subject and the necessary reform is accomplished.

WE hope that some one or more of the several solicitors returned to Parliament will take steps with a view to the repeal of sect. 37 of 6 & 7 Vict. cap. 73, which prevents solicitors commencing an action for fees till one month after delivery of their bills. To us it is surprising that solicitors should have so long suffered under this now unnecessary imposition. Small bills of costs are constantly lost to the members of the Profession, through their being deprived of the ordinary right enjoyed by all other creditors. In these days the principal operation of the enactment is to open the door for the perpetration of fraud upon our branch of the Profession.

REFERRING to the report of the committee of the Birmingham Law Society, published in our last issue, upon the subject of the "requirement of written authorisation for payment of money to solicitors," their observations will, we feel sure, occasion much surprise to members of the Profession in other parts of the country, not only because in many counties the rule requiring such written authorisation obtains, as a matter of course, but also because of the delicacy evidently felt, at all events by a part of the Profession in Birmingham, in connection with such requirement. Of all business men, solicitors should be the most business-like, and surely it is nothing less than absolutely necessary that such written authorisation should be given and required under such circumstances as those contemplated by the committee. The question of suggested doubt or distrust being implied from such a requirement, ought not in our opinion to have been considered either by the committee or the meeting of the society to whom the report was submitted.

FROM numerous inquiries which we have received we gather that many articled clerks who intend presenting themselves for final examination next Michaelmas Term are in doubt as to whether they will be examined inter alia upon the subject of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act. The Act may or may not then be in operation, probably not. Yet the asking of questions upon it does not depend upon whether it will at the time be in operation, although it may be fairly assumed that no question will be asked upon it if its operation is postponed, the more so as it has not in recent examinations been referred to by the examiners. On the other hand, should such questions be asked, they can only be those to be answered by a careful consideration of the Act itself.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to us upon the subject of the large number of prosecutions conducted principally before magistrates throughout the country by supervisors of excise and other officials connected with the several public departments of the State. The writer urges that these prosecutions ought only to be conducted by members of the legal Profession, who should be appointed to undertake the work. Except for the expense which such a system would occasion we should certainly agree with our correspondent, and no doubt many of the prosecutions which take place ought, in all propriety, to be conducted by professional men.

A DISTINGUISHED member of the higher branch of the Profession, a member of the Commons House of Parliament, calls our attention to the fact that it often happens in Parliamentary business, dealt with before select committees of the House of Parliament, that while one side is represented by a distinguished silk gownsman, the other may be, and often is, represented by those who are not members of the legal Profession. No doubt many Parliamentary agents are not solicitors, and it may be fairly urged that they ought to be. On the other hand, the work undertaken by such agents is of comparatively recent origin, and most of them constitute firms of the highest standing. It is an anomaly similar to that referred to by us in a recent issue as regards agents who conduct the business relating to Indian appeals heard before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

ARBITRATION—AWARD—COMPLAINT — LIMIT OF TIME FOR COMPLAINING—9 & 10 WILL. 3, C. 15, S. 2.—The last day of term is not within the limit of the time fixed by 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, s. 2, for making complaint of corrupt or undue practice in making an award on an arbitration. Complaint is made on the day on which notice of motion to set aside the award is served. Harvey v. Shelton (7 Bed. 455), not followed: (Corporation of Huddersfield and Jacomb, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 824. V.C. M.)

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT 1855, S. 2—PETITION FOR LIQUIDATION PENDING REFERENCE. — Money paid into court under the Bills of Exchange Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 67), pursuant to a judge's order "to abide the event" of an action then pending, forms no part of the debtor's estate, but is a security to the creditor for the payment of the amount recoverable in the action, notwithstanding that the matters in dispute in the action have been referred, and bankruptcy supervened before any proceedings are taken in the matter of the arbitration: (Ex parte Tate and Co; re Keyworth, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 849. Bank.)

COMPROMISE OF ACTION FOR CAUSING DEATH BY NEGLIGENCE—ACTION FOR NOT APPORTIONING DAMAGES—9 & 10 VICT. C. 93; 27 & 28 VICT. C. 95.—The declaration alleged that defendant had brought an action as administrator of the plaintiff's mother, whose death was caused by the negligence of a railway company, against the railway company, for the benefit of himself and the plaintiff, according to 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93; that defendant, under 27 & 28 Vict. c. 95, compromised the action for a lump sum of money, without any apportionment by a jury of the amount of damages payable to the plaintiff in respect of his interest; and that defendant received the whole of the said sum, and retained it to his own use. Defendant pleaded that he, being plaintiff's father, had sued the said railway company in two actions, one for causing injury to himself, and the other under the statute mentioned in the declaration on behalf of himself, the plaintiff, and another child of defendant; the judgment in both actions was obtained in default of plea, that he compromised the said actions for the amount mentioned under a judge's order, in good faith, and believing the terms of the compromise to be the best he could obtain; and that no division or apportionment of the said money was ever required or made: Held, that under the circumstances stated in the plea, no action was maintainable at law: (Condliff v. Condliff, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 831. Q. B.).

COVENANT BY TWO PARTIES, TO BE PERFORMED ON NOTICE—NOTICE TO ONE ONLY INSUFFICIENT.—The defendant and F. M. covenanted with the plaintiffs that they would, upon receiving six months' notice in writing, pay to the plaintiffs two several sums of money. Notice to pay one of the sums was given to the defendant only. Held, that the notice ought to have been given to both the covenanting parties, and that a notice to the defendant only was insufficient: (Moul v. Moul, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 844. Ex.)

INFANT—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID UNDER PARTNERSHIP AGREEMENT — RESCISSION OF AGREEMENT BEFORE MAJORITY—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.—The plaintiff, during infancy, agreed with the defendant in writing to buy one half share of a public-house business of the defendant, agreeing to pay an instalment of the purchase-money at once, and the balance at a future uncertain time, the defendant to provide board and lodging for the plaintiff and his wife, and the plaintiff not to receive any fruits of the partnership until the balance should be paid. The plaintiff paid an instalment of the purchase-money, and went with his wife to board and lodge with the defendant, and shared the management of the business, but afterwards, and before his majority, rescinded the agreement. Held, that the plaintiff might, in an action for money had and received, recover back the instalment paid under the agreement, less the amount expended by the defendant in providing board and lodging for the plaintiff and his wife: (Everett v. Wilkins, 29 L. RULES OF PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE UNDER THE JUDICATURE ACT.

THE following is a report of the discussion which followed Mr. Dowdeswell's paper which we published last week:

Mr. E. Kimber thought that Mr. Dowdeswell was entitled to the gratitude of each branch of the Profession for the way in which he had handled this subject. They were informed that three gentlemen were now engaged in framing rules. But he (Mr. Kimber) thought it was only by the combined expression of the opinions of the Profession that any public good could be accomplished in this direction. It seemed to him to be absurd to suppose that any three gentlemen could do justice to the subject without some communication with the members of the Profession and the societies. Such a work, to be effectually done, would be a very serious tax upon their time and health. In the question of notices, he quite agreed with the writer of the paper, and thought that in the simple delivery of the notices there was security enough. For instance, the present "notice to plead" at common law was one of the strongest proceedings that could possibly be taken. It was given under the hand of the plaintiff's attorney, without any filing or proof of service being necessary, and yet, if no plea came in within eight days, judgment could be signed, and execution issued forthwith. The security against the misuse of this gigantic but simple power is the responsibility of the attorneys on both sides. For, if judgment and execution took place without such notice, the plaintiff would be liable to an action for damages by the defendant, and he, again, would have his remedy against the attorney. Besides that, the judge would immediately set aside such judgment, with costs against the attorney, to be paid personally, as an officer of the court. The consequence is, such a thing as the misuse of this process is never heard of. He could not conceive why all the forms of procedure could not be governed analogously by the same form. The notices to admit and to produce he looked upon as very useful, and as proofs that no filing or issuing were in any way necessary for the most responsible proceedings. All these things proved that there was no necessity for filing or issuing even a writ, or entering an appearance, but certainly not affidavits. As solicitors were responsible officers of the court, a claim or summons, under their signature, and a notice of defence, was all that was necessary. In nine cases out of ten, the original summonses and office copies were never asked for. The court even often relied upon copies in counsel's briefs. It was done every day. Why, therefore, cannot the Profession be made completely responsible to one another for the proper conduct of business? In motions the common law practice might take a leaf out of that of equity. It was a monstrous thing to allow a man to make a public ex parte application, it might be against persons of eminence and unimpeachable character, simply for the purpose of libelling and injuring their reputation; for even when the application was refused, the object in view was gained. Supposing such a thing were allowed in the Chancery Court, every one would loathe the administration of justice.

Mr. E. C. Dunn thought that the object of requiring an appearance to be entered in a public office seemed to have been rather lost sight of by the last speaker. The appearance gave notice that the proceeding was defended, and of the place where notices not requiring personal service were to be served; and it surely was useful that it should be entered, so as to be of record, and where a person who might have to make application in a proceeding could discover whom he would have to serve with notice of his application, and at what place. It was also necessary that summonses should be issued from the judges' chambers. It would never do to allow the parties to fix, without any reference to the state of the business at the chambers, any time they pleased for their attendance there. It was necessary that the person making the application should know when it could be heard. This was attained by the attendance to issue the summonses, and the summons itself was the notice to be served on the other parties to the proceeding, of the appointment which had been given by the judge.

Mr. Edgar thought it must be admitted that, where actions were defended, there were very considerable advantages in the entering of appearances. The effect of the introductory part of the 18th Rule appeared to him to be that, where the defendant admitted the claim and did not require the delivery of the statement, it was open to him to make a statement of defence, the nature of the claim of the plaintiff being disclosed in the writ of summons. He agreed with the observations that had been made, that the filing of so many things was entirely unnecessary. But it was obvious there was no option for the framers in the matter of the statements of claim and defence under the 18th rule. There would be under the Act two sets of rules—one framed before the Act came into force, and those which it would be in the power of the judges to frame when this took place. They had the power given them by the Act to modify the rules, and in that way they might alter the rules in the schedule, and dispense with filing in the case of claims and defences. To his mind it would be better to assign all merely legal claims to the jurisdiction of the three Common Law Divisions, rather than, as the Act does, to leave it open to plaintiffs to take them into the Chancery Division. It was advisable to make as little disturbance as possible in the existing system. He quite agreed that the great power given to the judges to modify the whole system of procedure ought to be carefully watched; but he thought its results were likely to be beneficial. There would be some difficulties at first in the working of the Act, and it was a great thing that the power of remedying any defects which experience disclosed should be vested in the judges, without the necessity of going to Parliament for amending Acts.

Mr. A. E. Miller, Q.C., thought there were advantages in filing both pleadings and affidavits. The Registrar's Book in Chancery had been found to be extremely important when questions as to the effect of proceedings had arisen at a subsequent period. He could not think that any hardship was inflicted by requiring the deposit of one copy of every pleading in a public office—its cost was inappreciable. The filing of affidavits was of great consequence in some cases. It obviated the necessity of hunting up solicitors in cases which had been settled, and information sought was by this means ready at hand. He was quite of the opinion that in most cases office copies were of no use; but he had occasionally found great discrepancies between the affidavits of two opposing counsel, and in this case the office copy was of use, as the only umpire. But generally the opposing sides had copies which could be trusted. In regard to the divisions for business, and matters in the nature of concurrent jurisdiction, the first proposals had been somewhat modified in passing through parliament. The object kept in view had been fusion and not division. There would be at first a difficulty in getting cases in the common law division, and also in getting the Judges to act out of the way in which they have been accustomed to act. If there were hard and fast dividing lines of jurisdiction, there would be no power of making a selection of the division, according to special circumstances. The more it was left open to parties to choose the division into which they might see fit to take their cases, the better. He quite thought it was a great hardship on the plaintiff that he could not get discovery from his opponent at law, except under certain conditions. On the other hand, the proceedings in equity were often very oppressive to defendants, as plaintiffs unnecessarily resorted to this most expensive way of getting admissions from the opposing side, which were often so qualified as to be useless. The schedule to the Act hit this difficulty, and he believed in the best way. A man by this could file his interrogatories, requiring most minute details from the defendant, as to every point he alleged, but if the court thought his conduct vexatious, he might be made to pay the costs, even though he succeeded in the suit.

Mr. J. Sewell White expressed his concurrence in Mr. Dowdeswell's views as to the principles which should guide the framers of the rules under the new Act. He thought there should also be ample provision for amending the proceedings at any stage of the cause, and for adjourning its further hearing on reasonable terms, where such a course was necessary to prevent the surprises which a liberal exercise of the power of amendment might sometimes occasion. He did not agree with a former speaker that an entry of appearance by a defendant was a superfluous step. It was an indisputable notice of an important act. Neither did he agree with the statement that the filing of affidavits was unnecessary. It pinned the depositions to the order of the court, and prevented a misuse of them, which might easily be made if a laxer practice prevailed. As to model pleadings and forms, he believed they were generally disregarded by the draftsmen. Such was his experience of the forms published in the Pleading Rules of 1845, the Rules for Claims in Equity, and the Indian Code of Civil Procedure. He hoped that under the new rules common counts and general forms would disappear, and that, whilst ample opportunity was allowed to either party to examine his opponent before the hearing by interrogatories on the material points of dispute between them, the practice of interrogating a party upon a written statement of the case drawn up by his opponent would be put an end to. As to ejectment suits, he thought there would be no greater difficulty in dealing with them under the new rules than with other suits, and he should have liked to have heard from Mr. Dowdeswell the precise nature of the difficulties which he appeared to apprehend.

Mr. Thomas Webster, Q.C., regarded the Act under discussion as the greatest step that had yet been taken in law reform. The divisions of the suits as suggested, according to some arbitrary and hard-and-fast rule, would have been entirely fatal to the measure. Each court should work out its own proceedings, and there should be no power of transference to another court. The client having selected his tribunal, with which choice there should be no interference, ought to have his whole case disposed of by the tribunal so selected. The first step should be the statement of the claim, whether a writ or action. A man should not be allowed to go into court without some distinct statement of his claim, and be able to make one claim one day and another on a succeeding one; he should not be able to shift his ground. A succinct statement of the claim should be put into writing, and by this the plaintiff should be bound. That he could shift his ground would be a scandal. He (Mr. Webster) thought it was necessary to have the proceedings filed. The first plaint and the answer should be on record. This he conceived to belong to the first principles of the administration of justice; and in regard to printing, it might be laid down as a general rule that when six copies were required, printing was cheaper than writing. If there were affidavits, they ought to be filed as a record of what was stated. The entering of an appearance must be done in some matters, either to confess the action or to defend; there could be no difficulty from that source. He did not share in the opinion expressed by a former speaker, that the framing of rules of procedure would be beyond the capacity of three gentlemen of sense and experience. The existing precedents need not be wholly disregarded; a change similar to the one we were considering had been in existence for some time in New York, and was found to be a vast improvement upon the old system, that the Hon. David Dudley Field, in reply to a question from the chairman at the congress at Norwich, on being asked whether there was likely to be a return to the old system, said, "You may as well thing of reversing the current of Niagara."

C. W. Ryalls said that he thought there were some objections to the statement of the plaintiff's case being contained on the citation, whether the citation took the form of a writ of summons or any other form. Many actions were commenced which never advanced further than the citation or writ. If the cause of action were set out in the citation, then the costs of the citation must be very considerably increased, because the statement must, in many cases, be somewhat lengthy, if it were full and sufficient. Such a statement would be unnecessary where there was no intention of contesting the plaintiff's demand, and the cost and trouble of making it ought to be saved. The citation and the pleading ought to be kept distinct, and nothing could be gained by uniting them. There was much difference between filing affidavits and being compelled to take copies of them when filed. If affidavits were used they should be filed; and all proceedings in a cause which was decided should be filed, though there was not the same necessity as to those which were never adjudicated upon. Some effectual provision should be made against speculative interrogatories. It was right that parties should have the power of delivering interrogatories without obtaining the leave of the court to do so; but it must be remembered that speculative actions have been used by reckless people as a means of extortion and vexation, and it will become intolerable if reckless suitors are allowed to cause the additional expense of lengthy interrogatories. The most important question for consideration with reference to the rules to be drawn under the Act arose with reference to those provisions of the Act which were similar to other previous provisions in former Acts of Parliament, and which were as yet unrepealed, except so far as they might be inferentially repealed by the Judicature Act; take, for instance, the Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, and rule 7 in schedule to Judicature Act. An Act should be passed repealing all former procedure Acts, and a complete code of procedure should be found in the Judicature Act and in the rules to be passed in pursuance of it, so that there may be no possibility of suitors being compelled to ascertain by legal proceedings which Act of Parliament is repealed, and which is not. As to the arrangement of circuits under sect. 68, it might be well to hold the circuits immediately before instead of immediately after the sittings of the full court in London, when all points reserved could be determined at once, and without the lapse of a long vacation between trial and motion, on leave reserved or for a new trial. If the present long vacation should be continued, a court should sit for this purpose immediately after the end of the circuits. Where leave was given to move by the judge at the trial, there should be no necessity of a rule nisi; but notice of the motion should be given, and the point reserved should be at once argued and determined. Sects. 58 and 59 provided for referees and the effect of their findings; it might be difficult to say how far the rules could affect the findings of referees, but it was highly desirable that the court should have power to review their findings on questions of fact, a duty of which the courts had got rid as regards the present system of compulsory references, by deciding that the finding of the master on a compulsory reference stood upon the same footing as the finding of an arbitrator chosen by the parties, and was final, both as to law and facts, the courts should have power to review the findings of referees, both as to law and fact. There was great dissatisfaction all through the Profession with regard to the present system of references to masters. In the appointment of local registrars, care should be taken that attorneys practising in the locality should not be appointed, and every possible facility should be given for appeals from them, if they were entrusted with any judicial duties. As to appeals, the appeal court should be as open to a litigant as a court of first instance. Security for costs should cease to be a condition precedent to the right of appeal; but power should be reserved to the court or a judge to stay an appeal until security be given, in the case of appeals which were clearly groundless and vexatious; such a power, however, should not be given to the local inferior judges, whose decisions were appealed against, many of whom, judging from the experience of some County Court judges, would uphold their judgments by all possible means. It might, however, be well to provide for some certificate from the inferior judge being produced before the court on an application to stay an appeal till security for costs were given. The appeal from local tribunals, and in all other cases, should be made speedy and easy, and should not, as now, be only the luxury of the rich. Appeal by special case should also be put an end to, except where it is adopted by mutual consent. He agreed generally in the views expressed by Mr. Dowdeswell in his able and suggestive paper, and particularly in the opinion that, as the course of legal proceedings were made easy and inexpensive, the recourse to them would be the greater.

The Chairman said the question of giving the court power to review the findings of a legal arbitrator on the merits, required great consideration, as it would open the door afresh to all the litigation which his award had closed. In the case of a verdict by a jury, it was necessary the court should have this power on account of the mistakes which they often fell into through want of experience and ignorance of the law; but this did not apply to a legal referee; and it might be better to hold his verdict final, on the principle, "Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium," subject to any points of law which might be stated in a special case. Also, the majority of cases decided by arbitrators would be cases of account, which the court cannot deal with without enormous waste of time. Mr. Webster had objected to the double proceeding of a writ and declaration or bill, and proposed to dispense with the writ; but he thought Mr. Webster had overlooked the fact that, out of ten writs issued not above three or four ever came to a declaration, being settled before declaration. So that if a declaration or bill were obliged to be served instead of a writ, the expense of drawing a declaration by a pleader or counsel would be unnecessarily incurred in a great majority of cases. He could not see any reason why proceedings should be both filed and delivered; for out of a hundred actions, there was not the slightest necessity generally that one of them should remain on record. Full ninety-nine out of a hundred of those preserved in the Record Office were nothing better than waste parchment. Affidavits were filed for the reason of securing evidence in cases of perjury. If these were kept by the parties themselves there would be no available evidence to procure a conviction for this crime. In regard to the system of pleading, the result of the new Act, he thought, would be to give more employment to special pleaders and junior counsel than at present. When in a trial for any liquidated demand a defendant did not appear, he thought judgment should go by default without putting the plaintiff to proof. He had seen, in such a case, a learned judge acting as counsel for the defendant, and exhibiting a mischievous ingenuity in picking holes in the evidence. In such a case, why should not the plaintiff be entitled, without further ceremony, to a verdict for the claim, provided it were a liquidated one? He would suggest that it might be a desirable thing for the gentlemen who were engaged on the work under consideration, to circulate amongst the members of the Profession a few queries on any questions of doubt. By that means they might obtain some valuable suggestions.

Mr. H. N. Mozley thought that in the class of cases in which the defendant could plead or demur, it was a question whether the Chancery practice should not prevail.

Mr. Rose was of opinion that, as regarded the public in general, the present was a most disastrous Act. The practice of the Common Law and Chancery had hitherto been so certain that a most ordinary practitioner was able to conduct his case from the beginning. But the Act of Parliament reduces the two branches of law to chaos. There were certain grievances which might have been stated and the remedies for them given on one sheet of paper. His own impression of the Act was, that the best thing to be done would be to repeal it. It was, he thought, impossible to make rules for the Act to work satisfactorily.

Mr. Dowdeswell said, that in regard to entering an appearance in a case where the defendant did not choose to appear, it was unnecessary to go to the judges for that purpose and then to file a declaration: although the mere fee was small, there were incidental expenses connected with it which materially altered the amount. He did not suggest that entering appearances generally should be abolished. The advantage of entering appearances is, that it gives the name of the attorney or place where the proceedings may be served. Filing the proceedings, in his own view, as derived from experience at common law, was that it was cumbrous and unproductive of good. Reference to those records might in after times settle some vexed questions; but the benefit was not commensurate with the burden. He did not see why we should tax living persons for some possible benefit to posterity. He was induced to make the last observation as to ejectment, because, under the present statute, judgment might be signed on non-appearance, or a person might defend for the whole or only a part of the property claimed. Though power was given in the new Act to sign judgment for liquidated demands if the defendant did not appear, this was not extended to ejectment. If the defendant, too, upon being called at the trial did not appear, the plaintiff, without proof, was entitled to judgment. There were no pleadings, only the writ and defence for all or part. The action under the Judicature Act was an entirely novel thing, and no provisions corresponding with them were contained in it. They had been found extremely convenient, and he hardly thought those who framed the Act had the action for ejectment in view when they drew up the 73rd section, which he feared would hardly meet the case.

LORD MAYOR'S COURT.

Married Women's Property Act, s. 7.

THIS was an attachment cause, which raised an important question under The Married Women's Property Act. It was tried before the recorder on the 19th Dec. last, when a verdict for the plaintiff was returned. A rule was subsequently obtained for a new trial, which was now argued. It appeared that the money in question (£137) was bequeathed to Mrs. Oakes, the wife of the defendant, subject to the life interest of a Miss Milner. The will was proved in 1865, and an order for the administration of the estate was made in 1866. The defendant married in 1871, and the life interest expired in 1873. Shortly afterwards a petition was presented to the Court of Chancery by defendant and his wife, and the money was paid to the garnishee under a power of attorney given by the defendant alone, and this money the plaintiff, a creditor of the defendant, sought to attach in the hands of the garnishee.

Kemp appeared for the plaintiff.

M'Call for the garnishee.

The DEPUTY-RECORDER made the rule absolute, holding that the case came within sect. 7 of the Married Women's Property Act, which enacts that where any woman married after 9th Aug. 1870, shall during her marriage become entitled to any sum of money not exceeding £200 under any deed or will, such property shall belong to the woman for her separate use. "Become entitled" meant become entitled in possession, therefore this money, being the separate property of the wife, under this section was not attachable for the debt of the husband. Rule absolute for a new trial.
