The Progress of the Preliminary Conversations for a Japanese-Dutch Anti-Comintern Pact.

With an aim to conduce to the improvement of the friendly correlations between Japan and the Dutch East Indies, conversations were made in preparation for an anti-Comintern pact between Yamaguchi, Charge d'Affairs of the Japanese Legation at Hague, and the Dutch Foreign Minister. The outline of the progress of the conversations is reported as follows:

The Netherlands possess a vast territory near East Asia. Moreover, the population of the Dutch East Indies includes many Chinese. Such being the reason, the public opinions of the Netherlands and the Dutch East Indies have always been much sensitive to the situation of affairs in China, especially to Japan's attitudes towards China. Meanwhile, Japan has been obliged to pay much attention to the trend of the Dutch public opinions.

Charge d'Affairs Yamaguchi, in these connections, gave a full illustration of the present situation of the Sino-Japanese relations on October 12, and expressed Japan's hope that the Dutch Government should be very cautious in leading the public opinions rightly. The Dutch Foreign Minister expressed his appreciation of the Japanese request, and said that the Netherlands would make every possible effort to meet it.

Yamaguchi then turning to the question of the defence against the Comintern activities, pointed out that Japan's present demand towards China was nothing more than a natural result of the Communist menace suffered thoroughly by the Japanese Government, adding that he expected the Dutch Foreign Minister would fully understand it. The Dutch Foreign Minister answered that the existence of strong anti-Bolshevist feelings in the Netherlands was only a matter of common knowledge, which needed no explanation, and revealed that the Dutch Government was still trying hard to suppress the Communist movement, though it was not, at present, so furious as it had been before.

Yamaguchi then mentioned his view that it was considered the wisest way for those nations having common interests in the defence against the Communist assault to act in unanimous co-operation; whereupon the Dutch Foreign Minister inquired of him to what extent the co-operation could be expected to be possible. Yamaguchi, in reply, pointed out the danger that such co-operation might naturally lead up to the support of a political system just opposite to the Communistic, or might interest the participant nations in a political block, and revealed his view that the scope of the co-operation should properly be limited within the counter-propaganda against the Communist campaign and the exchange of informations concerning Communist activities.

The Dutch Foreign Minister seemed to take an active interest in the proposal, saying that it would be favourable if the Netherlands could exchange informations with Japan in connection with the Red movement in the Dutch East Indies at least.

(Yamaguchi 1)

On October 24, twelve days after the previous meeting, Yamaguchi visited the Dutch Foreign Minister to talk over the matter again. The Dutch Foreign Minister apparently had an intention to limit the scope of co-operation solely within the Dutch East Indian affairs. Yamaguchi took the position that the home country of the Netherlands also should be included, and in reply to the Dutch Foreign Minister's inquiry about the ground of his claim, pointed out that there was a powerful propagandic machinery of the Comintern in Amsterdam, which had an important effect on the drift of argument concerning Japan appearing on the Dutch papers, requesting him to think over the matter again.

On the following day, October 25, _____, the Chief of the Bureau of the East Asiatic Affairs of the Dutch East Indian Government who was just in Hague on furlough, visited Yamaguchi. He revealed to the Japanese Charge d'Affairs the policy of the Dutch East Indian Government to oppress not only the Communist activities but also any other kind of political movement which was considered harmful to the public order in the Dutch colonies and her diplomatic relations with other nations, and suggested to expand the scope of the co-operation so as to include the prohibition of all other kinds of harmful political movement. But, after all, he lodged no objection to the necessity of the exchange of information and opinions regarding the suppression of the Bolshevik movement.

After the proclamation of the Japanese-German Anti-Comintern Pact, however, the Netherlands appeared too much prudent to conclude the pact in question. It was likely that the rumour then abroad of a Japanese-German military alliance against the Soviet Union was partly the reason of her hesitation.

The Chief of the Bureau of the Political Affairs of the Dutch Foreign Office, then, declared to Yamaguchi that the Netherlands had no intention to conclude an anti-Comintern pact, which is prone to develop into some form of political coalition. Yet he expressed, at the same time, the desire on the part of the Netherlands to open the exchange of information as regards individual cases, both in Asia and in Europe, on the principle of reciprocity, between the competent offices of Japan and the Netherlands respectively, through free contact with each other, with the approval of the Dutch East Indian Government. He further emphasized the point that the scope of the co-operation should cover the suppression of those elements who act in defiance of the constitution.

The Japanese Government, with full appreciation of the Netherlands' standpoint, is now watching developments calmly.
